Mr. George Henderson (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, due to a serious error of judgment by the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans, thousands of jobs are now in jeopardy. Why has the Minister placed the reputation of the Canadian fishing industry in jeopardy? What is the Minister going to do to save those jobs now in jeopardy? Will the Minister produce the reports that he talks about that okayed this product?

Hon. John A. Fraser (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman, who is the critic for fisheries matters in the Official Opposition, has been a Fisheries Minister. I know that he will speak to the right hon. gentleman who leads his Party, and remind him of the necessity of not making allegations that affect the health of Canadians when those allegations are groundless.

Ms. Copps: Fraser speaks.

An Hon. Member: Table the reports.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Fraser: Requests have been made of me by the media for these reports. My response has been that if the company involved is prepared to release them, I am.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Ms. Copps: You are a dead fish.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I suspect this will be a difficult day, and I would ask for calm, please.

Mr. Fraser: Mr. Speaker, I view this as a serious matter because of the irresponsible allegations being made. I would think Hon. Members would listen.

I cannot release those documents right now and I will tell you why. There is an application by a media outlet under the Access to Information Act. That is being challenged by the company. Until that hearing on whether or not these documents should be released, which the Department of Fisheries and Oceans on my instructions has said we will release, is completed, I cannot in law release these documents.

Mr. Nunziata: It is your public duty.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Fraser: It is one thing to ask me to release something, but when the law says that I cannot release the documents yet, Hon. Members have to accept that. These documents, I am satisfied, will eventually be released. We are taking the position in the courts that they should be.

FISH INSPECTION STANDARDS

Mr. George Henderson (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, as a former Minister I must say I have never made a decision that has affected so many lives as the decision which this Minister just made.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Henderson: Never, Mr. Speaker, in Canadian history has a Minister of Fisheries overruled his own experts on a matter of health. I want him to know that.

Do we have any standards for fish inspection in this country, or do standards change from day to day on the basis of political interference?

Hon. John A. Fraser (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member persists in saying that this is a question of health. I have repeatedly said that it is not. The Hon. Member ought to be prepared to accept that. With respect to standards, one of the independent panels, which I appointed, commented that the guidelines were too vague. As a consequence, in June I invited industry to join with officials in my Department to revise the guidelines, which was done. I did not revise them; industry revised them.

• (1425)

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Broadbent: That is good news!

Mr. Riis: That is okay, John!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Fraser: I am sure that all Hon. Members will realize that an industry which has to compete will not come up with unsatisfactory guidelines.

The Hon. Member said that never before has a Fisheries Minister overruled his officials on a matter of health. I categorically deny that I would, or did any such thing.

REQUEST FOR MINISTER'S RESIGNATION

Hon. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. It concerns the following irrefutable facts: that the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans has approved about a million cans of tuna which two sets of federal inspectors, plus a panel from four Canadian provinces, deemed to be unfit for human consumption. This means, among other things, that it could cause senior citizens or children to throw up, as well as other people. That is all medical fact.

Is the Prime Minister prepared to accept the judgment of the Minister, which was that he was prepared to give the benefit of the doubt to the industry in such circumstances, that is to say, the Minister was prepared to gamble with the health of Canadians? Or will the Prime Minister do the proper thing and make clear that such a Minister is not entitled to remain in the Canadian Cabinet?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans never said that he would propose to give the benefit of the doubt and gamble against the health and safety of Canadians. This Government always resolves any doubt in favour of Canadians; that has been its record.

In response to the thoughtful question of my hon. friend, as I understand it, what we have so far is no objective evidence whatsoever of any threat to health and safety, which are very important matters. I think my hon. friend would agree that since that time, since the incident occurred, regulations have been changed in such a manner as to preclude the possibility of this kind of incident ever occurring again and, no less important, that in this area Canada has a superb reputation for quality. I hope that no Member of the House would inadvertently make a partisan or unfair comment which would diminish it.

REQUEST THAT PRODUCT BE WITHDRAWN FROM STORES

Hon. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister has said that his Government will always do what is in the interests of Canadians. As is always the case with the Prime Minister, which Canadians are we talking about? That is the issue.

The Minister of Fisheries and Oceans is prepared to let this product remain out there on the shelves, almost a million cans, for Canadians to consume. Incredibly enough, the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs is reported to have said this morning that he agrees, thus giving up his obligation to the consumers of Canada. Will the Prime Minister make it clear that he wants an industry which is important to this country to continue with its international reputation, and that he wants Canadians to have healthy food by having that product withdrawn from shelves all across Canada and taking corrective steps to ensure that this does not happen again?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I think my first obligation was to ensure that there was no evidence whatsoever of any threat to health or safety. That appears very much to be the case. My hon. friend asks about what would happen, notwithstanding that fact, if the product is less than desirable. If that is the case, it will be removed because the health of Canadians will be protected at all times and in all circumstances, and the quality of our products will be so recognized internationally.

INSPECTORS' FINDINGS

Hon. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): My question pertains to the last comment of the Prime Minister. Considering the fact that not one but two groups of federal inspectors have said that it is unfit for human consumption, that it can make people vomit, and that this judgment has been agreed to by a panel representing four provinces in addition to the Province of New Brunswick, is this not enough evidence for the Prime Minister to make him reach the right conclusion now, to stop those cans from being purchased even this afternoon in stores across Canada and have them taken off the shelves?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): I think I have responded fully to my hon. friend. The first obligation was to go to the core issue which was the issue of any possible threat to health and safety. I think that matter has been resolved. The benefit of any doubt, of course, is resolved in favour of Canadian consumers and our reputation internationally. We will take every action consistent with those objectives, I assure my hon. friend.

MINISTER'S RESIGNATION SOUGHT

Mr. George Baker (Gander-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Fisheries has placed a new meaning on the term "tuna fish surprise". It is not a very pleasant surprise to open a tin of rancid tuna.

My question is directed to the Prime Minister who removed from his first potluck Cabinet the Minister of the Environment because she endangered Canadian animal lives. I am asking the Prime Minister will he ask for the resignation of the Minister of Fisheries whose actions are threatening the well-being of Canadian human lives?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, within the last little while there have been some liberties taken with allegations of fact that affect reputations. They will be dealt with at a parliamentary commission and will be looked at very carefully. Some of the allegations that have been made deserve a response before an objective forum.

I think there is one thing that I can say that would be widely acclaimed by all Members of this House and that is that the Minister of Fisheries who has served in this House honourably and well, has served as Minister in two Governments—

Mr. Marchi: Play it again, Sam.

Mr. Mulroney: —as Minister of the Crown, a very effective representative of British Columbia and a proud Canadian.

Mr. Benjamin: Why don't you take up the violin?

MINISTER'S ACTIONS

Hon. Douglas C. Frith (Sudbury): This is a supplementary to the Minister of Fisheries, Mr. Speaker. With divided opinion, why did not the Minister of Fisheries request the Minister of National Health and Welfare to undertake an independent analysis of the tuna, and did you inform the Minister of National Health and Welfare when you made the decision to release the questionable product?

Hon. John A. Fraser (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Mr. Speaker, there never was a question of health.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Fraser: There was no question of health because the product was tested in laboratories in Vancouver, Blacks Harbour and in Halifax.

The independent committees that addressed this subject all report that there is no question of health hazard whatsoever. What there is is a question of aesthetics and it is not a completely objective standard. The report commissioned by my own Department says that the former guidelines were vague.

I with the Members of the House would appreciate the fact that repeated allegations of something which is clearly not so do not do any credit to this House nor do they in any way help the fishing industry of this country.

REJECTION OF PRODUCT BY CANADIAN ARMED FORCES

Mr. Ray Skelly (Comox-Powell River): My question, Mr. Speaker, is to the Prime Minister. On television last night the Minister clearly admitted what he had done. He clearly said that the company would have the benefit of the doubt in this case. The Armed Forces of Canada, after purchasing $100,000 worth of this tainted material that was at one point declared unfit for human consumption, examined it and rejected it as unfit for members of the Armed Forces. Why should Canadians, senior citizens in homes for the elderly, people in hospitals, and ordinary Canadians be subjected to this product that the Armed Forces rejected and that, in the minds of many Canadians today, poses a problem for their health and safety?

Hon. Erik Nielsen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker—

An Hon. Member: Oh, here comes Erik!

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: It always amazes me when a question is asked that sometimes people choose, for some reason I don't understand, not to listen to the answer.

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Speaker, as the Minister has explained, there was never any question as to health and safety involved in the product. Indeed, the Department did have a shipment and went to the trouble to obtain a reassessment, a re-examination in a laboratory environment. That laboratory examination certified that the product was completely free of any health or safety hazard.

REQUEST FOR DISMISSAL OF MINISTER

Mr. Ray Skelly (Comox-Powell River): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Prime Minister once again. The Prime Minister will know that several years ago the Canadian salmon pack was quarantined because of a hint of improper inspection of our fish products for our export markets. That is worth $1.7 billion a year with a half a billion—

Mr. Speaker: Does the Hon. Member have a question?

Mr. Skelly: Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Fisheries has jeopardized that. Will the Prime Minister do the correct thing and dismiss the Minister of Fisheries forthwith?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): I think I have already indicated my view of the role played by the Minister of Fisheries. The evidence is clear cut and I think it would be unfair of my hon. friend to take that attitude, given the assurances given by the Minister—

Ms. Copps: Would you feed it to your family?

Mr. Mulroney: —and other colleagues, and his Department, to the effect that there was no evidence of any kind of any threat to health and safety.

Nobody in his right mind would wish for an incident that would cause even the possibility of a threat to anybody's well-being, or anything that might diminish even in such a tiny manner the reputation for quality that our products have abroad.

It does happen; we have taken the appropriate action. I am informed that it cannot occur again and that what we should be doing is exercise vigilance but also be proud of the products of the Canadian fishery.

INQUIRY WHETHER GOVERNMENT INFORMED ABOUT TAINTED FISH

Mrs. Thérèse Killens (Saint-Michel-Ahuntsic): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. This morning, the Minister said, and I quote:

[English]

I think the consumer should be prudent, the consumer should check the smell and colour of the tuna. When a fish is improper for consumption I think we can smell it.

Maybe the Minister should eat a carload of tuna!

My question is as follows: Since the spoiled fish is a consumer product, could the Minister inform the House whether he was told about the problem last April?

Hon. Michel Côté (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I would like to answer this question by saying that the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs is responsible for regulating the inspection of fish at the retail level only, and that such regulation or inspection is concerned with preventing fraud and with product packaging.

We are in no way involved in the health and safety aspect of food products. That responsibility lies with the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans.

That is our position in the debate on this issue with our colleague at Fisheries and Oceans.

● (1440)

HEALTH THREAT CAUSED BY CERTAIN PRODUCTS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mrs. Thérèse Killens (Saint-Michel-Ahuntsic): Mr. Speaker, could the Minister give Canadians the assurance that he and his colleagues will do whatever is necessary to remove this harmful product from store shelves and do so immediately, today?

Hon. Michel Côté (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): I can assure the House that the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs has an abiding interest in protecting the consumer, and in this respect, we were given the assurance by the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans that the product was safe, and we are satisfied with that statement.

REPUTATION OF CANADIAN FISHING INDUSTRY

Mr. John R. Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister.

The disastrous decision made by the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans has had the effect of damaging and compromising Canada's excellent reputation in the fish products industry and threatening the jobs of workers in the fish processing plants of New Brunswick. Now does the Prime Minister intend to go about repairing the harm done to the reputation of Canada's industry and restoring the confidence of Canadian consumers?

[English]

Hon. John A. Fraser (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Mr. Speaker, the answer is, of course, that in New Brunswick, where the people know all about this situation, there is a general sense that the matter was properly and fairly dealt with. There is no concern in the fishing industry in New Brunswick whatsoever.

My hon. friend talks about jobs. There is no safety issue here. I can assure my hon. friend that, as a consequence of the better guidelines that are now in place, those jobs are probably more secure than they were before.

ENFORCEMENT OF INSPECTION PROCEDURES

Mr. John R. Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the Prime Minister. In order to restore Canada's good reputation in the fishing products industry, is the Prime Minister prepared to send the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans to New Brusnwick immediately to assure the workers in that particular plant that the high levels of inspection and the procedures to ensure that quality products are put on the market will be enforced?

[Translation]

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I think I can give my hon. friend the assurance that the Minister has done so on many occasions. In the area we are concerned with, the issue we are dealing with is a matter of health and safety. I think it has been dealt with today in the House to the satisfaction of all Members—

Mr. Rodriguez: It is a matter of confidence.

Mr. Mulroney: —and in doing so, I think that in this important matter, the Minister is sending a message of confidence to the industry's workers and to consumers.

BANKS AND BANKING

CANADIAN COMMERCIAL BANK COLLAPSE—DIVIDEND ON PREFERRED SHARES

Miss Aideen Nicholson (Trinity): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of State for Finance. On March 5, knowing that it was in financial difficulty, the Canadian Commercial Bank nevertheless declared a dividend on its preferred shares. Now that the Minister has had six months to examine the affairs of this bank, can she explain that decision to the House?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, the problems of the Canadian Commercial Bank were brought to my attention on March 14, 1985, and not on March 5. In the spring, we had indicated in committee how the problems had arisen and that management at that point had some confidence in the company and its earnings.

TRADING IN SHARES

Miss Aideen Nicholson (Trinity): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the Minister of Finance. On the strength of the March 5 dividend, the price of CCB preferred shares rose and some 8,500 shares were traded before the bail-out was announced on March 25 and prices fell to rock bottom. On April 29, in response to my question in the House, the Minister said that he was sure the bank had complied with all provincial regulations for full and timely disclosure of shares trading. Will the Minister tell the House if he still stands by that statement?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, that is the sort of question that should be put during a committee hearing. I will not stand here and answer a question with the complexity lying behind that one. Having served for a number of years in the investment business, I know the care that must be taken in responding to that type of question. I would ask the Hon. Member to save that question for when the committee sits.

SMALL BUSINESS

MEASURES TO REDUCE RED TAPE

Mrs. Suzanne Duplessis (Louis-Hébert): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of State for Small Businesses.

I would like to know whether his Department has taken steps to reduce to a minimum the number and complexity of the forms that small- and medium-sized businesses have to complete for Statistics Canada—

An Hon. Member: That is politicking.

Mrs. Duplessis: Will the Opposition side please keep quiet?

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[English]

Mr. Speaker: I have the distinct feeling that there were caucus meetings this morning.

[Translation]

Mrs. Duplessis: There has been a notable absence of decorum since the House resumed sitting.

I would like to know whether there have been any tangible results to date, and this is further to complaints received from owners of businesses in my riding.

Hon. André Bissonnette (Minister of State (Small Businesses)): Mr. Speaker, first I would like to thank the Hon. Member for Louis-Hébert for her very pertinent question. In February and March this year, I held national consultations and asked businessmen and my provincial counterparts a number of questions. These questions were raised with a view to achieving harmonization and a reduction in paper work in this country. We set up task forces in each province, and these groups have started their work. We shall be seeing concrete results within the next few months.

However, the matter is fairly complex, and we cannot reduce paper work by tackling only one form at a time. A comprehensive approach is necessary.

FISHERIES

SALE OF CANNED TUNA—INSPECTORS' FINDINGS

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister and it is a very easy one. Under federal regulations and by federal inspectors under the mandate of the Prime Minister's administration, the million cans of tuna in question here were found to be unfit for human consumption. Would the Prime Minister tell the people of Canada what the words "unfit for human consumption" mean to him?

Hon. John A. Fraser (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Mr. Speaker, let me respond to the Hon. Member. The inspectors rejected certain stock on the basis of what is called an organoleptic test. That means that they touch it, they smell it, they look at it, and they consider its texture and aesthetics.

Ms. Copps: It stinks.

Mr. Fraser: This is a task which is not easy and which is at times very subjective.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Fraser: The plant in question was quarrelling with the judgment exercised by these inspectors. It appealed. The same inspectors sat on the judgment. They came to the Minister and asked if they could not have an independent look at this matter. The Minister gave them two committees which took an independent look at the matter, and made a ruling.

Hon. Members are so concerned with jobs, but if they keep on this way, they are going to have a delegation of workers from New Brunswick—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The answer is getting long.

LABELLING OF CANS

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is again directed to the Prime Minister. If these million cans of tuna were sold outside Canada, then according to Canadian law each can had to have a cautionary label on it showing that it had not been approved in Canada. Again, what do the words "unfit for human consumption" mean to the Prime Minister? Why would there have to be cautionary labels put on cans sold outside Canada? Did the million cans sold inside Canada not require precisely the same thing?

• (1450)

Hon. John A. Fraser (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Mr. Speaker, the assumptions upon which the Hon. Member's questions are based are just not correct. The stock in question was recommended for sale outside Canada by one of the independent committees.

FISHERIES ACT—REFERENCE TO "TAINTED OR RANCID FISH"

Right Hon. John N. Turner (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans has some trouble with the definition of "unfit for human consumption and health". The Fisheries Act states in these words: "No one shall sell tainted fish or rancid fish". Is that no longer a requirement?

Hon. John A. Fraser (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Mr. Speaker, if the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition would get his legal research work done adequately, he would know that the words to which he referred are set out in certain guidelines. The question at issue was whether or not the objective or subjective application of judgment by the inspectors was adequate or inappropriate. That was the matter which was being appealed. It had nothing to do with health whatsoever.

I want to just remind Hon. Members that in this country when we have a Department of Fisheries and Oceans, which literally has the power of economic life and death over the people who are governed by its regulations, if a citizen cannot come to the Minister to get an independent assessment of something with which he quarrels with the Department, the citizen has no appeal at all. And you would transfer any independent assessment, any independent appeal, to the very people who rejected the product in the first place.

Ms. Copps: Rancid is rancid.

Mr. Fraser: I am sure that that would not fit well in the areas you come from, if you are talking to your own processors.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

TRANSPORTATION OF DANGEROUS GOODS

REQUEST THAT LEGISLATION BE STRENGTHENED

Mr. Bill Attewell (Don Valley East): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Transport. While many Canadians are concerned about the transport by rail of dangerous goods such as toxic and explosive chemicals, in some circles there is more concern about the transport by trucks of dangerous goods. Since the provincial Governments are quite involved in some aspects of transport by trucks, could the Minister clarify for us where we stand on this very important piece of legislation which appears to need strengthening?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, on July 1 broad regulations covering the transportation of dangerous goods were promulgated. These regulations apply to all modes of transportation. In the case of provinces, Ontario specifically agreed and became a party to those regulations, which means that transportation by truck both interprovincially and intraprovincially is covered by the Dangerous Goods Act and by the regulations which were promulgated on July 1.

CANADIAN COMMERCIAL BANK COLLAPSE—AUDITING OF LOAN PORTFOLIO

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (Saint-Henri-Westmount): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance. The Minister of Finance and the Minister of State for Finance have told us repeatedly that they relied upon the best available evidence before agreeing to a support package back in March which will probably now cost Canadian taxpayers about $1 billion.

Why did the Minister of Finance or the Minister of State for Finance refuse to accept an offer from the major banks to conduct a quick special audit which would have determined the value of the loan portfolio upon which the whole support package depended?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, we have said repeatedly in this House that we consulted with the banks, that the banks had some input into the decision which was made, that they had some right of examination, that the Inspector General had the right of examination, and that the combined decision—combined decision—was based on the impact that this bank could have on our system. And I am looking forward to discussing this further in committee.

OFFER MADE BY CHARTERED BANKS

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (Saint-Henri-Westmount): Mr. Speaker, does the Minister of State for Finance deny that an offer was made by several of the chartered banks to conduct a quick special audit in order to determine the value of those assets, that that offer was made and refused?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Minister of State ((Finance)): Mr. Speaker, I have denied none of the events which are related to any of the activities surrounding this decision. This was a collective decision. It was made on behalf of the banking system in Canada, it was made on behalf of the Canadian dollar, it was made on behalf of the Canadian people, it was made on behalf of the Alberta economy, and the banks participated in making that decision.

Mr. Johnston: Yes or no?

FISHERIES

SALE OF CANNED TUNA—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Mr. Speaker, I want to go back to the Prime Minister who did indicate earlier that he would be prepared at some point to take action in order to get the contaminated tuna off the shelves.

Mr. Fraser: It is not contaminated.

Mr. Broadbent: The Prime Minister said he was taking this matter seriously, and I have a serious question for him. Considering that we do know, and no one is saying that anyone's life is being threatened—no one on this side is saying that—

Mr. Fraser: Well, we got that out of you, anyway.

Mr. Broadbent: No one is saying that. But we do know that—

Mr. Fraser: You have been saying it all day.

Mr. Speaker: Order. If I must admonish one side not to interrupt, I must also admonish the other side.

Mr. Broadbent: We know that lives are not being threatened but we do know that it has been said that this fish is unfit for human consumption and that it could cause elderly people, children, as well as others, to be sick. My question to the Prime Minister is simply this. How many Canadians have to get sick before the Government will take action?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I think that my hon. friend would recognize that that is an unworthy question—

Mr. Broadbent: Pardon?

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Unworthy.

Mr. Broadbent: Unworthy?

Mr. Mulroney: And it was very much an unworthy question. I have given my hon. friend the assurance that he sought, quite properly, that at no time was there the slightest evidence of danger to health or safety at any time. I further gave him the assurance that as far as I was concerned, and the Government was concerned, any quality matter less than top quality was unsatisfactory. We will be moving in that direction.

I thought that we responded fully and completely to some accusations which may have caused panic and caused hardship and unfair damage to people and to reputations. I have given my hon. friend honestly and openly the full assurance of complete co-operation of the Government that any matter will be resolved on behalf of the ordinary Canadian.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, with respect to the Prime Minister, I say that his response was an unworthy response. If he is going to describe a serious question in those terms, then he deserves to get it back.

REQUEST FOR GOVERNMENT ACTION

Hon. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): I want to ask the Prime Minister a question on behalf of everyone in this House who is serious about the health of Canadians and about the viability of the industry. Since it is now known that the product on the shelf can cause people to bring up, which causes a lot of damage to people's health, as we would understand it, why will he not take action now to preserve the health of Canadians, instead of waiting? That is the question.

Hon. John A. Fraser (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Mr. Speaker, there is nothing in any of the information which has been brought to me that justifies the allegation that the Hon. Leader of the Democratic Party is making. No matter how he wants to disguise it, he has now admitted that there is no health problem—

Mr. Broadbent: No.

Mr. Fraser: —but he is trying to create a health problem by using other words. I assure you, Mr. Speaker, that the Hon. Leader of the New Democratic Party and those Hon. Members who pursue this line of questioning will have to satisfy themselves, apparently, that there is no health danger in this stock.

TEXTILES

RECENT CLOSURE OF DOMINION TEXTILE PLANTS AT SAINT-JEAN AND VALLEYFIELD, QUEBEC

Mr. Jean-Guy Guilbault (Drummond): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Regional Industrial Expansion.

Last week you said that the Government was seeking ways to help the textile industry and that it was about time the industry faced up to the reality of international competition. Would the Minister tell the House how he can possibly reconcile that statement with the recent shutdowns of two Dominion Textile plants in Saint-Jean and Valleyfield?

[English]

Hon. Sinclair Stevens (Minister of Regional Industrial Expansion): Mr. Speaker, in answer to the question of the Hon. Member, what was indicated last week was that we are in a very competitive world. The textile industry in many countries is extremely competitive today and we must accept the reality of the real world, which means that imports can come into this country at a very competitive price. Unfortunately, that is costing Canadian jobs. That is part of the reason the Dominion Textile plants were closed. This Government is now reviewing measures which we might take to relieve the situation.

Mr. Speaker: Before proceeding to petitions' reports, may I simply remind Hon. Members that we are developing an unhappy habit of putting questions and answers using the word "you". May I remind all Hon. Members, please, that for the future questions and answers must go through the Chair.

RELEASE OF VACLAV PIVRNEC DETAINED IN CZECHOSLOVAKIA

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present a petition from residents of Ontario concerning Vaclav Pivrnec, who is detained in Czechoslovakia and who is unable to reunite with his family in Canada. The petitioners ask the House of Commons to urge the Government of Czechoslovakia to issue Vaclav Pivrnec a permit to rejoin his family in Canada.

SINGING OF CANADIAN NATIONAL ANTHEM AT INTERNATIONAL EVENTS

Mr. Andrew Witer (Parkdale-High Park): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present to the House a petition on behalf of the Toronto Blue Jay fans who were recently subjected to viewing the shabby treatment of the Canadian National Anthem at the hands of Yankee fans in New York City. While an apology has been received from U.S. officials, the petitioners request that the Government of Canada ensure there are no future affronts by making our concerns known and by providing for the distribution of our anthem as recorded by the Royal Canadian Mounted Police and chorus at all future international events which call for the singing of our national anthem.

QUESTION PASSED AS ORDER FOR RETURN

Mr. Paul Dick (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, if Question No. 311 could be made an Order for Return, the return would be tabled immediately.

Mr. Nunziata: Mr. Speaker, on March 15 of this year, I put some 40 questions concerning the Richard Hatfield marijuana case on the Order Paper. They are still outstanding and I would like to ask the Parliamentary Secretary if he can indicate a precise time when these questions will be answered.

Mr. Dick: Mr. Speaker, I would be glad to bring that to the attention of the new Solicitor General and I am sure the questions will be responded to as quickly as possible.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House that Question No. 311 be deemed to have been made an Order for Return?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Question No. 311—Mr. Kaplan:

1. How many photographs of the Solicitor General have been hung in the premises of the (a) Correctional Services of Canada (b) RCMP and, in each case, in which locations?

2. What was the cost of the (a) photograph (b) framing (c) distribution (d) hanging of the photographs?

3. Under what item of the departmental budget were the costs listed and what government objective was achieved by such expenditure?

Return tabled.

Mr. Speaker: Shall the remaining questions stand?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

MOTIONS UNDER S.O. 31

SALE OF CANNED TUNA

Mr. Speaker: I am in receipt of two notices under Standing Order 31. I propose to hear them in the order in which I received them. The Hon. Member for Egmont (Mr. Henderson).

Mr. George Henderson (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 31, I ask leave to move that this House do now adjourn for the purpose of discussing an important matter requiring urgent consideration, namely the decision of the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans (Mr. Fraser) to permit the sale of tainted tuna.

Mr. Speaker: I am in receipt of a similar motion from the Hon. Member for Comox-Powell River (Mr. Skelly).

Mr. Ray Skelly (Comox-Powell River): Mr. Speaker, I also ask leave to seek adjournment of the House to debate a matter of urgent and pressing necessity concerning the withdrawal of a product which has been identified as a matter of serious health concern and safety to the Canadian public. It is apparent that the Armed Forces removed and disposed of that product and it would be in our interest to deal with that issue as expeditiously as possible.

Mr. Speaker: That is somewhat different from the notice the Hon. Member for Comox-Powell River (Mr. Skelly) sent me. I take it he would like me to deal with what he sent me which is the requirement under the motion.

I gave quite a lot of thought to this matter. I think the Speaker is always in a difficult position on these questions. I think I can conclude from today's Question Period that the matter has had at least a substantial airing. In that context I would find it difficult, given all the circumstances and given today's Question Period and the attention it has received, to find that the matter would qualify for a debate under Standing Order 31.

I remind Members that they may wish to look at other rulings to see what constitutes an emergency and what constitutes a question of urgency for debate. But I did think, listening today, that given the questions and answers which have aired the issue which needed to be aired, and there is no question about that, in that context I find it difficult to find that Standing Order 31 applies.

Mr. Deans: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I wonder if you would take under advisement and perhaps comment at a later time on the difficulty that would confront members of the Opposition if in a matter that was deemed by them to be a matter of urgent importance they chose not to raise it during Question Period and how that might influence the decision of the Chair.

Some Hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Shame.

Mr. Speaker: The Hon. Member for Hamilton Mountain (Mr. Deans)—

Mr. Nunziata: That is logical.

Mr. Speaker: No, it is not logical. The Hon. Member for Hamilton Mountain is in fact using a point of order to comment on a ruling of the Chair, which he knows is improper.

Mr. Deans: I know.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Unworthy.

Mr. Speaker: He knows that. I think I know why he is doing it, because I think I sensed from Question Period the seriousness with which this issue is taken by every Member of the House.

Mr. Riis: We thought it was serious.

Mr. Speaker: The point the Speaker must take into consideration is the degree to which there is, prima facie, a perceived emergency. What I—

Ms. Copps: A million cans of tuna.

Mr. Kempling: Shut up!

Mr. Speaker: Some Members may think it is reasonable to interject at all times no matter who is speaking, but I do not.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Kempling: That is stupid, Sheila.

Mr. Speaker: What is not helpful on one side is not helpful on another side.

The dilemma I face in all of these situations is whether I perceive any emergency to exist. I am not suggesting that the raising of the question in Question Period eliminates an emergency if one should exist, nor would an emergency not exist if questions were not asked in Question Period. The question is: Has the information that I have on which to make a judgment been changed, added to, altered, augmented or modified in any way by what I have just heard in the last hour? What I am suggesting to the Hon. Member is that I have found that the information I now have on which to make a judgment includes all the press reports, Question Period and everything I have seen, and it suggests to me that the emergency issues contemplated very narrowly in Standing Order 31 are not met.

Mr. Gray (Windsor West): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I respectfully ask you to consider for future decisions the matter of the proper interpretation of the relevant Standing Orders. I am not talking about your current decision, but since this is something which comes up quite frequently I would respectfully like to ask your consideration of the following brief comment. Subsection (5) of the relevant Standing Orders says:

In determining whether a matter should have urgent consideration, the Speaker shall have regard to the extent to which it concerns the administrative responsibilities of the government or could come within the scope of ministerial action and the Speaker also shall have regard to the probability of the matter being brought before the House within reasonable time by other means.

It may be argued that the wording is such that the criteria in this subsection of the Standing Orders are not exclusive. However, I respectfully submit that if the wording is not exclusive, it is very close to being exclusive, and calls upon the Speaker to look upon only two matters: one, whether the issue in question comes within the responsibility of the Government or is capable of ministerial action; and two, whether in future there is the probability of the matter being brought before the House within reasonable time by other means. Therefore, I urge you to consider, Sir, whether any reflection on, or consideration of, current circumstances at the time the motion is raised is something that a Speaker should take into account rather than what opportunity can reasonably be expected to be provided for debating the matter in question within the very near future.

Mr. Speaker: I thank the Hon. Member for his intervention. Recognizing that he does not wish me to take it as a comment on a decision, I will therefore not take it as such. I suggest to him that he and I may need to have a conversation on this matter, and I am perfectly happy to do so. However, for the moment, I refer him not only to Subsection 31(1), but to paragraph 31(16)(a). I thank him for reading to me a part of our rule book that I can assure Hon. Members I know by heart simply because making decisions as to what is an emergency matter is taxing to every Speaker. Therefore, Speakers learn this rule.

Subsection 31(16)(a) narrows the issue substantially. It constrains the issue to find an emergency debate necessary only when:

the matter proposed for discussion must relate to a genuine emergency, calling for immediate and urgent consideration;

Those have been the two criteria which have caused every Speaker difficulty. I fully appreciate what the Hon. Member is saying and I can assure him that if I were persuaded that as of this moment a genuine emergency existed, I would not hesitate to find a need for debate.

As I may have just now left the wrong impression, may I also say that it is not up to me to find that there is an emergency. It is up to me to find that there is prima facie ground to believe that an emergency exists sufficient to justify changing the order of business of the day to allow a debate right now. That is where the other issues come in with regard to when another matter is appropriate. If I were persuaded that a prima facie case of an emergency has been made, I would not hesitate to grant the debate. I have, however, ruled that in my judgment I am not persuaded that a prima facie case has been made.

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

Mr. Paul Dick (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I ask that all notices of motions for the production of papers be allowed to stand.

Mr. Speaker: Shall notices of motions for the production of papers stand?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

FAMILY ALLOWANCES ACT, 1973

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed from Tuesday, September 17, consideration of the motion of Mr. Epp (Provencher) that Bill C-70, an Act to amend the Family Allowances Act, 1973, be now read a second time and referred to a legislative committee, and on the amendment of Mr. Frith (page 6625).

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, I am not surprised that the Government has introduced the anti-family, anti-child legislation which we see in the context of this particular proposed law, because we have seen quite clearly today that this same Government is prepared to play Russian roulette with the health of, potentially, a million Canadians. We heard the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans (Mr. Fraser) stand in his place in the House and say that the industry thought the standards were too high, so the problem was solved by lowering the standards. It is a not a problem of health, Mr. Speaker, it is a problem of aesthetics. We are talking about a million tins or rotting tuna that the Government refuses to take off the shelves. I am not surprised, Mr. Speaker, that the Government would adopt a cavalier, devil-may-care attitude with regard to the issue of family allowances, child tax exemptions, and, indeed, the issue of missing children which I dealt with in my remarks yesterday. Quite clearly, a Prime Minister who can stand in his place, as he did today, and defend a Minister of Fisheries who has ignored—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Order, please. The Hon. Member knows that we are debating the amendment to the Bill on family allowances. I do not know why we are debating tuna fish. I hope the Hon. Member will get back on track.

Ms. Copps: Mr. Speaker, my reference to tuna relates to the health and welfare of Canadians, which is also being dealt a fatal blow as a result of this particular legislation on family allowances.

An Hon. Member: She doesn't know what she is talking about.

Ms. Copps: The Member says I do not know what I am talking about. I believe that Canadians understand what rancid tuna is, and if we have to bring a can into the House to show them, we will do so.

Some Hon. Members: Order.

Ms. Copps: With regard to the main question, which is family allowances, we are talking about the people who would be most affected by this cut-back. The Government says that $22 is not a lot for Canadian families. Well, families and single parents who are struggling to raise small children, often surviving on tuna, are being directly assaulted by the Government's anti-family Budget measures. Look at the package. The Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Epp) has said on numerous occasions that this particular measure will assist poor families.

Let us examine the facts. Let us examine the truth, if it is possible for the Government to put the truth before the Canadian people. The truth speaks volumes about the anti-family legislation that is personified in this family allowance attack. The truth is that as a direct result of the Budget measures introduced by the Wilson-Mulroney Government, the purchasing power of families earning $15,000 a year will be reduced by almost $2,000. Almost $2,000 will be taken from the tax credits, the family allowances, and the tax exemption of families earning $15,000 a year.

An Hon. Member: We can't hear you.

Ms. Copps: I am sorry if the Member finds it difficult to hear the Opposition speaking out for the women of Canada. I can understand why the Member would not want to hear the truth—

Mr. Andre: No one has difficulty hearing you.

Ms. Copps: —when it comes from the government side of the House, because there are not too many people on the Government side who have stood to fight for women and to save the family allowance cheque which, for some women who are not working outside a home, is the only support they receive from the Government of Canada. I can understand why the Member would support his friends from Bay Street with a $.5 capital gains write-off and a $1 billion bail-out for the banks, yet would wash his hands of the $20 that the Government has been sending out to families who are at the low end of the income scale.

I wish the people of Canada understood now what they will understand from a fiscal point of view when the final impact of this sneaky and insidious Budget is felt. An average family of four, earning the average Canadian income, is going to lose almost $4,000 when the cumulative effects of this Budget are felt. That includes the deindexation, the cut-back on family allowances, and the reduction in the child tax credit as well as the insidious tax on over 2,000 health supplies which continues to be imposed by the Government.

I can understand why Members on the Government side of the House are not speaking to this legislation. It is quite clear that they are fighting for Bay Street, for the banks, for the billion dollar bail-outs, and for the tuna companies which want to have the standards lowered, but they are not fighting for the ordinary Canadian. I believe that Members on the Government side of the House have heard from their constituents, and women in particular, who do not necessarily receive any income from other sources. They have looked to the Government for leadership and follow-through on its promise to home-makers, which we have not seen materialize. Those women are looking to the Government to live up to its promise of the so-called economic partnership between men and women that the Prime Minister spoke about in his very first statement in the House of Commons.

Sad to say, we do not see any leadership among Progressive Conservatives with respect to programs concerning women. Mr. Speaker, I must tell you that a great many women who are housebound are in no position to make personal representations to the Government to seek renewed justice in terms of family allowances. So it is up to us in the Opposition parties to show the Government how strongly opposed the people are to the decision of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Wilson) and particularly the decision of the Prime Minister to slash $2,000 off the purchasing power of the poorest and most underprivileged families in Canada. I am talking about families of four persons who earn $15,000 on average. Those are not rich people. Bankers do not need the protection of the House of Commons any more than the big tuna industry, but it quite obvious that the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans (Mr. Fraser) is prepared to speak up for companies and apparently could not care less about the health of thousands of Canadian men and women. The Government changed, quite clearly, in its approach concerning the promises made to the Canadian people.

Today, Mr. Speaker, I was a guest on a radio program and a man phoned from Kingston and said over the air—

[English]

The gentleman on this radio show said that he was conned in the last election. He voted Conservative. He said he was conned because he believed the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) and the Government when they said that universality is a sacred trust. People believed the Prime Minister when, in his first statement in the House, he said that one of his greatest priorities was the economic integrity of women in this country. They believed him when he said that the support of the family was going to be a cornerstone of the politics of the Conservative Government. Unfortunately, we have seen that the Prime Minister has put the word "con" back into the Conservative Party.

The Minister of National Health and Welfare has abandoned his responsibilities to women and children in this country. He has washed his hands of the support for families that has been a hallmark of the Liberal Government in the past.

How much does it cost to raise a family? No one is suggesting that the sums we receive from family allowance, the tax exemptions and child tax credits, even minimally support a family. According to the figures used by the Children's Aid Society in providing support for foster parents, and statistics dating back to 1984, it costs over $100,000 to raise a child from birth to 18 years of age. According to the Metropolitan Toronto Social Planning and Research Council, it costs over $100,000 to supply the bare minimum in food, clothing and education for that same child. This does not take into account post-secondary education or luxuries.

Many women in Canada have welcomed that family allowance cheque and the support which Government provides for families. Two income families, such as a steel working family in my riding earning $30,000 a year, are not living in the lap of luxury. Rather than asking whether we should be cutting back from those families, we should consider whether a single income family should be paying the same taxes as a single person who is earning $30,000. Having been single myself, not supporting a family, I would suggest that I should pay a greater burden of the Canadian tax share than a man or woman who is supporting two, three or four children.

A basic principle of Canadian political life and Canadian social sovereignty has been that families be given support. That support has taken various forms, such as family allowance which is paid directly to mothers, tax credits paid directly to mothers and through the tax system indirectly in order to provide support for families.

[Translation]

But now, Mr. Speaker, once and for all we see the true colours of the Progressive Conservative Party of Canada. They are the real "blues" who cold-bloodedly work for the rich. They easily managed to come up with thousands and thousands or even a billion dollars—I am not sure I have it quite right in French but I think you know what I mean. They could find money for the banks, just like that. It does not matter—

Mrs. Killens: One billion.

Ms. Copps: One billion . . . It matters little to Canadians that you can come up with $1 billion for the bank, but can you not find any money at all for the families? Now that is really something, they easily found $1 billion for the banks without even asking for collateral, without any real guarantee that the bank will—

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I am sorry but the Hon. Member's time has expired.

Mr. Angus: Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member referred to single parents. Could she provide the House with specific figures that will directly show the impact of this deindexation on single families headed by mothers? There are some single males raising families but these single-parent families are primarily headed by females. Would the Hon. Member add to her already fine contribution?

Ms. Copps: I could provide some statistics that were gathered by the Liberal Party but I am sure the Government would immediately disavow these statistics. Let me refer to the documentation that was placed before us by the Canadian Council on Social Development. When considering single families headed by mothers, a yearly income of $15,000 would be higher rather than lower than average. However, according to these statistics, as a direct result of these Budget measures, a single parent family earning $15,000 a year will see a reduction of almost $2,000 in the moneys that it receives directly and indirectly from the federal Government.

In other words, by 1989 its purchasing power will be reduced by almost $2,000 through direct sales taxes as well as an indirect reduction in tax exemptions that will take effect in the latter part of the Budget.

What makes this Budget particularly insidious is the fact that the short-term effect of the provisions being implemented by the Minister of National Health and Welfare appear to be good. It appears that the family allowance cheque will be slightly increased for those families in need. Unfortunately, the cold reality of the Conservative Party's fiscal policy will hit those people between the teeth in 1989 when they see a net reduction of their purchasing power of almost $2,000.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Debate.

Ms. Lynn McDonald (Broadview-Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, today we are examining a Bill to deindex the family allowance. This is part of a Government plan that we disapprove of profoundly. It is a plan to redistribute income from lower and middle income Canadians to wealthier individuals. It is part of a plan that the Government has obviously instituted in its Budget.

The Government still uses the rhetoric of compassion and support of the welfare state. However, the measures throughout the Budget are ones from which lower and middle income Canadians will suffer particularly.

The measure before us to deindex family allowance by 3 per cent a year is, of course, very similar to the measure that the Government introduced for the deindexing of old age pensions. I am pleased to say that we persuaded it not to take that action. Millions of Canadians protested the deindexing of old age pensions.

It was for precisely the same reason for which people objected to that deindexation that I want to address the subject of the deindexing of the family allowance. These programs are universal social programs which have been developed over the years for which the CCF, the founder of the NDP, fought for decades. They were finally instituted by Liberal Governments after a great deal of prodding. Yet the principle of universality was one never very firmly held by the Liberal Government and we have seen the erosion of the old age pension and the family allowance over the years.

It is with some sadness that I note this important principle has received only partial support from our Liberal colleagues who have joined us in this fight, although we welcome them aboard the fight for universality. We wonder where they were in past decades when they deindexed the family allowance, the old age pension, and capping under the six and five program. All these measures have made it easier for the Conservative Government to proceed with its even more diabolical plan of a massive redistribution of income.

This Budget has different measures in it, and the Bill we have before us today deals with one measure, but we must look at the global picture, which is quite terrifying. There will be federal tax increases. There are increases in personal income tax. The tax exemption will be reduced so the actual tax families will be paying, including lower and middle-income families, will be going up in a period in which wages are barely keeping up with the cost of living. For many people, wages are falling slightly behind. Many families will have lower real wages but higher taxes to pay. With the attack on the universal programs, which have been part of the total revenues for families, people will have to cope with that too.

Many people will say "What is $100 million for the federal Government? What is a few pennies a day, a few dollars a day for individuals?" The Conservative Government tries to justify its plans by saying it is a very modest sacrifice that people are being asked to make. But it is not a modest sacrifice at all. This Government is clever enough that when it wants to introduce massive redistribution it does not do it in one fell swoop, which would make everyone a little more than suspicious, but it does it bit by bit, year by year and program by program. The family allowance is not being abolished. There were Conservatives who opposed the family allowance and never wanted it in the first place but the family allowance will stay. Families will continue to get a cheque. The cheque they get will not be worth very much because its value will decrease.

What we have, which is very interesting, Mr. Speaker, is a triple whammy in four years. First, there is the deindexation of the family allowance. It begins January 1, 1986. People will not get the same increase according to the cost of living that they would have under current regulations. The deindexing of the family allowance begins in 1986 and continues year after year.

The second whammy begins in the next year, that is the attack on the child tax exemption, which will go down, and will not be worth as much. We have some concerns about this. If the money the Government is saving by not rebating it through the tax exemption would be going into other child care programs, we would be very happy, for the tax exemption is not a good point of public policy.

As everyone knows, the tax exempiton favours rich individuals because it is proportionate to income. The very poor do not benefit from it at all. We are quite happy to see the end of the tax exemption. We would be advocating it very firmly if it were not for the fact that the money is not going to other child care programs but is relayed into other Government programs, such as bailing out the Canadian Commercial Bank and any other number of preferred corporations which this Government likes to support. This measure will allow capital gains exemptions for wealthy individuals.

The second whammy of reducing the child tax exemption is one for which we have a more complex message, that is, yes, it is the right thing to do but the money should be redirected.

The third whammy is the one concerning the child tax credit, which begins two years later. It takes us into 1989 and it will continue in future years. All this time, of course, the family allowance deindexing is in effect, so it is declining. The tax exemption begins to decline a little bit later and then the child tax credit begins in the fourth year.

It is interesting to note that the Government has made it so complicated for people to follow that it is a sort of give a little here and take a little there, add and subtract. It has taken a little while for people to figure out what the net result will be, namely, that Canadian families will be much worse off. The long term results are a very substantial reduction in child care support for families.

One of the sneaky measures which this Government has used is to increase the child tax credit before beginning to deindex it. This procedure is being used by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Wilson) to say that the Government cares about families with needs, about single parents and families headed by women who do not have other financial resources and who depend more extensively on the child tax credit. We are glad to see the increase in the child tax credit but we are very aware that this increase in the child tax credit is a very temporary increase. It is to sweeten the blow. It is to make it not so obvious that the family allowance is being deindexed.

The family allowance is being deindexed, beginning in the next year. The tax exemption is going down beginning the following year. The child tax credit will go down only a little later. Then all three of them will continue to go down each year that we have a Conservative Government. Canadian families have to understand that it is not just a few pennies of sacrifice they are being asked to make in any one year. It is this ongoing erosion in support for the family.

[Translation]

The National Council on Welfare has projected the reductions in benefits for poor families over the next few years. For instance, before the Budget, a family with an income of $9,000 and two children would have received $1,549, but after the Budget, if the Bill is passed, it will be receiving only $1,527, a difference of $22. Families stand of lose $22 next year, and these are the poorest families. Furthermore, the purchasing power of that amount will be reduced, because we must take inflation into account. If the rate of inflation is 4 per cent, it will be as though they were receiving $1,466, meaning a real reduction of $83 for next year.

It is not true that the Conservative Budget will protect the most disadvantaged families in our country. It will simply cut spending on families for the benefit of other groups: investors and private corporations, the people that receive capital gains.

The Minister of Finance (Mr. Wilson) says that Canada no longer has the money to subsidize family allowances at the same level. Is he right, or is he just using this as an excuse? What are the facts?

The Minister of Finance is wrong. When the family allowance program was started, family allowances cost the Government a lot more. In fact, they represented 7.7 per cent of the federal Budget in 1947 when the program was introduced. In 1965, family allowances represented 6.1 per cent of federal spending. This percentage has continued to decrease. There was a reversal in 1974 under a Liberal minority Government, when the New Democrats forced the Government to increase family allowances.

Since that time, family allowances have suffered cuts as a result of decisions by the Liberals and federal Conservative budgets.

I find it somewhat hypocritical that today, the Liberals are supporting us in our fight against de-indexation. Remember, it was the Liberals who cut family allowances before, and who did so several times.

Can we afford the family allowance program? Certainly that question is a reasonable one and it is being extensively debated. Let us look at the facts. Family allowance distributes $2.4 billion to 3.6 million families in Canada with 6.6 million children altogether. Obviously a very large number of people benefit from this program. Nearly 20 per cent of this amount is recovered in federal taxes, so the net outlay of funds for family allowance is just under $2 billion. This amounts to only 2.4 per cent of federal expenditures and it is only .57 per cent of the Gross National Product. When people indicate that we cannot afford the family allowance program, these are figures about which they are talking. In terms of federal expenditures, it is not a lot of money. In terms of the importance of raising the next generation in healthy and safe conditions and in terms of giving them adequate stimulation, leisure, recreation, sports and all other things which children need, it is simply not enough. It is not a great deal of money when we think of the enormous number of expenditures to which the Government has given higher priority. We would like to see fully indexed family allowances. Indeed, we would increase other child support measures.

Specifically, we would increase the child tax credit by 80 per cent. It would be a mechanism to ensure that more tax revenues went to families in greatest need. We would ensure the existence of a universal program for all families and an important increase in the amount of money for families in greatest need. These types of figures are perfectly reasonable. They were afforded in previous times. There is no reason that they could not be afforded now. For example, if we returned to the tax rates of the pre-1982 period when wealthier individuals were taxed at a higher rate, and if we imposed a minimum tax on wealthy individuals, such as a 20 per cent tax for people with incomes of $50,000 and above, we would raise about $3 billion more. In short, there are other ways to ensure that money is available for families. It is a question of lack of political will, not an economic barrier, which keeps us from giving families what they need.

Why does the Government say that it cannot afford that now, when the Government could afford it 20, 30 or 40 years ago when the family allowance was instituted? In those intervening decades, Governments have come up with higher priorities to them, such as corporate giveaways. There has been an increase in corporate giveaways throughout this period and a decrease in taxation for wealthier individuals. The Auditor General estimates that $30 billion to $50 billion per year go into corporate giveaways. It is for those reasons that there is not enough money to pay a $2 billion program for families. Let us look at the proportions: $30 billion to $50 billion for corporations and $2 billion for family allowance. It is shameful to say that we cannot afford it, and it is patently untrue. It is a question of political will, children should be placed much higher on our political agenda.

Family allowance is a question for women because women do most of the child raising. It is the woman who actually receives the family allowance cheque, unless the father of the child or some other person is physically looking after him or her. It is a recognition of the enormously important work of Canadian women in the area of child care. It is shameful to think that the Government would want to reduce this very important recognition. In fact, in my opinion the recognition is not great enough. It is something for which Canadian women had to fight. They won the right to have their family allowance cheques payable in their names. It was a very interesting fight in the Province of Quebec, led by Thérèse Casgrain. They wanted the cheques to be payable to women because they were the ones who were looking after the children, buying the necessities and managing the family budget. It was felt that they were the ones who should have that money.

The last federal Government underestimated Canadian women in a battle over the Constitution. This Government has underestimated Canadian women as well, and the fact that there will be a terrific fight on this issue. I invite Canadian women and all people who care about children to join in this fight. They should say to the Government that families and children are important and that we can afford it. We have the resources. We simply have to use them in support of our children. I ask people to sign petitions, to write letters, to talk with their Members of Parliament and to lobby. I ask organizations such as church groups, parent groups and day care centres, to be active. All people who are concerned about children should speak up now. It is only the beginning of a fight, a very important fight. It may seem like pennies and dollars now, but it is a long-term erosion of the family allowance and of social support for the next generation, the children of today. We ask the Government not to deindex the family allowance. It should be kept where it is and Canadian families should be given the support they need.

Mr. Boudria: Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Hon. Member for Broadview-Greenwood (Ms. McDonald). In view of the presence in the House this afternoon of the Associate Minister of National Defence (Mr. Andre), does the Hon. Member agree with the priority of the Government or the priority of the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Nielsen) in that it has $56 million to buy new military uniforms but does not seem to have $55 million to restore the family allowances which were just taken away?

Ms. McDonald: Mr. Speaker, my disagreement with the priorities of the Government in the area of expenditurese goes well beyond expenditures on uniforms. I think the Government is misguided in many respects. I do not quite see the point of focusing on any one expenditure as being a misguided one. If I were the Minister of Finance, I would go for a massive change in the taxation system in order to have fair taxes. I would certainly want to find money in the many other ways which are available through tax reform, through seeing that corporations paid their fair share and through seeing that wealthy individuals paid their fair share. I would certainly give social programs a very much higher priority. However, I do not see the point in focusing on any one expenditure. I think the Government needs a massive realignment of its priorities, and that is what I would advocate.

[Translation]

Mrs. Killens: The Hon. Member for Broadview-Greenwood (Ms. McDonald) criticized the Liberal Government's 6 and 5 Program. May I remind the Hon. Member that without this program, interest rates would now still be at the double digit level? The federal Government appealed to all groups in our society, unlike Bill C-70 before the House today, which singles out one particular group. May I remind the House that we appealed to the elderly, parents, employers, business people and unions, and everyone helped to bring interest rates down to what they are today. I think it was a great victory for the Liberal Party and should not be referred to as a black mark on the record of the Liberal Government.

Does the Hon. Member have any alternatives to the steps we took at the time?

[English]

Ms. McDonald: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. We opposed the six and five program, which was a method of deindexing. I think we were right to oppose it and I think the Liberals have a great deal of gall to be so much in support of full indexing now when they were not in the past.

Mr. Blaikie: By the way, Mr. Speaker, your French is "dobra".

[English]

I wonder if the Hon. Member from Broadview-Greenwood (Ms. McDonald) could elaborate. She mentioned the significance of the family allowance for Canadian women and referred to the battle which Canadian women and their allies here in Parliament waged with respect to their economic rights during the constitutional debate. Could she comment on the way in which this is now shaping up as a battle on the part of Canadian women for economic rights and the need for them to win this battle as well.

Ms. McDonald: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I think there are some very important parallels between the two situations. First of all, the women of Canada, when they were engaged in the constitutional debate, were very worry of what the Government had proposed because women had been hurt very badly by provisions which Governments have brought in, such as in the Bill of Rights, and they were most insistent that there be strong wording and special protection to ensure that there were equal rights for women. I do not want to go into the details of this battle which are extremely interesting and we could certainly happily spend a great deal of time on them. But I think the point is that the Government of the day entirely underestimated Canadian women. It made some mistakes; they thought that these would blow over quickly, but in fact Canadian women did not let the Government forget about mistakes. They organized and they marched on Ottawa, they had meetings across the country and they lobbied their MPs. They did all of the normal political activities which Governments were not expecting women to be doing. They did them and they did them very successfully and indeed became a model to other pressure groups who were encouraged to see that the Government had to buckle under and change the wording of the Constitution, the Charter of Rights.

I think there are parallels here. I have already been in touch with some women's organizations. The National Action Committee on the Status of Women has sent a wire on this subject. It is the umbrella group that represents most of the women of Canada. I have been in touch with representatives of the National Action Committee in Quebec, and of course there is going to be a big fight there. I think we are going to be seeing women across the country speaking out, because women who fought for their political rights do not want to lose their economic rights. Why did we win politically to lose economically? Women are going to see that and I think they are going to object.

It is not just going to be a women's fight, Mr. Speaker, because women and young people supported the old age pensioners in the fight last spring, and I think we are going to see the old age pensioners speaking up on this issue and indeed they have already begun and they are going to continue to do that. They will be supporting the women and families in this struggle. I think we are going to see a really interesting coalition of people coming forward fighting for our universal programs and fighting for the family allowances.

Mr. Young: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. The Hon. Member for Broadview-Greenwood (Ms. McDonald) may be interested to know that I met with a group of single-parent families in Kitchener several weeks ago when they were expressing very grave concerns to me about the impact of this budget measure on the incomes of those families. They pointed out to me that in single-parent families there has been an increase in poverty in the last five years of some 25 per cent. They also pointed out to me that this is not just a question that affects women and children but one that affects society as a whole. They said to me that if the federal Government gets away with reducing that income to those families, the needs will still be there and other levels of Government will have to pick up that need. They were projecting that since provincial Governments, which are primarily Conservative also, are cutting back on fiscal expenditures, in all likelihood the municipal tax base will be required to pick up that need, which could mean an increase in property taxes at the municipal level.

I wonder if the Hon. Member for Broadview-Greenwood would like to comment on that, or if she has heard similar expressions.

Ms. McDonald: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Of course one thing that can happen when the federal Government cuts back is that these needs are pushed down to the provincial and the municipal Governments and they may or may not choose to meet them. The problem the Hon. Member raises, and I think he put it optimistically, was that they would choose to meet those needs at the cost of raising taxes, in other words that the needs would have to be met and they would simply be paid for in a different fashion.

The other alternative is much worse, and that is, that the needs will not be met and people will go hungry, people at the bottom level, and they are going to be hurt as well because they are affected by the tax increases and the reduction in the family allowance and they will simply go without. That is the dim prospect and that is a very decided possibility.

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma) Mr. Speaker, I am just delighted to have the opportunity to speak on Bill C-70, the family allowances amendments Bill, because I think that this Bill and the deindexation of the family allowances is part of the over-all scheme and plan which we saw in the Budget presented by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Wilson) last spring. Perhaps we did not realize at the time all of the problems that the Government was creating for municipalities and others across the country through the collapse of the Canadian Commercial Bank, but clearly that Budget was designed to unleash on Canadians a veritable rain shower of taxes, not massive taxes for any one individual at any one place but taxes which will be spread over the next 12 months or so. The deindexation of the family allowance is part of that general increase in taxation across the broad lower and middle-income families of this country while at the same time reducing the benefits made available to them.

There, of course, was the massive battle that took place last spring over the issue of the deindexation of the old age pensions. Family allowance is a similar payment made to families and the same thrust of the Budget applies to this benefit which in fact, for a family of four will start to knit in in 1986 and cost some $22 annually.

During that year we are looking at a general taking away of benefits, especially to lower and middle-income families of some $20 million, but by 1986-1987, the following fiscal year, it will be $90 million and by 1990-1991 it will be $400 million. We can see how this reasonably small reduction in benefits the first year continues to grow each year until we are talking about almost half a billion dollars being taken away from middle and lower-income families. The great concern of people across the country is that it will be very harmful to take $400 million in family allowances during that period of time.

In my constituency the area of Manitoulin has one of the lowest average incomes in the Province of Ontario. Of course, this reduction will be most harmful to low-income families that in many cases live in northern and rural areas of the country. This reduction in benefits due to a deindexation of the family allowance is a harmful and unwarranted attack on Canadians.

There is some concern because the promises made by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) during the 1984 election campaign were so strong. He promised that he would maintain the entire social security system of the country and that he would maintain full indexation for that system. I would like to quote from the speech the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Epp) made in the House last November 15. I assume this speech was made in response to the Speech from the Throne, and it appears on page 277 of Hansard for this Parliament. The Minister of National Health and Welfare said:

> It is my role as Minister of National Health and Welfare to put forward signals and initiatives which will strengthen the role of the family and give it more prominence in society than I feel it has been given before.

How can the Minister of National Health and Welfare make that speech and then, during the budget debate last May 23, support the cut-backs which took place through the deindexation of the old age security pensions and family allowances?

A week or so before that statement was made by the Minister of National Health and Welfare last November 15, we heard the Speech from the Throne of November 5, 1984. The Speech reads in part:

> My government has as a high priority measures to support and strengthen the Canadian family, which is the cornerstone of our society. The need for accessible and affordable child care has in recent years come to the forefront of the social agenda facing Canada. In an effort to reach a national consensus on options in this area, you will be asked to establish a parliamentary task force on the future of child care in Canada.

We see a Government which has made maximum use of rhetoric, but after the decisions have been made in Cabinet, we see a Government that comes down against the average family. As I said, this is part of an over-all pattern of taxation which I believe will total some $37 billion over the next four or five years.

First there were reductions in the old age pensions and the family allowance benefits through deindexation of those programs. There was an increase in the excise tax on fuel a week or two ago. There are sales taxes on pharmaceuticals and health care needs. As well, there is a deindexation of the personal exemptions on income tax. There has been a veritable rain shower of new taxes hitting the average and lower-income familes.

Let us look at the impact of the deindexation of the personal income tax rates. In this fiscal year, that deindexation will amount to some $80 million but by 1990-91, it will amount to $4.36 billion in additional taxes created by that deindexation. The personal surtax on high-income Canadians will only last for 18 months to two years while the deindexation of personal income tax goes on and on and amounts to billions and billions of dollars.

The exemption in the capital gains tax will be only $300 million in 1985-86. Although that is a substantial amount of money, it will be $600 million in 1986-87 and by 1990-91, the reduction in taxes for high-income Canadians will be $1.25 billion.

We see emerging a constant pattern of massive taxation imposed in a regressive way. Sales taxes and excise taxes are those kinds of taxes which bear more heavily on low-income Canadians just as the deindexation of the family allowance bears more heavily on low-income Canadians.

Who are the big winners in the Budget? Obviously it is high-income Canadians who are able to take advantage of the capital gains tax exemption of $1.2 billion by 1990. It is the large multinational oil companies. The PGRT will provide some $2.5 billion worth of benefits to the large oil companies. The deindexation of the family allowance will be a very heavy burden on lower-income Canadians, a burden of some $400 million per year by 1990-91.

The deindexation of the family allowance and child tax credit will cost low and middle-income families some $15 million in 1985-86. It will cost them $40 million in 1986-87 and this will affect the 3.5 million Canadian families with children.

Because of last year's election campaign, the Toronto Star published an article entitled "Promises, promises, promises" on June 8, 1985. The newspaper calculated that some 29 promises had been broken or had not seen any action. Some of these promises are very significant to our debate today because they represent this general attack on the family.

For instance, one of the promises made was to maintain the tax exemption for families with children at current or higher levels. Another was to increase funding to the provinces for medicare. If we look at the projections based on the Budget, we see that by 1990-91, there will be a reduction of $2 billion per year in transfer payments to the provinces. I am sure that as we approach the day when the transfer payments begin to be reduced, we will hear a great deal more from the provincial Governments because of this promise to increase the medicare funding to the provinces.

Another promise made by the Government during the election campaign was that all savings generated from any changes in social programs would be redistributed to other social programs and would not be applied to deficit reduction. The reduction in the family allowance alone of $400 million by 1990-91 will go to cover about one-third of the benefit which is being transferred to high-income Canadians under the capital gains tax exemption.

The Government made another promise to increase federal transfer payments to the provinces. We have heard the debate during this past year and I have just mentioned the $2 billion reduction in transfer payments which are provided for in the Budget.

There are no tax increases because that would start a recession. That is the really crucial part of this entire Budget unless we really believe that giving to oil companies suddenly is going to create hundreds of thousands of new jobs proportionate to the $2.4 billion reduction, or the exemption of $500,000 a year. What we have to look at is that massive tax increase not only from the deindexation of the personal income tax scales and exemptions but all of the regressive taxes, the sales tax, gas tax, and so on, which is estimated to be some $38 billion of additional taxation during the next four or five years.

The promise was right, Mr. Speaker, but the result of the Budget was wrong. The Government may think that because of the rhetoric of the Prime Minister this has somehow or other not got through to the average Canadian. However, a report in The Globe and Mail on July 25, 1985, showed the results of a poll conducted by Decima Research, which is the polling organization used by the Prime Minister's Office. Those results indicate that the Canadian people are pretty sophisticated and knowledgeable with respect to the Budget and the impact it will have on all Canadians. I would just like to read a couple of key paragraphs from that article. The first one reads:

> The results of the poll obtained by The Globe and Mail show most Canadians are unhappy with Finance Minister Michael Wilson's budget and think they will end up paying more taxes than they do now.
> Entitled Decima Quarterly Report, the poll's results also show 49 per cent of Canadians do not think the Conservatives will meet their promise to reduce the federal deficit through the new budget.

The article continues, and I quote:

> According to the poll, 21 per cent of Canadians are "very dissatisfied" with the federal budget, while 39 per cent of the population is "somewhat dissatisfied."

In other words, Mr. Speaker, 60 per cent of the population are dissatisfied with the Budget and the impact it will have upon them and their families. According to the Decima Research poll, 3 per cent were very satisfied. Those are probably the corporate executives of the large oil companies.

The Decima Research poll further stated:

Two-thirds of respondents said the budget will not lead to a fairer tax system, while 27 per cent said it will result in a more equitable tax system.

Clearly, two-thirds of Canadians thought that the Budget was not a fair Budget. The article continues:

In addition, 77 per cent of those polled said they believed they will pay more taxes as a result of the new budget.

All of the aspects of the Budget which cut into family benefits are harmful, but the worst part of the Budget is that I do not believe it will result in the economic growth which the Government has claimed. In fact, the Government's own estimates in the Budget project that the economic growth, which was some 4.7 per cent in 1984—it was actually 5 per cent in Ontario—will be some 2.4 per cent in the year 1986, which is about half of what it was in 1984. The Budget will really start to impact then because all of the additional taxes will be in place and the drag on the economy will be felt even more than it is now. That is not surprising because regressive taxation, taking that amount of money away from low and average income Canadians, is bound to have a negative impact on growth and consumer spending.

Last spring, when we were in the Budget debate itself, I read that a family of four earning $15,000 a year in 1986, will pay $162 more per year. That same family will lose some $22 in family allowance. The Budget is simply an attack on average and low income Canadians. If we look at that same family of four and project ahead, because all of these things, the deindexation, the personal exemptions and the income tax scale are all cumulative over the years, by the year 1990, that family of four with the $15,000 a year income, will pay some 36 per cent more in income tax. But a family in the $200,000 bracket is able to take advantage of the capital gains exemption and so on and will actually pay $2,352 less in taxes. Surely this is a very unfair scheme. This Bill on family allowances which is before us today is an integral part of the whole budget process.

I commend the Minister of Finance (Mr. Wilson) for making an exception to a number of the sales tax items for health care needs and drugs and so on, but I feel he really needs to take another look at the family allowance benefits and the deindexation in his Budget because, surely, if taxing health saving drugs and medical supplies is clearly wrong and improper, then deindexing the old age pension is equally wrong and will be harmful to Canadian families. Therefore, I hope the Government will change its mind on these items, just as it has on other items in the Budget and allow this motion for the six months hoist which has been put forward by the Hon. Member for Sudbury (Mr. Frith), to be carried.

Mr. Benjamin: Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask my good friend, the Hon. Member for Algoma (Mr. Foster), if he would be prepared to comment: When the six and five program was debated, which he mentioned in his speech, which in effect deindexed family allowances, did he or did he not support the six and five program? And would the Hon. Member explain the holier-than-thou attitude of the Liberal Party now for something it did when it was in power?

Mr. Foster: Mr. Speaker, the six and five program was instrumental in reducing inflation to less than 6 per cent and 5 per cent. There was really no loss in revenues to Canadian families in the family allowance or the old age pensions. Clearly, this Budget's provisions, which deindex old age pensions and family allowances, directly benefit very high income groups and the large multinational oil companies. But it is the low-income families who are going to be the most hard hit. According to the secret document put out by the Department of Finance, low-income families over the next five years will have to pay $4.3 billion due to the deindexation of the personal income tax exemption. Young couples in the lower income range will lose the benefit of RHOSPs. The whole thrust of the Budget is an attack on low-income families.

Mr. Benjamin: That was not my question.

Mr. Foster: Well, I have outlined in some detail how this Budget attacks low-income families, and in such a strange way. It seems to me that if the Government wanted to wind up RHOSPs, which I do not agree with, and if it wanted to give the economy a tremendous boost, it should have said that people had to put the money into a home or major appliances for the home. That would have given the economy one of the greatest boosts it has ever received but, instead, the Government just said that people can take the money and transfer it to some other saving program. There was no economic benefit and the Government loses the taxes on that money.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I believe there is another question for the Hon. Member.

Ms. McDonald: Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member has certainly said many fine things in favour of support for families. Does he agree that families need support more than just indexation of family allowances? Would he agree that the child tax credit ought to be increased very substantially as the NDP has recommended?

Mr. Foster: Mr. Speaker, everything I have said indicates that our Party favours improving benefits for families. Clearly, the child tax credit is less regressive than other means of taxation. That is the problem with the whole Budget. It is not improving the progressive aspect of our taxation system because so many of the taxes are very regressive. An example of that is the 2-cents a litre or 9-cents a gallon gasoline tax. It is very regressive for people living in the northern and western parts of our country. They have to travel longer distances. As well, the Government is imposing $1 billion worth of new taxes. We have the sales tax on health care and personal hygiene products and non-prescription drugs. The 1 per cent sales tax which the Government will impose on farmers next January will cost them $11 million in 1986.

We are faced with a very regressive tax regime and the deindexation of family allowances is part of that plan to increase taxes and reduce benefits for low and middle-income Canadians.

Ms. McDonald: Mr. Speaker, I am puzzled by the way the Hon. Member has managed to say all these things in favour of increasing child support. Could he explain how it was that the Liberals, when in Government, allowed the family allowance to decline? It was given a shot in the arm during the minority Government of 1972 to 1974 when the NDP insisted that it be increased, but other than that it has substantially declined.

The Hon. Member referred to regressive taxes. We are certainly against regressive taxes but it was a Liberal Government which reduced the marginal tax rate on wealthy individuals and increased the giveaways to corporations. Therefore, how does the Hon. Member manage to justify this principle of being in favour of progressive taxes when his Party has done the reverse?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I will allow the Hon. Member one minute to respond.

Mr. Benjamin: Where were you when we needed you?

Mr. Foster: Mr. Speaker, I always hear the NDP taking credit for old age pensions and their indexation, taking credit for family allowances and their indexation, and taking credit for the child tax credit. I do not remember the NDP actually being in power federally. If it is responsible for all these things why was it not in power?

Mr. Benjamin: We will take the credit anyway.

Mr. Foster: It was the Liberal Government which did these things and put them in place. As the Hon. Member for Regina West (Mr. Benjamin) says, the NDP did not do these things; it just likes to take credit for them.

Mr. Benjamin: That is right, and we kicked you into doing them.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Questions and comments are now terminated.

Mr. Benjamin: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. As a former famous football player, I ask you if Hon. Members, in responding to questions during the last 10 minutes, are allowed to call time out and take three minutes to say nothing?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I do not think I should answer that question. I would like to recognize the excellent Member for York East (Mr. Redway).

Mr. Alan Redway (York East): Thank you, Mr. Speaker, I appreciate that. I appreciate as well the opportunity to address a few remarks in connection with Bill C-70, an Act to amend the Family Allowances Act of 1973. This Bill has been repeatedly characterized by the Opposition over the past day or two as the Bill which deindexes family allowances. In fact, as all Members of the House realize, this Bill is only one part of a three-part package which deals with family benefits generally. The three parts include changes to family allowances, changes in the child tax credits, and changes in the child tax exemption under the Income Tax Act.

I think it would be great to have all of these items before us at the same time to enable us to debate this issue in its totality. Unfortunately, that is impossible under the rules of procedure of the House. Coming from a municipal council background, as I do, it disturbs me that we cannot deal with an issue in that way. In municipal councils all of the issues revolving around a particular problem can be dealt with at one time. That points out, only too well, that we need further changes in the rules of procedure of the House.

The three-part package which I referred to has been the subject of much debate and scrutiny over the past number of years by a great many social agencies. There is now an organization called The Social Policy Reform Group which represents a coalition of four of those groups. It has been calling for substantial changes in this area for the past few months. It has called for three specific changes. The first is for a substantial increase in child tax credits. The second is for the elimination of child tax exemptions under the Income Tax Act, partly to provide funding for increased child tax credits, and partly because of the inequity of people earning higher incomes receiving more benefits than people earning lower incomes. The third thing they have been saying is that family allowances should not be modified and should continue to be fully indexed.

The net result of all the changes that they are proposing would be that people earning lower incomes would receive a greater net benefit than people earning higher incomes. The reason given for requesting these changes is that under the present system, which was established by the past Government, a family earning an income of $30,000 a year receives greater benefits than does a family earning only $10,000 a year. The Government recognizes that this is an inequity and it has been the subject of a great deal of debate in the committee relating to this matter. Therefore, the Government has acted in these three areas.

The Government has made changes in the child tax credits. In fact, in line with what was suggested by The Social Policy Reform Group, the Government has increased the child tax credits. They will increase from a maximum of $384 for a child to a maximum of $524 for a child in 1989. After that they will not decrease, as many members of the Opposition have been saying they will, but will continue to increase with modified indexing.

The child tax exemption is going to be changed too. It will not be eliminated, as is advocated by The Social Policy Reform Group and some Members of the House, but will be reduced in stages from the current level of $710 to $382 per child in 1989. Those reductions will generate additional funds which will allow for the increase of the child tax credits.

The third thing that will happen with be a partial deindexing of family allowances. Presently the family allowance is $31.27 per month per child. That will not decrease or be eliminated. In fact, if inflation is in excess of 3 per cent, it will continue to increase. The net effect of those three measures will be exactly what has been suggested by The Social Policy Reform Group and other critics. The effect will be that the total family benefit package will increase for people on low incomes and decrease for people on higher incomes.

In spite of those facts, we have heard a grat deal of criticism of these measures. Most of the criticism has been geared specifically to the legislation before the House. It is being implied that this is the only change being made to the family benefits package. In fact, that is not the case at all. One of the criticisms that can be levelled against the changes in the package is that the child tax credits should be increased even more. I do not think anyone would quarrel with that. Everyone would like to have the child tax credit increased even more. However, realistically, the Government has to take into account the total fiscal management of the country rather than one isolated area. Our annual deficit is now $35 billion a year and our cumulative deficit is $200 billion a year. I believe that Canadians understand that it is impossible to increase the child tax credits any more than they are being increased at the present time.

