Nevertheless he suggested, and in fact quite frankly stated, that it is not within the competence of this House, as a political and partisan body, to judge of that report and to render a verdict upon it. No man in this House or in this country is more fully informed than the Prime Minister of the great agitations which were carried on from decade to decade in order to achieve responsible self-government in the provinces of Canada; no man is better informed than he of the principles which underlie responsible self-government in this country. And we are sitting in judgment to-day because there is no other court in this country, and no other court can be constituted without an almost complete abrogation of the constitution, which can be empowered to take the place of this House in judging of that report and finding a verdict upon it. In September last the Prime Minister appealed to whom? To the general electorate of this country for their support by returning to this House of Commons, if it was possible to be obtained, a majority supporting him and the party which he has led for so many years, and with which he has been identified for almost the whole of his later life—the party of which, I might say he has been a distinguished member, and in which he has rendered to this country many eminent services. The parliament assembled here to-day is the result of the recent verdict of the people, and the government, the members who form the administration, are responsible to this parliament and must justify their acts before it. Parliament is vested with the right of legislation, of enactment by statute, for the government of the country. Parliament enacts the law under which the administration is carried on, but the Prime Minister and his colleagues are responsible to this House, and to this House alone, when it is in session, for the efficient and faithful administration of those laws. In the earlier weeks of the session I sat in this House and heard such discussions as would lead members to believe that the making of our laws is of paramount importance, of more importance than their administration; but I submit that the administration of the laws after parliament has enacted them is a duty and responsibility of this government, and that those laws will be utterly ineffective and inoperative unless that administration is duly and faithfully performed.

Now, this theory and practice of the constitution is endorsed, in part, by the right hon. Prime Minister in his recent address. He says:

> According to our theory of government, the Minister of Customs is responsible for the administration of the affairs of that department.

But the Prime Minister failed to state that he himself and his colleagues in the ministry are responsible to this House and to this country for the efficient administration of each and every department of government. That responsibility and that duty cannot be denied by the Prime Minister and those associated with him. Now, did the Prime Minister have knowledge of the conditions existing in this country, conditions which were known generally throughout the length and breadth of Canada? Not knowledge, I suggest, of every specific detail, but did he have knowledge of existing conditions sufficient to put him and his colleagues upon inquiry and upon investigation? If he had such general knowledge and notice, I say he is responsible to this House for not ordering such an effective inquiry as would have brought the details more directly to his notice. The Prime Minister admits that after the negotiation of the agreement between this government and the government of the United States in 1923—> —the attention of the government was drawn for the first time to the growth of the smuggling evil as it affected commercial interests in this country.

That was in 1923, nearly three years ago. Yet I say to-night—and I do not think my statement can be denied—the Prime Minister cannot point to one single fact in evidence in this case which discloses that the government took effective measures to render administration of the customs more effective. A delegation representing a number of the large manufacturing and commercial interests of the country informed the Prime Minister and his colleagues of the existence of these great evils in the Customs administration.

Mr. MANION: What date was that?

Mr. CAHAN: After 1923, the minister says. What attitude did the government take? Let me read the Prime Minister's own statement of the government's attitude. Referring to this delegation that came to meet the members of the government, he says:

> Did the government say: No, we have our own preventive service, our own Customs department, our own officers. We ourselves will look after the suppression of smuggling and the protection of the revenue laws.

I submit that is what this government are elected to do, that is what they must do to carry out their oath of office, in order faithfully to perform the responsibilities and duties which rest upon them. That is what they must do if they are to maintain a good account with the parliament and with the House of Commons of this country. And what does the Prime Minister say? The Prime Minister says the government did not take that position, and I say that in not taking that position the government were recreant in their solemn trust and duty.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think my hon. friend is drawing an entirely wrong inference from those words.

Mr. CAHAN: I do not want to do an injustice to my hon. friend, but I am going to elaborate my argument and I think he will see that I am not straining his words unduly. If I do so I regret it very much, but I am going on. The government entirely abnegated their responsibilities and duties; the government under the direction of the Prime Minister took the indefensible position of placing upon those very men who formed the delegation the duty and responsibility of what? First of making suggestions which would most effectively deal with the situation. The delegation asked among other things for more effective legislation and the government, feeling no particularly urgent responsibility, asked the delegation to draw up the measures which in their judgment it was essential to have enacted. And then further he says:

> The government met that request by asking the Commercial Protective Association to draft such legislation as its officers thought would be most effective.

Then the Prime Minister says to this House:

> Now I ask, could the government possibly have taken a more effective way of dealing with the problem than by requesting those most concerned to draw up the legislation themselves?

Mr. RYCKMAN: Let George do it.

Mr. CAHAN: Yes, let George do it. What were the existing conditions at that time? The Prime Minister has quite fully and frankly informed us; he says:

> The country was face to face with a condition in relation to smuggling of such a magniture as few could comprehend.

But the Prime Minister leaves us to understand that he fully comprehended it. He had all the agencies of government at his command and yet failed by one single administrative act, one single effort, to administer the existing laws pending further legislation which would tend to mitigate these evils; he left it to a private association of business men to draw up and submit the additional legislation. More than that, he left it to this private association to supplant the Department of Customs in the administration of the law at the outports. Was not this a complete or almost complete abnegation by the Prime Minister and the government of the duties and responsibilities of the high offices which they respectively hold?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Does my hon. friend wish the House to infer that in his view the government should have declined to co-operate with the protective association?

Mr. CAHAN: No, certainly not. I am going to deal with that in a moment. But when before in the history of this country did a government abnegate their duties and responsibilities; when did they ever fulfil the high trusts of their office by placing the administration of a department of government in the hands of a private association of business men? Again in the letter of February 4, 1925, which the Prime Minister read, Mr. Sparks informed the government that:

> Smuggling and undervaluation for duty purposes were causing an immense loss of revenue and seriously interfering with the business of legitimate traders and manufacturers.

Yet no active administrative efforts were made to protect the treasury by checking these evils. And the Prime Minister adds:

> Assuredly the protective association brought to the attention of the government the evils of smuggling as they have described them.

But it was not only additional legislation which was urged by this delegation who approached the Prime Minister. The Prime Minister quotes a letter from Mr. Sparks dated February 26, 1924, as follows:

> Might I take the opportunity of stating that after four months of investigation by a staff of trained criminal investigators—

Referring to investigators employed by the merchants and manufacturers association.

> —we are convinced that at least half of the smuggling now going on could be prevented within a month by an energetic policy on behalf of the department.

But in the record of evidence taken by that committee I submit there was not one single effective administrative measure taken by the government in the course of these three years to mitigate these evils and to protect the commerce of this country. Again on April 8, 1925, Mr. Sparks wrote to the Prime Minister as follows:

> Smuggling on this continent has become a huge industry. . . . After months of investigation by trained investigators we have no hesitation in saying that this traffic constitutes a national problem of the very first importance.

Then the Prime Minister himself says:

I regarded this as probably the greatest problem which the country has before it at the present time.

Again let me state that on July 13, 1925, almost a year ago, the president of the Toronto Board of Trade wrote the Prime Minister urging upon him and his government that in the reorganization of the preventive service the dominant note, to quote his words, should be the strict enforcement of the law in the interests of the lawful commerce of the Dominion and an increased national revenue which, in turn would be reflected in an improvement in economic conditions generally. Yet still not a single direct effort was made by the Prime Minister and his colleagues to secure a more effective administration of the law, although at that time they had secured from this House an amendment to the law with more stringent provisions, and a vote of this House supplying all the necessary funds to carry that law into effect. The returns brought down recently in the public accounts show that they so neglected their duty that they did not even make use of the appropriation which this parliament had placed at their disposal for the efficient administration of the law passed in 1925. "But," the Prime Minister says, "We gave the association government detectives; we paid for those detectives and told them to use those detectives and let them report to you"—to Mr. Sparks. Yet in this House, if I understood the Prime Minister correctly—and I am prepared to withdraw the statement if he denies it—he spoke of disloyalty to him and to his government on the part of one of the officials loaned to Mr. Sparks, and who was instructed to report to Mr. Sparks.

Mr. STEVENS: And by the way, who were paid by Mr. Sparks and his association.

Mr. CAHAN: Were they? And so the Prime Minister and his colleagues disregarded their responsiblities as members of the government of Canada, and proved, I repeat, recreant to the trust which was imposed on them, and left the administration of the custom laws of this country in the hands and under the control and direction of a private mercantile association. Then to this body of private gentlemen who, at the government's request, were in fact usurping the functions of the government of the country, the Prime Minister describes his attitude as follows:

What attitude did I take towards him?

[Mr. Cahan.]

He is referring to Mr. Duncan, who was then in the employ and under the direction of this private association of merchants:

What attitude did I take towards him? What attitude did the Minister of Finance take? We said to him: This business which you are on is a serious one for the country. We give you full latitude to do anything and everything you want to do or think ought to be done.

What was that but the re-establishment in this country of an irresponsible body to whom some of the chief functions of administration in this country had been assigned and entrusted by the Prime Minister of the country? And so I say that the government of this country by a responsible cabinet, under a responsible prime minister, ceased to function in Canada, and the system of responsible government, the system of parliamentary institutions, which are the only hope and stay of Canada, were degraded, step by step, until they have reached the contemptible position in which some members of this House would by their speeches place them to-day.

What are we told to-day? We are told that although this ministry is responsible to this House and to this House alone, although there is no other body in this country, judicial or otherwise, to which they can submit themselves and still maintain responsible government in this country—we are told by them, now that parliament has so degenerated, that we are unfit and incapable of judging of the merits of a report submitted after six months of investigation by members of a committee on which the government controlled the majority. We are told that we are unfit to consider and decide upon that report. When, I would like to know, was there ever a precedent in the history of any province of Canada since responsible self-government was granted, when was there ever a precedent in the history of the proceedings of this parliament, when the only prospect held out to the country was, on the one hand, government by a private committee of mercantile men, or on the other, authority being vested in some judicial committee or commission appointed by the government themselves to judge of their own conduct, because parliament is unfit to so judge, as parliament has done ever since we have had responsible government?

The Prime Minister appealed to this country, and a minority of this House were returned pledged to support him. He has appealed to this House now, and this House alone can decide. There is no other tribunal, judicial or otherwise, that has or possibly could have jurisdiction to decide in this matter. Upon this House, and upon this House alone, rests the responsibility, and the sole responsibility, and no matter what may be our individual capacities we are derelict in our duty, we forswear our oaths of office and our pledges to the country, we are recreant to that duty which is placed upon us by our institutions, if we decline to-night so to decide.

Mr. D. M. KENNEDY (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, it is not my intention to take up the time of the House at any great length. I merely wish to state what my position will be when the time comes to vote on the amendment to the amendment, and on the amendment.

I have listened with a great deal of care to most of the debate. My position has changed somewhat since I moved the amendment in the committee. The majority of the committee was unable to agree to it. The Conservative members of that committee moved a certain amendment, and I also moved an amendment representing my views at that time. After listening to the debate I not only think that my position in the committee was justified, but I feel that when the opportunity presents itself I must vote for the amendment that has been moved in this House.

In section 6 of the report, which has been referred to quite often in the debate, I find the following—and to this, of course, every member of the committee agreed:

> The evidence submitted to the committee leads to the general conclusion that for a long time the Department of Customs and Excise had been slowly degenerating in efficiency and that the process was greatly accelerated in the last few years. Apparently the Hon. Jacques Bureau, then Minister of Customs, failed to appreciate and properly discharge the responsibilities of his office and as a result there was a lack of efficient, continuous and vigorous control of subordinates by the headquarters staff at Ottawa.

In addition, Mr. Speaker, I moved that Mr. Farrow, the Deputy Minister of Customs and Excise, should be discharged. The majority of the committee recommended that he should be retired. My reason for objecting to that was simply this: We had recommended that a number of the officials in the Department of Customs should be discharged, and I could not see any difference between the position of some of these officials whose names are mentioned in the report and that of the deputy minister under whom the department had so rapidly degenerated during the last few years. I am very much opposed to the distinction that is drawn between individuals who practically are all guilty of the same kind of conduct and the same inefficiency in performing their duties, simply because one happens to draw $2,000 a year and the other $10,000.

That very position leads me still further. I find that while the position of a minister in the government is somewhat different, I have to vote for as near the same kind of censure of him as I am constrained to vote for with regard to Mr. Farrow. Certainly if the deputy minister was guilty he should be held responsible, in a large measure at least, for the degeneration in efficiency of the department. This is much more true of the ex-Minister of Customs, Hon. Jacques Bureau. I submit, Mr. Speaker, that the government itself has to accept responsibility for the degeneration in efficiency of that department. This, of course, I regard as a very serious matter for the government, and it is the chief reason why I feel that I must vote for the amendment after the subamendment is disposed of. The Department of Customs is practically as important a branch of government as the Canadian National Railways, if you like to call them a branch of the government. The total revenues of the Canadian National Railways amount to a little over two hundred million dollars annually. Under the Customs department, taking the various branches together, we obtained a revenue in 1924 of nearly three hundred million dollars. Does anybody believe that we would be justified in voting confidence in the government if it could be said that under the management placed and left at the head of the railways there had been or was a rapid degeneration in efficiency during the last few years? That is the thing that appeals to me as being so serious in connection with this matter. The whole evidence bears on this question and justifies that conclusion.

We have been told that the government is bad, that it has made some very bad mistakes, and that it is true of previous governments that we have had. That may be. We have not the privilege of dealing with the previous government to-day, but we have the responsibility of dealing with the present government. We have been told what will happen if the hon. members who form the official opposition come into office. Well, I wonder if we are going to be able to keep them out of office. They very nearly succeeded in defeating the government during the last week or two, and I do not want, Mr. Speaker, to establish a precedent here that any government can expect the confidence of this House even if it has allowed the chief revenue collecting department of the government to degenerate rapidly in efficiency. It seems to me—and that is the reason I differ with most of my colleagues here—that the government that allows that to happen must face something more than a severe tongue-lashing in the House of Commons, and the only weapon we still have, and the only weapon that governments fear, is a vote of want of confidence.

I would trust that if the amendment to the amendment does not carry, it can be moved as an addition to the amendment. As it stands at the present time I find that it will be necessary to vote against the amendment to the amendment and support the amendment, not that I disagree with the amendment to the amendment so far as its form is concerned, but because of its position and relation to the amendment. Not that I altogether agree with the terms of the amendment, but I do agree with it in so far as it is a vote against the government, and having regard to the evidence and to what has happened in the department during the last few years, I can conscientiously cast my vote only in that way.

Mr. JEAN-FRANCOIS POULIOT (Temiscouata): My speech, Mr. Speaker, will be very short. I am sorry my hon. friend from West Calgary (Mr. Bennett) is not in his seat, because he would have been very glad to hear the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Kennedy), making the same speech as Collins would have made.

Hon. E. M. MACDONALD (Minister of National Defence): Before the motion is put I rise to speak more of a matter of privilege than otherwise. My hon. friend from Kent, N.B. (Mr. Doucet), in his address the other night, referred to me as being one of those who participated in the stopping of prosecutions for smuggling. I want to mention a circumstance that occurred in June 1925. A portion of the permanent force were in Glace Bay, Cape Breton. They had an officer's mess there. These officers had some liquor. This liquor was seized, I do not know by what authority, whether federal or provincial. Everybody who knows anything about the life of officers, on active service or otherwise, knows that the mess is an institution which has been maintained by them from time immemorial. When the liquor was seized one of the officers happened to be going to Montreal, and came on to Ottawa. He reported the matter to the department and stated—and the officers of the department sustained the point—that under the king's regulations the mess supplies were immune from seizure by civil authority. I simply transmitted to the department the position these gentlemen took in regard to this officers' mess. I never inquired what the decision of the department was, and I never knew what it was. Further than that, I had nothing whatever to do at any time with regard to this question of the smuggling of liquor or smuggling of any kind. I merely wish to say that if the innuendo which was contained in my hon. friend's reference to me was of the same character as was made to some of my colleagues, then there have been a great many innuendoes in this discussion that are without foundation.

Mr. MALCOLM McLEAN (Melfort): I do not intend to take up much time of this honourable House, but I wish to make some remarks before the vote is taken. If I might be permitted to digress a little bit, I would like to tell hon. members a story. I am reminded of two boys who were working in a law office. They met one day and one said to the other, "Johnny what do they pay you at the office?" Johnny said, "Four dollars a week, what do they pay you"? The other boy said, "$1,000 a week". Johnny says, "Aw go on, you're talking." The boy said to him, "No, I am not, they pay me $3 a week in money and $997 in advice." I feel something like that boy. As a new member of this House I am bewildered by the flow of legal lore and the advice that has been given particularly during the past few days, but generally through the session. The legal advice and information that have been given us are enough to bewilder an ordinary, plain person trying to solve problems coming before this House on the basis of experience and common sense and by assiduously studying them. So to-night, as I look over the debate of the past few days and the issue at stake herein, I find that I must endeavour to differentiate between the material that has been displayed and the legal verbiage that has been thrown around it.

Time after time in this House I have heard clever lawyers such as the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan) argue the case as if they were prosecutors in a court-house prosecuting some law breaker. I appreciate much the excellence of the wisdom and learning given to us by the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George and the plane on which he spoke. But habits of the court room are hard to break, and apparently the intention on his part and on that of many hon. members opposite was not to make the matter plain and clear to us, but to ensure that a verdict would be given against the defendant.

When first these charges were made in this House some months ago, I was surprised that the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens) should in his laudable desire to suppress smuggling in this country, go all the way to Montreal, Rock Island, to Beebe and these other places of which many of us had never heard before and tell us about the lamentable conditions existing in the customs administration there. I would have thought that the hon. member for Vancouver Centre, coming from the city of Vancouver, a city which through the press and other methods of spreading information has been notorious for smuggling, booze running and dope peddling for many years back, would have first started to clean up near his home where we are told that charity begins. I would have thought, I say, that there where it was easier for him to get information he would have endeavoured to start the cleaning up process.

I found, however, that there was something else to it than that. I found that in addition to the smuggling of liquor out of Canada and other commercial goods into Canada, there was the smuggling of something worse, something that in my opinion the Canadian people will feel less like forgiving even than the smuggling of liquor out or the smuggling of other commercial goods in. I refer to the smuggling of secret information, secret reports, confidential reports, prepared by trusted employees of this government for the benefit of the public and the administration generally in enforcing the observation of the law and in bringing evildoers to justice. These reports, according to all the information that has been given us in connection with this matter during the past few days, were smuggled from their rightful place in the possession of the government into the hands of the chief political attacker of the government at this time. While I am not excusing the smuggling of liquor or other goods into the country and other goods out of the country, these are material things, the value of which can be reckoned accurately in dollars and cents. But when parts of the civil service of Canada, the secret agents of the government who are paid to get information on which the laws can be upheld, are debauched to the stage where they are willing to allow their information to be smuggled to the hon. member for Vancouver Centre or any other hon. member, that is a sad state of affairs and the people of this country are not going to think lightly of it.

Information given out during the course of this debate has shown that all the disclosures in the Customs Inquiry committee on smuggling in two months and a half, prepared for and paid for by the government and handed to the hon. member for Vancouver Centre, was that based on the famous Duncan report. Is there anything so infamous in the history of the department as that this information which was prepared and paid for by the government should be handed over for political purposes and that the service should be debauched in this way? Yet, hon. gentlemen opposite smirk and smirk as they sit in their places and think lightly of it, while they talk of some youngster who brought in some celery, bread and other things.

I notice another hon. gentleman of the legal profession making notes, and I know he will get after me in good style; but I am satisfied that to-night I have in mind the outlook of the people of Canada rather than the heated and biased outlook that it is almost impossible to keep away from after six months of political warfare in Ottawa, where intrigue runs strong, where lobbying has been developed to the fine art at which it stands, where efforts have been made such as we had an inkling of in the debate—yes, desperate efforts made to swing members this way or that but generally I think to swing them away from the thing their constituents in many cases want.

This attack on the government through the Customs investigation and now through this report is not a new thing at all. All during this session and the session of last year hon. gentlemen opposite have been making these attacks on the government. The government have been accused of almost everything under the sun. If they were not accused of anything that was bad, it was because their opponents apparently overlooked it. At the start of the session they were accused of paralyzing industry, bringing the country to the brink of ruin.

Mr. SPENCE (Parkdale): That is right.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): The hon. member says that is right. Yet he has helped to hold the House here for six months and has not suggested anything to assist in remedying that state of affairs. All through this session attacks have been made on the government. First hon. gentlemen opposite tried economic attacks. This House was well fitted to deal with that, because of the fact that the House had gathered in members from 245 seats throughout the country who knew the exact conditions in their constituencies and were thus able to compare them with those of last year, the year before and six months ago. So the economic attacks on the government failed.

They brought political attacks on the government and again for the same reason members who had gathered from all parts of the Dominion were able to judge of their value and they failed. They accused them of being a government held in office by bribery, barter and many other terms that might not be parliamentary so that I will not repeat them. These political attacks were made on the government time after time and they failed. So they decided on another form of attack and, true to Tory traditions, they decided to bring it on moral and uplift grounds. This is not a new thing at all, but it is something that would almost make the angels weep to hear of a Tory opposition in the city of Ottawa in the year 1926 attacking the government of the day on high moral grounds. This is a form of attack that they have made on different Liberal governments at various times throughout the Dominion and people have reached the stage where they very easily discount such methods. But when they brought this new moral attack on the government they coupled with it an extremely strong barrage of legal argument, and in this I will admit the remainder of the House is at a disadvantage over members of the opposition. They have now spent days and weeks at different times during this session giving us legal arguments. If we could turn these arguments into good cash value we certainly would be enriched. But we cannot do that, because there is no value in them. If you weigh them dispassionately you will agree that there is no market for these legal opinions that we have been getting. This is an old method, Mr. Speaker, to break down co-operation between the various groups that have combined to carry on the government of the country. When they cannot be broken down directly on the economic or political isues involved, it is a first class plan to use moral and "uplift" arguments. If we cast our eyes back a few years to the Motherland where co-operation has been employed between different political parties, we find the same plan tried; we find that an issue such as we are debating to-night has been interjected in order to try and cause disruption. I remember the government of Mr. Asquith, I think it was, being defeated in 1895. A number of groups were working together, and the government was defeated after a very heated debate, on the cordite question. The Tory politicians made the welkin ring with their predictions of the danger to which the empire was exposed because there were not sufficient supplies of cordite on hand. Well, the government were defeated, they went out of office, and their opponents took their place, and within a few weeks it was shown that no addition had been made to the cordite supplies of the country although it was proclaimed by the Tories that there was a calamitous shortage. However, the Tories achieved their purpose. They got into power and the country got ten years of Tory misrule, including the Boer war, as a result of that famous debate on the cordite question.

Throughout this session hon. gentlemen opposite have been taunting the government with being in a minority and of having to make promises that were not in the interests of the country in order to secure support. Moreover the Progressives have been condemned likewise in the worst possible manner for co-operating with the government. Yet to-night we find hon. gentlemen opposite applauding some of the former allies of the government who have announced that they are going to support this amendment. I say this is all part of the game. From the political point of view it may be a very fine game but it will not be endorsed by the people of this country who have to pay the bills and who have sent members down here in order that they should co-operate in the carrying on of the administration of public affairs; it is a mighty poor game from the standpoint of the interests of the country.

Mr. KENNEDY (Winnipeg): What game are you playing?

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): My desire is that we should not waste time but that we should put through legislation that will be of benefit to the people of Canada now and for many years to come. That is the only game I am playing. It is the only game that I have ever played politically, and I have no desire to play any other.

Mr. KENNEDY (Winnipeg): Are you quite sure of that?

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): Yes, quite sure. But let me say this: the courteous thing for any hon. member when asking a question is to rise and not remain in his seat.

We have had some memorable speeches on the legal aspect of this question. I am not going to enumerate them, but I have something to say to the hon. member for Vancouver Centre. That hon. gentleman is not a lawyer but he gave a long address and no doubt, from his own point of view a very effective one. I noticed, though, that he did not touch on the smuggling conditions in his own city which, as I said before, are notorious from one coast to the other. Smuggling conditions there are worse than they are anywhere else on the continent, not excluding even Montreal, and yet nothing was said about them by the hon. member.

The hon. member for West Hamilton (Mr. Bell) in a very learned speech, also strove to impress upon us the viciousness of the administration of the Department of Customs. When the hon. gentleman was speaking, however, my mind went back to a period early in February when he told us about the hundreds of people in his community, in his own fair city, going out on the hillside in the depths of a Canadian winter and gathering grass to carry home as the only fuel they could get to keep them from freezing. That was a terrible state of affairs in a city where such an enormous quantity of beef, as stated by the hon. member for East Algoma (Mr. Nicholson), is consumed. The hon. member for West Hamilton made a speech such as we might expect from a high class criminal lawyer. But some of it, I am afraid, resembled the product of a member of another profession in which I understand he is engaged, namely, that of playwright. In view of these two roles in which the hon. member has distinguished himself, and bearing in mind also the picture he painted of the dismal conditions in Hamilton, we may be pardoned if we do not take his arguments too seriously on the present occasion.

The right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Meighen) has a highly trained legal mind. He applied his well known critical faculty, his great dialectical power, to attacking the government. I have often thought, while admiring the skill displayed by the right hon. gentleman in building up his case, that that case is often laid on poor foundation. He reminds me of a critic who wishes to examine a picture, and who, instead of standing back from the painting and trying to view it in its proper perspective and proportions as the artist intended, goes right up to the picture, pulls out a thread from the canvas with a pair of pincers, examines that thread under a high-powered microscope and tears it completely to pieces. I have no complaint to make of that; it is the usual style of the right hon. gentleman, but it is regrettable that instead of taking a broad view of national conditions he limits himself to a very narrow and very sectional view. Therefore I am sure that his fine legal argument, spun out in great detail as it was, will not affect public sentiment to the extent desired by my right hon. friend.

As regards smuggling and other crimes of a similar nature in this country I desire nothing more than to see the law thoroughly enforced; I desire nothing better than that there should be a thorough investigation into the administration of the Customs department, or any other department that may come under fire, at this or at any other time. It seems to me that it would be far better to have a judicial investigation, such as contemplated by the subamendment of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) into such matters than to throw the issue into a partisan assembly such as this. It is true we have power to try this and other matters except where they have not been handed over to the jurisdiction of the courts. In the last couple of weeks we had a striking reminder of this House, in an electoral case, having divested itself of its power and conferred it upon the properly constituted courts of the country. In the present instance, I think the same procedure should be followed. It is true that the House of Commons has a right to judge the government of the day on its merits. But when men are accused of law-breaking as distinct from unwise or inexpedient administration or leadership, surely the proper way to determine their innocence or guilt is by judicial procedure. Here we have charges made and the accusers are also the grand jury and the petty jury. Such a condition of affairs in any other transaction would be considered most unreasonable, and I know hon. members will agree with me, even though they may be prevented from expressing their views, that this is a most unreasonable course to take.

There is another consideration that I think should be kept in mind when discussing the relative merits of an investigation by a judicial body or by a partisan committee of the House. To-night we are putting ourselves in the position of sitting in judgment while only part of the evidence is in our hands. The city of Montreal, Rock Island, Beebe and a few other isolated points have been investigated fairly thoroughly, but the rest of the Dominion from coast to coast has not yet been investigated. I am not criticizing the committee on this account, but I do say we should not sit in final judgment on this case, even if it be conceded that it is legal for us so to do, until all the evidence is before us. For that reason, if for no other, I think a judicial investigation should be proceeded with.

The fundamental causes of smuggling have been already touched on. Undoubtedly when you make it profitable you will find a certain class of men ready to take the risks incident to smuggling. During the Napoleonic wars and for a few years afterwards smuggling was one of the greatest troubles of the British authorities, and men took desperate chances of fine and imprisonment because of the big profits which attended successful smuggling operations. Not until the duties were reduced, and in many cases abolished, did the illicit traffic die out. Once the incentive to smuggling is removed, smuggling ceases. I have not heard during this investigation of anyone having been found guilty of smuggling farm machinery, coal oil, binder twine or similar commodities into this country of late years, simply because the duty is so low it is not worth the risk. Usually only high-priced commodities of small bulk are handled by smugglers.

To-night, Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask hon. members to keep in mind that the things which loom so large before us at this time and seem so important to us in the heat and mist of partisan debate will in a few years shrink to their right proportions and appear of little account. I am satisfied that then we will have forgotten who Moses Aziz was. His name will not be so much remembered as the name of the man mentioned by the Solicitor General when speaking yesterday. But one thing we will remember, whether the result of this debate was good or evil for the country as a whole. By that time, however it will be too late to change our decision.

During the debate I heard it charged that the Customs department deteriorated very rapidly in the last few years. I hold in my hand volume 52, part I of the public accounts for 1916, and I find that even at that time there was rapid deterioration going on in the Customs service. For instance, instructions were given at some ports, particularly at Morrisburg, to allow certain articles to be entered free of duty, and those articles were brought in in car lots. I am not going to read the evidence, but it is at least interesting as showing that the deterioration of the Customs service has been going on for a long time.

The people of Canada to-night are more interested, Mr. Speaker, in seeing that the Customs department and every other department of government is improved and strengthened, and that the administration is conducted in such a way that it will enure to the prosperity and peace of the country, rather than in the case of Moses Aziz or any other smuggler on whose behalf members of parliament have been asking for clemency. Such requests are being made day after day of the authorities in Ottawa, Toronto and every other capital city in the Dominion, and many of them are granted. The people of Canada are not so much interested in clemency being granted or withheld, neither are they so much interested in the legal arguments advanced to-night; but they are interested in the result of this vote. To-night we are making our choice for the people of Canada, who are not able to come here to make it themselves, as to whether the government that has carried on during the past five years, the government that they know has helped greatly to bring back prosperity to Canada and to restore that condition of political and economic satisfaction that we have had in the past few years, shall be sustained.

Mr. A. U. G. BURY (East Edmonton): Mr. Speaker, I should not intervene at this late hour of the debate, but for the fact that on this question I think members generally on both sides of the House should voice their feelings. It is not a question, in essence, of any party issue. It is a question that transcends all party considerations and has to do, as the right hon. leader of the opposition said in his speech yesterday, with the honour of the country. May I say that in listening to the different speeches that were delivered in defence of the action of the Minister of Customs and in defence of the action, or rather the inaction, of the government, I think no one who afterwards reads the pages of Hansard will fail to come to the conclusion that the defence advanced by the ministers, even those most prominent and most interested, utterly failed to accomplish what it was proposed to accomplish. The pleas which were made were ad misericordiam appeals, based on the inexperience of the Minister of Customs (Mr. Boivin) so far as the charges relate to him, and upon the fact that he had only recently come into his office and was not familiar with the duties and powers belonging to it. Such a plea was put forward on behalf of a gentleman who, as has already been pointed out, had a distinguished legal career and a long practice not merely in civil law, because had that been the case we might have found some reason to explain and extenuate his conduct. But this is the conduct, the course of action of a lawyer not only brilliant and learned in his legal acquirements and in the practice of his profession but a lawyer whose practice has been in criminal law, who has been a prosecutor for the crown. The speech of the hon.

minister himself was a poor attempt to justify and explain his conduct; the speech of the Prime Minister, (Mr. Mackenzie King) his leader, was almost equally poor and weak and irrelevant; the speech of the Solicitor General might be placed in the same category for absolute inefficiency, and finally the speech of the Minister of Railways, who was supposed to take this House by storm and be the saviour of his party and of the country, was perhaps the poorest speech delivered by a member of the government that I have heard in the months I have been in this House.

Not merely was there an utter absence of genuine defence or argument but in point of fact there was gross misrepresentation by nearly all the gentlemen whose names I have mentioned, both of the facts and of the law. That statement is easy to make but perhaps not so easy in the time at my disposal to exemplify, but the misrepresentations in connection with the law were perfectly obvious. The Minister of Customs informed the House yesterday evening that it lay virtually with the Minister of Customs to issue his warrant of commitment before a man, found guilty by a magistrate or by two justices of the peace, should be taken to prison and confined there. That, of course, is utter rubbish. The warrant is not that of the Minister of Customs but one issued by the magistrate or justices who try the man. The Criminal Code of this country which, as the Solicitor General very well knew and as the Minister of Railways should have known, regulates procedure in these matters, directs the justices or the magistrate who tried the case, immediately after the conviction of the offender, to fill in the form of conviction according to the code and to issue a warrant according to the nature of the sentence.

Now let me pass on to some of the charges made in this case. I say—and I think the House will agree with me—that the charges have been absolutely proved. The charges which were laid by the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens) on February 2, have been proved practically to the hilt, as will be seen by the reports and findings of the special committee. Not only that, but we have the admission of one of the members of that committee, the hon. member for Vancouver North (Mr. Donaghy), in his long speech delivered the other day, that if the hon. member for Vancouver Centre had not taken the action he did these facts would never have been elicited, and the condition of the Department of Customs would never have been brought to light. It follows, therefore, that all the attempts—and they have been many and strenuous and eloquent and vociferous—which have been made to throw discredit on the action of the hon. member, and the attempts to discredit the motives and results of his action are absolutely answered not out of the mouths of members on this side of the House but out of the mouth of the member appointed by the government on that committee.

I wish to say also that in his defence of the government the Prime Minister was very eloquent and very diffuse in laying before the House what the government had done, by reason of which they should be exonerated from these charges and sent back to resume their duties with a clean sheet. If you analyze the speech of the Prime Minister, the speech of the Solicitor General, even the speech of the hon. member for Vancouver North, and the speeches of most of the members who spoke on behalf of the government, you will find that the only defence is that the government placed adequate legislation on the statute books. The Prime Minister took us over one statute after another which was placed on the statute books by this government, directed to meet the needs of the Department of Customs. I submit to this House that the trouble is not with the legislation; the trouble is with the administration, and there was a very significant and very eloquent silence on the part of all government supporters who were so strenuous in their defence of the administration on the one vital matter of how the government administered their own statutes. It would be far better for this country if it had about one-half of the present statutes, and they were administered properly. There is no use trying to cure an evil of this kind by putting statutes on the statute book, to be filed away on the shelves of parliament or of our law societies or in legal offices or even on the shelves of ministers of the government. What this country wants is that the legislation that now exists on the statute books of this country shall be carried out fearlessly, without partiality, with a stern and determined hand, that the ill-doer shall be caught and punished to the last letter of the law, and when that is done the stigma that rests upon the fair name of this country —and that it does so rest, is shown by the facts that have been divulged as a result of this inquiry—will be lifted from that name.

Another thing to which I would like to call the attention of the House is this. The pleas that have been made here have been most absurd. The hon. member who preceded me, the hon. member for Melfort (Mr. McLean) urged upon the House that there had been continuous efforts by the opposition to swing votes. That was the weight of one of the first charges he made against us, that we had been busy trying to swing votes. Oh, I should like to have the secret history of the last four months of this parliament! I should like to have told here all that went on behind closed doors in ministers' offices and in private members' offices throughout this building. I should like to know who did the trying to swing votes. I venture to say here and now that from the beginning of this session till this very day the government have been trying to swing votes to keep in office, and its tenure of office has been the most precarious tenure of office that any government has ever had. I am not going to take up the time of the House any longer. I see that the hour is late and I am not desirous of delaying the vote which the House is anxious to take.

The House divided on the amendment to the amendment (Mr. Woodsworth) which was negatived on the following division:

Mr. EDWARDS (South Waterloo): I was paired with the hon. member for North Waterloo (Mr. Euler). Had I voted, I would have voted against the subamendment.

Mr. FONTAINE: I was paired with the hon. member for Ottawa (Mr. Chabot). Had I voted I would have voted for the subamendment.

Mr. CROSS: I was paired with the hon. member for West Calgary (Mr. Bennett). Had I voted, I would have voted for the subamendment.

Mr. W. R. FANSHER (Last Mountain): I beg to move in amendment to the amendment, seconded by the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Coote):

That the words "and that the committee for such purposes be revived" as they appear at the end of the amendment be struck out and the following substituted therefor:—

Your committee deplores the common practice, as revealed by the evidence, of members of parliament and others appealing to the minister to relax the regulations of the department for personal advantage or political expediency.

And also to add thereto the following to paragraph four:

Since the inquiry indicates that the smuggling evils are so extensive and their ramifications so far-reaching that only a portion of the illegal practices have been brought to light, your committee recommends the appointment of a judicial commission with full powers to continue and complete investigating the administration of the Department of Customs and Excise and to prosecute all offenders.

And also to strike out all the words after the word "department" in the third line of paragraph eight.

And also in clause thirteen to add the name of R. R. Farrow, Deputy Minister of Customs and Excise, to the list of those who are recommended that their services be dispensed with,

And that the committee for such purposes be revived.

Mr. SPEAKER: Before putting the amendment to the amendment, I may say that I have some doubts as to its regularity. All the allegations or declarations contained in this subamendment have just been voted upon by the House, and Bourinot at page 318 states:

If the amendment is rejected, it is regular to move another provided, of course, it is different in purport from that already negatived.

Of course if the new amendment had been different in purport it would have been proper to be moved.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The opinion, Mr. Speaker, you have tentatively expressed must arise from a failure to appreciate the amendment and its entire effect. The main clause of the subamendment just defeated was to strike out all of the amendment itself; the subamendment struck out all the words after the word "instructions" and substituted a number of paragraphs instead. The effect of this amendment is not to strike out anything except the very last few words:

And that the committee for such purpose be revived.

Otherwise the first amendment moved by the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens) stands, of course making it very substantially different from the amendment just defeated. The last few words are struck out and then all that is in this amendment is inserted including those last few words, those last few words, therefore, coming in their proper place in the end. The difference in a word is this that the subamendment just defeated eliminated the primary amendment of the hon. member for Vancouver Centre. This amendment takes the amendment of the hon. member for Vancouver Centre and adds to it the amendment of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre.

Mr. CANNON: The leader of the opposition is apparently more familiar with the amendment just proposed than I am. The question has been raised by Your Honour as to whether or not the subamendment is in order. It is a rather difficult question to decide. The members have not had the amendment in their hands; we do not know the exact contents or terms of it, and I think it would be fair to every hon member that we should adjourn so that we may know exactly what the hon. gentleman proposes. Nobody knows except the leader of the opposition.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. CANNON: If my hon. friend will allow me a moment. In conclusion I would move the adjournment of the debate in order that we might know exactly what is before the House.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. gentleman has already spoken. He is speaking for the second time.

Mr. CANNON: If the Speaker will allow me, I spoke on the subamendment which has been defeated, but we have before the House a new amendment and I am speaking on it.

Mr. SPEAKER: I understand the hon. the Solicitor General had spoken on the point of order, had taken his seat, and then rose again to move the adjournment of the debate.

Mr. CANNON: Technically, Your Honour, I did speak twice, but I just got up the second time to add to my remarks that we should adjourn the debate.

Mr. SPEAKER: I shall have to abide by the rules in such a circumstance as this. Otherwise the Speaker might perhaps risk his head. Seriously, if no objection is taken to the motion made by the hon. member, I will put it.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Certainly the hon. membre cannot make a motion to adjourn the debate. He has already spoken.

Mr. CANNON: I had no doubt the right hon. member would make the objection. He is right.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I was going to rise merely for the purpose of pointing out to the House that there is nothing new in the present amendment. The present amendment hon. gentlemen have had in their hands ever since it was moved by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth). The wording is familiar to everybody. Of course the difference is very vital but it is nothing new at all. The difference is very vital as it makes this amendment entirely different from the one we have already dealt with. While it carries into effect the different suggestions made by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre as to further action, at the same time it is a motion censuring the government. The censure stands; the whole of the first amendment stands, and the different matters urged by the hon. gentleman which have already been discussed are merely added to it.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I think if Your Honour will look at it in this way it will not take long to decide it. The subamendment moved by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre was largely in substitution of the amendment moved originally. The subamendment now proposed is in addition, not in substitution.

[Mr. Cannon.]

Mr. SPEAKER: I am not convinced by that argument. I take the amendment which has just been defeated by the House; I read the various allegations of that subamendment and those of the present subamendment, and I find they are identical. The allegations are the same, and I must be governed by common sense and by precedents. Bourinot says:

But an amendment once negatived by the House cannot be proposed a second time.

All the allegations are so much alike that the French translation which I gave I read from the subamendment which has just been defeated.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Mr. Speaker, will you permit me one minute?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Sit down.

Mr. SPEAKER: Even if I should declare the subamendment out of order, any member may rise and move another amendment provided that it is drafted according to the rule. So that nobody is deprived of his right. I say, therefore, that in my humble judgment, the subamendment is out of order because it is an exact repetition of the subamendment moved by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I rise to appeal from your ruling.

Mr. SPEAKER: Mr. Fansher having moved the subamendment which by the Speaker was declared out of order because in his judgment it was a repetition of the subamendment moved by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth), the Right Hon. Mr. Meighen appeals from that decision. Is it the pleasure of the House that the ruling of the Speaker be sustained?

The House divided on the question: Shall the ruling of the Chair be sustained? And the ruling was negatived on the following division:

Mr. EDWARDS (South Waterloo): I was paired with the hon. member for North Waterloo (Mr. Euler). Had I voted I would have voted that the ruling of the Chair be not sustained.

Mr. SPEAKER: I shall now put the amendment which I had overruled. Shall I read it again?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Dispense.

Mr. SPEAKER: The question is on the amendment to the amendment.

Hon. W. R. MOTHERWELL (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, before we have any more amendments, or subamendments, or any more votes recorded I desire to make a few observations. True it is that the sub-amendment of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) has been defeated, but the battle is never won or lost until the last gun is fired. My mind goes back with some vividness to the night of February 2 last when the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens) made his famous charges against the government. Ever since then, however, hon. gentlemen opposite have kept rigidly away from the allegation with respect to the former Minister of Customs and Excise having taken away to his home at Three Rivers nine large boxes of public documents and there destroyed them. At no time throughout the entire investigation has any attempt been made to ascertain whether such an allegation had any semblance of the truth. And yet throughout his speech the hon. member for Vancouver Centre repeated the allegation and asserted that if such a thing were true there was danger of more evidence of a damaging nature being destroyed. The House will recall that the question before us at the time was whether there should be an adjournment. The government was asking for an adjournment of six weeks in order to carry out the reconstruction of the cabinet. The hon. member for Vancouver Centre took the ground that in view of all these documents having been taken away from the files and destroyed, there was a possibility that other documents might be taken away and destroyed in the same ruthless manner if we were given an adjournment. That was the keynote of his statement; I remember it quite well. However, the hon. member for Vancouver Centre did not make his charges applicable to the government on that occasion. He was good enough to absolve the Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) from any complicity in this terrible crime, and he also absolved the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Stewart, Edmonton) and I remember quite well, too, that he was good enough to absolve myself from any complicity. I think I told my good friend on that occasion that I did not want any absolution at his hands.

Mr. STEVENS: That is right.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I think the chief charge contained in the amendment has been that this government has been too slow in instituting reforms in connection with smuggling throughout Canada. Well, Mr. Speaker, if we have been slow in this matter, all other governments have been slower still, because no other government since confederation ever took such prompt action to put down smuggling, and no government ever achieved the success that has attended our efforts.

[Mr. Motherwell.]

Let us see what there is in this charge against the Minister of Customs. A few days after the general election last October we went into council and decided to carry on until parliament met and then ask whether we would be sustained in this House, with the result that on some fourteen or fifteen occasions we have been sustained by our supporters and our allies. Two or three days following the election of October 29, 1925 after we decided to carry on, the Minister of Customs consulted the Minister of Finance with regard to the best steps to take to combat this smuggling difficulty. At that time our desks were covered with accumulations of correspondence and papers which we had not been able to attend to during the campaign, but by November 15, the Minister of Customs had got in touch with Mr. Duncan, an ex-Scotland Yard detective whom the Minister of Finance had loaned him for the purpose of investigating conditions in Montreal and elsewhere. At the time Mr. Duncan had other investigatory work on hand, but by December 1 he was in Montreal prosecuting the inquiry that we felt was necessary before we took further action to combat the smuggling evil. No reasonable man can claim that the Minister of Customs could have acted more expeditiously.

In the meantime the member for Vancouver Centre seemed to know exactly what was taking place in the department. On the very day that Mr. Duncan got into harness at Montreal the member for Vancouver Centre, or some of his friends, sent a despatch to the Montreal Star intimating that he intended to take action in the matter—but he was just two weeks behind the Minister of Customs. It is significant that on February 2 the hon. member made allegations and charges against this government respecting the very conditions that are outlined in the report made by Mr. Duncan on the instructions of the Minister of Customs.

We all know the legal axiom that whoever seeks justice must come before the court with clean hands. Let us inquire how the hon. member for Vancouver Centre stands in that respect. First he puts himself in the dual position of investigator and prosecutor. Then when the committee was being formed he allowed himself to be put in the position of judge and juror. Was there any impropriety there? What is the usual custom when one member makes a charge against another? If he is offered the opportunity of going on the committee, very often he declines for good and substantial reasons obvious to all. But the hon. member has no delicacies of that nature; he wants to be prosecutor; he wants to be judge and jury and now, if we allow him, he would like to be hangman as well. There are no niceties to deter the hon. member from cleaning up this mess and incidentally destroying the government.

There is another triviality; the hon. member gave no notice the night he made his statement. You will remember that the substance of his remarks was on the order paper in the form of a resolution; he took it off in the middle of the night and then, when other assassins were abroad, he launched it in the form of a charge against this government, taking the Minister of Customs entirely unawares and giving him no opportunity for preparation. But I suppose that is only a trivial oversight on the part of my hon. friend; if he were out to kill, why give notice? However, we will pass that up.

Then another thing is the method which he followed in getting his information. Where did it come from? Mr. Duncan in his evidence says it is his opinion that the information came from Mr. Sparks. I did not look it up, but an hon. gentleman informs me that Mr. Sparks swore that the information did not come from him. When the Minister of Customs intimated that he knew where my hon. friend got the information in the Duncan report, my hon. friend denied that. Then the Minister of Customs said:

> Will my hon. friends make the same denial concerning Mr. Sparks?

Then note the hon. member's answer:

> No. Mr. Speaker, so far as the Merchants' Protective Association is concerned it is, as the hon. minister knows, an association of business men which has met the government on several occasions. I have met the Merchants' Protective Association, as I have met Mr. Sparks, both last year and this year. But I want to say to the hon. minister that the information which I used to-day is certainly not exclusively or indeed in large measure that of Mr. Sparks.

He admits inferentially, however, that some of that information came from Mr. Sparks, although he does not say how much. I have not the pleasure of Mr. Sparks' acquaintance; I may meet him some time but just now I must form my opinion from what he has done not only in this regard but in other respects. Mr. Sparks swore that he did not give the information to the hon. member for Vancouver Centre, while the hon. member admits in his speech that he received some of the information from Mr. Sparks. These two gentlemen cannot both be telling the truth, and I leave it to them to settle who is wrong. One thing which we do know, however, is that the hon. member had the substance of the Duncan report before the Minister of Customs ever saw it. That was information dug up at the instance of the minister, and the hon. member used it as a foundation for his charges. He used it to destroy the future political prospects of the minister, and to destroy the government as well. Well, I suppose the question of ethics does not enter very much into warfare, but I think we might examine into what this means. If I know anything at all the information upon which the hon. member based his charges was stolen by somebody from somebody, and the hon. member used stolen goods; that is the way he started to clean up things, but we will see how it finishes.

What was the government going to do with this information when they got it? Judging from the attitude we have taken in the matter of royal commissions, as outlined in the amendment just defeated, we were going to take the course usually followed in matters of this kind. First we were going to have a parliamentary committee to look into these charges, something in the nature of a preliminary hearing before a magistrate. Then, if the allegations were reasonably substantiated, the matter would be submitted to a royal commission which would go into it in a judicial way and get at the real facts. But apparently the hon. member was desirous of precipitating a political issue; hon. members opposite did not want an investigation by a royal commission, because they have voted down a subamendment to that effect.

I remember some experiences I had which the hon. member for Mackenzie (Mr. Campbell) mentioned this afternoon. He took the ground that if this government would only follow the example set by the Scott government of Saskatchewan in 1916, when they cleaned up the rascality found to exist in some departments there, as a supporter of that government he would be delighted to support this government as well. That is exactly the course that we started out to pursue. What was the result of the investigations at Regina? First of all, we had three committees appointed, and these three committees established the fact that great wrongs had been committed, that thefts had been committed by part of the staff. While we were hunting around for the personnel of three royal commissions to continue these investigations, there was a great deal of excitement among the ranks of the opposition, just as there is here to-day. They thought that we were going to leave the matter in the hands of a committee of the House and, as they said, whitewash ourselves. It took us some time to find enough judges available to constitute these three commissions, and what kind of judges did we appoint? Did we appoint judges who would whitewash us? No. Did we appoint judges that we hoped would be friendly to us? No, and I do not think you could find judges of that kind in this country. In order that we might not even be suspected of trying in any way to pack the commissions of investigation, we appointed two men who, when they were in political life, were absolutely opposed to us, while the third had been opposed to us all the time he sat in the Regina House. I quote from the journals of the Saskatchewan legislature:

> Mr. Calder made a statement to the assembly concerning the personnel of the three royal commissions that have been appointed:
> The first for the purpose of inquiry into all contracts and other works under the control of the highways commission, to consist of ex-Chief Justice Wetmore and Messrs. Mason and Smith.
> The second for the purpose of inquiry into the charges of bribery against certain members of the assembly, to consist of Messrs. Justices Brown and Elwood, and
> The third for the purpose of inquiry into the charges concerning the erection of certain public buildings, to consist of Sir Frederick Haultain, Chief Justice of Saskatchewan, and Messrs. Justices Newlands and Lamont.

As everyone knows, Sir Frederick Haultain had been the leader of the Conservative opposition right from the inauguration of the province, and he had attacked the government of that day just as vigorously as my right hon. friend the leader of the opposition (Mr. Meighen) does this government, and that is saying something. That was the man, Mr. Speaker, whom we appointed chairman of this commission to inquire into the deeds of the government and their officials. Did not that show we wished to be fair in the matter? It is as if the right hon. leader of the opposition had been appointed a judge last year, after having fought us here for four years, and then we appointed him a judge and handed over to him the destinies of this government in as far-reaching an investigation as could possibly be held. That is what we did in Regina in the case of these three royal commissions that were appointed, and that is the kind of investigation we want. That is the kind of investigation my hon. friend from Mackenzie said he would support if he had the opportunity of doing so.

I shall not deal with the Aziz case. The Minister of Railways (Mr. Dunning) demonstrated this afternoon, and it has been demonstrated during this debate a dozen times, that not only had the Minister of Customs (Mr. Boivin) the right to exercise discretionary authority in the Aziz case, but such had been the practice of the department, justified by years of practice, and endorsed by the Deputy Minister of Justice as being the proper and the legal course to pursue. The charges now are being levelled to a great extent, not against the Minister of Customs, because we had this afternoon one of the best exonerations of the minister that could possibly have been given even by one of his friends, and we had it from an opponent, the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan). He gave the Minister of Customs and all the ministers from Quebec a clean bill of health and a certificate of good character. Apparently then we come down to the one question of censure of the government. What for? Where are the criminals among the government that it was suggested existed this afternoon? There are only two ministers present just now. Do you see any horns on the Minister of Finance or myself? Which one of us is the criminal? If we wanted to hunt for a criminal, would it be on this side of the House that we would use the X-ray?

Mr. MEIGHEN: You would not need the X-ray there.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I want to point out that we not only started this investigation as soon as the Minister of Customs had taken office, but away back in 1924 we went out of our way to such an extent that the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George said that we have abdicated all the functions of government in working in co-operation with the Commercial Protective Association, which had asked us to endeavour to clean up this smuggling business. We asked them what they wanted, and they said they wanted remedial legislation. We were busy in the midst of a session at the time, if I remember rightly, and we logically and properly answered: You draft the legislation, and if it is reasonable we will put it through. We also increased by a considerable amount the vote for the preventive service, so that the staff might be enlarged. When has there been in the history of Canada since confederation such an attempt to better matters, and yet we are going to be censured for what we did by the men who never did anything but help corrupt the situation and make it worse. If we are going to have a fight, we might as well have it on that as anything else. The one who does most to clean things up is going to be censured. But there is a higher court than this, Mr. Speaker, to appeal to, and that is the country, and we are not afraid to go there.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is the only place you can go.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: They will not be able to get away with their libellous statements concerning the Minister of Customs when we go to the country; they will not be able to get away with traducing remarks about Hon. Jacques Bureau taking his files away. Let us examine that file charge.

Mr. SPENCE (Parkdale): What's the use of bothering? It won't do any good.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Let us examine it, because the ashes of those burned files—they said they were burnt—are rising up in judgment against hon. gentlemen opposite and proving them to be wrong. What about the letter from the liquor commission? That proves it was submitted to the liquor commission. It was said to be burned and destroyed, but I say it is rising up in judgment against hon. gentlemen opposite now. My right hon. friend the leader of the opposition said: Well, if that letter was there, it should not have been there. It was a public document. But he did not tell the House that it was addressed to Three Rivers and never was forwarded to Ottawa. That might very easily happen. For many years when I was in Regina my home was in Abernethy, and sometimes I would have twenty or thirty letters there awaiting my arrival. It was very easy for these letters not to be forwarded to Regina. They might very easily be filed away by someone who did not know their purport, and so with Mr. Bureau. I wonder if the hon. member for Vancouver Centre really believed what he said. He should know that Mr. Bureau, like any other minister, had the right to take away his private files. Was he not a minister himself for three or four weeks in 1921? He must have known that he had the right, and I know he exercised the right of taking away some of these files because there was a file of the Department of Trade and Commerce put on the table during the debate on the contract of Sir William Petersen. The file was supposed to be on the table there. It was noticed by the right hon. leader of the opposition. There was a letter in that file marked "confidential". The Prime Minister indicated that it should not be tabled, and the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens) knew he had a right to that letter and took it off the file before our eyes; so that he knew Mr. Bureau had the right to take away his private files. The keystone of his charges was that boxes of letters were taken to Three Rivers and destroyed. He repeated the charge and opposed an adjournment for fear we would cover up our alleged nefarious conduct by the destruction of more files. Do hon. gentlemen think he can get away with that before a royal commission, or before the electors—making charges that the minister has stolen property and also trying to ruin the reputation of an honourable man, the present Minister of Customs, whose shoestrings he is not fit to unloose? I do not quote poetry often, but here is a passage from Othello which I will read.

> Who steals my purse steals trash.

And if we remain in Ottawa much longer, he who steals my purse will certainly steal trash. It reads:

> The good name, in man and woman, dear my lord,
> Is the immediate jewel of their souls.
> Who steals my purse, steals trash; 'tis something, nothing;
> 'T was mine, 't is his, and has been slave to thousands;
> But he that filches from me my good name,
> Robs me of that which not enriches him,
> And makes me poor indeed.

The only difference is that he attempts to filch the good name of the hon. Minister of Customs, but that does enrich him, which makes the offence a thousand times worse. However, it does not seem to affect him, he is as hard as a nail, with a hide on him like a rhinoceros. I remember the night he made those charges. He did it well. He thought he was going to shake the members on this side of the House out of their chairs that night, and he came pretty nearly doing it, but those of us who know the hon. gentleman, the fearless fighter he has been in former sessions, can see the violent contrast between his conduct in former sessions and during this session. Ever since that night he has taken very little part in proceedings, but no doubt he did his work in the committee. As soon as he got through that night, as soon as he saw the hon. Minister of Customs was ready for him—which was not due to preparedness, because he did not know what was coming; it was rather due to his resourcefulness—he was able to meet him. I was reminded of the retreat from Mons; as soon as the enemy had dug in it was only a matter of time till he would be beaten. I want to draw a parallel in the present case. My hon. friend's march upon the Marne was stopped that night.

I forgot to tell the House the result of the investigation of the Regina commission. Some men were put in gaol and one sent to the penitentiary. Was the government ruined? We went to the country the next year, and in a House of sixty members seven Tories came back. Give us a chance to show the heinousness of the hon. member's charges. Let us have a royal commission, such as we had in Regina. Well, there may be more than seven Tories come back to this House, but they will have a very much smaller number than they have at the present time. If the hon. Minister of Customs and other young men on this side of the House, who are growing into prominence both inside and outside the government, have an opportunity to display their talents for one year, we will see what will happen. This government would be in power for an indefinite length of time and they may be in any event. What does the investigation show? It shows that it is very incomplete. It says that more inquiries will be necessary. Yet think of it, wanting to render a decision, with the evidence only partly in! What would you think, Mr. Speaker, of a judge, hearing evidence on one side only, solemnly rendering a decision. The committee investigating this matter admit that the investigation was only partial and that subsequent investigation will be necessary to get at the real situation. Yet they want to render a verdict based on a partial exposure of the facts. It is just as reasonable as a judge on the bench giving a decision without hearing all the facts. Why does the opposition want that? Because they know that a complete exposure of the facts would put them in the wrong and put us in the right, so that there would be no hope for them at the next election. That is the reason they want a snap verdict.

I wish I could impress my Progressive friends with these facts. There are not many of them in the House at the moment. I know they are really desirous of doing the right thing. I ask them if it is right for members to base actions on party feelings. We are "ready, aye ready", for further investigation. Why is it not granted? Did we not make the best possible use of every particle of our time since the Minister of Customs came into the government and before that? How are we going to clean up all the mess which was left after the Tory government had been in power for ten years? This customs matter is part of it. The charges against my colleague completely broke down. The Minister of Railways (Mr. Dunning) demonstrated that this afternoon. What is the charge? It is that this government is subject to censure, although any one member of this government has done more to improve matters than all the whole caboodle opposite. But I do not mind what the Tories do, I expect it. It is part of the game. What would they do if they followed their feelings? If one-tenth of those members who wanted to break away from the party on the motion for censure against the Minister of Customs acted as they really felt, we would not have been two behind but about twenty ahead. I know how many men would have censured the Minister of Customs if he had been outside of politics and if they really desired to express their honest opinion. How many of them will get up alongside of him and size up to him in character and ability? I do not think there would be very many applicants. Lots of hon. members on the other side have character and ability, but there among them is no man of greater ability and promise than the Minister of Customs. They just want to get over here. It is a long time since the 29th October last to wait to get over here. They were just within the promised land as they thought, but they were denied entrance. They think they are just about in now, but they are not here yet.

This question involves many things. If the government and their allies are defeated, it means that we shall get a dissolution or somebody on the other side will be called upon. There is no doubt who will be called upon; it will be the leader of the opposition (Mr. Meighen). The Montreal Star and the Gazette sometimes have had another guess, but they have always been guessing wrong, and I do not think their guess has done the leader of the opposition any harm. When these party papers begin sniping their own leaders, they are not up to much. That applies to both sides; we have the same thing to contend with, so that that makes me sympathise with my right hon. friend.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The hon. gentleman particularizes as to ours. Will he be good enough to particularize as to the Liberal papers to which he refers?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: There is only one—the Toronto Globe. Is that the answer my right hon. friend wants?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I think the answer is a little incomplete, but I will accept it.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: That is the only one I am aware of. The Speaker permitted the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre to discuss the alternative to supporting the government, to this government continuing in power with the assistance and co-operation of its allies in order to carry the programme of the session to consummation. Some of it is in the Senate; some of it is still in this House. What is going to become of the Hudson Bay railway if my right hon. friend has charge of affairs? We have been working on that project in the west for forty years. Is the fact that this government has exercised itself in endeavouring to suppress smuggling more rapidly than any other government in the history of Canada, justification for jeopardizing the building of the Hudson Bay railway? The rank and file of the Tory party in eastern Canada, when the Hudson Bay railway question was before the House opposed it, not openly, not by getting up and moving against it, but speaking against it, deriding it and sneering at it. The Journal of this city spoke about the Hudson bay area as the country of icebergs, seals, walruses and so on.

The leader of the opposition when he was in the west pledged himself to the building of the Hudson Bay railway providing it would not cost more than $3,000,000. That pledge would be carried out if he gets into power to-morrow and the Hudson Bay railway would stop somewhere in the vicinity of where he stopped it before, namely at Kettle rapids, the second crossing of the Nelson river. I wonder how supporters of the Hudson Bay railway are going to justify before their electors defeating this government for having done more to suppress the smuggling evil and by their action jeopardizing the Hudson Bay railway. The leader of the opposition is going to have some trouble in defending that in Portage la Prairie if I know anything. I look forward with some interest to the contest in Portage la Prairie; I hope it will not be a three-cornered one. How much further will his supporters allow him to go than to spend the $3,000,000? Not one foot farther.

What about the grain bill that is hanging up in the Senate waiting for somebody to come that they do not want to come? Nobody on either side wants Mr. Boyd to come to Ottawa; they do not need him; but they are waiting for him to come. What will happen to that bill, commonly called the Campbell bill? When that bill was in the agricultural committee, every Liberal, every Progressive, every anti-Tory in the committee voted for it. It really should be called the Turgeon bill that should have been put through last year instead of now. Twelve Conservatives voted against it in the agricultural committee. It is now in the Senate; how much mercy is it going to receive from the party that is always behind the big interests—the Tory party? We shall see what the farmers have to say about that when they ask: Why did you jeopardize these things? What are you getting in lieu of this? Were the government and their allies not doing well enough for all parts of Canada, but particularly for the west and the Maritimes?

One of the things we have done for the Maritimes is to clean up tuberculosis in the cattle. There is only one province in the Dominion that is free from tuberculosis as regards its cattle and that is Prince Edward Island. There is a standing offer to the Premier of Nova Scotia to do the same thing for that province just as soon as they are ready. That has not been done in any other province. We have in the estimates a provision, an old part of the Agricultural Act vote devoted to paying the balance of the instalments on two buildings in the Maritime provinces, one at Truro and one at Fredericton. That is something that has not been done for any other province.

What about the tariff, which means a great deal to us, if my right hon. friend comes over here? The tariff is of practically no use to western Canada. We recognize that we have to have a tariff; we are willing to have a reasonable tariff on what we have to buy; but we feel that the Maritimes and the prairie west that are really injured by a protective tariff should be dealt with fairly in order to compensate them for their loss under that tariff. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) has to have revenue to carry on the government and this is one way in which something like $130,000,000 or $140,000,000 is secured. But it must be an equalized tariff, one that will bear as equally as possible on all classes of the people; and those who are not helped by it should have some compensation in lieu thereof. That has been our tariff policy. What has been the policy of hon. gentlemen opposite? Protection for the central provinces that have benefited most and let the rest of the country go hang. If the members from the Maritimes and the prairie provinces deliberately put their neck into this noose again they will do it with their eyes wide open. I wonder if my good friend the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Mullins) intends to run again. If he does not it is not because he is afraid to run; he is not afraid of anything. How is he going to explain his attitude toward these questions? That is what is interesting me?

We are going to have a very interesting election whether we are on the inside or the outside track. It is not always the horse on the inside track that wins the race; its the best horse that wins as a rule. The government has dealt with the tariff in a manner most satisfactory to the country as a whole. There never has been such a satisfactory adjustment of the tariff since 1897 as there was this session. There has been an adjustment downwards of the income tax, restoration of the penny postage to the figure it was in 1897, a thing that was hailed with delight all over Canada. Are we to be punished for these things? Is there to be restoration of a high protective tariff with all that it means? I am not saying these things because of unkindness to hon. gentlemen opposite, but I am not going to shake hands with them until I have to.

What about the question of old age pensions? Some people in this country are so well situated now by way of pension that they are oblivious to the interests of others who are getting old. How much legislation is the country going to get from my hon. friends in that respect? Will they revive the bill which passed this House? Well, we will see.

We have had a debate on the Locarno pact with all it implies. At the beginning of the session we were twitted with not having ratified it although there is a lot at stake in that compact and the questions associated with it. I think it is the only question ever debated in this House upon which the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Meighen) did not speak a word. It is not from shyness that he did not speak.

Mr. MANION: There is no such pact.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I do not care what you call it; it is very hard to keep track of all these things. There is the question of accepting the obligation involved under it.

Mr. MANION: Not until Germany is admitted to the league.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: What did the right hon. leader of the opposition do when he was asked by the Prime Minister to indicate his position? I have read his speech in Toronto and the loop-the-loop speech he made in Hamilton. We used to think that whatever else might be said of the right hon. gentleman he was never open to the accusation of cowardice. Whether that may be, on that occasion he hoisted both the white flag and the yellow flag; he crawled in under the underpinning of the barn, through a hole in the wall, and pulled the hole with him.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh!

Mr. MOTHERWELL: You cannot laugh that down. Who was the author of the War-Time Elections Act? What about the disfranchising of thousands of men who came to Canada in good faith and after showing themselves to be good citizens expected to get their certificates of naturalization? The right hon. leader of the opposition is credited with having disfranchised many worthy citizens at one stroke of the pen. He is also being blamed to some extent for the partial enfranchisement of women; the enfranchisement of those women he thought would vote right. Never was such a crime committed even in Mexico in connection with the matter of enfranchisement. What about the traffic in soldiers' votes. The allotment of those votes to the proper constituencies where they would get the best results? What a glorious, delightful way of securing control of the government.

An hon. MEMBER: Such a thing was never done.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Those who know most about the matter do not deny it.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I did not think the hon. gentleman expected a denial. I thought he knew he was talking nonsense just to fill in time.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: My right hon. friend takes good care not to make a denial. Hon. gentlemen opposite want to come over here and clean up smuggling more rapidly, a practice that is encouraged by a higher tariff, as stated by the Minister of Railways (Mr. Dunning) this afternoon.

Mr. MULLINS: I should like to ask my hon. friend a question. I happened to be out of the chamber when he made a reference to me a moment ago. Does not the policy of this government with respect to the live stock industry merit severe censure?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. SPEAKER: I think we are getting away from the question. I would ask the Minister of Agriculture to adhere to the subject before the House.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: You have been so indulgent in the past, Mr. Speaker, that I have no hesitation in accepting your hint not to wander too far from the question. May I not answer the question of the hon. member for Marquette?

Mr. SPEAKER: Yes, providing it is to the point.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: My hon. friend suggests that the government has been guilty of neglect with respect to the live stock industry.

Mr. MULLINS: Pure neglect.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: The hon. gentleman was not here last year except as a witness and the evidence he gave before the Petersen committee was favourable to the government with regard to the live stock industry. He was against the chilled meat industry in competition with Argentina. He showed that the only hope of the live stock industry of this country was to get our cattle into the markets of Great Britain on the hoof. We have not failed I might state in our duty to that industry. We were the ones to strike the last blow which opened up the British market, closed for thirty years to our stockers. That trade is developing now by leaps and bounds, but when we strove to get lower ocean rates what help did we get from hon. gentlemen opposite? None at all. I would point out—not to defend the hon. Minister of Customs—that in the Waisberg case the Conservative whip, the member for—what is his constituency again?

An hon. MEMBER: Lunenburg.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: The member for North Simcoe (Mr. Boys). Waisberg, a professional smuggler, a confirmed briber, a corrupter of the morals of that district, got into trouble with the Customs department. And who came to his rescue? The Conservative whip. He importuned the then Minister of Customs, Mr. Bureau, who turned him down. Twice the Conservative whip came down to Ottawa, he tells us in his professional capacity—how he could separate it from his capacity as a member of parliament I do not know—and finally Mr. Bureau remitted the gaol penalty but charged Waisberg double duty. Surely this House cannot hope to get any remedy for the smuggling difficulty in that direction.

The Prime Minister recited what took place between ourselves and the Commercial Protective Association. We even went to the extent of inviting them to draft amendments to strengthen the Customs law. In this work we did not get too much support from hon. members opposite outside the leader of the opposition. We passed the necessary supply to provide a new preventive service, but we had not time during the interim to use it all. The country was in the throes of a general election, and I think under the circumstances we have effected great reforms in the direction desired by the people of this Dominion.

Mr. McQUARRIE: What kind of throes are you in now?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I do not know what the hon. gentleman means. As has been said more than once, the people of Canada are watching the results of the movements in this House, and of every member who is responsible for precipitating another general election they will ask: Why did you do it; what was the question involved? How much more rapidly could any set of men go in the direction of reforming the Customs service than we did? What more honourable man can you find in the public service than the present Minister of Customs? I am ready for the contest at any time, but I do not want the country to be precipitated into another general election without due deliberation, I do not think it is wise to make a leap in the dark. Therefore I would exhort every hon. gentleman who intends to come back here to weigh well the results of his vote to-night.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): In what constituency does the hon. minister propose to run?

An hon. MEMBER: In yours.

Mr. E. J. YOUNG (Weyburn): Mr. Speaker, since the Customs committee has presented its report practically every speaker on the opposite side of the chamber has prefaced his remarks by complimenting the committee on its work. I am sorry that I cannot concur in that opinion. I do not consider the committee is entitled to any thanks from this House or from the country, for the reason that it did not investigate the charges that it was appointed to investigate. Not very many minutes ago the hon. member for East Edmonton (Mr. Bury) stated that the charges made by the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens) were proved right up to the hilt.

An hon. MEMBER: Hear, hear.

Mr. YOUNG (Weyburn): Some hon. member says "Hear, hear." Well, let us examine the hilt, and I think we will probably find that it extends all the way down to the point. What were the charges that the hon. member for Vancouver Centre made? I well remember on February 2 at about midnight, "at the witching hour when hell itself breathes forth contagion to the world"—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. YOUNG (Weyburn): I remember the hon. member got up and hurled his charges across the floor. First he said:

I wish to say right now that already nine filing cabinets filled with records containing damaging evidence have been removed from the custody and the care of that institution known as the government, taken away down to the home of an ex-minister and there destroyed.

Did the committee investigate that charge?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Yes.

Mr. YOUNG (Weyburn): I have never heard of it. Did they find that charge true? It is not so stated in the report. They ignored that charge entirely. Then he said:

In the second place I will not disclose the source of my information because I know, and I will prove it to the House before I am through, that innocent business men would not dare to walk the streets of Montreal if it were known that they disclosed certain information. Yes, and the ministers know this, the government know it.

That, I think, Mr. Speaker, is perhaps the most serious charge of all. It means that in the city of Montreal a gang of thugs would actually put out of the way any reputable business man who dared reveal anything that he knew about their machinations. Was that charge investigated by the committee? I never heard of it. Is there anything about it in the evidence taken? I have not seen it. Is it mentioned in the report? I have not seen it there. They did not investigate that charge.

An hon. MEMBER: Time..

Mr. YOUNG (Weyburn): Oh, there is lots of time. This is his third charge:

We voted $350,000 for special preventive work. What did the government do with it? It was used largely for political henchmen during the election.

That is a very serious charge; it means that the government asked parliament last session for $350,000 to prevent smuggling and used that money as a campaign fund during the last election.

An hon. MEMBER: Where was it used?

Mr. YOUNG (Weyburn): The Minister of Customs told you in his reply; it was left in the treasury of the country. Did the hon. gentleman substantiate that charge?

An hon. MEMBER: Certainly.

Mr. YOUNG (Weyburn): He did not. Did the committee investigate that charge? No, they ignored it as they ignored all the other serious charges. Let us see what the next charge was.

An hon. MEMBER: Time.

Mr. YOUNG (Weyburn): The hon. gentleman is fond of calling time, but when he is speaking he pleads that he is a young member of the House and asks that we reserve our questions and interruptions until he is finished. This is the next charge:

In the presence of a deputy and another witness, this individual, asking to be appointed to certain positions, offered to superior officers a bribe of $100 a week, not a casual little bribe that ended with the first offering, but a steady salary addition of $100 a week. This was before he was chief preventive officer.

[Mr. E. J. Young.]

Now, follow me, all members of the government. This was reported to the minister of the crown, and subsequent to the report of that offer of a bribe, the same minister of the crown promoted him to the position of chief preventive officer of the district of Quebec. Bisaillon offered a bribe for promotion, but "No," this government says, "keep your money to yourself; do not waste your money in that way; we will give you the position without any bribe."

Was that charge investigated?

Mr. STEVENS: Yes, and sworn to in the committee, and demonstrated by both the deputy minister and Mr. Sparks.

Mr. YOUNG (Weyburn): And stated in the report?

Mr. STEVENS: No; it is in the evidence

Mr. YOUNG (Weyburn): Is it in the report?

Mr. STEVENS: My hon. friend would not expect all the evidence to be inserted in the report.

Mr. YOUNG (Weyburn): We expect the report to at least state what charges were proved. Let us see what was the next charge:

I purpose to show that this man Bisaillon, the chief customs preventive officer, raised to that position after the government had knowledge of his rascality and his criminality, received moneys of the crown, some $69,000, discovered in several cases, including $14,000 referred to in this examination which I shall read in a moment; that he received moneys of the crown to the extent of tens of thousands of dollars, deposited them to his own account, and this examination will disclose that he never remitted those moneys to the account of the Receiver General.

That is a very serious charge, and was it investigated?

Mr. STEVENS: Yes, and proved to the hilt.

Mr. YOUNG (Weyburn): If it was proved to the hilt why have they asked the attorney general of Quebec to try and prove it?

Mr. STEVENS: If my hon. friend will allow me I will tell him. The attorney general of Quebec is the only officer who can properly deal with the matter, and it was referred to him by the committee for the necessary action.

Mr. YOUNG (Weyburn): I see. Here is the recommendation of the committee:

The committee recommends that the evidence of J. A. E. Bisaillon given before this committee with reference to his bank account for the amount of $69,000 be transmitted to the attorney-general for Quebec, for the purpose of comparison with the evidence given by him on the same point at preliminary inquiry at Quebec, P.Q., in the case of Rex vs. Symons et al, and for such action by the said attorney-general as the evidence may warrant;

Was that charge proved? Here they ask that the evidence be sent to the attorney general of Quebec for his examination, to see whether it is correct.

Mr. STEVENS: Permit me to interrupt. As a layman I asked that the charge of perjury against Bisaillon be included in this report. The lawyers on the committee, colleagues of my hon. friend as well as of myself, advised me, and the committee so decided, that it was not proper to mention a charge of perjury in a reference of this kind, and this is the action recommended by the lawyers of the committee. I am told it is quite in order.

Mr. YOUNG (Weyburn): I am not a lawyer and do not understand these fine points. I am a plain, blunt man, and I suppose this report is published for the guidance of ordinary mortals. One would gather that the committee are not quite sure of this man's guilt. What is the next charge? I might explain this a little bit first. When the hon. gentleman made his speech he referred to this gang of smugglers and thugs in Montreal, who would go so far as to commit murder. One of their number was a negro named Bud Harris, who was defrauded by his companions of $3,000, his share of the spoils of the smuggling operations. This man threatened to squeal on his comrades because of this fraud, and the hon. gentleman says:

> If you will turn back the files of the Montreal papers you will find where the body of a coloured man was found wired up with wire and weighted with weights in the Back river. I think from the description I give of this case hon. members will recall it. That was the body of Bud Harris, the coloured member of this gang. That was what he got for intimating he would squeal on the smuggling gang in Montreal. Mr. Speaker, do you wonder that I emphasize this: that with the knowledge of these things, with the knowledge of the character of this man Bisaillon, with the knowledge of these activities of Giroux and others, this government preserved them in their office since last February with positive knowledge before them, and with equal knowledge of their rascality, put this man Bisaillon in the premier office of the customs service—

It is a serious thing to charge that the government knew these men to be not only smugglers and gangsters but also murderers, and with that knowledge promoted this man Bisaillon. Was that charge investigated by the committee; was it proven? I do not see it in the report.

Mr. STEVENS: It is a statement of fact.

Mr. YOUNG (Weyburn): Then the hon. gentleman should be able to prove it. These are the charges the committee was appointed to investigate, and they were ignored entirely. Let us consider the next charge, which has to do with the 16,000 gallons of alcohol sold for less than its value:

> That may be an example of the exemplary honesty of these people. It may be that, but it looks to me, knowing a whole lot more about the incident, that it was simply a case of covering their tracks. But what was this alcohol sold for? This sixty-nine per cent overproof alcohol was sold for thirty-six cents a gallon.

And a little later:

> A previous seizure properly treated was sold for $14 a gallon.

The charge was that the government had sold 16,000 gallons of alcohol which had been seized from the barge Tremblay to their friends for 36 cents a gallon when they should have sold it for $14 or $15 a gallon, thereby defrauding this country of hundreds of thousands of dollars. Was this charge investigated?

Mr. STEVENS: Absolutely, and proved to the hilt.

Mr. YOUNG (Weyburn): My hon. friend's leader took up the matter in the House yesterday, I think, and said that this alcohol was offered to the Quebec Liquor Commission, who refused to buy it because it was unfit for human consumption. The Minister of Customs also pointed out that this alcohol was offered to the Quebec Liquor Commission, and that they refused to buy it because it was unfit for human consumption; they said they could only buy at a very low price, and the minister sold it for the best price he could get, 36 cents a gallon, or 4 cents more than it would cost to reproduce it. The leader of the opposition then said that the government should have sold the alcohol to the commission if they got only one cent a gallon for it because, he argued, that when the Quebec Liquor Commission put that liquor out as potable liquor they would pay an excise tax of $10 a gallon on it, and the government would thereby have gained by it, he said, $160,000. When he made that statement I could not help wondering whether he really believed it himself, or whether he was trying to impose upon the credulity of the House.

Mr. STEVENS: It is perfectly correct.

Mr. YOUNG (Weyburn): Let us examine that statement for a minute. The Quebec Liquor Commission each year buy so much alcohol, and no more. I do not know what the amount is, but they buy as much as they can sell. Let us suppose it is 100,000 gallons.

Mr. STEVENS: It has been over 300,000 gallons for the last three years.

Mr. YOUNG (Weyburn) Very well, but 100,000 gallons will do for the sake of illustration. The excise tax on that at $10 a gallon would amount to $1,000,000. Now it does not make one particle of difference to the revenue of this country whether the Quebec Liquor Commission buy that from the Customs department or from some distillery. If they had bought that 16,000 gallons from the Customs department, they would not have bought it from some other quarter, and the tax of $160,000 paid into the treasury would have been the same. Yet the hon. leader of the opposition gets up and says that we lost $160,000 on that transaction.

I do not think the government are altogether blameless for the situation that is here tonight. I think they might have acted a little differently in the matter on the night of the 2nd of February when the hon. member for Vancouver Centre was hurling his charges across the floor. I think the government should have got up then and told him in good plain English what they thought of him, even if they had to transgress the rules of the House. I would have done it. This committee, I say, did not investigate the charges. The charges are there, and they were not investigated. Why was the investigation confined to certain places and certain times? Well, everybody knows that the committee was composed of four Liberals, four Conservatives, and one Progressive. Everybody knows that the Liberals were suspicious of the Conservatives, that the Conservatives were suspicious of the Liberals, and that the Progressives did not trust either of them very much. The general attitude of the committee was that each side was trying to put something over the other. I reasoned when I saw the investigation had been confined to particular places and times desired by the hon. member for Vancouver Centre himself that it would be a very simple matter for the Conservative members of the committee to persist in asking questions and keeping the inquiry centred on any places they liked. The Liberal members of the committee could not object to that, because to do so would put them in the position of appearing to block the inquiry, so they had to allow those who were taking the initiative to centre the investigation pretty much where they liked.

The hon. member for West Hamilton (Mr. Bell), who was a member of the committee, let a little more light on it this afternoon when he said that perhaps the Liberal members of he committee were asleep, implying that the Conservative members of the committee were a little sharper than the Liberals and put something over them. That is the statement of a member of the committee, that the Conservatives acted in such a way as to put something over on the Liberals, and that is the evidence and that is the report on which we are asked to condemn the Minister of Customs, on the evidence of a committee a member of which says: Possibly the other side were asleep and we slipped something over on them. Is that justice?

Next we are told that the case is to be tried before this jury. This House is the court, and the members are the jury. The members of this House have not even read the evidence, which comprises some 3,000 pages, and a good many members have not even read the report. How then are we to judge this case. Can we be impartial judges? The jury itself is not in the court room. They have not read the evidence, they have not studied the report, and they have not been here during this debate. How then are the members of this House in a position to judge whether the Minister of Customs should be condemned?

Mr. MANION: They might have read the evidence.

Mr. YOUNG (Weyburn): They might have, but I say they did not. There are 3,000 pages of it, and members have not studied that carefully enough to render a judgment. Even in a court a judge, after hearing all the evidence and taking notes, always listens very carefully to the summing up of the lawyers.

Now what is the offence of the Minister of Customs? Of what crime has he been guilty? It is this, that he showed a little clemency to a fellow man. Here is a man found guilty of having a little liquor in his possession. He was tried and sentenced to a fine of $150, and to three months imprisonment. He paid his fine, and then the minister, at the request of a friend, delayed the sending of that man to jail.

Mr. KENNEDY (Winnipeg): Why did he do it?

Mr. YOUNG (Weyburn): Why have such things been done right along in hundreds of cases?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): Was not the request for clemency based purely on political grounds, and granted on these grounds?

Mr. YOUNG (Weyburn): Did not the member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) explain to the House the other night that he had that day received a telegram very similar and had acted upon it? I can advance you a dozen reasons why you should do a certain thing, but does it follow that if you do it you have acted because of any particular one of those reasons, or any of them at all?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): Yes.

Mr. YOUNG (Weyburn): Not at all. I am advancing you reasons why you should vote for the Minister of Customs, but are you going to do it?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): I am not complying with your request at all.

Mr. YOUNG (Weyburn): It is a common practice for members of the House to request a minister to exercise clemency, and it is a common practice for the minister to exercise it. I will not ask the hon. gentleman if he has ever asked for it, but I say the time may come when he will do it, and be very glad to do it. We have a system of laws, and we have policemen to enforce the laws, but the policeman does not try an offender. He takes him where he can be tried. We have a court to try offenders, and the offender can hire a lawyer to defend him, and if the case goes against him, and he has enough money, he can hire another lawyer to get him off. Is there any place where that man can find mercy? If there is not, it will be a sorry day for us. There must always be some place where the human element can come in, and where cold justice will not be the only consideration. A long time ago it used to be the practice, when a general came back from the battlefield victorious, to honour him, but if he lost his army he was destroyed. That is considered barbarous to-day, and we do not do it any more. But here is another fight that is conducted along a line 4,000 miles in extent, and the general has 5,000 men under him, and because his forces were worsted at one or two outposts, you ask that the general himself be destroyed. It is the custom, I am told, among ship owners to discharge a captain who has lost his ship, but did you ever hear of them discharging a captain because for a single hour he had to run before the breeze? Never. Hon. gentlemen are great admirers of the tall chimneys and want them in all our cities. Do they not know that the tall chimneys sway in the wind. What would a tall chimney be if it were absolutely rigid and would not sway in the wind? It would snap and be worthless.

Mr. MANION: What would it be worth if it did nothing else but sway?

Mr. YOUNG (Weyburn): The Minister of Customs is not the kind that does nothing else but sway. Take this from Bobby Burns:

> My son, these maxims make a rule
> And lump them aye tigither
> The rigid righteous is a fool
> The rigid wise anither.
> The cleanest corn that e'er was dight
> May have some piles o' caff in
> So ne'er a fellow creature slight
> For random fits o' daffin.

My hon. friend was speaking about Shakespeare a minute ago. Shakespeare wrote The Merchant of Venice.

Mr. MANION: Bobby Burns was a better authority on whiskey.

Mr. YOUNG (Weyburn): He is not the only authority. An inconspicuous college professor found a single grammatical error in The Merchant of Venice and denounced Shakespeare in the market place as no fit man to be writing literature. There is in the Customs department to-day the most capable, energetic and upright minister that has been there for many a long day, and because you find one grammatical error in his conduct you would condemn him. You know there are different kinds of men in the world. There is a big man, big-hearted, big-minded, who grasps big things in a big way, who can safely handle big affairs, and then there is the small strict man who never would go one hair's breadth out of the path of rectitude, and to-day we may choose. Will you have George Boivin, the big man, or the strict man who acts according to his formula? France had a strict man once who would not deviate one iota from the right path. It was the bloodthirsty Robespierre, the man that had no heart, no soul, nothing but the letter of the law and cold steel. That would not be the man to put in charge of any big affair or large department. How will the people of the country look at our action in this matter? We are told that the eyes of all Canada are centered on us. I think the hon. member said the other night that in all future generations they would be looking on us, when the walls of this building were crumbling into ruins and our names would stand out and it would be known how we voted. The picture is a little overdrawn. But how will they look at us?

> O wad some power the giftie gie us,
> To see oursel's as ithers see us!

Well, let us consider how others will see us. Here is a man, Moses Aziz, an ignorant Syrian, raised in a foreign country. Our ethics are not the same as their ethics, perhaps not in the habit of thinking liquor is an evil. He is found with liquor under the flooring of his cellar. He is convicted and sentenced to prison, and because he was not sent there promptly the Minister of Customs is to be condemned.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): How many times has Moses Aziz been fined?

Mr. YOUNG (Weyburn): The records show once. That is one side of the picture, and here is the other side. We have a great building containing 600 rooms with 245 members. Rooms were searched but not for papers, and I know there was great indignation when our papers were ruffled. Papers were not the only things that were found, and we rose in our might, and we denounced the person who dared enter our rooms and demanded his head. A little of the same stuff that Moses Aziz had in his cellar was discovered there. How will our vote look to the people when they read about it? And we are going to condemn the Minister of Customs? We would cut a sorry figure before the country. Let me tell the House a true story. One hon. member in this House voted twice to condemn the Hon. George Boivin. That hon. member was going into a friendly country with a supply of whiskey in his possession, and when the customs officer came and was about to seize it—it was one bottle and not very big at that—the man said to him, "You dare not seize it until we get to the American border." But before they got to the American border he had drunk the whole thing.

Mr. MANION: Nothing against that in the United States law.

Mr. YOUNG (Weyburn): The law says you shall not take whiskey into the United States, and it does not specify whether it is in a bottle or a leather bag.

Mr. MANION: Why did they not seize the passenger?

Mr. YOUNG (Weyburn): The evidence was destroyed.

Mr. MANION: He was the container.

Mr. YOUNG (Weyburn): I ask hon. members, can that man conscientiously condemn the Minister of Customs for leaving Moses Aziz out of gaol for a few days longer if he himself had—what shall I say?—Aziz had whiskey in his cellar, and the other man had it under his belt. What is the difference? Would we not cut a sorry figure here, insisting on our privileges and rights as members of parliament, exercising the rights the law has given us, abusing that power, smuggling liquor from Hull into the building, and because the police dare not come into the building and trouble us we think we are immune—and now we condemn the poor ignorant Syrian who had some in his cellar.

Mr. MANION: You should limit this to your own experience and not bring us all into it.

Mr. YOUNG (Weyburn): They did not find anything in my room. Let us ask ourselves, are we justified in condemning the Minister of Customs for doing what he did, when we know that every day in our lives we do worse? I say candidly that I am going to vote in favour of George Boivin on this subamendment, the amendment, the main motion and on every subsequent amendment there is proposed.

Mr. MANION: We are not surprised at that.

Mr. YOUNG (Weyburn): The Minister of Customs, as I am sure all will admit, is one of the ablest, most promising and highest type of men we have in this House or in this country to-day, and Canada can ill afford to do without his services. If the Hon. Mr. Boivin goes out in disgrace from this House his public career will be ruined. The Liberal party has said: We will go down with him because it is better for this country that the Liberal party should go into the wilderness—

Mr. KENNEDY (Winnipeg): For forty years.

Mr. YOUNG (Weyburn): If my hon. friends opposite have the framing of the election laws and the counting of the votes, it will be for forty years. It is better for us, for Canada, that we go into the wilderness for a season and come back again bringing Boivin with us than that his services should be lost to the country. That is the reason we are going down together—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. YOUNG (Weyburn): —or else we are going to stay where we are. The hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Kennedy) said in his address: The Customs department is more important than the National railways. Mismanagement would not be tolerated on the part of the National railways or any other railway or any bank or any large institution in this country. They do not send men to gaol when they are found committing small offences; their idea is to keep them out of gaol if they can. The crime of the Minister of Customs is that he kept one man out of gaol, when my hon. friends opposite think he should be in gaol. Do they think it improves the position of this country to put a man in gaol?

Mr. MANION: It would stop bootlegging for a while.

Mr. YOUNG (Weyburn): We have tried it in Saskatchewan; we have tried it here and in the east but it has failed.

Mr. MANION: He will be prevented from bootlegging while he is in gaol.

Mr. YOUNG (Weyburn): Would you stop anything from coming into this building if you put us in the tower? When the railways or the banks find anyone guilty of misdemeanours they make them disgorge if they can.

An hon. MEMBER: Quote some more poetry.

Mr. YOUNG (Weyburn): I will:

I know not whether laws be right or whether laws be wrong,
All we know who lie in jail is that the wall is strong,
And that each day is like a year, a year whose days are long.
This too I know that every law that man has made for man
Since first man took his brother's life and the sad world began,
But straws the wheat and saves the chaff, with a most evil fan.

The cause of your trouble is the unjust laws that you have made. Why do men smuggle? Because you have denied man the inborn right to buy his stuff where he can buy it best. I had a friend one time who always said that if he started to break the law he would break it by smuggling because there, he said, "I am not injuring my fellow man and I am simply taking back in an illegal way what nobody had any right to take away from me."

Mr. RYCKMAN: Where is he now?

Mr. YOUNG (Weyburn): He is where my hon. friends opposite will never be. He is standing where they will never stand, standing where a man stands who thinks his own thought and is a free man. You pass a law and you say to the people of this country: You shall not buy goods where you can buy them best; you shall not spend your wages where you can spend them to the best advantage; you must buy from individuals named by us. Those individuals, the favourites of the government come and say to the government: The people are not buying our goods; they are buying goods from the United States; they are smuggling them in. Pass a more drastic law; put them in gaol; put heavier fines on them. These are the things that make men smugglers. Your committee that was appointed to investigate those charges bring in recommendations to stop smuggling and ignores completely the cause of the smuggling.

Mr. KENNEDY (Winnipeg): Does the hon. gentleman know that all this has to be printed?

Mr. YOUNG (Weyburn): The hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre has no kick coming about the number of pages of Hansard used by anyone on this side. A man that will talk for hours about amendments to the Grain Act after the matter has been all threshed out in committee, after the question has been practically settled, and fill I do not know how many pages of Hansard, has no kick coming about speeches by hon. members on this side. I might incidentally remark that he was not very well posted on the question he was discussing. Here is a speech which occupies twenty-six pages, delivered at about this hour in the morning by an hon. gentleman opposite and about one-half the space is filled with charges. Those charges were flung at the government on the eve of the Prince Albert election in the hope that the government would become frightened and resign, or that it would influence the result in that constituency before the charges could be replied to. But the hon. member who made those charges did not know the calibre of the Minister of Customs (Mr. Boivin); he made a complete answer to every one of them.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. YOUNG (Weyburn): Hon. gentlemen may laugh, but in the early part of this session I sat here for a whole month and heard them wasting time. The hon. member for Vancouver Centre opposed the six weeks' adjournment asked for by the government for fear they would take advantage of it to destroy letters of a damaging character, as he said they had done before, a charge which he failed to prove. Therefore he should now apologize to the government for the insinuation.

Hon. J. C. ELLIOTT (Minister of Labour): There is no doubt that the work of the Customs inquiry committee is not completed, and it must be continued by some other body; that seems to be agreed by everybody. Now what is the difference between the members of the committee on this question? First of all the majority agree that certain recommendations should be made to the House. I think it will be agreed there has been a fair and honest endeavour to present to the House a report that would have a beneficial effect upon the customs laws of Canada and that would, to a large extent, meet the requirements of the situation.

Now I am bound to pay a tribute to the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens) for the industry and attention which he has devoted to the work of the Customs committee, and I would pay a similar tribute to all the other members of that committee. A careful perusal of the speech made by the hon. member on February 2 against my hon. friend and colleague the Minister of Customs must lead to the conclusion that he was referring to the hon. minister's predecessor and to others; in fact, it is tantamount to an exoneration of the present minister. I ask what is the outstanding charge that the hon. member now makes against the Hon. George Boivin? I challenge the hon. member to make any serious denial of my statement that there is any other real charge against the hon. minister at the present time except that he failed to have Moses Aziz sent to gaol shortly after conviction.

Mr. STEVENS: My hon. friend has challenged me. If he will be good enough to simply read the amendment which is now before the House he will find that it contains in precise language the charge which is made against the hon. minister. He will find there a complete answer to his question.

Mr. ELLIOTT: That is not what I was asking. I am in the judgment of every hon. member when I say that the only real charge against the Minister of Customs at the present time is that he did not send Moses Aziz to gaol as soon as my hon. friend thinks he should have sent him.

Mr. STEVENS: My hon. friend asks me what the charge is. The charge is set forth in the amendment, and if he desires to be fair he will read it now. I will recite it in my own language if he desires.

Mr. ELLIOTT: No, my hon. friend knows the question perfectly well, and he knows the answer.

Mr. STEVENS: Certainly I do, I have it here.

Mr. ELLIOTT: And the answer is just as I have stated, that the only real, substantial charge against the Hon. George Boivin at the present time is the Aziz charge.

[Mr. Elliott.]

Mr. STEVENS: My hon. friend I know desires to be fair. The answer is simply this, and I will give it in the official language of the amendment that is now before the House:

The evidence further discloses that ministerial action has been influenced by improper—

Mr. ELLIOTT: Mr. Speaker, I asked my hon. friend if he could state any other charge against the Hon. George Boivin. Without reading over two or three pages he ought to know in his own mind and be able to state to this House what that other charge is.

An hon. MEMBER: Take your medicine.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I will let you have yours. He ought to be able to state to this House—

Mr. STEVENS: Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege and to a point of order, both. As to the point of order, the hon. minister challenged me to state what the charges were against the hon. Minister of Customs other than the one regarding Moses Aziz. In response to his challenge I rise to give him precisely what those charges are, and I submit, Mr. Speaker, that in all fairness I am entitled to present those charges to the House.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I submit, Mr. Speaker, that the exhibition my hon. friend is now giving is the best proof to every hon. member that unless he studies pages of charges—

Mr. STEVENS: No, just one paragraph.

Mr. ELLIOTT: —he cannot think of any other substantial charge against the hon. Minister of Customs than the Aziz charge. That leads up to the point I want to make. A perusal of my hon. friend's speech of February 2 fails to disclose the slightest suggestion of the Moses Aziz charge. I again challenge him to point out where in that speech from one end to the other there is one word or syllable referring to the Aziz case. His charges now are those which he discovered by accident; he does not rely upon any of the other charges he made at that time. This charge was discovered through a letter sent by the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Robichaud) to the Hon. Mr. Boivin during the stress of an election. I ask hon. members of this House if that is not a fair statement of the kernel of the present charges.

Mr. STEVENS: Absolutely no.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I say absolutely yes, and the whole tenor of the remarks of the hon. member for Vancouver Centre and the right hon. leader of the opposition has been to show that the minister did not speak of the Moses Aziz case in exactly the same words on two different occasions. He told the story at one time and varied it slightly from the story he told at another time, and that is the offence for which this man is to be put out of the public life of this country.

My hon. friend knows these charges well, and I am sure he will agree with me that the charge he is making against the minister at present is the Aziz charge, and nothing else.

Mr. STEVENS: That is positively wrong.

Mr. ELLIOTT: And how much of the hon. member's time in the discussion of these matters was devoted to the discussion of anything but the Aziz charge?

Mr. STEVENS: If my hon. friend will permit me to say so, I never discussed the Aziz charge at all; he will not find it in my speech.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Part of my hon. friend's argument was that the Aziz charge would be dealt with by the hon. member for West Hamilton (Mr. Bell). I want to ask hon. members of the House what charge has been made against the Minister of Customs other than the Aziz charge?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. ELLIOTT: It is all very well for my hon. friends to laugh; it is fine to laugh when someone else is being charged.

Mr. MANION: What about the Dominion Distilleries charge?

Mr. ELLIOTT: My hon. friend from Fort William is very adroit in drawing a red herring across the trial, but he should know by this time that he cannot do so with me; I am not talking of the Dominion Distilleries. This is a serious discussion; this is an important investigation, and I do not think it comes with good grace from any hon. gentleman sitting in the front benches of the opposition, with the experience of the hon. member for Fort William, to interpolate anything about Dominion Distilleries when we are discussing the Moses Aziz charge. His inquiry is as far away from the discussion as Peru is from Jerusalem.

Mr. MANION: My hon. friend was asking what other charges were against the minister.

Mr. ELLIOTT: My hon. friend knows he is not meeting the question fairly. The point I want to make is this. I stand in the judgment particularly of the independent gentlemen in this House as to whether the charge against the Minister of Customs is not as I have stated. If that is the charge against him is it not a fact that practically everything else has been abandoned, that practically no evidence has been submitted except in connection with a charge which did not form a part of my hon. friend's speech on February 2 at all?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Time.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I hear some of my hon. friends shouting "time". That is the last thing they want; that is the thing Moses Aziz did not want, and he was by no means the only one. Now I ask hon. members seriously if they think it is fairly meeting the charges made by my hon. friend on February 2 for him to now try and say "I have substantiated these charges by finding a peg for some other charge upon which I may hang my hat." Every hon. gentleman in this House probably had to come through an election campaign, and as a matter of fact some of us had to go through two of them.

Mr. MANION: And you were lucky, too.

Mr. ELLIOTT: We were fortunate. You heard the explanation given by the Minister of Customs with regard to what happened at the time. He found that letter on his desk when he came in to look over the correspondence, and to answer what it was possible to answer. Will any hon. gentleman who has been through an election suggest for a moment that a man with an election campaign on his hands will go through a file of 100 or 150 letters and manage to get any idea of their contents? You all know the stress of an election, and you know very well that careful consideration cannot be given to matters of this kind at such a time. I ask gentlemen on the opposite side of the House, is there any hon. gentleman who will seriously say if he had been in the place of the Minister of Customs at that time he would not have done exactly as the Minister of Customs has done? There is not the slightest doubt about it.

I have endeavoured to call to the attention of my hon. friend from Vancouver Centre the fact that if making out the charges contained in his speech on the 2nd of February were essential to his succeeding, then he has utterly failed for the charge against the minister has been a different charge altogether. That is a point that I think has been largely overlooked in the course of this discussion.

There is a great deal of difficulty for a minister in carrying out the duties of a department where there is any ministerial responsibility involved. Every hon. minister who has presided over a department knows that, and I believe that when my hon. friends on the other side of the House consider seriously the situation the minister was in, there is not one of them but who in his heart of hearts will say other than that he in all probability under similar circumstances would have done exactly the same as the minister did.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: Mr. Speaker, as the hour is getting late and this is one of the most important debates of this session, I beg leave to move the adjournment of the debate.

Mr. SPEAKER: Mr. Beaubien moves, seconded by Mr. King (Huron) that the debate be now adjourned. Shall the motion carry?

Mr. BOYS: On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, I would like to make a statement with reference to the vote. We met last night and had a definite and distinct understanding—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. gentleman cannot speak now that the question is put. The hon. gentleman is always very courteous, and he should be treated courteously. If he wishes to rise immediately after the vote is taken, I will give him the floor.

The House divided on the motion (Mr. Beaubien) which was negatived on the following division:

Mr. BOYS: Last night the whips of the three parties in this House decided that we would to-night vote upon this question. It seems to me the arrangement thus made by the whips should be respected by the various parties in this House, and I desire to state that when the motion to adjourn was made it was certainly contrary to the understanding reached by the whips.

Mr. CASGRAIN: I may be permitted to say a few words on the same subject. It is true we met and had a certain agreement that we would try to finish the debate this evening, but at that time there were only two motions before the House, one by the hon. member for Vancouver Centre and the other by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. We voted on one of those motions. As the House is well aware, this motion was defeated and immediately afterwards a new motion was added to the main motion, absolutely and entirely different from the other; it was not expected at all. There was a ruling by Your Honour which was not sustained, so that a new feature was introduced in this debate. We are in the same position as we were last night.

Mr. THEODULE RHEAUME (Jacques Cartier) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, previous to voting on the amendment which is before the House, I deem it my duty to say a few words so as to explain the vote which I shall be called upon to give presently. The amendment before the House is evidently one presented in bad faith. It has been given a virgin robe, but this virgin robe fits it just about like a green suit would fit the member for Frontenac-Addington (Mr. Edwards), on the 12th of July, the national day of Orangemen.

I say, Sir, that this amendment is in bad faith; first, because the censure does not include a member who is quite as guilty—if it is a question of guilt which is being considered by the House—and that gentleman is not included for the simple reason that he is not sitting on the government side. But why do they wish to censure the Minister of Customs (Mr. Boivin)? Because, Sir, he complied with requests which are of daily occurrence. Is not a member often merely an interceder with those in power? We are likened to saints and called upon almost daily to intercede. And, because a member accedes to the request of an unfortunate elector, a mountain is made of it. Looking upon the shocked expressions on the faces of gentlemen opposite when the name of Moses Aziz was mentioned, I asked myself: Is there no mirror on that side of the House!

I see the member for West York (Sir Henry Drayton) smiling; he the Parisian par excellence. What, Sir, they are shocked with the Moses Aziz affair! I say, search among yourselves! How many Moses are there within your ranks? Most astonishing, everyone was shocked, they blushed like scandalized young virgins. No Sir, those who had charge of affairs during the war have no right to be shocked over the Moses Aziz incident! The members who sold those old jades, not to be forgotten, have no right to protest. The member who swapped an old horse for two ducks and then sold it to the government for $150 cannot very well blush when confronted with the Moses Aziz incident! The Tory member who got $175 from the government for an old mare that had gone through the South African campaign and died the day following the sale, has no right to be perturbed over the Moses Aziz incident! No Sir, I say that the members of the opposition are wearing masks for the occasion. You have disguised yourselves under a false cloak. You are recognizable. Drop that cloak, your past demands it: Drop it, the veil is too thin.

Censure the minister of Customs; why? Because he did what all the ministers have done since confederation, and what precedents applicable to similar cases allowed him to do. There is moreover another reason for which I cannot register my vote in favour of this amendment. I have no mandate from the electors of the county of Jacques-Cartier to put into power the right hon. leader of the opposition. In the course of the last electoral campaign he did not think it worth while to come into one single county of the province of Quebec in order to propound his policy. Oh! you may answer, the policy of the opposition found supporters in Quebec. Yes, there came to the historical county of Jacques-Cartier, that I have the honour to represent, a party leader who bid desperately to win over my constituency. This gentleman proclaimed in Jacques-Cartier and throughout the province a doubtful independence which at first dazzled the people, but could not convince them. What a cunning duplicity! The Hon. Mr. Patenaude hastened to repudiate the Right Hon. Mr. Meighen. He was as far remote from Mr. Meighen as he was from Mr. King. Nevertheless, his blows were concentrated on the latter. At about the same time the leader of the opposition boasted at Charlottetown that he would carry 35 seats in Quebec, when not one candidate of the opposition could be nominated without first having received the silvery blessing of the Hon. Mr. Patenaude.

There must have existed a pact, if not, there were hidden and powerful interests which were backing my opponent, helping him to form a group in this House, capable of directing a certain policy which you all know.

Mr. FAFARD (Translation): Will the hon. member allow me a question?

Mr. RHEAUME (Translation): With pleasure.

Mr. FAFARD (Translation): Did the hon. Mr. Patenaude come forward as the Messiah?

Mr. RHEAUME (Translation): As the Saviour also. Only he saved no one, he not even saved himself. However, Sir, what is most astonishing: a few months after the famous defeat of the Saviour, the Messiah, who was to replace the leader of the opposition; after his famous defeat, I say, what a drama did the country witness? At a large popular meeting held at the Forum where by din of trumpets and advertisements posted everywhere, they had succeeded in rounding up a good crowd, we there witnessed the leader of the opposition, who had been publicly repudiated seven or eight months previous by Mr. Patenaude, shower compliments upon compliments on the latter.

Mr. FAFARD (Translation): Mr. Speaker, I do not want to interrupt the hon member, but I wish to draw his attention to the fact that at the last meeting held in Montreal, the hon. leader of the opposition presented flowers to the Hon. Mr. Patenaude, while he made no mention of Mr. Monty.

Mr. RHEAUME (Translation): I congratulate the hon. member for so closely following our meetings at Montreal. That is really what happened to the great scandal of many good Conservatives who had carried on loyally with Mr. Monty the struggle during more than four years in favour of Mr. Meighen. How ungrateful is politics, the roses are often for the eleventh hour toiler! Those who performed the noble task of the sower are not there to reap.

A funny coincidence: a few days after the meeting at the Forum, the Hon. Mr. Patenaude, in a solemn interview given to the press, publicly gave the "Lamourette" kiss to the Hon. Mr. Meighen.

No, Sir, I have no mandate to vote in favour of the amendment, because I am aware that this amendment was moved to obliterate all the benefits of the Liberal administration and in particular the Robb budget, one of the best budgets that has ever been brought down in this House, a budget which, at the time, was applauded even by our opponents. All were unanimous to acknowledge that after the financial crisis the effects of which are still felt, the hon. Minister of Finance had found the means of balancing the country's finances. Deficits have disappeared and have made way to surpluses. Our opponents came to the following conclusion: If we allow the government to take advantage of their good work, we are lost; and it is then, Sir, that they thought out the clever idea of bringing charges and thus blind the people by throwing mud without mercy, without thought whether they attacked irreproachable men, whether they blemished the reputation of honest public men and which often, in the public opinion, it is impossible to rehabilitate even after a whole honourable life.

These are the circumstances which have prompted the opposition to bring its charges. But this is not all. One of the reasons which prevents me from voting for the amendment of the opposition is that the Liberal party had adopted a policy of moderation wishing to give fair play to all parts of the country, an equitable tariff policy which allowed the manufacturers to exist and also protected the consumer from being bled alive by exorbitant prices.

The government were carrying out a policy of autonomy which pleased all who loved freedom, a definite autonomous policy, not one which takes refuge in silence in presence of questions put to them, an open, frank policy capable of being appreciated by all free men in this country. The other day when the question was put by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) to the leader of the opposition as to where he stood on that question, the House witnessed the sad performance of a party leader to whom I recognize great talents, who squats in his seat and declines to enlighten the House on this question of autonomy so dear to all Canadian hearts.

Mr. MERCIER (Laurier-Outremont) (Translation): I should like to put a question to the hon. member for Jacques-Cartier. Would he tell us about the conduct of Mr. Patenaude towards Mr. Meighen at the meeting which took place at the Forum? The hon. member for Jacques-Cartier knows that Mr. Patenaude came forward against him and he is fully aware that Mr. Patenaude repudiated Mr. Meighen—

Mr. RHEAUME (Translation): Mr Speaker, I enjoy questions.

Mr. MERCIER (Laurier-Outremont) (Translation): What do you think of the conduct of the Hon. Mr. Patenaude towards Mr. Meighen after having repudiated him in the last Quebec campaign?

Mr. RHEAUME (Translation): I shall frankly give you my opinion in regard to the conduct of Mr. Patenaude and Mr. Meighen. It is also that, I think of the whole province of Quebec, of the whole country: it is that these two gentlemen were, during the 1925 campaign and since, two mournful humbugs.

For the last fifty or sixty years we have had elections every fourth or fifth year, with the exception of when the Tory party prolonged its own existence.

Mr. DOUCET (Translation): With the Liberal party's consent.

Mr. RHEAUME (Translation): Pardon, if the hon. member for Kent (Mr. Doucet) has a question to ask me, I shall be delighted to answer it.

A MEMBER (Translation): He has not even the politeness to rise.

Mr. DOUCET (Translation): Politeness is not lacking in me.

Mr. RHEAUME (Translation): The discussion has been gracious up to now and I trust I may continue in this manner. I am aware that the hon. member for Kent is to-night or rather this morning as it is five minutes to four, under the influence of a delirious emotion. He had an inextinguishable thirst for power and this morning, the day after the St. John the Baptist holiday, he still has a thirst, one which is not yet quenched. However, we do not know what the future has in stock for us. The hon. member for Kent is in an exceptional situation. Much will be forgiven him, because he has much loved, even scandals.

I note that there are in this House gallant fighters. The hon. member for Laurier and Outremont (Mr. Mercier) whispers in my ear this advice: Let us fight and win out. It is surely what the Liberal party intends to do. There is still life left in the heart beats of the government. It was struck at this evening, one might say in a treacherous way. This attack reminds me somewhat of the way the old city of Champlain was attacked by General Wolfe. I acknowledge the bravery of the English general's troops who have left an everlasting name in history. It was at an hour like this one, an officer appears and attempts to pass by the "Anse-au-Foulon," the sentry cries out: Who goes there? France! answers the officer, thus he prepared the way for the English army to reach the plains of Abraham where was to be decided the battle which gave to England what was the finest jewel of the crown of France. The battle abounded in feats of heroism, but the historians agree that this incident was not worthy of the courage of Wolfe and his grenadiers. Well, to-night when I witnessed the attack directed by the opposition, the whole of this drama recurred to my memory and I thought: Why do they not come out openly, why do they seek a winding path to escalade the Ottawa fortress. Gentlemen, it is for you to decide, if there might not have been more glory for the opposition to triumph on the merits of its own principles, its own definite programme than to triumph by a subterfuge as the one which they have adopted here under the form of a hypocrite amendment which is at present before the House.

Mr. Speaker, during this famous campaign, of which I have just spoken, what words of despondency have we not heard! Every candidate of the opposition wore a crepe on his hat and shed crocodile tears. "We were on the verge of bankruptcy, it was the ruin of the country if Mackenzie King continued to carry on the affairs of the country and yet, at the end of seven months, the Minister of Finance found it possible to bring down a budget which balanced our finances and relieved the ratepayers of a large share of the burden which had been imposed upon them by the Tory government.

As I see the hon. member for Winnipeg South (Mr. Rogers) entering the House, I avail myself of the circumstance, to repeat that the Patenaude movement in the province of Quebec was concocted at the Windsor Hotel, in Montreal, and that the hon. member for Winnipeg South was not a stranger to the birth of this child. He was himself sponsor at the christening.

Mr. FAFARD (Translation): May I ask the hon. member the reason why he did not give the child his father's name?

Mr. RHEAUME (Translation): He did not tell us, he gave no reason. The search for paternity is always allowed in the province of Quebec according to the French law, and it is exactly in virtue of this old French law which has remained on our statutes that we sought the Patenaude paternity, and found it. The people themselves found it.

On many an occasion in the course of our splendid meetings at Jacques-Cartier, I put various questions: "Mr. Patenaude, why at such a date, about five o'clock in the afternoon, were you at the Windsor Hotel, in Montreal, with the hon. member for Winnipeg South (Mr. Rogers)? What took you there?" There was no answer. And as we, on this side of the House never bring forward anything without proof to back it, I call as witnesses the hon. member for St. James (Mr. Rinfret) who came to lend me a helping hand, I call to witness the member for St. Henri (Mr. Mercier) as well as the member for St. Denis (Mr. Denis) and many others. The hon. member for Maisonneuve (Mr. Robitaille) whom I notice is smiling with the smile that draws to him the majority of the lady voters; and our Holy Father (Saint-Père) of Hochelaga, can all bear testimony to such statements. In order that you may understand how the Patenaude movement was looked upon with suspicion in the province of Quebec. I may say that at two o'clock in the morning, in the riding of St. Henri, there were still eight hundred people listening to the Liberal members and it was our Saint-Père of Hochelaga who pronounced the benediction.

We had other questions that we put to the new Saviour.

How did it happen, Sir, that an Imperialist newspaper found it possible to carry on the Hon. Mr. Patenaude's campaign? We asked ourselves this question. I put it to my constituents of Jacques-Cartier.

[Mr. Rhéaume.]

Mr. SPEAKER (Translation): I would ask the hon. member to keep within the bounds of the amendment. I listened without too much distraction to the speech of the hon. member for Jacques-Cartier and, up to the present, I have not been able very well to see the relationship of his remarks with the purport itself of the amendment.

Mr. RHEAUME (Translation): I am just coming to it, Sir, I am now linking up the two. I was saying, Sir, that I had no mandate and that my constituents had given me no mandate to vote in favour of this amendment, I must first give the circumstances which led to my mandate. It seems to me that a certain latitude should be given to members of this House, and especially when it is four o'clock in the morning. I promise, Sir, that I shall establish the connection between my arguments and the purport of the amendment, should I appear to stray somewhat from the subject, I shall return to it by doing a little winding but not too long a one. I had the honour to study under our Speaker at the old University of Montreal. I learned from him constitutional law, and, Mr. Speaker, I also learned to bow to your decisions.

Mr. FAFARD (Translation): All is well.

Mr. RHEAUME (Translation): This reminds me of an incident, but I fear I would not be in order in telling it. A good parish priest, in the course of an election in which the hon. Speaker of this House had an interest, told his parishioners: "Here in the pulpit, one has no right to carry on politics, however, vote for the best (le mieux)," and the hon. Speaker of the House was a candidate at that election.

Now, Sir, I return to the purport of my speech, to the puzzle which has been put to the electors of the province of Quebec.

When an imperialistic newspaper asked the people to vote in favour of Mr. Patenaude, the so-called independent candidate, it was a mystery to everybody, and, one evening, at a large meeting in Lachine—and I well interpreted the thoughts of all my constituents—I said: "You, my opponent, who are a handsome fellow, do take off the mask which disfigures you." We knew what we were talking about. In fact, he was well masked and he laid down his mask when he gave the "Lamourette" kiss to the hon. leader of the opposition, a few days after the meeting at the Forum. Well, Mr. Speaker, I, who obtained the votes of more than 20,000 electors of the county of Jacques-Cartier, am not allowed to frustrate their will and substitute to the Liberal policy, one that they have never approved. I will vote against the amendment.

Mr. FAFARD (Translation): Mr. Speaker, I see no reason why the hon. member tries to justify his conduct in this House this evening, because if the one who carried on the contest against him happened to be here, he would exactly follow the same procedure.

Mr. RHEAUME (Translation): I entirely agree with the remark of the hon. member.

The attitude taken by the Hon. Mr. Patenaude, who will perhaps be taken in the future cabinet—if a new cabinet there must be,—is a challenge to public opinion of the province of Quebec. I wish to state that this is a lurid comedy and that the comedy will be repeated before the parliament of the nation.

Mr. LACOMBE (Translation): Shame! shame!

Mr. RHEAUME (Translation): Yes, you are quite right to cry out shame! Young member of the county of Two Mountains, for whom success awaited not riper years; you are quite right. Beholding so much deceit, hearing my opponent in the county of Jacques-Cartier proclaim that he was as far remote from the leader of the opposition as from Mr. King, nevertheless, putting all blame on one and not mentioning the other, I recalled a biblical passage where Rebecca, wife of Isaac—

Mr. DOUCET (Translation): Mr. Speaker, I wish to raise a point of order. Would the hon. member tell us what connection exists between the wife of Isaac or the wife of Jacob and the amendment at present before this House?

Mr. RHEAUME (Translation): I am delighted to be able to give an immediate answer. These are the words of the great patriarch Isaac to his son Jacob who, disguised, was asking him for his blessing: "This is truly the voice of Jacob, but it is the hands of Esau." And this is the comparison: it is that there was in Mr. Patenaude as well as in Rebecca who had laid this stratagem as much deceit as there is in the amendment which is submitted to us. Is the hon. member for Kent satisfied? I might add to complete my thought that at the large meeting held in St. Laurent the people who were listening on the radio repeated not without reason: it is truly the voice of Jacob but it is the hands of Esau.

Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Terrebonne (Mr. Prevost), notwithstanding a serious illness has found it possible to be loyal to his duty of member in coming here to protest with us against the deceitful policy, which is wrapped up in the amendment. The hon. leader of the opposition, whom I had the honour to hear at the Forum—I was in the last row—

Mr. FAFARD (Translation): There was no one in the last row!

Mr. RHEAUME (Translation): I was entirely alone. I heard his speech and his language was excellent. I understand him perfectly well. I congratulate him on his effort to acquire the French language, and should he wish to persevere in studying that language I know he will be able to come into our province to give us better reasons than those he gave us for having abstained from visiting us before the general elections.

I frankly admit, Sir, that when the hon. member for Vancouver Centre delivered his speech and spoke to us about people having been hung, murderers and robbers, the little hair I have on my head stood on end. We shivered, Sir, on hearing these charges. I thought: What, destroy public documents! There is not a member of the House who could be elected if he approved of such scandal. To charge the minister of having destroyed files, I say that it is the most formidable charge which can be levied against a public man who holds cabinet rank! Where would be our trust in public men, Sir, if ministers to hide their evil deeds, were to destroy the public files? For I acknowledge to the opposition the right to criticize. It is not without reason that the country pays to the leader of the opposition a salary of $14,000, it is that he may criticize justly. And, to his honour, I must acknowledge that he well earns his money, and if it depended on me I would wish him heartily to remain for a long time the leader of the opposition, in order that he might continue to criticize as he does with such ability the deeds of the government.

However, the hon. member for Vancouver Centre has gone beyond the limit, he failed to substantiate his charge and it seems to me he owes the minister, not only on his account, but for the sake of his family, he owes him at least an apology or a public statement. If these charges had been made on the steps of the Chateau Laurier or anywhere else outside of this House, an action for damages would have been instituted by the minister so charged. I state that this is not courageous, that it is not generous to make such a charge when no proof is forthcoming; at least when we are aware that a false accusation has been laid, an apology should be made. This is the opinion not only of the House but that of the public in regard to this matter. And they wish to make us believe that this member is in good faith when he moves such an amendment? For the amendment is truly his creation.

Mr. Speaker, when such charges are brought against a public man, the country has a right to expect an apology. I bear a great esteem for the hon. member for Vancouver Centre and I state that before this debate closes on this question—

An hon. MEMBER: Oh, oh!

Mr. RHEAUME (Translation): Is this the crowing of the rooster? The debate on the amendment—I am in order, Sir, I am speaking on the amendment the whole time—the debate on the amendment will perhaps last until to-morrow. Perhaps it may end before. We have munitions to carry on. I see here gallant warriors, sharpshooters, if you will have it so, and who will, when I am through, empty their belts. However, I would request at this early hour when dawn approaches and invites one to prayers, I would ask the hon. member for Vancouver Centre to place his hand on his conscience and think: Do I not owe an apology to the hon. minister whom I have vilified and against whom I have not substantiated my charges? I appeal to his heart and reason, and I feel convinced that before this session is over we shall have this apology. I think it is in the interest of the hon. member, humanity is the same all over, it has horror of injustice.

Now, Sir, I see that a number of members around me seem keen to take part in the debate. I have but one word to add. If the discussions in our public meetings were less bitter and especially in our parliaments, the public interest would be better served and the country would reap the benefit. I state that our public men have everything to lose in throwing mud at one another. I make such a statement on behalf of the good name of our country, because to-day, through the means of telegraph, these charges made in the nation's parliament do not remain there, they reach every part of the country, the United States, the old continent, and when we ask these people to send us their sons to help us in tilling the land of Canada, they answer: "But we are not going to emigrate to your country, the public funds can no further be trusted, public documents are no more in safety in your country, they are in the hands of political robbers." That is the effect produced in foreign lands by these non-substantiated charges and I protest in the name of justice, honesty and in the interest of my country against these charges laid with a political aim and not substantiated nor retracted.

I shall close these few remarks, Sir, and I thank you for your kind attention. On the day of the celebration of the French Canadian national holiday, I conceived the idea of going together with a few friends to make a pilgrimage to the Notre-Dame cemetery. On entering we were faced with a magnificent mausoleum. Cut in the stone there was but one inscription, but one name Laurier. Surmounting it, there were nine women of bronze representing the nine provinces of the Dominion. The faces of all these women have different countenances but in each of these countenances, one can discover a common impression of sadness. They weep over the one who has left us, the one who held the respect of all his fellow-citizens from the Atlantic to the Pacific. They weep over the man who gave more than fifty years of his life to his country; they weep over the one who gave fifteen years of prosperity and national grandeur to Canada which he loved so much. Union at death's door is an admirable thing. Indeed, union at death's door is a magnificent spectacle, but union in national life is still more beautiful. Canadians, hailing from Scotland, you that have preserved in your character something of the granite of its mountains; sons of the Emerald island; you that have left the shores of the proud Albion, and have preserved the motto of Trafalgar and are proud of it; you that have come from the sunny shores of old France, finally, you Canadians who have gathered from everywhere, let us put our shoulder to the wheel and let us work in the interest of the country; let us cease our fraticidal struggles, let us unite in brotherhood and justice.

Mr. J. A. MERCIER (Laurier-Outremont): Mr. Speaker, at this late hour of the morning it is with great diffidence that I rise to speak on the subamendment, but I have the utmost confidence in the Minister of Customs (Mr. Boivin). I am possibly the oldest friend he has in this House. I knew him when he was a young boy studying law, I know his honesty of purpose, I know the love that he has for his country and the great admiration that the province of Quebec has for him. The motto of my province is, "I remember". The province of Quebec will remember what this investigation has done and that this investigation did not go outside of that province; in fact it hardly went outside the city of Montreal. We in the city of Montreal and in the province of Quebec have the greatest admiration for the Minister of Customs, and we regret the action taken by this House to-night in defeating the first subamendment. I say to hon. gentlemen that the province of Quebec has remembered, remembers now and will continue to remember what was done to one of its most illustrious sons.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the amendment to the amendment before the House at the moment you stated a few moments ago to be identical in its phraseology and in its terms with the amendment moved by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth). Under the circumstances I see no reason why the amendment should not be accepted. In making that statement I wish, however, to make it perfectly clear that in accepting the amendment the government and hon. members of the House reserve their right to reject the amendment as amended or to amend the amendment as amended, as the rules of the House may permit. In these circumstances I think we will advance proceedings by a stage if it is understood that we on this side are prepared to accept the amendment moved by the hon. member for Last Mountain (Mr. Fansher) because it is in the same terms as the amendment moved by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, for which we have already voted.

Amendment (Mr. Fansher) agreed to.

Mr. C. G. POWER (Quebec South): On the amendment to which has now been added the subamendment I have certain remarks to make which, at this late hour, it may be impossible to proceed with. I would therefore move that the debate be now adjourned.

Mr. SPEAKER: Before this motion is put I should have said that the question now before the House is the amendment as amended.

The House divided on the motion (Mr. Power) which was agreed to on the following division:

ADJOURNMENT

Mr. MACKENZIE KING moved the adjournment of the House.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask the government if the report which is current to-night that an order in council has been passed appointing certain civil service commissioners is true, and also if it is true that just recently another has been passed appointing a senator; and also if the Prime Minister intends to make any statement as to the attitude of the government following three defeats to-night.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Mr. Speaker, if my right hon. friend will retract the last statement he has just made, I will answer his former questions.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 5.17 a.m. (Saturday).

RESIGNATION OF GOVERNMENT

ANNOUNCEMENT BY MR. MACKENZIE KING—ADJOURNMENT OF THE HOUSE

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING: Mr. Speaker, I have a very important announcement which I wish to make to the House before proceeding any further. The public interest demands a dissolution of this House of Commons. As Prime Minister I so advised His Excellency the Governor General shortly after noon to-day. His Excellency having declined to accept my advice to grant a dissolution, to which I believe under British practice I was entitled, I immediately tendered my resignation which His Excellency has been graciously pleased to accept. In the circumstances, as one of the members of the House of Commons, I would move that the House do now adjourn.

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN: Mr. Speaker, if I caught the Prime Minister's words aright, they were that the House adjourn; that the government has resigned. I wish to add only this that I am—

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I might say that this motion is not debatable.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not propose to debate it, but I presume the Prime Minister will agree that I have a right to make a statement. As the House knows, we are close to the end of the session and the question of how the session should be finished is one of great importance to the country. I think there should be a conference between myself and the Prime Minister.

Mr. CANNON: I rise to a point of order. The motion made is not debatable.

Mr. SPEAKER: Everyone knows that a motion to adjourn is not debatable, but a grave and extraordinary situation has arisen. I do not see that there is any opposition to the motion to adjourn; but Bourinot at page 355 says plainly that under such circumstances the leaders in the House of Commons are allowed by courtesy of the House to make statements. I understand the right hon. gentleman is not debating the motion to adjourn. That would be out of order.

Mr. CANNON: I understand that the motion has been carried. If it has not been carried, how could the right hon. gentleman speak on it?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I make my position clear? At the present time there is no government. I am not Prime Minister; I cannot speak as Prime Minister. I can speak only as one member of this House, and it is as a humble member of this House that I submit that inasmuch as His Excellency is without an adviser, I do not think it would be proper for the House to proceed to discuss anything. If the House is to continue its proceedings, some one must assume, as His Excellency's adviser, the responsibility for His Excellency's refusal to grant a dissolution in the existing circumstances; and until His Excellency has an adviser who will assume this responsibility, I submit that this House should not proceed to discuss any matters whatever.

Mr. SPEAKER: The right hon. gentleman is technically right. The motion to adjourn is not debatable. The right hon. gentleman (Mr. Meighen) stated that he did not intend to debate that motion but he wanted to make a statement. Under the circumstances, according to Bourinot, he should be allowed to make a statement.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The only statement I wish to make is this. I think on the question of the completion of the session there should be a conference between the Prime Minister and myself, in which conference I am prepared to engage.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: There is no Prime Minister—may I emphasize that? When there is a Prime Minister he may come to this House and announce his policy and his wishes.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Until when is the House to adjourn?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I assume until to-morrow.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 2.15 p.m.

GOVERNMENT OF MR. MEIGHEN

FORMATION OF MINISTRY—PROGRAMME OUTLINED—STATEMENT PRESENTED BY SIR HENRY DRAYTON

Sir HENRY DRAYTON (Leader of the House): Before the proceedings open I desire to give to the House a statement prepared by the right hon. the Prime Minister (Mr. Meighen) in connection with changes in the ministerial situation. The statement is as follows:

Immediately following the resignation of the late government and the adjournment of the House yesterday, His Excellency, the Governor General sent for the Right Honourable Arthur Meighen, leader of the Conservative party and requested him to form a new administration. Mr. Meighen advised His Excellency last evening that he would undertake this task, and was sworn in this morning as Prime Minister, Secretary of State for External Affairs and President of the Privy Council.

Having in mind the fact that the present session has now continued for almost six months, and is very near its close, Mr. Meighen believed it to be the first duty of any government he might form to conclude with all convenient despatch the work of the present session. Such a course in preference to a somewhat prolonged adjournment was demanded also by a just regard for the convenience of hon. members, especially those who come from a great distance.

It was manifestly impossible to effect this result if a government was to be formed in the usual way and if ministers were to be assigned portfolios necessitating the vacating of their seats and consequent by-elections. The delay thus involved would, especially at this period of the year, have entailed unnecessary hardship. The Prime Minister accordingly decided to constitute and submit to His Excellency a temporary ministry composed of seven members, who would be sworn in without portfolio, and who would assume responsibility as acting ministers of the several departments.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh!

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I am delighted to hear the applause of hon. gentlemen opposite and to note their anxiety to have the session brought to a close.

An hon. MEMBER: Read the statement.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Hon. gentlemen are unnecessarily alarmed. Let me repeat the statement which they apparently approve:

The Prime Minister accordingly decided to constitute and submit to His Excellency a temporary ministry composed of seven members, who would be sworn in without portfolio, and who would assume responsibility as acting ministers of the several departments.

This step has been taken and the following members have accepted office as ministers without portfolio:

Sir Henry Drayton.
Hon. R. J. Manion.
Sir George H. Perley.
Hon. H. H. Stevens.
Hon. Hugh Guthrie.
Hon. W. A. Black.

Honourable R. B. Bennett is on his way to Ottawa from Calgary and will be asked to accept similar duties upon arrival. Sir George Perley will, during Mr. Meighen's absence from the House, have charge of matters affecting the Department of External Affairs and of the Privy Council.

These men have been assigned responsibility as acting ministers as follows: Sir Henry Drayton, Finance department and Railways department. Honourable R. J. Manion, Department of Health, Department of Soldier's Civil Re-establishment, Post Office department, Immigration department, and Labour department; Sir George Perley, Department of Secretary of State and Department of Public Works; Honourable H. H. Stevens, Customs department, Interior department, Department of Indian Affairs and Mines, Agriculture department, and Trade and Commerce department; Hon.

Hugh Guthrie, Department of Justice and Department of National Defence; Honourable W. A. Black, Department of Marine and Fisheries.

Mr. Meighen having accepted an office of emolument under the crown, namely that of Prime Minister, has thereby vacated his seat, and has asked me to assume temporarily the duty of leading the government in the House. As already stated the government deems it its first duty to give parliament an opportunity of dealing with all such matters as should be disposed of prior to the close of the session. Among these is the resolution of the Honourable member for St. Henri, for adoption of the report of the special committee which investigated the Department of Customs and Excise, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Stevens, as amended by the amendment submitted by Mr. Fansher. The government feels that under all the circumstances it has no other course than to ask the House to take up and dispose of this subject in the same way as others which appear on the order paper. While in opposition the present Prime Minister announced to parliament the acceptance by his party of the amendment moved by the Honourable Mr. Stevens, as amended by the amendment of Mr. Fansher. This position the same party takes now when in office and the adoption of such amendment so amended represents the view of the government and the advice of the government to the House. So soon as prorogation takes effect Mr. Meighen will immediately address himself to the task of constituting a government in the method established by custom. The present plan is merely to meet an unusual if not unprecedented situation.

PRIVILEGE—MR. MACKENZIE KING

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege to read to the House an article which appears in the morning press—I am reading from the Ottawa Citizen of June 29, but I assume that the same article has appeared in other papers throughout the Dominion. As the article contains a reference to His Excellency the Governor General which reflects on His Excellency as well as on others, I think it important that an immediate statement should be made with reference thereto. The article is as follows:

The Canadian Press understands that His Excellency the Governor General consented to sign only such of the appointments submitted to him by the Prime Minister as had been made on Friday, before the adverse votes to the government, and these included the two senatorships, W. M. MacDougald, Montreal, Quebec, and Dr. Daniel Riley, High River, Alta., and the judgeships already announced, as well as the two appointments to the Civil Service Commission, these being made Friday.

[Sir Henry Drayton.]

The government had also determined appointments to the vacant senatorship in Nova Scotia, to two judgeships in Quebec, and one judgeship in Ontario, it is stated, but as these were not submitted to His Excellency until after Friday's votes, Lord Byng felt himself unable to assent to them.

To the last paragraph I give an emphatic denial. Not one word of it is true, Mr. Speaker. The paragraph to which I give denial is this:

The government had also determined appointments to the vacant senatorship in Nova Scotia—

Appointment to the vacant senatorship in Nova Scotia was never determined by the government and no recommendation whatever was made to His Excellency in reference thereto.

—to two judgeships in Quebec and one judgeship in Ontario, it is stated, but as these were not submitted to His Excellency until after Friday's votes, Lord Byng felt himself unable to assent to them.

May I say as the one who was occupying the position of Prime Minister at the time, that I did not present a single order to His Excellency the Governor General which His Excellency declined to accept at the time, except the one order asking for dissolution of this House, which His Excellency said he was unable to assent to.

While I am referring to this matter, Mr. Speaker, may I draw Your Honour's attention and the attention of the House to the position which I took with His Excellency after the last general election? I then took the position that owing to the uncertainty which existed as to the control of parliament, I would not ask His Excellency to make any appointments to office, nor would I commit the government to any new course of action without the House in the first instance deciding upon the party that had the right to carry on. I shall expect that the Prime Minister now in office will give the same undertaking to His Excellency—that no appointments will be made and that the government will not be committed to any new courses of action until it is definitely known whether the right hon. Prime Minister enjoys the full approval and confidence of this House.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON (Leader of the House): Mr. Speaker, I hasten to assure my right hon. friend that the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Meighen) will conduct himself in his office with the most perfect propriety.

REPORTS

Eighth report of the select standing committee on Miscellaneous Private Bills—Mr. Brown.

Ninth report of the select standing committee on Miscellaneous Private Bills—Mr. Bowen.

FREE METHODIST CHURCH OF CANADA

Mr. A. E. ROSS (Kingston City) moved:

That the promoters of Bill No. 111, an act to incorporate the executive council of the Free Methodist Church in Canada, having signified their intention of not proceeding further with the said bill during the present session of parliament, the bill be withdrawn.

Motion agreed to.

PRIVATE BILLS

Mr. FRED W. BOWEN (Durham) moved:

That in accordance with the recommendations contained in the ninth report of the select standing committee on Miscellaneous Private Bills, all bills reported in the eighth and ninth report of said committee be placed on the orders of the day among private bills for consideration in committee of the Whole this day.

Mr. FRANK S. CAHILL (Pontiac): Mr. Speaker, I think there are certain names mentioned in one of the reports that I may have to object to. Therefore I ask that this motion stand as a notice of motion.

Mr. SPEAKER: Stands as notice of motion.

CUSTOMS INQUIRY

REPORT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE—MOTION FOR CONCURRENCE AND AMENDMENTS THERETO.

The House resumed from Friday, June 25, consideration of the motion of Mr. Mercier (St. Henri) for concurrence in the report of the special committee appointed to investigate the Department of Customs and Excise, and the proposed amendment thereto, as amended, of Hon. Mr. Stevens.

Mr. FERNAND RINFRET (St. James): Mr. Speaker, before I attempt to resume this debate, I cannot resist the temptation to outline the different aspect that this House has taken since the last time we met. If my memory went back to only a few months ago, I think I could find fluttering around me some of the arguments that my hon. friends opposite—now pretending to be the government—used at the time regarding what they called the "truncated and incomplete" government of that time. I look in vain at the gallery, and I wish my eyes could pierce the walls, to see if I might not find in the lobby the pretended Prime Minister of to-day. I see before me some of the ministers who are without portfolios, although at the same time every one of them pretends to act for a number of departments. The hon. member for Fort William (Mr. Manion) and the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens) are each burdened with five or six departments, although they were eager at the time to claim that no government could function under circumstances which were much better than we find them to-day. We were also told, Mr. Speaker, that the Hon. Mr. "Myself" had been called to take charge of the Department of Finance. I was just going to rise to a point of order and state that we had never heard of such a gentleman, and to inquire as to his identity when we found that it was no other than the same gentleman who early in January was so definite in stating that no government could function under such conditions. I am surprised to see the hon. member for West York (Sir Henry Drayton), enter into a combination completely opposed to the stand he took in the House in the early days of this session.

If I say this, Mr. Speaker, it is merely to underline the fact that our revered leader took the proper course when he advised dissolution, and I am sorry that we of the Liberal party have not been allowed to bring before the people of Canada, who after all are the real judges, the question which has come to a crisis in this House. It is well to point out that politicians should be very careful in the stand they take in this House. In speaking for two months at the opening of the session hon. gentlemen opposite made it very easy for us to find a heap of arguments, a lot of statements, the character of which may not suit us but which would very well depict them in their own words. Perhaps I may be permitted to add that whether he sits as the Prime Minister or merely as the member for Prince Albert, we of the Liberal party are united in the fullest admiration and confidence in the Right Hon. William Lyon Mackenzie King.

As for the debate which we are continuing to-day, I am under no difficulty whatever in making the statements I should have made had I remained on the other side of the House. I hold the same views; I have the same arguments to present and circumstances have not in the least altered my opinion of this report and the amendment which has been moved. I say that because I think we should approach this question without the least sense of partisanship and look at it squarely and frankly. I think on the whole the speeches which have been made not only by the ex-ministers, if I may call them so, but by some of the independent members as well have been above partisanship, and it is my intention to do likewise. But I would like to put this principle first, that if we show no partisanship in the defence of our case we should expect none in the attack. When I heard members sitting on these benches, now sitting across the floor, applauding some of the speeches made during the course of the debate, I could not help thinking that these members were less concerned in reforming the Customs department than in embarrassing the then government. They were not so anxious to prevent smuggling as to smuggle themselves into power if they could. And it reminded me of a scene during the last campaign in our province. I attended a political meeting of one of the candidates then representing Mr. Patenaude, who perhaps will represent Mr. Meighen to-morrow, and he was depicting the ruin which he claimed had come over this country. The more ruin he depicted the more applause he commanded from his Tory hearers; the more gloomy his picture the more enthusiasm he created, and when he finally concluded by saying that this country was on the very verge of bankruptcy nothing could control the exuberance of those good Tory patriots. I had the same impression when listening to some of the speeches during this debate. An hon. member who sat on that committee depicted what he said were the conditions of smuggling in his own province, and the more cases he brought before the attention of the House the louder became the applause of the Conservative members sitting around him. It was easy to see, Mr. Speaker, that hon. members were rejoicing over what they thought they had found, and were only too sorry that they could not find more. That was the measure of their patriotism, and that is what I want to prevent when dealing with this matter. I would like to deal with it not as a member of the Liberal party, not as a member of the Conservative party, but rather as though I belonged to the third party, who claim that they should have the deciding voice in this contest.

The hon. member for Mackenzie (Mr. Campbell) took the stand that we were the defendants, the other side the prosecutors and the third party the jury. I would be quite willing, Mr. Speaker, to take him at his word, but I would not leave it to him alone to decide or to the three or four other members of that group who appear to be of the same opinion. I would be willing, however, to leave it to a majority of the independent party. If the hon. member takes the stand that neither the Conservatives nor the Liberals should vote because they are prejudiced by party spirit, to follow his own reasoning he should himself follow the majority of what he calls the independent jury. Has anyone ever seen in the justice courts of this country a case decided by a minority of the jury? If you have a jury composed of twenty-five or thirty members would any case be decided by five of those members as against the wishes, the opinions, and the decision of the remainder of the jury? I say to the hon. member for Mackenzie that if he wishes to be consistent—and I will give him every credit for sincerity—instead of registering his own vote against the motion and perhaps later on against the ex-government, he should rather find out the opinion of the majority of the independents in this House, and he and all other members of that group should then unite to see that that sentiment is carried in the House. Any independent member who holds the view that neither the Liberals nor the Conservatives are unprejudiced in this matter should not vote according to his own individual viewpoint, but he should vote in order to see that the wish of the majority of independents is carried out. That is why I say that when the hon. member for Mackenzie (Mr. Campbell) or any other member votes censure of the ex-government in this matter or of the ex-Minister of Customs, he is following only his own individual opinion; he is not following at all the opinion of the majority of independents in this House.

I now come to the report, and I desire to say that I am in accord with much that is contained in it when it was first presented to the House. The hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens) said that the committee had been unanimous in bringing in this report; but we should take into consideration the fact that unanimity in such a report is always arrived at by way of compromise on certain matters dealt with in the report. The hon. member for Vancouver Centre told us that there had been reservations regarding the minister, and that on that point the committee could not agree, that there was a composite opinion. I look to the proceedings which are printed with the report, and I can see very well, Mr. Speaker, why there was a diversity of opinion on the matter of censuring the minister. It was simply because members on the other side of the House who formed part of that committee were willing to censure the minister, and were even willing to include censure of such hon. members on this side whose names had come before the committee, but they were perfectly unwilling to include in the report the names of hon. members of their own side of the House. That, Mr. Speaker, was the nature of the difference of opinion which obtained at that time. It was a remarkable state of things, and it should be pointed out even to-day that hon. gentlemen opposite wished to exercise undue severity where an hon. member of this side was concerned, but they became remarkably lenient when a member on their own side was concerned, and were prepared to consign all such matters affecting their own side to oblivion. If there was a composite opinion during the preparation of this report, it was only on that point. The Liberal members on the committee had no censure to offer of hon. members, whether on this side of the House or on that, who had followed the established custom of making representations to the department on behalf of certain of their constituents. The member representing the Progressive party on the committee was in favour of censuring all the members whose names had been exposed before the committee; he would not consent to censuring the minister alone. These were both logical attitudes to take. What is to be thought of hon. gentlemen on the other side who want to exercise the strictest kind of severity against either our minister or the members of our party, and at the same time plead for the fullest measure of indulgence for members of their own party who had done the very same thing, only that one happened to be a Conservative and the other a Liberal. That is the stand that was taken on that matter in the committee.

The report gives us certain findings, the most radical in my opinion being contained in clause 6, which says:

> The evidence submitted to the committee leads to the general conclusion that for a long time the Department of Customs and Excise had been slowly degenerating in efficiency and that the process was greatly accelerated in the last few years.

Without discussing, Mr. Speaker, whether the evidence submitted justifies that finding, we find the Conservative party taking the stand that the only words in that paragraph which count and to which they assent are the words applying to the four years we have been in power. Though they admit that the Department of Customs had been slowly degenerating for a long time, the only charge they make against this government is that it had not been able to stop that process of degeneration which had started under the Conservative administration.

Let us see what the Liberal government in office tried to do to stop that process of degeneration, which in the opinion of the hon. member for Vancouver Centre himself, had obtained in that department for a long time. The House has been reminded of the fact that the ex-government put legislation through the House in order to make the preventive service more effective. It has also been pointed out to the House that the ex-government had entered into a treaty with the United States in order to make the prevention of smuggling between the two countries more effective. It has also been pointed out to the House that before this committee was asked for, the Minister of Customs had started a departmental inquiry, and it is only to his credit to state that the main findings of the committee were nothing else but a substantiation of what had already been found out by Mr. Duncan, acting under the very instructions of the then Minister of Customs. We have in this country a situation which is to-day unprecedented as regards the administration of the Customs department. It has been said before, and I wish to emphasize it, that we have a border 4,000 miles long to protect. We have, on the other side of that border, and in some of our own provinces on this side of the border, laws prohibiting the use of alcoholic drinks, which are in themselves the strongest incentive to the smuggling of alcohol on both sides of the border. We have had at the same time the development of a system of good roads and the enormous development in the automobile industry, which two combined have afforded to the smuggler every facility that he could ask for in order that he may carry on his contraband trade. These are the conditions the ex-government had to contend with; and to these conditions, in my opinion, the development of smuggling between the two countries is due to a great extent. The hon. member for Vancouver Centre has dealt at length with the treaty which was negotiated with the United States. But let us see what the conditions in that country are? Are they any better than in Canada? Will it be claimed that the Coolidge administration does not enjoy the confidence of the people of the great republic or that it has displayed energy in seeking to stamp out this evil? Yet the Coolidge administration has not been able, any more than we have, to contend with this problem and to solve the difficulties created by the new conditions which now exist between the two countries. Therefore why should we censure the late Canadian government because it has not been able, with less resources at its command and in the same amount of time, to solve a problem which the Coolidge administration has failed equally to solve? The problem with respect to the smuggling of alcohol still confronts both countries, and both countries are trying to fight it. They have entered into a treaty in order to try and cope with it more effectively; and if they have not succeeded in doing so on the other side of the line, or if we in Canada have been equally unsuccessful, it would be most unfair to censure the late government and the ex-Minister of Customs for failure to deal with the problem.

In this connection may I quote paragraph 24 of the report? It reads as follows:

> The real solution of the difficulties at such points as Windsor, Niagara Falls, where traffic is heavy, and where a thorough examination of vessels and vehicles cannot be carried out, will be found in the discovery in advance by investigators of the secret service of the persons who make a practice of smuggling at these points, and their arrest when passing the customs barrier. The committee recommends that at bridges, ferries and main highways, where traffic enters Canada, in addition to the regular customs supervision, vessels and vehicles should be searched at frequent irregular and uncertain times. The uncertainty as to what vehicles will be examined, and as to when such examinations will be made, should operate as a strong deterrent of smuggling.

I draw your attention, Mr. Speaker, to this paragraph. Do you not see that it admits the great difficulty which exists in the prevention of smuggling at such points as those referred to? Even hon. gentlemen opposite themselves do not say that the government or the department can stop this contraband traffic. They recommend, in consquence, the hiring of secret service men who—at uncertain periods, at irregular intervals and secretly—shall proceed in such a way that they may be able to catch some of the smugglers. But is there not evidence in this very paragraph that the problem is a most difficult one to deal with, and that it would be most unjust to censure the government because—although it has improved conditions to some degree—it has not finally succeeded where other governments have failed to achieve success? And is it not the height of injustice for the hon. member for Vancouver Centre to have stated, as he did, that the late government had entered into partnership with a group of bootleggers? Could any statement be more immoderate or more unjust in view of the difficulties of dealing adequately with a problem so baffling and so intricate in its character as this one?

I have said already that the recommendations of the committee had been unanimous, but may I point out that there was unanimity merely because of the necessity for compromise which always arises with the framing of such a report as this. Actually there is not unanimity with respect to that report; I know several members opposite who do not agree with its recommendations. Then why do they support those recommendations? For no other reason, and I wish to emphasize the point very strongly, than to gain a political advantage. They will support a report in whose recommendations they do not believe—and perhaps the same may be said as to some hon. members on this side also; I am not trying to be partisan in any way—for the sake of endeavouring to secure censure of the late government, which simply resolves itself into a question as to which party shall succeed to the treasury benches and nothing else. Now my argument is that if we could remove such political considerations from the report, if we could suppress any amendment that would have a tendency to obscure the real issue, we could deal with the findings of the committee in a way that would be useful to the country. But if the issue is merely to endeavour to place one party in the right and the other party in the wrong, then all the advantage which the country should derive from the customs inquiry will be lost. We should come to the consideration of the report animated by a desire to see whether its recommendations are in the best interests of the country and of the Department of Customs and Excise. We have not been able to do that. Why? Because in the five or six days of debate that have taken place there has been nothing but jockeying for position in the House and to obtain power, which in my mind is a much less important matter than that of curing the evils which lie at the root of the customs problem. That brings me back to my first line of argument, which is this: Although hon. gentlemen opposite pose as saviours, as angels of purity, struggling to combat with all their strength what they call corruption, they do not seem anxious at all to reform the Department of Customs and Excise. They are merely seeking to create an issue whereby they may possibly gain a temporary advantage and form a temporary—in my opinion very temporary—government such as we have to-day.

Then, Mr. Speaker, the inquiry has not been completed in so far as the ground which should be covered is concerned. Nobody denies that. I do not take any stock in the argument that the inquiry was confined to the province of Quebec, my argument would be the same if the inquiry had been confined to the province of Ontario; but my contention is that the investigation should be extended to all the provinces of the Dominion and cover all parts of Canada before we affirm any opinion as to what the situation in respect to the Department of Customs and Excise is. There should be a full and complete inquiry; it should not be limited to one province. There is another reason why we supported an amendment the other night asking for a judicial commission to continue this inquiry and make it complete. It has not been complete as to years; it has covered only the last four or five years. It may be interesting to find out to what extent Conservative members on the committee were justified in stating that for a long time the Department of Customs had been degenerating. The scope of the inquiry should be enlarged so as to cover not only all Canada, but all Canada over a period of years, in order that the House may come to a proper decision on a matter of this kind.

As I have said my hon. friends opposite were not concerned about reforming anything except their own position in this House, and they think they shall have achieved their aim if they can put through a motion of censure that will leave this matter where it is. For that purpose—and I am sorry for them because I think this is a grave injustice—they have singled out the former Minister of Customs claiming that he personally in the discharge of his duties during the last number of months has come under the censure of the House.

As members of this House and public men—and again I do not speak as a partisan—we should be fair; we should admit conditions of public life as we find them and as they are. I was elected seven years ago; I am not an old member; but I have been long enough in public life to know that our constituents come to us and ask us to do services of all kinds for them. They regard us, every member in every individual constituency, not only as legislators, not only as their representatives in this House, but as public men to whom they can come when they are in distress and in need of help. If we go one step higher and come to the ministers of the crown, it is our duty or at least it has been the established practice in this country for us to go to them and to plead for benevolence on behalf of our constituents. These are conditions that have obtained in this country under all regimes and all governments of both political parties.

Our constituents come to us with requests not only in connection with the Customs department but in connection with every department of the public service. For instance they want to bring in immigrants who perhaps do not strictly conform with the requirements of the law but who, by the discretion of the minister, may be allowed to enter. When a man has been sentenced for a number of years and has served part of the sentence they ask us to apply to the Justice department to have him liberated on parole. They come to us to obtain delays in payment of their taxes because they are embarrassed in their business. There is no service of any kind that they do not expect from their member.

At the same time I think we can say that on both sides of the House, whenever such a demand is made upon us, we make it our duty to go to the minister. It has been established in this debate that such has been the practice of members of all parties, even of the opposition, to go to the minister on behalf of constituents. If my words are too strong I will bow to your ruling, Sir, but I speak in a general way not applying my remarks to anyone in particular. Are we going, whether in power or in opposition, to take the hypocritical stand in this House that what everyone of us—and I apply this to myself as a member now—has done many a time and thought it our duty to do, will become a crime because it has been found out before a committee of inquiry of this House? I for one will not stand for such a thing. I do not know what the decision of the House will be on the motion of censure towards the ex-minister of Customs, but he has my full support because I realize that what has been asked of him has been asked of our ministers by every one of us. I will never try to screen myself because they have not found me out and have found someone else out. It is nothing short of sheer hypocrisy to try to make a crime out of what the ex-Minister of Customs has done in this matter when the same thing has been asked for and done over and over again and will be done again in the future by everyone intrusted with such responsibility.

If there is any censure in this matter I claim my share of it as a public man and I claim the same share of censure for every public man in this House. If you do not want such conditions to obtain, do away with the discretion you give to the ministers, because there is no doubt there was a discretion left to the minister in this case. If he had had no discretion how could his intervention have been made effective? If he could not interfere, how could his interference have had any effect in having the sentence delayed? The fact that he did interfere and succeeded in having the man's sentence suspended is sufficient proof to me that he had discretion in the matter. If he had had no discretion he could not have exercised any effectively.

In this very debate we have had before us cases showing that this has been done before. The ex-Solicitor General (Mr. Cannon) in a very remarkable speech pointed to the details of the Plamondon case. He could have read a part which I have before me and which shows that the Plamondon case was only one of many which are on record in this very inquiry. At page 2153 we find the evidence of Richard Alleyn on Wednesday May 19. After dealing with the Plamondon case, the Hon. Mr. Bennett puts this question:

The arrangement was approved of by the department, by which he was to do so?

Mr. Alleyn's reply is:

Yes. As a matter of fact, in the other six cases the department did not want those persons sentenced to jail; they told us they did not wish these people to go to jail; not only in the Plamondon case.

Here in four lines of the report are seven cases which are the same as the case of Moses Aziz and which occurred under the regime of the Conservative party.

An hon. MEMBER: What date?

Mr. RINFRET: The Plamondon case was in 1920. There are six other cases bunched up as the departments are now bunched up in the hands of several of the hon. gentlemen opposite.

The hon. member for Mackenzie (Mr. Campbell) after he had finished his speech was reminded that he himself only a few months ago, indeed in April last asked the same favour from the Department of Justice and it was referred to the Department of Customs. The case was exactly the same. Here was a man who had been convicted of making home brew and who could not pay his fine. The hon. member for Mackenzie thereupon asked, and properly so, that he be given time to pay up so as to avoid his being sent to jail. He applied to the Department of Justice and his application was transferred to the Department of Customs; and so much was it a matter of routine that it never even came before the minister of that department. It was decided to suspend the sentence. Now what is the difference between that case and that of Moses Aziz, which the hon. member has described as criminal? So far as I can see the two are identical; it is the same sort of offence. In both cases the man is sentenced to gaol; in both cases a member of parliament applies to the department for suspension of sentence; in both cases the sentence is suspended. I can see no difference whatever between them, and it is strange that the hon. member for Mackenzie should argue that it is a crime to suspend a sentence in August, 1925, but very proper thing to suspend one in April, 1926. I see no difference at all. And the Plamondon case is more striking. Here was a man who was caught in possession of an illicit still. He was sentenced to imprisonment, and not only was sentence suspended, but upon his becoming informant against other people he was paid by the department a sum equal to the amount of his fine. He received for informing against others money enough to discharge his fine, with the result that he was not punished at all. That was done under the government of my hon. friends opposite.

Now as an ordinary member of the House and not as a member of the party to which I belong I ask hon. gentlemen this question: Why should we single out the ex-Minister of Customs (Mr. Boivin) and try to make a case against him in respect of something which has taken place under various administrations at the instance of various members of parliament? I hold that it would be the height of injustice and hypocrisy on the part of this House to adopt a vote of censure on the ex-minister in a matter of this kind.

This is not a question of mere justice. It seems to me that justice devoid of all other considerations is merely another form of injustice. If we want to do away with all possibility of appeals to ministers, then we should in my opinion fully accept the proposal contained in the amendment to the amendment, and abolish all ministerial discretion. If under such circumstances a minister, having no authority to exercise any discretion in a matter of this kind, undertook to use his own judgment then he would be liable to censure. But under existing conditions I cannot see any reason whatever why we should single out the ex-Minister of Customs and try to derive from the inquiry some political advantage for the party opposite. It is very poor politics indeed for this House to attempt to give any party such an advantage at the expense of the reputation of a minister who, I contend, deserves no censure at the hands of hon. gentlemen.

I have not dealt in detail with this case because it has been fully reviewed in the House. I merely wanted to remind the House that other cases of a similar character had been brought to light. We could, I have no doubt, find many other instances if we went through all the files under any government. This case is insignificant in itself, and is it not remarkable that although the inquiry has lasted many months and, as my hon. friends opposite admit themselves, was conducted in the most impartial way—in fact some of them are inclined to think that the party then in power rather erred on the side of too much impartiality, having to bend backwards in order to be straight—yet this is the only matter which the investigation has been able to bring out. Not a single case of bribery, not one instance of unlawful profit of any kind, not one charge against the honesty of any of the members of the government or of any of the members of this party has been disclosed. Is it not, I ask, a remarkable fact that practically the only matters which were brought out before the committee were such as had been discovered by Mr. Duncan himself, who carried out his investigation on the instructions of the then Minister of Customs. If we remember that the conditions obtaining between this country and the United States to-day are quite abnormal, owing to the existence in that country of the prohibition law and the extended facilities of which the bootleggers have been able to avail themselves, we can readily understand that smuggling should have been engaged in on an extensive scale. It seems to me, therefore, that far from censuring a group of men who have done their very best to improve the conditions that have arisen as a result of the introduction of prohibitory laws on the other side of the line, the members of this House, and more particularly the independent element, should continue to co-operate with us, and instead of adopting this motion of censure, which will lead nowhere, accept the main motion so as to have the recommendations of the committee carried into effect. It is necessary in my opinion that the investigation be continued, and this party supports that view. The inquiry should be made exhaustive in all parts of the Dominion, and should cover an adequate period, to enable us to understand just what has been the situation, not only in the last few years but over a more extended time. Only in the light of such a complete investigation can the public form a proper opinion on this question.

Just a word more with reference to the motion of censure. In previous parliaments when there were but two parties and when the government could command a clear majority among its supporters, a motion of censure was a very different thing from what it is to-day. In those days, when an opposition moved a vote of censure they had no hope that the motion would carry, with a consequent defeat of the government and the abandonment of the work of the session. It was merely a way of recording an opinion. The party wanted to go on record that regarding a certain question it differed in opinion from the government, and so it voted for the motion, which was defeated by a majority of the supporters of the administration. It was, as I say, merely a matter of record before the country. To-day however the situation is different, and with a motion of censure against a government there is involved not only the defeat of the government but the destruction of the whole governmental programme. That was the situation when the motion of censure was moved last week. Now we have been sitting here for six months and putting through legislation of a very varied character—legislation which did appeal at times to all members of the House and on other occasions to the majority. Certainly not one of these measures was defeated, some having passed unanimously; and practically all of them have gone to the Senate.

I urge that the independents—who, as they themselves say, form the jury in this House—when voting on this amendment must not lose sight of the fact that by their vote they will also decide as to which of the two parties shall retain the reins of power and, what is more important still, as to what political spirit shall prevail in this country. I appeal to my Progressive friends, some of whom have been in the House for the last five sessions, while others have been here only for this session, that, although they are a small minority to-day, they represent the wishes and the aspirations of the west very much as do our Saskatchewan friends of the Liberal party—I ask them, have they not found in the late government a true friend, the first government that was ever really anxious to try to do something for the provinces that they represent? That is an important point. "Oh," you may tell me, "we may secure a certain degree of assistance from the new supposed-to-be government"—to speak as our friends opposite did of us last January. To which I reply: "How long will it last? Will it last until the next budget speech, unless the new minister then renounces the whole Conservative programme? It can not." So I say to these independent members representing western constituencies that in considering how they will vote on this motion of censure they must have an enlarged outlook and view the whole political situation; they cannot take an isolated view and regard this particular case alone. If I were a Progressive member and told my constituents on my return home this summer, "Well, the Liberal government during the past six months yielded to our demands for the continuation of the Hudson Bay railway, they gave us a measure of rural credits, they tried to put through the House an Old Age Pensions Bill, and they gave us other legislation;" naturally my constituents would say, "That is very good. We hope you gave the Liberal government full support." What would they say when I replied, "No, I withdrew my support because a certain man in New Brunswick was gaoled in the month of December instead of August." I think my constituents would tell me that not only was I ungrateful to vote against that government, but that I lacked foresight in turning out of office such a government and putting in its place the very party who have steadily refused all these measures and opposed them until this year, when they modified their stand because they thought they might possibly make an agreement with the Progressive party.

It is a matter of record, Mr. Speaker, that while the Conservative party has tried to divide this country on economic problems, has tried to draw the east against the west, we of the Liberal party in the east have stood for co-operation between all the provinces. We who went through the last federal campaign in Quebec remember that our Conservative friends told us—and I wish my Progressive friends to listen to this because it is very important—they told us that we had sold Quebec to western interests. That is how they tried to prejudice us in the eyes of our people. That was the strategy of my hon. friends opposite in the last election, and that will be their stand again as soon as they feel they can act independently of any Progressive support in this House. We all know that the Conservative party stand for selfish, private interests, and the King government has consistently opposed those interests in order to secure a good national understanding and to be fair and just with all the provinces. This is a matter of history, Mr. Speaker. It is a statement of facts, not mere argument.

Therefore before I move the amendment I would remind my Progressive friends that the issue now before us is very much greater than this paltry, shabby, lamentably insignificant case of Moses Aziz. It is even greater than the reform of the Department of Customs. The issue is not so much as to which government shall retain power, but what spirit shall prevail in this country. After having worked together during five years in an effort to foster a spirit of good-will between east and west, are we to go back to our constituents and report that the whole thing has fallen down because a poor individual who had in his possession a few bottles of liquor was not jailed in a certain month of the year? If we do so, what will our people say? I readily understand that hon. members on the other side should grasp this occasion to try to oust us from power and take our places, for they are playing the political game; but from the bottom of my heart I must say that I cannot understand that in the face of the circumstances a single independent member in this House should support such a move. It may be a vain hope, but in all sincerity I do hope that when our Progressive friends come to think over the situation they will at least agree that the Moses Aziz case is so paltry as to be unworthy of the consideration of this parliament for weeks and weeks. There are urgent national problems before this parliament which might more profitably engage our attention. I ask those members who have found in the Liberal programme all that they wanted in a broad, general way, whether they are going to falter now and abandon that programme for a paltry case of this kind. I cannot believe it, Mr. Speaker. Therefore I have every confidence in moving an amendment which will do away with the motion of censure and provide for the continuation of the inquiry on a larger and more effective scale, in order that all the facts may be presented to this House before we pass judgment. I move, seconded by Mr. Prevost:

That the amendment as amended be further amended by striking therefrom the following words:—

"The evidence further discloses that ministerial action has been influenced by the improper pressure of political associates and friends of the minister, or acting minister administering the department, resulting in the suspension and in some instances the abandonment of prosecutions against those charged with violation of the statutes, and in the loss of revenue to the country. Moreover successful appeals have been made to the minister and acting minister administering the department to improperly interfere with the course of justice between the conviction of the offenders and the execution of judgment thereon. The Prime Minister and the government had knowledge for some considerable time of the rapid degeneration of the Department of Customs and Excise, and their failure to take prompt and effective remedial action is wholly indefensible. The conduct of the present minister of the department, the Honourable George H. Boivin, in the case of Moses Aziz is utterly injustifiable".

By adding after the words "for reasons of political expediency" at the end of the second paragraph thereof, the following words: "or personal advantage".

And by adding to the proposed addition to paragraph four of the report of the committee, after the words "and to prosecute all offenders" the following words: "and to examine former ministers of the Department of Customs and Excise with respect to any matters which in the opinion of the commission may reflect on their administration;

The said commission to be composed of three judges, one to be nominated by the Prime Minister of Canada; one by the right honourable the leader of the opposition; and one by the honourable the leader of the Progressive party, said commission to have all the powers conferred upon such commissioners under the Public Enquiries Act;

The said commission to have power to make findings and recommendations, and to report the same to parliament at the opening of the next session together with the evidence taken before said commission".

In so many words, Mr. Speaker, this amendment would do away with the mention of censure and would provide for the establishment of a commission to continue the inquiry as I have indicated.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I rise to a point of order. I submit that it does not require very much debate to demonstrate wherein this amendment is entirely out of order. The House has already determined that the words referred to in the Stevens amendment shall stand. The object of this amendment, as shown by the speech of the hon. member, is to strike out the Stevens amendment, upon which the House has already passed.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No, no.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Hon. gentlemen say no. This House has already said that the words of that amendment shall not be struck out, and it has been passed upon to that extent. As to that there is absolutely no question.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No, no.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I hear murmurs of no, no. I would like to know what else was the object of the amendment offered by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth). The whole purpose was to strike out these words and get rid of censure, which is the purpose here. It is entirely against the rules of the House to again submit a question upon which the House has already passed.

That is my first point; my second is very short, and I am sure it is well known to you, Sir. Under the practices when the House amends a motion or a proposed amendment in its latter part the former part cannot then be amended. Here in this case by the adoption of the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Last Mountain (Mr. Fansher) this House amended the latter part of the Stevens amendment, and by so doing prevented amendment to any of the foregoing part of that amendment.

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Mr. Speaker, if the reasoning of my hon. friend were to be accepted, it would be very difficult indeed to ever move more than an amendment to the amendment which is before the House. But my hon. friend was entirely wrong when he said that the House had already voted in favour of retaining the words which are moved to be struck out by the present amendment. What the House adopted was the amendment offered by the hon. member for Last Mountain (Mr. Fansher):

That the words "and that the committee for such purposes be revived"—

—be struck out and that they be replaced by certain other words, but he moved to strike out only the words "and that the committee for such purpose be revived." The House has never voted in the way my hon. friend has intimated, and even if the amendment of my hon. friend from Last Mountain had been to strike out all the words of the amendment of the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens), it would only be for the purpose of replacing them by other words as moved by the hon. member for Last Mountain—striking out some words to replace them with others, not accepting those words absolutely. The only thing that has been adopted by the House is the amendment of the hon. member for Last Mountain, so much so, Mr. Speaker, that you now have to put the question for the adoption of the amendment of the hon. member for Vancouver Centre as amended. We have never voted to accept the amendment of the hon. member for Vancouver Centre. You have to put the question to the House, Mr. Speaker, in order that that should be voted on. There is no doubt in my mind that the amendment moved by my hon. friend for St. James (Mr. Rinfret) is absolutely in order.

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (Acting Minister of Justice): I think my hon. friend who has just addressed the House (Mr. Lapointe), if he will more calmly consider this question, will see that the objection is well taken. The position in brief is this: An amendment was offered by the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens), to which my hon. friend from Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) offered a subamendment, which sought to change the amendment offered by my hon. friend from Vancouver Centre in very material parts. That amendment offered by my hon. friend from Winnipeg North Centre was negatived by the House. Subsequently the hon. member for Last Mountain (Mr. Fansher) moved a subamendment which was accepted by the House. So now we have the original amendment amended. It has already been amended by the amendment of the hon. member for Last Mountain, and has become a definite and distinct question, and we have a right to have that question passed upon by the House in that form—the original amendment as amended by the amendment of the hon. member for Last Mountain. It is true, as my hon. friend has said, that the amendment of my hon. friend from Vancouver Centre has never yet been voted on, but the form of the question to be submitted to the House was definitely settled when the House adopted the amendment of my hon. friend from Last Mountain. It became then the amendment as amended, and the question to be put to the House is: Shall the amendment as amended be adopted? I submit that under the rules it is impossible to change the form of that question by striking out any portion of it, or by inserting any new words in it save at the end; it is permissible to add new clauses. The whole matter is very succinctly set out in Bourinot. In a reference to May's Parliamentary Procedure, the matter is so well put that I shall read it to the House. Bourinot at page 318, says:

It is laid down in the highest English authority that "when the House has agreed that certain words shall stand part of the question—

As we did when we amended the amendment.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Not at all.

Mr. GUTHRIE: That is my argument. It goes on:

"—it is irregular to propose any amendment to those words, as the decision of the House has already been pronounced in their favour, but this rule would not exclude an addition to the words if proposed at the proper time. In the same manner when the House has agreed to add or insert words in a question—

As we did by adopting the amendment of the hon. member for Last Mountain:

"—its decision may not be disturbed by any amendment of these words; but here again other words may be added."

I submit that the only opportunity of amending the question now is to add clauses at the end of it. The question as it should be submitted to this House has been settled as to form. If further clauses are to be added, they can be moved, but the precise language of the amendment as amended cannot be changed either by striking out or substituting certain other words. There have been many cases based on the dictum which I have just read to Your Honour, and I believe that it is a well understood and a well settled rule. If it were otherwise, this House would be undoing what we have already done. We have adopted the amendment offered by the hon. member for Last Mountain to the amendment offered by my hon. friend from Vancouver Centre. That is the decision of the House, and are we now going to negative what we have done by another amendment? It would make an impossible situation, and that is the reason for the rule. The only recourse now open to those who desire any change is to submit clauses which are additional and not by way of substitution.

[Mr. Guthrie.]

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I would like to draw your attention to what I said at the time the amendment to the amendment moved by the hon. member for Last Mountain (Mr. Fansher) was accepted. My words will be found in Hansard at page 5095.

Mr. Speaker, the amendment to the amendment before the House at the moment you stated a few moments ago to be identical in its phraseology and in its terms with the amendment moved by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth). Under the circumstances I see no reason why the amendment should not be accepted. In making that statement I wish, however, to make it perfectly clear that in accepting the amendment the government and hon. members of the House reserve their right to reject the amendment as amended or to amend the amendment as amended, as the rules of the House may permit. In these circumstances I think we will advance proceedings by a stage if it is understood that we on this side are prepared to accept the amendment moved by the hon. member for Last Mountain (Mr. Fansher) because it is in the same terms as the amendment moved by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, for which we have already voted.

I submit, Mr. Speaker, that it was only on that understanding that the government at that time were prepared to accept the amendment to the amendment. If any objection had been raised, or if any opposite view had been expressed the debate would have been permitted to proceed without that amendment being accepted.

The hon. member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie) said a moment ago that the precise language of the amendment cannot be changed. I would submit to my hon. friend that if the precise language of the first part of the amendment is retained, then if it be true that we have a government in office opposite, that language will have to be changed, or hon. gentlemen opposite will be voting censure on themselves.

Mr. GUTHRIE: It cannot be changed without the consent of the House.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Further, it speaks of the conduct of the present minister of the department. We were informed a few minutes ago that the present minister of the Department of Customs is the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens) himself, so if it be true, Mr. Speaker, as my hon. friend from South Wellington has just said, that it is impossible to change the precise language of the first part of the amendment, then I am afraid hon. gentlemen opposite will find themselves in a strange predicament.

My hon. friend said a further word as to not negativing the early part of the amendment. What the amendment before the House at the moment does is to amplify certain parts of the amendment as amended and to delete certain parts in accordance, as I have already said, with the right which the rules of the House give to amend the amendment to the amendment before it is considered.

Mr. GUTHRIE: My hon. friend the other day did refer to the right to make further amendment in accordance with the rules of the House. I would certainly say that right exists, but it must be in accordance with the rules. The point of order at the present time is that of the necessity of conforming to rules or to parliamentary usage.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I make my point perfectly clear? In using the language I did, I was speaking directly to His Honour in a manner equivalent to asking His Honour to intimate if the construction I was there putting on the motion was not absolutely right, and no exception was taken.

Hon. H. H. STEVENS (Acting Minister of Customs and Excise): With all due deference to the right hon. gentleman, he can scarcely expect the House to accept an utterance of that character in the face of the actual rule. The statement was clear: He reserved the right on behalf of any hon. member, to move a further amendment within the rules of the House, and I want to say to him now that no one on this side would question for a moment that right within the rules. What we are challenging is this: We say that this amendment is not within the rules of the House on several very definite grounds. My hon. friend has quoted Bourinot but May, 13th edition, page 261, will also assist in the consideration of this question. I will also read from Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms, and I desire to draw Your Honour's attention to perhaps two, if not three, distinct grounds upon which this amendment could be ruled out of order. The first ground is to be found in rule 336, which reads as follows:

> After a decision has been given on an amendment to any part of a question, an earlier part cannot be amended.

And so forth. It is very clear that the amendment moved by the hon. member for Last Mountain (Mr. Fansher) places this motion clearly within that rule, and makes it contrary to the rule to again amend it except by adding to the amended motion. These rules are not arbitrary or unfair. They are rules arising out of long years of experience, designed to keep questions within reasonable bounds of discussion, and to fix some period during which amendments or changes may be made in a motion. The second rule to which I would like to draw Your Honour's attention is rule No. 337, reading as follows:

> An amendment on a question must not be inconsistent with a previous decision on the same question given at the same stage of any bill or matter.

It will be recalled at once that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) moved that all the words after the word "instructions" in the original motion be struck out. That was his motion, and he added that certain other words should be substituted therefor.

Now, if Your Honour will look at the amendment submitted by myself, it will be found that the present amendment offered by the hon. member for St. James (Mr. Rinfret) strikes out precisely—no not precisely but almost precisely—the same words as the original amendment of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre struck out; that is it strikes out all of the main clause of the original amendment. I submit that on that ground also this amendment is distinctly out of order. Furthermore the House came to a decision on that very question; it decided by an adverse vote to reject the amendment of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. The House declared that in its opinion the words which he moved to strike out should remain in the amendment. That I think must be admitted.

Mr. SPEAKER: From what number of Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms is the hon. member quoting?

Mr. STEVENS: From rules Nos. 336 and 337. Rule 336 reads as follows:

> After a decision has been given on an amendment to any part of a question, an earlier part cannot be amended

And so on. Rule 337 reads as follows:

> An amendment on a question must not be inconsistent with a previous decision on the same question given at the same stage of any bill or matter.

Now I submit that this is in almost precise terms the same amendment as that offered by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. Then I would draw Your Honour's attention to rule No. 338, which reads as follows:

> An amendment that is merely an expanded negative cannot be proposed by the Chair.

That may not be quite as clear, it may be a little more obscure, but I think it must become evident to Your Honour that the amendment proposed by the hon. member for St. James differs very little from what may be called an expanded negative. It is another way to express a negative with respect to a question which has already been decided and rejected by the House.

Hon. R. J. MANION (Acting Minister of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment): A citation from Bourinot has already been given but the rule is laid down so plainly in May, 12th edition, that I wish to read it even if it does involve a certain amount of repetition. On page 262 the author states:

Several amendments may be moved to the same question, but subject to these restrictions. No amendment can be made in the first part of a question, after the latter part has been amended, or has been proposed to be amended, if a question has been proposed from the chair upon such amendment.

The latter part was amended by the acceptance of the amendment of the hon. member for Last Mountain. I continue quoting:

—but if an amendment to a question be withdrawn, by leave of the House, the fact of that amendment having been proposed will not preclude the proposal of another amendment, affecting an earlier port of the question, so long as it does not extend further back than the last words upon which the House has already expressed an opinion.

Well, the last words upon which an opinion was expressed were those of the subamendment of the hon. member for Last Mountain, which were added to the amendment of the hon. member for Vancouver Centre. But let me read a little lower down, and the opinion in this is even more clear than in the other quotation. On the same page May says:

When the House has agreed that certain words shall stand part of a question, it is irregular to propose any amendment to those words, as the decision of the House has already been pronounced in their favour: But this rule does not exclude an addition to the words, if proposed at the proper time.

That is so clear and distinct that I think there is no way of getting around it. I should like to read it again if I may because it is so clear as to be unmistakable:

When the House has agreed that certain words shall stand part of a question—

And remember that in accepting the amendment of the hon. member for Last Mountain the House has agreed that it shall stand part of a question—

When the House has agreed that certain words shall stand part of a question, it is irregular to propose any amendment to those words, as the decision of the House has already been pronounced in their favour: But this rule does not exclude an addition to the words, if proposed at the proper time.

In view of that rule the only possible amendment so far as I can see is an addition, but nothing of the kind is proposed by my hon. friend.

Hon. LUCIEN CANNON (Dorchester): The contention laid down by the new minister without portfolio would be perfectly correct if the House had decided or taken a decision or divided on the amendment moved by the other minister without portfolio, or so as to make no mistake, the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens). But the House has taken no decision; there has been no division, and therefore everything alleged on the other side crumbles down.

Mr. MANION: Does the House not take a decision just as well without a division as with one?

Mr. CANNON: The only way for a House to express itself is through a vote or through unanimity, and I do not think anybody will contend that there is unanimity in this House.

Mr. STEVENS: There was on Friday night a unanimous adoption of the amendment moved by the hon. member for Last Mountain (Mr. Fansher). It was unanimously adopted and was so pronounced by the Speaker.

Mr. CANNON: The Fansher amendment was moved and then I understand the Fansher amendment was accepted as something to be added to the Stevens amendment; but the Stevens amendment has not been adopted so far as I know and it is not going to be adopted for a while yet. So long as an amendment is before the House and the House has not taken a decision on it, we are free to move any other amendment. I do not think either May or Bourinot or other constitutional authority will be found to give a contrary opinion. The whole question is whether the House has taken a decision or not. It has not and therefore we can move any amendment we wish.

Mr. A. U. G. BURY (East Edmonton): May I call the attention of this House and in particular the attention of the ex-Solicitor General to the words of the ex-Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) as reported on page 5095 of Hansard?

Under the circumstances I see no reason why the amendment should not be accepted.

That is to say the then Prime Minister accepted the amendment of the hon. member for Last Mountain. He went on:

In making that statement I wish, however, to make it perfectly clear that in accepting the amendment—

There is a definite statement by the then Prime Minister that he had accepted the amendment of the hon. member for Last Mountain.

—the government and hon. members of the House reserve their right to reject the amendment as amended—

That is the amendment of the hon. member for Vancouver Centre as amended by the amendment of the hon. member for Last Mountain which the then Prime Minister and the House had accepted. The then Prime Minister, speaking for members of the House, reserved the right to reject the amendment of the hon. member for Vancouver Centre as amended by the amendment of the hon. member for Last Mountain when the amendment as amended was submitted to the House. He went on further:

—or to amend the amendment as amended, as the rules of the House may permit. In these circumstances I think we will advance proceedings by a state if it is understood that we on this side are prepared to accept the amendment moved by the hon. member for Last Mountain.

Then you, Mr. Speaker, on the same page of Hansard, summing up the position in which the House then stood made this statement:

Before this motion is put—

That is the motion for adjournment of the debate.

—I should have said that the question now before the House is the amendment as amended.

That is the amendment of the hon. member for Last Mountain was accepted by the then Prime Minister and the House and incorporated with the amendment of the hon. member for Vancouver Centre, and that was the next motion that would have been put but for the adjournment of the debate. The facts as stated in Hansard are absolutely clear.

Hon. GEORGE H. BOIVIN (Shefford): I have only one word to say on the point of order and I will begin by saying that I consider that my hon. friend (Mr. Bury) is perfectly right in his concluding remark when he said that had it not been for the motion of adjournment the question which would have been submitted to the House by Your Honour would have been the amendment moved by the hon. member for Vancouver Centre as amended. We all agree on that point. That was the question which was before the chair when the hon. member for St. James (Mr. Rinfret) rose in his place this afternoon to do as he undoubtedly had a 4 p.m. right to do, to make an address on the question before the chair and then move an amendment to that question. If Your Honour will look at page 316 of Bourinot you will find that there are several ways in which a motion may be amended. It may be amended by leaving out certain words; second, by leaving out certain words, in order to insert or add others; and, third, by inserting or adding certain words that are not already in the motion. The object of the English rule, the object of the Canadian rule which has been followed since confederation, the object of the rules which have been cited by my hon. friend opposite, is to prevent any hon. member from wasting the time of this honourable House by repeating over and over again the same amendment and obliging this House to vote over and over again on the same question. Bourinot is very clear that there can be at one time only one amendment and one subamendment to a question; but Bourinot is equally clear that when an amendment has been amended the amendment as amended then becomes the amendment and it may be amended as often as hon. members see fit, providing, however, that the amendments are within the rules.

It is argued that since the House has voted upon and accepted a subamendment, the words accepted by the House cannot be deleted from the amendment. That precedent will be found on page 319 of Bourinot and happened during the session of 1871, where after a motion had been amended and the amendment had been amended by a subamendment, it was then proposed to take out certain words that had been added by the subamendment. If we were attempting today to remove from the amendment as amended certain words which this House unanimously agreed to accept when we accepted the Fansher amendment, I think the point raised by my hon. friend opposite would be well taken, at least according to the precedent established in 1871, with which by the way I do not entirely agree. Nevertheless under that precedent the point would be well taken.

What I want to point out to the House and to Your Honour is that the question now before the House has never been decided before. That is the whole point of order. What has this House decided? This House decided on one occasion that it would not consent to wipe out entirely the whole Stevens amendment for the purpose of substituting therefor the amendment moved by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth). That was the decision taken by this House. It was voted upon and a majority decided that the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) should not be inserted as a substitution for the Stevens amendment. On that we voted and on that point we all agree. Then the same amendment was proposed, not by way of substitution, but as an addition to the Stevens amendment which was still before the Chair, but which had not been voted upon. On its being proposed as an addition to that amendment it was unanimously adopted by the House as such, but it was not adopted as additional to something upon which the House had already voted. It was adopted as an addition to a question on which the House would be called upon to vote and which, therefore, was still subject to amendment according to every constitutional authority.

Now, how can an amendment be made? It may be made by striking out certain words and adding others. Let us take for granted that we cannot remove such words as the House has unanimously agreed to accept. Very well; Your Honour will see that we do not propose to delete any of those words. The words which we seek to delete are words which have never been accepted by this House, words which have never been voted upon, and words which, before they could be accepted, the House would have to pass upon. The question is now upon the amendment as amended; that is the question which Your Honour would have placed before the House if a motion had not been made for adjournment the other night. That is the question which Your Honour was supposed to submit to the House to-day before the hon. member for St. James rose to his feet, and when he concluded his remarks he exercised his undoubted right to remove certain parts of the amendment which have not yet been accepted by the House, and to substitute other words therefor. I respectfully submit that the amendment is in order.

Mr. LAPOINTE: The present confusion is due in part to the fact that questions of this kind are not put in the British House of Commons as they are here. In the British House of Commons, when an amendment is moved of such a character as that submitted by the hon. member for Last Mountain (Mr. Fansher) the other day, two questions are put. In the first place the question is put whether the words proposed to be left out shall stand part of the question. The British House first votes on this question and, if it is decided that the words which it is sought to delete shall be struck out, then the House votes on the second question, namely, whether the words moved in substitution shall be inserted in the amendment. I refer Your Honour to May at page 283. Let us apply this practice to the present instance. The hon. member for Last Mountain moved in amendment that the words "and that the committee for such purposes be revived", as they appear at the end of the amendment, be struck out and other words substituted therefor. He moved two things: first, that certain words of the Stevens amendment—not all—be struck out, namely, the words I have just quoted. If we followed the British practice Mr. Speaker would have to put, first, the question whether the words "and that the committee for such purposes be revived" should stand part of the question. The House would vote on that question and if it were negatived, that is to say, if these words were not to stand part of the question, then the words moved by the hon. member for Last Mountain as an addition would have to be put as a new question. It is because of this practice in the British House of Commons that, in my opinion, hon. gentlemen opposite were led into the mistake of quoting May and others as they did. The main amendment has not yet been put to the House. The only words that have been put for deletion are the words "and that the committee for such purposes be revived", and I contend that the House has not voted to retain the words which the amendment now proposed seeks to delete.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON (Leader of the House): My hon. friend has made a very good argument but it is based only on one resolution. He argues that the words which it has been decided to strike out are only the concluding words of the Stevens amendment. My hon. friend argues, at least by inference, that an amendment to strike out the whole of the Stevens amendment would be out of order and he points out that all that the amendment of the hon. member for Last Mountain (Mr. Fansher) proposed to delete was the last sentence of the main amendment. I think I am within the judgment of hon. members when I say that the amendment now submitted by the hon. member for St. James (Mr. Rinfret), having for its purpose the striking out of exactly the words proposed to be struck out by the amendment of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth), is according to the argument of my hon. friend (Mr. Lapointe) himself not admissible. I submit therefore that the point of order is well taken.

Mr. G. B. NICHOLSON (East Algoma): The ex-Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), speaking in the House on Friday last, declared that he saw no reason why the amendment moved by the hon. member for Last Mountain (Mr. Fansher) should not be adopted. That amendment was carried unanimously, and rule 36 states clearly that after a decision has been given on an amendment to any part of a question, an earlier part cannot be amended. The amendment moved by the hon. member for Last Mountain was clearly an amendment to the Stevens amendment, and in view of this rule I should like to hear the opinion of the ex-Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe).

Mr. LAPOINTE: I do not agree with my hon. friend.

Mr. E. B. RYCKMAN (East Toronto): I take exception to the regularity of this proposed amendment on another ground. I think it is axiomatic, and would be so conceded by anybody who was asked to pass judgment dispassionately upon this amendment, that the latter part of a question after being amended is an answer to any attempt to amend a previous part. The answer to the argument advanced by the hon. member for Shefford (Mr. Boivin) and by the late Minister of Justice—

Mr. LAPOINTE: I am not deceased yet.

Mr. RYCKMAN: —is simply this: If the form in which the resolution is drawn does not appeal to any hon. member, then it is his duty to vote against it. But the point I wish expressly to raise is this. On Friday night the Fansher amendment was passed. It provided for a royal commission, with the usual authority given to such a commission. This amendment is distinctly at variance with, yea, in contradiction of, the action of this House on Friday night, when it unanimously accepted, at the instance of the then Prime Minister, the Fansher amendment. Now the House is asked by this resolution to set up:

> The said commission to be composed of three judges, one to be nominated by the Prime Minister of Canada; one by the right hon. the leader of the opposition; and one by the hon. the leader of the Progressive party, said commission to have all the powers conferred upon such commissioners under the Public Enquiries Act;

I submit, Mr. Speaker, that that is directly contrary to what this House decided on Friday evening, and that therefore the resolution is out of order.

Mr. POULIOT: May I ask a question of the hon. gentleman: Quelle est l'autorité sur laquelle il base son raisonnement?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Vous avez tort.

Mr. SPEAKER: Does any other hon. gentleman desire to speak to the point of order?

I have listened very attentively to the argument from both sides of the House. I must first of all put in concrete form, a synopsis of the main motion, the amendment, the first subamendment, the second subamendment, and the third subamendment.

Mr. Mercier, chairman of the committee, moved the adoption of the committee's report. To that an amendment was moved by the hon. member now Minister of Customs (Mr. Stevens), the purport of which is to censure a certain minister of a former administration, and in fact that administration itself. To that a subamendment was moved by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) the purport of which was to strike out all the words of censure in the main amendment and to substitute therefore a judicial inquiry and to add the name of the ex-Deputy Minister of Customs to those whose heads should fall. This subamendment was defeated. Immediately the member for Last Mountain (Mr. Fansher) rose and moved another subamendment, differing from the preceding subamendment in just one particular; instead of being substitutionary of, he made his subamendment supplemental to the main amendment.

The question now is: Did the House by adopting the subamendment moved by the hon. member for Last Mountain at the same time accept the censure which is contained in the main amendment; and should the Speaker when putting the question take this view as granted?

I have looked up the various authorities as to the effect of a subamendment when it has been added to an amendment. The House may not be aware of the fact that on the complex question of amendment and subamendment we do not follow the British practice. The hon. leader of the House (Sir Henry Drayton), and one of his colleagues later on during the argument, laid great stress on what Bourinot says at page 318, fourth edition:

> But an amendment once negatived by the House cannot be proposed a second time. It is laid down on the highest English authority that: "when the House has agreed that certain words shall stand part of the question, it is irregular to propose any amendment to those words, as the decision of the House has already been pronounced in their favour, but this rule would not exclude an addition to the words if proposed at the proper time. In the same manner when the House has agreed to add or insert words in a question, its decision may not be disturbed by any amendment of these words; but here again other words may be added.

This is strictly the British practice. That is why it is cited between quotation marks. But if the House will turn to the bottom of the preceding page the following note will be found:

> In the British House the practice of putting amendments is quite different from that in the Canadian parliament and from that in practice generally in colonial and foreign parliaments. The British practice can be defended on logical grounds but it has some inconveniences. That usage, however, has not been adopted in Canada.

In other words, in England the Speaker, when putting an amendment to the House which purports to leave out or to insert words, puts each question separately; for instance: Shall those words stand part of the motion? And the House having pronounced upon that question, he puts the further question. If we followed the British practice, the argument advanced by the hon. leader of the House would be irrefutable; but we are in the Canadian House of Commons, and Bourinot states that we have not in Canada adopted that usage. Hon. members will find the subject dealt with at length at pages 316 to 322 of the fourth edition of Bourinot. As he points out, the practice is quite different here. After a subamendment has been moved and adopted unanimously, if you please, the Speaker must again put the question before the House and ask: Is the amendment as amended adopted? Bourinot adds that any number of subamendments may be moved. Of course, only one is considered at a time. Now I ask the House to judge, leaving technicalities aside: Is it possible that on Friday, or rather Saturday morning, the hon. member for Shefford (Mr. Boivin) and his colleagues agreed unanimously that censure should be pronounced against themselves?

Mr. MANION: We agreed upon the form of the amendment.

Mr. SPEAKER: Under similar circumstances in England the government would have censured themselves, but the procedure in Canada differs according to the practice laid down by Bourinot.

Let me add that once in this House of Commons Mr. Speaker Sevigny forgot to do what I am bound to do when the question is put, that is to ask: "Is it the pleasure of the House that the amendment as amended, be adopted?" and he corrected himself the following day. You will find that in the Journals of the House, 1916, at page 201:

> Mr. Speaker: After the vote taken at yesterday's sitting on the amendment proposed by Mr. Bennett (Calgary) on Mr. Stevens' resolution, I decided that the amendment having been voted in the affirmative there was no need to again propose the principal motion, as amended, to the House.
> I have since carefully examined this question and have ascertained, by referring to authors, that the question, as amended, should have again been placed before the House.
> [Mr. Speaker.]

And he gives many precedents. He quotes the third edition of Bourinot, while I have quoted the fourth edition. At page 439 of the third edition Bourinot says:

> If the amendment be negatived, the Speaker will again propose the main question, and a debate may ensue thereon or another amendment may then be submitted. On the other hand, if the House adopt the amendment, then the Speaker will again propose the question in these words: 'Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the main motion so amended'."

The hon. member for East Algoma (Mr. Nicholson) and the Minister of Customs (Mr. Stevens), I think, cited from Beauchesne a moment ago what they called rule 36. This mark well, is not a rule; it is an obiter dictum under rule 36, probably taken from one of the English authors. In this case I declare that having considered this question seriously I come to the conclusion that it does not come under the British practice. The House has not agreed that the words of the first amendment shall stand part of the question, nor has any action been yet taken upon the main amendment. It is therefore still open to amendment. I repeat it; it is not the practice in Canada to put the motion that certain words shall stand part of the question. The method of the British House of Commons in putting amendments is peculiar to the British parliament and is regarded as illogical and inconvenient by other assemblies, as pointed out in the above citation from Bourinot's third edition. The practice in the Canadian House is quite different, as explained in the fourth edition in the note at the foot of page 317.

In the Canadian House when a motion has been amended the Speaker will then put the question, "Is it the pleasure of the House that the motion as amended shall be adopted?"

As I have already stated, this point was once decided by Mr. Speaker Sevigny, and it is based on Bourinot and Canadian parliamentary practice.

In my humble opinion the subamendment is in order.

Mr. GEARY: Mr. Speaker, in all respect I wish to appeal from your ruling.

Mr. SPEAKER: Mr Speaker having decided that the subamendment moved by Mr. Rinfret was in order on the ground that it is in conformity with the practice of the Canadian House of Commons and the hon. member for South Toronto (Mr. Geary) appealing from that ruling, the question now is, Shall the ruling of the Speaker be sustained?

The House divided on the question: Shall the ruling of the Chair be sustained? And the ruling was sustained on the following division:

Mr. MEWBURN: I was paired with the hon. member for Quebec South (Mr. Power). Had I voted I would have voted against your ruling, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. HANNESSON: I was paired with the hon. member for St. Boniface (Mr. Howden). Had I voted I would have voted against your ruling, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. FONTAINE: Mr. Speaker, I was paired with the hon. member for Ottawa (Mr. Chabot). Had I voted I would have voted to sustain your ruling.

Mr. GEORGE SPENCE (Maple Creek): Mr. Speaker, here we have the unprecedented situation of members calling on the provisional government to resign, and there being no one here to resign.

An hon. MEMBER: Do you want an election?

Mr. SPENCE (Maple Creek): Yes, tomorrow. I had two elections last summer; I beat both my opponents, and my good electors thought so well of me that they presented me with a Ford car. I won two elections in one year and am ready for another one.

Mr. HOCKEN: Do you want another car?

Mr. SPENCE (Maple Creek): Never mind about the car. I think it is the duty of every hon. member to place himself on record upon this very important question. We have heard an attack made in this House, and let me say that it was a submarine attack, to drive one of the members of this House, a young man, out of public life. We have been told that this is the highest court in the land. If that is the case, I hope a sense of justice will prevail here that is in keeping with such a court. But I ask you, Mr. Speaker, if that is the case. Here in an atmosphere surcharged with passion, in which party and political prejudices run high, we have the accused condemned before he is even heard, and hon. members rush out of the House so that they shall not hear his defence. I ask those of you who still pray to get down on your knees to-night and pray that you will never be tried in such a court.

I am glad, Mr. Speaker, on such an occasion as this, to be a member of parliament. Goodness knows that there are many things in connection with the life of a member of parliament that are not very agreeable, but this is one of the occasions when I feel proud that I can stand up in this House and register my vote for a higher sense of justice than we have had exemplified here by hon. gentlement opposite. They dig up their precedents in musty law books, but there is a higher sense of moral justice, that cannot be found in law books, for it is not written there. It is that sense of justice and comradeship that prompted the men on the Lusitania when she was sinking to cry, "Women and children first," and to provide the helpless and innocent young victims with life belts, while the men threw themselves overboard and were swallowed up by the sea.

Now, let us examine and see who are to be the judges. I for one will not stand up in this House and condone the conduct of anyone who has been guilty of wrongdoing, but at least I want to make sure that the accused shall get a fair hearing. Are we all such paragons of virtue that we can sit in judgment on this man's character? Here is a man being tried who showed clemency to a certain individual and the judges are to be the men who condemn him for that clemency while they themselves interceded in order that clemency might be granted to others. The greatest sin of which the ex-Minister of Customs and Excise (Mr. Boivin) was guilty was that he told the truth about himself. In the one case the man for whom clemency was asked was accused of being a trader in liquor; in the other case clemency was sought for a man who was making home-brew, making a poison dangerous to human life itself. The one is languishing in gaol while the other, I understand, is a free man. Is that justice?

I am very glad to support this amendment because I feel it will result in granting a full and impartial inquiry, and I for one would not like to leave this House until an investigation of that character was guaranteed. But hon. gentlemen opposite say: "Give us the reins of government and we will continue the investigation." Is anyone credulous enough to believe that statement? Does anyone think for a moment that the hon. member who preferred the charges against the late administration will continue the probe into the conditions in his own port of Vancouver? Is anyone foolish enough to believe that? I am not. Is anyone foolish enough to believe that this inquiry is complete when only one province has been attacked, and when the international boundary line extends for a distance of 4,000 miles, thus leaving a vast territory untouched? I do not. Narrowed down as it has been, this investigation is an attack upon the province of Quebec. I pause to hear denial from hon. gentlemen opposite, but no one there opens his mouth in denial.

An hon. MEMBER: They are quieter over there now.

Mr. SPENCE (Maple Creek): Ah, yes, it is very easy to accuse, very easy to enter a court charged with prejudice as the court proposed by hon. gentlemen opposite would be. "But they cried, saying, crucify Him, crucify Him." I am opposed to the tactics of hon. gentlemen opposite and have been opposed to them from the very first. I have been opposed to the way in which information on this matter was secured and presented to the House. In the report itself there are many recommendations with which I do not agree, many which are entirely impracticable. One recommendation proposes that the minister shall have no discretion in the case of sums amounting to over $200. I say that when the royal commission which is to be appointed proceeds from one coast to the other and investigates the conditions along the international boundary line, it will find that the recommendation contained in paragraph 8 of the report is entirely impracticable. You have an international boundary where there is a crossing into Canada every mile, and in some cases the distance is shorter than that. Horses and cattle cross the international boundary freely, from the western ranges of the United States into Canada and vice versa. On my farm to-night there may be 100 head of horses which have found their way into the pasture, yet under such a regulation as proposed I could be thrown into gaol for that. Is it fair? It is not only unfair; it is preposterous. In this investigation we have been only scratching the surface, and we think we can only cure the existing conditions by enacting a set of laws.

It does seem strange to me that the report before the House does not contain a reference at least to the actual cause of smuggling. I do not think it was the duty of the committee, or that it was within their province, to say that the tariff should be lowered; but I do think they should have drawn the attention of the House and the country as a whole to the fact that tariffs do lead to smuggling—that tariffs, and particularly high tariffs, are the cause of most of the smuggling that is indulged in. That being the case I submit to you, Sir, that the recommendations contained in this report are very unsatisfactory. I am only a humble member of this House, yet I feel I could stop smuggling in twenty-four hours by putting on the free list the articles which are being smuggled. Why has the committee not even referred to such a possibility as that? But no, somebody had to be made the goat, somebody had to be crucified so that hon. gentlemen opposite could get into power for a few hours.

The right hon. the Prime Minister, the member for Portage la Prairie, is a man whom I have always admired. He is a very bright lawyer. I remember the time when he entered this House twenty years ago; I knew him when he was in Portage la Prairie. But I am not going to congratulate him on his victory, short-lived though it may be. If I were to do so I should be a political hypocrite. At the same time I extend my sympathy to him for the position in which he finds himself to-day—the Prime Minister pro tem with a cabinet of seven. It reminds me of that fine picture of the seven-headed monster drawn in Revelations which predicted the end of all things. I think we can make dismal predictions of the combination in the present case.

I studied astronomy, Mr. Speaker, many years ago, and I had the pleasure of looking through one of the most powerful telescopes to be found anywhere in the world. Sometimes there would be a little shadow or a dim outline on the object glass, a mere speck, but this would prevent me from seeing that part of the universe beyond. I sometimes think we have to get a little distance away from the situation in order to view matters in their proper perspective. We have some mute, inglorious Moses Aziz who has been guilty of nothing more nor less than of being a free trader. He has not gone to gaol quite so soon as some hon. gentlemen opposite would like to see him go. I contend that a gaol sentence for smuggling is wrong; I am absolutely opposed to it. I wish some future historian could view the situation as we view it here to-day, and in order to get that perspective of distance I am going to read now what I think some future historian will say about this occasion. I think it is quite in order to write what a future historian would have to say. If the hon. member for West Calgary (Mr. Bennett) were in his seat he would be digging up precedents and quoting from musty books. I am going to try a new method and to read from future history:

The natives of that period—

Meaning this.

—were a remarkably queer people. Their womenfolks wore low-necked dresses in winter and furs in summer. The working men spent a great deal of time and energy in building things which they called railroads, traces of which can still be found near a spot in the parish of Ontario where once stood the great city of Toronto—a prehistoric word meaning "good".

They also spent vast sums of money in digging ditches which they called canals. The remains of one of these canals was quite recently discovered at a place called Welland.

Concrete roads intersected the international boundary at strategic points offering facilities for tourists to enter the country. Luxurious tourist camps were, even in that unenlightened day, provided to offer hospitality to the stranger within the gates, but only after he was subjected to the most humiliating search of his person at the border. This proved very repugnant to the class who had the leisure and the means of travel and consequently the roads and camps were little used by the people of this period of which we write.

Scores of millions of dollars went into harbour improvements so that the great ships of all the nations of the earth seeking pleasure and trade would find anchorage and hospitality. Large sums of money were spent in sending trade commissioners to foreign lands to encourage international trade so that industry at home might grow and flourish. But strange to say this remarkably energetic people were no less remarkable for their stupidity. For, incredible as it may now seem, they passed laws preventing nations from trading with them except in a limited degree. Some of these laws placed embargoes on raw materials. Although the meaning of the word is somewhat obscure, at any rate authorities are in entire agreement as to the effect upon the country, for railroads rusted for lack of traffic and expensive wharves rotted in disuse. In the light of what we now know about trade and commerce one would think that these things had only to be stated to be understood.

The record is somewhat broken at this point, but it is now almost universally believed that what were known as the "common people" and another tribe known as the "consumers", were far in advance of the legislators of this period. So far, indeed, in advance were they that the customs and trade laws were disregarded and some of them openly violated even, it is reported, by the legislators themselves, although this latter has never been properly established.

Trade treaties still in existence supply the only authentic evidence that reforms were sought by the most liberal and progressive element of the people, but prior to the twentieth century little progress was made owing to the opposition of the Tories, a race now happily and totally extinct. The Tories blocked every Liberal and Progressive measure for tariff reform until things went from bad to worse. The government of the day offered an immence reward to anyone who could invent a tariff wall with valves in it that would open outward for manufactured products but not for raw materials and that would open inwards for raw materials but not for manufactured products. Many attempts were made to invent such a wall, but without success, because it was found impossible to distinguish between raw materials and finished products.

This led to a great deal of trouble resulting in international complications. The practice of what we now know as "free trade" was called smuggling and became so prevalent that every means, legislative and otherwise, was tried to put a stop to the practice. Men were thrown into gaols and dungeons for breaking the customs and trade laws, but upon release they invariably resumed their operations in the practice of smuggling because they were becoming too advanced to regard free trade as a crime. As a consequence of this, trade continued to flow then as now through the channels of least resistance.

Records of this time show that a society called the Protective Association tried to force their will and persecution upon a loyal but disobedient people. At this point the records are not clear as to whether this association was the same as the Canadian Manufacturers' Association or an entirely separate association. The best authorities differ and the matter may never be finally determined. This much, however, is clear that a veritable shower of terror and sparks descended upon Ottawa, then the seat of government and disorder. Matters were brought to a head by the greatest statesman of the period, one George Boivin, whether of French or Scotch extraction is not now clear. Mr. Boivin, allowed some mute, inglorious peasant called Moses Aziz to remain in gaol for three months for having smuggled goods in his possession. This raised such a storm of protest and indignation all over the country that a movement was started that resulted in the greatest reform of all times that we now enjoy, namely, universal free trade and peace and prosperity has returned to a smiling land.

That is, I think, somewhat along the line of what the future historian will write of this occasion. In conclusion, I am very glad that the amendment of the hon. member for St. James (Mr. Rinfret) has been declared in order and that we are to have a full and impartial investigation of the whole customs matter. It would be a crime if at this time a new government, if it is capable of sustaining itself in office for a few brief months, should have within its power to shut off investigation into the period before they left office in 1921 and to discontinue that probe into sections of the country where the investigation has not been carried so far. I look to get results from a full and impartial inquiry, results so great that this country, whatever the judgment of the House may be on this particular resolution, will speak in no uncertain voice in vindication of the ministry which has just retired and of the honour and integrity of one of Quebec's greatest sons.

Mr. ARMAND SYLVESTRE (Lake St. John): On any other occasion I would have ventured to address the House in English but as the question now under consideration is of such importance I think I had better speak in my mother tongue, with which naturally I am more familiar.

Mr. SYLVESTRE (Translation): I have closely followed this protracted debate. I have listened attentively to the speeches delivered. There was one which especially impressed me, and that was the speech of the hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Rhéaume), who clearly disclosed to the House one of the most shocking political plots, a real scandal in its truest sense. I mean the plot which was hatched last autumn in my province in regard to Mr. Patenaude's event. This new saviour, this new messiah, who, contrary to our Divine Master, was not born in a crib but in a hall at the Windsor, one of the finest hotels, in Montreal. The hon. member for Jacques--Cartier very clearly showed us who was the father of this new saviour, we discovered his paternity, and the hon. member further added—and it is a fact—that according to the civil code we have a right to carry on searches so as to discover the paternity; this right also implies the one of carrying on the search, I think, so as to discover the maternity in order to definitely establish to what concubinage or adultery Mr. Patenaude is the offspring.

Now that I have established my premises, I want to show the deceit which exists on one side of the House, where a mountain is made of the Moses Aziz incident, wheen it is they, the so-called very virtuous gentlemen, who impeach us the most, that are responsible for a state of things ten times worse. Because this new Messiah, sir, did not only carry on his propaganda in Montreal, he rambled through the province, he came to my county, and I well remember one night when this fine chub-cheeked baby recently dressed in swaddling-blue clothes was taken off the train with great precaution; he wished to impress us with the idea that he was born and likely to live, and all he was able to say on that occasion was this great axiom: "The country before parties"; as if it were not the parties who direct the country's policy. A scandal is at present being made of an insignificant affair, the Moses Aziz incident, it is simply the case of a man who was put into jail in December instead of August. There is another incident which is brought to light in this inquiry, a far more serious one than that of Moses Aziz, and upon which very little was said; I, nevertheless, intend to bring before the House the facts in all their details in order to expose the odium of those who seem to have a monopoly of all virtues and honesty; I wish to mention the Plamondon case. This incident did not occur under our reign, but under that of those virtuous gentlemen who have just crossed over to the right. This Plamondon case dates back to the year 1920. I first pick up the report of the inspectors of the department which is as follows, at page 2148 of the Minutes of Proceedings of the Special Committee on the Customs Department inquiry:

SIR,—I beg to enclose herewith seizure report 699 of three red copper stills and one galvanized tin still of the capacity of about thirty gallons, three lead worms, about 2,000 gallons wash, forty-five gallons spirits, 1.7 U.P. and a large quantity of other articles as enumerated on seizure report No. 699, excise form No. 4, executed on the eleventh instant against Mr. Olivier Plamondon, jobber and manufacturer of this city.

At 2 p.m. on the 11th instant, I was informed of a large illicit distillery being operated by Mr. Olivier Plamondon at 45 and 47 Sault-au-Matelot street, Lower Town, Quebec.

Accompanied by Mr. Excise Enforcement Leon Hardy I proceeded immediately to the premises above mentioned and we found the doors locked. Mr. Officer Hardy then broke open the doors and we found on the second floor the three copper still installed on three gas stoves ready to work. The four floors of the building were filled with barrels of wash which were transmitted to the stills through a rubber hose. We then seized the contents of the building, and officer Hardy was left in charge to supervise the work of removing all the stock.

Police Sergeant Ludger Couture was requested by me to have a constable in attendance at the doors of the building all the time so as to keep away the public and protect the plumbers I had hired to disconnect all the machinery, and labourers to destroy all the wash and help carters to remove all articles seized to the Customs examining warehouse. As Olivier Plamondon though was not found on the premises when we entered the building, it was apparent that somebody had been there operating the stills a few moments before our arrival. We could not place Plamondon under arrest immediately, but early on the morning of the 12th instant, as it was feared that Plamondon could escape, I have given instructions to Mr. L. Moraud, attorney for the department, to have necessary proceedings entered in court so as to have Plamondon placed under arrest. I am informed by Mr. Attorney Moraud that the warrant was immediately issued and executed and Plamondon pleaded not guilty before Hon. Judge Choquette yesterday and held for hearing on Thursday, 19th next on $2,000 bail.

Under these circumstances I think it would be advisable if the department were to instruct the attorney to take proceedings at once against Plamondon before the hearing of the case on the 19th because it is opportune that a severe punishment should be given the case in this instance so as to put a stop to this illicit trade which has been going on on a large scale.

This, Mr. Speaker, is far more serious than the case of Aziz, who had in his possession a few bottles of whisky. Here is a man who had in his possession four stills, 2,000 gallons wash and a complete apparatus ready to start, so much so that the inspectors of the department, on their arrival, were able to verify that it had just been used but that those in charge had probably been able to escape. It was certainly a very serious offence. If a man has a small personal still in order that he may distill for his own use a little whisky or what is called home brew, it is of course contrary to the law, but if a man possesses four stills, 45 gallons of whisky, 2,000 gallons wash—I am not a chemist in order to know what quantity of alcohol could be extracted, however, I state that the cases of Plamondon and Aziz cannot be compared, "the worst political scandal"—as our opponents exclaimed—that the country has ever witnessed, because a man had three bottles of smuggled whisky in his possession! What happened after? The attention of the lawyers having been drawn to these facts by the Inspectors, they immediately wrote to the Deputy Minister of Inland Revenue, on August 18, 1920, the following letter:

DEAR SIR,—We beg to send you herewith a preliminary report of proceedings taken by us against Olivier Plamondon, Jr., in whose possession three stills and a great quantity of alcohol and malt were found last week.

As it was urgent that proceedings be taken without delay, and as Messrs. Sévigny & Sirois, your solicitors, seemed to represent the defendant, M. Larue, your Quebec representative asked us to take the necessary steps for the immediate arrest of Plamondon.

We have acted in accordance with his instructions and Plamondon was arrested immediately. The accused then was let out on bail of $2,000, and the date set for the preliminary hearing in his case was the 19th of this month.

Owing to the fact that we have not received instructions from you, and due to Mr. Sévigny's absence to-morrow, we had that date changed for the 20th, and the preliminary hearing will take place on the later date.

We were informed this morning that Plamondon intended to plead guilty and as we feared that the magistrate might be too lenient towards the accused, we took it upon ourselves to have the following complaint sworn to before the magistrate.

(a) For manufacturing spirits illegally;

(b) For having had in his possession spirits which he knew had been illegally manufactured;

(c) For having had in his possession an empty barrel of spirits on which the marks have not been obliterated;

(d) For having sold spirits which he know had been illegally manufactured.

Now, according to the act, these charges were justified because they represent as many infractions as there are mentioned in the letter of Messrs. Moraud and Alleyn:

The letter continues:

We have also been instructed to lay an information against the party who had made stills.

The above informations were laid with a view to convincing the court that the accused is a dangerous criminal, so that he would get a proportional sentence, should he plead guilty.

This affair has moved the public opinion very deeply hereabouts, and has taken much importance, and the public opinion seems to expect that the guilty party or parties will be severely dealt with.

That is why we have thought it advisable to have the revenue officers to lay the above informations.

Will you kindly let us have your instructions without delay.

Yours truly,

(Signed) MORAUD & ALLEYN.

Here are the crown attorneys, who speak from facts and state, under their signature, that Plamondon is a dangerous criminal, that the whole affair has greatly stirred the population of the district. All these details are given; the department's attorneys fearing that the judge might be too lenient request that an exemplary punishment be inflicted—even should this man plead guilty—because he is a dangerous criminal. What happens after this? On August 19, with reference to the letter of the 18th, the following telegram is sent by the crown attorney to the Deputy Minister of Inland Revenue:

[M. Sylvestre.]

QUEBEC, August 19, 1920.

GEORGES W. TAYLOR, Esquire,

Deputy Minister, Department of Inland Revenue, Ottawa.

Your telegram received re Olivier Plamondon. The accused, through his attorneys Sévigny & Sirois . . . .

A nice situation! Note that it is therein mentioned "The accused through his attorneys Sévigny and Sirois". At first they were the department's attorneys.

Mr. DOUCET (Translation): Was that Mr. Sevigny whom you mentioned, a minister at the time?

Mr. SYLVESTRE (Translation): Mr. Sevigny was Minister of Inland Revenue and Speaker of the House when the Conservatives were in power.

An hon. MEMBER (Translation): What department had he?

Mr. SYLVESTRE (Translation): The department of Inland Revenue, I think.

Mr. CASGRAIN (Translation): Who was then Prime Minister?

Mr. SYLVESTRE (Translation): Mr. Meighen.

Mr. GERVAIS (Translation): Was it the same Mr. Meighen who is Premier to-day?

Mr. SYLVESTRE (Translation): Yes, the very same. It is stated in the telegram: "The accused through his attorneys". These lawyers who were Crown attorneys in 1920, had suddenly shifted in the scene; they became attorneys of the accused and Messrs. Moraud & Alleyn, who had acted promptly on the instructions of Mr. Hardy, had the pleasure of seeing their mandate confirmed in spite of the fact that Messrs Sévigny and Sirois were the Crown attorneys. The scene had shifted. Moraud & Alleyn were acting for Crown and Sévigny & Sirois became the attorneys of the great criminal.

I now return to the telegram of August 19, 1920, sent to Mr. George W. Taylor, Deputy Minister of Inland Revenue:

Your telegram received re Olivier Plamondon. The accused, through his attorneys Sévigny & Sirois, offers to plead guilty and pay the minimum fine of $200 without imprisonment and denounce the other parties implicated. Please give us your instructions before to-morrow if possible.

LUCIEN MORAUD.

On August 20, 1920, the following letter is addressed to Mr. Lucien Moraud, barrister:

Your letter re Plamondon received. Proceed as stated. . . . .

At the time Mr. Moraud had told the department that five complaints, five charges had been laid against Plamondon. He received instructions to proceed.

Your letter re Plamondon. Proceed as stated. See amendments mailed for increased penalty under section 185. No preliminary hearing should take place for complaint under 180, and case should be tried summarily as provided by 132.

This is not all, Sir. Probably overtures took place not only by letters and telegrams but also by the intermediary of the attorneys of the accused, and this was necessary, so as to establish the chain of evidence which might have been found wanting in the series of documents which were produced.

On the 20th of the same month the following letter was addressed to Mr. Moraud, the Crown Attorney:

AUGUST 20, 1920.

LUCIEN MORAUD, Esquire,
Barrister, Quebec.

DEAR SIR,—With further reference to my recent correspondence respecting the case of Mr. Olivier Plamondon, I am advised by Messrs. Sévigny & Sirois, attorneys for Plamondon, that the latter has given you the names of four other parties connected with this case, with the understanding that he is pleading guilty under section 180 but would be condemned to the minimum fine.

Such were the results of the steps taken Plamondon who is caught in the act, in violation of the act, for the sake of escaping the penalty provided in the Code, makes known the names of four other persons implicated in this affair, with the understanding that he will plead guilty and that he would be condemned to the minimum fine. The letter continues as follows:

I beg to state the department approves of this agreement and you are therefore instructed to lay one complaint only against Plamondon under section 180 of the act, either for having distilled spirits or for having a still in his possession.

Mr. GERVAIS (Translation): Who signed that letter?

Mr. SYLVESTRE (Translation): I have not finished reading the letter; I shall mention it at the end. So, the department was aware of the fact that they are dealing with a dangerous criminal; the department was aware of the fact that Mr. Moraud, on the instructions of the Inspectors, laid five charges against Plamondon.

The department was aware of the fact that Mr. Moraud on the instructions of the inspectors, laid five charges against the offender; moreover the department writes to Moraud: Act as you state in your letter, it is quite right. Only, on August 20 things are somewhat shifted around; Plamondon first says: If you will but condemn me to a fine. . . . Here we have a criminal caught in the act, who starts by making dishonest proposals which are finally accepted, and he further says: I shall divulge the names of four persons who are implicated with me, with the understanding of course, that one charge only will be laid against me and I shall be condemned to the minimum fine. One must not lose sight that the act states: a fine of at least $200 and not exceeding $500. That makes a great difference. Plamondon adds: "If you condemn me only to the minimum fine, that is $200, without jail, I shall plead guilty and make known the names of the other guilty parties." It is then that the department gives instructions to their attorneys to entirely approve these stipulations. The only reason why such stipulations were approved, were that Plamondon consented to give the names of four persons who were implicated with him in this affair. Extraordinary indeed, the department agreed not only that he should be let off with the minimum fine, but there was no mention of a jail sentence. And the letter is as follows:

You will note that section 180 states that the minimum penalty shall be $200 and one month's imprisonment. The department will not, therefore, insist on the imprisonment portion of the sentence, and the magistrate's attention should be drawn to section 1028 of the Criminal Code, which provides that whenever the offender shall be liable to different degrees or kinds of punishment, the punishment to be inflicted shall, subject to the limitation contained in the enactment, be in the discretion of the court or tribunal before which the conviction takes place.