The second criticism that has been levelled against the legislation is that the child tax exemptions under the Income Tax Act are not being reduced enough. That criticism is not being levied by everyone, because most people realize that if the child tax exemptions are completely eliminated those funds will come out of the middle class. The Government has taken into account the suggestions that higher income people are getting more benefit from the child tax credit exemption and therefore is reducing it. However, at the same time, it is not being eliminated altogether so that there will still be some benefits for all sectors of the Canadian population.

The third criticism, obviously, is the one we have heard for the last few days concerning the partial deindexing of the family allowances. That is being done to provide some of the funding, at least, to look after the increase in the child tax credits. Without that additional funding there would not be enough funding generated by the reduction in the child tax exemption to provide for the increase in the child tax credit. Therefore, the total package will have the net effect of increasing child benefits and family benefits for low income people while taking it away from high income people.

It has also been suggested that some of the money that is coming from the modification in the indexation of family allowance will leave the social welfare package and not be spent in the social welfare area. In fact, that is not the case. According to the figures, it is estimated that in this fiscal year, 1985-86, the change in the family allowance will generate about $20 million in additional income for the Government, whereas the increase in the spouses allowance—which Members will recall was introduced before the summer break and then supported after much debate and discussion by all parties—will cost approximately $190 million in this fiscal year, 1985-86. In fact, even taking into account changes in the family allowance, that will not divert funds from the social security package altogether.

Next year, the money generated by Family Allowances—approximately $90 million—will go elsewhere. That is compared to the cost of Spouses Allowances next year which will be $325 million. Therefore, no money has been diverted from the social security package by the net effect of all of these changes. The net effect of all of these changes simply is that it will increase the family benefits for people who are at the lower end of the income scale and decrease it for people who are at the upper end of the income scale.

In the last few days the Opposition has indicated that the other changes in the Budget—referring to tax increases and other tax changes—will have a detrimental effect on everyone, not only low income people. That is quite true. Of course, we would like to be able to increase all of the benefits and take credit for it. Mind you, Mr. Speaker, whenever we increase them, the Opposition will always continue to say that we have not increased them enough. Of course we would rather increase benefits because all Members, whether in Government or Opposition, like to increase benefits. Furthermore, no one likes to pay increased taxes. Unfortunately, bearing in mind the total fiscal picture of the country, we must be realistic and I believe that Canadians are realists. They know that when they go shopping after earning $100 for the week, they cannot spend $150 because they would have to borrow from the bank. That is the problem we face as a country and that is the difficulty with raising taxes. No one wants to pay taxes and no one wants to be responsible for raising taxes. Unfortunately, when the financial affairs of the nation have fallen into the state they have it is necessary to correct that situation. It is a necessity not only for the Government but for everyone in this country.

We would all like to see improvements. I represent a constituency consisting of many low and middle income people. I am very conscious of any changes in their social security package. I listened very carefully to the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Epp) when he said that the Government would be monitoring the effect of these changes very carefully and that if any detrimental effect on anyone in Canadian society became evident, changes and modifications would be made to make sure that it did not happen. I want to assure Members of the House that I will hold the Minister to that statement. However, bearing all of that in mind, and in spite of the criticism that has been levied against this particular piece of legislation, it is quite clear to me that the total effect of this package is something that all of us can support. Like it or not, everyone supports the concept of improving family benefits for those in the lower income scale and that is what this Bill does. I am sure that Members of the Official Opposition and the NDP will finally support this bill.

[Translation]

Mr. Tardif (Richmond-Wolfe): Well, Mr. Speaker, let us say that I am pleased and that I wholeheartedly endorse any measure likely to improve the situation, particularly if it restores the balance so that those who have the capacity to pay assume the social charges.

But the question I am asking myself, the question I was asked is this: Let us take a case which is not uncommon at all, a family with two children, a mother of two children who is the sole breadwinner and who asks: Why should I have to accept a cut-back, or will I eventually be forced to accept a cut-back?

I think the question is relevant, appropriate and to the point. And that woman, that sole breadwinner goes on to say: I understand and I am fully aware that our country's financial situation is not very promising, but when it comes to banks and matters of capital gains, do you find the means, the money, the resources? Yet, when it is a matter of small or minimum incomes, more often than not the strict minimum, you cannot find what is, under the circumstances, a relatively small amount, something like $50 million.

Here is my question: What do you say to the man or woman who asks: Why must I bear the brunt of this measure?

[English]

Mr. Redway: Mr. Speaker, I am sure that the Hon. Member will have a very good and clear explanation for his constituents in answer to that particular question. Quite clearly, he can explain that we are not talking about one change to one program. We are talking about a package of three programs. The net effect of those three programs—with an increase in the child tax credits, a decrease in the tax exemption for children under the Income Tax Act and the modification in the indexing of the family allowances—is that families on lower incomes will receive more benefits.

I assume the Hon. Member was referring to a constituent in that position. I suspect he will be able to tell her that the net effect of all the changes in the Government's Budget for her and her family is that she will be much better off than before when under a Government of which he was a supporter.

Mr. Angus: Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Hon. Member for York East (Mr. Redway). He made reference to the three packages and his belief that this measure will not negatively impact on lower income people. What if we add to that equation the other packages contained in the spring Budget, the changes in consumer taxes, the increase in RRSP limits and the capital gains break?

Does the Hon. Member agree that when you add those components and do a comparison by income level that in real dollars by 1990 those who are making $10,000 a year will actually lose $396 while those making $200,000 a year will be increasing their benefits by over $4,500?

In percentage terms, there is a greater difference. When you look at the percentage of disposable income, you find the $10,000 a year earner dropping by 4 per cent but as a percentage of the discretionary spending, a drop of over 11 per cent occurs while the $200,000 a year person increases his disposable income by 3 per cent and 4.2 per cent of his discretionary spending.

Has the Hon. Member looked at the total package contained in the Budget, not just the narrow social one that he detailed a few moments ago? If he has, does he agree with the figures I have related to him?

Mr. Redway: Mr. Speaker, I certainly have looked at the entire budget package. I have looked at it in comparison with the family benefit package as well. I must say that I have to take issue with the Hon. Member on his figures. I am sure that in making his calculations, the Hon. Member has utilized the absolute maximum benefits that anyone could obtain under all of the provisions of the Budget if they remained in effect until 1990.

I am sure, at the same time, the Hon. Member has not taken into account any other changes that may come along in the interim between now and 1990. As we know, this Budget is for the fiscal year 1985-86. There will be five more budgets between now and 1990. Obviously there can be very substantial changes in all situations. As indicated on many occasions by the Minsiter of Finance (Mr. Wilson) and by other Ministers of the Government, provided the economic situation improves, very substantial changes will be made in all of the benefit packages that Canadians receive.

The Hon. Member overlooks the impact which the other changes will have. For instance, what about improvements to the economic situation, bringing about a Government fiscal situation with the deficit being brought into line and having people back at work again. In doing so, we generate wealth in their hands which, as the Hon. Member has pointed out on many occasions, generates additional tax revenue which in turn helps to reduce the deficit and helps to provide revenues to allow additional benefits to be increased.

When you look at the net effect and the whole picture, it does not look anywhere near as black as the Hon. Member paints. Far from looking black, the net effect of the Budget should be that employment will increase, people will be going back to work again, and not as many people will be on welfare and unemployment insurance. This reduces the costs of Government and in turn the deficit because people will be paying taxes again. All of this will get the deficit under control and will put people back to work again. The net effect will be additional revenues available for the Minister of National Health and Welfare and his colleagues to increase all of these packages.

When you look at things in a very narrow sense, and I understand that is the role of the Opposition—quite rightly so—the Hon. Member's job is to criticize, to be negative and to make sure that all of the negative aspects of a situation are brought out and not the positive ones, then you can certainly understand what the Hon. Member is getting at. However, if one takes a more positive view and looks at the net impact of all the figures in the Budget, he sees that we will be a lot better off whether a person is at the low end of the scale, the middle or wherever.

Mr. Schellenberg: Mr. Speaker, I have a comment and a question. I would like to compliment the Hon. Member for York East (Mr. Redway) on his calm, cool and reasoned explanation of this Bill. With the debate we have had in this House over the last few days and some of the misinformation given, it is nice to hear someone tell it like it is. I think it is safe to say that the Hon. Member has convinced me to vote in favour of this Bill.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Schellenberg: The Hon. Member talks about his wish to increase the child tax credit measure. Should our Government not consider perhaps removing the child tax benefit for those making in excess of, say, $50,000 a year so we may continue this reverse Robin Hood method to provide more in the form of child tax credit?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The Hon. Member may want to answer that question behind the curtain. I would like to recognize the next speaker. Questions and comments are now terminated. The Hon. Member for Thunder Bay-Atikokan (Mr. Angus).

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay-Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, I want to deal with two matters relating to Bill C-70, an Act to amend the Family Allowances Act. I want to deal with the very obvious one, that of deindexation of family allowances. I want to begin, however, by dealing with the section entitled "Presumption of Death".

Clause 15.1 of this Bill is a new section. It does not deal with the question of deindexation or the amounts payable for family allowances. It deals with the Minister having the right to declare a child dead or alive.

I want to deal with this in two ways: the psychological impact and the financial impact on families who may be affected. Before doing so, Mr. Speaker, I would like to read the three paragraphs under the portion "Presumuption of Death":

(1) Where a child has, either before or after the coming into force of this section, disappeared under circumstances that, in the opinion of the Minister, raise beyond a reasonable doubt a presumption that the child is dead, the Minister may issue a certificate declaring that the child is presumed to be dead and stating the date on which the child's death is presumed to have occurred, and thereupon the child shall be deemed for all purposes of this Act to have died on the date so stated in the certificate.

(2) If, after issuing a certificate under subsection (1), the Minister is satisfied from new information or evidence that the date of death is different from that stated in the certificate, the Minister may revoke the certificate and issue a new certificate dating a different date, in which case the child named in the certificate shall be deemed for all purposes of this Act, to have died on the date so stated in the new certificate.

(3) If, after issuing a certificate under this section, the Minister is satisfied from new information or evidence that the child named in the certificate is alive, the Minister shall shall forthwith revoke the certificate and cause to be paid any allowance that would have been payable in respect of the child if the certificate had not been issued.

I am greatly concerned about this particular part of the Bill. Let us all think about what the impact would be on ourselves if one of our children or grandchildren went missing. We all recognize that from time to time children go missing in Canada, some never to return. Of course there is a certain anguish on the part of the parents, the family and the community. We hear about abductions, runaways and murders. From time to time they are interrelated. However, we must consider the impact on mothers and fathers who still have some hope that their children are alive out there somewhere. For many of them that is all they have left—hope. What will happen if some bureaucrat, because obviously it would have to start at that level, decides that the period of absence has been long enough and the Minister must declare the child dead? What would that do to the hope of such parents? I ask all Hon. Members to think about that. I am sure we all know of instances in our communities where children have disappeared, have come to very unfortunate ends or have just never returned and no one knows where they are. In 1976, the last year in which Statistics Canada attempted to track disappeared children, there were still some 1,200 on the books as missing. I learned today from one of the organizations dealing with missing children that 90 per cent of all such children are abducted by one of their parents. We have heard of the stories involving a family separation, one parent receiving custody and the other parent deciding to abduct the child. I do not think we are talking about that because in most cases the parents know where the child is located. However, what about the remaining 10 per cent, the children abducted by non-family members or strangers for whatever purpose? For the first while a lot of work is done in the community, spearheaded by the parents and the authorities, in an attempt to find the child. The age range can be anywhere from one year old to some 17 or 18 years old. They always hold out hope, but this law will indicate to them that there is no more hope. For reasons of financial importance to the Government of Canada, the child will be declared dead and the Government will not have to pay the family allowance.

There is a psychological aspect and there is the actual financial impact on families who have, since their children went missing, spent every cent they could by posting rewards and by telephoning around the country. They scraped together every cent. Many times money is donated to the cause by friends and neighbours in the community. The Government would then come along and say that it is stopping the $31 payment because the child is not living at home. However, the parents could still be looking out for the interests of the children by trying to find them and to bring them back into the warmth and security of home.

I understand why the Government needs some kind of mechanism. Currently, with the Statute of Limitations, I gather that it takes seven years to declare a child dead. Conceivably someone could be receiving family allowance for those seven years. If we require a mechanism, perhaps we could have some kind of suspension procedure rather than a declaration of death. In that event the Government could say that until the child returns home or until there is clear evidence that the child is no longer alive, it will temporarily suspend the family allowance payments. It could also tell the parents that the moment the child is found or has returned home, they should notify the Government and it will be reinstated. I urge Government Members and the Minister to look at the problem to see if there is any way to soften the blow or perhaps to see whether it is really worth the pain and anguish. If we are only talking about some eight to twenty children per year, surely that amount of money will not break the Government of Canada. We are not that bankrupt! I will continue to raise this matter, as I am sure others will, in an attempt to arrive at a solution. I encourage parents who have been through that situation to write to all of us to tell us what they think the effect of this proposal will be.

I should like to turn to another aspect of the Bill, one which touches most Canadians. The main principle of the Bill is the deindexation of the family allowance. What is deindexation all about? If inflation rises by 5 per cent per year, it means that the family allowance will only increase by 2 per cent. If inflation rises by 2.9 per cent, it means that the family allowance payment will not be increased. No one is suggesting that the Government is actually taking away the paper figure. It is not being reduced from the $31.27 per child, but the purchasing power of the recipient is being reduced. Each year the payment will be worth 3 per cent less in terms of purchasing power. If it is compounded over the years, it is even worse. In real terms it means that families, in particular women and their children, will have less money to spend on children's clothing, family food, school supplies, bus tickets and essential medications for those individuals who are ineligible for Government income support programs. Also it means that there will be less money for recreation or to sock away for future education. These are the types of things for which family allowance payments are used. Perhaps, for those of us here who are making what would be considered a damn good buck as Members of Parliament, $370 per year for each of our children does not seem to be much. However, for many Canadians it means the difference. For many women it is their only income. Let us not erode it. For many families it is a nest egg for the future, not only for their future or the future of their children, but for future generations, by providing for their education, because unfortunately we do not have free education.

The previous Hon. Member who participated in the debate talked about three particular components. I would like to ask him about the rest of them and to present to the House some detailed figures. First let me indicate that these are not my figures; quite frankly I am not an economist. These are the figures of the Canadian Council on Social Development, a well-respected agency in the country. Its previous head went on to become a Minister of the Crown in the Province of Ontario, the Hon. Reuben Baetz, who is not exactly what one would call a ranting, raving lefty. That organization is very well respected because it conducts research to ensure that we in the House of Commons know the impact of our decisions.

There is a table in one of their documents entitled "Effect of the Budget on the Disposable Income of Families in 1990—Couple with Two Children". It has a range of the various income levels and I want to run through some of these.

For those whose gross income level in 1985 is $10,000 the tax deindexation and tax deductions will take $179 away from them. Child benefits will reduce this income by $89; consumer taxes will take another $130 away from them; the increase in RRSP limits really does not affect them because they do not have any money to put aside; capital gains break, for some reason they will get $2. In 1990 dollars that translates into a loss of $396 per year of 4 per cent of their disposable income and 11.3 per cent of discretionary spending. Those who are making $15,000 a year lose $398 through the tax deindexation and reduction; $103 through child benefits; $140 through consumer taxes; no increase in RRSP limits that benefits them; and $7 in capital gains break for 1990 dollars of $634. Their percentage of disposable income is 4.4 per cent while discretionary spending is 9.8 per cent.

We go on, Mr. Speaker, until we reach the last plateau where there is a decline which is in the $40,000 bracket. They lose $625 because of tax deindexation and tax reduction; $277 from child benefits; $361 due to increase in consumer taxes. They gain back $863 through the increase in RRSP limits and $42 in capital gains. Their net change in 1990 dollars is a loss of $358. That is a 1.1 per cent decrease in disposable income and a 1.9 per cent decrease in discretionary spending.

Let us take a look up the line, though, to the folks at the top. It is not the $500,000-a-year bank president who some people in this House like to refer to, but it is someone who is grossing $200,000—and I think sometimes that is an appropriate way to describe it. The tax deindexation and tax reduction will drop their income by $1,552; they will lose $344 from child benefits; they will lose $1,442 from consumer taxes, but here is where it changes, and this is the argument we are making. It is not a balance. The increase due to the change in RRSP limits is $3,825. They get $4,032 more because of the capital gains break. In total 1990 dollars they have a net improvement of their lot in life of $4,519. That is a 3 per cent increase in disposable income and 4.2 per cent as a percentage of discretionary spending.

Very clearly, Mr. Speaker, based on that kind of analysis, the phrase "the rich get richer and the poor get poorer" is no more or less applicable here than any place else in terms of this Bill and the other Government measures. Somebody with income of less than $10,000 loses $396 and someone with income of over $200,000 gets $4,500.

What about the ability of this country to afford family allowances? Do we really have to reduce the value, and I want to be careful in using those terms, of family allowances in order to pay for our deficit?

Mr. Speaker, I can see that I am going to have to go to stage two at some point in this debate which I suspect will be a fairly long one. You would not want to declare it six o'clock, would you?

Mr. Benjamin: Agreed.

Mr. Angus: Mr. Speaker, I will leave the affordability aspect for another time. However, I think it is very clear that the reduction in the value of family allowance is not the way to go if we must bring about a reduction in our deficit.

I thought for a moment that the Hon. Member who spoke before me was reading my previous speeches when he talked about the need for employment creation so we could get people working and paying taxes. That is what we have been saying all along. Let us focus on that; let us put people to work now so that they can pay taxes so we will have the money to keep the family allowance indexed.

The reason it was indexed originally, was to ensure that we did not have to keep coming back and increase the amounts by acts of legislation. It was to establish a base and from that base keep in tune with inflation so that nobody fell behind. It was hoped that perhaps from time to time, as Governments changed, we might be able to improve that base. The philosophy was that there was the protection out there and this Government, like the previous one, is quite committed to eliminating that protection wherever they can, particularly when it affects ordinary Canadians.

Mr. Speaker, I thank you and I look forward to another opportunity at a later date.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Questions or comments?

Mr. Dingwall: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I was very happy to hear the remarks by the previous speaker. I wonder if he would entertain a question and perhaps provide some of his thoughts and the thoughts of his Party. As many of us know, the family allowance of roughly $31 a month goes to each child. I am wondering if the Hon. Member has in his constituency and knows of other individuals across this country who are in a situation where on paper a family may look as if they are fairly well, and I use the word "oiled" in terms of income.

I hope you do not interpret my remarks as being sexist, Mr. Speaker, but the income as a result of the family allowance goes to the mother and that money is not expended on frills, or on grandiose schemes to invest in corporations in the United States—and I am coming to the question—it is spent on the necessities of the child and of the family. It is spent on such things as rubber boots, jeans, T-shirts, sneakers, socks, school supplies and medicines.

I want to ask the Hon. Member as the first part of my question, does he have in his constituency situations of that nature and is he aware that there are large numbers of Canadians from coast to coast who are in that situation, where they use the family allowance not for what I think the Government is suggesting, as maybe for frills, but for the necessities of having a good family life. Could he answer that question?

Mr. Angus: Mr. Speaker, I thank the Hon. Member for Cape Breton-East Richmond (Mr. Dingwall) for his question. Very clearly, not just in my constituency and elsewhere in northwestern Ontario, the part where I come from, but right across this land there are people who need that money. They are just so close to the line in terms of their cost of survival. That relates not just to those who we traditionally think of as low-income Canadians but to those who through no fault of their own have been forced for years into very high mortgages. Mothers in particular have been forced out of the home to work in order to help pay for that. Those who have chosen to stay at home use the family allowance to provide those extras that, thanks to Government policy, were taken away from them through exorbitant interest rates, consumer price increases and things like that.

What we have to do is turn things around. We have to say to those recipients of family allowances that we are going to continue the protections. We are not going to allow the value of that cheque to be reduced through any Act of this Parliament. What we want to do now is make sure that we tackle those other things that will take the pressures off so that all Canadians can have a better life.

Mr. Dingwall: Mr. Speaker, I will certainly leave time for my colleague to ask a question as well. With regard to the fairness of reducing the family allowance, does the Hon. Member not agree with me that there could be nothing more unfair than for a national Government with in excess of 200 seats to get tough by saying to families with children that the Government will reduce the family allowances? Would the Hon. Member not agree with me that that is absolutely unfair and shows the ruthless and uncaring attitude of the Government?

Mr. Angus: Mr. Speaker, not only would I agree with the Hon. Member but I would point out that since we are looking for fairness, perhaps the Government could impose a minimum tax on the rich, something which would bring in at least $400 million a year, provide some fairness in the tax system and eliminate the need to fiddle around with the support programs that exist for women and children in this country.

Mr. Redway: Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Hon. Member, but before I ask that question, I would like to comment briefly on the previous question and answer.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): No, just ask the Hon. Member a question, please.

Mr. Dingwall: Can I comment on his question?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): No.

Mr. Redway: Mr. Speaker, I was interested in the Hon. Member's comments regarding the provisions in the legislation relating to presumption of death. I wonder if the Hon. Member is aware that the provision that is included in this legislation is already included in the Canada Pension Plan legislation and that the provision that is being proposed in this legislation relating to the presumption of death is already included in the Old Age Security Act. I wonder as well if the Hon. Member realizes that under the current family allowances provision, as soon as a child disappears, the family allowance cheques are to be cut off and that in fact this provision allows the compassion to which the Hon. Member refers by allowing the Minister to have the payments continue rather than be cut off immediately as the current provisions provide.

Mr. Angus: Mr. Speaker, the answer to the Hon. Member's first two questions is yes and the answer to the last question is no. With regard to the first two questions, one of my experiences both as a Member of Parliament now and as a provincial Member—in fact, it was 10 years ago today when I was first elected—

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Angus: I just thought I'd add that in.

Mr. Benjamin: Ontario's loss, Canada's gain.

Mr. Angus: I have experienced having to convince the powers that be that some senior citizens were really alive. Can you imagine the feelings of a lady receiving a notice from the Government of Canada, through a bureaucratic mix-up, saying that her husband who is sitting right beside her is dead? I think we do have to be careful.

In terms of the latter question, I suggest that providing that flexibility is a positive step but I think having it as a declaration of death as opposed to a procedure for suspension other than at the moment the child runs away would be a better way to approach the issue. I would ask the Hon. Member if he could communicate that to the Minister.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Are there further questions or comments? If not, I will recognize the next speaker.

[Translation]

Mrs. Thérèse Killens (Saint-Michel-Ahuntsic): Mr. Speaker, I rise in the House today to speak on behalf of thousands of Canadians who will be deprived of a sum of money that is essential to their well-being, if this majority Government manages to adopt Bill C-70.

In the riding of Saint-Michel-Ahuntsic, almost 10,000 families out of 20,000 are living on incomes of $19,000 or less, which means that half of the people in my riding have to live on a salary of less than $19,000. These families will be heavily penalized by the new measures provided in this Bill.

The more I listen to the debate, the more I think the issue is being confused, Mr. Speaker. In my comments I intend to make a sincere effort to explain to Canadians the injustice that will result if Bill C-70 is passed.

Women are penalized by this Bill, more so than any other group in our society. My colleague from Vancouver East (Ms. Mitchell) described yesterday the harsh reality of single mothers living on a minimal income, who are forced to count every penny to feed their families, and sometimes end up soliciting on the street. I think it is appalling for a Government that is able to find thousands and even billions of dollars to bail out the Canadian Commercial Bank. And in the same breath, that same Government is talking about reducing the deficit. Where is the consistency in all that? What criteria are being used to support a large financial institution like the Canadian Commercial Bank instead of promoting the well-being of Canadians? Why is this Government penalizing our families and our children? And why should the needy once again have to pay?

In Hansard of November 15 of last year, the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Epp) said in the debate on the Throne Speech, and I quote: "It is my role as Minister of National Health and Welfare to put forward signals and initiatives that will strengthen the role of the family and give it more prominence in society than I feel it has been given before."

What made the Minister of National Health and Welfare change his position between November 15, 1984 and September 15, 1985? Does he think Bill C-70 is going to strengthen the role of the family? Our analysis will prove the contrary. The argument being used in this debate on the other side of the House is as follows: There will be an increase in the child tax credit. True $450 for each child in 1986, $489 for each child in 1987 and $524 in 1988. However, they failed to mention that starting in 1989, the child tax credit will be only partially indexed.

As far as family allowances are concerned, in 1986, a family will receive $22 less in family allowances. From 1987 to 1990, as the increases in the child tax credit are added, a family will be getting higher benefits for their children under the Budget. As I just said, it is true benefits will be higher, but they will start losing ground in 1991, and these losses will increase from year to year, because the two child benefits, namely family allowance and the child tax credit, will be increased only by that percentage of inflation that is in excess of 3 per cent.

Without the Budget changes, these benefits would have been fully indexed to the cost of living. That is something we must not forget.

The neediest families will get increased child benefits from 1987 to 1990. Subsequently, they will lose money because of other changes in the Budget. However, the vast majority of Canadian families, including many families living below the poverty line and on low incomes, will be receiving reduced child benefits as of 1986. To understand why this is happening, we have to consider the Budget's further repercussions on child benefits and on our income tax system.

For instance, here is how logical they can be, as advocated in the Budget. First, partial deindexation of family allowances in 1986. Second, deindexation of the child tax credit. Third, deindexation of personal tax exemptions for both father and mother. Fourth, abolition of the $50 tax exemption. Fifth, higher federal sales tax rates, from 10 to 11 per cent as of January 1, 1986. Sixth, a new tax on drugs.

According to our figures indeed the poor will benefit from a higher tax credit for three years but, beginning in 1988, owing to the many other regressive measures I have just mentioned, the poorest of the poor will be penalized under Bill C-70.

On the other hand, wealthy Canadians will continue to claim their capital gains tax exemption and lower retirement plan contributions such as in the case of RRSPs. Given the capital gains tax exemption, people whose income amounts to $100,000 or more will receive in excess of $600 million in tax benefits, whereas under the amendments to the Act now under consideration, with respect to the child tax credit and the tax exemption, the Government will save only $150 million. It is easy to figure out even without being a chartered accountant that the Government will give $600 million to the rich, take $155 million from the poor and have middle class Canadians make up the $445 million difference.

The Budget will also cut down the number of families eligible for the maximum child tax credit because it will lower the limit from which the benefits start to decrease. The limit is now $26,330 but it will be lowered to $23,500 for the 1986 fiscal year. For instance, a family with a net income of $26,000 is eligible for maximum credit under the present system since it is below the limit from which the tax credit is calculated. Once the limit has dropped to $23,500 the child tax credit will be $155 less, which is 5 per cent of the difference between $26,000 and $23,500.

In addition the limit will be geared to the inflation rate less 3 per cent. As a result, since the average income will go up year after year, more and more families will earn more than the limit and will therefore get reduced benefits.

On Monday, Mr. Speaker, I met in my constituency office a mother who strongly objected to the deindexation on the basis of her family budget which I am going to read to you. The father is the only bread winner for his wife and his two children. Net income: $19,195.82. Food for the year: $6,360. Rent: $5,100. Heating: $780. Life insurance: $540. Telephone: $192. General insurance: $800. Back to school expenses: $100. Transportation: $110. Total expenses: $13,982. This gentleman has a taxable income of $10,240. This couple cannot afford a car. In this budget, there are no provisions for entertainment, clothing, drugs. In 1984, they received a Tax Credit of $367 per child, which means that they received $734 for both their children. In 1985, the wife was compelled to seek part-time employment. If we add the wife's part-time salary of $7,000 to the husband's net salary of $19,195.82, we get a total net income of $26,195.82. Now that the wife has decided to return to the labour force to help balance the family budget, this young lower middle class couple will incur a tax credit loss of $155 the first year, because the budget, as I said earlier, is lowering the ceiling from $26,000 to $23,500. If the ceiling remained at $26,300, this young couple would be entitled to the full Child Tax Credit.

Mr. Speaker, this Bill will have other negative impacts on Canadian families. In the area of taxation, for instance, we are all aware that when the time comes for taxpayers to submit their income tax returns, people are anxious to get an advance payment on their income tax. To do so, they will go to companies which can get them the money more quickly. Did you know that these American-owned companies make between $15 million and $20 million profit on these Child Tax Credits?

Moreover, among single mothers whose income is below $2,000, one out of five of those entitled to Child Tax Credits had to contact a discounter. These mothers need the money, and such examples further demonstrate the need to maintain the social programs for Canadian families, for Canadian men and women. Last year, 60 per cent of the people who used that service earned less than $8,000. I am referring to the service of discounters. In 1979, there were 7,000 discounting operations. In 1984, five years later, there were 385,000 discounting operations compared with 7,000 five years before. In 1979, there were only a few discounting offices. In 1984, there were over 1,000 in Canada. Between $15 and $20 million in profits are made on income tax child credit payments. The assignment of income tax refunds is prohibited in the Province of Quebec and in the United States. The Social Action Committee and the National Anti-Poverty Group are urging that income tax refund discounting be abolished, because even if there is a temporary increase in the income tax child credit for the people most in need, the increase will find its way deep into the pockets of discounters, because if the income tax refund takes four months to come, the discounter is charging four times 15 per cent, which means the client will be paying the discounter 60 per cent of his refund.

I was dismayed yesterday when I heard the statement made by the Hon. Member for Bow River (Mr. Taylor) under Standing Order 22, and I quote:

> Mr. Speaker, there is a move on foot to abolish tax discounting or to make it impossible for the legitimate businesses to continue to operate.

He went on to say:

> Today some 380,000 Canadian taxpayers use the services of tax discounters, compared with 6,000 in 1979.

As I said earlier.

> By and large, the large majority of tax rebate discounters are honest, upright citizens who offer their services to those who want to use them voluntarily.

In my view, the Hon. Member for Bow River is very ill-informed and I will keep on defending the rights of low-income people.

I also want to remind the House that in Quebec, since the Budget of April 23, 1985, all Quebecers must pay a tax on all insurance premiums: life insurance, automobile insurance, fire insurance, theft insurance, personal insurance, group insurance, medical-surgical insurance, supplementary death benefit insurance—

An Hon. Member: That is the provincial budget!

Mrs. Killens: That is the provincial budget, as the Hon. Member is saying but anyway I do represent Quebec families living in my constituency of Saint-Michel-Ahuntsic and—

Mr. Bernier: This is mental distortion!

Mrs. Killens: It is their budget that I am now defending, Mr. Speaker.

Who speaks on behalf of the poor? Who defends them? We do as Liberals, Mr. Speaker. This is why I rose today and I am taking this opportunity to urge all Members of our various organizations in Canada to sign petitions urging the Prime Minister to re-establish full indexation of family allowances and the income tax child credit.

Due to the complexity of the issue and the time that will elapse before people feel that reduction of income, I hope that all this will not slow down the mobilization of all those who are affected by that legislation such as single-parent families who live in many instances under the poverty level, families with low- and medium-sized incomes which will seriously suffer because of that legislation. We have to remember that sometimes it takes very little for a family to slip under the poverty line.

In addition to that, in Quebec . . . I have in hand a Quebec mazagine called Rubrique économie, la gazette des femmes. Under the headline "The New Quebec Budget", we read:

Backward reforms which could bring women back to square one.

The Quebec Budget of April 23 last seems at first glance quite pleasant. The publicity surrounding the budget maintains that it will improve the budget of your family.

However, a careful review indicates that this is true for only certain classes of families. In addition it does absolutely nothing to improve the financial conditions of women. And, finally, a profile of a woman called Linda.

With respect to the subtitle "Family allowances radically reduced", it says:

You will point out that Linda will still get family allowances for her children. Of course. But what will they be worth in 1986? As far as federal allowances are concerned, which come to $582 a year, the federal Government is already collecting $101 in income tax on them. With the new system, the Quebec taxation system will also levy its share——that is $146. As for provincial allowances, they are worthless. From now on, they will be fully repaid to the Quebec Government by the parent claiming the child as dependent. On top of that, some people say that this fictitious income could give rise to the payment of an additional federal tax of $39.

This is new.

I wanted to mention this even if it comes under provincial jurisdiction because, as I was saying earlier, I am defending the women in my constituency.

When we think of all the consultative processes initiated by the Government, we have to ask ourselves some serious questions. The following statement is found in the preface to the Blue book published by the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Epp):

Through it, I invite all interested parties, whether individual Canadians, organizations concerned with social policy, business, labour or provincial governments to consider how we can ensure greater fairness in the distribution of benefits from these programs without disturbing the universality of Family Allowances and the Olf Age Security pension . . . The views expressed by Canadians in this process will be taken fully into account before program changes, if any, are implemented.

—the government's twin tests of social responsibility and fiscal flexibility will be guided by the following principles:

1. The concept of universality is a keystone of our social safety net. Its integrity must not and will not be called into question.

Mr. Speaker, it is really hard to find any consistency in those statements.

I would like to take this opportunity to draw the attention of this House to the open letter sent by the Canadian Labour Congress to the Right Hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney), which says the following:

Listen to all Canadians and not only those whose views you find convenient.

The letter also requests the continuation and increase if necessary of benefits under essential social programs such as Unemployment Insurance, Old Age Security and family allowances, and the preservation of the universality of certain programs.

The estimates and the previous debate on the universality of family allowances clearly show that the erosion of social programs may be an objective your Government is determined to reach——says the letter.

The letter asks for a reform of the tax system so that:

—all individuals and companies pay their fair share to the Government—

—and warns that, by 1990, the increases and fiscal rebates announced in the Budget will have resulted in a $2 billion reduction of corporate taxes, while personal income tax and sale taxes will have increased by $4 billion and $3 billion respectively, making present disparities even worse and—

—bringing about an even greater polarization of wealth and poverty.

We expect in the future continuously high unemployment, social programs in jeopardy, an increasingly unfair tax burden on low- and middle-income Canadians, a Government less and less present in essential areas of life. In other words, we foresee a more difficult future for most——warns the letter written by the Canadian Labour Congress.

Mr. Speaker, I see that you are on the point of rising and I shall therefore conclude my comments.

Those statements are not mine, Mr. Speaker. This is a letter sent by 56 participants in the national economic conference organized by the Prime Minister last March. It should be noted that these 58 signatories of what I have just read represent about half the participants in this conference. This is food for thought.

It is obvious, Mr. Speaker, that in this debate, the Opposition Members are those who speak for the people, and if I have another opportunity, I shall rise to speak again.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Questions or comments.

The Hon. Member for Beauce (Mr. Bernier).

Mr. Bernier: Mr. Speaker, just a comment. Am I entitled to a comment or a question? A comment?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Yes, a comment.

Mr. Bernier: A comment? Thank you Mr. Speaker.

I think the Hon. Member who just made a speech, not a masterly one, I must add, because I would like to know the name of the assistant who prepared that pile of figures—she must have taken a leaf out of the book of the former President of the Quebec or Montreal Savings Bank, an expert on distorting figures and interpreting numbers, and she must have drawn her inspiration from her Party's finance critic.

The Hon. Member said that last April, our Government imposed a 9 per cent tax on insurance in Quebec, but she did not specify which Government, and I would ask the Hon. Member to make a correction immediately and make it clear whether it was the present Progressive Conservative Government or the present Government of Quebec that imposed the tax. It is being implied that our Government is doing all the taxing: taxes should be ascribed correctly and honestly and not the way the Hon. Member did a few moments ago.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The Hon. Member for Saint-Michel-Ahuntsic (Mrs. Killens).

Mrs. Killens: Mr. Speaker, I am looking at my notes and I think the Hon. Member is right, because I said: Furthermore, in Quebec, since the Budget was brought down on April 23—the Budget date makes it obvious I was referring to the Quebec Government. Mr. Speaker, it was indeed the Government of Quebec that imposed the tax on insurance.

Mr. Bernier: I have a supplementary, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The Hon. Member for Beauce (Mr. Bernier), on a supplementary.

Mr. Bernier: Mr. Speaker, I accept the Hon. Member's withdrawal, but now I wonder why she included this comment in her speech. So it was just to have people think the Progressive Conservative Government was forever imposing taxes, but I would like to add for the Hon. Member's information that we inherited a situation of which she is well aware.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The Hon. Member for Saint-Michel-Ahuntsic (Mrs. Killens).

Mrs. Killens: Mr. Speaker, I would like to take this opportunity to clarify the comment I made earlier. I said that in my riding in Saint-Michel-Ahuntsic, I represent people living in Quebec, and that is why I made a reference to the budget of my constituent who came to my office and who, of course, have to pay taxes on insurance in Quebec.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The Minister of State for Small Businesses (Mr. Bissonnette).

Mr. Bissonnette: Mr. Speaker, I was listening earlier to the Hon. Member for Saint-Michel-Ahuntsic (Mrs. Killens) arguing about the possibility—and I repeat possibility—of a reduction, but is that what people want or would they not rather have employment and lower interest rates, something which this Progressive Conservative Government has been striving to achieve and has succeeded in doing within a year? Did you tell that to the people in your comments? Did you point out those extremely important facts to the Canadian people?

We definitely did lower interest rates, we definitely did create jobs, 300,000 new jobs, about which you have not said a word. You referred to prostitution a while back. I am somewhat ill at ease when you suggest that people could be forced, when you tend to imply that people could be forced to engage in prostitution.

But, Madam, hearing such statements gets to be extremely frustrating. Even when the reference is to 3 per cent on a possible $15 family allowance, that boils down to 45 cents a month. Are you telling the people that a person might have to engage in prostitution because of a 45-cent a month reduction? I think a little more honesty and straightforwardness are called for.

This Conservative Government has been struggling to find jobs. We have created 300,000 new jobs. This must be stressed. I think you should look at the positive aspects rather than talking about prostitution in your comments.

Mrs. Killens: When I talked about prostitution, Mr. Speaker, I was merely quoting from the comments made by the Hon. Member for Vancouver East (Mrs. Mitchell) in her speech this week.

Besides, to reply to the Minister's question when he asked what people want in my constituency, well, what they want in my constituency is "jobs, jobs, jobs"! You are right, but they also want something else. They would like this Government to stop making foolish expenditures, when for instance it wastes $56 million on new uniforms for the Canadian Forces. Our taxpayers, those at home at least, are concerned when their tax money is being used to buy limousines for Ministers, cabinet Members and so on. Thirdly, hundreds of thousands of dollars were spent uselessly to redecorate the Ministers' offices. We hear also that hundreds of thousands of dollars, even millions of dollars, are wasted by the Ministers travelling on private jets both in Canada and to other continents. They are afraid, apparently. On top of this, we could add the billion of dollars the Government will spend to bail out the Canadian Commercial Bank.

So my constituents back home are concerned because they feel that these are useless expenses and they are eager to see the national debt reduced and the social services maintained. Also, they want jobs. But they certainly do not have the same priorities as Hon. Members opposite seem to have.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The Chair recognizes the Hon. Member for Champlain (Mr. Champagne).

Mr. Champagne: Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask my hon. friend from the Opposition how she can talk in the House about spending public funds in an exemplary fashion, in order to redistribute the wealth among our constituents, among the Canadian people, when her own Government, over the past 20 years, managed to create a deficit that is practically insurmountable, and to accumulate a debt that the Canadian people, more specifically our families, our senior citizens and most everybody, will have to pay. Because her Party which was the Government at the time and which is now in the Opposition is now claiming that it has found all the answers that eluded it for 20 years. They are raising issues they were unable to solves successfully over a 20 year period.

As my colleague the Minister of State for Small businesses (Mr. Bissonnette) was saying, we have created a great many permanent jobs and we must repair the damage which your Government caused when it was in power.

I think also that if you were a little bit honest, you would stand up in the House and admit that your party is responsible for the deficit, a problem that we must now solve in the interest of all Canadians. That is what the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) said and that is what we are going to do.

Mrs. Killens: Mr. Speaker, I take this opportunity to point out that when we were on the other side of the House as a Government we had only 36 ministers, but they now have 40. That is what we mean when we talk about ministerial budgets. I did say something about the limousines, but that is peanuts. They decided that an executive assistant was just not good enough, so now they have put a chief of staff over the executive assistant, and is he ever well paid! Just one more item to boost the budget. I am saying this in passing, but I could mention a few other things.

I would like to say something to the Hon. Member—whose riding I forget—who shouted 6 and 5 a moment ago. Now that is one of the programs we are proud of, it is one of our better achievements because we got co-operation from all segments of society—the elderly, parents, management, industry, unions. It had to be a sound decision since we were successful in lowering the inflation rate from 12 per cent then to 3 or 4 per cent now.

Mr. Bissonnette: The Hon. Member referred to the use of Government aircraft. Well last year we used them 30 per cent less than your Government did. Thirty per cent less last year. What do you say to the people of Quebec when we invest more than $160 million in Quebec industries to create jobs in your riding? Now that is something. More than $800 million in investments in the coming months, in Quebec alone. Only to create jobs. Now, what about interest rates—2.75 per cent less for a family with a $40,000 mortgage—what about that? It amounts to over $1,000 a year. Did you tell that to the Canadian people? No. I think one has to be more positive, even on the Opposition benches. One must be positive and see things as they are. That is the message I wanted to convey to you.

Mrs. Killens: I am not in position to argue about figures, about the $35 to which you refer. It could be less costly but I will surely have the opportunity to check and we will see in a few months whether—

Mr. Bissonnette: Some 30 per cent less.

Mrs. Killens: You say 30 per cent less, very well.

Now you know when a moment ago you took all the credit for the improvement in interest rates and everything else, all this is the result of our efforts. Now it is because—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): We are through with questions and comments.

[English]

Is the House ready for the question?

Some Hon. Members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The Hon. Member for Gander-Twillingate (Mr. Baker) on debate.

Mr. George Baker (Gander-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I have a few words to say in this particular debate. It is rather amusing to listen to a Cabinet Minister across the way take credit for the jobs that were created in the country since the new Government was elected. The fact of the matter is that the best record in the past three years for the creation of jobs in the private sector in this country is held by the Turner administration. When one checks with Statistics Canada one discovers that on a month-to-month basis that is a fact.

However, the Hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Turner) would not have the audacity to stand in this Chamber and dispute what the Conservatives are saying because the present Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney), the last Prime Minister, and the Prime Minister before had nothing to do with the job creation that this Hon. Member is talking about. If he would analyze it on a month-to-month basis, using Statistics Canada figures, he would find that this is so.

They should not dare to stand up and say "we created these jobs". That is like a lot of things with this Government. Do you know who said on December 21, 1984, on page 1459 of the House of Commons Debates the following: "All savings generated from any changes will be redistributed to social programs and will not be applied to deficit reduction"? The Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Epp), who is now saying that we need to reduce the deficit, said that. Who said, on November 17, 1984, in an interview with The Toronto Star in response to the question, "Would the commitment be that all money that is saved would be applied directly to giving more money to the neediest?", "There would be, there could be, no other reason". The question was asked, "It wouldn't be applied simply to the deficit?" And the answer was, "No, absolutely not". Do you know who said that, Mr. Speaker? The Prime Minister of this country.

Now we hear Government Members standing up and pointing out how bad the deficit is and saying that we now need to cut family allowances. Why are they cutting 22 cents here and 22 cents there? They say it is to reduce the deficit. Mr. Speaker, that is not good enough for the families in this country who are living on an income between $5,000 and $10,000 with five or six children.

Mr. Speaker, I see that you are saying my time is up. I am sure you will allow me to continue this excellent debate at the next sitting.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): It being six o'clock p.m., the House stands adjourned until tomorrow at 11 a.m., pursuant to Standing Order 3(1).

The House adjourned at 6 p.m.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

The House resumed from Wednesday, September 18, consideration of the motion of Mr. Epp (Provencher) that Bill C-70, an Act to amend the Family Allowances Act, 1973, be read a second time and referred to a legislative committee; and the amendment of Mr. Frith (page 6625).

Mr. George Baker (Gander-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I would like to conclude the remarks which I started yesterday. I was pointing out to the House the great contradictions in the statements made in this Chamber by the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Epp) as recorded in the House of Commons Debates with regard to the intent of this legislation. As recorded on page 1459 of Hansard, on December 21, 1984, the Minister said the following: "All savings generated from any changes will be redistributed to social programs and will not be applied to deficit reduction". That same day, as recorded on page 1444 of Hansard, the Minister of National Health and Welfare said: "I can confirm that the regular indexing of the Old Age Security, Guaranteed Income Supplement, and family allowance will be increased as of January 1, 1985 . . .".

I point that out to indicate the contradiction in Government policy. There is an even greater contradiction in what the Progressive Conservative Party proclaimed prior to the election campaign and what actually happened in the Minister's Budget. In introducing this legislation which will cut back on family allowance increases, the Minister said that this is part of a package deal. The Bill before the House proposes that the amount of money a mother receives for a child will not be increased by its normal amount. The Minister said that that is only part of the package and there are other things that will be done that were included in the Budget which, he claimed, will offset this reduction is income for the poorer families.

That is why we have a motion for a six-month hoist before the House today. That motion should be for a fifty-year hoist. However, in parliamentary procedure we cannot do that. But let it be understood, Mr. Speaker, that we would prefer that this Bill not be presented to the House at all.

In the budget papers we see an increase in the child tax credit for the taxation year 1987, but we also see that the child tax exemption will be reduced to $560 per child under the age of 18 at the end of the year. The Budget calls for a further increase of $35 per child in the child tax credit in 1988, and a reduction in the child tax exemption to $470 per child under the age of 18 at the end of the year. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Wilson) said in his Budget that in the taxation year 1989 the child tax exemption will be further reduced to equal the value of the family allowances.

That is not all, Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Finance said that starting in 1986 the existing federal tax reduction will be eliminated. He said that, consistent with the Government's general approach, indexation of personal income taxes will also be modified starting next year. He said that beginning in the 1986 taxation year the indexation of personal exemptions and tax brackets will be based on the amount of the annual increase in the CPI that exceeds 3 percentage points. Further on in the budget papers, the Minister said that as part of the deficit reduction measures the Budget proposes to eliminate the federal tax reduction for 1986 and subsequent taxation years. The maximum tax increase from this measure will be $50 for single and $100 for married taxpayers in each year. The package which the Minister is talking about includes tax increases all over the place. There will be a reduction in the amount of money that can be claimed on income tax forms.

The Canadian media have looked at these figures and the over-all package and concluded that new calculations show that the Budget will hit poor parents the hardest. In an article on June 13 the Canadian Press said that families earning $20,000 will lose something in the order of $100 or $150. The article then goes on to discuss families earning between $10,000 and $20,000. The Minister of Finance presented a Budget which projected that poorer families would benefit. However, no one knew how much they would benefit by because it depends upon how much the Budget takes away from poorer people.

There was a claim made by one of the New Democratic Party Members in this Chamber yesterday that perhaps in the first three years some of the poor families would benefit more. I doubt that very much. That is stretching it to the hopeful extreme. When you look at this package which the Minister of National Health and Welfare is talking about, you see there is a loss. Everybody loses. The people who lose the most are the poor people. I will tell you why, Sir. This Bill is one of the reasons.

It is fine to look at all the reports of the social agencies and people who examine the income of poor people. They say that the best way to give money to parents for children is through the child tax credit because it is based on a person's income. The less you make, the more you get back.

There is one flaw in making calculation totally on the basis of income at the end of a taxation year. The cheque we are talking about here today is a monthly cheque. Someone in my riding is making perhaps $5,000 a year. He has seven or eight children at home. His total income is $5,000 a year. Add up what this person gets in the monthly family allowance cheque, multiply it by 12 and it comes to half of $5,000. Now his income is $7,500. Then you add on what the family gets. The head of the family gets this money. Why do I say that, Mr. Speaker? Because that money is used to pay the light and the heat bill as well as groceries. That is what that monthly pay cheque is used for. When you add the child tax credit, the income goes up to $9,500 for the year. You can now see the importance of the family allowance cheque and the child tax credit cheque. The most important cheque is the monthly family allowance cheque.

What happens if that cheque is delayed? I was going to say, "The Government of Canada in its wisdom", but I do not know where the wisdom was when the Government cut back on the hours in which the rural post offices could be open in Newfoundland and in other parts of Canada this year from 40 hours to 30 hours. When that happened, a problem arose. UIC cheques come on a certain day, Canada pension cheques come on a certain day, old age pension cheques and family allowance cheques come on a certain day. Some of those post office closures meant that for three or four days the family had to go to a merchant and beg for some food. They owed money for food. That is the normal thing in rural and other areas of Canada, Mr. Speaker. A lot of people, and certainly the Minister and the Government of Canada, do not realize this.

I recall the time when the Government of Canada, under the auspices of this Minister, changed the place of issuance of the Canada pension disability cheques from St. John's, Newfoundland to Ottawa. All of a sudden the Government discovered, when it changed the system on March 31, that the cheques did not arrive on time. The Government blamed the delay on the mail. But Members of Parliament received phone calls, as I did from one lady, who said that for the first time in her life she had to go to the local merchant, whom she disliked intensely, to ask if she could charge her food because she did not get the Canada pension disability cheque on time.

Under consideration in this debate today is the family allowance cheque that a person gets on a certain day. Hon. Members of the House of Commons on all sides of the House may find it difficult to understand, although the majority of them in this Chamber know exactly what I am talking about, that the family allowances cheque which does not come on the anticipated day causes mayhem in that household. The bills cannot be paid. The children cannot eat. We are not talking here about clothing or school books; we are talking about absolute daily necessities of life. That is what is wrong with this Bill.

I would like to refer back to what the Minister and members of the Progressive Conservative Party of this country have said during the election campaign and after—

Mr. Malone: Read the polls.

Mr. Baker: The Hon. Member says to read the polls. His is a Government that operates by polls. If you analyse the polls, Mr. Speaker, you will discover that the Progressive Conservative Party picked up 6 per cent but the New Democratic Party went down 6 per cent. So just imagine that Party bragging about the polls when it apparently got its support because of the shift of support from the New Democratic Party. But this is a Government of contradictions, anyway.

I would like to get back to my point now, Mr. Speaker, without any more interruptions from the Hon. Member from Alberta. The Minister of National Health and Welfare can satisfy his Party's position prior to the election campaign. He can satisfy what he said in this Chamber as it appears on the official record last December, 1984, that the social programs could not be used for deficit reduction. I will give the Minister an honest suggestion. Why not take the amount of money he is saving by reducing the family allowance and add it to the cheques of the poor people in this country? When the analysis is made of the child tax credit, why not add more on to the family allowances?. If he is so concerned about poor people as he claims in this Chamber, why not add that money to the monthly family allowances cheques of those poor people whom he professes to supports? That is an obvious solution for the Minister. But I am sure the Minister cannot do that because he is tied into a system of deficit reduction. It is deficits, deficits, deficits. Yet, the Government is steadily increasing the deficit at an alarming rate. Why is it doing that, Mr. Speaker? Because the Government has friends. It can give away $15 billion to the oil industry and we will see an increase in gas and oil prices.

Mr. Malone: Oh, oh!

Mr. Baker: The Hon. Member is laughing. The Government can put up a billion dollars to bail out a bank or it can put up any amount of money for anything it wishes. At the same time the Government says it wants to reduce the deficit and that is why it is taking money away from the monthly family allowance cheques of Canadian mothers. What an outrageous claim that is on the part of the Government of Canada!

Surely, the Minister of Finance, the Minister of National Health and Welfare and the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) of this country can do better than that. Surely they have some heart. Surely they can at least try to comply with the promises they made prior to getting elected.

Mr. Redway: Mr. Speaker, I know the Hon. Member is aware of the fact—and he referred to this in his comments—that this particular measure is part of a three-part package in the Budget which refers to family benefits. The first, of course, has to do with this change in the family allowance. The second is the child tax credit to which the Hon. Member referred, and the third is the change in the child tax exemption under the Income Tax Act. I know that the Hon. Member is quite aware, in spite of his comment that he has great doubts, that the net effect of all these changes is that the benefits for families earning low amounts are increased and the benefits for families earning larger amounts are decreased. In fact, I am sure he is aware, as the Minister of National Health and Welfare indicated in his comments, that right now under the present system a family which earns some $30,000 a year receives a greater advantage from these benefits than a family who earns only $10,000 a year. Of course this will change that situation. I know as well that the Hon. Member is aware that nothing is being taken from the social package by the changes being made in the modification to family allowances. In this fiscal year, 1985-86, for the $20 million that is coming out of the family benefits package, $190 million will be used to pay for the new spousal allowance for spouses between the ages of 60 and 65. In fiscal year 1986-87, for the $90 million which will be coming out of the family benefits package, $325 million will be going into the spousal allowance provisions. I know the Hon. Member is aware of all those facts, but I am interested in knowing the official policy of the Liberal Party, of which he is a member, with respect to improving family benefits for those at the lower income end of the scale and taking into account the proper and reasonable financial management of the company—

Ms. Copps: To bail out banks.

An Hon. Member: It is not a company.

Mr. Redway: Of course some opposition Members feel that this matter is not serious and that they have to interrupt at this time. They should listen carefully. I am sure the Hon. Member will tell us the official position of his Party with respect to improving family benefits for people at the lower income end of the scale, many of whom he represents, of course bearing in mind proper and reasonable management of the debt with which we are now faced.

Mr. Baker: Mr. Speaker, the Hon. member has noticed that some of my colleagues are a little restless this morning. The reason for that is that we are debating our particular motion for a six-month hoist; in other words, to throw the Bill out of the window where it belongs. The Hon. Member referred to three elements of the social package, but when we think about the social package in the Budget, it involves at least a dozen elements. It does not only involve the Bills of the Minister of National Health and Welfare. It involves reductions in the amount of exemptions one can claim on one's income tax form, which affects everyone. Also it involves the elimination of the federal tax reduction program, which affects everyone. In the Budget it was indicated that that was introduced in 1973 because there was a difficult economic time and that it is no longer needed.

I could go on and on. However, I am sure the Hon. Member will have to agree that when we look at the total social package, there is an over-all reduction. There has to be. If we look at only three programs, wherein the Minister takes away from two and gives on one, there is a benefit to some poor families. However, the total social package is covered by the Budget. How much will we end up with in the end? As a matter of fact, everyone in society will lose except millionaires.

Before sitting down, I want to say that there is one particular clause in the Bill on which the Minister should perhaps be congratulated. I am referring to the amendment in Clause 4. Some Hon. Members in a future speech should make reference to it. I did not have a chance to do so because the Speaker cut me off; the Speaker would not allow me the time to explain my point on Clause 4. That particular clause enables the forgiving of amounts owed to the federal Treasury. That is a very important clause. We have difficulty with it from one point of view in that it says the Minister "may". It does not say the Minister "shall". It says it would apply in cases of hardship perhaps over a period of time—it is a judgement call. The provision should be more specific than it is in this particular Bill. That is another clause that should be talked about more generally.

To conclude, in answer to the Hon. Member's question, let me say this, that family allowances and old age security and all such programs are Liberal measures, Liberal policies. The Liberal Party brought them in. The NDP says, well, the Liberal were forced to do it by the NDP.

Ms. Mitchell: Right on.

Mr. Baker: But certainly the one claim that cannot be made in this Chamber is that the Tories had anything to do with it at all.

I think that is the final point and I think it answers the Hon. Member's question. He can perhaps understand our frustration here on this side of the House. We want this Bill thrown out through the window, thrown out, kicked out, not rewritten, not even discussed. That is why we have the motion before the House today and that is why some of the Members here in the House are perhaps a bit unruly at times.

[Translation]

Mr. Malépart: Mr. Speaker, perhaps my hon. colleague, considering the comment made by the Hon. Member on the Government side, who, I am afraid, only reads the Bible according to Brian—

Perhaps my hon. colleague would consider what was said by the Advisory Council on Health and Welfare, a non-partisan advisory agency whose role consists in advising the Government. It stated clearly,—I wish the Hon. Member would read these comments instead of the Brian Bible—that poor families will lose $22 in the first year.

I have another question. I would like my hon. colleague to comment on what the Government has done in this area, because it is the first Government to decide to take advantage of the illnesses of its citizens to reduce the deficit.

What does my hon. colleague think about the 10 per cent tax on medication? I am thinking, for instance, of arthritis sufferers who must take medication regularly, and who use liniment and aspirin to relieve their pain and suffering. This Government has also taxed all medication that belongs to the "family pharmacy".

According to the Advisory Council on Health and Welfare, the increased number of taxes under the new Budget will cost a Canadian family $125 more. Nevertheless, Progressive Conservative Members and the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) would have us believe that they are helping poor families with the proposed changes to family allowance payments.

[English]

Mr. Baker: Mr. Speaker, even down to pet food and candy in the confectionery stores and down to woodburning stoves—practically everything. I do not know if they left anything out. Do not forget, too, that they have increased the normal rate. That is what we are talking about, Mr. Speaker, the total package put before this Chamber by the Minister of Finance.

When examining the total package and adding on to that the provincial sales tax on the bottom line, because the federal tax goes on first, one sees that those living in Alberta do not pay as much for that product as do those who live in Quebec or Newfoundland where the tax rates are different.

This Government also, Mr. Speaker, because of that package gave a windfall profit to the provincial Departments of Finance right across this country. About half of the federal tax is added on again in provincial sales tax at the provincial level. It is sometimes very comical to hear a provincial Premier say, "We did not increase taxes in our Budget." He did not have to do so because he knew from this new-found federal co-operativeness that he was going to get a windfall profit from the Minister of Finance when he presented the federal Budget. The provincial Ministers of Finance did not have to increase the tax on gasoline; the federal Government did it for them. I see you are saying I am out of time again, Mr. Speaker.

An Hon. Member: And everything else, too.

An Hon. Member: Rest your jaw.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops-Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to have an opportunity to rise today to say just a few words regarding Bill C-70. The Government says it is an Act to amend the Family Allowances Act. I think maybe it should be called an Act that is part of the Conservative program to make the rich richer and the poor poorer in Canada. Perhaps it can be called a Bill that is a symbol of the real Progressive Conservative Party's programs for Canada. It is actually with a great deal of sadness that I rise today to speak to this Bill which will reduce family allowance payments. That is hardly the kind of Bill about which one looks forward to speaking.

We should consider the kinds of Bills that we should be discussing at this time. At a time when we should be coming to grips with the economic and social challenges facing this country, to be debating a Bill that is asking for a reduction in the amount of money paid to mothers for their children is absolutely disgusting. Yet I have been waiting patiently for members of the Conservative Party to rise and explain to the people of Canada why they are taking up the valuable time of this House to reduce the family allowance payments to Canada's children.

I have not heard many Members justify what is going on today. I hear Hon. Members of opposition Parties asking questions and pointing out the unbelievable nature of this waste of the time of the House of Commons, but I do not hear many Members opposite rising to justify the taking up of valuable time for such silly nonsense.

Perhaps there is some value in this exercise because it provides us with an opportunity to find out what this new Government is really doing. Multimillion-dollar PR campaigns are going on all the time and there are pages and pages of Government advertising in newspapers trying to explain all of the wonderful things the Government is doing. There is the usual mumbo-jumbo and bafflegab that one hears during political discussions. Therefore, people are a little bit confused. However, discussing this Bill will provide us with an opportunity to give the public a clear example of the priorities of this Government.

I would like to remind Hon. Members that the Government thought it was important that we spend tens of millions of dollars on new uniforms members of in the Armed Services. Ask the people who are in the Armed Forces and the people who provide leadership in the Armed Forces if they thought that this was a priority. I do not think a single one has come forward to say that this was priority. However, tens of millions of dollars were spent on new uniforms.

We have seen corporate bail-outs occurring one after the other. I do not have to name the corporate giants of this country that were involved. The Government spent tens of millions and hundreds of millions. It did not matter.

There was a fair bit of discussion by Members opposite about the Western Accord. One of the aspects of the Western Accord was a $7-billion tax relief to multinational oil companies. I know that the Hon. Member from Alberta is an honourable man and he will agree with me that $7-billion worth of tax grants went to such multinational corporations as Texaco. There is enough money for that. There are billions of dollars for that and there are millions and millions of dollars for Ministers to jazz up their offices and to take special flights to their constituencies when time and time again commercial flights are leaving at virtually the same time.

Mr. Manly: Forty thousand dollars to Peru.

Mr. Riis: There is all kinds of money for little junkets to Peru. There is all kinds of money for Government advertising. I do not know if you saw the newspapers last weekend, Mr. Speaker, but just to remind us of all the good things the Government is doing let me point out that it took out full-page ads in the newspapers. It must cost tens of thousands of dollars to advertise like that in national newspapers, and this is occurring day after day. I think that if the Government were doing good things for the people of Canada, it would not have to tell the people what it was doing. It could tell by example and show by action. It becomes rather suspect if the Government has to advertise its programs just like Coca-Cola advertises the new Coke.

We saw the Budget cut services to Planned Parenthood and to social housing at a time when there is not one housing group in this country that is not appealing for greater support for social housing. The Government cut $2 billion in transfer payments to the provinces, and that means that there will be cuts in health care and education payments.

The Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Epp) rose the other day to say that he was concerned about families in Canada and about providing support in whatever way possible for the family unit. One of the very first things the Government did was to cut the Registered Home Ownership Savings Program when 75 per cent of those using that program were young couples in their twenties saving money to buy their first homes. The Government felt that it did not need to help young families to buy their first modest homes.

Then the Government increased the sales taxes and gasoline taxes. Sales taxes are the most regressive taxes that exist because they place the largest purchasing impediment on the shoulders of low-income families. Statistics Canada came up with an interesting comment the other day. It said that as a result of the Budget that was brought in by the new Minister of Finance (Mr. Wilson) and the new Government, 750,000 Canadians would be placed below the poverty level. Three-quarters of a million people will find themselves living below the poverty line as defined by the Government itself because of the measures introduced in the Budget. I could go on and on. I could talk about the $500,000 capital gains tax exemption which will help thousands of upper-income Canadians.

In the last few days, we have seen when this Government really focuses its support. In a matter of a few hours, the Minister of State for Finance (Mrs. McDougall), the Minister of Finance, the Governor of the Bank of Canada, the Inspector General of Banks and the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) found $1.5 billion to help all those large depositors in the Canadian Commercial and Northland Banks. They did not find money to help people with $20,000 or $60,000 in the bank. They found money to help the Bank of America, Citi-Bank, Barclays Bank and the Royal Bank, large financial conglomerates with deposits of up to $50 million. The Government indicated that it was going to give them back all their money even though it was not insured. The Government indicated that it would be able to find $1 billion or even $2 billion to help its friends.

I made that point because it is important that we see the context in which we are debating this Bill today. While the Government has no hesitation in finding billions of dollars for the deficit by raising taxes or cutting services, it has the courage to come to Parliament to ask for authority under Bill C-70 to cut family allowance payments because it cannot afford to pay for them. It is almost unbelievable that this is taking place within this context. We cannot afford a modest monthly increase in family allowances just to keep up with the cost of living. We must recognize that the cost of living is increasing and that a modest family allowance payment should increase at least to keep up with the cost of living. That is all we are asking, but the Government says that it cannot afford that.

I would like to remind Hon. Members of the cost of all of this. In 1984, family allowances cost $2.4 billion and that money went to help 6.6 million children. About 20 per cent of that is taxed back because upper-income families pay taxes on their family allowances. Therefore, the net amount was of $1.9 billion. That is probably about the same amount we are going to be paying to the banks in this instance.

Are Government Members saying that we really cannot afford to pay people a cost-of-living increase on their family allowances? I do not know if that is what they are saying. I suppose it is, because that is what this Bill asks for.

Last weekend I had the opportunity to tour three housing complexes in my riding, two in the City of Kamloops and one in the City of Salmon Arm. By and large, these housing complexes were the homes of people with very modest incomes. A number of the families were single-parent families. I went door to door and I asked these people whether they were aware that the Progressive Conservative Government which they had recently seen elected intended to reduce the increases in their family allowance payments because the Government, could not afford it, apparently. When the people heard that their family allowance cheques were going to be reduced from the cost of living, on a number of occasions tears came into these people's eyes. Hon. Members opposite may laugh at that, as Hon. Members are doing now. They are chuckling at that. Imagine people getting a little nervous and perhaps bleary-eyed because the Government is going to be cutting family allowance payments.

Mr. Thacker: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I was not laughing at it. I insist that the Hon. Member withdraw his comment.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, I will say that the Hon. Member for Lethbridge-Foothills (Mr. Thacker) was not laughing. Not all Members were laughing. I simply said that some Members opposite were laughing.

Mr. Thacker: You did not say "some Members".

Mr. Riis: I am saying that some Members opposite were laughing when I said that when mothers heard that their family allowance payments were going to be decreased tears came into their eyes. I do not find anything funny about that. I realize that not everyone was laughing; I am simply saying that some Members opposite found that to be humourous.

Mr. Manly: They should be standing up defending those people.

Mr. Riis: I know that for many people the family allowance cheque which comes each month does not make a big difference in terms of purchasing power. However, when one considers that there are something in the neighbourhood of 1.5 million Canadians who are children of low income families, believe me, when that monthly family allowance cheque comes it is important. To some families it means the difference between having winter clothing for the children to wear to school and not having those clothes. To other families it means being able to afford a pair of running shoes in order that those young children can participate in school sports. In some cases, it means whether or not there will be food on the table for those young people to eat.

In the City of Kamloops, and in many other cities across the country, food banks are very busy at a certain time of year and at a certain time of month. I am speaking of the time when funds from welfare cheques have run out and when people are waiting for family allowance cheques to come in. I am speaking of the time when mothers have to go to the food banks to obtain food in order to put it on the table for their children. That has become a reality now for an increasing number of families in the country.

As responsible parliamentarians, we cannot overlook that. We cannot pretend that it is not taking place. That is why we as New Democrats feel this legislation must be hoisted—it must be stopped. That is why we speak in favour of this motion to hoist this Bill for at least six months. Quite frankly, it should be hoisted for an eternity. It should be an infinite hoist, not one for just six months. I am certain that six months from now it will not make any more sense than it does today. However, it is a way of deferring the decision until, hopefully, saner heads prevail.

It was an extremely stressful situation for me to go door to door and speak to these individuals who will be receiving diminished family allowance payments. It was not easy to ask them what it would mean to their lives; nor was it easy to find out that a decreased family allowance payment over the next number of months will have a profound influence on many of the families whom I visited. It was but a handful, Mr. Speaker. However, I remember vividly a few months ago when the present Minister of Justice (Mr. Crosbie) had this to say: "Mr. Speaker, you have to be tough, mean and nasty and do all kinds of unpleasant things." The context of the preceding quote was in the sense that we cannot tell the people of Canada what we will do when we get into power because if we tell them then they will never elect us. That was a statement by the present Minister of Justice before the last election. I remember his words. I remember referring to them on a number of occasions and recognizing that there is an honest man who spoke the absolute truth. I realized that if the Progressive Conservatives had actually laid out what they were going to do before the last election, it would be quite a different result today. However, that is past history. I just wish to point out that, in a sense, we were forewarned when senior spokespersons for that Party indicated that the Government has to be mean and nasty. I suppose a great many of us did not think that the Government would have to be mean and nasty to Canada's children and to mothers struggling to raise those children. We really did not think that is what the Minister of Justice was referring to when he made that comment.

Today, in Canada, one out of every five children under the age of 16 lives in poverty. I hope Members opposite will reflect carefully when they vote on the motion before us. I hope Members opposite will reflect on what this legislation will mean to those young people who are living in poverty. I hope they will reflect on what this move will mean to families who really look forward to the family allowance cheque to make up the difference.

I realize there have been changes with respect to tax credits and to the Income Tax Act which will help some families. Let us also recognize that that happens once a year, at tax return time. The people I am referring to are people who are literally struggling on a day-to-day, week-to-week and month-to-month basis. The fact that they will receive some relief at the tax year-end is encouraging. However, it is a year late. What will those families do for the other 12 months of the year?

I ask Members opposite to think seriously about what this measure will do to so many people in their own constituencies. This is not unique to any region of Canada. It is not isolated to any one constituency or province. When one considers that the legislation which is before us is being placed on top of legislation which was introduced with the Budget to cut back on housing for low income Canadians, legislation which removed the possibility for so many Canadians under the Registered Home Ownership Savings Plan to afford decent housing, and when one considers the cut-backs on planned parenthood and on transfer payments, and when we see the Government increasing the cost of living for people as a result of the federal sales tax, we see this measure as simply one more burden. We do not have to go through with it. When one considers the total federal Budget, the amounts of money we are considering here are infinitesimal. I plead with Hon. Members, particularly those who sit on the government benches, that, when the time comes to vote on the motion, they realize the importance of doing whatever we can as responsible parliamentarians to ensure that those people who need help today receive it. What that means is that this legislation must not be allowed to proceed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The Hon. Member for York East (Mr. Redway) on a question or comment.

Mr. Redway: Mr. Speaker, I was pleased to hear the Hon. Member finally recognize toward the end of his remarks the fact that the piece of legislation which is before us is only one part of a three-part package. I am speaking of changes to the child tax credit, the child tax exemptions under the Income Tax, as well as the measure which is before us. I am glad the Hon. Member recognizes that the net effect of all this will be an improvement for people at the low end of the income scale. I am sure that the people to whom the Hon. Member spoke in his riding were at the low end of the income scale. Being an honest man and an upright Member of Parliament, I am sure he explained to those people that, in spite of this one change to the family benefits package, the entire package will actually benefit people at the low end of the income scale.

I know that his Party, unlike the Official Opposition, did have a positive and constructive position to put forward with respect to changes in family benefits. However, one of the suggestions that was made, as I understand it, was to eliminate completely the child tax exemption under the Income Tax Act. As the Hon. Member is aware, it is proposed that that exemption decrease from $710 at present to $382 in 1989 for each child. The reason, of course, is to generate extra income in order to increase benefits under the child tax credit. There will be other income as well, some of which will go to help pay for the spouses' allowance provisions that were brought in last fall.

Can the Hon. Member tell the House if he personally supports the total elimination of the child tax exemption under the Income Tax Act? This would mean that modest middle-income families, many of whom I am sure live in his riding, would be deprived of substantial benefits that they will continue to get under the package proposed by the Government as a result of the Budget. Does the Hon. Member support the position of his Party that all of the child tax exemption should be eliminated?

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the comments of the Hon. Member. Yes, I did explain the total package to the people I visited, not simply an edited version. However, as the Hon. Member is aware, my concern is that people have to live 12 months of the year. The monthly family allowance payments are very critical to so many families. Having said that, I want to respond directly to his question: Yes, indeed, I do support that position. I want to make it very clear that this is not just the NDP position or my position; virtually every single social reform group which advised the committee on this issue made reference if not to the exact proposal, then to something very similar.

Our proposal is for an 80 per cent increase in the child tax credit, which perhaps the Hon. Member did not mention, I do not really recall. This would provide a significant increase for virtually all middle and lower-income Canadians. That is based on the assumption that upper-income Canadians do not require support in the same way to assist them in raising their children, and as well that the family allowance should remain universal, no question about that.

Mr. Redway: Mr. Speaker, I am aware that his Party's proposal would increase total family benefits, but the way it proposes to do it is not only by eliminating the child tax exemption but also by pumping in substantially more new funding. However, I know the Hon. Member is well aware of and concerned about this country's financial position. He is aware of the deficit and I know he would like to see it reduced and eliminated if possible. I know as well that he would never advocate anything irresponsible and which might increase the deficit. I am sure he recognizes it would be impossible to find money from other sources because all it would mean would be an increase in the deficit. Bearing all those things in mind would he still advocate, in order to improve this package, the complete elimination of the child tax exemption, something which, if we did not pump in all this extra money which no one has, would obviously have a detrimental effect on the low and middle-income people of this country?

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, both I and my Party have no hesitation in providing the necessary funding to assist those in need in our country. As the Hon. Member well knows, our program does not result in an increase in the deficit, however. His Government is doing that. The Minister of Finance said the other day he was going to increase the deficit by $1 billion at least—there was no hesitation—not to help children or families but to help large financial corporations, domestic and international. There was no hesitation there, not one bit. There is no hesitation in saying we are going to give everyone a $500,000 capital gains exemption and lose all kinds of money, billions of dollars over the years. But we do not have enough money to help children. That is what the Government has been saying.

We feel quite differently. We say that it will not increase the deficit to do this. We can pay for it by reforming the tax system, something which every Member of this House agrees needs to be reformed. There are many corporations and individuals who do not pay their fair way today. We feel, as I am sure all Hon. Members do, that if those corporations and individuals simply paid their fair tax, we would have all the necessary funds to provide the capital injection to assist those people in need, whether it be young children or families. We would not increase the deficit, we would just have a fair collection of taxes, which I am sure the Hon. Member would endorse 100 per cent.