The department through the intermediary of its Deputy Minister had already begun to bring pressure upon the judge. And so very scrupulous gentlemen, who were shocked at the sight of a man having a few bottles of whisky in his possession, and that a minister used his discretion in delaying his jail sentence, find it an ordinary incident, a natural thing, that an absolutely undue influence should be exercised on a judge, that his duty should be dictated to him, and that he should be told: "The act lays down such and such a thing, according to the act a fine and imprisonment should be imposed, but it matters little, lay these considerations aside." And these gentlemen are not shocked. When our hon. friends were in power, everything was permissible, everything seemed natural, they even had the right to try and influence a judge before he gave his decision in order that he should give judgment so to comply with a purely political object.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Shame!

Mr. SYLVESTRE (Translation): And the intrigues were still being carried on, Sir, the case goes from worse to worse. According to a letter dated August 25, 1920, addressed to the Deputy Minister by the crown attorneys, the following is to be found:

SIR,—Section 1028 of the Criminal Code provides that whenever the offender shall be liable to different degrees or kinds of punishment, the punishment to be inflicted shall subject to the limitations contained in the enactment, be in the discretion of the court or tribunal before which the conviction took place.

It is true.

It would appear this applies to section 1080 of the Inland Revenue Act, which imposes both fine and imprisonment. In fact this was decided in the case of Rex vs. Robidoux, 2, C.C.C. page 19, and also exparte Kent, 7, C.C.C. page 447. It was ruled in these cases that unless there is express provision to the contrary, an enactment which authorizes both fine and imprisonment for the summary conviction the offence is to be construed as giving discretion to the magistrate to impose fine or imprisonment, or both.

That is the crown attorney wrote a letter which is absolutely in keeping with the provisions contained in the Statutes. When a penalty includes a fine and imprisonment, it is according to law, and it was decided in the cases cited that the judge may impose one or the other or both at the same time. The judge, yes, but not the crown. The government has no right to direct the judge, as it was done in this case, to act in such and such a way, to influence his decision, to dictate to him his duty. Mr. Speaker, never have we witnessed such a disgusting procedure; here we find a minister, who for purely political aims, being fully aware of the situation and having to deal with a dangerous criminal, instructs the department to begin overtures in order to give this dangerous criminal his freedom. The letter continues:

If you refer to these decisions you will note that they were given with regard to prosecution taken under section 180 of the Inland Revenue Act, which is section 150 of the old act, so that there is not, in my mind, the slightest doubt that section 1028 of the Criminal Code applies to all prosecutions taken under above quoted section of the Inland Revenue Act.

This aparently does not satisfy Mr. Justice Choquette of Quebec City, before whom the department has taken a certain number of prosecutions, under section 180 of the Inland Revenue Act. Mr. Justice Choquette claims that as this section provides for both fine and imprisonment, he has no other alternative than to send him to jail, if the department may not insist on the imprisonment portion of the sentence. He has therefore requested the department, before rendering sentence, in each case, to obtain your opinion as to whether or not he may dispense with the imprisonment, and I shall be glad to have you advise me in this regard at your earliest convenience.

As the sentence against the parties concerned has been suspended pending expression of your opinion, I would request you to give the matter your immediate attention.

Now, it is included in the evidence that the department at that time took serious steps and proceedings in order to try to influence the decision of Judge Choquette who wanted to sentence the man to both a fine and imprisonment, as it was his right, and they endeavoured to find some way out, some means in order to protect a dangerous criminal by simply imposing a fine.

And this, Sir, did not occur under a Liberal government, it did not occur under the reign of those who, according to the Tories, have no knowledge even of what may mean the word virtue, but it did take place under a Tory administration, under the reign of our good Conservatives, under those who are shocked at a trifling, under the government of those gentlemen who are not aware that they are living in glass houses and that it is very dangerous for them to throw stones into their neighbour's garden; all this happened under the over virtuous administration which held power from 1911 to 1921!

These gentlemen were in too great a hurry to cross over to your right, Sir, where they are at present, I am confident that they will still make a quicker crossing to this side which they have just left.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

After Recess

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

PRIVATE BILLS

On the Order:

Mr. J. L. BROWN (Lisgar): By leave of the House, Mr. Speaker, I desire to present a motion referring to private bills.

Mr. SPEAKER: It cannot be made at this stage unless by leave of the House.

Mr. BROWN: By leave of the House I move, seconded by Mr. Evans:

That all bills reported this day in the eighth report of the select standing committee on Miscellaneous Private Bills, be placed on the order paper amongst private bills, for consideration in committee of the Whole, forthwith.

Mr. SPEAKER: I am sorry to say that this motion is out of order; such a motion requires unanimous consent. The same motion was made this afternoon, and the hon. member for Pontiac (Mr. Cahill) asked that notice be given. Otherwise it might be adopted unanimously.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN (South York): Mr. Speaker, before you leave the chair might I make a suggestion? A number of divorce bills on the order paper are being held up through the prolonged consideration of one other private bill, and I would like to see them brought forward first.

Mr. SPEAKER: This motion was made this afternoon, and an hon. member objected, as it is his right to do. According to rule 40 notice must be given, and notice was given this afternoon.

RED LAKE AND NORTHWESTERN RAILWAY COMPANY

The House resumed, from June 22, consideration in committee of Bill No. 95, to incorporate the Red Lake and Northwestern Railway Company—Mr. Heenan—Mr. Duff in the chair.

On section 1—Incorporation.

Mr. CHURCH: I do not wish the House to think I am taking an unfair attitude in regard to this bill, but there is a great public principle involved; the whole railway question of Canada is wrapped up in the principle involved in this particular bill. The province of Ontario is vitally interested in it; the territory to be covered is a part of the newer section of Ontario, and I believe it to be National railway territory. No matter on what side of the House I sit, I support my principles first, last and all the time, and I believe a great question of public rights is before the House now. The people of Canada have spent two billion dollars on railways and to-day the policy of Sir Henry Thornton is pro-American. He has millions of dollars in Vermont and millions of dollars in Michigan, but he has no money to build branch lines into the richest territory in Canada. The wealth of this country is unknown and unexplored; it contains about 4,000 prospectors, who require this service.

I contend, Mr. Speaker, that the province of Ontario, which according to a return which I received from the Deputy Minister of Railways only yesterday, pays $780,000 a year to the Dominion government out of a total revenue of $946,000, should receive more consideration. The young ex-Minister of Railways (Mr. Dunning) and the Progressives succeeded in having $28,000,000 spent on branch lines in the west for the benefit of agriculture. I am a supporter of New Ontario; I supported it in the old days when we wanted Sir Adam Beck to electrify the Temiskaming and Northern Ontario railway in order to preserve the great mineral wealth of that country for the people of Ontario. Now that wealth is controlled by American capital, together with the water-powers existing there. Once you give away the water-power you automatically give away the dominant factor in the industrial life of the country, and I contend that if the Canadian National Railways can afford to spend $28,000,000 on branch lines in the west they can afford to build a branch line here and preserve this territory.

I believe I am representing a great public policy and a great public principle in forcing a showdown with the administration of the National railways, so that New Ontario will be given what it deserves. I do not want the young member for North Timiskaming (Mr. O'Neill) to think I am opposing this bill because of any personal reason, but I want to see justice done to that territory not only by this House, but by the government of the province of Ontario as well. The Toronto Globe has been running a series of articles dealing with the Red lake district, its wealth and its transportation needs. I opposed this bill in the Railway committee on public grounds, because I believe Ontario to-day is only a way-station for the rest of Canada. Speaking of a ginger group, I believe that is the thing we in Ontario need; no province is suffering more to-day from a lack of transportation than is Ontario. The old Grand Trunk railway in Ontario was taken over by the government, and the money which should have been invested there was put into the National Transcontinental railway. What was the result. From that day to this the older sections of Ontario, as well as new Ontario, have been suffering untold ills from the lack of transportation; farmers have been unable to get their crops to market, there has been rural depopulation and lack of production.

In referring to the principle involved in this bill, I wish to quote from the report prepared in part by the present Acting Minister of Railways, the Drayton-Acworth report, which has a direct bearing on this particular charter. This report was made to parliament in 1917, after an exhaustive survey of the waste and duplication of railways in this country, railways that had been built without any possible hope of making dividends, let alone interest and sinking charges. This report says:

> We recommend that the jurisdiction of the railway commission should be enlarged. Charters for new railways are granted by the Dominion parliament in great numbers. In the years from 1900 to 1908, 116 charters were granted for 37,862 miles of line. Only 453 miles were actually built. In the two following years there were granted, according to a statement made in the Senate by the Hon. Mr. Davis, on April 6, 1910, respectively, 68 charters for about 68,000 miles and 75 charters for about 75,000 miles.

The commission further recommends:

> We think that no charter should be granted, till the proposals made have been investigated by the commission, and the commission have reported whether or not, in their opinion, the construction of the proposed line would be for the public advantage. The opinion of the commission will not necessarily bind the action of parliament.

Mr. HEENAN: Mr. Chairman, I rise to a point of order. The hon. member is discussing the principle of the bill. This bill has been before the Railway committee and is now being considered in committee of the Whole here, and I submit that we should be discussing the clauses of the bill at this time, not the principle.

The CHAIRMAN: I have to rule that the point of order is well taken. We are now on clause 1, which refers to the incorporation of the company.

Mr. CHURCH: The clause we are discussing involves the principle of the bill. The principle of the bill is in every section. I would like the hon. member from Kenora-Rainy River to tell me what connection Mr. Backus has with this particular bill.

Mr. HEENAN: Mr. Backus is opposing this bill, so he and the hon. member for Toronto Northwest are in the same boat.

Mr. CHURCH: It is well known that Mr. Backus went to the Ontario legislature in the days of the Farmer-Labour government, and that that government gave to Mr. Backus a whole kingdom up in New Ontario. Mr. Backus wrote a letter to the Railway committee offering to build this railway himself. I want to criticize the policy of Sir Henry Thornton and of the National Railways for giving up this territory. The other night we passed a vote of $3,000,000 for the Hudson Bay railway, and here it is proposed to build a line that will take away business from that railway. The province of Ontario has been sidetracked so far as branch lines are concerned.

So far as the principle of this bill is concerned, this is not a project for the general advantage of Canada. It cannot be considered such by the wildest stretch of imagination. The railway is to be built wholly within Ontario, and the promoters should have gone to the Toronto legislature for their charter. It was admitted that to come within the jurisdiction of this parliament the road technically had to cross the border into Manitoba. The Minister of Railways was asked in the railway committee what the policy of the government was regarding this particular railway, and he could not tell the committee. The National Railways have millions of dollars to spend on golf links and hotels and improving the system in the United States, in Michigan and Vermont, but when it comes to developing the mining industry of this country, where are they? We allow private interests, largely American, to get these franchises, and I say that it is the duty of this parliament to stop issuing these paper charters. We have a new Acting Minister of Railways, and his report was on the right lines when he recommended that we should go slow in granting such charters as this. This bill, Mr. Chairman, is 95 per cent a mining and a power bill, instead of a transportation proposition. I protest against the province of Ontario, which contributes 46 per cent of the taxation collected by the treasury of this country, being sidetracked in the matter of branch lines. In Manitoba and Saskatchewan the National Railways are building branch lines that will never pay dividends, let alone interest charges, and as one of the representatives of Ontario I protest against the shortsighted policy of the National Railways in failing to give Ontario the branch lines it needs, not only in the older parts of the province, but in the newer portions, in the Red lake district, for instance, and other portions of the province where branch lines are required to develop the mining industry in this province.

The richest mining country in the world today lies in the northwest section of the province of Ontario, including the Red lake district; as far as the Manitoba boundary, and also in the Cobalt and other districts where mines are being worked. This being the case I am sorry at the shortsightedness of the government of Ontario in writing to the Railway committee of the House of Commons and saying they had no interest in this bill. If there is one district in which the government of Ontario should be interested, it is New Ontario with its untold wealth. There are approximately 4,000 prospectors in the Red lake district at the present time and they can get a good road in there for a very small amount of money. But every member from Ontario who is loyal to his province should be in favour of the National railways building into that territory. If this bill passes, then good-bye to any possibility that Sir Henry Thornton and the National railways will do anything to develop this part of northern Ontario. Sir Henry Thornton has already spent millions of dollars on building golf courses and installing radios, on giving terminals to Detroit, and providing facilities in the state of Vermont, but when it comes to developing New Ontario that gentleman has no money at all available. I suppose if a branch line to the North Pole were needed he would not find it difficult to obtain the necessary financial aid. I believe those hon. members who are opposing this bill are acting in the public interest. If we mark time for a few days there is a possibility that the National Railways may yet be brought to time and made to realize the necessity of building into the Red lake district.

Mr. DUNNING: Will the hon. gentleman permit a question? A few days ago, when I was Minister of Railways, my hon. friend insisted that I should make a statement of the policy of the government of that day regarding this particular railway. Can he inform the House what the policy of the present acting, shadow Minister of Railways is with respect to it?

Mr. CHURCH: It is all very well for the hon. gentleman, who is a new member of this House, to talk.

Mr. DUNNING: I merely asked a question.

Mr. CHURCH: The hon. gentleman is "the young Napoleon" who has come out of the west but I tell my hon. friend—

Mr. DUNNING: Will the hon. gentleman answer the question?

Mr. CHURCH: The Canadian Pacific Railway on a hotel is spending $5,000,000 in developing his own town of Regina. I say further that he and the management of the National Railways have been able to get millions of dollars to spend on terminals in Detroit and other cities in the United States, but when it comes to something likely to benefit New Ontario they have not a cent for the purpose. The policy of the management of the National Railways is a most shortsighted one in view of the wealth waiting to be developed in New Ontario. The province of Ontario is entitled to better treatment than it has hitherto received, and the time has come for the formation of a "ginger group" to stand up for its interests in this House. A lot of money is voted for development work in other provinces but nothing for Ontario. I do not blame the late Minister of Railways for looking after his own province, in which he displays great interest; I am only sorry that we have not got somebody in Ontario as powerful and equally alive to the interests of the mining camps of that province. I have the utmost respect for the minister and he has shown great regard for the development of his own province. I read the recommendation of Sir Henry Drayton a while ago that all private charters should be reported by the railway commission.

Mr. DUNNING: Answer my question.

Mr. CHURCH: I am sorry that the mining industry of the province of Ontario has not received the support which it should have received. One of the greatest mistakes made by the late Sir James Whitney—and he did not make many mistakes—was in failing to electrify the Temiskaming and Northern Ontario Railway, and undertaking to provide cheap light and power for the miners and prospectors in northern Ontario. Had he done that, New Ontario would have had a population of half a million people instead of a population of 80,000, and the gold and silver production of the province would be ten or fifteen times what it is at present. A further result would have been that the population of Ontario would have grown to such a figure that it would have been entitled to a representation of ten more members in this House, and then that province would have got justice from this parliament. It is really most discouraging and most humiliating that the tax payers of Ontario, who pay 46 per cent of the taxation of Canada, cannot get one necessary branch line built into the northern districts of the province where untold wealth is waiting to be mined.

Mr. ARMSTRONG (Timiskaming): Coming from the north country and being very closely allied with its interests I wish to speak on this question for a few minutes. We who went to northern Ontario before the advent of railroads are thoroughly familiar with its problems. We had hoped in past years that the provincial and the Dominion governments would be the chief agents in developing the great industries of northern Ontario. I was a member of a delegation which interviewed Sir Adam Beck and asked him to get the Hydro Electric Commission to develop power in New Ontario. We were flatly turned down on that occasion. We were told that the Hydro Electric would not undertake the development of power in the north country; it would cost them more than it would cost private interests. At that time we were paying $250 per horse-power in the mines but to-day as a result of development by private interests it costs only from $50 to $60 per horse-power. There would not have been a wheel turned in the north country to-day if it had not been for the ingenuity and the energy of private interests. I believe that if it were possible the Ontario government and the Dominion authorities should come in and carry on development work; but if they will not do so why should private interests be debarred from doing the necessary development? I say here to-night that there would not have been many mines discovered in northern Ontario if we had relied only on the provincial or federal government. Every mine discovered there has been discovered by a prospector, the pioneer of the north country.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): How were the nickel mines at Sudbury and the silver mines at Cobalt discovered except through public ownership and the construction of a railroad by the government of the late Sir James Whitney? That country was not developed by prospectors, it was developed as a result of the policy of Sir James Whitney in causing a railway to be built through the mining district.

Mr. ARMSTRONG (Timiskaming): No mine was discovered by any government. Both the Larose and the McKinley-Darragh mines were discovered by prospectors, not by the Whitney government. The provincial government, it is true, sent a prospecting party to co-operate with the prospectors. They also started a property known as the Provincial Mine, but it was not followed up and it turned out to be a dud. Since then the provincial government have entirely abandoned the policy of prospecting the north country; they have left it entirely to the prospectors, who are deserving of credit for the energy and heroism which they have displayed. I want to say another thing for those prospectors. In that country we are greatly indebted to prospectors who go into remote districts and make discoveries, although they have no money and scarcely anything but a grubstake. They have to take in their train a canoe in the summer or a dog-team in the winter. It costs twice the price of the ordinary express on the National Railways. That is what the National Railways do to assist prospecting. It is almost impossible for some of the poor prospectors to take their equipment from Cobalt to a point west of Red lake. Some interest must be shown in the prospectors.

We have attached great importance in past years to the work of the pioneers in agriculture. The agricultural area in our country depends entirely upon the mining area. You cannot send your agricultural products out of our country; the agriculturists have to depend upon the mining people for a market, and mining and agriculture in our part of the country go hand in hand. Since I came to that country more than a hundred thousand people have been brought in. If the government do not intend to do something in this connection they should give private ownership an opportunity. I am not speaking particularly in favour of this railroad or against it, but I am in favour of allowing private enterprise an opportunity of building up a greater northern Canada.

Mr. EVANS: I would have thought, after the many times this bill has been before the House, the promoters would have withdrawn it for good. They must, however, be admired for their persistence. The many times this bill has been before the House I have tried to get some information as to the promoters and as to the need for such a railway. It is a project that does not appeal to most of us and it cannot but be detrimental to the National Railways. As yet we have had very little information forthcoming. Trying to get some information regarding the feasibility of this road, I find that Mr. Lloyd Moore, financial editor of the Toronto Globe, has lately given a detailed account which goes to show that not only is the railway not needed but the whole thing is simply a gigantic swindle.

His article in the Globe reads:

> After four days of travelling around Red lake, it seems quite apparent that the snow-stakers are showing little interest in real work now that the fictitious market for claims has settled to a more reasonable level. Dome and McIntyre are carrying most of the load. 'Much credit is due Dunlop, Red Lake, for the aggressive policy that is being pursued. Some encouragement has been given in the work done already, and there is a reasonable probability that the outlook will improve as the exploration programme is advanced further. The effort being made by the Dunlop syndicate deserves a more detailed description which will be given out later.

But as to the other great syndicates and those who are responsible for the rush, he says that they are simply marking time. The date of this paper is June 25. The writer goes on to say:

> With hardly a single exception, the other syndicates are resting on their oars making no real attempt to fulfil the glittering promises made when Red lake syndicate flotations were in vogue. Here and there small parties are at work, but the whole situation is much less active than might be expected, taking into account the obvious importance of the Howey discovery and the favourable geological conditions that prevail over a large part of the Red lake district. The prospectors have not made the most of their opportunity. No work whatever has been done on the many scores of locations that want attention. Some snow-staked ground was sold early in the season at fancy prices and the unsold claims have been left alone. Such neglect does not affect the public as directly as the inativity of syndicates in which investors have placed their money.

The whole thing seems to be almost a great swindle. As many went in there before the winter was over, much hardship ensued as a result of the false news spread throughout the country by syndicates and prospectors who had no other interest in the whole matter than that of prospectors' earnings. But now apart from all this there is another feature that ought to appeal to this parliament at this time. While we were trying to get some policy laid down by parliament, the former Minister of Railways (Mr. Dunning) said that they had no interest in the matter. I am sure that the present Acting Minister of Railways, (Sir Henry Drayton), who has taken over his office to-day, after his very exhaustive report of some years ago when he advised that there should be only two railway systems in Canada, will have something to say on this matter. But there is an interesting side for the people of Canada to consider regarding granting charters of this kind.

According to the Canada Year Book our railway debt to-day amounts to more than $2,000,000,000. Many are favouring private enterprise. I think we should encourage private enterprise all we can; but in answer to the hon. member for South Timiskaming (Mr. Armstrong), I want to say that the railways are public utilities and should never be allowed to drift into private hands. The people should keep them under their ownership and control. It has become a habit with some of our big men, bank managers, railway magnates and others, to denounce government ownership, and to denounce the National railways in particular. They would at this time give the National Railways back into private hands because they say it is too costly for the people. The cost to the people will be the same whether it is for private gain or even to make up a deficit. The substance of these remarks generally is to the effect that the National Railways are too heavy a load for the people to carry, but the fact remains that while our National Railways to-day are showing a deficit annually, the privately-owned system is returning very handsome profits each year. Some 10 per cent dividend is paid year after year by that system and in addition to this very large surpluses are added to reserve. There is no doubt that had both systems been under one efficient management our railways in the year 1925 would have reported a surplus instead of a deficit.

Our railway situation at the present time is something like this. While the taxpayers have to find money to meet a heavy deficit in connection with the national system the earnings from carrying charges as shown by the private concern have left a very handsome profit in the final accounting. The result is that the deficit in connection with the national system and the profits made by the private company are together a heavy burden on the industry of the people, for the extra amount which we have to pay in the form of charges for railway service may be described as taxation. If the railways were all under one management the Canadian people would this year, I repeat, have had the benefit of a surplus in connection with the National Railways.

The dangers attending public ownership seem to be a bugbear to some people. They would take our railways to-day and place them in private hands, but they want to leave the debt for Canadians to bear later on. There is a sum of $2,400,000,000 to-day on which interest must be paid, and it is not likely that any private concern would take over the railways at that capitalization. While speaking on this subject I am reminded of the words of the Acting Minister of Railways (Sir Henry Drayton) contained in the report which he submitted along with Mr. Acworth in the year 1920, to the effect that there should be only two systems of railway in this country from henceforth.

Why should we at this time start another system of branch railways as a result of which we should have probably a repetition of the debacle that now faces us? Facts and figures are sometimes presented in such a way as to mislead the public. The opponents of the National Railways never tell us that the reason for their hostility to the public ownership of public utilities is the fact that it interferes with what they consider the sacred right of some people to exploit the public for private profit. It is certainly strange, as the president of the Canadian National Railways pointed out recently in one of his speeches, that no danger was apprehended when the Canadian National Railways were piling up a huge operating deficits, which their opponents were quite willing to have the country bear. No one appeared to worry over that fact. But now that times have become more stable, now that the country is coming back to normal conditions, there is no doubt that, with the various roads making up the system coordinated and operating as a unified and efficient whole, large operating profits are anticipated. And as the president of the national system remarked, "whispers of death" and other newspaper articles have begun to appear in the press. I quote the words of Sir Henry Thornton:

> Can it be that our great financial experts would rather see our national road making tremendous operating losses than see them get out of the red ink and operate on the right side of the ledger to the tune of, say, $32,000,000 a year?

According to the Canada Year Book at the end of 1924 the total capitalization of the National Railways has stood at $2,326,411,356 of which $608,624,084 represents stocks, leaving a funded debt of $1,717,787,272. A very large part of this immense sum was lent or given by the government to these roads when they were in private hands and bond issues were guaranteed in respect of it. The part of the debt which is not to-day represented by earning capacity is as much a part of the public debt as even our war expenditure and should be so considered. The railways should be relieved of this burden. But when we have a project such as this, which is going to add rather than take from the burden of the debt which we now owe on our railways, it is time for this parliament to outline a specific policy regarding our railways. I must confess that I am in favour of government ownership. It has been one of the planks of the farmers' platform for many years and we have seen no reason to change our mind on the subject. When we have such a legacy of debt to meet, bequeathed by the unreasoning optimism of the boom period, which came to an end just about the time the war began, surely we should consider this matter very carefully.

A few years ago it was not safe for anybody to say anything against the boom in railway construction. Anyone who at that time demurred against the credit of the country being granted in aid of railway promoters was thought fit perhaps for a lunatic asylum. Now we have to pay dearly for our ill-considered expenditures during those years. To-day the Red lake district is not suffering for lack of a railway. No one knows yet whether the settlement there will be permanent, and as one writer says, those who have gone in there are simply biding their time, leaning on their oars and waiting for somebody else to take the burden of developing the country.

When we were building branch railway lines ahead of settlement our bank presidents did not take the trouble to warn the people of over expansion of our railway system. I must add that they did not refuse to profit by the commissions which were paid them for acting as financial agents for the government or the railway promoters. Nor do the annual statements they now publish show that they have suffered at all by what they call the intolerable burdens the country has to bear. We know the burden of taxation year by year is increased by railway deficits, all because of the indiscriminate granting of railway charters in years past—charters for just such projects as this Red Lake railway. These men boast of their great prosperity, but a glance at the market reports showing the prices at which the shares of their companies are quoted would indicate that they at least are all right while the people are still carrying the burden. The same interests who would transfer our National railways to private control complain bitterly of the additions to our railway debt, but they were absolutely necessary to provide capital to put our railway system into a condition of operating efficiency. There is no doubt that those interests would prefer to see the Canadian National Railways starved so that the country would in sheer desperation be eager to turn the system over as a gift. Those selfish interests would be willing to see the Canadian National Railways go from bad to worse until we were willing to abandon the property on any terms. Then our financial benefactors could step in and salvage it on their own terms, but leave the debt on the hands of the public.

Now, when a private corporation finds that as a result of inflation or over-expansion its capital is far in excess of the dividend-earning capacity of the plant it writes the capital down and the shareholders bear the loss. If to-day the capitalization of our National railway system were written down to something like its true value—during the years of the boom we paid at least one-third too much for all our material—that system would show a profit on operation. A recent noteworthy example of this writing down of capital is the great English company of Vickers Limited, a company of international reputation. Its share capital has been written down some $60,000,000. It would be better perhaps if we put the capitalization of our National railway system at something nearer the real value and earning power of the road. If that system were returned into private hands does any hon. member suppose for a moment that its capitalization would not be written down?

Progress reported.

CUSTOMS INQUIRY

REPORT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE—MOTION FOR CONCURRENCE AND AMENDMENTS THERETO

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Mercier (St. Henri) for concurrence in the report of the special committee appointed to investigate the Department of Customs and Excise, the proposed amendment thereto, as amended, of Hon. Mr. Stevens, and the proposed amendment to the amendment of Mr. Rinfret.

9 p.m.

Mr. SYLVESTRE: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the government if there is any ground for the rumour that they will resign by reason of the adverse vote this afternoon?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: We appreciate jokes.

An hon. MEMBER: Dispense.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: We may dispense with the joke.

Mr. LAPOINTE: It is a good thing you do.

Mr. SYLVESTRE (Translation): Mr. Speaker, when the House rose at six o'clock, I had reached the point where the Department of Inland Revenue had begun to have doubts in regard to the interpretation of Section 180 of the Inland Revenue Act connected with Section 1028 of the Criminal Code, which determines what penalty the judge had a right to inflict. This section 180 is as follows:

Every person who without having a license under this act, then in force,—

(a) distils or rectifies any spirits, or makes or ferments any beer; or

(b) assists in distilling or rectifying any spirits, or in making or fermenting any beer or wash in any unlicensed place; or

(c) imports, makes, commences to make, sells, offers for sale or delivers any still, worm, rectifying or other apparatus suitable for the manufacture of wash, beer or spirits, or for the rectification of spirits, or any part of such apparatus . . . . . is guilty of an indictable offence, and shall, for a first offence, be liable to a penalty not exceeding five hundred dollars, and not less than one hundred dollars, and to imprisonment, with or without labour, for a term not exceeding twelve months and not less than one month, and, in default of payment of the penalty, to a further term of imprisonment not exceeding twelve months and not less than six months.

This section 180, has been amended by the Statutes 10-11 George V, chapter 52, clause 4 and the minimum fine was then fixed to $200 instead of $100 as it was previously. The government of that day, that is the Department of Inland Revenue, under the direction of a good Tory, absolutely wished to save the hide of his friend, Mr. Plamondon, and as the attorneys had been communicated with as to doubts existing whether the judge should sentence the man to both a fine and imprisonment or simply to a fine, the case was referred to the Department of Justice. On August 25, Mr. Moraud, at the time attorney to the department, received the following telegram:

Have sentence against Olivier Plamondon suspended pending opinion of Justice Department on section 180 Inland Revenue Act. Instruction to prosecute other parties being mailed.

On August 25, the opinion of the Deputy Minister of Justice had been received, certainly an authority on the matter, his answer was as follows:

Referring to your letter of this date, No. 4552, in connection with the prosecutions pending before Judge Choquette, of Quebec City, under Section 180 of the Inland Revenue Act, I am of the opinion that Section 1028 of the Criminal Code clearly authorizes the court to impose a fine or imprisonment or both for infractions of said Section 180 of the Inland Revenue Act.

Now, Section 1028 of the Criminal Code is as follows:

Whenever it is provided that the offender shall be liable to different degrees or kinds of punishment, the punishment to be inflicted shall, subject to the limitations contained in the enactment, be in the discretion of the court or tribunal before which the conviction takes place.

The letter to which I have just referred, dated August 25, 1920, was signed by W. Stuart Edwards, Assistant Deputy Minister of Justice. That is to say the Department of Inland Revenue, so as to have a clear conscience, having referred the facts to the Deputy Minister of Justice, the latter confirmed by letter the decision of Judge Choquette who had come to the conclusion, after Plamondon had pleaded guilty, to sentence him to a fine and jail. The situation was critical, both for the protectors and protected. Other means had to be found. What was done? On August 27, another letter was sent to Mr. Lucien Moraud, attorney to the department., which is as follows and is signed by the Assistant Deputy Minister of Inland Revenue:

I beg to enclose herewith a communication received from the Assistant Deputy Minister of Justice, with regard to the interpretation of Section 180 of the Inland Revenue Act. You will note that it is therein stated that Section 1028 of the Criminal Code gives the magistrate discretion to impose either a fine or imprisonment or both in any prosecution under the above quoted section of the Inland Revenue Act.

The instructions were therefore clear and precise. By all means a way out had to be found so as to prevent that dangerous criminal, to which the department's attorney had referred to, going to gaol. What was done? Overtures were started in order to withdraw the charge which at the time was before the judge, and to which Plamondon had pleaded guilty, an attempt was made to withdraw the charge in order to substitute another, and this time in such a manner that Plamondon would only be sentenced to a fine. What happened? A letter dated September 2, 1920, signed by Moraud & Alleyn, attorneys to the department was sent to the Deputy Minister of Inland Revenue:

SIR,—In accordance with your instructions contained in your wire of the 28th of August, and confirmed yesterday by 'phone—

It was urgent, they wired, wrote and telephoned.

—we have made a new complaint against Olivier Plamondon under Section 185 of the Inland Revenue Act, and have applied for withdrawal of the complaint already laid under section 180.

Mr. Justice Choquette hesitates to take it upon himself to allow us to withdraw our complaint for the following reasons: Plamondon on first appearing before Mr. Justice Choquette after his arrest, pleaded not guilty. A few days later, after the department has been consulted and an understanding reached that Plamondon should plead "guilty," he would not be condemned to jail, he again appeared before Mr. Justice Choquette and changed his plea of "not guilty" to one of "guilty."

We applied this morning to be allowed to withdraw that complaint, but the court refused, on the ground that we could not withdraw such complaint when the accused had pleaded "guilty." The latter immediately moved to be allowed to change his plea of "guilty" to that of "not guilty," so that we could withdraw our charge.

Mr. Justice Choquette took the motion "en délibéré" holding that Plamondon could not be allowed to change his plea again, and stating that he would submit the matter to the Attorney General of the province of Quebec, in order to know whether he could accept this new change of plea.

The matter is now in the hands of the Attorney General, and should the latter be willing to permit it, Plamondon will be allowed to change his plea so as to enable us to withdraw our charge under section 180.

The other accused parties have been arrested, and their trial is bound to come up next week. We will keep you informed of any new development.

I respectfully submit, Sir, if ever we have had a gross example of denial of justice, of odious interfering, it is in this case. Here is a man who has pleaded guilty to a charge bearing both a fine and gaol. The judge sentences him to both. Proceedings are started. The accused's attorney, who is no more nor less than the ex-Minister of Inland Revenue himself, the Hon. Mr. Sévigny, who was even Speaker of this House, applies to the same department, to induce them to have the judge's decision changed. As a rule, everybody has a great respect for judges. The courts enjoy the respect of all, one never interferes, neither directly nor indirectly, nor especially by means of undue influences, in order to shield a political friend. But in this case they want absolutely to whitewash Plamondon and it is requested that the department should bring weight to bear upon the judge. And it is what the department does, by letters, telephones and telegrams, however, without success. It is then that the attorney general shortly after came to a decision, because when a charge is laid before the court, especially when the accused has pleaded guilty, it is not a question of private interests between two parties, but of public right, as for instance, whether the law has been observed or not. Consequently no one had the right to withdraw this charge, no one had a right to prevent the carrying out of the sentence which had been passed by the judge on Plamondon. Nevertheless, for gentlemen who become very scrupulous when they learn that a man has been so unfortunate as to keep three inoffensive little whiskey bottles at home, they are deaf to this state of affairs, they close their eyes and give us evidence of bad faith by not blushing ten times more than in the case of Moses Aziz!

And still the case goes on. It is real romance this affair of Plamondon. Never did political men take steps with such assurance and with such gross violation of the law, purely and simply to shield Plamondon who was a political friend.

Furthermore, on September 9, 1920, another letter from Messrs. Moraud & Alleyn which is as follows:

OTTAWA, September 9, 1920.

DEAR SIR,—With further reference to the action taken against Olivier Plamondon, in connection with the seizure of stills, we beg to report as follows:

As mentioned in our letter of the 3rd of this month, on instructions from you, we applied for withdrawal of the complaint laid against Plamondon, under section 180, and laid a new complaint against him, under section 185, on which he pleaded guilty. Mr. Justice Choquette then stated that he could not allow us to withdraw our complaint against Plamondon, under section 180, because the latter had pleaded guilty. He took the case en délibéré and rendered judgment yesterday morning. By his judgment he decided that Plamondon could not change his plea of "guilty" to that of "not guilty" on the charge laid under section 180 and that we could not withdraw our complaint. He therefore proceeded to sentence Plamondon to $200 and two months in jail. The latter has taken an appeal and has been liberated on bail, pending the decision of the court in the appeal. Sentence has been suspended on the charge laid under section 185 until the Court of Appeal has decided the other case.

The Court of Appeal will sit in October. Kindly advise us what your instructions are concerning the appeal entered by the defendant. Will send you a complete report on the whole matter in a few days.

Yours truly,

MORAUD & ALLEYN.

What happens next? On September 9, Plamondon was condemned to $200 fine and two months in gaol. What was there to be done to have the sentence commuted? All the witnesses which had given evidence, all the attempts made to try and prevent him from going to gaol having failed, there remained but one last procedure, a last straw to save the drowning man: it was quickly seized. The Prime Minister of the present government, the Right Hon. Mr. Meighen, stated the other day that the moment a sentence is passed, no one has a right to intervene; well, what happens in the present case?

Steps were taken in order to have the sentence commuted, and they succeeded, for on October 7, 1920, a letter from the Acting Deputy Minister of State is sent to the Deputy Minister of Inland Revenue and later communicated to the crown attorney. The letter is as follows:

CANADA, DEPARTMENT OF SECRETARY OF STATE,
OTTAWA, October 7, 1920.

SIR,—Referring to your letter No. 4852 of the 18th ultimo to the Remissions Branch, Department of Justice, dealing with an application of clemency made by Sévigny & Sirois, Barristers, of Quebec—

This is always Mr. Sévigny, the ex-Minister of Inland Revenue and ex-Speaker of the House.

I continue to read the letter:

—on behalf of one Olivier Plamondon, who was recently sentenced by His Honour Judge Choquette to pay a fine of $200 and to serve two months' imprisonment for possessing an illicit still, I am commanded to inform you that his Excellency the Governor General has been pleased to order that Plamondon be not called upon to serve the sentence of two months' imprisonment, and that he be released from further liability for this sentence as soon as the $200 fine has been paid.

His Excellency's decision has this day been communicated to the Solicitor for Plamondon.

I have the honour to be, sir,

Your obedient servant,

P. PELLETIER,
Acting Under-Secretary of State.

To the Deputy Minister of Inland Revenue, Ottawa, Ont., Canada.

Here is a man who is sentenced by the court to a fine of $200 and to two months in gaol. An appeal is made, why? The case which I have just submitted is not based on supposition, but on evidence, on facts proven at the Committee of Inquiry on the administration of the Customs Department. An appeal is made but only for the form, for there is evidence to show that little attention was given to this appeal from the moment the sentence of gaol was commuted by the Governor General. The principal reason why Plamondon escaped being lodged in gaol was also established. It is that he, the most guilty one besides being caught in the act, promised, in order to save his hide, to become a Crown witness so as to have four men, who had assisted him, sentenced. He denounced his employees—as it came out in the evidence that these men were employed by Plamondon—and as a reward for his treachery, his gaol sentence was remitted and he only had to pay the fine of $200. Furthermore: he was given the share which was owed to him as an informer. He paid the fine to which he was sentenced from the money he received as an informer and he pocketed the balance.

To sum up the case, here is a man who in August is found in possession of three copper stills and another galvanized tin still of a 30 gallon capacity, three lead worms, about 2,000 gallons of wash, 45 gallons of spirits—a sufficient quantity to quench the thirst of many people. This man escapes the severe penalty which he deserved from all angles and in all justice for the simple reason that he was a political friend of the government of that day—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Shame! Shame!

Mr. SYLVESTRE (Translation): —and because he gave information against his employees and had them sentenced. He had to meet five charges. On an order from the minister four of them were withdrawn; this was still in gross violation of the law, for when a charge is made, especially by a public department, it is not a question of private interests, it is a case of public interests, it is a question of finding out whether the law has been violated or not, because everybody must respect it. And the moment there is evidence of violation of the law, no one has a right to intervene, especially in such a grossly and indecent manner as was done in the present case, when they wanted to influence the judge, when they wanted to withdraw the charge after Plamondon had pleaded guilty. To-day, I appeal to all those who wish to look into the Moses Aziz case without any prejudice. I appeal to all those who want to pause a moment and compare the two cases. Can a scandal be made out of an insignificant thing as the Aziz case, and no mention be made of a case so serious in consequences as that of Plamondon?

I am also sorry, Sir, that this inquiry was directed exclusively against Quebec. I am not aware that we are more dishonest or less virtuous than are the other citizens of Canada. I am wondering why there are two weights and two measures, why the Liberals, connected with the Aziz affair must be looked upon as black sheep, when the Conservatives connected with the Plamondon affair are spotless white lambs?

The inquiry should not have been limited to Montreal. Certainly there are other centres in Canada where smuggling is carried on. There are centres in Ontario, and important ones, which are much nearer to the United States than the city of Montreal is. The province of Quebec has been subjected to many an assault and will be subjected to many more, however we are proud of the part we have played in every circumstance and it is not the insults that may be directed against us which will change our attitude.

Mr. Speaker, it is a beautiful thing to hear patriotism and loyalty proclaimed. I do not know if my friends on your right, Sir, have the same knowledge of the history of Canada as we possess. I was listening, for instance, the other night to the hon. member for St. Lawrence and St. George (Mr. Cahan) who was saying that he had a thorough knowledge of the characteristics which predominate in the province of Quebec and that this inquiry was not directed against it. He may know our characteristics, but we also know ourselves, as well as he does, and if we refer back to the history of Canada, let our friends on the right, Sir, learn, if they are unacquainted with the facts, that if the Dominion of Canada still forms part of the British Empire, it owes it to the loyalty and courage of the French Canadians of the province of Quebec. In 1760, when we passed under another flag, we were guaranteed by the constitution the free exercise of our language and religion. In return, we swore allegiance to the King of England. And faithful to our oath 50 years after, when we were attacked by our neighbours the Americans, in 1812, 1813 and 1814, who saved the country? Overtures were made to our ancestors, to the ancestors of those who belong to the province of Quebec; but faithful to our oath, we held out bravely, it was a handful of French Canadians, who under the walls of Quebec, repulsed the invasion, while another handful of French Canadians under the orders of de Salaberry repulsed the American invasion on the shores of the Chateauguay river, and the empire was saved. What our ancestors did, we have continued to do and shall carry on in spite of suspicious tactics, and insults, in spite of all the means which may be sought in order to discredit us and make us pass for what we are not.

This is why, Sir, it behooves us to consider the question, at present before the House, to discuss it calmly without endeavouring to rouse political passions, without seeking to appeal to race and class prejudices. I feel convinced that if we consider the question in this manner, the House will approve of us, for the Moses Aziz incident is certainly not sufficient to make a mountain of it, while those gentlemen who are opposite have much to hide but do not seem to realize it. Mr. Speaker, I feel fully confident on this question and I hope that the House will approve of our stand.

> Notwithstanding the time devoted by the committee to the taking of evidence the matters referred to it by the order of reference could not be completely reviewed. Much evidence was taken in connection with the port of Montreal; the situation at Beebe and Rock Island, Quebec; and the operation of distilleries. The committee have also with some detail examined into liquor smuggling in the Maritime provinces. The committee have examined in a general way the conduct of business at certain customs ports of Ontario. The committee have not dealt, except incidentally, with the middle west and the Pacific coast. To a degree, therefore, this report is incomplete and suggestive rather than final. Full audit and extra-departmental investigation would be profitable in improving the service and recovering a large amount of revenue.

I submit, Sir, that so far as the public of this country is concerned that representation discloses a very distinct limitation in matters as they stand at present. It discloses that the investigation was incomplete in many particulars; incomplete as to the localities investigated and incomplete as to industries investigated, in particular, several distilleries and the business they are carrying on. It is incomplete, moreover, as to the parties investigated; incomplete in fact for the most part with respect to many phases of the subject matter the committee was called upon to inquire into. The evidence was sufficient to disclose that there is great need for a very full, complete and exhaustive inquiry into the evil of smuggling and into the problem of collecting the revenue as it has developed. The people demand to-day that the matter be not allowed to stand where it is at present but that the fullest possible investigation be made from the Atlantic to the Pacific, in order that something comprehensive and constructive may come from the discussion which has taken place in this House. I submit, Mr. Speaker, that it would be nothing short of a public scandal if, after the amount of time devoted to this inquiry by the committee and after the discussion which has taken place in this House with respect to the committee's report, matters were permitted to drop before the public was perfectly satisfied that the investigation had been thorough and complete on all essential points.

May I now draw the attention of the House to the amendment moved by the hon. member for Vancouver Centre, the minister without portfolio, who at present is administering the Department of Customs (Mr. Stevens). That amendment contains no suggestion of a continuation of the investigation; the amendment is largely confined to a vote of censure on ministers of the crown and is a political amendment purely and simply, evading altogether the matter of primary interest and concern to the people of Canada, namely, whether or not means can be discovered effectively to combat the smuggling evil, to what extent frauds may be taking place in different parts of Canada, and to what extent there is need for redress. I cannot dwell too strongly, Mr. Speaker, on that phase of the amendment moved by the hon. member for Vancouver Centre, because it illustrates two things: one, that he who has taken the most interest in the work of the committee evidently felt satisfied when he had completed the investigation at Montreal and the investigating of a few officials from the province of Quebec and one or two officials of the Department of Customs here, but he was not ready to move in this House that an investigation should be continued into the customs ports of such large centres as Toronto and Winnipeg, his own city of Vancouver, and the cities of Halifax and St. John; also was not prepared to advise the House that a complete examination should be made into the affairs of the distilleries that have not been investigated.

I submit, Mr. Speaker, that what the public wants is a very full investigation into all the phases of this matter which I have indicated. It was not until the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) moved an amendment that the House had before it the constructive proposal of a judicial investigation to continue the investigation which the special committe commenced—a judicial investigation that would take up the work that had not been reviewed by the committee, and that would also afford opportunity where there was reflection upon the personal character of any man, for him to have a judicial hearing before being condemned in the eyes of the public. That, Mr. Speaker, is an all important feature of the amendment which was moved by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre; he did have regard for what in British fair play and justice is regarded as all important, namely, that a man whether he be a humble citizen of the land or a minister of the crown, before he is condemned should be entitled to an investigation conducted in a judicial manner and in a judicial atmosphere.

When we on this side were in office we accepted the proposal of a judicial investigation. We intimated that if it were given to us to carry on, that investigation would be made comprehensive, that it would extend to the different centres that I have mentioned and to the different industries to which I have referred, and that it would be made a thorough inquiry, so that this House when it assembled at the next session would have before it the evidence which was taken by that commission, and would also have before it the report of the commission itself, the findings of the commissioners and any recommendations they might have to make, and that the House might be in a position to do something really constructive by way of such further reform as might be considered necessary. However, the amendment was voted down, as the House will recall, by a majority I think of two.

Then what to all intents and purposes was the same amendment was moved by the hon. member for Last Mountain (Mr. Fansher), and that subamendment was agreed to and was added to the amendment. May I point out this circumstance to hon. members of the House? When that amendment was carried in that form, the one criticism that I heard coming from the official opposition, and which I heard made also by members of the Progressive group and others in this House, was that that judicial investigation would be carried on by the government of the day, and that the government of the day would appoint as investigators judges in whom they might have confidence, but in whom perchance members of the opposition, members of the Progressive party and citizens of the country generally would not have equal confidence; in other words, that the judicial commission would be a commission chosen by the government of the day to conduct the investigation in a manner that would please the government of the day. That was the criticism that was directed against the amendment as amended as it stood at the time the late administration went out of office. Before going out of office we considered very carefully that phase of the question. We believed that the people of this country would expect the government that undertook the work of cleaning up this smuggling evil to appoint a commission in which there would be absolute confidence, a commission with respect to the findings of which not an hon. member of this House, nor a single citizen of this country, could take any exception. We conferred among ourselves as to the manner in which that all important end could best be attained, and we came to the conclusion that the manner in which that end could best be attained would be through the appointment of a commission of judges, three in number, one to be named by the Prime Minister of the day, the second to be named by the leader of the opposition, and the third to be named by the leader of the Progressive party. I submit, Mr. Speaker, and I wish to say it as emphatically as I can, that I believe it is a commission of that character, and of that character alone, that the people of this country will be satisfied with on this all important national problem. I venture to say that those whom hon. gentlemen opposite, members of the Conservative party, represent, will expect them to name on the commission a judge in whom the Conservatives of this country will have confidence. I know that so far as the Liberals of this country are concerned, they will expect that an opportunity will be given for the Liberals to name a judge in whom the Liberals of this country have confidence, and I believe that the same will be found to be true with regard to those whom the Progressive members of this House represent, that their constituents will expect them, if the opportunity is offered, to give favourable consideration to an amendment which will give to their leader the right to name on a commission to investigate this all important matter one in whom they have entire and perfect confidence. I repeat that no other commission will satisfy the public demand at the present time. I submit that all the discussion that has taken place in the last few months before the committee of this House, and the discussion that has taken place in this House of Commons has aroused public feeling with respect to the hideousness of certain features of this national evil and national menace.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Hon. gentlemen say, "hear, hear." Then I say that if hon. gentlemen are sincere in their "hear, hears" the one way to bring about reform is to give to this country a commission in which the entire country will have confidence. I submit further, Mr. Speaker, that in view of the manner in which this whole question of vital national importance has become a matter of political controversy and of political strife, nothing will satisfy the people of Canada to-day, with respect to settling this question in a proper way other than a commission that will have on it representatives of the three parties that compose this House of Commons. I want the House to stop and consider, as I ask the country to stop and consider, what better guarantee could be given to the nation that the work will be done thoroughly, that the work will be done honestly, that the work will be done effectively, than that each political party in this House will be put in the position of vying with the other political parties in seeing that there is brought to light in the fullest possible way everything that should be disclosed in connection with the existing situation. The late government was prepared to make that proposal had it continued in office.

An hon. MEMBER: When?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Before the government went out of office, the amendment which was proposed to-day was shown to several hon. members of this House, and it was indicated very plainly that that was the amendment which was intended to be moved from the then government side as a subamendment to the amendment as soon as opportunity was presented therefor. Such was the case. However, it makes little difference whether such was the case or not, so long as at the present time the House has before it an amendment to that effect. The amendment which the opposition, through one of its members, has offered to the House to-day was in the same language and the same words as the amendment which the late government had intended to offer. I say it is due to the people of this country, it is due to these who are represented by the different political parties, that such a degree of confidence as to the thoroughness and fulness of the investigation shall be given to them now that the opportunity has presented.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: Do we not consider our judges trustworthy, and is the right hon. gentleman suggesting that each party should name one judge who would be practically a representative of that party?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Assumedly all the judges of the country are trustworthy, but I do say that human nature being what it is, the public would have more confidence in a tribunal constituted in the manner I have suggested, nominated by representatives of all sides of the House than they would have in judges appointed by hon. gentlemen opposite.

May I further direct the attention of the House to this fact: Hon. gentlemen opposite who have been most active in the work before the committee have carried the work just as far as it would suit themselves. If the subamendment to the amendment is not carried we will have to consider the amendment as amended, and that amendment will give to hon. gentlemen opposite solely, and only to them, the nomination of the judicial commission that is to carry on the inquiry. I submit, Mr. Speaker, that the public will not have the same degree of confidence in a commission appointed by hon. gentlemen opposite in that way as they would have in a commission appointed in the manner I have indicated. I say that without any desire to reflect on hon. gentlemen opposite because when I had the honour of filling the position of Prime Minister, in seeking to suggest a commission that would invite and secure public confidence, I proposed to give to the leader of the opposition and to the leader of the Progressive party that very opportunity for the reasons I have mentioned.

Mr. QUINN: Did you do that when you appointed a commission on Maritime rights?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: We will take one commission at a time. My hon. friends opposite will have an opportunity to have such a commission if they have not faith in the Maritime rights commission as now constituted. But what I wish to make clear at the moment is that I do believe that nothing short of an inquiry by a tribunal as representative as I have mentioned, conducting an investigation in a manner as thorough as we have proposed, will be satisfactory to the people of Canada.

Mr. BELL (Hamilton): Will the hon. member tell us the occasion on which he proposed that the judicial commission he now speaks of should be appointed? I am not asking this for the purpose of challenging his statement, but merely because I want accurate information with respect to it.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I have mentioned that already. I have said that before the government went out of office I had shown the amendment to several members in this House, and those members are within the hearing of my voice at the present time. It was not an amendment I presented, because an opportunity had not been afforded for doing that; it was an amendment prepared in advance because of the criticism that the amendment as moved by the hon. member for Vancouver Centre, and amended by the amendment of the hon. member for Last Mountain, left to the government of the day, and to the government of the day only, the appointment of the judges who were to compose that tribunal.

Mr. BELL (Hamilton): On what date was that amendment drawn up?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I cannot say offhand. However, I am not standing here for the purpose of being cross-examined; I have given my word and I hope my hon. friend will accept it. May I add this further word as to why that subamendment seemed to me all-important? The amendment of the hon. member for Vancouver Centre, as I have already indicated, was aimed primarily at passing censure on the Prime Minister and members of the government, at passing censure on the Hon. Mr. Boivin, at passing censure on persons who had no opportunity whatever of appearing to answer charges that might be brought against them. I ask hon. gentlemen opposite when was I, as Prime Minister, told that there were to be charges in the form of censure against myself and members of the administration in any amendment to the report which the House would be asked to adopt? When was the Hon. Mr. Boivin told there was going to be a finding in the nature of a vote of censure by this parliament? No chance whatever was afforded him to appear before a judicial tribunal and disclose whether or not those charges were well-founded. I stated the other day, and I repeat to-night, that the former Minister of Customs and Excise, Mr. Bureau, states that he is prepared to go before any judicial tribunal.

An hon. MEMBER: Why did he not go before?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: There was not a judicial tribunal of this character for him to go before. However, he asked that I should state on his behalf in this House that he was prepared to go before any properly constituted judicial tribunal and answer for his administration as Minister of Customs and Excise with respect to the particular matters mentioned in the report, and any other matter which could be alleged against him. I made the further statement that I thought a commission of that kind should be appointed that I thought the Hon. Mr. Bureau should go before such a commission; that he should be heard; that that commission should examine thoroughly into his whole management of the department, and that if the commission found that in any way he was wanting in the discharge of his duties or was guilty of conduct which was not befitting a minister of the crown, I as the leader of the Liberal party would ask him to resign his seat in the Senate of this country and would expect him to do so. I wish to repeat that announcement at this moment. If that commission is appointed on which the Conservative party will have the naming of a member, on which the Progressive party will have the naming of a member and on which the Liberal party will have the naming of a member, I will expect Mr. Bureau to appear before that commission to be examined by each one of those judges, and I will expect this House to have before it at the next session of parliament the finding of those judges upon the conduct, behaviour and administrative character of the work of the late Minister of Customs. If as a result of that finding there should be anything that reflects upon Mr. Bureau's character or upon his management of the affairs of the Department of Customs, then, as I say, I will as leader of the Liberal party ask and expect him to resign from the Senate of Canada. In accordance with the principles of British justice can anything be fairer than that?

As the amendment is brought in this afternoon it applies solely to the hon. member for Shefford (Mr. Boivin) who until two or three days ago was filling the position of Minister of Customs in this House. The amendment moved by the hon. member for St. James (Mr. Rinfret) does not confine investigation to one minister of customs; it extends the investigation to an examination into the administrations of any or all ministers of customs. It takes the very charges that are being made by hon. members opposite against the hon. member for Shefford and it states to all intents and purposes that inasmuch as the late Minister of Customs has never had an opportunity of appearing to be heard before a judicial tribunal in his defence in a manner which would enable him to have his position stated as a judicial body would state it—

Mr. DUNNING: And never been censured by the existing committee.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: —and as my hon. friend says, never been censured by the existing committee, he should be given such an opportunity before he is condemned in this House. Inasmuch as the committee which brought in this report did not find that it was possible for a majority of their number to agree upon a censure of the late Minister of Customs, why should this House, without an opportunity of reading the evidence, which opportunity I venture to say none of us has had, without an opportunity of having the benefit of the knowledge which they had, purely and simply for political reasons condemn the hon. member for Shefford in this manner? The public who have a sense of fair play and justice will demand that that course be pursued; they will not be satisfied with any other course than a judicial inquiry. There will always be a lurking suspicion that the amendment of my hon. friend, should it carry, was an amendment moved for purely political reasons. No man or woman in the country will feel secure in his or her mind that real justice has been done to those whose names are mentioned in the amendment.

Further, with respect to anyone whose name is mentioned in the report or in the evidence, I do not care who he is, be he a member of parliament, be he an official of the Department of Customs, be he a citizen of the country who is neither an official of the government nor a member of parliament, if in any particular there be reflection upon his name or character in what has come before that committee, he too should be made subject to investigation by this judicial tribunal. Can anything be fairer than that? That opportunity should be given to anyone who is named in any way.

I understand that in the committee itself the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Kennedy)—and I mention him specially at the moment because I think he will wish to see justice done in this matter—was unwilling to vote especial censure against the hon. member for Shefford, the late Minister of Customs. I ask whether the hon. member for Peace River, having regard to his desire to see justice and fair play done to a fellow member of this parliament, is not going to be satisfied that all the public interest as well as the ends of justice and truth will be rightly served if he along with his leader has an opportunity of naming one of the judges on this commission and the commission is composed also of a judge appointed by hon. gentlemen opposite as well as a judge appointed by the present opposition. These are considerations of a practical and immediate character and should be taken into account at the present time.

More than that, over and over again we have heard, during the course of this late inquiry, query after query as to why it was that only ministers of the late government should have their administration investigated and that there should be no inquiry into the administration of the Customs department when hon. gentlemen opposite had some of their friends and their number at the head of affairs. I do not reflect and I do not wish to reflect upon any previous ministers of the crown; but knowing the character of the men who have surrounded me of late, I do not propose to say that hon. gentlemen opposite have men of any finer character in their party. I venture to say that an investigation of the Customs department as it has been conducted during the last ten, fifteen years, will bring to light a good many things that will help to explain the situation that we are trying to account for at the present time.

Hon. gentlemen speak about degeneracy in the service. Degeneracy does not start in one or two years; it is a matter of years, and you discover degeneracy only after the evil has had several years to run. The source of degeneracy lies in the past, not in the present. Degeneracy is the fruit of past evils, and I think it will pay this country to have an investigation made that will go back into the past and see how the Customs department was administered under hon. gentlemen opposite. But do you suppose if it is left to my hon. friend opposite to make an inquiry, should by any chance this phantom administration continue, they are going to extend it back into the past? I would have to have more confidence in them than I have at the moment to believe anything of the sort. So I say, whether we have regard to the subject matters to be investigated, whether we have regard to the extent of the investigation, whether we have regard to the individuals whose conduct should be inquired into, whether we have regard to public officials, ministers of the crown, past or present, the course which has been suggested in the amendment now before the House is the right and proper course and the only one which will completely satisfy the citizens of this country.

Let me in conclusion say this: If we have to wait till hon. gentlemen opposite get their government into working order we may find in the Customs service new developments which will not be wholly creditable to the country. Ministerial responsibility surely stands for something. The hon. member for Vancouver Centre talks about ministerial responsibility in his amendment. I should like to know what ministerial responsibility we have in Canada to-day. We have opposite four or five hon. gentlemen without portfolios, each one of whom assumes ministerial responsibility for half a dozen departments. I say, Mr. Speaker, it will be a miracle if within the departments of the public service conducted under such management there do not develop difficulties and problems of a character one would hesitate to suggest. I say that the interests of the country demands, not that the invesigation should be postponed until doomsday, but that immediately there should be appointed such a tribunal as I have indicated, which will be able to conduct the inquiry in a thorough, efficient and perfectly impartial manner, and submit to this House such material as may be necessary as a basis upon which to make needed improvements in the public service and to remedy the evils that have been complained of. What is required is a tribunal which will serve the national welfare in a way the country has reason to expect.

Hon. H. H. STEVENS (Acting Minister of Customs and Excise): With the concluding words of the leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) I am in hearty accord, namely, that a judicial inquiry should be made without delay and should be carried forward to a conclusion with all expedition possible under the circumstances. May I at once direct the attention of the House to the fact that in the amendment adopted unanimously the other evening on the motion of the hon. member for Last Mountain (Mr. Fansher), amending the motion which I myself had made, this recommendation is proposed:

> Your committee recommends the appointment of a judicial commission with full powers to continue and complete investigating the administration of the Department of Customs and Excise and to prosecute all offenders.

The other day my right hon. leader (Mr. Meighen), on behalf of his followers in the Conservative party, accepted that amendment in toto, and I am authorized to state to the House now that the right hon. gentleman, as well as this government, will stand or fall by it. This amendment was accepted as a full expression of the wish of those who desire that such an investigation should be in the nature of a judicial inquiry, and it was frankly and freely received and given the unanimous endorsation of the House. Now the hon. member for St. James (Mr. Rinfret) comes forward and moves another amendment. The hon. gentleman always speaks with great courtesy and skill as well as with moderation, but I would point out that in substance his amendment has for its object not the appointment of a judicial inquiry, but rather the striking out of that portion of the original amendment proposing the censure of those responsible for the breakdown in the Department of Customs in the past. That is the object of the hon. gentleman's amendment; of that there can be no question; and the addition of the words suggesting that the inquiry shall be conducted by three judges is really immaterial.

Let me examine the situation as briefly as possible. What is a judicial inquiry? Under all known precedents in this country and in accordance with the method which has been followed from time immemorial, a judicial inquiry is one conducted by a member of the judiciary, and it has been universally recognized in the past that the judiciary of Canada were of such a trustworthy character that any judge appointed to inquire into any subject might be expected to make a report that would be genuine and that would meet with public approval. The proposal of the ex-Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) is that three judges shall be appointed, of whom one shall have the peculiar confidence of the Liberals of Canada, one the confidence in particular of the Conservatives, and the third the confidence of the Progressive party. I submit that the very nature of such a commission indicates that it will represent partisan or political views. There is no escape from that inference. In other words, the suggestion is that in the appointment of such a commission we shall free these judges of non-partisan restraint and ask them instead to represent us respectively as Liberals, Conservatives and Progressives.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: In view of what the hon. gentleman has just stated, does he consider that the judges so appointed would necessarily lose their judicial character because they were nominated by the parties?

Mr. STEVENS: No. I do not want to be disrespectful, but I do submit that the amendment is not a sensible one, because, in my opinion at least, a judicial inquiry presided over by a judge of the land would in any event have the confidence of the Canadian people for the reason that we believe our judiciary to be a non-partisan body.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hope would be that the judge named by each party would be of such well known character and reputation that he would command the confidence of the entire country.

Mr. STEVENS: I can only remind the right hon. gentleman of his own words. A moment ago he asked whether anyone in this House would believe that a judge appointed by hon. gentlemen opposite—pointing to ourselves—would conduct a fair and judicial inquiry.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No. I said, would command the same measure of confidence as if each party had the right to name one judge.

Mr. STEVENS: It will be conceded, I think, that the meaning is the same. However, we will not quarrel over that point. What I am trying to bring to the attention of the House is the fact that a judicial inquiry such as the House has already approved of by unanimous vote is the sort of inquiry we propose to give.

I come now to the next point raised by the leader of the opposition. The right hon. gentleman says that action should be taken without delay. I may assure him, on behalf of the present government and those on this side of the House, that action will be taken in the immediate future, as promptly as possible, and that this judicial inquiry will be vigorously prosecuted. I go further. We have approved of the report, and we do not purpose to delay for a year or for nine months putting it into full effect while an inquiry is being held. This report contains many valuable suggestions and proposals that ought to be put into operation forthwith.

Now, the right hon. gentleman says there was no opportunity for him to appear before the committee.

Mr. ROBB: Before leaving that,—my hon. friend has promised an immediate inquiry, which we all desire. Will he or the leader of the House say, on behalf of this government, with only one member properly sworn in, the others all acting ministers, that they have any right to make appointments of any kind until they are approved by the people?

Mr. STEVENS: That point has been raised two or three times.

Mr. ROBB: It was raised earlier in the session.

Mr. STEVENS: I will proceed to answer my hon. friend. I would suggest this to the fair-mindedness of hon. members, many of whom possess that quality in a considerable degree. This government came into office under most extraordinary circumstances. My right hon. friend walked into the House yesterday and without notice stated that he had resigned, giving no opportunity for the formation of another government. Within twenty-four hours a government—certainly not a finished government, as we all know—was formed. A few hours ago my hon. friend from St. James (Mr. Rinfret) twitted us a little on being somewhat in the position of my right hon. friend when he met parliament in January last. But he had two full months to form a government; we had twenty-four hours. That is a vast difference. We are not pleading for any special consideration on account of these circumstances, but in all fairness and justice it ill behooves any member, particularly any member of the late government, to reproach the present government because it is not fully organized within twenty-four hours.

Now, my right hon. friend said there was no opportunity for him to appear before the committee. This committee was in daily operation for four and a half months, and held one hundred and fifteen sittings.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My point is, there was no opportunity to appear to answer the charges there that were made.

Mr. STEVENS: The only charge made was one which my right hon. friend knows is a perfectly proper charge. It is a charge that his administration, having had control of affairs for a period of years, must be held responsible in the eyes of parliament and of the country for the condition of the department at the end of that period. There was not a sitting of the committee when the right hon. gentleman and any of his colleagues, or the ex-minister himself, would not have been welcome before it. My right hon. friend and other hon. members have rather suggested that in some way or other I am responsible for his failure to appear before the committee. Let me again remind the House that we—speaking for the party to which I belong—were never in control of the committee. I want to say in justice to my hon. friend from St. Henri (Mr. Mercier), chairman of the committee, to the hon. member for West Middlesex (Mr. Elliott), who for a time was on the committee, to my hon. friend from West Lambton (Mr. Goodison), and to my hon. friend from Vancouver North (Mr. Donaghy), that they were fair. There were sharp cleavages of opinion at times, but I have not a single complaint to make of the treatment I received on that committee. Now I say to my right hon. friend there was opportunity at any time during that period—and many things arose which called for the presence of the late Prime Minister or his colleagues to explain—for him to have appeared if he had chosen so to do.

To-night, as I think he did on Friday evening, my right hon. friend defends the late minister.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I take immediate issue with that expression. I have made no defence whatever of the late minister. I cannot make that too plain. I have no defence of any character whatever to make for the late minister. All I do say is, the late minister should be given an opportunity to defend himself before he is condemned, and he should have that opportunity before a judicial tribunal.

Mr. STEVENS: I cannot put any other interpretation on my right hon. friend's words than that of a very hearty defence of the late minister, but I accept—

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I did not defend for one minute anything respecting the late Minister of Customs. I expect him to answer for himself.

Mr. STEVENS: I am very glad to have that statement from my right hon. friend and I accept the correction. I should like, however, to point out to the House that in my estimation it is altogether late to offer excuses for the ex-minister, and to say that another tribunal should be erected before which he can go and defend his position, because the report contains these words:

> The Hon. Jacques Bureau, the then Minister of Customs, failed to appreciate and properly discharge the responsibilities of his office, and as a result there was a lack of efficient, continuous and vigorous control of subordinates by the headquarters staff at Ottawa.

I admit, Mr. Speaker, that that is not what might be called a violent censure of the ex-minister—

Mr. CANNON: If my hon. friend will allow me? In fairness to everybody I would remind him that there is one word, and a very important word, left out in the quotation he has just read—the word, "apparently."

Mr. STEVENS: I will read the whole clause:

> The evidence submitted to the committee leads to the general conclusion that for a long time the Department of Customs and Excise had been slowly degenerating in efficiency, and that the process was greatly accelerated during the last few years. Apparently—

Mr. CANNON: There it is.

Mr. STEVENS:

> —the Hon. Jacques Bureau, then Minister of Customs, failed to appreciate and properly discharge the responsibilities of his office,

And so on. I admit that that is not what might be termed a severe censure of a minister; it does not condemn any personal delinquencies. But here is the point, Mr Speaker: This minister had passed off the scene, he was out of the department, and it was known to the committee that there were matters which might have been brought forward, but which perhaps it was desirable should not be.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: There I say, Mr. Speaker, that in fairness to any man those matters should be brought forward and the ex-minister should be given a chance to answer them. There should be no innuendoes.

Mr. STEVENS: I am going to deal with that in a moment. I desire to be fair, but I do say that it was not our business to persecute the ex-minister, to pillory him. He was no longer the minister of the department, and this finding was perhaps the best that could be secured from a committee consisting of four of his friends, four of his opponents, and one independent.

Another word with respect to the report. I beg hon. members to take note of this—the report itself suggests a full audit and an extra-departmental investigation. These are, I may say, my own words, and were the best I could get into the report. I think in the original draft the suggestion was put in stronger language, but my colleagues agreed with me that such an investigation, whatever form it might take, should be of an extra-departmental character. It was felt it would be unwise to recommend to the House that the department itself should conduct the investigation, and there was unanimity in this recommendation, which left it open to the government to determine what form that extra-departmental investigation should take. Let me state what led to the wording of this clause. It was suggested that perhaps the Audit Board could make the investigation, then that the Finance department, being vitally interested in the class of service rendered by the Department of Customs and Excise, might conduct such investigation Then it was suggested that perhaps the Auditor General might be the proper officer, or that it might be a special commissioner or a judicial inquiry. They left the matter open for the House to determine, or for the government to determine, and we have determined that by the amendment which I have read. This my right hon. leader and all his colleagues have accepted in toto, a judicial inquiry as suggested by the hon. member for Last Mountain.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I take another point. My right hon. friend says, "Why, this government will only investigate the actions of the late government; they will not go back." Then he called in question the action of the committee in not digging into the past, although he added the assurance that he did not wish to reflect on that committee.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. STEVENS: That has been on the lips of several; my hon. friend from Regina (Mr. Dunning) says, "hear, hear." Let me just say a few words in regard to that, and let us look at it very frankly. For four and a half years the late government had absolute, untrammelled access to all the records of that department. For at least two years, or at least eighteen months, they were aware that something was seriously wrong within the department. With that knowledge, with full access to the files, with all the records before them, I ask whether it is fair for the right hon. gentleman to come to the House now and say this committee has not discharged its duty, that it should have dug into the past. If there was anything wrong it was the duty of the late government to expose it. Not only is that the case, but when I made my motion in February the original draft suggested that a committee of the House be appointed to investigate conditions in the Customs and Excise Department within a certain limited time. So far as I was concerned that limit was prompted because of the knowledge that conditions within the department, as the report stated, had been accelerated in the last few years, or had been more pronounced in the last few years. Then the hon. member for Shefford (Mr. Boivin), then Minister of Customs, suggested an enlargement of that motion. My right hon. leader accepted that suggestion and no limit was placed beyond which the inquiry should not go. Now I ask the House in fairness to myself whether I should be blamed personally for a delinquency in that regard; I ask the House if it is reasonable to ask me to have done a great deal more than I did—and I am speaking now in the personal vein. I had a certain definite task to perform; I did my best, and while my actions may have been faulty and many others could have done better, I say with a clear conscience that I did my best in the circumstances. Hon. gentlemen opposite placed four men on that committee, four of their own members. Other than sitting in the committee, where only a portion of the work was done, they did not join with me. Most of my work was done outside of the committee, preparing for the work therein. But those members sat on the committee and served well and faithfully; they had every opportunity I had; they certainly had a willing minister to help them; they had everything the minister could give them in the way of files and information, and while I do not say there is any blame, if there should be such I submit to the House that it should not be placed upon my shoulders, but should rest upon their own party.

I think my right hon. friend was not only a little but very unfair to me in the suggestion—I was going to say innuendo—which he made. He said, "Why, the hon. gentleman only investigated one or two ports; he centred his attention on Quebec." I pause at that point to say that there was no suggestion whatsoever of centering upon Quebec. In Quebec we have a city of which I think every Canadian is proud. I am not saying this in specious flattery, but because in Montreal we have a metropolitan city of which any country might well be proud, not only because of the beauty of its position but also because of the immensity of its commerce. In that great metropolis there was necessarily a concentration of activity in regard to this matter. You would not go to some little outport to look for the seat of the trouble; it was because this activity converged on Montreal more than on any other centre in Canada that the investigation was centred there. And let me say also that I did my utmost, without support, to uncover the conditions which obtained at Windsor and at Niagara Falls. I did achieve some success, but not very much. I want to say to my right hon. friend, however—and I will deal with some of these matters in a moment; I do not wish to be too long, but I think it is important more or less to cover the subject—that nearly all of the investigation having to do with liquor smuggling was centred in the province of Ontario. It is true that the head office of one concern affected was in the city of Montreal, but the main activities were either on the Atlantic coast or along the Great Lakes. So, Mr. Speaker, it is not correct to say that the investigation centred only in Quebec.

And the right hon. gentleman said more. I find his words in Hansard of the other day and he repeated them to-day, so I am sure he will not question them. He said, "Why, I have been informed that the smuggling in Vancouver was worse than at any other port."

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. STEVENS: Very good. For four and a half years he had the reins of office and he now tells this House—condemning himself out of his own mouth—that he knew that smuggling in Vancouver was worse than in any other port of Canada. Is it proper, is it fair or just for the ex-Prime Minister to come forward now and say, "For four and a half years I had the reins of office; for eighteen months, I have been thoroughly apprised of the conditions within the Department of Customs", and yet he tells us that for a portion of that time Vancouver has been the worst place in Canada and not one single thing has been done by him or by his late government to remedy conditions.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I did not say that I knew there had been smuggling in Vancouver. My words will be found in Hansard, and I said that I had been told.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Those are my words—that I had been told there was more smuggling at Vancouver; I had been told that within the past week or so.

Mr. STEVENS: I think I have the very words my right hon. friend has mentioned, and I will read them:

> The facts speak for themselves. . . . the port of Vancouver has not been investigated.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. STEVENS: Some hon. members sitting around him said at that time, as they say now, "hear, hear". This is the way my right hon. friend approached it to-night. He proceeded thus the other day:

> I am told there is more smuggling going on in the port of Vancouver than in any other port in the Dominion.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: "I am told" —hear, hear.

Mr. STEVENS: The taunt was against myself, that I had deliberately suppressed an investigation into the port of Vancouver, and had turned my attention to Montreal.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend is quite wrong. I was not reflecting on him at all. I was urging that there should be an investigation of the port of Vancouver. I was not making any reflection on my hon. friend.

Mr. STEVENS: I accept my right hon. friend's explanation, and I am very glad to have it. But the point is this, Mr. Speaker: I give to the House frankly and fairly this statement, that I did what I could within the four and a half months of the inquiry. If any man could have worked harder—I may have worked foolishly—I would like to know in what respect it could have been done.

Now let me turn to a little different phase of this question. Since this debate began, about a week ago, arguments have been advanced somewhat to this effect; that the criticism of the opposition of that time when my amendment was moved was prompted wholly by political motives.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. STEVENS: All right. We will not at the moment debate or combat the suggestion. My hon. friend from Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) in what I thought was a very moderate and well-reasoned speech, used that argument very strongly, and he pleaded for himself this: Being here in the House almost isolated, how could he be expected to share in the partisan views of either the Conservatives or the Liberals? That was, I think, very largely his argument. Now I put this in fairness to my hon. friend. Suppose the situation were to be reversed; suppose he were sitting in this House, by the changes in political fortunes, at the head of 100, 110 or 120 members of the Labour party of Canada. Does he not think that in any move that he might make as an individual he would in that case be open to precisely the same charge of being partisan if he proposed or opposed a certain thing? How could he escape that charge? He has a logical and a philosophic mind, and I ask him how, under such circumstances, he could escape that charge. I say this to my hon. friend, and to my hon. friend from Labelle (Mr. Bourassa) also, because he made some remarks along the same line: The only way in which it is possible for an individual to escape being charged with partisanship is to separate himself entirely from others, and to stand alone as an individual and as a pure independent.

But not very much, either in the nature of progress or reform, in the suppressing of evil in public life, has been accomplished or can be accomplished by individual effort. There must be co-ordination of effort, there must be co-operation amongst those holding common ideas. I ask my hon. friend at least to give me credit for this, that whatever may be the circumstances in which I raised this question, I was actuated by a genuine desire, as I think he has been and is, to do what I could, as I saw it, in what I believed to be the best interests of my country.

Strange to say, the hon. member for Joliette (Mr. Denis) on the same evening, if I remember rightly, denounced us because we have allowed the estimates of the Customs department to pass last year, and the year before, I think he said. Now what were the circumstances? and here I call my hon. friend the then Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) to witness. He knows, and there are others on the other side who know, that the Hon. Jacques Bureau when he came into this House with the estimates he was in such a state of health that all of us knew he was not fit to be in the House attending to his duties. We knew that, and my hon. friend knew it—

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: What does my hon. friend mean by that remark, "not fit to attend to his duties?" Does he intend by that remark to cast any reflection upon the character of the Hon. Mr. Bureau?

Mr. STEVENS: I am speaking at this moment with all the sympathy that one human heart can have for another.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am not speaking of sympathy, but of justice. Does the hon. member intend to reflect by that remark in any particular on the character of the Hon. Jacques Bureau? I ask him that question.

Mr. STEVENS: I cannot understand my right hon. friend.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think everyone else will understand me. I ask him, is he in his remarks directly or indirectly reflecting upon the character of the Hon. Jacques Bureau?

Mr. STEVENS: In what I was saying at that moment there was not only no reflection, but I was speaking out of the full sympathy of my heart, absolutely, and I was going to add this. My hon. friend from West York (Sir Henry Drayton), who was then financial critic for the opposition, came to those of us on the other side of the House at that time and said: "The Minister of Customs is in bad health, and his estimates, so far as we know, are all right." At that time we had no idea whatsoever that there was anything wrong within the department, and the hon. member for West York asked us, as his colleagues, to let the estimates of the Minister of Customs go through with little or no criticism, and that, as a matter of fact, is what happened. There are hon. gentlemen opposite who are gentlemen enough and who are fair enough to agree that these words are absolutely correct. Now my hon. friend from Joliette taunted us that that had been done, that we had let those estimates pass, and he said that because we had allowed them to pass, because we had not criticized the department, we were to blame for the degeneracy in the department. That is not a fair argument. So far as I am concerned I had not the remotest idea, Mr. Speaker, until last winter that there was anything seriously wrong in the Customs department. I add this: I have known the Deputy Minister of Customs for twenty years, and it was not until this inquiry commenced and I had access to the files, to the correspondence and the facts, that I became aware of the delinquency of the Deputy Minister of Customs. I say that I had known him intimately for twenty years and had held him in the highest esteem, and there was nothing more painful to me in this inquiry than to be forced by my knowledge of the facts to put my imprimatur upon a report that reflected somewhat harshly upon that gentleman.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I come to another point that has been repeatedly discussed, and which I think deserves some consideration. It has been stated that the information which formed the basis of this inquiry was, to use the words of the ex-Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell), stolen. The accusation was that I had virtually connived at the stealing of this information, and had used it as a basis for attack.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Not stolen, but smuggled, I think was the expression.

Mr. STEVENS: Let us look into that closely for just a moment. First of all my right hon. friend said, speaking of myself:

All of this information was from government sources and from Inspector Duncan.

Now in the first place, Mr. Speaker, that statement is not accurate. Inspector Duncan, as far as I know, dealt with a certain branch of the department, and so far as the information which he secured is concerned—I shall deal with that later in a moment—certainly it was used. But so far as all of the information regarding alcohol and the dealing in alcohol was concerned, there was not one single item that originated in government sources. All of that information I had to dig up myself. I dug it up out of the files, yes; but the original information was information that was secured outside of the department altogether.

Now what are the cases dealt with by Mr. Duncan? There was the case of Rock Island. All of that information was public. It was well known. It was secured by Mr. Sparks, of the Commercial Protective Association, and by Mr. Duncan when he was in their employ. They had all that information, and certainly they gave me that information. There is no question about that; nobody denies it. But it was not stolen out of the department. As a matter of fact, that information was given to the government, and paid for by the Commercial Protective Association, and it was given to me as well. Take the Gaunt case. That was a case before the courts in Montreal. It was known to the world and open to the world, and every bit of my information in regard to that case came from the records of the courts, records that had no government origin at all. We found on the files of the Gaunt case that a complete audit had been made by the department of which I had no knowledge at all on February 2. A complete audit had been made which bears out almost in toto the report of the auditors, Clarkson, Dilworth & Gordon.

Mr. ELLIOTT: May I ask my hon. friend when that information came to his knowledge?

Mr. STEVENS: What information?

Mr. ELLIOTT: The information contained in the—

Mr. STEVENS: In the Gaunt case?

Mr. ELLIOTT: In the Gaunt case.

Mr. STEVENS: It came into my possession I would say, early in November.

Mr. ELLIOTT: What year?

Mr. STEVENS: The year 1925. Now the Gaunt case was tried in the courts before that; I think some months before, but I cannot recall for the moment. However, the point is this: All the information supplied to me by Mr. Sparks, of the Commercial Protective Association,—all the evidence for which they had paid,—they had obtained themselves before it was ever handed over to Mr. Duncan as a report to the department at all, and it was verified by the files in the department after we came into possession of it.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Will my hon. friend permit me another question? Is it not a fact that Inspector Duncan was actively at work, loaned by the Department of Finance for this purpose, from October 1, 1924?

Mr. STEVENS: Oh, yes. I am sure my hon. friend will excuse me if I am not precisely accurate in my dates, but Inspector Duncan was loaned to the Commercial Protective Association in the fall of 1924, and he worked for them through, I think, until the summer of 1925. Then he was taken off and did not go on to that work again until the minister sent him to Montreal on December 1, 1925. That is as far as I can recall. There are many other things, but what I want to say to my hon. friend is that practically every bit of information that I secured was information in the possession of Mr. Sparks and the Commercial Protective Association before the government took the matter over at all. When they were paying for it they had a perfect right to it. That information is the information which I secured. Furthermore, none of it came to me, none of it was given to me, until after Mr. Sparks was convinced that the members of the government were not taking the matter seriously.

Mr. ROBB: Will my hon. friend allow me? I am sure he would like to have his record correct. It is quite true what he says about Duncan having been employed until the summer of 1925 when we had to take him off for a period to put him on another case, but the difficulty was that while Sparks was always going round and insinuating we never got anything, it was the Minister of Customs who sent Duncan down with instructions to round up Bisaillon and the whole crowd.

Mr. BELL (Hamilton): When he knew that there was to be an investigation.

Mr. STEVENS: I say this to my hon. friend: These are the bare, bald facts. After it was known that my resolution would appear on the order paper of this House, these steps were taken. I am not going to cast any reflection other than to state the facts. That is why the ex-Minister of Customs and Excise sent Duncan to Montreal on the expedition on which he went.

Now, the Solicitor General the other evening—

Mr. MALCOLM: Was it not on February 10, 1925, that a writ was issued giving Duncan full authority to search all premises?

Mr. STEVENS: It probably was; my hon. friend seems to have the writ under his hand. I am not questioning that and I hope my hon. friend will not question it. I would like to remind my hon. friend also, not in the case of Mr. Duncan but in the case of Mr. Duncan's assistants, that in December, 1924, or thereabouts, they were given authority to arrest. It was, I think, on January 17, 1925, I am not very far away, that the Hon. Jacques Bureau curtailed that by ordering them first to report before they arrested, and also ordering them to report to Bisaillon who at that very time was under arraignment in the courts of Quebec but was later on acquitted as far as that particular charge was concerned. He was arrested December 24, 1924 and tried, I think, on February 13, 1925. As to that, however, I may be a day or two out.

Mr. MALCOLM: My hon. friend will find that on February 10 a complete writ was issued giving Duncan authority "to search, break into, and examine."

Mr. STEVENS: Yes, Mr. Duncan has had such powers right along. It may be they were a little enlarged in connection with the Department of Customs and Excise. Mr. Duncan is an old officer. That is not the case with the others. And by the way, when Lenetsky Brothers were arrested for silk smuggling they were about to be released because Knox's right of arrest had been taken away from him, and the only way they were really held was because Mr. Duncan, having been supplied by the Minister of Finance with the authority, stepped in and exercised the power of arrest.

Mr. ROBB: And for that reason my hon. friend would now present a resolution to condemn me.

Mr. STEVENS: No, I do not condemn my hon. friend, and have never condemned him. I do condemn the ministry for this reason: Under our constitutional form of government when a delinquency within a ministry is known and—shall I say?—protected, or when it is not remedied and eradicated, then the whole ministry must take the responsibility for the delinquency of one of its members.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I deny absolutely that the delinquencies were known to the ministry.

Mr. STEVENS: This attitude on the part of my right hon. friend is what I cannot understand. He comes before the House and asks for consideration. He asks, as the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) and the hon. member for Nelson (Mr. Bird) suggested, that we should be gentle with him and his colleagues because we are all human and liable to err; and these hon. members pleaded the very human doctrine that we should not condemn one another. But I want to point out that that doctrine applies when the individual to whom it is addressed is penitent at least, that is a prerequisite to the case. But it does not and cannot apply to responsible ministers in office. Responsible ministers cannot dissociate themselves from the ordinary treatment accorded man to man. Take my hon. friend who has just vacated the portfolio of Minister of Customs and Excise. I want to say this now, because perhaps I could not say it at any better moment: He and his colleagues will look in vain for one single utterance of a personal character denouncing him; but I have called in question, and I will show it in a moment again, his ministerial acts. If the business of this country, or the business of any country, is conducted on the basis that you cannot condemn a government, that you cannot challenge a minister, that you cannot challenge a man's public acts because, forsooth, we must be kindly one to another or that we must recognize the doctrine "Judge not that ye be not judged," and other such reasons, there is a black time ahead for the administration of this or any other country. It is a doctrine that cannot apply; there is a vast difference between the two.

My hon. friend the Solicitor General (Mr. Cannon) in a delightful speech the other night —and he is always delightfully irresponsible; he is one of the most forceful and eloquent of members, but ever the actor—made a most extraordinary charge against us. He said that when the $350,000 vote was before the House members of the Conservative party had refused to take out from under the Civil Service Commission the appointments under that vote; therefore, he said, the preventive service fell down. The hon. member's leader and the hon. member himself, the ex-Solicitor General, have accepted this report in toto, and I will direct the attention of members to section 17, subsection 2, which states:

That such chief preventive officer—

Of whom he was speaking when he was denouncing us.

—be authorized to select his staff in consultation with the Civil Service Commission.

He has accepted the report, accepted that recommendation, and then he condemns us because last year we insisted that appointments to the preventive service should be made under the Civil Service Commission.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): My hon. friend is not suggesting that the report brings them under the control of the Civil Service Commission?

Mr. STEVENS: No. The recommendation in the report is the opinion of the committee. As I said a moment ago, my right hon. friend stated the other day that he accepted every line of it. We have accepted that report and we propose to put it into effect.

I wish to refer to a statement made by the ex-minister when he interrupted my right hon. leader the other day. In this instance we were referring to the alcohol question, that is the 82,000 gallons of alcohol that the Dominion Distilleries had sold. This is not my only complaint, but my chief complaint as regards the administration of my hon. friend. Let me say again that it is his administrative acts in this regard that I am calling in question. We were dealing with that question, the point being that I charged, if you like, that 82,000 gallons of proof alcohol had been sold by the Dominion Distilleries as potable spirits to the United Staes; that it should have, under those circumstances, carried an excise tax of $10 a gallon. I charged that Mr. Hushion, ex-M.P., a Liberal associate of my hon. friend, negotiated the sale of 16,000 gallons of these 82,000 gallons and that this with the balance was sold in the way I have mentioned. I am going to deal with this matter, and if the House will follow me I believe I can substantiate to the hilt this statement, or if the House so chooses to interpret it, this charge.

If I am accurate in my argument this involves, according to the report of the auditor which I have in my hand, a loss of revenue of $749,396.09. I will now quote the statement made by my hon. friend and I will ask the House to judge my hon. friend on his own ground. Let the House take his own words and then follow the facts in the evidence which I shall now give, and see whether or not I am justified in the position I take. I am reading from Hansard at page 4970. Mr. Meighen had been speaking and he used the phrase:

11 p.m.

Because it was used for potable purposes.

The ex-minister rose in his place and interrupted, making this satement:

Mr. Boivin: When it is proved by my right hon friend from the evidence taken before that committee, that the liquor was used for potable purposes, this government will take the responsibility and not before.

I turn to the evidence itself and I will read to the House some of it. I will take first the evidence of Leo George, who was one of the directors if not one of the chief directors of the Dominion Distilleries, the firm in question which I charge had handled this liquor, and an intimate friend of Mr. Hushion, who negotiated the sale with the minister. This is from page 2416 of the evidence. Since the moving of our paraphernalia over to this side I think my marked copy is mislaid, but perhaps I can find it even at that. I had it all marked and it is not easy to find from an unmarked copy. This is the evidence of Mr. George, who was being questioned in the committee by Mr. Bennett:

Q. Did you ship denatured alcohol to the United States in the same way as you did whiskey?—A. Yes, shipped alcohol to the United States.

Q. And you used the same methods?—A. Yes, the same methods.

Q. But alcohol was being shipped through in the same way?—A. Yes.

Q. Do you do any blending?—A. Yes, they blended.

Q. Have you yourself have anything to do with the blending?—A. No, I know nothing about it at all.

Q. Now, this denatured alcohol that we have been referring to, was denatured by a certain process prescribed by the government?—A. I suppose it was.

Q. Do you know anything about it?—A. No.

Q. You know alcohol was shipped to the United States, by the same general methods?—A. I was told it was.

Q. As was used with respect to whiskey?—A. Yes.

Q. Do you know anything about the abstraction of the denaturing substance from alcohol after it gets into the United States?—A. I understand that they can abstract, in the United States.

Q. Do you know they do that?—A. I understand they do.

Then on page 2419:

Q. Is that the way you exported your denatured spirits?

That is by Ford or Sandwich over the Detroit river.

A. The same way.

Q. They were dealt with in the same way; a party would come into your office and put down his money?—A. Yes.

Q. I notice from December 7, 1925 to January 19, there are about 15 cars, most of which were shipped to Mr. Scherer?—A. Yes.

I pause here to say that Mr. Scherer was a bootlegger of whiskey for potable purposes into the United States and nothing else. That was his business. He could not take this liquor in as denatured alcohol; he could not get access to the United States with this alcohol as denatured, because it did not comply with the United States law. So it was taken in for potable purposes just the same as whiskey.

Mr. Cooper also on page 2452 gives evidence in this matter. I am sorry that I have mislaid this, but the point is this that both Leo George, Cooper and Hushion declared in evidence that this liquor was shipped into the United States for potable purposes. Denatured alcohol of this grade never brings more than a dollar a gallon even in comparatively small quantities, and even when sold in large quantities it brings from sixty-five to eighty cents a gallon. There is only one instance in all the auditors' reports where as much as a dollar a gallon was paid for this class of alcohol. Yet these men sold it at prices ranging from $7 to $10 a gallon—a great deal of it at the latter price—at places in the United States, chiefly in Detroit and Oswego. Mr. Hushion before the committee stated in his evidence that he had with him at the time an offer for as much more as he could produce at $5 a gallon, proving conclusively that the alcohol was being used for potable purposes. And in their evidence both Mr. George and Mr. Cooper stated that the process followed was to take the No. 1-F special denatured alcohol and extract from it the denaturants, thus making it immediately potable.

I want to turn now to the law and the regulations governing it. In the Excise Act it is provided in section 368:

In this part special denatured alcohol means—

That is, the No. 1-F special to which I have been referring.

—alcohol in suitable admixture with such denaturants as have been approved by the minister.

And 371 reads:

(2) Specially denatured alcohol shall only be sold or delivered under a departmental permit to dealers and manufacturers to be used in the arts and industries in cases where denatured alcohol would be unsuitable, and shall only be moved or transported under such conditions as the minister may by regulation prescribe.

(3) No alcohol shall be manufactured or sold under the provisions of this part for beverage purposes.

That is the law. Now I come to the regulations prescribed by the department. This grade No. 1-F special to which I have referred is authorized for use in the manufacture of rubbing alcohol compound exclusively. Let me pause to make this point clear. The only reason why the Dominion government, through the Department of Excise, permits the manufacture of this alcohol is the fact that full denatured alcohol is useless for external use in rubbing, for the purposes of hospitals, for the infirm and for other uses not of an ordinary industrial nature. Wood alcohol can be sold without any difficulty in this country but the regulations restrict its sale to certain persons. For instance, the following provision appears in the regulations:

The rubbing alcohol compound shall not be put up in packages containing more than sixteen fluid ounces each.

I call the attention of the House to the fact that this alcohol to which I have been referring was sold in five gallon tins by the carload, some 82,000 gallons of it having been disposed of for the most part to Scherer and some of it to Evans. These were the only two men who got it, and both of them were notorious bootleggers, known to be such and to be the sole medium through whiskey had for years poured into the United States contrary to the laws of that country. The regulation is that rubbing alcohol shall be put up in packages containing not more than sixteen fluid ounces, and the words "rubbing alcohol" must appear in conspicuous type. It is further provided in another regulation:

The sale of "rubbing alcohol compound by persons or firms holding permits (hereinafter called permit holders) is in future to be confined exclusively to wholesale druggists recognized and such by the pharmaceutical associations of the respective provinces; retail druggists licensed to carry on business as such under the statutes of the respective provinces; bona fide hospitals; bona fide practising physicians; benevolent and religious public institutions caring for the infirm and sick.

The maximum quantity is sixteen ounces.

Another regulation is to the effect that special denatured No. 1-F shall be used as rubbing alcohol compound exclusively and may be sold only to persons or firms holding permits specifically issued for that purpose, and who are required to observe certain conditions which are fully set forth.

Now I claim that under the law the minister had no right to allow the Dominion Distilleries to sell that alcohol to any persons except those stipulated in the regulations, and the only answer than can be made is that the alcohol was sold for export. There is no other defence possible, because the minister cannot exceed the ambit of the law and the regulations. If it is contended that the alcohol was sold for export then it should have paid the excise tax, because under the regulations no whiskey, no liquor, no alcohol may leave the lake ports without having paid that tax. Yet these people were allowed to sell this liquor. Again I direct the attention of the House to the statement of Mr. Hushion under oath that he came to Ottawa as a missionary in this business. I therefore charge the ex-minister with having failed properly to protect the rights of the treasury by allowing the Dominion Distilleries to sell this alcohol for potable purposes for use in the United States. That is my argument; that is the charge I make.

I do not desire to delay the House much longer but I shall discuss for a moment now the Aziz case, about which a great deal has been said. Up to this moment I have not mentioned it in any of the arguments I have put forward. Let me point out that the Aziz case is not the whole question before the House. There are many grounds upon which the late administration has been called in question; there are many grounds which form the basis of the motion now under consideration. Among these there is the charge that as far back as December, 1924, at least as established by an abundance of evidence the late ministry were aware of serious delinquencies in the administration of the Customs department. I charge that in the sale of this alcohol the minister who has just left office (Mr. Boivin) was derelict in his duty. Now I do not charge him with any personal delinquency in the matter, but I contend that he as minister did not properly discharge his duties. And I want to suggest to hon. gentlemen opposite that when we make charges of this kind it is beside the point to insinuate that we are trying to drive a man out of public life and from the association of his fellows by attacking him personally. Surely the House knows perfectly well that there is no personal animus in the matter. But when a man takes office he must assume the responsibility that office entails. Similarly, when a man assumes the responsibility of a member of parliament he must expect criticism when he lays himself open to it. And for the reason that the late government failed to discharge its duties in so far as the Customs department was concerned, I say they are open to censure. I go further. The government did not dare last Friday to take a vote on the main amendment, nor do they dare now to let the House vote upon that question.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Take it right away.

Mr. STEVENS: No, my right hon. friend succeeded in casting a cloud over the whole issue by seeking to have the words of censure deleted from the motion and an innocuous amendment substituted in its place.

Coming now to the Aziz case, all I need say is this: it is not a matter of the ex-minister having yielded to the importunities of a friend. That is not the point. I do not see why the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Robichaud) should be described, in the language which has been used against him, as having been recreant when he has been guilty of appealing to a minister who responded to his appeal. Hon. members opposite say that he was wrong in appealing to the ex-Minister of Customs, and they condemn him in language which I will not repeat. They condemn the hon. member (Mr. Robichaud) out of hand and describe his conduct as inexcusable. Well, if the hon. gentleman has done wrong is not the minister who granted his request still more guilty? That is the whole thing in a nutshell. For the space of a week now, Mr. Speaker, you have been listening to hon. members referring to the ex-Minister of Customs by name, in absolute contravention of the rules. You will at least, Mr. Speaker, acknowledge that in my language in parliament I observe the rules, or try to, and that I have always referred to the ex-minister as "the hon. member for Shefford." But right along—and I break the rule now to draw attention to it—it has been said, "Are you going to drive George Boivin out of public life?" This appeal has been made to the House in contravention of the rules and amenities of parliament, and I submit the practice should not have been continued, because after all it is not the person we are attacking, it is not my hon. friend, whose friendship I would cherish, that I am attacking; but I cannot separate him from his office, as I cannot separate my right hon. friend from the responsibilities of first minister which he held for four and a half years, and if we call in question at all the administration's dereliction of duty, then those who happen to be in that position must, forsooth, share that responsibility. Therefore I wish that the House would in considering this question keep away from the personal feature of it and view it wholly in the light of their duty.

My hon. friend from Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth)—I see he is again in his seat—made an eloquent appeal, in the course of which he quoted Edmund Burke's opinion that we should have towards our fellow-beings that feeling of humanity and consideration which recognizes that we are all weak and liable to err, and that there is much good in all men. Now I ask my hon. friend and other hon. members to listen to these words of Edmund Burke, which I think are far more applicable to the immediate situation before the House than those quoted by my hon. friend, grand and noble as they were. I am reading from the works of Edmund Burke an excerpt from his impeachment of Warren Hastings. Burke said:

> There are persons who flattered themselves that the corruptions of India would escape amidst the dissensions of parliament.

Yes, Sir, there are those who would say that amidst the dissensions of parliament, amidst appeals against persecution, those who have been derelict and recreant in their duty may escape. Then he continues:

What the greatest inquest of the nation has begun its highest tribunal will accomplish.

I call the attention of hon. members to these noble words:

My lords, the business of this day is not the business of this man, it is not solely whether the prisoner at the bar be found innocent or guilty, but whether millions of mankind shall be made miserable or happy.

Again I pause. The business of the day, Mr. Speaker, is not the welfare of any individual. The business of the day is this: Shall the fair name of Canada be sullied by those who have been recreant in their duty, and they go not reproached? Shall they? That is the question. Shall the rights of the millions of Canada be passed over simply because we do not desire to cast any reflection upon a fellow-member of this House? Burke continues:

Your Lordships will see, in the progress of this cause, that there is not only a long, connected, systematic series of misdemeanours, but an equally connected system of maxims and principles invented to justify them. Upon both of these you must judge. According to the judgment that you shall give upon the past transactions in India, inseparably connected as they are with the principles which support them, the whole character of your future government in that distant empire is to be unalterably decided. It will take its perpetual tenor, it will receive its final impression, from the stamp of this very hour.

I conclude, Mr. Speaker, with these words, that just as this House decides in this matter just so in the future will administrators of departments, those who are appointed to conduct the affairs of this country, be influenced so that in the hour of temptation perchance they will not deal lightly with matters which in this report, which comes out of the turmoil and out of the partisanship—shall I say?—of this investigation, have been demonstrated to be not in the interests of the country. And so I say to hon. members to-night, let us get away from the idea of personalities. It is not this man, no; it is the record of the administration, entrusted with this great trust, who have been recreant in their duty, which is now called in question.

Miss AGNES C. MACPHAIL (Southeast Grey): Mr. Speaker, to begin with let me say that I enjoy having the Conservative party in power because that keeps them just that much further away from me. I have resented since I came here five years ago, and particularly this session, the self-righteous attitude of the Conservative party. In their opinion they have the divine right to rule: they are smug and self-righteous. I am afraid that is only the plain statement of a truth. I should like to feel as one human being should feel towards another towards my colleagues of the Conservative party who sit in this House, but their attitude has always prevented me, except towards a few who are personal friends of mine, from entertaining the feeling that I would like to entertain for them and that I do feel towards those who compose the Liberal party. That, however, is a personal feeling and has nothing to do with what I shall say later.

I think now I might say something that I have never said before. I wish to say, through you, Mr. Speaker, to the women of Canada, and possibly to the people of Canada generally, that it is quite time more women came to this House. They could not do worse than the men have done; of that I am fully convinced. At least they would not talk quite so much, and when they did it would be about something. The mountain of words that overwhelms the most trivial business in this House is a perpetually amazing thing to me. I hope the time is not far distant when women will sit in this House representing the sentiments that the different parties now represent. I do not believe in a woman group, much as I believe in groups, but I do believe that women should now come to the House of Commons, because they will take direct action, because they are interested in human welfare more than in making long speeches that are very difficult to follow.

For a person who is trying to take an honest and non-partisan view of this customs probe—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Miss MACPHAIL: As a matter of fact that is the view I am taking, and it has nothing to do with what I feel about the actions of hon. members—it is most difficult to arrive at an honest conclusion. One does not know what to believe, and I want to say quite frankly that the rumours and counter-rumours that have come to my ears in the last week about this thing have almost, if not quite, destroyed my faith in human nature. I want to go back to the country people, to the plain everyday working citizens of Canada, to the people who labour with their hands, to see if I cannot revive within myself some confidence in human nature. Members have come to me almost with tears in their eyes, tremendously excited, telling me that all the evidence was not before us, that there were other and more terrible hidden things which would rise up in the future and haunt us if we took other than one action. I think hon. members have no right to make such suggestions. If there is hidden evidence, bring it out and let us see it. We as members of parliament should not be asked to pass upon something of which we have no knowledge at all. I do not know whether or not there is hidden evidence; I tried to run many of these rumours to the ground and found a great number of them led nowhere. It may be, however, that they did lead somewhere and I did not follow them to the right place; I do not know. I do know that the things that are being said, the whisperings going on and the members visiting other members in private rooms are not creditable to members of this House or to the institution of parliament.

Although our group may vote in different ways it does not make any difference; we are all trying to get a complete clean-up of this customs affair, and I also want to say that I will not for one moment question the motives of those in our group, with whom I have been associated for five years, who vote differently from myself. I know we are striving for that one thing, a complete clean-up of this customs business.

Now I come to something which pains me exceedingly; I wish I could get out of saying it and I have come to the place where I almost wish I had gone to Europe the other morning; it would have been much more comfortable. I have, however, in agony reached the conclusion that the late government was well aware for quite a period of time—possibly from March to November—that all was not well in the Customs department. It is possible that they knew that Bisaillon was the head of the Montreal underworld and chief preventive officer at one and the same time. I am afraid it is true that it was not until the Stevens motion was mooted that the eleven charges which had been laid against Bisaillon were investigated, and I believe it is true that Mr. Duncan was able to secure the arrest of Mr. Bisaillon four days after he was really given authority to do so. The Department of Customs is the revenue-collecting department of government, doing a business possibly 150 per cent greater than that done by the Canadian National Railways, and one can safely assume that through the corrupt administration of this department large sums of Canadian money were lost. Much as one may feel disturbed about this, or by condemning anyone, it is not a thing that can be lightly passed over or winked at. When we came here at the beginning we entered into a co-operative agreement with the Liberal party, believing it more likely that we would get the legislation we wanted through that party than through the Conservative party. I happen to be one of the executive of our group, and as such have many times met the executive of the cabinet. I want to pay a tribute to the actions of those men; they were in every sense of the word kindly gentlemen, and with perhaps one little slip I think were absolutely true to the co-operative pact into which we entered. I want to pay the highest tribute I possibly can pay to those gentlemen for their adherence to that pact, and I want to assure them that more than words can utter I regret the action I am forced to take.

I am not concerned about which party are in power; the fortunes of parties make no difference to me. I do not believe in the party form of government, in fact I do not believe we will ever have good government in Canada until the party system as we know it is broken to pieces. I think if this kind of scrapping and nonsense keeps up that break-up will perhaps be faster than it otherwise would be.

I have a political creed, and it may be of interest to the House to know what it is. I believe we need a change in the form of government which will allow questions to be debated on their merits, and in which the cabinet will be a committee of the House. I believe in good will and the creation of a peace psychology to replace war and militarism. I believe in social credit; I believe that humanitarianism should be expressed in our social laws. I believe in the low tariff. I believe in enabling laws for co-operation. I believe in electoral reform. I came here to try to work these things out with one party or with the other or with all, and I hope the day is not too far distant when, as sensible human beings, we may be able to vote on the merits of each question and all work together for the good of Canada. At present we have one camp lined up against the other, not working for the good of Canada; I do not think I am going too far when I say that parties do not work for the good of Canada but for the good of party, and I think it time we stopped that nonsense. I believe the people of Canada will also think it time that sort of thing ceased.

I have come to a decision, whether rightly or wrongly, and to that decision I intend to adhere. I am going to vote against the last amendment, and in favour of what is really the Woodsworth amendment plus the Stevens amendment. It is not all I would like; I favour the commission of judges appointed by the three groups in this House, and I think the party now in power might well grant that. I do not think it unfair to say that even judges win their positions through political influence, and if the present government wish to be fair this board should be composed of judges appointed by the different groups in this House.

I have no particular trust in the gentlemen now sitting on the treasury benches; I know that too many of them have also figured in scandals. I would like to trust them, but common sense tells me that I cannot do so too much. Therefore I think this board should be above criticism by any party, and one in which the people of Canada would have complete trust; I think if the party now in power would accept that suggestion they would go a long way towards convincing the people of Canada that they are not trying to make political capital out of this matter but are honestly trying to clean up the Customs department. I do not want particularly to discredit the ministry who vacated their seats yesterday; I do not want to discredit anyone, but I am forced to this action on the very facts of the case revealed in the evidence which I went over in part to-night. So I plead with the present government to go this far; I think they should do so. I do not know whether or not they will, but at least I believe they would be doing a good thing for Canada and at the same time a good thing for themselves if they accepted this suggestion.

Mr. G. G. COOTE (Macleod): When this House assembled in January last, Mr. Speaker, neither of the old parties had a clear majority which would enable them to carry on business. They would not co-operate with each other, and if the business were to be carried on it was necessary that the group in this corner of the House should co-operate with one party or the other. After careful consideration we decided to assist the Liberal government to carry on; we agreed upon a certain programme of legislation, and I think I can claim that I gave consistent support to the government in carrying out that legislation. I may say, however, that had we decided to co-operate with the Conservative party in carrying on the government I would have endeavoured to give them the same measure of support.

When the Customs committee report came before this House, however, we had to deal with an entirely different matter. It was a question of administration, and not a question of legislation. We had not been connected in any way with the administration of affairs in this country. As a matter of fact, the things which are complained of in this customs report happened before we started to co-operate with the Liberal government. We have to deal with this question on its merits. It has been debated in this House for the past week, and I am not going to debate it to-night for more than a very few minutes. I would like, however, with the permission of the House, to review some of the votes which took place on Friday last.

First of all, I could not support the amendment moved by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) because it seemed to me that it was avoiding the issue which was placed before us in the amendment moved by the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens). The hon. member for Last Mountain (Mr. Fansher) asked me to second his amendment. I did so out of courtesy to him and because I approved of the things which were asked for in that amendment. When it was presented to me, Mr. Speaker, I did not consider whether it was in conformity with the rules of this House. It was ruled out of order by Your Honour, and listening to your judgment on that occasion I concluded that you were right in your ruling that the amendment was out of order. Therefore I voted to sustain your ruling, as I have consistently done, I think, throughout this session.

Later on I twice voted for amendments to adjourn the debate. I understand that I have been criticized in some quarters for doing so. After co-operating with that government all through this session, I felt, Mr. Speaker, that I could not do less than extend to them the courtesy of voting for a motion to adjourn the debate if that was desired by that government. Further, Mr. Speaker, you and all the members of this House know very well my objection to this House sitting after midnight; I have made that known on more than one occasion. I hope the time will come when we shall not be compelled to sit to such unearthly hours. On Saturday morning, when the last motion to adjourn the debate was voted on, it was coming daylight. That was not a fit hour for members to decide such a momentous question. Personally, Mr. Speaker, I had reached the limit of my endurance, and I think a great many members of the House were in the same plight. I might add that if this debate were to go on for another week, I think we would all have reached the limit of our physical endurance. For that reason I appeal to all hon. members to try and bring this debate to an end as soon as possible.

Mr. Speaker, to-day I had the unpleasant duty of being compelled to vote against your ruling because I felt that your ruling was not right. I do not claim to be very well versed in the rules of the House, but it did seem to me that the rules certainly were not intended to permit of endless amendments, and possibly because I am so weary of this debate I was opposed to the moving of further amendments. I simply wished, with the permission of the House, to offer this explanation of the different votes which I have recorded in connection with this case up to the present time.

I have listened carefully to the debate on this question for the past week and I have come to the decision regretfully I must admit that the statement contained in the amendment moved by the hon. member for Vancouver Centre is justified, and I do not see how I can possibly vote against it. I am not opposed to the principle contained in the amendment moved by the hon. member for St. James (Mr. Rinfret), but as its adoption would do away with the amendment which is offered by the hon. member for Vancouver Centre, I must oppose it.

May I say, before I sit down, that I hope the members of the late government and the members of the Liberal party will not take it too much to heart. I am voting this way simply because I feel it is my duty to do so, after giving careful consideration to this matter. It is quite possible, Mr. Speaker, that we are not sentencing the Liberal party to any long sojourn in the wilderness. After forty days and forty nights, it is possible they may come back. The people will judge, and we must leave it to the people to decide. So far as I am personally concerned, as I have said before, I am not concerned with the fate of political parties, or particularly with the fate of governments. I am sorry that in this country we have a system of government under which it is impossible for us at times to have a real government, and because of this faulty system we have to-day what somebody has called an imperfect or a makeshift government. But we must do the best we can under this system and until there are enough members come to this House with the determination to reform the system itself, we shall have to put up with it.

We are placed in this difficult position, Mr. Speaker. A very great principle is involved in this case, that is the responsibility of the government to protect the revenues of the country and to give honest administration to every department. It is on that basis, and on that basis alone, that I am casting my vote to-night, if the House will allow us to come to a vote.

Hon. CHARLES MARCIL (Bonaventure): I do not wish to give my vote, Mr. Speaker, without a word of explanation. I appreciate thoroughly what has been said by the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Coote), and I hope the day will come when our debates will be curtailed and our hours of sitting as well.

I am about completing my twenty-eighth session. I have seen between five and six hundred members of parliament come and go, and parliament renewed seven times, and only half a dozen remain of those of us who were here more than a quarter of a century ago. But the tactics employed then are the tactics that are employed to-day, except that in those days we had two parties, and now we have a third party acting as arbitrator.

As I heard you, Mr. Speaker, give your decision this afternoon it reminded me that ten years ago the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens) and myself worked hand in hand. There have been occasions in this House during that time, a quarter of a century, when men on great issues rose above party and worked together willingly for the national good, and that was one instance, ten years ago, when the hon. member for Vancouver Centre and those who were associated with him did me the honour of asking me to second a motion that he was submitting to the House for war-time prohibition. It was not popular for a Quebec member to undertake that task. Quebec, consulted in the matter of prohibition, had voted it down by 125,000, but I came here imbued with the idea that during the war time at least, when Canada's efforts were needed to be given to the utmost for the prosecution of the war, prohibition of the importation, manufacture, and sale of liquor, which is at the bottom of all this trouble here since the United States have adopted prohibition, should be enacted. The hon. member for Vancouver Centre and myself did the best we could. He made the best speeches; he always does the best he can, and I backed up my assertions with letters from the whole hierarchy of the province of Quebec, and with thousands of petitions. I thought I had made out a pretty good case, but—strange how things happen in this world—the man who was put up by the government of the day to move an amendment to the motion moved by the hon. member for Vancouver Centre and myself was the hon. member for West Calgary (Mr. Bennett), who will be Minister of Justice to-morrow in this new government. We took the position that war-time prohibition should be adopted on moral and economic grounds, and showed the House that our liquor bill amounted to something over $300,000,000 a year. However, we were voted down, and as I heard you, Mr. Speaker, give your decision this afternoon I was reminded that on that occasion ten years ago the hon. member for West Calgary moved an amendment to the motion moved by the hon. member for Vancouver Centre. The amendment, having been put to the House, carried. After the amendment had been carried I called upon the Speaker, as I find by referring to the Hansard of 1916, to put the main motion as amended. Sir Robert Borden objected, "The amendment is carried," he said, "that puts an end to the matter." But on the following day Mr. Speaker Sevigny gave the decision to which you referred this afternoon, in which he showed that the adoption of an amendment amending a motion is not the end of the story, but that the amended motion must be put, and that is the reason for the debate at the present time. We have never voted on the Stevens amendment, so-called. It has been put by you, Mr. Speaker, to the House for the purpose of enabling the House to amend it still further or adopt it.

I want to say one word about the work of the committee. I think the members of that committee are entitled to the greatest credit. They did the best work that could possibly be expected of them, but I am sorry to say their work has been incomplete. They do not themselves claim that this investigation is in any way complete. In the early days of the session, following the remarks made by the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson) I called the attention of the Minister of Customs to the fact that in the territorial waters of the gulf of the St. Lawrence, smuggling was being carried on from St. Pierre Miquelon on an extensive scale. These territorial waters are closed waters for the purpose of fishing, but it appears that the extraordinary stand is taken that for smuggling they are international waters, and the result, as we see it, is that schooners drop anchor threee or four miles from shore and keep open bar year in and year out, demoralizing the population of that district, not only on the Quebec side but on the New Brunswick side as well. That is an important phase of smuggling which has not been touched at all by this committee, and one which should be taken up whether this matter is referred to a judicial commission or otherwise.

I do not want to refer any further to the report of the committee because I want to be lenient and merciful to the House. We are saturated with this discussion on the Department of Customs and Excise, and the country is heartily sick of it. The country wants a decision taken and an end put to the whole business as far as this House is concerned, because this question is being dealt with here according to political bias which will carry no conviction to the country; the country will be divided just as this House is divided. To the final decision, rendered by a judical commission of the character proposed, full value and effect will be given.

I am sorry that the subamendment to the amendment moved by the hon. member for St. James is meeting with opposition in this House. I had thought that the wording of the subamendment was so fair and reasonable that it would appeal to the minds of all Canadians irrespective of party. Here is what the subamendment proposes:

> The said commission to be composed of three judges, one to be nominated by the Prime Minister of Canada; one by the right hon. the leader of the opposition; and one by the hon. the leader of the Progressive party, said commission to have all the powers conferred upon such commissioners under the Public Enquiries Act;
> The said commission to have power to make findings and recommendations, and to report the same to parliament at the opening of the next session, together with the evidence taken before said commission.

I think that is a fair proposition, and one that should have met with the approval of all. I have been a long time in the political game, having had forty or fifty years' experience, and I have known judicial commissions appointed by governments in the past that were far from satisfactory to the public at large. In the present instance the commisisoners would be chosen somewhat as the arbitrators are chosen by the parties to arbitration proceedings. I hope the House will accept this solution of the problem and that we will be able then to put an end to the existing difficulty.

I do not want to say any more on this point except to add this: Owing to the adoption of prohibition in the United States the smuggling question has become one of the most difficult on this continent to deal with, not only for the Canadian government but for the authorities at Washington. To-day that question is taxing to the limit the efforts of United States prohibition officers, and millions of dollars are being spent in the attempt to put down smuggling. The adoption of prohibition in the neighbouring republic has resulted in increased smuggling so far as Canada is concerned. I remember when the late Hon. William Paterson was appointed Minister of Customs. In those days the smuggling was not so extensive as it is to-day; there was not the same amount of profit in it. If there was no advantage in bringing liquor into the United States, none would be brought; but the higher the tariff was in Canada the more incentive there was to smuggling. I am speaking from experience, and I am well aware that there are men in this House who know how true it is that smuggling is carried on because smuggling is profitable; when it is not profitable it will to a large extent disappear. That is the reason why the government has been confronted with a problem such as no other government had to deal with in the past.

To an impartial tribunal, freed from the partisan spirit which prevails in this House, the case which has been made out by the ex-Minister of Customs and Excise would carry conviction; it would have that effect with any jury in this country. But the charges have been brought before a political court and if that court renders a verdict it will be political in its nature. I am not unaware of instances of men, held in high esteem by this country, who have been condemned in political courts and yet their honour has not been impaired in the slightest. Nevertheless I hope the House will take this opportunity of constituting a judicial tribunal which will give entire satisfaction to the Canadian public. There is this important fact to be borne in mind as well: the department involved here produces revenue to the extent of over $300,000,000 a year, and that revenue must be safeguarded in every respect. I am sure that a judicial tribunal such as I have indicated could make very important recommendations in addition to those which have been made by the Customs inquiry committee. One of its first recommendations should be to remove from the Minister of Customs and Excise the discretion which the law now gives him. If that discretion had not existed, no such appeals as those complained of would have been made to the late minister or to his predecessors. I myself have knowledge of such appeals, which, indeed, have been made to every member of parliament; and hon. gentlemen supporting for the first time the present government will, if the present cabinet remains in office, find themselves before long, urged to make similar appeals, because there is always a tendency when a man gets into trouble to say, "Give him another chance," and so on. The experience of the past has demonstrated what will happen unless the whole system is radically changed, and that can best be done through the findings of a judicial commission.

I am going to vote for the subamendment with the greatest satisfaction, because I know it is in the interest of the country. On the other hand I will vote against the amendment of the hon. member for Vancouver Centre because I deem it to be nothing but a political move.

Mr. HENRI BOURASSA (Labelle): Mr. Speaker, I just want to explain the reason why I am going to vote against this subamendment. The other day I voted quite reluctantly for the amendment moved by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) and I explained why. I am opposed to this report; I am opposed to the amendment moved by the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens), and I am more convinced than ever that this House is not in a position to pass judgment upon this question or any issue connected with it. I reluctantly supported the amendment moved by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre the other day because it carried the principle of the appointment of a judicial commission. This seems now to be accepted by the whole House. I do not want to connect my name and my vote with any further amendment, subamendment, or subamendment to the amendment as amended dealing with this issue, which has become a political football and does not at all advance parliament, the late government, the present nucleus of a government, or the people at large in any realization of the actual situation.

I think yesterday, if I may say this word, the ex-Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) took a manly attitude and did the only right, the only proper thing which he could do; and he did it in the proper way. The explanations which he gave to the House as to his resignation should bring before the attention of the people of this country an issue far more important in my eyes than the issue now before the House. Not that I do not attach importance to the proper management of any great department of state; but, I repeat, the issue on its merits is not properly before the House. It will have to be dealt with by a judicial commission, and the House when it is seized with the whole question will be in a position to pass judgment on the findings of that commission and upon the findings of the committee.

But with regard to the constitutional issue raised by the resignation of the Prime Minister in the extraordinary circumstances which he has related to the House, I think it is high time that we should brush aside this matter and consider the larger question on its merits.

If this government succeeds as it carried its votes on Friday, very well. Let us have done away with this customs issue. I understand a commission will be appointed; it will go on with the investigation. After this is done, in the few days that are left to us, we have several other questions to examine. We have to know upon what platform and what programme this intended government propose to rule this country. We have to know what legislation they propose to carry on during the remainder of the session. We have to know what policy they propose to pursue if they remain in power.

Therefore I am going to vote against any further complication in this matter, against this subamendment, against the amendment moved by the hon. member for Vancouver Centre as amended and against the motion moved by the hon. member for St. Henri (Mr. Mercier) for the adoption of the report. The only motion I would be inclined to support would be one purely and simply for a reference of the whole matter to a judicial commission for investigation.

It has been amply demonstrated to the people of this country that this House is not the proper place and this is certainly not the proper time to deal with a matter of this kind in a judicial way. This is demonstrated by all speeches of the last week, that of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre and my own included, but at least we have been candid enough to admit that we do not feel prepared and we are not prepared to act like judges. The attempts which have been made since then to put a new complexion to this House prove that the intention of acting judicially on this matter is simply a put-up job, I was going to say, by one party after the other. The question at issue between the two parties at the present time is which party is going to rule. Evidently this is another question, and I want to disconnect it as soon as possible from the matter at issue. The present government is neither going to be sustained nor thrown down by this question before the people of Canada.

Another reason why I am not prepared to vote for this subamendment or any other motion calculated to precipitate the issue before the people of Canada is that I should deplore the idea that an issue should be made before the people simply and solely upon the dirty matters with which we have been dealing for the past eight days. I hope the next time the people of Canada are appealed to, whether it be this summer, this fall, or next year, they will have something else to deal with than these matters that will no more be properly exposed to the people than before this House by the work of this committee, good men as they are, or by the debates that take place in this House. I hope that in these few words I have made myself clear to the members of this House and to the people whom I represent.

[Mr. Bourassa.]

Mr. A. L. BEAUBIEN (Provencher): Mr. Speaker, I am sure the House will pardon me for getting up at this late hour, but I will follow my usual practice and be very brief. We have had the amendment moved by the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens) who made the motion which brought the committee into being. We have also had added to it the amendment of the hon. member for Last Mountain (Mr. Fansher). We also have the amendment moved by the hon. member for St. James (Mr. Rinfret). I view this question just as I would view a case in a court room. A man or a group of men are brought before a court where a jury is sitting. The case is never given to the jury until the whole evidence has been completed. In this report, which I understand was a unanimous one by the committee, clause 4 states:

> Notwithstanding the time devoted by the committee to the taking of evidence the matters refrrd to it by the order of reference could not be completely reviewed.

I ask any man who has a sense of British fair play: Are we going to condemn a man or a group of men until the evidence is completed? I am taking the committee at their own words. They know more about the matter than I do; they have sat for months; they have heard the evidence, and then in their report they say that the matter could not be completely reviewed. I am not going to pass judgment which will condemn one man or a group of men without hearing all the evidence.

I had a dream last night. I dreamt I was in a court room. The ex-Minister of Customs (Mr. Boivin) was arraigned to answer the very charge which is now brought against him, of keeping Moses Aziz out of gaol. The judge having heard the evidence discharged him with a warning to use better judgment in the future. The hon. member for Mackenzie (Mr. Campbell) was also in court charged with having written a letter to the ex-Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) with a request to keep another man from going to gaol on the ground that he could not pay his fine. The judge heard the evidence in this case also and found that while the hon. member for Mackenzie had been indiscreet he had been guilty of no very serious offence.

Mr. CAMPBELL: What did the judge say about the ex-Minister of Justice for approving of the application of the member for Mackenzie?

Mr. BEAUBIEN: I do not blame the hon. member for Mackenzie, because I might have done the same thing myself. Members of parliament are in duty bound to represent their electors, and if an elector who is in trouble seeks advice, it is only right for his representative to put his case before the minister concerned, whose duty it is to listen to such representation. If we do not want ministers of the crown to have any power of discretion in the future, then let us so provide by law and let us inform the public accordingly. Electors expect members of parliament to do anything and everything and I hope my voice will carry throughout this Dominion when I say to-night that if the people expect their representatives to make certain appeals on their behalf they must not turn round and condemn them afterwards.

The amendment proposed by the hon. member for St. James is to my mind the fairest that has been submitted in this debate. It gives to the group in this corner an opportunity to have some say in the appointment of the commission. This is the first time in the history of parliament that it has been proposed that any minority group should participate in such an appointment. Am I going to throw that precedent away? It seems to me a healthy state of affairs that different groups should be consulted in a matter of this kind. This is the conclusion to which I have come after serious reflection. I may be wrong in the eyes of some people but I am acting conscientiously. The ex-Minister of Customs was probably indiscreet, but I refuse to admit for a moment that he is open to censure. I have sat with the hon. gentleman in this House for the last five years, having come into contact with him both personally and in his official capacity as minister of the Department of Customs, and speaking from my experience of him I believe that the honesty, the integrity and the ability of the hon. gentleman are beyond question. Certainly his ability he has demonstrated in this House; and of his honesty I am convinced from personal experience. I do not think it would be according to British fair play to condemn the minister as proposed in the motion of the hon. member for Vancouver Centre. I do not take any stock in the rumours one hears around these corridors. They do not amount to anything in my estimation. Let us have a proper judicial commission before whom all the facts can be brought out to the satisfaction of the country, and let members of that commission represent impartially the views of the parties constituting this parliament. I did not want to speak at any length to-night but I could not let this occasion pass without putting myself on record and paying the ex-Minister of Customs the tribute to which I think he is entitled.

The House divided on the amendment to the amendment (Mr. Rinfret) which was negatived on the following division.

Mr. SPEAKER: I declare the subamendment lost. The question now is on the amendment as amended.

Mr. E. J. GARLAND (Bow River): Mr. Speaker, before you put the question I desire to say a few words thereon. I am satisfied that every hon. member is exceedingly anxious that the judicial commission which is to be appointed by the acting government shall be of a non-partisan character. There is no doubt that it should be such. I would therefore suggest that the time is not yet too late when the acting government may accept an amendment which will allow them to go to the country feeling that at least their commission will have the confidence of the people. Like the hon. member for Southeast Grey (Miss Macphail), I have very little confidence in either of the political parties as such. I have a great deal of confidence in several hon. members of both parties. I am not willing, nor do I think the public will be, to accept the findings of a royal commission appointed by the Conservative party any more than I would be ready to accept the findings of a royal commission appointed by the Liberal party. Therefore I move, seconded by the hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Gardiner):

That the amendment as amended be further amended by adding thereto the following words after the words "and to prosecute all offenders":

and that such judicial commission should consist of a judge to be named by the two judges of the Exchequer court of Canada, the said judge acting as a commission to have all the powers conferred upon such commission under the Public Inquiries Act. The said commission to have power to make findings and recommendations and to report the same to parliament at the opening of the next session, together with the evidence taken before the said commission.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I simply rise to say that this amendment is one which, it seems to me, this House can accept; the government certainly can accept it. Our idea is to have a commission just as impartial as we can get it. We do not want partial judges; we do not want judges named by this or by that party, to fight one with the other. We do want to get a commission as impartial and as far-reaching in its effects as is possible, and the hon. gentleman has found a means of taking away the selection of this commission from politicians of all stripes; on behalf of the government I have much pleasure in accepting it.

Mr. CANNON: I wish to congratulate the hon. gentleman who has moved this subamendment. We cannot have too many safeguards from the present government, and if the leader of the House had not accepted the amendment I would have supported it on division. When I consider the past records of these gentlemen, royal commissions have been instituted under Tory regimes in the past—and I wish gentlemen sitting to my left to remember this—reports were brought in, and those found guilty are still sitting in this House supporting my hon. friend.

Mr. CAHILL: I do not wish to detain the House on this question, but it is quite apparent from the amendments which have been offered that members of parliament have no confidence in their ability to appoint a commission; neither have the government. I think the only proper course to take in the circumstances would be for this parliament again to appeal to the final arbiters, the electors of Canada, and if this amendment were not before the House I would move that that be done. Since this amendment is now before us, I cannot do so.

Amendment (Mr. Garland) agreed to.

Mr. SPEAKER: Before the question is put, I wish to inform the House that there is added to Mr. Stevens' amendment the subamendment of Mr. Garland (Bow River), and previous to that the subamendment of Mr. Fansher. I wish the House to keep that in mind, so that it will know on what it is voting.

The House divided on the amendment (Mr. Stevens) as amended, which was agreed to on the following division:

ADJOURNMENT—BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Sir HENRY DRAYTON moved the adjournment of the House.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I ask my hon. friend one or two questions? Is it the intention of the government that the House shall sit on the 1st of July?

[Mr. Speaker.]

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: In connection with the business of the House, Mr. Speaker, it has become now entirely a matter for the House, and we would very much like to have the opinion of the House. So far as I know, we have got rid of the only contentious matter remaining before parliament. I do not think there is anything at all contentious remaining on the order paper. We have the estimates, which are my right hon. friend's estimates, and we are prepared to put them through. In addition to those estimates, we have the legislation of my right hon. friend which is here in this House or in the other House, and we are prepared to do everything we can to facilitate that. In other words, so far as we are concerned I see no reason why this House should not close its business to-morrow night, but that, of course, is entirely for the House to say. If on the other hand parliament thinks there are a lot of other matters to be discussed, that we have not been here long enough, or that there are some contentious issues arising out of my right hon. friend's own estimates or legislation, why then the government is perfectly willing to sit on the holiday if the House desires. But if we are to have a lot of contentious business brought on, perhaps it is not worth while sitting on the holiday.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: In connection with the legislation, does my hon. friend include the bill for the transfer of the natural resources to Alberta, which appears on the order paper as a resolution?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: We have not as yet had time to go into what has been done by my hon. friend in that connection, but it has been noted. We do not propose to take any action one way or the other in the dying days of this session in connection with that legislation.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That means no action?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: No action this session.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That will be gratifying, I am sure, to our friends from Alberta.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I am quite sure, Mr. Speaker, they will not be shocked, because they have been gently prepared by no action at all on the part of gentlemen opposite, who have had lots of time to act, which we have not had.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I ask my hon. friend what business is proposed to take up to-morrow, and in what order?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: We have some bills that I think should be got rid of. There is the bill in connection with the Montreal harbour commission, and a bill regarding which my hon. friend the ex-Minister of Finance has been good enough to send over to me to-night a memorandum, having regard to the Civil Service Superannuation Act. Apparently that is a bill about which there should be very little trouble, and I take it from what his memorandum discloses that it is something which should be disposed of. I think we ought to facilitate all the legislation which ought to be handled at all.

Mr. LAPOINTE: You are very nice indeed.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: My hon. friend is a little late in paying me that tribute, which I know the House feels I so wonderfully deserve. After that we shall take up the estimates. We know there will be very little trouble about my right hon. friend's own estimates, but we shall be governed very largely by their criticism.

Mr. SPEAKER: May I suggest to the House while it is in the mood for passing bills and estimates holus-bolus, that perhaps after the six months we have been here this session it is about time the report of the special committee appointed last year to reduce the length of the session and reduce the length of speeches was adopted.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: There is only one other question my right hon. friend asked that I did not answer. He asked whether we would sit on the holiday. So far as the government is concerned, if the House cannot get closed up by to-morrow night, but wishes to go and wind up the work of the session as quickly as possible by sitting on the holiday we are content to work on the holiday.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 1.15 a.m. (Wednesday).

Wednesday, June 30, 1926

The House met at two o'clock.

PRIVATE BILLS

Mr. FRED W. BOWEN (Durham) moved:

That in accordance with the recommendations contained in the ninth report of the select standing committee on Miscellaneous Private Bills, all bills reported in the eighth and ninth reports of said committee be placed on the orders of the day among private bills for consideration in committee of the Whole this day

Mr. SPEAKER: There are no private bills to-day; they will appear on Friday.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): Are we to prorogue to-night or not?

Mr. SPEAKER: I am in the hands of the House.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Mr. Speaker, do those bills include all the divorce bills?

Mr. MACLEAN (York): Yes.

Mr. LAPOINTE: If so, I object to the motion. I ask that those bills should go to the Private Bills committee like all the other bills.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON (Leader of the House): Mr. Speaker, may I make a suggestion to my hon. friend? I understand some of the bills are contentious and some are not. Would he indicate the bills which are contentious and let the other business of private bills be discharged in the ordinary way? It is within my hon. friend's right, of course, to object to all of them, but I would suggest that course of action to him.

Mr. LAPOINTE: We may allow the matter to stand for the present, anyhow.

Mr. SPEAKER: It will stand for the present.

Mr. BROWN: I was on my feet, Mr. Speaker, to move that the House proceed to consideration of private bills in committee of the Whole forthwith. I had been given to understand that the hon. member for Pontiac (Mr. Cahill) who had raised objection to the motion yesterday had withdrawn his objection.

Mr. SPEAKER: At the present time one cannot say whether the House will prorogue to-day, to-morrow or the day after. But the motion will stand: It will have the same effect as the motion of the hon. gentleman from Lisgar.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): May I ask the leader of the acting government, Mr. Speaker, if there is any agreement to be arrived at as to what bills are contentious and what are not contentious; he should take into consideration the fact that there are two other groups in the House?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Mr. Speaker, I very gladly include my hon. friend's party, and I have no doubt that he will be able to get full information as to the motion from the hon. member immediately next to him.

Mr. BROWN: I may say that the hon. leader of the House is entirely wrong.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I am sorry that there is a rift within the lute, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. BROWN: That is a guess again; there is no rift.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Mr. Speaker, I would point out that there is far less of a rift within the lute in this quarter than I find indicated in the party to which my hon. friend belongs.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: We now understand, Mr. Speaker, that this motion will come up again to see if the business of the House can be expedited.

Motion stands.

SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES FOR 1925-26 and 1926-27

A message from His Excellency the Governor General transmitting further supplementary estimates for the year ending March 31, 1926, was presented by Sir Henry Drayton (Acting Minister of Finance), read by Mr. Speaker to the House, and referred to the committee of Supply.

A message from His Excellency the Governor General transmitting supplementary estimates for the year ending March 31, 1927, was presented by Sir Henry Drayton (Acting Minister of Finance), read by Mr. Speaker to the House, and referred to the committee of Supply.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Mr. Speaker, I desire to point out that the estimates now tabled are the estimates of my hon. friends opposite without any change whatever.

CIVIL SERVICE SUPERANNUATION

Sir HENRY DRAYTON (Acting Minister of Finance) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 233, to amend the Civil Service Superannuation Act, 1924.

[Sir Henry Drayton.]

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

Mr. SPEAKER: When shall said bill be read a second time?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Now.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: It is for my hon. friends to say, of course; it is not our bill.

Mr. J. J. DENIS (Joliette): I think we should follow the regular procedure. We have not seen this bill yet, and I think everyone should have that opportunity.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Explain.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I am asked to explain. This bill merely extends the time within which civil servants may take advantage of the acts in connection with the retirement and pension funds. It has been brought up in the House several times, and was prepared by my hon. friends.

EXCISE ACT AMENDMENT

Hon. H. H. STEVENS (Acting Minister of Customs and Excise) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 234, to amend the Excise Act.

He said: This bill arises out of the report of the special committee investigating this department, and merely amends section 4 of chapter 52 by striking out the proviso at the end of that section, which reads as follows:

Provided, however, that the Governor in Council may suspend the operation of subsection 4 of this section during such period or periods as he may deem necessary.

This subsection was inserted in the bill in 1920.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

SURRENDER OF LANDS AGREEMENT WITH HUDSON'S BAY COMPANY

Mr. EVANS:

Has any agreement between this government and the Hudson's Bay Company been reached whereby the company agrees to abandon certain lands in the province of Alberta for the privilege of choosing the same amount in Manitoba or Saskatchewan?

Hon. Mr. STEVENS (Acting Minister of the Interior):

On the 23rd December, 1924, an agreement was entered into with the Hudson's Bay Company under which all lands held by the company within Forest reserves, Dominion parks and Indian reserves in the Fertile Belt were surrendered in exchange for vacant and available Dominion lands in the provinces of Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta, to be selected by the company.

Clause one of the agreement reads as follows:

1. The company agrees to surrender and release unto His Majesty all lands situate within Forest reserves, Dominion parks and Indian reserves in the Fertile Belt as defined in the said deed of surrender, hereinafter called the deed, and by an order in council P.C. 1667, bearing date the seventh day of May, 1896, to which the company holds title, and also any other interest, if any, in or to lands in the said reserves and parks to which it is entitled or claims to be entitled under the terms of the deed and the said legislation, in exchange for a quantity of vacant available Dominion lands in the provinces of Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta, situate outside the said reserves and parks to be selected by the company, and equal in area to the sum of the following:

(a) One-twentieth of the area of any land surveyed or unsurveyed included in Fertile Belt forest reserves other than the parks and reserves mentioned in subparagraph (c) hereunder. Forest reserves being as defined by the schedule to chapter 13 of the statutes 13 and 14 George V (Dom. 1923).

(b) One-twentieth of the area of any land included prior to said enactment in Forest reserves other than those mentioned in said subparagraph (c).

(c) The area of any land within Rocky Mountain park, Waterton Lake park, Rocky Mountain forest reserve and Indian reserves, unencumbered title to which is surrendered by the company to His Majesty.

Provided that no lands in Indian reserves and the Rocky Mountains forest reserve, the Rocky Mountains park or in the Waterton Lakes park as defined and shown on the homestead map or plan, Western Canada, of the Department of the Interior, seventeenth edition, published in the year 1921, copy of which is hereto annexed, except lands to which the company surrendered, or surrenders, the unencumbered title in fee simple shall be credited to the company in the said exchange of lands. Provided that in cases where the company has leased mineral rights the lands shall be conveyed and the leases assigned to His Majesty, and the title shall be treated as an unencumbered title in fee simple for the purposes of this agreement. Provided that any lands heretofore granted or conveyed by His Majesty to the company for purposes of exchange in excess of the area heretofore relinquished or surrendered by the company for such exchange shall be reckoned and taken as lands selected and acquired by the company in satisfaction—pro tanto—of the company's rights to lands under this clause.

No other agreement has been entered into whereby the company agrees to abandon lands in Alberta for the privilege of choosing the same area in Manitoba or Saskatchewan.

SADDLE LAKE RESERVE—ALBERTA SALE OF LANDS

Mr. BURY:

1. Shortly prior to, or at the sale on March 3, of a portion of the lands of the Saddle Lake Indian reserve, Alberta, did the Indian agent at the said reserve receive instructions that intending purchasers securing first choices would be entitled to purchase as much land as they desired?

2. If so, were these the original instructions of the government to the said agent, and if not the original instructions, on whose advice, request or suggestion and on what ground was the change in such original instructions made?

3. Were the names of the persons who actually drew and purchased portions of the said land only those set out below; and did each purchase the amount of land set out below opposite his name?

J. Gagnon, 8 quarter sections;
J. Cormack, 3 quarter sections;
Jacobs, 3 quarter sections;
H. Fontaine, 19 quarter sections;
V. Tessier, 5 quarter sections;
A. Poitras, 7 quarter sections;
P, Charron, 2 quarter sections.
1 Purchaser (name unknown), 1 quarter section.

4. If the above names and amounts of land were not those of the persons who actually purchased on the said 3rd or 4th of March, what were the names of and amounts purchased by such original purchasers respectively?

6. Were initial payments on their said purchases made by any of the said purchasers to the agent on the said 3rd or 4th of March or shortly thereafter?

7. Were other persons who had not themselves drawn tickets entitling them to purchase, subsequently summoned to the house of the said agent and desired or allowed themselves to become direct purchasers of lands or portions of such lands?

8. Does the list of purchasers given by the Minister of the Interior in answer to question (8) of the questions put to him on April 15th (Hansard 27th May, p. 3902), include as well such subsequent purchasers as the said original purchasers? If so, which are they?

[Mr. Stevens.]

Hon. Mr. STEVENS (Acting Minister of the Interior):

1. First instruction was to sell these lands by units, as originally plotted by the Soldier Settlement Board, such units ranging in area from 160 to 320 acres according to the suitability of the land for farming purposes. Following representations that this method would not prove satisfactory as the majority of prospective purchasers required half a section in order to farm properly by western methods, it was decided to permit each purchaser to select any parcel he desired, on the understanding, however, that not more than half a section would be allotted to any one individual.

2. Answered by No. 1.

3. The names of the purchasers or allottees at the first sale and the areas applied for were as follows,—

Several of the first allotments were made, the department is advised, by parties acting on behalf of others, the various selections being pooled, so the department instructed that these parties must be called upon to assume their contracts and obligations direct with the department, and individual purchases in no case to exceed half a section. This re-adjustment was satisfactorily carried out, and all available lands have been allotted or sold on this basis.

8. Yes. Fourteen quarter sections remaining have since been sold to the following parties:—

Peter Sheput, half section. Jos. Verbisky, half section. William Sheput, half section. Nick Chornohus, half section. William P. Kuz, half section. Stanley Boychuk, half section. Fred Calliou, quarter section. Joseph Leroux, quarter section.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

DOMINION DAY SITTING

On the Orders of the Day:

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the Opposition): I would like to ask my hon. friend if the government has decided as to whether or not the House is to sit on the 1st of July. I may say that the opposition is wholly agreeable to any decision which the government may have reached in the matter.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON (Leader of the House): I think last night, Mr. Speaker, we asked what the opinion of the House was as to whether we would sit or not on Dominion Day. If it is the opinion of the House that we should sit, we sit.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I want to be sure I understand my hon. friend aright. I intimated that the opposition collectively are agreeable to whatever decision the government has reached. Do I understand that the government has reached the decision to sit on the 1st of July?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Yes.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That is the government's decision?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Yes.

PRIVILEGE—Mr. McMILLAN

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. THOMAS McMILLAN (South Huron): Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege. In yesterday's Mail and Empire I find the following:

> Ottawa, Ontario, June 28.—The reasons Thomas McMillan, South Huron, was not entitled to a pair are stated in the following statement made by W. A. Boys, chief Conservative whip. Mr. Boys has given the following details of the situation over the McMillan pair.
> When the Liberal whip asked me for a pair for Mr. McMillan, I refused on three grounds:
> 1. Early in the session when Mr. A. D. Chaplin was sick in bed in Chatham and could not attend, I was refused a pair for him.
> 2. Mr. McMillan had but a few days ago paired with Mr. Jones of New Brunswick, and had disregarded his pair and had voted.
> 3. Mr. Carmichael, one of the Progressives, was supporting the opposition, so I was given to understand, and had to leave for the west on account of the illness of his daughter, and I felt his vote would offset Mr. McMillan's, and the actual voting strength of the House would thus be preserved.
> In addition to the above reasons I since learned from Mr. Hocken that about five weeks ago Mr. McMillan had approached him for a sessional pair, to which Mr. Hocken had verbally agreed. On the 13th June, Mr. Hocken took sick and was confined to bed. On the 15th June, Mr. Hocken, owing to the unusual importance of the division, asked to have the pair confirmed by the Liberal whip, and asked Mr. McMillan to come to see him in his room. This Mr. McMillan refused to do, and in consequence Mr. Hocken had to be carried into the House at two a.m., when he should have been at home in bed.

Mr. Speaker, I wish to take exception to such a statement. So far as I am implicated, there is no truth in this statement. The hon. member for Royal (Mr. Jones) came to me and asked for a pair. My reply was: "All right, but I will do nothing myself; we will go to our whip, Mr. Casgrain," which we did. I told Mr. Casgrain in the presence of Mr. Jones that he would like to pair with me, and while I was not going home till to-morrow, Friday, night, yet I would pair with him from that moment until my return on Monday night, but it was between the two of them. When the hon. member for Royal did return, he came to me and said that while he thought he was paired, he knew there was no blame attached to me.

As to the hon. member for Toronto West Centre (Mr. Hocken), while we did meet and I would have liked a sessional pair, I got no such assurance from him, and considered our pair only temporary over the week end until our return on the following Monday. Furthermore, I know nothing of the hon. member for Toronto West Centre wishing the Liberal whip to confirm my pair with him on the evening of June 15. This report is the first I have heard of it. That was the same night on which my pair expired with Mr. Jones, and while a messenger did hand me a note from Mr. Hocken, saying he wished to see me in his room, it was just when the vote was called, and having no obligation to him, I returned the note saying I could not come at present. I did not know of his illness till afterwards.

Mr. H. C. HOCKEN (Toronto West Centre): Mr. Speaker, the statement made by the chief whip of the Conservative party which has just been read by the hon. member for South Huron (Mr. McMillan) is absolutely accurate. The hon. member came to me of his own initiative, outside the door of my room upstairs, and suggested that he and I should pair for the session. The words he used were these: "When I am away you won't vote, and when you are away I won't vote." If that is not to be understood as a sessional pair between two hon. members of the House, then I would like to know what is.

As to the occasion upon which he voted, I was under the doctor's orders at the time under no circumstances to leave my bed. I endeavoured to get the assistant whip to confirm the sessional pair I had made with the hon. member for South Huron, and he came to me and said that he had gone to the hon. member for South Huron and said that he would like him to come and see me in my room upstairs so that I could go home to bed, but that the hon. member for South Huron had refused to do so. That is the substance, and pretty nearly the text, of the statement made by the whip, and I am here to say that that statement is correct.

Mr. G. B. JONES (Royal): Mr. Speaker, I have listened to the statement made by the hon. member for South Huron (Mr. McMillan). On Thursday the 10th of June I passed a note across the floor to the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth (Mr. Hatfield) asking him to favour me with a pair from Friday until the next Wednesday. He returned the note and said that he was paired with the hon. member for Digby-Annapolis (Mr. Short) until his return. I spoke to our whip and he said: "Perhaps you could see Mr. McMillan." I crossed the floor to where Mr. McMillan was sitting, somewhere near his old seat before we changed sides, and I asked him if he would give me a pair until next Wednesday. He said, "Wait till I see my whip." He spoke to the whip of the Liberal party, and the whip beckoned me to come up and said: "You wish to pair with Mr. McMillan?" I said, "Yes, until next Wednesday." The Liberal whip wrote down, "Jones-McMillan, Wednesday." I got up then to leave, and Mr. McMillan put out his hand and shook hands on it. I went over and reported the matter to our whip, and he recorded the pair in the same way as until Wednesday next. That was on Thursday night. I went home on Friday afternoon and arrived in Montreal at 7.20 on Wednesday morning, and on looking at the Montreal Gazette I noticed that it said that I was the only Conservative away from the House without a pair. You can understand the feeling that came over me when I read that. I came to Ottawa and crossed over and said to Mr. McMillan: "Why did you go back on the pair you made with me?" He said: "I am not to blame for that." I said: "Who else is to blame but you?" "Oh well," he said, "it was our whip." I said: "I did not pair with your whip. I made an honourable pair with you as between man and man and member and member, and you have gone back on your word." He said: "The next time we make a pair we will make it between ourselves." He then asked me if I would give him a pair that week end so that he could go home as his wife was ill, and I said: "Not until this matter is cleaned up." That is the last conversation I had with the hon. member.

Mr. PIERRE F. CASGRAIN (Charlevoix-Saguenay): May I say a few words in connection with this matter? I remember the hon. member for Royal (Mr. Jones) and the hon. member for South Huron (Mr. McMillan) coming to see me and telling me that they wanted to pair. I did not object to it, but I said that the hon. member for South Huron could pair with the hon. member for Royal if all our members would be here and there would be no absentees, and that should there be any absentees I would see that the pair would be covered by some other member on our side who might be absent. On that very night before the division took place I remember going to the whip of the then opposition and reciting these facts to him and offering him a pair for the hon. member for Royal, I think Mr. Sylvestre, the hon. member for Lake St. John, but it was declined. That, according to my recollection, was the only understanding at that time. I have never refused to give a pair to hon. gentlemen opposite; I have always desired to be agreeable to them.

As regards the other incident that was mentioned, that a pair was refused to the hon. member for Kent (Mr. Chaplin) who happened to be sick, the circumstances are these: At that time the hon. member for Kent had not been sworn in and had not signed the roll and so, according to the usages, practice and rules of the House of Commons, was not a member in regular standing.

BUSINESS CONDITIONS IN SYDNEY

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. E. M. MACDONALD (Antigonish-Guysborough): Last week a very representative delegation from the city of Sydney, Nova Scotia, waited upon the then government and made certain representations as to the conditions of business and the industry there, and asked for certain remedies. I may say that the then government had under consideration dealing with that question. I desire to ask the government whether any representations have been made to them since they took office, and whether they intend to bring down any legislation to deal with the matter this session?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I am quite sure we will be very glad to hear any representations my hon. friend has to make in connection with the conditions in Nova Scotia, and I hasten to assure him that we will not only consider them, but, I hope, give far quicker and more sympathetic treatment to them than he has been able to do.

Mr. MACDONALD (Antigonish Guysborough): Have any representations been made to the government?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: No, I have heard nothing.

ORDER IN COUNCIL PASSED BY THE LATE ADMINISTRATION

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. GEORGES PARENT (Quebec West): I wish to ask the government if it is true that a general order has been issued to suspend the execution of all orders in council passed by the previous administration, and also the execution of all contracts already entered into between the late government and contractors?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I have no knowledge of any such order.

MONTREAL HARBOUR COMMISSION

On the motion of Sir Henry Drayton, Bill No. 189, to provide for a loan to the Harbour Commissioners of Montreal was read a third time.

SOLDIER SETTLEMENT ACT, 1919, AMENDMENT

CONCURRENCE IN SENATE AMENDMENTS

Hon. R. J. MANION (Acting Minister of Soldier's Civil Re-establishment) moved the second reading of and concurrence in amendments made by the Senate to Bill No. 17, to amend the Soldier Settlement Act, 1919.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: What are the amendments?

Mr. MANION: I have not had time to go into them thoroughly but there is only one change that I can discover, and I have discussed the matter with the chief commissioner, and it is to the effect that instead of having a board of arbitration as was decided by this House, any change in the valuation of the soldiers' land is now left to the Soldier Settlement Board itself, with the opportunity of appeal to the Exchequer Court of Canada. There was some idea, I believe, that this would impose too much work upon the Exchequer court. However, I had the matter looked into and as far as I can find after rather hurried examination there would not be so many appeals as to embarrass the Exchequer court. At the same time there is a condition in the bill permitting the Exchequer court to delegate that work if they will to some other agency such as a district judge or a county court judge. So far as I have been able to look into the matter, and I have done that as thoroughly as time would permit, the change is satisfactory to all concerned. I have inquired of some of those who took great interest in the soldier settlement question when it was up and I think the matter is satisfactory from our standpoint unless there should be objections from somebody else.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The minister has just stated that he himself has not had the opportunity to inform himself fully as to the amendments. I have a copy of the amendments which, through the courtesy of hon. gentlemen opposite, has just been handed to me, and when I look at the bill it seems to be completely scored from end to end. Consequently I think opportunity should be given to the government and to the members of the House to see what the significance of these amendments is before we consent to them. I therefore suggest to my hon. friend that he allow the bill to stand until we have had an opportunity of fully considering them.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: We will allow it to stand until later in the day.

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre): May I ask the minister whether the expense connected with such appeals would not preclude anyone at a distance, or anyone who is not in good circumstances, from making an appeal?

Mr. MANION: It may, perhaps, result in a little more expense, but I am not even certain as to that. I can assure my hon. friend, however, that if the bill goes through every effort will be made to avoid expense to any of these soldier settlers who may have to appeal. As I have already said, the matter is so arranged that the Exchequer court could delegate the work to a local board. They could appoint, for example, an assessor to go and investigate so that there would not necessarily be any additional expense to the soldier settlers. Of course the Exchequer court itself holds sittings throughout the country; but the point is that they could delegate to a county court judge, or to some other official whom they saw fit to choose, the power to act as assessor in their behalf in order to get a fair decision. The reason for making the change was that an appeal to the Exchequer Court of Canada would be more likely to result in an absolutely fair and impartial decision in all cases than would an appeal to local boards, who might be influenced one way or the other by local influences.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I would ask that the motion stand.

Mr. E. J. GARLAND (Bow River): Will the minister say that up to the point where disagreement arises upon the question of valuation, the full jurisdiction rests in the hands of the Soldier Settlement Board and the board has the power to decide?

Mr. MANION: Yes, if the man is satisfied, but if he is not satisfied he can appeal to the Exchequer court.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): If my hon. friends, after all their protests, can accept that, very well.

Hon. CHARLES STEWART (West Edmonton): Inasmuch as we have not had an opportunity of noting the amendment I welcome the delay, and I do not attempt to say anything at the moment, except that I am amazed that my hon. friend would accept this amendment, because it is the identical proposal which I made to the House, and hon. members kept me here for three days endeavouring to change this, in order to place the matter in the hands of the district court. I am glad the Senate viewed this matter in the light of the experience they had in discussing it and went back to the original proposal.

Mr. MANION: I did not keep my hon. friend three days. Some of my hon. friends may have taken a certain attitude on this question, but I do not remember. It is now left entirely in the hands of the Exchequer court, with the opportunity of passing it over to the district or county court or some assessor, if they desire. In reference to the remarks of my right hon. friend on the other amendments, I think they are mainly technical but I am satisfied to have the bill stand.

Mr. A. NEILL (Comox-Alberni): Apparently the strongest argument that can be advanced in favour of the changes made in this bill by the other body is the claim that they have left it open for us to go back to the original bill as passed in this House. They have left it open to go back to the local tribunal, and the strongest argument advanced by the minister apparently, as to why we should accept their amendment, is that they have left open the door to get back to the bill as it passed this House; in other words, to the local tribunal. That was the provision in the bill as it left this chamber.

Then again the argument is used that appealing to the Exchequer court will provide uniformity and will be more reliable. That argument might apply were it a question of law, or a case where it was desirable to have a uniformity of law throughout Canada; but how can you have uniformity of judgment?

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I cannot hear a word.

Mr. NEILL: How can you have uniformity of judgment in the matter of the value of land which varies every five miles? It was alleged in the previous debate or possibly in the other chamber, that by having a judge, one man acting, he could make up his mind what the value was in a given case. Then the matter was settled. All he had to do was to adopt that value in every case. To anyone who knows anything about the common sense view it is simply ridiculous, because the value of land varies, not only in every province, but every few miles. In one case it might cost $300 or $400 to clear land. That is common in the west. Is that condition to be compared with the case of broken land on the prairie where it does not require anything to clear it? The purpose of the bill was to see that justice would be done by the local tribunal in every local condition that arose. I think it would be desirable that we should have the full amendments of the bill before us, so that we would know what particular sections were affected and in what way. The amendments will be found in Votes and Proceedings. Perhaps in line 95 you strike out the word "and". It may not mean much or it may be very important. In one of the Senate Hansards I saw a suggestion made on the addition of a clause which while apparently innocent, might be used in a court directed to the strictly legal aspect for the purpose of upsetting the whole bill; because it said it could only apply to those soldiers whose condition was such that it was impossible for them to continue with the overload of indebtedness which they might have. The wording of the clause was of such a character that it might be held, "Well here is this man with an overload of $2,000, but he is a hard-working industrious chap, with a wife and growing family. It is not impossible for them to survive that load and overcome it." That was not the principle of the bill as it left this House. The principle was that fair and even-handed justice should be meted out, and the case should not be decided upon legal technicalities at all. At a later stage I saw that same bill in the Senate and I could not find that clause; but if that clause is in the measure it requires careful investigation. The minister should take steps before the bill comes up again to have the amendments printed in such a way as to show what their effect will be. If we have to wade through forty or fifty amendments, where we are told to strike out the word "or" and insert two or three words in another place, going through it in the hurried way in which we are doing, justice will not be done.

Mr. MANION: I am not—neither is the government—in any way wedded to this measure, because we have not had sufficient time to look into it. The amendments of the Senate were put on the order paper and appear in Votes and Proceedings of June 23, so that we did have an opportunity, had we watched our Votes and Proceedings, of studying the matter. But if it is the opinion of the House, after a further discussion when the matter comes up again, that these amendments should be dealt with further, we have no objection. My copy of the bill contains the amendments.

Motion stands.

LONG TERM FARM LOANS

CONCURRENCE IN SENATE AMENDMENTS

Sir HENRY DRAYTON (Leader of the House) moved the second reading of and concurrence in amendments made by the Senate to Bill No. 148, for the purpose of establishing in Canada a system of long term mortgage credit for farmers.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: What are these amendments?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I desire to bring these amendments to the attention of hon. members. I think they have been tabled for some time and are available to hon. members who desire to look into the question.

Mr. DUNNING: Did the minister say they had been tabled for some time?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I think the information has been before us.

Mr. DUNNING: Yesterday.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I thought it was earlier. They were tabled only yesterday, but the bill is a very important one, and I think we should consider it as early as possible. I propose to take up the amendments one by one and draw them to the attention of my hon. friends. The amendments appear in the Votes and Proceedings. The first amendment is one made to clause 3 of the bill. That clause provides for the appointment of the members of the board. I believe the House will agree that there is no objection whatever to that amendment; it simply adds, after the word "council" the words, "On such terms and conditions as the Governor in Council may prescribe."

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): What does that mean?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Personally I do not think it adds anything to it.

Mr. DUNNING: It makes no difference?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: It makes no difference. Generally when anyone is appointed he is appointed on such terms and conditions as the person making the appointment chooses to attach. That is all that is said. The amendments are to be found on page 497 of Votes and Proceedings. The amendment to section 5 merely makes it clear that the capital stock shall be based on the principal outstanding on mortgages from time to time rather than on the original face value of the mortgage. The first three and a half lines of subsection (a) of section 5 are struck out and it is provided instead that the government of Canada may subscribe an initial amount not exceeding $5,000,000 and pay that amount in such subscriptions and at such times as in the judgment of the board are necessary.

On page 3 after the word "total" the words "amount of principal outstanding on" are added. The effect is to restrict the capital to the amount actually outstanding. I do not think there is any other change in that section except one providing that shares in the capital stock may be transferred at the option of the board where the sale of property is satisfactory to the board.

Next we come to section 7. On page 5 of the bill there is a charge of some moment. The matter was discussed in the House and there were some differences of opinion as to whether we were doing right or not. The particular provision had reference to the limitation of expenses of operation to one per cent of the loan, and after some discussion that was carried. I remember supporting it myself although other hon. gentlemen considered it unfair to fix such a limitation until it had been seen how matters worked out. It was thought that we could trust to the board to manage things properly. However, we put it in and the Senate struck it out. That limitation having been removed the matter is left entirely to the proper administration of the board. In his note on the section Mr. Finlayson, who had the matter in hand both in this House for the minister and in the Senate, says that it was felt that the judgment of the board should be unfettered in fixing upon the provision to be made in the mortgage interest rate to take care of cost of operation.

There is another change in subsection 6 of section 7. That subsection provides:

> Every farm loan shall be repayable in equal annual or semi-annual instalments of principal and interest.

The Senate has added the words "at the option of the borrower." No one I think will object to that. It simply means that the borrower can decide whether he wishes to have his loan carry payments annually or semi-annually.

In subsection 7 the words "all assessments and taxes" are struck out and the following words are substituted:

> All assessments, taxes and other charges necessary to be paid for the security of the board in respect of the loan.

The amendment is to provide that the borrower shall pay, in addition to assessments and taxes, such other charges as may be found necessary for the protection of the board in relation to the upkeep of its property. Personally, I do not know exactly what was feared, but hon. gentlemen who live in the district will probably appreciate the reason for the change. At any rate, the amendment does not appear to be of considerable importance. The subsection as amended by the Senate reads:

> (7) Notwithstanding anything contained in the Interest Act every borrower shall pay simple interest on defaulted payments at a rate not exceeding eight per cent per annum and shall agree to pay when due all assessments, taxes and other charges necessary to be paid for the security of the board in respect of the loan and to effect such insurance as the board may require. Should such taxes, assessments and charges not be paid when due, they may be paid by the board and charged to the borrower, and if not repaid to the board on or before the next interest date with interest thereon at a rate not exceeding eight per cent per annum the borrower shall be considered in default under the mortgage.

The effect of this amendment is that if these payments have to be made by the board in the ordinary course the board may charge interest on such payments, not to exceed 8 per cent.

There is a change in subsection 8 of the same section. The amendment recognizes the right of the borrower to repay his loan in whole or in part at any time within the specified period.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): At no time shall the borrower pay more than 8 per cent on the loan in arrears. Does that 8 per cent include all charges?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: It would cover all charges which have been actually paid by the board; that is all. The rate is not fixed. That is something for the board to arrange in the ordinary way, but they cannot stipulate for a greater rate of interest than 8 per cent.

We were considering the section dealing with payments by borrowers. As I was pointing out, this subsection has been amended to recognize the right of the borrower to repay his loan in whole or in part at any time without notice, instead of after five years as in the original bill. This privilege, however, will be subject to regulations not inconsistent with the Interest Act, which provides that the penalty for repayment without notice after five years' duration shall not exceed a bonus of three months' interest. As I said to my hon. friend from Regina (Mr. Dunning) I would think this would be a matter of administration.

Mr. DUNNING: I said so when the bill was going through this House.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I would think the board ought to take the money at any time without any trouble at all. This is to help the borrower because before he had not the right to repay without notice. This helps him to the extent that he can repay at any time without waiting five years, but that he may be charged a bonus of not more than three months interest. In my view, when we establish the machinery of administration the proper way of dealing with this would be to have a rule enabling a man to repay his loan at any time without charging him any bonus whatever.

Hon. J. A. ROBB (Chateauguay-Huntingdon): Before my hon. friend leaves section 8, may I direct his attention, if it is permissible, to certain suggested amendments that were made in another House by the leader of the government. A resolution was presented there and seconded by an hon. gentleman who is mentioned as a member of this government. I should like to know what my hon. friend's attitude is in that regard. I observe some hon. gentleman over there said that if you were going to chloroform the bill you might as well chloroform it at once. I submit to my hon. friend that even should the bill pass this House, if the government is not sympathetic towards it there will be means of tying it up.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Some amendments were proposed in the other House but were withdrawn; for example, an amendment to the effect that this law was not to be operative without the consent of the provinces, as I recall it. We are not receiving this bill in any such spirit at all. So far as we have gone with these amendments, I have not seen anything which really tends to injure the administration of this bill one way or the other. I do not know if my hon. friends are going to say we will strike something later on of that character, but so far we have not. I quite admit to my hon. friend that the usefulness of all legislation depends upon how it is carried out—

Mr. ROBB: Hear, hear.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: —and I hope this bill is going to be properly carried out. So far as I am concerned, it will be properly carried out.

Mr. ROBB: I congratulate my hon. friend upon his rapid conversion.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I am quite delighted to give my hon. friend an opportunity of exchanging smiles with me, but he is entirely wrong. Why, we were calling for this provision before the bill was brought down. If my hon. friend will go back a little he will remember the ghost of a bill we had last year, and he will remember that the then opposition laid down the lines of a bill which my hon. friend afterwards put the clothes on. I congratulate him on that.

Sections 9 and 10 are pretty well tied together. They speak for themselves. The calling of the loan is to be at the option of the board. I do not think there is any difficulty about that. Then comes section 8, in which a change is made in the number of members to act as agents for the provincial board. The number of members is reduced from five to four, the reduction being in the members representative of the borrowers from two to one. There is also a proviso—I am giving the effect of the whole thing—that until such time as in the judgment of the board nomination by the borrower is practicable, all the functions of the provincial board may be exercised by the three members nominated by the government of the province. I think my hon. friend will say that that is all right.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): No, Mr. Speaker, I am not altogether certain that it is all right, but I doubt if at this stage we can do anything to remedy it. As my hon. friend well knows, one of the major principles underlying this bill was that it should ultimately develop into that type of credit control which would allow the borrowers themselves to administer their own credit. I remember the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens) supported us strongly on that point before the Banking committee in the last four years. The ideal condition is an agricultural credit system which will in the ultimate rest absolutely in the hands of the borrowers and be administered by them. This amendment to a great extent delays that action. We need more representation. You have to encourage the borrowers to take an interest in this matter and the best way to arouse their interest is by giving them power to elect their representatives to the board. This amendment cuts down their representation from two to one. Frankly, Mr. Speaker, I do not think we can do anything at this late stage with respect to this feature, but I simply wish to go on record as intimating to the administration that unquestionably in future we, or others, will come back to this House asking that recognition be given to the borrowers' interest in the matter.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The next section to be amended is number 9, where the word, "stock" is put in after "capital". I need not pause there at all, for it is just carrying out the purpose of the first amendment that I drew attention to. Then we have subsection 5 of section 9:

> If as a result of proceedings under any mortgage the title to the property securing such mortgage is transferred to the board, the stock held by the borrower in the board shall be cancelled and the amount paid thereon by the borrower shall be forfeited to the board.

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Regina): I do not know whether we are exactly in order in discussing the amendments in this manner, but, Mr. Speaker, I object to the amendment. I do not think it is fair to the borrower. His land is forfeited to the board, and in addition the amount of his stock, which, remember, he paid for in cash, and which was equivalent to 5 per cent of the original amount of his mortgage, is also forfeited to the board. It is not even credited to him in any manner as part of his debt. It is true there may very well be circumstances where the amount owing to the board by the mortgagor may be so much greater than the value of the stock which the board takes over as to involve the taking also of the borrower's interest in the association equivalent, as I have said, to 5 per cent of the amount of his loan. But surely we should not assume that all cases will be of that kind. Under the amendment, however, as suggested by the Senate, all cases would be treated alike, and whatever the situation of the borrower and his security might be he would nevertheless forfeit the 5 per cent interest in the capital stock of the institution.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I speak subject to correction by my hon. friend, whose bill this very largely is. I would have thought that if it is not clear it ought to be made clear, and as a matter of administration it must be made clear, that so far as that stock is concerned it must be looked upon as a payment pro tanto on the borrower's debt.

Mr. DUNNING: What is "pro tanto?"

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: "To the extent it goes." You see, the man is given a certain amount of stock.

Mr. CAHAN: It is a partial security.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Yes, which is held by those administering it, and I submit that no board would ever think of taking that stock and the property as well if, by taking any of the stock, the debt would be paid.

Mr. C. H. CAHAN (St. Lawrence-St. George): If the debt would be more than paid it would be highly immoral.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: And I do not think that is at all the intent of the section.

Mr. DUNNING: That is the language.

Mr. G. G. COOTE (Macleod): Could not further words be added to that amendment, that it should apply on the mortgage?

Mr. CAHAN: It is only in the case of one particular proceeding, when the board have failed to realize on a mortgage security sufficient to pay the mortgage debt, and of course I think it would be highly immoral indeed if, when a transfer of the mortgaged property, plus the stock, was more than sufficient to liquidate the actual indebtedness outstanding, the board appropriated that excess.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): If that is the spirit in which the act will be administered it will be satisfactory, but it should be made very clear that in the event of a delay in the realization of a security, if the amount of money secured including the 5 per cent is more than enough to pay the mortgagor's liability, then there should be a refund.

Mr. CAHAN: It seems to me, at this late hour, that that could be arranged by regulation, but it should be clearly understood as my hon. friend has pronounced it.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): If the Acting Minister of Finance, whoever is acting at the moment—I am really at a loss to know.

An hon. MEMBER: It is all the same.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Yes, it is all the same. If whoever is acting will go on record that a regulation will be enacted providing that the spirit enunciated here will be incorporated in the bill, it will be satisfactory.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: There is not the slightest difficulty in that. Furthermore, before any proceedings would be taken the man must be credited with the amount of the stock.

Mr. A. M. YOUNG (Saskatoon): In an important matter like this why should not the procedure be incorporated in the bill, without trusting to some regulations which are to come afterward? I strongly protest against legislation going through in this fashion. These things should be printed and submitted to the House, and there should be no cross-firing here unless we know what we are doing. I want to go on record as saying that this manner of doing business is entirely improper, in my judgment, and should not be carried on.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I am afraid my hon. friend is singularly ignorant of the business of the House. If he will look at the Votes and Proceedings he will find everything before him, and I have no doubt he can read as well as anyone. If hon. gentlemen want to delay this bill and tie it up the responsibility must be theirs. I am willing to assist in every possible way in providing the fullest measure of relief to farmers all over Canada under this measure. That is my desire, but if for technicalities or the like we are to be held up certainly the fault is not ours. This bill will have to go back to the Senate if any further changes are made. I am perfectly willing to accept what has been said by the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Garland) to the fullest possible extent, and I really think the House should take the same stand. However, I am entirely in the hands of the House.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go on.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Very well. There is a new clause A, having to do with the audit of the books. It is as follows:

An audit of the books of the board and of each provincial board shall be made in accordance with regulations made under the provisions of section sixteen of this act by a firm of charterd accountants appointed for that purpose by the Governor in Council, and a copy of the report of the said accountants on the annual statement of the board shall be laid before parliament by the minister within the first fifteen days of the first session thereof following the date of the said report.

I do not think my hon. friend will object to that.

Mr. DUNNING: Not at all.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Then there is another new clause B, as follows:

(1) Notwithstanding anything contained in this act the operations of the board in virtue thereof shall be conducted in such a manner as to give, as far as practicable, to the shareholders in each province the full benefit of the operations in such province.

(2) The word "shareholders" in this section shall mean the holders of shares of the board subscribed by the provinces, respectively, by the borrowers in such provinces and by the government of Canada as provided in paragraph (2) of section five of this act.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I do not think the principle is a sound one in any national rural credit scheme but I am not going to raise any opposition to it, because I feel satisfied that there will be no possibility of taking advantage of this particular clause for many years. By that time probably we will have come to reason again and will have amended the bill to conform to proper principles.

Mr. CAHAN: I would like very much to see this clause retained for the present, because it is with great difficulty that members representing eastern constituencies can prevail upon the provincial governments to cooperate under this scheme. This provides something of an incentive.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): It will not really amount to anything.

Mr. CAHAN: Possibly not.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): It would mean some additional expense in keeping the books; you would have to keep all the provinces separate, but I have no objection at present because I think the problem will solve itself.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Then I proceed to the new clause C, which is as follows:

Except as may be otherwise decided from time to time by the Governor in Council all actions and decisions of the board shall be deemed within its powers and shall be conclusive against all interested parties.

Mr. DUNNING: I do not like that, but I suppose we had better take it.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I do not know that there is any very great harm in it, and I do not know that it does any particular good either; I do not think it makes any difference.

Mr. COOTE: What was the purpose of putting it in?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The expert of my hon. friend the ex-Minister of Finance did not give me a memorandum on that particular clause, but I suppose it really means that as between the investors and the board, the board is supposed to be boss. I do not see how it can possibly change any matter of property in civil rights, which are entirely in the courts and with which we cannot interfere. I agree with my hon. friend; I do not see any use in it but if we cut it out it means wasting time. I do not think it will do any harm.

Mr. CAHAN: Does it not merely enact that, prima facie, the decision of the board shall prevail? That is all that is meant, I think, that prima facie the decision of the board shall prevail against all interested parties, but that if there should be a case of exceptional wrong resulting therefrom, an appeal may be made to the Governor in Council.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): It is very dangerous.

Mr. CAHAN: Yes, but it is necessary.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Of course, as every hon. member knows who has had anything to do with mortgage companies, the mortgage company is prima facie correct all the time, but they have to go to the courts just the same, and the borrower here would have his remedy in the courts, and nothing we can do can bar that court remedy. I do not think this does any harm.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Just one other point, and it is an important one. I think one of the greatest conflicts that took place with regard to this bill was on the question of the jurisdiction of the provincial board. I am very much afraid that this clause will entirely destroy what little right the provincial board has been given, and the only right which the board now definitely has is to insist upon a conference in the event of a dispute as between the central board and the provincial board on questions affecting the borrowings of that province. If this clause is designed to destroy that little vestige of authority that is left to the board, I think it ought to be struck out. I do not want to delay the bill in the least, but unless I can get the assurance that that is not the intent and purpose of this clause, and that it will not be so interpreted, I am afraid that in fairness to the bill itself and to our understanding of it, the clause should be modified.

Hon. H. H. STEVENS (Acting Minister of Customs and Excise): May I call to my hon. friend's attention the fact that this clause opens with this expression:

Except as may be otherwise decided from time to time by the Governor in Council—showing that there is still a restraining hand on the board by the Governor in Council, which would be precisely the proper body to which any provincial board might appeal if they felt aggrieved. I think my hon. friend's point was well taken, but I think he will find that it is safeguarded there.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): The authority of the provincial board is given to it in a prior clause of this bill, and the only authority it has is the authority of forcing a conference in the event of a disagreement as between the central board and the provincial board on a question of policy, particularly on matters of foreclosure. This does unquestionably refer to questions of foreclosure. The interested parties can be interpreted as nothing else but the bondholders or the borrower. Now if the board is to be given full authority under this clause to step in and exercise its full power in any way it likes on any individual without reference to the provincial board, the situation is unquestionably bad. But if the minister will declare now that this cannot be interpreted as referring to or minimizing any of the powers previously given in the act to the provincial board, I am willing to let the matter go.

Mr. STEVENS: It would not be possible to say that, offhand, at least, but I submit again that if my hon. friend will read the clause carefully he will note that if it were brought to the attention of the Governor in Council that some abuse such as he mentions had actually arisen, then the Governor in Council has power to curb the action of the board in deciding against all parties. My hon. friend and his colleague from Macleod (Mr. Coote) and one or two other hon. gentlemen who have given close study to this matter for so many years, as well as myself, know the very great difficulty in matters of this kind in getting a formula that will exactly meet the situation. I earnestly trust because I am interested in this legislation, that nothing will be done to prevent the legislation now becoming law. I think we are perhaps fortunate in getting it to the point where it is to-day. There might be some technical question such as my hon. friend raises that might cause some apprehension, but I feel certain that it is not sufficient to jeopardize the bill. I think I can say with some assurance that my hon. friend will be able to trust any responsible federal government, whatever its political complexion may be, to properly exercise its rights and its functions in connection with this clause or similar clauses.

Mr. CAHAN: In reply to my hon. friend from Bow River (Mr. Garland), certainly under this provision I am prepared to advise him that, as a matter of law, no order in council can diminish or take away any of the powers conferred by statute upon a provincial board. It is absolutely impossible.

Mr. JOHN EVANS (Rosetown): I would like to point out that if there is one general fault with this bill, it is that the borrower himself is so far away from the management. This new clause is, I think, dangerous. In my opinion it over-rides entirely clause 11 of the bill, and I certainly do not like it.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Before the motion is put, Mr. Speaker, let me say that I am indeed gratified to know that although there has been a change of administration, a change from the administration which has succeeded in bringing this legislation to this point, yet this legislation will rest in the hands of two hon. gentlemen opposite one of whom has been a constant and faithful supporter of legislation of this character for five years, to my personal knowledge, and the other one, who is now the acting leader of the government in this House, recently indicated his entire sympathy with the object sought to be secured by this bill. Not only that, but he supported the protests which emanated from this corner of the House as to the possibility of the interest rate going to a higher point than 7 per cent.

[Mr. Stevens.]

When this particular section which has been amended by the Senate was before us a few moments ago, I refrained from discussing it in order that we might discuss the whole principle on the conclusion of the discussion of the details. The administration which has just gone out of office gave us the definite assurance that in the event of their finding themselves unable to sell the bonds in the open market at a rate of interest which would allow them to loan to the borrowers at a sufficiently low rate, 7 per cent, they would themselves take up the first issue of the bonds up to the amount of $15,000,000, if necessary, and so establish a market. I am quite satisfied, Mr. Speaker, that the hon. gentlemen opposite will be willing to go just as far as the administration which has just gone out was willing to go, and that they will give the House and the country, espécially those in the west who are suffering from rates of interest running from 8 to 9 and 10, and in some cases even to 12 per cent, some hope that in the future agriculture will be put on a basis where it will be at least relieved, if not unshackled, from the hideous burdens which it is carrying at the present time. But I am satisfied that unless sympathetic administration is given to this act from the very outset, and unless some attempt is made to apportion the costs over a period of years, the costs in the initial stage will so advance the interest rate to the borrower that the bill itself will utterly fail. But in the hands of a sympathetic administration, looking at this matter from the point of view of the whole national industry of agriculture extending over the whole of the future, the act can be made of great value. But it rests entirely with the administration; it rests completely with the sympathy of the government that is handling it.

Although I deeply regret the action of the Senate in striking out the 1 per cent limitation of administration costs, a limitation which would have ensured us a reasonably low rate of interest,—the rate would have been governed solely by the cost, plus the rate at which the bonds could be sold—there was some surety there, but there is none to-day. We have to rely entirely on sympathy from hon. members opposite who will be administering this act.

An hon. MEMBER: You will not be depending upon a broken reed.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Perhaps not but that remains to be proved. Let me say to the hon. member who has just spoken that his fate and the fate of his party in Canada in the future may rest entirely upon the sympathetic manner in which they handle this matter they are taking into their hands. At this moment few in eastern Canada realize the growing power and force of western Canada. The sooner they do realize it the sooner they will give more sympathetic hearing to and indulge in less bitter criticism of the protests we are bringing to this House. Let me say this: Although I deeply deplore the action of the Senate in striking out the one per cent limitation, I am prepared to accept the assurance on record in the speeches of the hon. member for Vancouver Centre, who is now a member of the government, and the hon. gentleman who is acting leader of the government, that they believe the one per cent limitation should be put in this bill. I am satisfied that they will carry out that assurance and I am prepared to give them every assistance to make the act a success. But I say that upon them rests the responsibility of properly administering the act and I hope they will be true to it.

Mr. DUNNING: Before the motion carries I desire to say a very few words. On the whole, the amendments will not prevent the carrying out of the objective which the government had in view in bringing down the legislation in the first place. It is perhaps fortunate for us that the chloroforming process which was referred to in a quotation by the ex-Minister of Finance did not come to fruition in another place. I am not so sanguine as my hon. friend who has just sat down, regarding the administration of this act and the development of this system by the pro tem government. I am not so sanguine for the reason that I have a very vivid memory—

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I can assure my hon. friend the ex-Minister of Railways that if he had been in this battle for five years he would have found that with respect to one member of the Conservative party at least we got more complete sympathy and understanding from him than we did from any other member of that party.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Hon. gentlemen opposite need not applaud because with that one exception not a single hon. member in their ranks gave us any assistance. But there is at least that moiety of justification for my statement.

Mr. DUNNING: I am not complaining of my hon. friend's statement. I think it took more than one to save a certain city on a notable occasion, and it will take more than one advocate of a rural credit system on the other side to blot out from my mind the objections which were urged by scores of hon. gentlemen opposite when we were putting this very legislation through this House. But hon. gentlemen opposite are silent to-day. Well, we will judge of the sincerity of this pro tem government in regard to this matter by the manner in which they give this legislation a chance to live. It must come into being first. A sympathetic administration can bring it into being; an unsympathetic administration can make absolutely sure that if it is born at all its life will be anaemic indeed and very brief.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): May I suggest to the hon. member that he should not be as gloomy as the former opposition was just because he is now sitting where they used to sit?

Motion agreed to; amendments read the second time and concurred in.

SOLDIER SETTLEMENT ACT, 1919, AMENDMENT

CONCURRENCE IN SENATE AMENDMENTS

Hon. R. J. MANION (Acting Minister of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment) moved the second reading of and concurrence in amendments made by the Senate to Bill No. 17, to amend the Soldier Settlement Act, 1919.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: We have not had any opportunity to consider the significance of these amendments. We would require at least until the six o'clock recess to look into the effect of the changes.

Mr. MANION: I am not particularly desirous that there should be any hurry in the matter at all but the ordinary business before the House is getting cleaned up and so we come back once more to this particular legislation. I quite agree with the right hon. gentleman that there has not been very much time for consideration, but may I say that in the meantime I have discussed the subject with hon. members who were raising objections and I think most of them are reasonably satisfied with the matter as it stands at the moment.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The former Minister of the Interior (Mr. Stewart) who is particularly desirous of having something to say on this matter asked me expressly, as he might be out of the House when the matter came up, to see that it was not brought up again before six o'clock.

Mr. MANION: I discussed the matter with the former Minister of the Interior myself and he agreed there was nothing objectionable. However, I have no objection, if the right hon. gentleman objects to going on, to letting the motion stand.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): May I ask the acting minister when we may expect this bill to come up again?

Mr. MANION: I am quite prepared to go on with it now. What objection could the right hon. gentleman have to discussing the matter now?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I have strong objection for the same reason as that mentioned by the acting minister. When he first spoke on the matter he said that he himself was unfamiliar with the changes, and I submit that we must not be rushed in this way in the case of such important legislation. My hon. friend will make no headway by trying to press matters unduly and not giving time for their consideration.

Mr. MANION: I would suggest to the right hon. gentleman that he adopt a little more courteous tone.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Do not be over-sensitive.

Mr. MANION: I have tried to show every consideration for my hon. friend's wishes and I do not think he needs to talk in any such threatening tone. That will not get him very far either.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Be conciliatory, Doctor.

Mr. MANION: We are not a bit worried about you at all.

Motion stands.

SUPPLY

AMENDMENT RESPECTING FISCAL POLICY ENUNCIATED BY PRIME MINISTER

Sir HENRY DRAYTON moved that the House go into committee of Supply.

Mr. Mackenzie King and Mr. Campbell rising at the same moment:

Mr. SPEAKER: It is customary when the Speaker rises for hon. gentlemen who may be on their feet to resume their seats. That is simply a matter of ordinary courtesy. In seeing the right hon. leader of the opposition instead of the member for Mackenzie the Speaker is exercising the right conferred by parliamentary usage of extending the courtesy of recognition to one of the leaders.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the Opposition): Throughout the general elections which returned to parliament the hon. members who are now in this House the present right hon. leader of the government repeatedly stated there was one issue before the country and one issue only, namely, the fiscal policy as enunciated by him on many occasions. Throughout the present session as leader of his party the present Prime Minister has continued to maintain the position taken by him at the time of the general elections. I do not believe that such a fiscal policy has the approval of the majority of members of this House, and I therefore beg to move the following resolution, seconded by the Hon. Mr. Lapointe:

> That the Speaker do not now leave the chair but that it be resolved that in the opinion of this House the fiscal policy of the government, as enunciated by the present Prime Minister when leader of His Majesty's opposition would prove detrimental to the country's continued prosperity and prejudicial to national unity.

Mr. SPEAKER: Is the House ready for the question?

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Quebec East): I do not rise for the purpose of making a long speech. I am sorry that my physical condition would not permit me to do that. I wish to say a word or two in support of this amendment, in order to be consistent with the stand I have taken in this House during the present session and the stand I took before the electors of Canada, and especially of my own province, during the last general election. True the right hon. the absent leader of the government was also absent from my province during the election. He seemed to have a peculiarity of eclipsing himself on certain occasions.

Mr. HANSON: He will be there with the goods.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Yes, I understand he will be. That will be a change which I welcome. I do not like to fight at a distance.

An hon. MEMBER: No, no.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I think my hon. friend might keep quiet. He was banging his desk long enough and might be silent now when hon. members wish to speak. One desk on this side of the House has already been broken, and I suppose before long one will be broken on the other side. The right hon. gentleman was represented by proxy, and his proxy, which was covered by a mask on certain questions, was quite uncovered so far as this issue is concerned, and he was supported by hon. members who stood by him and who supported him on the platform and in the press. Not only did they advocate higher protection, but they advanced arguments which, if they had been listened to and given effect to, would have rent this country asunder and divide Canada into fragments. I happened to lay my hand on some advertisements in the press at the time, and I will read just one or two extracts to show that the issue was clearly put before the electors of my province. An advertisement in the Montreal Gazette of October 20, 1925, concludes with these words:

Vote for candidates who support Patenaude policies.

But now we hear from hon. members opposite that that means Meighen policies. I will read another paragraph from this advertisement:

The issue is clear. Patenaude promises adequate protection for the products of the factory, the wages of the workingman and the produce of the farm. King will not increase protection, but is pledged to lower it.

Another advertisement appeared in the Montreal Gazette October 26, 1925, which I will not read in its entirety. In part it says:

We must send to Ottawa men who support the policies of the Hon. Es. L. Patenaude. There is no middle ground—there can be no compromise. The man who supports King's policies and is a King candidate in the province of Quebec is committed, with his leader, in an alliance with the Progressives. This alliance strikes at the vital interests of the province—no man in such an alliance can or will represent the best interests of Quebec and her people. He will again sacrifice the interests of his country and his province to keep his leader and his party in power.

Another advertisement was published in the Montreal Star, October 13, the title of which is

Part of this advertisement reads:

The western Progressives look only to themselves, therein displaying a selfishness which is inimical to the best interests of the whole country.

No section group of politicians should be allowed to dictate the policies of this country to suit themselves. All interests must be considered in a spirit of fairness and justice.

The western Progressive-Liberal alliance is a threat and a menace to the rest of Canada.

Vote for higher protection and vote for E. L. Patenaude.

Meaning Mr. Meighen. All these posters were issued by The Central Conservative Committee, 120 St. James street, Montreal. Another poster reads as follows:

Who will you have—Patenaude or King?

Mackenzie King and his government, during the last four years, have disregarded the interests of this country, and in order to retain power at Ottawa—they have moved heaven and earth to get the support of the western free traders—dickered with the Progressives of the west for their support.

As the Progressives are determined to bring Canada under free trade, King had to make concessions to gain their support. Mackenzie King evidently feels that in the Progressives' support is his only hope of retaining power at Ottawa. During his recent speeches in the west he has been making further overtures to the Progressives and the Porgressives are demanding further concessions, at the expense of Quebec.

Those were the words which were circulated everywhere, and this was the charge we had to meet at every point. I claim that this sort of campaign is calculated to divide this fair country of ours.

Mr. MANION: Like the Turkish war.

Mr. LAPOINTE: And I claim that this issue, if raised in the way it was raised, is an issue which must be fought by all men who want moderation, peace and prosperity in Canada, instead of dissension and civil war. We on this side of the House who were representing the Liberals in that election, claimed that the peace and prosperity of Canada depended on uniting the minds and the wills of all Canadians, whether west or east of lake Superior. We claimed, and we still claim, that it was the duty of all public men as well as all the citizens of Canada, wherever they live, to consider and study the divergencies of interest in the various sections of the country, to try to find on what basis compromises may be affected, to try and strike the point which can unite all men of moderate opinion, all those who want to harmonize this country, instead of dividing it. We have urged that the policy as advocated by the acting leader of the government—not the one in the House, but the one outside of the House—and his proxy in Quebec, of increased protection in a general way, and a general increase of the tariff, was calculated to divide the country, instead of uniting it, and that is the reason we voted against that policy. To be consistent with the stand I took then, I am pleased to have this opportunity of seconding and supporting the motion by my right hon. leader.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON (Leader of the House): I desire to say at once that I sympathize very much with my hon. friend (Mr. Lapointe). He referred to his not feeling very well. No one regrets that fact more than I do. It is a pleasure to hear my hon. friend. We have always liked him in this House and when I was across the floor I admired the manner in which he conducted the business of the government. I am only sorry to see the hon. gentleman to-day seizing an occasion like this to bring up such a question. My hon. friend is really too big a man to move a motion. Is there any doubt at all as to where any party in this House stands on this question? Imagine my hon. friend moving a vote of want of confidence in a government which is not yet formed.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The strongest reason why such a motion should be made.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Surely my right hon. friend knows that we had a right to bring the session to a close. We are simply trying to keep intact the labours of parliament this session and to see that the country properly functions. We are trying to look after things, as the right hon. gentleman should have done before he resigned. Of all extraordinary exhibitions the resignation of the last government was the most remarkable. Not one word of advice was offered the opposition.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Does my hon. friend expect that?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Usually a prime minister retiring under similar circumstances arranges with the leader of the opposition for the proper carrying on of public business.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My contention was that the business of the country could not be properly carried on without dissolution; that the leader of the opposition could not carry on properly the business of the House.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Does the right hon. gentleman say that the business of the country cannot be carried on with parliament constituted?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Constituted as it at present is—

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: It took the right hon. gentleman a long time to find that out. He did not appreciate the welfare of the country at the commencement of the session; his one idea seems to have been that nothing could be properly done except by himself. It is not a question of the interest of the country; it is a question whether the hon. gentleman is in or out of office. I repeat that one of the most extraordinary resignations ever witnessed was that of the right hon. gentleman. It is customary for outgoing governments to show some regard for public business. They usually have some concern about bringing the session then in progress to a satisfactory conclusion; they realize that it is necessary to vote supply. But this government simply went out without making the slightest provision for the public service.

Mr. CANNON: Will my hon. friend allow me a question?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Sit down.

[Sir Henry Drayton.]

Mr. CANNON: I will sit down if the minister's followers are less courteous than himself.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I am perfectly willing to answer any question. I ask, however: has the public interest been considered by my hon. friends opposite on this occasion? That question surely answers itself. Did they have the interest of the public at heart or are they so much concerned about partisan politics—

Mr. DUNNING: You have engaged in it for six months.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I will repeat that question. Are hon. gentlemen so concerned with partisan politics that public business amounts to nothing?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I did not expect anything but laughter and jeers from hon. gentlemen opposite. There is a type of partisan who can do nothing else than laugh and jeer.

Mr. MACDONALD (Antigonish): Satan rebuking sin.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: One lonely voice from the Maritimes.

Mr. CANNON: What about your own supporters? Do they not count?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Most of the people of the Maritime provinces have learned what has been going on. They have come to realize where their interests lie and they have acted accordingly. Is the memory of hon. gentlemen opposite so short that they cannot recollect, even amidst the numerous excuses offered, what the real argument was in connection with the customs report? The argument of my hon. friends was this: For heaven's sake don't do anything that will turn this government out; otherwise, all the business of the session will go by the board. All the legislation we have put through will go. Are hon. gentlemen's memories so short that they forget that? But practices change easily in some cases; principle amounts to very little occasionally. The very gentlemen who were making that statement last week—yes, even this week—now condemn this government for endeavouring to keep the country functioning and to bring the session to a close. They condemn us for trying to vote supply and to ensure that the legislation which has been passed shall not be lost.

4 p.m.

Do hon. gentlemen really think that this House has not heard the question of the respective trade policies of the parties sufficiently discussed this session? Is there the slightest doubt as to where anybody stands on the question? There is at any rate no doubt where some people stand; there is no doubt where this party stands. This party stands full square for a policy of such reasonable protection as will enable the country to function—that and nothing else. We hear a lot of prattle from time to time about higher taxes and higher tariffs and all that sort of thing; and to hear some hon. gentlemen talk one would fancy that we wanted a tariff up to the moon.

Mr. POULIOT: Will the hon. gentleman define "reasonable protection"?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The hon. member knows what reasonable protection is. Most of the people in his own fair province know as well just what it is. Of course, for political reasons my hon. friends keep their real convictions to themselves in their caucus rooms and never give expression to them on the floor of the House. But all right thinking people in Quebec—and there are very many of them—know exactly what reasonable protection is. They know exactly what it is. What they want—notwithstanding what they say here—is such a fiscal policy as will enable Quebec to function, not a fiscal policy which will allow the lazy man to get along without working, but something which will enable this country to function having regard to the standards of living in other countries. That is all. Everybody knows where we stand. What was the necessity of bringing up the question to-day? That is just exactly what hon. gentlemen who are interested in the legislation of this House being passed have got to ask themselves. They have to ask themselves whether they think this House should be closed in the regular way with supply voted and legislation properly passed, or whether on the other hand this House should stop now.

Mr. DUNNING: How?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: My hon. friend asks, how? I said, now.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That is what we want.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The ex-Prime Minister says, "That is what we want." That is what he thinks of his own work and the work of his party here for the past six months! He wants to scrap it all.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Not a bit of it.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: My right hon. friend said just a moment ago, "We want to stop now." We know what happens if we stop now.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: It is going to happen, anyhow.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: We have a murmur now from the authority on agriculture. I suppose he is going to tell us what will happen to certain bills if we stop now. I suppose he is going to tell us how we can make legal legislation which has not yet received the royal assent. I suppose he is going to tell us how we can look after his rural credits bill and other legislation. But he does not know. This question, Mr. Speaker, has been discussed time and time again. There is no useful business purpose to be served in discussing it to-day, not the slightest. We have discussed it not only in the budget debate, but all through this session. This motion is moved simply because the government to be made is not to be allowed—or rather the House itself is not to be allowed to get the benefit of its own labours. What are we trying to do for the House? We are sincerely trying to have the estimates put through properly. And they are my friends' estimates, not ours. We are adopting them and are going to put them through. We are not saying we will spend them all; we will see to it that they are all right before we spend any of them. But we are trying to put my hon. friends' estimates through this House so the public business can be carried on. We are anxious also that the legislative labours of this session, scanty as they are, be not thrown away.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I heard my hon. friend speak of the "government to be made." Does he suggest there is no government just now?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Well, I notice, whatever it was, it was good enough and vigorous enough to pass through the House last night a most deserved vote of censure upon my hon. friends opposite by a majority of ten. After all, Mr. Speaker, governments are committees of the House. We know very well that my right hon. leader had the right to send us all away, to come back again perhaps in six weeks' time, or the right of prorogation.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: He has not that right, I submit.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: My right hon. friend says that my right hon. leader has not that right. My right hon. friend is long on protestation but he is very short on authority, and when he gets down to legal questions he is shorter still. We are simply trying to close the House properly, to look after supply and legislation and then prorogue. And it is for the House to say whether they want that done or not. Certainly, Sir, the whole idea of this motion is not to pass on any question of fiscal policy, it is just simply put forward with the idea that nothing shall be done to close the session properly.

Mr. POULIOT: Is my hon. friend through with his dissertation on what constitutes reasonable protection?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I could give my hon. friend a lot more.

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Regina): Mr. Speaker, it was refreshing to hear my hon. friend's frank admission that the present pro tem shadow government has no right to be on the treasury benches.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. DUNNING: Well, if his first words meant anything they surely meant that.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. DUNNING: And later it was refreshing also to hear his threats that if this amendment carries, an amendment, which is in absolute accordance with the principles held by a majority of this House, all of the work of the last few months will go by the board, that none of the legislation will be finally passed. Surely my hon. friend assumes a great deal of power for a pro tem government—which he admits has no right to be where it is—when he makes those threats. I am authorized, Mr. Speaker, to say that my hon. friends opposite cannot control the conclusion of the proceedings in this House, they cannot hold their axe over our heads and say to us: If you vote in accordance with your consciences this House will close without passing certain legislation in which you are interested. The members of this House have something to say as to whether or not its proceedings will continue for a long enough time to put on the statute books the measures in which we are interested. It is time, Sir, that there should be some protest against the autocracy of an attitude such as that expressed by my hon. friend. If our friends opposite do not feel themselves in a position to carry on the proceedings of this House in such a manner as to permit of the conclusion of the legislation now before us, we on this side can undertake to do so, and will do so.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MANION: Why didn't you do it the other day?

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. DUNNING: My hon. friends are surely very much disturbed.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Not at all.

Mr. DUNNING: They know perfectly well they are in office not on the basis of policy at all,—

Some hon. MEMBERS: On the basis of honesty.

Mr. DUNNING:—they were smuggled into office with the help of Moses Aziz. Now, Moses having served his turn and our friends being seated on that side of the House, we can consider the fundamental business of this country, which out of the mouths of my hon. friends opposite when they sat here we learned from day to day was the one great question of protection. Yes, for six months it was dinned into our ears by hon. gentlemen opposite that there was one question, and one question only, which divided the parties in this House. They shed crocodile tears for the young men that were being driven out of Canada because their policy was not being put into effect, and they told us on every conceivable occasion that Canada was being ruined by the late government. Why, Mr. Speaker, if Canada was being ruined by our policy is it not time that this House said something about it? If my hon. friends are right, surely it is not a matter upon which any hon. member, after all the talk we have heard about it, will hesitate to place himself on record. That threat of a dissolution! Why, Mr. Speaker, everyone knows that in spite of the undertakings given by hon. gentlemen opposite that there will be another session or two, they are planning dissolution right now, and anyone on this side of the House who is coerced into voting against his own principles in the hope that thereby he will be avoiding dissolution will be deceived indeed by the very men who tell him there will be another session or more.

I want to make it perfectly clear that, so far as the legislation now before the House is concerned, there is no doubt that this House is competent to remain in session until that legislation is placed upon the statute books. That threat need not deter men who believe sincerely in the principles which they profess. For my part I shall lose no opportunity, as hon. gentlemen opposite lost no opportunity, in setting forward my views on the fiscal policy of this country. From the bottom of my heart I believe that the fiscal policy enunciated by the present Prime Minister when leader of the opposition would prove detrimental to the country's continued prosperity, and especially do I believe that it would be prejudicial to national unity. Are they going to remain in office or partially in office—

Mr. SUTHERLAND (North Oxford): Might I ask the hon. gentleman if he is still in favour of the fiscal policy enunciated under his direction in the Saskatchewan provincial legislature a few years ago?

Mr. DUNNING: I did not direct the enunciation of any fiscal policy at any time; my views in that connection are well known. I am now discussing what hon. gentlemen opposite intend doing, and in that there can be no mistake; it is on record in the debates of this session. It is well known that we could not discuss anything from the old age pensions to soldier settlement without having the tariff dragged in, and the plea was always for higher protection.

Mr. MANION: Nothing of the sort; we never advocated anything of the kind.

Mr. DUNNING: Well, Mr. Speaker, I can wait until my hon. friends are finished; there is no need for heat in this discussion. At every opportunity hon. gentlemen opposite pleaded individually and collectively for higher protection, and surely they cannot deny it now. If they do deny it let them vote for this amendment, and we will know where they stand.

My hon. friend who has just sat down made some reference to the manner in which the late government resigned office; he contended that some notice should have been given to the then leader of the opposition. It is rather late in the day to talk of the amenities of debate, when we had the spectacle only a week ago of an amendment to the motion to go into supply being moved absolutely as a surprise, admittedly so by the hon. gentlemen who made it. Might I also point out that there was no opportunity for the late Prime Minister to advise anyone of his intention to resign. The moment His Excellency refused the advice of the late Prime Minister to dissolve this parliament the right hon. gentleman's resignation was in order, and it was the only thing he could do. My hon. friends are partly in office, forming a shadow government, by virtue of the exercise of the royal prerogative. The advice of the late Prime Minister was that the people of Canada were entitled to settle the question of who should govern this country; that advice being declined there was only one dignified and proper course for the right hon. gentleman to follow. He placed his resignation in the hands of His Excellency the Governor General and came to this House one hour later to advise us of what he had done. Immediately an adjournment was moved in order to enable the situation to be dealt with by the representative of His Majesty in this country in any manner which he saw fit. That, I submit, was the proper course to take in this matter. Hon. members have smuggled themselves into office; believers in higher protection, they now control the government when, as a matter of fact, everyone knows that a majority of the representatives of the people in this House at present are not in harmony with such a policy. With a government smuggled into office in that manner—

Mr. CLARK: And one smuggled out of office; do not forget that.

Mr. DUNNING: I have the floor, I think.

Mr. HARRIS: Will the hon. gentleman permit a question?

Mr. DUNNING: Certainly, if it is a question.

Mr. HARRIS: Does not the hon. gentleman think that he, along with the late government, was smuggled out of office?

Mr. DUNNING: If my hon. friend applies the word smuggling to the efforts which he and his confreres made to get into office, I am quite in agreement with him. The other day I mentioned some of the tactics pursued by my hon. friends opposite, and the episode which took place in another place yesterday and to-day, with respect to one of these pieces of legislation which my hon. friends are now so anxious should not be hurt, confirmed what I then said. Let us face the question, Mr. Speaker. It may be said that it can wait until another session; can it?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. DUNNING: Yes, someone says "hear, hear," someone who does not want a dissolution.

Mr. HANSON: I will take dissolution tomorrow.

Mr. DUNNING: You took something else not so long ago. Even if there is no dissolution are we to accept the principle that a government supporting a policy out of harmony with the majority of members of this House shall retain office for a year or more and be able, within the scope of present legislative authority, to put their policy into effect although it is not the will of the members of this House? When I say that what do I mean? I mean that a policy of higher protection can be put into effect to a limited extent at any rate, within the powers of existing legislation, by a government which so desires. There are many ways in which my hon. friends can hand out favours to their special interest friends; they can raise the tariff indirectly and develop their policy although that policy does not command a majority support in this House. It is time, Sir, before this session closes, for men to stand up and say where they stand on this question which has been described all session by hon. members opposite as the most important matter before us. For my part I take the same stand, and I will vote for the amendment.

Hon. LUCIEN CANNON (Dorchester): Mr. Speaker, the spectacle that we are witnessing to-day shows how the course of events has proved that we were perfectly right. We have opposite a so-called government representing, according to our constitution, absolutely nothing at all. We have the leader of the House (Sir Henry Drayton) telling us from his seat in this House that he really does not reprent a government, but a government to be named later. The situation is absurd; it is ridiculous, and the people of Canada will not stand for it. Notwithstanding the efforts of hon. gentlemen on the other side, efforts which are in some measure published, and efforts which are in a greater measure to be hidden, we know what has been going on; we know the methods adopted by the other side to get into the position in which they are to-day, and the public of this country is entitled to know the true story of the events of this week.

Are we as members of this House realizing our responsibilities? The leader of the House requests us to forget everything which was said this session in order to give a chance to the Tories to organize for the next election, which they will bring on in the fall. Are we, in order to help the Conservative party to put through their policy of protection, to abandon every principle which has been voiced in this House during this session and in former sessions? Are we, Mr. Speaker, because the leader of the House, or the supposed leader of the House, the representative of this embryo government, asks us to go home in order that they shall be rid of their troubles—are we going to listen to them and refuse to vote according to our principles on this very important question?

I address myself now particularly to the western representatives in this House. This government will either carry on or ask for a dissolution; there is no other course. If they are to carry on as they have pledged themselves to do, how wil they carry on? Will they change their policy? Is any man on the other side willing to get up at this stage of the debate and inform the House that the Conservative party have changed their policy on the tariff question? Will any man with authority get up in this House and give an assurance to the representatives of the western provinces or to the representatives of the eastern provinces that there has been any alteration in their tariff principles, or supposed principles? These gentlemen were either sincere when they spoke on tariff questions in the course of this session, or they were not. If they were sincere, there is not one man in the House who is in favour of a low tariff who can support them for a minute. There is not one man who through any process of mental activity could reach the conclusion that he can support these people if they are sincere in their tariff policy as they have announced it. If they were not sincere in stating their policy, that is a further and a stronger reason to put them out immediately.

Mr. KAISER: Can this government raise the tariff without the House approving later?

Mr. CANNON: My hon. friend has not been in office very long, but if he happens to remain in office a little longer he will find out that there is many a process that can be used by a government to change the tariff without coming to this House.

Mr. SPENCE (Parkdale): Did you do it?

Mr. CANNON: I will tell this to hon. gentlemen opposite. I am sufficiently familiar with the laws and with the powers given to a government to know that there can be most serious changes in the tariff without the House being consulted at all.

Mr. NICHOLSON: You know how to evade the law, eh?

Mr. CANNON: My hon. friend can give me pointers as to that. If he wishes to put the question on that ground, I am willing to discuss it with him, but I do not think he will insist.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Go right ahead.

Mr. CANNON: My hon. friend tells me to go ahead, and I know why he says that. Here is a gentleman who has been a judge on a moral question, who would put us out of power because we were not worthy of running this country. I am perfectly willing to discuss moral questions with him at any time anywhere, but I do not think it will be to his advantage, and he knows it.

This fight, Mr. Speaker, is only beginning. If there are members of this House who are under the impression that this shadow government is going to be allowed to run this country without our fighting, they are making a mistake. If the leader of the House is under the impression that by smiling away as he did this afternoon and asking us to pass legislation which was opposed by gentlemen on the other side all through the session, he will attain the one object his party have in mind, that is, the taking hold of the administration of public affairs in this country and putting through their policy, he is making a mistake. We are doing what we think is our duty, and we appeal to every member of this House to consider with great care the resolution which is now before the Chair. This resolution is of paramount importance, and no member can escape giving his opinion before the great tribunal, the people of this country, is appealed to. The eyes of Canada are upon this House, and now is the time for every member to show his sincerity. Now is the time for every member to state in no uncertain way where he stands, and I am very anxious to have the vote recorded on this question.

Mr. MALCOLM McLEAN (Melfort): Mr. Speaker, I think on an occasion of this kind, when a change of administration has taken place it is well that an announcement of the policy of the new administration should be given to this House and to the people of the country as early as possible. My reasons for saying that are many, and I think they are valid and weighty reasons. I am pleased to give my support to this motion moved by the right hon. leader of the opposition which reads as follows:

> That in the opinion of this House the fiscal policy of the government, as enunciated by the present Prime Minister when leader of His Majesty's opposition would prove detrimental to the country's continued prosperity and prejudicial to national unity.

Among the reasons I have for coming to that conclusion are the following: During the last campaign which preceded the general election statements were made by the present Prime Minister and by many of his acting ministers as to their attitude on the tariff issue. I am not going to quote them at length. I will not take up the time of the House by doing so. But I have before me part of a newspaper report of a meeting at Fort William on September 29, which was addressed by the then leader of the opposition, the present Prime Minister. The report goes on to say:

> Dr. Manion, the Fort William candidate, and W. F. Langworthy, Conservative candidate in Port Arthur, also spoke at both meetings. They discussed local problems and urged the necessity for a higher protective tariff, quoting examples from local conditions.

I find that later on in this House the hon. member for Fort William, who is now Acting Postmaster General, told us—I am not absolutely clear as to his actual words but the intention was unmistakable—that the tariff was a ruinous one to Canada, that the low tariff was ruining this country. He mentioned the tariff on automobiles and stated that it was lower than the tariff in any other country in the world where these vehicles are being manufactured. The hon. gentleman told us that he knew of no act of the then government that was tending to improve the condition of the people of Canada.

Mr. MANION: Hear, hear.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): I think the hon. gentleman will agree with me that if the previous government passed no act which tended to improve the condition of the people of Canada then the present administration, if it succeeds in retaining power, will be forced to rescind the acts passed by their predecessors in the past four or five years, particularly those dealing with the tariff.

Mr. MANION: They themselves rescinded the next year about half a dozen measures they passed.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): I should like my hon. friend to put to me any questions he desires but I cannot understand the nature of his interruption.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): Will the hon. gentleman speak a little louder so that we at this end of the chamber may hear him?

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): I shall be very glad to accede to my hon. friend's request and speak a little louder. I submit that in view of the statement referred to by the hon. member for Fort William the present administration will have to repeal all the acts passed by its predecessors for the purpose of benefiting the people of Canada.

We were also told by the Acting Postmaster General on April 20 that no industrial leader dare invest his money in Canada today. We were told many other things about the tariff, including the statement that in the provinces of Ontario and Quebec two million farmers are selling their products to the industrial workers in those provinces and so getting a great deal of benefit from a protective tariff. I have no idea where the hon. gentleman got his figures that there were two million farmers in these two provinces, but the opinion of the farmers of Ontario and Quebec, as well as of the other provinces, as expressed by them on many occasions, is that a high protective tariff is not conducive to their welfare.

Another statement made by the Acting Postmaster General was that free trade and a lower tariff had ruined the farmers of Great Britain and forced them off the land. I want to assure my hon. friend that it was not free trade and a lower tariff that ruined the farmers of Great Britain but Tory landlordism plus the high tolls which the absentee rent collectors charged up against the land—as high as the land would bear—not to speak of the high tariff that was enforced prior to 1846, and the competition for land engaged in after that date and leased by absentee landlords in many cases. We were further advised by hon. members opposite that the people of Canada should endeavour to build up their cities at the present time in order to secure a larger market for the products of the farms. I leave it to the imagination of any hon. members of this House to conceive if the time can possibly come within their own span of life when the people of Canada will be able to build cities sufficiently large and populate them to the extent required to consume the products of all the farms of the country. It is like another remedy that was proposed during the general elections by the then leader of the opposition, the present Prime Minister. He told the people of the Maritime provinces that his policy for remedying the grievances under which they suffered was to pay part of the cost of the freight on the products they raised in order to secure an entry for those products into the central markets of Ontario and Quebec, and that that policy would apply to the products of the western provinces as well—that in the case of the western provinces also he would be in favour of paying part of the freight on their products into the central markets of Ontario and Quebec. It would require a very vivid imagination indeed to see where the products of the Maritime provinces—such as lumber, fruit, poultry, beef, butter, and fish from the sea—could find an adequate market in the protected cities of the central provinces by securing lower freight rates, or where the farmer of western Canada could secure such a market for his live-stock, his grain products, and his dairy products in the same provinces. That they could secure such a market by simply reducing the freight rates is absolutely unreasonable and out of the question and yet we are asked to believe that is the policy hon. gentlemen opposite would carry out as a set-off to high protection on manufactured goods.

The amendment of the right hon. leader of the opposition to-day goes on to say that the Conservative tariff policy would be prejudicial to national unity. As an illustration that such will be its effect I need only quote from the headlines of papers published on October 18th last. For example one of these reads as follows:

> Western farmer cartooned as "Carving alive struggling manufacturer, bound hand and foot";

Then we find in the body of the article this statement:

> While half a million is being spent on billboard advertising, proclaiming the virtues of higher protection, the offensive element does not appear in such places. Rather it is in the newspapers. In a recurrent series of cartoons, the dominant suggestion is that Premier Mackenzie King is under servility to the west.
> In one of these productions the western farmer is pictured as carving alive a struggling manufacturer bound hand and foot, while Mackenzie King is looking on gleefully. In another it is Mr. King who is harnessed up, and a western farmer is shown with the reins cracking the whip over the leader.
> What is being pictured in a way that is calculated to arouse prejudice against the King government and against the west is reflected also in the editorial columns of the press and in the speeches of Conservative leaders.

If the publication of news of that kind is necessary in order to secure higher tariff conditions in Canada, it is needless to say that the people of western Canada are not very strong for a higher tariff. But as to the effect of such statements on national unity there can be no question in the world that they are bound to work ill to the Dominion as a whole. I should like to contrast some of the things that have been said by the present Prime Minister and his acting ministers and supporters in this House with what a former great leader of the Conservative party had to say, and the principles in which he believed, in regard to tariff matters. Sir Robert Giffen, in his article on taxation in the Encyclopaedia Britannica says:

> "Sir John A. Macdonald, the great protectionist Prime Minister of Canada, in a conversation with the present writer in 1882, avowed without hesitation that protectionist taxation in Canada was indefensible on economic grounds, and he defended it exclusively for political reasons."

That is not the attitude that our friends of the Conservative party have been taking for the past six months in the House and for the past few years throughout the country.

In the national policy resolution introduced into parliament by Sir John A. Macdonald on March 12, 1878, one of the reasons given for the adoption of a national policy of protection is that, "moving, as it ought to do, in the direction of a reciprocity of tariffs with our neighbours, so far as the varied interests of Canada may demand, (it) will greatly tend to procure for this country eventually a reciprocity of trade."

I submit that Sir John A. Macdonald was more farseeing in his day than his successors have been at any time. In order that reciprocity in trade might be secured between ourselves and other countries, it might be politically defensible that a tariff should be arranged between the two countries on certain commodities. But that is not the way the tariff has been used in late years. The claim has often been made in this House during the present session that the United States was the greatest, the wealthiest and the most prosperous and up-to-date country in the world. To much of that I take no exception, but we were told something to which I seriously object, namely that Canada was in a forlorn, dependent and poverty-stricken condition. We were told by the late leader of the opposition, now acting Prime Minister, that we had entered upon a period of depression in 1921, along with every other nation on the continent, and that we had remained in that period of depression longer than any other nation. I do not think it is fair that the statement should go out from this House that Canada has been in a state of depression and has remained longer in that state of depression than any other nation. I do not know what he meant by saying any other nation on the continent, but I take it that he intended to include Mexico, Panama, Bolivia, and all the other South American republics. It is not fair to state that we have remained in that period of depression longer than any other country on the continent. I remember last fall reading the report of a meeting in Vancouver addressed by the hon. member who is now acting Minister of Customs; at least I assume it was he, because the report stated that Mr. H. H. Stevens addressed the meeting and stated that if Canada did not wake up and get rid of Mackenzie King and his government, in the next three months, the country would be on the road to bankruptcy in four years. At a time when the railroads, the banks and the commercial institutions were telling the people of Canada that they were enjoying prosperity such as they had not enjoyed for many years, this was the kind of service that was being rendered to Canada by gentlemen who are part of the shadow government in office at Ottawa at the present time. I have in my hand a piece of literature which was used to considerable effect throughout the country. It is headed, "Land values and protection", and it is issued under the auspices of an organization which has an advisory council and an executive committee. I notice that the president of that executive committee was quoted by the hon. member for Toronto Northeast (Mr. Baker) as an up-to-date authority. This literature was used in the campaign and one statement reads:

We predicted in April, 1924, in our pamphlet "If Canada would prosper" that unless the tariff were raised our railroads would drift towards insolvency, and that this would react against the west. This is coming about much more rapidly than we anticipated.

We find that for the month of May past the net earnings of the Canadian National Railway were 706 per cent higher than a year ago. Under these conditions these prophets of evil told us that we were ruining Canada and driving our railroads into insolvency. That statement never was true. It is dangerous to prophesy unless you know what is going to happen.

For a few moments, I wish to look into the condition of the rich country to the south of us, with particular reference to the middle and western farming community. During the past few months, the condition of agriculture in the middle west and throughout the United States as a whole has caused grave concern to public men at Washington and leaders of public opinion elsewhere in that country. I hold in my hand an article written by Representative Dickinson, of Iowa, in which he says that the United States industrial structure is four-cornered. One corner, manufacturing, is protected by a tariff wall, while another corner, the railroads, is protected by the Interstate Commerce Commission which endeavours to see that the rates are so fixed as to give the railroads a profit of 5 per cent. But some of them make much more than that. The third corner consists of labour, which is protected by the exclusion of immigration to that country. But the fourth corner, represented by the farmers of the country, is not protected. That corner is extremely wobbly. There is nothing to hold it up. In the opinion of Mr. Dickinson, and in the opinion of the majority of the farmers in the middle west, there is no possible way in which a tariff prop can be placed under that fourth corner, and the only way to assure reasonable prosperity is that all the legs be knocked out of the structure, and that the structure be allowed to rest where nature has provided it should rest, namely on the resources of the country, on the intelligence and industry of the people, and on their ability to find markets for their products throughout the countries of the world.