Mr. Redway: Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member has referred to his Party's proposals concerning a fair tax system. Certainly, as he indicated, all Members of the House endorse the idea of a fair tax system. Of course where we would have our differences, I am sure, is over the question of what is a fair tax system. As he knows the Budget proposed a minimum tax and the Minister of Finance this week, in answer to a question I posed myself, indicated that a minimum tax is on its way and will be introduced to be effective as of January 1, 1986. In addition to that, there are other proposals in the Budget for raising funds. The net effect of all those proposals and all the proposals I have heard from the Hon. Member's Party which suggest we should reinstate some of the marginal tax rates which previously existed, as the Hon. Member knows, will not be to eliminate or reduce the deficit or change the course this country is moving in, because those marginal tax rates were in place at a time when the deficit was growing and they did not halt the growth of the deficit. Regardless of how we may differ on reform of the tax system, I think we know that that alone will not change the direction of the financial affairs of this country and eliminate the deficit. He and I both know that in our hearts and minds.

However, bearing in mind that regardless of reform there would still be a deficit and we would still have financial difficulties, would the NDP and the Hon. Member personally still advocate that we eliminate altogether the child tax exemption in the Income Tax Act?

Mr. Riis: What does the Hon. Member want me to do, Mr. Speaker, put it in writing in blood? We have a position and I do not know what more I can say. Yes! Yes! What I find interesting, as I try to answer his question, is that what we are debating here is not the deficit. I wish the Hon. Member would rise and say that he believes that the appropriate thing to do is to reduce increases to family allowances. Does he really believe that we should be reducing the increases to the family allowance payments across the board to all Canadians? Does he support what is before the House at the moment?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Resuming debate.

Mr. Riis: Give him a chance to answer.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is there unanimous consent to allow the Member for York East (Mr. Redway) to answer?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Gauthier: For a short answer.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Very well, the Member for York East has the floor for a short response.

Mr. Redway: Mr. Speaker, as the Hon. Member knows, we are talking about a three-part package—

Mr. Gauthier: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The Hon. Member for Ottawa-Vanier (Mr. Gauthier), on a point of order.

Mr. Gauthier: Mr. Speaker, we agree with the Hon. Member being given the floor to explain his position. However, I would like to reserve the position of the next speaker, because you may have noticed it is now 12:01 p.m., and I think there are 58 minutes of debate left. If the Hon. Member recognized on this side of the House takes the floor before the 50 minutes are up, he will be entitled to take 20 minutes for his speech and not the additional 10 minutes.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The Hon. Member for Ottawa-Vanier (Mr. Gauthier) is right. However, the 58 minutes are up in any case, and the Hon. Member for Montreal-Sainte-Marie (Mr. Malépart) will have 10 minutes.

[English]

Mr. Redway: Just to conclude, Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member realizes that we are talking about a three-part package, the net effect of which is to improve benefits for low income families. The second point is that, apart from that, there is going to be no decrease in the family allowance. It may not increase as fast as it would otherwise, but there is to be no decrease, and the Hon. Member knows that quite well.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Resuming debate. The Hon. Member for Montreal-Sainte-Marie (Mr. Malépart).

Mr. Jean-Claude Malépart (Montreal-Sainte-Marie): Mr. Speaker, it is with sadness that I rise in the House to take part in the debate today, because for the third time we are considering a Bill that is anti-social and is aimed at an important although unorganized group in our society.

Mr. Speaker, there are three groups in society that should have the concern of Governments and all Members of this House and which must be defended. First, the elderly; second, the sick; and third, our children.

Mr. Speaker, there are other groups in our society, and I am thinking for instance of farmers, business people, small businesses, the multinationals and workers, that are structured and organized and able to argue their own case. Unfortunately, the three groups I referred to, namely the elderly, the sick and children, are not organized, and previous Governments, whether they were Conservative or Liberal, have always seen it as their duty to protect them.

And now, for the first time in our history, a Prime Minister with his gang of Conservative Members is attacking the three poorest and least organized groups in our society. For the first time, Progressive Conservative Members, led by their Prime Minister, are basely taking advantage of the inexperience and lack of organization of these groups to get their money and give it to the rich.

Fortunately, the elderly proved to the Prime Minister that they were capable of taking a stand, and they humiliated him right here on the Hill. Fortunately, Opposition Members and the various associations that help people in their struggle against various diseases were ready for this, and again, they obliged the Prime Minister to apologize and backtrack on certain kinds of medication. But unfortunately, he did not have the courage to backtrack on everything.

And now we have a third attack, this time on families with children, Mr. Speaker. It is too bad I have only ten minutes, because I would have liked to have had more time to consider the subject in detail.

Mr. Speaker, regarding the tax on medication, the Prime Minister knows perfectly well, although Progressive Conservative Members may not be aware of this, that the "family pharmacy" is now taxed. Arthritis sufferers need liniment and bufffered aspirin.

The Government said it would tax that because it is not important. I would like to give you some figures. How many youths under age 15 suffer from arthritis and whose parents are faced with additional expenses just to pay the 10 per cent tax?

An Hon. Member: There is no tax.

Mr. Malépart: Mr. Speaker, a Progressive Conservative Member claims there is no tax. Read the press release. He does not know anything, Mr. Speaker. I have no idea which riding he comes from, we have never heard of it.

Mr. Speaker, 3.2 million Canadians suffer from arthritis, including 600,000 in Québec. Some 30,000 young Canadians under age 15 suffer from arthritis and must use pain relieving drugs on a regular basis, yet this Government and this Prime Minister of Iron Ore fame have chosen to levy a tax on sick Canadians. Who are the biggest consumers of cough syrups, congestion relieving drugs, dressings and band-aids in Canada? Families with children. Here again this heartless Government has seen fit to launch a frontal attack against families with children. I see the Hon. Member for Lac-Saint-Jean (Mr. Côté) indicating it is not so. He has stood up for millionnaires, he has decided he came here to protect millionnaires, and that is his right. Well, Mr. Speaker, I for one, thought I would come here to champion the cause of poor and middle income Canadians.

Mr. Bissonnette: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The Hon. Minister of State (Small Businesses) on a point or order.

Mr. Bissonnette: Mr. Speaker, I would suggest that the Hon. Member for Montreal-Sainte-Marie (Mr. Malépart) wants to rake me over the coals, but he has precious little to say. This is just another opportunity for him to speak nonsense, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I do not think that was a point of order. The Hon. Member for Montreal-Sainte-Marie (Mr. Malépart) may continue.

Mr. Malépart: He does not know anything, except perhaps in the field of structural beams, and that is just about it.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to prove that the Government, the Prime Minister and most Members on the other side of the House have misled the population. They did admit to misleading the elderly, so they apologized for that, they did admit to misleading the sick, so again they apologized for that, and once again we will do everything we can to force them to apologize for misleading families with children.

The November 5th Speech from the Throne was a Progressive Conservative document in which the Prime Minister had the Governor General say this about social justice:

> My Government has as a high priority measures to support and strengthen the Canadian family, which is the cornerstone of our society.

The Government slashes $55 million off income support programs then throws that money down the drain—$56 million—to change the colour of military uniforms. That is one of the measures endorsed by the Hon. Member for Lac-Saint-Jean (Mr. Côté), the Minister of State for Small Businesses. That was the option of all Quebec Conservative Members, $56 million to switch colours at the expense of families with children, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Côté (Lac-Saint-Jean): A point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The Hon. Member for Lac-Saint-Jean (Mr. Côté) on a point of order.

Mr. Côté (Lac-Saint-Jean): I should like to make a correction, Mr. Speaker. The Member for Lac-Saint-Jean is not Minister of State for Small Businesses.

An Hon. Member: Nor will he ever be!

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The Hon. Member for Montreal-Sainte-Marie.

Mr. Malépart: Mr. Speaker, I continue. There is a conflict, and it is a very nice start for the Conservatives.

Also, Mr. Speaker, the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Epp) has been nicknamed the Minister of Social Injustice. It is the first time in the history of our country that the person in charge of that department has fully endorsed the interests of the multinationals and the rich at the expense of the poor, Mr. Speaker.

For the information of Progressive Conservative members who know how to read, I should like to quote a statement which the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Epp) made on November 15, 1984, as reported on page 277:

> It is the family and commitment to community which guarantee stability in our social fabric.

That is the Minister of Social Injustice speaking.

> It is my role as Minister of National Health and Welfare to put forward signals and initiatives which will strenghten the role of the family and give it more permanence in society than I feel it has been given before.

He has succeeded, Mr. Speaker, he has cut $50 million from the assistance programs aimed at helping them. Here is another proof, Mr. Speaker. This consultation paper entitled Child and Elderly Benefits has a blue cover and was published by the Progressive Conservatives under the authority of Jake Epp, Minister of Social Injustice.

When we want to determine the intellectual honesty of this Government, of this Prime Minister, Mr. Speaker, we must use as criterion the principle of universality which is the basic element of our social safety net. Its integrity should not be questioned and will not be questioned.

In January, 1985, speaking on behalf of his Government and on his own behalf, the little guy from Baie-Comeau stated: We are not going to touch universality. Four months later, he blamed the Canadian public for lacking the necessary maturity to discuss social programs. That is the image of our Prime Minister!

In this same blue consultation paper, the Prime Minister and the Minister of Social Injustice of Canada pledged that the findings were aimed at starting a debate, both open—I wonder if he knows what it means—and objective on our tax benefit programs and at redirecting all the savings to programs aimed at urgent social objectives, including the protection of needy Canadians, rather than the reduction of the deficit. It is written black on white. That is the word of the Government and the member from Toronto or wherever he comes from who wants to reduce the deficit on the backs of our children. There is a contradiction in that party, Mr. Speaker. And there is still more evidence that the accused is guilty as charged.

On December 20, 1984, as shown on page 1401 of Hansard, my colleague for La Prairie (Mr. Jourdenais) asked the following question to the Prime Minister:

> Could the Prime Minister inform the House whether it is his Government's policy, or whether his Government intends, to reduce gradually over the years the tax exemption for families with children?

The answer of the Prime Minister, whose words must normally and quite rightly be believed, was as follows:

> No, Mr. Speaker. That is not what the Government intends to do.

However, if you look in the Budget, you find that it is exactly what he has done.

Mr. Boudria: Aunt Jeanne was right!

Mr. Jourdenais: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The Hon. Member for La Prairie (Mr. Jourdenais) on a point of order.

Mr. Jourdenais: The Hon. Member for Montreal-Sainte-Marie (Mr. Malépart) has just quoted something that I never said in this House.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The Hon. Member for Montreal-Sainte-Marie (Mr. Malépart).

Mr. Malépart: Mr. Speaker, I never spoke about the Hon. Member for La Prairie (Mr. Jourdenais); it is not worth it because nobody knows him. I can understand that he would feel insulted because we never speak about him, but—

Ms. Copps: He has nothing to say.

Mr. Malépart: I only have one minute left?

Mr. Speaker, I could also quote the comments of the Minister who, in his honesty, invites the committees . . . it is true that he looks good. When I was an MLA in Quebec, Maurice Bellemare called people like the Minister of National Health and Welfare and the Prime Minister clean cut guys because they are neatly combed, neatly dressed and have a distinguished appearance, but they are just empty shells, Mr. Speaker. I agree with Maurice Bellemare.

Mr. Speaker, all the groups, that is 92 groups of citizens from across the land came here to tell the Minister: All the money you will be slashing from income tax deductions should be transferred to the income tax credit. What do we see in the budget? It is taking $55 million out of the pockets of families in need. They are not surprised to hear the Minister of State for Small Businesses (Mr. Bissonnette), who defends millionnaires, suggest that indeed they were going to reduce the deficit with that.

We find in the document that a member of the organization of the Health and Welfare Advisory Committee, an independent body, which is neither Liberal nor Conservative or NDP has carried out a major study, and I would urge Progressive Conservative Members to read it. It clearly shows that needy families will lose money starting from the first year. Secondly, couples with an average income of $26,000, which does not make one rich, will lose $125 starting from next year because of this Government's senseless actions and the ignorance of Progressive Conservative Members.

Mr. Speaker, I can tell you, and I will conclude on this for lack of time, unfortunately, yes, I can tell you that when we supported the senior citizens, we worked day and night, body and soul to force those Members who, as they are now saying today about family allowances, pretend they support that and today they look foolish because the Prime Minister backed down, because he recognized his error; we will be working body and soul and all the groups in Quebec are joining together, and I can tell you that Progressive Conservative members are in for a show and we will find another Mrs. Denis, and Charlie Brown will again have someone speaking his mind to him.

[English]

Mr. Stan J. Hovdebo (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, I like very much the title to which the previous speaker referred, "The Minister of Social Injustice". Several years ago, the former Prime Minister ran a campaign on a "just society". He was in power for a number of years but he failed to reach that goal. Chief Cardinal from Alberta wrote a very good book entitled The Unjust Society which tabulates the injustices which have been done to the native people across the country. I think it is time for a new book. Perhaps we can use Chief Cardinal's title and call it, "The Government which is Developing an Unjust Society". Not only is that the net result of the Government's Budget but in the area under discussion we do not have any kind of suggestion that the people of Canada should trust the Conservative Government to produce a just society. In its scramble to protect its friends at the higher levels of income and to eliminate the deficit, the Government has put itself into such a position that none of the people of Canada at any level will be able to trust it.

What did the Budget do, Mr. Speaker? It was aimed at getting more money from the lower and the middle income groups. Bill C-70, which is before us today, is only one of the steps in the process of getting money out of the lower and middle income groups and, in effect, passing it on to the large corporations and to the shareholders of those corporations who will profit from the situation.

Step number one was obviously the intended reduction in the senior citizen's pensions. That failed. It embarrassed the Government, the Prime Minister and it embarrassed the "Minister of Injustice", as the previous speaker suggested.

Number two is a tax on illness because the Government has established across the board, and is already collecting, a tax on many of the drugs which people need to survive. We have a tax on illness we have a tax on old age, and now we have a tax on children. The Government is attempting to reduce the amount of money which the mothers of Canada are going to need to keep their families going. It is not just the poor people in the country who are going to feel this. Anyone who is having difficulty making ends meet recognizes that as the family allowance goes up with inflation, they have that little extra money which helps them to keep going.

What does this Bill do, Mr. Speaker? First of all, it attacks universality. I know that Members of the Government side will say that it does not attack universality but if we project what is happening in this Bill over a period of time, we find that eventually the family allowance will be very insignificant and the tax credit will be increased, so that we will end up with a program which is selective and not universal. That is the direction in which we are headed. It is obviously part of the government agenda to eliminate universality of social programs. The Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Epp), when he was commenting on the MacDonald Report suggested that he would like to reopen the case for universality. The defence of the Government on this matter has been to suggest that it will raise the tax credit, and that suggestion is valid and worth-while.

There is no doubt about the direction and the agenda of this Government. It shows up in this Bill and it showed up in the previous suggestion which failed concerning reduction in the senior citizens pensions. It shows that this Government is willing to choose selective payments over universal payments. Even if we did accept the idea of the tax credit as being a replacement, the amount being put into the tax credit is so insignificant that it will not pay for the increases in sales tax. It is not enough. The tax credit is not enough to help a poor mother or a poor family pay for the taxes being imposed by this Government. The Government keeps telling us and hopes that we believe—but I think the people of Canada know better by now—that it is trying to do these things for the benefit of the family.

The effect of this Bill falls mostly on two groups of people. First, it affects the families. Within the families there are two other groups. The Budget and this action affect the amount of money a person on social welfare will get. In many places, Saskatchewan is probably a good example, the amount of social welfare has been cut so drastically that it is very difficult for a family to get along on what it gets from social welfare.

With the number of unemployed increasing and with the lack of jobs being developed by the Government, more and more people are receiving social welfare. By the third or fourth week of the month, perhaps at the end of the second week if a person is paid every two weeks, people find themselves without enough money to eat well. That is just one group of people who will be affected by this Bill over a long period of time.

We recognize that the immediate effect of the Bill will not be felt. I think the Government is counting on that to make the Bill acceptable. Canadians know what indexing is. Canadians know that this Government committed itself to social programs and said that it would not cut back on universal or social programs.

In one of the Minister's main statements he said that the Government would not cut back social programs to reduce the deficit. When he rose in his place the other day, his first statement was to say that everybody knew the country has a deficit, that we must do something about it, and as a result he was introducing Bill C-70 so the Government would be able to reduce the deficit. That was a direct statement that the Government will reduce the deficit by reducing social services and that it will be done on the backs of children and families, the lower and middle-income groups.

Several months ago, the same Minister guaranteed that any reduction in social programs would not be used to reduce the deficit but would be given to people more in need than others.

What we have is an absolute lack of trust. If the Government thinks that in this approach it will get the support of Canadians, it is badly mistaken.

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber-Port au Port-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to participate in this debate. I am pleased to have the opportunity to stand in my place, but not at all pleased that it is necessary for Members of Parliament, yet again in a period of a few months, to remind this Government of its broken promises, broken commitments and of its abandonment of the principle of sharing the burden of taxation equitably.

It was only a few months ago that many of us stood in our places and suggested to the Government of Canada that it had done something unjust and immoral in attempting to balance the books on the backs of senior citizens, those least able to defend themselves, but here we are again. We are to get a message through that targeting precious dollars predicated on the notion that the state has a role to play in ensuring the welfare of Canadian children is a mistake.

I remember standing here as other Members did, including the Hon. Member who just spoke so eloquently, telling the Government it was making a mistake in attempting to take dollars out of the hands of mothers and fathers, primarily mothers, used to caring for their children. This is immoral, unjust and wrong and the Government will not get away with it.

I am sure I speak for both opposition Parties when I say that Members are not here simply to make noise, to score political points or to embarrass the administration. We are telling the Government that this measure is unacceptale to us as parliamentarians and that Bill C-70 is unacceptable to Canadians. Let me tell the Government now that this country is going to organize. The Coalition for Justice that spontaneously came together just before this House rose for the summer will come together again. The sense of moral outrage expressed by Canadians last May, June and early July, shall be expressed again.

Bill C-70 will progressively, over the next four year period, take precious dollars and cents out of Canadian households, the dollars targeted to ensure the health and welfare of children.

When I sit and look at the assessment undertaken by the health critic for the Liberal Party, the Hon. Member for Sudbury (Mr. Frith), showing the impact of this Bill on Canadian families, I am startled. By 1990, a family with an income of $15,000 a year—two earners and two children—will pay an additional $1,844 in taxes. A family with an income of $80,000 taking advantage of capital gains, will pay an additional $404, and one not taking advantage of capital gains will pay an additional $1,125. Where is the justice in telling a family with an income of $15,000 which puts them squarely below the poverty line and on the bottom of the totem pole, that it will have to pay an additional $1,844 while a family earning $80,000 will have to pay only $1,125? Where is the justice in that kind of measure? Where is the reflection of the so-called sacred trust which the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) claims was bestowed upon him by Canadians last September 4? How can that kind of regressive and immoral measure be described as keeping faith with Canadians?

We in Ottawa live in an ivory tower, not only as we work in the House of Commons, surrounded by stained glass windows and marbled imported from the continents of the world, but as we live in the suburbs of Ottawa, in Rockcliffe Park, Craig Henry and so on. These are neighbourhoods of beautiful brick homes with two-car garages, paved driveways and even pink flamingoes on the front lawns. However, that is not reality. It is a lovely model for the rest of the country and it is a dream to which those who have not aspire.

What about a $15,000 wage earner in the community of Anchor Point, Newfoundland, with a house built on the rocks overlooking salt water? The husband slaves for four months of the year in the North Atlantic in order to bring home some income. I see the Minister of State for Small Businesses (Mr. Bissonnette) nodding his head; he visited that area not too long ago. In fact, the wife works in a fish plant splitting fish for three or four months a year so that the family can make that $15,000. Do the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance (Mr. Wilson) really believe that such people can afford to pay an additional $1,879? Do they really believe that loggers in northern British Columbia can afford to pay that amount? Such loggers find themselves facing a diminishing resource. They work with their hands in order to bring home incomes for their families. They are not living on taxpayers' dollars from bureaucratic jobs and living in Craig Henry or Rockcliffe Park. They live in northern British Columbia communities such as Smithers and work with their hands for a living. Can they afford to pay an additional $1,879, which will be taxed away from their income? Is that the trust which he placed in the hands of the Prime Minister, the sacred trust which the Prime Minister claims is a mantle of prime ministership? No, it is not.

Last summer Canadians amazed this administration when they spoke with one voice in defence of the quality of life of senior citizens. The true measure of any nation is how it treats its elderly citizens and its children. We saw that Canadians would not accept a measure or an attempt to balance the books on the backs of senior citizens at a time when the Government was contemplating capital gains giveaways and giveaways to multinational oil companies. Every Member of the House knows that Canadians will not stand by silently and watch a measure being introduced which, between now and 1990, will have a serious impact upon the ability of the poorest people to provide for their children—to provide a roof over their heads, to provide proper clothing and to provide decent food. Canadians will not stand for it.

Mr. Lapierre: Nor for tainted tuna.

Mr. Tobin: Nor for tainted tuna, that is for sure. I plead with Hon. Members opposite to do what they did last year. They should speak up in their caucus meetings and in their private councils. They should warn the Minister of Finance that this will not wash any more than the Government's last attempt to punish those least able to fend for themselves. If they were astonished last summer and learned respect for grey power, they should remember that every senior citizen, among the most unselfish people in Canada, who stood and demanded justice at that time will join the cause and demand justice for their children and grandchildren. I advise them to withdraw this Bill.

Mr. Simon de Jong (Regina East): Mr. Speaker, it is with a degree of sadness that I rise to participate in the debate on Bill C-70. At this time in the progression of civilization and the human race, major social, economic, cultural and technological changes are taking place. They are changing the way in which society operates and traditional family structures. They are also affecting the manner in which children are raised and the traditional roles of males and females. Also at this time there is very little certainty and it is no longer possible for a youngster to attend school, obtain a degree and be assured of a job for 20 to 40 years and then to retire. In fact we are all experiencing tremendous changes, very fast and severe social changes. There is a need for collective government action at this time. Very often the elderly and the children are the victims of fast social, economic and cultural changes. Yet it was the old and now it is the young which the Government attacked in its Budget.

Earlier this year the people of Canada, not just old people but men and women of all age groups and from all walks of life, joined together and created such a massive protest that the Government had to back down on its deindexation of pensions. The same will be true when it comes to the attack of the Government on the children of Canada.

Raising children nowadays is not an easy task. I should know, in that I have been a single parent for part of my life. Right now I have six children for whom I have some responsibility. They range from teenagers to a young baby. The task is certainly easier for me than it is for most of my fellow Canadians. In terms of my income, I am one of the few privileged Canadians. However, most parents do not fall into that category. Even though I am a member of this privileged class, I know that family allowance cheques are an important part of my budget. I know what it is like to purchase new running shoes and jackets for five teenagers to return to school in the fall. The purchase of such shoes can involve an outlay of some $20 to $40 per pair.

Also we must remember that we are living in an age of mass media advertising, much of which is directed to children. Some of the best psychologists are working on that advertising, and the children of today are subjected to forces at work which are much more poweful than in earlier days. They are concerned about peer groups and peer acceptance, much of which is affected by consumer items.

This summer I had occasion to visit some of my constituents. I knocked on doors in a low-income district. I spoke with an older, single parent woman who had a teenage son attending high school. She could not afford to buy him a new pair of running shoes. It was a $25 to $30 outlay which she just could not afford. Mr. Speaker, she expressed her frustration at not being able to provide her teenage son with the things that the other teenage children at school had.

As these families and as all families in the country do the difficult job of trying to raise their kids in a half decent way and provide them with love, a sense of security and a sense of belonging, and they, hopefully, in turn will become upright, decent and productive citizens of this country, I think families need help. They do not need to be attacked. The state cannot, Mr. Speaker, do all those things that will ensure that the kids of this country will have a decent family home, with equal opportunity and the ability to become productive citizens. The state cannot guarantee that, but the state can do those things that will help parents do their jobs.

We hear from the Tories tremendous rhetoric and they wrap themselves, Mr. Speaker, in righteous and moral platitudes about the importance of the family. I agree, the family is a very important, very essential unit for the social fabric which has been under tremendous strain. We hear many members of the Government, as they wrap themselves in this moral self-righteousness and talk about the importance of the family, denounce some miserable soul who might have got pregnant out of wedlock and seeks to have an abortion because the alternatives in her life are not very attractive. Oh, no, these moral, selfrighteous people will denounce the poor child, but they are the very same ones who will attack the opportunity of that young girl to carry through with her pregnancy and to raise her child. They will attack her economic opportunity of raising that child. They will force her into an option that is unacceptable.

It is unfortunate that people are forced to discontinue a pregnancy through economic circumstances. I think that when a civilization and a society reaches that stage where people cannot continue with a pregnancy and cannot give birth and raise their children because economically they cannot afford it, then the civilization and society has reached such a low point that it can surely be considered barbaric.

Instead of this Government helping the family, helping young women make a "pro choice" it is in fact creating the economic conditions in which the opposite occurs. Surely the responsibility should be the Government's for the type of society that it is creating in this good, rich country of ours.

Mr. Speaker, I stand opposed to the motion.

[Translation]

Mr. Alain Tardif (Richmond-Wolfe): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased with this opportunity to take part in the debate on Bill C-70.

I think that when considering this legislation, we have a choice of two approaches. One is more or less mathematic, and by that I mean that, on the basis of this Bill, we can imagine a whole series of situations and scenarios in which a number of families could possibly benefit by the implementation of these provisions.

However, Mr. Speaker, the fact remains that all this is entirely hypothetical, and further assumptions must be made with respect to the inflation rate and salary levels, so that the range of possible answers is very broad indeed.

I intend to ignore this approach, for the simple reason, Mr. Speaker, that whatever the mathematics of the question may be, I feel that if there is even one case, one family in Canada where the implementation of this Bill will result in a potential or outright loss, that in itself would be reason enough to take an energetic stand against this legislation.

Mr. Speaker, that is why I would prefer another approach which considers the humanitarian aspect, that is, the impact on many hundreds of families as a result of a reduction in family allowance payments.

The Opposition will say this reduction is only marginal and hardly significant.

Mr. Speaker, I think they forget that to these families $5 can make all the difference.

We must remember that those families and we meet them in the course of our work, where one person has full responsibility for one or two children in many cases depend on welfare. They wonder how they can afford to send their children back to school in the fall, because of all the expense involved. They worry because the family allowance they get seems hardly enough to start the school year. For these people, $20 when you have to live in that kind of situation—it is simply disastrous, and I think that justifies opposing the passage of this Bill most aggressively.

Besides, the principle of these cuts has already been clearly established, and I would like to quote from a document entitled: "Securing Economic Renewal", in the Budget Papers, where it says:

> Net federal expenditures will be reduced by approximately $15 million in fiscal year 1985-86 and $40 million in 1986-87. Provincial tax revenues will not be affected in 1985-86 and only marginally in 1986-87.

Thus, it is clear from the start that the purpose of the Bill is to save money and add to the Government's revenues.

The justification given for a decision of this kind is, of course, the size of the national debt and the fact that the country's ability to pay has become problematic. We can accept the argument up to this point, that is, academically and theoretically speaking. Except for the rich, as my colleague so rightfully points out.

Canada's present financial situation is a matter of fact for everybody, rich and poor alike. But the problem, the catastrophy, the drama is that we are so indulgent towards the rich, we are making unbelievable concessions to them. To the poor, to old age security pension recipients and to others who cannot do without drugs we say: You have a social burden, you shoulder a responsibility and so you must share the problems facing this country.

And then we turn around and think nothing of granting generous tax concessions to oil companies, we readily support banks, and we make all kinds of decisions in favour of individuals who we know full well can indeed pay their own way.

It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that it is imperative and essential to correct the situation. As a matter of fact, the recurrent theme advocated by our friends opposite throughout the election campaign can be summed up by the word generosity. I doubt if I ever heard the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) rise to speak without saying that we had to be generous, particularly towards underprivileged people. Generous here, there and everywhere.

Well, this Government has indeed been very generous, extremely so. The problem is that it has been generous towards people who, in the circumstances, could also be generous and accept to share part of the financial burden, if only to give some respite to men and women who simply cannot support our ever increasing financial load.

Here is a statement made by the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Epp), whom my colleague rightfully dubbed the social injustice minister: "The stability of our social fabric is guaranteed by the family and our attachement to the community. As Minister of National Health and Welfare, my role is to give directions and take initiatives designed to strengthen the role of the family and give it more importance than ever in our society". As a philosophy it seems encouraging and reassuring for those who are anxiously waiting to see what the future has in store for them.

Those people are sitting at home watching TV and wondering what they can do. How can I show my disapproval? How can I say I disagree? They are totally help less. They cannot afford to hire lobbyists. They cannot afford to have friends close to the system express their discontent. However, they are the ones who have the most crying need for those crumbs, for those amounts which I know are marginal but still something important for them. And there are people asking us: How is it that you the managers of this country cannot find the money, the big money of course, because $50 million have been mentioned, which we need to enjoy at least the same stability we had under the Liberal Government when you find the money needed to help out banks, to buy icebreakers, to change armed forces uniforms and to allow so many other usually harebrained expenditures? I must honestly say that unfortunately I do not know the answer.

Look at the party opposite. I was listening yesterday to the Minister of State (Small Businesses) (Mr. Bissonnette) bragging about inflation and about interest rates. But Canadians are not that dumb. They know quite well that today's inflation and interest rates are not the result of steps taken by the Government, by the party opposite, but the result of those taken before this Government ever came to power. When things are going badly they say that it is the fault of the previous Government and when inflation and interest rates are low they say we owe it to the previous Government.

Before concluding, Mr. Speaker, I would ask you to do exactly as you did on the issue of old age security pensions that is to back down as you did when you acknowledged that you were wrong about that. Please do now what you did for medicine and for old age security pensions and the opposition members will back you up.

[English]

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, in the last 30 or 40 years, we have seen some very important programs adopted in this country, programs which have improved the lot of most Canadians. I am thinking of the Unemployment Insurance Program, the Old Age Security Program, the Canada Pension Plan, the Canada Assistance Plan and others. Most Canadians who are working seem to feel that we have solved most of the country's problems. They believe or want to believe that we have eliminated poverty in this country. Nothing could be further from the truth.

In the City of Winnipeg and in every city of Canada, there has been a dramatic increase in the number of people who are appearing every day at facilities provided by churches and other community groups to get a decent meal. At the Stella Mission in Winnipeg, just a few blocks from my own constituency, they are again providing food hampers for people who are in need. That is something which occurred 75 years ago when the founder of the CCF, J. S. Woodsworth, the Party which preceded the NDP, was in charge of that mission.

Schools and churches in Winnipeg and in every other city in Canada are collecting used clothes to provide for people in need. There are people who cannot go to work unless they receive those used clothes because they cannot afford to buy needed clothes to wear. There are children in the core areas of Winnipeg and other cities who cannot go to school because they do not have shoes unless they receive them from voluntary organizations who are trying to meet those needs.

I relate these facts because when the Government proposes to deindex family allowances, to take away from many women the one sure source of income they have, it is striking at the hearts of people in need. We are not talking about a few people, we are talking about hundreds of thousands of people.

It has been estimated that half of single-parent families headed by women are living in poverty. That is the situation; yet the Government is proposing that beginning next year we deindex family allowances by 3 per cent. It is almost certain that in the next number of years, the cost of living will increase by more than 3 per cent.

Let us assume that the cost of living increases by 4.5 per cent. If one considers what has happened in the last 10 years, that is a very conservative estimate. That will mean that the real value of family allowances, particularly for those in a lower-income bracket, will be reduced by 3 per cent each year. If that continues for three years, as it undoubtedly will, we are talking about a very substantial decrease in the real value of family allowances.

We say that this is unacceptable, and we are not alone in saying that. Every organization involved in working with families and children has expressed very clearly that what the Government is proposing is unacceptable. May I call it one o'clock, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It being one o'clock, I do now leave the chair until two o'clock this day.

At 1 p.m. the House took recess.

NATIONAL SOVEREIGNTY

ASSERTION IN ARCTIC THROUGH NATIVE PEOPLES

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, as custodians of the land known as Canada we have the responsibility of conserving and protecting the fragile nature of the Arctic. With the important issue of Canadian sovereignty looming over us, certain questions become necessary and timely. Should sovereignty become an expression of military presence only? Is sovereignty to be asserted by breaking ice and taking oil south? Should we rely on icebreakers, submarines, oil rigs and the like, in order to assert our presence?

Rather than using all this disruptive technology as the only way of asserting ourselves, why not identify and encourage civilian presence by way of reinforcing the native people, their lifestyle and activities in the Arctic? We could facilitate and strenthen traditional life—the living off the land—as was practised so well before the arrival of the white people, and which is now endangered. We could encourage the expansion and facilitate the movement of caribou, musk-ox, and reindeer herds.

We could accelerate the creation north of 60 of a network of national parks and wilderness areas. Our native people have proven over the centuries their ability to live in the Arctic and they should be active participants in reinforcing Canadian sovereignty. In the long term, we will be better served by developing sovereignty with the help of the native people rather than relying on the technology and values prevailing in southern Canada.

THE ADMINISTRATION

CRITICISM OF MINISTERS' ACTIONS

Mr. Vic Althouse (Humboldt-Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, this is a story of three billion-dollar Conservative Ministers and each had a little pen.

The first Minister was in charge of the Wheat Board. By the stroke of his little pen he cut out our quality advantage over other wheat exporters by permitting the sale of low quality unlicensed wheat. This was in keeping with the Prime Minister's (Mr. Mulroney) wish that we have a level playing field in our trade relations with the United States. We have now lowered our quality standards to theirs; but the cost to western farmers in lost future sales will be in the billions of dollars.

The second Minister gave a billion dollars to bank depositors—some of them were even Canadian. With her little pen she showed the world that Canadian banks are not terribly well supervised. Not only did she cost the taxpayers over a billion dollars in bailout guarantees, but she sent a signal to all future foreign investors to avoid Canadian banks. That is billions of dollars that we will not get to use.

The third Minister used his little pen to overrule his food inspectors' advice on some rotting tuna. Military cooks would not use it. We would not let starving Ethiopians eat it, but he insisted on putting it on the market. Now nobody wants Canadian processed fish—not Canadians and not foreign buyers. By lowering our standards he, too, has cost us a billion dollars in lost sales and lost reputation because he did not pay attention to quality.

Quality counts. Canadians used to have it. With their three little pens, three Ministers took us from world class to bush league.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

BEHAVIOUR OF CERTAIN MEMBERS DURING PROCEEDINGS

Mrs. Suzanne Duplessis (Louis-Hébert): Yesterday, Mr. Speaker, as I was asking a question of great importance to the businessmen of my riding, the Liberals—and I hasten to say that the New Democratic Members were quite respectful—the Liberals were practically raising hell in the House. I am saying that because it was not the first such incident since we came back earlier this month.

Last spring only the odd Member behaved like that, but the attitude of the Liberals has deteriorated so much since last September 9th that those Members, bent on emulating the belligerent approach of their leader, keep shouting and kicking up a row, systematically opposing all interventions by Government Members. They no longer bother to listen to answers given to their questions by the Prime Minister and his Cabinet colleagues.

It is not as if they were trying to defend the interests of Canadians. What matters to them is the political points they might score. The Gallup poll proves it and Canadians are not fooled. The moment they enter the House, those men and women follow their leader, forget all about good manners and behave like uncivilized people. This is a deplorable situation—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Hon. Member for The Battlefords-Meadow Lake (Mr. Gormley).

[English]

THE LEADER OF THE OPPOSITION

Mr. John Gormley (The Battlefords-Meadow Lake): Mr. Speaker, for ten days those of us in western Canada have witnessed the debate over the Canadian Commercial Bank. In this time Parliament has reached a new low in partisan irresponsibility. It is unfortunate that the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Turner) has departed from his usual high role as a responsible spokesman and has chosen the rankest and most dubious kind of denunciation.

In the House, the Leader of the Opposition indulged in some wild flights of fancy of which the House should take notice. Furthermore, the House is entitled to an explanation. The Leader of the Opposition has levelled wild, unfounded accusations at the Government, its Ministers, high public servants, the banks, and everyone connected with the demise of this western Canadian bank. His statements and unfounded charges have done grave damage to public confidence and to Canada's banking industry at large.

I challenge the Leader of the Opposition to make public, away from the protection of the House, his destructive allegations. Parliamentary privilege has thus far protected the Opposition Leader in his wild accusations. It should protect him no longer. Surely the Leader of the Opposition will endeavour to rescue his tattered credibility and explain his allegations. If he fails to do so, with his credibility now reduced to a level even below that of the Rat Pack's, he should resign.

HOUSING

CRITICISM OF GOVERNMENT POLICY

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, in the near future the Minister responsible for Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation will be meeting with his provincial counterparts to sign agreements on the future of social housing in Canada. All signals indicate that the Government wants nothing more to do with providing adequate and affordable housing for Canadians. Co-operative housing associations, native Indian bands, social planning groups and labour unions have condemned the transfer of social housing responsibilities to the provinces as a foolish and costly mistake of the Government.

In British Columbia, where the Social Credit—read Conservative—Government was given responsibility for senior citizen housing in 1979, the Bennett Government cut housing starts from 1,700 in 1978 to 600 in 1979, to 350 in 1983. While the PC Government of Alberta spent $128 per capita on housing last year, the British Columbia Government spent a total of $13 per person. Giving the Bennett Government control of social housing would mean thousands more Canadians living in the streets with no homes to call their own.

I call on the Government to begin caring for Canadians in need of housing. Do not leave them freezing in the cold this winter without adequate shelter.

FINANCE

APPLICATION OF SALES TAX TO NON-PRESCRIPTION DRUGS

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, the application of the sales tax now being applied for the first time to non-prescription drugs, which was announced in the Budget last spring, has created real hardship for thousands of people in Canada, but particularly for two groups of people—our retired people, the seniors, who frequently need to purchase drug items such as aspirin, cough remedies, anticids and laxatives, and mothers with young children, who make frequent and regular purchases of items such as cough and cold remedies, baby aspirin, baby oil and powder, and vitamins.

We are told by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Wilson) that he had to do these things because he has to deal with the record deficit. At the same time as he puts this tax on people who really cannot afford to pay the increased cost, he has increased the benefits to people in the highest income brackets through the $500,000 exemption for capital gains, through the increased reduction of income taxes, and so on.

I call on the Minister of Finance, who has been able to reduce taxes for those upper income Canadians by several billions of dollars, to remove this new sales tax which he has applied to non-prescription drugs and which is having such adverse effects on so many Canadians in the low and middle-income brackets.

THE LIBERAL PARTY

BEHAVIOUR OF LEADER OF THE OPPOSITION

Mr. Gilles Bernier (Beauce): Mr. Speaker, the actions of the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Turner) leave much to be desired. It is too bad he ignored the advice of the editor of the newspaper Le Devoir, Jean-Louis Roy, who wrote on September 16th: "It is time for the Liberal Leader to go beyond the level of crassly partisan speeches in the House and set forth his vision of what this country needs."

Mr. Speaker, it is doubly unfortunate that the Leader of the Official Opposition has failed to take advantage of this opportunity to moderate his comments.

Instead of taking the very apt advice offered by Mr. Roy, the Leader of the Opposition has preferred to make countless unfounded comments and accusations. The inordinate and excessive charges he made involving the Prime Minister, the Governor of the Bank of Canada and Canadian bankers have had the effect of seriously harming the financial institutions of this country.

Now that many of his statements have been contradicted by officials in the United States and by presidents of Canadian banks, he owes the House an explanation. The House of Commons is neither a neighbourhood bar nor a businessmen's club: it is the public forum of this country.

Unless he wants to be branded as irresponsible, the Leader of the Opposition ought to take this opportunity to give the House and this country the explanations to which they are entitled.

Fortunately, Canadians are not fooled by the Opposition's accusations. Look at this morning's polls—

Mr. Speaker: I am sorry to interrupt the Hon. Member but his time has expired.

THE LEADER OF THE OPPOSITION

Mr. Reg Stackhouse (Scarborough West): Mr. Speaker, early this week the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Turner) claimed the Canadian Commercial Bank transferred all its good assets and good loans worth $300 million to its California subsidiary between the time it received a cease and desist order from the Federal Reserve Bank in San Francisco and the time it came before the Inspector General of Banks.

This claim has been repudiated.

David Scott, the Deputy Superintendent of the State Banking Department in Los Angeles, is quoted as saying the U.S. Federal Reserve Board did not warn the CCB of a pending cease and desist order in February. Mr. Scott is also quoted as saying there was no flow of $300 million from the CCB to its California subsidiary. I talked to Mr. Scott today and he confirmed the accuracy of the report in an Ottawa newspaper.

On Tuesday the Leader of the Opposition asked the Prime Minister if he knew about this transfer of funds. On Thursday we ask the Leader of the Opposition: Did he know about it? Did he look for evidence before making his allegation?

It is because I have a real and profound respect for the Leader of the Opposition, perhaps more than some of his Members do, that I now urge him to return to this subject today, present the evidence he has to support his claims, if he has it, and, if not, withdraw his remarks.

IMMIGRATION

CONDITIONS UNDER WHICH REFUGEES DETAINED

Mrs. Lucie Pépin (Outremont): Mr. Speaker, I want to draw the attention of Canadians to the intolerable situation prevailing at the Ville Saint-Laurent Detention Centre for refugees in Montreal. Yesterday, detainees who were on a hunger strike were involved in a fight with security guards, and one refugee was wounded.

The conditions under which refugees are detained in these centres are deplorable and fail to meet the minimum standards of the United Nations. I visited the Centre in June with several other Members, and we found conditions similar to those in prisons.

The Standing Committee on Labour, Employment and Immigration transmitted a report on these detention centres to the Minister last June, and we are still waiting for a reply.

A few months ago, five security guards at the Ville Saint-Laurent Centre were fired because of their brutal treatment of the refugees, which means that the authorities are aware of the problem.

The detainees who are on a hunger strike want to meet the regional authorities responsible for detention centres tomorrow, with their lawyers.

I hope the authorities will have the decency to listen so that finally something can be done about the inhuman conditions under which these people are being detained.

THE LEADER OF THE OPPOSITION

Mr. Albert Cooper (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, we have in the last few days seen the development of a serious situation in Canada. As we all know, the Opposition often releases information which becomes the news in the nation. This news quickly reaches into the homes of the people of Canada. The credibiity of the Opposition rests on the accuracy of that information.

Over the last couple of weeks the Leader of the Opposition has made a number of serious allegations about people and about issues. He has been quick to call for resignations and to offer his condemnation of actions on nothing more than what now appears to be rumour. Today we read that the Leader of the Opposition has been dealing in rumours. He called for the resignation of others on the basis of rumours; what will he now do faced with the facts of his own?

Will he, one, take the advice of the Hon. Member from Shawinigan and call a convention?

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Cooper: Or, two, will he check his facts before attacking the credibility of others?

Or, three, will he continue as he is now by keeping the rest of the rats quiet while he is out in front of pack?

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: I think Hon. Members would expect me to indicate that the last reference in that statement would be normally out of order.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

INCREASE IN CANADIAN TELEVISION PROGRAMMING

Ms. Lynn McDonald (Broadview-Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, as arts and culture critic for the NDP caucus I joined with the arts community and Canadians generally in pressing for more Canadian programming, especially in entertainment. Thus it is with a great deal of pleasure that I welcome the CBC's announcement of an increase in Canadian television programming to 80 per cent in prime time this year.

If the focus on Canadian programming last week is anything to go by, we have a most exciting season to look forward to. The announcement of a 30 per cent increase in drama programming is even more welcome and more overdue. This new programming will mean jobs and opportunities for Canadian writers, performers, directors and producers, independents as well as those in the Corporation. Yet there are losers as well, for the CBC is continuing its policy of treating women as second-class citizens. The increased opportunity for male writers, actors and so forth is not being matched with similar opportunities for women. Indeed, since more women appear in American programming than in Canadian programming, this move by the CBC may reduce the portrayal of women to below the current and paltry level of one-quarter.

I call on the CBC to become the excellent national network it could be and portray the dynamism and creativity of Canadians of all regions and both sexes.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

SALE OF CANNED TUNA—SEIZURE OF DISPUTED PRODUCT

Right Hon. John N. Turner (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. In reviewing Hansard and the answers to questions yesterday by the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans, the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, and the Prime Minister, I can only conclude that the Government is more interested in covering up incompetence than in coming clean with Canadians.

In view of the statement the Prime Minister made yesterday to the House that "less than desirable", tuna products would be removed from consumer shelves, why does his Minister persist in refusing to withdraw that contaminated tuna from Canadian grocery shelves in light of the Prime Minister's very categorical statement in the House?

Hon. John A. Fraser (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Mr. Speaker, I want to respond to the right hon. gentleman's question without necessarily accepting some of the rhetorical comment which preceded it. I would like to tell the House that in the interest of public confidence—

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Fraser: —and because there are public concerns about the acceptability of the disputed stocks for consumers, I have today asked my colleague, the Minister of National Health and Welfare, to invoke the power of the Food and Drug Act and to effect the seizure of the disputed product.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): Better late than never. It is a number of months too late but we on this side of the House welcome that statement. In the circumstances, we will review the situation and see how effective it is.

I want to say to the Minister, on behalf of a number of people who telephoned my office, particularly Richard McColl of Killaloe Station in the Ottawa Valley, who was sick all night a few months ago after eating a tin of Bye The Sea tuna, that he and thousands of others of Canadians will be relieved that the Minister is taking strong action—belatedly and too late, but finally.

Some Hon. Members: Question.

Mr. McDermid: What is the question?

Mr. Speaker: That being no one else rising to ask questions—oh, the Hon. Member for Oshawa.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Blackburn (Brant): The whole House is exhausted.

DISCRETIONARY POWERS OF MINISTERS

Hon. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Mr. Speaker, I, too, would like to say it is good to see the Government do something. Even though it is acting late, it is now going to be done.

My question is directed to the Prime Minister and it concerns the discretionary power which would still reside with the Minister. It is still possible for a Minister, on his discretionary authority, to reach a decision which could see food substances going on the shelves of stores all across Canada which could technically be described as unfit for human consumption. Therefore, will the Prime Minister take steps to ensure that that kind of discretionary power will not reside with a Minister of the Crown?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the Deputy Prime Minister, in the course of his review of various aspects of federal operations, pointed out some time ago in a preliminary report the almost inherent conflict of interest which exists in some situations where various Ministries are called upon to pass value judgments upon products under their legislative purview. One of the recommendations he is bringing forward is to centralize this capacity for review and judgment in the Department of National Health and Welfare. I think that is a recommendation that most Members would look upon with favour.

CENTRALIZATION OF POWERS

Hon. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Mr. Speaker, as the Prime Minister would say, in the spirit in which he answered that question I would like to ask him another one just so that we are very clear. Is the Prime Minister telling the House that the discretionary authority which currently resides with a Minister of the Crown to make a decision that has health implications is going to be removed and put into the Ministry of Health and Welfare?

Hon. Erik Nielsen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, the discretionary authority which the Hon. Member is speaking of resides in several Departments including those of Agriculture, Corporate and Consumer Affairs, Fisheries and Oceans, and Health and Welfare. The thrust of the recommendation that will be brought forward will be to centralize these inspection services in order that a common standard and a higher degree of excellence can be achieved to ensure health and safety in inspection services throughout the broad range of government authority.

RECOMMENDATION TO CABINET

Hon. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to be pedantic on the point, and I understand that the thrust of what the Minister said is to turn health matters over to the Minister who has responsibility for that. However, he did not answer the question, although I am not saying it was deliberate.

The question concerns the discretionary authority specifically. Is he assuring the House that the discretionary authority, which now resides in a variety of Ministries, to make a decision over and above the technical advice on health matters, will be removed and put into the hands of the Minister of National Health and Welfare?

Hon. Erik Nielsen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, that essentially is precisely the consideration that will be brought forward to Cabinet for its decision.

Mr. Frith: It's about time.

Mr. Nielsen: It certainly is about time. It's a pity that it wasn't done many years ago.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Nielsen: I expect that that proposal will be before Cabinet by approximately the middle of next month.

MINISTER'S ACTION

Mr. George Henderson (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, I too, was very pleased to hear the announcement of the Minister today. I am sure that to some extent the industry is going to be pleased as well. However, the Minister made a very, very serious mistake in judgment. In doing so I believe that he contravened, probably deliberately, the Fisheries Inspection Act which bans the sale of fish that is tainted, decomposed, or unwholesome. That includes, of course, fish that is aesthetically offensive to man. Why did the Minister violate the Fisheries Inspection Act and allow that tuna to go on the market in the first place and cause all this damage?

Hon. John A. Fraser (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Mr. Speaker, I will repeat again what I think Members of the Opposition accepted yesterday. There was no hazard to health through any of this product. Under the present situation, citizens who believe that they are aggrieved by any application of the standards by inspectors have only one appeal, that is to the Minister. I listened to those grievances. I did not make the decision on whim or caprice, but as a consequence of two independent committees. On the basis of that advice I released the product.

I am sure that the Member, who has been a Minister of Fisheries, would be interested to know that it is my intention to bring about, as soon as possible, an adequate appeal procedure for such cases.

FISHERIES COUNCIL'S ADVICE

Mr. George Henderson (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, I was also extremely disturbed this morning when I learned that the Minister had placed a gag order on his own staff regarding this issue. I was disturbed because you do not restore confidence by muzzling the troops.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Henderson: Will the Minister accept the advice of the Fisheries Council of Canada and the industry, and publicly state in his place today that under no circumstances will he ever again overrule, for political expediency, the decisions of his inspectors regarding the quality of Canadian fish products?

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. John A. Fraser (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Mr. Speaker, I can assure all Hon. Members that I will endeavour to do everything possible to ensure the high standard of Canadian fish products and to serve the fishing community to the best of my endeavours. I must say, though, that I do not appreciate, nor do I accept, any suggestion of political interference.

CONDITION OF ATLANTIC REGION FISHERY—GOVERNMENT'S INTENDED MEASURES

Mr. Fernand Robichaud (Westmorland-Kent): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans, and I was very pleased with his statement. However, the fact remains that the Minister has plunged the Atlantic fisheries in a serious crisis that might result in a loss of jobs.

I would therefore ask the Minister what he intends to do to restore the industry's credibility and protect the jobs at risk as a result of his actions.

[English]

Hon. John A. Fraser (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member knows that I have as great a concern for jobs in the Atlantic fishery as has anyone. I can only say that the steps which I have taken today with my colleague should address any question of confidence in that regard.

Mr. Fernand Robichaud (Westmorland-Kent): I have a supplementary, Mr. Speaker.

To get back to my question, the Minister said that he was taking certain steps. What are those steps? I would like to know so I can give the Atlantic industry some reassurance. May I know what those steps are?

[English]

Hon. John A. Fraser (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Mr. Speaker, I thought it was obvious to all Hon. Members that I have today asked my colleague, the Minister of National Health and Welfare, to effect a seizure of the disputed stock.

Ms. Copps: That's it?

EXERCISE OF MINISTERIAL DISCRETION

Mr. Ray Skelly (Comox-Powell River): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. The Minister of Fisheries appears to have overruled the Deputy Prime Minister, indicating in the House today that he will be setting up his own appeal procedure. Would the Prime Minister clarify exactly what is going on here with ministerial discretion?

Hon. Erik Nielsen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I see nothing inconsistent between what the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans said and what I said in trying to be helpful to the Hon. Member's Leader. The Task Force on Program Review will be bringing forward, for consideration by the Cabinet, a recommendation that all food inspection services be consolidated in the Ministry of Health and Welfare.

We have just been discussing the overlap that exists in federal Departments. In provincial jurisdictions as well there are parallel food inspection services which we will have to discuss with our provincial colleagues in the hope of achieving a high-level, centralized food inspection service that guarantees the health and safety of all Canadians.

INSPECTION OF FISH PRODUCTS

Mr. Ray Skelly (Comox-Powell River): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans said in the Chamber today that he was setting up his own appeal procedure and that he would do it again. There has been a misuse of discretionary power which has resulted in a serious problem. Would the Prime Minister clarify exactly what is going on now in inspection services rather than what will happen in the future? What is going on now?

Hon. John A. Fraser (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member is the fisheries critic for his Party and he knows full well that there is very grave concern within the industry about appeals with regard to inspection matters. My colleague has indicated that because of overlap this problem will be addressed, and I will be making representations at Cabinet to ensure that a proper appeal procedure is in fact established.

TAINTED TUNA—PROTECTION OF CONSUMERS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Yesterday, the Minister said he was satisfied with the decision made by the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans to authorize the sale of tainted tuna. Mr. Speaker, it is incredible that yesterday the Minister should have been satisfied with the situation and that today, his colleague at Fisheries and Oceans should be withdrawing the tainted fish from supermarket shelves. How can the Minister claim to protect the consumer and what does he intend to do in future to prevent such a catastrophe?

Hon. Michel Côté (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I think that yesterday I repeated several times what I would do, and I urged consumers to be careful. Today, I am very pleased with the request made by my colleague at the Department of Fisheries and Oceans, and also with the Government's announcement that it will make the same agency responsible for both food and drug inspection.

REQUEST THAT CODE NUMBERS ON CANS OF TUNA BE PUBLISHED

Mrs. Thérèse Killens (Saint-Michel-Ahuntsic): Mr. Speaker, even if the cans of tainted tuna are withdrawn from store shelves, I want to ask the Minister whether he at least intends to publish the code numbers on the cans.

Hon. Michel Côté (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): My answer is simply that it has always been our concern to protect the consumer. We have carefully followed all developments in this debate, and we are satisfied with the procedures and with the decisions that were made in the best interests of Canadian consumers.

[English]

GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. John R. Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Yesterday the Prime Minister said: "This Government always resolves any doubt in favour of Canadians". The Minister of Fisheries and Oceans on television last Tuesday said that he had to make a decision on this tuna problem and he gave the benefit of the doubt to the company.

Can the Prime Minister tell this House—and he was supportive of the decision of the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans yesterday in the House—whose interest the Government is really protecting, the health and safety of Canadians, or of the companies?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I indicated yesterday that, should there be any doubt, that doubt would always be resolved in favour of the Canadian consumer. That is precisely what transpired at the request of the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans today.

PROTECTION INQUIRY

Mr. John R. Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is directed again to the Prime Minister. The Minister of Fisheries and Oceans said yesterday in this House that as a result of this whole episode he had invited industry to help revise the ground rules for inspections "I did not revise them—"

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Rodriguez: "—industry revised them".

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Preambles are not allowed to supplementary questions. A supplementary question, please.

Mr. Rodriguez: My question to the Pime Minister is this: whose interests, really, is the Government trying to protect, those of the company? Are you protecting ordinary Canadians, or is this an ordinary way to run a country?

Mr. Fraser: Mr. Speaker—

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): I am sorry, I did not see my colleague rise, but his answer would be the same as mine.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Mulroney: The only interest involved is the interest of the taxpayer and of ordinary Canadians.

Oral Questions

MULTICULTURALISM

GOVERNMENT PRIORITY

Mr. Bob Pennock (Etobicoke North): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of State for Multiculturalism. There have been some recent concerns expressed to me by various ethnic organizations in my riding that the Government is no longer giving the multiculturalism portfolio the priority it deserves. Their concern focuses on the fact that the new Minister of State for Multiculturalism has a dual portfolio instead of a single portfolio as was the case previously. I would ask that the Minister please address this concern and give his assurance that multiculturalism remains a priority with the Government.

Hon. Otto Jelinek (Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport) and Minister of State (Multiculturalism)): Mr. Speaker, it is typical that the concern for the ethnic community comes from a member of the Conservative Party rather than from the Opposition.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Jelinek: I compliment the Hon. Member for asking the question. In answering it, however, I can assure the Hon. Member and others that they can put that concern to rest. First, dual ministries are not new. Second, this Government over the past 12 months has laid a strong foundation on which to build, including the devleopment and establishment of a permanent Standing Committee on Multiculturalism.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, it is a total and absolute commitment, dedication and sensitivity to this area by, myself and the Government, which will guarantee success. We will reach out, Mr. Speaker, to 8 million Canadians of ethnic origin like never before.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Order.

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL CONFERENCE

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): Mr. Speaker, if we take those words as reality, could the Minister still get up in his place and tell the House why the First Ministers' Conference was void of any results? And why did the Government cut the budget by 9 per cent? If that was a priority, it would not have cut the Budget. Could the Minister please answer that question?

An Hon. Member: Right on.

Hon. Otto Jelinek (Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport) and Minister of State (Multiculturalism)): Mr. Speaker, those Hon. Members have been sleeping for the last three weeks. They have finally come on board after my colleague has asked the question. The answer is simple. My predecessor, for the first time ever, was able to hold a federal-provincial Ministers' conference. Work from that conference is going to come to the Standing Committee on Multiculturalism—

Ms. Copps: Where is the 9 per cent?

Mr. Jelinek: —and I look forward to this member's participation. As far as the reductions are concerned, the Hon. Member will be very happy to know that we have already increased the budget of multiculturalism and we will proceed on that basis.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: The Hon. Member for Trinity. Is the Hon. Member rising to ask a supplementary question?

Mr. Marchi: I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker.

SIZE OF BUDGET

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): If the multiculturalism budget has been increased, then it is news, not only to this side, but to the other side as well, because last April that budget—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Hon. Member indicated he had a supplementary question.

Mr. Marchi: Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a very simple question. By how much was the budget increased, and when?

Hon. Otto Jelinek (Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport) and Minister of State (Multiculturalism)): Mr. Speaker, it appears to me that there is "Panic City" across the floor on the other side.

Now that the Hon. Member has finally woken up in his seat, I invite him to come to the Standing Committee where I will explain the details of the whole thing.

AIR CANADA

DEATH OF PASSENGER ON FLIGHT TO TORONTO

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina West): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Transport. As he knows, flight attendants are responsible to be aware of and continue to pay attention to the well-being of passengers abroad the aircraft. Is the Minister aware that on an Air Canada flight which arrived in Toronto nine days ago, a passenger who was taken on board in a wheel chair as a debilatated passenger, passed away during the flight, and the attendants did not notice and were not aware of the passenger's death until it was time to take him off the aircraft in a wheel chair?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I have not been made aware of the subject to which the Hon. Member refers. As he knows, there were some 72 alleged infractions which were submitted by the CALFAA organization. Most of those have been investigated. There are still 16 which are undergoing further consideration but I will certainly undertake a look into the incident to which the Hon. Member has referred.

Mr. Benjamin: I hope that passenger didn't eat any tuna.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some Hon. Members: Shame.

Mr. Speaker: No comment. A supplementary question.

FLIGHT ATTENDANTS' STRIKE—APPOINTMENT OF MEDIATOR

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina West): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Minister if he does not now agree that the situation of amateurs operating cabin crews on Air Canada has gone on long enough and the issue should be resolved with the immediate appointment, as requested by CALFAA, of a mediator, and more stringent enforcement of the regulations by the Minister's Department?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I can advise the Hon. Member and the House that my colleague, the Minister of Labour, has indeed appointed a mediator this afternoon. He has announced the appointment of Roland Doucet as mediator pursuant to Section 195 of the Canada Labour Code.

I can assure my hon. friend that the surveillance and monitoring of safety standards is ongoing. As I indicated to him earlier, it has been beefed up substantially.

BANKS AND BANKING

CANADIAN COMMERCIAL BANK COLLAPSE—SEIZURE OF ASSETS IN CALIFORNIA

Miss Aideen Nicholson (Trinity): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of State for Finance.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Gauthier: Don't be so happy.

Miss Nicholson: The Government has lead us to understand that the Bank of Canada has first claim on all the assets of the Canadian Commercial Bank, but U.S. regulators have seized $255 worth of CCB assets in California and are quoted as taking the position that California residents will have first claim. Can the Minister tell us what steps are being taken to protect Canadian interests?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, let me say that the first protection for Canadian interests is that we do not spread around misinformation picked up at lunch at the Toronto Club.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Frith: What about the Albany Club?

Mrs. McDougall: What has happened in California is a routine matter of regulation in that the Superintendent of Banks of the State of California took steps to take possession of property. Officials of the Bank of Canada are in touch with the state regulators. Our position continues and the Bank's position continues to be that Canadian interests are covered.

Mr. Gauthier: By whom?

UNITED STATES FEDERAL RESERVE BOARD REPORT

Miss Aideen Nicholson (Trinity): Mr. Speaker, the Minister has said that she is trying to get the U.S. regulators to make available to this House their report of February 20 on the Canadian Commercial Bank.

An official of the Federal Reserve Board in Washington has been quoted as saying that she has not yet had a request. Could the Minister explain just what is happening?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, with reference to the request to the U.S. regulator, the article that appeared in the press today was surprisingly based on invalid information. Concerning that inquiry, I will read the telex response, and I am prepared to table it, Mr. Speaker. It reads:

> The report of examination is the central tool of the supervisory process in the United States. It contains the findings of the examination, including information about specific assets and borrowers and criticisms of various aspects of an institution's operations. Confidentiality of the document is intended to respect the private business affairs of individual customers—
> Accordingly, it is the policy of the Federal Reserve not to accede to requests from outside parties—

That was confirmed by telephone this morning. We are continuing to pursue other channels.

SPACE WEAPONRY

UNITED STATES STRATEGIC DEFENCE INITIATIVE—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Ms. Pauline Jewett (New Westminster-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. On September 7, the Prime Minister made what appeared to be a very clear statement about Canada and star wars. The Prime Minister stated that it would not be in Canada's interests for the Government of Canada to participate in SDI research.

Since then the Deputy Prime Minister has totally muddied the waters. Will the Prime Minister take this opportunity to restate that policy and tell us in no uncertain terms that if government agencies and Departments, such as the National Research Council, the RCMP, and research centres in Defence and Communications, are asked to assist or invited to join in star wars work by the SDI office in Washington, they will decline and join the Prime Minister and say no?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I indicated on September 7 that the policy of the Government of Canada was that we did not feel participation on a Government to Government basis was in the interests of Canada or Canadians, and that it might inhibit the exercise at all times of an independent foreign policy, which is exactly the primary interest of the Government of Canada. That is why we said no on a Government to Government basis. I thought that was in the interests of Canada.

This is still a democracy, as the Deputy Prime Minister has pointed out—

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Mulroney: —well, relatively speaking.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Mulroney: I thought the Deputy Prime Minister set out the other criteria fairly and well.

NATIONAL RESEARCH COUNCIL INQUIRY

Ms. Pauline Jewett (New Westminster-Coquitlam): Fairly well, my foot.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Ms. Jewett: The Deputy Prime Minister has suggested that the National Research Council getting involved in star wars research would not involve the Government of Canada, Mr. Speaker.

Is the Prime Minister saying to the House that the National Research Council, the RCMP, the research centres in Defence and Communications are free to become involved with the SDI office in Washington? This is what we are confused about. Would the Prime Minister, not the Deputy Prime Minister, make it quite clear that they must not be involved, consistent with his policy on SDI?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Hon. Erik Nielsen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of National Defence): The Hon. Member is going to get the Deputy Prime Minister whether she wants to or not, Mr. Speaker.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Hnatyshyn: So much for your foot.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Nielsen: What she has said in her preamble is utterly false. I have said it before and I say it again that, as research projects come up involving the continued co-operation that we enjoy with the United States in this field, and hopefully they will grow, we will determine whether or not to proceed on any individual project on the basis of Canadian priorities and Canadian objectives.

Ms. Jewett: You are saying yes to star wars.

REGIONAL INDUSTRIAL EXPANSION

EMPLOYMENT OPPORTUNITIES IN CAPE BRETON

Mr. Lawrence I. O'Neil (Cape Breton Highlands-Canso): Mr. Speaker, this week more than 150 employees of Cape Breton's heavy water plants were laid off. Tomorrow and over the weekend I will meet some of these people. My question is for the Minister of Regional Industrial Expansion. What can I tell these people when they ask if there will be new employment opportunities in the region?

An Hon. Member: Nothing.

Mr. Riis: Rely on the market-place.

Hon. Sinclair Stevens (Minister of Regional Industrial Expansion): Mr. Speaker, in reply to the Hon. Member, I am sure he will be very pleased to learn that since we indicated our new Cape Breton initiatives we have had over 400 inquiries. To date we have made 90 offers aggregating several millions of dollars. If all the offers are put in place with new businesses established it will result in over 500 jobs being created in Cape Breton.

In addition to that, we have 51 major projects defined as projects under review that could produce employment for 100 people or will involve over $2 million. Those projects would create thousands of jobs in Cape Breton. Cape Breton has never had such a job creating effort before.

REQUEST FOR DETAILS ON LOANS MADE BY AGENCY OF CANADIAN COMMERCIAL BANK IN SANTA ANA

Mr. Raymond Garneau (Laval-des-Rapides): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance or the Minister of State for Finance.

According to information contained in public documents released by the California Banking Commission, the Santa Ana Canadian Commercial Bank branch had outstanding loans of $396 million on its books as at December 31, 1984 and, on June 30, the loans totalled only $165 million, a decrease of $232 million U.S., or roughly $300 million in Canadian dollars.

Can the Minister tell us what happened to those loans? Were they transferred to other Canadian Commercial Bank branches?

[English]

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, I would like to point out that the first order released on the Canadian Commercial Bank, its agency and its subsidiary bank in California from the regulatory authorities, came in February, 1984.

I am not sure where I was then precisely, but I know I was not here. I think the question around the transfer of assets could be addressed to some of the Hon. Member's former colleagues since the activity in those agencies started long before my time.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

MINISTER'S KNOWLEDGE OF THE FACTS

Mr. Raymond Garneau (Laval-des-Rapides): A supplementary, Mr. Speaker.

Am I to understand that the Minister is telling us that between January 1, 1985 and June 30, 1985, when the bank was bailed out, when the fiasco really began, she did not know and still does not know where the loans went, who got the loans, or even whether they were repaid? Mr. Speaker, how can we possibly launch a proper investigation in committee if the Minister does not know anything at all about a situation where she did ante up $1 billion of Canadian taxpayers' money?

[English]

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, if there is anybody who has not ignored the situation, it is myself. We have indicated to the Hon. Member, to his colleagues, and to our other colleagues across the aisle, that we are prepared to discuss this matter in full in committee. I am really looking forward to that discussion.

SYDNEY STEEL CORPORATION—GOVERNMENT FUNDING

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Regional Industrial Expansion. Yesterday an announcement was made with regard to the Sydney Steel Corporation indicating that the federal Government was willing to co-operate in some development there. When will the Government commit itself to complete funding of Phase II and, in doing so, will it make some commitment that Canadian railways, CN especially, will be ordering their rail lines from Sydney Steel?

Hon. Sinclair Stevens (Minister of Regional Industrial Expansion): Mr. Speaker, as the Hon. Member undoubtedly knows, I met with Premier Buchanan yesterday. Among other things, we discussed the situation at Sysco. We received the updated Hatch report concerning Sysco. We reviewed its recommendations and felt that they were quite positive. In the context of those recommendations, we have agreed in principle to come to an agreement which will hopefully affect the recommendations in the Hatch report, and an announcement should be made within a few weeks.

MODERNIZATION OF PLANT

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the same Minister. Will a commitment be made by the Government to complete funding of the Phase II modernization of that plant, or will we have more years of delay and indecision as we had under the Liberals?

Hon. Sinclair Stevens (Minister of Regional Industrial Expansion): Mr. Speaker, obviously the Hon. Member was concentrating on his supplementary question without listening to what I said. When he has an opportunity to read Hansard, I think he will see that a very definitive, positive answer was given.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT

DESIGNATION OF AREAS IN ALBERTA UNDER FEDERAL DEVELOPMENT PROGRAMS

Mr. Jack Shields (Athabasca): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Regional Industrial Expansion. He will know that the national energy policy of the former Government devastated the economy of the Province of Alberta with resulting high unemployment. Has the Minister taken action to designate areas of Alberta as tier 2 areas so that they may qualify for the Government's economic development programs?

Hon. Sinclair Stevens (Minister of Regional Industrial Expansion): Mr. Speaker, I am sure the Hon. Member is aware of how the tier 2 and other designations are determined. We have the entire tier system under review. He will be pleased to know that under the existing ERDA program a subagreement affecting his area will likely be entered into very soon, and I think the area residents will find it very beneficial.

CANADIAN COMMERCIAL BANK COLLAPSE—REPORT OF AUDIT OFFER

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (Saint-Henri-Westmount): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of State for Finance. I have listened to, and I have read her answers in Hansard. She is becoming a master at circumlocution and stonewalling. There is one fact which will do much to clarify the situation. Why did she or the Minister of Finance, or the Prime Minister, refuse the offer of a special audit from Canadian chartered banks, which could have avoided this entire disastrous situation? Why was it refused?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, I see that the St. James Club has the same kind of misinformation as the Toronto Club.

Ms. Copps: How about the Albany Club?

Mrs. McDougall: At least the Albany Club lets in women.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mrs. McDougall: I believe some senior bankers stated publicly yesterday that there were some bankers looking at the portfolio. I have never indicated otherwise and have denied nothing.

MINISTER'S POSITION

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (Saint-Henri-Westmount): There was not much substance to that answer, Mr. Speaker. Will the Minister reacquire some credibility and respect by at least confirming in the House a rumour, which is now commonly held on the street and elsewhere, that she and the Minister of Finance refused to bail it out, probably wanted the special audit, but were overruled by the Prime Minister for purely political purposes? Will she confirm that here for our benefit and reacquire some respect?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, once again we are dealing with things which happen on other streets. We have been standing beside each other. This was a collective Government decision which we all reinforced, and it was reinforced by two provinces and the chartered banks. I do not know how many times I have to say that before the Hon. Member listens to what we are saying here instead of to what is happening out on the streets.

CANADIAN RADIO-TELEVISION AND TELECOMMUNICATIONS COMMISSION

REJECTION OF LONG DISTANCE TELEPHONE SERVICE APPLICATION

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Communications. After very extensive hearings, the CRTC turned down the application of CNCP Telecommunications to enter into the long distance telephone business in competition with existing systems. In view of that decision, why did the Minister send a document to Cabinet proposing that he be permitted to spend $1 million in a propaganda campaign to educate people on the advantages of deregulation?

[Translation]

Hon. Marcel Masse (Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, this document was submitted to Cabinet within the framework of a general review of the Canadian telecommunications policy and it was not issued the week following the application by the CNCP, but last winter. Indeed, it is within this framework that a federal-provincial conference will be held in mid-November to discuss the issue of telecommunications. This is not a propaganda document, but a document to promote consultation, and the amount put aside for it is largely to be used for research so that those who will have to make decisions, including the provinces, will be well-informed.

[English]

REQUEST THAT COMMISSION NOT BE OVERRULED

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, various groups, including provincial Governments, made representations in opposition to the application of CNCP.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Does the Hon. Member have a supplementary question?

Mr. Orlikow: Can the Minister give us assurances that he will not recommend overruling the decision of the CRTC?

[Translation]

Hon. Marcel Masse (Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, I have not yet received any notice of appeal from the CNCP in this matter.

IMMIGRATION

CONDITIONS UNDER WHICH REFUGEES DETAINED—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mrs. Lucie Pépin (Outremont): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Immigration.

For the last few days in Montreal, refugees have been on a hunger strike at the Ville Saint-Laurent Detention Centre.

Yesterday, three refugees were involved in a fight. Two were sent to Parthenais and the third was wounded. These people are protesting against detention conditions which do not meet the minimal standards of the United Nations.

What does the Minister intend to do about this urgent situation which will soon turn into a riot.

[English]

Hon. Walter McLean (Minister of State (Immigration)): Mr. Speaker, I assure the Hon. Member that I have been monitoring closely, with officials of the Department, the situation in the Montreal detention centre. As the Hon. Member will know, it was part of the study of the standing committee into detention centres. These centres were never intended for longer stays. At the moment I am informed that those who are being detained for longer periods receive regular medical care. The situation is quiet. There will be a meeting of support groups, those who are incarcerated, and officials within the next day or two.

[Translation]

Mrs. Pépin: I have a supplementary, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Please make it a very short supplementary.

INQUIRY WHETHER PROBLEM CAN BE SETTLED IN SITU

Mrs. Lucie Pépin (Outremont): I am very happy to learn that the meeting will take place, but I would also like to know whether the Immigration officials who will take part in this meeting will be able to solve the problems on the spot.