Mr. S. G. TOBIN (Wetaskiwin): I am glad that this resolution is before the House, as I wished to have an opportunity to express my attitude with regard to the fiscal policy of this country. I was elected in opposition to the fiscal policy of the Right Hon. Arthur Meighen and the Conservative party as a whole. I represent a district in Alberta. In our province the one great thing we are interested in is the production of agricultural products, the selling of the same and the buying of implements and supplies of every kind and description at as low a price as possible. That is the life of our country and the only condition in which our country can prosper is where the taxes or the tariff on the goods they must purchase in large quantities are lowered. I remember when the Right Hon. Arthur Meighen was speaking in his tour of the west he told us that the reduction of freight rates westward for the relief of the west was utterly unjustifiable, or "utterly indefensible," to use his exact words, and I made up my mind that I would go out before the people, and if the people elected me I would protest in parliament to the best of my ability, in the interests of the provinces of the west and therefore of all of Canada, against higher tariffs. If we help the western provinces we help all of Canada. I listened for three or four months to the speeches of the members of the then opposition, now on the government side, and they said, "We are losing money on grain shipped eastward. If the Crowsnest pass agreement were not in operation we could collect thirty millions more from the farmers of the west," and their policy was, "No more statutory freight rates." The people of western Canada must have reasonable freight rates, and we wish to put ourselves on record on this matter. Hon. members say, "We cannot do anything without the consent of parliament." I say we do not want to build up a party or organization which talks that kind of propaganda, and has such a fiscal policy. I want to go back to my constituency as having recorded my opposition to that policy. That is the attitude I took when I was elected and that is the attitude I take now.

The government just retired met parliament in January and in sportsmanlike fashion they consulted the House on the question as to who should be Prime Minister. Parliament decided by a majority that the right hon. gentleman now in opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) should be Prime Minister, and hon. members opposite refused at that time to grant an adjournment so that he might get his cabinet constituted. They voted supply piecemeal and generally did all that they could to embarrass the government. Now they want us to help them along. The late government brought down a budget which met with the approval of the Canadian people and they carried out the programme they outlined in the Speech from the Throne, including rural credits, which the people wanted, the West India treaty, and amendments to the Grain Act. The Tariff Advisory Board has also been appointed and the commission to inquire into Maritime rights has been set up. The question of freight rates is also being looked into. These are all matters in which the people are vitally interested and they were all undertaken by the late government.

I protest against the fiscal policy which the party opposite has advocated both in this House and in the country. Hon. gentlemen opposite told the government at the opening of the session that it could not function owing to the number of vacancies in the cabinet. To-day there is nothing but vacancies in the government which is attempting to conduct the business of the country. I do not want to prolong this debate, but I must decline to vote confidence in hon. gentlemen opposite unless they are prepared to assure this House that they stand for a different fiscal policy. This assurance they will not give us, and for that reason I must support the motion which has been brought forward.

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre): I do not propose to discuss the merits of the resolution but I want to state the position which we must take in approaching a vote of this nature. Those of us who are not vitally concerned with the question of free trade or of higher, or lower tariff sometimes find ourselves in a quandary in facing a vote such as this. In this particular instance the difficulty is even greater owing to the peculiar circumstances that surround the discussion. Personally I am not very much in favour of what might be termed "blocking tactics," motions intended simply to harass the government. Whichever party may be in power, I believe the government ought to be given a fair chance. From the standpoint of some of us, who, notwithstanding what some hon. gentlemen in this House may say, still regard ourselves as independent, and who have nothing to gain immediately from party conflict, I do not think there is any reason at any stage for lending ourselves to any blocking of the business of the House.

I must observe however that I cannot be blind to the fact that the present government is in power through no act of this House. I am not a constitutional authority, but from what little I have read I have always understood that in accordance with British practice the king should be advised by his ministers and should obey their voice. I do not see why British practice should be departed from in Canada. I recognize that all along Canada has been in a position somewhat different from that of Great Britain. Hon. gentlemen opposite have told us again and again, when we have referred to the necessity for defining our status in this country, that it was quite unnecessary to do so inasmuch as undoubtedly we had autonomy in Canada. They have assured us that we were equal with the Motherland in all respects. Now I submit that the decision given the other day by His Excellency the Governor General absolutely demonstrated that there is no such equality.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: I rise to a point of order. There is a distinct rule forbidding any references to the crown such as the hon. member is making. The rule reads:

> No member shall speak disrespectfully of His Majesty, nor of any of the royal family; nor of the governor or person administering the government of Canada.

The rule is quite clear and it has always been understood that no criticism should be made of the King or of the Governor General. I submit that the hon. member should not proceed further with such criticism.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: On the point of order, may I say that there is not one word I have used which by the widest construction can be considered to be in the slightest degree disrespectful of the King or of the Governor General. I am speaking on a strictly constitutional point as I have a right to do. If I have no right to discuss such a point then I have no right to sit in this House. I submit on this point of order that if we as members elected to this House are to be debarred from discussing a constitutional question we may as well not come here.

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Quebec East): I quite agree with my hon. friend from Argenteuil (Sir George Perley)—or rather the acting minister of many departments—that no member has a right to speak disrespectfully in this House of His Excellency the Governor General or of the crown. But from what I have heard of the remarks of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) I fail to see that he has uttered one word of such a character. Let me point out however that for any act of the crown the Prime Minister of the day must take responsibility; and when an hon. member of this House accepted the invitation to form a cabinet he assumed responsibility for His Excellency's declining to grant a dissolution to the then Prime Minister. Any discussion that takes place on the subject, any reference that is made to the matter, has relation to the conduct of the Prime Minister of Canada who in this instance, I claim, assumed responsibility for what I consider a breach of the constitution.

5 p.m.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I am not going to make as long a speech as my hon. friend has made, but I assure the House that we accept responsibility to the full. What is more, this House only last night declared that the late government were unworthy of office, that they had not the confidence of parliament, and that they were in fact endeavouring to escape just retribution.

Mr. DUNNING: That is not a point of order.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: My hon. friend was not making a point of order at all.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Absolutely.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Then I will say just exactly the reverse of what he was saying. He was talking about what was done—

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Mr. Speaker, if the discussion is going on I would remind you that I have the floor. I thought it was a point of order.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Perhaps that is right.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Mr. Speaker the point of order raised had reference to the right of an hon. member to make reference to His Excellency the Governor General.

An hon. MEMBER: Criticize.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: An hon. gentleman opposite says, "criticize." I say the rule is that there should be no disrespectful word spoken of His Excellency, and criticism dealing with His Excellency in any disrespectful way would certainly be entirely out of order in this House. No hon. member has the right to criticize the crown in a disrespectful way. But I submit it is an entirely different thing for hon members to speak of their constitutional right to sit in this House, and also of their right to sit either to the right or the left of the Speaker. May I say, Sir, in reference to what the hon. member has just been referring to, that the question of His Excellency's right—

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Order. My right hon. friend now is departing from the point of order.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Not at all. The hon. member was speaking of His Excellency's right to take the course he had taken in not accepting the advice of the then Prime Minister and sending for another member of this House to give him advice. That of itself may be a perfectly constitutional position in certain contingencies. I want to make it clear from His Excellency's point of view, because I desire to see justice done to His Excellency in this matter, that His Excellency—

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I rise to a point of order.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Surely I have the right to proceed.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I desire to raise a point of order

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: There is a point of order now before the Chair to which I am speaking.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Sit down.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. gentleman has a right to raise a point of order.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: When we are speaking on a point of order?

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member has raised a point of order.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I submit, Mr. Speaker, that my hon. friend now is proceeding to discuss what was done by His Excellency, while the point of order that had been taken was that the reference made by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre was not in order. My right hon. friend has a right to speak to that point of order, but on the pretence of so doing he has no right to make a speech or to refer to what His Excellency did. I was called to order in dealing with it, but my hon. friend the former Minister of Justice dealt with it without being called to order.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I submit, Mr. Speaker, that when His Excellency is brought into discussion in this House it becomes the duty of any leader in parliament to see that no injustice is done to His Excellency or to any act of his, and this more particularly where one has been in the position of Prime Minister and has been an adviser to His Excellency. When one so situated sees that His Excellency's position is being or is liable to be wrongly placed before this House, it becomes not only his right but his highest duty to see that His Excellency is not misunderstood and put in a wrong position.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order. I am asking for Your Honour's ruling.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Surely, Mr. Speaker, I am perfectly in order.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: My right hon. friend is again attempting to make a speech. He has a perfect right to defend his position—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: —but not now.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Mr. Speaker, the point of order is that His Excellency is being criticized, and I am endeavouring to point out that so far from permitting criticism I am here to defend for the time being, if you wish, the position taken by His Excellency. But I want to make perfectly clear what my understanding of His Excellency's position is, that he may not be placed in any false position. When I advised His Excellency that I thought dissolution was essential, my advice was not taken—

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Sit down.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: —and His Excellency sent for another adviser—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Order.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Sit down.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I want your ruling, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. SPEAKER: What is the point of order?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: That my right hon. friend is not speaking to the point of order.

Mr. SPEAKER: I understand that the right hon. gentleman is speaking on the point of order. I do not like references to the head of the state—

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I heartily agree, Sir.

Mr. SPEAKER: —and I should like to have the point well stated so that I may make my ruling.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Mr. Speaker, I submit that this House has not the right to speak in any way disrespectfully of His Excellency. I think all of us are absolutely agreed upon that point.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Hear, hear.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: But in any possible criticism of His Excellency it becomes, from my point of view, the duty of His Excellency's advisers, past or present, to see that His Excellency is not misrepresented by any statement made in this House. I say I am the only person at the moment in this House who can state as I understand it His Excellency's position with reference to myself as the former Prime Minister, I therefore stand here to make clear, so there can be no mistake throughout the country as to His Excellency, what I conceive to be his position. I conceive it to be this: His Excellency does not wish to have this parliament dissolved if it is possible to carry on the business in the way in which it should be carried on without dissolution, and inasmuch as I advised His Excellency to dissolve parliament, and as His Excellency believed that all reasonable expedients should be tried before dissolution took place, he was prepared to send for another hon. member of this House, the leader of the then opposition, and ask him whether he was in a position to carry on the business of the country and, if so, to give him an opportunity so to do, that is, to carry on the business of parliament constitutionally. In accepting office the present Prime Minister took the responsibility of being able to carry on the business of this House without a dissolution. Now if it is found he cannot carry on the business of this House without a dissolution, it becomes the constitutional duty—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Hon. H. H. STEVENS (Acting Minister of Customs): Mr. Speaker—

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I have the right to say—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. SPEAKER: Has the hon. gentleman a point of order to raise?

Mr. STEVENS: Yes, Mr. Speaker. I would be the last one to desire to shut off any hon. member who was speaking in order, but I submit to Your Honour that the right hon. gentleman has exceeded his right in discussing the point of order, and is in fact discussing matters which under the motion before the House do not properly come up for discussion. While I have not the rule under my hand, I am certain that Your Honour can readily see that the right hon. gentleman is not in order in making the statements he has just made on a point of order.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Mr. Speaker, I have no desire to continue a debate at this moment. At the proper time I will bring up the constitutional question myself. But let me make it perfectly clear that it is not His Excellency that is being discussed in this matter, it is the present Prime Minister who has assumed the responsibility of carrying on the business of this House without a dissolution, and I say before we can finally pronounce any definite opinion as to His Excellency's act, we must wait to see whether or not the present Prime Minister can fulfil the undertaking which he then gave and what His Excellency may do in the circumstance.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. SPEAKER: Does any other hon. gentleman desire to speak on the point of order?

An hon. MEMBER: Number one or number two?

Mr. CANNON: Mr. Speaker, on the point of order, the principle well known to every member is that the crown can do no wrong. Why is that principle laid down? Because there is always in the House somebody to take responsibility for the acts of the crown. Therefore we never discuss what the crown did, but we can always discuss what the advisers of the crown did. I think nobody will contend that at this juncture a member of the House is deprived of the right of discussing whether it was a good or bad thing, according to our constitution, that a change of government should have taken place and that a dissolution should have been denied. But when we are discussing this the crown is not in question at all—the king can do no wrong—His Excellency is not in question, but those on the other side who assume responsibility for the decision of the crown are being criticized.

Mr. LAPOINTE: That is the whole question.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I rise to a question of privilege. I would point out that I was not discussing whether or not His Excellency had done something good or bad, and I want to make that clear; my argument was altogether different. If I caught the hon. member correctly it was implied that I had been criticizing His Excellency, and I want it clearly understood that that is not so.

Mr. CANNON: My hon. friend is not at liberty to discuss that question; my hon. friend who raised the point of order said that no member had a right to criticize the crown. There is no doubt about that, but we can always discuss the conduct of a government which has assumed responsibility for the crown.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: The point I raised was that there should be no disrespectful reference to the Governor General.

Mr. CAHILL: Do you withdraw that objection?

Mr. McGIBBON: The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth)—

Mr. CANNON: The point of order is withdrawn.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: It is not withdrawn.

Mr. SPEAKER: Might I remind hon. gentlemen that to-morrow is Dominion Day, and therefore we should be united as good Canadians, and should proceed as such. Do I understand now that the point of order is withdrawn?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes.

Mr. SPEAKER: Because I may recall to hon. gentlemen first of all that the action of the Governor General is not debatable on the motion now before the House. The question before the Chair refers to the fiscal policy of Canada, and therefore such references to His Excellency are absolutely irrelevant. With regard to matters which may be debated in relation to the action of the Governor General I will read the following to members of the House:

> Certain matters cannot be debated save upon a substantive motion which can be dealt with by amendment or by distinct vote of the House, such as the conduct of the Governor General—

I understand from the hon. gentleman that he is not discussing the conduct of the Governor General. Certainly the name of the Governor General or the name of His Majesty the King cannot be brought into a discussion to influence the debates of the House. However, I understand that the point of order is withdrawn, and I hope the hon. gentleman will confine himself to the question before the Chair.

[Mr. Woodsworth]

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: I did not propose to withdraw the point of order, but Your Honour has settled it in the remarks you have just made.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I could not hear the hon. gentleman.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: I said His Honour had settled the point of order in the remarks he just made.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Well, if I can at all recall the points that I wished to make when this very lengthy point of order was raised I would remind the House that I was suggesting that whilst I was not at all in favour of anything in the nature of mere blocking tactics, at the same time we ought to recognize the very peculiar situation prevailing in this House. The provisional government is there through no act of this House, and I went on to discuss the way in which that provisional government had come to occupy their seats. I am not discussing nor do I propose to discuss the propriety or impropriety of any act of His Excellency.

Mr. SPEAKER: That would be clearly out of order.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I quite understand that, and I have no intention of so doing. It seems rather strange that there are certain hon. members of this House—I do not refer to the gentleman who challenged me—who always run ahead and think something I will say is going to be out of order. Curiously enough, in the great majority of cases the Speaker has seen fit to sustain me. I want to make it quite clear again that I am not discussing the propriety or impropriety of anything the Governor General has done, but I was pointing out that in the Motherland the king always accepts the advice of his responsible ministers, and has done so for the past hundred years.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I am rising to another point of order. Should not the hon. member speak to the question before the House?

Mr. SPEAKER: I think so. The hon. gentleman should make relevant remarks. The motion before the House purports to condemn the fiscal policy of the party in office, as enunciated by the Prime Minister, whilst leader of the opposition, as detrimental to the welfare of the country.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I am leading to that.

Mr. SPEAKER: I do not see the relevancy of the hon. member's last remarks.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: If the Speaker will have patience—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. SPEAKER: So far I do not see the relevancy of the hon. member's remarks as between the relations of the crown and cabinet in England when the question before the Chair concerns the fiscal policy of Canada.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I do not wonder, Mr. Speaker, because I led up to that in my opening remarks, and I have since been interrupted for about twenty minutes. I began by stating that I did not intend to discuss the merits of the question before the House but rather to indicate the reason which would lead the Independent members to vote one way or the other. We are in a difficult position, and I was proceeding to show the reasons which must underlie our decision in voting. I was pointing out the practice in England with regard to the advice which must be taken by the king, and I was going on to state that since in Canada that practice has not grown into law we are in rather a peculiar position. Apparently we have not as yet attained the full status of nationhood, but I suggest that while that may be true we are still under nothing like a dictatorship. We are organized to-day under the forms of representative government, and we have a perfect right to proceed in accordance with the well recognized principles of representative government. The Governor General has seen fit to ask Mr. Meighen to form a government—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order, order.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Is there anything wrong with that?

Mr. MacLAREN: I again ask whether the hon. gentleman is in order. I do not see that his remarks have any bearing on the fiscal policy.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member had just commenced a phrase when he was interrupted; I did not hear it.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: When again interrupted I was saying that the Governor General had seen fit to ask Mr. Meighen to form a government, but I take it that any action of that kind is based upon some very definite principles. I think the Governor General would be the last to take arbitrary action, and the only principle that I can think of is that the Prime Minister (Mr. Meighen) might probably be in a position to carry on the government of this country, that is, that he would be supported by the majority of the members of this House. I can see no other principle than that.

Mr. SPEAKER: Might I remind the hon. gentleman that by ministerial declaration yesterday in the House, the right hon. the Prime Minister (Mr. Meighen), through his spokesman in the House of Commons, the right hon. leader of the House (Sir Henry Drayton), took full responsibility for the action of His Excellency the Governor General. Therefore I do not see that it is permissible for the hon. gentleman to introduce the name of the Governor General into this debate. He may within the rules, attack the government or attack the Prime Minister. The Prime Minister having fully accepted the responsibility for the action of the Governor General, I rule, and on this point I am supported by Bourinot, that the name of the Governor General should not be introduced in this debate.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I would pass directly then, Mr. Speaker, to the question of responsibility, and here again, not being well versed in constitutional law, I confess that I am a little bit puzzled to know just how the Acting Prime Minister, or the gentleman who here to-day acts for the Prime Minister can accept responsibility under the circumstances. I do not understand it at all, and I would ask to have an explanation before very long from the government, from those members who know constitutional law, as to the constitutional principle under which, under these circumstances, the Prime Minister can claim to have responsibility for advising the Governor General.

The position that our group takes with regard to such matters, I will remind the House, is that there ought to be some way in which there could be condemnation of the government without such condemnation necessarily involving a change of government. I think we are just coming to the difficulty of which I tried to warn the House a week ago. May I quote, or give the substance at least, of my remarks on that occasion. I said:

> I want to be clearly understood. We must insist upon being free to condemn certain actions of the government without necessarily replacing the government by any party or group in the House.

I went on to point out:

> Now government has to do with a great variety of subjects; government policy covers a very wide field indeed. We have been spending, I suppose almost half the time of the House this session discussing the question of lower or higher tariffs. As I have said before, I do not believe that either free trade or protection or higher protection will solve the economic problems that face this country. But I would ask hon. members whether a great question such as free trade or protection, or higher or lower protection, is to be set aside without consideration merely because a certain individual named Moses Aziz did something that was wrong, or because a minister in dealing with that case took an action which some do not regard as justifiable.

This is the position in which the House now finds itself. There has been a condemnation of the government. I do not think anyone will question that. The vote last night clearly showed condemnation of the government, but side by side with that, I would point out that such condemnation dealt with only one particular question, and we must remember that there is a great variety of questions which must be dealt with by a government, and this country has not decided, and this House has not decided, that it wishes the policies of hon. gentlemen opposite to prevail in this country. I had expected that there would be a statement of policy from the provisional government; I think we were entitled to that. When parliament assembles it is customary for the government to give a statement of its policy in what is known as the Governor General's Speech. In that Speech the government of the day announces the general policy which it proposes to pursue. The policy that is being pursued at the present time presumably is that announced in the Governor General's Speech six months ago. Do hon. gentlemen opposite intend to follow out that policy? Are they prepared to follow it out to the limit? I submit, Mr. Speaker, that no other policy has been announced on the floor of this House. If hon. gentlemen opposite propose to carry out that policy in detail, sincerely and honestly, I would have to give them my support because I am not concerned primarily with the individuals who happen to be in office. But I want to know, and I have a right to know, whether they intend to carry out that policy. If they do not, then this House has a right to know what alternate policy they propose. I had expected a statement of the government's policy—perhaps hardly immediately, since their leader is not in the House and they have had but a short time to prepare—but I would have expected a general statement, and since that has not been given it seems to me that gentlemen on this side of the House are justified in introducing motions of this character in order to draw out what is the policy of hon. gentlemen opposite.

In my speech in the recent debate a week ago I referred not merely to questions of the tariff, but to other questions—to our imperial relations, for instance. I am reminded that this fall we are holding an Imperial conference. Will any hon. gentleman in this House say that the group opposite has any mandate whatever from Canada or any right whatever to speak for Canada at that conference? The fact that certain Progressive members joined with the Conservatives in condemning laxity on the part of the government does not mean at all that the Conservative party has any right to go over to England and announce an Imperial policy which has not been before this House. I called attention, I notice, to other questions in which the country is interested. One was mentioned here to-day—rural credits. Then there is the Crowsnest pass agreement, and the building of the Hudson Bay railway; the proposals regarding soldier settlement and advances to settlers on crown lands; the question that our group are particularly interested in, old age pensions; the question of the amendment of the Immigration Act, and the amendment to the Criminal Code, both of which passed this House but have been rejected by the Senate. These involve policies that are of great interest to us, and we have a right to know at this stage what is the attitude of the party that advises the Governor General on these matters.

There is just one other consideration that I should like to advance, Mr. Speaker. We have been here for almost six months, and we have as yet accomplished practically nothing. I think hon. gentlemen opposite ought to have applauded that, because I am sure they agree. Perhaps however they do not, because the practical thing accomplished is that we have substituted one party for the other. Perhaps that is what they have been aiming at. But the fact is that for six long months we have done comparatively little but play for position, and apparently the strategists on that side have been better than the strategists on the ex-government side, and so we have the situation we find here to-day. I did not come here to represent the Liberal party or the Conservative party. I was opposed by both, as a matter of fact, in my election. But I came here to try to get certain business of the country done; and now at the end of six months I do not think we have any right, simply because one group has been substituted for the other, to say that because the warm weather is here, and we are all tired, and this proceeding is getting on our nerves, we will pack our trunks and go home to-morrow. Personally I have every desire to facilitate the business of the country; but there are certain policies involved in the estimates which I cannot agree should be passed over without discussion. It is suggested that we could do all this business in a day but I cannot agree—and I think I can speak also for my colleagues in saying this—I cannot agree to allow millions of dollars of the money of the people to be voted in that fashion. The fact that these estimates have been drawn up or proposed by one party, and that the responsibility for them now devolves on another party, does not obviate my difficulties with regard to the matter. And then there are other questions. To-day I have been calling attention to important public measures that are before this House. More than that, this very day somebody called me into a lobby only a short time ago and asked if there was any chance of dealing with the claims of the Indian tribes of this country.

Mr. CHAPLIN (Lincoln): Order.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I am using that as an illustration and I do not think that I am out of order in doing so.

Mr. CHAPLIN (Lincoln): Stick to the subject that is under discussion.

Mr. DUNNING: Speaking to the point of order: If the introduction of Australian butter into the discussion of every other subject discussed this session has been in order, then the illustration my hon. friend (Mr. Woodsworth) is giving is quite to the point.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I was simply using it as an illustration. I say that somebody pointed out to me that there was a petition before the House from certain Indian tribes of this country involving the constitutional right of Canadians to come to parliament with their grievances, and he made this appeal to me: Are we to go away, after waiting for six months, without having any chance to present our grievances to parliament? As far as I am concerned this is a minor matter compared with some of the other questions that are before the country; nevertheless are we simply to go away and say: We will have nothing to do with these things?

I do not think we can interpret our duty in that fashion, and it seems to me that we we quite justified in voting for a motion of this kind, not in order to hold the House in session for a longer period, but in order to insist on the principle that the group that assumes to advise His Excellency and that occupies the government's position to-day should let the country know clearly what their policy really is on important issues.

Mr. A. W. NEILL (Comox-Alberni): I shall not detain the House for any length of time.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. NEILL: Hon. gentlemen opposite are pleased to be facetious. I do not wish to give a silent vote on this important matter. I intend to vote for the amendment but not as expressing absolute adherence to the doctrine that a tariff is undesirable in Canada. In British Columbia we are not unfriendly to some measure of protection; the principal objection to it is the manner in which it is divided. We find that the present conception of protection is that 90 per cent of it shall go to the eastern manufacturers and 10 per cent to those industries of British Columbia which need protection. That is not the form of protection that we idolize in British Columbia. Nevertheless while we are not so strong—we are not strong at all—for the high protection ideas of hon. gentlemen opposite, yet we are not prepared to commit ourselves to the very low tariff ideas of hon. members from the prairies as those ideas have been so often expressed here by hon. gentlemen from those provinces. But he would be a bold man indeed, after the experience of the last few days, who would say he knew what the convictions of some representatives of the prairie provinces really are. In this connection I know that my own political reputation has been entirely ruined. I told my constituents during the election that if there was one thing of which I was sure it was that no matter what would happen, a prairie province representative would not be found voting for the right hon. gentleman who is now the leader of the government because of his well known principles of high protection. My reason for saying that was based on the experience of the past four years during which I have heard—day after day, month after month, year after year—hon. members from the prairie provinces, with almost complete unanimity, echo and re-echo the idea that they stood for nothing but a low tariff form of fiscal policy. But how different do we find the situation in the last few days?

Now, there are two reasons why I am voting for this amendment, and I want to state them very briefly. First of all I want to demonstrate to the House and to the country —shall I say rather prove to the country?— whether certain hon. members in placing the present party in power were actuated by the high altruistic principles to which they gave expression and whether, having placed the former opposition in power, they are prepared to revert to their original principles on which they were elected, or whether they will for partisan purposes maintain the present government in power by voting against or abstaining from voting altogether on this amendment, which, after all, is a very simple and very modest echo indeed of the principles which they have so vociferously outlined in this House for the last four years.

My second motive in voting for this amendment is to demonstrate if I can to the right hon. leader of the government, or to his deputy for the moment in the House the absolute need, I think, of an appeal to the country and of a general election before this House meets again. There have been rumours —I suppose I am in order in mentioning this; they have been mentioned in the press, let alone in the corridors—that in some way the right hon. gentleman who leads the present government is committed to the principle that he must carry on in this House and will be unable to go to the country. I hope that is a mistake; I hope there is no truth in these rumours at all. I am convinced that both sides—the best elements of them at any rate—the most intelligent and thoughtful men in both the great political parties have been convinced for months that the only possible solution of the existing situation is an appeal to the country, and a great deal of what we have witnessed lately has been mere jockeying for position to settle which side would have the benefits of holding the reins of power when an election came.

There was no difficulty on the part of the Conservatives in framing an amendment expressing want of confidence in the Liberal government which would be satisfactory to their followers, because a Conservative has no confidence in a Liberal government at any time; but when it came to a question of enlisting the support of other groups in the House it was necessary to present something more than a mere declaration of want of confidence. And so a mélange was prepared containing a varied and weird mixture of incoherent political crimes. We had Senator Bureau offered to us if we liked to vote in condemnation of wrongdoing on his part, although he was only mildly censured in the formal report. Then we had the case of the ex-Minister of Customs and Excise suggested for attack if we liked to go in that direction. Then there was the suggestion that a great deal of liquor was being consumed in the country; and finally there was the suggestion—not so much in the House as in the corridors—that certain dark and mysterious revelations could be and had been made in connection with the Duncan report. Allusion was made in particular to a certain diary which would shock humanity if it were made public. Now, I took the trouble to go downstairs to the office where all reports of such a nature are filed and where I am told the Duncan report was filed, and I find nothing at all to bear out the suggestion or reference to this mysterious diary—which I believe, if not actually successful, at least was the means by which an attempt was made to obtain the support of one or two members. As nearly as I can find out, that diary never had any existence, and if it was produced, it was in an utterly unauthorized way and for an ignoble purpose.

I said I wanted to try to convince the leader of the government of the urgent necessity for an election. I would ask him, can he proceed and meet the House next year, relying on what has proved to be such unreliable support in the past? Do we want a continuation of the situation which we have to-day? The recent votes in the House present enough evidence of contradiction without anything else. It may be said, "Well after all, there was no harm in co-operation." Hon. members of the Progressive group told us last night that they had co-operated with the late government. That was perfectly correct and proper, and I have nothing to find fault with in that remark. I myself indulged in a form of co-operation with the government of the day, and submitted certain legislation and certain administrative policies that I wanted adopted, in return for which I would assist the government through the session. I have no shame in that confession. It was co-operation of a distinct type, and a great portion of our desired legislation I received. I am not going into the conduct of other hon. members; I will only speak for myself Having made an arrangement of that kind, whether right or wrong, that is my responsibility; but if after having made that arrangement I then voted for the resolution or the form of censure, which contained no greater principle than a desire to turn out the Liberal party, the position I would have put myself in would have been very untenable from the ordinary man's point of view. The reason I took that action is that, member of parliament as I am, and politician as I have been accused of being, I still have some lingering remains of the honour involved in an agreement, even if not expressed in legal terms. I still think that if a man makes an honourable agreement with anybody, and it is carried out honourably by the other party, it does behoove a gentleman to comply with the terms of it as he understands them. If I had not done so, I would have held myself to have broken faith in an honourable agreement, to have betrayed the government, and to have betrayed myself, and taken shelter under the excuse that the hon. ex-Minister of Customs had done something which I would have asked him to do under exactly similar circumstances. I want to warn the right hon. leader of the government, do not go in for co-operation, have no truck or trade with the sons of Amalek, whose conception of co-operation is, as was so wittily expressed the other day by the hon. member for Nelson (Mr. Bird), to get all the benefits they can and let someone else take the responsibility. I want to warn the government against that course.

It is against my personal interest to have an election before holding another session. Nevertheless I am hoping that this motion will carry, or if defeated, that it will be defeated by such a close vote that it will convince the leader of the government that it is impossible for him to carry on. In either case my object will be obtained, and an election will be brought on. I believe it is the only thing to save the country in the present situation.

Mr. JOHN EVANS (Rosetown): I do not intend to give a silent vote upon this important question. At the beginning of this session we agreed to support the government on a programme of legislation, and while they may not have done all we would like them to have done, I was not going to break faith before one session at least was concluded. Last night, through indisposition, I did not remain in the House, and did not give my grounds for the vote I cast. Many votes have been brought on this session with no other object than to divide the little group in this corner, who have had the responsibility of deciding on most important matters, and on questions of policy between the two parties in this House. I must say that there were many influences at work which divided this group as it did last evening. One of these was the Alberta natural resources question. When this new government took office we thought some policy would be enunciated, both on the tariff and on these questions that now stand on the order paper. Not one word has come from the government benches since they have taken office. I must say that I felt very keenly last night and was tempted to vote along with some of my Alberta friends who were much interested in this great question. I feel very keenly regarding any question of privilege regarding class, creeds, nationalities, provincial or vocational, in this whole Dominion. I want to see these two great provinces put on an equal footing with every other province, and I did expect that when this matter was on the order paper our friends who have now taken office would pronounce some policy in regard to it. The fact is that they have been afraid to do so, for some reason or other. What their policy is we do not know.

Then again we have the fact that the leader of the government (Mr. Meighen) says we should uphold the government now to carry out the legislation of the session and that the business of the country should go on. We have been here, Mr. Speaker, six months, and three months of that time has been wasted by those who are now occupying the government benches. During that time the business of the country might have been put through, and by this time most of us would have been enjoying the comfort of our homes. I have been in this city since January 5; I have not seen my home since, because it is too far to travel back and forth. Three full months have been wasted by those who are appealing now to this little group to enable them to carry on the business of the country.

This group is the deciding body on all questions at the present time. It is a terrible responsibility to assume, but the fact that there are a number of Progressives sitting in this corner to-day is evidence that a large section of the people in the Dominion are not content with present conditions. Parties are playing politics for political expediency and not for the country's welfare. Year after year this proceeding has gone on, and I am happy to say that, although an election was called last year—said to be called for the purpose of eliminating the third party—the third party will not be eliminated. You may kill the body, but the spirit is still there. The reason for the mess we are in to-day, the reason for the spectacle we are presenting before the country and before the whole world—enough to humiliate any Canadian patriot and make him ashamed of his own country and his countrymen—is that the Conservative party at the beginning of the session were not willing to accept a majority vote. They determined to oust the government by any means whatsoever, and since they could not do so on policy they expected to do it by abuse. It was no common thing to hear members of the Conservative party on this side shouting, "If you don't get out, we will push you out. Why don't you get out? Resign; you cannot function." The fact is that they were bad losers; they could not accept the majority vote, and now we find ourselves still here with the country's business unfinished.

I could not either yesterday or on any previous occasion vote for the party opposite to bring about what has been freely referred to in the last few days as political purity. I was asked in common with others to vote, for the purpose of bringing about political purity, for a party who still harbour among their numbers men who crucified their brothers at the front during the war by sending them worthless supplies at profiteering prices. I was asked to vote to bring about political purity through the instrumentality of a party who, during their last administration, were guilty of the most heinous crimes in carrying out their policy of privilege and favouritism, and the granting to certain people of some of the country's hard earnings for which no return was given. Class privilege, favouritism and corruption have existed to an extent that knew no bounds and such as, in my opinion, no country in the world has ever known.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

After Recess

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. EVANS: Mr. Speaker, before six o'clock I was dealing with the cause of the crisis facing this House at present and the responsibility of the government which is now appealing to the Progressive party to support it so that the business of the country may go on.

Being a representative of the agriculturists of Saskatchewan, I cannot see my way clear to support the present government. I pointed out this afternoon that that party when in power on a former occasion has been guilty of some of the greatest crimes that could be committed against certain classes in this country—crimes which they committed in the carrying out of their policy of favoritism, class privilege and corruption. During the years of the war they allowed profiteering to go on unhindered throughout the manufacturing centres of the Dominion, while the farmers had to suffer confiscation of their products at prices sometimes below the cost of production. At a time when wheat would have fetched a price to give us something for our trouble, it was commandeered at $2.21 a bushel, and we had to pay the freight to Fort William, which freight was increased by over 30 per cent, for during their term of office the government stole from the farmers the statutory protection which we then enjoyed under what is known as the Crowsnest pass agreement. That agreement was worth about $25,000,000 a year to the people of western Canada. Its suspension was continued from year to year, but in 1921 the government promised to restore the agreement in time for the new crop to be hauled at the rates therein provided. However, by order in council, or some other autocratic means, the Crowsnest pass rates were not restored at that time and the farmers of the west lost another $25,000,000. I say the government confiscated our products at that time at prices which did not allow the cost of production to be reaped by the farmer, while profiteering in all lines of manufactured goods took place, even in munitions and other supplies for the front as well as in foodstuffs and other commodities that were needed in this country. At the same time a 7½ per cent higher duty was placed on all our supplies.

When dealing with these great questions of political purity and political policy, Mr. Speaker, I ask this House to-day: Does the customs investigation reveal anything to equal the Home Bank scandal of those days, when for seven years, from 1916 onwards, the very Finance department itself was prostituted to keep going a defunct institution that should have been closed out? It has now cost this country some millions of dollars to reimburse, only partially, those depositors who lost their all in that institution. Broken homes and broken lives, and even suicides, are to be found to-day along the trail from the door of the Finance department to the door of the defunct Home Bank. Again, during the years that the Conservatives were in power they inaugurated a most systematic and tyrannical application of the dumping clause, which practically closed out some of our best co-operative companies in western Canada, making it impossible for them to distribute goods on a co-operative basis.

Taking all these things into account, Sir, I cannot support the present government. The whole debacle of corruption in the Customs department to-day is due to the policy of the Tory party. Favoritism and privilege have been the means of farming the workers during the last forty years in this country; large concerns have been allowed to settle their profiteering balances by promissory notes, while farmers in western Canada have been sent to prison for not making income tax returns when the poor beggars had nothing on which to pay income tax. Promissory notes of these big corporations have been taken in settlement of taxes, some for as much as $800,000. Talk about loss of revenue! Who is responsible for that; to what is the present debacle due? It is due to the maintenance of the rankest kind of feudalistic bondage the world has ever seen. You have a combination of evils here; trade restrictions for one thing, robbing the public of their earnings and of their right to buy and sell. When you couple this with the debasing liquor traffic it makes a combination of evils with which no nation can cope. We place a number of men in the position of administering an evil law and expect them to be clean; can it be done? I am afraid our professional politicians on both sides of the House have been guilty of receiving doles from these distillers for election campaign funds, so how can we expect clean politics where this sort of thing takes place?

The smuggling evil to-day is simply a backwash of the flow which we have allowed to go freely into a friendly country, without much effort at prevention. That, together with the effort to prevent workers from exercising their rights, is the cause of all our trouble to-day, and speeches in this House during the past six months have shown that it is the intention of the Conservative party to carry on the same policy, which I cannot support. When I look at the mad race for power made by that party, and the sort of thing that has been appearing on the Conservative press throughout the country I find a spectacle humiliating to any patriotic Canadian. While our own group may be divided, our very presence here is an evidence that the people of Canada long for something better. I have said before, and I will say again, that I do not believe this thing can be cleaned up by those who have been connected with the bondage of the past, and I have no hesitation in supporting this amendment.

The House divided on the amendment (Mr. Mackenzie King), which was negatived on the following division:

Mr. GERSHAW: I was paired with the hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Barber). Had I voted I would have voted for the amendment.

Mr. BELL (Hamilton): I was paired with the hon. member for Sherbrooke (Mr. Howard). Had I voted I would have voted against the amendment.

Mr. EDWARDS (South Waterloo): I was paired with the hon. member for North Waterloo (Mr. Euler). Had I voted I would have voted against the amendment.

Mr. POULIOT: I was paired with the hon. member for North York (Mr. Lennox). Had I voted I would have voted for the amendment.

Mr. BRISTOL: I was paired with the hon. member for Cartier (Mr. Jacobs). Had I voted I would have voted against the amendment.

Mr. SPEAKER: The question is on the main motion.

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Mr. Speaker, I desire just to make one remark. During the course of this session, when we on this side of the House were the government of the country, we received abuse of all kinds, not only in the House but in the press supporting hon. gentlemen opposite, because we had co-operation with the hon. gentlemen of the Progressive party. Let me say, Mr. Speaker, that we are proud of their co-operation. It was an honourable co-operation, open, uncovered, and before the eyes of the whole people of Canada. We have nothing to be ashamed of in that regard. We are pleased indeed to have had that co-operation and support from the hon. gentlemen led by my good friend the hon. member for Brandon (Mr. Forke). But what I desire to ask the leader of the House (Sir Henry Drayton), before you leave the chair, Mr. Speaker, is what sort of co-operation he is having with some gentlemen?

An hon. MEMBER: Be a sport.

An hon. MEMBER: Poor loser.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Mr. Speaker, in answer to my hon. friend's question I am very, very happy to find that there are some gentlemen in this House who have got still enough common sense to know what the right thing is, and to do it; that there are still some gentlemen in the House who believe that this House ought to be closed decently and properly, and that we should proceed with our business,

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): When did the change take place?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: My hon. friends are unduly excited. I think I have said all that the occasion requires, and I hope that some day my hon. friends opposite will be able to face facts a little more quietly and courageously.

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Regina): Mr. Speaker, surely the House is entitled to a plainer answer than that. We have had, as the hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Lapointe) has said, an honourable co-operation with certain other members of this House in endeavouring to put through legislation which we mutually believed in and supported. That co-operation was open and aboveboard. We had part of that co-operation extended to the principles contained in the budget which passed this House, and which is regarded as the most popular budget in many years in Canada—a budget more in the interests of the common people of this country than any other budget we have had for many years, a budget based upon principles directly opposite to the principles referred to in the amendment which has just been dealt with by the House.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I rise to a point of order.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Sit down.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: My point of order is simply—

An hon. MEMBER: Hurry up, we want to get away.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: —that the hon. gentleman has already spoken.

Mr. BOIVIN: He spoke on the amendment, not on the main motion.

Mr. CANNON: Learn the rules before you attempt to lead the House.

Mr. SPEAKER: In Bourinot, at page 421, I find the following:

When an amendment has been moved to the question for the Speaker to leave the chair, discussion should be properly confined to its subject matter. When an amendment is negatived, a debate may be raised when the Speaker again puts the question, on the general policy of the government, or on some other subject, not embraced within the exceptions just mentioned. This question arose in the session of 1876. An amendment having been negatived, it was urged by a member that no further debate could take place on the original question; but Mr. Speaker Anglin observed—"The House has not yet resolved that I leave the chair, and that question is consequently still before the House; and gentlemen who have not yet spoken are in order, and are permitted to speak on almost every question."

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. SPEAKER: I hope, however, that hon. members will continue the discussion in a dignified and calm manner.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I understand that if an hon. member speaks upon an amendment after it has been moved to a main motion he cannot afterwards speak on the main motion.

Mr. LAPOINTE: That is a new doctrine.

Mr. DUNNING: I do not know why my hon. friends should be so anxious to prevent me from speaking.

An hon. MEMBER: You are wasting time.

Mr. DUNNING: I am never unkind to hon. gentlemen opposite. But, Mr. Speaker, alluding again to that co-operation to which I was referring a moment ago, we heard certain expressions from the then opposition, and the word "bribery" was used frequently and by the right hon. gentleman who now, from outside the curtains of this chamber, pretends to lead this government.

An hon. MEMBER: Take it back.

An hon. MEMBER: That is untrue.

Mr. DUNNING: I wish to say simply this—that the hon. members who in the past have co-operated with the government, have frequently resented the use of that word as applied to that co-operation. They have refuted it by stating plainly on more than one occasion the basis and the procedure of the co-operation between the two groups; and when we see, on occasions of this kind, a considerable section of those who have been co-operating with the late government voting so directly in contradiction to their known principles—principles which I admit they hold now just as strongly as they did before the vote—

Mr. MEWBURN: They have seen the light.

Mr. DUNNING: They have seen no light of high protection, I guarantee that—then, Sir, the House has a right to know what form of co-operation has been entered into between the hon. members who now occupy the treasury benches and the members to whom I am referring.

Mr. KENNEDY (Winnipeg): Honest government.

Mr. FRANK S. CAHILL (Pontiac): Apparently the government do not propose to answer the hon. member for Regina.

An hon. MEMBER: Look behind you.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Is that the government?

Mr. CAHILL: He has put a question to the government somewhat in the form in which I proposed to put it. I know the present government of ministers without portfolio will be only too anxious to answer my question, but first, I want to see if I am right in the foundation I am laying for that question. I understood hon. gentlemen opposite when they were sitting on this side of the House to state emphatically, both in the House and on the platform during the elections, that they were in favour of adequate protection.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. CAHILL: Some hon. gentlemen opposite say "hear, hear". Is that still the policy of the government of to-day?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): They have no policy.

Mr. LAPOINTE: And no government.

Mr. CAHILL: If that is the policy of the government, we find hon. gentlemen to my left, particularly from Alberta, co-operating with the present so-called government, although on some occasions they could not support the Liberal party on their tariff policy because it was not low enough. It is also rumoured in the corridors, Mr. Speaker, that an arrangement has been made whereby the present government, if they are able to elect their ministers, have agreed to have another session of parliament, in fact one or two more sessions. If there is such an agreement it must have been entered into as a result of some understanding. What is that understanding? That is a fair question to ask.

An hon. MEMBER: Honest government.

Mr. CAHILL: Some hon. gentlemen opposite do well to talk of honest government, particularly some of the members I hear interrupting. If they want to discuss honesty in government and in public life, I am prepared to discuss that subject not merely with one or two in particular but with any of them. So I will ask them to kindly have a little patience for a few moments. It is suggested in the corridors and about the House that there is an understanding between hon. gentlemen opposite and hon. members in the corner of the chamber to my left that there is to be another session. Now, Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that the country well understood that the policy of the Conservative party in the last election, and during this session until yesterday, was a policy of adequate protection.

An hon. MEMBER: Higher protection.

Mr. CAHILL: Not only higher protection but adequate protection, which is practically a prohibitive tariff.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. CAHILL: It is either that or nothing. Now that was the policy of hon. members opposite.

Mr. CHAPLIN (Kent): It elected 116.

Mr. CAHILL: My hon. friend states the case well. There were 116 members elected on that policy and 129 elected on the opposite policy. Then where do hon. gentlemen opposite propose to get sufficient support to carry on the government of the country?

An hon. MEMBER: What about the majority?

Mr. CAHILL: That is what I want to ask my hon. friends opposite. How did they get the majority? What is the bargain?

An hon. MEMBER: We do not work like you.

An hon. MEMBER: You do not work at all.

Mr. CAHILL: Hon. gentlemen opposite have said to their old friends, "We are in favour of adequate protection." What have they said to their new friends in the corner of the House to my left?

An hon. MEMBER: Ask them.

[Mr. Cahill.]

Mr. CAHILL: I want to ask my hon. friends in the other end of the chamber if the leader of the present government has agreed with them that there will be another session, and if so what the terms of that agreement are? It is well understood that one of the parties to this compact is in favour of adequate protection. The other party is in favour of even a lower tariff than the one in force when the present opposition were in power. We took a vote on that matter only a few days ago. The question I want to ask is this: to whom do they propose to be traitors, their own party or the other party?

Hon. W. R. MOTHERWELL (Melville): As I have never had the opportunity of addressing any house from the opposition benches—

Mr. CAHILL: I understood the government to say they were going to give me an answer to that question.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: —I think it would be too bad for me to miss this opportunity of making a few observations. I notice there has been a certain disposition to plead for an opportunity for this government to get on its feet. Under ordinary circumstances I think that plea should be responded to by every hon. member in this House, and if the government has come into existence naturally, normally and born properly we would be so disposed.

An hon. MEMBER: Take your licking.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: They are spoken of as a shadow government, an embryo government, and a temporary government, but I speak of them as a still-born government, a government which has had its vital cords cut out too closely to be able to survive. At five o'clock yesterday, just three hours and fifteen minutes after my hon. friend's government was born, they received a staggering blow.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No, no.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Yes, just the same kind of blow we received.

Mr. MANION: You have had a few since.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: My hon. friend should have been in front of a looking glass so that he could have seen by their own photographs just what they looked like.

An hon. MEMBER: You have not been there long.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I have been told that there is far more fun on the side of the House to the left of the Speaker. After yesterday's experience on the first ground I am disposed to believe that my statement is correct. After having had the privilege of sitting on the other side for over twenty years, it seems to be my turn to say something on this side, and I hope to render some service in my present capacity. The question before the House is in regard to the tariff. What has been the history of the tariff when we on this side were on the government benches? What have we done?

An hon. MEMBER: Nothing.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: That just shows about how much my hon. friend knows.

An hon. MEMBER: Forget about it.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: From the first session we came into power, in 1922, we commenced to carry out our promises in respect to the tariff, not in large strides, but by easy stages. In 1922, 1923, 1924, 1925 and again in 1926 we did something. What about the Australian treaty? What about the West India treaty?

Referring to my Progressive friends, the hon. member for Southeast Grey (Miss Macphail) paid a splendid tribute to the Liberal party on this side of the House last night, and I want to express my appreciation of it by saying that, with the exception of one little slip, the government had co-operated honourably with the party of which she is a member. I say that without even one slip —because I do not call this a slip, in our co-operative arrangement—hon. members in that corner of the House have always been at liberty to take whatever stand they chose on any given subject; so that I am willing to take the stand that just as we are co-operating honourably with them they should co-operate honourably with us.

Mr. MANION: I rise to a point of order. An amendment has been moved by the leader of the opposition to the effect that our tariff policy was not satisfactory to the House—putting it in my own words. In other words, it was a tariff amendment. The whole discussion was or should have been upon the tariff. Bourinot at page 421 says:

> When an amendment has been moved to the question for the Speaker to leave the chair, discussion should be properly confined to its subject matter.

The tariff question was the one on which the amendment was moved.

> When an amendment is negatived, a debate may be raised when the speaker again puts the question, on the general policy of the government, or on some other subject, not embraced within the exceptions just mentioned.

The tariff is the exception just mentioned. I submit the debate at the present time by members on the other side of the House dealing with the tariff is absolutely out of order.

Mr. CANNON: My hon. friend would be perfectly right if this were an ordinary motion; but this is a motion to go into supply, and when the question is put we can talk on anything we desire to discuss.

Mr. MANION: The question is on the amendment moved on the motion for the Speaker to leave the chair.

An hon. MEMBER: No, no.

Mr. CAHILL: It must be appalling to hon. members to see such ignorance displayed by members on the other side, who, having sat in the opposition, should know something about the rules. When hon. members make the suggestion which has been made two or three times on the other side, it is evident that they know nothing about the rules.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member should speak to the point of order.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): On the point of order, by no stretch of the imagination can the hon. member who has just resumed his seat claim that the motion which has just been made deals with the fiscal policy of the country. It cannot deal with the fiscal policy of the country when moved as a political motion.

Mr. LAPOINTE: What are we here for, if not to talk about politics? We are here to settle the politics of the country.

Mr. ELLIOTT: In answer to what my hon. friend the Acting Minister of Labour and Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment (Mr. Manion) tells us ,I refer, on the point of order, to Bourinot's Parliamentary Procedure, fourth edition, page 419.

An hon. MEMBER: I want to go home.

Mr. ELLIOTT: An hon. member says he wants to go home. He cannot go home before this matter is settled. Bourinot says:

> Before the House goes actually into committee of supply, the Finance minister will bring down the estimates by message from the Governor General, and when the message has been read in English and French by Mr. Speaker, or by the clerk at the table, the minister will move "that the said message, together with the estimates accompanying the same, be referred to the committee of supply. "The order of the day for the House to go into committee of supply having been read, the Speaker will put the question—"That I do now leave the chair." The same question is always put whenever the House is to go into committee of supply in order to afford an opportunity to members to propose amendments.

On this point it is observed by an eminent authority that the ancient constitutional doctrine that the redress of grievances is to be considered before the granting of supplies, is now represented by the practice of permitting every description of amendment to be moved on the question for the speaker leaving the chair, before going into committee of supply or ways and means. Upon other orders of the day, such amendments must be relevant, but here they are permitted to relate to every question upon which a member may desire to offer a motion; the same practice is now followed very extensively in the Canadian Commons; but there are certain limitations to this right. Only one amendment can be moved to the question, "that Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair. If that amendment is negatived, a discussion on other questions may be raised but no other motion can be proposed.

On this authority I submit that any question may be debated.

Mr. MANION: Will the hon. member read the first paragraph on the following page?

Mr. ELLIOTT: On page 421?

Mr. MANION: Yes.

Mr. ELLIOTT: It does not touch the point raised by my hon. friend. This is the paragraph:

When an amendment has been moved to the question for the Speaker to leave the Chair, discussion should be properly confined to its subject matter. When an amendment is negatived, a debate may be raised when the Speaker again puts the question, on the general policy of the government, or on some other subject, not embraced within the exceptions just mentioned.

This does not bear on what my hon. friend contends.

Mr. SPEAKER: Having listened to the arguments on both sides, I should think that it would be an easy matter, even though the question is rather technical, for hon. members to conform themselves to the practice as indicated in Bourinot. As Bourinot observes, only one amendment is permissible to the motion that the Speaker leave the Chair for the House to resolve itself into committee of supply. In the event of such amendment being negatived, Bourinot, at page 420, says that a discussion on other questions may be raised but that no other motion shall be proposed. At page 421 he says further:

When an amendment has been moved to the question for the Speaker to leave the Chair, discussion should be properly confined to its subject matter. When an amendment is negatived, a debate may be raised when the Speaker again puts the question, on the general policy of the government, or on some other subject, not embraced within the exceptions just mentioned.

I have not by me the amendment which was voted down a moment ago, but as I recollect it has reference to past declarations on the part of the present Prime Minister (Mr. Meighen) who formerly led the opposition, from which declarations it is argued that it would be dangerous, in the interest of the country, to support the right hon. gentleman's fiscal policy. The amendment embodying that contention having been rejected, I take it that this retrospective feature of the tariff declarations of the present Prime Minister may not be further debated That is clearly inferred from Bourinot. I quote again the precedent cited by Bourinot at page 421:

This question arose in the session of 1876. An amendment having been negatived, it was urged by a member that no further debate could take place on the original question; but Mr. Speaker Anglin observed—"The House has not yet resolved that I leave the chair, and that question is consequently still before the House; and gentlemen who have not yet spoken are in order, and are permitted to speak on almost every question."

That is to say, they could speak "on almost every question" except the one just then disposed of by the House. I rule therefore that hon. members must confine themselves to other issues and refrain from any further discussion of the particular question upon which the House has just voted. May I observe at this juncture that it would facilitate matters and would make for greater celerity if hon. members on both sides would abstain from unnecessary interruptions.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I have no fear of disregarding your ruling, Mr. Speaker, for I have no intention whatever of discussing the tariff. I merely want to pay my respects to this new pupa government which is emerging into the chrysalis stage.

An hon. MEMBER: The chrysalis comes first.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I would suggest that my hon. friend go and take some lessons in entomology. Now if my hon. friends in the Progressive party consider that they are justified in transferring their allegiance from us to the high tariff group, it is no business of ours so long as they can satisfy their constituencies of the soundness of their position.

This question which we have been discussing is apparently associated with the probability or the improbability of a dissolution. There is no reason why the two things should be associated but inasmuch as the Speaker has ruled that we may discuss almost any subject at all apart from the tariff I want to emphasize the fact that no matter how we vote or when we prorogue a dissolution is bound to come. How do I know? Well, I know the feelings of hon. gentlemen who have to sit opposite. We ourselves have gone through six months of more or less excruciating agony, wondering at every moment what was going to happen next, and the only gratifying feature of that trial has been the knowledge that during that time, with the aid of our associates, we have been able to put a good deal of first class legislation on the statutes of Canada. We have made reductions in taxation, we have restored the penny postage, and we have done other things for which the country will be grateful. That, as I say, is the gratifying feature of the situation so far as we are concerned; and because of what we suffered, because of my own experience, I feel a certain amount of sympathy for hon. gentlemen opposite now that they are starting to sweat, so to speak. Just as we could not stand indefinitely the humiliation of being over there, neither can they. By the time they prorogue and get out of this House they will know what it is to occupy those benches. No doubt they are wishing that that time were here already. But so long as they are here they will be subject to criticism not half as bad as they levelled at us, and I feel they will allow themselves to be forced into a dissolution just as soon as prorogation takes place.

Is there any hon. gentleman in this House who is so simple as to think that by voting for the government he is going to escape a dissolution? Well, I have a lot of sympathy for him. It would seem to indicate that certain promises have been held out. That would do no harm to those to whom the promises were given, but I would ask my hon. friends opposite, how are they going to carry out those promises? Public sentiment is superior to their wishes. The whole country is crying out for a showdown—for a general election. I am not such an extreme party man that I do not think there is a place for Independents in this parliament, but I do think the public affairs of the country cannot continue to be deadlocked as they are at the present time. Already a crisis of tremendous gravity has grown out of this situation from the bringing into existence of this government by means of a most unnatural birth, which was brought about as the result of the deception that the present Prime Minister must have practised on the crown in convincing the crown that he and his party could carry on the national affairs satisfactorily and for a reasonable length of time. There must have been deception, otherwise the crown would not have taken his advice and refused dissolution, thus bringing this government into existence, believing they could carry on better than we could. The responsibility for that act does not, as has already been said, devolve on the crown but on its advisers. But in my estimation there will be an election before the snow flies, and I am sure every hon. gentleman who has the cause of good government and the interest of Canada at heart will welcome that day.

It may be that those who voted—unnaturally under ordinary circumstances—with the present government, felt that they had one of two choices: either to help kill themselves or to help kill this government; and, incidentally, to make sure of not having a dissolution by voting against the government. This side of the House has already put itself on record as being in favour of a dissolution. When the former Prime Minister advised His Excellency to dissolve this House, everybody knew our views on the question. We have no formal declaration from the other side of the House what their views are, and undoubtedly the hope is that by retaining this government in power there will be another session of this parliament. Well, I have too much respect for the historic traditions of my opponents on the other side of the House to think they would stand the humiliation which they would certainly have to submit to if they attempt to carry on for another year. That is why I think we will have an election before the snow flies.

There is another question in the offing, Mr. Speaker, and that is the tremendous constitutional question which has been raised as the result of the birth of this government under such extraordinary and exceptional circumstances. That is a question of paramount gravity, and there is far more involved in it than there is in the question of tariff. Something has happened in this country that has not happened in the British Isles for a hundred years, something that has not happened in Canada since confederation. What is going to be done about it?

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Let the hon. member or some of his colleagues introduce that question as a separate issue, and let us fight it.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I am simply cogitating on the question in advance. The Prime Minister has intimated that a resolution will likely be introduced if an opportunity of going into supply is again given, and I expect it will be. That will be the proper time to go into it. In the meantime sufficient has been said to-day to indicate the danger of giving birth to a government under the circumstances to which I have alluded.

Mr. G. G. COOTE (Macleod): Mr. Speaker, unfortunately I was out of the House at the time the debate on the amendment to go into supply came to a conclusion, and I wish to speak for a moment on that amendment. This House has been in session for practically six months. As a matter of fact it is six months to-day since I left my home to come to Ottawa. I do not know how the other members feel, Sir, but I feel that I have earned my indemnity already. As the hon. ex-Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell) has just said, I should like to go home. I do not think I can be blamed for that desire.

The motion before the House when the amendment was moved was that the House should go into committee of Supply. I think it is the duty of this House to vote supply. In my opinion the amendment was moved, for possibly two purposes: First, to prevent the House granting His Majesty supply; and, second, to put some of us who want to expedite the business of the House in an unpleasant position. That is the misfortune of any member who comes to this House to try to transact the business of the country and not to play politics. There is always somebody on one side of the House or the other whose chief concern is to get some of us in bad with the people we are trying to represent and serve. I say without any hesitation whatever that that is the prime motive behind the amendment moved to the motion to go into committee of Supply.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: What does the hon. member say was the prime motive of the amendment?

Mr. COOTE: To put in an uncomfortable position any members who wish that the House should go into committee of Supply.

Mr. CANNON: My hon. friend seems to be in a particular hurry to go home. Why did he ask suspension of the rules in order that he might move an amendment himself?

Mr. COOTE: Simply so we would not be put in the position that in the last seven business days the House would automatically go into committee of Supply, which would prevent any member moving an amendment to voice any grievance that he might have.

Mr. CANNON: Then why deprive us of that right?

Mr. COOTE: I am not depriving any hon. member of that right.

Mr. CANNON: You surely are.

[Mr. Motherwell.]

Mr. COOTE: Mr. Speaker, the business of this House should be concluded. The former government resigned, leaving considerable business unfinished. Certainly those measures which had passed this House, and had been amended by the Senate, should be given a chance to be brought before this House again to be discussed and if thought fit, given third reading. Otherwise the work of this session would be wasted. I am very tired of the party warfare which is carried on in this House. Hon. members to my right will admit, I think, that it was carried on by the members opposite for five months, but since their transfer to the other side of the chamber the party warfare is carried on just the same by those who now form the official opposition. So far as I can see we are between the devil and the deep sea. The ex-Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell) said to-night, as I understood him at least, that there was more fun on this side of the House. I think he is right. But, Mr. Speaker, is that what he came here for? I want to know if the members of this House are justified in drawing $4,000 a year just for fun.

Mr. FAFARD: He is not asking to go home.

Mr. CANNON: You want your indemnity and then to go home without working at all.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Cannot my hon. friend appreciate the fact that you can have fun out of your work? Work is drudgery without the fun associated with it.

Mr. COOTE: Yes, I can appreciate that all right, but I have heard people outside of this House say, "What is the use of paying 60 cents to get into Keith's theatre when you can see a better vaudeville show in the House of Commons?"

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Does my hon. friend think he makes a contribution?

Mr. COOTE: This is very funny to some of my hon. friends. Now may I say that when we came to Ottawa six months ago some gentlemen sitting to my right, who are very fond of interrupting me just now, were very anxious to secure the support of hon. members sitting in this corner of the House.

Mr. CANNON: If my hon. friend is referring to me I would ask him to give one single instance when I even spoke to him.

Mr. COOTE: At that time this group wrote both the then Prime Minister and the leader of the opposition asking their attitude in regard to certain questions in which they were very much interested, one of which was the tariff. May I now draw to the attention of the House a few words from the letter of the present Prime Minister, then leader of the opposition:

> May I add, though, that on the subject of the tariff I could not in a few words better define our historic and present policy than to quote what the Right Hon. W. L. Mackenzie King on September 8, in the county of Peel, in the province of Ontario, declared to be the policy of the Liberal party, namely—"a tariff which will help to give us what we need in the way of revenue, and, at the same time safeguard industrial development."

This is the declaration we had from the leader of the present so-called government when we had to consider the question of co-operating with either of the old parties.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Does my hon. friend understand from that letter that the leader of the present government accepted the tariff policy of the Liberal government, and is that why he and his party voted against the amendment?

Mr. COOTE: No. I would say that the tariff policy of either party did not influence my vote to-night one iota.

Mr. CAHILL: It would be very interesting to know what did influence my hon. friend in his vote.

Mr. COOTE: I told my hon. friend a few moments ago; if he had not been asleep he might have heard me. I voted against that amendment because I think we should attend to the business of the House and get supply voted.

Mr. CAHILL: That is childish.

Mr. COOTE: I suppose it is childish, but among all the politicians in this House I consider myself a child. I do not want to take up the time of the House; we should get to business, although I doubt very much if we will. I should like to say, however, that we seem to be fast approaching the time when the Governor General should seriously consider calling on certain members of this House to form a coalition government.

Mr. SPEAKER: Under rule 19 the hon. gentleman should not bring into a debate the name of His Excellency. I know he has no sinister motive, but it is not proper to refer to the Governor General in a political discussion.

Mr. COOTE: I am very sorry to have transgressed the rules of the House. I feel that possibly what we need, and need soon, is a coalition government in which all groups —a co-operative government, I do not care what you call it—may be represented.

Mr. CAHILL: Is that the answer to my question? It sounds like it.

Mr. COOTE: Then possibly party warfare may cease long enough to allow the business of the session to be concluded. Now I have a word to say to the low tariff men in this House, of whom I hope some are still my friends in spite of my recent vote. My views on the tariff have not changed at all; regardless of how many votes I may give against amendments on motions to go into supply, I do not think my tariff views will change very much. I would still be co-operating with the party which claims to be the low tariff party, and which does contain a number of low tariff men, had it not been for an unfortunate occurrence in one department of that government. I am sorry that in this country we have a system of government under which, if serious trouble occurs in one department, the result seems to be that the whole government must be upset. I wish some members of the late government were still in office, but there is no use in going back and re-washing old linen. I do regret the fact, however, that governments are put out of office in this country because of the misdemeanors of one or two of their members.

There are many other things I would like to say along this line, but I will not be responsible for longer delaying the business of the House; if that business is further delayed the responsibility must be on someone else. As I said last night, physically I am almost at the end of my endurance; if this party warfare is carried on much longer I may be compelled to go home and leave those party warriors to fight it out.

Hon. J. A. ROBB (Chateauguay-Huntingdon): On the first vote taken yesterday, after this government assumed the treasury benches, on an appeal from your ruling, Mr. Speaker, the government were defeated by a majority of one. On a subsequent vote they received a majority of twelve; later they had a majority of ten and to-night that majority has been reduced to seven. The hon. gentleman who has just resumed his seat, speaking I presume for the group in that corner of the House who saved the government—because you must keep in mind, Sir, the fact that had that group not voted with the government to-night they would have been defeated—said that the only solution now apparent is a coalition government. I submit that that cannot be posted up to-morrow as a verdict in favour of the government; we have it from the hon. gentleman who speaks for that group that he has so little confidence in this government that he suggests a coalition.

As the hon. gentleman has said, we have worked hard during a long session, I think one of the longest sessions I have attended during the eighteen years I have been in parliament. The independent press of the country, as well as the Tory press, have been telling the country from early in this session that the only solution for Canada to-day is a general election, so that the people may determine what is best. Now having in mind that the government of which I had the honour to be a member had a larger majority in this House than this government has ever registered, having in mind also the difficulties that we had in carrying on, knowing the conditions, and knowing what the Acting Minister of Finance (Sir Henry Drayton) will be up against, I submit that they can neither satisfy their friends who financed the advertising which hon. gentlemen opposite profited by during the last election, nor can they satisfy the group to my left under existing conditions, and I submit that the sooner the hon. gentleman to whom His Excellency now looks for advice advises him that he is not able to carry on without certain negotiations, the better. I make this statement so that hon. members may know whether it is true or not, and if not true, may refute it: I have been told only recently in the lobby that there is a bargain that there shall be two more sessions. Well, I want to know what is going to be the policy of the government during those two sessions, and I think the people of Canada are entitled to know what is going to be their policy. I believe that the gentlemen who financed the advertising which hon. gentlemen opposite enjoyed last fall are also entitled to know that, and what is more, the electors who sent to this parliament the hon. gentlemen who saved this government from defeat to-night are entitled to know it. I am not much interested in what hon. gentlemen down to my left may think, but I am interested in knowing what their electors will think to-morrow morning, and I am interested in knowing what those who throughout this session have been advocating a higher and a higher tariff and their friends who have been urging upon them a higher and a higher tariff will think, and also what the general public of Canada will think. I submit, Mr. Speaker, that the only possible solution of this difficulty is not a coalition, but a return to the people, and let the people decide.

Mr. E. J. GARLAND (Bow River): Mr. Speaker, what are the terms of this co-operation? That question has been asked by several hon. gentlemen to my right. It is true that from the beginning of this session almost up to to-day, certainly up until the end of last week, a most full and honourable and open system of co-operation has existed between the late government and hon. gentlemen in this party, and it has been admitted on both sides that both groups have lived up to the terms of that co-operation. I am here to say that that is the case. There was perhaps a falling off on the question of the natural resources of Alberta, due to complications affecting the provincial government in Alberta, which possibly provided hon. gentlemen to my right with some meagre excuse for the position in which they found themselves. Let me say, though, that when the late government sat over there and ran away from its own duty and its own responsibility, it ceased from that moment to have any further claim upon the co-operation of hon. gentlemen in this group. I regret deeply to say that, and I hope that in the future co-operation can again be restored, not only with that group, but with any group that will co-operate with us. We are always willing and open to co-operate, but the day last week on which the Prime Minister of this country decided to fly away from his responsibilities, to fly from possible defeat, to fly from the carrying through of his legislation and his estimates, from that moment on we were placed in an entirely different relation towards him and his ministry.

I am satisfied, Mr. Speaker, that the parliamentary institutions of this country, as practised at the present time, are utterly impossible in view of the situation in this House, and there must be a modification of that situation. I think there has been a recognition of that by several hon. members who have thought deeply upon this subject, and it was so stated in no uncertain terms at the outset of this session by the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa), the hon. member for Nelson (Mr. Bird), and other hon. members in this group, who have constantly indicated to the House their complete dissatisfaction and lack of confidence in the present parliamentary institutions. There has got to be a change of alignment, a change of the method of appointing governments, and of accepting votes upon certain questions.

Let me say definitely at this stage that I for one do not intend to be tricked into voting for any merely political motion. The hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Lapointe) said that we were here to discuss political questions. We are not here to discuss political questions. We are here to carry on the business of Canada. Let the hon. gentleman take his political discussions to the hustings; there perhaps they may receive a hearing and may have some influence, but political questions such as this motion raises at this stage certainly have no reasonable bearing upon the vote of any hon. gentleman.

Let me say, Mr. Speaker, that to my personal knowledge there is absolutely no co-operation, nor co-operative understanding, nor negotiation, nor arrangment, nor anything of that kind whatever, between the hon. members of this group and the hon. gentlemen who now sit on the government benches. I personally have not entered into any negotiations with them with respect to this vote, or with respect to my vote on any other question. I go further, and I say that before this group—I speak advisedly, and hon. gentlemen around me can contradict me if I am wrong—can afford to enter into any co-operative arrangement with hon. gentlemen opposite, we shall know what their policy is; we must know it, just as we asked hon. gentlemen now to our right what their policy was. The day we enter into any co-operative arrangement with hon. gentlemen who now sit on the government benches, on that day hon. gentlemen to my right and the public will know it. That arrangement will be just as open and above-board and honourable as the arrangement we had with hon. gentlemen to my right. That day may never come but I tell hon. gentlemen frankly that when it does come they will know it, and there will be no backstairs intrigue to my knowledge and with my consent.

On the particular amendment which has just been voted on, the fiscal policy of this country was absolutely not at stake. If you wish to discuss the fiscal policy of this country —I know I am verging here upon the point of being out of order—I would remind hon. gentlemen to my right that the party to my right which now preaches low tariffs, and did under the pressure of the group in this corner of the House and of that able and eloquent little group from Saskatchewan, grant certain reductions in the tariff this year, just as was done last year on agricultural implements, yet in one session in the last four years it brought in a budget announcing the death knell of protection, and the very next year established a policy of tariff stability. In the face of that, what can we think? Can we be expected to get anywhere on such a vague, academic, theoretical question as has been put to us tonight? We do not know, we cannot know, what we are voting on. But as soon as we vote on an issue, we shall record our votes intelligently, and I hope consistently.

One word more, and I am through. I am satisfied that this motion was introduced to-day, as other motions may be introduced subsequently, for one purpose and one purpose only. The Liberal party is now so anxious to gain control of the election machinery in view of what they hope will be an appeal to the country that they are willing to go to any extreme to get that control. I speak as one from the province of Alberta and for myself I have nothing to fear from an election. I have never personally spent one cent on an election campaign, and I will not. My people have subscribed for my election campaign and they have elected me, and I owed allegiance to no party, to no corporation; no one has any strings on me but my U.F.A.

The United Farmers of Alberta has just completed one of the most successful campaigns that has ever been carried on in that province. We have been swept back again into office, and I have nothing to fear, nor have hon. gentlemen from the province of Alberta sitting around me anything to fear from an election; so I am in a position to be able to say, when charges of an evil and objectionable character are being levelled against me, that the country does not want an election to-day. No one knows that better than hon. gentlemen to my right, and hon. gentlemen who are in touch with business circles in eastern Canada. Those in high authority who have the power to pass the control from one party to another know that just as well as hon. gentlemen in this House know it. That being the case, I say that we would be ill advised indeed to fall into any trap that may be set for us by hon. gentlemen to my right just as we would have been ill advised to fall into the trap set by the hon. member for East Calgary (Mr. Davis), or by any other hon. member who moves a political motion. So far as I personally am concerned, I will weigh every question on its merits, and if I detect in it a single trace of political motive, distinct altogether from the interests of the country, I shall have no hesitation in voting against it.

It might just happen that in spite of the common sense of some of the members in this House—most of us have some sense but some have a political sense that exceeds their business sense—a situation may arise where even then it may not be possible to carry on. In that case there is but one thing possible, as I view the matter, and that is that some form of co-operative government, just as the hon. member for Macleod suggested, should be arranged for and carried on so that the election machinery may be taken out of the hands of political parties, and a disgraceful influence upon the votes of the people of this country be removed from partisan hands for all time. And in entering into a co-operative arrangement of that kind, let Colonel Biggar, the Chief Electoral Officer at the present time, or whoever may be the chief electoral officer at the moment, conduct the federal election. In each constituency each little group or each little party will have its own organization, but as far as the present national control of political machinery is concerned, it is wrong in principle. It is absolutely unsound that political parties—either Liberals, Conservatives or Progressives—should have anything whatever to say about it.

I have now, I hope, given to my hon. friend the member for Pontiac, and to other hon. gentlemen, my answer to their questions. And may I say in conclusion that it ill becomes these hon. gentlemen who know us, who have known us for four years, and who have co-operated with us, to suggest or to attempt to suggest, as they have done to-night, that we have in any way done anything dishonourable. I will tell my hon. friend everything when there is anything to disclose.

Mr. CAHILL: Will my hon. friend permit a question? He has made a statement which I take it is correct. I know him and I believe he is absolutely honest in his statement. But he also said that, as I understood it, we should hurry through this session, prorogue, go home, and then come back here next session in the same state of confusion that now exists without any understanding. If we are to come back, if this parliament is to meet again, we should have some understanding. This country should not be left in the state of chaos it is in to-day without some such understanding. How does my hon. friend think the country is going to accept the position in which it is left to-night if there is no understanding that there is to be another session? If there is an understanding, the nature of it certainly should be explained, although I believe there is no understanding so far as my hon. friend himself is concerned.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I am not in a position to solve the horrible problem which is worrying me just as much as it is my hon. friend. I have simply stated the position as it is at this moment. I presume that if it is the desire of my hon. friends to carry on they can do so; but the suggestions I have made appeal at least to myself, and I hope to every honourable person, as reasonable suggestions for dealing with the situation.

Mr. JEAN J. DENIS (Joliette): I only want to say a few words in answer to my hon. friend from Macleod (Mr. Coote) and my hon. friend from Bow River (Mr. Garland). These two gentlemen know that I hold them in high esteem, as I also hold in high esteem all members of the Progressive party and all members of this House. However, it seems to me that in their utterances to-night there is such variance and such a lack of logic that I could not let them pass unchallenged. I see the hon. member for Macleod walking out of the House. He is quite free to do so, but I have told him that I was going to reply to some of his statements and he would do me a great favour by remaining. The hon. member says, "I have earned my indemnity already." With all due deference to the hon. member, for whom I have every consideration, I ask him: Is that a principle? Hon. members of the Progressive party, and I have no fault to find with them on that score, have come here and contended that they are men of principle; that the two old parties changed their principles but that they themselves adhere to principle. Is it a matter of principle for an hon. member to say, "Once I have earned my indemnity I can go home"?

Mr. COOTE: Will the hon. member permit me to say that I am quite ready to stay here another month or two months if there is business to be done, but I do not like to remain at this stage of the proceedings and listen to party warfare. That is the point I thought I was making when I spoke.

Mr. DENIS (Joliette): My hon. friend, perhaps, has not had very much experience in politics. Does he know that since confederation and prior to that time there has never been anything else in the Canadian parliament but party warfare? Does he know that in England at the present time there is party warfare in politics, and that the same condition prevails in every civilized country where there is a parliament?

Mr. COOTE: Is the hon. gentleman not aware that a great many of us in this corner of the House came down here to try to get away from party warfare, and that we do not want to see politics introduced into the carrying on of the business of the country?

Mr. DENIS (Joliette): My hon. friend is cherishing an illusion. As long as there is a parliament in Canada there will be party warfare—that is, if such an expression is appropriate, and I do not think it is proper. I know what my hon. friend means. What he objects to is one party fighting against another. My hon. friend will live many years and die an old man I hope, but when he reaches an advanced age he will still find the same conditions as to party warfare existing in this parliament that he sees now.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): The hon. gentleman is too pessimistic.

Mr. DENIS (Joliette): Long before my hon. friend was born there was party warfare in this Dominion. Let them read the debates before and since confederation and they will see there has been nothing else but party warfare. Of course when a government has a majority of thirty, forty or fifty, there is not very much party warfare; but each time the political parties are divided as they are at the present moment, when there is but a small majority on one side or the other, you will have political warfare; that is inevitable. But do not let us call it party warfare; let us consider it the efforts of two parties working in different directions, both of them having at heart the good of the country and both doing their best to accomplish that desired result. I want to attribute proper motives to the members of every party; but if you insist upon calling the struggles between the parties party warfare you will see bitter fights in this House under present conditions, as well as under altogether different conditions.

Mr. COOTE: Will the hon. member tell us what the bitter fights are all about?

Mr. DENIS (Joliette): I want to discuss this matter with my hon. friend in a polite and friendly manner, and for that reason I will not answer his last question but I will tell him this: If he wants to be logical and wants to act in accordance with principle he cannot claim that he wants to go home, because by voting with hon. gentlemen on this side he will bring about that result sooner than he would if he voted with hon. gentlemen opposite. My hon. friend said the amendment this afternoon was purely a political amendment. Let us be frank when we are discussing this matter. Every time a resolution is brought in for political purposes, according to his notion, is he at liberty to vote diametrically opposite to his principles? It is impossible to accept that.

My hon. friends have spoken of co-operation. It is true there has been co-operation between the Liberal and Progressive parties, and had the Liberals of the province of Quebec not been willing to co-operate with the Progressive party, co-operation would have been impossible. We did co-operate with them, and I am not sorry for it. If we had it to do all over again I would co-operate. But both sides must co-operate. We Liberals from the province of Quebec could live very well without co-operation, and if we did co-operate it was for the reason that I stated at the opening of parliament, that throughout the length and breadth of Canada our party should co-operate with all independent groups and work together for the welfare of our country. That was our object, and in order to attain it I am not ashamed to state to-night that I have voted for more than one measure which in my estimation might have been doubtful if I had considered my province only. But that was not my object. I considered the whole of Canada; I realized that two or three thousand miles from here there were provinces with which we should co-operate, and for that reason I supported those measures. My friends having obtained what they were after, apparently they say, "Now that we have crossed the river, we take our hats and are going home."

Mr. COOTE: The only reason I have voted as I have is that one department of the government had got into such a state—and I felt that some members of the government knew it—that I could not support the then government. I was sorry that the co-operation could not be further carried out.

Mr. DENIS (Joliette): I want to be very modest in my words and speech, but I will go further; do my hon. friends of the Progressive party think—their principles being known and recorded in this House—that co-operation would be easier with the present government than with the group on this side of the House? If there is one hon. member who is of that opinion, I should like to know his name. They cannot contend that, because it would be illogical. I do not want to blame them for their action; they are perfectly free and they have my consideration, esteem and respect, but notwithstanding all that I cannot bring myself to the belief that co-operation is easier with the Tory party than with the Liberal party. Co-operation with the Tory party is impossible; and that has been demonstrated during the present session. Just think of the logic of these estimable gentlemen. They want co-operation, but in the meantime, while they are claiming co-operation, they are supporting a party with which they cannot co-operate.

My hon. friend said they would like to have coalition. I do not know if it is new to my hon. friend, but it is not new to others. I am going to tell my hon. friends something to take with them to Saskatchewan and Alberta. Referring to coalition, do my hon. friends from the Progressive party know, or do they ignore the fact, that for two or three years at least, and perhaps more, very prominent people belonging to both parties in the provinces of Quebec and Ontario have claimed that those two provinces should go hand in hand and co-operate in order to govern this country? If my hon. friends do not know that, they do not know very much, because it is no secret. I am not divulging any secret, and moreover I was not a party to it. I am simply repeating what I have heard time and time again, and no one can go to Toronto or Montreal without meeting among the business men of those two largest cities in this Dominion many who will tell my Conservative friends on the one hand and the Liberals on the other that they should co-operate, and that there must not be any feud between Quebec and Ontario. If there is any misunderstanding between those provinces, remember that our interests are identical and that they should join hands and work together. Do my hon. friends know that Quebec has 65 members and Ontario 82? My hon. friends should make the addition and find out what it represents. They ask for co-operation and coalition. If we ever have coalition between Ontario and Quebec, the Progressives might not see their policy advanced very much. I do not want to threaten anybody, but, in common with my hon. friends from Macleod (Mr. Coote) and Bow River (Mr. Garland) I want the business of the country carried on and am willing to let politics go in order to gain that end. I hope my hon. friend will not think for one moment that I was speaking of him in a personal way. Although I do not know him very well personally, he knows I have a great deal of esteem for him. To-night I am speaking with a purpose. I want him to consider my statement, not because it comes from me, but because I am voicing the opinion of many who think as I do. I advise the hon. gentleman to read Hansard before he goes home and consider once more what I have just said concerning Quebec and more particularly Ontario.

Motion agreed to and the House went into committee of Supply, Mr. Duff in the chair.

SECRETARY OF STATE

To provide for the purchase of 650 copies of the Canadian Parliamentary Guide $1,950.

Mr. BOIVIN: Has there been any increase in the price of the Guide?

Sir GEORGE PERLEY (Acting Secretary of State): There has been no increase. This is the annual vote.

Item agreed to.

Governor General's Secretary's Office—
Salaries, including Governor General's secretary additional to salary authorized by R.S., c. 4, $3,600; John Guy at $1,500 and George Johnson at $1,380 .. $35,370
Contingencies .. 66,000

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: What is the salary of the Governor General's secretary?

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: It is $2,400.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: What is the additional amount for?

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: These are my right hon. friend's estimates. I suppose he considered that the additional amount was warranted.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: What is the additional amount?

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: It is $3,600.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That is a total of $6,000 for the Governor General's secretary.

Item agreed to.

National Defence—Militia services—Cadet services, $400,000.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Mr. Chairman, may I ask a courtesy of the new administration? One of our hon. members who has had this question under consideration for some years desires to address the House on it.

The CHAIRMAN: Item stands.

Non-permanent active militia, $1,660,000.

Mr. RINFRET: I wish to congratulate the new government on their spirit of economy in decreasing this item by $50,000. I believe they have inherited that spirit from the former government, and I merely express the hope that when the estimates are brought down next year—and very likely they will be brought down by this side of the House—it will be found possible to further reduce this amount.

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (Acting Minister of National Defence): I do not want my hon. friend to be misled. The former government reduced the amount, but found it necessary to restore the $50,000 in the supplementary estimates.

Mr. BOIVIN: Does my hon. friend contend that the amount is required for training camps for the non-permanent militia?

Mr. GUTHRIE: No.

Mr. BOIVIN: Is my hon. friend seeking to pass this estimate upon assurances that he has received from some official in his department, or does he verily believe that it is required?

Mr. GUTHRIE: I have some familiarity with the department, but, speaking generally, I have not had time to examine the items. We are taking the items as prepared by the former government, of which my hon. friend was a member. In the short time I have had to examine this estimate I think the amount will be required.

Mr. BOIVIN: It is all very well for the leader of the government to rise in his place and with a gesture to the gallery say, "Gentlemen, you will certainly pass these estimates, because they are yours." I have not had time to examine the supplementaries, but I take the hon. member's word that the same condition exists in connection with them. So far as the main estimates are concerned, there is no doubt we take full responsibility for their preparation, and we hope the country will give us credit for the estimates as they are presented to the House. I ask my hon. friend now and the other hon. members of the newly formed government sitting around him, whether or not they will undertake to spend the money that we are voting to them to-night? That is a question to which the people of Canada are entitled to have an affirmative or negative reply. Therefore I think before we proceed further in rushing these estimates through at the rate of millions of dollars per hour we should have some assurance that the government is going to use every reasonable effort to expend the money voted according to the wishes of this House. Without that assurance I do not think we should continue at this headlong pace passing estimates which may never be expended.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I certainly will not undertake that this amount is to be expended. I had no part in the preparation of the estimate, but I will undertake that so much of it as is absolutely essential and necessary shall be expended. If it is possible to make a saving on that amount I will undertake that it shall be made. But as the estimate has been prepared by careful officers of the department who have examined closely into the situation, I do not think the criticism is well taken by my hon. friend, who was a member of the government which prepared and submitted this, together with the other estimates, to this House wih the approval of his Excellency.

Mr. BOIVIN: My hon. friend is wrong. There is no criticism of the estimate, nor of the official who prepared it.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I have given the undertaking.

Mr. BOIVIN: My hon. friend has given an undertaking to spend just as little as possible of the estimates voted. I am not referring to this particular estimate; I realize that military training camps have existed for years. They existed under previous Conservative regimes and under Liberal regimes; there has been a laudable effort to reduce the amount expended in this way each year, but there are a great many other items in these estimates which the government considered absolutely necessary to the welfare of Canada. If they had not been absolutely essential they would not have been included. As my hon. friend says, they were recommended by responsible officers of the different departments, and every estimate in the blue book was approved of by the late government after that recommendation. I am not criticising the officers; I think they did their duty in preparing the estimates, but I would like to know whether the opinions of these responsible officers will be carried out or whether my hon. friends are merely voting these estimates in order to close parliament at the earliest possible opportunity and get back to their homes, leaving perhaps for another year the real expenditure of money required for the public service, in order that they may get the benefit of having placed the amounts in the estimates and in order that they may tell the people of Canada, "Oh, well, the Liberals prepared the estimates and we are not going to spend the money." I think my hon. friend was quite wrong when he criticized me for blaming any official, because that was not at all my intention. All I wanted was an assurance from this government that they would endeavour to carry out the wishes expressed by parliament in the voting of these estimates.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Certainly, and those wishes will be carried out as carefully and as economically as possible.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: We are now voting large sums of public money to different hon. gentlemen opposite who are supposed to be administering several departments of the government. Before we proceed any further I would like to discover from those hon. gentlemen to what extent they have complied with constitutional practice in the matter of assuming office. I would like to ask my hon. friend who is leading the House whether he has taken any oath of office of any kind since he undertook to lead the House, or even before doing so.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Each of the different formalities prescribed in the office of the Privy Council has been observed; I am quite frank in saying that I do not know how many there are.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I want this information before we vote public money to hon. gentlemen who, in our opinion, are not entitled to spend one five-cent piece of the public money. I ask my hon. friend who is now leading the House whether he has taken any oath of office this year.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: No.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Will my hon. friend tell me what departments he is administering?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I think this is somewhat irregular, Mr. Chairman, but I am quite willing to give my hon. friend the information.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: We are discussing supply at present. If my hon. friend hesitates to give an answer to any of the questions I am asking I will see to it that we do not proceed with supply. Supply, as my hon. friend knows, is the stage at which the people's representatives in parliament have a right to question the administration as to their right to administer public funds.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Absolutely; I am not making the slightest objection to it; I am not even throwing the slightest doubt upon the honesty and accuracy of the previous administration who prepared these very estimates. So far as this is concerned I have taken all the oaths which go with the administration and with the standing one has as a member of the king's Privy Council. In addition to that I have been regularly appointed by order in council as a member of the king's Privy Council to act in the present occasion in the Department of Finance and the Department of Railways and Canals.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Will my hon. friend tell me when that order in council was passed, and if he will lay a copy on the table?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Yes, there is no trouble about it. One was sent me to-day.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I see the copy?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Yes.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend has told me that he has taken no oath this year. May I ask the hon. member for Argenteuil (Sir George Perley) what departments he is administering?

[Sir Henry Drayton.]

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: I am Acting Secretary of State and Acting Minister of Public Works.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I ask my hon. friend if he has taken any oath of office this year?

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: No. I took my oath as a Privy Councillor a great many years ago.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Those of us sitting on this side who composed the former government have taken the oath as privy councillors, but that does not entitle us to administer departments of the government at present. I want to make the position quite clear to hon. gentlemen opposite. I observe ministers in this government are former Privy Councillors, men who have taken the oath as councillors, men who have taken the oath as privy councillors many years ago.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: Except the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Black).

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I will have a special word in regard to him a little later All the other acting ministers have taken the oath as privy councillors at some previous time, but that gives them no right whatever to sit in this House as ministers. What I am concerned about now is the oath taken when one becomes a minister of the crown.

Mr. GUTHRIE: That is not the oath we have taken; none of us are ministers of departments, but merely acting ministers.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I wish to ask the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. Manion) what departments he is administering.

Mr. MANION: I have the Departments of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment, Immigration, Labour, Health, and Postmaster General.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Has my hon. friend taken any oath of office?

Mr. MANION: No, not since I took the privy councillor's oath about the same time my hon. friend took it.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Now will the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens) tell us what departments he is administering?

Mr. STEVENS: This is an interesting interrogation, but it is quite proper for the right hon. gentleman to have all the information available. I am Acting Minister of Agriculture, Trade and Commerce, Customs and Excise, and Interior, which, of course, includes Indian Affairs and Mines.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Has my hon. friend taken the oath of office with respect to the administration of any of these departments?

Mr. STEVENS: I took the oath as privy councillor some years ago, also the oath as administrator of the Department of Trade and Commerce at that time.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: When was that?

Mr. STEVENS: My hon. friend will probably recall.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend himself mentioned it; he evidently regards it as having some bearing. When did he take that oath?

Mr. STEVENS: So far as I can recall, it would be early in September of 1921, about the fifth or tenth.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The government of which he was a member at that time went out of office shortly afterwards, did it not?

Mr. STEVENS: Yes.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Will the hon. member for South Wellington kindly tell us what departments he administers?

Mr. GUTHRIE: I became a privy councillor for Canada in July, 1919. I have taken no oath of office. I am appointed by order in council, and am acting minister for the Department of National Defence and the Department of Justice. The order in council appointing me is similar in form to that presented by my hon. friend from West York.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Perhaps I could shorten the questions by asking my hon. friend whether all of the acting ministers have been appointed acting ministers by order in council.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The practice has been the same, I think, in every case. The fact is, as was stated in the House the other day, the right hon. the Prime Minister was sworn in and has taken the office of Prime Minister. He is not acting, he is real—

Mr. CANNON: The real thing.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: He is the real thing, and I think the House recognized that; my hon. friend is quite right. He also has taken the portfolio of External Affairs, and is President of the Privy Council. In connection with the others, what was done was this—I am not speaking of the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Black), who took the appropriate oaths on that day—but in connection with the others they were all formerly sworn, and, of course, still are members of the Privy Council, and are ex-cabinet ministers.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Does my hon. friend mean sworn since the present administration took office?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Prior to the time the preceding administration was in office.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend has not yet answered the question whether all the acting ministers were appointed acting ministers by order in council.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Yes.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Can my hon. friend tell me the dates of the orders in council?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I have given my hon. friend a copy of the order in council.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: They were all the same date as this one?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I think so.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Can my hon. friend be sure of that?

Mr. MANION: Mine is dated June 29.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I would ask my hon. friend from Argenteuil if he was appointed by order in council, and would he undertake to have the order in council laid on the table of the House, if not tonight, at least to-morrow when the House assembles.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: Yes.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Was my hon. friend from Vancouver Centre appointed by order in council?

Mr. STEVENS: Yes.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Will he undertake to have a copy of the order in council laid on the table to-morrow?

Mr. STEVENS: Yes.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend from Fort William was appointed by order in council? Will he undertake to have a copy of the order in council laid on the table to-morrow?

Mr. MANION: Yes.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Will my hon. friend from South Wellington undertake to have a copy of the order in council appointing him laid on the table to-morrow?

Mr. GUTHRIE: Yes.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Black) is a minister without portfolio?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: He is Acting Minister of Marine and Fisheries.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: He was made a minister without portfolio as a privy councillor.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Yes.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Was that done by order in council?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I have no doubt it was.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: The hon. gentleman took the oath as privy councillor on the 29th of June, and was appointed Acting Minister of Marine and Fisheries by order in council. I have here a copy of the order in council appointing Mr. Manion, Mr. Black (Halifax) and myself.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Would my hon friend let me have that? I wanted to ask whether the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Black) was appointed a privy councillor by order in council.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: He was sworn in in the ordinary way.

Mr. MANION: A man cannot be appointed privy councillor by order in council.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Does my hon. friend say there was no order in council in connection with the appointment of the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Black) as privy councillor?

Mr. MANION: He took the oath of office as privy councillor.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Does my hon. friend say that there was no order in council passed creating the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Black) a privy councillor?

Mr. MANION: I do not know whether there was or not.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Will the leader of this administration that has been formed by order in council tell us whether there was an order in council in that case?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: My hon. friend should not gibe at order in council administration; he knows all about it. At the moment I cannot for the life of me tell him what the exact procedure was, but I do know that everything that was said to be necessary was done, and I have given my hon. friend what was given to me. As to what was given to the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Black), I do not know what was given to him.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Can my hon. friend tell me where the new privy councillor is?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: He was in the House until a short time ago.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Can he come into the House this evening?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: He is not very well, as my hon. friend knows. He has his arm in a sling.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am sorry to hear it. I did not know it until this moment. I would ask my hon. friend if he will be in a position to advise me first thing when the House meets to-morrow whether there was an order in council appointing him privy councillor, and when it was passed, and if he will please have a copy of the order laid on the table.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I shall be pleased to do so.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend who is leading the House says that these orders in council appointing himself and several other gentlemen who are sitting beside him were passed in council. Who were in council at the time these orders were passed, may I ask?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: My hon. friend is now asking a question which he himself on previous occasions said could not be answered. It is a matter of privy council oath. I have a very vivid recollection of the stand taken by my right hon. friend in the Murdock case.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend may think that by evasions of that kind, he will get away from informing the House as to how, with respect to the creation of this so-called ministry, the constitutional requirements have been complied with, but I wish to tell him at once that he will not get away from it by evading. The country is entitled to know by what authority hon. gentlemen opposite are asking this country to vote millions of dollars for them to administer. It happens to be part of my duty as leader of His Majesty's loyal opposition to ease the country's mind as to where there is any doubt on that question.

An hon. MEMBER: You eased the country's mind the other day.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I might as well come to the point that I have very much in mind at the moment. My hon. friend the leader of the House says that everything was done in a constitutional and proper manner. It is not a secret in any way of the Privy Council that an order in council to be regular, to have any force, must be carried by a quorum of the cabinet, and that at least four are necessary to form a quorum. I can understand how the right hon. the Prime Minister may have taken his oaths and been sworn in as a minister, but he was then, as I would understand it, the sole member of council entitled to act in an executive capacity. What I would like my hon. friend to tell the House, if he will, is how, when the right hon. gentleman assumed the position of Prime Minister and undertook to form a ministry, he complied with the constitutional rule which requires a quorum of four to enable any order in council to be passed to appoint any minister or to do any public business.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Mr. Chairman, I am quite sincere when I tell the committee that I did not count how many were present, but my recollection is, and I think it is correct, that there were six members of the Privy Council present. There has to be a start made, and the start was made.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Privy councillors are not permitted to walk into the council chamber, sit around the table, and pass whatever orders they may like, to give each other official positions. If that were the case there is no reason why my erstwhile colleagues and myself should not have walked into the council chamber and sat down at the table with whoever was prepared to assume the position of Prime Minister of this country and assign positions to ourselves that would enable us to control the expenditure of public moneys to the extent necessary to carry on the administration of public affairs for a year.

Mr. CAHAN: Would it not all depend on whether my right hon. friend and those who sit about him were invited to do so by a privy councillor who had been called upon by His Excellency the Governor General to form an administration?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No, I am afraid it does not. I think my hon. friend will find that there are two oaths which everyone takes who is called upon to perform the duties of a minister of the crown. One oath taken is that of Privy Councillor, which a number of us in this chamber this evening have taken. But the fact that we are members of His Majesty's Privy Council gives us no right whatever to be ministers of the crown or to be acting as ministers of the crown. There are gentlemen in the other House who have taken the oath as privy councillors and are privy councillors, but they have no right by virtue of that oath to be ministers or acting ministers. It was never contemplated that the government of the country should be carried on by gentlemen who had not taken the oath of office with respect to the administration of the departments with which they were concerned. It was never contemplated that one single individual could take an oath as Prime Minister and president of the Privy Council, and any other portfolio he wished, and by virtue of that one solitary oath be able to place in office immediately a number of his fellow members of the House of Commons, members of his own political party, and thus carry on the government of the country.

Mr. CAHAN: Has not the Prime Minister from time immemorial been entitled to call upon other members of the Privy Council to administer temporarily the affairs of a particular department without such member taking an oath with respect to that department?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: After a government has been formed and ministers of the crown have taken the oath to administer the departments to which they are assigned, certainly an acting minister may be appointed to act in the place of a minister already entrusted with a portfolio and properly sworn in. But what I want to make clear to the House and to the country this evening is that of this entire cabinet there is not a single member who has taken any oath to administer a single department of the government; and yet these gentlemen come before us with estimates and ask us to vote hundreds of millions of dollars. We have voted some thousands of dollars already just to see how calmly they would take the process, and how rapidly they are prepared to vote millions of dollars to themselves without having any authority whatever to ask this House for a single dollar. I say there is not a single minister of this administration sitting in his seat to-night who is entitled to ask this House to vote him a single dollar.

Mr. CAHAN: Has the right hon. gentleman ever heard in the history of parliamentary proceedings of a minister asking for a vote to himself? Is not every vote recommended by the crown, and is not that money voted to His Excellency?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That is quite apart from the matter which we are discussing. I was not arguing that hon. gentlemen opposite were asking for the money for themselves. I hope my hon. friend does not think I regard hon. gentlemen opposite as being quite as bad as that.

Mr. CAHAN: That was the whole tenor of your argument.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am quite prepared to admit they are ready to go to a certain limit; I did not think my hon. friend would assume I was arguing that they were seeking to get this money for their own personal use. I had no idea of the kind. What I do say is that they are seeking to get this money in order to expend it on the public services of the country.

Mr. CAHAN: In order that the money may be properly and efficiently spent in carrying on the government of the country.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: We will see how proper the procedure is. My hon. friend has referred to the annals of parliamentary history. I venture to say that he can search the pages of history in all ages of the world and he will find no single instance where a government was ever formed in the manner in which this government has been formed. Furthermore, he will not find a single instance where the expenditure of the entire supplies of the country were handed over to a group of gentlemen with no responsibility whatever. If my hon. friends opposite have an idea that we propose, as members of this House, to allow the House to prorogue under these circumstances without a pretty full explanation they are very much mistaken.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: I think I may be able to relieve the anxiety of my right hon. friend a little. I doubt if there is any member of this House who has had as much experience as a minister without portfolio as the member for Argenteuil. In 1911, when the government of Sir Robert Borden was formed, I was selected as a minister without portfolio, sworn in as a privy councillor and continued to sit in this House.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think I can correct my hon. friend. I do not think the order followed was the one he has described. He was not sworn in as a minister without portfolio and then as a member of the privy council; he was sworn first of the privy council, and afterwards became a minister without portfolio.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: I was sworn of the Privy Council and afterwards became minister without portfolio.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: I administered quite a number of the government departments from time to time as minister without portfolio, and without taking any special oath in administering those departments. I came into this House years ago and passed estimates for departments of the government when I was a minister without portfolio and there was never any question raised by anyone as to the propriety of my doing so.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I hope my hon. friend will not think I am guilty of any impropriety in asking him questions; I am trying to discharge a public duty.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: Before my right hon. friend continues, I may add that I was appointed minister without portfolio on the present occasion in exactly the same way as I was in 1911.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Quite so. I appreciate that fact, and I think my hon. friend probably will have the experience of being minister without portfolio again before very long. I cannot say, of course, what curious methods may have been adopted by a previous Conservative administration, but I will say this: I do not think Sir Robert Borden, whom I regard very highly as a constitutional authority, would ever have thought under present circumstances of asking my hon. friend to administer the affairs of a department, without having in the first instance appointed him to administer that department and caused him to take the oath of office required in such a case.

Mr. CAHAN: In case a portfolio is vacated by death, in every instance the records show that some other member of the cabinet, with or without portfolio, was designated temporarily to administer the department.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend is speaking of ministers who have died. I am speaking of ministers who have never been born and I am speaking not only of ministers who have never been born, but a government which has never been born, according to the statement we heard this afternoon. I ask hon. members opposite—they have a sense of humour I hope—did they ever in their lives witness a spectacle as ludicrous as this—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order, order.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am glad all the members agree. May I say to my hon. friend who is interested in the ministers who are dead—

Mr. CAHAN: I was speaking in regard to the point of the prime minister taking office and then appointing a member of the privy council as acting minister to fulfil the duties of that office temporarily. But when my hon. friend is searching for precedents, in the history of responsible government where will you find a prime minister who established a precedent such as he has done?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order, order.

Mr. CAHAN: I have the floor. The precedent of proving recreant to his public trust, of resigning, as the right hon. gentleman did, from the office of prime minister, resigning on behalf of his entire government, without having the sense of honour, shall I say—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order, order.

Mr. CAHAN: —resigning without considering the interest of the country which demanded that he should have offered to see that the departments of government should be temporarily administered pending the selection of his successors.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend I admit is very learned in the law, but I am afraid constitutional law and practice are not his forte. I hope he will not think I am speaking disrespectfully, because I respect his years and his great ability, but since he makes the kind of charge which I understand he does make against me at the moment, I think he will have to listen to what I have to say about constitutional practice in changing ministries. The practice with respect to resignation, as I understand it—and perhaps my hon. friend will tell me if I am wrong—is that if the Prime Minister is of the opinion there should be a dissolution of parliament his duty is so to advise His Excellency the Governor General, just as he advises His Excellency the Governor General in regard to other matters of concern to the state. He might assume that something less than a dissolution would be sufficient to meet the needs of the state, in which event he would advise His Excellency in accord with his belief. May I say, in considering what I was called upon as prime minister to consider, that after noting the proceedings in this House last week I came to the conclusion that this House could not with dignity and honour to itself continue to carry on the public business of the country. I came to the conclusion that to attempt to carry on public business with a condition such as we were witnessing towards the end of last week would be to bring the great and honourable institution of parliament more or less into disrepute; and having that view I was obliged to consider whether it was desirable to attempt any longer to carry on parliament. I went to His Excellency and said I would not longer take the responsibility of carrying on as prime minister, believing that the best interests of the state were not being served by any government attempting to carry on under the circumstances which now exist, and I advised His Excellency as to the next step to be taken which in the circumstances seemed to me should be dissolution.

Under different circumstances I might have advised His Excellency to send for some other hon. member of this House to form an administration, had I believed any other hon. member of this House could form an administration and be able to carry on better than I was able to do. But I did not honestly believe that. The only person I could think of whom it would be at all fitting and proper for me to ask His Excellency to call on, if His Excellency was to be asked to call on any hon. member, was the right hon. leader of the opposition of the day. Well the right hon. leader of the opposition of the day had had no support from this House of Commons from the moment it came into being up to the moment I sought to advise His Excellency, and the main question that was discussed all through the session, the main issue in the election, the issue that decided whether hon. members were to be returned to this House, and as to which side they were to sit on when they were returned, was according to the present Prime Minister the great fiscal issue on which on an amendment to go into supply, we had a discussion this afternoon. In those circumstances how, when the majority of hon. members in this House differed from the Prime Minister on fiscal policies, the most important of all policies, could I possibly advise His Excellency that the right hon. gentleman was capable of forming a ministry and carrying on? It was impossible, just as my hon. friend says, honestly to advise His Excellency that I believed any other member of this House should carry on the government of the country, and I had to consider that. I am frank to say—well it is not for me to relate what I did say to His Excellency. I can however say to this House what was my conviction—that it was not possible for any hon. member to carry on the business of this House; and I submit that what has been disclosed to-night bears out what I said at the time I first decided to advise dissolution, and so advised His Excellency—that what was needed in order that the public business might be carried on in the dignified and proper manner in which it should be carried on was a dissolution of parliament which would permit the people to say who was to control the government of this country from now on.

A prime minister may have a feeling that there are certain policies he is not in a position to carry through which possibly other groups in the House are in a position to put through, and that in the public interest should be carried through. In cases of that kind a prime minister might go to the crown or its representative and say, I am not in a position to carry this policy through; I cannot carry on the business of this country myself, but I believe that so and so, whoever he may be, would be able to carry on, and I would ask Your Excellency, or Your Majesty —as the case might be—to call on him. In that event His Excellency would take the course, I presume, of calling on whoever was named. But I could not advise His Excellency to call on the right hon. leader of the opposition to carry on the business of this country with any belief that he could carry it on with dignity and honour. I had in my mind, when I was considering the question, a vision of precisely the spectacle we see here to-night.

An hon. MEMBER: What spectacle?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: An attempt to carry on the government without a prime minister in the House and without—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I say to hon. members opposite that I made use of that situation at this moment to hear them laugh. That is what they were saying could not be done. I never said it, and hon. members on this side never said it, but the gentleman who to-day is prime minister said it.

Mr. CHAPLIN (Lincoln): You were not elected.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Apart from that I would direct my hon. friend's attention to the fact, that, while I personally may not have been elected, the government of which I was the head has continued in office from 1921 up to the moment I resigned the other day, without sustaining a single defeat.

Mr. MANION: Quite a few members short.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If the fact that there were a few members short was the reason why His Excellency should not have permitted my government to carry on, I wonder what becomes of the effect of that reason when it is applied to the present so-called government. A few members short?

Mr. MANION: After two months.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: After two months, yes. But what is the position to-day?

Mr. MANION: So far we have had only twenty-four hours.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: How many members short is this government at the present time?

Mr. MANION: I do not wish to interrupt the right hon. gentleman; I will answer his question when he sits down.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am sitting down.

Mr. MANION: Then you are through.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Not by any means.

Mr. MANION: Finish your speech then.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Perhaps I may put the question in another form. The hon. member asks, how many ministers short is his government? I would ask, how many ministers long are they?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. MANION: We have all we need to get a majority.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: This country to-day is being governed, with all the great responsibilities of government, by a cabinet in which there is not a single minister of the crown in parliament and in which there is no Prime Minister with a seat in the House. with such a sequence of events I say that if ever a Prime Minister was justified in tendering advice urging that the conditions demanded dissolution, I have been justified in this instance. We find the affairs of the country being administered by a group of gentlemen not one of whom is a minister of the crown—and this while parliament is in session.

Mr. McGIBBON: Don't take it so badly.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The whole struggle throughout the centuries has been to bring about a system of responsible government whereby every executive act of the crown should be performed upon the advice of a responsible ministry. Do hon. gentlemen opposite pretend to be such a ministry?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Sure.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Sure! It only shows how ignorant hon. gentlemen are of the nature of responsible government. Does my hon. friend who is leading the House (Sir Henry Drayton) think that the people of Canada, the men and women who are paying the taxes to carry on the business of the country, will be satisfied for one moment with a government constituted as this is?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I can only say to my right hon. friend that I should like the sensible people of this country to see him at this moment.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I did not quite catch the hon. gentleman's remark, but I shall proceed to conclude my answer to the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan) with reference to what he sees fit to describe as discourtesy on my part in not advising hon. gentlemen opposite of my intention to resign.

Mr. CAHAN: I did not suggest that it was discourtesy; I did describe it as an unparalleled dereliction of duty.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: We are not permitted to introduce the name of His Excellency into this discussion—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Why do so then?

Mr. NICHOLSON: That is what you have been doing all evening.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I have not done so. I have been discussing the ministers who have been advising His Excellency.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Keep cool, boys, it is only beginning.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The point I am making is this. When a Prime Minister advises the crown or its representative of the necessity for calling upon someone else to succeed him he does just what my hon. friend suggests; he seeks to have arrangements made whereby his successor may carry on.

Mr. CAHAN: Hear, hear.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: But I did not go to His Excellency to tender His Excellency any such advice. My advice to His Excellency was that in my opinion dissolution was imperative.

Mr. CAHAN: And?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It was not for me, when His Excellency declined to accept my advice, to suggest that I would continue in office any longer.

Mr. RYCKMAN: Leave His Excellency out of it.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am not speaking of His Excellency personally; I am referring to my relations with the representative of His Majesty. I repeat, when I tender advice to the sovereign's representative and that advice is not accepted, it is impossible for me thereafter to advise His Excellency in respect of any matter whatever. The moment His Excellency declines to receive my advice I cease to be his adviser.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: We are discovering the views of hon. gentlemen opposite with regard to the obligations of responsible government. My hon. friends have not the remotest idea of what should be the relationship of a responsible ministry to the crown. Now I hope I have set at rest the anxiety of my hon. friend from St. Lawrence-St. George.

Mr. CAHAN: I trust I shall have an opportunity of replying to the right hon. gentleman.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes, and when the hon. member does so I hope he will put himself in my place—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh no.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Never will.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I do not want the hon. gentleman to be leader of the opposition, but I should be pleased to see him at least a member of the present phantom ministry. I should be glad to see some representative from the city of Montreal sitting opposite.

Mr. RYCKMAN: Don't worry.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If such a representative were in the cabinet it would help to fill out the picture. May I say this to my hon. friend who is leading the government. Assuming that he had the responsibility of advising the crown, and that his advice was not accepted: would he feel that it was his duty then to persist in tendering advice as to how matters were to be arranged, or would he wait until he was asked to give such advice? I ask the hon. gentleman that question. Let me say that I was quite prepared to do anything His Excellency might have asked me to do.

Without disclosing anything which should not be revealed I think I may go so far as to say that I indicated very clearly to His Excellency that I was prepared to have my resignation withheld at His Excellency's request. But when I offer advice and it is not accepted then I say that the only duty, the only dignified course that remains—indeed, the only thing that could possibly be done under the circumstances—is to cease to advise on any matter. That question, I hope, is cleared up.

Mr. HOCKEN: Having regard to the state of affairs in which we find ourselves now, does the right hon. gentleman not consider that he should have co-operated with his successor in carrying on the business of the House to a conclusion?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I never anticipated having a successor who would attempt to carry on under the present conditions. If I believed that a dissolution was unavoidable it was my duty so to advise His Excellency, and I certainly never would have offered that advice had I felt that as at present constituted parliament could function with dignity and with honour to itself.

From the day this session began until the moment I tendered my resignation to His Excellency, hon. gentlemen opposite, who were then on this side of the House, levelled against me and my colleagues the charge that we were co-operating with the Progressive group and that the Liberal party and that group were part and parcel of one organization working together—as though there were something wholly improper in a relationship of that kind. They spoke of our alliance as an unholy, unnatural alliance, as something discreditable to the Liberal party and to the Progressive group, and they said that that alliance should be ended. Then when we saw it ending through the intrigue that was going on in the two houses of parliament, when we saw—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: —when we saw conditions had come—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Order nothing. I repeat what I have said.

Mr. MANION: I rise to a point of order, Mr. Chairman. I submit it is against the rules of this House for any hon. member to pass severe strictures upon the other House. The right hon. gentleman has just used the word "intrigue" in regard to both Houses. I submit he should be made to retract it.

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend is very sensitive in the matter of strictures.

Mr. MANION: I want a ruling from the Chair.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Will my hon. friend allow me a chance to make a reply?

Mr. MANION: Make your reply to the Chair.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am doing so. Mr. Chairman, may I say that my hon. friend is very sensitive with respect to strictures. Does he object to my having used the word "stricture" against the other House? May I quickly and immediately take back that expression—if I used it.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It so happens, however, that it was not "stricture" that I used, but "intrigue". It just shows how excited my hon. friends opposite are that they did not notice what I had said. May I say, Mr. Chairman, that I had not the slightest desire to reflect upon the other House. It is this House I am talking about.

Mr. MANION: You are talking a long time.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes, and I tell my hon. friend that I am going to talk a very much longer time. If hon. gentlemen opposite think they are going to run off to the country with the treasury under conditions such as this, they are very much mistaken. Conditions have very much changed in this country from what they were in days preceding confederation if a Tory government formed, as this government is, of so-called ministers, not one of whom has taken the oath of office, can come into the House of Commons and, through the questionable support that they have secured by the methods that they have adopted, vote themselves the supplies necessary to carry on all the departments of government—

An hon. MEMBER: You are thinking of '37.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes, I am thinking of '37, and I tell my hon. friend that I was never prouder in my life than to have the privilege of standing in this parliament to-night and on behalf of British parliamentary institutions denouncing the irresponsible government of his party. Do hon. gentlemen opposite advocate that we shall go back to a condition of affairs in Canada worse than anything that existed in 1837?

An hon. MEMBER: We have had it for the last eight months.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: 1837 was bad enough, but it was not a circumstance on the present condition of affairs. If at the instance of one individual a prime minister can be put into office and with a ministry which is not yet formed be permitted to vote all the supplies necessary to carry on the government of Canada for a year, we have reached a condition in this country that threatens constitutional liberty, freedom and right in all parts of the world.

Mr. LADNER: Mr. Chairman—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Sit down.

The CHAIRMAN: Order.

Mr. LADNER: Will the right hon. gentleman state frankly and directly to the House who that individual is? Has he the courage to do so?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The courage to do what?

Mr. LADNER: To state the individual to whom he has referred in the last sentence of his remarks?

Mr. CANNON: That is Arthur Meighen. Didn't you understand?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I said, and I repeat it, that a prime minister does not come into office by virtue of the will or the wish of any individual. A prime minister comes into office by virtue of having the confidence of the people's representatives in the House of Commons.

Mr. LADNER: Will the right hon. gentleman for once answer a question directly?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Sit down.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I repeat what I have said.

Mr. LADNER: You are saying it differently now.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: What did I say before?

An hon. MEMBER: Nothing.

Mr. LADNER: I am not afraid to repeat what he said. The right hon. gentleman stated that at the instance of one individual a government was able to be placed in power and to vote to themselves supplies for a year, and then he proceeded in a somewhat bumptious manner to describe the iniquities which might follow. His reflection was upon a person whom he must know he could not refer to, and whom he is ashamed to name.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I beg my hon. friend's pardon. I ask him, how does the present Prime Minister of Canada come to be in office?

Mr. LADNER: By a proper constitutional course.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: What is the court?

Mr. LADNER: Course. Owing to the lack of confidence of the majority of the members of the House of Commons, due to the dereliction of duty of the former government.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend is entirely mistaken. The government of which I had the honour to be the head never met with defeat from the day that it came into office to the day that it resigned.

Mr. BURY: Mr. Chairman—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order. Sit down.

The CHAIRMAN: Order.

Mr. BURY: The right hon. leader of the opposition said a minute ago that the Prime Minister at the instance of one individual was allowed to get into power.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No, no.

Mr. BURY: He did.

An hon. MEMBER: Listen again. You are dreaming.

Mr. BURY: May I ask the right hon. leader of the opposition, who was the individual?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I repeat what I have said. The Prime Minister is in office to-day—

Mr. BURY: At the instance of one individual.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes, that is correct.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Who?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If hon. gentlemen opposite will not get so excited—

An hon. MEMBER: Name the individual.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I say that the individual to whom I refer has, I believe, acted according to his conscience, honestly, sincerely, truly. I have nothing disrespectful to say of him in any particular. I have the greatest admiration for him.

Mr. BURY: Mr. Chairman, I rise to a point of order.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Sit down.

Mr. BURY: The right hon. leader of the opposition is referring to the action of His Excellency, and I do not think he has any right to discuss it.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend was seeking to have me name an individual, and I am replying. The rules of this House do not say that individuals cannot be named; the rules say that individuals in certain positions cannot be spoken of disrespectfully. May I say that the individual of whom I am speaking is a gentleman for whom I have the greatest regard it is possible for one man to have for another. The individual of whom I am speaking is a gentleman for whom I have the greatest affection possible, and may I say further that the individual of whom I am speaking is, I believe, a gentleman who would never commit an act of any kind which he did not think right and proper in every particular. Let me make that clear. Hon. gentlemen opposite cannot bring his name or office into this discussion.

Mr. CLARK: Who is doing it?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am speaking of myself as to the advice I tendered as Prime Minister.

An hon. MEMBER: But you are not.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: In order that there may be no misrepresentation of the position, I ask any one on the other side of the House to stand up and tell hon. members, in the presence of those who have heard me speak, of one single utterance of mine which has been disrespectful in any particular in respect to the Governor General.

Mr. BURY: The objection of some of us on this side of the House is that the right hon. leader of the opposition has no right to discuss the conduct of His Excellency.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I have made no reference to the conduct of His Excellency I would like to know when we arrived at the time in the affairs of this country, when the constitutionality of any act of any governor general cannot be discussed. I am discussing the constitutionality of a course of procedure, and nothing more. I would not for one moment be discussing the particular phase of this question if it did not lie at the root of the whole question of where power comes from. I ask my hon. friends opposite: Do they think the power of a prime minister is derived from above or that it comes from the people through their representatives in parliament, who extend their confidence to a ministry that is able to retain the confidence of the House? Now, I just want to say this. I tendered certain advice, which was declined.

An hon. MEMBER: You have told us that ten times already.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I know, and I am going to state it many more times. But I want to tell my hon. friends that what the country is witnessing at this present moment—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: —is the best evidence of the fact that the advice tendered was sound, and I am glad to hear hon. gentlemen opposite applaud. Now, in order to avoid any mistake may I say something which I tried to say two or three times this afternoon when I was interrupted, but which I think I am free to say now? In being declined the right of dissolution I believe I was declined that right because His Excellency had the honest belief that some other member of this House could be found who as prime minister could carry on the business of government in this country in the way it should be carried on, befitting the dignity and honour of parliament, and which would therefore avoid the necessity of a general election.

An hon. MEMBER: It is being carried on.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Just a moment. I am prepared to say this, that until I find out just whether or not it is going to be possible for any individual chosen from the ranks of hon. gentlemen opposite to carry on the business of the country in the manner the country will think right and proper, having regard to the honour and dignity of parliament; and until I see what action His Excellency takes in those circumstances, for my part I am quite prepared to withhold any kind of expression of view as to the constitutionality of the action taken in not accepting my advice. I have no objection that the right hon. gentleman who is to-day Prime Minister of Canada should be given his chance, if you wish to call it such, to carry on the business of this country at present. I do say, however, that when he took the responsibility of His Excellency's refusal to grant a dissolution he put himself under the necessity of making very clear to this country that in doing so he was capable of doing all that it involved, and which was that he would be able to conduct the affairs of this country in this parliament in a manner, as I have already said, befitting the honour and dignity of the venerable institution of parliament. If he is unable to do that, it is then his duty to return to His Excellency and tell His Excellency that he has not been able to carry out his undertaking. Then, when the present Prime Minister of this country returns to His Excellency and informs His Excellency that he finds it impossible to carry on the business of the country in the manner I have already described; that he regrets to find that his experience has been similar to mine, I will wait and see what His Excellency does before I judge of the motive which governed with respect to the non-acceptance of the advice which I tendered and which motive up to this moment I have never questioned.

May I say this, that I believe it has been represented to His Excellency by the present Prime Minister that he is able to carry on the business of this House in a manner which is dignified and proper. He could not possibly be Prime Minister to-day on any other score; he must have told His Excellency that, or His Excellency would never have asked him to be Prime Minister. But having said that to the crown representative he owes it to the honour of the crown to implement his words, and I say it is not to the honour of the crown that he should seek to put into the seats of the ministry a group of gentlemen not one of whom has taken any oath of office, and call that the responsible ministry which is to advise His Excellency the Governor General with respect to all the affairs of this country. I say I cannot think of any act more irresponsible or unconstitutional than that. When the present Prime Minister went to His Excellency and said, as he must have said, "I am prepared to take the responsibility of Your Excellency having refused dissolution to Mr. King", he had to pledge himself to His Excellency by his word that he was able to carry on where I was unable to carry on. Now let me repeat that. If I had believed that the present Prime Minister could do anything of the kind I would have so advised His Excellency, and would have been very glad to have had His Excellency send for my right hon. friend and give him a chance.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): May I ask a question?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Certainly.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): When the right hon. gentleman was refused the right to dissolve parliament, was he requested to carry on until the ministry could be formed?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No. I want to say to my hon. friend that I was not so requested, and that is the point I was trying to make to my hon. friend from St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan).

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Is not that the constitutional practice in Great Britain?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I make this clear to my hon. friend? It depends entirely upon the nature of the advice tendered. The advice I tendered was not that the present Prime Minister should be sent for; I could not honestly advise His Excellency to send for the right hon. gentleman.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Why?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Because throughout this parliament, from the day the members of this House were elected until the moment I went to His Excellency, I was the only one who had the confidence of this House, and having regard to the issue on which hon. members were returned had a right to believe I was the only one able to retain that confidence.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh!

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Hon. gentlemen opposite may laugh, but I would ask them to look over the division lists.

Mr. CAHAN: Did the former Prime Minister, the right hon. gentleman representing Prince Albert, tender his resignation to His Excellency because he thought he had lost the confidence of this House, or was it because he had lost confidence in himself?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I can tell my hon. friend that it was not either, but that he had come to the conclusion that there was not any human being living who could command the confidence of this House at this time in a manner that would do credit to the administration of affairs in this country. That was the conclusion I had come to.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Is it not true that on a similar occasion in Great Britain, when the Ramsay MacDonald government was faced with a situation somewhat similar, but not quite, Mr. MacDonald did not resign, but he was requested by the king to carry on until Mr. Baldwin formed his administration? And was not that possible in this case?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The parallel that my hon. friend suggests was not at the beginning of the MacDonald administration, but at the close. Mr. Ramsay MacDonald went to His Majesty the King and asked for a dissolution after he had been in office only part of one session, and he got a dissolution. My position, and I take it in the interest of this country, as a self-governing Dominion, is that the Prime Minister of Canada advising His Excellency the Governor General is in precisely the same position as the Prime Minister of England advising His Majesty the King. May I say to my hon. friend who has just spoken that any other theory of government reduces this Dominion of Canada from the status of a self-governing Dominion to the status of a crown colony. What has been the evolution of our political institutions?

An hon. MEMBER: Are we going to have a lot more?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes, you are going to have a lot more. Hon. gentlemen opposite need a good deal of education in the matter of political freedom. I want to make clear the principles for which I have been standing. What is the position of a crown colony? Governors go out from Britain with instructions from the Colonial Office, and they exercise authority which is more or less discretionary with themselves. They call upon individuals to become members of their councils; they have the appointing to office, and the dismissing from office in certain cases. That was the condition we were in in parts of Canada about a century ago. But since that time there has been a political evolution of considerable proportions in all parts of the British Empire, and what to-day are known as the self-governing Dominions are to my mind, in precisely the same position in the management of their own domestic affairs as is the government of Great Britain with respect to its domestic affairs.

An hon. MEMBER: We all know that.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No, you don't know it, or you would not be sitting where you are. The difference between a crown colony and a self-governing Dominion is that the Governor General of a self-governing Dominion acts upon the advice of his responsible ministers. May I say this, Mr. Chairman: For one hundred years in Great Britain there is not a single instance of a Prime Minister having asked for a dissolution and having been refused it. May I add this further, that since this Dominion was formed, since confederation in 1867, there is not a single instance where a Prime Minister has advised a dissolution and has been refused it. Is there then no constitutional issue at stake?

Mr. CLARK: We have never had a usurper before.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: You have certainly got one now in the seat of the Prime Minister, and one who is more or less of an expert as a usurper. I submit, Mr. Chairman, that the issue that we are face to face with at the present time is one which affects all parts of the British Empire, and it is amongst other reasons because of my belief in and my love for the British Empire that I take the stand that I do in this matter. It is only by a recognition of the fact that the British Empire rests upon the corner stone of responsible self-government in each of the Dominions and in the Mother Country that this great empire can endure; and that is why I feel we are called upon at this time to see that the principle of responsible self-government is fully carried out. I say, Mr. Chairman, that at this time we have at heart the interests not only of Canada, but of South Africa, of Australia, of New Zealand, of Newfoundland, of the Irish Free State, of India, yes, and of the British Isles themselves.

Mr. CANTLEY: The United States too.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No, not the United States. That shows again how ignorant my hon. friend is. The United States have an entirely different form of government, and a little study of comparative institutions would not do my hon. friend opposite any harm. Mr. Chairman, I do not wish to take up very much more time—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go on.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes, I will go on. I want to make this position clear, so that there can be no mistake as to my attitude in relation to His Excellency the Governor General and the advice which I have tendered. I ask hon. members to listen very carefully to what I am now saying.

I believe that His Excellency the Governor General sincerely believed that the present Prime Minister would be able to carry on the government of this country in a manner befitting and in accordance with British traditions, in a manner which would accord with the recognized principles of responsible government; and believing that, His Excellency undoubtedly asked the present Prime Minister whether he was prepared to assume office on those conditions. Now if the right hon. gentleman can demonstrate to the country, if he has demonstrated to this House and this parliament, that he is able to do that, after what we have seen and are witnessing in this so-called ministry presented to us to-night, then I say that His Excellency's judgment in the matter has been sound and right, and there is no criticism to offer. But I do say this, that if—and this is subject to something further I shall have to say—if by any chance it should appear that we have another day of the character we have had to-day, when the government can only be carried on by ministers not one of whom has taken an oath of office, then I think it would be time for His Excellency to ask himself the question whether the right hon. gentleman who assumed to carry on this House has carried out his undertaking. If he has not carried it out, then, as I have already said, it is the duty of the present Prime Minister not to wait until His Excellency is obliged to send for him but to return to His Excellency the Governor General and relieve His Excellency of the tremendous responsibility which he is carrying at this hour. I say that it is the duty of the right hon. the Prime Minister at this moment to lose no time in returning to His Excellency the Governor General and telling His Excellency that he has attempted to carry on but that he finds he is confronted with a situation, parliament being in session, which does not allow him to carry on in a manner which will help to maintain respect and regard for parliamentary institutions, and that therefore he asks to be relieved of tendering to His Excellency further advice. It will then be for His Excellency to say what course he will take. Until His Excellency has had that opportunity, and until I see what course His Excellency takes as a consequence of it, I for one do not intend to offer any criticism whatever of the constitutionality of the course taken up to the present time. I do not think I can make my position clearer than that.

Now, may I return again to the situation with which we are confronted? I asked hon. gentlemen opposite a moment ago whether any of them had taken the oath of office. Not one has. I asked them how they were appointed? They said they were all appointed by order in council. Now look at the situation: We have a Prime Minister who has taken an oath. I ask hon. members to remember this—the Prime Minister has taken an oath. He has not given a mere promise or undertaking to do something, but has taken a solemn oath which relates to the crown itself, with all that pertains to the sacredness of parliamentary institutions. That oath obliges him to see that the crown's name in all particulars is protected; that the crown or its representative shall not by any act of his be brought into public discussion. May I say that is only through the act of the present Prime Minister that any mention has come to be made of His Excellency the Governor General at the present time—only through his act. He has taken his oath to see that the government of this country is carried on in a manner which will not reflect upon the crown and all that the crown stands for in conserving the liberties and freedom of the people under responsible government. Now, I shall give the Prime Minister the opportunity to-night of thinking over the position in which he has placed His Excellency the Governor General, over the position in which he has placed His Majesty's representative in this country, over the position in which he has placed the King himself,—because he is acting as one who is advising the crown through its representative—and I say to him that if he will read my words in the morning, if perchance he cannot hear them now, he should consider very carefully how much longer he is going to keep His Excellency in the position of great suspense which he must be in at the present time with respect to whether or not his act has been constitutional or justified, and for what he does in that regard the present Prime Minister will be judged by the people of this country and by posterity itself.

Now that right hon. gentleman, having taken the oath of office, proceeds to appoint his ministry. May I again recall to hon. gentlemen opposite what I said a moment ago about the manner in which orders in council are passed and what is essential in that regard. Four members of the cabinet are supposed to constitute a quorum. How was the first order in council passed, appointing hon. gentlemen opposite? I suppose the hon. gentleman who is leading the House at the moment was appointed by the first order in council. Therefore I ask my hon. friend who were present at the cabinet meeting when he was appointed? What was the quorum that enabled the Prime Minister to pass an order in council and present it to His Excellency? I say that if the Prime Minister of this country went to His Excellency the Governor General with an order in his hand appointing certain gentlemen opposite ministers of state or acting ministers of state, when there was only himself to sit in council and pass it, and asked His Excellency to sign that order, he committed the most autocratic and unconstitutional act that any individual in this country could commit.

Mr. MANION: By what right does the leader of the opposition charge the right hon. the Prime Minister with such an act as he is practically accusing him of at the moment?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I was only taking the words of hon. gentlemen opposite.

Mr. MANION: They did not say anything of the sort.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes, they say they were appointed by order in council.

Mr. MANION: The hon. gentleman has been told that there were at least six ministers present when the orders were passed.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Just let us get at the truth of the whole matter. Let my hon. friend repeat his statement.

Mr. MANION: I do not intend to repeat anything.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Do not let there be any mistake. What was said was that my hon friend was one of a number of six who had been appointed to the Privy Council. I asked him when they were appointed privy councillors, and with the exception of one they were all appointed even before the late government came into office; the one remaining has been appointed since we went out.

Mr. MANION: Once a privy councillor always a privy councillor.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The fact that one was formerly a privy councillor does not give him the right to go into the Privy Council and do what he pleases with the affairs of the state. I tell my hon. friend that these gentlemen to my right and left are privy councillors. If his doctrine is correct, we have just as much authority as hon. gentlemen opposite to walk into the Privy Council and take our seats.

Mr. MANION: Not unless you are invited.

Mr. GUTHRIE: You would have a right to go there if you were summoned.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes, my hon. friend was summoned, but was it as a minister of the crown? We are now trying to discover by what authority hon. gentlemen opposite come before this House and seek to put through estimates.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Give me about five minutes and I will show you.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend will have the opportunity to do that a little later. What I wish to point out is this: Hon. members opposite say that they are acting as ministers by virtue of orders in council which were passed. They sit in their seats as acting ministers and it is as acting ministers that they come before us. But I say that so far as ministers are concerned the first acting minister could only have been appointed by order in council, if he was so appointed, by an order which the Prime Minister, sitting alone in state, put through.

Mr. MANION: Why could he not do that? I ask my hon. friend a question: Why could not the right hon. the Prime Minister call in any privy councillors whom he chose so long as they had been sworn as privy councillors as we all have been? Why could he not call them in and pass his orders in council?

Mr. CAHAN: The constitution of the country specifically provides for that.

Mr. PARENT: Where do you find that?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I have in my hand, and I will ask the House to notice it, an order in council which my hon. friend opposite has just sent me, I mean the hon. gentleman who is leading the House. This order is P.C. 1044. I ask the House to look at this P.C. 1044, which is certified to be a true copy of a minute of a committee of the Privy Council approved by His Excellency the Governor General, on the 29th June, 1926. The order in council reads:

> The committee of the Privy Council, on the recommendation of the Right Honourable Arthur Meighen, the Prime Minister, advise that the Honourable Sir Henry L. Drayton, a member of the King's Privy Council for Canada be Acting Minister of Finance and Acting Minister of Railways and Canals.
> E. J. LEMAIRE,
> Clerk of the Privy Council.

That was quite evidently the first order that was passed. When that order was passed it must have been presented to council by the Prime Minister and he had not seated around him any colleague who had taken the oath of office—any colleague who was a minister—not one; yet he goes to His Excellency the Governor General with this order and advises His Excellency to sign it, so that he can have a leader in the House. Did hon. members ever hear of a procedure of the kind being called constitutional?

Then we have P.C. No. 1047. There are two or three orders between these. I would like my hon. friend to produce them tomorrow, so that we can see what they are; I will ask him to lay on the table orders in council 1045 and 1046. This order in council No. 1047, reads:

The committee of the Privy Council on the recommendation of the Right Hon. Arthur Meighen, the Prime Minister, advise that—

The Hon. R. J. Manion, a member of the King's Privy Council for Canada be acting Minister of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment and Acting Minister in charge of the Department of Health, Acting Postmaster General, Immigration and Colonization, and Labour;

That the hon. Sir George Perley, a member of the King's Privy Council for Canada, be Acting Secretary of State and Acting Minister of Public Works;

That the hon. William Anderson Black, a member of the King's Privy Council for Canada, be Acting Minister of Marine and Fisheries.

E. J. LEMAIRE,
Clerk of the Privy Council.

Look at the spectacle. Here you have all these gentlemen being made acting ministers, and how have they been made acting ministers? By themselves, all sitting there around one table, not one of them sworn to office. Look at the procedure. The Prime Minister gets his appointment, takes his oath, walks into the council room, sits down at the head of the table all alone, and says, "I must begin to form a government."

Mr. MANION: Why all alone?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Because he is the only one who has a right to go there to discharge an executive act.

Mr. MANION: Have not all the privy councillors a right to go into the council chamber?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No.

Mr. MANION: They are summoned by the Prime Minister.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The minister will hear more of the legal aspect of this to-morrow. I want to present the case to-night sufficiently to enable His Excellency to learn through the one who has assumed responsibility to advise him just what is being done in this parliament, so that the one who to-day pretends to act as Prime Minister will have an opportunity to think of the seriousness of the situation into which he is bringing both himself and the crown's representatives.

I have demonstrated how these gentlemen found their way back into the House of Commons and began to vote themselves supplies. Do you think, Mr. Chairman, after all the struggle there has been through the years to bring about a condition where the ministry of the day will be responsible to parliament and through parliament to the people, that any parliament worthy of such a name can permit this kind of conduct to go unchallenged and uncensured? If this be permitted to pass, we may have one Prime Minister exercising authority in this extraordinary manner to-day, and who may we not have attempting to exercise it another year hence, or two or three years or twenty years hence? I ask hon. gentlemen to recall the fact that all the acts of this parliament that are countenanced become precedents for some future occasion, and if we in 1926 permit one gentleman, who is asked by His Excellency whether he will undertake a great trust and who says to His Excellency that he is prepared to undertake it and can undertake it —if we permit him to proceed as was done in this case, what is certain to result? If simply to assume office and promise to tender advice is all that is needed in the way of undertaking to enable one gentleman to surround himself by a number of others and to give them positions and powers as ministers of the crown, albeit only acting ministers, and if these gentlemen are permitted to draw from the treasury the millions of dollars they are asking us to vote to-night and have the right to carry on the government of the country for another year at least, what guarantee have we of future liberty and freedom in this country?

I hope I have said enough; but I will say in conclusion that I think the only thing befitting the dignity and the honour of the House at the moment is that the hon. member opposite who is leading the House should not attempt to proceed further with the putting through of any supply, but that I should move now that the House adjourn in order that His Excellency through his adviser may have an opportunity to take account of to-day's proceedings. I would first move that the chairman do now leave the chair.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The hon. member moved that the House adjourn, and it is not in order.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: I have only a few words to say.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The motion is not debatable.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: I want to say before the motion is put—

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It is not debatable.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: I do not think the right hon. member, notwithstanding his long speech, wishes to be unfair in this matter. I simply want to say, regarding the appointments which have been made and which the right hon. gentleman criticized, that I am informed by Mr. Lemaire, the clerk of the Privy Council, that they were made in the same way exactly as has been the custom for years, and as has been done in the case of other ministers without portfolio. If the right hon. member will cast his mind back he will remember that he himself appointed ministers without portfolio, and that they were appointed by being summoned by the Prime Minister, and that he had cases himself where a minister without portfolio administered a department of government. I am quite sure he will remember that himself. As for saying that a minister without portfolio cannot properly represent a department unless there is an actual minister of it, I know myself of cases where, after the death of a minister, the department was for some time administered by a minister without portfolio, although there was no actual minister of the department at the time. I myself administered the Department of Public Works for some time under those conditions. I simply wanted the right hon. gentleman to understand that the procedure in this case is exactly the same as that followed for years.

When it comes to the point the right hon. gentleman makes of the Prime Minister sitting in state, all alone, and passing an order in council, I wish to bring to mind what happened in his own case when he was called by the Governor General to be Prime Minister. What happened was, I think, that he selected the men who were going to be his colleagues. They were sworn in by the Governor General; then they went back to the council chamber, sat down and passed an order appointing themselves. My right hon. friend tries to make out that the present Prime Minister could not be appointed by order in council because he was all alone. How was the leader of the opposition appointed Prime Minister? He was appointed Prime Minister by order in council after the cabinet got back and appointed him.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend has been courteous in his presentation of the statement regarding the manner in which the cabinet of which I had the honour to be the leader was formed. He said that the Prime Minister and his colleagues in that cabinet took the oath of office. That is precisely what hon. gentlemen opposite have not done. Not one member of the cabinet of which I was the head walked into the council chamber until he had taken the oath of office. There are two oaths to be taken before any hon. gentleman has the right to administer the affairs of a department: he must first take the oath of a privy councillor and then the oath of minister of the particular department to which he may be assigned. Hon. gentlemen will see that, with big interests concerned—

Mr. CHAPLIN (Lincoln): Rockefeller.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: There is not a single contract signed by hon. gentlemen opposite to-day which will stand for an hour in a court of law. Are we going to allow the business of the country—the railways, the banks, other financial institutions and such other institutions such as the wheat pool, and the grain exchange, about which we have been hearing so much during the last few days—are we going to allow these big interests to be imperilled, in matters in which they are vitally concerned, because of the fact that contracts signed from day to day in the name of the crown are signed by persons not one of whom are ministers who have taken the oath of office which entitles them to sign in His Majesty's name? Was it, Mr. Chairman, ever intended that ministers should act on behalf of and in the name of the crown without having taken an oath of office?

Mr. MANION: We are not king's ministers; we are acting.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Not king's ministers? You never said a truer word. And Mr. Chairman—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hurrah!

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Mr. Chairman—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hurrah!

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I say—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hurrah!

Mr. LAPOINTE: That will not expedite the session.

Mr. MANION: We can stay as long as you can.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I say that when we have from the lips of a member of the cabinet the statement that he and his colleagues are not king's ministers it is time His Excellency the Governor General sent for the present Prime Minister and asked the question, who are the responsible ministers by whom through you, I am being advised? Until that question is asked, I for one propose to see that this parliament if I can effect it, shall not be permitted to vote another dollar of supply. I move that the chairman leave the chair.

The CHAIRMAN: Mr. Mackenzie King moves that the chairman leave the chair. Those in favour of the motion will rise.

Yeas: 80.

Mr. BELL (Hamilton): Mr. Chairman, I have seen two hon. gentlemen opposite voting who I am sure are paired. One hon. gentleman behind the ex-Minister of Customs (Mr. Boivin) is paired to my knowledge.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I would suggest that the whips confer and that we start all over again.

Mr. BOYS: I do not want to make any trouble, but we should understand just where we are. I am glad to see the Liberal whip in his place because I think he will agree with me that the terms of the signed lists of pairs which both he and I possess include votes in committee as well as in the House.

Mr. CASGRAIN: I agree with the hon. member.

Mr. BOYS: But hon. gentlemen opposite have voted whose signed pairs I have in my possession.

Mr. LAPOINTE: We will start all over again.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Your men have been counted; others have come in since.

Mr. LAPOINTE: They did so honestly.

Motion (Mr. Mackenzie King) negatived: Yeas, 80; nays, 101.

An hon. MEMBER: The same number.

The CHAIRMAN: I declare the motion lost.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Mr. Chairman, the speech that has just been delivered by the right hon. leader of the opposition is one of the most eloquent and convincing that I have ever listened to in my life, and the Liberal party may well be proud of its leader. My reason for voting as I did was because I do not believe in the policy of refusing to opponents the right of reply. That is all I wish to give them. I am satisfied that they shall have the right to adjourn the debate, and I suggest to them in all courtesy that as the hour is late—and I have voted with them on this occasion as have several of my colleagues for exactly the same purpose—they adjourn the debate. We will listen to their reply to-morrow as attentively as we have to what was said by the opposition to-night.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I say to my hon. friend at once that if I thought I was being guilty of any discourtesy to hon. gentlemen opposite I would not have made the motion.

Mr. MANION: That was the purpose.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No. In the circumstances it seemed fitting to me that we should not continue the proceedings.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I accept the right hon. gentleman's statement.

Mr. STEVENS: Mr. Chairman, I think it is only due to my right hon. leader that I should review the situation in a very few sentences. By the act of the ex-Prime Minister the position of leader of the government was vacated. His Excellency then called in the Right Hon. Arthur Meighen to form a government. He had to consider whether he would ask the House to adjourn for a few weeks in order to allow him time to form a ministry and meet the House, or whether in view of the dying hours of the session, admitted by all, it would not be advisable to ask the House to allow the legislation on the order paper to pass, together with the estimates, and prorogue parliament. In doing that he stated to the House—in what I think was a courteous message delivered by my hon. friend who is leading the House in his name, a message presented within twenty-four hours after his Excellency had requested the right hon. gentleman to form a ministry—the situation, and closed with these words:

> So soon as prorogation takes effect Mr. Meighen will immediately address himself to the task of constituting a government in the method established by custom.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: You cannot do that while the House is in session.

Mr. STEVENS:

> The present plan is merely to meet an unusual, if not unprecedented, situation.

Had the House at that time or on two subsequent occasions rejected the Prime Minister's suggestion, it would have made a great difference. Last night there was offered a resolution from the opposition benches which was a challenge to the government's authority. The House sustained the government on that occasion by a majority of 12 and subsequently by a majority of 10. To-day we met the House, and the right hon. gentleman himself, leading the opposition, offered a direct vote of want of confidence in the government. That resolution was debated at length and was finally rejected by a majority of 7.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I submit that my right hon. friend is going beyond his right of criticism when he interprets the opinion of the House. I say the House can only interpret its opinion by its registered vote, and by its registered vote up to this minute the House has sustained the government, admittedly, as frankly stated in the written message from the Prime Minister himself, merely a temporary government formed for the purpose of carrying on the business of this House and finishing it in order to give the Prime Minister time to form a permanent ministry. I submit that the decision of the House in these votes shows that the Prime Minister of Canada enjoys the confidence of this House to that extent.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Constitutionally, would it not have been much more proper if the then existing ministry had continued to wind up the business of the session—

Mr. MANION: But they refused.

Mr. LAPOINTE: They did not refuse; they were not called upon.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): —instead of my hon. friends opposite undertaking to do so?

Mr. STEVENS: My hon. friend is absolutely right. I am not going to offer what I am about to say in criticism of the ex-Prime Minister. It will be recalled that when he tendered his resignation—most unexpectedly I think to us all so far as the moment was concerned—the suggestion was made by my right hon. leader that under the extraordinary circumstances a conference would be advisable between the right hon. gentleman now leading the opposition and himself as to the best method of carrying on the business of the House with the least inconvenience to all members concerned. Through a difference of opinion between the right hon. gentleman that offer was not accepted. But I wish to draw to the attention of hon. gentlemen what I think will convince them that our procedure has been quite constitutional in every respect. The present Prime Minister having presented his address to the House, and having been sustained in these two votes, is, I submit, quite entitled to carry on. The right hon. leader of the opposition calls in question the orders in council appointing the acting ministers. This procedure was carefully considered by the law officers of the crown and by those who advise the ministers in these matters, and every constitutional requirement was observed.

One other thing I desire to say, His Excellency may call into council others besides privy councillors, and then swear them in but in this case it was his right to call in certain persons. He called on the Right Hon. Arthur Meighen, then leader of the opposition, to form a government. That was one call. Certain other privy councillors already sworn in were then called into council for the purpose of doing the very things which constitutionally it was proper for a privy councillor to do. The outcome of that is the present government, admittedly carrying on temporarily, frankly so stated to the House and well known and thoroughly understood by the country. We are merely asking that the business of a session admittedly drawing to a close, most of which—

Mr. CAHILL: Just beginning.

Mr. STEVENS: I am really serious in this, and I do not wish to burlesque it. I say this long, arduous, tedious session is admittedly drawing to a close; the business is completed with the exception of one or two non-contentious bills and a portion of the estimates. We say this: We are ready to accept the estimates as already prepared; we will carry out the mandate of the House in the expenditure of these moneys with one reservation, that we purpose to be as economical as possible in the administration of these estimates, and we will try to bring the business of the House to a close. That is all we are asking at present. I admit that it is quite within the right of hon. gentlemen opposite, and quite within the right of my right hon. friend, to challenge the government whenever they see fit. But I do call into question the logic or fairness of his argument when he seeks to lead the House to believe that there was something unconstitutional in the act either of His Excellency or of the present Prime Minister.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I have a right to reply, I think.

Mr. CAHAN: I have the floor, I believe

The CHAIRMAN: Did you wish to ask a question?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I wanted to reply to a point raised by my hon. friend.

Mr. CAHAN: I am only going to take a few moments. The right hon. leader of the opposition has detailed to us the circumstances under which he offered the resignation of himself and his colleagues to His Excellency the Governor General, and he has stated very clearly that in offering his resignation he did not advise His Excellency to call upon any member of this House to form an administration. The reason he did not so advise His Excellency was that he did not believe any member of this House to be competent to fill that high office, with the exception of himself. He left His Excellency the Governor General without advice; he left the country without a government except as represented by His Excellency the Governor General. There may be no interregnum in the government of a country such as this, with a constitution such as we possess, and therefore His Excellency had to exercise his own discretion in calling upon a member of this House to form an administration, and, in the exercise of that discretion, he called upon the then leader of the opposition.

Now, what are the prerogatives of His Excellency, and who are to advise him under the constitution of the country? I read section 11 of the British North America Act, and I cite it now so that hon. gentlemen may give it their attention before we again meet to-morrow. Section 11 says:

> There shall be a council to aid and advise the government of Canada, to be styled the Queen's Privy Council for Canada; and the persons who are to be members of that council shall be from time to time chosen and summoned by the Governor General and sworn in as Privy Councillors, and members thereof may be from time to time removed by the Governor General.

Therefore the Governor General, left without advice, even if there were no privy councillor living in Canada, would have the right to appoint privy councillors to advise him, but he also had the right to ask any existing privy councillors to come in and advise him in a crisis such as confronted him when the then Prime Minister of this country tendered his resignation and insisted upon its immediate acceptance.

Mr. POULIOT: May I ask a question?

Mr. CAHAN: I am not answering questions just now. Then section 12 of the British North America Act provides:

> All powers, authorities and functions which under any act of the parliament of Great Britain, or of the parliament of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, or of the legislature of Upper Canada, Lower Canada, Canada, Nova Scotia or New Brunswick, are at the Union vested in or exerciseable by the respective Governors or Lieutenant-Governors of those provinces, with the advice, or with the advice and consent, of the respective executive councils thereof, or in conjunction with those councils, or with any number of members thereof, or by those Governors or Lieutenant-Governors individually, shall, as far as the same continue in existence and capable of being exercised after the Union in relation to the government of Canada, be vested in and exerciseable by the Governor General, with the advice or with the advice and consent of or in conjunction with the Queen's Privy Council for Canada, or any members thereof, or by the Governor-General individually, as the case requires. . .

So if some calamity had wiped out every privy councillor in Canada or had taken away the life of every member of the existing cabinet, under this constitution His Excellency had the right there and then to appoint new privy councillors, if he saw fit, to assemble and advise him in such a crisis, in order that the country might not be left without a government. But according to the statement made here to-night, His Excellency, being left without official advisers, by reason of the resignation of the present right hon. leader of the opposition, called in a certain number —I do not know how many—of privy councillors, who had previously taken the oath of office and who had continued to be members of the Privy Council, and asked for their advice. He also had with him the present Prime Minister, who is not now a member of this House, whom he had selected and appointed as Prime Minister, and who had been nominated to occupy the portfolios of Minister of External Affairs and President of the Privy Council. The Governor General had a perfect right to take the advice of the Prime Minister, whom he had selected, as to what members of the Privy Council of Canada, who are numerous, should be called in to form a committee of the Privy Council for the purpose of attending to these matters of administration which demanded immediate attention. So they assembled and proceeded correctly under the constitution, and there was no other alternative than to take the measures which were taken by them to give the country a temporary government. The right hon. leader of the opposition disclosed by his speech to-night, and it is a fair criticism to say that he desired to force this parliament into dissolution, that he took the means that he did at the time in order to force a dissolution of parliament, which His Excellency in the exercise of his discretion refused to grant to him.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am told that my hon. friend said I had refused to carry on.

Mr. CAHAN: I was not discussing that at present.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: But my hon. friend discussed it before.

Mr. CAHAN: When I asked the hon. gentleman a question about an hour ago.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I did not hear it, and I want to say—

Mr. CAHAN: You answered it then.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I did not refuse to carry on. May I say further that after tendering my resignation I distinctly stated to His Excellency, and stated it in writing, that I was prepared, if His Excellency so desired and should ask me, to keep my resignation in abeyance until he had had the opportunity to take such further steps as he might wish to take.

Mr. CAHAN: I do not wish to raise the question, but unfortunately His Excellency cannot be present to give his testimony as to what took place.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Fortunately I have a copy of the letter in which I tendered my resignation. May I say to my hon. friend that when I spoke first to His Excellency on the matter of resignation, it was on Saturday. I had several interviews with him before the final resignation was accepted.

Mr. CAHILL: I rise to a point of order, Mr. Chairman, and it is that the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George, in using the language he did, that it was unfortunate His Excellency could not be present to give his evidence, was directly challenging the integrity of the leader of the opposition.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I say to my hon. friend that I do not think His Excellency will differ in any particular from anything I have said this evening?

An hon. MEMBER: Take it back.

Mr. MACDONALD (Antigonish): My hon. friend from St. Lawrence-St. George has undertaken to speak for His Excellency in this House—

Mr. CAHAN: Not at all.

Mr. MACDONALD (Antigonish): —and to intimate directly and indirectly that His Excellency, if he could speak, would say something contrary to what my right hon. leader has said, and I submit, Mr. Chairman, that he has no right to make any such statement.

Mr. CAHILL: Take it back.

Some hon. MEMBERS: You sit down.

Mr. CAHILL: He will take the statement back or he will not speak. The hon. gentleman cannot come into this House and run the whole House by himself.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Sit down.

Mr. CAHILL: I will not sit down until he withdraws the statement.

The CHAIRMAN: I think the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George, while perhaps not exactly out of order, certainly went a little bit too far in the implication which was contained in his statement, and in order to maintain decorum of debate I would ask him to withdraw that expression.

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

Mr. CAHAN: I bow to your ruling, Mr. Chairman, and I withdraw it. I am perfectly willing, if in the heat of debate I go beyond the proper line, to apologize to the Chairman and to the committee. What I was about to say is this, that the former Prime Minister, the present leader of the opposition, handed in his resignation under very peculiar circumstances, circumstances unprecedented, except for one occasion in the history of this country. He had challenged this House on the matter of the Customs report, but he avoided a direct and final vote upon the amendment offered to that report, which amendment he was opposing. He lost confidence in himself and felt, no doubt, that he could not further command the support and confidence of this House. Before that report and the Stevens amendment to it, which reflected upon the then Prime Minister and his administration, could come before this House for final decision, his courage oozed out at his finger tips or at his toes—I do not know which—and he rushed off to tender his resignation to the Governor General.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I did not rush. I went down on Saturday, and we discussed the matter calmly from Saturday until Monday.

Mr. CAHAN: I suppose he did discuss it, but anyway the final rush I think was made somewhere about twelve o'clock noon on Monday.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The final meeting with His Excellency was on Monday by appointment which had been made on the Sunday previous, the appointment being so arranged in order that His Excellency might take whatever steps he desired to take with reference to accepting my resignation at that time.

Mr. CAHAN: Whether the resignation was tendered on Saturday or on the following Monday, and accepted then, the obvious object of the advice given by the Prime Minister at that time for a dissolution of this parliament was to prevent this parliament from exercising its duty and its responsibility of passing upon the conduct of the late administration in connection with the Customs report.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I deny that statement absolutely.

Mr. CAHAN: The circumstances under which, admittedly, the Prime Minister on Saturday or on Monday offered his resignation convey that fair inference, because, in the very act of advising a dissolution, if he really desired a dissolution, he knew that. if dissolution were granted, it would prevent this House from passing the reprimand upon himself and his administration which was contained in the amendments to the Customs report.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I say to my hon. friend that I have the strongest reasons not only for believing but for knowing that the so-called censure that he talks about would never have been passed on this government had this government remained in office until after that vote was taken, and that vote was only passed because of this co-operation between a certain number of gentlemen to my left and hon. gentleman opposite to prevent a dissolution of this parliament.

Mr. CAHAN: I can only infer, and members of this House can only infer, as the leader of the opposition himself infers, what would have taken place if the resolution of censure contained in the Stevens amendment had been allowed by the late government to be voted upon by this House. But when the advice of the right hon. gentleman was tendered to His Excellency for a dissolution and refused, as we believe, in the exercise of a constitutional right, within the discretion of His Excellency the Governor General, this country was left without a government, and I suggest that the proper procedure was taken in selecting a prime minister and in summoning a certain number of the king's privy councillors in Canada to advise during the interregnum, while the new Prime Minister was forming his cabinet, and that there is nothing exceptional in any member of the King's Privy Council being appointed by a committee of that Privy Council to be acting minister, for the time being, of any department. Nay, more than that, as there will be a recess, I will venture to say that the leader of the opposition to-night, if he searches the records of his own administration, will find more than a single instance in which a member of the upper house—I refer to Senator Dandurand, a member of his own government—

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend is beginning to talk about the Senate.

Mr. CAHAN: Well, Senator Dandurand was a member of the previous government without portfolio, but he held and exercised various administrative offices in the government of the right hon. gentleman, although he was never sworn in or took the oath as minister of any special department.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend does not get my point. I never for a moment denied that you could have acting ministers. But what I do say is this: You have got to have a ministry constituted in the first instance of ministers who are sworn in and able to carry on business, and who, after they are sworn in, go back to the people for re-election.

Mr. CAHAN: Oh, well!

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: After you have gone through the process and got the ministry duly formed in accordance with the constitutional practice in respect to the taking of office, then if you want to add one or two ministers as acting ministers to take the place of a minister who has become too old or, as my hon. friend says, take a portfolio which has been vacated by death, you can do so; but it was never contemplated by any constitution under heaven that a ministry should be composed entirely of acting ministers. That is reducing the matter to the reductio ad absurdum.

Mr. CAHAN: My reply to that is that it is never—

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I add this—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Sit down.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I venture to say that my hon. friend will never be able to quote a precedent in British history where a minister pretending to administer a department of government ever came into parliament while parliament was in session without having resigned his office of emolument under the crown in order to go back to the people for re-election. If he takes an office of emolument he must obtain the approval of the people. A minister of the crown is not in the same position as a private member. When a member of parliament takes office under the crown he is then in an entirely different position in relation to the electorate. He has got to go back to the people and receive endorsation, and if he does not get that endorsation he is not able to act as a member of the ministry.

Mr. CAHAN: No doubt ministers who accept any office of emolument under the crown will go to their constituencies to be re-elected.

Mr. CAHILL: When hon. gentlemen opposite do that then they can come back and get supply.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: But they have to do it immediately.

Mr. CAHAN: I have the floor.

Mr. CAHILL: But you are not saying anything.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend is making a statement which is not correct.

Mr. CAHAN: I have the floor. The right hon. gentleman at least might observe the ordinary courtesy of debate and allow me to complete my short statement. There is nothing to provide that a member who accepts a portfolio must seek re-election within five, or ten or even fifteen days.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: There is not one of these ministers who has taken a portfolio.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Sit down.

Mr. CAHAN: I ask for an opportunity to complete my statement.

The CHAIRMAN: The hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George may not be questioned without his consent.

An hon. MEMBER: Allow him to finish.

The CHAIRMAN: I am Chairman and I am going to preserve order. Does the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George wish to allow the hon. member for Prince Albert to put a question to him or not? If he does not, I must ask the hon. member for Prince Albert to take his seat.

Mr. CAHAN: My suggestion and my contention is that there is no provision in the constitution of this country which prevents a member of the privy council, having been so authorized by an order of a committee of the privy council, from acting temporarily as a minister of a department, in order that the king's government may be carried on for a few days. That has been the practice in case after case—

Mr. CAHILL: Never.

Mr. CAHAN: —and it is only because of the exceptional circumstance of the resignation of the right hon. gentleman during a session of parliament that these temporary appointments become absolutely necessary in order that the king's government might continue to be carried on in this country.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: They were not necessary.

Mr. CAHAN: They were absolutely necessary. Further, when the right hon. gentleman asks for precedents, he will find no precedent in this country for his own abject and recreant neglect of the duties of his office and his own—shall I use the word if it is parliamentary? I should like to use it—his own utter lack of courage in refusing to meet this House and abide by its judgment.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend talks of "lack of courage." I ask him to take back that expression.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I ask the hon. gentleman to take back the expression because it is unparliamentary and may not be used in this House. Furthermore when my hon. friend talks about my being "recreant to duty" he is making a statement which is absolutely without foundation.

An hon. MEMBER: Mr. Chairman, did you not say that you were going to keep order?

The CHAIRMAN: I must ask the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George to withdraw the expression "recreant to duty."

An hon. MEMBER: What about the expression "lack of courage?"

The CHAIRMAN: I presume the reference there is to "political courage." I do not think that is unparliamentary, but the other expression is certainly out of order.

Mr. CAHAN: Can I not say—

Mr. CAHILL: Withdraw.

Mr. CAHAN: —that if the Prime Minister is not performing his duty, or if he neglects his duty, he is recreant?

An hon. MEMBER: Take it back.

Mr. CAHAN: If the Chairman says the expression is out of order I will take it back.

The CHAIRMAN: I understand the hon. member to say that the leader of the opposition was recreant to his duty. If he did say that he ought to withdraw the expression, and I am sure he will do so.

Mr. CAHAN: I will retract and say that the right hon. gentleman did not perform what I conceive to be his duty, which was to continue to meet the House, while the Customs report was before it, and allow the House to pass its verdict upon that report. Rather than meet the House and allow the House to give its verdict on that report, he advised the dissolution of parliament, which he knew would prevent the House from passing judgment on that report. He thereby placed the country in a most peculiar and unprecedented position which rendered it absolutely necessary that His Excellency the Governor General, in accordance with the constitution, should ask the members of the privy council to come and advise him. They did assemble and did advise him, and, acting within their prerogatives as a committee of the privy council, they appointed certain members of parliament to act temporarily in the administration of the several offices to which they were then designated. That procedure is constitutional. Precedents have been established time after time during the ministry of the right hon. leader of the opposition with respect to one, two and sometimes three members of the government.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If my hon. friend wishes to make precedents, may I say that no acting minister was appointed during the entire period of my administration until the government had sworn ministers who had to go back to the people for re-election, ministers who had undertaken the duty of carrying on the business of the country.

Mr. CAHAN: That is merely a facetious explanation—

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Oh, no.

Mr. CAHAN: —because the right hon. gentleman has admitted that he had called in members of the Privy Council who did temporarily administer the affairs of particular departments without taking a new oath of office at all, it being well known that their appointments and oaths as privy councillors qualified them to receive temporary nominations for the administration of the particular offices to which they were temporarily appointed by order in council. The right hon. gentleman brought about an unprecedented condition of affairs in this country. I will not reflect further upon his motives in bringing about that condition of affairs, which had to be met by exceptional measures; but he will look in vain to find any precedent established from which it can be shown or from which it can be adduced that anything irregular or unconstitutional has taken place in the recent formation of what he now calls "a shadow ministry."

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I rise for the purpose of moving the adjournment of the House, and I think I should do that for three reasons; the first is that I do not think we are making much progress; the second is that I have hopes that we will find certain hon. members in a more reasonable frame of mind when we come back, and the third is that I would like the eminent gentlemen who belong to the great Liberal party to consider what Mr. Asquith says on this very point so much stressed and debated. It is only a little bit of a whole lot of jurisprudence in connection with the matter, but it is something my hon. friend could think over in connection with some of the statements made to-night. Mr. Asquith says:

> The dissolution of parliament is in this country one of the prerogatives of the crown. It is a mere feudal survival, but it is a part, and, I think, a useful part, of our constitutional system. It does not mean that the crown should act voluntarily and without the advice of responsible ministers—

Mr. DUNNING: It does not mean that.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Quite right. I am always trying to be fair with my hon. friends, and I am giving everything in their favour. Perhaps they will say, "hear, hear" to this:

> —but it does mean that the crown is not bound to take the advice of a particular ministry to put its subjects to the tumult and turmoil of a series of general elections so long as it can find other ministers who are prepared to give it a trial.

Mr. DUNNING: Ministers.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: But there are no ministers opposite.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: This is December 18, 1922, and if my hon. friends will only go a little bit further they will find that the Prime Minister, the real representative of the crown, can himself take all the portfolios and have as many acting ministers as he likes looking after portfolios which he himself has taken.

Mr. CAHILL: But he has nobody in the House to receive supply.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Mr. Asquith says further:

> The notion that a minister who cannot command a majority in the House of Commons, who is in a minority of 31 per cent, is invested with the right to demand a dissolution, is as subversive of constitutional usage as it would, in my opinion, be pernicious to the general and paramount interests of the nation at large.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The hon. member has just quoted Mr. Asquith on the subject of dissolution. Is it not true that in 1914 Mr. Asquith asked for a dissolution at the beginning of the year, and before the year was up asked for another, and that in both instances he was granted a dissolution by His Majesty the King?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: This is what Mr. Asquith said—and he is older and wiser and knows what the law is now.

Mr. MACDONALD (Antigonish): There is nothing to support my hon. friend there.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: There is another thing we should always look at in connection with this—

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Would it not be better to postpone replying to further questions until to-morrow?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Yes, I wanted to do that. There is something really to be considered in connection with this matter, not in heat or passion or anything else—just a little bit of common sense to be applied to the situation.

Progress reported.

ADOURNMENT—BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Sir HENRY DRAYTON moved the adjournment of the House.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I ask what the business will be for to-morrow and the order of it?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: If my hon. friend will permit the House to do any business, we will go on with the business of the House and try to get supply through.

On motion of Sir Henry Drayton the House adjourned at 1.10 a.m. (Thursday).

PRIVILEGE—MR. LAPOINTE

CONSTITUTIONALITY OF PROCEDURE ADOPTED IN FORMATION OF MINISTRY

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Quebec East): I rise to a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, on a matter which vitally affects the rights of this House. My hon. friend who is leading the House has just tabled six orders in council, which I am going to read. The first is P.C. 1042, which is as follows:

That the Honourable Sir George Perley, a Member of the King's Privy Council for Canada, be Acting Secretary of State and Acting Minister of Public Works.

That the Honourable William Anderson Black, a Member of the King's Privy Council for Canada, be Acting Minister of Marine and Fisheries.

E. J. LEMAIRE,
Clerk of the Privy Council.

I agree with my hon. friend the acting leader of the House that these are unusual times and unusual conditions—

Sir HENRY DRAYTON (Leader of the House): Will my hon. friend allow me one moment, just on the question of order? I am quite content that this matter should be discussed but I think it should be discussed under some appropriate heading, and that we should not have it under every heading. We had a long discussion lasting for some three hours last night while in committee of Supply; I did not think it was in order at all, but hon. gentlemen were very anxious to discuss it and the government certainly has not the slightest intention of preventing that discussion. But I think my hon. friend will agree that we should have some understanding as to when this question shall be finally discussed. My hon. friend says he is rising to a question of privilege, but he has not yet defined that question.

Mr. LAPOINTE: You are preventing me.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I would have thought the proper place for this discussion would have been on the orders of the day.

Mr. LAPOINTE: My hon. friend is quite wrong; a question of privilege can be raised at any time, especially on motions.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: So long as we agree that it is to be raised once and not under every single item.

Mr. LAPOINTE: My hon. friend will see that this is the proper time.

Mr. SPEAKER: For the enlightenment of the House I might read the following:

In the Canadian House, questions of privilege take a wide range, but it may be stated in general terms that they refer to all matters affecting the rights and immunities of the House collectively, or to the position and conduct of members in their representative character.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I would just like to point out to my hon. friend that if he raises this merely as a question of privilege he is raising it in such a manner that it cannot be discussed. There is no reply to privilege.

Mr. LAPOINTE: It will be a question affecting the privileges of every member of this House, so every member will have the right to speak.

Mr. SPEAKER: I had it in mind to tell hon. members who might be interested in the question which is now being raised by the hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Lapointe) that they have a right to answer.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: So long as that is understood, I have no objection at all.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I was proceeding to say, Mr. Speaker, that these are unusual circumstances, and perhaps the rules of the House may be strained to meet unusual circumstances, but, Mr. Speaker, laws cannot be evaded for the purpose of meeting such unusual conditions, and more particularly when those laws are of the character of the law of the independence of parliament, which is at the very root of our parliamentary institutions. I would first call the attention of the House to chapter 4 of the Revised Statutes of Canada, being "An Act respecting the salaries of certain Public Functionaries." Section 4 of that chapter reads as follows:

The salaries of the following ministers, members of the King's Privy Council for Canada, shall be as follows, that is to say:—

The Minister of Justice and Attorney General—

so much.

The Minister of Militia and Defence—so much, and all the various departments are mentioned with the salary attached to the office of the minister in each case.

I next refer to chapter 10 of the Revised Statutes of Canada, section 10 of which reads as follows:

Except as hereinafter specially provided:—

(a) no person accepting or holding any office, commission or employment, permanent or temporary, in the service of the government of Canada, at the nomination of the crown, or at the nomination of any of the officers of the government of Canada, to which any salary, fee, wages, allowances, emolument, or profit of any kind is attached.

Next I refer to section 12 of chapter 10, which reads as follows:

Nothing in this act contained shall render ineligible as aforesaid, any person holding the office of President of the Privy Council, Minister of Finance, Minister of Justice, Minister of Militia and Defence—and so forth until the end of the paragraph, which reads:

—or shall disqualify any such person to sit or vote in the House of Commons, if he is elected while he holds such office and is not otherwise disqualified.

In so far as what I have stated up to this point is concerned, I suppose everybody will agree with me that immediately upon the acceptance of office upon the part of a minister of the crown, whether he be Minister of Justice, of Finance, Customs, Trade and Commerce, Public Works or any other department, his seat becomes vacant in this House, and he has to be elected while holding such office by some constituency in Canada.

I now refer to chapter 1 of the Revised Statutes of Canada, being the Interpretation Act, to section 31, and I refer particularly to paragraph (l) of that section, which reads as follows:

—words directing or empowering a minister of the crown to do any act or thing, or otherwise applying to him by his name of office, include a minister acting for, or, if the office is vacant, in the place of such minister, under the authority of an order in council, and also his successors in such office, and his or their lawful deputy.

I submit with the utmost respect, Mr. Speaker, that according to the Interpretation Act, the words contained in chapter 4 of the Revised Statutes of Canada with regard to the salaries paid to every one of the ministers I have mentioned, apply also, under the Interpretation Act, to any acting minister, and more particularly to a minister who, while the office is vacant, is appointed by order in council to act in the place of the minister.

Sir, in chapter 10 of the Revised Statutes of Canada, under section 11, there is an exemption made which reads as follows:

Nothing in the next preceding section—

That is the one I have already read to you regarding any person holding an office to which an emolument or fee is attached:

Nothing in the next preceding section shall render ineligible any person holding any office, commission or employment, permanent or temporary, in the service of the government of Canada, at the nomination of the crown, or at the nomination of any of the officers of the government of Canada, as a member of the House of Commons, or shall disqualify him from sitting or voting therein, if, by his commission or other instrument of appointment, it is declared or provided that he shall hold such office, commission or employment without any salary, fees, wages, allowances, emolument or other profit of any kind, attached thereto.

This section was inserted in the statute of 1884 to meet the case of the late Sir Charles Tupper—I am now quoting from Bourinot, page 145:

—who, while a member of the House of Commons and Minister of Railways, accepted the position of High Commissioner of Canada, resident in London, but received no salary under his commission for that office. The committee on privileges were of opinion that the seat was not vacated, but to quiet doubts raised in and out of the House on the point, the foregoing act was passed indemnifying Sir Charles Tupper from all liability to any penalty or responsibility, and adding the qualifying provisions cited above to the law.

This is so much the case, Mr. Speaker, that when I had the honour a few months ago to be appointed Secretary of State of Canada, I was directed by the Department of Justice at the time to have those words inserted in the order in council appointing me, namely, that there was no fee, commission or salary attached to the office, because failing the inclusion of those words in the order in council, my seat in this House might have been vacated.

I have here all the orders in council appointing these gentlemen opposite—they claim, and they did claim last night, that they were regularly appointed—appointing them as acting ministers for the various departments I have mentioned. Under the Interpretation Act anything concerning those ministers in any other statute in the Revised Statutes of Canada applies as well to the acting ministers, and more particularly, as is the case at the present time, to ministers appointed by order in council for the purpose of acting for the ministers during a vacancy in the office of the minister, and Mr. Speaker, not one of those orders in council includes that reservation that these gentlemen are holding office without any emolument or fees. Those emoluments or fees are therefore attached to the office. I submit with regret, because I would be sorry to lose the company of my hon. friend from West York (Sir Henry Drayton), and other gentlemen, that they have occupied their seats in the House of Commons since the 29th of June last illegally, and I submit to you, Mr. Speaker, that all the votes they have given ought to be counted out and expunged from the records of this House.

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (Acting Minister of Justice): To the objection which has now been urged by my hon. friend from Quebec East, the former Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) I have only this to say—that it is of the most technical character, and avoids a broad or general view of the law which appears on the statute books of Canada. The Independence of Parliament Act, as is well known, was placed upon the statute books for the purpose of safeguarding not only the House but members of the House of Commons, and the rights of the electors of Canada in regard to all relations which exist in this chamber, and section 10, one of the well known provisions of that act, provides that a man who is a member of this chamber shall not accept any office from which he shall derive or receive any salary, fee, wages, allowance, emolument, or profit of any kind unless he is prepared to submit himself to his constituents, or to some constituency in this country, for re-election. Such was the object of the enactment and the test in this instance—it is an easy one and will suggest itself to everyone, is: Do those four or five hon. members including myself, who now sit in this chamber as acting ministers come within this prohibition? Do they come within the class mentioned in section 10 of this enactment? Do they receive any salary, fee, wages, emolument, or profit of any kind in connection with the office of acting ministers of the crown?

Mr. MACDONALD (Antigonish-Guysborough): Yes.

Mr. GUTHRIE: My hon. friend says "yes" but I state emphatically no.

Mr. MACDONALD (Antigonish-Guysborough): The order in council does not say so.

Mr. GUTHRIE: That is another point altogether. I say we do not. It is clear to anyone who is willing to stop and consider the matter. But the next section provides—what is the number of the chapter?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Chapter 10, section 10.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Chapter 10, sections 10 and 11.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Section 11 is a special provision providing for exemption and it says:

> Nothing in the next preceding section shall render ineligible any person holding any office, commission or employment, permanent or temporary, in the service of the government of Canada, at the nomination of the crown, or at the nomination of any of the officers of the government of Canada, as a member of the House of Commons, or shall disqualify him from sitting or voting therein, if by his commission or other instrument of appointment, it is declared or provided—

Now what I submit is, that it is "provided" in these orders in council simply by the insertion of the word "acting" minister instead of minister. The insertion of the word "acting" constitutes a clear and emphatic provision.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: May I ask a question?

Mr. GUTHRIE: Well, I do not like to be disturbed just now but the hon. gentleman may proceed.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I should like to understand clearly the argument of the hon. gentleman. Do I understand that he is arguing that the question of salary settles the whole matter—that if hon. gentlemen are able to get the appointment without salary, or have their salaries paid somewhere else, that then they have the right to occupy the treasury benches?

Some hon. MEMBERS: No, no.

An hon. MEMBER: Sit down.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I say that has been no breach of the Independence of Parliament Act which I am discussing. I say that the test of the matter is: Do we or do we not accept any office of salary, or emolument under the crown? If we do our seats become vacant. If we do not we have a perfect right to hold our seats. That is the test. Do we or do we not receive salary or emolument? Now the word "acting" minister has been inserted in the order in council for the express purpose of demonstrating or providing that we are not ministers with portfolio therefore we do not receive emolument or salary for our services. That form of order in council for the appointment of acting ministers has been in force and adopted by the Privy Council in Canada for twenty-five to thirty-five years and members of the late government, members of the government in which my hon. friend from Quebec East sat, passed many orders in council in this identical language relating to ministers without portfolio and acting ministers in the former government without any further reservation or provision.

Mr. DUNNING: Members of this House?

Mr. GUTHRIE: Members of this House, and they did not infringe the law because they received no salary, no wage, or no remuneration. That is the test. If we do receive any such then I admit we are contravening section 10 of the Independence of Parliament Act. If we do not, and as acting ministers we cannot and do not, there is no infringement of any of the provisions of the Independence of Parliament Act.

Now while I am on the subject may I state that the procedure in this instance in regard to the appointments recently made of acting ministers has been in accordance with the established custom in the Privy Council in this country for at least thirty-five years. There has been no variation; in the present instance there has been an adoption of the old forms and the old precedents. There is no specific law on this subject. There is no statute law to regulate these matters; they are largely matters of custom and of form which have grown up in the office of the Privy Council. Some of these customs are not founded in statutory enactment, some of them were originally founded merely in convenience.

Now it was charged last night by the ex-Prime Minister that one serious objection to myself and my hon. friends appearing in this House as acting ministers of the government was, that no oath had been administered to us. Why should an oath be administered to us, may I ask him? What statute requires it! What law has been contravened if no oath was administered to us? Where is the law, where is the statute, where is the regulation? We have none in this Dominion of Canada. All that is required by law of a minister of the crown in this country is that he be sworn of the Privy Council. That is the first condition. The second condition is that he be a member of this House or of the upper chamber: and the third is that he be called upon to act by that person who, for the time being, is the Prime Minister of the country.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Will my hon. friend say that any member of the Privy Council can act without taking an oath?

Mr. GUTHRIE: I am coming to that now. Just allow me to proceed and I will try and answer all my hon. friend's statements. In England the procedure is somewhat different to that adopted in Canada. The appointment of a minister in England is much more formal than it is in this country. In England in the first instance a man is sworn of the Privy Council. Then he goes through a special formality, the very dignified and quaint formality, of kissing the hand of his sovereign. Then the seals of office, of his department, are formally handed to him and on the acceptance of those seals he becomes a minister. But in addition to that, after all that has been gone through—not before, after—he is required to take an oath in conformity with a law passed in 1868, an imperial statute, the Promissory Oaths Act, which applies to certain ministers of the crown, mentioning them by name. That is, after he has accepted the seal, after he has become a minister, he is required to take an oath for the faithful performance of his office. We have no statutory requirement of that kind in this country. I admit that a custom has grown up in the Privy Council office in this country that when a man is called to the Privy Council, when he has been selected as a minister in the cabinet, with a portfolio he shall take an oath for the faithful administration of his office. This applies only to men who enter the cabinet as ministers with portfolio, but in no case in the last thirty-five years—because that is as far back as the search has gone—has the oath been required of a minister who is appointed without portfolio, or a minister who is specifically appointed as an acting minister.

[Mr. Guthrie.]

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: As an acting minister is he assuming any powers or any trust that the minister usually exercises?

Mr. GUTHRIE: Any powers the prime minister directs him to assume, or any powers he is called upon to exercise under the prime minister; I say he is.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: But the hon. member and others are acting ministers of certain departments. Are they as such ministers exercising any powers or any trusts relative to a department, such as the obligations the minister would have in a department?

Mr. GUTHRIE: I think to some extent we are.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Then my point is that before any powers or trusts can be exercised in a legal way an oath must be taken that they will be so exercised.

Mr. GUTHRIE: No, I submit there is no such requirement by our law; no enactment, no regulation, no order in council; and no oath is required. But as a matter of custom an oath prescribed to ministers upon their accepting portfolios, but in no case, so far as we have been able to find, has any oath been required of a minister appointed without portfolio, or appointed merely as an acting minister. This Mr. Speaker, is nothing new. The procedure in the case of the present appointees without portfolio is identical with the procedure pursued by the government of my right hon. friend who now leads the opposition. A memorandum has been obtained from the clerk of the Privy Council upon the subject. He is an official of the government, admirably fitted for the high office which he holds, an official of very great experience, for many years the private secretary of the late Sir Wilfrid Laurier, and a close student of all that went on in and about the Privy Council and upon all formal matters pertaining to the Privy Council. He has a full knowledge of details, a knowledge of methods and of customs pertaining in the office of the Privy Council which enabled him to fulfil his duties as private secretary to Sir Wilfrid Laurier while Prime Minister of Canada. He has himself occupied the office of clerk of the Privy Council for two or three years, I think. He is a very capable official, well informed in regard to the duties of his office, and he was requested to make a search and give information in regard to what is actually the custom and what is actually the practice in such matters, and I am going to give the House the result of that search now.

He has directed a letter dated to-day, July 1, to the Right Hon. Arthur Meighen, P. C., Prime Minister, Ottawa, which reads:

Dear Mr. MEIGHEN,

Replying to your inquiry on the subject of oaths taken by ministers and acting ministers, I beg to inform you that upon a member of the Privy Council being called to take a portfolio and preside over a certain department, he is required in all cases to take the oath of office.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. GUTHRIE: That is what I stated.

The wording of this oath, a copy of which is attached, is not prescribed by any statute, in so far as I have been able to discover, but would seem rather to be dependent upon custom and usage.

Regarding the appointment of acting ministers, this is generally done by order in council, but it has not been customary for an acting minister to subscribe to any oath and no acting minister in the past twenty-five years has been asked to do so.

Ministers without portfolio have in several instances been called upon to temporarily preside over departments as acting ministers, but in no case, in at least the period of time mentioned above, was an oath administered to them.

Such was the opinion which I gave you two days ago, after consultation with Mr. Kezar, the assistant clerk of the Privy Council, who has an experience of over thirty-five years in this office.

During the last administration three ministers without portfolio were at different times appointed as acting ministers, namely, the Hon. Mr. E. M. Macdonald, Acting Minister of National Defence, appointed 28th April 1923.

He was not sworn.

The Hon. R. Dandurand, appointed acting Minister of Justice, 27th August, 1923; no oath was administered. The Hon. H. B. McGiverin, appointed Acting Secretary of State, 26th November, 1924. No oath was administered save that of a privy councillor. Mr. Macdonald was appointed Minister of National Defence on the 17th, August, 1923.

That was about four months after his appointment as a minister without portfolio.

And was sworn in as such on the 18th of the same month, but was never sworn in as acting minister; nor was either Senator Dandurand or Mr. McGiverin. In the case of Mr. Macdonald, he was appointed as Acting Minister of National Defence when that position was vacant, the former minister, the Hon. George P. Graham having resigned as such and appointed Minister of Railways and Canals.

I may also inform you that there have been other cases in the past of ministers without portfolio being appointed as acting ministers after the resignation of the regular minister, or the post was otherwise vacant.

Your very sincerely,

E. J. LEMAIRE,
Clerk of the Privy Council.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I ask my hon. friend if he has ascertained, or if his leader has ascertained—he says the oath is a matter of custom and that it is not always taken—if since confederation there is any case where a minister has not taken the oath.

Mr. GUTHRIE: There is no case where an acting minister or minister without portfolio has been required to take it.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Is there any case where a minister has not taken the oath?

Mr. GUTHRIE: No, I know of no case, and I think I am safe in assuming this that in every case where a minister is appointed with portfolio the custom to be complied with requires that he should take an oath. I agree that that has been the custom, and that custom should be complied with now in the case of ministers being appointed with portfolios.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): In the case of the then Acting Minister of National Defence, Mr. Macdonald, to whom he refers, for instance, and who, he claims, was appointed acting minister without having taken the oath, was he appointed by order in council, and if so was the order in council passed by a properly sworn quorum of the council?

Mr. GUTHRIE: That raises the point which I will come to next and that is the other point that was dealt with the other night by the ex-Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King). As regards his first objection that no oath was taken, I think I have clearly established, to the satisfaction of anyone who has an open mind on the subject, that there is no legal, no statutory requirement, no regulation or order in council which prescribes that an oath should be taken even in the case of a minister being appointed as a member of the government with portfolio. In that case, however, custom does require an oath, and although I do not think it is necessary for me to read it, the form of the oath is as follows:

I, do solemnly and sincerely promise and swear that I will duly and faithfully and to the best of my skill and knowledge execute the powers and trusts reposed in me as Minister of . So help me God.

That oath is, I think, in every instance required by custom of a man who becomes a minister with a portfolio, but it is never required of an acting minister or a minister without portfolio.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Has an acting minister any power or trust reposed in him?

Mr. GUTHRIE: I answered that question as well as I could a moment or two ago.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: And in answering it he did not answer it yes or no.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I answered it a moment or two ago as fully as I intend to answer it. There is another phase of this question and it brings up the order in council question also. In the situation which developed on Monday last on the resignation of the Prime Minister in a very hasty manner, I think I may say, it became absolutely necessary that His Majesty's representative in Canada should have a government. The old saying that "the King's government must go on" had full application last Monday if it ever had application in this country.

His Excellency decided to send for the present Prime Minister and to entrust him with the formation of a new administration. How was the present Prime Minister appointed? What order in council could be passed in his case? I ask the same question in regard to my right hon. friend, the late Prime Minister. I ask the same question in regard to the late Sir Wilfrid Laurier. How were they appointed? I have copies of these orders in council under my hand. In each instance they were appointed upon their own recommendations. As the ex-Prime Minister said last night they sat alone in their glory at that council table and themselves authorized their own appointments.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Was that not after they had been sworn?

Mr. GUTHRIE: I will come to that. It was after they were sworn in as privy councillors. Then they marched in and were sworn in as ministers. That is a custom in England, which is always followed. In the case of Sir Wilfrid Laurier, the situation is very plain. He was the only minister on the 11th July, 1896, and the order in council in that case reads:

> The committee, on the recommendation of the Hon. Wilfrid Laurier, the Prime Minister, advise that a commission do issue appointing the Hon. Wilfrid Laurier a member of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada, to be President of the Privy Council.
> The committee, on the same recommendation, furthur advise that, upon the said the Hon. Wilfrid Laurier, taking the prescribed oath or oaths of office, he do assume the functions of President of the Privy Council.

Subsequently the late Sir Wilfrid Laurier made his recommendation for his ministry.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend has just read an order in council which states that a commission do issue. May I ask whether he or any of the other ministers has had a commission issued to him by any order in council?

Mr. GUTHRIE: I assume that in due course some commission will issue.

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Does my hon. friend think that commission can issue while parliament is in session and the minister not resign his seat?

Mr. GUTHRIE: It is not the commission; it is the order in council with the approval that counts in our case. But it is a grave question whether orders in council are necessary in any case. Certainly orders in council were passed; but all that is required by law in the formation of a ministry is the request and authority of the Prime Minister and the oath of a privy councillor. We do not need an order in council either as a matter of law or as a matter of custom. We would be fully entitled to assume the duties of our office if we were requested by the Prime Minister who has himself been duly called and sworn and appointed, and it would be quite within our rights to attend at his request and become members of his government, with the approval of His Excellency the Governor General.

This is the situation. There is in Canada a Privy Council, the King's Privy Council for Canada, and that Privy Council is constituted under section 10 of our constitutional act known as the British North American Act. Section 10 of that act provides:

> There shall be a council to aid and advise in the government of Canada, to be styled the Queen's Privy Council for Canada; and the persons who are to be members of that council shall be from time to time chosen and summoned by the Governor General and sworn in as privy councillors, and members thereof may be from time to time removed by the Governor General.

That is the only council provided for in the British North America Act which is the constitutional authority over this body. It is the King's Privy Council for Canada. There is a very much involved but a very beautiful and ancient oath administered to every member who is summoned and sworn of the Privy Council. Bear in mind that there is a Privy Council and in our statutory charter nothing whatever is said about a cabinet. There is no statutory authority for such a thing as a cabinet, but there is statutory authority for a Privy Council. It so happens that in this case I and my hon. friends, with the exception of the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Black), were all members of the Privy Council, not of recent creation, but of some years ago. We had therefore the privilege of being summoned.

And in addition the hon. member for Halifax was summoned and was sworn of the Privy Council before any other proceedings were taken. He subscribed the roll, took the oath and became one of the King's privy councillors for Canada. We were there as of right, members of the King's Privy Council attending the King's Privy Council, summoned by His Excellency upon the advice of the Prime Minister who had been accepted as the chief adviser of the crown at that time. There we sat in council; there we passed four orders in council, or it may be five. I do not know the number.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend has read the statute with regard to the Privy Council enabling privy councillors to aid and advise the Governor General. We all admit that privy councillors may aid and advise the Governor General, but have privy councillors the power to perform any executive act where they are not sworn in as ministers?

Mr. GUTHRIE: The term "aid and advise," under the wide interpretation given to it, includes almost everything because everything that is done by a minister in his public capacity is assumed to be in aid of the crown or in aid of some of the rights or interests of the crown. I grant that there has grown up, under the system in Great Britain and under the system in Canada, a committee of the Privy Council, which we know as the cabinet. It has no definite starting point, having been a matter of slow growth and of gradual constitutional development. There is not a single statutory enactment either in Great Britain or in Canada with reference to the cabinet. It is not recognized in our legislation but it exists nevertheless as a committee of the Privy Council.

Now there was no cabinet; there was no inner body at the time we met on Tuesday last. The cabinet had ceased to exist merely by the resignation of the Prime Minister, because the resignation of the prime minister carries with it the resignation of the ministry as a whole. The moment the prime minister resigns the government disappears. There was no cabinet at the time and therefore it was open to His Excellency, if he so desired—and the course he adopted was taken on the advice of his new prime minister—to summon his Privy Council for Canada "to aid and advise," according to the language of the act, or not to, as he saw fit. Those who were notified and summoned for that Privy Council meeting were all members of the Privy Council and of the House and were that day appointed acting ministers. What transpired at that meeting of council I am not at liberty to state. As the House knows, privy councillors are bound by oath not to make known anything that transpired at a meeting of council, touching either what is said or what is done. But under ordinary circumstances the results of the meeting may be disclosed, and the result of this meeting was the orders in council which have already been submitted to the House and under which we claim to have been duly and properly appointed acting ministers, without portfolio—bear that in mind—without salary and without emolument in any form.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: And without any right to sit where you are.

Mr. GUTHRIE: That of course challenges all that I have said, and my right hon. friend will have ample opportunity to reply. I do not want to bring about a partisan discussion. I desire simply to make my statement as clear and definite as possible and if I am wrong hon. gentlemen opposite will correct me. Such however is the right we claim, and such is the case we prefer to the House. We have been appointed regularly and constitutionally in accordance with custom observed from time immemorial, one might say, but at all events custom which has existed in this country for thirty-five years. We have followed the forms and practices of our predecessors. The moment we undertake to become ministers of departments or, as is sometimes said, full-fledged ministers, then in keeping with the established custom we shall be obliged to take the oath which I have read. Until that 3 p.m. time, however, we are required to take only one single oath, the oath of a Privy Councillor of Canada.

I refer to the case of my hon. friend for Antigonish-Guysborough (Mr. Macdonald) as a case in point. The Right Hon. George P. Graham was Minister of National Defence, and he resigned that portfolio to become Minister of Railways. In April of the same year my hon. friend from Antigonish-Guysborough was appointed minister without portfolio and Acting Minister of National Defence. He was called and sworn of the Privy Council, not as minister with a portfolio but as acting minister. The record shows no oath as having been administered to him, other than the oath of Privy Councillor. He acted as minister of the department of National Defence until the month of August following when he was sworn as minister and he took the oath as minister which I have quoted to the House. In the interval he received no salary, no emolument, no fee of any kind. Will it be said that while he sat in this House in those intervening months he did so without right? Can it be said that he forfeited his seat on becoming acting minister of that department? Can it be said that Mr. McGiverin forfeited his seat?

Can it be said that a dozen other acting ministers without portfolio, whom we could name if we so desired, forfeited their seats? There has been no exception which I have been able to find in all the orders in council I have read, or regarding which I have inquired.

The ex-Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) says that recently his attention has been called to the fact that there should be in the order in council an express declaration that no emolument shall be paid. If any office other than that of acting minister were involved there might be some force in what the hon. gentleman says.

Mr. DENIS (Joliette): In the case of the hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough, is it not a fact that he was appointed Acting Minister of National Defence at a time when there was in office a government with a quorum of at least four members who had been sworn?

Mr. GUTHRIE: I am not referring to that point; I am discussing the subject with relation to the necessity for taking the oath. The record shows that the hon. gentleman was not sworn. That is a matter on which I think we are all agreed; we do not need to argue it. The facts are incontrovertible.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Do I understand from the hon. member's argument that he contends there is nothing in the constitution which would prevent privy councillors from continuing indefinitely in a position of that character?

Mr. GUTHRIE: Privy councillors are appointed for life.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: That is not what I mean. Is there nothing to prevent privy councillors, called by His Excellency, from continuing indefinitely in an executive position?

Mr. GUTHRIE: His Excellency could dismiss them as readily as he could appoint them.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: It would be in his discretion?

Mr. GUTHRIE: They are appointed for life, during pleasure.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I am not thinking of them in their capacity as privy councillors, but rather as advisers to His Excellency with the right to perform executive acts. Does the hon. member say that there is nothing in the constitution to prevent privy councillors, called to undertake executive work, continuing indefinitely in such office?

[Mr. Guthrie.]

Mr. GUTHRIE: There are three safeguards: first, an adverse vote in the House; secondly, the will of the Prime Minister, who may ask for their resignation; and, in the third place, the right of the crown to dismiss ministers.

Mr. LAPOINTE: What about the people of Canada?

Mr. GUTHRIE: And ultimate appeal to the people. Now, I have tried to state the case as clearly as possible without indulging in such over-statements as those with which the House was entertained last night, and I think that any reasonable person will conclude that in everything we have done we have complied with statutory authority, with custom, and with the usages of government in this country. We stand here to-day fully accredited as acting ministers in the various departments to which we have been assigned.

I took occasion this morning to ask the Deputy Minister of Justice for an opinion regarding the right of members of the Privy Council to pass the orders in council which have been submitted, and the following is the reply I received as I entered the House.

July 1, 1926.

By section 11 of the British North America Act it is provided that:

"There shall be a council to aid and advise in the government of Canada, to be styled the Queen's Privy Council for Canada; and the persons who are to be members of that council shall be from time to time chosen and summoned by the Governor General and sworn in as privy councillors, and members thereof may be from time to time removed by the Governor General."

I understand that the Prime Minister and all the members of the present acting ministry have been at one time or another chosen and summoned by the Governor General and sworn in as privy councillors and have never ceased to be members of the Privy Council. In these circumstances I am of opinion that upon their being summoned to attend meetings of the Privy Council, no oath other than that already taken is required of them.

With regard to the question whether a meeting of members of the Privy Council, summoned upon the advice of the Prime Minister, has power to appoint acting ministers of departments, I am of opinion that this question should be answered in the affirmative. It is a well known principle of constitutional government in Canada that the Governor General may act upon the advice or with the advice and consent of or in conjunction with the Privy Council of Canada or any members thereof. I know of no provision which creates any limitation upon the exercise of this power in connection with the appointment of acting ministers, and I am of opinion that the orders in council in question appointing acting ministers of departments were validly passed and are as effective as if made upon the recommendation of any committee of council.

This is signed by W. Stuart Edwards, Deputy Minister of Justice.

Hon. LUCIEN CANNON (Dorchester): My hon. friend who has just taken his seat has shown his usual ability, but I do not think he has answered the question put to the House by the former Minister of Justice, the hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Lapointe). In discussing this question I will endeavour not only to speak as a lawyer, but to use such language that every man who is not a lawyer will understand what I mean.

The question before the House is not whether these gentlemen can be acting ministers; the question is whether they can be an acting government. The question is not whether, to meet certain exceptional cases of urgency or emergency, one or two ministers may be sworn in as acting ministers or ministers without portfolio, but whether a whole administration may be so formed, whether the control of the affairs of this country can be put in the hands of an acting government which is not a real government. In order that the minds of those who are kind enough to listen to me may not be confused, there are actually two questions before the House, and I will ask the members of this acting government who follow me to give an answer to both.

The first proposition is that laid down by the acting leader of this House (Sir Henry Drayton) when he said yesterday that they were nothing. Hon. members will remember exactly the words used by the hon. gentleman when he said "We are nothing". This government does not exist; this government is to be formed, and this is the first proposition. Is this a government which represents nothing; is this a government which is simply in the embryo form and is to be formed later? If so, I will follow that proposition by the answer that if you are nothing, if you have no authority, you certainly have not the power to deal with the public money of the Canadian people. I wish hon. gentlemen to listen carefully now. If on the other hand this proposition is not sound and the proposition laid down this afternoon by the Acting Minister of Justice (Mr. Guthrie) is true, that these gentlemen are real ministers exercising executive functions, then they have no right to remain in their seats in the House. Therefore, in order to be well understood before going into the merits of the case, I say that the dilemma before the acting government is this: If you have no authority you are not entitled to supply; you are not the government; you should not lead the House and you should not assume an authority which you do not possess. If you exist as a government; if you have authority to exercise ministerial functions, you have no right to remain in those seats.

My hon. friend who preceded me said that there had been a meeting of the Privy Council, and that as a consequence or result of that meeting a cabinet or a supposed cabinet was born. In order to understand what this means, with the indulgence of the House I will very briefly recite the history of the Privy Council. If hon. gentlemen who are interested in constitutional law will read the authors dealing with such matters they will discover that the Privy Council was born of the ordinary common sense of a king or head of a state who wanted to have advice on difficult matters, and in their origin the privy councillors were simply the friends or intimates of the king who were consulted on matters of importance. Under the Norman system; under the Tudors; under the Plantagenets this system has evolved, and under George III the present system came into existence.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Because he could not speak English.

Mr. CANNON: Because I come from Quebec I would rather leave that point to my hon. friend. The Privy Council was a general council, and after George III, when the constitutional theory under which we now exercise government was laid down, a distinction first arose, and this is where I differ with my hon. friend and where I challenge any constitutional student in this House to differ with me. The distinction was then laid down as between members of the Privy Council as a whole and the members of a committee of the Privy Council called the cabinet. Every former minister in this House is a privy councillor who can be called, on matters of urgency, to give his advice to the head of the state. But will any man contend seriously that the Privy Council as a whole can administer this country? The body to administer this country is not the Privy Council but a committee of that council called the cabinet.

This is sound constitutional law. The reason why that distinction has been drawn, and the reason for the importance of that distinction, is the very safeguard of the liberty of the citizen which we enjoy; I mean responsible government. In England responsible government was first established under George III, and under Queen Victoria it came to its full bloom. We have the right in Canada to enjoy the same liberties and the same extent of freedom under our constitution as our fellow-citizens in England enjoy. We have to-day in Canada a Prime Minister. He is the one who is responsible for the present situation. He is responsible for everything which has been done since he has become the adviser of the crown. Putting aside political distinctions, are we as members of the House of Commons and representatives of the people of Canada, to stand in our places here and say that the present Prime Minister of Canada was perfectly justified in tearing up the constitution of this country in order to form a supposed government? That is the question. We are no longer in the swamps of New Brunswick; we are no longer in the filth of a customs inquiry. We are on the highest level of a constitutional struggle to decide whether the rights of the people, which have been won after so many difficulties, are to be safeguarded. That is the question. I do not care whether that principle is upheld by the Liberal party, by the Progressive party, or even by the Tory party. By whomsoever it is upheld, I will under any circumstances stand behind the public men in this country who will preserve and maintain the rights and liberties our forefathers won for us, and I do not think that any member in this House will be willing to renounce the birthright which he has received, simply in order to please the Right Hon. Arthur Meighen.

What are the circumstances which brought about this crisis? The Right Hon. Mr. Meighen advised the crown in this country that he could carry on the business of the House. He advised the supreme authority in this country that he was in a position to carry on a government. The right hon. gentleman either was sincere or he was not. If he was sincere, what could have been the meaning of his advice? It could have had only one meaning, that he could carry on constitutional government and nothing else. Will any hon. gentleman contend for one moment that the crown could have been advised by the right hon. gentleman that we were to have in this country a revolution in constitutional methods? My hon. friend laughs.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I should think so.

Mr. CANNON: His only answer up to now has been laughter. I hope he will get something else, because this is a serious question. The only meaning of the advice given by the right hon. gentleman, when he told the supreme authority in this country that he could carry on, must have been that he could carry on in a constitutional way. Is he doing it? If he is not doing it, he has deceived the crown. Is he doing it?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Yes.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

[Mr. Cannon.]

Mr. CANNON: He is doing it, is he? My right hon. friend who is leading the House, and who was formerly a Minister of Finance, a man who has held high office in this country says that he is doing it—my hon. friend, who gets up in this House and without any hesitation says that he is nothing, and yet nevertheless wants to lead this House. If on the other hand, the advice given by the Prime Minister was that he could conduct the affairs of this country in an unconstitutional way, I do not believe that any hon. member of this House will stand behind him. We have been reproached and told, certainly with some amount of truth at times, that too often the House of Commons is simply the witness of political warfare. Mr. Speaker, we must not make any mistake as to what politics are. Politics is the greatest science that any human being can become familiar with.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): It should be.

Mr. CANNON: The object of politics is the improvement of the conditions under which human beings live, and if any man can do any good to his fellow-citizens through his political influence or his political knowledge, I do not think he need be ashamed of saying that he is a politician. But there is a distinction between politics and partisanship. There is a distinction between high politics and petty party matters. We have now reached the point in the affairs of our country where we need politicians in the highest sense of the word, and not petty partisans, like some of our friends on the other side have shown themselves to be in this debate. So I say, Mr. Speaker, that the Prime Minister of to-day is Prime Minister only on account of the very solemn declaration that he must have given, and that he did give, that he could carry on public affairs in Canada through constitutional means. Let us see now if he has done that.

My hon. friend the ex-Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) has quoted the law, and I shall not go back over that ground and quote more law, because my hon. friend has done it in his usual perfect way. The law concerning governments is very simple. Any hon. member can understand it; he need not be a lawyer for that. As I said yesterday afternoon in the course of another debate, the great underlying principle of the British constitution is that the king can do no wrong. In England, so long as ministerial responsibility was not fully established, a king could be called to account for his conduct. Charles I was beheaded; others were disposed of by the estates of the realm, because then the king was considered as being personally responsible for the administration of public affairs. But a change took place in the minds of the statesmen of England, and they said: The king, in order to exercise his full authority as it should be exercised, should cease to be an individual and be maintained only as an institution. The king is not an individual under our constitution, Mr. Speaker; he is an institution. But hon. gentlemen will ask me, if the king is not to be held responsible for the conduct of public affairs who shall be held responsible, because somebody has to be responsible to parliament. The answer to that is that the government which advises the crown is always responsible for the actions of the crown.

Therefore, unless we have ministers who are responsible to the House, where is the responsibility for the present conduct of public affairs? The Prime Minister is not in the House. He is not responsible to us; he is not a member of the House. And the other ministers in the one breath tell us that they are not ministers, and in the other breath they say that being ministers without portfolio they are in no way responsible to the ordinary constitutional usage. If we have not got the Prime Minister in this House to assume the responsibilities for the acts of the crown, if we have no other minister substituted for the Prime Minister to assume responsibility for those acts, then, constitutionally speaking, this result follows—the crown becomes directly responsible. Is that what my hon. friends wish? We stand for the constitution as it is to-day, and we tell the members of the Tory party, who always have been so eager and so desirous to protect the royal prerogative—we tell them: Give the crown the protection to which it is entitled through ministerial responsibility. If there is one institution which is respected in Canada if there is one institution for which we will fight to the very last moment in this parliament, it is the institution of the crown. But we tell hon. gentlemen opposite this: Regularize your position in order not to project the crown into our party warfare.

Now, Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend who preceded me said: "My situation is exactly the same as the situation of the former Minister of National Defence, the present member for Antigonish-Guysborough (Mr. Macdonald)." Let us examine this contention very briefly. When the former Minister of National Defence was sworn in as an acting minister for a while, we had at that time in Canada a regularly constituted government under sworn ministers. What is the oath that a minister has to swear to? What is it? This is the oath that a minister has to take:

> I—do solemnly and sincerely promise and swear that I will duly and faithfully, and to the best of my skill and knowledge execute the powers and trusts reposed in me as minister.

When an acting minister in a properly constituted government acts for a short time, if he does not take the oath there are other ministers who have taken it and who are responsible to parliament and have to be in parliament to defend his acts. That is the distinction. When Senator Dandurand was acting minister, when Mr. Macdonald was acting minister, if these gentlemen had done anything that they should not have done—anything against their powers or against the trust reposed in them—their colleagues in the then government were in the House of Commons to answer for their acts. Have we got this situation here?

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. CANNON: The only sworn minister in this government is the Prime Minister. The Prime Minister is not in the House, he is not answerable to us for any of his acts. And what actually are his tactics? His tactics are to get rid of us as soon as possible in order that the House of Commons or parliament shall not take control over the administration of public affairs at this critical juncture in our history. No man can administer a department, unless under exceptional circumstances such as I explained a minute ago, without taking an oath. Could, for instance, the leader of the opposition go into the Department of Finance and give orders? He could not; he could not undertake to administer that department—although a privy councillor—without taking an oath to perform his duties properly. We have in this House officers who perform their duties, as we all know, with absolute perfection. Our Clerk could not sit here for a minute unless he had taken previously an oath to perform his duties as he should. We as members of the House of Commons were not permitted to take our seats at the opening of this parliament, not one of us, before declaring on the Bible that we would fulfil our duties as we should. If we are not allowed to sit as private members without taking the oath, are hon. gentlemen opposite going to run the country without taking it? The acting minister who preceded me said "Show me the law that forces a minister to take an oath?" The law is common decency. Law? If the clerk of the city where my hon. friend the Acting Minister of Finance (Sir Henry Drayton) lives, wishes to collect five cents, he has to take the oath of office. That being so, is my friend who is going to spend hundreds of millions of dollars to be freed from taking the oath?

I have spoken, I think, long enough, but this is an important question. The Tory party, Mr. Speaker, have one great quality, and that quality is to pretend to safeguard the constitution while they are tearing it. Read the history of England and you will see that encroachments upon the constitution have often been committed by the Tory party while pretending at the same time to protect that constitution. But coming nearer our shores read the history of Canada, read the annals of our constitutional evolution, and you will see that the Tory party invariably while pretending to protect the rights of the crown have had absolutely no hesitation in trampling on those rights if the interests of their party incited them to do so. Let us come to more recent years. We are deciding to-day the momentous question as to whether a man can be given the right to be Prime Minister of this country without following any of the constitutional processes. I am not speaking as a member of the Liberal party but I am speaking on behalf of and in the name of the citizens of my province—nay in the name of the citizens of the whole of my country—and I say to hon. gentlemen opposite: You are coming to this House and through the mouth of the acting leader of the House asking us to give you a mandate to run the affairs of Canada. Before we give you that mandate and before we resign one ounce of the authority of parliament we ask you "What is your record? What have you done in the past? Your past is the only guarantee we have of your future conduct." Before we reach a decision let us look back into the history of the Prime Minister of Canada to-day and ask ourselves if we can give him the least bit of authority that the law does not allow him to have—the man who for party purposes stole the elections of 1917, the man who deprived regularly elected members of this House of their seats, in order that his party might be in power, the man who deprived thousands of electors of this country of the opportunity to express their views, because he was afraid their verdict would not be favourable to his party politics, the man who transformed this country into an armed camp, where races facing other races were asking if a civil war would not be necessary in order to protect the liberties that we had won. This is the man who comes to this parliament and asks the members of parliament to give him a blank cheque, in order that he can repeat this year the unfortunate happenings that we witnessed in former years. I am not interested in systems of co-operation any more. I am not interested in the petty local provincial problems. It is a question now for every man who wishes to safeguard Canadian liberty to stand behind those in this House who wish to vote for the triumph of constitutional government in Canada.

In concluding, Mr. Speaker, I remind the House that to-day the sun rose on this Canadian land to light the first of July, the anniversary of confederation. In 1867 our present form of government was born, and under that government we have striven to make our country great, prosperous and united. Will it be said that on that same day over fifty years later those who inherit the duties and obligations of the Fathers of Confederation have forgotten, for local or petty interests, the great charge, the momentous charge, to conserve and maintain the charter of our freedom on Canadian soil?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON (Leader of the House): May I congratulate my hon. friend who has just spoken (Mr. Cannon) upon the calm and logical manner in which he has discussed a constitutional question! He has been discussing it however in the only way the question can be logically discussed by him and by his friends; that is in the way it was discussed last night by the right hon. former Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King). What have we to-day from this hon. member on the constitutional question? We have to-day from him a wild torrent of abuse, an attack, Mr. Speaker upon my right hon. leader which is as everybody knows utterly unjustifiable.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No, no.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Yes. And we have references to all kinds of things frequently discussed in this House before, but having absolutely nothing to do with this constitutional question, and I am not going to discuss them, because it is not necessary to do so. The known character and standing of Arthur Meighen of itself is an absolute answer to everything the hon. member said. Further than that—well we will drop that point.

Now, Mr. Speaker, in his calmer moments, before he was absolutely intoxicated with his own eloquence, my hon. friend assayed to present some considered arguments to the House. In the first instance, he wants to know what we are, and he wants to know where we are, what I think we are, or whether we are what they said we were—

(Cheers and other demonstrations in the lobby having been heard in the House):

I would say the great constitutional authority has carried his constitutional jury with him.

An hon. MEMBER: They are listening to my hon. friend's speech.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: When hon. members are quite finished I will go on.

An hon. MEMBER: Go ahead.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Have I permission to proceed?

An hon. MEMBER: Have you taken the oath?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: You know, Mr. Speaker, I can quite understand this conduct of my hon. friends. It is the only way they can do anything in the present situation, and the whole thing is done out of pique, coming from hon. gentlemen who cannot understand the situation.

Now, Mr. Speaker, we brought in to the House two days ago a written statement which gives the exact facts to the House. There is absolutely no question about those exact facts. It is perfectly true that we are simply acting ministers. It is also perfectly true that we are as much subject to the House and the House has just as much control over us as if we had been sworn in a dozen times. We are just as much responsible to this House as if we were drawing salaries, and the real distinction is that we are not drawing salaries. What really is the trouble here? That is the one thing that one has to ask himself. Is it that hon. members do not like to see ministers working without pay; because that is the only practical difficulty. We have, Mr. Speaker, ministers now working without pay.

An hon. MEMBER: Too bad.

Mr. CAHILL: And without authority.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: That may be my hon. friend's opinion. It is not the fact. They are acting in precisely the same way as acting ministers always have acted; there is no change at all.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: May I ask the hon. member a question along lines similar to a question I asked before? Would the hon. gentleman suggest that, if at any time a cabinet, or the members of a cabinet, proposed to go without pay for a year or so, they would on that account be entitled to administer the affairs of the country without going before their constituents?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Not at all. We have perfect unanimity upon one point, surely, and that is this—we have it admitted by the hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Lapointe)—that we can have acting ministers for short periods of time. That was the argument. What was the statement to the House? It was that these are merely temporary appointments for the purpose of winding up the business of this House.

Mr. GUERIN: Are hon. gentlemen opposite responsible to the House for their acts?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Yes. It is entirely a matter for the House to say whether they want us to wind up the business of the House or not.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): If it is true, as the hon. member states, that the only essential difference between the position in which they now find themselves and that in which they may find themselves as soon as they become ministers instead of acting ministers, is the fact that they are not drawing salaries, is there any necessity that they should at any time become ministers?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: This is admittedly a temporary situation. I am referring to the situation having regard to that temporary period as regards our duties.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Does the hon. member think that although acting for the moment in a temporary capacity he and his colleagues are acting unconstitutionally and have not authority?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: No.

Mr. GARLAND: That is the inference.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Not at all. My hon. friend does not follow me there. It is admitted by the ex-ministers who have spoken in this debate that the House can have acting ministers and that those acting ministers can perform the necessary functions of the office.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): But the acting ministers must be constitutionally appointed.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Certainly, and we were.

Sir EUGENE FISET: No, you were not.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The Deputy Minister of Justice says so; the clerk of the Privy Council says so. They say that we were appointed in exactly the same way as was the former administration, as was the administration of Sir Wilfrid Laurier.

Mr. CAHILL: With the exception that they were sworn in as ministers.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: With the exception that we were appointed acting instead of regular ministers. It is admitted that you can have acting ministers. We have had the case, for example, of the ex-Minister of National Defence (Mr. Macdonald). His case is precisely the same as ours.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): This is so important a point that I wish the hon. member who is speaking would make himself perfectly clear upon it. My understanding of the situation—and I am simply going to put a question—is that the late Acting Minister of National Defence, when acting minister, was appointed by an order in council passed by a properly constituted council with authority to perform that act. In this case the point in dispute is that the hon. members who are now acting ministers were appointed by one man only and not by a quorum of the council.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: My hon. friend must see that, as a matter of constitutional law, anyone who is a member of the Privy Council summoned to attend—and they have to be summoned, I admit, and the summoning has to come from the gentleman to whom His Excellency has entrusted the task—can attend a meeting of the Privy Council. The six were summoned; they were there, and they had absolutely full authority to do every single thing that was done. Their jurisdiction to act is not a jurisdiction as ministers sitting in the Privy Council. We all know that every member of that Privy Council can attend if summoned although he may have nothing to do for the time being with administration, or although he may be serving during the whole course of the government as an acting minister having no department whatever, maybe having no department assigned to him, but being minister without portfolio.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Granting that privy councillors who are summoned may act as privy councillors in council and pass orders in council, can the same men then act as ministers of departments?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Yes. There is absolutely no trouble about that at all. They are assigned to departments by orders in council which they have the right to pass.

Mr. CAHILL: Where do they get the authority?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: It is done in that way in every department.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: There comes before us a document that purports to be an order of the Privy Council. Is that document valid simply because members who have taken the oath of privy councillors and have been summoned, have passed or voted in favour of it? Is that what constitutes its validity?

Mr. BOYS: Why not?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: My hon. friend is quite right. As long as they are regularly there, as long as they have the confidence of the gentleman in whom His Excellency has reposed his confidence, it is perfectly regular. In fact it is the only way in which this can be done. There has to be a start in the case of all governments. This is the way in which Sir Wilfrid Laurier's government started.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: We have not a government yet.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: My right hon. friend says that we have not a government yet. In one sense he is perfectly right and in another sense he is perfectly wrong.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: This has never been done before in Canada.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I shall have something to say about that later.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: They do not have to take the oath, neither does there need to be a quorum? Is that my understanding of the matter?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: My hon. friend is wrong; the oath has to be taken, and the oath of a privy councillor is a much longer and more specific one than the other.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Not the minister's oath?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: No. That is limited to one particular department to which the minister is assigned.

Sir EUGENE FISET: Is it not a fact that in the case of the hon. member for Antigonish (Mr. Macdonald) when he was appointed Acting Minister of National Defence, he had already been sworn in as member of the Privy Council without portfolio and therefore he could be appointed by order in council to act in any department, while in the present case the only oath of office that hon. gentlemen opposite took was when they were sworn in as privy councillors. If this oath, as has been stated, stands good in their case, then they are in the same position as a minister who has been duly appointed, and therefore they have not the right to sit in this House and must appeal to the people.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I am afraid my hon. friend, under the guise of asking a question, is abusing the privileges of the House and making a speech. I am sorry he did not make it with his customary reserve.

Sir EUGENE FISET: I am talking from experience.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: My hon. friend's experience in this case is unfortunately not quite right. The position of the hon. member for Antigonish, having regard to his oath, is exactly the same as my position, as the position of my hon. friend the Acting Minister of Justice (Mr. Guthrie), or any of the others.

Sir EUGENE FISET: Will my hon. friend allow me? That is exactly what we contend. If this oath is the same my hon. friends have no right to sit there as members of this House.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: All that I can say is that the hon. member for Antigonish did sit as a minister in this House. He sat for four months as a minister in this House, and moreover without there being any regular minister of that department. Therefore his case is exactly the case of the acting ministers here.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I put a question?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I think I have been fairly reasonable in regard to interruptions and I want to get on. I will answer any questions hon. gentlemen like to ask when I have finished. I want to deal with the question raised as to our responsibility to the House. We are absolutely responsible to the House.

Mr. DUNNING: But you are very anxious to get rid of the House.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: My hon. friend no doubt thinks that is a bright remark. He may want to stay here all year, but I do not and I am sure there are a great many other hon. gentlemen who are equally anxious to get away. The hon. member may be such a slave to duty that he wants to keep us talking constitutional questions indefinitely. Nobody else wants to do that. Now we are responsible to the House, as the conduct of the present opposition shows beyond doubt. Hon. gentlemen opposite are continually trying to get vote against us in the House, and they know that we are responsible to parliament. It is simply idle to talk about there being no responsible government when by their very actions hon. gentlemen show that they believe there is.

We came before the House with the express declaration that our activities should be confined to closing up the work of the session. The regular government to be formed has not yet been appointed. The present government, so far as this House is concerned, is merely acting for the House in order to put into effect the work which has been done so far this session. That is all. Is that a crime against responsible government? I should have thought it would be a crime against responsible government not to make some effort to carry into effect the work which parliament has laboured to perfect. And that is all we are trying to do.

The only speech which we have heard today that carries an argument is that of the ex-Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe). He points out that in the order in council which appointed him to take charge of the Secretary of State's department, there was explicit provision that no salary should be paid. Well, there was a reason for that. The fact is, however, that there has never been inserted in any order in council appointing an acting minister any provision in regard to salary, for the reason, as we all know, that it has never been the practice to pay acting ministers any salary. Acting ministers are not entitled to remuneration, inasmuch as they take no oath of office and have no patent.

Mr. BOURASSA: In Mr. Meighen's statement which was read to the House on Tuesday, the following paragraph appears:

> The Prime Minister accordingly decided to constitute and submit to His Excellency a temporary ministry composed of seven members, who would be sworn in without portfolio, and who would assume responsibility as acting ministers of the several departments.

Has that undertaking been fulfilled? Have hon. gentlemen who are acting as ministers taken the oath indicated in that statement by the Prime Minister?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What is referred to in that statement is the oath as members of the Privy Council. The hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Black), prior to that time, had not been a member of the Privy Council and he had to take that oath.

4 p.m.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It says seven members who would be sworn, not one.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: My right hon. friend may find some pleasure in grasping at straws—

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Not straws.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Why, the right hon. gentleman fairly made the heavens ring a short time ago because he found there was only one oath. Now he says there should be more than one oath. He cannot have it both ways.