● (1500)

[English]

Hon. Walter McLean (Minister of State (Immigration)): Mr. Speaker, as the Hon. Member will know, a number of the problems were outlined in the Standing Committee's unanimous report which contains 22 recommendations. I will be reporting on those to the House in October. We have acted on some four or five of those recommendations relating to health, safety, and other provisions. We will be acting on the basis of that report immediately, and in fact even before the response is brought in.

CLERK OF PETITIONS' REPORTS

Mr. Speaker: I have the honour to inform the House that the petitions, with the exception of one presented by Hon. Members on Wednesday, September 18, 1985, meet the requirements of the Standing Orders as to form.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

WEEKLY STATEMENT

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the Government House Leader (Mr. Hnatyshyn) if he can outline the business of the House that he intends to call over the coming several days.

Hon. Ray Hnatyshyn (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity of informing the House of the agenda. Hon. Members will know that we have now had a long and interesting debate on Bill C-70, an Act to amend the Family Allowances Act. This matter has received the attention of the House and I am anticipating that it can go to committee where it can receive the—

Mr. Speaker: With great respect, I hesitate to interrupt the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Hnatyshyn), but it is almost impossible for Hon. Members who are interested in the answer to the question on the business of the House to hear it. Could I ask those who are having conversations if they might conduct them somewhere else?

Mr. Hnatyshyn: As I was saying, Mr. Speaker, I think that Bill C-70, now having received a very thorough discussion, should make progress and get to a legislative committee where there will be an opportunity for Hon. Members to investigate the details of the legislation as well as to speak in a meaningful way to the principles involved.

We are intending to call Bills C-67 and C-68 which deal with the Parole Act and the Penitentiaries Act. Hon. Members will know that these two Bills are being debated together and will go to one legislative committee. I understand that there will be a very brief debate on those Bills. I am so informed and do really believe that there are not very many more speakers.

As well, I would like to bring forward Bill C-74, an Act to amend the Constitution Act, 1867, and the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act, again with a view to having this matter referred to a committee so that we can examine the various dimensions of the legislation and call witnesses to make sure that Members of Parliament from all sides of the House have a full opportunity to examine the proposal which I put forward. You will recall, Mr. Speaker, that I put that draft Bill before the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections last June and that that committee had a chance to look at the draft legislation before I brought it forward.

In addition, Bill C-55, an Act to amend the Immigration Act, will be brought forward. I would like to see what progress we make with these Bills. This would be the sequence of Bills as I see it for the foreseeable future unless there are circumstances that lead me to change the order of business. It may be, for example, that in the course of the next few days, we will be able to bring forward the motion with respect to the reference to the Finance Committee of the bank matter and I would hope that we can get that done at an early date so that the work of the committee can be organized and all Members will have an opportunity of examining in detail the circumstances leading up to the statement made by the Minister of State for Finance (Mrs. McDougall) on September 1.

POINT OF ORDER

WITHDRAWAL OF NOTICE OF MOTION FOR ADJOURNMENT UNDER S.O. 31

Mr. Ian Deans (Hamilton Mountain): Mr. Speaker, on a separate point of order, I would like to ask your permission to withdraw a notice that I filed with you earlier this day requesting an emergency debate. The response by the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Fraser) and the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) today that the defective fish will be withdrawn from the shelves of all stores satisfied the requirements that I had sought to have satisfied.

SOCIAL SECURITY

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL AGREEMENT

Hon. Jake Epp (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, we have all recognized that one of the major problems facing the country today is the number of Canadians on welfare rolls who are ready, willing and able to work. This fact cannot be measured simply in financial terms. It must also take into account the human price that is paid by too large a number of Canadians who are forced into this situation. I am pleased to report that I have concluded an agreement with my colleague, the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Miss MacDonald), and with our colleagues from all the provinces and Territories on action that we shall take together to break this deadly cycle of welfare dependency. Together we are going to provide hope and encouragement to these people, but above all we are creating for them the opportunities they deserve.

Two of the seven points of the agreement refer to programs that are the responsibility of my colleague, the Minister of Employment and Immigration. I will give a brief explanation of each of them. First, we agreed to specify participation levels for social assistance recipients in the Canadian jobs strategy. This is in response to a long-standing concern of the provinces that employable people receiving social assistance have not been getting their fair share of places in the employment programs of Employment and Immigration Canada.

Employable social assistance recipients make up about 30 per cent of the total unemployed population. By contrast, rough estimates suggest that employable social assistance recipients did not make up 30 per cent of the participants in CEIC programs under the previous Government. It is this situation that we have agreed to address.

Of the six components of the Canadian jobs strategy, three can potentially benefit employable social assistance recipients. They are job entry for those entering the labour force, targeted mainly on youth and women; job development, targeted mainly on the disadvantaged, and the innovations program fund for pilot projects. I will deal with this component in more detail in a moment.

Our objective in negotiating the agreement was to ensure that employable social assistance recipients would have access to a share of Canadian jobs strategy funds that reflects their representation among the jobless. At the same time, we recognize the importance of maintaining flexibility in setting participation levels, both by province and by component, of the Canadian jobs strategy.

Under the agreement, my colleague and I will negotiate appropriate participation levels with each province and Territory to take effect April 1, 1986. Second, we agree to use a portion of the innovations program funds for pilot projects aimed at enhancing the employability of social assistance recipients. We did this because we recognized that many social assistance recipients face multiple barriers to securing employment and hence gaining self-sufficiency. Traditional welfare programs have not been designed to address the problem of enhancing the employability of their clientele. It is important, therefore, that we experiment with ways of doing this and test their efficacy through actual pilot projects in the field. Specific proposals for the use of innovations program funds will be ready by the end of the year, based on discussions among my officials, those of my colleague and those of provincial and territorial Ministries.

Before going on to areas dealing with my Department, I would like to give a special note of thanks to my colleague, the Minister of Employment and Immigration, because of the work that she has done with the provinces and the Territories and the negotiations that she has undertaken almost from the very first day this Government took office. It is work that is starting to show results, and I commend her for that today.

The Minister of Employment and Immigration is not in the House at this point because she is in my home province participating with the provincial Government of Manitoba on a further job-creation program, namely the Limestone Program. That is the reason that rather than being in the House of Commons, she is in an important place like my home province, to work further with the provinces.

Mr. Frith: She should be in Sudbury.

Mr. Epp (Provencher): The rest of the points refer to one of the most important programs of my Department, the Canada Assistance Plan. This is the program that supports Canada's social safety net by sharing with the provinces the cost of Canada's network of social assistance and social services. Since its inception in 1967, the Canada Assistance Plan or CAP has fulfilled its mandate to provide financial assistance and social services to Canadians who are in need. Our review of the program has shown that however well it may be fulfilling its basic task of maintaining persons who are on social assistance it does not give us all the tools necessary to assist those persons in getting off social assistance and into stable, rewarding, long-term employment.

The new approaches outlined in this agreement will go a long way toward making CAP a program that not only assists people but helps them develop the skills and experience to assist themselves. The first of these new approaches involves the question of disincentives. These vary from province to province, but we have discovered that the guidelines of the program have sometimes worked to make work or training less attractive than remaining on social assistance. A primary example of these disincentives was the requirement to deduct 100 per cent of all training allowances from welfare cheques. These allowances, which were designed to help meet the additional expenditures involved in following a training course and to serve as an incentive for people considering taking such courses, meant nothing to social assistance recipients because for each dollar of training allowance they received they lost a dollar of social assistance. Under this agreement, that will not be the case.

Another example is the non-cash benefits that are often so important to persons on social assistance, such as free prescription drugs, medicare premiums, dental care, eyeglasses, just to name some. These usually stopped as soon as a person took a job or entered a training course. This was often a major disincentive. Under this new agreement, provinces will be able to eliminate this disincentive and still maintain cost sharing under CAP.

The second new approach involving the Canada Assistance Plan is one that I consider a major improvement in our ability to use the money now being spent for social assistance in a positive fashion to permit Canadians on social assistance to assist themselves. This is so important that I would like to read point 5 of our agreement, with the indulgence of the House:

In addition to item 1 above—

—that is the one to negotiate the bilateral agreements between the provinces, the Territories, and the federal Government.

—to expand opportunities for social assistance recipients to participate in training and employment by permitting provinces, who wish to do so, to refer social assistance recipients to Canada Jobs Strategy programs or similar provincial programs, and also to transfer to those programs those funds that the provinces would have spent on social assistance payments to those programs. The federal Government will then transfer an equal amount of money, which would have been paid under the Canada Assistance Plan as the federal share of the social assistance payment, to the programs involved.

The design, eligibility criteria, administrative requirements and evaluation methodology relating to these new arrangements will be developed by November 30, 1985, and the impact of this initiative will be reviewed in three years.

The money now allocated for social assistance can only be used for that purpose. This restriction exists for a very good purpose. This money is meant to provide for the basic needs of people who cannot support themselves. If people are in need their needs must be met and no conditions can be attached to that assistance. In particular, they cannot be required to perform work as a condition of receiving that aid. CAP does not permit "workfare". This principle is one of the most important principles of the Canada Assistance Plan, it will be maintained, and I want to stress that point.

What will be changed is the rigidities in our system of funding that prohibit funds now used to maintain a person on social assistance from being used to defray the costs of those programs that will provide that person with job skills and work experience. The Canadian jobs strategy provides precisely the kind of programming required by employable persons now on social assistance.

The first point of our agreement, increased targeting of these programs for social assistance recipients, will help. However, we want to make even more of this programming, or similar provincial programmings, available to our clients. To this end my provincial colleagues, the Minister of Employment and Immigration and I have agreed to use jointly moneys that would have been used to maintain a person on social assistance to pay the costs of the work experience programs that will enable him or her to get off assistance.

The mechanism is straightforward. The results may be profound and the costs will be no more than that of current programming. When an individual social assistance recipient is eligible for and volunteers for an employability program that promises to be of benefit, the province and the federal Government will direct to that program the money that would have been spent to maintain that individual on social assistance.

The idea is simple. The effect on the client will be vastly increased opportunities for self-sufficiency. There is no coercion, simply increased opportunity. There is no increase in cost, simply a more creative and positive use of existing funds.

The fourth component of this strategy initiates federal-provincial pilot projects to evaluate new approaches that would promote self-sufficiency of social assistance recipients who face multiple employment barriers. This initiative, funded on a cost shared basis, will involve CEIC in the screening, approving and monitoring of projects to eliminate duplication of those already funded under the CJS innovation fund. Vigorous evaluation techniques will of course be established and results of such evaluations will be shared with all Governments concerned.

Finally, my colleague and I and our provincial and territorial counterparts agreed to collaborate on improving the flow of information and on evaluating our programs and, most important of all, on maintaining the "four-cornered" consultative approach. This four-cornered consultative approach, linking my Department, the Department of Employment and Immigration and provincial and territorial social services and employment Departments is the basis for the virtually unprecedented co-operation that produced our agreement. Its continuation is essential if we are to achieve lasting benefits for people on social assistance.

In conclusion, I would say that this agreement proves the value of open federal-provincial and territorial co-operation. All levels of Government are deeply involved with this issue; it does not bear on one single jurisdiction. The agreement we have made will increase the chances for welfare recipients to break their dependency on social assistance and to find self-sufficiency in stable employment. Together, Governments are going to create opportunities and real encouragement for welfare recipients to participate. The Ontario Minister of Community and Social Services, the Hon. John Sweeney, has described this as "An historic and giant step forward". It is indeed, and I want to thank all members of the House for taking the time to listen to me.

Hon. Douglas C. Frith (Sudbury): Mr. Speaker, first of all, may I begin where the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Epp) left off when he indicated that the new Minister of Community and Social Services for the Province of Ontario indeed called this an historic moment, an historic agreement and a giant step forward for all of us who are in the profession of politics and are here to serve our own citizens.

That comes as no surprise to me because I know that in years past when we have attempted as the federal Government, when the Liberal Party was in power, to reach similar types of agreements, we often found that it was the Conservative Party in Toronto that was the stumbling block to a lot of improvements under the Canada Pension Plan and under the Canada Assistance Plan, and therefore it does come as no surprise to me that the new Liberal Government in Ontario has agreed to sign this document and bring forward this kind of imaginative proposal.

I also wish to point out that the Quebec Minister for Social Affairs, Mrs. Pauline Marois, stated yesterday that this came as the result of the efforts of her Government and that it is clearly an idea which originated in Quebec. I mentioned that because when Mrs. Monique Bégin was Minister of National Health and Welfare, she began with her Quebec counterpart implementing the programs that we have seen today.

• (1520)

I, too, would like to join in congratulating the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Epp) for having reached this type of accord with his provincial counterparts. Politics aside, I think all of us recognize that there were great stumbling blocks under the Canada Assistance Plan. Those stumbling blocks were not only costing the provincial Governments and the federal Government large sums of money, but they were also taking away the opportunity from a number of families to engage in a meaningful pursuit of work. As a result of this type of agreement, I hope that we will be able to find meaningful jobs for those who have found themselves in the vicious cycle of welfare in order to have a meaningful role to play in our society.

I hope that the Minister will take my remarks in the context of being a beneficial criticism of the proposals in his program in which I feel he may find some blockages. I hope that the Minister can overcome them.

First and foremost, we have learned over the last several years that Governments often bring in programs designed for certain target client groups. Those programs fail mainly because we cannot reach the client groups which we were attempting to reach. I hope the Minister will inform the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Miss MacDonald) to be aware of the difficulty in reaching those target groups, particularly with respect to the target groups which fall under the Canada Assistance Plan.

Second, I hope that the Minister of National Health and Welfare will inform the Minister of Employment and Immigration that we on this side of the House have a great many concerns with respect to the job-creation strategy that will be brought forward to target the group which is presently on welfare and which comes under the Canada Assistance Plan. I say that because if one takes a look at the number of unemployed in our country and the number of people who are on welfare, it will be seen that all of those people are not found in the urban centres of our country. A great many of them are in the hinterland regions. I am concerned that in the job-creation strategy which the Minister of Employment and Immigration put forward earlier this year with respect to Summer Works many of the regional incentives are being taken out of those programs. Thus, Atlantic Canada, northern Ontario, northern Quebec and rural Quebec do not have access to some of the manpower programs which people living in urban centres have. As a result, many people who are in the target group will not benefit from this type of program, if the same type of job-creation strategy as used in the past is used now. I hope that the Minister will make sure that concern is brought to the attention of the Minister of Employment and Immigration.

I also hope that in the job-creation strategy a great deal of attention will be paid to the ability of municipal Governments to create jobs for which welfare recipients could well be targeted. That was not found under the previous programs of this year.

I hope that the Minister of National Health and Welfare will recall that there was an incentive program in which the private sector fueled the job-creation projets. I know that the Minister of Employment and Immigration has indicated the success which the program has met in certain parts of the country. I will not dispute the numbers here on the floor of the House of Commons. However, I will tell the Minister that that program was certainly a flop in other areas of the country. I am speaking of an area such as Sudbury, where there is a tremendous depression in the private sector. As a result of that economic depression in the private sector, we simply do not have private sector sponsors ready to go out and create jobs. In those areas of the country in which that economic fact is evident, municipal governments, boards of education—the public sector—were not allowed to get their projects up on the drawing boards to create those jobs for the people we are trying to target here. I hope that point will be brought to the attention of the Minister.

I ask the Minister of National Health and Welfare to take this matter one step further. He knows, as do all of us in this Chamber who have been in politics for any number of years, whether it is at the municipal, provincial or federal levels, that we recognize the problem of lifetime welfare. That is a problem which is not found in just one area of the country. Every one of us as Members of Parliament has these client groups within our constituencies. Therefore, what I am about to say has a great deal to do with what I hope this historic accord can do to aid one other situation which has been pointed out in the House in the last ten days.

As the Minsiter is aware, the Minister of Employment and Immigration was instrumental in the creation of this accord. A great many of the programs will be administered by her Department with money which will come out of the budget of the Department of National Health and Welfare. I would like to use Sudbury as an example to illustrate my point. Ten months ago, the Minister of Employment and Immigration introduced rule changes to the Unemployment Insurance Act which would, as of January 1, 1986, count severance payments and pension payments as part of the entitlement to unemployment insurance benefits. As a result of that, there will be fewer incentives for workers to take early retirement.

The Sudbury example brings home the truth. I can tell Hon. Members that in the City of Sudbury, this year, the municipal welfare budget is the highest it has ever been in its history. Part of the reason for that will be compounded by the changes to the Unemployment Insurance Act. Now that there will be fewer incentives for those who are older to take an early retirement package, the unions and the companies will be left with no choice but to lay off the younger workers. This will affect people with 10 to 12 years of seniority who are around 40 years of age. These people will have to go on the unemployment rolls for the next year. At the end of the 52 weeks, unless some alternative job is created for them, their only alternative for living is to go on welfare.

It seems to me that, with the degree of co-operation exhibited by the provincial Governments and the federal Government which can bring forward this type of accord, surely the same type of co-operation and open-ended thinking can lead the Minister of National Health and Welfare to convince the Minister of Employment and Immigration to change the proposed uses of the UI funds. I say this without any desire to make political debating points on the floor. That type of change would place another 1,200 people on to the welfare rolls. If the intent of the accord is to reduce the number of people on welfare, I welcome it.

I point out to the Minister that there are other measures being taken by the Government which run counter to this type of accord. I hope he can convince his Cabinet colleague to undertake those necessary changes under the unemployment insurance rules so that we in Sudbury do not end up with more people on welfare. I use Sudbury as an example only because I represent that constituency and I know it well. I have colleagues on all sides of the House who have indicated to me that they have people who face the same situation in their ridings.

Last, but not least, I wish to indicate to the Minister that most of us in the political field welcome this type of accord which has been signed. I hope that in the coming days and months the implementation of the strategy will be successful in eliminating a number of people from the welfare rolls in each municipality across the country. I congratulate the Minister of National Health and Welfare for being part of this historic accord.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Ms. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I would also like to commend the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Epp) on the intent and the changes which have been proposed in co-operation with the provinces to make training and job opportunities more accessible to persons who are on social assistance. Of course, it is essential that programs and policies be integrated in a far more flexible way so that people are not caught between the provincial, federal and territorial jurisdictions with little choice but to remain on welfare. We can think of many examples of how this has happened in the past. I would also mention the local jurisdictions when we speak about day care, which is also part of the needed program.

I would mention to both my colleagues who have just spoken that I think we need to be careful in terms of how we refer to people who are unfortunate enough to be on social assistance. The words we use to describe them are important. I heard them referred to as client groups, et cetera. We must be careful, even though we are sometimes talking in technical terms, that we do not put a label on people who are on welfare and, in that way, perpetuate a stigma which exists and which is often being promoted in the larger society. I know many people feel like second class citizens and they should not. Social assistance is one of our security programs and it is their right when they have no other option.

As a person who practised social work for many years and as someone who has worked with many low-income people in my own community, I have never met a person who really wanted to be on social assistance. Most people would far prefer to have a job at a decent rate of pay and be independent. Unfortunately, jobs are either not available or they are so low paid that a person cannot support a family and so they have no alternative but to seek social assistance. In many cases as well a person may have been unemployed for such a long time, or not have been in the job market at all, that they lack the skills and confidence to compete in the open market. Here again it is easy for people to deliberately speak about people on welfare who do not want to work. That is not the case. It may be that sometimes they need further support and training, but they certainly need jobs. People on welfare have such abominably low incomes that it is hard enough to feed and clothe their families and pay the rent; they certainly have no money left to spend on transportation looking for work. As well, most of them do not have the kinds of clothes needed to seek work or get into the work-force. There are many things which inhibit and discourage people and make them feel depressed.

I think social assistance should be used in a positive way and I commend the Minister for this approach. I also commend him for indicating his opposition to what I think is commonly known as work for welfare schemes where persons are forced into almost any job to in effect pay for their welfare. That is a very negative kind of social policy and I am very glad we are all against that. We welcome moves to remove the disincentives which exist in the system and I hope the opportunity will be provided for people on welfare to move into training programs and federally-subsidized jobs. I hope that is what we are talking about. I am not altogether sure because the Minister did not spell out the job opportunities. It is essential that social assistance allowances be maintained while people are training or looking for work so I commend the Minister on these changes, as well as his colleagues in the various provinces and territories.

My main concern, Mr. Speaker, is that we must be sure there are training opportunities for people generally. We should not differentiate between those on welfare and others in this respect. The training opportunities must be realistic with respect to the education some people have as well as future job markets. I commend the Minister for these moves, but I hope that he makes sure there are the right kinds of training opportunities for people. There is nothing more discouraging for someone who has been on welfare or unemployed for a long time than to take a training program and, at the end, end up back in the welfare cycle again. However, that is what is going to happen if we do not have jobs at the end of a training program. Neither do we want people coming off welfare and competing for jobs by pushing someone else out. That is not going to solve anything. We really need many more jobs in the community.

I appeal to the Minister and his colleague, the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Miss MacDonald), to take a whole new look at an old area of work, that of community jobs. There are many, many examples in my community where literally thousands of people, particularly women who have been on welfare, got their first start through work in this area. They might have worked in one of the local food co-ops or in the local school or library. They might have started in child care services. While I never did really like the short-term nature or low rates of pay of the Manpower programs we used to have, I must say there is an advantage in these kinds of programs if they can be extended for people who have been on welfare. I know many hundreds of them living in public housing projects in my riding who have developed a lot of self-help services and shown they have the talent and potential, but they really need to be able to feed their families while doing this kind of thing. I have worked in situations in the past where these kinds of programs have been developed very aggressively and training has gone along with them. Many of the people involved have subsequently moved up into para-professional kinds of jobs.

I therefore ask the Minister to consider this as one area which is particularly suited to people who have been on social assistance, particularly mothers, many of them in their middle years, who are going to find it hard even with training to get into the competitive job market. People on welfare should be treated the same as other citizens, although I hasten to add that often certain kinds of pre-employment programs are necessary for people who have been unemployed for some time. We have a lot of figures to show that when people have been unemployed they begin to get more and more depressed. They soon begin to lose their confidence and blame themselves. It is not their fault. It is the system we have which really does not have enough jobs for the people who need and want them. We really have to give much greater emphasis to the job end of the problem if this program is going to work.

I would also like the Minister to consider, along with his provincial colleagues, whether there might be a more flexible use of social assistance or family allowance programs. There could be a type of family benefit program which would continue an allowance for children at the same rate, let us say, that they get while on social assistance, when a mother who is able to get a job inevitably finds it to be low paying, barely sufficient for a single person. I think a program like that would more than pay for itself because it would allow women to get off welfare and stay off.

Finally, I want to refer to the whole question of day care, which I noticed the Minister avoided. I thought he would be discussing that with the provinces as well. Many people are very concerned about this issue and they want to know if the Minister is or is not in favour of day care for profit as was reported recently in the Ottawa Citizen. Is he willing to take the Canada Assistance Plan money away from existing non-profit day care centres to give to profit-making commercial day care centres without creating any extra facilities? There is no way that we as taxpayers should subsidize commercial day care operators for a profit. Experience has shown that commercial day care centres often violate standards, pay staff indecent wages, have lower adult-child ratios, less enriching programs for the children, and less involvement of parents which is very essential. We cannot afford to use children for profit and I urge the Minister to go on record opposing this type of day care.

I also ask the Minister to speed up, if he can, the report of the task force on child care which, I am sure, will recommend a plan for affordable, accessible day care which is non-profit and which incidentally, is not part of our welfare system. I hope that we will consider that. In closing, I think that the proposed changes to make the Canada Assistance Plan more flexible are based on a sound premise and I commend the Minister and his colleagues. However, the goal of independence will only be achieved if there are jobs at the end of this so that people will not wind up on the welfare rolls again.

Mr. Gordon Towers (Parliamentary Secretary to Solicitor General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, question No. 380 will be answered today.

[Text]

Question No. 380—Mr. Murphy:

1. Since September 4, 1984, have any construction agreements been signed with the government under Section 5 of the Fair Wages and Hours of Labour Act and, if so (a) how many (b) what were the names of the parties (c) on what dates and, in each case, did the Government exempt the agreement from the provisions of paragraphs 3(1)(a) and (b) of the Act?

2. In which of the cases outlined in part 1, was the grant or payment made by statutory authority?

Mr. Len Gustafson (Parliamentary Secretary to Prime Minister): 1. None. 2. Not applicable.

[English]

Mr. Towers: Mr. Speaker, I ask that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The question enumerated by the Hon. Parliamentary Secretary has been answered. Shall the remaining questions stand?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I wish to inform the House that because of the Ministerial statement consideration of Government Orders will be extended by 35 minutes this day. Therefore, Private Members' Hour will begin at 5:35 o'clock p.m.

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Epp (Provencher) that Bill C-70, an Act to amend the Family Allowances Act, 1973, be now read a second time and referred to a Legislative Committee, and the amendment of Mr. Frith (p. 6625).

Hon. Jean Lapierre (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, I am delighted to have an opportunity to take part in this important and momentous debate on the future of Canada's family allowances program. I am sorry to see that the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Epp) had to leave, because he was really put to the test in recent months when he attempted to slash old age pensions and had to reverse his decision as a result of pressure from the public and from various quarters. Here he is now searching for a logical explanation to do exactly the same thing at the expense of families.

Mr. Speaker, I would suggest that the logical reasoning which prompted the Government to change its mind about old age security pensions should do similar wonders with respect to family benefits.

Mr. Speaker, estimates show that the net loss brought about by changes advocated in the Budget in the case of a family with an income of $15,000, for instance, will amount to $1,879. A family with a $35,000 annual income stands to lose $3,452, but another one earning $80,000 will lose only $1,125.

If that is what they want to call justice, it is injustice, nothing less. It is totally unacceptable that they should want to deprive low- and middle-income families of such social benefits. I see that my colleagues opposite are wondering just where the Government is leading them.

Mr. Speaker, you know very well that Canada needs a policy which supports the family and a rising birth rate. Young couples cannot feel overly enthusiastic when they think that the Government is abandoning them to face their family responsibilities, especially after hearing the Prime Minister say that those social programs were a sacred trust, that they need not fear since he would not tamper with them.

Mr. Speaker, we have witnessed umpteen attempts aimed at undermining our social programs. They tried that with old age security pensions, now they are launching an attack against family allowances. Next in line is unemployment insurance. Mr. Speaker, we have lost some of our faith in the promises of those men and women on the other side.

Let us get back to family allowances. I must tell you a little secret, Mr. Speaker. When I was still a young lad—I was raised in the Magdalen Islands, probably the poorest region of Canada—if my mother had not had her family allowance cheque she would have been unable to buy me the shoes and the various supplies I needed to go back to school.

Mr. Jourdenais: Otherwise he could not have become an MP.

Mr. Lapierre: One thing I can tell you, Mr. Speaker, is that the insignificant man from La Prairie (Mr. Jourdenais) should stop laughing and remember that some Canadian families did experience difficulties. Just because he came here with a big salary does not mean he should try to forget his modest background. Mr. Speaker, I am not anxious to ignore my humble background and leave the poor to fend for themselves. Just because we have managed to obtain the public's trust does not mean we should now leave the poor to their own devices. And that is exactly what the Hon. Member for La Prairie would have us do.

Mr. Speaker, I was saying that the family allowance cheque had a special significance. At the end of each month, when the children needed something at home, the family allowance cheque made all the difference. There are other Members who also look down on that sort of thing today, but I say that at this very moment, there are still millions of families in Canada that depend on their family allowance cheques. And I say it is unfair and inhuman to want to make cuts in the system and destroy it.

Mr. Speaker, whether it is a school bag or shoes or clothes to go back to school, I used to work at a corner store and a store where they sold men's and boy's wear, and I can assure you that in September, all those back-to-school items are paid for with family allowance cheques. Sure, all this is supposed to improve with the tax credit and tax exemptions, but let us stop putting our heads in the sand and start facing the facts. For most women in Canada, the only income they can call their own and spend as they wish is the family allowance cheque, even in families where the husband has a substantial income.

Mr. Speaker, that is why I believe family allowance payments are very important to the women and children of this country. For many Canadian families and women, this cheque may be the only cheque they get. It is the only money they have of their own to buy things for their children. You know this as well as I do, Mr. Speaker. So why does the Government want to take that away from them? That is what I find unconscionable! Mr. Speaker, I do not care what kind of advantages they are promising in the way of tax exemptions. You know that in most cases, it is not the wife who benefits.

And what about the tax credit? I can give you any number of examples of what happens when the tax credit cheque arrives. The husband uses it to buy a video and for any number of things, but the children do not get anything out of it. I will tell you why. Because the tax credit is a big cheque. You know, in most family budgets, there is always some pressing need, and whenever there are any really big debts, people say: Well, we will wait until my wife's tax credit comes in.

That is the problem. That is why the monthly cheque is so basically important, and I believe that no one can deprive Canadian women and families of this established right.

Mr. Speaker, we may see hundreds of women who will not dare admit this, but we all know the facts, and I am certain that you are aware of some cases yourself. This is what I would like the Members opposite to understand. As for their story of wanting to balance the budget, Mr. Speaker, we are not taken in. They want to balance the budget on the backs of women when they have lots of money for the Canadian Commercial Bank, which will cost us nearly $1 billion. That is not a problem! They have enough money to buy an icebreaker that will cost $500 million, including $30 million a year simply to operate, and they have the audacity to tell us that they cannot afford to help Canadian families. It is shocking, Mr. Speaker. As parliamentarians, I do not think that we can accept this. Mr. Speaker, we cannot accept to see money being wasted the way the Government does it. They spent $60 million to change the colour of the uniforms of the Armed Forces when some children do not even have any running shoes to go to school, when some children have nothing in their lunch boxes. What kind of morality do these people and this Government have? What sense of value do they have? What priorities do they have? Mr. Speaker, I think that it is time for those people to stop listening to the business sector and to start speaking to ordinary people. They should go and see the children as they enter the schools in the morning, not in the rich neighbourhoods, but where the real people live, and I am certain that they will find out in the schoolyards that the children do not have too many clothes on their backs. That is why, Mr. Speaker, this issue is so important. I am among those who benefited from the family allowances which my mother received. My school friends also benefited. If you take this away from the poor families, what will they have left? This is what we find unacceptable. You have enough money for everyone else, especially for the wealthy. You have enough money for big companies and for the oil companies. There are other Members in this House who will not admit it, but I am certain that family allowances made a difference in their own family. Salaries were not always what they are today, and I am certain that, if they had the honesty to admit it, they would say that it made a lot of difference. They have friends and they have families. Yet, they are taxing suffering, they are taxing medication, they are looking for money for all kinds of fantastic projects as long as they preserve the Prime Minister's image. But when we are dealing with issues as fundamental as the family, they say that they are very concerned about traditional values, Mr. Speaker. What kind of society do we want to build? Is it now more important to make sure that the Prime Minister looks good than to encourage the Canadian family? God knows, Mr. Speaker, that I am not a traditionalist! Yet, I would say that, when such basic values are involved, the politicians have no right to ignore them and to listen blindly to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Wilson) and the Prime Minister and be party to an injustice. There is no partisanship in my comments, Mr. Speaker. This legislation is simply unacceptable, whether you are blue, red, green or orange, because there are families in every political party.

Mr. Speaker, I invite my colleagues to reflect on this because one day children will blame them for their attitude.

[English]

Mr. Ernie Epp (Thunder Bay-Nipigon): Mr. Speaker, I rise to join in this debate on the six-month hoist motion with respect to Bill C-70, An Act to amend the Family Allowance Act. I am very happy to take part in this debate because it is absolutely essential that we use every opportunity we can to have this Bill set back in time and if the Government will not withdraw it, kill it by that means.

In explaining why I believe it is so necessary for this Bill to be killed, I want to say a little about the beginning of this session of Parliament. In November of 1984, I remember being in this building for the Throne Speech and going to the Senate Chamber to listen to the Governor General read the Throne Speech. I found myself just outside the doors with many other Hon. Members, including Cabinet Ministers. We were all listening carefully. At one point I looked over and saw the Minister of Finance (Mr. Wilson) who stood not more than six feet away. As the Governor General read the sentence, "That we must deal urgently with the deficit is beyond dispute", I glanced over at the Minister of Finance and raised my eyebrows because it is most certainly a matter which is open to dispute. He nodded his head portentously and I realized one of the realities about this Government. Whatever promises were given to the Canadian people in the summer of 1984, certain key people in this Government were convinced that the only way in which this country could advance toward prosperity was to take action on the deficit, no matter what.

As we walked back toward this Chamber, I seized the opportunity to meet the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Epp). As you will appreciate, Mr. Speaker, that had a special significance for me since I had not had the opportunity to shake his hand before and to chat briefly with him. We walked into the Chamber together and as we parted, I said, as one Epp to another, "Beware the cutters". It took a moment for that to register. The Minister laughed, as did the Tories around him. Ten months later, it is obvious, as it was obvious last spring, that that was no joke. In fact, the Minister of National Health and Welfare was going to be forced to yield to the "cutters" whatever his protestations.

It became clear, in fact, on May 23 that Bay Street had triumphed over Main Street, that River Heights and Tuxedo were socking it to Steinbach and Ste Anne. As I travelled early in July through southern Manitoba and areas in which I grew up, I wondered to myself what the people of Provencher must think about their Member of Parliament, the Minister who spoke so bravely in months past about what the Government was going to do, and who was forced into ignominious retreat with respect to the deindexation of family allowances. After all, in January, he published a consultation paper in which he suggested—and I read from page 6 of this booklet, the third principle which would govern any reconsideration of family benefits and old age pensions, and I quote:

> Any savings which may result from program changes will not be applied to a reduction of the deficit.

That was a bold and categorical statement. He had in fact invited Canadians and Members of Parliament to think with him about how we could ensure greater fairness in the distribution of benefits from these programs without disturbing the universality of family allowances and the Old Age Security pension.

It became all too sadly clear in his comments on Monday that he has been forced to yield this point. He went so far in fact as to straightforwardly present the savings which were going to be made in this area as a means of deficit reduction without any particular apology, nor any defence that I could see.

The Minister of National Health and Welfare said in his speech on Bill C-70, and I quote from Hansard on September 16, 1985 at page 6619:

> In the Budget of May 23, 1985, the Government, through the Minister of Finance (Mr. Wilson), announced its intention to restructure the federal child benefit system to provide greater assistance to families with lower incomes while at the same time moving to bring our national debt under control. This Bill represents a first step toward meeting those dual objectives.

That seems to me a very candid concession. What had been rejected in January as an option, what had been denied in the statement of the principals who govern the actions of the Government, had been abandoned under the pressure of the Minister of Finance. The Minister of National Health and Welfare went on in his speech to say:

> Many of those concerned about the problem of the debt and the deficit advised a more drastic course of action. Indeed, there are those who advocated that Government spending be reduced through the elimination of some of our social programs, and that includes family allowances.

That paragraph is an astonishing admission of the kinds of battles which appear to have been fought if not in caucus, then in Cabinet. There had been struggles to maintain something or other of the system. I suppose I should recognize that the Minister achieved something in maintaining what he has maintained, but there can be no doubt that the sacred trust of the summer of 1984 lay in tattered ruins when statements of that sort were being made on September 16.

What happens to the hopes of Government that remain? He is, after all, convinced. I am sure his colleagues will support the fact that the changes being made to the family allowance system are part and parcel of better targeting. He concluded his observations on Monday by saying:

—I believe this Bill merits the support of the House. It is part of a restructuring of the child benefits system which will ensure that the benefits given to families with children are distributed on a fairer and more rational basis.

He goes on to add his thoughts about the fiscal situation and the deficit. Do the changes represent an improvement in the circumstances of poorer Canadians, about which the Conservatives still presume to cry crocodile tears at times?

The Canadian Council on Social Development last spring gave an assessment of the impact of the whole package of Budget changes on Canadian families. I would submit, Mr. Speaker, without being particularly open to question, that surely as a Minister, the Minister of National Health and Welfare would have available to him the kinds of assessments which the Ministry of Finance could make, applying fairly straightforward assumptions to the consideration of the circumstances of families of various levels of income. The astonishing thing about that, as the Canadian Council on Social Development has demonstrated, is if one applies those assessments to families, a couple with two children earning $10,000 a year all the way to $40,000, one finds that they will suffer a loss in income. The loss as far as a percentage of disposable income is concerned, runs as high as 4.5 per cent by the year 1990. If one takes not disposable income, which is income after taxes, but discretionary income—the amount of money people have left after having paid for food, clothing as well as taxes—one finds that a family with $10,000 a year will lose over 11 per cent of discretionary income because of the changes which the Government is bringing in. That is quite scandalous, given the statement that the Government is seeking, at the very least, to orient things to needy Canadians. On the other side, Canadians with resources, those with large incomes, end up quite nicely ahead of the game with gains of 3 per cent to 4 per cent rather than losses.

The point has been made by the Canadian Welfare Council, which has the opportunity of making published reports under the Government of Canada because it is officially appointed, that only the poorest families with incomes below the tax-paying thershold will benefit from these changes, and at that in rather modest amounts for a few years. After the various changes are phased in—and I will not read the list of the various changes—even the poorest parents will receive less than they would from the existing child benefits system. In the meantime, some lower-income and all middle-income families will suffer losses in child benefits, starting in 1986. The Council concludes that in future fewer and fewer families will qualify for the child tax credit, and the value of child benefits will decline for everyone. Universality will be maintained in name, but, in fact, child benefits will lose value and be increasingly concentrated on families on the bottom rungs of the income ladder. This is what we get in the fortieth anniversary year of the family allowances in Canada from a Party, the Government now, many of whose Members probably never thought family allowances were a good idea and were quite preapred to accept all the media talk of baby bonuses. Conservatives never recognized that the point of the family allowance was to take people on minimum, limited wages and to provide them with something toward the cost of maintaining a family. The family allowance was always a vital part of Canadian fiscal economic policies established in the middle 1940s resulting from the experience of depression and war. Conservatives, I suspect, in many cases have never appreciated that.

I am personally very disappointed that the Minister of National Health and Welfare yielded, as he did. I say to my colleagues on both sides of the House that the only decent thing to do to this Bill is to hoist it six months and kill it, as it deserves to be killed, and get back to really building up the benefits that families need.

Mr. Keith Penner (Cochrane-Superior): Mr. Speaker, I begin by saying that it would be politically naive in the extreme to say that Parliament and the Government of the day ought not to be concerned about the size of our federal deficit. Having said that, however, I ask the House how can we ask mothers and their children to lead the way in a program of deficit reduction? How can we do that, Mr. Speaker? The Government has already backed down under pressure from Opposition Parties and from senior citizens organizations from imposing a financial penalty on senior citizens as proposed in the Budget. Now we ask the Government to do exactly the same thing again, to think about it.

The Government should think about this Bill which imposes a penalty on children. This is no temporary measure just brought in for a short while. This is a permanent feature of our social contracts with this nation. It will hurt families more as time goes on. If we need austerity measures, and I do not deny for a moment that we do, then I say that the Government should begin with its own house.

If this Government is committed to a program of austerity to bring fiscal balance back, why do we have the largest Cabinet in our history? Why do we have all those expensive new staff positions in every Minister's office?

Mr. Boudria: And the limousines?

Mr. Penner: Why do we have expensive redecorating and refurnishing of Minister's offices? Why do we have such an increase in the size of the Prime Minister's office when the Conservative Party yelled and screamed in anguish at the previous levels in the size of that office. Now the Conservatives have gone far beyond that. They have bailed out a bank at what may yet amount to $1 billion, a failed endeavour. If we need austerity, let it begin with the Government and the way it operates.

There are many expenditures that can be postponed or reduced. I ask the Government to leave the children of this nation alone. Leave the children and their mothers aside in the deficit fight until every other avenue of saving, every other means of expenditure reduction, has been fully explored and implemented. Once the Government has done all of that and it has its own house in order then it can say with pride "Look at our austerity measures". If still more are needed, perhaps the Government can make a plea, beginning with middle-income families and up, but not until the Government has done its own work.

This Bill indicates to me that something is very seriously wrong in Canada with our priorities. We limit the flow of money to needy persons but we can find money for almost anything else that comes to mind in Government operations.

I just returned last evening from visiting an Indian community on the coast of James Bay, a community which this past spring was flooded out. I went to see how the repair work was coming along and found that it is not coming along well at all. Houses are still partly demolished. I asked the officials why and they told me that there is not enough money to repair the homes. Winter is coming on and the houses are standing on blocks with no insulation. I saw a child playing in a dirty, muddy pool in front of his partly demolished home. Not far away from him was a huge garbage disposal site. That site ought to be moved away from the community because it is creating problems with the drinking water and causing disease. However, it cannot be moved because there is no money. We are asking that child to help us in our fight against the federal deficit. In the recently leaked Buffalo Jump report, the Government indicated that it wanted to cut more than $300 million from the program to assist the poorest of poor, the Indian people of Canada. Let austerity begin with ourselves; let austerity begin with the Government itself. We cannot fight the deficit on the backs of needy people. We cannot fight the deficit by calling for the co-operation of children and their mothers who need those few extra dollars.

The Government argues that the child tax credit will offset this reduction in the family allowance. We know from a careful analysis of this by the National Council on Welfare that that is not so. In speaking about child benefits, the council indicates that many lower and all middle income families with children will receive less than they do from the current system. After 1990, even the poorest families stand to lose child benefits. In future, fewer and fewer families will be eligible for the child tax credit. That argument which has been offered on the other side does not stand up under analysis. It is a false argument. The buying power of the family allowance cheque must be maintained. It is unfair, unjust and unreasonable to do otherwise.

I remember when the child allowance came into existence. I recall, as a child, being told about it by my mother. I could not imagine that some Government in far off Ottawa was concerned about a person like me, a child, and that it would actually give money to my mother to provide some of the things I would not have otherwise had. I remember the war years, those years of austerity. There was little money for things such as a pair of skates, a baseball mitt, a bicycle or even a movie at the cost of 12 cents. We accepted that as children because we were told that there was an ongoing war and that everyone had to sacrifice. Brothers, uncles and fathers were dying overseas. Later came the child allowance, money for mothers to provide their children with things they ought to have in the process of growing up. Those few extra dollars have become important. It is not extra money that can be thrown around. It is now important money, especially with unacceptably high levels of unemployment, soup kitchens and the increase in poverty. Mothers need that money to provide their youngsters with items to enrich and enlarge their lives. We are not talking about luxuries; we are talking about necessities.

What sense is there in saying that this small sum of money will not be increased fully in accordance with the cost of living? What sense is there in asking for this small cheque to be reduced by the rate of 3 per cent per year? According to the National Council on Welfare, by 1990, as a result of budget changes to child benefits and the income tax system combined, a family with an $80,000 income will lose $1,125 per year. No tears are shed for them. However, a low income family will lose more, $1,879 or $754 more per year, and a middle income family earning $40,000 will lose $3,452. Where is the justice? Where is the rationale?

I should like to conclude my remarks where I began. Most Canadians agree that the mounting federal deficit must be brought under control. However, the Budget proposes to do so by turning away from what has been a long-standing commitment on the part of the federal Government of Canada, that is, to continue the fight against poverty. It is a wrong-headed policy. We are debating a cheap, petty, public policy. I am certain the Minister feels ashamed about it. Therefore, I call upon back-bench members of the Conservative Party to join with us in bringing pressure upon the Government. It should be given the message that this is not the way in which to proceed in a reduction of the deficit. It is an injustice to do it on the backs of children, their mothers and families which need these few extra dollars that we give them each month.

Hon. Jake Epp (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, there are a number of points I should like to cover this afternoon on Bill C-70. The first one was just made by the Hon. Member for Cochrane-Superior (Mr. Penner). He left the impression that this was the first time that family allowances had been affected by Government decision. I draw to his attention that when I first rose to speak on Bill C-70, I pointed out that the former Government had made more radical changes in 1976.

Mr. Penner: Not permanent, though, Jake.

Mr. Epp (Provencher): I hear the Hon. Member saying that they were not permanent.

Mr. Penner: They were just temporary measures.

Mr. Epp (Provencher): I point out to him that they were much more permanent than anything we have suggested. Whereas the family allowance payment per child is now approximately $31 per month, if the decision of the Government which he supported had not been taken, the payment today would have been $51. That is a permanent change. If he takes a look at the six and five proposal also introduced by his Government, there was a change as well. The Hon. Member used the word "permanent". The first time I rose to speak on the Bill, I said very clearly that as financial circumstances permitted, we would examine the benefits level. That is not permanent. I know him to be an honourable man; he has demonstrated that throughout the years. I clearly point out to him that some of the things he said cannot be substantiated in fact.

I also rise today because I am concerned about the statements which were left on the record by the Hon. Member for Hamilton East (Ms. Copps). At the time of the introduction of Bill C-70, I made proposals relating to more flexibility. I said that there would be more discretionary power for the Minister of National Health and Welfare regarding unfortunate circumstances where children were presumed to be dead, and that we were looking for a means by which to be more caring and more flexible in our dealings with parents in that unfortunate and tragic situation. Unfortunately the Hon. Member absolutely misinterpreted the intent of the proposal. She literally called it an attack on parents in those unfortunate circumstances. In order that the record be very clear in this regard, I point out the effect of that amendment once again. During debate in the House on the family allowance amending Bill, Bill C-70, the Hon. Member for Hamilton East questioned the rationale behind one of the minor amendments included in it. The amendment in question proposes to give the Minister discretionary authority, for the purposes of the family allowance program, to issue a certificate declaring that a child is presumed to be dead in cases where a child has disappeared and there is reasonable evidence to believe that the child is dead. What it will do is enable the Government to settle with the parents in those cases, not to remove any money because at the present time the payment is not for seven years.

In fact, the Act says very clearly it is to be curtailed. That is how the Act now reads. The payment is to be curtailed in that month. Generally we have been paying on a six months basis. That is beyond the date. In fact, what it will now enable us to do is to have the flexibility to meet the exact circumstances of those unfortunate situations.

The third point I make, Mr. Speaker, is this: I wish to inform the House that there have been consultations among the representatives of the Parties of the House and that it is not possible to reach an agreement pursuant to Standing Order 82 or Standing Order 83 with regard to the allocation of time to the second reading stage of Bill C-70, an Act to amend the Family Allowances Act, 1973.

Therefore, at the next sitting of the House it is my intention to propose the following motion pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 84:

That, in relation to Bill C-70, an Act to amend the Family Allowances Act, 1973, one sitting day shall be allotted to the consideration of the second reading stage of the said Bill; and that fifteen minutes before the expiry of the time provided for the consideration of government business on the above-mentioned sitting day, any proceedings before the House shall be interrupted if necessary, for the purpose of this Order and, in turn, every question necessary to dispose of the said stage of the said Bill shall be put forthwith and successfully, without further debate or amendment.

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor-Walkerville): Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Moments ago the Hon. Member for Cochrane-Superior (Mr. Penner) asked the members on the government side to think about what they are doing. When in the Chamber speaking as we have been about this Bill and when one looks around the Chamber, one would have to be one of those who likes to sing in the shower where the echo enhances your voice because, really, all the value that attends these interventions is to have the sound of your voice enhanced because it is clear. Look around us. Except for the rat pack making noises behind the benches nobody is paying any attention to what is going on. There is very little likelihood that the arguments that have been repeated over and over again about the unfairness of the Government's action are going to penetrate, except by a process of osmosis.

Yesterday the Hon. Member for York East (Mr. Redway), in dismissing the rather considerable number of statistics advanced to demonstrate that a great many families were going to be hurt by the actions set out in this Bill, advanced the hypothesis that in spite of the fact that the statistics based on what the Bill purports to do now may indicate some harm done to low-income, middle-income and poor people, that if you think about it there may be some changes in the economy, there may be more people going back to work, the Government may change its mind about something or other and when it all gets shaken out in the wash, it will not be so bad after all and, if it is looked at maybe in 1990 or 1991, in fact things will be a great deal better for the poor and the low-income and middle-income people who are going to be hurt by this legislation.

I had great difficulty in following the argument until I observed that the speaker was projecting a map of his logic. I noticed that that map constituted a circular movement of the finger, as I do now, so we could recognize that the logic of his argument was the same as the logic of the entire argument on that side, circular and inpenetrable.

It is an argument that must be extremely perplexing and confusing to the Canadian people, particularly in the context of the events that have been transpiring in this House over the last few days. We have a Government that assured the voters that it would do nothing that would hurt the quality of life or affect the benefits of the poor or the middle class in our society and certainly would not commit itself to attacking the deficit on the backs of those who could least afford it. In spite of that we have heard speaker after speaker on the other side, with rotating finger, clearly indicating that one of the motivations for the kind of legislation that we have before us was indeed to cut back the deficit. This is at the same time as we are in the process of discussing the contribution of something in the order of $1 billion to make up the losses that resulted from this government's ineptitude.

What is transpiring now is really quite shocking when you think about it. After all, it has only been a few weeks since the Government attempted to make changes in the Old Age Security and thought that they might do it at the expense of a set of tired and sleepy targets that proved to be neither tired nor sleepy. The senior citizens rose up, with the support of the entire country, and the proposal to partially deindex old age pensions was a decision that had to be changed, and so full indexation was returned.

Now, looking around for easy targets and I suppose with a new dimension of sexism perhaps, certainly looking at children as easy targets, the Government thinks that it is going to attack women, children and families and not get a reaction. The reaction is already taking place. The reaction is manifestly affecting the attitude of the Government because the Minister stood up only moments ago and said "We have had enough of this, too many people may be aroused to what is going on, so we had better have closure." But it is too late. It is unnecessary and ridiculous. One would think we were talking about an extremely expensive program here. The fact of the matter is, by comparison to many of the programs that continue and in terms of some of the measures that this Government has already advocated and in terms of the savings that they hope to achieve, this program is trivial. It has been contracting, not only in terms of cost but benefits that have been going to citizens over the last few years. By the way, when the Member who spoke earlier asked this Chamber to think, I suppose it is worth noting that he ought to contemplate what was said by the Minister earlier and that is as a result of the actions of the past Government the family allowance was indeed cut several times over the last 15 years. The result, I will repeat what the Minister said, is that it amounts to only some $30 instead of the $50 it would have totalled per child if the former Government had not been as deliberate as this one in saving money at the cost of children, families and women.

Let us look at the record. Ten years ago family allowances consumed about 1.2 per cent of Gross National Product and 6.4 per cent of federal expenditures. Presently it consumes .57 per cent of the Gross National Product and 1.2 per cent of Government expenditures. In dollar terms we are talking about something like $2 billion a year, just twice as much as we are going to have to put into the bank fiasco, just twice as much. In the first year of this partial deindexation the Government just may save as much as $20 million. Not until 1990-1991 is it going to save as much as $400 million. That is trivial compared to the $1 billion that it is going to throw the way of the banks. It is certainly trivial compared to the amount of money that is going to go to the oil companies and it becomes a joke in its triviality compared to the tax expenditures benefiting the largest corporations which are not producing jobs in proportion to the amount of money going into those coffers.

Let us recognize that the Government, under the leadership of the Minister, in consultation with the other two Parties, did attempt to look at some changes which were purported to be to the advantage of women, the family and children. However, what was the net result? No attention has been paid to the substantial changes in the tax structure that will affect people, whether or not they have children or are women. There has been partial deindexation all along the line. We should look at the pattern of changes to the child benefits.

What about the claim advanced by the Hon. Member for York East and by others yesterday that the poorest are going to be better off? I would just point out that in the first year, a family with two children making less than $9,000 per year will lose $22 in the first year and will make some gains until 1990 but after that will continue to lose. A family with two children and an income of between $15,000 and $35,000 per year—and the $35,000 per year is about average—is going to lose simply on the basis of those changes in benefits.

Having heard some of the utterances of the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Epp), I am sure that he did not intend this to happen. He is groping around looking for a means by which he can modify things to some slight degree so that he can get back to a program that will fulfil the intentions that he has broadcast over this land. I would suggest that the first step would in fact be to withdraw or modify the Bill in committee. Better still, I would suggest that the Minister rise like a man who stands for the principles that he preaches to the country to support us in this six-month hoist.

Mr. Blaine A. Thacker (Lethbridge-Foothills): Mr. Speaker, this afternoon I listened to what I think is the absolute height of hypocrisy supposedly on the part of the poor. I listened to the Hon. Member for Cochrane-Superior (Mr. Penner) talking about—

Mr. McCurdy: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. It is my understanding that the terms "hypocrisy" and "hypocrite" or any term like that is considered unparliamentary language.

Mr. Epp (Provencher): It just depends how it's used.

Mr. Boudria: Only when referring to another Member.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The Chair did not understand the meaning of the word "hypocrisy" as applying to a specific speaker. I believe that it was used in a more general way. Therefore, it is parliamentary.

Mr. Thacker: Mr. Speaker, I want to bring to the attention of the Hon. Member for Cochrane-Superior who referred to some renovations in the Prime Minister's Office that he conveniently did not make reference to the renovations to Stornoway, the home of the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Turner), renovations which were much more substantial. I must say as well, Sir, that the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) took a 15 per cent reduction in his salary increase and Cabinet Ministers took a 10 per cent reduction. That same offer was made to the Leader of the Official Opposition as well as to the Leader of the NDP (Mr. Broadbent) and they both refused. They were not going to take any reduction in salary to show any leadership.

Second, I would like to refer to the little Indian boy to whom the Hon. Member for Cochrane-Superior referred. The Hon. Member spoke of the immorality of depriving that poor little duffer. I agree that it is immoral but what is surely more immoral is that that Hon. Member and all Hon. Members of the NDP who happen to have two children are taking 79 bucks a month in family allowance payments. We know that the top tax rate in this country is 50 per cent. It is surely more immoral for us to take that money while that little duffer does without, and that is the goal of this Party.

Ms. Mitchell: Let's have fair taxation then.

Mr. McCurdy: Make it more progressive. We agree with you.

Mr. Thacker: We are trying to have the people who make more money give up that family allowance. Members of the NDP are trying to keep that money because of sheer personal greed.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mrs. Lucie Pépin (Outremont): Mr. Speaker, I am delighted to rise in the House to deal with Bill C-70 and try to focus the debate again on the children and not on what is now going on in the office of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) or in the office of the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Turner). I should like to say how surprised I am to hear that the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Epp) would like this debate to come to an end, thereby muzzling the Opposition which is trying to defend Canadian families. I am also somewhat disappointed, because the role of the Minister of National Health and Welfare is to protect Canadian families, women and children. He is clearly trying to muzzle the Opposition.

I feel it is most important to emphasize that family allowances are just about the only social recognition women get for having and raising children. I think it is also very important to emphasize their particular nature.

In 1944, the Government of the day adopted legislation providing for family allowances because of the distress of poor families and the extremely high infant mortality rate at the time. It can be said that poverty today should be one of the major reasons for maintaining family allowances.

I think it is necessary to maintain the universality of family allowances to avoid the group within our society receiving allowances being stigmatized and because selective social programs would cost a lot more to administer and absorb the resulting savings. Today, it is not the universality of family allowances which is being questioned, although the Government is often tempted to establish a beach-head in this direction.

What we are dealing with here today is a possible reduction of the purchasing power of families with children, because family allowances will no longer be indexed on the cost of living increase, but rather on the excess of this increase over 3 per cent.

I listened to the Minister of National Health and Welfare when he introduced his bill. He said among other things that the difference between what he is proposing and a normal increase of the family allowances based on the consumer price index was only $22 per family per year. He emphasized also the steps which the Liberal Government had taken in 1976, 1983 and 1984 to reduce the annual increase of family allowances.

Let us examine closely the arguments put forward by the Minister of National Health and Welfare to see if they will stand the test of a serious and thorough analysis. In 1976, the Government decided not to increase family allowances and, in 1983-84, it decreed an increase of 6 and 5 per cent, in line with the program it had implemented to end the economic recession. What we must understand is that each time a Liberal Government was compelled to limit the yearly increases, it implemented temporary measures and, the following year, everything returned to normal.

We should emphasize that the purpose of its budget restraints was not to reduce the deficit. The Liberal Party has never tried to solve the deficit on the backs of the poorest of the poor. What do we have here? When we consider the historic background, we realize that the purpose of Bill C-70 and the budget tabled on May 23 is to empoverish our middle and low income families gradually.

What is involved is not a mere $22 per family, Mr. Speaker. To cry out that $22 is peanuts is to miss the point. Liberal members are not as near-sighted as Conservative members. We are well able to see what the Budget and Bill C-70 imply for the coming years.

This is why I have no problem stating that what the Liberal Party did in 1983-84 with its 6 and 5 program was small beer compared to what this Conservative Government wants us now to swallow.

If you look at the table of estimates for up to 1991, you will see that for the fiscal year 1985-86, the Conservative Government will be taking $20 million out of the taxpayers' pockets by reducing family allowances. That figure is increased 20 times for the fiscal year 1990-91. This means that the Government is considering family allowances as its future reserve for solving deficit problems.

Old age security benefits also were a very significant source of revenue that would have been used to wipe out the deficit had it not been for the firm step taken by the senior citizens in coming here to remind the Government last June that their duty was to support our elders, those who helped make Canada what it is today.

Mr. Speaker, I would now like to compare the savings that will be gained on family allowances up to 1991, with the expenditures this Conservative Government is prepared to make until 1991 in the case of those who can afford to make capital gains.

As I said earlier, the Government will take $400 million from families with children to reduce its deficit in the next five years. At the same time, it will forgo—

An Hon. Member: Rob the poor and give to the rich!

Mrs. Pépin: —at the same time it will forgo $1.25 billion because of an income tax exemption on capital gains.

An Hon. Member: Shame!

Mrs. Pépin: Unfortunately, the impression I get is that the argument of the deficit holds only when they want to reduce social expenditures. When it comes to helping the rich in our society, there is no mention of the deficit whatsoever.

Indeed, the corporation surtax will have disappeared by 1991. The removal of the oil and gas revenue tax will entail a $2.5 billion loss to the Government, but a gain for multinational corporations. The Government will also lose $1 billion in special Canadian ownership levies.

Mr. Speaker, in this speech opposing Bill C-70, I am going back to the whole budget debate. Ironically, I am doing exactly what the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Epp) suggested opposition members should do, that is put Bill C-70 back into historical context.

Bill C-70 makes no sense when viewed in the light of election commitments made by the Conservatives. They promised to maintain social programs to help Canadian men and women through the economic recession.

During the debate on the Speech from the Throne in November 1984, the Minister of National Health and Welfare stated: "It is my duty to give signals and take steps to strengthen the role of the family and give it more importance than ever before in our society".

Today, by removing the indexation of family allowances, the Government is attacking social programs designed to support the family. I wonder what kind of signals the Minister of National Health and Welfare is giving them?

Our social programs are not wasteful. The Macdonald Report points out that Canada ranks in the lowest third group of industrialized countries as far as its expenditures for social programs are concerned. This is what the report says: "Considering the moderate funds which, according to OECD criteria, Canada allots to its social sector, there is really nothing to warrant drawing from the social envelope to reduce the deficit."

With Bill C-70, the Tory Government is denying families with children the maintenance of their purchasing power. At the same time, it is increasing taxes on fuel and health products. Family allowances are often the only income going directly to women.

I think that the financial security of women should not be eroded but rather strengthened. By reducing the annual increase in family allowances till 1991, the Tory Government is asking mostly women to make up the deficit.

I would like to recall what the National Action Committee on the Status of Women said before the Standing Committee on National Health and Social Welfare during its hearings on benefits granted to senior citizens and their children. The National Action Committee believes that the assistance now being paid out universally to all parents is too low. Consequently, it has urged the federal Government on several occasions to increase family allowances to a more realistic level. The Committee opposes one of the options in the paper under consideration published in January which would entail a reduction in family allowances. It opposes any actual decrease of the allowance by way of a surtax or a ceiling on cost of living indexation.

On the other hand, the group for the reform of social policies writes in connection with family benefits that the Conservative budget has been said to be increasing the assistance paid to low-income families but actually such assistance will be reduced by 1990, when the combined effects of income tax increases and the reduction of family allowances will offset any gain from the increased child tax credit.

Mr. Speaker, like many pressure groups representing families, children and women, I oppose Bill C-70.

[English]

Mr. Jim Manly (Cowichan-Malahat-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to participate in this debate and make my views known on Bill C-70. I feel this Bill is just another nail in the coffin in which the Conservative Government is trying to bury our whole social security program. I especially welcome this opportunity to speak since the Minister has just given notice of a motion he will move for time allocation. I must admit I was a little surprised by that notice after only nine or ten hours of debate on a very fundamental question facing Canadian people. After a mere nine or ten hours, the Minister has decided that the Canadian people have had enough of this debate and there will be time allocation. This is a significant change for the Conservative Party. One need not have a long memory to remember the times when Conservatives at least maintained that they upheld the principle of full and open debate on measures such as the one before us. Now, just nine or ten hours after debate had begun, they wish to shut the lid on it.

It was also interesting to hear the exchange between some of the Conservative Members, the Minister and some of the Liberals over which one of those two Parties had done the most damage to our social security program. The Minister pointed out very rightly that if it had not been for some of the changes introduced by previous Liberal Governments the family allowance today would be $52 instead of $31. I remind Hon. Members this is the first time the Conservative Government has been at bat for a while and we are just beginning to see the way in which they are attacking our social security programs. We had several years in which the Liberals slowly but surely eroded those programs. It seems that once again we have to be fighting a rear guard action protect our social security programs and to ensure that all Canadians have a right to participate fully in Canadian society and have, at least, a chance of living a life with some dignity and equity.

Canadians should have known that when they elected a Conservative Government that this was the type of agenda that it had in mind since, in the past, some Conservatives had let slip that they were going to have to do some very mean and nasty things. We now see those mean and nasty things happening. The reason the Canadian people did not really believe that this was going to take place was because they accepted, at face value, the promises made by the present Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) when he was campaigning. For example, last August, he very solemnly gave the assurance that no social programs at all affecting anyone in need would be touched by a Progressive Conservative Government. Without hesitation, the Prime Minister gave that assurance and, now, with very little hesitation, we can see this Government moving to remove full indexing from family allowances.

When the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Epp) introduced this legislation on Monday, he said that we cannot separate social programs and benefits from economic reality. That is a proposition with which we would all agree. Social programs and benefits have to be tied to economic reality. The question I would like to raise is how do we perceive that economic reality? If we look at the actions of the Conservative Government in the past few months, we see that its view of economic reality is basically one of cutting back on social programs in order to grant a tax holiday to people with capital gains of up to $500,000. We see proposals to bail out the Canadian Commercial Bank to the tune of $1 billion. At the same time, we see proposals to cut back on programs like Old Age Security and the family allowance. The seniors of Canada made the Government see the folly of trying to cut back on the OAS. However, as my colleague, the Hon. Member for Vancouver East (Ms. Mitchell) pointed out, they may have persuaded the Government politically that it was folly but they have not yet persuaded this Government morally. It is important for the Government to face up to the fact that what it is doing is not moral.

If we are going to talk about economic reality, let us do so from the perspective of hundreds of families in my constituency. I am sure this would also be true of hundreds of families in most Members' constituencies. In fact, it would be true of millions of Canadian families coast to coast. They face an economic reality which I think is rock bottom and we have to deal with it in this House. It is the economic reality of being poor, not having enough money from month to month to meet basic necessities. It is the economic reality of children having to go back to school in need of new clothes and school supplies and their financial resources are stretched to the breaking point. That is the economic reality we should be looking at first of all.

The Macdonald Commission, when it looked at the question of distribution of income, seemed rather surprised that there has not been any real change in Canada over the last 30 years. The overall distribution of income has changed remarkably little during the past 30 years, according to the report. The poorest fifth of Canadian families and individuals continues to receive about 4 per cent of all income while the most affluent fifth receive about 40 per cent. It seems surprising that the distribution of income appears so stable and existing research has not fully discovered the reasons for this phenomenon. Whatever the full explanation may be, the gap between the affluent and the poor in Canadian society remains as wide as ever. In one table to the report, the effect of some of the transfer programs on the distribution of income is shown. Before programs such as family allowance and OAS are counted, the poorest fifth of Canadian society received only 1.4 per cent of Canadian income. That is, 20 per cent of Canada's people received one-seventieth of Canada's personal income. After those programs are added in, they received the magnificent amount of 4.6 per cent of national income. With aboriginal people the question is even more severe. Government transfer programs constitute the second largest source of income for these people. With that in mind I want to go back to what the Minister said about the fact that previous changes to the family allowance program have meant we are only paying $31 per month today compared to what it should be, $52 a month. We wonder why there has not been any real improvement in the gap in income equality in Canada, yet we continue to have Governments such as the previous Liberal Government and the present Conservative Government cutting back and eroding such basic programs as family allowances.

When the Catholic Bishops spoke on this issue two years ago, Mr. Speaker, they talked about putting an end to these cut-backs. They said the economic realities in Canada revealed a moral disorder in our society and I want to say to the Conservatives opposite that Bill C-70 contributes to those moral disorders and I support fully the motion that this Bill be given a six-month hoist.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE RAISED

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Charest): It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 46, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: The Hon. Member for Ottawa-Vanier (Mr. Gauthier)—Conflict of Interest—(a) Request for details concerning formation of certain private companies. (b) Company shareholdings; The Hon. Member for Comox-Powell River (Mr. Skelly)—Fisheries—(a) Exercise of ministerial discretion—inspection of fish products; The Hon. Member for York West (Mr. Marchi)—Multiculturalism—(a) Federal-Provincial Conference—size of Budget.

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Epp (Provencher) that Bill C-70, an Act to amend the Family Allowances Act, 1973, be now read a second time and referred to a legislative committee, and on the amendment of Mr. Frith (p. 6625).

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): Mr. Speaker, I rise this afternoon to participate in the debate on Bill C-70, which has the effect of deindexing family allowance benefits to the tune of $55 million. It is out of sad necessity that I speak on this Bill. It is an obligation on this Member and certainly on Members of my Party to speak against another piece of regressive Tory legislation. This Bill has its roots in a Budget that one can characterize very accurately as a give and take Budget. It takes from the poor, the working class and middle class and gives to the rich and wealthy Canadians.

Specifically, Mr. Speaker, what does this Bill mean in real terms to the average Canadian? To better answer that question one cannot only look at the ambit of this particular Bill, one has to look at the number of measures introduced last May in the Conservative Budget. When you do that you see that by 1990, including changes to personal income tax and family benefits, a two-child family with both parents working with income in the neighbourhood of $15,000 will lose about $1,879 in purchasing power. Compare that to a family earning $80,000 who will lose $1,125. Even with this very quick arithmetic, we can see very clearly that low-income families will lose $775 more per year than high-income families, and middle-income families will lose three times as much. Then consider the increase in consumer and gasoline taxes, the tax on health care products, and the removal of the RHOSP program which permitted young couples to put money aside to purchase their home. Then you get an idea of where this Tory Government is going.

As if that was not enough, the pre-Christmas debate was one which the Government wanted to use to open up the question of universality. Then prior to the summer recess we had the issue facing senior citizens of this country. This Government wanted to fight the battle of the deficit on the shoulders of our senior citizens. This month we see that senior citizens have been replaced by the mothers and children of this country. To make matters worse, the Minister of Health and Welfare (Mr. Epp) has moved for closure on this Bill. Is that because the Government is embarrassed to have Members of Parliament debate Bill C-70 further? Is it worried that Canadians will get agitated as they did in May and June to stop the regressive move of deindexing old age pensions? I recall hearing the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) talk about civility, parliamentary procedure, democracy, and the will of the people. Where are those words today? Where is the Prime Minister today with his great oratorical skills?

Those were not the only words uttered by the Prime Minister. In the Speech from the Throne it says, "My Government has a high priority measure to support and strengthen the Canadian family which is the cornerstone of our society". How do those words compare with the Bill before the House? The Minister of National Health and Welfare was not to be outdone by the rhetoric of the Prime Minister. He said, "It is the family and commitment to community which guarantees stability in our social fabric. It is my role to put forward signals and initiatives which will strengthen the role of the family and give it more prominence in society than I feel it has been given before".

Hon. Members on the other side were talking about hypocrisy. I ask them to look at the statements of the Minister of National Health and Welfare and the Prime Minister. It does not take a genius to discover that there is a serious credibility gap between their words and their actions. Canadians no longer trust the Government. They no longer have any confidence in the Government's plan of action. Most importantly, Canadians will not allow the Government, despite its absolute parliamentary majority, to take them down a path they do not wish to travel. There is no better example of that than the actions of our senior citizens. The Government was prepared to deindex old age pensions. It made statements in the House and across the country that it would not back down. How long did it take for the Government to buckle under and listen to Canadians across the country? Canadians are facing another issue on the same principle, only this time senior citizens are being replaced with children and mothers.

The Government has been accused of lacking decisive leadership, and rightfully so. One can look at the banking fiasco, the broken promises, the on-again-off-again waltz with star wars, and the tuna fish issue. On those issues they did lack leadership. The only position that they are clear on is that of social security programs. The Government is comprised of a regressive group of men and women who are taking us backward rather than forward. The Government introduced a Budget which gives the wealthy tax breaks, loopholes, and a $500,000 bonanza and asks senior citizens, mothers, and children of the country to bear the brunt of the financial situation that the Government finds itself in. They are being regressive rather than progressive as their Progressive Conservative label would suggest they should be.

Time after time history has taught us the consequences of allowing misery and neglect to fester unremedied. It is indeed very dangerous to make these matters worse. When speaking to this country some time ago President Kennedy declared: "If we cannot help the many who are poor, we cannot save the few who are rich". Mr. Speaker, while our circumstances are different than those on other parts of the globe, the words still ring very true and they should be heeded. If the Government is honest enough, it will realize that compared to many countries Canada is very wealthy.

Our challenge as a Parliament is to tear down that vertical mosaic which John Porter described 20 years ago in his book. We must tear down that vertical mosaic and redistribute the wealth and power of the country. These policies will not do that. Rather, they will reinforce that vertical mosaic and that is dangerous. The Liberal Government of the last 16 years initiated many of these programs and Canadians realized that this was the social contract they had with the country. Closure or no closure, Mr. Speaker, the children and families of the country do not want to renegotiate a new contract with this or a future government. My Party will remain true to that social contract. Let us see whether the Government has the courage to stand up to something that is very wrong.

Mr. John R. Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, I just want to say a few words about this particular motion to hoist Bill C-70 for six months, and the few words I want to say will take exactly 10 minutes. I do not see Machiavelli on the other side of the House, but if I were machiavellian I would tend to think that this plan to cut back on family allowances was a deliberate scheme. The proposed cut-back in old age pensions was the stalking horse put forward to get everyone to jump on it. We all did, and we did a very effective job. The polls following that decision of the Government showed that its popularity had dropped. The Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) then struck his breast and said, "Mea culpa, mea culpa, mea maxima culpa. We were wrong, we will index it again".

Ms. Mitchell: Shame on him.

Mr. Rodriguez: He said that and the polls went up again. What he really wanted to do was undermine family allowances. There are those who see that the Government was really out to stick it to the children of the country, particularly the poor children.

I was reading a very interesting statistic earlier and I would like to share it with you, Mr. Speaker. According to Statistics Canada, in the past five years the number of children living in poverty in Canada has grown from 723,000 to 1,113,000 which is an increase of 54 per cent. The Government says that it is increasing the child tax credit but even with an increase in the child tax credit, it has lowered the income level at which the child tax credit would be paid. In fact, we look at the proposed cut-backs in the family allowance as part of that whole budgetary proposal which lays on top of the federal sales taxes. We look at that whole package and see in fact that the poor in society will get even poorer as a result of the particular measures being proposed with respect to deindexing family allowance.

I am sure all Members of the House when they are in their constituency offices have people telephone and come to see them. There are fixed times for the receipt of the family allowance, certain times of the month when it arrives in the mail. If that family allowance is one or two days late, the telephone rings. I am sure Members of this House are well aware of that. It triggers a response. I do not believe this Government really understands the extent of poverty in this country, the extent to which the family allowance has become an integral part of the family income. In fact, probably in many families that is the only cheque which a woman receives in her own name.

There are many communities across this country where wives do not have the opportunity to find work outside the home and depend in a real way on the husband's income. The family allowance cheque will probably be the only cheque she ever receives in her own name. What has this Government decided to do? Cut the family allowance. It then turns around and says it is increasing the child tax credit which by the way, comes at the end of the year when the income tax form is filed by the spouse. In fact we are not really addressing the problem of wealth redistribution in this country.

The other provisions in the Budget ensure that the wealthy in Canada will continue to accumulate greater and greater wealth. The Prime Minister during the last election campaign promised there would be a minimum tax on the wealthy in Canada. That remains a campaign promise. Nothing has been done to effectively deal with tax reform. Do the wealthy of this country really need the $.5 million capital gains gift which this Government has given them? Do they really need it?

Mr. Duguay: Do you really need to yell?

Mr. Rodriguez: Well, obviously, the Hon. Member does not hear very well. When those Members were in the opposition, they were great ones for dumping on the Liberal Government. Now they are the Government and in fact what they do is deal with people in just as cruel a way as the Liberals before them. The Members opposite should be ashamed. They have an opportunity to revamp the Income Tax Act. They have a vast majority. Now is the time to seize that opportunity and really ensure that those who need income support in Canada will receive it. Surely the Government should be using the Income Tax Act to ensure that it redistributes wealth to the families who really need it. In fact, this Bill will only exacerbate the poverty which presently exists.

According to the Canadian Council on Social Development all the various taxes which are proposed in the Budget will cost the average family over $1,000 in purchasing power by the year 1990. Surely the Government has to be concerned with that sort of regressive kind of tax, the sales tax. Even the children pay federal sales tax on candies and pet food for their pets. All the various pharmaceutical products which Canadians may need will be taxed.

Is it the real purpose of this Government to separate the classes in this country? I have accused it of that. I think what was really intended in the Budget was to reinforce class distinction, to really ingrain poverty into Canada and to help the wealthy to accumulate even greater wealth. As a matter of fact, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Wilson) said in a speech in Montreal that the problem in Canada is that there are too few wealthy people. I would like him to consider the fact that there are actually too many poor people in this country and that the Government should really undertake a program of tax reform in order to make sure that as much as possible we eliminate that grave discrepancy.

I once said, Mr. Speaker, that there are three purposes of an Income Tax Act. First, it must be redistributive in nature. Second, it must be just and, third, it must be progressive. It seems to me that there is no redistributive nature in the proposal of Bill C-70. All the witnesses who came before the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs testified that this was not an appropriate way to go. We should not cut the moneys which go directly to the wife and to the children. Yet the Government proceeds in its arrogance. I do not know if it is trying to prove it is decisive. Government gave notice that it will introduce the guillotine tomorrow. It is going to close off debate. I suppose Government is trying to prove how resolute it is.

I know the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Epp) has been a fair person in the past. I think he should really consider putting off this measure. I appeal to him to put off Bill C-70. I believe we should take a good long hard look at it, Mr. Speaker, and I make that recommendation to the Minister.

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, it will not be easy to say something novel in this debate. On the other hand, it is also very difficult not to say anything because this measure is so upsetting and backward in terms of the evolution of the social policy in this country, it makes it impossible to remain silent.

I would like to answer a few questions about some things which have puzzled me. My first question is how is this money spent when it reaches the mothers of this nation? The money, Mr. Speaker, is usually spent very quickly and it is spent on purchases at the corner grocery store and the department store for the necessities of the child. If we multiply this family allowance by the numbers of people who spend it—and I am told that it is spent very quickly—we can see that this as a total sum could be an economic force of considerable impact on our economy. Therefore, it helps the family, the retail stores and it helps trade and commerce.

To look at this only as an expenditure of the state is a very narrow outlook. It is actually a good stimulant of the economy. It puts money where it is needed and it helps the growth of our economy. It puts money where the need is immediate and at the level of our retail system where sales can make the difference, particularly at the small business level.

The second question is how will the deficit be reduced by this proposed deindexation? That is the main hobbyhorse of the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Epp) in his explanation. If you compare the sum of money, which the present Conservative Government will not distribute once the deindexation takes place next year, it is a fraction of the deficit, at best a fraction of 1 per cent. It is a figure that will not make an indent in the deficit, nor will it have any impact to speak of. To use the deindexation issue as one that is going to help the economy by reducing the deficit is a very serious way of misleading Canadians into believing that it will. It is an illusion, and the Progressive Conservative Party better wake up to this reality.

The third thought that comes to mind in analyzing the consequences of this Bill is what does it do to our social security system. This Bill is being presented by way of smoke and mirrors, which I regret to say, is pseudo-justice. The appearance of the increase in the child tax credit at first sight leads one to conclude that we are making progress. When you look at the cumulative combined effect of the three measures which have been so well elaborated and analyzed by previous speakers, you can see this is a backward social measure. It is not worthy of the fine progress made over the last few decades in developing a solid and strong social security system for our families.

I believe that universality is the more cost effective method. It is the fairer method and it is also the one that administratively can be better carried out. Everybody receives whatever the sum is but you make sure that the income tax system takes back from those who have more for the benefit of those who have less. It has worked and served us well until now. We should make sure that it will continue to serve us.

This Government will have some difficulties when it administers this program when certain families move above or below the threshhold. People will have to apply for consideration and some people will be disqualified. There will have to be a continuous administration of the system, which is costly. A means test will be required. That seems to be the guiding philosophy and criteria of the so-called Progressive Conservative Party. What there is progressive, I fail to see.

I submit that the nation is in trouble when the Minister of National Health and Welfare begins to talk like the Minister of Finance (Mr. Wilson). The Minister of National Health and Welfare is the Minister of the poor and the Minister of the Canadian people who have so far benefited from the measures for their welfare. When he begins, as he has done in recent months, to echo the tune of the Minister of Finance, I submit he is abandoning his mandate. He is somehow representing the interests of the Minister of Finance, the interests of those who want to reduce the deficit, but he is not fighting in the interests of all of us who are concerned about the future of our social security system. More than that, he is not fighting for those who have benefited from the system as it has been administered so far, namely, in a universal manner.

We all gain by a system, Mr. Speaker, that distributes wealth through universal programs and taxes those who can pay, rather than by the selective application which, by 1990, and this is the bottom line of the Bill before us, will mean that the average Canadian family will in real purchasing power lose over $1,000. That is the sadness of the measure. All of a sudden Canadians are being told that as of next year their family allowances will no longer keep pace, with the cost of living that is, up to 3 per cent. Everybody's capacity to receive and use this income will be affected by 3 per cent beginning next year. There will be an erosion in purchasing power of family allowance recipients.

To us who are the architects of the social security system of Canada, this is a profoundly hurting experience.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Caccia: I hear some Members of the New Democratic Party howling. They have never been in power. They have never put into practice any scheme. We, successive Liberal Governments, have put and built into place a fine social security system. It is very hurtful to see a dismantling operation as a result of the Progressive Conservative Party getting into power and gradually shifting the income to the advantage of those in the higher income brackets and to the disadvantage of those in the lower income brackets because that will be the net effect of this measure in the long run. Let me repeat, that will be the net effect in the long run. You have to see it in its totality and as it will affect people by 1990. At that time, we hope we will have an opportunity to settle the accounts on the hustings. We will certainly have something to say about the Tory candidates in each of our ridings concerning this measure. The present Minister of National Health and Welfare will also have his own riding defending this measure. I suspect, Mr. Speaker, that that will be the case.

Mr. Neil Young (Beaches): Mr. Speaker, I take no great pleasure in talking about this particular Bill. It is extremely regressive and will have a serious effect on Canadian women and their families. Why would the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Epp), who I know to be a fairly reasonable type person, suddenly rush in to declare closure on debate on this Bill? What is the Government afraid of? The Government must know, as I do, that there are a growing number of Canadians across the land who view this Budget with some dismay. They have examined the Budget—and for very good reason—in a way that Canadians have never examined previous Budgets. Senior citizens across the country indicated their displeasure during the month of June when, despite the arguments of the Government that the seniors supported what it was doing, they clearly showed that they did not support it. In fact, they organized in a political way rarely seen before among the senior population. They organized so effectively that they will never view Governments as they did in the past when they trusted Governments to treat them properly and listened to the promises of politicians. They suddenly found that all the promises made to them were betrayed and that they were being asked to be sacrificial lambs in the Government's fight to reduce the deficit. Seniors saw what the Government was doing to them in the Budget, and I think women are seeing the same thing.

Like most Hon. Members last summer, I spent time talking with people in my own constituency and in other communities to hear what they had to say about the Budget of the Government. It is widely recognized that the Budget, more than any other Budget, certainly in my experience and in the experience of many other people, constitutes probably the largest shift in disposable income away from people at the low and middle income levels to people in high income brackets. There is absolutely no doubt in anyone's mind that the Budget dealt a severe blow to those people who could least afford to pay to reduce, as the Government put it, the national deficit. That Budget is being fully understood and women are beginning to organize against this attack on family allowances and, I would even say, an attack on the family as we in Canada know it.

There is absolutely no question that the deindexing proposal, in addition to the other ones in the Income Tax Act—and we will have plenty of time to talk about them specifically as they affect family allowances—is an outright attack on women. Many women rely on that cheque as their only source of independent income. Contrary to the promises of the Government during the election campaign that it would do many things for women, it brought in these proposals. The Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) appeared on national television several times promising to provide more dollars for rape crisis centres. What did he do in the Budget? He did nothing, absolutely nothing. What about the promise with regard to transition houses for battered women? There has been nothing. What about equal pay for work of equal value? There has been nothing. What about more money for child care services? The Prime Minister referred it to a parliamentary committee. I am sure the Hon. Member for Vancouver East (Ms. Mitchell) will ensure that women's rights and the rights of children are advanced on that committee.

What about research and development? The Prime Minister promised oodles of money to step up the efforts of the country in the area of research and development. What did we see in the Budget? We saw nothing but departmental cuts for research and development. What about the Canada Council? All we see is less money for the arts. What about social programs? The Prime Minister declared that social programs, particularly universal ones, were a sacred trust and that if there was to be any change in social programs, the money saved would certainly not go toward reducing the deficit. What have we seen since then? We have seen that the Government was clear in its intention when it decided to deindex old age security benefits and that any money it saved, as if it was its money and not that of taxpayers, would go toward reducing the deficit. The same thing is happening in the area of family allowances and in other areas of the income tax system. If the Government were seriously interested in reducing the deficit, there are other ways of doing it rather than attacking the poor, those least able to afford it. Regardless of the protestations of the Liberal Party today, it could have reverted to the marginal tax rates of 1980. At that time we argued that the Liberal Government had no business revising marginal tax rates for high income earners. If the Government were to do the proper thing and revert to the marginal tax rates of 1980, in our estimation it could raise something in the order of $1.7 billion. It would ensure that the people who could afford to pay would pay to make the country run economically. I see that my time is up.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The Hon. Member will have four minutes remaining the next time this matter is before the House.

It being 5.35 p.m., the House will now proceed to the consideration of Private Members' Business as listed on today's Order Paper.

THE VOLUNTEER SECTOR

AUTHORIZATION FOR THE STANDING COMMITTEE ON HEALTH, WELFARE AND SOCIAL AFFAIRS TO STUDY AND REPORT

Mrs. Lise Bourgault (Argenteuil-Papineau) moved that the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs be empowered to study and report on the volunteer sector in order to evaluate its social and financial impact and to recommend appropriate ways of offering fiscal or other compensations to volunteers and volunteer organizations.

She said: Mr. Speaker, in my speech I intend to cover three aspects of volunteer work in our society. According to Statistics Canada, this kind of work represents, in Canada, the equivalent of $3 billion per year in salaries alone. Volunteer work continues to be a very important asset which the Government should encourage and support through measures adapted to the needs of volunteer workers.

Mr. Speaker, volunteer work has changed a great deal in the last 25 years, and that is why I would like to define, first of all, the concept of volunteer work, and then describe the typical volunteer worker. In concluding, I intend to elaborate on the role of volunteer work in our society, its limitations and its problems, and I will stress the vital role of government in this area and ways of giving tangible recognition to volunteer work and its practitioners.

Basically, we can distinguish three kinds of social volunteer action: factual action, spontaneous action and volunteer action. Since we are concerned at this point with volunteer action or volunteer work, I shall briefly describe what is generally understood by the two other types of actions.

Factual action, although the conception may be somewhat vague and ambiguous, and although there are several types of factual action, refers to the kind of action resulting from membership in established groups or institutions that exist for the purpose of achieving certain objectives or in order to perpetuate customs or tradition. Although the individual's participation in such action is not compulsory, the kind of factual action will depend on certain natural criteria such as age or sex and belonging to a given professional or occupational group. Factual action is always the result of a society's natural and institutional structures.

Spontaneous action, which by definition refers to freely chosen and voluntary participation by its members, takes place within the framework of small, unstructured groups that have no clear-cut social function, except at certain specific moments. Although the importance of spontaneous action and its contribution to society cannot be denied, it is primarily aimed at satisfying the individual needs of the participants themselves. Taking part in spontaneous action is a way of accomplishing individual aims which are not seen as being part of a community effort.

As to voluntary action, it is more commonly referred to as the volunteer sector.

Mr. Speaker, I have no intention of making an exhaustive retrospective of the various definitions of the volunteer sector. I would rather try to give a clear and practical definition of voluntary action so as to make the significance of my motion more readily understandable. As early as in 1948, Lord Beveridge defined voluntary action as private action, in the sense that it does not come under the State. While following in the footsteps of Beveridge, let us say that it is necessary to identify the five aspects of voluntary action: voluntary action that implies non mandatory participation; voluntary action through participation in a group project; in voluntary action, consideration of profit is non existent; the voluntary action done within existing institutions in a society at a given moment in its history; voluntary action focused on the achievement of societal objectives.

Indeed the Social Affairs Department has already classified volunteer actions as follows: social or service volunteer action; sports or recreational volunteer action; artistic, moral support, leisure volunteer action, and so on. And so it is that voluntary action is done through constant exchange between an individual and society. Such is the thrust of my motion, Mr. Speaker, because, since then, the impact of the voluntary sector on the evolution of society has been growing and the difficulties inherent in this mass movement keep making headlines.

I propose to use statistics to draw the classical profile of a volunteer and show that the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs must be empowered to study and report on the volunteer sector in order to evaluate its social and financial impact.

Notwithstanding the great interest in the volunteer sector, there are practically no independent or empirical statistics on a national scale, except for Novia Carter's 1975 study. Statistics Canada's national survey is the first wide-ranging survey ever done in Canada. It will go a long way towards filling the gap of missing data in that field, but it alone cannot possibly meet the demand for statistics. It was designed only to gather information on volunteer workers generally rather than to make an in-depth study of the characteristics, activities and motivations of a given group of volunteers.

The survey was aimed at one third of all participants in the February 1980 survey on the working population, roughly 18,745 households or 43,000 individuals. Its objective was threefold: Obtain information on the total amount of volunteer activities in Canada as well as descriptive data on individual volunteers; determine the kinds of volunteer organizations which exist and the types of services they are offering; discover why the people who were previously engaged in volunteer work have quit and why those who at one time considered engaging in volunteer activities have abandoned this idea.

In view of the enormous amount of data collected, I will limit myself to a brief analysis covering the widest possible range of general information. I will deal with three major issues: the rate of participation in volunteer work and the characteristics of the people involved in it, the amount of volunteer work done, and the types of volunteer organizations.

Mr. Speaker, the generally accepted notion of the typical volunteer is that of a middle-age married woman who is bored, well-off financially and anxious to help others. But the few empirical studies made so far runs counter to that notion. A 1969 survey carried out in Great Britain indicated that middle-age married women of the middle class no longer make up the vast majority of volunteers. On the other hand, the Novia Carter study indicated a surprisingly high proportion of men and a large participation of young people, low income workers and poorly educated people. A similar survey made in the United States confirmed these findings.

To draw up an adequate profile of the volunteers which this survey has identified, we should consider two factors: the rate of participation in the volunteer sector and the social and demographic traits of the volunteers.

Before looking into the rate of participation in the volunteer sector, it is logical to deal first with volunteer activities as a whole. The survey indicates that there is in Canada a large number of volunteers, 2.7 million in all, or 15.2 per cent of the active population have done volunteer work without pay during the year under review, namely, from February, 1979 to February, 1980.

The analysis of the rate of volunteers per age and sex brought to light a number of interesting findings, the most important of which being the comparable rates between men and women, respectively 14.2 per cent and 16.2 per cent. Age seems to be a determining factor in both sexes, the oldest groups, 25 years and over, demonstrating higher rates of volunteering than younger groups. For instance, the rates for people aged 25 to 44 being 19.8 per cent alone is more than twice that for people aged 15 to 19 at 9.4 per cent, or for those aged 20 to 24 at 9.3 per cent.

Moreover, the highest rates are among those aged 25 to 44, married and with an education up to at least one university degree. It is interesting to note the higher incidence of volunteer service among people having an occupation, namely 16.4 per cent, as compared to the unemployed, 9.8 per cent, or to people outside the work force, 14.2 per cent. It therefore appears that, contrary to a widespread belief, volunteer service is not limited to people without gainful employment. Figures show, however, that part-time workers are more likely to engage in volunteer service than those with a full-time job.

Finally, a breakdown by occupation shows that workers in the "management and professional," "primary sector occupations" and "business" groups have the highest rates, while a breakdown by industry shows the highest rates in "farming" and "public service".

To summarize, let us say that the highest rates of volunteer service have been noted in the following groups: middle-aged persons of either sex, married people, employed people and people with a relatively higher level of education.

Finally, in relation to population and volunteer service rates, employed persons have the highest ratio of volunteers when compared with other groups of activities and more than 80 per cent worked full-time.

Indeed, a few months ago, Mr. Speaker, I had a poll taken of my constituents in Argenteuil-Papineau in order to know and compare the results of the Carter Survey and the volunteer situation in my constituency.

Now, my constituency has some 327 volunteer associations, in which 9,062 persons do volunteer work for a total 993,316 hours. The typical volunteer is married in 79 per cent of cases, his or her income is approximately $20,000 in 46 per cent of cases, and $25,000 and over in 31 per cent of cases. He or she is aged 51 to 64 in 29 per cent of cases, a female in 52 per cent of cases and a male in 48 per cent of cases. The volunteers of Argenteuil-Papineau want to contribute to society in 62 per cent of cases, and to increase old-age security benefits in 24 per cent of cases.

In short, it seems that the profile of our volunteers is essentially as drawn by Mrs. Carter. The stereotype of the unemployed, middle-aged, married woman true to the traditional concept of the typical volunteer does not come out in this analysis. On the contrary, we have noted relatively equal distributions for most of the demographic variables.

More striking still is the almost identical distribution of men and women, the high percentage of people with high school education or better, and the high rate of employed persons.

At present the highest ratio—31.5 per cent—of persons who did volunteer work during the reference year, that is from February 1979 to February 1980, belong to the "social services and welfare" group. That group includes a relatively wide spectrum of social services, including child care, convassing organizations, service clubs and so forth.

Although we do not have more detailed breakdowns, there is reason to believe that a large part of the respondents in that group work for a canvassing organization.

In order of importance, religious organizations rank second among organizations, representing 25.5 per cent of all volunteers. As far as recreational organizations are concerned they include one quarter of all volunteers. Then there is education with 16.3 per cent and health with 7.9 per cent.

However we can say that there seems to be some relation between paid and voluntary work because according to our findings, the work done by volunteers vary to some extent according to their professional work for which they get paid.

Finally, the Government cannot remain indifferent with regard to the potential of the voluntary sector. Not only can voluntary organizations provide direct and complementary services to institutional resources but, in addition, the voluntary sector can become a place for privileged training for young people and adults. It can also be perceived as the anteroom to the formal sector where young people can prepare themselves to enter the world of paid work.

The voluntary sector, because of the jobs that it still manages to create, may be considered in this period of financial crisis and unemployment as a buffer in terms of jobs created and also in terms of jobs saved. We know that the services rendered by voluntary organizations allow in many cases public institutions to save paid jobs, but we now have the tendency to overlook the fact that at present the voluntary sector is one of the few areas where jobs are created. Of course, those are temporary, and short-term jobs offering very low wages, but in spite of those aspects for many people work is the important thing. Under the circumstances, we understand the interest of the Government which finds in voluntary organizations some openings for young people, women, or marginal workers looking for jobs and this at a relatively low cost.

Remember, Mr. Speaker, that each year, the general public and the Governments hand out millions of dollars in gifts or grants to voluntary organizations. Whether under manpower programs or direct subsidies such as New Horizons, etc., thousands of Canadian volunteers are managing public funds. In my constituency, noteworthy tourist activities such as the crossing of Lake Simon, the Montpellier Summer Festival, the Lachute agricultural fair bring in thousands of dollars and create hundreds of jobs. Mr. Speaker, such activities are entirely organized and managed by volunteers.

In short, the Government is for more than one reason concerned with voluntary action. However, at present, many volunteers are restless either because they are wondering about the results of their action or they are physically or morally tired of always being at the forefront and finally because the costs of their action go beyond their financial resources. Consider the cost of fuel, of child care, etc.

The want of relieving forces and the financial crisis are adding to the already very heavy burden weighing on that fellowship chain both so strong and so vulnerable.

Mr. Speaker, this is the subject of my motion: That the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs be empowered to study and report on the volunteer sector in order to evaluate its social and financial impact and to recommend appropriate ways of offering fiscal or other compensations to volunteers and voluntary organizations.

The tax system should be thoroughly amended to bring a more significant support to people and organizations involved in the voluntary sector, whether it is in arts, recreation or community action. Without such steps, Mr. Speaker, the crisis now threatening the voluntary sector could cost a lot more to the Governments than the few thousand dollars which would entail a reasonable and stimulative fiscal compensation that would help democratize and extend to all strata of the community the access to volunteer and community work.

[English]

Ms. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, first I would like to congratulate the Hon. Member who raised this issue and who spoke so eloquently in support of greater recognition for volunteers. On behalf of the New Democratic Party, I will certainly strongly support the proposal which she brought forward, a proposal to study the volunteer sector to evaluate its social and financial impact and to recommend appropriate ways of offering fiscal and other compensation to volunteers and to volunteer organizations.

I recall that in 1979, a similar proposal was made. For a short time I sat on the subcommittee which was established to look at volunteerism. We had really just begun to get into the subject when there was no more Government and we had to go to the polls.

My Party recognizes the very many hours of volunteer time and the very valuable contribution that many thousands of volunteers have made to community services, the movements for social reform and many kinds of self-help services across the country. I think we all recognize that these are very important and essential contributions that these people, the majority of whom are women, are making to society.

Most volunteers work many hours with no financial recognition and often without other kinds of recognition. This is one thing about which we should talk in committee. It is important that volunteers who are so dedicated and give so much of themselves also have some form of recognition. If they do not receive some form of honorarium to cover their costs, as the Hon. Member is suggesting, then at least they should have something on paper. One of the things I had proposed before was that homemakers giving of their expertise and developing a great deal of skill in community services should be able to put that on a résumé when they go looking for jobs. Often women have not had paid job experience. It would be very valuable to have some proof of their unpaid experience. I asked the former Liberal Minister of Employment and Immigration if this could not be one of the things that Canada employment offices would do.

It is also important that there be some form of honorarium for certain kinds of volunteers and certainly for low-income people who have just as much skill and perhaps far more motivation for helping out in their communities but simply cannot afford to do so unless there is some way that their costs including bus fare and babysitting are covered.

Before I move on, I would like to mention one thing. If I understood the Hon. Member correctly, she mentioned that the typical volunteer is married and has an income of probably over $20,000 per year. I would like to mention a very interesting volunteer experience with which I was connected for many years. It was a very productive service in British Columbia composed of a group of welfare mothers who started up a program called the Vancouver Opportunities Program, a program which subsequently expanded throughout the province. These welfare mothers decided that if they were ever going to get out of the welfare trap, they needed to get experience and training and there were many services with which they wanted to help out.

These women developed a program which allowed them to put in a certain number of hours per week on a volunteer basis, not taking a paid job away from anyone, in schools, self-help programs, day care centres, libraries and a vast number of different agencies and services. At one time, thousands of them were involved in the program. One of the important incentives was the fact that they received an extra $100 on their welfare payments which helped cover costs and gave them a little extra boost. That money was very much needed as well.

I knew many of the people involved in this program, most of whom were women, although later on, men were included. Many of these women went on into paraprofessional jobs. They took training and some are working in the administration of public housing or as paraprofessionals in welfare agencies. Some have gone on into the regular job market. This is the kind of program at which it would be interesting to look in committee.

We also want to recognize the very important contribution made by the many, many volunteer organizations across this country. In my riding of Vancouver East, I am very proud of the fact that there exists probably more citizens' organizations that in any other community in Canada. Yet this riding is largely composed of low-income communities with many different ethnic groups. We have many ethnic organizations in which people give of their time. There are Chinese, Italian, Indo-Canadian, Portuguese, Korean and Japanese, just to name a few. We have many native people who come from rural areas who help each other in forming their own organizations and reaching, as a network, to help native people so they will not be trapped in some of the problems of the street which are so common.

We have area planning groups which are assisted by municipal groups which have developed community plans in five areas of my riding. They have spent hours and hours of heavy work, with a great deal of technical expertise, in developing plans and actions which would improve their communities. I am also very proud of a group which I helped to organize called the Strathcona Property Owners and Tenants Group, which completely changed the type of urban renewal programs which we have. Some 15 to 20 years ago when it was established it helped to redevelop the Chinese community of downtown Vancouver. There are block representatives and all kinds of meetings in two languages involving a lot of resource people. They put hours into this. The same is true of the Downtown Eastside Residents Association which represents an area of Vancouver which people said was a slum with which nothing could be done. Those people have organized. It is simply remarkable to see the type of things they have done to improve services, to build new housing and to make the area into a real community. Those are just some examples. I know that Hon. Members will have many more.

There are volunteers who work in community centres, neighbourhood houses and sports programs. I want to say that I am concerned that we look very carefully at what volunteers should not be doing. It is important that volunteers not replace essential public services, for example. It is important that they not be seen to be replacing paid workers and professional workers who are essential to carry out legislated services. It is easy, and I know it has happened in British Columbia, for Governments under restraint, and because they think it would be economical, to completely disregard the essential public function of services which are the right of Canadians and which must remain under legislative jurisdictions. This is not to say that voluneers cannot often help as part of a team with professionals, even in these services.

We are also opposed to privatization. I hope it is not being suggested that some of these essential services be turned over to the private sector in the thought that it would cut costs by putting in volunteers, cutting salaries and undermining unions and workers who have worked hard to get their salaries up to a decent rate of pay. Recently, we had a real tragedy in Vancouver, where a transition house which was formerly operated by the Department of Human Resources was turned over to the private sector. The YWCA tried to maintain it for a while and they just could not do it. They were not given enough money. It is now back into no woman's land. It is without staff and, at the moment, women are occupying that service demanding that it be reinstated with adequate government funding. We do not want to see this happen in other sectors. I know that most volunteers would not want this to happen either.

Thus, we must define in this committee the appropriate role of volunteers. I would like to see some real supports which would help volunteer organizations. I know that many groups are advocacy groups and they are essential. I am speaking of tenant organizations, anti-poverty groups, consumer groups and environmental groups which are working for reforms and, perhaps, taking small "p" political action. It has been very difficult for Governments to give these organizations the type of objective help they need in the way of funding. It has been difficult for many of them to be classified as charitable organizations so that donations they receive can be income tax deductible. We must recognize the many volunteers who are involved in the peace movement which, again, performs an important function. I wish to recognize the number of women who are dedicated to this type of movement. I have mentioned the environmental movement and the involvement of groups of all kinds, including unions. Incidentally, the solidarity protest we had in British Columbia reached out and involved networks of volunteers in every community. They advocated progressive changes. They protested the type of services that were being cut back, which was hurting people and which is still hurting the people of British Columbia.

I am sure we will be discussing all of these measures in committee. I will not take more time tonight to go into the matter further. I just wish to reiterate that volunteers must never replace essential public services. I think we need to define what we mean by private agencies. They are sometimes called voluntary agencies, although they are operated with paid staffs. We need to clarify what we mean by those words. We need to recognize in every positive way we can the outstanding contribution of volunteers across Canada.

Mr. Claude Lanthier (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): It is a pleasure, as Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance, to reply to the motion presented by the Hon. Member for Argenteuil-Papineau (Mrs. Bourgault) and to emphasize the importance of the volunteer sector in Canadian society, something on which I am sure all Members of this House are in agreement.

Many federal departments have ongoing contacts with volunteer organizations, either as a way to facilitate social action or to promote various policies. The Department of the Secretary of State has programs that are concerned exclusively with volunteer organizations. It has a national budget of $480,000, plus $300,000 for a regional component. The program provides support for 16 national and nearly 100 provincial and territorial organizations.

We feel that the Secretary of State's voluntary action program plays an essential role in supporting social action, community development, economic development and the creation of volunteer organizations.

The Department also has a program for participation by the disabled, which has a national budget of about $430,000 and a regional budget totalling $287,000. This program provides assistance to four national organizations, which include the Coalition of the Provincial Organizations of the Handicapped, the Canadian Mental Health Association, the Association for the Hearing Handicapped and the Canadian Association for Legal Assistance, Information and Research for the Disabled. The program for participation by the disabled supports volunteer organizations for the disabled and provides financial assistance for projects promoting their full and active participation in our society.

We see these programs as examples of the kind of projects our Government is promoting in the volunteer sector. The Department of National Health and Welfare also has support programs for community groups, which are very well known and very useful. In addition to its supportive role, designed so as not to undermine the self-sufficiency of the volunteer sector, the Canadian Government has played a major part in resolving the difficulties arising from our tax structure and the structure of Government services that are particularly problematic for the volunteer sector.

There has been one issue in particular that was of some concern to the volunteer sector, namely the definition of "political activities", because it meant that certain charitable organizations were unable to be recognized as such for tax purposes, while others were concerned they might lose their status.

Members of the House will recall that this question was dealt with and quite clearly explained by the Minister of National Revenue last May 29 in Vancouver. The Income Tax Act provides that all the resources of a charitable organization must be used for the charities of the organization itself. Therefore any charitable organization getting involved in political activities may very well lose its acquired status. Charitable organizations then began to fear that the simple fact of telling Members of their choice their point of view on certain issues might be considered as a political activity likely to warrant the loss of their indispensable status.

In contemporary society it has become obvious that militancy, on the part of non-government organizations or individuals, is now a central element of our democratic organization.

Therefore it was a decisive step for charitable organizations when the Minister of National Revenue announced that he would allow non-partisan political activities and would consult with charitable organizations before going ahead with his current projects. In short, henceforth a charitable organization will be allowed to express its views to elected representatives of its choice inasmuch as the issue in question relates to the charitable activities of the organization. There is no question of condoning activities favourable to candidates or political parties, even if it were the Progressive Conservative Party.

It is certain that the Income Tax Act has significant effects on charitable organizations and this is why it is important for the future and the health of the voluntary sector in Canada to allay any fear those organizations may have of losing their very crucial status simply because they expressed their opinions to the duly elected representatives of the people. The Government needs the opinion of voluntary organizations. Often, they are the first to inform the Government that such or such a service should be given to meet new social needs. As they work directly with people, and especially with those in need, they can see problems and challenges which escape the Government. Voluntary organizations have to be active and militant, and therefore the changes proposed last May are quite welcome.

However, as concerns the tax system, the status of these organizations is not the only matter at issue. The tax credit for charitable donations is still under considerations. For instance, we have to find out how the implementation of the tax credit would affect the taxation system and what would have to be the cost-sharing agreements between the federal and provincial Governments. Obviously, the advantages of the tax credit have to be balanced against those of the deduction from income. Would abandoning the deduction from income and replacing it with the tax credit add to the tax burden of the average taxpayer, and if so, how can we avoid it?

Mr. Speaker, Canadians are well aware that, unfortunately, all taxation matters are complex, and as much as a proposal seems desirable and complete, its repercussions always have to be examined before it is implemented. The voluntary sector has expressed its views at length to the Government on taxation matters.

Various departments have held consultations, public servants have made analyses and groups of volunteers have come to Ottawa to express their opinions. This exemplary show of sustained efforts will certainly enable us to solve progressively any future problem, and our Government will eventually find an equitable response. However, if we explain in detail all these taxation and income issues which concern the voluntary sector, it is because this is indeed an area where the Government can be helpful.

We are not at all certain that new mechanisms are needed to look at the voluntary sector as, because of its very nature, this sector includes many enthusiastic individuals and groups throughout the country only too eager to impart their ideas and points of view to us. As parliamentarians, we have a responsibility to listen to what they have to say and, from there, to find ways to improve the organization of Government services in this area.

Mr. Gabriel Desjardins (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, it is with much interest that I take part today in this debate on the motion moved by my colleague the Hon. Member for Argenteuil-Papineau (Mrs. Bourgault). I congratulate her for the quality of her speech and I thank her for giving us the opportunity to make the apology of the volunteer sector. I think it is important that we, in the House, take once in a while the time to praise the admirable work of volunteers.

Mr. Speaker, as elected representative of the Témiscamingue riding, I can assure you that distant regions like mine and many others in Quebec have been developed thanks largely to the generous contribution of volunteers.

I wish to take this opportunity today to thank and pay tribute to all volunteer individuals and organizations who are at work in my region and greatly contribute to improving the quality of life of my fellow Canadians.

If I may, Mr. Speaker, I should like to provide an example of the kind of volunteer organizations which we have in our distant regions and which dedicate themselves to the safety of the people.

There are here a number of members from remote areas who suspect that I am referring to this great bunch of guys who are our volunteer firefighters. They are not paid, they give themselves the training of professional firefighters and decide, out of sheer generosity, to save the lives of their neighbours. There are a number of them in my own riding and I know that there are some people here who have a number of them in their own municipalities or small parishes. In order to understand their courage fully, Hon. Members should see it in the context of a region like mine, some cold winter night in December, when they must leave the comfort of a fireplace, rush out in a below 40 degree temperature to try and put out a fire and save lifes. There are people like that back home. And I think it is an excellent occasion to pay tribute to these people who often risk their lifes to save others.

In this sense, I think the Hon. Member for Argenteuil-Papineau is providing us with a great opportunity to pay tribute to all these peoples in our communities who, by the thousands, work very hard for the development of our communities.

If I may, Mr. Speaker, I should like to deal more specifically with the motion before us which asks that the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs report on the volunteer sector in order to evaluate its social and financial impact and to recommend appropriate ways of offering fiscal or other compensations to volunteers and volunteer organizations. I should like to make the following comments.

The volunteer sector has been there for a long time, Mr. Speaker. Over the years, it has taken up an important place amid the other well-known sectors in our society, the public sector and the private sector.

It is a fact that compared to the other two, the volunteer sector is somewhat mysterious. Its dynamics cannot be seen, by reason of its very nature, because it needs no official framework nor structures. This means there is no question of specific numbers of person-years or hours, of measuring or assessing each task, or looking at payrolls.

Mr. Speaker, in my view, that is exactly what makes the beauty and the greatness of the volunteer service, this concept of gratuitousness and total availability.

As I often say, Mr. Speaker, true volunteer work is an ailment, the altruism ailment, the ailment to want to serve others at any cost. And I know volunteers would want that kind of ailment to be as contagious as possible.

And if the Government, Mr. Speaker, had to pay for those services rendered by volunteers, it would never find the funds or the money needed.

It is precisely because volunteer service precludes any assessment that it has become over these last few years an interesting subject of study. Many attempts have been made to better identify the economic and social force of volunteer service in this country.

A number of studies, analyses and surveys were done on the subject. I am thinking specifically of an important survey of the work force done in 1981 that was one of the first attempts to evaluate the contribution of volunteers. Honourable Members will recall that that survey brought forth very interesting facts indeed. For instance, volunteers in Canada provided an average 137.4 hours during the reference year, and married people, as was said earlier, had the largest total of volunteers and hours worked. Generally speaking, single people, either widowed, divorced or separated, spent the most time individually doing volunteer work. The survey also pointed out that the typical volunteer was employed and had a higher education.

The labour force survey was followed by other interesting studies, the best known of which no doubt is that done by the economist David Ross on the financial and economic dimensions of registered charitable institutions and volunteer activity in Canada. Mr. Ross estimated that the total economic contribution of charitable institutions and volunteer workers included in the two Statistics Canada surveys he analyzed were the equivalent, in comparative terms, of 1.7 per cent of the gross national product. Compared with other industries, that contribution is twice that of the primary wood processing industry. It is close to a tenth of that of the whole sector of social, cultural, business and personal services, and close to a third of the economic contribution of the building industry.

Mr. Speaker, you may ask why I refer to the Statistics Canada surveys and Mr. Ross's study. Well, it is to show that this sector is currently being seriously researched, and the public can at any time consult those studies to get information.

Moreover, the Volunteer Work Program of the Secretary of State Department is now working with Statistic Canada on the holding of a national survey on volunteer work. Apparently, it also accepted to fund a survey on employer attitudes towards their employees' volunteer activities. This is the point I wanted to make: The Government already is funding many research activities, each of which opens new vistas. This is a way to increase knowledge.

I also want to point out the work done by the Coalition of National Volunteer Organizations to define the concept of volunteer work. The Coalition of National Volunteer Organizations, which represents many of the 50,000 charitable institutions in Canada, attended the National Conference on the Economy that was held in Ottawa in March. It outlined the various ways in which the volunteer sector contributes to economic life, especially by offering job training programs, creating new services and promoting discussion on issues of general interest. The participation of the volunteer sector in that Conference and the submissions of voluntary organizations to the MacDonald Commission also made the Government aware of the views of volunteer workers, so that they may be recognized in the future review and development of policies.

Mr. Speaker, polls, like Decima and Gallup also have supplied a lot of useful information on the subject.

The Decima Poll in May 1985 has shown that the great majority of respondents, 87 per cent, feel that groups work is the best for influencing corporate and Government decisions. Further, young people and women are among the most likely to consider group work as a good way of exercising decisive influence. In view of the increasing role of those two groups in decision-making, this shows that the influence of the voluntary sector could be felt increasingly.

The Gallup Poll in turn shows that donations relate to a rather unpredictable behaviour. Nearly 90 per cent of the respondents have stated that they never decide beforehand on the amount of their annual charitable donations. This points to the importance for charitable organizations of using dynamic and innovative techniques for collecting funds.

I mention these surveys, Mr. Speaker, simply to show that they are one of the means through which we can learn more about the social and economic implications of the voluntary sector. Through its voluntary action program, the Department of the Secretary of State is in a good position to assemble all these bits of information and analyse them, and this is certainly being done.

The Hon. Member for Argenteuil-Papineau would like appropriate means to provide these fiscal or other compensations to volunteers and to voluntary organizations to be recommended. Could it not be said that, as soon as a voluntary worker receives some compensation, he can no longer be considered a voluntary worker?

In my opinion, Mr. Speaker, what differentiates the voluntary worker from any other is precisely this element of working for nothing and self-sacrifice. The bona fide volunteer does not seek financial compensation, for his wages or salary consist in realizing that he is participating in the well-being of those around him.

If, on the other hand, we are talking about tax incentives, that is something else again. We know that the give-and-take proposition led to a study on the possibility of offering tax credits in exchange for charitable gifts. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Wilson) has made a note of all recommendations received and I have the impression that the establishment of such credits remains a valid option. However it does require further consideration, for we must at least assess the indirect impact such a step might have. Be that as it may, the first steps have been taken and the matter is under active consideration.

In concluding, Mr. Speaker, I would say that the intent of the motion is commendable but, as I see it, should Parliament seek additional information there are plenty of reports or surveys and other documents. Thanks to all the work done, this sector is now gaining even wider recognition.

Mr. Peter Peterson (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, the motion of the Hon. Member for Argenteuil-Papineau (Mrs. Bourgault), that the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs be empowered to study and report on the volunteer sector, deserves careful consideration. As has been pointed out earlier in this debate, the voluntary sector is a key element of our society. Its strength lies in its freedom of action and its self-sufficiency. It is interesting to compare the voluntary sector in this country with that which exists in some other parts of the world. In some countries, where full democracy is not a way of life, voluntary organizations are very circumscribed in what they may do. Fortunately, Canada is characterized by a sector that adds appreciably to the quality of life of our citizens. However, its social and financial impact is elusive and that explains the desire to examine the sector from a closer vantage point.

The national household survey on volunteer activity, which the Department of the Secretary of State and Statistics Canada are undertaking, should help to clarify many aspects of voluntarism including economic, social, and even philosophical and psychological, if you consider factors such as the motivations which lead people to volunteer.

Parliamentarians have various opportunities at present to question Ministers about the voluntary action aspect of their portfolios. The Standing Committee on Communications and Culture, for instance, allows us to put questions to the Secretary of State (Mr. Bouchard) seeking clarification on that Department's many dealings with the voluntary sector. We do this in the framework of the departmental estimates, and have always received co-operation from the departmental officials in supplying us with whatever additional materials we may require. A mechanism thus exists for us to examine Government links with voluntarism in this way.

The question of offering fiscal or other compensation to volunteers and their organizations is an interesting one. One may note that many volunteers are not interested in receiving compensation for their services, that their motives are completely philanthropic and humanitarian. For many volunteers, the fact of helping someone in need or serving the community is compensation enough. Compensation could raise the spectre of bureaucratic mechanisms for allocating it, which would be anathema to the sector which, after all, is built on the free spirit I have referred to.

Fiscal incentives to organizations are already being looked at, as has been indicated earlier in the debate. The Government has received the benefit of the views of a great many organizations, all offering their viewpoints and suggestions as to how fiscal incentives should work. I understand that discussions took place between the Secretary of State and the Minister of Finance (Mr. Wilson) before the Budget and that discussions are continuing.

It is interesting to note Gallup's findings when they polled on tax incentives. Fifty-four per cent of the respondents were unaware of the existence of tax incentives to encourage charitable giving. Awareness increased with income-education level and white collar occupations. There was also a correlation between performance of volunteer work and the incidence of charitable donations. Fifty-five per cent considered the current tax treatment of donations as fair and 28 per cent thought it unfair. Fifty-one per cent of this latter group named low income people as being disadvantaged by the tax treatment and another 8 per cent said the system favoured big donors in high income brackets. That was in a November, 1984 survey, so it is still reasonably current and probably still reflects attitudes. It provides food for thought for Parliamentarians and voluntary organizations alike.

One might well ask, Mr. Speaker, what the voluntary sector thinks of being studied and surveyed. We have at least one answer to that question. Last year Drs. J. J. Rice, David Ross, and Jean-Bernard Robichaud carried out a national consultation at the request of the Department of the Secretary of State. They conducted 100 three-hour interviews with persons interested in voluntary action across Canada to see what their requirements were and to determine their support for studies which would clarify the social and financial impact of voluntarism. In addition to the interviews, this team sent out and analysed 400 questionnaires to voluntary organizations. The result was a clear call for undertaking national surveys. Knowing that the sector itself is interested in such surveys is encouraging to researchers and Government departments which help fund such research.

I am personally very encouraged by the kinds of studies which are already being done by and on behalf of the voluntary sector. The pace of research is indeed accelerating, and I am of the view that present means and methods are adequate for evaluating the social and financial impact of the voluntary sector.

[Translation]

Mr. Charles Hamelin (Charlevoix): Mr. Speaker, following the remarks made by my colleague on the motion moved by the Hon. Member for Argenteuil-Papineau, I must emphasize the great benefits which Canadian men and women get from volunteers . . . As recently as last week, I had the opportunity to meet with a group of volunteers, and I should like to indicate to the House that like various other organizations, in this case it was the junior Chamber of Commerce of Saint-Urbain which organized for all volunteers a special evening to emphasize the enormous contribution of volunteer men and women working with various groups and they expressed to these people the gratitude of the community.

The reason my collegue moved this motion clearly stems from the fact that she wants to develop the volunteer sector, to encourage individuals to get involved in the volunteer sector which is one of the outstanding strengths of both Quebec and Canada. I think that no level of Government would be in a position to satisfy all the needs. It is a well-known fact that Canada is a large economic entity with limited resources which must try to satisfy boundless needs. Without volunteers in many areas of activities, including culture, health services and sports, our communities could not provide youths with the necessary training in all areas.

I think therefore that our colleague's proposals stems from the fact that she would like to move volunteers to do again something for their community and to obtain, if possible, a certain compensation. Well, volunteer means "he who does something out of his own free will." The volunteer gets a lot of satisfaction by feeling that he is doing something that will benefit the community and that he is doing it without pay and according to his own way of doing things. I think that today, Canadian wives and mothers who have children out of their own free will—today that is possible, in years gone by it was less so—could perhaps obtain a fair compensation for bringing Canadian men and women into this world. But do we collectively have the financial means to do it and how could we determine how much is worth the contribution of all Canadian women who are bearing children for this country? I think that those who are devoting themselves to the welfare of their community get tremendous benefits. I think that, as my colleague was saying, if we try to bureaucratize or institutionalize this generosity which is so essential to Canadian men and women, we would be taking a very dangerous step. However, I think that the purpose of our colleague's motion is essentially to encourage volunteer work within our community in the best interests of Canadian men and women throughout Canada.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hour provided for the consideration of Private Members, Business has now expired.

[Translation]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 46 deemed to have been moved.

CONFLICT OF INTEREST (A) REQUEST FOR DETAILS CONCERNING FORMATION OF CERTAIN PRIVATE COMPANIES (B) COMPANY SHAREHOLDINGS

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa-Vanier): Mr. Speaker, on Monday I asked a question in the House about the staff in the Prime Minister's Office and a rather extraordinary procedure according to which certain employees, including three senior advisors, received preferential treatment by being allowed to arrange personal service contracts and set up companies acting on their behalf. I wanted to ask the Prime Minister whether he or the Minister responsible for Treasury Board had in fact approved this contract procedure, and at the time, as Hon. Members will recall, the Deputy Prime Minister answered that he saw nothing irregular in it.

Mr. Speaker, it is not up to me to criticize, but all I know is that according to the Estimates, 120 person-years were approved for the Prime Minister's Office, and now we hear that three people, Messrs. Van Dusen, McMilland and MacAdam, would be hired by contract, and thus surplus to the person-years approved in the Estimates.

What I wanted to know was whether these people, who had established private companies in Ontario, so-called numbered companies, whether these people had complied with the conflict of interest guidelines or, to use the official term, the conflict of interest/post-employment code for public office holders, one of the documents tabled last week by the Prime Minister.

No reply was forthcoming, and that is why I asked for an adjournment debate.

There are two or three reasons why such contracts are set up. First, a private company obviously enjoys tax benefits. In Ontario, a private, incorporated company pays far less income tax than the individual taxpayer. It would be an advantage for someone in a situation like the three gentlemen in the Prime Minister's Office to be able to receive his salary, deposit it in the company and thus avoid taxes. It is legal, and I do not think there is much that can be done about it.

What I wanted to know is whether these contracts and companies were examined by Treasury Board and by the Prime Minister and whether they are in order.

Mr. McMillan of the Prime Minister's Office, one of the officials who earns a rather respectable salary, admitted he had personal reasons for establishing that service contract instead of being paid a regular salary. I should think that the other two, Van Dusen and MacAdam, also had personal reasons to set up private companies to have their salary.

What I want to ask the Parliamentary Secretary this evening is, first, can he assure the House that those three individuals who work in the PMO come under the code of ethics governing the conduct of holders of public offices with respect to conflicts of interest and, second, can he assure the House that the Government as employer, and particularly the President of the Treasury Board, have indeed made sure that there are no conflicts of interest in those companies?

I would ask the Parliamentary Secretary to make the contracts public and tell us whether those companies have clients other than the employees mentioned, the three individuals. Do they have other clients? Can we find out from the Government whether those three public officials who work in a rather important office, the Prime Minister's Office, are beyond the shadow of a doubt and considered as such in terms of conflicts of interest?

Mr. Speaker, my question is simple: Are they pure, in the clean, and not subject to any conflict?

[English]

Mr. Paul Dick (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I am rather surprised at the Hon. Member bringing up a new aspect to this question about which I had no idea. He wants something tabled. I will have to look into that. It is not normal to table certain matters in the House without all involved parties being in agreement. I certainly will not do that. However, I thank my hon. colleague for raising this question.

First I should like to assure him that the matter at hand has nothing whatever to do with conflict of interest. It is normal to have contracts of this nature. Many individuals work for the Canadian Government on contract. There are hundreds, if not thousands, of people working on contract for the Canadian Government from time to time. These three individuals have been engaged to work for the Government in a perfectly normal way. It is well known in the private sector. Thousands do it. It is accepted by the Department of National Revenue and has been for many years, in fact for decades. These contracts were approved by Treasury Board in the normal way contracts are approved. I assure the Hon. Member that there is no reason for concern.

All persons, including those employed under contract, working in the Office of the Prime Minister have been directed to comply with the conflict of interest guidelines. Full disclosure is required under this Government by all such people. I should point out that this is the first time a Prime Minister has required all people working in his office to comply with the conflict of interest guidelines. This was not so under previous administrations. This covers and includes people on contract.

There is no way to state the case more clearly. They have complied fully with the guidelines administered by the Assistant Deputy Registrar General.

As to the matter of taxes, taxes have always been a private matter between the Department of National Revenue and the individuals involved. Suffice to say, they have been employed in a manner approved by the Department of National Revenue, and the Department is taxing them in the manner in which it has taxed others over past decades. It is extremely common, there is nothing surprising, and the matter has been approved by Treasury Board.

FISHERIES—EXERCISE OF MINISTERIAL DISCRETION—INSPECTION OF FISH PRODUCTS

Mr. Ray Skelly (Comox-Powell River): Mr. Speaker, my question relates to the question I asked in the House today concerning the activities of the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans (Mr. Fraser). On April 29, 1985, the Minister overruled his federal fisheries inspectors and permitted a large quantity of tuna, which had previously been determined by his inspectors to be unfit for human consumption, to be distributed in markets in Canada and the United States. It has been deemed that this product could in fact affect the health of Canadians and definitely would affect the nature of a $2 billion industry in Canada.

Yesterday the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) and the Deputy Prime Minister (Mr. Nielsen) completely supported the actions of the Minister. Today, I guess after examining the thing, the Prime Minister ordered the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans to withdraw this. It appears to us that the Minister's use of his discretionary power was completely unwarranted and presented a very serious threat to a very viable Canadian industry. In fact, it caused a health concern in the minds of Canadians. As a result, the Minister should have been dismissed.

We cannot have ministerial discretion used in such an inappropriate way. Never for one moment did the Minister of Fisheries deny doing this. Never for one moment did he indicate that he would not be prepared to do this again. That must be corrected only by the removal of the Minister.

My second point is that the Minister has made three serious errors. He made one with the native people of New Brunswick by launching and assisting in what could only be called very ill-considered raids against those people. Also he was involved in an ill-conceived licensing arrangement in which he overruled officials in his Department on the basis of what can only be construed as political advice. Of course the third was allowing contaminated food unfit for human consumption to be distributed in the market-place, going against his inspectors.

The Prime Minister must consider today that we have a $2 billion industry, $1.7 billion of what is known as a top quality product being exported into the world market where we are struggling to get more of a share. There are 100,000 jobs and 1,000 registered processors in this country and the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans jeopardized that whole industry.

What very clearly must be done today is that the Prime Minister must organize a national advertising campaign, indeed an international campaign, that will reinstate the confidence of people to whom we market fish, assuring them that we thoroughly inspect it and that we have a competent and expansive inspection process. They must be assured that the Government of Canada will no longer be overruling those people who are doing a good job but that it will in fact be backing them to the hilt to ensure that our product when marketed is top quality product safe for human consumption.

This House and the committee before the House definitely has to take a look at the licensing facilities and the threat that this Government is taking something in the order of $65 million out of the Department of Fisheries and Oceans. We must be sure that that $65 million in the November cuts, in the May Budget and in the kind of slashing and cutting that is going on is not coming out of the inspection service, that this Government does not deregulate inspection, leaving it up to the company, as the Minister says, to draw guidelines together.

This Minister says the benefit of doubt goes to the companies. Those are direct quotes from the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans. It is absolutely unacceptable that that course and direction be established by this Government.

It is not too many years ago that it was the individual Canadian who had to make a decision at his table, or in the supermarket, that he was buying quality food. Because of the tremendously serious hazards of doing that the Government stepped in and for a number of years had effective inspection processes. We are now seeing a process by which it would appear that that is being turned back to the companies, that the benefit of doubt would go to the companies, with the attempts to cut back civil servants and cut back the deficit resulting in a diminishing of this Government's resolve to ensure that Canadians can have confidence at their table in the food they consume, particularly in the fish they consume.

The Government must also ensure that our cutomers overseas can have confidence that our product is thoroughly inspected and is a top quality product safe for human consumption.

Mr. Mel Gass (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Mr. Speaker, the fish inspection regulations made under the Fish Inspections Act prohibit the import or export, or processing for export, of any fish product that is tainted, decomposed or unwholesome. These terms are defined in regulations, and normally through his officials the Minister provides an interpretation of these definitions by developing standards for minium acceptability.

Where an individual or company is not satisfied with a decision of an inspector, the decision may be appealed to the Minister. The Minister must then order a re-inspection, provided the product does not contain harmful or poisonous substances. Following a re-inspection, on the basis of the advice provided to the Minister, the Minister makes the final decision.

There are a number of other powers in regulations provided to the Minister. For example, to process for export a plant must have a Certificate of Registration. If the plant fails to meet requirements of the regulation, Mr. Speaker, the Minister may withdraw the certificate.

MULTICULTURALISM—FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL CONFERENCE—SIZE OF BUDGET

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to follow up in today's final debate on a question I earlier asked today, only a few hours ago, of the Minister of State for Multiculturalism (Mr. Jelinek). I asked that question, not only because I am the critic for that particular portfolio for my Party, but also because it involves a principle that is very dear and goes to the heart of what this country is all about.

One of the back-benchers on the Government side began the questioning today during Question Period when he said that there was some concern out in the country that the Minister of State for Multiculturalism has a dual portfolio, that is to say he is the Minister of State for Multiculturalism as well Minister of State for Fitness and Amateur Sports. There is concern—there is great concern in the country that we are going backwards with respect to a vibrant multiculturalism policy. If we go back to the era of 1979 under the then Conservative Government we find then too that the Minister of Multiculturalism was also the Minister of Fitness and Amateur Sport and somehow had to divide his responsibilities between fitness and amateur sport and multiculturalism. So there is concern.

Mr. Speaker, when I rose in my place today I asked the Minister why the budget for multiculturalism was reduced by some $2.255 million or 8.5 per cent in the Estimates that the Government presented to this House last February. The response of the Minister was that as far as the reductions were concerned, I would be very happy to know that the Government has already increased the Budget for Multiculturalism and will proceed on that basis. That is a very serious statement, Mr. Speaker. The only information this House of Commons and the communities across Canada have is that this budget, through the Budget Estimates, was reduced by some 8.5 per cent, meaning $2.2 million.

Under consecutive Liberal Governments that budget has always increased. This was the first time that it was decreased. It might have been okay to have the budget stay the same but to absorb a reduction of 8.5 per cent in the budget when Government spending was on average 7.3 per cent certainly flies in the face of the serious priority of Conservative Members who wanted to leave ethnocultural communities with the opinion that this was something very dear to their program. We see that it is not.

The Minister's statement in response to my question is very serious, because it leads me to believe that if in fact the budget was increased, whether by his predecessor or himself, as he has been in this position only a few months, he would have informed the House and Canadians from coast to coast that the budget had been increased. I will give my hon. friend from the Government side an opportunity this evening to expand on that.

If in fact the budget for Multiculturalism was increased, I would certainly like to know by how much it was increased and for which particular programs. Under the reduction announced by the Government there were cut-backs in projects aimed at helping immigrants, in the support for multi-ethnic organizations, heritage language programs, support for projects and organizations devoted to the preservation and development of cross-cultural understanding, funding for publications and on and on. If in fact the budget was increased, I would like to know when the budget was increased.

One of the serious problem I face when dealing with the leaders of various ethnocultural communities and organizations is that there is never enough money from the directorate to do the types of things they wish to do. I think it is certainly a responsibility on the part of the Government, if in fact it has seen fit to increase this budget, to announce to the Canadian public where, how and when the budget was increased. People still believe that this Government reduced the budget through the Budgetary Estimates that were brought forward in April.

Finally, if the budget for the Multiculturalism Directorate was not increased, then I think the Minister of State for Multiculturalism owes the House and the country an apology for misleading this House. I do not say that he did so intentionally, but certainly if this budget as of today has not been increased there is a problem, because the record speaks for itself. I look forward to hearing the Parliamentary Secretary to the House Leader respond to these very crucial and important questions.

Mr. Paul Dick (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, of course the Hon. Member smuggled in considerably more material than he had in the question he put this afternoon. I do want to point out to him that, unlike the previous Liberal Government, we did not close down the Ministry of Multiculturalism right after the election and then set it up again a year before the next election, as the Liberal Government had a habit of doing. In fact, the Hon. Member could ask the former Hon. Member for Parkdale-High Park, Senator Haidasz, how he got ousted immediately following an election. We have a Ministry of Multiculturalism which will continue to be in existence throughout the term of this Government, rather than only for election purposes.

It is with considerable pleasure that I rise to respond to the Hon. Member's question. I wish to emphasize at the beginning that there has been no slackening of the Government's commitment to multiculturalism. In fact, our commitment is much greater than ever existed under any Government. We have a Ministry; we have a Deputy Minister and an Assistant Deputy Minister for the first time, and we have established a Standing Committee on Multiculturalism to deal with issues of multiculturalism. Previous Liberal administrations never took such action.

The present Government will provide an additional $4.9 million over this fiscal year and next to strengthen the multiculturalism sector's capacity in the areas of race relations, cross-cultural development, assistance to community groups and public education.

The Hon. Member has noted a 9 per cent cut in the 1985-86 Estimates which were tabled in the House in March of this year. That came about as part of the Government's review of expenditures. This reduction is more than compensated for by the $2.5 million additional for 1985-86, as part of the $4.9 million which I previously mentioned.

These actions make it clear that even when programs in several areas are being reviewed for rationalization and expenditure control, this Government has maintained and, in fact, has increased its financial commitment to multiculturalism. These increased funds have been allocated after ongoing consultations with the provinces and with communities. They underline the Government's continuing commitment to follow up on the extremely worth-while recommendations made in Equality Now.

Furthermore, the Government is increasing the complement of the multiculturalism sector by 15 person-years and has raised the profile and status of the multiculturalism program within Government by appointing for the first time an official at the Assistant Deputy Minister level.

As has already been noted, a Standing Committee on Multiculturalism has been created for the first time. It will have the opportunity to consider the details of these and other governmental initiatives relating to multiculturalism.

Our support for multiculturalism and equal opportunity for all Canadians is strong and will be a fundamental tenet of all Government initiatives in the future. Our ongoing concern for Canadians of all backgrounds is manifest and our intentions are being translated into action. We intend to make sure that the skills, talent and expertise of all Canadians are used to the fullest extent.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The motion to adjourn the House is now deemed to have been adopted. Accordingly, the House stands adjourned until tomorrow at 11 o'clock a.m., pursuant to Standing Order 3(1).

MEASURES PROPOSED BY GOVERNMENT—IMPACT ON FAMILIES

Mr. Jean-Claude Malépart (Montreal-Sainte-Marie): Mr. Speaker, I was shocked by the action taken yesterday by the Minister of National Health and Welfare, who is supposed to defend families with children.

Mr. Speaker, the Government not only wants to reduce the incomes of families with children, it also wants to prevent the Opposition and the Canadian people from telling the truth in this debate. That is why the Minister of social injustice decided to impose closure in the debate on second reading of the Bill to de-index family allowance payments.

Mr. Speaker, it is becoming increasingly clear to me why the Minister is referred to as the Minister of social injustice, a title he richly deserves. It is shameful to see how anxious the Mulroney Government is to gouge the incomes of poor and average Canadians and the reluctance with which it is trying to impose a minimum tax on incomes of rich Canadians who manage not to pay a cent of income tax.

Mr. Speaker, I have here a letter addressed to the Prime Minister by the Confédération des organismes familiaux du Québec, from which I would like to quote the following:

> Prime Minister, where is the consistency in your approach? You say that you have a great deal of consideration for Canadian families, but you are attacking the meager measures that exist for their benefit. Families are starting to wonder.

Mr. Speaker, from October 7 to 13, for the first time—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am sorry to interrupt the Hon. Member but his time has expired.

DISASTERS

EARTHQUAKE IN MEXICO—NEED FOR AID

Mr. Jim Manly (Cowichan-Malahat-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, the people of Canada want to extend not only sympathy but also practical help to the people of Mexico following the devastation caused by yesterday's earthquake. The Mexican people and Government face massive problems. Direct victims of the quake need medical treatment. Emergency water and sewage facilities must be provided to prevent epidemic disease. Housing must be provided for people whose homes have been destroyed. There must be emergency distribution of food.

In the name of humanity, the Government of Canada must move quickly to help. Working in co-operation with recognized relief agencies, our Government should announce an immediate program to match, dollar for dollar, all private contributions. Direct Government-to-Government aid should also be given to help repair communication and transportation links, as well as water and sewage lines.

Canada should make the strongest possible representation to the International Monetary Fund to reverse yesterday's badly timed decision that cancelled $450 million worth of loans to Mexico. I urge the Canadian Government to announce immediate plans for a comprehensive and generous program to help the people of Mexico.

GOVERNMENT'S ACHIEVEMENTS

Mr. Gilles Bernier (Beauce): Mr. Speaker, the Conservative Government can count on the co-operation of several groups in its efforts to improve the lives of Canadians, Quebecers and the people of Beauce whom I have the honour to represent.

Since we came to power, our Government has been listening to the people, and to confirm the truth of this statement, I can mention that 67 per cent of Quebec business people say they are satisfied with the way the Mulroney Government is running the country. Business people across this country are our main partners in creating jobs.

The newspaper Les Affaires of August 31 published a detailed report on how business people feel about the present Government, and it was a very positive analysis.

Also, now that the Macdonald Report has been tabled, Canadian citizens will be able to consider their national future in its broadest terms, now that the Commission has described with great frankness and energy the choices open to Canadians.

This is a golden opportunity for elected representatives to change the face of this country and to redefine its social, industrial and even national frontiers. The new trade agreements with our neighbour to the South, the restructuring of social programs and Quebec's place in Canada are subjects that deserve serious, frank and thorough reflection.

Canada's future depends on its ability to react quickly to change, and the survival of this country will depend on that ability.

FISHERIES

FUTURE OF HERRING FISHERY IN GLOUCESTER RIDING

Mr. Roger Clinch (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, the last two weeks have been highlighted by mementous events within the herring fishing industry in the constituency of Gloucester. The future of the industry is threatened.

During that time I had an opportunity to meet with officials of the Department of Fisheries and Oceans as well as spokesmen for producers, plant workers and fishermen from my riding.

The current crisis in the Gulf of St. Lawrence stems from the disagreement between fishermen and Department of Fisheries and Oceans biologists.

The quotas established last year were expected to cover a three-month fishing season, but it actually took fewer than eight days to fill them.

If coastal fishermen can catch 8,000 metric tons within eight days, should we question the accuracy of the data provided by the biologists?

We learn from fishermen with over 20 years of experience that this year herring stocks are abundant enough to allow for double the established quota.

In the interest of people whose sole source of income is fishing, I would urge the Minister to reconsider his decision not to raise quotas. The full impact of this situation will be felt not only by the fishermen who will be unable to sell their fish next year, but also by the producers who will already have lost their markets.

I would be remiss to conclude without emphasizing that we would be making a mistake by ignoring the representations of my constituents. Therefore I ask the Minister to review the data and give those fishermen a fighting chance to earn their living.

AGRICULTURE

REQUEST THAT MINISTER DISSOCIATE HIMSELF FROM ENVIRONMENT CANADA REPORT

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry-Prescott-Russell): Mr. Speaker, I urge the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Wise) to dissociate himself altogether from the Environment Canada Report dealing with the impact on farm lands of the municipal drainage outlet program established under the Canada-Ontario subsidiary agreement for Eastern Ontario and said to be a preliminary evaluation.

[English]

This report is a direct attack on the farmers of eastern Ontario who requested funding, and on all the minicipalities which administered these funds. It would seem that the authors of the report had made up their minds on the conclusions before they even started. Eastern Ontario farmers do not agree with these findings and I doubt if any of them were even consulted.

Eastern Ontario has always lagged behind other areas of the province, and programs such as the one I just described have assisted in upgrading the land. More funding is needed to allow the farmers of our part of the country to be more competitive with others.

I call upon my colleagues, the Member for Stormont-Dundas (Mr. Warner), the Member for Leeds-Grenville (Mrs. Cossitt), the Member for Ottawa-Carleton (Mr. Turner), the Member for Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Tupper), the Member for Lanark-Renfrew-Carleton (Mr. Dick) and others to join me in condemning this report.

TRADE

CANADA-UNITED STATES NEGOTIATIONS

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex-Windsor): Mr. Speaker, in his press conference this morning the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) again maintained his closed and secretive approach to freer trade talks with the United States. He refused once more to clarify how agriculture would be treated in these talks. He has also refused to make a public announcement this week on his free trade plans, despite earlier promises of a six-month signal.

Why is this approach being taken? Clearly, it is a deliberate political strategy which is explained by the secret documents that leaked out yesterday. Those documents say: "It is likely that the higher the profile of this issue, the lower the degree of public approval will be". They also state: "Benign neglect from a majority of Canadians may be the realistic outcome of a well-executed communications program".

The Conservative Government wants to keep Canadians in the dark, despite the deep concern of many communities about this issue and despite the blackmail from the United States, where a leading U.S. Congressman yesterday said that no free trade deal with Canada would be signed unless we cut back our lumber exports. Free trade on that basis would make us no more than an American colony. For that reason we oppose it strongly.

HIGH CHEMICAL INPUT COSTS

Mr. Geoff Wilson (Swift Current-Maple Creek): Mr. Speaker, I share excerpts from a letter concerning drought assistance written to me by a farm couple in the Cabri area of southwestern Saskatchewan. They say:

> It angers us to hear about how Government plans to write down debts with farm credit. There are farmers in this area, and I am sure in other areas, that are in financial difficulty because they had to have land at outrageously high prices. They never stop to think there may come a time when there would be no crop or when the price drops or when there is no market for our grain. That's all happened before.

In other words, Mr. Speaker, they ask why should the foolhardy be rewarded with a loan writedown while the prudent get to foot the bill? Why should the guy who outbid everybody else at a land auction now be bailed out by those whom he outbid?

The letter continues:

> If you want to help us in a positive manner and help all farmers, try to reduce our input costs. I think the cost of chemical is a big rip-off and these companies should be investigated. I think most all farmers spend a good portion of their income on grasshopper poison in the drought area, and maybe Governments could pay for that if they want to help.

This letter is fairly representative and contains some good, sound advice. I recommend these useful and practical suggestions to the Hon. Member for Assiniboia (Mr. Gustafson), Chairman of the Task Force on Drought, and to the Hon. Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Wise).

YOUNG OFFENDERS ACT

TREATMENT OF YOUNG IMPAIRED DRIVERS

Mr. John Oostrom (Willowdale): Mr. Speaker, a recent Gallup Poll conducted for the federal Government has found that young people are increasing their daily intake of alcohol. Alcohol consumption has increased to 39 per cent; up from 37 per cent a year ago. Consumption has increased by 5 per cent among those aged 12 to 14, and by 23 per cent among those aged between 15 to 17.

S.O. 22

With new tough regulations being implemented for drinking drivers, my constituents feel that these regulations will not be equally enforced and that the Young Offenders Act will take preference. If an individual can obtain a driver's licence at the age of sixteen, then such an individual should be subject to the same penalties that adults now face. A mechanism should be implemented in order for the two Acts to complement each other. After all, the destructive force of any accident is the same.

PUBLIC SERVICE

LANGUAGE TRAINING PRIVATIZATION CONSEQUENCES

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa-Vanier): Mr. Speaker, on May 28, 1985, the President of the Treasury Board stated before the Standing Joint Committee on Official Languages Policy and Programs that his Government was considering privatizing the Federal Public Service Language Training Program. Since then, I have received a very large and significant number of complaints from many public servants who are concerned, indeed worried, about the Conservative Government plans to privatize a program which has earned an enviable international reputation to say the least, both for its efficiency and expertise.

During the election campaign, the Conservatives bragged about developing programs to promote women employment at higher levels. By nurturing such an irresponsible idea as privatizing language training, the Government will jeopardize the jobs of 788 employees, 62.6 per cent being women. Moreover, 536 of the 788 employees are members of the teaching staff of which 59 per cent are professional women who, for the most part, have made a career of teaching.

Mr. Speaker, the Public Service Commission of Canada at present controls standards and teaching methods. But were language training to be privatized, there would no longer be any federal Government control over private firms.

Why then is the Government still bent on so-called savings . . .

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I am sorry to interrupt the Hon. Member, but his time has expired.

FINANCE

SALES TAX ON READY-MIX CONCRETE

Mr. Dave Nickerson (Western Arctic): Mr. Speaker, as a loyal government supporter, far be it from me to question the wisdom or otherwise of the recently imposed 6 per cent sales tax on ready-mix concrete, or even to query whether or not it is appropriate to consider such material as a manufactured product.

That which irks concrete mixers, who have now had bestowed upon them the dubious honour of being elevated in status to that of manufacturers, is the extreme complexity of the calculations needed to determine the tax payable.

• (1115)

After having obtained his eight digit licence number and ten digit account number, the new manufacturer must consult at least ten memoranda to compute the tax and fill out a multitude of forms connected with the remission thereof. At least 14 different items, including various delivery charges, have to be factored in when computing the tax, with the result that the tax per cubic yard for each truckload will be quite different.

Could the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. MacKay) simplify the system so that it is not necessary to have a chartered accountant riding shotgun on every cement truck?

FISHERIES

SALE OF CANNED TUNA—NEW BRUNSWICK RESEARCH COUNCIL REPORT

Mr. George Henderson (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, we were to have started today with a question on the tragic earthquake in Mexico. However, we have been informed that the Minister for External Relations will be making a statement on motions on this matter at a later time, and we will certainly be replying to it.

Therefore, I direct my question to the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans. It concerns a revelation today in the report of the Research and Productivity Council of New Brunswick, the Crown corporation upon which the Minister based his information in order to release the product, indicating that the Minister released that product before the results of the test came to him. Will he now stand in his place and admit publicly that he made a very, very grave mistake in judgment?

Hon. John A. Fraser (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Mr. Speaker, I am very concerned about what the Hon. Member has just said. If I heard him correctly, he is saying that the product was released before we had the results of the report of the New Brunswick Research Council. That is clearly not the case. In fact the product was not released until we had the results of a further independent report which I commissioned.

TESTING DONE BY COUNCIL

Mr. George Henderson (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, the press release issued by the Research and Productivity Council of New Brunswick clearly indicates that the Minister of Fisheries released about a million cans of tuna before its testing was completed. There is nothing any clearer than that. Is the Minister denying that allegation by the corporation upon which he relied for advice?

Hon. John A. Fraser (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Mr. Speaker, I am sure the Hon. Member will bring to me the document which he has. What he is saying is completely contrary to what happened. I am sure the Hon. Member will do the civil and appropriate thing and speak to me about it in a few minutes.

Mr. George Henderson (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, enough is enough. This time I will direct my question to the Prime Minister. The Minister of Fisheries and Oceans commmitted a grave mistake in judgment. He allowed a product to go on the market-place without any testing results whatsoever.

It is with some reluctance that I have to ask this question. Will the Prime Minister do the honourable thing and demand the resignation of his Minister of Fisheries?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, that is about the fifth or sixth time this question has been raised. I think I have explained the circumstances and the celerity with which the Government acted. There having been no threat to health and safety, we wanted the cans removed in any case. We are now assured that new procedures will preclude this occurring in the future.

The Deputy Prime Minister has reported to the House that we hope to make sure that—

An Hon. Member: He broke the law.

Mr. Mulroney: —testing is done by the Ministry of Health and Welfare in the future. I think all of this represents a reasonable and appropriate response by the Minister and by the Government to a serious situation which we dealt with as quickly and as effectively as I think any Government could.

PRIME MINISTER'S PRESS CONFERENCE STATEMENT

Mr. George Baker (Gander-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, this morning during the Prime Minister's press conference the question was asked: "You are saying the cans of tuna should not have been on the shelves". The Prime Minister responded by saying "That's pretty damn obvious".