Mr. BOURASSA: In the other cases, it was the same oath taken by the various gentlemen composing the government at the time they became privy councillors some years ago.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Yes. And that is the right thing to do according to the report of Mr. Lemaire which we have received after an exhaustive study of the situation.

Let me answer the point made by the ex-Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe), to the effect that, as there was no stipulation in these orders in council that no salary should be paid, we are therefore disqualified. As I have already said, it has never been the practice to make any such stipulation in any order appointing an acting minister. True, it was done when the ex-Minister of Justice was appointed, not as acting minister, but as permanent minister in charge of the Department of Secretary of State. Hon. gentlemen will see the difference. In that instance my hon. friend was a regular, permanent minister, and as such he would be technically entitled to salary. Under the act he would also be entitled to salary as Minister of Justice, both being permanent portfolios That of course would be wrong. It would be a technical and forced interpretation of the law to contend that he should receive a separate salary as Secretary of State, and clearly that was never the intention. But in order to obviate any possibility of misunderstanding that clause was inserted. It has never, however, been the custom to make such a provision in connection with acting ministers, for the simple reason that, as I have stated and reiterated, acting ministers have no right to receive any salary. Nor was such a stipulation made in the case of the ex-Minister of National Defence (Mr. Macdonald, Antigonish) who acted, and very properly acted, for four months without pay.

Now we are entirely in the hands of the House. If the House wants us to go on we are perefectly willing to proceed to carry out the business of the session. If, on the other hand, for any reason real or fancied—and I have heard no real reasons so far advanced—the House does not want its programme carried into effect, and desires to have us abandon it, we are in the judgment of hon. members.

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the Opposition): Regarding the last remark of my hon. friend, may I say that this session's work will be concluded and satisfactorily concluded by prorogation but it will be concluded at the instance of a Prime Minister who has the confidence of this House and who is able to control it, and not at the instance of a government which, as the hon. gentleman says, does not exist in one sense, while it does in another. I want to make the situation clear so that hon. gentlemen will have no misunderstanding. The statement of the leader of the House (Sir Henry Drayton) was intended to convey the impression that if this House was not satisfied with hon. gentlemen opposite there would be a dissolution without the business of the session being concluded. No consequence of that kind necessarily follows at all. If it is shown that hon. gentlemen opposite are not in a position to conduct the business of this House as it should be conducted and that they have not the authority to carry on the business of the country as it should be carried on, then it becomes the duty of the adviser to His Excellency to so advise the Governor General, and it becomes the duty of His Excellency to send for someone who can bring to a close the business of this House in acordance with the support and the confidence of the House.

Mr. McGIBBON: Not a discredited minister.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I will not pay any attention to my hon. friend. I wish to make it clear to the House that if the present Prime Minister advised His Excellency that he found it impossible to carry on, His Excellency must then send for the present leader of the opposition—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: —and should I be called upon, I will undertake to advise His Excellency to arrange for a prorogation in the first instance in order that the legislation of this session may be given assent to, and that after prorogation, dissolution should take place. There will be no dissolution until after prorogation; that is the point I want to make clear.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I would like to ask the hon. gentleman one question, because this matter is immensely interesting and involved. Assuming that that advice be given by the right hon. Prime Minister, so called, to-day; supposing that situation arises and His Excellency is advised that the present Prime Minister is unable to carry on. Then His Excellency may call upon the right hon. leader of the opposition—

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That is his duty.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Yes, just a moment. The former ministers have ceased to be such; they are now private members, and in that event what more right would they have to vote money or to have the House vote money than the present government?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am very glad my hon. friend asked that question, because the more he studies the workings of the British constitution the more he will see that it has been so developed as to secure the principle of the freedom of parliament in all these matters. The members of the former government sitting on this side of the House have been ministers of the crown during the present session of this parliament. Each of us after we assumed office resigned our seats, went back to the people for re-election, were re-elected and returned to this parliament. There is not one minister of the administration of which I had the honour to be the head who has not been back to the people for re-election, who has not received the approval of the people as a minister, and who has not sat in this House as a minister of the crown. The situation is that ministers who have been ministers in one session are entitled within a specified time during that session again to assume their seats upon the treasury benches without going back for re-election, and they are the only ministers who are entitled to assume authority.

I contend, Mr. Speaker, that no minister is entitled to put through estimates or to attempt to do anything in this House who, after assuming responsibility as a minister, has not resigned his seat, gone back to the people for re-election, been re-elected and returned to this House. If that be the case in order that the public weal may be properly secured, does any hon. member think the constitution ever contemplated a subterfuge which would allow acting ministers to do these things without complying with the qualifications laid down for ministers? Why, Mr. Speaker, the whole purpose of having ministers go back for re-election is that a private member of the House is in an entirely different position from a member who undertakes to exercise authority under the crown either as a minister or as an acting minister. The theory of the constitution is that a member has been elected to parliament but he has not been elected as a minister of the crown; there have not been reposed in him any powers or trusts of any kind such as the oath of office contemplates shall be reposed in those who attempt in any way to administer the affairs of a department. When an hon. gentleman has taken the oath of office or undertakes to assume the powers and trusts of the administration of a ministerial department he must go back to the people and to all intents and purposes say, "You elected me as a member; you did not elect me as a minister having responsibilities. I have to come back for your approval of that higher office to which I have been invited."

I hope my hon. friend who asked the question clearly understands the situation. This is all-important, because the whole business of parliament may fall to the ground if the procedure is irregular in any particular. The law of the constitution contemplates that matters shall be carried out in accordance with parliamentary usage, custom and law, and if parliamentary usage and law is departed from then the business of parliament becomes so irregular, the business of government generally throughout the country becomes so irregular, that it is impossible to say whether at any time something which is done is legal. We have to be very careful in that regard. My contention is that there is no ministry in office in the true sense of the word; that as a consequence any acts performed by the so-called ministry cannot be held to be valid in any particular, and that the ministry has no right to exist.

A few moments ago when I said, "There is no government in office," the leader of the House answered, "In one sense the hon. gentleman is right," but I ask hon. members this question: Since when was the government of Canada carried on by a government of which it could be said in any sense that they were not a government? That is exactly the question, and that is the whole issue as I presented it to His Excellency the Governor General in tendering my advice. I said it was impossible for hon. gentlemen opposite to form a government which would be known as a government in the true sense of the word, for the simple reason that before they could act as ministers or assume responsibility of an executive character they would have to resign their seats and go back to the people for re-election, and I knew if they attempted to do that they could not carry on successfully the business of this parliament.

The more one thinks of this thing the more one sees how crucial is the whole situation in regard to parliamentary institutions. I want to make that perfectly clear, because I think it is all-important to the country that there should be no mistake as to the situation which exists to-day. I advised His Excellency that I did not believe anyone else could carry on in this House and perform the necessary duties of a prime minister in order to bring about prorogation in a regular way. I took into account the situation we see here now; knowing the present Prime Minister I knew exactly what his tactics would be if he were asked to form a ministry. Under these circumstances I could not advise His Excellency to send for the right hon. gentleman, but I had to leave to His Excellency a free hand to find any member of parliament who would undertake the task. What has the Prime Minister done? He has gone to His Excellency and said, "I can carry on the government of this country", and it is only because he has so represented his power to His Excellency that that advice was accepted. Now the position is this. What we are witnessing at the moment is that hon. gentlemen opposite not only have not the capacity to carry on, but admit themselves that they have not the powers of ministers of the crown.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: No.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Does my hon. friend say they have the powers?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Yes, as I tried to explain to my hon. friend we have the powers, temporary powers.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What is the use of laughing? We have always said so.

An hon. MEMBER: How long will they last?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: It entirely depends upon this House. This House can stop them to-day or to-morrow. When this House is over our powers stop.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: There we have exactly the threat that my hon. friend was holding over us a moment ago. There is the threat that is being held over the head of hon. members. The present Prime Minister, through his representative in this House, is threatening that there will be a dissolution brought about unless the House permits them to carry on.

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: There is no threat.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: There is a threat.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I rise to a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker. I was asked as to the duration of our powers, and I said it depends upon this House. When this House is not here, this temporary ministry is over, and the Prime Minister will then proceed with the task of forming a permanent government.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend says: When this House is not here, our work is over. I want to tell him, that if the constitutional course is pursued, their work will be over while this House is still here. That statement embraces the whole constitutional position. Their work should never have begun. Their work is not going on to-day. Their work is over now; it was long since past. They have no right to stay here for an hour, and I say that as soon as that fact is brought home to His Excellency by his duly constituted adviser, as it will be brought home ultimately through the force of public opinion, if not from the arguments in this House, then it becomes the duty of His Excellency, if His Excellency is going to act, as I believe he will, in a constitutional way, to say to the present Prime Minister: You led me to believe that you could carry on the business of this House, and I gave you your chance; I gave you your opportunity, but now that you come and are obliged to admit that you are unable to carry on the business of this House, I cannot grant to you, I cannot constitutionally grant to you, a dissolution when within the past few days I have refused a dissolution to another Prime Minister, and when the whole reason was that you undertook to carry on and took the responsbility of my refusal of a dissolution.

Is there difficulty in imagining, and this is a very serious thing for the crown and its representative—I put this to hon. gentlemen opposite whose duty it is to protect the crown: If any other course were taken by His Excellency than that, what interpretation would immediately be put upon His Excellency's act? It would be that His Excellency had taken a particular course for the purpose of favouring one political party rather than another political party in control of the government of this country. Now that is a course which, as I know His Excellency the Governor General, I believe he would be the last person in the world intentionally to take. I say that I believe His Excellency the Governor General wishes to be in every particular a constitutional governor, but I say that it is the duty of his advisers to see that he is not permitted to make a mistake which will in any particular threaten the high office which he holds or bring into public controversy and discussion the name of the crown or its reprsentatives. That is all important.

I want to make clear again the position. I tell my hon. friend who is leading the House that it is his duty now, as a member of the ministry which is advising His Excellency the Governor General, to tell his leader the Prime Minister that it is his duty to go to His Excellency the Governor General and to say to His Excellency: My ministers have stated in the House over and over again that they are not ministers of the crown; the leader in the House (Sir Henry Drayton) has told the House of Commons that there is no government in office at the present time in one sense. That is what my right hon. friend has said, and another minister last night used the expression, and it will be found on the records of Hansard to-day: We are not the king's ministers; we are not ministers of the crown. I say that those statements should immediately be brought to the attention of His Excellency, and His Excellency should be advised at the same time that it is now his constitutional duty under the circumstances to send for someone else to see if the business of the country can be concluded in a proper way. That is the constitutional obligation of the adviser of the crown in circumstances such as we have at the present time.

Mr. MANION: May I ask why my right hon. friend, when he had the opportunity, did not carry on himself?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Because he was defeated three times in the House.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): He was never defeated.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The records of this House show that while I was Prime Minister never once was the government of which I was the head defeated in any way.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Three times.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend from Fort William (Mr. Manion) asked, why did I not go to His Excellency and say that I could carry on. I went to His Excellency and what I said was this that I did not believe the business of this House could be carried on in a manner befitting the dignity and honour of parliament. I did not say it could not be carried on by subterfuge; I did not say it could not be carried on by intrigue; I did not say it could not be carried on by devious methods of one kind or another. What I did say was that this House could not be carried on with honour and dignity to the crown and its representative and for that reason I thought that there should be a dissolution, but when I was counselling a dissolution, I never contemplated that the business of this session would end there. After discussing dissolution and obtaining a decision favourable to dissolution, my next step would have been to consider the time at which dissolution should be taken. I would have advised His Excellency to arrange immediately for prorogation, and in the Speech from the Throne to announce the dissolution. That is the manner in which it should properly be done. That is the only way in which dissolution at the moment should be thought of by any party concerned.

What I wish to make clear now, because it is the whole constitutional issue so far as the crown and the representative of the crown is concerned, is that the crown cannot refuse the advice of one Prime Minister and immediately thereafter, within the same week, accept the same advice from someone who has taken the responsibility for the refusal in the first case. Let me put the position clearly, so that we will get away from any mistaken ideas in regard to matters of this kind.

Assume for a moment that it is not a case of this parliament, but a case of the British parliament, and that Mr. Baldwin is conducting the affairs of the British House. Mr. Baldwin goes to His Majesty the King and says: Owing to the different groups that we have, owing to the uncertainty of numbers and the parity of parties, I have reached the point where with the great problems with which this nation has to deal at the present time—such as the industrial troubles with which he has been dealing, assuming that such conditions existed with a House composed as this one is—I feel that the business of parliament cannot be carried on successfully by anyone, and that the only thing that will save the situation is a dissolution of parliament, and allowing the people to express their views anew, so that we may get a House that is more representative of the popular will than the House is at the present moment. Assuming that advice was tendered to His Majesty the King, I venture to say—and I say it because it has been true for a hundred years—that His Majesty the King would not refuse to grant a dissolution in those circumstances. I say His Majesty would grant it, that it would be his constitutional duty to grant it, and for a hundred years it has never been refused. But assume for a moment that His Majesty the King had doubts as to whether the business of the House could be carried on, and he had reason to believe that Mr. Ramsay MacDonald might be able to carry on, and Mr. MacDonald were to say "I can carry on the business of the House and will undertake so to do." and His Majesty the King were to give him the opportunity. Ramsay MacDonald goes back to the House of Commons to show what he can do. He would never do—no British statesman would ever do—what has been done here. Imagine this kind of thing in the Mother of Parliaments over yonder? Imagine any Prime Minister undertaking to tell the people of Great Britain that he would carry on the business of the country with half a dozen acting ministers? And they say themselves that they are not ministers; and they say themselves that they are not a government in one sense of the word. Does anyone assume that, if that sort of situation presented itself, that at the end of the week His Majesty the King would grant to Mr. Ramsay MacDonald the dissolution which he had refused to Mr. Baldwin? Now my position is this: We in Canada are a self-governing dominion in the full sense of the word. With respect to our own domestic affairs the government of the day stands in the same relation to the Governor General as the government of the day in Great Britain stands in relation to His Majesty the King. In those circumstances I say that the procedure that would be expected to be followed in the Old Country should be followed here. I believe that is the intention of His Excellency, Lord Byng. I believe it to be the intention of His Excellency to see that constitutional procedure is followed. Have we not been talking about equality of status as a thing newly acquired within the British Empire? Before I leave the point I have just been referring to, let me quote an authority which I trust hon. gentlemen opposite will be prepared to accept, although I fear they may even hesitate so to do. I have in my hand a volume entitled Canadian Constitutional Studies.

An hon. MEMBER: Who is the author?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Someone asks "Who is the author?" I am surprised that the question should come from that side of the House. The author, according to the title page, is the Right Hon. Sir Robert Laird Borden, G.C.M.G., D.C.L., L.L.D., and I am proud to say that the volume bears the following inscription "The Hon. W. L. Mackenzie King, Prime Minister, with the compliments of Sir Robert Borden." I have made some of my constitutional studies from the writings of Sir Robert Borden. I regard Sir Robert Borden as a very eminent constitutional authority, and here is what Sir Robert says at page 61 of this book with respect to our constitutional development from confederation down to the time of the world war:

> In the discussion of executive competence it is important to examine the status and functions of the Governor General.

That is not bringing the name of the Governor General into discussion; the author is discussing the general relations of the government and the Governor General. I continue to quote:

> Before 1848 he was regarded as an imperial officer responsible primarily to the British government through the Colonial Office. With the progress of responsible government, there came a necessary change in his relation to the administration of public affairs. In Canada this relation is the same in all essential respects as that of the King in Great Britain.

I ask the present Prime Minister to take this volume of Sir Robert Borden, a former Conservative Prime Minister in this parliament, one who has had larger experience in the problems of government than any other public man living in Canada to-day, and place before His Excellency those words:

> In Canada this relation is the same in all essential respects as that of the King in Great Britain. The administration of public affairs is conducted by ministers responsible to parliament, and the Governor General acts by their advice.

These gentlemen talk about being responsible ministers, ministers responsible to parliament. Why they tell us here that they are not responsible to anyone. They say there is no need for oaths, there is no need for orders in council, there is no need for statutes. They might as well add there is no need for parliament itself; all that is necessary is that the Right Hon. Arthur Meighen should tell whoever happens to be Governor General in Canada "I can form a government and carry on if you will let me do it, just as I please myself." That is the position we are face to face with.

Now may I give one or two other authorities on this matter? I will not at the moment take further Canadian authorities; I have already quoted from an eminent Canadian source. I will take a British authority, and I will begin with one who is a distinguished graduate of Oxford university. The volume I am about to quote is Responsible Government in the Dominions by Arthur Berriedale Keith, M.A.,

(Edin.), D.C.L. (Oxon), of the Inner Temple, barrister-at-law, and of the Colonial Office, Junior Assistant Secretary to the Imperial conference, Membre Effectif de l'Institut Colonial International, in three volumes, volume 1, Oxford, at the Clarendon Press, 1912. At page 180 of this volume hon. gentlemen will find under the heading Executive Government—the Governor as Head, the following statement; Let me say that Mr. Berriedale Keith is recognized throughout the world as a leading constitutional authority; I do not believe there is any one writing on constitutional law and parliamentary institutions who is recognized as being more of an authority than Mr. Berriedale Keith. He says at page 180:

> It is a complete mistake to suppose that the governor is entitled to refuse advice because he does not approve the actions of his ministers, and thinks that he may have a good chance of getting a majority for the opposition if he refuses their advice: his duty is not to his own conscience, but to the people of the dominion which he governs, and he should execute that duty independently of every other consideration.

In other words the point that is brought out there is not that the Governor General is a person who should not have a conscience, but that the Governor General, as a constitutional governor, is in the position that the king is in when it is said "The king can do no wrong". That is one of the oldest maxims of Constitutional government—the king can do no wrong. That does not mean that in his personal capacity and conduct he may not be capable of doing things that are wrong. It does mean that as king he acts only upon the advice of his ministers, so that if a wrong is done it is not the wrong of the sovereign, it is the wrong of the adviser. That is the position that I take at the moment. The great wrong that is being done at this hour to the crown, and to its representative in this country, is that its advisers are deliberately permitting the crown to remain in the position they have placed it in of appearing to take sides in party warfare and party struggle. Listen to this:

> The normal form of the refusal to accept ministerial advice is when a ministry beaten in parliament, or which is losing its hold on parliament, asks for a dissolution in order that it may strengthen its hand in the country.

That is putting it pretty strongly—I think as strongly as it can be put, that the normal form of refusing to accept ministerial advice is where a ministry seems to be losing its hold on parliament and asks for a dissolution in order that it may strengthen its hand in the country. Now, what does Mr. Keith say in that regard:

> Now the imperial practice in this regard is, of course, that the minister receives a dissolution when he asks for it.

Even in such an extreme case as that a prime minister is granted a dissolution. And why is that the recognized imperial practice? It is the recognized imperial practice because it is known that the highest tribunal to which the government can appeal is the electorate. If a government were asking the crown or its representatives to continue it in office when it was losing its hold, then there might be ground for a refusal, but when a government asks that it have the right to go before the people to be judged because conditions are such that it is impossible for anyone to carry on a government, then we find that the imperial practice is as stated here. This authority says that of course the minister receives a dissolution when he asks it. He continues:

> There is in favour of this view the most important authority, and the expressions of opinion which have been made on the other side from time to time are hardly authoritative. It is indeed clear that the refusal of a dissolution is much too dangerous a course for the crown to take; it at once reduces the crown, however reluctantly, to be a partisan in a political struggle. In the case of a governor this does not matter very seriously; he is only a temporary tenant of office, and his personality and popularity are not things of the highest moment; he may discredit the post of governor and weaken the imperial connection, but these things can be put right by a tactful successor, and, truth to tell, both governors and ministers, as self-government develops, seem to grow more used to work together; the governor exercises more influence if less power than his predecessors in the sixties and seventies, and there are fewer of those claims, preposterous on both sides to an unimpassioned view, than then were rife. But the popularity of the crown is only borne out by absolute ministerial responsibility; the loyalty of the country to the crown must depend in political matters on the feeling that whatever is done is done not as a royal whim but at the will of a ministry commanding influence in the country. Any other theory, however specious, is sure in the long run to lead to the degradation of the crown, which owes its absolute security, as Lord John Russell pointed out in 1839, to its standing apart from all political strife.

That is as far as I think I need quote from that authority. I said I would give the House British authorities. I quoted from the great English university of Oxford and I now quote from another authority the great university of Cambridge. I hold in my hand a volume entitled, Some Historical Principles of the Constitution, by Kenneth Pickthorne, Fellow of the Corpus Christi College, Cambridge. It is one of the latest publications on the constitution, having been written as late as April 3, 1925. That brings matters up-to-date pretty well. There are chapters on Constitution and Sovereignty; Sovereignty, Parliament and Toleration; The Sovereign Parliament and Ministerial Responsibility; Ministerial Responsibility and Cabinet Government, Cabinet and Crown; Crown and Empire; Sovereignty and the Rule of Law; The Rule of Law and the freedom of the Subject.

I intend to quote a passage or two from this volume which brings up-to-date pretty effectively the constitutional position in this regard. I quote from page 89 of Kenneth Pickthorne. This volume is one of the Westminster Library series:

After twenty years' experience of the throne—

This was a reference to Her late Majesty Queen Victoria.

—she still thought that this was a prerogative whose exercise required at least the active authorization of the Monarch. She wrote in March 1857 to Palmerston that she could not possibly come to a decision on so important a point without a personal discussion; and the next year the Queen refused Derby's request for permission to announce that, in the event of an adverse majority, he had Her Majesty's sanction to a dissolution.

This occasion was the turning point: for the Queen, apparently not quite certain of the propriety of her action, sought the support of Lord Aberdeen, as that of a man widely experienced in politics and now retired from them. Aberdeen approved the refusal to permit the threat of a dissolution, but at the same time suggested that if her minister advised to dissolve it would be constitutional to assent. Moreover he considered that ministers had a right to threaten dissolution so long as the Queen's name were no part of the threat; she, no doubt, had a right to refuse, but then she must find a prime minister who must accept the responsibility for the refusal, and he could not remember—

And this is quoted:

—he could not remember a single case in which the undoubted power of the sovereign had been exercised upon this point.

Since that occasion—

And that occasion was away back in 1857.

—it has hardly been doubtful that the Monarch would dissolve, of course, on the advice of a prime minister.

My hon. friend spoke last night about Mr. Asquith and made some reference to a statement which Mr. Asquith had made. I find as a footnote to what I have just read the following:

But remember the incident in December 1923, when Mr. Asquith for example, doubted whether His Majesty was bound to dissolve on the advice of a prime minister, who had always been in a minority, never even leading the largest party in the House. It seems, indeed, that His Majesty might have refused, on condition of finding a new prime minister ready to be responsible for the refusal, but the fact that he did not makes it much less likely that he or any other Monarch would do so on a future occasion.

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

Then at pae 94 the author says:

As to dissolution, at any rate it may be said now, that it is extremely difficult to imagine any circumstances in which it would not be placed at the disposal of ministers, for we have seen a premier who had been in office less than a year not leading a majority, nor even the largest single party (not because he was refused legislation essential to his policy, but because inquiry was demanded into the relations of his government with the administration of justice), quite unreservedly threaten with dissolution a House of Commons less than a year old and carry his threat into effect.

There are two well-recognized constitutional authorities each making it perfectly clear that it becomes the duty of the Sovereign to accept the advice of the Prime Minister for dissolution if it is tendered; or if he does not, then he must find a Prime Minister who will take the responsibility for that refusal, and taking the responsibility for that refusal means that the same request cannot be granted him just on the caprice of the moment, but that he must carry out the obligation to carry on if that is the condition under which he has been asked so to do.

May I cite another authority? A few years ago there was an important case in Tasmania. I hope as a dominion we are on a somewhat more important plane than Tasmania. But the governor there had refused the advice of his ministers, and as a consequence of that refusal he was recalled because of the fact that his action was not supported. I read an article written by Sidney Low, entitled "A New Theory of the Constitution; Unquestioning Obedience to Ministers." Sidney Low is the author of the Governance of England and many books of constitutional history. Unfortunately I have not the date at which this article appears in the London Daily News, London, England. I want my hon. friends opposite to recall that it appeared originally in the London Daily News, but the reproduction of the article will be found in a volume entitled "Canadian Defence," October 14, 1914.

The Governor of a colony—

I hope we are beyond the colony stage.

—has no power to impose his wishes upon a ministry He must accept his ministers' advice "unquestioningly."

That is the new constitutional theory as stated by Mr. Harcourt, the Colonial Secretary, in his despatch to the Governor of Tasmania.

The importance of Mr. Harcourt's attitude is explained in the following article by Mr. Sidney Low the well known constitutional authority.

The despatch which Mr. Harcourt has just sent to the Governor of Tasmania is a state paper of considerable significance. It puts the coping-stone on the edifice of colonial self-government and marks the final phase in the emancipation of the oversea states from external control in the management of their domestic affairs.

The Secretary of State has officially declared that the governor of a British dominion is bound to follow the advice of his ministers in respect to any question of internal politics. He has no discretion in the matter and must leave the responsibility with the group of politicians who are supposed to represent the people. The colony, in fact, is a sort of republic with the Prime Minister, for the time being, as its virtual president. The same doctrine was affirmed by Mr. Harcourt in the House of Commons when dealing with the relations between Lord Gladstone and General Botha in the South African Union.

The Tasmanian crisis turned on the question of the governor's right to grant or withhold a dissolution of parliament. This right is part of the royal prerogative which the governor is supposed to exercise as the representative of the sovereign. In this country, however, the royal prerogative in this matter has fallen into abeyance. If a Prime Minister, whether defeated in the House of Commons or not, advises the King to dissolve that advice is accepted.

There is a point I want my hon. friends opposite to notice. Hon. gentlemen opposite say that we were defeated. I have told them and they know that we were not defeated; one has only to look at the records of the Votes and Proceedings of this House to see what our position was. I will give the House a little later on the position as it is recorded there. But for the moment I want to point this out that even if, while we were in office we had been defeated, if we followed the British practice, after having carried on the government as long as we had carried it on under existing conditions, if we asked His Excellency to grant dissolution, His Excellency would have been obliged to grant dissolution even under those extreme circumstances. The article continues:

The responsibility is left with the minister who thought fit to appeal to the constituencies; and the wisdom of his action must be judged by the results. The issue is between him and the people, and the Sovereign does not intervene either to influence the verdict or to postpone the trial.

These are very significant words, very far-reaching words. They affect the whole foundation of constitutional government from one end to the other of this great and vast empire. That is what fills me with amazement at the position of hon. gentlemen opposite. They would dare at this time in the history of the British Empire to risk the possibility of a great constitutional crisis, of which no one can tell how far-reaching the effects may be, just because they are determined to proceed in an unconstitutional manner. It is not too late yet for them to retreat.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Will the right hon. gentleman give the House the date of that article?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: This is as far back as 1914.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): The date might be of value for the record. It is July 17, 1914.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend has evidently consulted the same authority. The article goes on:

In the colonies a different practice has prevailed. The governor has been supposed to exercise his discretion in this and other matters. Dissolutions asked for by premiers have been frequently refused. Colonial parliaments are short lived and party majorities are narrow; and His Excellency may not deem it worth while to put a busy and scattered population to the expense of an election when the people will in any case, soon have an opportunity to express their opinion. In 1899 dissolutions were refused by the governors in no fewer than three of the states. In 1909 Mr. Earle, the Labour Premier, was defeated in the Tasmanian House of Assembly by a majority of six, and asked the Governor, Sir Harry Barron, to let him go to the country. The governor refused, and sent for the leader of the opposition, who was able to form a ministry with sufficient support in the House. In these and other cases 'Downing-street" backed up its man on the spot and asserted the discretionary power of the governor.

All that, as my hon. friend will note, relates to a position affecting not a self-governing dominion, but these smaller states of a colonial status. What is the next paragraph?

It has now decided in the opposite sense.

That is in 1914 in the communication sent to the governor of Tasmania.

The old trouble has broken out in Tasmania again. The Liberal minister in Tasmania was defeated by a single vote, and the premier, Mr. Solomon, asked Sir William Ellison-Macartney, the Governor, to grant a dissolution. But the governor refused and called upon Mr. Earle, the Labour Leader, to form a ministry, annexing, however, to his request the condition that a general election should take place. Mr. Earle accepted under protest, and his objection was supported by the parliament which resolved, with only one dissentient vote, that the governor's demand was contrary to the principle of responsible government. The resolution was transmitted by the governor to the Secretary of State for the Colonies, who has replied in the despatch which emphatically supports the position taken up by the Tasmanian premier and legislature. It is laid down that the governor ought to act upon the advice of his ministers in such a question as that of authorizing or prohibiting a dissolution of parliament, which is one of purely internal politics, and that he ought not to impose conditions upon them. In other words, it is the ministers, presumably representing the people, who are responsible for the "peace, order, and good government" of the colony, not the officer who represents the crown and the imperial cabinet. If this doctrine is maintained—as it probably will be—almost the last vestige of imperial control over the affairs of the self-governing colonies disappears. It is an emphatic recognition of the complete nationhood of the dominions, so far as regards their own domestic government. The governor remains, though it may not be long before he will be appointed on the recommendation of the local, rather than the home, cabinet. He is there to guard the general interests of the empire, and to see that any legislation which may touch these or affect international relations, is reserved for the consideration of the central government.

Mr. SPEAKER: May I interrupt the right hon. gentleman? I have followed very closely the debate as it has so far proceeded, and it appears to me that the present trend of the discussion is rather beside the issue which is before the House. The proceedings were subjected to what is described by the authorities as an incidental interruption. The hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Lapointe) raised a question of privilege which I am bound to say, in the language of Bourinot, affects the House collectively. The point of the hon. member's contention is that the hon. gentlemen at present acting as ministers of various departments are encroaching upon 5 p.m. the privileges of parliament inasmuch as they have taken the oath as ministers and should go before the people. That, I gather, is his point, and the hon. member argues that according to the act on the independence of parliament the acting ministers are consequently debarred from conducting the affairs of the government in the House until elected.

Many hon. members have discussed the question pro and con, and if I have followed the remarks of the leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) I am afraid they are somewhat irrelevant to the point taken by the hon. member for Quebec East. The question of privilege having been stated, and answer having been made by hon. gentlemen concerned, it seems to me that the House should come to some conclusion in the matter. I have not the slightest desire to minimize the importance of the question raised by the hon. member for Quebec East, but I would remind the House that, as Bourinot points out, every question under consideration must sooner or later take a concrete form, and must be determined. Such determination of the question may be achieved by means of a resolution moved in accordance with the rules of procedure. An hon. member may, of course, at any stage of the proceedings, raise a question of privilege, but the House must come to some conclusion upon it. It would seem hardly desirable to debate a question of privilege at interminable length, once it has been clearly stated. I suggest that, to this end, a motion be moved.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): May I ask Your Honour a question? In view of the fact that as Your Honour has admitted this question affects every individual member of the House, should any hon. member be denied the right to state the case from his own point of view?

Mr. SPEAKER: Undoubtedly the question raised in this instance affects the House collectively, but it seems to me that a motion should be moved to determine the sense of the House in the circumstances.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I submit that if the representatives of the two larger parties in the House are to be given a reasonable opportunity of discussing this question of privilege affecting the whole House no hon. gentleman ought to be precluded from stating his case. Any member, indeed, if necessary, every member should have a chance to speak to the question.

Mr. SPEAKER: I hasten to assure the House that I have not suggested that any hon. gentleman should be denied the right to discuss the question of privilege as raised by the hon. member for Quebec East, but when I interrupted the leader of the opposition it appeared to me, if I followed him, that he was discussing a totally different subject.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I submit, Mr. Speaker, that the question before the House at the moment is the right of hon. gentlemen opposite to be in office and to advise His Excellency. If that question is to be settled at all one must necessarily go to the roots of the situation to discover how hon. gentlemen came to be in office, and I have been endeavouring to show that they are in office by reason of circumstances of such a character as to demand that immediately, through their prime minister, they advise His Excellency that they are there without due authority and without right and should resign forthwith so as to enable His Excellency promptly to regularize the situation. I make that explanation tentatively, Mr. Speaker; I have not yet concluded my remarks.

Mr. LAPOINTE: It would be perfectly in order to move a motion as a result of the discussion of a question of privilege, but I respectfully submit, Mr. Speaker, that no one is bound to do so. Any hon. gentleman who desires to do so may exercise his right to move such a motion to conclude the debate, and while I quite agree that there must be a determination of this debate as of any other, at the same time this is a matter that affects the rights of every single member of the House. Under the circumstances, I submit that every hon. member is entitled to speak.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I should be the last member, Mr. Speaker, to desire to disregard any ruling of the Chair, and having discussed the subject at considerable length, I shall draw my remarks immediately to a close. I have only one further quotation to offer on the subject to which I have been referring, namely, the parallel between constitutional procedure in Canada and similar procedure in Great Britain. May I quote from a well known authority:

The Constitution of Canada, an introduction to its development and law, by W. P. M. Kennedy, M.A., Litt. D., Trinity College, Dublin, Assistant Professor of Modern History in the University of Toronto, 1922.

I refer hon. gentlemen to page 382:

The relations between the Governor General and the cabinet are now fairly clear. He does not attend cabinet meetings, but all communications which can be called official come to him through the cabinet, and all orders in council are submitted to him personally. He is entitled to receive the full confidence of his ministers when they ask him to act in any official capacity. If confidence does not exist, he can doubtless dismiss them; but he would do so with the full knowledge that he would be compelled to find successors who would be prepared to take constitutional responsibility for his action.

As a matter of fact no instance of dismissal exists in the history of federal government in Canada. Doubtless also he has the constitutional power to refuse a dissolution, but the sense of political responsibility has become so strong with Canada's new status in the empire that to do so would be an act of extreme danger. The tendency is to assimilate the constitutional conventions of Great Britain and to follow in this matter the completeness of political development.

Now I want to draw the attention of the House to the oath which a privy councillor takes, and which is the oath hon. gentlemen opposite say they have taken. Professor Kennedy says in reference to the relation of the cabinet to the Governor General:

He is entitled to receive the full confidence of his ministers when they ask him to act in any official capacity.

Now I say His Excellency at this moment is entitled to have the full confidence of his ministers, and I say they cannot extend to His Excellency their full confidence if they do not explain to him the whole situation as it exists in this parliament at this moment, and the subterfuge to which they are resorting in attempting to carry on the business of the country or rather in pretending to carry it on in any way. As privy councillors sworn by a solemn oath to protect the crown and its representative it is their business to prevent the crown and its representative in Canada from being placed in a false position before the people. If confidence does not exist he can doubtless dismiss them, and I say without hesitation that if these gentlemen continue longer in office after what has been said with respect to their present position, His Excellency's duty is to dismiss this ministry and find someone who will take responsibility for the dismissal. I may say that as leader of His Majesty's loyal Opposition I am prepared to take responsibility for the dismissal of hon. gentlemen opposite. I am prepared to take that responsibility because hon. gentlemen know that the proceedings of this House cannot be brought to a close except by someone who has sufficiently the confidence of the House to be able to bring proceedings to a close in a proper and regular way. Let me read part of the oath taken by members of the Privy Council:

You will in all things to be moved, treated and debated in any such Privy Council, faithfully, honestly and truly declare your mind and opinion to the honour and benefit of the King's Majesty, and the good of his subjects without partiality or exceptin of persons, in no wise forbearing so to do from any manner of respect favour, love, meed, displeasure, or dread of any person or persons whatsoever. In general you will be vigilant, diligent and circumspect in all your doings touching the King's Majesty's affairs;

There are two paragraphs to which I draw the attention of hon. gentlemen opposite. They are sworn to declare their minds and opinions to the honour and benefit of the King's Majesty and to be circumspect in all their doings touching the King's Majesty's affairs. I say, Mr. Speaker, that there is no single matter which so affects His Majesty the King as the exercise of the royal prerogative. The whole development of constitutional government has been to circumscribe little by little the absolute power of the crown, to cause the exercise of discretionary authority to rest upon ministerial responsibility. There was a time when the crown could perform almost any act pretty much of its own volition, but little by little one prerogative after another came to be exerised on the advice of the ministry. At one time it was the prerogative of summoning parliament; at another time it was the prerogative of pardon; at another time it was some other prerogative, and perhaps the last of all the prerogatives to be circumscribed was that of dissolution. I say hon. gentlemen opposite owe it to their oaths as privy councillors to advise His Excellency the Governor General of the present situation and to let His Excellency fully understand what may be the consequence to him as the representative of the crown itself if, through their advice, he should act in any unconstitutional manner at this time. I appeal to hon. gentlemen opposite, before it is too late, to remedy a great wrong and to see to it that His Excellency is advised that they are unable—

Mr. SUTHERLAND (North Oxford): What are you trying to do—start a rebellion?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I want to prevent a rebellion; I want to protect the honour of the crown; I want to prevent the name of the crown—

Mr. CAHAN: I rise to a point of order I submit, Mr. Speaker, that under the rules and practices of this House any member has a right to state a matter of privilege, but having stated the matter of privilege, if further proceedings are to be taken thereon he must, from his seat in the House, make a motion presenting a clear issue to the House for debate. Such an issue has not been presented to the House; full opportunity has been given to hon. gentlemen who wished to state their question of privilege, and I submit that further debate is out of order unless a motion is made on the issue of privilege, upon which further debate may take place and the decision of the House be given.

Mr. SPEAKER: The question of privilege affects collectively the members of this House of Commons, and may be debated by all members. But as I said a moment ago I expect that this long debate—

Mr. CANNON: Are you giving your decision?

Mr. SPEAKER: Yes.

Mr. CANNON: I would like to speak to the point of order.

Mr. SPEAKER: It is rather late.

Mr. CANNON: It is not late. Here is a very important question—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. gentleman is in order.

Mr. CANNON: This is a very important question, the most important matter discussed since the opening of the session. Hon. gentlemen opposite say the debate has lasted too long; it started at two o'clock this afternoon and it is now shortly after five o'clock. We heard gentlemen speaking for two months on trifling matters, and they were never called to order by the Chair.

Mr. CAHAN: There was a motion before the House.

Mr. CANNON: There need not be a motion; the rule is well known. Bourinot, who is quoted so often here, is very explicit in the matter. This question of privilege is one which interests every member of the House, and every member has a right to speak on it. If any member decides to move a motion he will do so when he so decides.

Mr. SPEAKER: That is what I was going to say when the hon. gentleman preceded me.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Might I be permitted to add just a word before this decision is given. At page 302 of Bourinot I think exactly this point is touched, as follows:

> Questions of privilege may always be considered in either house without the notice necessary in the case of motions generally.

And at page 303 I find the following:

> In the Canadian House, questions of privilege take a wide range, but it may be stated in general terms that they refer to all matters affecting the rights and immunities of the House collectively, or to the position and conduct of members in their representative character.

Mr. SPEAKER: It agrees exactly with what I said at the beginning of this discussion. I have no ruling to give. I simply suggested that there is a question of privilege that affects collectively the House of Commons, but that the point of privilege having been stated clearly and unmistakably, and the answer of the ministers having been made, the debate should now come to an end. Certainly every member is entitled to speak on the question as it affects collectively the House of Commons, but I do not see the necessity of prolonging unduly the debate, unless a motion is put in concrete form dealing with the particular issue raised by the hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Lapointe).

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I shall not take up much further time. I was saying when the question was raised that hon. gentlemen opposite had stated to this parliament that they were advising His Excellency because of an oath which they had taken as members of the Privy Council. I have drawn attention to the circumstance that that oath obliges them to have great regard for anything and everything which in any particular may affect the crown, and I am contending that their action in attempting to carry on and continuing to sit on the treasury benches, as they are doing at the present time, is an action which is imperilling in a more far reaching way, I imagine, than they contemplate, the position of the representative of the crown in this country, and I submit that they can perform no finer act on this day on which we enter upon the sixtieth anniversary of our Dominion than to resolve, however difficult it may be for them so to do, that they will make it their first duty to see that the representative of the king in this country is given advice which is constitutional and sound, in order that the relations of this country with the Old Land may not be strained in any particular, but that we may be drawn closer and closer together through that bond which is the great bond within the empire, namely, the preservation of the liberties of the Mother Country and of all the Dominions through common political ideals and institutions based on the principle of responsible self-government in the case of each and all.

May I add this word? There is a distinction between the privy council and the cabinet. I hold in my hand one of the orders in council which my hon. friend handed to me at the beginning of the sitting to-day. That order reads:

> Certified to be a true copy of a minute of a meeting of the committee of the privy council, approved by His Excellency the Governor General.

There the distinction is suggested between the rights of privy councillors and those of the particular group which constitute the cabinet. A privy councillor has the right to aid and advise His Excellency the Governor General, but it is only a committee of the Privy Council sworn as a cabinet that has the right to perform any executive act, and it is a committee of the Privy Council which constitutes the government of the day. What I contend, Mr. Speaker, is this: While hon. gentlemen opposite have exactly the same privilege that many of us have who sit on this side, as members of the Privy Council, to aid and advise His Excellency, which is the duty of all privy councillors, they have no right and no power to act in an executive capacity, to perform any executive duty whatever until they have taken the oaths of office which will compel them, after accepting office under the crown to resign their seats, and go back to the people for re-election, and then come back to this House with all the authority essential to clothe them with ministerial responsibility. If they are not prepared to take that step immediately, then they should immediately resign.

Hon. R. J. MANION (Fort William): Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to take up many minutes, but there are one or two points I wish to make that I think may be of interest in this debate. In the first place, we listened last evening for a couple of hours or more to abuse—I might call it a tirade of abuse from the right hon. the ex-Prime Minister—

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I take exception to my hon. friend's words immediately, Mr. Speaker. I submit that it is not right for my hon. friend to say that I engaged in a tirade of abuse. He is welcome to his opinion, but I submit that the suggestion is unparliamentary and wholly uncalled for though it is language to which we are accustomed from the hon. member.

Mr. SPEAKER: I do not think the hon. member would like it said of him that he has indulged in a tirade of abuse as against his opponents. I think the expression is rather too strong.

Mr. MANION: Under the circumstances, Mr. Speaker, since that expression is too strong, and since I do not know any other words that will take their place, I withdraw it. The right hon. gentleman made the remark that it was nothing better than he could expect from me. I wish, Mr. Speaker, you would ask him to withdraw that remark, because it is the second time he has used it of me this session.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I said my hon. friend's remark coming from him came from him; that is all.

Mr. MANION: I do not wish to get into a controversy with the right hon. gentleman. I will leave it to the House to judge what kind of tirade or speech the right hon. gentleman made.

The right hon. gentleman this afternoon in the course of his remarks talked of our threatening the party diagonally opposite, as the expression is, with a dissolution, and he blamed us for what he called threatening the party diagonally opposite—I mean no disrespect when I use that term—the Progressive party. I remember, Mr. Speaker, all through this session, every time a question came up when the late government was in any danger whatever, the ex-Prime Minister turned to the hon. gentlemen of the Progressive party and said: If you defeat the government on this measure it will mean an election. Yet he now takes the attitude that we are threatening them, and are not acting as we should in that regard.

He also asked: What right has the Governor General to refuse him a dissolution, and yet to give it to the right hon. gentleman who is leading this government, the present Prime Minister? Well, so far as I know, Mr. Speaker, the right hon. the present Prime Minister has not asked for a dissolution. I do not know why the leader of the opposition takes that attitude.

Everybody in this House knows why the right hon. gentleman who is to-day Prime Minister took the attitude he did. He took the attitude he did because it was the only attitude he could take in fairness to the House and country. The right hon. gentleman who leads the opposition stood up in this House the other day and without any notice announced: I have resigned the position of Prime Minister of this country; and when the present Prime Minister, who was then leading the opposition rose and suggested that there should be a conference regarding the remainder of the session, the ex-Prime Minister called him to order, and said: There is no Prime Minister. He objected to his discussing the matter with him at all. So there were only two courses left for the present Prime Minister. He could either have asked for a dissolution himself, since he had been called upon by the Governor General to form a government, or he could have said: We will attempt to carry on and fulfil the obligations of the late government to the people of Canada, and we will consider the convenience of hon. members, instead of sending them away for six weeks or two months, and then bringing them back again—

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I submit that my hon. friend is entirely wrong in the first of his two alternatives.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order, order.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend says there were two courses open to the present Prime Minister. One was to ask for a dissolution. I say that he could not have asked for a dissolution because he was taking the responsibility of a refusal of dissolution.

Mr. MANION: What I meant to say was an adjournment, not a dissolution, and I think that was clear from my speaking of sending the members away for six weeks or two months.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I hope hon. gentlemen opposite will feel that I was justified in rising at the moment.

Mr. MANION: What I meant was an adjournment, and I used the words six weeks or two months. He could have sent the members of parliament away to their respective homes in the various sections of this country, and then at the end of six weeks or two months have called them back, when as a matter of fact the business of this House could be finished up in three days, or at the most inside of four days or a week. Instead of that he took the patriotic attitude of considering the convenience of members, the patriotic attitude of considering the business of the House and of the country; and when he asked my right hon. friend the leader of the opposition to discuss matters with him he was met with a refusal, although what he did was best for this country and best for this House. To-day and yesterday we find the right hon. leader of the opposition opposing that attitude. The business of the House which has been carried on for six months, and surely that was long enough for a session, was all practically completed except the estimates, the bills that were to come back from the Senate, and two or three noncontroversial bills that are still to be passed. It looked, Sir, as if we should be able to finish in two or three days or in a week at most if hon. gentlemen opposite did not indulge in the obstructive tactics in which they are indulging at the present time. But what has happened? The right hon. gentleman who leads the opposition is simply holding up the House, he is doing exactly what he tried to do when he resigned, he is doing his best not only to embarrass this House but to embarrass this country: That is the attitude of my right hon. friend. I do not know that we can expect any different attitude from him as far as that goes. I do not wish to be personal in the matter but what I want to point out is this—that other prime ministers in other days took a different attitude, a contrary attitude to the attitude taken by the right hon. gentleman who retired the other day. Let me compare his attitude with that taken by Sir John A. Macdonald in 1873 when the government of the latter through a scandal also—not a scandal arising out of the administration of the Department of Customs and Excise but what is known as the Pacific scandal—was put in the same position as the late government was put in. At that time Sir John A. Macdonald did not take the attitude of retiring and saying to the then leader of the opposition, Mr. Alexander Mackenzie: "I will not discuss the matter with you. Get along as well as you can. I do not care how much I embarrass you or the country." He took the patriotic attitude, perhaps too much to expect from my right hon. friend, of standing in his place in this House and telling the leader of the opposition of that day that he was going to resign—that he had resigned in fact—but that he was ready to meet him and discuss matters with him and facilitate the carrying on of the business of the country and of the House.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I ask my hon. friend a question—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Sit down.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: —so that we may see the parallel clearly? Was Sir John A. Macdonald's advice refused or declined by the governor general to whom he tendered it?

Mr. MANION: I will deal with that in a moment, and I think rather effectively, by giving citations from the same books from which the right hon. gentleman quoted himself. The leader of the opposition stopped quoting one instance at the very passage which was of interest to this House. I happened to notice that my right hon. friend stopped at a particular point in his quotation from Keith; and I am going to give him not one but sixteen instances in the last few years where governors general have refused dissolution to outgoing governments.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend cannot give one instance of that kind in Great Britain in one hundred years, or in self-governing dominions.

Mr. MANION: I will give sixteen.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Not in the self-governing dominions but in some of the colonies.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Before the hon. gentleman passes from this point may I ask if he suggests there are sometimes occasions when it would be patriotic to resort to unconstitutional action?

Mr. MANION: My hon. friend has a perfect right to get up and express his opinion but the question is not one entitling any hon. gentleman to rise to a point of order.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I rose for the purpose—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. May I remind hon. gentlemen that the question before the House is one of privilege affecting the independence of members of parliament.

Mr. MANION: I have no objection to anybody asking a question, but I do not think that remarks which have no bearing on the subject are appropriate. Here is an account of what happened in the House of Commons on November 5, 1873. I am going to read just a couple of passages; the report is too lengthy to read the whole of it:

At any rate—

This is Sir John Macdonald speaking—

—he thought the House would leave that matter—

This was the matter that was being discussed previously——in abeyance for a few moments till he made an announcement he had to make. He had to announce that the ministry had resigned.

That was the Macdonald ministry.

Till last night they believed they had the support of this House; that the House would not only give them a vote of confidence, but sufficient support to enable them to carry on satisfactorily the affairs of the government. However, from certain things stated in this House, and from certain communications more or less formal outside of the House, they had reason to believe—in fact they knew—that they had not at this moment a good working majority. The consequence was that he felt it his duty to-day to go to His Excellency and respectfully tender him the resignation of the government, and His Excellency's authority.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Hear, hear.

Mr. MANION:

He had it in charge from His Excellency to state that he had accepted the resignation of the administration, and sent for Mr. Mackenzie, the leader of the opposition, to form a government.

And then further down:

Sir John Macdonald observed that it was the bounden duty of the expiring administration to see that the incoming administration had no embarrassments.

But the right hon. gentleman who is leading the opposition here made it his bounden duty to cause every embarrassment not only to the present administration but to the country in general. The right hon. gentleman does not seem to care whether this is a temporary administration—because we admit that it is a temporary administration—he does not seem to care whether the estimates go through, whether Supply is passed, and he does not seem to care whether the legislation which my hon. friends at the other end of the chamber have been fighting for all the session is held up in mid-air or allowed to pass—he does not care anything about it, all he cares is to embarrass the temporary government which was formed within twenty-four hours instead of the period of from six to eight weeks which is usually allotted in such cases.

Mr. DENIS (Joliette): What has my hon. friend been quoting from?

Mr. MANION: From a press report of the debates of that time.

Mr. DENIS (Joliette): A press report?

Mr. MANION: Yes, a press report of the proceedings of the House; I do not think Hansard was in existence at that time, or that there was any official report such as the one now published daily.

Mr. DENIS (Joliette): I am not disputing my hon. friend's statement.

Mr. MANION: I realize that, and I have no intention of being brusque towards my hon. friend. Now, Mr. Speaker, I have shown what the attitude was of a man who was one of the outstanding statesmen in the world in his day. He did not take the attitude which the present leader of the opposition has displayed. The attitude which he took—and to my mind it was the only fair and honourable attitude—was that in order to aid the incoming administration to carry on the affairs of the House and the affairs of the country he would assist them in every possible way. The attitude of the ex-Prime Minister in this instance is to embarrass the country and embarrass the incoming administration in every possible way. Sir, John A. Macdonald deemed it to be a patriotic duty to help the incoming administration to carry on the affairs of the country, because country should come before party. We listened for two and a half hours last night, and for an hour or more to-day, to the right hon. gentleman who leads the opposition, and I submit that all his speeches have been veiled attacks upon the Governor General of this country.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Mr. Speaker, the motive underlying the remarks my hon. friend has just made is most apparent.

Mr. MANION: Let the right hon. gentleman correct me if he wishes, but I object to his imputing motives to me.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I say that the statement that any word of mine has been a veiled attack upon His Excellency the Governor General is absolutely unfounded and unparliamentary and should be immediately retracted.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. gentleman who has the floor cannot impute motives to another hon. member. If, as he states, the right hon. gentleman had been attacking His Excellency the Governor General, either openly or in a veiled manner, my hon. friend knows very well that I would not have permitted it.

Mr. MANION: I know that, Mr. Speaker, and that is why I suggested that the attack was veiled. However, I bow to your ruling.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon friend is required to withdraw the statement completely.

[Mr. J. J. Denis.]

Mr. SPEAKER: I trust the hon. gentleman will withdraw his rather strong expression.

Mr. MANION: Well, Mr. Speaker, if there is anything to withdraw, I withdraw it willingly in deference to your ruling.

Now, before I close my remarks with some quotations from the same book from which the right hon. leader of the opposition quoted, I wish to say this: The best inference which can be drawn from the quotations which the right hon. gentleman has made, and his own remarks, is, that even if they cannot be regarded as veiled attacks, they come very near to being attacks upon the Governor General. If the Governor General did what the right hon. gentleman claims he did to him the other day, he certainly was getting close to attacks on the Governor General.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I have not taken any exception to what the Governor General did to me the other day. I said I would wait to see his action in the present situation.

Mr. MANION: The only reference that has been made in these debates to the Governor General has come from my right hon. friend, expect some refutations from this side. About every other paragraph of his speech dealt with the Governor General, and to those of us who have had the very great honour, as some twenty on this side of the House had, of serving under that gentleman who is now Governor General—

An hon. MEMBER: What kind of services?

Mr. MANION: Who asked that question?

Mr. SPEAKER: I would ask hon. members on both sides not to drag in this debate the name of His Excellency. Yesterday I made it clear that the relations between the Governor General and the Prime Minister might be brought into the debate, because ministers have accepted the responsibility of taking office under the Governor General. But to bring in the personality of the Governor General I think is highly undignified.

Mr. MANION: May I ask you, Sir, what is undignified? Have I done anything which is undignified?

Mr. SPEAKER: I am not referring to the hon. member. I say that bringing the name and the personality of the Governor General into any debate before the House, unless it is as regards the official relationship in which the ministers stand to the Governor General, is absolutely out of order.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I submit it is out of order for the hon. gentleman to refer to the fact that he and others have served under the present occupant of the office of Governor General overseas. It seems to me that is introducing most decidedly the personal element and I think it is out of order.

Mr. SPEAKER: I interrupted the hon. minister when he was mentioning that fact, because introducing the name of the Governor General in that regard is, according to authority, using the name of the crown, or of the office of the Governor General of the Dominion, to influence the opinion of parliament. To that I strongly object.

Mr. MANION: I will make no more references to the Governor General, except to say that I am not very much surprised at the attitude my hon. friend takes, because it is an extraordinary attitude to my mind, and he takes extraordinary attitudes very often. It is an extraordinary attitude for anybody to take that on the 1st day of July, Dominion Day, we should not pay a tribute to the Governor General of this country.

Mr. CANNON: I rise to a point of order.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I ask your ruling, Mr. Speaker. Was I in order in raising a point of order a moment ago?

Some hon. MEMBERS: No, no.

Mr. CANNON: On the point of order raised by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, I think the Speaker has been perfectly correct in saying that the hon. member (Mr. Manion) should not drag the name of the Governor General into our debates. I spoke for about an hour and did not mention the crown once, and the rule is very well known that in no debate are we to try to influence members of the House by even mentioning the crown.

Mr. MANION: I think my hon. friend should have directed his remarks to his leader and not to me. As far as I am concerned, I do not want to carry on this part of the discussion further, but I wish to point out, before I come to the quotation, that the right hon. gentleman who is Prime Minister had only twenty-four hours in which to place himself in a position to carry on the business of the country. My right hon. friend, who led the party which preceded this party in power, had from October 29, to January 7 to form his administration, and the administration came into the House without the Prime Minister in his seat, and not only without the Prime Minister in his seat, but without a seat of any kind, a Prime Minister who had to leave his own native province to hunt up a seat in a western province.

The right hon. gentleman quoted Keith volume 1, on Responsible Government in the Dominions. I have read the volume and remember parts of it. He stopped quoting from Keith at a certain point, and I took the opportunity of looking it up. I wish now to discuss the abstract question in regard to the rights of the Governor General in refusing dissolution and I submit I am quite in order as the whole discussion has been around that point. He quoted Keith at page 181. He stopped quoting just before a paragraph which says:

> The question of dissolution always, from the nature of the case, presents the governor with a possibility of differing from his ministers with success; it necessarily implies the existence in the colony of two parties, of which one is in possession of the government, but the other has been successful in driving them to appeal to the people. The governor has therefore a difficult task, not merely in deciding to refuse to accept ministerial advice but in deciding to accept it; for the fact that the prerogative is not expected as a matter of course to be used as the ministry advises prevents him from sheltering behind the advice of his ministers. If he acts on their advice he may easily find himself quite as unpopular as if he had refused to do so, and indeed the governor is expected to do what is best for the country, a course by no means normally at all simple or easy.
> There are two important facts which the governor must consider in granting or refusing a dissolution. In the first place, the duration of colonial parliaments is brief,

An hon. MEMBER: Colonial parliaments?

Mr. MANION: Yes. Well I will come to some dominion parliaments.

> Then he must remember—

Mr. ELLIOTT: Does the hon. member think that that clause referring to colonial parliaments applies in that sense?

Mr. MANION: No, I believe Canada is a dominion. I think perhaps I am as good a believer in Canada as my hon. friend. Keith continues:

> Then he must remember that the shortness of parliament, and the important work that has to be done, render a dissolution to be avoided if possible, for the waste of time, expense, and dislocation of a general election, if less serious in themselves than the same features in this country, are equally important to a smaller community. Moreover, there is growing stronger and stronger the feeling, in Australia—

Nobody will dispute that Australia is not a colony.

> —in Australia at least, that a dissolution does wrong to the members of parliament, who thus are not merely put to trouble and expense, though election expenses are not on the English scale, but are put in jeopardy of losing their salaries, an important consideration in a place where the paid member is an institution. Then a second consideration is the question of supply.

Further down he says:

The cases of refusal of dissolution and the grant under circumstances of difficulty are almost innumerable, and many of them are interesting. One of the most important of the earlier cases is that of Governor-General Sir E. Head, of the united province of Canada in August 1858, on the defeat of Mr. Macdonald's ministry.

An hon. MEMBER: When we were a colony.

Mr. MANION: I will not dispute that, but I will come to the time when we were a dominion. The first refusal, No. 1 was in 1858, and the second was in 1860 and that case is very interesting. Keith says:

In 1860 the Lieutenant Governor of Nova Scotia declined to grant ministers a dissolution after defeat in the House, and the case is interesting because he met in his defense the argument that the governor is a mere figurehead.

His action was justified by the result, as the opposition formed a successful administration.

And that is going to happen in the present instance. No. 3, was in 1877, and the note in Keith reads as follows:

In 1877 the Governor of New South Wales sent home for advice as to his action in connection with the grant of a dissolution when supply was not granted being made conditionally on supply being obtained.

The question was referred to Lord Carnarvon, the Secretary of State, to Sir T. Erskine May, who sympathized with the governor in his desire to secure that supply should be granted, but who thought that there was objection to letting the parliament know that he had granted a dissolution conditionally on the government obtaining supply.

Then he quoted further parliamentary practice in support of his contention. That request was refused. The next case:

4. Special interest also attached to the case of Lord Canterbury in Victoria, because of his large and varied experience in parliamentary government. The Duffy ministry asked him to dissolve when defeated, and represented that they should be given a dissolution, as a ministry in England was given one. . . . But the governor refused to accept their advice. . . . He held that the country could well be managed by a ministry chosen from the existing parliament and proceeded to choose one which held office with success. His action was criticised very bitterly by the outgoing ministry.

History is now repeating itself.

My right hon. friend cited the case of Tasmania.

5. In Tasmania in 1879 the governor had more troubles on his head, for Mr. Crowther, who had followed Mr. Giblin, Mr. Fysh's successor in the leadership of the party, asked for a dissolution on the ground that it was desirable to test the feeling of the country on the principles of direct taxation and a change of relations between the houses. The governor declined.

[Mr. Manion.]

Another case was in New Zealand:

6. New Zealand, as usual, presents interesting features. In 1872 the Governor, Sir G. Bowen, declined to grant the Stafford ministry a dissolution.

7. In 1877 the Grey Liberal ministry asked the Governor, Lord Normanby, for a dissolution, because, having taken office in October on the defeat of their predecessors under Major Atkinson on a vote of confidence, they would have been defeated in the House before they had time to develop their policy, but for the casting vote of the Speaker. . . The governor declined. . . . The ministry then advanced the view that the power to dissolve was one resting on the Constitution Act, not on the prerogative, and therefore should be exercised on ministerial advice without regard to the grant of supply.

8. A month later the governor was again asked to dissolve but he had now come to the conclusion that it was not necessary to do so, as the premier could probably command a majority in the next parliament. On the other hand, the premier argued that the governor was only a constitutional monarch, and must dissolve on advice.

That is the attitude taken by the leader of the opposition to-day.

The matter was referred to the Secretary of State for the Colonies, who on February 15, 1878, definitely approved the views taken by the governor of his rights and his duties, while emphasizing his duty to consider carefully the views of his ministers.

9. There is also an interesting case that is worth mentioning as a sequel to the case of Mr. Letellier, which will be adduced below. Mr. Joly, who was called by Mr. Letellier to office, had never a strong hold of the government. He was at last defeated by six votes in the lower house, and the upper house had already stopped the supplies, and so he asked in 1879 for a dissolution on the ground that he anticipated a majority from the country. The request was refused.

Mr. CANNON: Referring to the Letellier case, his course was considered so unconstitutional that he was dismissed by the federal government. Sir John A. Macdonald himself dismissed him.

Mr. MANION: My hon. friend may give one case where that happened, but there are sixteen altogether although I do not intend to read them all. Some of these cases were in Australia, some in Canada. The sixteenth was in South Australia:

In South Australia, Mr. Price, the Premier, applied to the governor in 1906 for a dissolution. . . . The governor was unwilling to dissolve a parliament which had not long been in existence. . . . He therefore declined to grant the dissolution.

That is as recent as 1906. I could give more; but I give these because the right hon. gentleman opposite has used Professor Keith as one of his precedents, and we all know that Professor Keith is one of the most outstanding constitutional authorities in the British world to-day. He has used him as an authority, and according to him he gives case after case—and I have quoted ten—where the governor refused dissolution to the Prime Minister who asked for it. Therefore there is no discussion on the matter. It is a constitutional course if the Governor General chooses to take it. The attitude taken by the right hon. gentleman who is to-day Prime Minister of this country was the only patriotic attitude he could take. He had to form a government and attempt to carry on until the business of the House was completed. After that if he wishes to dissolve parliament, that is his affair.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Does the hon. gentleman ask the House to accept the sixteen precedents which he has quoted as an example to be followed to-day and so deny the evolution which has taken place in our status and which is acknowledged by his previous leader, Sir Robert Borden?

Mr. MANION: I do not deny our evolution, and I do not pretend to be an authority on constitutional questions; but I have read enough of constitutional questions to know that it is the right not only of the king, but of the Governor General to advise with his ministers. My hon. friend will not deny that. I am not using these citations to prove the case. I am showing simply that the attitude taken by the leader of the opposition is wrong in implying that this is an unprecedented case. I gave sixteen citations. The right course for the right hon. gentleman opposite to have taken, since he objected so much to the course we have taken, was to go to the Governor General, state that he could not carry on properly, and ask for dissolution. If the Governor General did not agree, then his duty was to come back to the House and attempt to carry on until he was defeated.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My duty was to do whatever His Excellency would ask me to do under the circumstances. I indicated clearly to His Excellency that I was desirous that my resignation should be withheld by His Excellency if he desired to hold it pending an arrangement of any kind.

Mr. MANION: I think I have shown convincingly there are many precedents for the attitude taken to-day. I also believe the right hon. gentleman opposite, having taken the attitude which he has taken, should have patriotically assisted instead of attempting to embarrass the right hon. gentleman who is now Prime Minister of this country.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

After Recess

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

Hon. J. C. ELLIOTT (West Middlesex): When the House rose at six o'clock I was about to address myself to some of the remarks of the Acting Minister of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment, of Health, and of Labour (Mr. Manion). Before coming to the arguments which I intend to submit to you, Mr. Speaker, I desire to refer briefly to the three main points stressed by the hon. member. In the first place he referred to what occurred when Sir John A. Macdonald was defeated in consequence of the Pacific scandal. The Hon. Mr. Mackenzie, as the House will remember, was asked to form an administration as a result of Sir John Macdonald's defeat. I am rather surprised that my hon. friend should have cited that case in support of his contention. What did the Hon. Alexander Mackenzie do when his opponents were defeated in the House and he was called upon to form a government? Did he do as hon. gentlemen opposite have done? Did he attempt to form a visionary, illusory, shadowy, ghostlike administration, or did he, in the regular course, create a cabinet which would be really vital and which gave evidence of some of the characteristics of a true government? The Hon. Mr. Mackenzie formed a government mostly composed of members of the House to whom were assigned portfolios of departments of government, who were forthwith sworn as responsible ministers. On the advice of the first minister the Governor General, Lord Dufferin, prorogued parliament the same day upon which the ministry took office. Writs were issued for the elections necessary to fill the seats in parliament thus vacated, in order that the new ministers should at the earliest possible date obtain the sanction of the electors for exercising their functions as responsible ministers of the crown. All the ministers were promptly returned, several of them by acclamation. After continuing in office for a period of about two months—that is to say, during November and December, 1873—Mr. Mackenzie obtained from the Governor a dissolution of the parliament elected a little more than a year previous, and a general election ensued in which Mr. Mackenzie's administration was sustained by a majority of eighty. This was the course followed in the instance cited by my hon. friend, and the House can contrast the difference between the attitude shown by the Hon. Alexander Mackenzie towards the responsibility which he felt devolved upon him on being asked to form an administration and the sense of responsibility which apparently

hon. gentlemen opposite entertain in attempting to form a visionary government to carry on the affairs of the country. Although they admit that they are not the king's ministers they claim to be ministers entitled to ask for supply, and pretend to be vested with the power to manage the various departments of the public service.

What is, and has been in the past, the attitude of other administration under circumstances similar to those in which we find ourselves at this time? The hon. gentleman referred to the Letellier case, already mentioned by the hon. member for Dorchester. I do not intend to discuss that case at any length, but in my opinion, like the Alexander Mackenzie case, it proves exactly the opposite of the contention advanced by hon. gentlemen.

The last reference which my hon. friend made appears to me the most important. I want to do my hon. friend the credit of being fair enough and frank enough in reading these instances to refer to the fact in almost every case that the word "colonial" was brought in in one place or another, in connection with the recital of what had taken place. On this occasion, the birthday of this great country, it seems remarkable that my hon. friend—who, in common I think with all the other members of this House and the people of this country, is proud of the status acquired by this Dominion among the overseas dominions of the world and proud of the fact that it has advanced to the stature already attained—should suggest, as a reason why a certain course should be followed now, some course followed years ago in certain places which were admittedly merely colonies at the time.

In connection with the argument of my hon. friend the Acting Minister of Justice I would like to refer to chapter 10 of the statutes of Canada. This chapter, as my hon. friend correctly stated, refers to the fact that no person accepting or holding any office, commission or employment, permanent or temporary, in the service of the government of Canada, at the nomination of the crown, or at the nomination of any of the officers of the government of Canada, to which any salary, fee, wages, allowance, emolument or profit of any kind is attached—as well as sheriffs, et cetera—shall be eligible as a member of the House of Commons or shall sit or vote therein. May I draw particular attention to those words:

—to which any salary, fee, wages, allowance, emolument, or profit of any kind is attached—

[Mr. Elliott.]

Looking at the English act you will see that the word "profit" was not originally included there, which gave rise to some of the decisions given years ago in England. But I want to ask my hon. friends this. Can anyone point to a case in any British dominion where it was even argued, let alone conceded, that you could have a government or an administration without having therein one minister clothed with the full powers of a minister?

The present administration cannot be called such. Just let us see how it was organized. The Prime Minister was sworn in, and by that act he vacated his seat. At the beginning of this session nearly three weeks were spent by hon. gentlemen opposite in attempting to convince members of this House that unless there was a Prime Minister occupying a seat in either house, no matter how many other fully qualified ministers there were, the government could not function. In this connection may I just read the words of the then leader of the opposition as they appear on page 15 of Hansard:

The powers of a prime minister are very great. The functions and duties of a prime minister in parliament are not only important, they are supreme in their importance. The Prime Minister is not only the leader of the House, in whichever house he may be, but he is the spokesman of the nation before the crown or the representative of the crown. He is the spokesman, and the only spokesman, of the nation. He is the sole via media between parliament, as parliament, and the crown or the representative of the crown.

Then later he proceeds:

The ministry is embodied in the Prime Minister. He personifies his ministry in so far as parliament is concerned, in so far as the crown is concerned, and he speaks as between parliament and the crown. All this implies—and it is the result of many years of constitutional development, a development which proceeded against struggles not a few—that the minister known as the Prime Minister, in order to enable the government to function within the walls of parliament, must be a member of one of the Houses of Parliament. He must be a member because parliament has the right to demand that he come there to expound the policies of the government, to defend those policies, and admit his submission to the control of parliament. Otherwise though he be the King's servant he is not the agent of parliament.

Then he went on to elaborate that theory to such an extent that as I watched him and as hon. members around him applauded to the detriment of the furniture on this side of the House—

Mr. GEARY: We are through with that furniture.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Only for a very short time. Watching the right hon. leader of the opposition, in my innocence as a very youthful member of this House I was at times almost constrained to think that he believed himself to be right. We contended on this side of the House, and properly I submit, that if there were other ministers in the House properly clothed with authority and prepared to assume the functions of an administration it was not necessary for the Prime Minister to be also in the House. I submit that we were correct in that, as we are now correct in the theory that you cannot have government not only without a prime minister, without whom according to my hon. friends the government cannot function; but without any other responsible minister who has taken the oath of office properly to administer the affairs of his department.

See the change in the arguments of my hon. friends to suit their own case; they have not one minister who has taken the oath of office. Is that what my hon. friend intended to convey when he spoke here the other day? Might I pause here to say that in parliaments thought to be enjoying responsible government it has been usual, no matter how secretive the Prime Minister and other members of his cabinet may feel disposed to be, before assuming the functions of government for them to be good enough to disclose to parliament at least some of the policies which they intend to follow in the course of their duties as a government. Of course I cannot blame them for not doing what governments do, because this is not a government. I cannot blame them for not doing what administrations do, because even they do not claim that this is an administration. But what did my right hon. friend the Prime Minister (Mr. Meighen) promise this House in the message which was delivered by my right hon. friend the Acting Minister of Finance (Sir Henry Drayton)? This is the message sent to this House; it appears at page 5097 of Hansard:

> Immediately following the resignation of the late government and the adjournment of the House yesterday, His Excellency, the Governor General sent for the Right Honourable Arthur Meighen, leader of the Conservative party and requested him to form a new administration. Mr. Meighen advised His Excellency last evening that he would undertake this task, and was sworn in this morning as Prime Minister, Secretary of State for External Affairs and President of the Privy Council.
> Having in mind the fact that the present session has now continued for almost six months, and is very near its close, Mr. Meighen believed it to be the first duty of any government he might form to conclude with all convenient despatch the work of the present session. Such a course in preference to a somewhat prolonged adjournment was demanded also by a just regard for the convenience of hon. members, especially those who come from a great distance.
> It was manifestly impossible to effect this result if a government was to be formed in the usual way and if ministers were to be assigned portfolios necessitating the vacating of their seats and consequent by-elections. The delay thus involved would, especially at this period of the year, have entailed unnecessary hardship. The Prime Minister accordingly decided to constitute and submit to His Excellency a temporary ministry composed of seven members, who would be sworn in without portfolio.

Note the words, Mr. Speaker:

> —who would be sworn in without portfolio, and who would assume responsibility as acting ministers of the several departments.

When would they assume that responsibility? After they had been sworn in as ministers without portfolio! But does my hon. friend for a moment contend that the Prime Minister intended by that message that they would not take the oath? He did not say: who have years ago been sworn in as privy councillors, which oath they intend to rely upon as vesting in them the power to become acting ministers in their several departments. That is not what he said. What he said was: "who will be sworn in." So that my hon. friends have not carried out the procedure which the Prime Minister evidently communicated to them, and which the Acting Minister of Finance communicated to this House as the declared intention of the Prime Minister as his method of forming this acting cabinet. I want again to refer to the fact that nowhere in any British dominion at any time has any collection of individuals claimed to exercise the rights of government under the British constitution without some of those ministers having come into being in the regular way. What is the theory with regard to ministers who have not been vested with the full powers of a minister, who come in as ministers without portfolio? That is set out quite clearly in the practice and procedure relating to this matter. I refer to Bourinot, fourth edition, page 21, where I find this:

> The act provides for a council to aid and advise the Governor General in Canada. This body is styled "The Privy Council" and its members are appointed and may be removed at any time by the Governor General. That portion of the council known as the cabinet is always supposed to represent the views and policy of the majority of the peoples' representatives in parliament and can hold office only as long as its members retain the confidence of a majority in the House of Commons. The principles that prevail in the formation of a cabinet in England obtain in the case of an administration in Canada. Its members must have seats in one or the other of the House of Parliament, but the majority of them, as a rule, sit in the House of Commons. The whole privy council practically never meets for business as an organized body but only those select members of it who constitute the cabinet. The cabinet consists, generally speaking, of those members of the privy council who are at the head of the various departments of state but there are frequently added members of one or other of the Houses who hold no portfolio.

Let me repeat that:

There are frequently added members of one or other of the Houses who hold no portfolio.

But they are the exceptions. The cabinet, the administration, the creation that is vested with power to carry on the administration of the country's affairs, that part of it that has administrative life, is the cabinet, consisting of the heads of the various departments who have been regularly sworn in, and after having been sworn in, have been re-elected; and that is the only way in which you can get an administration capable of asking for supply and handling that supply in carrying on the affairs of the country.

I followed with a great deal of interest the argument of the Acting Minister of Justice (Mr. Guthrie). If his argument meant anything, and I followed him very closely, it meant this: that if a minister is only an acting minister he does not need to take the same oath that a minister who is clothed with the powers of a fully developed minister requires to take. I submit, Mr. Speaker, that that shows how illogical the argument of my hon. friend is. Let me follow it a step further. I refer to chapter 10 of the revised statutes, which deals with the members of the cabinet. Section 11 says:

Nothing in the next preceding section shall render ineligible any person holding any office, commission or employment, permanent or temporary, in the service of the government of Canada, at the nomination of the crown, or at the nomination of any of the officers of the government of Canada, as a member of the House of Commons, or shall disqualify him from sitting or voting therein, if, by his commission or other instrument of appointment, it is declared or provided that he shall hold such office, commission or employment without any salary, fees, wages, allowances, emolument or other profit of any kind, attached thereto.

I repeat the provision:

—if, by his commission or other instrument of appointment, it is declared or provided that he shall hold such office, commission or employment without any salary, fees, wages, allowances, emolument or other profit of any kind, attached thereto.

What does that mean? I submit it must be quite apparent to every hon. member in this House who reads that section that that is the only exception to the rule that if a member accepts an office of emolument he vacates his seat. But it must be stated in the order in council appointing him that he holds such office without any salary, emolument, or other profit of any kind attached thereto.

[Mr. Elliott.]

The situation is, I submit, a very simple one. My hon. friends must realize, when they think the matter over, that they have not done what the Prime Minister in his message to this House promised they would do, namely, take the oath before assuming office. They must realize that there is no real administration to carry on the affairs of government at the present time; that they are not sworn in, not properly clothed with full powers as cabinet ministers, and on that account unable to form a quorum of cabinet. In constitutional matters the power to take control of the money of the people and to use it for public purposes is a power which must be guarded with the utmost care. Millions of dollars are sought to be granted to the members of this temporary administration, an administration that is merely a shadow, that is without form and void and lacking all the attributes which an administration must possess not only in this country but in every self-governing dominion in the world. Yet they are asking the people of Canada to grant them the right to expend millions of dollars of public money without having taken that oath which the rules and statutes prescribe must be taken as a safeguard that such money will be properly expended in the interest of the various government departments.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Will my hon. friend kindly give me the reference to the statute which provides for that oath?

Mr. ELLIOTT: For that oath?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Yes.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I do not know that I have the reference here.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: There is no such statute.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Does my hon. friend suggest for one moment that the members of a cabinet are not required to take an oath of office?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I was only asking my hon. friend a perfectly proper question, and his statement illustrates his ignorance of the subject. There is no such statute.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Then I would ask my hon. friend if he means what he says, and he frequently does although not always—

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: There is no such statute.

Mr. ELLIOTT: —I would ask him why, when he was about to become a real minister, he did take an oath of office if such is not required? Will my hon. friend tell me?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I did not say that.

Mr. ELLIOTT: That is all very well.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: My hon. friend says "all very well." What I said was there was no such statute. My hon. friend has referred to an oath which he says is required by statute, and there is no such statute; that is all. My hon. friend might get a little closer to the facts sometimes.

Mr. ELLIOTT: My hon. friend knows perfectly well that he is—

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Absolutely right.

Mr. ELLIOTT: No, he knows that he is not right. If he is right then I would ask him why do the members of the cabinet take the oath? Why does the Minister of Justice suggest—and he stated what the Minister of Finance now denies—that if he were a real minister, that is a live minister—a minister into whose being had been infused the breath of life—he would have to take an oath of office? Being only an imaginary, spurious, unreal, visionary minister, how could he come here and seek to get control of the money of the people of this country without taking any oath of office? I do not want to labour the point. I am sure that my hon. friends realize by now that they have no existence as an administration, that they are absolutely without the powers which are necessary in order to entitle them to exercise the functions of government, to entitle them to receive supply, and to carry on the business of the country.

I want just at this stage to deal with another phase of the argument that has been presented to you, Mr. Speaker, during the course of this debate. In doing so I hope that I shall keep away from matters that are personal and endeavour to argue the question out on its real merits. Because, after all, Mr. Speaker, this is a serious question. What the people of Canada are concerned with today are not recriminations back and forth from one member of this House to another, but the very serious problem of how the affairs of the country are to be administered, how their money is to be expended, and the status of those by whom that expenditure is to be made. That is a serious question and it should be argued seriously. It is not enough, I submit, for some hon. gentlemen opposite to say: "You are taking up a lot of time, you are taking it up at the close of the session when we should be at home." I agree that we should be home, we should have been home months ago, but why are we not there? We are not at home because my hon. friends opposite spent weeks, yes months, in the attempt to convince the members of this House that a government could not function if it had a prime minister who was not a member of either House of parliament. My hon. friends did not argue that the late government had ministers not entitled to carry on the administration but they argued that the fact that the late government did not have a qualified prime minister was an absolute bar to its constitutional functioning. It is not sufficient for hon. gentlemen to say that we should not take up a few hours, or a few days, for that matter, in discussing a question of this kind. It is not sufficient for them to say to us: "You are doing this just to get into power." Is that why my hon. friends opposite occupied all the early months of the session in useless discussion which did not get them anywhere or assist the members of this House in the solution of the problems which confront this country?

I think that my hon. friend (Sir Henry Drayton), who at times is reasonable, will, when he comes to consider the situation, realize that he and the other members of the visionary cabinet neglected to follow the constitutional procedure which would enable them to carry on for a short time. The matter is too serious to be treated in that way. Are the representatives in this House of the people of Canada going to submit to this proposition; that the affairs of this country shall be conducted in this way, that the moneys of this country shall be expended by a government clothed with less authority than any government that has ever assumed control of a self-governing country among any of the British dominions? I submit not.

Mr. PRICE: Clothed with less authority than the government my hon. friend has been supporting? Why, the idea!

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order, order.

Mr. PRICE: The public was fed up with that government.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order, order.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Really, Mr. Speaker, it amuses me when my hon. friend even suggests that he has an idea. It is quite new. I do not propose to get into any cheap argument with my hon. friend. That is not what I am here for. The time of this House is too valuable to be taken up in that way.

I wish again to urge that it is quite impossible for this government to function. If they do not take the proper course and get their house in order, they cannot carry on the affairs of government and are not entitled to be given the full power of a governmental administration.

Mr. FERNAND RINFRET (St. James): I must admit at the commencement of my remarks that I approach this problem with a good deal of diffidence. After listening for a couple of days to arguments presented by legal minds, you will understand, Mr. Speaker, that a layman such as myself cannot discuss a matter of this kind without first craving the indulgence of the House as to the manner in which he treats it. At the same time, I consider it the most momentous question that has been before us this session, and I will say more. I have sat in this House for seven sessions, and I have had the great honour of sitting in the press gallery for a number of sessions, and this is the first time in my experience in this House that a question of privilege has arisen in which it could be said that all the members of this House were collectively interested. It must be a very important question when Your Honour had to admit that the House had a collective interest in it, and that every individual member was permitted to protest against such a serious situation, which affects every one of us, and through us certainly affects the whole of the people of Canada whom we represent.

We see in this House a group of members endeavouring to administer the affairs of the government, when those hon. members have not taken the oath of office, nor have they been appointed regularly to their positions as acting ministers; and yet they claim that they have the right to conduct the business of the House, and the right to exact from us the voting of the public moneys, one of the most important functions that parliament is called upon to perform. What is the situation? Can we compare it with the situation in January last when we met in the first days of the session? My hon. friends would want us and the country to believe that they are in the same predicament as the government at that time was, and that the conditions are the same as those which obtained when we met in January. On that occasion there were on the other side of the House, sitting on the treasury benches, members of parliament who had been properly sworn in, who had every right to exercise the prerogatives of ministers of the crown, and who could properly and with dignity conduct the business of the House and administer the affairs of the country; yet because their membership was not complete and there were certain vacant portfolios, my hon. friends opposite claimed that that government had no right to function and should be dismissed. We find every one of those members who on so many occasions protested against what was a perfectly constitutional position, rising now to defend their own position, which is perfectly indefensible, and taking objection to our attitude on this occasion during a couple of days, when for two full months they protested against the situation which previously obtained.

We all know the result of the last federal election. There were three main groups of members elected, one group having 116 members, the government having 101; but there was a sufficient number of independent members elected to swing the majority one way or the other. The Liberal government was then in power. What was the Prime Minister to do after that election? What was he to advise His Excellency? And what took place at the time? The then Prime Minister advised His Excellency that in his opinion the proper course was not that he should retain office, was not that he should be considered as being still in power, but merely that parliament should be called at a convenient moment and the representatives of the people allowed to decide which party should administer the affairs of the country. That is what took place, and although the ministry was perfectly and regularly in order; although the members of the government had been sworn in and had taken office according to the best principles of our constitution, out of respect for the rights of the people and of public opinion they carefully refrained from entering into any act of administration until parliament had been convened to decide that issue. Yet what stand was taken then by my hon. friends opposite, these ministers without portfolio, without oaths, or without anything else that could qualify them as ministers? They claimed that every right had been violated; they claimed that the House could not function because the Prime Minister was absent from it. They claimed that there was no via media through which we could communicate with His Excellency and His Excellency be advised.

That was the stand my hon. friends opposite took then. What are the facts to-day? We have but a shadow government, but a temporary government, on their own admission and also on the admission of everyone else. We have but a group of men who have not been properly sworn in, who have taken no oath and who have not been properly appointed by the council, because in that council only one minister sat who had any right whatever to be there. The government which obtained the vote of confidence of the House in January last carried on for a number of months and succeeded in obtaining successive votes of confidence on the Address, on the budget and on the main measures of its political programme throughout the session. But when it found that the support upon which it could rely from the independent groups in this House was tottering, when it found that majorities were dwindling to one or two, becoming the expression not of the House, but merely of whatever members happened to be in the House at the time the votes were taken; when it found that it had become impossible to carry on, although the government had not been defeated, the then Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) went to His Excellency and advised dissolution, and dissolution was refused. What other course was there for the present leader of the opposition to take than to resign and to make way because he could not obtain dissolution?

The minister of so many portfolios that I do not know by which to designate him, the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. Manion) tried to demonstrate this afternoon that in a number of instances dissolution had been refused in the past. He said that he was going to cite sixteen instances. You have heard them, Sir, and you have noticed that every one of those cases was either concerning a colony, not a dominion, or concerning a province, not a dominion again, and that all of them date back over fifty years ago in the history of British institutions. If my hon. friend is willing to go back fifty years in the history of the liberties of the British dominions we on this side of the House are not. We stand for the liberties as we have them to-day; we stand for more liberties that may come to-morrow, but we shall certainly never go back to dead books or to forgotten periods of past history for examples of what we should do to-day. This is why one after the other we rise in our place on this question of collective privilege to protest against the situation which now obtains.

The leader of the opposition was criticized very severely because after tendering his resignation he did not advise His Excellency as to his successor, or did not make it easier for his successor to carry on the business of the House. How could he do so, when the very advice that he was giving was that no one could carry on, neither himself nor any other leader in the House?

[Mr. Rinfret.]

Mr. SUTHERLAND (South Oxford): Why did he not resign right after the election when he was defeated at the polls?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): He was not.

Mr. RINFRET: My hon. friend cannot have followed me, because this is the very point I have been trying to make so far. I should be glad to repeat my argument, but the rules of the House prevent my doing so. I may tell my hon. friend, if he finds any comfort in it, that whatever I said about this matter I said nothing about the Australian treaty.

Mr. SUTHERLAND (South Oxford): Will the hon. member permit a question?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. RINFRET: I certainly will. I should like to hear the question, but I cannot possibly reply to it unless it is put. The reason why I made this remark to my hon. friend is that whatever we discuss in this House, whether it be the Address, the budget, rural credits, old age pensions or anything else, when it comes to my hon. friend it always revolves around the Australian treaty.

Mr. SUTHERLAND (South Oxford): My hon. friend will not find me renouncing all past rules and establishing new precedents on a question of this kind, precedents that have never before been heard of in this or in any other British parliament.

Mr. RINFRET: That is my hon. friend's opinion, and naturally he is entitled to it; but if he had the same idea of the liberties of members of this House and of the rights of the common people as we cherish and foster, instead of making the statement he made he would protest against this House being ruled by a government formed of temporary members who have no right whatever to administer the affairs of this country. My hon. friend was so much concerned over certain problems that they perhaps prevented him from giving the fullest attention to a question like this which, in my opinion, is much more momentous than most of the questions to which he gave so much time during the course of the session.

I was arguing that it was impossible for the present leader of the opposition to recommend to His Excellency the name of a possible successor who could carry on the business of the House, when his very reason for recommending dissolution was that there was no such possible successor. That is very plain. He may have been wrong in believing that; he may have had a wrong insight into conditions in this House. But certainly he was logical, and the last thing we could reproach the leader of the opposition for is the course that he followed in that instance. How could he advise His Excellency as to the fact that he wanted a dissolution because no one could carry on, and in the same breath say: If dissolution is not granted, then I suggest that the leader of the Tory party can carry on. That would have been most illogical, and when my right hon. leader is criticized for having embarrassed the affairs of the country and of my hon. friends by the stand he takes, I cannot consider that argument seriously.

Is it not a strange thing, after we have been here for six months, being obstructed in every possible way, by every device that my hon. friends could imagine, to find that after they have claimed to hold power for two days they already feel that we are creating much embarrassment to their shadow cabinet. I shall remember all my life the scene which took place on Monday last when the then leader of the government got up in his place and, in a voice which betrayed the gravity of the moment, read to this House the document through which he was announcing that his cabinet had resigned. Before a minute had passed, the first thing that came to the mind of the then leader of the opposition (Mr. Meighen) was to rise and say: Well, now that you are out of it, I pray that you make it as easy as you can for us. Certainly we are not going to do anything merely to delay the business of the country. But in his time the right hon. gentleman (Mr. Meighen) was devising every means he could think of to prevent the estimates being voted and to keep bills from going through the House. Yet, so soon as the late government resigned, having before him the vision of a cabinet under his own control, the first thing he thought of in the gravity of that situation was reliance upon the benevolence of that very group of men against whom he had devised every scheme his fertile imagination could produce to make it difficult for them to carry on.

Do not let hon. gentlemen suppose that we are taking this stand to-day with any idea at all of embarrassing this government. As a matter of fact during the past couple of days this House has done some business. But when we were informed last evening of the procedure by means of which hon. gentlemen opposite came to occupy their seats, we had to rise in protest, not for any advantage that we might gain, not in the interests of our own party, but from the standpoint of the people at large. We could not allow such a situation to exist without comment. It has been shown by every text which has been quoted in this discussion that ministers, whatever their capacity, may be appointed only by a quorum of council. And a quorum comprises four ministers. Yet these hon. gentlemen, temporary ministers, acting ministers, and soon departing ministers, were appointed by the Prime Minister (Mr. Meighen) himself alone. He is the only minister who has been sworn in, and he, sitting by himself, presiding over himself, personally passed the orders in council appointing this acting ministry.

Mr. RYCKMAN: Just as Sir Wilfrid Laurier did.

An hon. MEMBER: He never did that.

Mr. RYCKMAN: He did. He "sat by himself, presided over himself," and made his own appointments.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: A self-made government.

Mr. RINFRET: I do not know to which period of Sir Wilfrid Laurier's career the hon. member alludes, but I venture to suggest that if Sir Wilfrid's record were compared with my hon. friends' he would find that the right was on Sir Wilfrid's side. I will not try to make any easy argument by going back to the days of Sir Wilfrid, but I may content myself with this observation: If we want to find an instance of a strict regard for the constitution, if we want to see a record of the business of the country carried on as it ought to be carried on, there is no one to whom we may look sooner than Sir Wilfrid Laurier. He was eminently fitted to promote the prosperity and to maintain the honour of this country, and no greater man in Canada's history can be mentioned. He was the right man in the right place. I say, he was the right man—words that are slightly different in sound from my hon. friend's name.

As I was saying, when Mr. Meighen appointed hon. gentlemen opposite he did so all by himself. He was the only one who had been properly sworn; he was the only one who had taken the oath of office, although there should have been at least four ministers properly sworn. Even conceding to the right hon. gentleman a brain capacity comparable to the sum total of that of four hon. gentlemen opposite, I still say that on the rock of constitution he should have stood with three other properly sworn ministers before attempting to pass such orders in council. This therefore is the situation. We have a Prime Minister who, not being in the House, is not responsible to parliament, and acting ministers who, being in the House, are responsible to no electorate. They have not been sworn in and have not made any move to secure the endorsation of their electors before coming into the House to administer the affairs of the country. No one disputes the fact that Mr. Meighen could have had three other ministers sworn along with himself in order to pass orders in council appointing acting ministers. Why then did he not take that course? For the very reason advanced by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) in giving his advice to His Excellency. If Mr. Meighen had attempted to withdraw three ministers from this House he could not command a majority. Are we responsible for that situation? It is a situation we deplore; it is regrettable that neither party can properly carry on owing to the complexity of this parliament. When we met in January it was perfectly reasonable to assume that the government might expect the support of a group who had supported it in the past and whose policy in more than one respect approximated its own. To-day however it is different. We find the independents voting differently on every question as it comes up. No one is able to predict how any vote will go. If a member happens to be called out to the telephone at the moment the division bell rings, the result is likely to be affected. We have had more than one vote which has been decided by a bare majority of one or two, and if a member happens to be ill and is unable to take his seat, the division may swing in the opposite direction.

Is it proper that the business of the country should be conducted under such conditions? Again I ask, did not the leader of the Liberal party follow the proper course in advising His Excellency that neither party could carry on under the circumstances and that a dissolution was therefore necessary? Hon. gentlemen opposite seem to think they can carry on. They come to the House without a prime minister, that via media which, as they claimed not long ago, is essential to proper government. They have not one sworn minister on the treasury benches and yet they want to carry on. More than that, they wanted to rush things through in one day. When we asked the leader of the House (Sir Henry Drayton) the other night what was going to be the business the following day he said, "It will be prorogation." They were going to do it all in one day; they were going to pass millions of dollars.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: You are wrong.

Mr. RINFRET: I know I am wrong at this moment—I am quoting you.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I know my hon. friend wishes to be fair, as he usually is. His may be one lone voice in the wilderness, but I pay him that compliment. What I said was that I thought all the contentious business had been disposed of, and as the estimates were all government business we might be able to conclude.

Mr. RINFRET: The point is not whether the items are warrantable or not. It is not a matter of spending so many thousands on a break-water or so many thousands on a lighthouse. The question is, are there ministers in the House who can be entrusted with the public money? That is the point. We do not claim that no money should be spent on public works. They are our estimates, it is true; but we do not want to entrust any men in this country or in this House with public money until we are satisfied that they have a right to administer it. I think this is a great principle which every member of this House should be very jealous to guard and protect and this is the issue in this discussion. It is not merely the passing of a bill or the voting of an estimate, it is the very principle that no man should be entrusted with any of the public money until he has complied with the constitution, and we claim that the present government have not done so. It would be belittling that question and losing sight of it to claim that because the estimates which were before the House last evening were devised by us, we should entrust that money to a group of men who have no right to it. We might as well go outside the House and entrust it to a private company, if we followed the line of argument of my hon. friend. It is not a question of whether or not the money should be spent; the question is who should spend it, and I say again that my hon. friend either loses sight of the question or does not speak his mind in taking the stand he has just indicated.

This is a momentous question, Mr. Speaker, and I rose for no other purpose than to join my protest with that of the right hon. leader of the opposition, who placed that question so clearly before the public last night. I was as much impressed by that address as was my good friend from Bow River (Mr. Garland) who rose in his place in a moment of well-understood enthusiasm and said it was one of the finest speeches delivered in this House for a very long time. Let me tell my right hon. leader that I would not pay him that tribute if it were only for his eloquence or the way in which he put his arguments, but what impressed everyone—and I do not think I am wrong when I say that it also impressed hon. gentlemen opposite and stirred their consciences—were the very points which he made and the principles which he endorsed as well as the situation which he outlined, which is of such grave importance in connection with the very welfare of the most cherished rights of the people of Canada.

I shall not stress the point further; I think it has been made perfectly clear that there is no government in this House. There are no ministers properly sworn in who could pass the orders in council under which my hon. friends claim they have a right to pose as acting ministers. I am not making a political speech, but we cannot let hon. gentlemen opposite come before this House and ask us to vote supply, or ask the right to take any stand whatever as ministers when they have not that right. To my mind it is not a question of political advantage; this parliament will go on and men now in this House will disappear, but I daresay this moment of Canadian history will be looked back upon by future generations and that the course we are now taking will be taken into account by those who will succeed us.

Before I take my seat I would like to raise one other point. I was very grieved with the stand the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. Manion) was about to take when very properly called to order. I know—and this will not be denied—that it is already the intention of hon. gentlemen opposite to go back to their constituencies and claim that once again the Tory party has been ultra loyal while the Liberals have not been so.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. RINFRET: I stand in the judgment of the Chair. I know that that is the intention of hon. members opposite; my hon. friend indicated it very clearly in his allusions and when he wanted this House to understand that the leader of the Liberal party had been disrespectful to His Excellency. Although a young member, I have been long enough in political conflicts to know what can be done with that sort of material when some hon. members get back to their constituents. If it is claimed by any Tory candidates in the coming fight that by taking our present stand to-night, that in fighting for popular rights and responsible government there has been an element of disrespect to His Excellency, I cannot agree with it. It has been said and emphasized that the crown can do no wrong; certainly His Excellency can do no wrong, but His Excellency can be wrongly advised. I think His Excellency was properly advised by the late Prime Minister when he was asked to grant dissolution, and when he was further advised that no other leader in this House could carry on. Now, after we have given that advice, we are asked to make it easy for others to carry on when in our opinion it cannot be done. Without the least intention of being disrespectful I say again that His Excellency should be advised by the Prime Minister of to-day that he cannot carry on with these shadow ministers who have no authority at all to act in this House. By taking that stand I say we are loyal not only to the crown but to the very best institutions of our country and to the dearest right of our citizenship Whether we win or whether we lose to-day or this week I am perfectly sure that in this fight the Liberal party has stood for the rights and interests of the country.

Mr. E. J. GARLAND (Bow River): It is with some diffidence and considerable humility that I rise to address Your Honour and the House this evening on the question now before us. In a recent discussion I stated that I would not be swerved from what I considered to be a reasonable course of action by any attempts of a purely party political character, and that course I have pursued from the very commencement of my parliamentary career. I intend on all questions to be governed by reason rather than political exigencies. Having that viewpoint, Your Honour can understand the position in which I now find myself. This issue is of immense importance because of its vital effect not only on our legislative relationship as between parliament and this so-called shadow government, or those who have usurped government for the moment, but because it also strikes deeper, to the very root of our whole status, and that is one of the reasons why I feel it incumbent upon me to address the House upon this subject.

The tremendous constitutional effects of the recent action should, I think, with all due respect to everyone concerned, be analyzed. As the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat (Mr. Rinfret) has intimated, His Excellency was probably ill advised and is now being ill advised in the position in which he finds himself. At the time of the resignation of the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) His Excellency had two courses of action before him which would have been absolutely constitutional. He could either have accepted the advice of his ministers, his properly constituted and sworn ministers, and so be under no possibility of accepting responsibility or censure, or he could have telegraphed, if in doubt under the circumstances, to the Secretary of State for the Colonies and ascertained clearly the position in view of our relationship to the imperial parliament. That may have been done, but there is no evidence that it was done. His Excellency could have done that in order, first, to do that which was right, and secondly, to escape responsibility. I wish to pay at this moment a most earnest and sincere tribute to His Excellency the Governor General. He is a man—I have met him personally and I can speak with knowledge—for whom I have the deepest respect. I regard him as one of our great Canadians, as a man who has done as much as most individuals in this country, if not more than most, to instil into the hearts of our Canadian people a true Canadian spirit. I am satisfied that His Excellency is absolutely apart altogether from partisanship in any action he has taken, and in any action he may take, but we must look at facts as they are placed before us and ask ourselves what did he do? He accepted the resignation of my right hon. friend the leader of the late administration, and refused him a dissolution. There is no doubt, Mr. Speaker, about this: Until recent years it had been understood that the Governor General of the dominions did possess discretionary rights. The king himself did not possess those rights, excepting only in theory, and has not exercised them for heaven knows how many years.

We are asked now to imagine the position in this country—I am speaking I hope now with some effect upon my hon. friend from South York (Mr. Maclean) because I know his predilections in this matter; I know the sincerity with which he has approached the question of our constitution and our position as a national unit within the commonwealth of national units—I say to him that neither he nor I, holding the views we do, can be true to our trust and our own conscience if we let pass this opportunity of registering definitely our assertion and our belief that the evolutionary movement in our political development has brought about an exact similarity of situation in the Dominions with that that exists in England herself. From the day Sir Robert Borden, greatly to his credit, secured for Canada the position that he did secure for her at the time of the signing of the treaty, we must assume in fairness to him and to national sentiment at that time, and since, that the moment we assumed national status we took along with that national status, and exactly to the same extent, the constitutional position that was then existing in Great Britain as respects the king and parliament.

His Excellency on this occasion did not act as the king would have acted. He did not accept the advice of his ministers. One must ask oneself why he did not do it. There are two reasons only that I may assume at the moment, if one may do that properly: First, having in view the interests of the country, he decided that it was in the national interest that there should not be a general election if one could be avoided, and looking over the situation that faced him in this parliament he asked himself: Have I any assurance that there is any other group in this House that can act as my advisers, and that is capable of continuing to administer the affairs of this country? And so he undoubtedly called upon the right hon. leader of the acting government. When that question arose, did the right hon. leader of the acting government assure His Excellency that he had absolute power to carry on? Did he inform His Excellency that he could form a ministry that would have the confidence of this House? If he did that, I say to him that he did not advise His Excellency in accordance with the facts.

Before I dwell further upon that, let me refer to the last occasion in this Dominion upon which the Governor General exercised his so-called discretionary powers and avoided a dissolution. It was in the year 1858. Sir John A. Macdonald had just fought an election and had been returned to power with a majority of from twelve to fourteen. He met parliament, and shortly afterwards he was defeated in parliament on a matter which had not been discussed during the election. It was on a side issue, a question, if my memory serves me correctly, as to whether or not this city of Ottawa should be the capital of the Dominion. When he was defeated in the House on that side issue, Sir John A. Macdonald resigned, and His Excellency then called upon George Brown and Dorion and asked them if they could form a ministry. It was really Mr. Brown, and Mr. Brown, co-operating with Mr. Dorion, decided that they could form a ministry, and they so advised His Excellency. They were invited to form a ministry, and did so, and on that same evening they were defeated two or three times in the House of Commons. With what result? With the result that they returned to His Excellency and asked for a dissolution on the ground that one minister having resigned, and they having taken office and having also been defeated, they should receive dissolution. At that time dissolution was refused. If the Governor General had the power to exercise discretion at that time, he exercised it against a dissolution because there was no need for an election, as the country had passed through one only two months previously. Sir John A. Macdonald still had a majority in the House, and His Excellency had to make up his mind whether he should give a dissolution to Brown and Dorion or recall Macdonald. He recalled Macdonald, put him back into the seats of office, and Macdonald carried on. That is the last occasion in this country of which there is any record of His Excellency using his so-called discretionary prerogative.

On the present occasion we must ask ourselves this question: Did the right hon. leader of the shadow government advise His Excellency that he had sufficient strength in this House to carry on? I have stated definitely that if he did that, he ill-advised His Excellency, and for this reason: The group which now has asserted the right to govern knows just as definitely as the group which has just resigned that it cannot carry on in this House by virtue of its own numerical strength without entering into some co-operative understanding with the group to which I have the honour to belong. I stated yesterday and I state now again, that to my personal knowledge no such co-operative understanding has been reached. The leader of the shadow government never at any time since the resignation of the late ministry invited or called upon the group to which I belong for co-operation as a group. If there have been any negotiations with any individuals I know naught of it. If the acting leader of the government has the greatest numerical strength in this House, made up of his own party and any individuals in this corner of the House, it is his duty to inform the House of that fact now.

Mr. McGIBBON: May I ask the hon. member a question?

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): With pleasure.

Mr. McGIBBON: Has not the House already informed him by two different votes?

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Informed him of what?

Mr. McGIBBON: That he has the majority?

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): That is rather an absurd question.

Mr. McGIBBON: If the hon. member cannot read anything from the last votes I am entirely sorry for him.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I think I can read. I certainly think I can read as well as the hon. gentleman and perhaps reason a little better. The late votes did not give a majority in this House. The late votes were a censure on the administration of the Customs department and did not give hon. gentlemen opposite a majority. Nor could they get a majority unless they had entered into a co-operative understanding with the group to which I belong. If there is any understanding of that kind let them produce it. I know naught of it, nor have I access to any individual in my group who does know of it. Therefore I repeat that if the Right Hon. Arthur Meighen informed His Excellency that he was capable of carrying on, that he was capable of administering public affairs, he ill-advised and misinformed His Excellency.

An hon. MEMBER: Put him out of business.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): An hon. member says "put him out of business." On that point it is very interesting to know just what might happen if we did put him and his friends out of business. His Excellency has refused dissolution to the right hon. leader of the late government, presumably on the grounds of expediency—that is that the general interests of Canada will not be served by a general election at the present moment. For no other reason could His Excellency arrive at the decision he made, being fully cognizant of the strength of hon. gentlemen opposite and the general situation in this House. Under no other circumstances could he be justified, I imagine, in refusing dissolution on the one hand and on the other hand allowing hon. gentlemen opposite to come into office. Now an hon. gentleman opposite says "give us defeat." If we did defeat hon. gentlemen opposite then what would happen? Do hon. gentlemen opposite presume to imagine for one instant that His Excellency, already in an unconstitutional position, could still further make himself unconstitutional—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): —by granting them dissolution?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Why the idea is repugnant to the whole nation.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member speaks of the effect of the advice that has been tendered to His Excellency. There is no point of order.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I am referring to the advice extended to His Excellency and not to His Excellency himself.

Now, Mr. Speaker, yesterday evening at the close of the constitutional debate of which this is the corollary—or perhaps we will say the second chapter, as suggested by somebody near me—the leader of the government quoted a very impressive passage from a speech made by Mr. Asquith and he appealed to hon. gentlemen sitting opposite to him, "Listen to what the English Liberal party says about this sort of thing. Listen to the position taken by Mr. Asquith, a position bolstered up subsequently by other Liberals in England." And the passage that he quoted was—I am not quoting from Hansard, Mr. Speaker, but from the report of the speech itself—the following:

> The dissolution of parliament (said Mr. Asquith), is in this country one of the prerogatives of the crown. It is not a mere feudal survival, but it is a part, and I think a useful part, of our constitutional system. It does not mean that the crown should act voluntarily and without the advice of responsible ministers, but it does mean that the crown is not bound to take the advice of a particular minister to put its subjects to the tumult and turmoil of a series of general elections so long as it can find other ministers who are prepared to give it a trial.

Just imagine any responsible minister like Mr. Asquith making a statement of that character, that the only thing required was that some other group should be willing to give it a trial; no other qualification needed. As a matter of fact the hon. gentleman was quoting from a newspaper report of a speech made in Brighton, in 1922. However, that speech was contradicted immediately in the Times, not only by very many eminent constitutionalists but amongst others by Professor MacNeill. On the 29th day of the fifth month of 1924, Mr. MacNeill wrote to the Times and his comment upon the statement quoted last night by my hon. friend is as follows:

> That doctrine—

The doctrine of the prerogative of the crown.

> —for whose maintenance Mr. Asquith, with the approval of Sir John Simon and Mr. Lloyd George, had made the Liberal party responsible in his speech of December 18, of which he states on May 23 "he has not a word to retract or qualify," is contrary to the fundamental principles of constitutional morality, is absolutely unsupported by usage, and has never been reduced to practice since the era of parliamentary government. When Mr. Asquith, as spokesman of the Liberal party, propounded the doctrine I took occasion in the columns of the press, without fear of contradiction, and in most express terms, to deny (as I will do again), its existence, and to state there was no precedent and nothing that could be tortured into a precedent in support of a position calculated to lower the dignity of the crown by the participation in party politics of its wearer who is the outward and visible representative not only of the majesty of the state of Great Britain, but of the community of nations forming the British Commonwealth of Nations.
> My contention for which I cited precedents, has never been impunged. Mr. Asquith seems by his recent speech to repeat and emphasize an ill-founded exposition of the practice of the constitution which, in the words of Mr. Macdonald a day or two after Mr. Asquith's pronouncement, "found scant support in the best informed quarters, and was meant more for the ears of the King" than the ears of his subjects.

Could there be a more definite and complete refutation of the utterances of Mr. Asquith as pronounced by the acting leader of the acting government at the moment? If there is I am at an utter loss to find it. But, Mr. Speaker, we do not have to go to cases of that kind.

Now the hon. member for Fort William, for whom I have the deepest admiration and respect—I love his genial manner, the torrential nature of his utterances; they are a pleasure to me and I delight in hearing them—throws out almost without consideration at times the most extraordinary collection of figures, and at other times citations that are purely irrelevant and have absolutely no purposeful application at all to the debate concerned. For example the hon. gentleman, for whom I have a sincere affection, this afternoon quoted case after case which is utterly and completely obsolete. I admit the existence of every precedent my hon. friend quoted; certainly everyone must; but conditions change. We have passed on miles beyond that milestone in our political evolution. Would he have us go back to the aborigine days in Australia? At that time they had a tribal king who walloped everybody. The hon. gentleman smiles. He is laughing at himself.