I would like to ask the Prime Minister is it not also obvious that in order to remedy the loss of confidence in the quality of fish sold in Canada and internationally it is not enough just to get rid of the cans of tuna but that he must get rid of the Minister of Fisheries.

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): My hon. friend expresses an opinion to which he is entitled, one which I regret, because I think he is aware of the fact that no one in this House would question the commitment of the Hon. Minister of Fisheries—

An Hon. Member: It is his judgment.

Mr. Mulroney: —to questions of health and safety and environment, well established over many years. Everything was laid out in good faith before the House. I think the responses have been appropriate and adequate.

I was asked this morning whether, in retrospect, we would have acted differently. I think that was the thrust of the context. The answer was, of course, yes. No Canadian wants this, which is why we acted as quickly as we did—

Mr. Deans: After two days of questioning here.

Mr. Mulroney: —to make sure that they were removed and that appropriate procedures were in place for the future.

MINISTER'S RETENTION

Mr. George Baker (Gander-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, does the Prime Minister really and honestly believe that he can retain a Cabinet Minister who asks Canadians to eat rancid fish? Does he really and truly believe that?

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An Hon. Member: Silence, silence.

NORTHLAND BANK—PRESIDENT'S PRESS CONFERENCE

Hon. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Mr. Speaker, I have a question on another matter. Late yesterday afternoon the president of the Northland Bank held an extraordinary press conference in which he accused the Government of doing just the opposite to what it was publicly and privately committed. He said that instead of helping to facilitate a restructuring of Northland Bank the Government of Canada, through its officials, was taking steps that would really involve the bank in a rapid liquidation of its assets at firesale prices. These are extremely serious allegations coming from the president of a bank. I would like to ask the Minister of State for Finance simply this. What is going on?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, I was both surprised and I guess a little bit frustrated by the statements that were made by the president of the Northland Bank yesterday. In our discussions I had indicated to him that I would facilitate in any way some proposals which he said were under negotiation as we had our discussions leading up to September 1.

I gave him every room to pursue those discussions. Not only that, but I appointed a full-time liaison person to work from my office with him very early the following week in order to assess the proposals that he was to bring forward to us. That person is one of the top corporate finance people in Canada. I have been in touch with him every day. He has examined every proposal that has come forward, and those negotiations are continuing.

REQUEST FOR WEEKEND MEETING OF PARLIAMENTARY COMMITTEE

Hon. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): My question is directed to the Prime Minister. What the Minister has just said to the House was effectively denied or contradicted by both the president of the bank and the vice-president of the bank, the two of them together at a press conference yesterday, when they said that the Government was not helping to facilitate the restructuring, and that a couple of offers, among others, were not being seriously considered.

• (1125)

The point at dispute here is the serious allegation involving a bank president going public, something which is extraordinary. He is saying that the Government is not doing what it has committed itself to do but that it is doing the opposite. Given the contradiction that exists between what the Minister has said today and what the bank president has said, without presupposing the accuracy of either but noting their seriousness, will the Prime Minister take immediate steps to hold a meeting of the Finance Committee of the House this weekend, a meeting at which the Minister and the president of the bank in question could appear to give their views?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, we have been trying to get the Finance Committee going for about two weeks now and have not met with the kinds of endorsements which I am delighted to hear today. As soon as the House Leaders grant their approval, the Finance Committee can begin sitting so that these matters can be fully examined.

Mr. Fulton: It's sitting every day, Brian.

Mr. Mulroney: I mean in regard to the problems about which we are speaking, obviously. I cannot account for a statement made by a bank president in difficult circumstances and under pressure. The Minister has provided appropriate explanations. Surely the Leader of the New Democratic Party would not quarrel with the proposition that this Government has already gone very far to establish that we were willing to take risks to protect fledgling financial institutions in western Canada.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Mulroney: Members of the NDP laugh at what we have done for western Canada but western Canadians will remember that, as will all Canadians. I guarantee that. They laugh because this Government tried to help a fledgling institution in western Canada.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mulroney: We have done so honourably and, we think, well, and we are ready to have that subjected to objective interrogation by the Finance Committee as quickly as it can sit.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

TERMS OF PROPOSED LEGISLATION

Hon. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Mr. Speaker, western Canadians as well as all other Canadians will remember that it was the Prime Minister's Government that created the billion-dollar fiasco for which they will now have to pay.

Since the Prime Minister refuses to have this very serious situation referred to the committee for immediate action—and I am not referring to the continuing problem of the banks but to this immediate crisis—will he or his House Leader confirm that the Government has already prepared legislation that contains clauses referring the the bail-out not simply of the Canadian Commercial Bank but also the Northland Bank? Will the Government confirm that such legislation has already been drafted, and if it has, does this not simply, on its surface, lend credence to what the president of the Northland Bank has been saying?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): No, Mr. Speaker. At an appropriate time any legislative initiatives that should be taken will, of course, be taken and my hon. friend will be advised.

My hon. friend says that western Canadians will remember that Progressive Conservative Members are responsible for the bank fiasco. We inherited this situation.

Mr. Broadbent: The bail-out.

Mr. Mulroney: What western Canadians will never forget is that the NDP got engaged and married to the Liberals and they passed the NEP which devastated western Canada. That is what they will never forget.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mulroney: They will never forget that.

Mr. Broadbent: Prime Minister, that's another lie.

Mr. Mulroney: Oh, it hurts. That is unworthy.

Mr. Stevens: Withdraw.

Mr. Speaker: I have to advise the Hon. Member for Oshawa that I heard that and I must ask him to withdraw it.

Mr. Broadbent: I will tell the Prime Minister—

Mr. Speaker: With respect—

Mr. Broadbent: —that we voted against most parts of the energy program.

Mr. Speaker: Would the Hon. Member please resume his seat?

Mr. Broadbent: He knows it. He should come clean.

Mr. Speaker: Would the Hon. Member please resume his seat?

Mr. Broadbent: I am happy to abide by the traditions of the House and withdraw the comment.

Mr. Speaker: Since I have yet to give him the floor for this purpose, would the Hon. Member simply rise and withdraw what he said? Would he simply withdraw it, please?

Mr. Broadbent: This is very touching, Mr. Speaker. I will withdraw my comments. I would like the Prime Minister to tell the truth once in a while.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

• (1130)

Mr. Speaker: The Hon. Member for Trinity (Miss Nicholson).

Miss Nicholson (Trinity): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of State—

Mr. Deans: You cannot say it over and over again. He is wrong and you know it.

Mr. Lewis: You are cheap-shot artists.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I have not checked the lunar schedule, but I think there must be a full moon.

The Hon. Member for Trinity.

CANADIAN COMMERCIAL BANK—LIQUIDITY STATEMENTS

Miss Aideen Nicholson (Trinity): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of State for Finance. The Minister has said that she and her officials were watching activities in the Canadian Commercial Bank during the spring and summer. Will the Minister tell the House when she became aware that, as of the end of June, the bank had stopped submitting the weekly and monthly liquidity statements which are required of all chartered banks, and why this was allowed to happen?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, once again we have had some serious allegations made which are based on misinformation. The records referred to in the newspaper were internal to the bank. Every single filing statement which was required to be made with the Inspector General and with the Bank of Canada continued to be made, and are continuing to be made now.

REQUEST THAT AFFIDAVITS BE TABLED

Miss Aideen Nicholson (Trinity): Mr. Speaker, just to clear up the situation, would the Minister table in the House all affidavits and papers filed with the Alberta court when the liquidator was appointed?

In view of the fact that the Minister said she was monitoring the bank over the summer to protect the Canadian taxpayer, will she tell us why, on August 29, even as the bank was being wound down, large advertisements appeared in Canada's papers offering a $50 bonus to new customers who placed minimum term deposits with the bank?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, I think the Hon. Member asked two questions. As far as the affidavits and papers are concerned, I understand those are public documents and they would have been filed with the court.

As to the second part of the Hon. Member's question, the bank was in operation until September 1. Our role was to watch the bank to ensure that as long as it was viable it was functioning and that when it ceased to be viable we appointed a curator.

FISHERIES

SALE OF CANNED TUNA—REQUEST FOR MINISTER'S RESIGNATION

Mr. Ray Skelly (Comox-Powell River): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans. The Minister will know that in an interview today the Prime Minister was asked whether the tuna—the decomposed, unfit-for-human-consumption tuna—which went on the shelves should have been placed on the shelves. The Minister will also know that the Prime Minister said: "Not damned likely," that that stuff should have gone on the shelves. Now that the Minister has lost the confidence of the Prime Minister, should he not do the right thing and resign forthwith?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I explained the context in which that comment—

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Mulroney: Is there something wrong with the Liberals today? I know how depressed they must be and I can understand why. Yesterday's polls were not too good.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mulroney: I explained the context in which that statement was made. I also explained the high regard and support I have for the Minister of Fisheries.

BASIS FOR MINISTER'S RULING

Mr. Ray Skelly (Comox-Powell River): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the Prime Minister. The Prime Minister will also know that the RPC of New Brunswick, on whose report the Minister says he released that product, today denies that and states that the Minister released the thing without a final report. I have the report in my hand from them dated May 3.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Is there a question?

Mr. Skelly: Will the Prime Minister indicate to the House on what basis the Minister of Fisheries released this material? How can the Prime Minister have any confidence in a Minister who would place rotten tuna on the shelves of Canadian supermarkets without having received a final recommendation?

Hon. John A. Fraser (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Mr. Speaker, the allegation which the Hon. Member makes was made earlier and I invited—

Mr. Skelly: Here is the report dated May 3.

Mr. Fraser: —the Hon. Member to bring me the documents upon which it is based. I have to say that I received a confidential report from the RPC on February 11. I received a further report from the independent committee which I struck as Minister on April 24. It was not until I received both reports and considered them carefully that the stock in question was released. If the Hon. Member has some information I do not have then I would be prepared to discuss the matter with him after Question Period.

POSITION OF GOVERNMENT AND MINISTER ON VIABILITY OF NORTHLAND BANK

Mr. Raymond Garneau (Laval-des-Rapides): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of State for Finance. I should like to get back to the problem raised a moment ago by the Leader of the New Democratic Party concerning the Northland Bank.

During yesterday's press conference Mr. Neapole said, among other things, referring to his bank and the Government's attitude . . . Here is what he said when accusing the Government:

[English]

"scuppering Northland's fight to survival". He also said: "The will does not seem to be there to restructure or amalgamate."

This is a quote from the press release made public after the conference. It is an extremely serious accusation which undermines the Minister's credibility.

Now then, I would like to ask the Minister of State for Finance — surely she has all the reports and data — whether she can tell us if, in her opinion and in the opinion of her Government, the Northland Bank is viable.

[English]

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, I have made it clear from the beginning that these negotiations were important to the future of the Northland Bank. I hope these negotiations have not been jeopardized by the discussions which have taken place by the president of the bank and those which have taken place in the House today. There are arrangements being discussed, and those discussions continue.

I have also made it clear on behalf of the depositors and the taxpayers that whatever negotiations are under way will have to be completed as quickly as possible.

Mr. Raymond Garneau (Laval-des-Rapides): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker.

The accusations the Minister has just made against the Opposition are unacceptable, especially coming from a Government which, on September 1, tabled in the House notices indicating that Northland Bank liquidation applications would be filed.

Again I direct my question to the Minister since this matter falls under her jurisdiction. Can you tell us today, without jeopardizing the negotiations, whether the Northland Bank is viable, yes or no?

[English]

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, I might also add that Mr. Neapole, following his press conference, and on The Journal last night, said that he was not attacking the Government. I would like to make that very clear.

The negotiations which are under way are being conducted in a business-like manner. They are dealing with an institution which is under the control of a curator. Those are facts. They are part of the negotiations. The viability of the bank will depend on the outcome of those negotiations.

APPARENT CONTRADICTION BETWEEN STATEMENTS BY MINISTER AND BY NORTHLAND BANK PRESIDENT

Mr. Mike Cassidy (Ottawa Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question to the Prime Minister also deals with the Northland Bank. Is the Prime Minister aware of the contradictions which exist between the statement Mr. Neapole, President of the bank, made yesterday in Edmonton, and those which his Minister of State for Finance has made on the question of whether the Government is trying to save the bank instead of merely liquidate it?

Why does the Prime Minister refuse to allow the Finance Committee of the House to listen to both Mr. Neapole and the Minister of State for Finance over the coming week-end in order to find out what the situation is, in view of such major and serious contradictions?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): What we have just heard is utter nonsense, Mr. Speaker. For the past two weeks, we have been asking the House to refer this type of question to a committee and we have been refused by NDP Members who wanted to look into the matter. Make up your minds! We are prepared to refer this issue to a committee. Nobody can question this Government's ability or desire to try and help these financial institutions, and we are prepared to have a Parliamentary committee look into this. But make up your mind, we are running out of time!

REQUEST FOR COMMITTEE MEETING

Mr. Mike Cassidy (Ottawa Centre): Mr. Speaker we have had trouble getting answers from the Government and I am afraid we fear the same thing may happen in the committee as well.

The last time a bank closure occurred it was over a weekend. That could occur. It could be planned by the Government right now. Surely tomorrow we should have the Finance Committee of the House hear Mr. Neapole, hear his allegations against the Government, in order to find out what is going on, rather than see the Canadian taxpayers landed with the cost of another bank bail-out without Parliament even being informed of what the situation is?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, we have been trying for two weeks to get a discussion in committee of everything related to these banks. Let me assure the Hon. Member that I think it is in Mr. Neapole's interest to spend the weekend negotiating a deal and not appearing in Ottawa before this committee.

ENERGY

CANADA-PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND ENERGY AGREEMENT

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton-East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Regional Industrial Expansion. It concerns the Canada—Prince Edward Island Energy Agreement. Will the Minister confirm that the $18.8 million which was earmarked for the elimination of the outstanding debt on the underwater cable, as expressed in the agreement, will be used for the exclusive purpose of writing off that debt and for no other purpose?

Hon. Sinclair Stevens (Minister of Regional Industrial Expansion): Mr. Speaker, the agreement, or the aspect of the package which I signed with Premier Lee last week, does touch on the cable funding and on the repayment with respect to that funding and I would suggest that the Hon. Member, if he wishes further detail on the actual terms of the agreement pertaining to the cable, should consult with my colleague, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources.

STATEMENT ATTRIBUTED TO PROVINCIAL MINISTER

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton-East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the same Minister. I inform the Minister that the Minister of Energy for the Province of Prince Edward Island has taken the cheque which was presented to him last week of $9.4 million, which was to be used expressly for writing off that particular debt, and has said publicly that it will be used now for the purposes of subsidizing residential users.

Will the Minister stand in his place and say whether or not he is going to have the Government of Prince Edward Island live up to the agreement, or is he going to be a part of an election slush fund?

Hon. Sinclair Stevens (Minister of Regional Industrial Expansion): Mr. Speaker, surely that type of suggestion and reflection on a very honourable Minister in another province should not be made in this House.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

FISHERIES

SALE OF CANNED TUNA—NEW BRUNSWICK COUNCIL REPORT

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. Three very serious charges have been levelled against the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans this week. The first one has been resolved. The tuna has been taken off the shelves. I would like to deal with the allegation made today by the New Brunswick Research and Productivity Council that the tests were not complete before the Minister released that tuna. The Minister has contradicted that. He has made that statement in the House. If the statement made by the New Brunswick Research and Productivity Council is proven to be true, will the Prime Minister ask for the Minister's resignation?

Hon. John A. Fraser (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Mr. Speaker, this statement has been referred to earlier. I have told the House I am looking into it. I have here the RPC report of February 11 and the independent report commissioned by myself of April 24—

Mr. Skelly: Release it, John.

Mr. Fraser: It was not until I had both those reports that any of this stock was released.

Mr. Skelly: Release the final report.

Mr. Fraser: I will examine the allegation which has been made and I will discuss it with Hon. Members, but I have to tell the Hon. Member that, on the record I have here, perhaps the statement is incorrect.

TESTING OF TUNA

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, the final outstanding charge with which I would like the Prime Minister to deal is the allegation made by the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans earlier this week that all tuna tests since June have been under new guidelines. That was contradicted last night by Fred Allen.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Hon. Member knows that this is now becoming a preamble. Is there a question, please?

Mr. Fulton: If that allegation is proven to be untrue, will the Prime Minister ask for the Minister's resignation?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I allowed the Hon. Minister to ask the first part of the question because of the preamble, but I think the Hon. Member knows that a such hypothetical question, such a purely hypothetical question, is normally not asked in this House.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

DEPORTATION OF ALLEGED AMERICAN CRIMINALS REQUESTED

Mr. Alex Kindy (Calgary East): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Justice and, in his absence, to the Deputy Prime Minister. It concerns Joseph Kindler and Charles Ng, two fugitives from justice who are being kept in Canada at the taxpayers' expense. Could the Minister tell this House whether he is going to invoke the Immigration Act and have those people deported as soon as possible?

Hon. Ray Hnatyshyn (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Justice, may I respond to the Hon. Member for Calgary East that in the case of Charles Ng no request has been made as yet for extradition. In the case of Kindler, the case is presently before the courts and it would be inappropriate to prejudge the outcome of that judicial proceeding.

In any event, Mr. Speaker, I think I can assure the House that the Minister of Justice will take his responsibility at the appropriate time in regard to both of these cases.

Oral Questions

MEMBERS OF PARLIAMENT

ALLEGATION AGAINST PRIME MINISTER'S PRESS SECRETARY

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg-Fort Garry): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. I have here a copy of a document reportedly prepared by Mr. William Fox of the Prime Minister's Office, outlining a communication strategy on the free trade proposal. In this document the recommendation is made that the Government undertake special studies and surveys into opposition Members' ridings in order to gain information which would discredit those Hon. Members.

Does the Prime Minister not consider that these recommendations made by members of his staff, if carried through, would constitute a serious infringement on the privileges and rights of Members of this House? And would he give us the assurance that the Government would not undertake these kinds of dirty tricks in order to sell its free trade proposal?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have no knowledge at all of the document which is being brandished by my hon. friend. If he is serious, he will want to file this immediately in the House of Commons so that we can all examine it. But the suggestion that he makes is fundamentally odious in the extreme vis-à-vis the privileges of every Hon Member of this House.

I can tell him without even seeing that document that Bill Fox, my press secretary, would not be associated with any such document directly or indirectly, because he is a most honourable person.

ORIGIN OF DOCUMENT

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg-Fort Garry): Mr. Speaker, I would be glad to submit the documents and table them. I am also pleased to hear the Prime Minister's assurances about the infringements. But someone in the Government prepared this document—

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Axworthy: —and we would like to know who prepared it. And is the Prime Minister—

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Axworthy: May I be allowed a question, Mr. Speaker? Is the Prime Minister prepared to have an examination as to where and who is making these recommendations, and will he give us his assurance that the recommendations in fact will not be carried out?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): I give that assurance. And I ask Hon. Members of the House if this is not exactly symptomatic of the disease which has taken over the Liberal Party, where you accuse people and then you say: "Oh, I may have made a mistake"—

Mr. Axworthy: I did not. I said let's examine it, let's find out who prepared it.

Mr. Mulroney: Yes, indeed, the record will show—

Mr. Axworthy: Let's find out.

Mr. Mulroney: The record will show that you are now backtracking. If you have a serious charge to make about a person, make the charge but do not backtrack—

Mr. Axworthy: Here it is. We'll table it.

Mr. Mulroney: —because we stand for individual rights and liberties—

Mr. Axworthy: Oh, yes?

Mr. Mulroney: —and we will protect everyone's reputation in this House—

Mr. Axworthy: Sure you will.

Mr. Mulroney: —against attacks by the Liberal Party.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

BANKS AND BANKING

CANADIAN COMMERCIAL BANK—REQUEST FOR LIST OF DEPOSITORS

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops-Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister who this morning in his press conference spoke of reasonableness and responsibility on behalf of Hon. Members. He will know that we are bringing forward shortly for discussion a $1 billion bank bail-out Bill. He has been anxious to refer the matter to committee on a number of occasions.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: That's a different matter altogether.

Mr. Riis: Would he not admit that since taxpayers' money will now be going to rather phantom-like depositors who are uninsured, that it would be the honourable thing for the Government to provide us with a list of all of those individual depositors who will be receiving the taxpayers' money?

Mr. Hnatyshyn: It has nothing to do with the investigation.

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, we have had a number of discussions on this topic. I have been indicating all the way along that I am prepared to provide categories of depositors by any number of divisions, by any number of categories, but that the spirit and the legal intent of Section 251 of the Bank Act indicates that the names of depositors in Canadian financial institutions should not be released to the public.

It is not in the interests of any member of the public that the list of depositors of any financial institution go public in this way.

REQUEST FOR AMENDMENT TO BANK ACT

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops-Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, this is a very extraordinary situation in which we are asking the taxpayers of Canada to come forward with in excess of $1 billion in cash to bail out a list of uninsured depositors. Recognizing the point that the Minister of State has just made, will the Prime Minister bring in legislation in order to deal with this very unique and extraordinary situation?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, the answer is no.

Mr. Riis: Why?

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Because we don't believe in retroactive law, that's why.

Mr. Riis: Who are you trying to cover up for?

Mr. Young: More brothers-in-law.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Hon. Member for Swift Current-Maple Creek.

GOVERNMENT'S STABILIZATION POLICY

Mr. Geoff Wilson (Swift Current-Maple Creek): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board and is with regard to agricultural commodities stabilization. A number of us have been following the long path toward that national plan and we were concerned to see an article in The Globe and Mail yesterday under the headline "Farm Income Plan a Step Closer". Can the Minister confirm the validity of that article?

Hon. Charles Mayer (Minister of State (Canadian Wheat Board)): Mr. Speaker, the general intent of the article is correct, but the body of it is totally incorrect in that the Minister of Agriculture has not made any agreement public. It is unfortunate that the article is so false, having appeared in a national newspaper.

I can confirm that the Minister has sent the provinces a proposed draft agreement which incorporates accommodations of all the provinces which presently have red meat stabilization plans without, I believe, violating the general principles behind stabilization. I can also confirm that the Minister was able to do this within the first year of our Government taking office. That fulfils a campaign commitment, something that the previous Government could not do for the previous ten years. For that the Minister deserves our congratulations and thanks.

FAMILY ALLOWANCES—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Jean-Claude Malépart (Montreal-Sainte-Marie): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Right Hon. Prime Minister.

Yesterday, the Minister of National Health and Welfare tabled a closure motion to prevent the Opposition and the public from telling the truth about the Bill to deindex family allowances.

Can the Prime Minister explain to the Canadian people why he is in such a hurry to take away money from the Canadian families and why he is so slow to impose a minimum tax on wealthy Canadians who now pay no taxes? Can the Prime Minister reply to this question?

Hon. Jake Epp (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased that the Hon. Member has asked this question. Yesterday the Member for Davenport got up and said: "I have nothing new to say", and then proceeded to say again what had already been said. That is the kind of debate that has been ongoing.

More important, articles in The Toronto Star and The Montreal Gazette today indicate that our approach is correct. We are taking money from those who can afford it and giving it to those who need it more. I suggest that the Hon. Member should get his head out of the sand and look at the amount of money that people earning lower incomes will get under this program. He should work to improve this program rather than to maintain a status quo which has been seen to be ineffective.

REQUEST THAT PRIME MINISTER MEET MOTHERS OF QUEBEC FAMILIES

Mr. Jean-Claude Malépart (Montreal-Sainte-Marie): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of social injustice in Canada has just told us a good one.

My supplementary is for the Prime Minister and concerns his answer to the effect that he does not want to meet Quebec families. Next Wednesday, there will be a meeting of Quebec mothers in Montreal. Will the Prime Minister have the courage to meet them as they want to express their views on deindexation, which will mean a loss for them of $55 million?

[English]

Hon. Jake Epp (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, that Member is against families that earn $10,000 getting an increase.

Mr. Ouellet: Answer the question.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Epp (Provencher): He is against reducing the tax exemption which is of greater benefit to those who have higher incomes, in order to provide benefits for those who have lower incomes.

Mr. Ouellet: Be in Montreal on Wednesday.

Mr. Malépart: Mulroney, you are too afraid!

Mr. Epp (Provencher): I would like the Member to note the headlines, "Benefits Make More Sense", and "Opposition Guns are off Target".

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Malépart: Come to Montreal. The public will speak to you.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): What a buffoon.

Mr. Axworthy: It takes one to know one, Michael.

Mr. Gauthier: There's the specialist buffoon over there.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Just another five or six minutes. The Hon. Member for Essex-Windsor.

TRADE

CANADA-UNITED STATES DISCUSSIONS

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex-Windsor): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister who continues to practise secrecy and vagueness with respect to free trade moves with the United States. For instance, this morning at his press conference he refused to make it clear whether agriculture would be on the table for negotiation.

Why is it that, despite the assurances he gave to the House last week, there have been no public signals given of the Government's intentions on free trade with the United States, even though the six-month deadline since the Shamrock Summit has passed?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, we will be responding in due course in an appropriate manner which has already been determined. There has been no variation or change in the position. I might suggest to my hon. friend that he get onside with the Premier of Manitoba on this issue.

Mr. Langdon: Mr. Speaker, I suspect that the Prime Minister will discover, to his chagrin, that the reservations that have been expressed by the Premier of Manitoba about free trade are precisely those reservations important to us.

COMMITTEE RECOMMENDATIONS

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex-Windsor): My supplementary question is directed to the Prime Minister. Why is he not prepared to clear up, clearly and unambiguously, the uncertainties that are developing across the country, by accepting the unanimous recommendations of the Special Joint Committee on this subject that the Auto Pact, the agricultural sector, and our cultural industries not be put on the table in any freer trade discussions that do take place?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have indicated to the satisfaction, I hope, of all Members of the House that, prior to engaging in any commercial discussions of this nature, there will be adequate consultation with the Premiers. On Saturday I had a lengthy telephone conversation with Premier Peterson during which we reviewed some of his concerns which we were able to accommodate in structuring our response. We have been talking to trade unions and the private sector and discussing this openly in the House of Commons. There has been no hesitation or variation. We believe the answer to unemployment is through more trade and we are looking for fair and equal opportunities in a tremendous market I think that is in the interests of the unemployed and of all Canadians.

HEALTH

AVAILABILITY OF HEROIN FOR MEDICAL TREATMENT OF PAIN

Mr. Ken James (Sarnia-Lambton): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. On September 9, 1985, the Minister detailed the plans for the reintroduction of heroin to alleviate intractable pain associated with malignant illnesses. Can the Minister clarify for the many Canadians who suffer grave and excruciating pain daily when this drug will be made available to these patients who eagerly await its use?

Hon. Jake Epp (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I thank the Member for the question. The matter of reintroduction of heroin for medical purposes, and specifically for the treatment of intractable pain, has been dealt with very carefully. We have made heroin available under extremely tight conditions in hospitals, with the decision for its use to be made by medical officers. We hope that the drug will be available from a U.K. supplier by the middle to the end of October. The only issue now is the matter of supply from the distributor and security once in Canada.

PETROLEUM INCENTIVE PROGRAM—REQUEST FOR REPLACEMENT

Mr. Russell MacLellan (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. There has been a serious down turn in frontier and offshore exploration. The Province of Nova Scotia, and the Canadian Petroleum Association among others have called for a replacement of the Petroleum Incentive Program by November 1. Will the Petroleum Incentive Program be replaced by November 1?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources I would like to advise the Hon. Member that she and I have had a number of discussions on this matter. She is also carrying on discussions with the provinces to try to arrive at a satisfactory resolution to this matter.

POINTS OF ORDER

REQUEST FOR TABLING OF DOCUMENTS BY MINISTER

Mr. Ian Deans (Hamilton Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order to seek your intervention and require that the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans (Mr. Fraser) be asked to table the documents that he used this morning in answer to my colleague, the Hon. Member for Comox-Powell River (Mr. Skelly).

Citation 327 at page 115 of Beauchesne states:

A Minister of the Crown is not at liberty to read or quote from a despatch or other state paper not before the House, unless he be prepared to lay it upon the Table.

I would contend that today not only did the Minister in fact make reference but he used that reference to attempt to leave the impression with the House of Commons and the public of Canada that the suggestions being made by my colleague were wrong, and that he used both documents—which he referred to specifically—to influence the course of events in the House of Commons.

I clearly recognize the problem that exists with this citation. I have dealt with the matter a number of times in the past and I appreciate that subsection 5 of Citation 327 states:

To be cited, a document must be quoted or specifically used to influence debate.

I also appreciate that there have times in the past when the very narrow definition of "debate" has been used to defeat a request such as the one I am making. However, I suggest that there is an ongoing concern in the land and there is no actual debate within the definition as set out in the orders under which we operate. However, in order to shore up his position, the Minister indicated to the House that he based his decision on those two documents.

Notwithstanding the fact that the debate, as quite narrowly defined, is not currently under way and perhaps never will take place, if the Minister believes that the documents he has cited or quoted from are important for the purpose of making his case, I would ask that, as the Standing Order is frequently used, he volunteer to table them.

Mr. Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, I would like to make a brief comment on the point of order just raised. I am sure that it will be argued that debate in the sense contemplated by Speakers' rulings in the past does not include the Question Period. I would urge your honour to consider two points. First, there is wide ongoing debate about this matter throughout the country and surely the House of Commons represents the country at large. Second, and more important, surely there was debate in the House during this Question Period on the matter of these two documents because representatives of the Official Opposition and the New Democratic Party both stated, in their questions a few minutes ago, that the Minister decided to release the rancid tuna in question before the Productivity Council of New Brunswick completed its tests, based on a report or statements of the Productivity Council. In his reply, the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans (Mr. Fraser) has denied or contradicted the assertions in the questions by spokesmen on behalf of the Liberals and the New Democrats. Surely, if that is not debate in a very definite sense of the term, then I do not know what it is. I respectfully submit that we have had a debate on this matter in the Question Period, at least today, and therefore the point of order should be sustained.

Mr. Speaker: The Hon. Member for Hamilton Mountain (Mr. Deans) raises a point of order on the basis that a citation has been made. Potentially, there is a second issue concerning whether a debate is occurring. However, there have been many precedents concerning the necessity to table a document that has been quoted during Question Period. Let us resolve that issue. I believe the Hon. Member for Windsor West (Mr. Gray) was referring to a ruling by Speaker Jerome in which he indicated that a Member could not simply ask a Minister if he quoted a document and, receiving an affirmative answer, therefore force him to table it. That would be unfair.

I listened to the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans (Mr. Fraser). I heard him quote dates. I did not hear him quote from a document. However, as is my custom on such matters, I shall reserve, read the blues and come back later.

I remind Hon. Members—particularly the Member for Hamilton Mountain—that it has been our custom to require Ministers to table the document only where clearly there have been quotations read from that document.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Mr. Speaker, I think you may want to consider an additional procedural question here. I believe that your initial observations are right on. They are in accordance with the traditional rulings of the Speaker. I would say the same if I were sitting on the other side of the House.

When you are considering this matter, you may also consider the fact that the documents in question, certainly in one case, are not state documents or Government dispatches. These are documents that were drawn up by way of reports and if we are going to refer back to what transpired in Question Period, as the Opposition has, I think it is quite clear that the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans has pointed out on an number of occasions that he is now the respondent in legal proceedings taken out by Star-Kist, under the provisions of the Freedom of Information Act. The purpose of those legal proceedings is to prevent him from making public, under access to information legislation and laws, the very documents that are being asked to be tabled.

The Minister is quite clear in his stance on this issue. He is in a position of being under a legal obligation to have this matter dealt with by the courts prior to making any decision with respect to releasing them or making them public.

In any event, apart from everything else, there was no quotation or citation from that document at all, and I think you are quite right that when members of the Opposition ask Ministers if they have documents and they acknowledge having documents, that in itself is certainly not a basis upon which they must lay those documents on the Table.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I recognized the Hon. President of the Privy Council subsequent to my remarks because I did not realize he wanted to make a procedural comment. However, if this continues much longer, I will not reserve my decision.

Mr. Deans: I have one brief point.

Mr. Speaker: Is the Hon. Member for Hamilton Mountain rising on a new point of order?

Mr. Deans: Yes. I am in fact rising on a new point of order, which Hon. Members will understand when they hear it. The information that has come forward forces me to rise on a new point of order. If, by virtue of my asking for the tabling of the documents the Minister is placed in a position that makes it impossible for him to abide by the law, I would simply ask that we not require him to table those documents.

Mr. Speaker: No, I am sorry. These are strictly procedural matters. I have heard the points of order. I am not at all sure what the point of order is of the Hon. Member for Hamilton Mountain (Mr. Deans), but I will be glad to reserve on it.

Mr. Fraser: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: I think the point has been well-aired.

ERROR IN IDENTIFICATION OF MEMBER BY COLLEAGUE

Mr. Fernand Jourdenais (La Prairie): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order different from the one we have been discussing for the last 15 minutes.

Yesterday, as reported the fourth paragraph on page 6772 of Hansard, the Hon. Member for Montreal-Sainte Marie (Mr. Malépart) said that I had asked a question to the Prime Minister. He referred to the Hon. Member for La Prairie. I rose on a point of order, but I was not recognized. I would like to point out that a correction should be made. The question referred to was not asked by the Hon. Member for La Prairie. I cannot tell you what Member asked it, but I was not the one. I would like the appropriate correction to be made.

Mr. Speaker: The Hon. Member referred to another Member who, in his opinion, caused an error in Hansard.

Mr. Lapierre: On the same point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: The Hon. Member for Shefford (Mr. Lapierre) on the same point of order.

Mr. Lapierre: There was indeed a mistake made yesterday, Mr. Speaker, as my colleague wanted to quote a comment by the Hon. Member for Laval-des-Rapides (Mr. Garneau). This matter can probably be settled without anyone getting all upset.

Mr. Speaker: Am I to understand that the Hon. Member for La Prairie (Mr. Jourdenais) and the Hon. Member for Shefford (Mr. Lapierre) are now saying that the Hon. Member for Montreal-Sainte-Marie (Mr. Malépart) wishes to make a correction to Hansard?

Mr. Jourdenais: Mr. Speaker, he is not the one who is asking. I request that this be corrected because the question referred to was not asked by myself.

Mr. Speaker: It is impossible for an Hon. Member to request a correction except for something that he has said himself. Otherwise, if a mistake is made, it is a debating error, an error of fact. However, in this case, I shall recommend to the Liberal party whip that he suggest to the Hon. Member for Montreal-Sainte-Marie (Mr. Malépart) a correction to Hansard.

EARTHQUAKE IN MEXICO—STATEMENT BY MINISTER

Hon. Monique Vézina (Minister for External Relations): Mr. Speaker, first of all, I think we should extend to the people and the Government of Mexico our sincere sympathy after this terrible disaster.

The Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Clark) met with the Mexican Ambassador last night to offer him our condolences and to inform him of the measures the Government of Canada has now taken to provide assistance.

At this time, Mr. Speaker, the Government of Canada has two concerns.

First, regarding the victims in Mexico: we want to help them, and that is why last night I announced that the Canadian International Development Agency was making $1 million available to organizations experienced in relief work. We expect to receive specific requests from these organizations within the next few hours, as soon as requirements have been specified. A CIDA expert on emergency relief has left for Mexico and she will be reporting to us on the situation.

Second, regarding thousands of Canadians who are worried about close relatives or friends in Mexico and whom we want to reassure as soon as possible.

Emergency procedures provided for this type of disaster are now in effect. As of yesterday afternoon, the Operations Centre at the Department of External Affairs is on a 24-hour schedule. The Centre's telephone number has been announced by the media, and I will repeat it here: area code 613-996-8885.

People who are worried about Canadians in Mexico can call the Centre and leave the names of the persons about whom they want to obtain information.

A team of six consular officers from the Department of External Affairs left Canada at 10:30 this morning to go and assist our embassy staff. They will be responsible for helping all Canadians who need assistance. The officers are fluent in Spanish and know Mexico very well. As information becomes available, it will be transmitted to the relatives and friends in Canada who contacted us.

[English]

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the Official Opposition, I rise to express shock and concern at the news of the tragic earthquake disaster in Mexico. I also want to express sympathy to the people of Mexico and, in particular, to all those who lost loved ones because of this disaster.

At least since 1981, when the President of Mexico paid an official visit to our country, we have had a special relationship with Mexico, a relationship involving growing closeness in many ways. Therefore, news of a disaster, like the earthquake that struck Mexico yesterday, comes as a matter of special concern to Canadians both in human terms and because of that deep and wide special relationship.

We are pleased to hear of the emergency measures announced by the Minister for External Relations (Mrs. Vézina). I would like to ask the Minister whether the Government could give serious consideration to increasing the special aid fund which she announced yesterday. The news of the extent of the damage created by the earthquake indicates that it is of catastrophic proportions. Certainly the Government should be looking at the matter of urgency, as to what more we could do, not only by providing funds but by providing such things as mobile homes, medical supplies, communications equipment, and technical experts in a whole host of areas not just medical doctors but also engineering and construction people.

Second, it is necessary for the Government to confirm that it is doing everything possible to assist Canadians who may be stranded in Mexico because of the earthquake. It may well be necessary for special evacuation measures to be taken, possibly involving planes of the Canadian Armed Forces, as well as special communications networks in addition to what the Minister has announced.

To conclude, on behalf of the Official Opposition, I want to express our shock and concern at the extent of the tragedy connected with the catastrophic earthquake that struck Mexico yesterday, as well as to express our deepest sympathy to the people of Mexico, in particular to those who lost members of their family, friends and relatives in this earthquake.

We wish to extend our heartfelt condolences to the people of Mexico and assure them that the Canadian Government will make a sizeable financial contribution to help them through this emergency.

[English]

Mr. Jim Manly (Cowichan-Malahat-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, the Minister's statement must be regarded as nothing more than a preliminary expression of sympathy for the disaster that has overtaken the people of Mexico. As I said in my statement under the provisions of Standing Order 22 this morning, the people of Canada want to extend practical help and not just sympathy.

One million dollars from CIDA to help NGOs with their relief activities cannot, in any way, be regarded as a considered response from Canada to Mexico in this time of tragedy. The earthquake has done billions of dollars of damage to Mexico. Buildings have been destroyed. Transportation and communication links have been disrupted. As the Minister knows, following any earthquake there are problems with sanitation and disease. These problems will be much greater in Mexico City with a population of 18 million people. Considering this devastation, unless today's announcement is followed quickly, and I stress the word "quickly", by the annoucement of a much more comprehensive program, the $1 million will be an insult to the people of Mexico in this time of tragedy.

A more comprehensive program would include at least two components. The first would be a matching dollar for dollar program with recognized relief agencies. Many Canadians will want to make direct contributions to an aid program, and our Government should encourage it by matching dollar for dollar.

The second would be a program of direct Government to Government aid to help Mexico rebuild infrastructure which has been destroyed by the earthquake. This kind of aid would include equipment, expertise and financial help.

In addition, our aid proposals should not be considered in isolation from other events affecting Mexico. It is offensive in the extreme that on the very day when Mexico was hit by the devastation of an earthquake, the Internaitonal Monetary Fund suspended $450 million of loans to that country. This action symbolizes the insensitivity of the IMF to the suffering of people in many countries where it has cracked the whip and withdrawn loans from Governments desperately trying to meet the needs of their people. If the Canadian Government is truly concerned about the tragedy facing the Mexican people, it will use all the power and prestige it has with the IMF to reverse that decision and to restore the loan.

The close ties between Canada and Mexico are shown by the fact that there may be as many as 35,000 Canadians in that country now. The Government has taken steps to establish contact. I commend it for that, but I urge it to bring in a much more comprehensive program to begin to address the needs of the people of Mexico.

PETITIONS

REGULATION OF GAS PRICES

Mr. Vincent Della Noce (Duvernay): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present a petition signed by 66,771 Quebec consumers asking for the establishment of a gasoline price board.

I was given this petition by Quebec's Association des services de l'automobile Inc. because the price of a litre of gasoline in Quebec jumped from 15.7 cents in 1975 to 57.5 cents in 1985—an increase of 400 per cent—while the retailer's gross profit has not changed in ten years and his operating costs have kept going up.

The recent purchase of Gulf by Petro-Canada does not seem to bring—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Order, please. The Hon. Member is only allowed to present a brief summary, but does he have another petition?

Mr. Della Noce: No, Mr. Speaker, I simply wanted to present this petition to the House.

Mr. Speaker: Are there other petitions?

The Hon. Member for Kamloops-Shuswap (Mr. Riis).

CHANGES TO UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE REGULATIONS

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops-Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to present a petition on behalf of a few hundred residents of British Columbia who are concerned by the announcement of the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Miss MacDonald) indicating that workers laid off after December 31, 1985, will have their pension benefits deducted from their unemployment insurance benefits, thus effectively eliminating the benefits to workers of the pension package they might receive.

Mr. Speaker: Before turning to the introduction of Bills, I wish to inform the House that because of the Ministerial statement, consideration of Government Orders will be extended by nine minutes this day. Therefore, Private Members' Hour will begin at 4.09 p.m.

MOTION TO ADJOURN UNDER S.O. 31

NORTHLAND BANK SITUATION

Mr. Speaker: I am in receipt of a notice under Standing Order 31 from the Hon. Member for Oshawa (Mr. Broadbent).

Hon. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Mr. Speaker, I was informed that the order was somewhat different from what it has turned out to be. If Your Honour makes a favourable ruling, I would be pleased to move the following motion at the appropriate time:

That the House do now adjourn to debate the federal Government's role in the crisis facing the Northland Bank.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: What do you think has been on the Order Paper for the last two weeks?

Mr. Broadbent: It is not the crisis.

Mr. Speaker: I am sorry if there was some confusion. As I understand the Standing Orders, they contemplate motions under Standing Order 31 at this time and on two days a week after Questions on the Order Paper. I can assure the Hon. Member that I would know it if I did not have a crib sheet.

The Hon. Member for Oshawa (Mr. Broadbent) sent me notice of his intent to seek leave to move a motion under Standing Order 31. As he knows, in considering an application for an emergency debate under that Standing Order, the Chair must judge whether it meets the strict criteria required. In the letter which I received from the Hon. Member, certain matters were raised. I must say to him that the holding of a press conference and the allegations made by the President of the Northland Bank are not of themselves sufficient to constitute a genuine emergency as contemplated by the Standing Order. Neither, I should remind Hon. Members, has the action or inaction of a Minister ever been accepted as a justification for granting an emergency debate. It is only the emergency itself,

Our precedents clearly indicate that the imminent, potential collapse or failure of a bank—and in this case it would be the second—and its repercussions for the banking industry as a whole has and does constitute, in my view, a genuine emergency as envisioned by the Standing Order. The Chair must then consider whether an early opportunity of debating the matter is likely to be available. As Hon. Members well know, there is a Government notice of motion on the Notice Paper but, as yet, the Chair has no clear indication of when that motion is likely to come up for debate. However, I am advised that conversations continue as to whether there will be a debate.

While I find that the emergency questions have been met, today I am not satisfied, as yet, that there is a sufficiently urgent need to change today's Order Paper to have that matter debated today.

The House resumed from Thursday, September 19, consideration of the motion of Mr. Epp (Provencher) that Bill C-70, an Act to amend the Family Allowances Act, 1973, be read a second time and referred to a legislative committee; and the amendment of Mr. Frith (p. 6625).

Mr. Speaker: I see the Hon. Member for Egmont (Mr. Henderson) seeking the floor. I had understood that the Hon. Member for Beaches (Mr. Young) had the floor the last time the matter was before the House.

Some Hon. Members: He is not here.

Mr. Speaker: In those circumstances, I recognize the Hon. Member for Egmont on debate.

Mr. George Henderson (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, it is rather ironic that we are speaking to Bill C-70 today. In effect its only motive is to cut the payments to mothers on behalf of their children.

In the last day or so we have seen a Government and a Minister who have seen fit to allow a product to go on the market, in this case tuna, which could be injurious to the health of small children. Instead of talking today about cutting family allowances, we in this Chamber should be talking about the whole issue of tainted tuna. Therefore I move:

That this House do now adjourn.

• (1230)

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The House has heard the terms of the motion.

Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Some Hon. Members: No.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: All those in favour of the motion, please say yea.

Some Hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: All those opposed to the motion, please say nay.

Some Hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five Members having risen:

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Call in the Members.

And the division bells having rung:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Towers): Order, please.

Mr. Prud'homme: Let me offer you a nice weekend, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Towers): I thank the Hon. Member for Saint-Denis (Mr. Prud'homme). I appreciate it very much. And the same to you, Sir.

Pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 19(4), it being 5.09 o'clock p.m., the motion before the House has lapsed and under the terms of Standing Order 9(1) this House stands adjourned until Monday next at 11 o'clock a.m. pursuant to Standing Order 3(1).

The House adjourned at 5.09 p.m.

PAROLE ACT, PENITENTIARY ACT, PRISONS AND REFORMATORIES ACT, AND CRIMINAL CODE

MEASURES TO AMEND

The House resumed from Friday, September 13, consideration of the motions of Mr. Beatty that Bill C-67, an Act to amend the Parole Act and the Penitentiary Act, and Bill C-68, an Act to amend the Parole Act, the Prisons and Reformatories Act, and the Criminal Code, be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee.

Mr. Alan Redway (York East): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have this opportunity this morning to say a few words in connection with Bill C-67 and Bill C-68. Bill C-67 is an Act to amend the Parole Act and the Penitentiary Act, and Bill C-68 is an Act to amend the Parole Act, the Penitentiary Act, the Prisons and Reformatories Act and the Criminal Code. These Bills contain a number of technical amendments, but their main thrust as far as Canadians are concerned has to do with what could be called the legalization of a procedure which has come to be known as gating. When inmates receive mandatory release after serving only two-thirds of their sentence, in the past there has been a requirement that they be automatically released. Because of difficulties with people who have been automatically released, there has been an attempt in recent years to try to prevent this release by the system of gating or rearresting them as soon as they walk out of prison. Of course the courts have found that this is not a legal practice. Bill C-67 has been introduced to ensure that we do not have to release prisoners automatically when it is inappropriate.

Of course, the explanation for that can be found in Bill C-67. These amendments would clarify the nature of the remission of a sentence and its impact on the sentence. It would allow the National Parole Board to order continued detention in a community based residential facility of certain inmates following a review by the board of those identified under stated criteria and referred to the National Parole Board by the Canadian penitentiaries service. The long and the short of it is that there would no longer be mandatory release in such a situation. The National Parole Board would have the discretion not to release people automatically.

The same applies in Bill C-68. Its amendments would provide for the termination of full parole and release on mandatory supervision. Both these Bills are extremely important in the area of sentencing and parole, two matters which Canadians view as very serious.

During the past election campaign we found that the whole issue of law and order was a major one on the minds of Canadians right across the country. To a large extent it was manifest in the call by many people for the return of the death penalty. What really became the characteristic of the issue was the whole question of whether we should have a return of the death penalty, whether we should have a free vote, whether we should have some form of referendum or what we should have concerning the death penalty. However, I believe that there is a wider issue than just the death penalty. It is the whole question of law and order itself or the whole question of tightening up the legal system—sentencing, parole and mandatory release provisions—in order to ensure that we protect ordinary Canadian citizens to the fullest extent. The Opposition and many organizations in Canada have pointed out that they feel this will have a negative effect on what Canadians should expect from their criminal system or from their prison system. Previous speakers have indicated that they feel there will be a rise in crime if these Bills go through, but that is definitely at odds with what we have seen happening in the last few years.

The concern demonstrated during the election campaign was just an example of the concern of all Canadians resulting from a series of situations which seem to have occurred, if not daily, almost weekly and have been reported in the press with a great deal of publicity. Of course it raises concern in the hearts and minds of all of us. I should like to refer to a recent concern which may not relate specifically to this issue but relates to the whole area of parole and releasing people from prison before the sentence which has been handed out by the judge has been completed. This case resulted from an occurrence in Metropolitan Toronto last month which was reported widely. That was the case of a man who picked up three teenage girls, forced them at gunpoint to strip, tied them up with their own clothing, raped them repeatedly, forced them into other sexual acts and then left them tied up in a field. This man had met them at a hamburger shop and had asked them for a ride to the railway station. Naively, they agreed to his request and took him there. The result of that were the acts that I have just read from one of the local Toronto newspapers of last month.

The case did not stop there, however. It was discovered that this individual had been released on a day pass from prison but had in fact been out for quite a few days. There had been a series of rapes in different parts of Metropolitan Toronto, followed by these particular incidents, and after the police emergency task force had surrounded him and apprehended this individual in a cemetery, I believe, it was determined that he was, in all likelihood, the one who had committed this series of crimes.

It seems to me that this sort of thing illustrates only too well the concern that the people of my riding have and the concern that Canadians have relating in general to the whole subject of criminal law, sentencing, parole, and mandatory release.

These two Bills, Bill C-67 and Bill C-68, are a small first step toward tightening up our whole legal system to ensure that all of us can feel safe in our homes and safe on our streets. We have a great and wonderful Charter of Rights in this country and it guarantees a good many freedoms: freedom of speech, freedom of assembly, freedom from discrimination and freedom to be treated equally. One thing that is not mentioned in the Charter of Rights is the freedom to walk down the street at night without fear. Hopefully this Bill will be the first step to bringing about that feeling of freedom on the part of all Canadians, that freedom to walk down the street at night without fear. In that respect I hope it will receive the unanimous support of all Members of this House.

Hon. Bob Kaplan (York Centre): Mr. Speaker, I am glad to have an opportunity to participate briefly in this debate. As a former Solicitor General I can be forgiven for reminding the House that the legislation before us now, which is legislation to constrain mandatory supervision, was in almost every particular the same as legislation which I had introduced and which I had hoped would go through the House before the last election.

We find ourselves in somewhat the same position today as we were at that time, that is that the Conservative Party and my own Party, the Liberal Party, are in agreement that mandatory supervision ought to be constrained further, while the NDP is raising objections to that.

Before the last election the objections of the NDP were fatal because we needed unanimous consent to get the legislation through before the end of the parliamentary session. This time the objections of the NDP are not going to defeat the Bill because it can still be referred to committee and we have lots of time to look at it. I do not want to indicate today to government Members that we will not have amendments to this legislation. It is not exactly the same as our previously proposed legislation but its objective is the same. I want members of the Government Party to know that we approach this issue with the same concern that they have, namely, to find out how we can constrain mandatory supervision further to make sure that inmates who we know are dangerous can be prevented from being released from prison any sooner than the court sentence imposed upon them specifies.

While I indicate a need to review mandatory supervision and tighten it up, I am also glad that the Government Party has not gone so far as to cancel mandatory supervision completely. I know that there are occasional public outcries for mandatory supervision to be completely cancelled and for inmates to stay in prison as long as the warrants which impose their sentences lasts since the public interest would be served best by keeping them behind bars as long as possible. I wanted to speak in today's debate because I do not agree with that position. I feel that mandatory supervision is useful for most inmates and I thought, in support of this initiative of the Government, that I ought to indicate why I think so.

A great many people believe that when a court imposes a sentence, somehow or other the machinery of parole and mandatory supervision work against the sentence of the court. That of course is not true. When a judge imposes a sentence, he is fully aware that there is a parole period and a period of mandatory supervision provided in the law and that if he wants the inmate to spend a certain amount of time behind bars before he gets out on parole, the court imposes an appropriate sentence. In no sense of the word do parole and mandatory supervision undermine what a court has in mind for the inmate.

That is quite different from the situation in the United States. Many Canadians, when reading of the American situation, assume that it is the same in Canada and that somehow the Parole Board has the function of equalizing sentences or working against the sentence imposed by the court. That is not the case. The Parole Board is very limited in what it can do and the judge knows, when the sentence is imposed, what kind of an impact the Parole Board and the law of mandatory supervision will have on the sentence that he imposes. He takes that into account when the sentence is imposed.

The Parole Board can take a look at the inmate during the middle third of his sentence to decide if the inmate has benefited to the maximum from being behind bars, if his rehabilitation will be benefited by putting him out on the street under supervision and if there is a satisfactory assurance that the public at large will not be at risk if he is put out of parole at that point. However, the Parole Board's jurisdiction under our law has not applied in the final third of an inmate's sentence.

Let us say that the Parole Board does not trust an inmate and feels that he should stay behind bars and not be put on parole. Our law presently provides that at the end of the second third of his sentence, provided he has behaved in prison, he can be released, to spend the last third of his sentence on the street, and the Parole Board has no authority to stop this. During the Trudeau years, the former Government introduced some constraint on the law that had existed before. Before we did that, an inmate who served two-thirds of his time behind bars and behaved well would get out at that time. Although he was still under warrant, there was no supervision or accounting of him at all. It was a system that had existed for over 100 years and it was known by the cons and the public as time off for good behaviour.

In 1970, the present concept of mandatory supervision was introduced. That meant that if the inmate behaved well, he could be released but he would have to report to a parole officer and terms and conditions could be imposed upon him. In 1970, the Government was responding to the idea that it is in the public interest in almost every case to allow the inmate to spend some time on the street under supervision before the end of his warrant. That is a very difficult policy to defend when someone emerges who has been victimized by an inmate who is out on the street during the last third of his sentence. Members of Parliament raise this issue in the House every day. What business to we have to allow someone to be out on the street when their sentence is not over, even under supervision, when they can create more harm? Why do we not keep them behind bars until the last minute?

The answer to that question, of course, is that at the last minute the offender will have to be released. Mandatory supervision only applies to inmates who will be released eventually; it does not apply to lifers or people who are serving indefinite sentences. So the criminal justice system has a difficult choice to make. Should we keep an offender behind bars for as long as possible and then release him to be completely free like anyone else in society? Or, should we control his re-entry into society, imposing a period of time in which he, and society, can help in his readjustment to life on the street again? The fact that we have conditional release, mandatory supervision and parole is an indication that in our criminal justice system we tend to believe that an inmate has a better chance of going straight, and society has a better chance of being protected, if there is that period before the warrant expires when the inmate is on the street but under supervision.

I had the opportunity, and I hope the present Solicitor General will take the opportunity, to look into the way in which mandatory supervision operates. What happens is that the offender is called in to a parole officer's office, sometimes as often as once a week, and it can even be more often than that. In some cases, he is asked to empty his pockets onto the table. He is asked questions such as: "What lock does this key fit? Where does this money come from? Whose phone number is this? Where are you living now? Where are you working? Are you staying away from alcohol? Are you staying away from your old friends who got you into trouble before you were convicted?" To me, this is a very valuable process. I am glad the Government did not succumb to the temptation of completely cancelling mandatory supervision because, as regrettable as it sometimes is, there are inmates, even with that type of supervision, who commit crimes. In the overwhelming majority of cases I believe, as does the Liberal caucus, that it is better to supervise the inmate's re-entry into society than to leave him behind bars, cold turkey, until the last day when he has to be released, when he cannot be told where to live and to stay away from alcohol, and so on. He cannot be told to find a job, nor can he be forced to report. He is completely free, like anyone else. The valuable opportunity to control him has been lost during the period of time in which he is most vulnerable. The most vulnerable period is when an inmate is released after a period of long confinement and has to adjust to making a living and having the same free choices that all other Canadians have.

While I say that, I still think there are some offenders who are exceptional. Because there are some who will, predictably, commit crimes again as soon as they can, there needed to be some machinery in place for taking mandatory supervision away. The legislation before us provides that machinery, which is why I am in favour of it.

There are some classes of offenders who are very good inmates, for example, pyromaniacs, inmates who are convicted for lighting fires, or sex offenders. These are classes of inmates who tend to be well behaved while they are in prison. In the case of sex offenders, they are often segregated from other inmates who would, possibly, injure them or kill them if they could get their hands on them. So they tend to be model prisoners. However, when the time comes for their release, it is possible that they can re-offend. This legislation provides the machinery to permit the Parole Board to review cases as they come up for mandatory supervision. I hope that it will use the machinery exceptionally. I also hope that it will recognize that it is beneficial for offenders, and society in pursuit of his reform, to put him on the street under control. But for those where it is predictable and almost certain that they will reoffend, this machinery is welcome. This machinery will be there.

I hope in looking at it together in committee that perhaps we will find ways to improve the legislation. Basically, mandatory supervision will be constrained but it will be preserved.

I would like to speak to another matter which is touched on in this legislation.

[Translation]

I am referring to the matter of increasing the number of members on the National Parole Board. According to the proposed legislation, the Government intends to increase the number of members from 26 to 36, which means an increase of 10. I, for one, am in favour of increasing the number of members, because the present workload constitutes a heavy burden on the shoulders of the Board, and since we are giving them more work through this legislation, it is only fair that we should increase the number of members on the Board.

The National Parole Board's workload has also increased as a result of cases under the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms. The present procedure is more time-consuming and involves far more work because of the various stages in the procedure and the opportunities afforded inmates to present their point of view. I realize that, and I am happy to see that the number of members on the Board has been increased to deal with these needs.

[English]

I have learned in recent days that the Government is far behind in filling the existing vacancies on the National Parole Board. I was in western Canada last week and learned that there are some spots on the National Parole Board which have been vacant for over a year. I want to urge the Government to take steps to fill these vacancies or to renew the terms of office of the present serving members. The Government is indicating in this legislation that it needs more members on the National Parole Board. In that case, why has it not acted to fill the vacancies which have existed on the National Parole Board for over a year? One reason may be the new patronage provisions in the conflict of interest guidelines which were introduced by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney). The National Parole Board was one of the commissions to which a relative of a serving Minister, that is, the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Clark)—the sister or sister-in-law—was appointed as a member of the National Parole Board during the course of the past year. If the Government had in mind to appoint other relatives, it has been prevented from doing so by the new conflict of interest guidelines.

The Government has brought in new conflict of interest guidelines. It is now impossible for the Government to make an appointment like the appointment of the sister or sister-in-law of the Secretary of State for External Affairs. What I would like to know is why that person is allowed to keep her job after the conflict of guidelines are changed to prevent that type of appointment. The Government is saying it is wrong for us to appoint our close relatives to jobs like this. Why is it allowed to continue to keep someone on the National Parole Board who it would not be allowed to appoint under the current conflict of interest guidelines? To me it is a question of whether the Government is really committed to having tough conflict of interest guidelines and to seeing them enforced.

I very much favour the increase in the size of the National Parole Board. It has a lot more work to do these days not only because of the Bill which is presently before the House but because of the impact of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms on the hearings of inmates' parole cases and on the appeals from the hearings of inmates' parole cases. Without agreeing, therefore, in advance—and I am looking forward to the committee hearings—to the whole machinery which has been introduced, which is a little different from the machinery I introduced when I was Solicitor General, I am in favour of this type of constraint on mandatory supervision. We look forward to seeing how it is going to work and to an improved system of criminal justice.

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, Bill C-67 and Bill C-68 have been grouped together for debate. They will be referred to a legislative committee at the same time.

Bill C-67 is An Act to amend the Parole Act and the Penitentiary Act. These amendments will give the National Parole Board the authority to deny potentially dangerous and violent inmates release on parole or on mandatory supervision. The Bill will make changes to the correctional program and conditional release, known as mandatory supervision. It will tighten this program for penitentiary inmates who are believed dangerous and could potentially commit another crime.

Let me give some examples of what is happening as a result of individuals being released when they should have remained in prison. In Brandon last year, a man twice convicted for rape was released from a psychiatric centre because it was illegal to gate or rearrest prisoners on mandatory supervision. Within five months this man stabbed one woman and shot another woman and her two children during a bloody rampage in Brandon, Manitoba. One can see that it is extremely important to tighten the parole procedures. As a result of the crime on the streets today we have now reached a point in Canada where women and children cannot go out on the streets.

I will give further examples of what has happened in Manitoba because that is primarily where some of the most bizarre cases have taken place. Parents will not be able to let their children out of their sight for a moment, even to allow them to take apartment elevators by themselves. There is too much risk in allowing their children to play on the streets alone. For example, a 12-year old girl was forced into a car on a Winnipeg street. She was found later, bound hand and foot, and left in a railway boxcar. Fortunately, this time the girl was unharmed when she was found by a passer-by walking her dog. She was not gagged by the person who abducted her and her screams alerted that passer-by. However, in another case in Winnipeg last year, a girl was bound hand and foot and, after bieng sexually assaulted, was left in a shed were she froze to death.

Winnipeg's tenth murder victim of 1985 was an 83-year old man who was assaulted and stabbed 16 times in his home. His body was found a week later. Two people are under arrest for that crime. Recently, a man out on a day pass picked up three teenage girls and forced them at gun point to remove their clothes. He tied them up and raped them repeatedly and left them bound in a field. Fortunately, due to good police work, this individual was picked up later.

It is reported in a Toronto newspaper today that a man is charged with beating a 15-year old girl. This man, who fell 18 feet while trying to jump from a downtown roof top to a tree, has been charged in the beating early yesterday of a 15-year old girl. The girl is in satisfactory condition in the Hospital for Sick Children. If 15 and 16 year olds cannot go out on the street, certainly we cannot allow our younger boys and girls on the street unattended.

The latest and most bizarre case in Winnipeg, which has extremely disturbed the people of Manitoba as I am sure it did all Canadians, concerns a three year old girl who was lured from her home with a stuffed toy. She died of massive head injuries after being sexually assaulted in Winnipeg. A 17-year old has been charged with the crime. The girl was found in a garage a few hours after the murder, clutching a toy that did not even belong to her. It is believed that her head had been bashed in with a brick.

The people of the neighbourhood where this most terrible crime occurred are now organizing neighbourhood patrols in the hope of preventing future tragedies. Some will be walking while others will drive throughout the area on the look out for trouble. They want their streets to be safe for women and children, as do all Members of the House.

Today I will suggest that the Solicitor General (Mr. Beatty) arrange an immediate meeting with the chiefs of police associations and other police organizations. I believe that we can learn more from the police about how to deal with these brutal crimes of child abduction, rape and murder. I do not know what the answer is, but I do not believe that more legislation will necessarily stop such crimes. I am sure that we can learn much from our police across the country about how to prevent these atrocities from continuing.

I will also suggest to the Solicitor General that he conduct a meeting with the provincial Solicitors General to deal with these heinous crimes that are reaching serious proportions.

Let me give another example of how these fiends work. On the previous evening to this three year old girl being sexually assaulted and murdered, the youth accused of this brutal crime is said to have been causing a disturbance in the halls of the apartment building where this victim lived. Neighbours said that a young girl was manhandled in the halls by the accused. We simply cannot let our children play in apartment blocks, especially high rises.

Another recent case in Toronto involves an eight year old girl who was abducted. She was going down the elevator to meet a friend to go swimming. We have never seen or heard of her since. We hope and pray that Nicole will be found safe and sound. It is just further evidence to show that we cannot let our children go out alone. In the case of the three year old girl who was sexually assaulted and murdered in Winnipeg, the Winnipeg police stated that it is one of the worst crimes they have ever seen. It has absolutely stunned the Winnipeg police force. They are to be congratulated for their excellent police work because they found the culprit within nine hours.

In Winnipeg, a steady stream of people dropped by the apartment building today before the funeral of the three year old girl. To date, over $2,000 has been collected, including the donation of a $400 headstone from a Transcona firm. People have been driving from as far as Kenora and Portage La Prairie to express their condolences.

I would like the Solicitor General (Mr. Beatty) to make a commitment that he will take positive action in dealing with safety on the streets, especially as it concerns children. All of us have children or grandchildren and are deeply concerned because any one of them could be the next victim.

This crime was particularly tragic because the father of this three year old was in Alberta and heard of the murder over the radio. One can only imagine his shock.

I want to emphasize that these crimes are a national issue and something which we can no longer condone. We must take action at the federal level. We must introduce legislation, whether it is provincial or federal legislation, that will help the police in any way. I hope my friend and colleague, the Parliamentary Secretary to the Solicitor General, the Hon. Member for Red Deer (Mr. Towers), will relay my plea and concerns to the Solicitor General. I am sure that Members want positive action to stop these heinous crimes and make the streets safe once again for women, children and all Canadians.

Mr. Cassidy: Mr. Speaker, I would like the Hon. Member to say whether he believes that keeping an inmate convicted of a violent crime in prison for the entirety of his term, with no chance of release for good behaviour or for mandatory supervision because a judgment is made that the prisoner might commit an offence again, will mean that, at the end of his or her term, he will be more or less likely to commit further crimes than a prisoner who has passed through a period of parole or mandatory supervision, thus having had a chance to integrate with society?

Mr. McKenzie: Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this Bill is to expand on the powers of the Parole Board. Decisions will have to be made in discussions with prison officials as to who should be transferred or released. That decision is not for a Member of Parliament to make. We will be picking people with experience and good judgment. I suggest that the Solicitor General meet with the different police organizations for discussion because the police are more familiar with criminals than we are. The police can certainly advise us whether somebody should be released or transferred. They know more about these things than anybody else.

Mr. Cassidy: Mr. Speaker, as the Hon. Member knows, prisoners whose eligibility for mandatory supervision is put into question by the proposals in Bill C-67 will have served substantial lengths of time, perhaps 5, 10 or 15 years. People change over time. The judgment as to whether a prisoner can benefit from mandatory supervision or should be denied it would presumably be based on a prisoner's behaviour while a prisoner.

A prisoner is not accepted for mandatory supervision if that prisoner has not exhibited good behaviour. The Member knows that.

The Bill presupposes that it is possible to judge whether or not a prisoner who has demonstrated good behaviour is likely or not to commit a violent crime if permitted to exit prison on mandatory supervision. My colleague, the Hon. Member for Burnaby (Mr. Robinson), has indicated quite strongly that, based on his knowledge of the corrections field, there is no scientific or established means by which that kind of prediction can take place.

The Hon. Member opposite says he believes that that is the case because he is supporting the Bill. What is the evidence? On what basis does the Hon. Member believe the prediction about the propensity to commit violent crime again based on good behaviour?

Mr. McKenzie: Mr. Speaker, if everybody behaved themselves, no one would be in prison in the first place. This is a very difficult problem, and we cannot continue with the same procedure. That is the reason for this Bill. The final authority will be with the people on the Parole Board.

I am concerned about people on the outside, not about people on the inside. Individuals are being released from prison, the Brandon case was an example. There was a prisoner who should never have been released at all. He murdered three people in a shoot-out with police. We have to do something to protect society. There is probably no foolproof legislation that will solve all the problems, but this Bill is certainly a step in the right direction. I am more interested in making the streets safe. That is my top priority. It is not just considering people in jail.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Debate. The Hon. Member for Ottawa Centre.

Mr. Mike Cassidy (Ottawa Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise to speak on this Bill and, as Hon. Members may know, I speak in part with great sadness because a death occurred this summer in the Kirkpatrick House in my riding of Ottawa Centre. Kirkpatrick House is a community residential centre operated by the John Howard Society of Ottawa. It was housing a number of prisoners on parole or on mandatory supervision. An inexperienced 21 year-old girl named Celia Ruygrok who had worked for the society on a part-time basis for only a few weeks was murdered. She was left alone after midnight not knowing that the prisoners, the parolees, in the building were for the most part those with violent criminal records.

Along with my provincial colleague, Evelyn Gigantes and Miss Ruygrok's family, I will be meeting with the Solicitor General (Mr. Beatty) this afternoon. We will be making some positive suggestions which, at the very least both the family and I hope might ensure that this situation does not occur again. We hope we can improve the way in which we deliver services, halfway houses or residential services, for convicted prisoners returning into the community.

I would say that the kinds of comments made by the Hon. Member for Winnipeg-Assiniboine (Mr. McKenzie) and other Hon. Members of this House do concern me. They seem to be trying to convey to the public that we are in the midst of a massive crime wave as a result of being too soft on prisoners.

There are areas of the criminal justice system about which I have some real concern. I am afraid that Bill C-67 and Bill C-68 indicate that the ministry has bought this thinking hook, line and sinker. It is the kind of line taken by the chiefs of police in particular, a group of people who, in my opinion, improperly inject themselves into politics by the way in which they comment on matters that should rightfully be political. They are there to administer the law not to whip up public storms of public protest. In doing so it seems to me that Hon. Members, such as the Hon. Member for Winnipeg-Assiniboine, mislead the public because the public is led to believe that if you simply increase sentences and have more maximum security prisons it will remove dangers on the street, or that the crime rate is such that people cannot afford to go out on the street at all.

Recent statistics issued by Statistics Canada indicate that the crime rate in 1984 is down from 1983. The crime rate has rested. It has been static for several years but is now declining. The same thing is happening in the United States. One reason is very simple. People between the ages of 16 and 23 form a smaller proportion of our population than they did a few years ago. This is the age group with the highest proportion of criminal activity. As people grow older, to some extent there is a diminishing of criminal activity. I find it remarkable, given the current economic conditions, that the crime rate has decreased rather than increased.

We are talking about serious problems with Bill C-67 and C-68. We are not talking about a rampant and sudden sharp increase in the crime rate. While public sentiment and the comments of the police have been directed to the question of punishment, we have had very little discussion of rehabilitation. I would say to Hon. Member opposite that it will be at our peril that we concentrate on the question of punishment and nothing else. My questions to the Hon. Member who just spoke were directed to the kinds of things that are raised, in my mind, by this Bill. If we keep violent offenders in prison for the entirety of their sentences in maximum security institutions, like the one to be built in the riding of the Hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney), then let them out on the street having had no contact with society for periods of up to 20 years, the minimum sentence now provided in cases of manslaughter and murder, how can we realistically believe that individuals after 10 or 20 years in jail can successfully and quickly adapt to society? Or will they be as violent as before and likely simply to go on?

There is a crime problem within our prisons, Mr. Speaker, as you know. Prisoners learn about halfway through their sentence whether they are to be denied the chance of mandatory supervision. What incentive will there be for them to offer any kind of good behaviour over the course of the remainder of their sentence, which could be another five or ten years? What if a prisoner is released on mandatory supervision and then reincarcerated because violated some condition? The condition could be as simple as having a drink. Perhaps, instead of moving to Mississauga as required, he moved to Hamilton because a girlfriend, who had been true to him while he had been in jail, moved to Hamilton, or something like that. Minor violations like that could lead to the prisoner being reincarcerated with no further chance of getting out until the end of his sentence. Prisoners with no hope of getting out before the end of their sentence, it seems to me, are prisoners without any commitment to good behaviour. There is no rational reason at all why they should indulge in good behaviour over the course of their sentence. That is why my colleague, the Hon. Member for Burnaby (Mr. Robinson), told the House earlier of his fears that this Bill, rather than improving the situation, could lead to greater violence within prisons. You would then have a larger number of prisoners emerging at the end of their sentences bitter, alienated from society, not knowing what is happening, and under no obligation to maintain touch with a residential centre, a parole officer, or anyone else when they get out. We all know that if you give someone a cheap suit and a few hundred dollars at the most when they come out, having had very little contact with the community or their family, probably having lost contact with anyone with whom they had an affectionate relationship because of the time they had been locked up, as well as having been surrounded by prisoners and talking about things you learn in prison for maybe up to 10 or 20 years, the chances of that inmate going back to a life of crime are extraordinarily and tragically high. That is one reason we have said that we intend to oppose this Bill.

I now want to talk about some of the specific problems we became aware of in Ottawa-Carleton as a result of the death of Celia Ruygrok. The facts surrounding that tragic death tell us that there are very serious weaknesses in the current system of mandatory supervision and parole, much less rehabilitation. Much to my amazement I have yet to discover whether the house in question, run by the John Howard Society, was intended to be an unstructured or a structured program. I think it is clear it was not meant to be a specialized program. Even if it was to be a structured program, under the standards laid down by Corrections Canada little or nothing was really required in the way of interaction between staff and parolees apart from the fact that there would be a staff person on duty at all times of the day and night. The staff was instructed to lend a sympathetic ear and direct prisoners to resources available in the community. The standards put down by Corrections Canada indicate that if there is to be a monthly meeting or regular meetings with the residents, they should be told about it. But it is not a requirement in a structured program that there be intense work with each prisoner in order to work out a plan of action for re-establishing themselves in the community. In the case of Kirkpatrick House, something as simple as whether or not the house would deal with prisoners who went out and got drunk had not been worked out. The people in Corrections Canada had an understanding of the policy in that particular home different from that of the staff who were there.

Although Corrections Canada was responsible for administering the contract, although parole officers were there—seldom, I think, but at least once every couple of weeks—it appears that no one raised any alarm bells over the fact that the full-time professionally qualified staff, who were adequately paid, I presume, were only there during the week. They worked around the clock from Monday to Friday but on the weekends, part-time staff, and in the case of Celia Ruygrok and perhaps others, inexperienced and underqualified part-time staff, were on their own. Even those residents who were working were likely to be free on the weekends. Those who were taking training programs at community college or manpower training were likely to be free on the weekends. Everyone has the habit of relaxing a bit on the weekends and if it is your habit to go and have a drink or two on a Saturday night and you finally get out of prison where you could not do that, I would think it is a natural tendency for prisoners to want to do it even if the conditions of their parole do not permit it. So here you have inexperienced staff left on their own, part-timers, a duty officer available at the end of the phone but basically saying: "Listen, don't call me unless you have to", and a tragedy occurs.

This particular house did not have any training for its part-time staff. They worked one shift under supervision and then they were on their own. Communications with the part-time staff were negligible. The director of the house was not aware that most of the residents had violent criminal records. In theory the staff should have had access to the dossier on each prisoner but the dossier was in the office of Corrections Canada somewhere in downtown Ottawa. Therefore, in practical terms, they were not accessible to the full-time staff, and even less accessible to the part-time staff. Had this home been located in Quebec City, Moose Jaw or Vancouver, I would assume access to the records of the prisoners would even be less than it was in theory at this home. Part-timers were not involved in staff meetings, from what I could establish. Records of meetings with the prisoners were not kept. It was all very informal.

Those things, Mr. Speaker, speak to weaknesses in the program of the house. Communications were obviously inadequate and there are certainly statements in the audit, which was done after the death, which indicate that the director and the John Howard Society seemed to lack interest in the operation of this home even though it was a $260,000 contract with Corrections Canada, a very major contract. In addition, the audit of the home in November, 1984, indicated:

> Since the evaluation completed in June 1984, CSC has continued to express concerns about the level and quality of service delivery provided by the CRC under the structured program agreement. No additional staff have been hired as anticipated, and the CRC program content continued to be seen as limited. Most recently at a JHS Board of Directors meeting 84-11-21, the concerns of CSC and NPB in this regard were expressed. The Agency indicated a commitment to respond to the problem by hiring an additional staff person ... A structured program will be developed and implemented with the assistance of additional staff resources, and by consultation with the CSC Ottawa area office.

That evaluation came out 7 to 8 months before the murder took place. What happened in the intervening time? It is hard to see what happened. Yet Corrections Canada was within a mile of this particular halfway house. Now I ask myself, if Corrections Canada, given the proximity of this particular house, was unable to get them to clean up their act and this death occurred, and if, as the report stated, common sense alone would have said you should not have left this young woman there on her own, inexperienced as she was, in the middle of the night, quite apart from any other factors about what should or should not have been done, then what about the halfway houses and community residential centres which are located at much greater distance and which, therefore, do not have the benefit of easy and quick communication with Corrections Canada staff?

In addition to that, this report was prepared on behalf of the Parole Board and Corrections Canada. It went quite thoroughly into a number of matters. I have only had an expurgated version because of the Freedom of Information Act. Much of it is blacked out, and much of that pertains to the particular circumstances surrounding this death.

It is the systemic problems which particularly concern me. I think this is relevant to Bill C-67 because community residential centres are the kinds of places to which prisoners are sent under mandatory supervision. Of the seven full-time and the one part-time officers in the Ottawa area, the most experienced had all of 13 months of experience. It appears from the report that she was expected to stand in for the area manager when the area manager was absent on holiday or for some other reason. In other words, inexperienced staff was being used to investigate the possible suspension of supervision or suspension of parole of prisoners. Also the report indicated that they tended to be too soft and rather forgiving to prisoners who went out on benders or formed liaisons with young women and so on. I cannot judge all this partly because a lot of the material has been expurgated. Nonetheless, since parole officers are an essential part of the justice system for prisoners who are placed in the halfway position of being out of prison and on their way to re-establishing themselves into society, or so we hope, we would have thought that Corrections Canada and the National Parole Board would have been more mindful of that weakness. If that weakness can occur in the nation's capital, it can occur systemically in any other part of the country. That raises real questions in my mind. We have parole officers who are underqualified and inexperienced. We have Corrections Canada which is incapable, even in Ottawa, it seems, of enforcing action when it had really deep and longstanding concerns, not just temporary ones, about a particular halfway house.

These are the kinds of things which lead me to say that we should be looking at the nature of the rehabilitation services which we offer to see if there is some way to improve them, rather than adopt the approach in this particular Bill which is be more vindictive.

The average cost of having a prisoner in penitentiary is estimated to be $40,000 per annum. Presumably the cost for prisoners who have committed violent offences and are in maximum security institutions is a good deal higher. If we include the capital cost of facilities which are now being built over some period of amortization or depreciation, the cost would be higher still. We are talking about $60,000 to $80,000 per year for prisoners in high security institutions. The effect of the Bill could well be that we will increase substantially the demand for maximum institutions because those prisoners will be kept in such institutions for longer periods of time. Let us compare that with the cost of keeping a prisoner in the community. A prisoner on parole who is not in a halfway house can cost as little as $3,000 or $4,000 per annum at current levels of parole supervision. A prisoner in a halfway house such as Kirkpatrick House can cost $40 per day or about $13,000 or $14,000 per year. In other words, the disparity is such that surely we should be looking at better means of rehabilitation. Surely we should be putting more resources into what those prisoners are doing when they are out in the community.

I see that my time is up. I hope one of my colleagues will ask me a question or two about this particular case. However, perhaps one thing can be drawn from the case of Celia Ruygrok. Charges have been laid. We do not know who was responsible in terms of the courts and so on, but let us seek to ensure that the security of staff is adequately protected and that we do not have single staffing at night in places where there are many violent offenders. We should try, in a positive way, to put into force the guidelines which have now been drafted by the Canadian Criminal Justice Association, guidelines which would seek to ensure that halfway house programs are working in a positive way in an attempt to try to help offenders establish themselves in the community rather than being dumping grounds for prisoners for a few months or a year or two between the time they are let out of prison on a conditional basis and the time that their term is actually up. Unfortunately, the dumping ground philosophy has been too prevalent. Whether it is a dumping ground in the community or a dumping ground back in prison, which it seems to me is the intent of Bill C-67 and Bill C-68, it is wrong. We have to be positive and treat the whole matter as an integrated criminal justice system, as criminal lawyers said in their testimony on the previous Bill a year or so ago. We cannot fiddle with just one part of the entire system, as is being proposed here, and hope to have positive results.

Mr. Kaplan: Mr. Speaker, I am glad to hear that the Hon. Member for Ottawa Centre (Mr. Cassidy) is looking further into and meeting with the Solicitor General (Mr. Beatty) on the Kirkpatrick House murder. Frankly I was surprised to hear him and his NDP provincial colleague criticize the John Howard Society so quickly, before getting completely to the bottom of the facts. My own feeling is that there is a lot more to find out about the case. The Hon. Member should not have rushed capturing headlines with his criticism of the way the house was run. Let us get to the bottom of it. I wish he had done that before making a condemnation of the John Howard Society.

The tenor of his remarks was to urge for a more controlled criminal justice system. His colleague, the Hon. Member for Burnaby (Mr. Robinson), when he spoke on these Bills the last time they were called as House business, said that the type of additional constraints on mandatory supervision that we wanted to see would lead to more crime. I ask him and his colleague to reflect on that proposition. Does it not really depend on the competence of the National Parole Board? Of course I am urging that we have a competent parole board, but I think these additional constraints which are being imposed upon mandatory supervision will reduce the amount of crime, not increase it. It is exactly the same argument as the one made before the last election when the NDP prevented us from getting this type of legislation at that time. For goodness' sake, we know that we are dealing with tough, hardened offenders, the most difficult risks in the whole system. Let us give the National Parole Board the teeth to keep the ones who are dangerous behind bars longer. That is what we are asking for in this legislation. I urge the NDP to look at the reality of the situation and agree that if the parole board does its job properly, this type of legislation will result in a lower crime rate, not a higher one.

Mr. Cassidy: Mr. Speaker, I have several points in response to the Hon. Member's intervention. With respect to Kirkpatrick House, my provincial colleague, Evelyn Gigantes, spent a great deal of time in July meeting with residents, staff and the bereaved family learning what had happened. Her comments were extremely responsible ones and were fully borne out in the findings of the report, which only became public or accessible to us a week or so ago. What she has said, as I have said, is that there were profound weaknesses in the operation of the particular house. There were profound weaknesses in a systemic fashion. This means that this could have happened anywhere in Canada in terms of the way the Parole Board, parole officers and Corrections Canada worked.

In response to my hon. friend, the former Solicitor General, he conveniently ignored the fact that his Government, with one brief interruption, had 20 years in which to bring in these improvements. It chose to do so only at the last minute. If that Bill were not passed, surely it relates to a large degree to the fact it took so long for the former Government to choose to bring forward these particular reforms.

The present Government, as was the case with the former one, seems to feel that it would be possible for the Parole Board to reach a conclusion about the propensity to violence of prisoners and to distinguish between two prisoners who committed the same offence and whose records, while in penitentiary, have in fact been the same, since one is not considered for mandatory release unless one has a record of good behaviour. For the life of me, I do not know how that can be done. However, I know that if a prisoner is released under the mandatory release program and someone only sees the prisoner once every couple of weeks and there are no alarm systems if there are problems—and problems have been alleged in the case of some people who were in this particular house—there is a real imbalance. Rather than allowing the Parole Board to lock up people and throw away the key until the term is over, it seems to me that we should be looking at what has happened in the community.

Perhaps the Hon. Member is suggesting that the way to prevent future violent crime is to lock such people up for life. Regrettably that has somewhat been the policy of the Canadian criminal justice system. I am sure that would work, but the expense and the effect in terms of human rights and that kind of thing would be intolerable. We already have a higher rate of incarceration than almost any country in the western world and I would not like to see that go on.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: A supplementary question?

Mr. Kaplan: The Hon. Member is relying on a real chestnut in argument. I will not defend or contradict what he said about my beliefs as I expressed them in my own speech. The New Democrats have a very contradictory position. They are saying, don't give the Parole Board the authority to hold inmates back on mandatory supervision because how can the Parole Board predict whether they are going to commit additional crimes or not? If that argument is true, how can they agree with the idea of parole at all because the whole idea of parole at the end of the first third of an inmate's sentence is to try to predict what an inmate will do during the parole period?

If the arguments of the Members of the NDP are right, that the Parole Board cannot predict who is going to be violent in the last third of their sentence, then how can they support parole, as I know they do, in the middle third of their sentence when the issue is very much the same: What is this inmate likely to do if we give him the chance to rehabilitate himself on the street?

I would urge that Members be more sensible and to recognize that prediction is not perfect. One cannot predict with perfect accuracy how an inmate is going to behave when he is let out on the street. But in a lot of cases it can be predicted, so let us give the Parole Board at least the tools to make that prediction in cases where it is possible. Let us hope that the Government will be more sensible when appointing people to the Parole Board, and not include just relatives of Ministers and Party hacks but people who will be able to do a competent clinical job of assessing how an inmate is likely to behave. In that way the best will be done for the rehabilitation of inmates and for the protection of our society from repeat offenders.

Mr. Cassidy: Mr. Speaker, I would be tempted to respond on the question of patronage and the record of the former Government. However, I would like to respond seriously to the serious points made by the former Solicitor General.

If, in fact, prisoners learn that the Parole Board which has denied them parole has basically an unmitigated right to decide whether or not mandatory release should be denied at the end of two-thirds of their sentence, then what incentive is there for good behaviour on the part of those prisoners, once they decide they have been fingered by the board and therefore will not get any remission of sentence at all? That is my first question.

My second question is this. We are told here, in the case in Ottawa, that the Liberal parole officers were too soft, and that may well be the case. If, on the other hand, a parole officer is told that if the mandatory remission is revoked and the prisoner is sent back that prisoner is then locked up for another four or five years until his sentence is completely over, what is that going to do in terms of the parole officer's decision in making the judgment call about whether or not to revoke?

There again it may in fact be that what is needed is that the prisoner needs to be locked up for another six months but then given another chance. But there is no second chance in Bill C-67. Once revoked, you are back for five years in the case of a relatively long sentence, and I find that to be a sledgehammer approach which, it seems to me, gives very few options in terms of what one needs to try to do in rehabilitation.

Mr. Keeper: I have a question, Mr. Speaker, for my colleague. He was saying in his address that prisoners are often just dumped in the community without any adequate supports and, by way of contrast, that we spend a great deal of money and resources on prisoners when they are incarcerated. I wonder if he could elaborate a bit on what he sees as the needs in the community if we are to have prisoners in the community?

Mr. Cassidy: Mr. Speaker, that is a matter which the new Minister, who does not come with any of the baggage of the previous Government or of being a Minister previously, has to seek to resolve.

It is clear from what I am learning, and I confess I am learning in this area, that the parole service needs to be adequately staffed, that we need to do more than is being done now in terms of finding employment opportunities for former inmates, that we need to ensure that community resources are available so that a prisoner who is determined to try to go straight does not get sucked back into the kind of environment or the kind of life that he or she had before.

I mentioned as well, and the Hon. Member for Burnaby-Coquitlam mentioned it also, that men or women who are imprisoned in the prime of their life, in their twenties most often, and are imprisoned for ten or 15 years under circumstances where they are not working, find it very hard to come out and take a job in a factory at $4 or $5 or $6 an hour, and to be at an enormous disadvantage because of the fact that society continues to exact a cost from such people, even if they have paid their debt to society.

The Hon. Member for Burnaby-Coquitlam suggested quite strongly that prisoners should be required, wherever possible, to work while they are in penitentiary and, for that matter, while they are in provincial institutions as well. They should be required to work because that is a way of cutting some of the costs and because in performing work they can qualify themselves to be more capable of surviving in society when they come out and maybe be able to do better. They can also demonstrate to the Parole Board or other authorities their capacity for rehabilitation and betterment other than the fact that they did not knife a fellow prisoner or mouth the prison guards in the time that they were sitting idle over years of enforced imprisonment and unemployment.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Resuming debate.

Mr. Jim Manly (Cowichan-Malahat-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to make a few comments in this very important debate which affects the entire future of corrections in Canada. We know that this debate is not only taking place in the House of Commons but also in the streets of our communities, and often in a very emotional manner. People have good reason to be emotional about this issue. As an example from my riding which I am sure many Members will remember, four years ago a 15-year-old girl was brutally murdered by Paul Kocurek who was a known sex offender who was out on mandatory supervision. He had been released barely six weeks earlier.

Quite rightly, the people of my community got very angry and very upset. They demanded changes. They formed an organization called "Citizens United for Safety and Justice" which was organized by parents and neighbours of the murdered girl. They have been persistent advocates of change in the law regarding mandatory supervision.

The details which came out in the trial of Paul Kocurek raised some very disturbing questions about the whole way in which mandatory supervision has been handled in the past. I think they have to be looked at in this debate.

Generally speaking, I agree with my colleagues who have pointed out that there are no adequate methods of predicting future violence on the part of a criminal who is being released but it is important to note that in the case of Paul Kocurek psychiatric reports indicated that if he did not receive proper treatment he was likely to kill someone. He was subject to fantasies of a sado-masochistic nature; he liked to choke women during sexual intercourse; he had a very disturbed personality and background. He had a history of molesting young children and in 1979, following the unlawful confinement of three young girls at which time he impersonated a police officer and attempted to handcuff them, he was given a two-year suspended sentence.

While on suspended sentence, one month later he was arrested for indecent assault on a four-year-old. As a result of that he was given a two-year sentence.

Under mandatory supervision, Kocurek was legally entitled to be released after serving two-thirds of his two-year sentence. It is interesting to note that two days before he was eligible for mandatory supervision release on June 20, 1981, he informed his parole officer that he was seriously considering waiving his right to mandatory supervision release in order to get further treatment at the regional psychiatric centre. In other words, he himself knew that he was a disturbed and unhealthy human being. His parole officer and the centre staff urged him to do this, but at the last moment he changed his mind and went through with the mandatory release program.

The conditions for his release included, among others, regular visits to the local mental health unit. However, he did not show up for his very first appointment. When he failed to show up for that appointment, nothing was done about it. No contacts were made with him. The parole supervisor was not notified and there was no real concern that this very disturbed human being who was at large in the community and had been told as a condition of his release that he should report to the mental health unit had not done so.

During the time that Kocurek was at large, he had in his possession a starter pistol and a pair of handcuffs. As I mentioned earlier, the handcuffs were part of the equipment that he had used earlier in the unlawful confinement of three young girls. He used these handcuffs and the starter pistol at the time of the assault which occurred on August 2. Six weeks after his release on mandatory supervision, he was involved in this brutal sexual assault and murder.

This entire situation raised a series of questions which I put before the Solicitor General (Mr. Beatty) at the time. I still do not think that we received adequate answers of these questions. Why was an adequate treatment program not provided for Kocurek when he was in prison and there had been psychiatric warnings that he would kill if he were not treated? Why, given his history of sexual offences against young women and the psychiatric prognosis that he was liable to continue, was his initial sentence so short? The answer to that, of course, lies with the provincial court system. Why, when he was released, was he not placed under a stricter form of supervision? If we are to have mandatory supervision, let us make sure that it deals adequately with the situation of the people who are being released. Why, when he failed to comply with the terms of his supervision, was he not reported and apprehended?

The fact is that while the program under which Paul Kocurek was released is called "mandatory supervisions", there was no really effective supervision at all. How do we deal with this? Perhaps the easiest answer is to make a scapegoat of the parole service. However, I do not think that is an adequate approach.

In March 1981, an in-house study of the conditional release program indicated that parole supervision staff morale was low. Among others, two reasons given for that was first, quantity control, and, second, minimum standards. Quantity control is bureaucratese for the fact that parole officers have caseloads which are too large. There are not enough staff members to do a decent job.

In introducing this Bill, the Minister has pointed out that it costs some $40,000 per year to keep an inmate in prison and only $4,000 per year to supervise that inmate on the street. I would like to suggest that we beef up our parole services so that we spend a little more than $4,000 per year. It could be money well spent if it resulted in a more effective parole system and one that was not demoralized because it was not able to do its important job.

The in-house study also noted the need for more intensive supervision, particularly for criminals who had a history of violence. That, of course, is precisely what was lacking in the case of Paul Kocurek. In his case, the tragic failure of supervision led to the brutal murder of a young girl. Kocurek is now serving 25 years in prison with no possibility of release.

Quite rightly, Canadians want some protection from this kind of action. The Solicitor General in introducing Bill C-67, claims that this Bill which introduces changes to mandatory supervision will provide that security. I would like to raise a question with all Members of the House and with the Canadian public. Suppose Bill C-67 had been in effect in 1981. What difference would it have made in this particular case to which I referred this morning?

If Bill C-67 had been in place, Paul Kocurek would not have been released in June 1981 but he would have been released in the early spring of 1982. Unless the regional psychiatric centre was able to work an eight-month miracle with him, Paul Kocurek would have been just as disturbed, just as dangerous and just as much a potential killer in the spring of 1982 as he was when he was released in June 1981. The Corrections Department would not even have had the option of imposing on him some kind of supervision. The tragedy is that when there was that option in June 1981, it was not exercised in an effective way. Bill C-67 would simply have delayed that release by a few months and then removed the possibility for any kind of effective supervision. I do not think that that answers the very real concerns of people in the Cowichan Valley and across Canada about violent offenders and the possibility of repeat offences.

At the time of the case to which I referred, the Attorney General of British Columbia pointed out an anomaly in our law. He indicated that a person found not guilty by reason of insanity could be kept locked up until considered cured, but sexual perverts who are also potential killers must be released when their time is up. Bill C-67 does not address that issue. It is obviously an issue that must be addressed and it will require a good deal of attention from the Government at some point. I would suggest that when the Government deals with it, it does so in an open manner that will involve a wide cross section of the Canadian public including organizations like Citizens United for Safety and Justice as well as prisoners' rights groups and civil liberties associations.

This is a debate which deals with the meeting place between the public's right to security and the entire question of civil liberties. I would like to see the Government bring this debate before the House. However, I do not think that Bill C-67 addresses the basic question of protecting the public from violent offenders. It merely does a con job on the issue.

Not only does Bill C-67 not provide the kind of security we need but it will have serious negative effects. First, it has been pointed out that it can lead to even more serious overcrowding in our prisons. The prisons are already full to the bursting point. There is double-bunking in some prisons and there are inadequate facilities for vocational training. There is a crowding of all the facilities. We should recognize that overcrowding leads to increased tension and increased violence among prisoners and that it also leads to increased tension and violence between prisoners and custodial staff. At best, our prisons are dehumanizing institutions and overcrowding will make it worse. It will cut back on every possibility of rehabilitation. It is interesting to note that the present Minister of State for Immigration (Mr. McLean), when he sat on this side of the House, raised several questions about the rehabilitative function of our prisons. He suggested that that function was being dropped and urged that it be put back into the centre of the philosophy of the correctional system. He urged the correctional system to give more priority to the educational system within our prisons. The previous administration in the last Parliament cut back on higher education programs for inmates. When those programs were restored it required that the inmates should have to pay. In this way it meant cut-backs in terms of enrolment. It is important to note that for many inmates taking part in these educational programs it was really something of an habilitating—not a rehabilitating—program. Most inmates had not had that type of opportunity before. If we are to lock people up in institutions it is desirable, if at all possible, that on their release they be better human beings as opposed to worse. Overcrowding eliminates that possibility, which will be one side effect of Bill C-67.

Bill C-67 proposes the removal of the leverage which prison authorities have over prisoners in terms of good behaviour. There will be no more good behaviour incentive. It is for that reason that Canadian prison wardens have opposed this proposal.

One detail of concern in Bill C-67 suggests that prisoners who have been convicted of certain crimes will have only one shot at the mandatory release program. The point of view is that a person with a history of violence who is released and gets into trouble with the law should not be back out on the street again. I agree, if we are talking about a violation in terms of another violent crime. However, if the released prisoner is involved in some type of technical violation of his release conditions of a fairly minor nature, I am not sure it makes good sense to say that he will never have another opportunity to become involved in the mandatory release program. Tehnical violations should not mean complete forfeiture of all future rights to mandatory release.

In conclusion, I wish to stress that Bill C-67 is not the answer to the concern Canadians have with respect to security. It does not involve the type of security against violent repeat offences by people who have been imprisoned for committing violent crimes. What it means is that at the end of their sentence prisoners who have been convicted of violent crimes, and those who continue to have a tendency to violence, will be released without any possibility of supervision or follow up. I urge the Government to take a second look at the Bill and to bring in a program which will deal with the needs of Canadians with respect to security. I hope the Government will recognize that by simply tightening up mandatory supervision it has not provided the answer.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Questions or comments? The Hon. Member for Ottawa Centre (Mr. Cassidy).

Mr. Cassidy: Mr. Speaker, I would like the Hon. Member to elaborate on one area of concern to me. I am speaking of technical or minor breaches of mandatory supervision conditions which can, in fact, lead to a situation in which a convict is forced to go back to prison under the proposed terms of Bill C-67 and then lose all remission and have no means of getting out again for a lengthy period of time. As I understand it, if one-third of an inmate's sentence has been remitted, that could involve three or four years of additional imprisonment for something as simple as having a drink when the inmate finally meets up with his lady whom he has not seen for seven or eight years. When a released inmate sees an old friend whom he has not seen in a long time or, possibly, misses a bus and arrives after the curfew at the place in which he is supposed to be staying, he can be sent back to prison. Is it correct that the penalty as a result of these misdemeanors, as modest as they are, could be several years of re-imprisonment because of a violation of the conditions of mandatory supervision? How can the Government, or anyone, justify that type of sledgehammer approach? What will parole officers do when faced with minor, technical breaches of conditions when they know that the revocation of mandatory supervision will have the effect of re-imprisonment for three or four years?

Mr. Manly: Mr. Speaker, the question obviously points to the great difficulties which anyone who has done time in a penitentiary will have to face in readjusting to public life. It is not an easy transition to make. We have heard of some Members of Parliament who face a difficult time of readjustment when they have to get back into ordinary life. How much more difficult is it for someone coming out of prison where they have been denied their freedom and any possibility of developing their lives and when their contact with other human beings has been circumscribed? How much more difficult is it for inmates who have had limited contact with their families under nerve-racking conditions? The mandatory supervision period is supposed to make the transition time possible with some type of of supervision. Inevitably, there will be some minor infractions. It is important, when those infractions are committed, that the person involved should be called to account. However, I do not think the way to call him to account is to revoke all future possibility of mandatory release. That seems to me to be completely counter-productive. If someone knows that as a result of having one beer, when his program says he should not drink, that he will face an extra four or five years in prison, he will really become much more desperate about the situation than otherwise. As the Hon. Member for Ottawa Centre (Mr. Cassidy) pointed out, this will mean that parole officers will have to be that much more hesitant about reporting these minor, technical violations.

It is important to remember that inmates already feel a great deal of frustration with respect to the question of mandatory supervision and the type of requirements that are often placed upon them. They sometimes feel they are being hassled for very minor sorts of matters. In addition to be being hassled, they will face an extra four months, two years or even four years of additional time in prison. That will not be conducive to a more rehabilitative atmosphere within our prisons.

Mr. Cassidy: I have another question. I must confess that I have learned something about this area over the summer because of the incident in Ottawa to which I referred and as a consequence of looking at this Bill. As I understand it, this Bill is in fact going to create two classes of prisoners. One class will be those who are convicted of a violent crime, which is in the Schedule—there is a long list of about 15 or 16 crimes deemed to be violent—and the other class will be prisoners who have committed some other offence.

Let us take two prisoners who are under mandatory supervision and who have three or four years of potential time still outstanding if they are sent back. One prisoner commits a technical offence, just as in the example cited by my friend, the Hon. Member for Cowichan-Malahat-The Islands (Mr. Manly), and settles in London rather than in Brampton, or vice versa. He did that without any desire to absent himself but it was just a place where he was more comfortable. The system would not respond to that. The prisoner with the violent record commits a technical offence. The prisoner with the non-violent record commits a violent offence. He takes a gun and holds up a service station. As I understand it, they both lose mandatory supervision. They both go back. The prisoner who commits the technical offence, who has a violent record, loses any chance of coming out of prison again until his time has been served. The prisoner who committed the violent offence, who, I would have thought, was more of a danger to society, can automatically be given a chance to earn remission all over again.

I wonder if my hon. friend can tell me under what circumstances that disparity is justifiable? I suppose neither he nor I know why the Government has left that provision in. But how on earth, if at all, can that kind of thing be justifiable, and if it is not, why don't we get rid of it?

Mr. Manly: Mr. Speaker, not only is that kind of anomaly not justifiable, but it is going to add to the sense of bitterness and frustration on the part of those people who might have their right to mandatory supervision release revoked for some minor technicality. If that sort of thing happened to me, I feel I would become a very bitter kind of human being. I do not believe that thinking Canadians really want our penitentiaries to create more bitterness in these prisoners than they already have, but that is going to be the effect of this kind of regulation.

It means that when the prisoner's release does come, when he has served his full time, he is going to be released as someone who has just one more chip on his shoulder and who has less of a possibility of effective integration into wider society.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Resuming debate.

Mr. Stan J. Hovdebo (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity to speak on Bill C-67 and Bill C-68, which are Acts to amend the Parole Act, the Penitentiary Act and other Acts consequential to those amendments.

This seems to be an occasion, Mr. Speaker, when we collectively, as the representatives of the people, react to something from the community which needs some discussion and insight. What is happening is that the Government is making amendments which are not necessarily well thought out and are not necessarily to the benefit of the correctional system in Canada and, I suppose, in the long term, are not necessarily to the benefit of the Canadian people.

It seems to me, as well as to many of my constituents, that these amendments are reactions to publicity and to the media coverage of situations which have happened across Canada. Bad as those situations are, they may not be the effective result of the legislation presently in place or even the result of legislation which was in place before 1970. In fact, many of my constituents look back at 1970 and suggest that perhaps we should have looked at some of the good things in that legislation and kept them rather than abandoned them.

As you know, Mr. Speaker, I come from the community of Prince Albert. We have a maximum security penitentiary as well as a minimum penitentiary. Therefore, many of my constituents are very closely involved with the penitentiary system. They are involved not only because of their proximity but because many members of their family are closely involved with the penitentiary service. Consequently, over the years, communities like Prince Albert have developed an attitude towards the pentitentiary service and towards the inmates of those penitentiaries which gives them, I feel, a better insight into the needs of the service than those of us have who live a little further away. I think it is worth-while, therefore, to take a look at the effects of this Bill and what might be possible under legislation which was more comprehensive and dealt more closely with the problems of the correctional services. When I say the "problems of the correctional services", I do not mean only the problems of the inmates, I refer to the problems of the penitentiary itself, the guards and so on.

There are also the problems of the Parole Board and of the parole services, those thousands of people who work daily with the prisoners after they are released from the institution. I am also talking about the problems of the community. So that when we examine a Bill such as the one which is before us today, we should not look at just one part of it, saying, "We will solve the problem of mandatory supervision and once that is solved, everything will be okay". It just does not work that way.

With respect to Bill S-32, a Senate Bill, Cole and Manson pointed out the danger of tinkering with one element of an integrated system of corrections. In their view, this simply creates new tensions and unforeseen problems elsewhere in the system. Cole and Manson suggest that any response to violent offenders and repeat offenders must be comprehensive and not piecemeal. A full and open inquiry into the various aspects of corrections law is the approach they favour.

The arguments presented by Cole and Manson on Bill S-32 can be used on Bill C-67 because these amendments do not deal comprehensively with all the problems. Basically what these Bills do is amend the Penitentiary Act to close the revolving doors. I believe every one here recognizes that there are some inmates who should not be let out. The penitentiary service itself recognizes that fact. They should not be let out if they are not well behaved within. The problem seems to have been that if they are well behaved and there is no reason to keep them in, it is required that they be let out after two-thirds of their sentence has been completed. Our position is not that we should stop this procedure entirely, but that we alter the process somewhat and make sure it works better than it has in the past. Instead of stopping a fellow at the gate and sending him back because we think there is a danger that he will commit a violent crime, we should establish a correctional service which predicts this a little more correctly and does something about it.

If you look at the history of the Prime Albert institution, Mr. Speaker, you will find it has done very well in involving the parole service, the John Howard Society and surrounding communities in helping inmates prepare themselves for release. That should be included as part of the solution. Any Bills which aim at restricting the use of mandatory supervision, if you are not going to do anything else, are probably acceptable. But there is no reason to restrict the use of mandatory supervision, and you could increase its effectiveness by putting into place services which are aimed at rehabilitation rather than incarceration.

What would be the effect of these Bills if they are passed exactly the way they are? Again I refer to the Prince Albert institution. Right now it has close to 500 inmates, but it is considered to be full when it has 375 inmates. If they fill every cell in the institution they can push it up to about 425. That is stretching it but they can do it. However, at the moment, with approximately 500 inmates, over 120 of them are double-bunked. Those of you who have been interested or paid attention to the effect of double-bunking over the last few years will recognize that that adds to the potential for problems in an institution. If we pass Bills such as these two, we are going to increase the number of inmates in those institutions. That adds to the frustration and volatility in the institution. It increases the possibility of violence. That, of course, affects every person in the place, and not only inmates. It affects every individual who works in the prison. If you speak to people who work with the inmates on a daily basis, you will find that tension can increase greatly over very small incidents. Therefore, double-bunking has a direct effect on the tensions within an institution, tensions which might eventually lead to riots and violence.

What effect do these two Bills have on the Parole Board? The Bills do not give to the Attorney General or the courts the right to gate prisoners. That is given to the Parole Board. The prison service can refer to the Parole Board those cases which they think need to be reviewed, cases of mandatory supervision which are coming up.

That will have the effect of considerably increasing the workload for the Parole Board. If you speak to members of the board, you will find they sometimes feel they are not spending enough time on individual cases and they are forced to make decisions before they are ready to do so. They often require psychiatric or pshychological reports on inmates before making a decision, and then the correctional people in the institutions quite often come to the conclusion that the reason for requesting psychological reports on inmates is to give them a little more time to talk to the inmate to make sure he is ready for parole. If they have to start doing this on mandatory supervision cases as well, their workload is going to be increased tremendously. That means we have to increase the number of people on the board and increase the amount of services. In some ways that makes sense because if the money we spend on keeping a man in prison was instead spent in areas such as mandatory supervision, then the return would probably be much greater than it is now.

We have been told many times, I am sure, that mandatory supervision is not as effective as parole. But we have to recognize that under those circumstances the cream, if you want to put it that way, has already been skimmed off and given parole and the mandatory supervision inmates are the ones who have been rejected for parole. So you have already started with, and I hesitate to use the term, a lower quality of inmate than you had before. So the amount of time the Parole Board must spend or should spend on mandatory supervision should be a great deal more than is presently spent on parole, and the members of the board think they are not spending enough time even now. So the effect on the Parole Board will be much more work, a requirement for much more staff, and possibly much greater insight into the effective use of mandatory supervision. This has a good side and a bad side. The good side is that if the services are provided, they will do better work. The bad side is that if they are not provided, they will not be able to spend enough time on each case.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It being one o'clock I do now leave the chair until two o'clock this day.

STATEMENTS PURSUANT TO S.O. 22

FITNESS AND AMATEUR SPORT

RESIGNATION OF COUNCIL CHAIRMAN

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): Mr. Speaker, I was dismayed to learn that Mr. Fernand Faucher, Chairman of the National Advisory Council on Fitness and Amateur Sport, has tendered his resignation.

In a letter to fellow board members, Mr. Faucher declared:

> The lack of interest on the part of the Minister and of the Branch people regarding the activities of the Council prompted this reaction.

I view Mr. Faucher's resignation as an extremely serious and most unfortunate setback in the area of fitness and amateur sport. It is abundantly clear that the Minister has been and continues to treat this Council solely as window dressing and has been guided only by his political and bureaucratic masters.

The Council was formed as a private sector group to advise the Minister on a variety of issues affecting fitness and amateur sport. However, it should be noted that the Council has met only once with the Minister since the new administration took office just over a year ago.

I urge the Minister to show that he truly cares about and values the role of the Council, by attempting to convince Mr. Faucher to remain as Chairman, and to re-establish a genuine two-way working relationship with the National Advisory Council. Anything short of this would be an abdication of his ministerial responsibilities.

FAMILY ALLOWANCES—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Mr. John Parry (Kenora-Rainy River): Mr. Speaker, the 3 per cent deindexation of the family allowance is the first step in the Conservative Government's budget strategy to slash $600 million from support to Canadian families by 1990. The Minister responsible for the well-being of Canadian families, the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Epp), informed the House last week that this money was required for a more important purpose, namely, that of deficit reduction.

Last year, however, the Leader of the Government was telling us that family allowances were of a sacred nature. Today, with one in six Canadian families living in poverty, affecting one in five Canadian children, and 42 per cent of Canadian families headed by single parents living below the poverty line, one must ask how the Government can take this action. How can it be said that child allowances must be cut back when amounts such as a billion dollars are still being handed out to a bank?

The Government is sending a clear message by the reductions in family allowance to the people of Canada that, as far as it is concerned, child rearing, parenting, and the development and growth of families are of less concern this year than they were last year, and will be of even less importance by 1990.

The priorities of the Tory Government desperately need to be re-examined.

NORTHWEST TERRITORIES

CALL FOR INUIT SELF GOVERNMENT

Mr. Thomas Suluk (Nunatsiaq): Mr. Speaker, two days from now representatives of all Inuit communities will be meeting in Coppermine to discuss the issue of division as it affects the Northwest Territories. Last spring it was reported by pro-western news reports that the Inuit had scuttled the agreement on an east-west boundary, where the Inuvialuit of the western Arctic would end up in the western territory without their consent. The fact of the matter is that the proposed western territory contains the present capital of the territories, Yellowknife, which understandably does not relish losing its status. In effect they said: "If you Inuit in the east wish to have a Government which understands and respects your needs, your languages and your culture, you must give us your oil rich western portion of Nunatsiaq in order for us to agree to division".

Since that time, the Inuvialuit of the western Arctic indicated in no uncertain terms their desire to be part of an Arctic territory.

All of us can be self-righteous in denouncing the minority Government of South Africa. Yet, when it comes to our own northern Canadian backyard, we are reluctant to give our own native people—the Inuit who are struggling to retain their own identity against the overwhelming odds of southern cultural inundation—their own territory.

We do not wish to impose upon Canadians and the Government of Canada another Indian problem to plague them over the coming decades. We demand the right to make our own mistakes and to be responsible for our own future within accepted Canadian political systems.

Mr. Speaker: I regret to inform the Hon. Member that his time has expired.

CAPITAL PUNISHMENT

CALL FOR DECISION ON REINSTATEMENT

Mr. Bob Pennock (Etobicoke North): Mr. Speaker, there is a strong desire by Canadians that this Parliament deal with the issue of capital punishment immediately. Be it a free vote in the House of Commons or even a national referendum, I believe it is important that effective action be taken on this most important issue.

Our Government needs to strengthen the deterrent for murder and other such abhorrent crimes. Over the last year we have witnessed many senseless killings of police officers across Canada. This should underline the need to reappraise our efforts to protect police officers, prison guards, and the Canadian public.

Since the abolition of the death penalty in 1976, more than 50 Private Members Bills have been introduced recommending the reinstatement of capital punishment. In polls taken since 1978, Canadians overwhelmingly have opted for the reinstatement of capital punishment.

One of the arguments that has been presented opposing such legislation focuses on the fact that normal House business would be suspended for an unacceptable period during the debate on this issue. I believe the House should unanimously move to debate this issue during extended hours so as not to disrupt normal House hours. Mr. Speaker, this important issue needs to be dealt with now.

CANCELLATION OF "OUR NATIVE LAND" PROGRAM

Mr. Keith Penner (Cochrane-Superior): Mr. Speaker, this week Canada will lose a truly excellent CBC radio program. It is a program of particular interest to those of us who are concerned about Indian and native affairs and of significance to all Canadians who care about their country and its people. The final edition of "Our Native Land" will be aired this coming Saturday.

When I first learned last January of CBC's intention to cut the program, I rose in the House to oppose it. Colleagues from all three political Parties responded positively to this representation. My office was later flooded with letters of support for "Our Native Land", and this support came from right across the country. However, CBC remained unmoved and unresponsive.

Afer 21 years of informative and entertaining reporting, this Saturday marks the final show of "Our Native Land". CBC has failed to carry out its mandate to reflect the culture of the people of Canada. It has ignored the wishes of Canadians who want to have this program continued.

I salute the program and its staff. They have served us well. They will be sorely missed.

HOUSING

AVAILABILITY AND AFFORDABILITY—DEMAND FOR ACTION

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay-Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, all Canadians have the right to live in decent, affordable housing, and society, and Government especially, has a responsibility to make that possible. That is not happening in Canada. In many areas of our country there is a crisis situation in housing in terms of availability and affordability.

Just today a coalition of social agencies in the Halifax-Dartmouth area declared a state of emergency in housing in their region. In their statement they point out that the vacancy rate has been below 1 per cent consistently since 1981. Ordinary three-bedroom apartments in Halifax are so expensive that it would require a family income of over $26,000 just to be able to afford the rent.

At the same time the federal Government's funding programs for co-operative and non-profit housing programs are being systematically reduced. This is a completely unacceptable situation.

The coalition demands that the leaders of Halifax-Dartmouth municipalities declare that a housing emergency exists for many people within their area of responsibility and that this declaration be acted upon by a commitment to start planning immediately for the construction of 1,000 social housing units within the shortest possible time.

My Party and I want to add our voices to these demands by demanding further that the federal Government take immediate action to address this crisis situation, not just in Halifax but right across the country, with the resources and the seriousness which a crisis warrants. Justice and social responsibility demand it.

THE ARTS

ESTABLISHMENT OF FRENCH CULTURAL CENTRE IN ORLEANS, ONT.

Mr. Barry Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, on September 8 of this year, Franco-Ontarians from the Orleans area, which is in my riding, saw their dream come true: the opening of the Orleans Cultural Centre, a project of the Franco-Ontarian "participaction" project.

This is another victory for Francophone volunteers in the area and also for all Franco-Ontarians to whom this outstanding example will be an inspiration. I also would like to point out that the federal Government contributed $800,000, or more than 70 per cent of the total construction costs.

In the fall of 1984, I had the honour of turning the first sod, and I have watched the project progress until the official opening. It is a source of great pride to me that the Centre was built in my riding, and I trust it will be used to capacity by all the people of Orleans.

Congratulations to everyone and three cheers for the Orleans Cultural Centre!

YOUNG OFFENDERS ACT

CALL FOR AMENDING LEGISLATION

Mr. Alan Redway (York East): Mr. Speaker, last month an Ottawa judge, following hard on the heels of a similar decision in Sudbury, ruled that because the word "imprisonment" is not mentioned in the Young Offenders Act, juveniles, who run away from a group home or residence to which they have been committed, cannot be charged with escaping lawful custody.

Last week, noting a growing public dissatisfaction, the provincial Attorneys General meeting in Regina urged the Government to amend the Young Offenders Act.

These are but the most recent in a long list of specific problems and general concerns that have been raised by the Attorneys General, the Deputy Attorneys General, the Chiefs of Police of Canada, the public, and Members of Parliament.

I urge the Solicitor General (Mr. Beatty), who is in the Chamber at the moment, to speed up his review and introduce a Bill to amend the Young Offenders Act and to correct these problems without delay.

MEMBERS OF PARLIAMENT

CONTENT OF ALLEGED GOVERNMENT DOCUMENT

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry-Prescott-Russell): Mr. Speaker, the Conservatives are in trouble. In typical fashion the Tories, whose popularity is waning, have taken a page from the Richard Nixon survival book and are attempting to intimidate and even discredit opposition Members of Parliament who disagree, or may disagree, with the Prime Minister's (Mr. Mulroney) view on free trade. Not only does the document in question attack opposition Members, but it makes a complete mockery of any of the consultation process which the Government says it practises.

The document is contemptuous of the very people that the Government purports to represent. The first sign of Tories in trouble, Mr. Speaker, is when they attempt to axe the Opposition. I cannot wait for their next difficulty; then we will see the Tories bury the hatchet in each other, the way they usually do. By the way, I suggest the Conservatives hire communications people who can spell.

NON-PROLIFERATION TREATY CONFERENCE STATEMENT—CANADIAN CONTRIBUTION

Mr. Reg Stackhouse (Scarborough West): Mr. Speaker, I believe this House should be fully conscious of the notable contribution that Canada has made to stabilizing the world through the success of the Non-Proliferation Treaty Conference. Five years ago it was not possible for that conference to issue a common statement.

Through the consensus achieved under the influence of Canadian diplomacy allied with other like-minded states, such a statement was published last week. It is the first common word to come out of this conference supporting a treaty with 129 signatory nations. Much of the credit goes to Ambassador Roche, the team of dedicated professional diplomats who worked with him, and the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Clark) who gave his support. Believe me, Mr. Speaker, as a person attached to the delegation who spent a week attending the conference, I was very proud to see the way in which the noble traditions of Canadian diplomacy are being carried on and making a significant contribution to world peace.

FINANCE

INVESTMENT OF PENSION FUNDS IN FOREIGN MARKETS

Mr. Neil Young (Beaches): Mr. Speaker, in his Budget of last May the Minister of Finance (Mr. Wilson) proposed that the rules for investng pension funds in foreign markets be dramatically changed. At the present time only 10 per cent of a pension fund's holding can be invested outside Canada. The Minister of Finance has proposed that this be increased to about 30 per cent, which represents an outflow of some $30 billion in Canadian funds for investment abroad.

The Minister has stated that this is intended to create jobs in Canada by enticing pension funds to invest money in Canadian small business. The logic of this argument escapes me, and it raises a number of additional concerns with respect to the security of those pension funds once they leave Canada.

The Minister has not indicated how those funds will be insured in the case of bad investments. Neither has he indicated how those investments will be supervised and regulated.

There is growing concern among Canadians that the Government is allowing the boys on Bay Street to play fast and loose with Canadians' hard-earned money. The Minister should go back to the drawing board before he proceeds with this budget measure, which has clearly not been well thought out. If $30 billion leaves the country for foreign investment, Mr. Speaker, while the Canadian economy requires that money for development here to provide Canadian jobs, the Minister of Finance should be ashamed of himself for his proposal.

FISHERIES

SALE OF CANNED TUNA—MINISTER'S RESIGNATION

Mr. George Henderson (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, it has just been brought to my attention that the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans has submitted his resignation to the Prime Minister. While we may all agree that the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans did the honourable thing by resigning from Cabinet—

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Henderson: —I have a question for the Prime Minister. Is he now admitting that there was political interference in this issue? If so, why did he adamantly deny it all last week?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I think that the honourable conduct of the former Minister of Fisheries is appropriate and adequate explanation. There has been an exchange of correspondence between the former Minister and myself, which has been distributed to Hon. Members. I hope it will be received shortly by my hon. friend and I hope that provides the necessary explanation.

PRIME MINISTER'S POSITION

Mr. George Henderson (Egmont): All last week, Mr. Prime Minister, we heard contradictory statements from you, Sir, and your Minister of Fisheries—

Some Hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Henderson: —concerning who actually ordered the tuna off the shelves and when the Prime Minister first learned of this tuna story.

Is this resignation an attempt by you, Sir, Mr. Prime Minister, to use the Minister of Fisheries—

Some Hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: I will invite the Member to rephrase his question, perhaps through the Chair. We are developing a habit that I need to stop. I think the Member understands.

Mr. Henderson: I will direct my question through you, Sir.

An Hon. Member: Be a gentleman.

Mr. Henderson: In the Prime Minister's attempt to use the Minister of Fisheries as a scapegoat, is the Prime Minister attempting to use the Minister of Fisheries as his scapegoat for his own negligence?

Hon. Erik Nielsen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker—

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Deans: How can he answer instead of the person asked?

Mr. Nielsen: —on behalf of the Government, and as Deputy Prime Minister, I can tell the Hon. Member and the House that the Government was seized of this matter last Wednesday and acted at once to address it.

Mr. Deans: This is offensive.

Mr. Riis: What is wrong with the Prime Minister?

Mr. Nielsen: The Minister of Fisheries has acted in accordance with the most honourable traditions of this House.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Riis: The Prime Minister is a big boy.

Mr. Deans: This is offensive.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Gauthier: Is the Prime Minister resigning too?

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Nielsen: I was going to say, Mr. Speaker, if opposition Members have the slightest appreciation of the function of Government, they would realize that the Deputy Prime Minister, acting on his responsibilities from time to time on instructions of the Prime Minister, acts in matters—

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Deans: He answers the questions while the Prime Minister is sitting there.

Mr. Nielsen: I have told Hon. Members that I acted on those instructions on behalf of the Government, and the Government acted immediately as a result of the inquiries that I conducted on his instructions.

Mr. Deans: That is unbelievable.

FINANCE

VALUE OF UNITED STATES DOLLAR

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg-Fort Garry): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. As brave and serious the resignation of the former Minister, I think all Canadians are also deeply concerned about decisions taken this weekend by the Finance officials and Ministers of five other countries which go to the very fundamental ability of our country to be competitive internationally and to run a proper economy.

In light of the so-called relationship and the tremendous importance of our trading relationship with the United States, can the Prime Minister tell us were we, in any way, informed by the United States Government about its intentions to hold these meetings and to make these decisions that go to the very heart of our trading relationship?

Will the Minister of Finance or some other official of the Government be in immediate touch with the Government in Washington to find out what impact it will have upon Canada?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, I think the Hon. Member—

Mr. Riis: Here goes another billion.

An Hon. Member: Billion dollar Barbara.

Mrs. McDougall: —should know that the meetings which took place this weekend of the Group of Five are part of a regular series of meetings which normally take place before the International Monetary Fund meets as it is doing early next month in Seoul. The fact that this meeting has achieved a somewhat higher profile does not in any way indicate that our relationship with the United States has deteriorated; in fact it has been enhanced.

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg-Fort Garry): Mr. Speaker, in the last few weeks we have seen that this Minister is capable of turning logic on its head. How can she explain the fact that a major decision to devalue the American dollar, which affects every one of our industries and regions, was taken without any consultation with this country, without information being given to us and without any invitation to participate? She says that that is an enhanced relationship. Would she please explain that to the Canadian people?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, there is absolutely nothing new in this process. The Minister of Finance was in Washington very recently. He spoke with the Chief of Staff of the President; he spoke with Mr. Baker, and he spoke with Mr. Volcker. The concerns which were raised in the G-5 meeting yesterday have been part of our ongoing discussions with the United States for some time. The fact that Mr. Baker indicated that protectionism is a problem is one of the reasons that this Government has been very actively securing our access to the United States.

CANADA-UNITED STATES TRADE—REQUEST FOR PARLIAMENTARY DEBATE

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg-Fort Garry): Mr. Speaker, obviously we cannot get much sense out of the Minister. Perhaps I could direct my supplementary question to the Prime Minister. When we consider the importance of the devaluation of the American dollar to our trading position, would the Prime Minister now agree that he should hold off on taking any major trade initiative with the United States until we have an opportunity to assess the impact of this action upon our trading position? Does he not also agree that it is time for a major parliamentary debate on what that trading initiative should be?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I think we have invited parliamentary debate and parliamentary opinion. We have taken the initiative of striking a parliamentary committee, of which I believe the Hon. Member is a member. It toured the country. We invited criticism, expressions of concern and constructive advice with regard to how we secure better access to our major markets. I think everything we have done is consistent with this degree of openness and searching for advice, counsel and criticism, because all of the country must be involved in this process.

FISHERIES

Mr. Ray Skelly (Comox-Powell River): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. Last Friday the Prime Minister indicated that as soon as he heard of the tuna scandal he acted immediately and removed the product from the shelves. The Minister of Fisheries and Oceans absolutely contradicted the Prime Minister within two hours on Friday. Would the Prime Minister indicate or admit to the House that he fired the Minister of Fisheries because he challenged his veracity and his integrity, not because of the serious, major error which the Minister of Fisheries made?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, in response to the last part of my hon. friend's observation, in conversation with me this weekend the Minister of Fisheries, given the reasons which he explains in his correspondence, offered his resignation as Minister, and I accepted it today.

With regard to the first part of the qustion, what I believe the Deputy Prime Minister was attempting to answer, I think quite fairly, to my hon. friend was that when it came to my attention last Wednesday morning—and I was chairing caucus—I asked the Deputy Prime Minister to begin immediately a series of meetings with the Minister of Fisheries and his officials to ensure that the matter was properly and effectively handled. The Minister of Fisheries met with the Deputy Prime Minister beginning in caucus itself. I think that should satisfy any concerns my hon. friend has.

PRIME MINISTER'S KNOWLEDGE OF MATTER

Mr. Ray Skelly (Comox-Powell River): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister's office was warned on July 28. It was warned again on August 13, DND was involved in removing tuna, at the Minister's awareness. The labs of the Minister of National Health and Welfare were involved in checking the product weeks ago. Can the Prime Minister say, truthfully, that he knew nothing about this before the date upon which he acted on it? If that is the case, what is going on inside the Government when a serious error such as this can escape the attention of the Prime Minister, when his office has been warned twice and at least two of his Ministers have been involved in the same problem?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I can tell my hon. friend that I was first alerted to this on the Tuesday night with a call with regard to a news item which appeared that evening. I read it for the first time on Wednesday morning in the press. I immediately instructed the Deputy Prime Minister, given the schedule I had, to begin a series of meetings with the Minister and appropriate officials so that the matter would be resolved. It is a fact, I am now informed, that an official from the Fisheries Department consulted with an official from my office in July with regard to an item which might appear on a television network. It apparently did not appear, and it was never brought to my attention.

EXCHANGE VALUE OF UNITED STATES DOLLAR—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. The Minister of State for Finance has just said that prior to the meeting on Sunday, which involved the United States and four other countries but not Canada, the major trading partner of the United States, the Minister of Finance met with the Chief of Staff of the President and the Governor of the U.S. Federal Reserve Board to be briefed on the situation. Obviously the Prime Minister and his Government knew about the decision to devalue the American dollar before it happened. Why are the Prime Minister and his Government so supinely accepting a decision which can cause untoled damage to Canadian producers, manufacturers and workers? Why is he treating this in such an offhand manner?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, I am very tired of having my remarks in the House misinterpreted by the other side.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mrs. McDougall: What I indicated was that the issues of concern were issues which had been raised in conversations between the Minister of Finance and U.S. officials with whom he met. The situation with the United States, which has been allowed to deteriorate so long by the Party on the other side, is one that we have made an extraordinary effort to rebuild. It is time that Hon. Members recognize that.

POLICY INQUIRY

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of State for Finance has just admitted that Canada's interest had been ignored in this situation. Why are the Minister of State for Finance, the Prime Minister and their Government allowing Canada's monetary and trade policy to be made in Washington and not here in Ottawa, and in this Parliament?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, it is precisely because our Party is taking the initiative around enhancing trade and enhancing our position that the Finance Minister has regular access to people in the United States, something which the Hon. Member's Government never sought.

I can also say that the Minister of Finance has been in touch with Mr. Baker and that the issues raised at the G-5 meeting were totally consistent with the conversations which he had had with him previously.

FISHERIES

SALE OF CANNED TUNA—PRIME MINISTER'S INFORMATION

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I am sorry to see the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans going because he is an honest and honourable Canadian.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Fulton: In saying that, I think the wrong man is being asked to walk the plank. My question is directed to the Prime Minister. Outside the House on Friday, the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans said that full details of the Star-Kist tuna scandal were transmitted several weeks ago to the Prime Minister's office. Are you prepared to stand up in the House today and say that that is not true?

Some Hon. Members: Order!

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have answered that question completely and fully. The only information that I have or I had was the information which I have just imparted to the House.

Mr. Speaker: The Hon. Member for Skeena on a supplementary question through the Chair, please.

MEETING BETWEEN MINISTERS

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Outside the House on Friday as well, the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans stated unequivocally that he met with you on the decision to seize that tuna—

Some Hon. Members: Order!

Mr. Speaker: I just specifically invited the Hon. Member to put a supplementary question through the Chair in parliamentary terms, please.

Mr. Fulton: The meeting took place between the Minister of National Health and Welfare and the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans. The decision was made at that meeting by the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans to seize that product. Is that correct? Is that how those events unfolded?

• (1430)

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, on Thursday morning I communicated via my principal secretary with the Deputy Prime Minister, asked him to convene immediately a meeting of the Minister of National Health and Welfare, the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans, himself, and other appropriate officials in regard to ridding the shelves of that particular product. This was conveyed to the meeting chaired by the Deputy Prime Minister and it was determined that that view would be an appropriate one. It prevailed, on the recommendation of the Minister of Fisheries.

REQUEST FOR ESTABLISHMENT OF PARLIAMENTARY COMMITTEE ON MARKETING OF TAINTED TUNA

Mr. Fernand Robichaud (Westmorland-Kent): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Right Hon. Prime Minister. It is quite obvious that the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans, because of purely political considerations allowed a certain quantity of tainted tuna to be put on the market, which has now led to a crisis in the industry. My question to the Prime Minister is as follows: In order to restore the credibility of this Government and that of the industry, is the Prime Minister prepared to refer the tainted tuna question to a parliamentary committee, so that an inquiry into this whole issue can be made?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I think that the Minister . . . and all the explanations I have given to date, including notes contained in the exchange of correspondence, could also be a subject of any kind of analysis this Parliament would judge appropriate. We have nothing to hide. The matter is open to all Parliamentarians.

FISH INSPECTION SYSTEM—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Fernand Robichaud (Westmorland-Kent): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary for the Right Hon. Prime Minister.

Could the Prime Minister give the House the assurance that in future, there will be no recurrence of this kind of political interference with our inspection system?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): In my opinion, the action taken by the Minister was undoubtedly taken in good faith, in the interests, as he saw them, of the fishermen and jobs as well as of health and security. It was a value judgment he made with respect to a given situation.

He reflected another perception in his decision on Sunday which was transmitted to us today, and he is an honourable man for having done so.

INFORMATION GIVEN TO PRIME MINISTER'S OFFICE

Hon. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. There is a clear discrepancy between what the Prime Minister has said and what the former Minister of Fisheries said on Friday as to the extent of the information that was given to the Prime Minister's Office on this tuna fish affair.

The former Minister of Fisheries has indicated that the Prime Minister's Office was fully informed, with full details. The Prime Minister now tells the House that his office was given a phone call some time in July about a television program that might take place. That is very different.

My question to the Prime Minister is this. Will he confirm that officials from the Department of Fisheries informed his office on August 13 about an impending court case on this matter?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): I cannot confirm that specific date. I can confirm what I have already said that sometime this summer, I believe it was during the month of July, or I am so informed, an officer or officers from the staff of the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans visited with an official from the Prime Minister's Office and conveyed to him a number of facts which I understand dealt with the imminent release of a television program dealing with the issue at hand.

The officer from the Prime Minister's Office apparently waited for this matter to be televised, it did not appear, and apparently concluded that that was that, and no information of any kind was transmitted to me. That is all of the information that I am able to convey to my hon. friend.

NOTIFICATION OF IMPENDING LEGAL ACTION

Hon. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Mr. Speaker, there seems to be a confusion of a number of different events here coming together in the Prime Minister's answer. My understanding is that the Minister of Fisheries took the correct action at that time, July 28, I understand, of informing the Prime Minister what was going on, according to the Minister of Fisheries, in considerable detail.

The question I just asked the Prime Minister was not about the July 28 meeting. It pertains to information that I am told was conveyed on August 13 about impending legal action involving the company producing the tuna fish that the country has heard so much about in recent days.

Can the Prime Minister confirm that officials from the Department of Fisheries informed his office in the middle of August about this situation?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): No, I cannot confirm, nor can I deny. I thought it was somewhat earlier, in the month of July, that this matter was raised in the manner in which I have described it.

The incident as it is reported to me, was that an event that took place in the winter or the spring that had already transpired was to become the object of a television report during the course of the summer. This was why the officials from the Department of Fisheries attended upon an official of any Department to apprise him of that. They explained apparently in some detail what the television program apparently was going to be about, and that was that. It did not appear and it was not brought to my attention.

Given this other date mentioned by my hon. friend which is subsequent to a date which is already acknowledged by me, I will be happy to look into it and provide him with all the details.

REQUEST FOR DISMISSAL OF OFFICIAL

Hon. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Mr. Speaker, considering the very serious implications of the fact that the Minister made an earlier decision and sent all this terrible fish out onto the supermarket shelves, given the result that that has led to which is, namely, the resignation of the Prime Minister—

An Hon. Member: That is who should have resigned.

Mr. Broadbent: —of the Minister of Fisheries, will the Prime Minister not agree that if his office were functioning properly, if he had been informed in the summer by the Minister of Fisheries, if he was informed by the Department of Fisheries some weeks later about legal action, and that if his office, the Prime Minister's Office, did nothing about that in the summer, they were negligent; the Prime Minister was negligent; and he should take corrective action and fire somebody in his office?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, there are about three hypothetical dimensions—

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Mulroney: Yes, there are, to this question. I repeat for my hon. friend that a decision which was raised in this House by the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans in the winter or early spring of the year was brought to the attention of some official of the PMO in July, and you suggest now, perhaps August. It was left that way. It was not brought to my attention. I have told my hon. friend that that is all I know about it. It was not conveyed to me. I will, however, be happy to look into the second part of that allegation and report to my hon. friend and the House, but there clearly was nothing improper of any kind at all.

An Hon. Member: Is Barbara next?

CANADIAN COMMERCIAL BANK—NON ATTENDANCE OF MINISTERS AT MARCH MEETING

Miss Aideen Nicholson (Trinity): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of State for Finance. Will the Minister confirm that neither she nor the Minister of Finance was present at the meetings of March 22 to March 25 when the fate of the Canadian Commercial Bank was being decided?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, I think that is a matter of public record, that the discussions were carried on by persons other than myself.

MINISTERIAL RESPONSIBILITY

Miss Aideen Nicholson (Trinity): Canada was facing its first bank failure in 60 years but two Ministers left the negotiations to officials and did not insist on full information about the bank's financial situation. How can the Minister justify the abdication of responsibility?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, I can confirm for the Hon. Member that I have never in my life walked away from my responsibilities, not once.

● (1440)

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mrs. McDougall: It is perfectly normal—

Mr. Nystrom: You're next, Barbara.

Mrs. McDougall: It is perfectly normal practice for negotiations to be carried on by people who are constantly in touch. The Governor of the Bank of Canada, the Inspector General of Banks and the Deputy Minister of Finance acted perfectly appropriately. My colleague, the Minister of Finance, and I were fully informed and established the policy on which the negotiations were made.

ABSENCE OF CANADIAN REPRESENTATION

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops-Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Right Hon. Prime Minister who will be well aware that the recent decision made over the weekend in the United States will result in enormous job losses for Canadians in all regions of the country. Since the Minister of Finance was in Washington prior to the meeting, knew of the meeting, and certainly would have known of the main item for discussion at the meeting, why did the Prime Minister not intervene and ensure that Canada was represented at that meeting?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, it is very clear that the G-Five meeting is a normal, routine meeting that takes place before the IMF meetings in the fall. Surely the Hon. Member is that well informed.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mrs. McDougall: The Minister of Finance has been in touch with Washington and has raised Canadian concerns with American officials. Many of those concerns were addressed by the action that was taken over the weekend.

REQUEST THAT PRIME MINISTER INTERVENE

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops-Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is again addressed to the Prime Minister. It seems to me that Canada has taken the long-distance feeling on a number of issues, including the 300 American protectionist Bills and most recently this weekend's decision. Why do we not move away from the long-distance feeling with the United States and ask the Prime Minsiter to pick up the telephone, call the President of the United States and start representing the interests of Canadian workers and producers on an issue as important as this one?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I would hope that within the next couple of days the Hon. Member will have occasion to rise to his feet to applaud the Government for continuing to do prescisely that.

REQUEST FOR AMENDING LEGISLATION

Mr. Alan Redway (York East): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Solicitor General. He will know that recently an Ottawa judge dismissed a charge of escaping lawful custody against a juvenile who had walked away from detention in a group home. Will the Minister advise the House if he will be introducing, without delay, amendments to the Young Offenders Act to correct this situation and to correct all of the other problems that have been brought to his attention by the Chiefs of Police and the Attorneys General across the country?

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Solicitor General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, as the Hon. Member will know, there is still the possibility that that particular decision may be appealed in the courts in which case we should wait until the outcome of the appeal. I have indicated to previous questioners in the House that I remain with an open mind. I am anxious to receive the various points of view of various people including Chiefs of Police, Attorneys General and others.

I have read in the press that the Attorneys General would like to meet with me to have a discussion about the Young Offenders Act. I would be delighted to do so. Additionally, I have indicated that I will be soliciting points of view on this matter in a very broad way and I will be apprising the House of the results.

NORTHLAND BANK—MINISTER'S MARCH STATEMENT

Mr. George Baker (Gander-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of State for Finance who tells us that we are not well informed. As reported at page 3513 of Hansard for March 29, the Minister of State for Finance said:

> Mr. Chairman, this situation was caused by an isolated incident. There are no other financial institutions in the country at the moment that are appearing to be insolvent in any way.

How could the Minister make such a statement with another bank so close to disaster?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Minister of State (Finance)): Because it was true, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. George Baker (Gander-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, the Minister knows that the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans did the honourable thing. We cannot put a dollar sign on his mistake but we know that the dollar sign on her mistake is over $1 billion. Will the Minister of State for Finance do the honourable thing and resign?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, the Party across the way was in Government for 16 years. It never did one thing to enhance the regulatory climate of our financial institutions. It walked away from its responsibilities.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Gauthier: Never had a bank failure.

Mrs. McDougall: It did absolutely nothing and my responsibility is to clean up the mess that it left us.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

CULTURAL AFFAIRS

CANADA-UNITED STATES TALKS—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Ms. Lynn McDonald (Broadview-Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister and concerns cultural integrity. Last week the Prime Minister said in the House that our cultural industries would not be negotiable in any discussions on free trade that might take place. However, in Halifax on Sunday the Minister of Communications said that they might be negotiable and certainly that they would not be exempt. Would the Prime Minister clarify the Government's policy? Are our cultural industries up for grabs or will there be a full exemption from free trade for cultural industries?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have not seen the statement alleged by my hon. friend but I think I can be reasonably certain that the Minister of Communications made no such statement because the position of the Government and the position of his Department are the protection of the integrity of our cultural institutions. It might come as some surprise that it was a Progressive Conservative Government which, of all things, founded the CBC. We believe in the protection of the integrity—

Mr. Gray (Windsor West): You're now wrecking it.

Mr. Mulroney: The Liberal House Leader says that the CBC is wrecking the Government. On the contrary; we work hand in hand with the CBC at all times. We believe in its integrity and independence.

TIME MAGAZINE—POSSIBLE RE-EMERGENCE OF CANADIAN EDITION

Ms. Lynn McDonald (Broadview-Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is also directed to the Prime Minister and concerns the cultural integrity of magazine publishing which is of course threatened by the possible re-emergence of the Canadian edition of Time magazine. Will the Prime Minister confirm for Canadians that there will not be a reappearance of the so-called Canadian edition of Time magazine?

Hon. Elmer M. MacKay (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member surely must know that, under the circumstances, the provisions of the Income Tax Act preclude any discussion of this particular matter.

IMPLEMENTATION OF GOVERNMENT POLICIES

Mr. Bob Corbett (Fundy-Royal): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Regional Industrial Expansion and is of vital importance to Atlantic Canadians. When does the Minister anticipate recommending and putting in place the shipbuilding policies that the Government promised shipyard workers last year?

Hon. Sinclair Stevens (Minister of Regional Industrial Expansion): Mr. Speaker, in answer to the Hon. Member, as he knows, the Government now has under review a shipbuilding program that we hope will be helpful. We are having ongoing discussions with certain representatives of the shipbuilding industry both on the labour side and on the management side and I think that the Hon. Member will be most pleased with what we are hoping to be able to work out in the coming weeks.

ABORIGINAL RIGHTS

REVIEW OF CLAIMS POLICY

Mr. Keith Penner (Cochrane-Superior): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. As the Minister knows, the Macdonald Commission Report called for an accelerated pace in the settlement of aboriginal claims. Last July the Minister asked for a full review of the claims policy. Can the Minister now tell the House if he expects that review of the claims policy to be completed on time by the end of November? When he receives the policy will he refer the matter to the Standing Committee on Indian Affairs and Northern Development so that the committee can have its analysis and provide some input to the Minister on this important subject?

• (1450)

Hon. David Crombie (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I can confirm to the Hon. Member that the task force report should be ready by the end of November. I met with the chairman of the task force last week. He indicated that he is on schedule. Thus, I expect it will be available by November 30.

With respect to its disposition, first, it will be a public report. Personally, I have no difficulty with the matter being discussed by the standing committee. I think the appropriate approach would be for me to invite discussion from the Hon. Member, the New democratic Party and other associated groups who have a concern with it, after it has been made public.

ARCTIC SOVEREIGNTY—OFFSHORE RESOURCES INQUIRY

Mr. Keith Penner (Cochrane-Superior): Mr. Speaker, since the review of this claims policy is not yet complete, and in view of the re-awakened concern in Canada with respect to Arctic sovereignty, will the Minister recommend to the group conducting the review that it give serious consideration to including in that review the possibility of the Inuit people of Canada negotiating a right to offshore resources, as well as to land resources?

Hon. David Crombie (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I think that is an excellent idea. At the Inuit Circumpolar Conference in Montreal at the end of last week, I indicated that idea as a part of the terms of reference of the original task force. Thus, there was no difficulty with respect to the task force taking that matter into consideration. I have urged the task force in that respect. I expect its recommendations will contain a consideration of that point.

EXTERNAL AID

MEXICAN EARTHQUAKE—CANADIAN ASSISTANCE

Mr. Jim Manly (Cowichan-Malahat-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Secretary of State for External Affairs, I would like to direct my question to the Prime Minister.

Last year 500,000 Canadians gave an average of $65 per person for African relief projects. They were encouraged in this respect by the Government matching them dollar for dollar. Considering the desire of Canadians from coast to coast to help in a practical way with the devastation which has taken place in Mexico following two earthquakes, will the Government announce a similar program of aid which would match dollar for dollar the contributions made by individual Canadians?

Hon. Monique Vézina (Minister for External Relations): Mr. Speaker, last week I announced the Government's intentions. This morning, I had a meeting with the Mexican Ambassador, who conveyed us his country's heartfelt thanks because Canada was the first country to take action following the earthquake.

We certainly urge all Canadians to show their generosity, but we think, and I personally think that the proposed matching, dollar for dollar, would not be the right approach, since it is a very special situation and we should preferably think in terms of twinning projects and consider new formulas for assistance.

[English]

CANCELLATION OF LOAN BY INTERNATIONAL MONETARY FUND

Mr. Jim Manly (Cowichan-Malahat-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, I regret the Government's decision. I think it important to encourage this type of contribution by matching aid.

My supplementary question is also to the Prime Minister. Has Canada made any representations to the International Monetary Fund to bring about a degree of sanity and compassion to that organization as a result of it cancelling a $450 million loan to Mexico on the very day of the earthquake? If Canada has not made representations, when will it?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, we have not made any specific recommendations in regard to the point raised by my hon. friend. However, he may recall that it has been an aim of this Government to obtain better financing for Third World countries. It is a cause which we promoted, with at least some modest success, at Bonn, and one which we will be promoting at the Commonwealth Conference as well. The Minister of Finance will also be discussing the matter in Seoul. We believe that it introduces a new element of fairness into financing for less favoured nations. I appreciate the view expressed by my hon. friend.

MINORITY RIGHTS

AID TO ASSIST COURT CHALLENGES—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa-Vanier): My question is directed to the Right Hon. Prime Minister and concerns a program that is very important to official language minorities. I am referring to the program to assist court challenges, which, as the House will recall, was set up by the Liberal Government to help certain groups or individuals to defend before the courts their Constitutional rights under sections 133(93) and 23 of the Charter.

The Prime Minister, the Minister of Justice and the Secretary of State have all been asked about this matter during the session, and I personally have asked the following question six times: When is the program going to be extended? The program expired on March 31, 1985. There are groups that are interested in the program. Could the Prime Minister inform the House when some news on the subject will be forthcoming?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, there will be an announcement this week on what steps we will be taking with reference to Charter challenges. I believe the Secretary of State has set that up for Wednesday.

GOVERNMENT PROGRAM

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa-Vanier): Mr. Speaker, will the Minister also tell the House if, on top of constitutional Articles Nos. 93, 133 and 23 of the Charter, Section 15 of the Charter will be covered by the new program?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, the answer to that question, of course, is yes.

INQUIRY CONCERNING CONSTITUTIONAL DEVELOPMENT

Mr. Thomas Suluk (Nunatsiaq): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. In view of the fact that the former Government of the Right Hon. John Diefenbaker, in 1957 or thereabouts, brought a Bill before the House to divide the Northwest Territories, will the Minister inform the House whether or not he has any intention of bringing before Cabinet within the next two years a new Bill to divide the present Northwest Territories into two territories?

Hon. David Crombie (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, as I think my hon. friend knows, the pace in change and timing of constitutional development in the Northwest Territories is very much in the hands of northerners. Indeed, the process by which we will achieve those goals is through the Constitutional Alliance. It is currently holding both public and community-based discussions. When it has concluded those discussions, I expect it will be able to offer a more specific answer to the Hon. Member's question.

SOUTHERN SASKATCHEWAN FARMERS—REQUEST FOR ASSISTANCE

Mr. Stan J. Hovdebo (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Agriculture. Prairie farmers, particularly those in southern Saskatchewan, have had a disastrous summer. Drought and grasshoppers have ravaged a large area and, lately, heavy rainfall and cool weather have exacerbated the problem by delaying the harvest and by spoiling hay. The farmers are asking the federal Government for assistance in dealing with this catastrophe.

Will the Minister show the same compassion to these farmers as his Government has shown to the bankers in the billion dollar bail-out? Will the Minister make a commitment today so that these hard pressed farmers will receive the $500 million or more in federal Government assistance which they need to bail themselves out of these problem?