Mr. MANION: The hon. member made a mistake. I am laughing at my hon. friend.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): The hon. member also mentioned Arthur Berriedale Keith. He quoted citations which would appear to offset quotations of hon. members on the other side, and he rebuked the ex-prime minister for having left off at a certain point in the quotation and not read a portion which he should properly have read, and which would not have been so satisfactory had he quoted it. But the hon. gentleman himself was no more fair, if there was unfairness, than the right hon. ex-prime minister, because I have in my hand the very latest works of Mr. Berriedale Keith published in 1921.

Mr. MANION: The hon. member did not expect me to quote all his works.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): No, but I would like the hon. member to quote the last reasoned statement of the authority, and not to go back and pick out that which for the moment suited him, and I do not blame him any more than I blame the hon. member to my right. I am quoting now from page 10 of Home Rule in Practice, by Arthur Berriedale Keith in 1921:

> The British rule has of late been followed in Canada as regards the Dominion government, in New Zealand, and the Union, but it is not yet established in the Canadian Provinces or Newfoundland.

And therefore all the provincial precedents quoted by my hon. friend have no direct application whatever to the situation which faces us here, because so far as the provinces are concerned they are dragging along, perhaps a step or two behind us, but they will soon come in line if my hon. friend will permit them. The citation proceeds:

> The explanation is obvious: it is in the larger communities alone that there has been fully developed that sense of political responsibility among ministers which would render intervention by the Governor unwise and dangerous.

I emphasize those words, and I say to hon. members opposite that their attitude in this matter is unwise and dangerous. They have not acted with due recognition of the immense responsibility of their position at the moment. I turn again to another publication of the same authority, published in 1924, somewhat more up to date, and entitled The Constitution, Administration and Laws of the Empire, and on page 155 I find the following:

> It might seem at first that the crown should be free to refuse a dissolution to a defeated ministry, as is still the rule in the dominions but there is no doubt such action would be unwise, and in view of invariable usage since Victoria's reign unconstitutional.

And the hon. acting minister would implant for all time, as a definite precedent, that the prerogative of the crown should be exercised in all cases wherever he so desired.

Mr. MANION: Oh no, I did not say that.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Well, that is the implication. If my hon. friend establishes the precedent which he seeks to establish to-night he cannot escape that implication.

Mr. MANION: I simply suggest that he has the right to do it.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I accept the position taken by the hon. member, and I suggest that it is infinitely more worthy of him than the implication his first utterance would carry. The quotation continues:

> The electors are the true sovereign authority, and ministers who advise dissolutions are entitled to ask from them judgment on their deeds.

Again at page 209, I find:

> The constitutional usage in the dominions has not yet laid it down that as regards the demand for a dissolution, the Governor must act on ministerial advice, although there are signs that this convention is on the way to be recognized in the more important cases. It was noted in 1914 that Sir R. Munro-Ferguson (now Viscount Novar), granted a double dissolution of the Commonwealth Parliament to a ministry with a bare majority in the lower House and scarcely any representatives in the upper. His predecessors in office had declined previous proposals for dissolution on the score that the possibilities of finding another ministry to carry on government without troubling the electors had not been exhausted, and had he acted on the same principle, it might have been possible to avoid a dissolution but he wisely conformed to the British precedents instead.

And I say it would have been much wiser if in our case His Excellency had been advised to adhere to previous constitutional practice.

That is the volume of 1924, entitled, The Constitution, Administration, and Laws of the Empire, by A. Berriedale Keith.

Miss MACPHAIL: It sounds patriotic anyway.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Yes. The question of our national status is inevitably involved in this matter, and I for one will not be a party to a retrograde step which will take from the people of the country one vestige of the authority which they have secured. All honour to Sir Robert Borden, all honour to Arthur Meighen when he acted as he did at the Imperial conference, and I am satisfied that if he now held the views he held at that time he would not be acting the way he is acting at present. What has converted him? Is it political exigencies, is it the pressure of the need for partisan advantage, or what is it? I am at a loss to understand his change. I say the majority of the people of Canada will look with the greatest disapproval upon such a course, and they will register their disapproval in no uncertain terms should an election be forced upon them on this issue. There is not the vestige of a chance of hon. members opposite succeeding in an election fought out on this issue, and they dare not try it.

Now, Mr. Speaker, there is a very confused idea of the status of these acting ministers. There is no authority to which I can definitely look with any hope of complete satisfaction on the constitutional or legal position of an acting minister. I am at an utter loss, so far as references or citations are concerned, to find any authority which will enable me to come to a definite decision as to the exact legal status of hon. gentlemen opposite, but in driving or picking my way through this morass of legal debate, I must have recourse to the legal documents themselves. Referring to chapter 1 of the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1906, I find in the interpretation clauses the following interpretation of ministers and deputies:

—words directing or empowering a minister of the crown to do any act or thing, or otherwise applying to him by his name of office, include a minister acting for, or, if the office is vacant, in the place of such minister, under the authority of an order in council, and also his successors in such office, and his or their lawful deputy.

That is the definition of a minister or one who is assuming that office.

Mr. CAHAN: Does the hon. member suggest that is the definition of a minister?

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): It is the interpretation.

Mr. CAHAN: Is it not a definition of certain statutes which may apply to a minister and therefore to an acting minister?

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): If my hon friend wishes to describe it in that way I have no objection. The words speak for themselves.

We turn now to chapter 4 and we find in subsection 4:

The salaries of the following ministers, members of the King's Privy Council for Canada, shall be as follows:

Those are the statutory provisions made which have been increased by statute since that time. Just as soon as that interpretation is satisfied, just as soon as a man becomes a minister or an acting minister, unless it be definitely provided for in the order in council under which he is made an acting minister that there shall be no salary, no wages, no emolument, in the absence of that statement in the order in council we can only assume, irrespective of any assertions that may be made to the contrary, that the statutory provisions apply and the statutory rank applies. Now we turn for a moment to chapter 10, in which is revealed the humiliating position in which hon. gentlemen opposite will find themselves. Before I get through I will show, I do not care which position they occupy, that they find themselves on the horns of a dilemma from which there is no escape. Section 10 of chapter 10 reads:

The independence of parliament. Members of the House of Commons.

Except as hereinafter specially provided,—

(a) no person accepting or holding any office, commission, or employment, permanent or temporary, in the service of the government of Canada, at the nomination of crown, or at the nomination of any of the officers of the government of Canada, to which any salary, fee, wages, allowance, emolument or profit of any kind is attached; and no sheriff—

And so on.

—shall be eligible as a member of the House of Commons or shall sit or vote therein.

I charge that hon. gentlemen opposite, by virtue of the order in council which they claim is right and if it is right according to their claim, should vacate the seats which they now hold. That would be the strictly legal interpretation of the situation. But they have pleaded plausibly an exigent circumstance. They have said to 10 p.m.

hon. members to my left, to myself, to others, in their speeches in this House: All we desire to do is to form a temporary administration so as to expedite the passage of the estimates and other legislation still left pending. When they place that position before us, they must say that there is no alternative. If there is an alternative, they must admit it.

Is there an alternative? So far as I can see, so far as the legal position declares, should hon. gentlemen opposite decide to resign they cannot secure dissolution. But should they decide to resign, hon. gentlemen to my right would naturally be called upon to enter the seats of office and to carry on for the balance of the session. Can they do it? The question arose in my mind yesterday and again this morning. Hon. gentlemen to my right having resigned their portfolios, having resigned the positions which they have just filled on those benches and sitting over here in opposition, going back to those that are now occupied by privy councillors just as they are privy councillors, would they be in any different position from that held by hon. gentlemen opposite. I was applauded to the echo yesterday by hon. gentlemen opposite when I asked the question. I got an answer that was not complete; but it made me seek further information, and I now find, according to the statute itself, that should it be decided that the late administration should return to the seats of office for the remainder of the session within one month of the time they resigned those seats, they have full power to carry on, to vote money, to pass legislation and to perform all the other functions of parliament. I quote subsection 13:

> Whenever any person holding the office of President of the Privy Council, Minister of Finance, Minister of Justice, Minister of Militia and Defence, Secretary of State, Minister of the Interior, Minister of Railways and Canals, Minister of Public Works—

And so on through the whole list of them.

> —or any office which is hereafter created, entitling him to be a minister of the crown, and being at the same time a member of the House of Commons, resigns his office, and, within one month after his resignation accepts any of the said offices, he shall not thereby vacate his seat, unless the administration of which he was a member has resigned, and a new administration has been formed and has occupied the said offices.

Do hon. gentlemen opposite assert that they have "occupied the said offices"? If they do that, they are absolutely tied to the emolument clause. So I say to them: They find themselves on the horns of a dilemma that cannot be escaped. They are in a cul de sac of their own making. Their board of strategy led them up a blind alley. I must presume, in view of the record of last session, that the board of strategy is operating overtime.

Mr. Speaker, the leader of the acting government, knowing the complete unconstitutionality of his position, not only is not entitled to dissolution, but should not ask for dissolution, and if he asks for dissolution he should not get it. The issue is this: Are we now to assert that in Canada the Governor General possesses a right over the people, over the parliament of this country, that the king himself does not possess in Great Britain? The hon. member for South York (Mr. Maclean) will never subscribe to that doctrine, I do not care how partisan his inclinations may be. I know the hon. gentleman too well; I know that on this question—and I am pleading to him simply because I want him to be fully aware of the responsibilities of his position—the hon. member for South York will vote with us should a vote be taken on this question. Otherwise he could not face his people with honour after his fight of years on this question.

I stated at the very outset that Mr. Meighen did not seek the co-operation of this group. He has throughout the whole of this session, if not himself personally, through his satellites behind him, viciously attacked us, described us as those who were on the auction block, as those who were accepting bribes, who were bartering, who were guilty of almost every wretched act that could bring this parliament into disrepute. The right hon. gentleman is at least consistent. He has not to my knowledge invited co-operation at all.

[Mr. E. J. Garland.]

We stand prepared in any constitutional position or under constitutional circumstances to extend to the leader of that party on a legislative programme of a progressive character exactly the same measure of co-operation that we have extended to hon. gentlemen to my right. We are as free from partisan inclinations as a group to-day as we were when we came into this House five years ago. If any evidence of that is required, all Your Honour and the members of the House have to do is to study the attitude with which we have approached questions of this kind or questions of legislation and our votes thereon.

I have nothing further to say. I congratulate the right hon. leader of the opposition in this, that he has brought to the attention of the House and the country, in most eloquent terms, in most convincing sentences, in most reasoned arguments, one of the most important questions that has ever faced the Dominion, that in my opinion has ever faced the parliament in which I have sat for five years. I was so impressed by the right hon. gentleman's speech last night that in my opinion it would be to the national advantage to keep him in opposition for five years. If the right hon. gentleman will make speeches of that kind, then his place is over here. Unfortunately, however, there faces us a situation which is solvable only by one of two methods. There should be a temporary restoration to office of my hon. friends to the right, with power of dissolution, to enable them to complete the work of the session, and if a co-operative agreement could be arrived at, so much the better. That is one course. The other is to face the facts. It is utterly ridiculous that this parliament should be hampered, hamstrung, shackled and tied year in and year out by the worn out practices of the two-party system. I say to you, Mr. Speaker, that this House has a responsibility to recognize that no longer is the two-party system possible in this country. No longer is it advisable, for the people have advanced in thought, in economic opinion and in political education to a point which absolutely prohibits any continuance of the old system. It is simply absurd to suggest that on any question that comes before the House our decision must have regard to the fact that it may defeat a government, notwithstanding that there may be no desire on the part of parliament to censure the government on its general policy. On one particular issue before the House, under the system that now prevails, members may be clubbed into subjection into a breach of principle, into a violation of their own beliefs, merely by the threat of dissolution. That is a violation of the rights of members; it is subversive of private rights. It is contrary to reason itself inasmuch as it compels men to vote against what they deem to be proper, in order to maintain in power for the time being a government generally proceeding in the public interest. This is something so obnoxious to me that I will do anything in my power, now or in the future, to free Canadian political life of such an anomaly.

Hon. members of this House missed an extraordinary opportunity a few years ago when they rejected a motion moved by the then member for East Calgary along the lines I have suggested. However idealistic or academic that gentleman may have been, he undoubtedly introduced on that occasion a practical motion of far-flung importance, embodying definitely as it did the principle that no government need necessarily resign as the result of an adverse vote unless such a vote were followed by a non-confidence motion. That principle should in my opinion be adopted definitely and for all time. If it were recognized to-day there would be no deadlock of this character facing us at the present moment. Parliament could function, the public interest could be served, elections could be avoided when they were palpably unnecessary, and the business of the country could be properly administered. The national interest, national sentiment, the patriotism and loyalty of our forefathers who fought the age-long battle between feudal privilege and democratic right demand that this House go on record definitely against unconstitutional action under ill advice and stand firmly for the constitutional recognition of the status of this Dominion.

Hon. J. A. ROBB (Chateauguay-Huntingdon): We have debated this question the whole day and part of the night. As a layman I had no intention of discussing a constitutional point such as this, but when hon. gentlemen opposite put up a medical man to speak for the government, I take it that it is quite in order for one who for some time has had something to do with the finances of the country to give the point of view of the people of Canada who pay the taxes.

We may differ, and honestly differ, upon the fiscal policy of this country, and we may have differences of opinion regarding our railways. We may differ with respect to such questions as the British preference or the reduction of income tax. But surely, Mr. Speaker, as a parliament we can unite on this principle, that in this Dominion, which to-day is entering upon its sixtieth anniversary of confederation, the people who provide the taxes to pay our vast debt have a right to know that their government is constitutionally formed and that those who are collecting the taxes, the tax-gatherers, are responsible to the country. Hon. gentlemen opposite are already receiving applications to sign contracts, and favours are being asked of them. Have not, then, the people of Canada the right to know whether or not these gentlemen hold office constitutionally?

I have not one word to say against the character of the hon. gentlemen who claim to constitute this government. They have all been exceedingly kind and courteous to me and I have nothing to say against them personally. But I do contend that these gentlemen owe it to themselves and to the country to see that they are properly constituted in office. My genial friend (Sir Henry Drayton) has helped me through many difficult propositions and he himself admitted this afternoon that we had not a properly constituted government.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Properly constituted, though temporary.

Mr. ROBB: I took his words down, but he can look them up in Hansard. He admitted that we had not a properly constituted government.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Temporary, but proper.

Mr. ROBB: If I understood him rightly he intimated that we had no government at all. Now, Mr. Speaker, this question resolves itself into one of two propositions. If hon. gentlemen opposite are properly in office as ministers of the crown, having been sworn in, they have no right to sit in the House inasmuch as they have not been re-elected. If they are not properly sworn in, then we have no government. As I feel that the House has debated the question at sufficient length, and so that we may have a pronouncement upon it, I beg to move, seconded by the hon. member for Melville (Mr. Motherwell):

That the actions in this House of the hon. members who have acted as ministers of the crown since the 29th of June, 1926, namely the hon. members for West York, Fort William, Vancouver Centre, Argenteuil, Wellington South, and the hon. senior member for Halifax, are a violation and an infringement of the privileges of this House for the following reasons:

1. That the said hon. gentlemen have no right to sit in this House, and should have vacated their seats therein, if they legally hold office as administrators of the various departments assigned to them by orders in council.

2. That if they do not hold such offices legally they have no right to control the business of government in this House and to ask for supply for the departments of which they state they are acting ministers.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I rise to a point of order. In the first instance I desire to point out that motions usually must have two days' notice. Your Honour can rule that this is a motion of such an extraordinary character, however, that the notice is not required, and I have no objection to Your Honour so ruling. I merely rise to point out that although we are not insisting on notice in a matter of this kind the very least my hon. friend could have done was send over a copy of this motion before it was moved. In the circumstances I do not insist on the point of order at all.

Mr. SPEAKER: I wish to be very clear on this subject. Do I understand that the point of order raised—

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I stated the point of order; I pointed out the discourtesy practised by the opposition in not furnishing us with a copy of this motion, and I withdrew any question of order.

Mr. SPEAKER: But as a question of regularity—

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I also pointed out that you could rule this motion in order and go on.

Mr. SPEAKER: The motion is in order Under rule 40 of Beauchesne will be found the following:

As a general rule every motion proposed in the House requires notice, unless it is of a formal or uncontentious character, or raises a question of privilege, or falls under rules 35, 36, 39 and 41.

I cited page 302 containing similar language in Bourinot a moment ago to the Acting Minister of Justice (Mr. Guthrie). This is one of those motions which can be moved without notice.

Mr. A. U. G. BURY (East Edmonton): Before the House votes on this question I should like to speak at no great length upon the issues raised in it. Yesterday the House listened to a long and impassioned speech by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) upon the constitutional question, and I would point out to the House in passing that the point of privilege raised by the hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Lapointe) is not that constitutional question at all. The point raised by the hon. member for Quebec East was that inasmuch as the acting ministers had been validly appointed to offices of emolument under the crown, therefore they had vacated their seats in this House and their recent votes should be expunged from the records of the House. That, of course, is a decidedly different position from the one urged by the right hon. leader of the opposition yesterday.

Mr. SPEAKER: I must ask the Deputy Sergeant-at-Arms to see that order is maintained in the corridors. I cannot hear the gentleman who is speaking, even though he is very near to me.

Mr. BURY: I was saying, Mr. Speaker, that the point of privilege raised by the hon. member for Quebec East was absolutely different from the point raised by the leader of the opposition yesterday and to-day. The leader of the opposition said that in point of fact the acting ministers had not been validly appointed, and that being so they were properly in their seats; their seats have not been vacated and their votes were absolutely in order.

I do not intend to deal at any length with the speeches of the leader of the opposition yesterday and to-day, first because they were criticisms of the action of His Excellency the Governor General in refusing him a dissolution. That criticism was based, as I am perfectly certain all members of this House are well aware, and as everyone in the country must know, on a consideration of how that refusal affected himself and his party. I do not suppose anyone harbours the delusion that the reason for that impassioned eloquence and indignation was any high constitutional principle or any desire to protect the liberties of our people. The whole question was how it affected himself and his party, and the chances of that party at the next general election whenever that may be. There is no need for me to defend the Governor General; His Excellency does not need the defence of this House, much less that of any private member.

Another reason why I have no intention of dealing at length with either of the speeches of the leader of the opposition is because they were both criticisms of the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Meighen), and I am inclined to think the Prime Minister does not need any defence by a private member of this House. I am reminded of an incident which is stated to have occurred somewhere in England, where a travelling menagerie was the object of the attention of some boys. They had been teasing the lion in the cage and some of the bystanders expressed indignation at their cruelty and tried to stop it. Finally one fellow said, "Open the door and let him out; he will stop it himself." I have a feeling in my bones that when the Prime Minister of this country comes back into this House and the door is open, so to speak, when he is free to express himself from his proper seat in this chamber, he will be very well able to defend himself against any of the charges and assertions that have been made in respect of his advice to His Excellency or any other line of conduct taken by him of recent days.

I would like to remind the leader of the opposition of something that occurred not so many months ago, and which is still fresh in the memory of some of us at least. I do not know whether it is equally fresh in the memory of his followers or of himself, because sometimes it is convenient to have a memory which is not too retentive. The leader of the opposition played, as he supposed, and I have no doubt as his followers supposed, very effectively upon the enormity of the Prime Minister in having, as he said, misled His Excellency by wrong advice. I want to remind this House of what happened prior to and at the beginning of January last. Members of the House will remember that on the 8th of January the then Minister of Justice and the leader of the House (Mr. Lapointe) made a speech, which will be found on page 19 of Hansard, in which he stated the attitude of his leader, the Prime Minister, then without a seat, and these were the words he used:

> The government met as soon as possible after the date of the election, and after having considered the situation as created by the result, the right hon. the leader of the government tendered his advice to His Excellency.

What was the advice? The speech continues:

> —and in a statement which he issued and which appears in the Ottawa Journal of November 5, he said: "After several interviews with His Excellency, at which the position brought about by the recent general election was fully discussed and all alternatives presented, I have taken the responsibility of advising His Excellency to summon parliament for the earliest practicable date in order to ascertain the attitude of the parliamentary representatives towards the very important question raised by the numerical position of the respective political parties."

That was the advice tendered by the then Prime Minister to His Excellency as to what steps should be taken. The notice published in the Ottawa Journal of November 5th proceeds:

> His Excellency has been pleased to accept this advice.

Surely the words of that statement drafted by the then Prime Minister, and published as an official declaration of what advice he had given to His Excellency are plain enough. As I took the liberty of reminding the House some months ago, in connection with the debate on the Address, that advice was, in the language of the then Prime Minister himself, that the House should be summoned and that it should be asked at once which party, whether that led by the then Prime Minister or that led by the leader of the opposition, was in the opinion of the House as a whole best fitted to take charge of the government of this country. That advice His Excellency adopted.

On the same day and in the same speech the then Minister of Justice and leader of the House went on to say:

> We were justified in retaining office and summoning parliament,—and in asking for the decision of this parliament as to who should be its executive.

I submit that the meaning is clear, the language is plain enough: "We were justified in retaining office and summoning parliament "for the purpose of" asking for the decision of this parliament as to who should be its executive."

Again the then Solicitor General (Mr. Cannon) on the 11th of February in the same debate made a statement along the same line. He said:

> The question before us is a very simple one. It is whether this government had the right, first of all, to meet parliament, and secondly, whether the government was justified in asking the members of the House of Commons to decide as to whether this government should remain in power or as to whether another administration should be formed.

Later in the same speech we are told that the Prime Minister had to advise His Excellency. On what point? There was only one point upon which His Excellency was to be advised by the then Prime Minister, and that was the point as to who was to be the leader of the government, who was to be the first minister of the crown, who was to be the adviser of His Excellency. The then Solicitor General said:

> Now the Prime Minister had to face a novel situation as I have tried to prove, and not only a novel situation, but a difficult situation. A man with ordinary conceit might have thought he had enough experience, enough judgment, enough personal perspicacity to advise His Excellency, but the Prime Minister took another stand. He said, "It does not belong to one man in Canada, no matter how exalted his position may be, to decide a situation so novel and so difficult. I will have the greatest, the highest and the most competent tribunal of the land to decide it, and instead of giving my own personal opinion I shall ask the two hundred and forty-five representatives of the people to make the decision".

Then speaking in this House this very afternoon one of the hon. members—I do not just recall the constituency for which he sits—carrying out the same idea, enunciating the very same principle, giving the very same reasons for the assembling of parliament and the purpose that was in the mind of the Prime Minister, stated that the then Prime Minister said he would not retain office, that it was not for him to retain office until he had consulted the House. Surely that position is plain and clear. Yet what does he do? In the teeth of the advice he had given His Excellency, in the teeth of the very advice which His Excellency had accepted and had acted upon—and I venture to say, being guilty of an abuse of the confidence of His Excellency—he does not carry out the decision and the purpose and the programme which he had laid down before His Excellency and which His Excellency had adopted. He does not call this House together and ask that question, who is to be the leader of the government and the first officer of the crown? No, he brings down a Speech from the Throne. In the teeth of what the hon. member said, to whose speech of this afternoon I have just referred, he assumes he is going to retain office. In one breath he said: It is not for me to retain office; it is not for me to advise His Excellency who is to be his government and who is to be his chief adviser. And in the next breath he brings down a speech from the throne which assumes that he is to be the Prime Minister, which assumes that he is retaining the office, which assumes that he is to be the first officer of the crown. In a statement made at that time by the then Prime Minister himself he said that while the election of the Speaker was not to be taken as an assertion by the acting government of an intention to retain office, the very moment the Speech from the Throne was brought down that was a statement and an assumption and a declaration by the government that brought it down that it was in office and intended to retain office.

Now I ask the House, in view of those facts, to come to the decision, and I think surely the decision is not hard to arrive at, that the right hon. gentleman who carried out that course of procedure before this House assembled, and after this House assembled on the 8th day of January, has small right to talk about giving His Excellency poor advice, and has still smaller right to talk about having proved false to his trust or to his position, and having, so to speak, taken advantage of His Excellency and abused his confidence.

Now I pass on to another point. The third reason I am not purposing to discuss the speeches of the leader of the opposition, either the speech of yesterday or that of to-day, is because both speeches were absolutely irrelevant to the point of privilege raised by the hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Lapointe). As I explained a few minutes ago, the point of privilege raised by that hon. member was that the acting ministers had been validly appointed and therefore that their seats had been vacated. Well, in point of fact, the position taken by the leader of the opposition yesterday and to-day was that the ministers of the government had not been properly appointed at all—that certainly was his position yesterday—that they had not taken any oath of office and were not competent to carry on the duties pertaining to the departments of which they were the acting heads.

I do not intend to deal at any length with the speech of the ex-Solicitor General (Mr. Cannon) except perhaps on one point. At the commencement of his speech he set himself out to make constitutional law so clear to the members of this House that everyone, even though not a lawyer, might perfectly understand the principles involved. He had not uttered very many sentences before some of us felt inclined to say, "You had better stop. We thought we knew something about constitutional law before, but if you go on much longer we shall think we know nothing about it at all." So far from making clear the principles of constitutional law involved in the issues that have been debated here, I think the hon. gentlemen rather beclouded them.

Now taking up for a few minutes the point raised by the hon. member for Quebec East, may I present his argument in as simple and clear language, and as briefly, as I can? This is what it was: That the acting ministers, in point of fact, had been validly appointed; that they had been validly appointed—and here was the second premise—to an office of emolument under the crown; and then there came a third premise, that inasmuch as every member appointed to an office of emolument under the crown vacates his seat by that action, so the acting ministers had thereby vacated their seats, were not properly in the House at all, were in point of fact strangers, and their votes that had been recorded the last two or three days on the motions on which the House had voted were improperly taken and should be expunged from the record.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. BURY: My hon. friends are welcome to applaud the clarity of the point. The question is not whether the point is clear, but whether the point is any good. If it is a bad point the clearer it is the worse it is for the point. If it is a bad point the best you can do to make it pass is to make it as obscure as possible so that nobody may understand what it is about. I am going to make the point so clear that everybody in this House can understand exactly what it involves. Now what it involves is this: First of all that the ministers were validly appointed; secondly that they were validly appointed to offices of emolument under the crown; and thirdly that they have thereby vacated their seats in this House because that was a necessary consequence of accepting an office of emolument under the crown. All right. Let us examine the point and the different premises or constituent parts that go to make it up. If that contention is correct it explodes at once the mass of argument which was built up both yesterday and to-day tending to impugn the validity of the appointments. There is nothing in the argument of the hon. member for Quebec East, if the appointments were invalid—nothing in it at all; and there is nothing in the argument of the leader of the opposition so far as that argument was directed to the question of the validity or non-validity of the appointment, if those appointments were valid. Therefore I think we may fairly leave it to the member for Quebec East to answer his chief, the leader of the opposition.

But let us look more carefully and clearly into the points involved. First of all it is assumed, as I have stated, that the appointment of each acting minister was invalid. The next thing assumed is that the appointment was to an office of emolument under the crown. Now I want to say before I pass on to the next point—that is to say the question whether or not the office was an office of emolument under the crown—that there was brought into the debate another point, a subsidiary argument, that whether the appointment was valid or was not valid there was no oath taken, and therefore even though the appointment was valid the ministers had no power to act and no right to ask this House to vote any money or Supply, no right to arrogate to themselves any powers. I purpose to deal with that in a few minutes.

Coming to the question of the nature of the appointment, that is to say the question whether or not it was an office of emolument under the crown, the argument that the office of an acting minister is an office of emolument under the crown is based entirely on the Interpretation Act. The hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Garland) read to the House the section upon which it is based. It is section 31 of which subsection (1) is thus worded:

And I should like the House to follow this carefully—

—words directing or empowering a minister of the crown to do any act or thing, or otherwise applying to him by his name of office, include a minister acting for, or, if the office is vacant, in the place of such minister, under the authority of an order in council, and also his successors in such office, and his or their lawful deputy.

Now the words that are essential in this section are these words:

—or otherwise applying to him by his name of office.

Let me read again:

—words directing or empowering a minister of the crown to do any act or thing—

And so on. Now the provision in the act under which a minister of the crown is entitled to his salary is to be found in chapter 4 of the Revised Statutes of Canada, Sec. 4 of which reads as follows:

The salaries of the following ministers, members of the King's Privy Council for Canada, shall be as follows, that is to say:—

The Minister of Justice and Attorney General, $7,000 per annum.

And so on. The words of that statute, section 4 of chapter 4, attaching a salary to an office, cannot be said to be words either "directing or empowering a minister of the crown to do any act or thing," and therefore the first part of that section has nothing to do with the question before us. But we have the other words:

Or otherwise applying to him by his name of office, include a minister acting for, or, if the office is vacant, in the place of such minister,

And so on. And it may be argued, inasmuch as section 4 of chapter 4 attaches a salary to the office of a minister, it will also attach a salary to the office or position or duties of an acting minister, because the words attaching a salary to the minister's office are words "applying to him by his name of office". That is the argument.

In answer to that I would say this; first of all, it is a very slim basis upon which to raise this large constitutional superstructure. They take three or four words of very general and wide import out of a statute, and build upon those four or five words of general import a huge superstructure, arguing that a salary that is attached to a minister must therefore come within the meaning of those words and attach to the acting minister. I want the House to realize the smallness of the foundation upon which the whole superstructure of the argument rests in regard to the salary of the minister as a minister of the crown—that the words giving the man a salary are words applying to him by virtue of his office. I think it is a fair interpretation of the statute that these words might be cut down by the operation of the very well recognized principle of legal interpretation, which is called the rule ejusdem generis. That is to say, explaining it simply, that where you have words of wide import, words that are apparently so wide in their import that they can gather into themselves all possible circumstances, all possible facts, if you have in front of those words, words of a particular import, the words of particular import will cut down, or tend to cut down, the width and application of the general words following. What are the words that immediately precede these words of wide application? They are these: "words directing a minister." That is telling him what his duties are. Secondly, "words empowering a minister," that is telling him what his powers are. Those are the two essential things a minister wants to know: he wants to know first, what are my duties; secondly, what powers reside in me to enable me to carry out those duties. That is what the act provides. The duties that pertain to the minister are the same as those that pertain to the acting minister, and the powers of the minister to enable him to carry on those duties are also the powers of the acting minister who stands in his shoes and carries out his duties for the time being. Following those specific and particular words we have the big wide words, "or otherwise applying to him by his name of office." I have stated that those words are very wide, and they must be very wide indeed to include the profit and enjoyment of the minister's salary. They must be very wide indeed before we can understand them to mean that the acting temporary minister is to have the same salary as the minister who is in the office, in occupation of the office and in possession of its powers. But those wide words are cut down by the preceding specific and narrow words, and are to be taken to refer merely to what pertains to his duties and his powers, and not to go the length of the salary.

What is there to strengthen this position? Because after all it is only an inference based on a rule of legal interpretation. In point of fact no salary, so far as we have been informed in the House by those members who have spoken to-day, is ever attached, except by some express enactment, to the office of acting minister. We have had case after case cited in regard to that, and we have been told there was no salary attached to it. The hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Lapointe) stated that unless some express words to the contrary were incorporated in the order in council appointing a minister, the acting minister would receive a minister's salary. We have had many acting ministers, and no case has been cited to this House where an acting minister had a salary attached to his position merely because he was an acting minister; but we have had case after case cited in this House where acting ministers have been appointed, have held office and acted for weeks and months under an order in council which contained no such excepting clause, or no such excepting words as those suggested, which merely appointed a member as acting minister of the crown, and did not go on to say, "without salary" or "without emolument." Therefore we have, in the first place, a general principle of interpretation which is in favour of the limitation of the width of the application of those words in the Interpretation Act. We have next the fact of long continued usage under which acting ministers did not enjoy salaries simply because they were acting ministers, and we have in the third place instances of appointments—and three of them were mentioned; the appointment of the then Minister of Defence, the hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough (Mr. Macdonald) the appointment of Senator Dandurand, and the case of another acting minister—three acting ministers appointed by orders in council, in which orders these words "without salary" do not occur. These ministers were appointed by the late government, by the very members who have been raising this argument to-day. The saving words "without salary" were not in their orders in council; yet they sat and acted. They are not disqualified, the heavens do not fall, the British constitution is not changed. There is no outrage perpetrated on the fair name of Canada, and no attempt made to curtail the liberty of the subject. Magna Charta stands unimpaired, and the Bill of Rights, but the moment the same thing which has been done three times over by the last government is done by this government, the very foundations of justice rock, and the temple of justice, like the temple of Dagon, comes down. Surely it did not need all this to show that this is nothing but a political gesture, just as much a political gesture as was the motion of yesterday. I may tell the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Garland) that there is not a single fact, so far as the facts go, which were not known to him when he voted on the motion which was defeated yesterday. He or some speaker from that part of the House yesterday denounced that motion as a political gesture and no more. Everyone knows that it contained at its end or right through its body the sting of the tariff, of what was stated to be higher and higher and higher protection; yet they repudiated it because it was a political gesture, and they were right.

The question of the tariff was not before the House. When the question of the tariff comes before the House, that will be time enough for hon. gentlemen to show on which side of the line they stand on that question. If this government is in power and this House is assembled next year, when the question of the tariff comes up on the budget members of the Progressive party diagonally opposite from me in this chamber will have ample opportunity to say whether they will help or resist the government, whether they will keep it in power, perhaps, or whether they will force it from power. But hon. gentlemen were very well advised to measure the motion of yesterday at its true value and to spurn the trap that was laid at their feet.

This gesture is more palpably a political gesture than was that of yesterday, because all the facts that are embodied in this gesture, with the exception of the question of the validity of the appointment, of whether the offices the acting ministers now hold are offices of emolument under the crown, of whether they are properly in their seats in this House, were known to hon. members yesterday.

I come to another matter and with that I close. As regards the question of the oath, hon. members on the other side of the House argued very strenuously that we were going to do violence to political principles and constitutional rights if we allowed ministers to act who had not taken an oath of office as ministers of the crown. By the way, may I refer for a few moments to the false analogies which the ex-Solicitor General (Mr. Cannon) used in his speech? He is a past master in the art of introducing irrelevancies, of introducing spectacular play that has no effect upon anyone who understands the principles that are at stake or who follows his argument. Let me call the attention of the House to the arguments which he used: We cannot allow these gentlemen to act as acting ministers because they have taken no oath. Why, he says, even the Clerk of this honourable House cannot discharge his functions without having taken a solemn oath. We, the members of this House of Commons, have taken an oath. I can imagine their little chests puffing out as they said to one another: We are not like these unholy acting ministers who have tried to discharge their duties without taking an oath. Now may I say, in answer to that: All the acting ministers have taken the oath of privy councillors, and the oath of a privy councillor is the important oath in connection with the acts of a minister. Let me call the attention of the House to this passage in the second volume of Todd on page 194. I want hon. members to listen to it:

> Moreover, the occasional appointment of a member of either house of parliament to a seat in the cabinet, without office, is no infringement upon the principle of ministerial responsibility.

Now listen:

> Ministers of the crown are responsible by reason of their being privy councillors, not as members of "the cabinet," which, as a separate institution, is, as we have seen, unknown to the law.

In other words the essential oath is the oath of a privy councillor and the essential oath had been taken by the four gentlemen whose powers and positions are being impeached to-day. That view is absolutely in keeping with the advice which the House has received indirectly and the information which was given to the House by the Clerk of the Privy Council, Mr. Lemaire. The House heard read a statement by the Clerk of the Privy Council that the procedure that had been followed in the appointment of these gentlemen as acting ministers was the precise procedure that had been followed in every case for thirty-five years. He was confirmed in that position by his assistant. Finally we heard read to us by the leader of the House a statement from the Deputy Minister of Justice that the proceedings and appointments had been absolutely valid and in accordance with the procedure that had always been followed; that in point of fact no law could be discovered requiring the administration of an oath to an acting minister without portfolio. I will be corrected if I am not right on this point.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Do I understand that my hon. friend wants to be without the law?

Mr. BURY: If my hon. friend will listen I think he will see my point quite clearly. As I said, we had a communication read to us by the leader of the House from the Deputy Minister of Justice that the proceedings and appointments had been absolutely valid and in accordance with the procedure that had always been followed. I have no doubt had the case been reversed and had we been on the other side raising the same point, the Deputy Minister of Justice, under the hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Lapointe), would have given exactly the same answer and his wisdom would have been applauded; he would have been a Solomon come to judgment. But just because the case happens to be reversed, and because the hon. member for Quebec East is no longer Minister of Justice, the findings of law given by his deputy, which no doubt had always been almost infallible during the tenure of office of the hon. member, are no longer infallible but are open to very grave question. However, let that be; this is my point. If I am wrong I shall be corrected in my statement that we were assured in this House on the authority of these gentlemen that no law could be discovered making it requisite for an oath of office to be administered either to an acting minister without portfolio or to a full minister with portfolio, but that in the latter case an oath was administered by reason of usage which had grown up. No law but usage in the case of a minister; no law nor usage in the case of acting ministers. That is the way it stands. That being so, what becomes of the argument of invalidity of appointment or impropriety in using their powers because they have taken no oath of office, when in point of fact no oath of office has ever been taken by acting ministers nor is required of them by law or usage?

The ex-Solicitor General thought he would get over that difficulty in connection with an instance which was cited where a member of his own government had not taken the oath. Oh, but, he said, there were then in existence a number of cabinet ministers who had taken the oath of office and therefore it was all right even though some of the others had not taken it. As I understood his argument, he spoke of the doctrine of the solidarity of the cabinet. I submit that the doctrine of cabinet solidarity means only that the cabinet is one in respect of responsibility. If one of its members go wrong, as occurred in the late government, the cabinet must fall as a unit; that is the doctrine of cabinet solidarity. But by no possible stretch of argument can it be contended that if an oath of office is necessary to one cabinet minister, to a second, a third, and a fourth cabinet minister, the oath may be dispensed with in the case of a fifth on the ground that four of his colleagues have taken theirs. That is the most absurd argument I have ever heard. The oath of a cabinet minister is his own personal affair, having to do with his own conduct of the department he governs, and it is indeed an extraordinary contention that because other cabinet ministers have taken the oath it may be dispensed with in a particular case.

The truth of the matter is that this House knows, as I am sure the country will know when this debate is read, that the whole thing is a piece of camouflage, a smoke screen behind which the opposition is trying to get back into office. Hon. gentlemen are clinging to the idea of office with a tenacity worthy of a better cause and are throwing to the winds every shred of dignity which the government of this country should maintain, if not for its own sake at least for the sake of the people whom it represents, as well as of the other dominions of this great empire of which it is a unit; because a stigma upon the name of Canada by reason of a lack of dignity in her council chamber on the part of her chief ministers is a stigma upon the whole British Empire.

Mr. POULIOT: Would the hon. member propose the abolition of the oath in the three branches of executive power?

Mr. BURY: I am not proposing the abolition of any oath, but my hon. friends opposite are trying to impose a legal necessity for an oath where none exists. That is the difference between us. In my humble opinion, speaking with confidence though a new member of the House, the duty of the leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) when he was Prime Minister was, upon his discovering that dissolution was not to be granted him, to come back to the House and to continue in office. Why did he not do that? He said that he could not carry on with efficiency and dignity, but he carried on under precisely the same conditions with the exception which I shall mention in a moment. Ever since January 8, until the twenty-ninth day of June, the right hon. gentleman held office without discovering that he could not carry on effectively and efficiently and with dignity. If he could carry on the business of the House, either in person or through his deputies, from January 8 to June 29, do you not think that he would have been able to continue for the few remaining days of the session so as to wind things up properly in the interests of the country? No, no man believes that. Everyone knows right well that the reason why, when he discovered he could not get dissolution, he handed in his resignation to His Excellency was that he dared not face the vote of this House on the Customs probe. But what he sought to avoid came after all. He handed in his resignation but that did not save his skin. The vote came. I say that the right hon. getleman's duty when he discovered that he could not get the dissolution was, not to have handed in his resignation but to have come back and wound up the affairs of the House and let members go back to their homes. Not that this latter was of such importance; the prime importance is to get the business of the country done. But what did the right hon. gentleman do? He offered his resignation to His Excellency—with a string attached. He said, "Hold my resignation in escrow." Do hon. gentlemen know what that means? It means that he did not want his resignation acted upon unless it was necessary to do so. What was in the back of his mind was this; that if anything happened, if perchance Mr. Meighen found himself unable to carry on, then he could go back to His Excellency and recall the resignation which was being held in escrow. I suppose there was some such thought in the back of his mind, but apparently His Excellency refused to accept the right hon. gentleman's resignation on that condition. His Excellency took the view that a resignation was a resignation and that was all. That is what makes the right hon. gentleman rather out of temper. That is what makes him forget the dignity due to his position and, more than that, the dignity due to the country over whose destinies he was presiding.

When the leader of the opposition was asked by the Prime Minister (Mr. Meighen), who was then in opposition, to co-operate with the government if a new ministry should be formed, he flatly refused to do so. He would have no truck with the new government. They had made their bed and they would have to lie on it: that was his attitude. Was that consonant with the dignity of his position? I say it was the attitude of a petulant child. May I in closing read two passages. First I want to quote from Todd, volume 1, at page 318. I want the House to listen to this and make up its mind as to whether the principle here enunciated has been fairly carried out by the leader of the opposition:

In all ordinary circumstances, the ministers chosen by the sovereign—

Please remember that it is the prerogative of the sovereign to choose his ministers.

—are entitled to receive from parliament, if not "an implicit confidence" at the least "a fair trial".

Has my right hon. leader, the present Prime Minister, received that? He has received nothing which, by the greatest stretch of the imagination, could be even called a trial, much less a fair trial. Now let me read one more passage from volume 2 of Todd, at page 194:

In Queensland, on July 20, 1866, a new ministry was formed for the purpose of carrying out a financial policy differing from that upon which their predecessors had resigned office;—

In this case the new ministry was formed to carry out a different financial policy, but that is not our case; we are trying to complete the programme laid out by the late government; we want to pass the estimates they themselves framed; we want to complete the business of the country along the lines laid down by the late government.

—and as it was deemed to be absolutely necessary that certain financial measures should be passed without delay, in order to place the affairs of the colony in a more satisfactory position,—

Of course you will say that is a colony, but I am dealing with the action of parliament, not with the representative of the crown.

—the new ministers appeared in the legislative assembly simply as executive councillors, without departmental officers, with the understanding that immediately after the passing of those urgent measures, they should accept office, and go for re-election.

They did not go even so far as the present government has gone; they came merely as councillors, asking that parliament put them in the position of finishing the business and passing those financial measures, and they were sustained. Let me read the remainder, to show that:

The assembly consented, though not without remonstrance from the opposition to this course. And after these necessary bills were passed, the ministers vacated their seats, on accepting office.

We are asking this parliament to finish its course under the direction of the present acting ministers without portfolio. We are asking that this government be allowed to finish the work laid out by the late government. We are asking that which is no more than our absolute constitutional right, or at any rate we are asking for that which other parliaments and legislative assemblies have conceded in similar circumstances, although in my humble opinion the leader of the opposition took the wrong course when instead of continuing in office he threw down the reins of government and left the country in the condition in which we now find it. Under these circumstances the least he can do is make the progress of the remainder of the programme as easy as possible.

Mr. JEAN-FRANCOIS POULIOT (Temiscouata): I have listened with very great attention to the admirable speech of my hon. friend, and I realize that he and the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George are the two big guns of the Tory party in this House. But the hon. member told you, Mr. Speaker, at the beginning of his speech that he would be short; he did not keep his word, but I make the same promise and I will keep my word.

My hon. friend finished his speech with two very interesting quotations from Todd. I will go further back, and quote Lycurgus, that great Athenian, a man full of old Greek wisdom, who once said that an oath is the bond that keeps the state together. That is the great principle adopted by every civilized country in the three branches of government, executive, legislative and judicial; the oath is the basis of good government.

What is an executive? If we take the British North America Act we find that an executive is an administrator, and there is a great difference between an executive councillor and a privy councillor. All executive councillors are privy councillors, but all privy councillors are not executive councillors; very often the honorary title of privy councillor is given a man who is not a minister of the crown, and these men would have no right to sit in the Privy Council as ministers. Executive councillors are acting temporarily, they are appointed during pleasure and when their term is over they are in exactly the same position as judges who have resigned their offices. When a judge is sworn as such he has a right to sit on the bench, but when he resigns for any reason he no longer has the right to occupy that office, and the same would apply to privy councillors.

Here, Mr. Speaker, we have a few ministers in front of us; I call them such through politeness, because they are no more ministers than are the back benchers of the Tory party. But they say, "A few years ago we were sworn as privy councillors; we are privy councillors for the rest of our lives." I know that is what they expect; I know that in the opposition they were not the good sports they are when they enjoy the sweets of power, but if you will remember, Mr. Speaker, they were ministers for a short time; they went to the country and were defeated and later in the papers we saw that the Meighen government had resigned and these gentlemen then ceased to act as privy councillors. They ceased to act as privy councillors because the people of this country had kept them out of the treasury benches for very good reasons. Those people, after they had resigned as privy councillors, were no more privy councillors than any back bencher in this House. They know that if they were sworn in as ministers they would have to vacate their seats in this House, as their leader has had to do, and be elected, but as they did not wish to do that, what did they do? They say: We were sworn in five years ago as privy councillors, and we will act as such: it will be an abuse of power, but never mind that, it will not be the first abuse of power of which the Tory party has been guilty; they have done it time and again, and they will do it now.

Mr. Speaker, sometimes we see men like Lord Shaughnessy, who was president of the Canadian Pacific Railway, and Mr. Beatty, the present president of that road, having conferred upon them the degrees of LL.D. and D.C.L., but do they argue cases in court before even a justice of the peace? They do not. Mr. Beatty is a lawyer, I am reminded, but Lord Shaughnessy was not. He was a very capable man, but he would not have argued a case in court because he had not been sworn in as a barrister. And similarly with the case we have before us in this House, Mr. Speaker. People who assume office under the crown have to take the oath of office. If a deputy minister of a department has to take the oath of office, how is it that his superior, the minister, is relieved of that obligation? That is something I do not understand, and I would like my hon. friend or anybody else to answer that question to my satisfaction and to the satisfaction of the House. If a man came to me and asked if those people on the treasury benches opposite had any right to sit on those benches, I would answer, as a lawyer: I do not believe they have any right, and I would advise you to have writs of quo warranto issued to oust those seven marvels of the world from office—I should rather say the seven capital sins.

Mr. G. R. GEARY (South Toronto): Mr. Speaker, I have before me the motion that this House has for consideration, and as I read it, I see that it has taken form from and is framed largely in the terms of the argument of the Solicitor General. In opening the discussion the hon. Minister of Justice made the argument—

Mr. LAPOINTE: Is my hon. friend speaking for the future when he refers to me as Minister of Justice?

Mr. GEARY: It is more by way of compensating for the reference the other day to him as the late—he interpreted it "deceased" —minister. I should have said, the ex-Minister of Justice made an argument based on the statutes, referring to the Interpretation Act, to chapter 4 of the revised statutes, and chapter 10 of the revised statutes. I must say that it did not strike me at the time that the hon. gentleman was speaking with any great confidence in his point of law. Section 10 of the statute the one the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) was curious about, says that no person accepting any office to which any salary, emolument or profit of any kind is attached shall be eligible as a member of the House of Commons. The emolument to which a member is entitled, and which he receives when he accepts such office, is the basis of his disqualification. That section is one of a group of sections which are headed "Independence of Parliament," and the provision is against a member of parliament by virtue of his seat in the House procuring for himself a position to which there is an emolument attached.

Then my hon. friend the ex-Minister of Justice turned to chapter 4 of the revised statutes, which sets out the salaries of certain ministers. I do not think we need bother about that. As I understood his argument, he indicated that because a salary is provided to be paid to a minister, and because the Interpretation Act by section 31 (l) says:

> Words directing or empowering a minister of the crown to do any act or thing, or otherwise applying to him by his name of office, include a minister acting for, or, if the office is vacant, in the place of such minister, under the authority of an order in council, and also his successors in such office, and his or their lawful deputy.

Therefore, he argues, a minister acting comes within the provisions of the statutes I have referred to. My hon. friend will recognize at once that the Interpretation Act and the words of the section that I have read are words directed to the jurisdiction and power of a minister, and where it says "words directing or empowering a minister of the crown to do any act or thing, or otherwise applying to him by his name of office, including a minister acting for," I point out to you, Sir, that as a matter of plain interpretation of these statutes, that does not import into the office of what I might call acting minister the position of minister. That is, the acting minister is not made the minister by that section to the extent that he is one of those who receives $7,000 per annum under section 4 of chapter 4.

Then my hon. friend the ex-Minister of Justice went on to section 11, of chapter 10, which provides that:

> Nothing in the next preceding section shall render ineligible any person holding any office, commission or employment, permanent or temporary, in the service of the government of Canada, at the nomination of the crown, or at the nomination of any of the officers of the government of Canada, as a member of the House of Commons, or shall disqualify him from sitting or voting therein, if, by his commission or other instrument of appointment, it is declared or provided that he shall hold such office, commission or employment without any salary, fees, wages, allowances, emolument or other profit of any kind, attached thereto.

And says that to make matters right these acting ministers should have been appointed with a provision in their commissions that they were not to draw any emolument. Mr. Speaker, that section has nothing to do with the case provided for in section 10, except it be a person who takes on a position that has an emolument, and as I have pointed out by the Interpretation Act and by section 4 of chapter 4, an acting minister is not one of those who gets any emolument, and so section 11 does not apply to him.

I think the ex-Minister of Justice was just taking a sighting shot with that argument. He was trying to prove that an acting minister is one who has a position of emolument, but if he will look at the concluding words of the interpretation section he will see that it obviously does not import into the word "minister" in all cases the words "acting minister." It simply gives the acting minister the jurisdiction and power of the minister himself. because by the language the jurisdiction and power is not only given to an acting minister, but also to his lawful deputy.

The ex-Solicitor General (Mr. Cannon) made the argument, which I think has been carried into the motion, first, that if there was no legal appointment there is no government; and second, if the acting ministers were legally appointed they have no right to control the business of the government. I take it that the second point is the same point that was argued by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe), and if my argument is sound now that there is nothing in the nature of disqualification in the "Independence of Parliament" sections of the act governing the appointment of an acting minister, then I suggest that part 2 of this resolution and the second part of the argument of the Solicitor General has no justification. If they do hold their offices legally it does not follow they are ministers. And the wording of the resolution does not attempt to go that far, because it says that if these men do not hold office legally they have no right to control public business. Nowhere does the resolution say that these hon. members are ministers or that they hold office as such; that has been very carefully avoided. So that the House is asked to say that certain men who are acting in a certain position are in one of two false positions: Either they have no right to sit as ministers, not being legally appointed, or else they do hold such offices legally and therefore are disqualified. If they have any right to sit are they legally appointed or are they not? I submit they are legally in their offices as acting ministers.

Nor is there anything in the arguments which have been advanced which indicates that these hon. members have not beeen properly appointed to take over, as acting ministers, the various departments which they control? I have not before me the opinion of the deputy minister but that ruling as I recall it when it was read this afternoon, and I should like to have it before me, is directly to the point. In plain terms it says that the appointment of these hon. members to be acting ministers was proper and regular in every way. I should have thought that it was useless to go beyond that opinion, I should have thought that the officers of the crown were the proper persons to adjudicate upon the regularity of these appointments that it should not be a matter for legal discussion in this House, nor should this House be required to pass judgment upon such a fine point.

Some trivial matters have been raised, such, for instance, as that an oath is required. My hon. friends forget that that begs the whole question. If the ministers are duly appointed ministers they do by custom take an oath. If they are appointed acting ministers, as in this case, there is no custom by which they take an oath; and the practice in the case of previous governments as well as in the case of the late government of hon. gentlemen opposite has not been for acting ministers to take the oath.

I do not want to labour the constitutional authorities, but will hon. gentlemen bear this in mind? I read in Todd at page 183:

> Upon the resignation or dismissal of a ministry it is customary for the sovereign to send for some recognized party leader, in one or other House of parliament, and entrust him with the formation of a new administration. Or, should the position of parties be such that no particular person appears to the king to be specially eligible for the post of prime minister, he may empower anyone in whom he can repose sufficient confidence to negotiate on his behalf for the formation of a ministry, and to present to him the names of the statesmen who are willing to serve His Majesty in that capacity.
> By modern usage, it is understood that no one but the Premier is the direct choice of the crown. He is emphatically and especially the king's minister, the one in whom the crown constitutionally places its confidence.

The Right Hon. Arthur Meighen, in the present case, was chosen by the Governor General and took his place as Prime Minister. His Excellency summoned to the meeting of that Privy Council certain other members of the Privy Council, and they proceeded to make the appointments that are complained of. I ask the House if any government has ever been formed in this country, or could be formed, under any other circumstances? To begin with the sheet is clean. There has to be someone to commence with. There is no miraculous process by which a certain number of men are designated by some power we know nothing about to be ministers. Thus these men are brought together constitutionally and the Prime Minister, who was the one chosen by the crown, makes his choice of those who are to be ministers of the crown or acting ministers. That has been done in the present case as regularly as one could imagine any procedure could be carried out; and we have the authority of the law officers of the crown to the effect that the method followed is perfectly in order. Now one does not suppose for a moment that when the law officers of the crown were discussing this matter and were giving an opinion on it they overlooked section 11 of the statute, which says that in case of all commissions carrying emolument the commission must contain a provision that no emolument will be paid, to avoid disqualification? One cannot begin to think that the law officers of the crown overlooked the very next section to the one they were discussing. Neither can one admit that in saying that all the proceedings were regular those law officers overlooked a requisite which had not been complied with, namely the taking of an oath. There is no oath, even founded on custom, that an acting minister must take.

I want just for a moment to refer—because to my mind it is beyond debate that the procedure in the appointment of this ministry has been regular and correct—to the course of previous proceedings in this House. In September of last year the late Prime Minister inaugurated his election campaign; he complained at that time, in fact complained very bitterly, that he was not able to carry on a government, that he had been obliged to mark time, that the situation had become impossible, that he must go to the country in order to get some sort of endorsement that would enable him actually to carry on the government of this country. He did not come back here with a majority of this House, he did not come back endorsed by the people, he did not come back with the majority that he said was necessary—a majority of his own party—to enable him to carry on. It would be interesting to review his difficulties during the session, but I come at once to the events of the last few days. The late government found itself in an impossible position, and on Wednesday this is what the Prime Minister said with regard to it:

I came to the conclusion that to attempt to carry on public business with a condition such as we were witnessing towards the end of last week would be to bring the great and honourable institution of parliament more or less into disrepute; and having that view I was obliged to consider whether it was desirable to attempt any longer to carry on parliament. I went to His Excellency and said I was of opinion that I would not longer take the resposibility of carrying on as Prime Minister, believing that the best interests of the state were not being served by any government attempting to carry on under the circumstances, which now exist—

And so on. That was the position in which the Prime Minister found himself, and an even clearer statement was made by the ex-Minister of Agriculture, who said:

We ourselves have gone through six months of more or less excruciating agony, wondering at every moment what was going to happen next, and the only gratifying feature of that trial has been the knowledge that during that time, with the aid of our associates, we have been able to put a good deal of first class legislation on the statutes of Canada.

Further on the hon. gentleman said:

—and because of what we suffered, because of my own experience, I feel a certain amount of sympathy for hon. gentlemen opposite now that they are starting to sweat, so to speak. Just as we could not stand indefinitely the humiliation of being over there, neither can they. By the time they prorogue and get out of this House they will know what it is to occupy both benches.

That was the position in which hon. members of the government found themselves on Friday last when dissolution was determined upon. The government was not able to get dissolution, and later on I shall have something to say about that. It resigned and the present government came into office. On Tuesday the debate on the Customs resolution was resumed. The right hon. leader of the opposition has stated to this House that he could have avoided defeat on that resolution with reference to the Customs report. How he knows that is beyond me, because he suffered a slashing defeat at the close of that same day. He says he would have been able to carry on very well and get through the resolution under debate.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend says this government suffered defeat on that day. Will he tell me what government motion was before the House that was defeated?

Mr. GEARY: The resolution containing the censure of the government.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No government resolution before the House was defeated. How can the hon. member say the government was defeated on any resolution? A government is not defeated on resolutions of private members.

Mr. GEARY: It may not have been technically a government motion, but it was a report of its own committee, and there were resolutions before the House which my hon. friends were opposing tooth and nail as a government, resolutions censuring the government and one of its members.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Does my hon. friend say that the first vote that took place under this present administration, that went counter to hon. gentlemen opposite, meant that they were defeated?

Mr. GEARY: No. This government secured the biggest majority of the House during this session.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: In its history.

Mr. GEARY: We had a majority of twelve, or something of that sort, on a division, which shows that we retain the confidence of the House pretty well up to the present moment. However that may be, my right hon. friend says he knew he could have pulled through and weathered the storm. I disagree with him, and subsequent events show that he could not have done so. He saw himself face to face with disaster that could not be avoided, and that is the reason of his resignation. Up till Tuesday last there had been no word of any sort touching this question which is now said to be of more vital importance than any question which has come before this parliament for many years. On Wednesday did my hon. friends on the other side say that this ministry should not be in office, and that there was this great issue before the country? No they did not. They came with still another resolution purporting to be a tariff resolution. They asked this House to say that because of the tariff policy of this party, upon which, so far as I am concerned, I stand four square, it should not be permitted to continue in office. I tell them that that policy as enunciated in June, 1925, is still the policy of the Conservative party. It has been debated many times during this session of parliament. None of my friends of the Progressive party had any doubt as to where the Conservative party stood on that issue. It was nothing new to them, and still they were solemnly asked to censure this government by a vote on that question. However, the government was sustained in this House. The resolution my hon. friends submitted had no relevance whatever to the issue before the House and no relevance to the present situation; it was designed simply as a trick to draw votes against this government. That trick failed, and on Wednesday night we came to the estimates, in order to pass them if possible. To the extent of many thousand dollars the estimates went through, and the first objection we heard was from the ex-Minister of Customs (Mr. Boivin). His objection was not at all as to the constitutionality of this government seeking to pass money estimates, but only a natural curiosity on his part to ascertain if, providing it got supply, it would spend the money. It was after the ex-Minister of Customs was satisfied with regard to that inquiry that for the first time—after the attempts by side wind before spoken of to procure a vote censuring this government—this matter of constitutionality was brought up, and brought up, as I venture to suggest, not from any bona fide desire to test the constitutional question but as a last resort, a sort of third wave of attack, the other two having entirely failed. We had a strange spectacle when these motions were put. My hon. friends opposite burst out at once against their former friends in the Progressive party. One could imagine their thoughts and one could hear words uttered bitterly, but faintly, very faintly, representing these thoughts. They lost no time, one ex-minister after another, one member after another, came out with reproaches against the Progressive members who voted against the resolution.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): The Progressive group has become so accustomed to that attitude on the part of both parties that it makes no impression upon them whatever.

Mr. GEARY: Rolls like water off a duck's back. I am not concerned with the effect on my hon. friends. I have no doubt they can take care of themselves. I am only alluding to the state of mind of hon. gentlemen opposite on finding they had been beaten. One would have thought no friendship was possible henceforth between them, but the funeral bak'd meats were scarcely cold before they were flirting once again.

We have heard a great deal about the dissolution that was asked for and not granted. My hon. friend made a very long speech last night, a very vehement speech, but not good enough, so far as I could see, to be repeated as he repeated it this afternoon. I say that those who read that speech may judge for themselves upon what the right hon. gentleman is basing all the arguments that he has to offer. The people of Canada will find there his attitude in regard to the refusal of his request for dissolution and to any future request.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Do I understand my hon. friend to say that we might expect an announcement in a few moments that the House will be dissolved?

Mr. GEARY: Not that I am aware of.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The wish is father to the thought.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes, I would like to see a dissolution.

Mr. GEARY: The right hon. gentleman has referred to that request for dissolution and has couched his thoughts in very careful language, but when he talks of what he hopes will soon come to pass, a request for dissolution, I shall quote his own language without putting an interpretation on it, leaving to those who read it to interpret it. What is moving the right hon. gentleman to use these words?:

> I will wait and see what His Excellency does before I judge of the motive which governed with respect to the non-acceptance of the advice which I tendered and which motive up to this moment I have never questioned.

He leaves it open himself to question not only what may be said on a future occasion, but of saying what he pleases about non-acceptance of the advice which he tendered. He goes on to say further:

> Until His Excellency has had that opportunity, and until I see what course His Excellency takes as a consequence of it, I for one do not intend to offer any criticism whatever of the constitutionality of the course taken up to the present time.

He is still withholding what right he may think he has to say whatever he chooses on some future occasion. It has been said—and I have no reason to doubt what my hon. friends have said—that for many years no dissolution asked for has been refused. That will go to show only one thing, namely, that in all likelihood no dissolution has been asked for under such circumstances as would make a refusal of it proper. That gets us no further on this particular request for dissolution, which, with all respect, I say was properly refused. Todd says:

> A valuable security against the improper exercise of this prerogative is that, before a dissolution can take place, it must be clearly approved of by the sovereign, after all the circumstances shall have been explained to him, and he shall have duly considered them. Upon such an occasion, "the sovereign ought by no means to be a passive instrument in the hands of his ministers; it is not merely his right, but his duty, to exercise his Judgment in the advice they may tender to him. And though by refusing to act upon that advice he incurs a serious responsibility, if they should in the end prove to be supported by public opinion, there is perhaps no case in which this responsibility may be more safely and more usefully incurred than when the ministers ask to be allowed to appeal to the people from a decision pronounced against them by the House of Commons".

Although technically there is said to be no decision as yet pronounced against the late government in the House of Commons, be that as it may, at all events Friday night showed plainly to the country at large that the government of the day had lost the confidence of the House when the Customs report came out. It had lost, too, what remained to it of the confidence of the people.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Just in connection with what my hon. friend is saying, does he not anticipate that unless a vote comes before dissolution is announced to-night, the present ministry will go out of office through a defeat?

Mr. GEARY: I am not a prophet.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Perhaps my hon. friend could tell us whether we are going to get the announcement of dissolution at midnight?

Mr. GEARY: I suppose the right hon. gentleman wants to hear himself say that. That is the only reason he is asking me about it. Todd also says:

No minister of the crown should advise a dissolution of parliament unless he has a reasonable prospect of securing thereby a majority of members in the new House of Commons, who will "honestly and cordially concur with him in great political principles".

I ask you, Mr. Speaker, and members of this House, if the late Prime Minister could have thought he had any reasonable prospect, if he had faced the country on that Customs report, of getting a majority of members in this House to support him? What are we asked to do to-night on this matter which has now arisen? We are asked to say that there should be recalled to the treasury benches a government which just two days ago suffered the deliberate censure of this House and made its exit from office in disgrace. That will be found upon the records of this House. It is clear to every hon. member that this House has without any equivocation set the stamp of disapproval upon the carrying on of the business of this country by the late government.

The hon. member for Bow River pointed to a section of the statute, and I may compliment him upon his interpretation of it, with which I have no fault to find. Section 13 states:

Whenever any person holding the office of President of the Privy Council, Minister of Finance, Minister of Justice, Minister of Militia and Defence, Secretary of State, Minister of the Interior, Minister of Railways and Canals, Minister of Public Works, Postmaster General, Minister of Agriculture, Minister of Inland Revenue, Minister of Customs, Minister of Marine and Fisheries, Minister of Trade and Commerce or Solicitor General, or any office which is hereafter created, entitling him to be a minister of the crown, and being at the same time a member of the House of Commons, resigns his office, and, within one month after his resignation, accepts any of the said offices, he shall not thereby vacate his seat, unless the administration of which he was a member has resigned and a new administration has been formed, and has occupied the said offices.

He may be sound in his interpretation of the law; but is there nothing to influence the mind of anyone to whom advice is given but the strict letter of some statute? Must he not consider the equities, and is it at all likely that when advice is given in a matter of this sort, equities will be left unconsidered and that the strict letter of the law will govern? Speaking of the general judgment of reasonable wayfaring men, can one conceive of these men saying that a short two days after a government is censured as the late government was censured, they could come back and occupy the treasury benches of this parliament as though such censure had never occurred? I think it is proper to say that this is the third device that has been tried in two days to prevent this government from functioning. The hon. member for Bow River has imagined the advice that was given by the Prime Minister. I know nothing about it whatever.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): May I suggest to the hon. member that the most sincere indication his party could have shown of a desire to govern would have been to solicit co-operation with those on whose support they must depend for government? They took no action in that regard.

Mr. GEARY: I do not know about that; but I know that when we were at an impasse, so to speak, the then leader of the opposition did ask across the floor of the House for some opportunity of discussion so that we could work out the business of this session, and he was curtly refused.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Would the hon. member be kind enough to quote the reference? I would like very much to see it.

Mr. GEARY: I have not the reference at hand. What was the advice the hon. member for Bow River imagined was given by the Prime Minister? He imagined his going to the proper place and saying: I have a government that can carry on. If he said that, if that was the course the right hon. gentleman took, it certainly has been justified by events that have happened since then. The government has been able to carry on; the government wants simply to pass supply, close up the session's business and let something remain on the statute books as a result of this session. What is asked is not an indefinite running on of this government formed in unusual circumstances. It is simply to close supply and finish the legislation which only awaits the last touch.

Mr. PARENT: It must be done legally.

Mr. GEARY: No one has seriously raised the question of legality. The thing is perfectly legal. As I understand it, the question in dispute is the constitutionality of advice given to the Governor General.

Mr. PARENT: There is no difference between legality and constitutionality.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I have now the quotation to which reference has been made, and it verifies absolutely every remark I made. It reads:

> The only statement I wish to make is this. I think on the question of the completion of the session there should be a conference between the Prime Minister and myself, in which conference I am prepared to engage.

Not a word there about co-operation; it is a conference between the then Prime Minister and the right hon. gentleman now acting as Prime Minister. What has that to do with the situation?

Mr. HOCKEN: What would be the purpose of a conference?

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Why not confer with the force which is really of use to the right hon. gentleman?

Mr. HOCKEN: In my judgment, the leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) owed a duty to the country to close the session in an orderly manner.

Mr. GEARY: A conference is not sought for the purpose of arranging a fight. One does not confer for that sort of thing. The object is to come to some understanding, and what does an understanding imply if not co-operation? It does not occur to me that we get very far by splitting hairs on the meaning of words.

Mr. LAPOINTE: In what capacity did the then leader of the opposition ask for a conference? He had not been summoned to form a cabinet at that time.

Mr. GEARY: I do not care whether or not he had any capacity at that moment, but there was an opening that would lead to a conference between two positions which were sure to be established in the next few hours, as events very soon proved.

[Mr. Geary.]

Mr. LAPOINTE: He had been so nice to us all along that he wanted us to facilitate matters even before he was summoned.

Mr. GEARY: One may take a narrow view of the question.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Yes, we know where the broadminded people are.

Mr. GEARY: At all events the ex-Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) will not say now that the next day, when the Right Hon. Arthur Meighen was summoned to be Prime Minister, the present leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) was prepared to enter into a conference.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I hope not

Mr. DOUCET: We knew that.

Mr. LAPOINTE: That is my sincere word.

Mr. GEARY: Since the late government resigned a number of attempts have been made in succession to divert attention from the blasting effect of the Customs inquiry. Hon. gentlemen opposite have endeavoured to secure a majority by some trick or subterfuge in order to get past that vote of censure, and now they are trying to have the House adopt a motion, the effect of which would be to whitewash them and put them back on the benches from which they have been driven.

The ex-Minister of Justice on one occasion, describing something that had occurred on the other side of the House when we sat there, said that it was not cricket. May I ask whether the late actions of hon. gentlemen opposite are cricket? They were given "out", and ever since have been grousing against the umpire's decision. I submit that the interests of the country demand that the government be given every opportunity to do what doubtless was implied in the advice tendered His Excellency, namely, to close out the estimates so that the business of the session may be brought to a conclusion. We have the formal declaration of the Prime Minister that the offices of ministers will be definitely filled, that the necessary elections will be held, and that every other procedure which may be required will be taken. It is not as though the government were attempting to carry on for any length of time with the present ministry, which is temporary. The object is merely to close the work of the session so that the labours of these past six months shall not have been futile.

Mr. C. H. CAHAN (St. Lawrence-St. George): I had intended to consider in some detail the sections of Chapter 10 of the Revised Statutes of Canada to which the hon, member for Quebec East (Mr. Lapointe) referred this afternoon in opening this prolonged discussion. There can, I think, be no doubt whatever of the accuracy and the validity of the interpretation which the hon. member for South Toronto (Mr. Geary) has given to the sections of that act which have been under consideration. The ex-Minister of Justice, whom I hope to see some day again prominently in the public life of this country—

Mr. LAPOINTE: Thank you.

Mr. CAHAN: —failed to refer to section 15 of chapter 10, which has a very important bearing on the discussion. Construe the provisions of section 10, as you will, I can conceive of no other interpretation being possible than that which the hon. member for South Toronto has just now placed upon it. Nevertheless the only penalty provided in the act is contained in section 15, wherein it is enacted that upon a member of this House becoming disqualified, by reason of the acceptance of any of the offices for which any emolument or salary shall be paid, shall vacate his seat. If certain gentlemen have really vacated their seats by accepting offices to which emoluments attach, and for services in connection with which they shall be paid out of the treasury of Canada, then the only way, according to the rules recently laid down by the opposite party in this House, by which their seats may be vacated is by an appeal to the courts of the country, which have full jurisdiction to take evidence and declare as to whether or not any of these members have accepted an office, to which emoluments are attached, which come within the provisions and prohibitions of section 15 of this statute.

Mr. CANNON: Will my hon. friend allow me one question? Does he consider the point he is now making an answer to our contention that a minister must vacate his seat the moment he becomes a minister? This is not a controverted election; he is disqualified because he is a minister receiving salary.

Mr. CAHAN: I am dealing with the very section which says that a member who accepted any emolument thereby becomes incapable of being elected to, or of sitting or of voting in the House of Commons. I say to hon. gentlemen that if they are attacking the seats of the hon. gentlemen referred to in this resolution, they may do so by bringing before the House, on a question of privilege, the issue as to whether these gentlemen are incapable of holding seats in the House of Commons. They are presenting to this House a legal issue similar to that which was brought into the House recently as to whether the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Kennedy) was entitled to sit as a member of this House. A proceeding dealing with the issue as to whether any member mentioned in this resolution has vacated his seat, by reason of the acceptance of some office to which an emolument or salary or profit is attached, is a legal issue which the courts of this country are quite competent to try. If the arguments advanced by my hon. friends the other day, which arguments obtained the support of a majority of this House, are to prevail in a case such as this, then why not take proceedings in the courts, or why not bring the issue fairly and squarely before this House by moving a resolution to the effect that a writ should now be issued for by-elections in these constituencies?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Does my hon. friend think a writ of quo warranto should be issued against each member of the administration to find by what authority he holds office and does he think that we should wait until the courts decide that question before the temporary government becomes permanent?

Mr. CAHAN: You must do that if you accept the doctrines laid down and accepted by a majority of this House during the present session. That is one alternative, but the other is this: If they have vacated their seats, why not bring the issue fairly and squarely before the House on a resolution declaring that writs should be issued?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The resolution now before the House brings the whole matter squarely before us.

Mr. CAHAN: I doubt it. I will discuss the resolution before the House in a moment, but I am now raising the preliminary point that the question may be tested in the courts as to whether these hon. gentlemen have vacated their seats. It may be tested in this House under a special resolution directed to that purpose, in respect to which the House, through the committee on Privileges and Elections, must take the necessary evidence which would enable the House to decide as to whether there are emoluments attached to, and received or receivable by them, in connection with the offices they are presumed to administer temporarily.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I ask another question?

Mr. CAHAN: Just a moment; I am going to deal with the resolution itself.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I just wanted to relieve my hon. friend's anxiety by saying that if we did not soon get a dissolution in the regular way we might have to begin legal proceedings to get hon. gentlemen out.

Mr. CAHAN: I think possibly that will be the only alternative left to the hon. gentleman. The issue raised in this resolution is not primarily as to whether the hon. gentlemen have vacated their seats; the resolution says that the actions in this House of the hon. members who have acted as ministers of the crown are questioned. The brunt of this attack is against the actions in this House of the hon. gentlemen who have acted as ministers since June 29, 1926, and the resolution names them. By reason of what actions in this House are the hon. gentlemen attacked?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I say to my hon. friend—

Mr. CAHAN: I am not asking my hon. friend, because the resolution should state them, and it should not be left to the conjecture of any member of the House or to some hypothetical suggestions of the right hon. leader of the opposition as to what those actions are. The actions in this House of the hon. gentlemen who have acted as ministers since June 29, 1926, are attacked in this resolution.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend referred to me just now as to their actions. I would say that the hon. gentlemen opposite who compose the ministry either have been acting or they have not been acting. If they have been doing nothing they should not be here; if they have been doing anything they are doing it illegally.

Mr. CAHAN: The right hon. leader of the opposition has repeated that some fifteen times, I think.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend does not seem to have grasped it.

Mr. CAHAN: Simply because the position stated is so utterly absurd that it is almost inconceivable that any hon. gentleman should have ever made the suggestion.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I admit the position is most absurd—

Mr. CAHAN: I ask for the floor in this case; if the right hon. gentleman has any questions I will try to answer them, but I am not going to enter into a personal discussion across the floor of the House at the moment. These actions which are impugned are alleged to be a violation, an infringement, of the privileges of this House. What are the actions which are infringements of the privileges of the House? They are not stated in this resolution at all, but it is alleged that actions which are not stated, which are not expressed, which are not explained, are an infringement of the privileges of this House for certain reasons. First, that the said hon. gentlemen have no right to sit in this House and should have vacated their seats therein if they legally hold office as administrators of the various departments assigned to them by order in council. It has never been suggested that these gentlemen hold any offices; the orders in council, which were passed by a committee of the Privy Council, did not appoint any of them to any office. It is clear from the statements made to parliament that they have never been offered any office, and it is perfectly clear that they have never accepted any office. It is therefore perfectly clear that they are not now holding any office under the crown, except that the Prime Minister of the country occupies the offices of Prime Minister and of President of the Privy Council. You can go through the authorities and find score after score of cases where members of the British House of Commons have been offered or tendered offices in the government, and even the signification by such members that they would accept those offices was not sufficient to vacate their seats in the House. In order that the seat of a member of the House of Commons, who has been offered or tendered an office under the crown to which emoluments or salary attach, may be vacated, it is not only necessary that he should have been tendered the office, it is not only necessary that it should have been accepted by him, but it is necessary that there should have been an actual appointment to that office as well as the taking of the oath of office for its due administration by the person so appointed. Nothing of the kind has taken place with regard to the hon. gentlemen mentioned in this resolution, and in view of the facts which have been adduced, and which are admitted, concerning which no member of the House can have any doubt, it is perfectly clear that the first reason given in this resolution does not apply to any of the hon. gentlemen therein named. The first reason is:

1. That the said hon. gentlemen have no right to sit in this House, and should have vacated their seats therein, if they legally hold office as administrators of the various departments assigned to them by orders in council.

Now everyone admits that they do not come under that heading. If they did, it would not be for them to vacate their seats, for if they did come under that heading their seats would become vacated by virtue of the statute. So that part of the resolution does not apply.

The second reason which is urged why the actions in this House of these hon. members are a violation and an infringement of the privileges of the House is:

2. That if they do not hold such offices legally they have no right to control the business of government in this House and to ask for supply for the departments of which they state they are acting ministers.

Mr. DUNNING: Hear, hear.

Mr. CAHAN: The hon. gentleman says, "hear, hear." But what does it mean to say they have no right to control the business of this House? Who controls the business of this House? This House controls its own business. This House is in supreme control. The members of this House control the business of this House under the direction of His Honour the Speaker. Even when the right hon. the Prime Minister in former days was sitting in the House, he did not control the business of this House. If he wished to make a motion that a certain order of business should be proceeded with, he made it, and the House could adopt or reject the motion as it saw fit. This House has control, under the direction of the Speaker, of its own business. Therefore hon. gentlemen who sit in the seats to my left, and who have been designated as acting for and on behalf of the Prime Minister, selected by him in order to temporarily supervise, during this interregnum, the various departments of the government of which he is Prime Minister—they do not control the business of government in this House.

Let us see what is the other reason. I quote again:

2. That if they do not hold such offices legally—

We admit they do not hold the offices at all, and therefore it is immaterial whether they hold them legally or illegally. They do not hold them at all. But this part of the resolution says:

That if they do not hold such offices legally they have no right to control the business of government in this House.

They do not undertake the control of business in this House. This House controls its own business under the direction of the Speaker and in accordance with the practice and rules of parliament. It proceeds:

They have no right to ask for supply for the departments of which they state they are acting ministers.

When did they ask for supply?

Mr. DUNNING: Yesterday.

Mr. CAHAN: Never. No minister ever asks for supply. His Excellency the Governor General comes to this House with an Address and asks for supply for his government, and, in the ordinary course, any member of this House, when once he has the authority of His Excellency the Governor General to submit the Address from His Excellency dealing with supply, if he has that authority, as a member of a committee of the Privy Council, whether he holds any ministerial office or not, has the right to rise in this House and make the ordinary motion for going into committee of Supply, and when in committee of Supply, to move for the passing of the various items submitted by His Excellency. I have always had the highest opinion of the former Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe), and I will venture my reputation that he never drafted a resolution such as that, which it is inconceivable that any member having an intelligent appreciation of the powers of this House and of the action of His Excellency the Governor General in addressing this House for supply, could ever have drafted and submitted to the House.

If I might be allowed to diverge for one moment, Mr. Speaker, to consider the case of privilege which was stated to this House this afternoon, in the discussion of which Your Honour allowed very, very wide departures, if I may say so, from the single definite issue placed before the House in the statement of privilege which was first made, a whole mountain of constitutional controversies was erected in that connection, and now we find that this mountain has laboured and given birth to this ridiculous little mouse which we find in this resolution, the whole tendency of which is to present to the House, by a circuitous way, a motion of want of confidence in the existing government.

Mr. DUNNING: But you say the government does not exist.

Mr. CAHAN: The government exists as long as there is a Prime Minister in this country who is sworn into office and has the right to select the other members of his ministry, and, under our practice, he is given reasonable time to do so. When the government of the right hon. leader of the opposition came into office he was allowed a reasonable time of several weeks in which to form his ministry. How did he form it? What is the basis for the extraordinary criticism made here with respect to a meeting of the committee of the Privy Council at which certain orders in council were passed? When the right hon. leader of the opposition was selected to form an administration he himself undoubtedly was first sworn into office as Prime Minister, and possibly as the holder of the office of President of the Privy Council. Then he summoned other members of the Privy Council; he could summon any members he might see fit, who were present in Canada. He had the constitutional right to summon them as a committee of the Privy Council, empowered to act further, and he did so. And when the right hon. gentleman sneers at the present Prime Minister for making appointments by orders in council, the latter is following exactly the same practice as the right hon. leader of the opposition followed when he first constituted his own cabinet; and the same practice has been followed in the constitution of each and every government since 1867.

But, Mr. Speaker, I should like to call attention just to one other phase of the question. I listened, as we all listened, with admiration to the address of the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Garland)—I think it was one of the most eloquent and, on the whole, most impressive addresses that we have heard during this session of parliament. I do not agree with all the hon. gentleman's interpretations as to the law, and I think he overemphasized certain interpretations which he gave to existing constitutional practice. The leader of the opposition stated his position very fully last evening. He says that he visited His Excellency the Governor General on Saturday and discussed with him the question of a dissolution of parliament; that he approached His Excellency on Monday about noon, in accordance with a previous appointment, and he then again discussed the question of dissolution; and that His Excellency declined to follow his advice and to grant a dissolution of parliament.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: In order that the record may be complete I should say that I also had an interview with His Excellency on Sunday. I did not say anything about that previously.

Mr. CAHAN: We will take it that the right hon. gentleman had interviews with His Excellency on Saturday, on Sunday and on Monday. It was the bounden duty of the leader of the opposition, as the then Prime Minister, to have informed His Excellency with respect to recent proceedings in this House, and recent proceedings in the special committee investigating the Department of Customs and Excise. We know therefore that, if the Prime Minister of that day performed his duty, His Excellency was well informed as to the report of the Customs committee, as to the Stevens amendment moved to that report, as to the fact that that amendment was a reflection, and a serious reflection, upon the administration under the direction and control of the then Prime Minister, who now leads the opposition. His Excellency must have been informed also of the three votes in this House—possibly they were not direct votes of want of confidence, dealing with them in a strictly technical sense—and His Excellency must have been in a position to know that a dissolution of the House, on the advice of the then Prime Minister, would render it impossible for the House, in the exercise of its constitutional functions, to pass the amendment introduced by Mr. Stevens, as amended by one subamendment at least which reflected very severely upon the administration of the government of the day. Now I ask the leader of the opposition to search the records—and he will search them in vain in recent years—to find a case in the British parliament, or a case in any of the dominion or colonial parliaments, if you distinguish between them, in which a prime minister was allowed a dissolution which would have the effect of preventing a legislature then in session from passing a resolution then actually before it, reflecting upon and discrediting the administration of the day.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: What will my hon. friend have to say if we get a dissolution before the present resolution is voted upon?

Mr. CAHAN: That the present resolution is perfectly ridiculous. I say, and I do not think the right hon. gentleman will deny it, that if the resolution dealing with the Customs report then before the House had been passed when on Saturday, Sunday and Monday the Prime Minister advised dissolution, it would have reflected very seriously upon his administration and have rendered it impossible for the right hon. gentleman to continue any longer in office.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Just to show how mistaken my hon. friend is, I really and honestly believe that if I had not resigned because my advice for the dissolution of parliament was not accepted, the criticism that has been levelled against the department would not have been passed at all.

Mr. CAHAN: Oh, well!

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am pretty sure it would not have been.

Mr. CAHAN: I do not want to enter into a discussion with the hon. gentleman. But I give him credit for being the most optimistic man I ever came into contact with in public life, and the genial optimism he displays even to-night in the suggestion, that he may come back as Prime Minister by a double shuffle within a week or two, surpasses the reasonable and intelligent anticipations of others who are not equally as sanguine as himself. But coming down now to the question, the right hon. leader of the opposition last evening stated:

> In being declined the right of dissolution I believe I was declined that right because His Excellency had the honest belief that some other member of this House could be found who as Prime Minister could carry on the business of government in this country in the way it should be carried on, befitting the dignity and honour of parliament, and which would therefore avoid the necessity of a general election.

There the right hon. member frankly admits that under the constitutional practice His Excellency the Governor General in the selection of an hon. member of this House, who could carry on the business of the government of this country and avoid the necessity of a dissolution and general election, would be acting within the constitutional practice; and, if the hon. member so selected were able to do so, he would entirely vindicate his selection by His Excellency the Governor General. The present leader of the opposition further says:

> I believe that His Excellency the Governor General sincerely believed that the present Prime Minister would be able to carry on the government of this country in a manner befitting and in accordance with British traditions, in a manner which would accord with the recognized principles of responsible government; and believing that, His Excellency undoubtedly asked the present Prime Minister whether he was prepared to assume office on those conditions. Now if the right hon. gentleman can demonstrate to the country, if he has demonstrated to this House and this parliament, that he is able to do that, after what we have seen and are witnessing in this so-called ministry presented to us to-night, then I say that His Excellency's judgment in the matter has been sound and right, and there is no criticism to offer.

That is the statement he made last night, clearly and distinctly to this House and to the public of Canada. That was before some member on the other side, I do not know who, had had a night to cogitate upon the matter, and to concoct this singularly ludicrous resolution which has been presented here to-night by way of a vote of want of confidence in the existing government; but that the constitutional practice thus stated by the right hon. leader of the opposition last evening is the constitutional practice in this country cannot I think be doubted. For instance, in this late work of Keith's, the edition of April 19, 1924, to which the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Garland) referred this afternoon, I find in the introduction, which undoubtedly is somewhat later than the writing of the text, he deals with the fact that in England there are now three recognized parties; and the fact that three parties exist and that at any time no one of those parties may have a complete majority in the House will tend to evolve possibly, and probably, a new constitutional practice. He says in dealing with this question:

> The constitutional issue, therefore, has again been raised as to the position of the crown in regard to the dissolution of parliament. It has been suggested that the practice in the dominions—

Mind you, this is written in April, 1924.

> —which empowers the representative of the crown to decline to grant a dissolution to a premier, provided that he is able to find a politician willing to carry on the government and to accept responsibility for the refusal, should be regarded as applicable to Great Britain.

There it is made clear that the practice, which in 1924 prevailed in the dominions of the empire, was to the effect that, provided His Excellency the Governor General was able to find a member of parliament willing to carry on the government and to accept responsibility for the refusal to dissolve parliament, His Excellency would be acting in accordance with recognized constitutional practice in calling upon such member to form a new ministry rather than to dissolve the House on the advice of the preceding prime minister. He says in effect: That now, in view of the fact that there are three parties in Great Britain, the question is mooted whether that same practice, which prevailed in 1924 in the dominions of the empire, should not now be accepted as also applicable to Great Britain, and as in the interests of the people of Great Britain. He further states:

> The question presents considerable difficulty when treated in the abstract. It is, for instance, obvious that the crown could not constitutionally grant a prime minister, who had obtained one dissolution and had been defeated, a second dissolution of parliament if any other means of carrying on the government could be found.

That is stated by Mr. Keith to be the present constitutional practice in Great Britain, and how does it apply to the present conditions in Canada? In September, 1925, the then prime minister of the country, the present leader of the opposition, approached the Governor General and asked for a dissolution. We have on record what purports to be a complete statement of the grounds which he presented to His Excellency the Governor General in asking for that dissolution. Certain issues were raised which he declared to His Excellency should be placed before the people of this country for a decision, and it was still further stated that for him to carry on the government of the country it was necessary to increase the number of his supporters in this House of Commons so that he would have a majority over both parties in opposition in this House. The result of that election is well known. The right hon. gentleman came back with a minority, with a very substantial reduction in the number of members who supported him in this House, and the two parties which had opposed him in that general election were together in a very considerable majority. What happened then? The Prime Minister of that day, although it was admitted that he had not secured popular support either of the electors or of the members elected by the voters of Canada, approached His Excellency the Governor General and asked that parliament might be summoned in order that the issue, as to whether the majority of parliament would support him for the time being, might be placed before parliament. His Excellency the Governor General granted that request and parliament was convened.

Then came another issue. We now know and it is clear that the usual constitutional practice was to summon parliament; when parliament convened, to have it elect a Speaker, and to place before parliament the issue as to whether the Prime Minister and his government had the confidence of parliament at that time, before any speech from the Throne could be brought down. Still, when the request was made to His Excellency the Governor General, he, to a slight extent, departed from the recognized constitutional practice in order to show to the existing Prime Minister every consideration and assistance possible in the administration of the government of this country.

We then had a speech from the throne brought down which contained little or no reference whatever to any issue placed before the people of this country in the preceding general elections, a speech which contained captivating references to proposed legislation which was likely to receive the favourable consideration of one of the groups in this House. The leader of the opposition, then Prime Minister, prior to that point, so far as we can see from the outside, certainly had received as favourable and as considerate treatment as it was possible for the crown to give to a Prime Minister who held the complete confidence of the crown. But then this matter of the administration of the Department of Customs came up; charges were made in this House and referred to the special committee, and that committee of nine members, four of whom were supporters in this House of hon. gentlemen opposite, brought in, through the chairman of that committee, also a supporter of the Prime Minister, a report, adopted unanimously, containing serious reflections upon the government which had been administering the customs laws of this country. Even if that report had passed, of itself it contained such severe reflections that no Prime Minister having a proper regard for the dignity of his office and his personal self-respect would have continued to hold office after that report had been adopted. Amendments were proposed to that report reflecting more seriously upon the administration of the government, and the temper of the House was indicated by three votes, none of which technically may have been a direct vote of want of confidence in the government, but each and every one of which reflected the studied and considered judgment of this House, to the effect that this House was prepared to approve and to pass the amendment which reflected so seriously upon the government.

Those facts being known to His Excellency, the Prime Minister of that day, the present leader of the opposition, according to his own statement, approached His Excellency and asked for a dissolution, at a time when a resolution of censure was before the House, when it was perfectly clear that that resolution of censure would be adopted although opposed by hon. gentlemen who composed the ministry. There was then a discretion in His Excellency the Governor General, as stated by all the authorities, as there would have been a discretion in the crown of England, to refuse to grant that dissolution at that time and under those conditions, until the right hon. gentleman and his government had submitted themselves to the judgment of this high court of parliament to which they had appealed.

Talk about a storm arising in this country over the action of His Excellency! If there ever should be a governor general holding that high office, who should become such a partisan of any party as to grant dissolution to a prime minister in order to enable him to escape from the censure of the parliament then sitting, you would have a storm from the Atlantic to the Pacific that would rock the very foundations of constitutional government in this country. But here we have His Excellency refusing to act on the advice of the Prime Minister; refusing to grant a dissolution and, following the constitutional practice laid down by the leader of the opposition himself, in the effort to ascertain if there is some member of parliament who was prepared to accept the duty of forming a new administration, His Excellency called upon the then leader of the opposition. the Right Hon. Mr. Meighen. The office of Prime Minister is now filled. It is now quite open to the present leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) to bring before this House any motion of want of confidence that he deems fit.

We still have, despite all the right hon. gentleman may say to the contrary, responsible self-government in this country, on exactly the same basis as responsible self-government exists in England, with regard to all matters which are within the legislative jurisdiction of this parliament, or within the administrative jurisdiction of the government of this country. If hon. gentlemen opposite think that this government now existing is not worthy of the confidence of this House, let them take the manly and courageous way, bring in a direct resolution of want of confidence and test the House. Let them not be content with this flimsy production, which does discredit to an ordinary, illiterate schoolboy, dealing with the actions in this House of certain members who admittedly have conducted themselves with most perfect decorum.

1 a.m.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If the House were to pass that flimsy, contemptible resolution, would it not be a horrible vote of want of confidence in the government?

Mr. CAHAN: It might possibly be considered a vote of want of confidence, but why has not the hon. gentleman the frankness and the courage to come forward with a direct motion having that object in view, instead of a resolution which may with difficulty be distorted in some way into a motion of want of confidence?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The hon. gentleman wants to know why we have moved this—what does he call it?—flimsy, contemptible—

Mr. CAHAN: I did not say contemptible. That would have been unparliamentary and I should have been called to order.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: At any rate something awful.

Mr. CAHAN: Yes, more than that, something ridiculous and discreditable.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Of course it is all that because it gives the reason why the opposition have no confidence in the government. But surely we cannot help it if a ridiculous situation exists opposite.

Mr. CAHAN: All I have to say is that both reasons indicated in the motion are absolutely false and without foundation, and the motion could have been brought before the House only for the purpose—well, I had better not finish the sentence.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: One or other of the reasons must be true.

Mr. CAHAN: Not necessarily. I have cross-examined witnesses too many times not to be able to frame a question to which no answer could be given that might not tend to convict the accused. I see my hon. friend, the ex-Solicitor General (Mr. Cannon) sitting beside the leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) and as I know he is an adept at framing such questions, I rather suspect that he may have drafted this resolution.

Mr. CANNON: If this motion is of so little importance why speak so long?

Mr. CAHAN: I am trying to do justice to the inordinately long speech which the leader of the opposition made last night and which he has continued to-day. I have so much respect for the right hon. gentleman that really I could not with propriety reply in less than an hour.

Mr. CANNON: We are enjoying it.

Mr. CAHAN: It is suggested by one bright mind—it may have been the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Garland)—that possibly we may have a repetition of the double shuffle such as we had in 1858, when a government went out and came in again, and its members resumed their former offices. May I point out to the leader of the opposition, however, that, even if the double shuffle should now occur again, there is one member of the opposition who would not come in to office, and that is himself, for the simple reason that for a considerable number of years now in this country the office of Prime Minister has carried an emolument and the moment the hon. gentleman, no matter what might happen to his ministers, took the oath of office, he at least would have to vacate his seat in the House. A good deal would also depend upon whether the Prime Minister recently resigned for himself and his ministers as well, or whether his ministers put in their individual resignations. Undoubtedly under the statute as it exists to-day, a minister who tenders his individual resignation may within thirty days be appointed to and fill another ministerial office without a by-election. But the leader of the opposition, even if this resolution passes and the present government resigns, will not be in a position to attend sessions of the House and conduct the administration.

This resolution does not ask that writs be issued to fill vacancies; it does not ask that an address be passed in this House reflecting on the conduct of His Excellency the Governor General, which has formed the whole body of hon. gentlemen's criticism. It is a resolution which I have described in apt terms as so ridiculous that it would not do credit to the skill of an ordinary schoolboy, and it does not contain a single statement of fact which can be relied upon. In other words it is an imposition on the intelligence of the House.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN (South York): I would not take part in this debate but for the fact that the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Garland) referred to my views regarding the future of Canada and the status which she should hold in the British Empire. I believe that a great federation of British parliamentary commonwealths, a federation greater than the United States of America, is in process of formation now and within that federation every unit will have absolute independence in the conduct of its own affairs. That has always been my belief. The chief feature of such a federation will be in my opinion an absolute equality as between one commonwealth and another in self-government.

I was impressed with what the hon. member for Bow River said, as well as with the remarks of the ex-Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), to the effect that any parliamentary principle that obtains in the Mother Country should be respected in any of the dominions. If the Prime Minister has the right in the Mother Country to advise the sovereign, with the assurance that his advice will be accepted, the same right should obtain in this country. And I believe that will be the view of the Prime Minister now in office (Mr. Meighen). What is good enough for the Old Country should be good enough for Canada and Australia and all the other commonwealths of the empire. Unless we have absolute self-government here at home we shall not be able to compete with the great republic to the south of us.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear!

Mr. MACLEAN (York): Hon. gentlemen applaud that statement. Well, the Conservative party has always held that position. It was the view held by Sir Robert Borden and I am sure the present Prime Minister will hold it. Now we must take a step forward and, as I say, if we have not complete home government we shall be unable to compete with our neighbour. Canada must be put on an equality with every other country on this continent in the matter of government, and nothing will help to bring this about so much as the co-operation of the Mother Country.

I cannot support the motion before the House; it is more or less a subterfuge. It is a subterfuge in view of the recent finding of a committee of this House in regard to the Customs scandals; that is a finding of the House and a finding of the country, and the people want an opportunity of expressing themselves in regard to it. I have been in this House perhaps longer than any other member; I hope the new Prime Minister will back me up when I say we should have dissolution right away and that this question should be submitted to the people. While I am saying that on my own account I believe it is what the people ask for. The Globe, the leading Liberal paper of Ontario came out three or four weeks ago demanding dissolution; the Montreal Gazette, expressing Conservative opinion, came out this very week with a similar demand, while the Winnipeg Free Press, which represents the western Progressive element, calls for the same thing. I hope the Prime Minister will find a way to go to the country on this question in order to clean up affairs in Canada. The present situation is most unsatisfactory; we can no longer bear the bad name which we have acquired. We must try to clean up the situation and to my mind the only way it can be done, and the way which will be insisted upon, is an appeal to the highest court of Canada, the men and women who constitute our electorate. They are the people to clean it up; they are ready to do so, and I am sure the public opinion now forming will be effective, possibly under the leadership of the new Prime Minister, in having this matter cleaned right up. I am sure that opinion will be supported by members on both sides of the House, because there are men patriotic enough, men who have studied the constitution enough to believe that they should take their part in cleaning up our public affairs. We want better administration; we want cleaner administration; we want to get away from distillery rule in this country, and we want to get away from the rule of great interests or anything of that kind. We must have a number of reforms, and the reform which I have advocated from my first day in this House is that great principle of public ownership. To-day the people of Canada have the greatest railway in the world.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): Hon. members opposite are applauding me now. This great railway is in jeopardy to-day, yet it is succeeding as no other railway ever succeeded before. The west is asking for lower freight rates; the industries of this country are asking for lower freight rates, and the way to make our country great is to consolidate our railways into one, re-route them to get a greatly improved service, and have lower freight rates by land, rail, sea and air. It is not a question of railways alone; it is a question of transportation, and the people in power in this country must deal with this question in all its phases.

That is the main thing I have to say to-night; I am quite willing to do anything I can to assist the new Prime Minister in appealing to the country, and I am sure some hon. gentlemen opposite will help also. I would not be surprised if the ex-Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) would help, and perhaps the ex-Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) would do something also.

I am not going into the merits of the whole question, but a way must be found to clean up this situation. We have been saying that parliament is supreme; I say the men and women voters of Canada are supreme in this country, and they want an opportunity of deciding the issue now before us. I have not taken much time in saying this, but I hope it will produce some response, because the country is looking for some gesture towards the clean-up of affairs which have existed in this country. Much as I admire the speech the leader of the opposition made last night, he is out of the running for the present; he has to take care of the scandals and revelations which have come out. We must have integrity in our public men; if we have it there we will have it in our whole public service, and that is the great requirement of our country to-day. I appeal to you, Mr. Speaker, and to this House to join hands in cleaning up conditions, in getting better and cleaner government and in making Canada what it is on the eve of becoming, namely, the greatest example of free parliamentary government in the world. This country has the richest resources of any country in the world; consider our agriculture, our mines and our industries, and most of all consider the desire of our people to work out their own destiny.

Mr. J. L. STANSELL (Norfolk-Elgin): I do not profess to be a lawyer, to understand constitutional questions or to be able to debate them in the able way they have been debated by hon. members on both sides of the House. I have, however, a firm belief in the common sense of the people of Canada, and I believe that applies as well to members of this House. Most of us know very well why this particular debate has been precipitated just now; we have seen speakers on the other side of the House work themselves almost into a frenzy over the danger to our constitution. But let me say just here, Mr. Speaker, that if the same zeal and energy now displayed by the leader of the opposition for the welfare and wellbeing of the people had been displayed when he was in power, the sordid conditions revealed in the Customs report would not have existed, and this matter would not have been a live question to-day. If the right hon. leader of the opposition had had the same zeal for constitutional protection when this House was summoned last January as he displays to-day when in opposition, we might have had a different story to tell.

I can recall no member of this House who has been louder in his declaration of the supremacy of parliament than has the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King). I know of no members who have been louder in their protestations that the day has long since passed when our procedure should be determined by musty precedents and rulings centuries old than have the hon. members who sometimes occupy the seats diagonally opposite, just now conspicuous by their absence. They say: We want something more up to date, something more along the lines of common sense, something that will enable parliament to function more intelligently than it has done in the past, and not this system of party warfare. I am somewhat concerned to know what these champions of change in parliamentary procedure will do on a question like this. They know just as well as any hon. member in this House that this discussion has been brought on, in the judgment of many of us, to distract attention from the real question before the House and the country, and to attempt to gain once more by some desperate means the seats of power. In that I have full confidence, Mr. Speaker, that they will be disappointed.

With many of the arguments that have been presented by able members on both sides of the House I might be in accord if they were applied to a government assuming office under ordinary circumstances, if it was a government that was attempting to bring down a speech from the throne and submitting a programme or initiating legislation. But that is not the situation at the present time. All that has been attempted by this provisional government is simply to bring order out of the chaos into which the country has been thrown by the action of the former Prime Minister. The action that has been taken in this case has been an honest, patriotic effort to make sure that the legislation that we have worked on for months in the interests of many portions of this Dominion should not be lost, and that supply should be voted. In connection with the voting of supply, if any of the estimates are extravagant in character or improper in any way, hon. gentlemen on the other side must know of it, but we are willing to assume that the estimates were properly and carefully prepared.

The spectacle we have in this House is that certain estimates have been passed, but not all of them. Hon. gentlemen opposite have refused to pass further estimates and to make provision for the carrying out of their own legislation, which had been nearly carried to completion, and would have been carried to completion but for certain investigations and disclosures reflecting on the late administration. All that this provisional government is doing is not to initiate legislation at all, but simply to endeavour to carry to completion the legislation and the estimates that are before the House and which have been approved by hon. gentlemen opposite, who are now unwilling to carry it to a completion.

Mr. SANDERSON: Will the hon. gentleman permit a question?

Mr. STANSELL: I think that sufficient time has been taken by hon. members on the other side. I intend to speak for only a few minutes and I should like to conclude.

Mr. MACDONALD (Antigonish): Your group has spoken for the last two hours, obstructing the vote.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: You have done that for two days.

Mr. STANSELL: I shall finish in two or three sentences, and then my hon. friend may put his question. I do not think it is too much to ask hon. members in this House to reserve criticism until there is something to criticise. They have anticipated what may be going to happen in the next few days or the next few weeks, and they have proceeded to criticise, and most of the criticism has been directed against an individual or individuals not in this chamber. It would appear to me to be the sound and proper thing to do, in view of the circumstances, to finish up the actual business of the House in a common sense way, and then go to our homes.

Mr. SANDERSON: What would the hon. member call the common sense way, and what does he mean when he refers to a provisional government?

Mr. STANSELL: I would call the common sense course the direct opposite of that which has been taken by my hon. friends opposite yesterday and to-day.

The House divided on the motion (Mr. Robb) which was agreed to on the following division:

Mr. SPEAKER: I declare the motion carried.

Mr. CANNON: Before you declare the motion carried I wish to call the attention of Your Honour to the fact that five members have voted whose vote can be challenged. However, I do not wish to bring this question up to-night; I am simply calling Your Honour's attention to the fact that I reserve my right to take any further action which may be necessary.

Mr. SPEAKER: I would remind the House that the challenging of the vote of an hon. member cannot be made by raising a point of order. There must be a direct charge embodied in a substantive motion.

Mr. HANNESSON: I was paired with the hon. member for St. Boniface (Mr. Howden). Had I voted I would have voted against the motion.

Mr. EDWARDS (South Waterloo): I was paired with the hon. member for North Waterloo (Mr. Euler). Had I voted I would have voted against the motion.

Mr. MORIN (St. Hyacinthe): I was paired with the hon. member for London (Mr. White). Had I voted I would have voted for the motion.

Mr. FONTAINE (Translation): Mr. Speaker, I was paired with the hon. member for Ottawa (Mr. Chabot). Had I voted I would have voted for the motion.

Mr. BIRD: I wish to explain to the House, and with extreme regret, that I was paired with the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Kennedy) who had retired from the House on account of indisposition, and I cast my vote inadvertently.

Mr. PARENT: Mr. Speaker, I think the rule is that once a vote has been cast and recorded it cannot be recalled.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. The rule is that when a vote has been recorded, when the result has been proclaimed, and when the motion has been declared carried or lost, that expresses the judgment of the House. This principle is to be found in May, who says at page 343 that a vote once given cannot be withdrawn.

As regards the claim made by the hon. member for Nelson that he was paired, May, at page 336, says:

There cannot be any parliamentary recognition of this practice (pairing) although it has never been expressly condemned and it is therefore conducted privately by individual members or arranged by gentlemen known as the whips, who are entrusted by their political parties with the office of collecting their respective forces on a division.

Therefore, the hon. gentleman having voted in the House, the vote must stand as it was proclaimed by the Clerk.

An hon. MEMBER: Do you refuse to recognize the practice of pairing?

Mr. SPEAKER: I rely on the authority of May as set out at page 336, which I have just quoted, and on the constant practice of this House.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: In the first place, let me congratulate my hon. friends—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: —upon the partial success they have achieved.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Partial!

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Yes, upon the partial success they have achieved, which was made possible by the accident which has occurred. The next matter I want to refer to is the statement which the ex-Solicitor General was kind enough to make with respect to the votes cast. There is no charge here within the meaning of the rule. I may say that hon. gentlemen have different ideas as to the propriety of the action taken.

Mr. CANNON: If my hon. friend would allow me—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Sit down.

Mr. CANNON: On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I may draw the attention of the House to the fact that when there is a direct charge against anybody—

Mr. CANNON: I am rising on a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. CANNON: I was making no charge against my hon. friend, and he knows it, but I say that when the seat of any member, in view of a motion, is in question, he is not entitled to vote. The motion just disposed of is a motion of that nature. I make no charge against my hon. friend and he knows it.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: It sounded like it. This is not a charge against the seat in that connection at all, but I wanted to make it clear that there were two ways of fighting; one we believe in and one we do not believe in. When there was a direct charge in connection with the ex-Minister of Customs, we said nothing against his vote and allowed it to be recorded. I want to say one further thing. I am now rising for the purpose of—

Mr. SPEAKER: There are only two cases provided for in the rules of the House in which members can be debarred from voting The first case is covered by rule 69, where the seat of the member is in jeopardy. The second case, covered by rule 22, is that of a member who has a pecuniary interest in the matter at issue. I have studied the matter in connection with the vote taken the other day, thinking perhaps the point might be raised.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: We have never raised such a point.

Mr. SPEAKER: As the hon. member states, and as I said a moment ago, the vote of an hon. member cannot be challenged unless it is by a direct charge embodied in a subsequent substantive motion.

Mr. CANNON: A motion. I gave notice that I might make a motion.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I rose originally, Mr. Speaker, for the purpose of moving the adjournment of the House, in order to consider the position in which the government finds itself in view of this vote. We had in the first instance to consider the vote of this House censuring the former administration, which was carried by a majority of ten, and we now have the vote which has just been taken, a tie vote if the proper votes were counted, censuring the government. I move that the House adjourn.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I shall assume, in view of the decision that the House has given on a very important motion, that the Prime Minister who is advising His Excellency will immediately advise His Excellency that this House has declared that his government has no right to be in existence and that he has found it impossible to carry on.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: In answer to my right hon. friend I would assume that the Prime Minister, reporting to His Excellency according to the facts as they actually occurred, will have to tell His Excellency that in this House his administration stands at least nine votes better than my hon. friend's party.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 2.15 a.m. (Friday).

DISSOLUTION OF PARLIAMENT

The Fifteenth Parliament was dissolved on Friday, July 2, 1926, by proclamation of His Excellency the Governor General.

END OF VOLUME V.