Hon. John Wise (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, as the Hon. Member will know, we were on the scene very rapidly with reference to the crop problems in western Canada. We have made an announcement with respect to providing a commitment of $48 million. That is phase one, which deals with the losses of livestock. Hopefully, within the next week or ten days we will be in a position to come forward with phase two of the program, which will deal with crop losses. I can assure the Hon. Member that the issue he raises will be given every consideration as well.

AID TO CATTLEMEN

Mr. Stan J. Hovdebo (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, will the Minister of Agriculture explain how it is that a week after the Saskatchewan Government announced a $60 per head disaster payment with respect to cattle the federal Government made an announcement with respect to $30 per head? Will the Minister explain why cattlemen will receive only $60 per head instead of the $90 per head which the two Governments promised?

Hon. John Wise (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, since the Hon. Member is a resident of the Province of Saskatchewan I think he must recognize the fact that it was a decision—one which I respect—taken by a democratically-elected legislature to announce a program. Of course our difficulty was the fact that we were dealing not only with Saskatchewan but with Alberta, parts of Manitoba, and two different areas of British Columbia. We wanted the time in order that the committee which we have established can go about its work and carry out the consultations which are always required if sensible and effective representations are to be brought about.

FARM CREDIT CORPORATION

MORATORIUM ON FORECLOSURES

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Agriculture. Last week he announced he was placing a moratorium on the foreclosures of farms by the Farm Credit Corporation which are running at approximately 14 per week. We have learned today that the American dollar will be devalued which will further depress commodity prices. Would the Minister tell the House when he is going to bring in assistance to farmers in order to arrest the situation of foreclosures on farms? Introducing a moratorium does not really help the farmers. I wonder if the Minister could make that clear.

● (1500)

Hon. John Wise (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member has posed that question before. It is almost becoming his weekly question. I would again invite the Hon. Member to reflect and to read the record. He will see that we have made a greater contribution to the agri-food industry in the last eight months than his Government did in all of eight years.

CLERK OF PETITIONS' REPORTS

Mr. Speaker: I have the honour to inform the House that the petitions presented by Hon. Members on Friday, September 20, 1985, meet the requirements of the Standing Orders as to form.

REQUEST FOR TABLING OF DOCUMENTS BY MINISTER—RULING OF MR. SPEAKER

Mr. Speaker: On Friday, September 20, 1985, the Hon. Member for Hamilton Mountain (Mr. Deans) on a point of order requested that the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans (Mr. Fraser) be asked to table documents he used in answer to a question from the Hon. Member for Comox-Powell River (Mr. Skelly). I undertook to reserve my ruling until after I had read the "blues". I am now ready to rule.

I fully appreciate the validity of the quotation put forward by the Hon. Member for Hamilton Mountain (Mr. Deans) in making his point, namely, that:

> A Minister of the Crown is not at liberty to read or quote from a dispatch or other state paper not before the House, unless he be prepared to lay it upon the Table.

This is, of course, taken from Citation 327(1) of Beauchesne. I do not believe I need to dwell on reminding the Hon. Member of Citation 327(3) of Beauchesne's which states:

> A public document referred to but not cited or quoted by a Minister need not be tabled.

Upon a close reading of Hansard I could find no evidence that the Minister had in fact either read from or quoted any document. Therefore, I do not find that he is obligated to table anything at this time.

REQUEST TO TABLE A DOCUMENT

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg-Fort Garry): Mr. Speaker, I wonder if I might have leave of the House to table a document as requested by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) last Friday entitled Canada-U.S. New Bilateral Trade Initiative Communication Strategy? It was a request by the Prime Minister. I am quite happy to comply.

Mr. Speaker: I believe the Hon. Member knows full well the rule of the House in Beauchesne which prevents him from tabling a document under any circumstances.

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Benjamin: Append it to Hansard.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I phrased what I just said very carefully because I think the Whip of Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition knows that unanimous consent does not apply in this case.

CONSIDERATION OF SOVIET EVIDENCE BY DESCHENES COMMISSION

Mr. Bob Pennock (Etobicoke North): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to present to the House today a petition on behalf of many individuals from my constituency regarding their concern over the possibility of Soviet evidence being obtained and used by the Deschenes Commission of Inquiry. Their concern focuses on the strong possibility that Soviet evidence is likely to be fabricated in order to damage the credibility of many individuals who have been long-time anti-Communists.

CHANGES TO UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE ACT

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops-Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, it is my privilege to present a petition on behalf of a number of western Canadians who are registering their protest to the plans of the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Miss MacDonald) that workers laid off after March 31, 1985, will have their severance pay deducted from their unemployment insurance benefits and thus effectively eliminate the benefit to the workers of the severance package they receive.

DRUG USE IN SCHOOLS

Mr. Édouard Desrosiers (Hochelaga-Maisonneuve): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour of presenting two petitions.

To the House of Commons of Canada, in Parliament assembled.

The undersigned of the first petition request that steps be taken to wipe out drug abuse in the schools in order to protect the future, the health and the well-being of their children.

Wherefor they humbly pray that your Honourable House take the appropriate steps to wipe out drug abuse in the schools.

REINSTATEMENT OF CAPITAL PUNISHMENT

Mr. Édouard Desrosiers (Hochelaga-Maisonneuve): The undersigned of the second petition are in favour of capital punishment in order to reduce violence in Canada.

The petitioners feel that leaving crimes unpunished is a violation of their rights and freedoms.

They therefore request that your Honourable House reinstate capital punishment, and as in duty bound, your petitioners ever pray.

SOCIAL SECURITY CUT-BACKS

Ms. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I am very honoured to present a petition signed by the Leaders of the New Democratic Party from all provinces in Canada, and the federal executive, which opposes deindexation of family allowance and the massive cut-backs to child benefits as an unfair attack on women and families with children, especially single parent mothers. It states that this deindexation will not be offset by changes to the child tax credit and that even the poorest families will be worse off. They are concerned that these cut-backs in child benefits on top of sales tax increases, income tax increases and excise tax increases, are very unfair and, furthermore, that they are entitled to full indexation of family allowances.

NOTICE OF ALLOCATION OF TIME ON SECOND READING STAGE OF BILL C-70

On the Order: Government Notices of Motions:

September 19, 1985—The Minister of National Health and Welfare:

That, in relation to Bill C-70, An Act to amend the Family Allowances Act, 1973, one sitting day shall be allotted to the consideration of the second reading stage of the said Bill; and

That fifteen minutes before the expiry of the time provided for the consideration of government business on the above-mentioned sitting day, any proceedings then before the House shall be interrupted, if necessary, for the purpose of this Order and, in turn, every question necessary to dispose of the said stage of the said Bill shall be put forthwith and successively, without further debate or amendment.

Mr. Speaker: Pursuant to Section (2) of Standing Order 26, this Government Notice of Motion stands transferred to and ordered for consideration under Government Orders later this day or at the next sitting of the House.

Mr. Paul Dick (Parliamentary Secretary to President of Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I just want to indicate to the House that with respect to the transfer order of reference to the Government Orders, discussions have been held and that the motion which the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Epp) indicated will be transferred will be discussed at eleven o'clock tomorrow morning.

Mr. Speaker: We seem to have some confusion. Could I ask the Hon. Parliamentary Secretary to repeat what he just said?

Mr. Dick: Mr. Speaker, I understand that the Minister of National Health and Welfare has transferred this motion for debate and I was indicating to the House that this matter will be brought up for debate at eleven o'clock tomorrow morning, the matter dealing with Bill C-70.

Mr. Speaker: There was some confusion I wanted cleared up.

Mr. Gauthier: Mr. Speaker, did I understand the Parliamentary Secretary to tell us that the Government's motion is transferred to Government Orders as of now, and that it will be taken up at the next sitting of the House? Is that what he just told us?

Mr. Speaker: There were two Government Notices of Motions standing on the Order Paper which were to be transferred today. I believe the Parliamentary Secretary is in effect introducing a business question by indicating the intention to call that matter tomorrow. I believe that is what happened.

Mr. Dick: On a point of order, I had risen to let Hon. Members know in the House that this matter of Bill C-70 will be dealt with at eleven o'clock tomorrow morning.

Hon. Members might also like to know that it is the intention of the Government to call the reference dealing with the Canadian Commercial Bank and the Northland Bank for tomorrow afternoon at three o'clock p.m. or when we get to Orders of the Day.

FINANCE, TRADE AND ECONOMIC AFFAIRS

September 11, 1985—the President of the Privy Council:

That the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs be empowered to consider and report on the events leading up to the decisions announced by the Minister of State (Finance) on September 1, 1985, with respect to the Canadian Commercial Bank and the Northland Bank, and in particular,

1) the decision to appoint curators to the Northland Bank and to the Canadian Commercial Bank;

2) the decision to seek parliamentary authority to compensate uninsured depositors for amounts outstanding on September 1, 1985; and

3) the decision to undertake regulatory reform to strengthen the regulatory powers of federal supervisory authorities; and

That the Committee present its final report no later than November 30, 1985.

Mr. Speaker: Pursuant to Section (2) of Standing Order 26, this Government Notice of Motion stands transferred to and ordered for consideration under Government Orders later this day or at the next sitting of the House.

Mr. Deans: Mr. Speaker, I want to begin my point of order by saying that I find this procedure to be most offensive. If it is the Government's intention to bypass the normal channels and to negotiate satisfactory terms and conditions in advance of the introduction of the motion to concur in the resolution, then we will stop co-operating with this Government on all matters. I want to make it quite clear that if it is the intention of the Government to disrupt the normally orderly practices of the House, then that disruption will continue indefinitely.

It is most unusual, Mr. Speaker, for the Parliamentary Secretary to rise and to indicate Government business. In fact, that is normally the prerogative of the Minister, not the prerogative of a Parliamentary Secretary.

• (1510)

Mr. Speaker: Order. First, I am not sure what the point of the last comment is. It is certainly the privilege of a Minister, in this case the Government House Leader (Mr. Hnatyshyn), to ask his Parliamentary Secretary to rise in his place. I take it that is what the Parliamentary Secretary was doing. It was precisely because we were confused about which matter the Parliamentary Secretary was referring to that I asked for clarity earlier. We got clarity on the National Health and Welfare Bill, but I take it the Hon. Parliamentary Secretary has now indicated something as well with regard to the other order of reference. That is what I was concerned about earlier.

Mr. Dick: Mr. Speaker, I thought I had been quite clear that one matter was being dealt with at eleven o'clock and one after three. I should point out that I understood some discussions had been taking place.

Mr. Deans: None.

Mr. Dick: But I will tell the Hon. Member that we intend to co-operate. We are giving notice almost 24 hours in advance which is more than members of the NDP did last week when they wasted a whole day by bringing in something for reference without telling anyone else. They did not co-operate one bit.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Deans: You can applaud, Jake, but you will get nothing through from now until Christmas.

Mr. Dick: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Dick: —I think that the NDP—

Mr. Speaker: Order!

Mr. Deans: I will stand up and say it again.

Mr. Dick: —has wrecked this House—

Mr. Speaker: I invite the Hon. Parliamentary Secretary to resume his seat.

Mr. Deans: I am telling you right now you will get nothing through until Christmas.

Mr. Dick: I want that on the record.

Mr. Speaker: Order!

Mr. Dick: You are irresponsible, Deans.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I did check the lunar calendar.

Mr. Gauthier: And?

Mr. Speaker: I was wrong. The full moon was not last week, it is this coming Saturday and I can see what is happening.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Paul Dick (Parliamentary Secretary to President of Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I ask that all questions be allowed to stand.

Mr. Speaker: Shall all questions be allowed to stand?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

MOTION TO ADJOURN UNDER S.O. 31

Mr. Speaker: I am in receipt of a notice under Standing Order 31 from the Hon. Member for Oshawa (Mr. Broadbent).

Hon. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Mr. Speaker, you will recall that last Friday I brought to the attention of the House my intention to move a motion under the provisions of Standing Order 31. During the proceedings on Friday you indicated your view that the subject matter, namely the crisis faced by the Northland Bank and the implications should it go belly-up, to put it bluntly, for the banking sector in general was, to use your words, a genuine emergency. You indicated at that time that you were not prepared to accept the motion, but clearly the logic of your argument was that if we did not soon have that subject before the House for debate, you would be prepared to recognize that emergency in the form of a debate. Therefore, I gave notice earlier today of my intention to move the same motion and if you make the appropriate ruling in that context, I would be very happy indeed to do so.

Mr. Speaker: I thank the Hon. Member for Oshawa. He did indeed give me the appropriate notice and I did indeed make such a comment on Friday, and I intended it deliberately. I think the Hon. Member will know that it was precisely for the reasons for my reservations regarding the question of urgency that I was particularly interested in hearing the comments, and clarifying what they were, that were made by the Parliamentary Secretary. Given the Government's intention to call that matter for debate tomorrow at three o'clock, apparently, I take it all Hon. Members will have an opportunity to put on the record—

Mr. Deans: There will be no debate.

Mr. Speaker: —their views, I suggest to the Hon. Member that, yes, I continue to hold the same views which I held on Friday with regard to the emergency provision of Standing Order 31. However, it is my view today, given what I heard three minutes ago—

Mr. Deans: Which we heard for the first time.

Mr. Speaker: —that there is not now sufficient need to vary the proceedings for today in order to allow a debate under Standing Order 31.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

The House resumed consideration of the motions of Mr. Beatty that Bill C-67, an Act to amend the Parole Act and the Penitentiary Act, and Bill C-68, and Act to amend the Parole Act, the Prisons and Reformatories Act, and the Criminal Code, be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee.

Mr. Stan J. Hovdebo (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, in the few minutes I have left I would like to indicate part of the reason we are not supporting these two Bills. Just before lunch I was making the point that the Parole Board is going to have a difficult time handling the increased load resulting from passage of these two Bills. Having spoken to inmates in the penitentiary in my home constituency, I can say that they feel very strongly that the things being put forward in these Bills will increase the frustration and the reaction to that frustration in the institution. As well, it will affect the surrounding community, in this case Prince Albert. Consequently, we should take into account the fact that if these Bills are passed we may be causing an increase in tension and possible violence in the institution.

Officials have told me that inmates who would probably be able to use mandatory supervision have refused to do so because they do not feel that the kind of services they get when they are out on mandatory supervision are adequate. They would rather put in the extra three or four years than go out under circumstances which do not contribute to their return to the community and to society. Many communities are quite willing to work with inmates if the services were available to help integrate them into the community. Therefore, our main point is to question whether it is better to spend $40,000 to keep one inmate in an institution or to spend it on services in the surrounding communities in order to help integrate these people back into society. We should increase the scope of these Bills so that we can provide the services needed to make mandatory supervision work.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Questions or comments? Debate?

Some Hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is the House ready for the question?

Some Hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Althouse: On division.

Motions agreed to, Bills C-67 and C-68 read the second time and referred to a legislative committee.

CUSTOMS TARIFF

Hon. Jake Epp (for the Minister of Finance) moved that Bill C-71, an Act to amend the Customs Tariff, be now read the second time and referred to a legislative committee.

Mr. Claude Lanthier (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour today of presenting before the House Bill C-71, whose purpose is to implement the amendments to the Customs Tariff as they appear in the Ways and Means Motion to amend the Customs Tariff tabled on May 23 of this year as part of the Budget Papers.

We believe that before outlining the main points of this legislation, it would be useful to review some aspects of the present state of international exchanges that guided some of the Government's decisions when preparing the tariff measures included in last May's Budget.

The marked protectionist trend typical of international exchanges today demands our serious attention, since protectionism is a direct threat to the trading system and to the general prospects for Canada's economic growth.

Canada is tremendously dependent on international markets because of the limited size of our domestic market. In fact, exports represent about 30 per cent of our gross national product. It is therefore vital that Canada see to it that the invasive protectionism practised by our neighbours is countered both by our country and other countries.

The Canadian Government has made a commitment towards maintaining a very open system of multilateral exchanges. Thus, we are supporting the official launching of a new series of multilateral trade negotiations in the near future, and we have defended this initiative, both at the meeting of Ministers of the Organization of Economic Co-operation and Development and at the Bonn summit. According to Canada, it is the best way to defeat the present protectionist trend and to ensure that international exchanges, which are so important to the growth of our Canadian economy, will continue to make a positive contribution to the daily well-being of Canadians.

Furthermore, we are also involved in seeking more secure trading relations with our principal trading partner, the United States of America. At the Quebec summit, our valiant Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. Mulroney) and the President of the United States (Mr. Reagan) decided, among other trading initiatives, to put an end to protectionism in the exchange of goods and services between our two countries. The Budget Papers explain how Canada followed up on this commitment. The Government has refrained from making a number of increases in most favoured nation tariff rates which it had been asked to implement.

Granted, these decisions may have disappointed some sectors of our economy which find it difficult to compete abroad if they cannot benefit from the umbrella of additional tariff protection, but our Government is convinced that it must be prepared to act according to its deepest convictions, in other words, that a more open system of multilateral exchanges and more secure trading relations with the United States are indispensable in the long term to sustained economic growth in Canada. It is of course unjustifiable to take protectionist measures, especially the kind that might have harmed other Canadian manufacturers.

We also want to deal with the provisions of Bill C-71 concerning the amendments we want to make to the Customs Tariff, for those amendments are in response to a wide variety of situations. As a result we will implement a series of measures designed to benefit specific sectors of the Canadian economy; they will also enable Canada to meet certain international commitments and, in some cases, rationalize the administration of the Customs Tariff.

To implement some of the recommendations made by the federal task force on Canada's car and car parts industries, and within the context of recent developments in the car industry and of representations made to our Government, Bill C-71 provides that, as of May 24 last, car parts from developing countries are allowed into this country at two-thirds the most-favoured-nation tariff. Cars and other vehicles from those underprivileged countries will continue to come in duty free until January 1, 1987, when they will be subject to 6 per cent of the general preferential tariff.

In that respect, we should remember that the manufacturer of the famous Pony, Hyundai of Korea which has been quite successful on the Canadian market in general, and particularly in Quebec, is about to adopt an investment and purchase policy likely to boost the Canadian car industry. In our opinion, it is important to encourage Koreans in that sector. We hope that foreign manufacturers and governments will keep such decisions in mind, as well as those which will eventually be made by Canada.

In addition, the proposed Bill contains three provisions to implement the recommendations of Tariff Board reference item 162 related to specific points concerning spun yarns and worsted and carded wool fabrics. Specific measures will be taken to avoid a future weakening of the tariff protection applicable to some light wool fabrics, and reductions in customs duties on unprocessed wool and worsted wool fabrics for dyeing and finishing. Measures have already been taken to maintain five tempory tariff items concerning wool fabrics used for men's clothing.

With Bill C-71, the Government will complete the implementation of recommendations made by the Tariff Board in phase I of its report entitled "Tariff items applicable to goods made or not made in Canada". The impact of those amendments is wide ranging. Three Tariff Board examples derive from the agreement between Canada and the United States with respect to the Tokyo Round multilateral trade negotiations. Last December Parliament authorized the repeal of the requirement whereby imported goods must be of a category or type made or not made in Canada so they may be admitted at specified rates, in the case of 19 tariff items. Bill C-71 contains similar provisions concerning other items referred to in phase I of the report.

Several amendments result from representations made by the private sector. Most of them reduce customs duties on various items not made in Canada. Others reinstate the tariff protection which had been removed after decisions related to the classification of goods had been appealed. The effect of these changes is quite varied. Three examples should give Hon. Members and idea of the benefits which would result from the proposed changes.

First, aluminium construction drop-centre livestock trailers will be imported duty free, thereby reducing the road transportation costs for cattle raisers and trucking companies.

Second, all workers who have to use safety helmets, goggles and face shields for welders will know that the costs of these important pieces of safety equipment will remain the lowest possible, thanks to the duty free import of all these safety items.

Third, all those who wish to see their kids play football with the proper equipment will be delighted to learn that football helmets, face masks and shoulder pads will be imported duty free.

In order to rationalize the administration of the tariff by the Department of National Revenue, especially in the case of travellers, Canadian tourists—and this is very important—may from now on import duty free up to $100 in foreign goods as often as they wish during the year, providing they have been out of Canada for at least 48 hours. At present, they may do so just once every quarter. This is a step toward a kind of rational and reasonable form of free trade.

In another area, the Deputy Minister of National Revenue may now prescribe or eliminate seasonal tariffs on some horticultural implements the production of which is only occasional in Canada. Thus, Canadian farmers will not only have the required protection at the appropriate time, but consumers will also be able to purchase imported products at the lowest possible cost when they are no longer available from Canadian producers, which is once again quite reasonable.

Mr. Speaker, it is obvious that Bill C-71 contains a number of tariff measures of major importance to certain sectors of the Canadian economy as a whole, and in some cases, to certain individuals in particular.

Bill C-71 is also part of the international agreements made by Canada and it follows up a number of specific commitments we have contracted internationally.

This brief summary of the provisions of this Bill should provide enough information on the reasons why Bill C-71 must be considered and approved rapidly by all Members of the House of Commons who are concerned about the well-being of our fellow citizens and all Canadian consumers. We are willing to answer any relevant questions.

[English]

Mr. Simon de Jong (Regina East): Mr. Speaker, initially we did not anticipate a prolonged debate on Bill C-71 and we felt that most questions could be raised in the legislative committee. However, after seeing the information which was revealed this weekend in an article in The Citizen, indicating that 1,152 jobs were to be cut from the Customs Department, we want to scrutinize this Bill and similar pieces of legislation proposed by the Government. The proposed cut-backs to the Customs jobs are unwarranted. We support the allegations made by the union that the cut-backs would result in a growth of illicit drugs and pornography entering into the country. We seriously question whether Customs will be able to do its job in an adequate manner if such a severe cut is made to the number of employees in that Department. The person-years for Excise, Customs and corporate administration amount to some 10,148. If it is slashed by 1,152 jobs, it is a dramatic cut. I wonder whether that reduced number of employees within the Department will be able to carry out its important mandate. I also wonder about the economics of the Government.

With the new system which is being proposed by the Department, packages would be sent to importers and an honours system would be introduced wherein it would depend upon importers to pay whatever duties are owing. It does not take much logic to recognize that a fair number of people will just forget to pay the customs duties which are owing. Will the Government introduce a new tax collection system or customs collection system? The economics just does not make sense. I would suggest that a Customs officer collects more than his salary in duties and therefore revenues to the federal Government. To cut the number of Customs officers would mean that we would have less service and that we would have more illicit drugs and pornographic material entering the country without being detected. Also it will mean a reduction in services to the public, whether it be in Customs offices along the border or within cities. Definitely it will mean hardship to many employees within the Department. The announcement talked about phasing out these positions and transferring people, meaning that a fair amount of hardship will be incurred by these employees.

Bill C-71 deals with tariffs. I think we will deal with many individual points when the Bill is before the legislative committee. However, over all, one wonders why the Government is proceeding with changes in tariffs when it is about to embark upon large scale discussions with the United States about some type of free trade agreement with that country. It is really patchwork legislation. We wonder how timely it is if there are to be major changes down the road. As a Government, it has not totally thought through what course of action it will follow in terms of the development of Canadian industry or how tariffs and excises influence the growth and maintenance of industries within Canada.

There is no doubt that the tariff regime is a way in which Governments affect economic growth and development. We all recognize the fine line which has to be walked. We want to protect Canadian industry and see it flourish. We want it at least to have a good crack at the domestic market. We also want to make certain that large foreign multinational corporations cannot move in and capture the Canadian market, thereby destroying our domestic producers. We also recognize that tariffs can have a negative effect upon the economic development of a country. Behind tariffs, inefficient industries can maintain their protective position and refuse to be innovative and to carry on scientific research. They can essentially become inefficient producers protected from foreign competition by a tariff wall. In the long run, such tariffs do a disservice to Canadian industry and of course to Canadian consumers.

Also we must recognize that tariffs do not have an equal effect across the country. Many of us in western Canada have historically complained that that part of the confederation bargain which worked against the West was that normally we paid higher prices for goods and services manufactured in eastern Canada and protected by tariffs. However, the goods and services which we produce, that is raw material and agricultural products, do not receive such protection. On the one hand we pay for increased costs. On the other hand, we do not receive any protection for economic activity in western Canada. When the Government enters the road of free trade surely one of the aspects it has to keep in mind is how well all regions of this country will benefit from whatever deal the Government makes.

We have seen even in very recent times that where there was an assumption that some understanding of free trade existed, in the lumber industry, in agricultural products, in the fishing industry, that in fact what we assumed to be the case has been threatened or, in some instances, our agreement has not held up at all. I think of the prok producers of my district who have experienced great difficulties because of the obstacles placed in the United States with respect to their products. We are all concerned in this House about what will happen to the lumber industry. We are aware that there are various protectionist measures being introduced in the United States Congress that would severely limit access to Canadian lumber. We know that given the parliamentary system in the United States, regardless of what agreements might have existed between Canada and the U.S. as far as lumber is concerned, that all of that can be upset like an applecart if some of these Bills presently before the U.S. Congress pass.

We wonder, Mr. Speaker, what type of negotiations the Government is ready to enter into in the United States and what we are doing. Are we making the Canadian industry and our jobs at home vulnerable to international competition, mainly from the United States? We recognize that no country can exist in isolation and that international trade is essential for Canada, and, I would say, for all of the industrial countries. As I mentioned before, it is a fine line. There must be some sensitivity to each sector of the economy. We must know what we want before we get into negotiations. We have to know what our strengths and our weaknesses are so that in the end we come up with a package that is balanced, that does not put an onerous charge on the consumers and yet protects the basic structure of the economy.

It requires knowledge, wisdom and foresight. It requires some competence as well. I am afraid, Mr. Speaker, that the present Government so far has not exhibited any of those essential traits. If one looks at how it handled the CCB one realizes that it mismanaged and in the end lost $1 billion. If one looks at the tuna affair and various other major blunders one becomes concerned whether this Government knows what it will be doing when it is prepared to negotiate a treaty with the United States. I am greatly concerned that the people opposite will be very easily hoodwinked into a deal which will be good for our neighbours but not good for the family at home. I have some genuine doubts as to their competence in handling this matter.

One of the specifics that we are somewhat concerned with in this Bill is the Government's decision not to apply a 25 per cent tariff to large fishing vessels. I recognize that the Government is concerned about the fishing industry and it does not want to see Canadian fishermen pay extra charges for foreign fishing vessels. Surely, recognizing as well the fact that our fishing fleet needs some drastic improvements, and it has been estimated that approximately $3.7 billion in fishing vessel construction is going to be needed, are we prepared to see that $3.7 billion of construction flow out of this country? Is it not possible to capture that $3.7 billion of construction to give jobs to Canadians with perhaps Government assistance and involvement as well so that the fishermen do not have to pay so much extra for their fishing vessels and yet at the same time that money stay in Canada where it will help to pay wages, help to support the small contractors, and generate income which in turn the Government collects taxes on and thereby increases its revenue?

A certain amount of economic planning is required to do that. The unfortunate part is that we have a Government that does not believe that Governments should be involved in economic planning, nor that Governments should participate in joint ventures. It feels that the market should take care of all that and it is quite willing to throw the boat building industry in Canada to the winds, to write it off. I find that unacceptable.

We note as well that the Government is not prepared to provide extra protection to the clothing industry, particularly that part dealing with woollen garments. Again, I question the wisdom of the Government. The garment industry has been an important industry in this country and has created and maintained incomes for many, many men and women over the years. The ability of a country to clothe itself is surely as important as the ability of a country to house itself and to feed itself. Therefore it is important that we maintain a viable garment industry in this country.

It would seem to be essential that if you asked the garment industry in this country to compete on the world markets, so to speak, to compete for the Canadian market on the same terms as foreign garment industries, that some extra assistance be provided to the Canadian garment industry. Are we expecting the Canadian garment industry to be able to compete on the same level as the garment industry from Taiwan, Hong Kong, Singapore, et cetera? Are we asking those companies to compete with other companies that pay starvation wages? Are we then saying to our garment industry that if it wants to survive it had better start paying starvation wages to its workers, too? That surely does not make sense to anybody in this House. We have better wages in Canada than, let us say, Korea, Taiwan, Hong Kong or Singapore. That means that our wage earners are in a better situation to pay the price, to buy those goods and services that they need. To withdraw the protection from our garment industry resulting in increased unemployment in this country at this particular time does not make much sense.

Over all, what is required is a thought-out policy and direction. It is required that the Government accept its responsibility. We need to have a Government that is willing to accept its responsibility as an economic leader and not to allow a laissez-faire attitude to prevail. We need to have a Government that is committed to an economic strategy. We need to have a Government that is willing to take some economic leadership by putting together a package that allows for the best conditions for our workers and our consumers.

We require a balanced approach and above all we require leadership on the part of the Government. Unfortunately, our Conservative friends do not believe in Government leadership. Therefore, they are not very good at putting together an economic strategy that will protect Canadian workers and consumers. I am afraid that with these folks across the way in Government, we are going to end up with Canadian consumers and workers being the losers and the multinational corporations the winners. The prize is the Canadian economy, our resources and our markets.

We will look at Bill C-71 more closely in committee. We hope that the Government at that time will be willing to answer our questions and our concerns.

Mr. George Baker (Gander-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I have just a few words to say on the introduction of this Bill. As the Parliamentary Secretary said when it was introduced, it covers items that were non-Budgetary and is more or less a clearing up of certain regulations and tariffs within the Department. When reading the items contained within the Bill, one wonders whether or not the Government is actually concerned about some of the items that are to be changed.

Two things come to mind when discussing with an ordinary person the customs tariffs and any changes that are made to that Department or its regulations. The first thing that comes to mind, as the Hon. Member pointed out a few moments ago, is the pending layoffs in the Department.

It is the policy of the Government of Canada not to fill jobs that become vacant and to cut down as much as possible in every single Government Department. I wonder how the regulations in the Customs Act will be enforced when the numbers of employees in that Department will be cut down to such an exaggerately small number.

The second thing that comes to mind is this: it is all well and good to amend the customs tariff and to bring in a Bill that reorganizes all of the regulations relating to the Customs Department by consolidating and amending it to meet present Government policy. This is done to facilitate the movement of goods and services between countries. When looking at some of the items listed in this Bill, one begins to realize that the Government has one attitude toward the movement of goods and services and other countries like the United States have a completely different attitude.

Supposing that there is not to be any tariff put on the importation of diesel boat engines or, as the Hon. Member pointed out, there is not to be a tariff on boats coming into this country, something which seriously affects the boatbuilding industry in Canada. The fact is that while the Government is doing these things, no reciprocal action is being taken by the Government of the United States or by any other Government.

What has the American Government done? It has slapped a tariff on saltfish, a tariff that affects the Prime Minister's riding, my riding and the ridings of all Atlantic Members. Then, through the Department of Commerce, the United States Government changed tariffs on raspberries, hogs, lumber and now fresh fish. In reply, the Government of Canada has indicated that there should be no tariffs on certain items coming into Canada that relate to the fishing industry. Clearly that does not make any sense at all.

Granted, the fishing industry is without a Minister of Fisheries and Oceans, but even if the Minister was still there, the fishing industry in Canada would still have some of the most serious problems of any industry in Canada, and certainly the problems facing it are greater than ever before. Provincial Governments and this Government always rationalized this by saying that a finished product cannot be produced by the fishing industry because of countervailing tariffs from another country. That was always the rationale that has been given and is still being given. We can see how stupid that particular claim is.

In dealing with this particular Bill, the Government of Canada must realize two things. First, it must realize that it cannot lay off its employees and hope to have a good job done in the Customs Department. The President of the Trasury Board (Mr. de Cotret), in passing down his orders to the individual Ministers, should realize that there are certain Government Departments that cannot function under such drastic reductions in staff. This particular Department is one of them.

The second thing the Government ought to realize is that in the area of tariffs, it takes two to tango. We cannot have one country, the United States, imposing such drastic tariffs while the Government of Canada is facilitating matters, clearing up the backlog and giving preferential treatment to this, that and the other thing through legislation.

With those two observations, I would say that we are looking forward to dissecting this Bill in committee so that we may try to figure out just what is included in it. We have to be very careful with this Government. We do not know what is in the Bill. We have to examine this Bill with a fine-tooth comb because the Government has the reputation of pushing things through under our noses without us really knowing what we are doing. We have to take the Minister's word for things. It took us one day to bail out the CCB through a Bill presented to the House. The Minister made statements with respect to what was in the Bill. She said such things as: "Everything is okay. This bank is not bankrupt. This is the only financial institution in Canada in trouble." The Minister also made statements such as: "We really do not want to do away with the regional bank. We do not want other banks to take over the regional bank. We have made that decision. We want a regional bank to remain in existence. We do not want other banks to take it over."

We listened to all of this language from the Minister of State for Finance (Mrs. McDougall). We listened to all the facts and figures which she gave. However, Hon. Members will notice that she could not tell us how many creditors there were. She could not tell us how many depositors there were. Yet, we went with the judgment of the Government. We did not want to be seen to be holding up a legitimate measure for the people of western Canada, as the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) put it. We took the Minister at her word, as we do with the Minister who has presented the Bill before us. However, we will be giving a second thought before taking any cabinet Minister in this Government at his word with respect to what is in a Bill. In other words, it is as the critic for the New Democratic Party pointed out. We are anxious to get the matter into committee in order to examine it just to see what is exactly there. It is only now, after we have seen the record of the Government, that all the people of Canada know that they have to be very careful with respect to what the Government is doing because it is not what it says it is doing. The people of Canada know what was in the disastrous Budget. One budget night the provisions looked great; but they certainly do not look all that great now.

Those are my words of caution to the Minister who is responsible for the customs tariff. I wish to remind him that he cannot run a department without any employees. I also wish to remind him that we will be watching the situation very closely. We will not allow the Government of Canada to make that number of lay-offs in such a vital service as this one is.

I also wish to point out to the Government that the people of Canada will not take what is happening with tariffs as it relates to our products in this country. They are not going to take it much longer. There is a crisis in the lumber industry, the fishing industry and in several other industries in the country which directly relate to tariffs. However, it relates to tariffs imposed by another country on our primary producers.

With those words, Mr. Speaker, I will yield the floor to someone else who wishes to comment on the Bill.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops-Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, it is indeed a pleasure to have an opportunity to rise and speak on Bill C-71, which is a most important piece of legislation in a variety of ways. I think the importance of the legislation we are debating is not necessarily with the Bill before us since the Minister has said: "Listen. There are some technical materials here with which we have to deal". Indeed, he is correct. He wants us to spend a fair bit of time discussing whether or not hand-rolled cigars with bands and ribbons on them should receive a $1.45 preferential tariff or a $3 one under a general tariff item. We have pages and pages of important material here before us. We are being asked to consider whether or not mine roof supports should fall under a free tariff item. There is much concern expressed with respect to hearing aids and the fact that we need to place tariffs on them. This is also true with respect to batteries, appliances, and so on for hearing aids. I suppose the Government feels we should not have a 12 per cent tariff, or a general tariff of at least 30 per cent but, perhaps, that those preferential areas should be only 8 per cent. The documentation goes on and on. Perhaps the items should be tariff-free.

It is interesting to note what this Government considers to be important. Here we are today, as the Hon. Member who spoke before me pointed out, with the forest industry literally on the edge of crisis. The United States, the major importer of our goods, is about to impose a quota, which will be passed by at least a two-thirds majority in Congress. This will mean that possibly a third of the sawmills in the country will have to close down. I see the Minister of State for Forestry (Mr. Merrithew) is in the House. We appreciate that fact. I know how concerned he must be with respect to this issue and the implications it will have on the industry. The process is beginning to move through Congress now. We are talking about one-half or one-third of Canada's major industry. Are we debating that subject in the House of Commons? Is that matter being referred to committee for ongoing discussions?

No. We are spending a great deal of time debating whether or not we should have a 12 per cent or an 8 per cent tariff on hearing aids.

This debate is taking place while we face a crisis in the fishing industry, one looming in agriculture, some serious concerns with respect to mining and while a major emergency meeting was held over the weekend in Washington of Finance Ministers from the major western countries, including Japan. That meeting was called in order to reach agreement with the United States concerning devaluation of the American currency. However, Canada was not invited to the meeting, even though we are the country which will be most adversely affected by the decisions made there. It is really a slap in the face to this Government. It is like saying: "We are going to carry on these discussions over the weekend and there is no need to invite our little country cousin up in Canada to attend." What that says is that our Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) is considered to be the equivalent of a State Governor. State Governors are not invited to meetings of Ministers of Finance. Thus, Canada is not invited to participate in such an event. After all, it will only profoundly influence every region of the country. It will result in significant job reduction and place a number of jobs at risk, or at least have that potential.

What does the Government say in response? The Minister of State for Finance (Mrs. McDougall) stood in her place and said that it is of no consequence. She said that we are down there having discussions and, presumably, we have faith in Mr. Reagan. The Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Lanthier), and I recognize him as an honourable parliamentarian, has said that this is a technical Bill with which we have to deal. Indeed, he is correct, it is a technical Bill. We wish to go through it clause by clause to determine whether or not the changes contained therein reflect the new trade policy of the Government. After all, Canada is a major trading partner in the world. Our livelihood depends upon the openness of our markets for others to accept our goods and services. We are a country taking massive steps day by day to expand our trading possibilities and opportunities. Now, the Government has come in and said: "Listen, we have a great idea. Let us cut back on all our customs officers. Let us cut back by more than 10 per cent all those people who deal with trade." I ask Hon. Members to think of that for just one second. There is some logic which begins to escape one.

We are a major trading partner and we want to expand and facilitate further trade. Yet, we are cutting back significantly with respect to the number of customs officers. Those are the people who are in the front lines. They are in the trenches with respect to the interface of trade with other countries. As representatives of the Customs offices of this country have indicated, what this means is that there will be an increase in contraband and smuggled materials coming into the country. There will be an increase in drugs and pornographic material coming into the country. However, the Government says: "Oh shucks, we have got a way to deal with that. We are going to have an honour system. We will just send the packages to people and then they will pay the duty which is due on them." If you were a criminal, Mr. Speaker, and you were importing contraband, illegal bullion or pornographic materials and someone said: "We are now going to ask you folks to act on the honour system.", boy, that would be the best news that you would have heard for a long time. Yet, that is what the Government says we will do. We will act just as book clubs act. The book clubs send out their books and if the person who receives them likes them then he sends the price of the books back to the book club. This is a book club approach to smuggling and the importation of questionable materials.

As a Member of Parliament from western Canada, specifically from the Province of British Columbia, we in that province are looking forward to a national event next year which will bring in literally hundreds of thousands—no, millions—of visitors to western Canada. It is called Expo 86.

Expo 86 is a transportation exhibition. It is a world fair. Its intention is to introduce Canada to the world with one spin-off being enhanced trade. We know that so many more people will be visiting, yet we are going to deal with this by cutting back on customs positions at our borders and in our Customs offices across the country. I have met with a number of Customs officers in western Canada over the last few days. They were concerned when they learned they were going to receive major job position cut-backs. Their reaction was one of alarm. These people are proud of the jobs they do and the services they offer, for example, at the interior Customs ports where tourists and goods arrive for distribution to central British Columbia and other parts of western Canada. These people want to do a good job, Mr. Speaker, but they simply do not have adequate manpower to do what should be done in an attempt to increase the number of visitors to Canada and the number of imports and exports. They do not have enough person power to do the job. When they learned that they were now going to have further cut-backs it really frustrated these public servants because now, more than ever, they will be unable to do the kind of job they wish.

As my colleague, the Hon. Member for Regina East (Mr. de Jong) indicated, Mr. Speaker, when we talk about tariffs in this House, we are really talking about the regional development of Canada and how the tariff system either aids or abets that development. There is a perception, particularly in the western regions of Canada that customs and tariffs and so on are by and large designed to protect central Canadian industry and that as a result of those protective walls around the central Canadian industry, goods are priced more expensively than they ought to be. Those areas of the far east, west and north of Canada which are resource exporters have as the very basis of their economic development the fact of free trade. When one considers that one of the areas in which we have free trade today is the softwoods industry, and when we see what is happening in terms of the non-tariff barriers which are being erected in the United States, and now the threat of a quota being placed on our wood exports to the United States, we realize just how serious this whole matter can be. I really have to ask the question whether or not today's discussion ought to be taking place at this time. Even though it is a technical Bill, changing the tariffs as they are applied to a variety of commodities, is this a time for discussion when we consider that we lack an over-all comprehensive trade policy? When we lack an over-all trade policy, one asks what the context is in which we are making these changes.

When we get into committee, we will ask why we want to place a tariff on hand-rolled cigars. The question itself might sound trite but there are hundreds of questions like this. Presumably, in a comprehensive trade package, we are trying to protect something in Canada. Perhaps there is a hand-rolled cigar industry in Canada we are trying to protect, but I am not aware of one. If there is such a fledgling industry which needs some protection in its early days, let us find out about it.

When we look through the list, Mr. Speaker, we find pages and pages of items such as mining equipment and agricultural equipment tariff free. The recommendation is that we should import all of the mining processing equipment Canada needs. On a global scale, Canada is a major mining country. Is it in our interests to continue to import all of the machinery and equipment used in mining? Should we not be an exporter of much of this equipment and machinery?

Mr. de Jong: Hear, hear!

Mr. Riis: Of course, we should, Mr. Speaker. Perhaps, then, if there is a case to be made in terms of an over-all comprehensive industrial strategy, with a complementary customs and trade strategy, it might make sense to have a tariff on some mining equipment sectors. However, these things are difficult to evaluate, Mr. Speaker; rolled cigars, hearing aids, knives, filters, and so on, without any context on which to base this evaluation.

We are less than enthusiastic about simply accepting this Bill as a technical Bill and falling all over ourselves to pass it. We want to get it into committee. We want to take it item by item. I have no hesitation in believing that the Hon. Member means what he says when he says this is a technical Bill, but we hear this from Minister after Minister. The then Minister of Fisheries and Oceans said a few days ago, "Don't worry, I've checked it. I've eaten the tuna. There is nothing to worry about. I've overruled all of the scientists who evaluated it. Have faith in me". Then the Minister of State for Finance says, "Don't worry about the meetings which took place in Washington on the weekend. They are just going to devalue the American currency relative to ours which will result in a possible loss of hundreds of thousands of jobs. But don't worry. Have faith. We know what we are doing". We were told to have faith when the Polar Sea invaded our territorial waters and the Americans forgot to ask our permission. We were told that would be sorted out. There is too much "loosey goosey" going on.

We are able to find $1 billion—which, described in another way, is a thousand million dollars—to bail out a couple of banks, without debating the merits of that decision. Over a weekend the Government committed itself and the taxpayers of Canada to a thousand million dollars. If we look at this Bill in that context, we feel strongly that we want to debate these minor areas, even though when we consider the kinds of topics and issues before this country today, when we consider the kinds of issues which Parliament should be discussing, we really wonder about the wisdom of spending hours and hours deciding whether hearing aids should be duty free or receive an 8 per cent tariff.

I say, Mr. Speaker, that we should get this into committee as soon as we can and deal with it very carefully in order to ensure that the Government is not pulling a fast one on us, as we have seen too many times before. We should get on, Mr. Speaker, with addressing some of the real important issues facing the people of this country.

Mr. de Jong: Mr. Speaker, I am wondering if my colleague is aware that one of the items which will now be duty free are manure spreaders, not the ones which are hand-pushed but ones, I would suppose, more mechanized. I wonder if the Hon. Member has any idea why the Government wants cheaper manure spreaders in this country? Does the Hon. Member believe that some of the political mistakes of this Government have to be spread around so, therefore, cheaper manure spreaders are now being called for?

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, I must admit I have not had an opportunity to delve into the manure spreader category of the Bill but the point he makes is an important one. There are sectors of our economy where we should be giving every bit of encouragement for their development. In a country where agriculture plays such an important role in providing foodstuffs for the hungry people, to develop a sound agriculture machine industry is something we could be proud of over the years. Some of the greatest technological innovations in agriculture machinery have been developed right here in Canada. For obvious reasons, Mr. Speaker, it is an area where we should excel. It is an area where we should be on the cutting edge of technological change, whether manure spreaders, combines or whatever. Perhaps some assistance in developing new parts of that industry for a few years in terms of a tariff imposed by the Government makes good sense. Again, it would only make good sense in the context of an over-all export policy. We are, of course, lacking that at the moment. In fact, we have always lacked that. This sort of simplistic mind set of free trade with the U.S. which some people have been voicing is certainly not the way to develop a comprehensive trade policy which would benefit Canadians.

My colleague from Regina raises a good point and points out even more the need for a logical, comprehensive and thoughtful approach to the development of a sound tariff and customs policy.

Mr. Taylor: Mr. Speaker, the last question and answer are what brought me to my feet. For many years the chassis of fertilizing machines and other equipment which aided the production of food came into the country tariff-free. In the last year of the Liberal regime, a tax was placed on the chassis of a fertilizing machine. Someone in that Department came to the conclusion that the chassis of a fertilizer was the same as a chassis of a truck. The chassis for the fertilizer I am thinking about is made specifically for fertilizing fields. In no way can it be used for a truck. Yet that tax was added and thereby increased the cost of production of food. I firmly believe that we should make sure that machinery coming into this country, including manure spreaders, which assists in the production of foods should come in duty-free. We should not be adding costs to the production of food. That is a very sound principle and I hope it permeates this legislation.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, the point my hon. friend raises is an interesting one. I know he is only too well aware of the technological advances Canada has provided to the world agricultural community over the years. This is a very important aspect of the economy of the riding he represents and he is well aware of the development of agricultural equipment over the years.

My concern, and I am sure that he shares it, is that too many of the discussions we have in this House regarding agriculture or our general tariff policy, by definition implies a comprehensive understanding of what we are trying to achieve over the long term. That requires an understanding between the major players of Government, industry, labour and others. We have to understand what we are trying to accomplish together. Our customs and excise programs should reflect that over-all strategy or game plan. However, over the years there has not been a long-term view taken. For years and years I blamed the then Liberal Government for not taking the time to develop a consensus so we could understand the direction we were moving in, in whatever area. Therefore I must reflect with some sorrow on a similar feeling today. So much faith in the "market-place" implies by definition a short-term view of economic development as well as societal development. The concern I want to share with the Hon. Member is that of this rather blind acceptance of the "market system" as the motivating and most important force. One of the reasons not only social democratic countries but countries like Japan are successful while we seem to flounder around rather like a rudderless ship in a sea without any long-term comprehensive program to help guide us is because they have long-term economic development planning.

Mr. Deans: Mr. Speaker, my colleague has made a study of this matter. He reported to caucus on this matter two years ago, if I recall correctly. I am particularly concerned about one matter which has an immediate effect in British Columbia and which will have certain repercussions if it is passed without adequate consideration. I am referring to Schedule 1, and in particular Tariff Item 41014-1. He knows, as do I, that this particular item is of grave concern in much of his riding, and certainly to the north in Revelstoke and areas—

Mr. Riis: East and north.

Mr. Deans: —to the east and north. I would very much appreciate if he could perhaps give us some insight regarding whether or not any negotiations or discussions took place prior to the introduction of this legislation with those people in that area of British Columbia who will be most affected.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, indeed, as my colleague indicated, we took some time over this issue in caucus about 18 months or two years ago. This item was the focus of our attention. To my knowledge no comprehensive discussion has taken place regarding the implications of this decision. In more common parlance, my hon. friend was referring equipment used in coalmining. We have developed some sophisticated technology over the years and we are presently world leaders in some of the more critical cutting devices used at the coal face. Here again we are suggesting that tariffs not be applied to not only coal-cutting machines but loading machines, draglines, power shovels, hydraulic excavating backhoes, front end loaders, front wheel graders and the like. This goes back to the original point that both my colleague from Regina and I were making, that if Canada is going to develop a manufacturing sector which relfects its strengths and resource advantage areas, coal-mining is certainly one of those. This is particularly true when you consider the high grade coal which so much of western Canada is blessed with and what that means in combating acid rain. The sulphur content of that coal is relatively low compared to most global coal deposits. We were concerned about Schedule 1, Tariff Item 41014-1 as being another example of the lack of thought the Government has given to providing duty-free importation of this equipment which has become so valuable in the development of a Canadian resource.

An equal concern arises when we come to deal with popguns and .22 rifles and so on, and the differentiation—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Charest): Order. I regret that the period for questions and comments is now over. Resuming debate.

Mr. Ian Deans (Hamilton Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I was a little worried that I might not get an opportunity to speak this afternoon, and I am certainly pleased to do so. If I may, I want to go back to the comment I made and the question I asked of my colleague because I think it exemplifies or highlights, if you will, the problem in dealing with legislation of this type. It is of course very complex. Its implications are frequently not felt until long after it has been put in place. The other night, just before I dropped off to sleep, I was looking through the Bill to determine just exactly where the Government was moving to reduce tariffs. If you had the opportunity to read the Bill, Mr. Speaker, I know you will want to express some concerns and I will therefore take this opportunity to express them on your behalf.

For example, for those of my colleagues who have not yet read the Bill, look at tariff Item 41002-1. I cannot think of a nation that should have more interest and concern in protecting its own base in this area than Canada. Let me put it in another context. For years there has been an ongoing argument, a debate might be a better way to put it, about the necessity for Canada to build up its manufacturing sector as it relates to raw materials.

I think you will recall, Mr. Speaker, certainly in the 18 years I have been in politics and probably extending far beyond that, there has hardly been a year when the whole question of the inadequacy of that sector has not been raised in the House of Commons. It is mind-boggling to think that a country with such vast mineral resources would not yet have been able to develop a substantial, not only domestic oriented but internationally oriented, manufacturing sector directly related to that valuable asset. There are very few Members in the House, the Hon. Member for Brampton-Georgetown (Mr. McDermid) being one who would remember the Legislative Assembly of Ontario and the numbers of times the question was raised concerning the need to enhance the manufacturing sector relative to the natural resource potential of Ontario, and I think it fair to say of Canada.

It has been a disappointment that there has not been the kind of emphasis placed on the development of that sector that many of us felt there ought to have been. Even at this late date, I think we had anticipated, as a result of this Government's statements of the election just recently passed, that its intention was to develop an industrial strategy in Canada. This would allow for those smaller operations that currently exist to expand to become world class, and in those areas we did not now have a presence, we would encourage development. We had anticipated that moves to eliminate tariffs in those areas, in particular, might have been delayed. We might have awaited the outcome of whatever Government policy was forthcoming before the Government moved to eliminate the tariff protection. I do not think anyone will disagree that in some fledgling western operations, and the Hon. Member for Bow River (Mr. Taylor) will know this, there is indeed the necessity to provide a certain amount of limited protection for a short period to allow for the growth that is so necessary to take place. My colleague from Bow River, if he has been following this, would certainly applaud that thought.

The interesting thing about this Bill, and I know when the Member studied it he probably came to the same conclusions I did, is that it is most unusual to find ourselves in a situation where the tariff in many areas, not all, is to be eliminated entirely—and I am the first to admis the tariff in place was small—it happens to fall within areas directly related to the resource sector. Whether that resource sector be, as my friend and colleague from Bow River indicated, the agricultural sector, whether in discussions with my colleague, the Hon. Member for Kamloops-Shuswap (Mr. Riis) it be in the coal mining sector or in tariff item 41002, 41026 or 42762 which affects mineral resources, and to some extent perhaps even the oil industry, the moves being taken by the Government can do nothing but reduce the possibilities for the development of that industry base within our own country.

I defy anyone in the House of Commons, or for that matter anyone outside, to suggest that the analysis I have put on those tariff reductions is other than factual.

Having said that, it therefore makes it awfully difficult to deal properly with what we are faced. How do we answer the questions from so many of our constituents who ask us how they are supposed to begin the process of developing a small but viable industry or maintaining a small but viable industry if they are to be put in a position of where what little bit of protection they had in the formative stages has been removed? That gets to the nub of the question. My friend from Brampton-Georgetown shakes his head and waves his hand. Unfortunately, the television cameras do not pick it up. The facts are there. Whether my colleague agrees or not, the question of whether we should be dealing with 44100-1 is a separate and identifiably different question. What worries me is that we have lumped into this one Bill to change the customs tariff a whole series of questions that relate not only to the appropriateness of having or not having tariffs for their own sake, but relate to questions of how one develops an industrial base when you are open to the opportunities for a much larger and sophisticated base to overtake you in the process. That is a very serious question I think the Government has failed to answer. It is the kind of question that is being addressed at this very point in time in the United States Congress on other somewhat related though identical issues.

Let me illustrate with an example. Over the course of last weekend I spent probably 14 hours travelling with Congressmen from various parts of the United States discussing problems in the steel industry. Certain truths came home to me as I listened to them describe their dilemma. Without exception, Democrats, Republicans, new Congress people and old, not particularly of one group, not homogeneous in every sense of the word, had one thing in common, the problems confronting them within the steel industry.

Mr. McDermid: In their constituencies.

Mr. Deans: In their constituencies but they represent, and I say to my colleague from Brampton who smiles, 204 Congressmen, if I recall, a substantial block of votes within that Congress. They were talking about the need within their own areas to protect their industry base. While on the one hand, let me say it, they admitted their President was speaking about free trade, on the other hand they were arguing forcibly that that was not in their best interests. I raised this matter to make the point that we are moving to eliminate tariffs or reduce them dramatically in certain vulnerable areas which have not yet reached a scale sufficient to allow them to be competitive in a very tough world market. At the same time the United States, which happens to be the country with which we do most of our trade, is moving to put in place tariff or non-tariff barriers on the sale of our products within its jurisdiction. What is the point in us eliminating the small tariff barriers now in place in those particular areas when the United States is moving with some haste to do the exact opposite in an attempt to protect the modernization of its steel mills? Perhaps the Hon. Member should read the Bill. Much of what is in it deals with the component parts necessary for the modernization of industry. At this moment the United States, as I said, is moving with a great deal of haste to try to put barriers in place which will enable it to improve the efficiency of its industry base. It will not be buying from us the products which we are currently in the process of manufacturing.

Mr. McDermid: Do you support it?

Mr. Deans: Do I support what?

Mr. McDermid: That with which we are dealing.

Mr. Deans: Of course not. The Government seems to be rushing headlong into an embrace with the administration of the United States to establish something called "free trade" which will inevitably destroy the industrial base in Canada. At the same time that administration is moving to protect its industrial base. It is about time that some members of the Tory caucus started to face reality. We cannot afford to alter the basic structure until we see what kind of retaliatory action the Government of the United States intends to implement with regard to protecting its industrial base. If any Members of the House doubt for one moment that in the major industrial areas of the United States there is some question about the imposition of quotas or other non-tariff barriers which will take the place of tariffs already in place, I urge them to go to Washington and sit down with their counterparts in the Congress to hear what they are saying.

Mr. McDermid: We know what they are saying.

Mr. Deans: I hear my colleague. If that is so, I anticipate that he will be on his feet momentarily to make a somewhat similar statement to the one I have made. This is not the time to eliminate tariffs. We should not have been sucked in in the negotiations. We should not have moved without careful consideration of the impact. Unfortunately that has been the case. That is what I am trying to get through to this motley crew of Conservative back-benchers, most of whom are not listening.

Mr. McDermid: One of them has more quality than the whole NDP.

Mr. Deans: I suppose the Hon. Member is speaking about himself.

Mr. McDermid: No, I am not. I am speaking about a colleague to my left.

Mr. Deans: I would certainly hope so. We are opposing it as it now stands because of the tremendous uncertainty in terms of what will happen within the next 10 months to a year and a half. In less than a year, or perhaps in less than six months, we will see a move on the part of the United States Congress which will detrimentally impact upon our lumber industry. We will see a move which detrimentally impacts upon our steel industry. We will see moves by the U.S. Congress which will have a detrimental effect on our farming industry in a variety of ways. While this is happening, we are moving to make it easier for them to infiltrate our markets even further. If that is not naive, I ask the Hon. Member for Bow River what is naive? If that is not backward policy, what is? Perhaps someone in the House could explain to me why we ought to be taking these steps right now. I am not only referring to these steps, as they are only a drop in the bucket compared with what is about to be begun at the negotiating table by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney), his Minister for International Trade (Mr. Kelleher) and the administration of the United States. A sell-out is taking place, and the Government, in an almost obscene way, seems to think that if we sell everything out somehow we will be better off. I fail to understand the rationale. I fail to understand what caused the Government to come to the decisions it has reached. I do not understand why we would be moving to reduce tariffs in advance of any discussions about fair trading arrangements. I do not understand why we would not have held off on making any further compromise efforts until we saw clearly from the United States what its over-all negotiating posture was to be.

As I have said, over the last weekend and going back over many years, as we sit down to discuss the impact of the actions they are about to undertake, we cannot help but draw the conclusion that a nation of this size, entering into a negotiating process of that type, must have available to it every method and means to protect itself in advance. We must have everything to use in the protection process to ensure that we are not steamrolled along the way as a result of its negotiating posture and overwhelming economic strength.

I am not making a definite statement about whether or not it might be possible to work something out in certain sectors. I frankly do not know the answer to that, and I am willing to admit it. I do not know if there is a way to work out some sectoral agreements, but I do not think we can go to the bargaining table with all the strength we need if, in advance of the process beginning, we have already moved to eliminate much of the somewhat small but nevertheless important tariff protection which currently exists. That is what the argument is in a nutshell. If we are to negotiate over the next two years, and if in the process of that negotiation we are to attempt to work out some agreements with the United States, there has to be some give and take. If we have already given everything before we sit down, then all that will be left will be the "take". From the meetings I have had over last weekend and stretching back as far as three years ago, I want to tell the House that the U.S. is bound and determined that whatever taking is to be done will be done by that country and not by us.

I say to my colleagues, those who care to listen, that we ought not to pass this piece of legislation at the moment. We need to have in our hands at least some means of putting before them possible retaliation—and I do not like that use of the word; it is not even the correct word—or some means of easing the pain, if in the event they do that which I understand they are about to do, that is, protect their own at the expense of ours. It is not being anti-American to suggest that what they do, they do in their best interest. They do not consider us for one solitary second in the process they go through. There is no one in the Congress of the United States who stands up and argues on behalf of Canada in the negotiation process. Therefore, before we give away that little protection we have left, I suggest that we wait until after the negotiation process has begun. We should wait until after we see what it is they are after. Then we should start to talk about how to bring down tariffs, if need be and if it is mutually advantageous, to a level which will cause them to be no longer a barrier.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Charest): It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 46, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: The Hon. Member for Broadview-Greenwood (Ms. McDonald)—Publishing Industry (a) Prentice-Hall Company takeover (b) Government policy; the Hon. Member for Regina East (Mr. de Jong)—Trust Companies—Pioneer Trust (a) Plight of uninsured depositors (b) Uninsured income averaging certificates; the Hon. Member for Cape Breton Highlands-Canso (Mr. O'Neil)—Regional Industrial Expansion—Employment opportunities in Cape Breton.

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Epp (Provencher) (for the Minister of Finance) that Bill C-71, an Act to amend the Customs Tariff, be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee.

Mr. Lanthier: Mr. Speaker, I do not know whether it was my introductory speech or the vindictive spirit we were threatened with this afternoon by the Leader of the "small" opposition, but I believe he neither read the Bill nor listened to our comments.

I would like to say first of all, that all the changes in this legislation were made in direct consultation with industry. Second, many of these changes were the result of a decision of the Tariff Board, a Government agency set up in co-operation with the private sector, and whose operations are entirely independent. I therefore fail to understand the Hon. Member's remarks. Third, I would like to draw the attention of the House to the fact that, to my great surprise, there were many references taking the U.S. Government as an example. It was truly a revelation, coming from the New Democratic Party, to be told today that we should take the U.S. Government's protectionism as an example. Since when has the U.S. Government been an example for the New Democratic Party?

So this afternoon, I had two revelations. First of all, they completely ignored the intent of the Act, which was to enshrine changes already in effect and which had already been approved in consultation with the private sector, and second, we have the New Democratic Party taking the Americans as an example of how to run a country. Let me tell you, Sir, that this is a surprise to me.

Mr. Deans: Mr. Speaker, I do not understand the reply. The Minister's Parliamentary Secretary cannot possibly use that as an argument.

[English]

It is not accurate, first of all, to say that that is what I said. I did not. I said we ought not to move until after we know quite clearly what the new U.S. posture is going to be. That is quite different from saying that we should emulate or imitate them. I said we had to know what they were going to do. It was a difficulty perhaps in the way I expressed it and I want to make clear to the Parliamentary Secretary that that is what it was.

Beyond that, I think the Hon. Member knows full well that I did read the Bill. That is what caused me to rise. If I had not read the Bill I would not rise. I never speak about things that I do not know anything about.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Deans: To infer that such is the case is to do a disservice to the House of Commons. I never questioned his method or motive. I do not doubt but that he is a lackey for the Government and I acknowledge that. I, on the other hand, am an independent spirit in this regard and I want to express the concerns that I personally feel, concerns I am sure that if he were not so closely tied to the Minister's coattails he would want to express, too.

[Translation]

Mr. Lanthier: Mr. Speaker, this afternoon nobody is watching me. Both my Ministers are absent, so I am quite free to speak and that is indeed the spirit in which I have spoken.

[English]

But I must add though, if I want to make myself clear—

Mr. Deans: Once in a while.

Mr. Lanthier: I do not think that we ought to realy on our translators, but should tell them the misunderstanding that exists between the Leader of the small Opposition and myself is not a matter of translation. It is a matter of basis. I understood by the way he referred to the United States a lot of time that he admired them. Of course as a responsible Government we are not going to enter a fight of protectionism against a big country. We are interested in their big market and maybe the United States is interested in showing the whole world a good example, how it can be a good neighbour, in order to exercise free trade that it wants to establish with other countries. I do not think it is a matter of protectionism, as referred to by the Leader of the small Opposition, I think that these people use it as an example and I think I understand them well.

Mr. Deans: As the House Leader for the real Opposition as opposed to the small Opposition—

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Deans: I am not exactly sure whether that reference was a put down or a misunderstanding. However, I accept it in the good humour that always exists in the House of Commons. It was intended to be humorous. Let me suggest, however, to the Hon. Member in all fairness, and I respect him, he knows that—we have been together outside of this place—I think he misunderstands what I am saying. It is not a matter of admiration for the U.S., neither is it support for its policy. It is an understanding of it and to understand what it is doing is to understand that what this Bill does is take away what limited protection we have in certain areas.

It does not interest me whether on an individual basis each of those companies that are presently involved in business in Canada can see certain minor advantages to the steps that are being recommended. That is not important because there is a much larger question looming on the horizon. In fact, it is not even on the horizon any more, it is much closer than that. That much larger question touches on the negotiations that will be started within the next short while with the U.S. over the question of free trade sectoral or otherwise. I am saying quite clearly my understanding of what the U.S. is now doing, and I think that my understanding is accurate. I believe that as a result of long and difficult meetings held over an extended period of time, I have some sense of where Congress is going and I might say to the Hon. Member that he is not going in the same direction as is the President and the administration. Don't ever get the wrong impression in that regard. Congress is moving in an almost diametrically opposite direction to the administration and the President of the United States at the moment in a variety of different trade areas. The interesting thing about it is that their only concern for Canada is to try to keep us from selling into their markets the things that we make more cheaply than them.

We have to keep that in mind when we are discussing this. It will detrimentally impact in every industrial part of this country, and I do not want the Hon. Member to misunderstand for one moment what I am saying. There is absolutely no doubt that whatever small protection we now have we should maintain until we see what their posture is going to be at the negotiating table. That is the argument. That is why we do not proceed until after we get a clear picture of where they are going. That is what I said at the beginning, that is what I said halfway through, that is what I said at the end, that is what I answered in the first question, that is what I answer now. This is not the time to do this.

If there is a time, and I am not sure there is but I am prepared to concede that there may be further debate necessary to determine that, but if there is a time it must surely come after we can see clearly whether the administration in the United States led by the President or whether the Congress of the United States led by the Congress will be the victors.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Charest): Order, please. It being 5 o'clock, the House will now proceed with the consideration of Private Members' Business as listed on today's Order Paper.

PUBLIC SERVICE EMPLOYMENT ACT

SUGGESTED AMENDMENT RESPECTING GREATER PARTICIPATION IN POLITICAL PROCESS

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa-Vanier) moved that, in the opinion of this House, the Government should consider the advisability of amending the Public Service Employment Act and other related statutes in consequence thereof, in order to permit greater participation in the political process by federal public servants than is now allowed under the aforementioned statutes.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the House is of course well acquainted with the subject of this motion, because we have discussed this topic a number of times. If I am not mistaken, we have had three similar motions before the House during the current session. I remember taking part in a debate on the subject not long ago, while my colleague, the Hon. Member for Glengarry-Prescott-Russell (Mr. Boudria), the Hon. Member for Ottawa Centre (Mr. Cassidy) and the Hon. Member for Regina West (Mr. Benjamin) have also proposed motions similar to the one before the House today.

I must admit that considering the repeated consideration of this topic in previous Parliaments, I am somewhat reluctant to rise again in the House to raise this very important issue, namely that of letting federal public servants know what their rights are in terms of participation in the political process.

Mr. Speaker, in drafting this motion I was mindful of a number of promises made by the Government during the last election campaign, promises which were also made by my own party during the campaign, namely, that the issue being an important one public servants ought to know what their rights are in the political process. To make this possible, we suggested that a parliamentary committee be asked to consider the issue of participation in the political process by public servants.

It seems to me that nothing has changed much in Parliament over the years. I remember that in 1972, when I was elected as a Member, the matter was already being discussed and continued to be in the years that followed. We talked about it when the late Walter Baker was the Member for Nepean-Carleton. He too presented bills, as I did, but the matter kept being postponed, because people said it was an issue of interest only to Members for Ottawa and the area, including of course Hull and Gatineau, Glengarry-Prescott, Lanark and the general area.

Mr. Speaker, we are talking about a fundamental principle. The Charter of Rights and Freedoms gives every Canadian the right of association, and freedom of speech, opinion and expression.

Section 2 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms of the Canadian Constitution is clear, where it says:

2. Everyone has the following fundamental freedoms:

(a) freedom of conscience and religion;

(b) freedom of thought, belief, opinion and expression, including freedom of the press and other media of communication;

(c) freedom of peaceful assembly; and

(d) freedom of association.

Public employees ask themselves these questions: What are we allowed to do, as federal civil servants? What are we allowed to do during an election campaign? What can we do without jeopardizing our career and our role as public employees? Those questions have been asked many times, but Government authorities have yet to respond.

In 1979, as a result of certain initiatives taken by the previous Government and the work done by a parliamentary committee which had made an in-depth study of the whole question, it was recommended that a committee of experts in this field be appointed to consider the whole issue of the merit principle and related matters. We all recall the famous "Report of the Special Committee on the Review of Personnel Management and the Merit Principle". The report contains a rather direct recommendation concerning participation in the political process. Mr. Speaker, here is a quotation from page 171:

Simply because political participation is a right of citizens, we believe—

We, the commissioners—

—that this should be the principle that applies to public servants, only limited in the exceptional cases where an indication of partisan political interests would compromise the reputation of the public service for impartiality or would damage the individual's effectiveness as a public servant.

That is clear.

The commissioners went on to say that public employees ought to be divided into three groups.

The first group is the professional group whose duties in every job are of a rather delicate nature since it acts as adviser to the Government; therefore any partisan or political participation is excluded.

The second group is the professional group whose duties may be of a professional nature such as medicine, veterinary medicine. What difference does it make whether the gentleman or the lady happens to be a veterinarian or a physician if he or she does not give political advice to the Government? I simply cannot see how they can be told: Well, because you are a physician, a veterinarian or an engineer, you are excluded from participation in the democratic political process.

And the third group is the professional group whose duties are of an administrative nature, administrative support or maintenance, for example. All those people, most of them in support jobs, all those people—some 80,000-odd, Mr. Speaker—ought to be free of any restriction and free to act on the political scene if they so desire.

Mr. Speaker, the problem stems from the interpretation of Public Service Employment Act Section 32 which is rather restrictive for all federal employees, whatever their classification, and prevents them from enjoying political rights as do all other Canadians.

We all know about the regular announcements and statements made by the Public Service Commission of Canada when there is an election. A few months before an election is called, the commissioners deliver what is called their message, the message from the commissioners of the Public Service Commission of Canada to all federal employees. The message goes like this: Beware, friends, you must not participate in the political process; given your duties, you might be caught flagrante delicto and be called upon to answer for your actions and your words to the commission, thereby jeopardizing your career as public employees.

Mr. Speaker, the interpretation given by the Commission—since it is an interpretation—is served up every time an election comes around and causes a number of problems as well as a lot of anxiety and concern among the electorate and in ridings where there a lot of public servants. It causes problems because, quite frankly, and I do not think any Members of this House will deny this, public servants—of course I may be generalizing a bit—with the exception of those who act as political advisers to the Government, public servants in general, like all good citizens want to get involved and be allowed to get involved in the political process. We are talking about democracy in action, and they feel it is important to be able to express their views as citizens, and I think they are perfectly right to want to do so.

Occasionally, statements by the Commission create a certain degree of anxiety, reflected, for instance, in issues as ordinary as a lawn sign. The public servant says: Can I put up a sign saying that I support Member X Y Z? The Commission says: I am not sure. But if you do put up a sign and there is a complaint, you are going to get into hot water! I remember the Miller case, where Mr. Miller, a Winnipeg public servant, wrote to his supervisor asking him to explain the Liberal Party's position on political participation, and it was about one of those grey areas. The document he sent us is quite interesting, and I would like to read to the House some extracts from this file, because it shows that public servants are in fact in an almost untenable situation.

● (1710)

[English]

This gentleman from Winnipeg wrote to his supervisor asking permission to attend a political meeting and, possibly, actively participate in the choice of delegates to a convention. The answer given was: "No. You cannot go to that political meeting because you are a public servant and, therefore, you would compromise your status." The public servant complied with the ruling but wrote to Mr. John Brown, Director, Personnel Services, Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, Manitoba Region, in Winnipeg, Manitoba. He put forward a very good case which reflects the essence of the difficulties most public servants face. The letter reads:

My reading of the act allows me to:

1. attend political meetings (partisan or otherwise).

I think the law states that that is correct. We all agree that it is correct. The letter continues:

2. express my own view at political meetings.

I think, again, he can do that and there would be no complaint.

3. write letters to members of parliament expressing personal views.

We all receive letters of that type all the time.

4. write letters to editors of public communications media expressing personal views.

That is also correct.

5. maintain a membership in a political party.

Again, that is accepted, even by the Commission.

6. contribute funds to a political party.

Again, that is accepted by the Public Service Commission as a right allowed under Section 32. He goes on to state:

My reading of the act prohibits me from:

1. raising money for a political party.

I do not know why that would be and I do not see it in the Act. However, that is the way he reads it.

2. acting as a spokesperson for a political party in public forum while on the public payroll.

3. publicly supporting or working for a partisan candidate—

That would be forbidden by his own interpretation.

4. running for political office . . . without securing a leave from my employer to do so—

The following section of the letter is one which I find interesting and enlightening. He says in his letter that when he asks permission to do certain things he is told that he cannot do them because he will compromise his role as a public servant. He goes on in the letter to use an analogy which I think is interesting and one which I wish to share with Members. He states:

In the obviation of your responsibility, you state in your last letter that I may be subject to some form of disciplinary action. Well, I may be hit by a truck crossing the street, but with the observation of certain traffic rules and conditions, and the application of good judgment, I will be able to avoid that possibility with reasonable certitude. On the other hand, I would not want to cross the street blindfolded, and that is what you are asking me to do.

Public servants who work for the public good are being told that if they do this they may be exposed to that so be careful and do not do anything. They are being told not to cross the street because they may get hit by a car. That is the gist of the difficulties faced by public servants. They do not have a clear understanding—neither do I as a matter of fact—of how to interpret Section 32 of the Public Service Employment Act.

To clear the matter up and to make sure the issue is well aired and well understood, we have suggested the question of political participation be sent to a committee of the House so that all parties interested—union, individuals, groups—may be heard, advance their arguments and then proceed from there to modify, change or improve the legislation. Up to now, we have not been able to do that, and we have had great difficulties in trying to cope with this matter.

I must remind the House of one important factor with respect to the question of political participation. The law states that the Commission may act on a complaint laid by a candidate to an election. In other words, the whole question of triggering Section 32 and the consequences which flow therefrom may occur to someone who, in the opinion of the Public Service Commission, may have broken the guidelines or the law. The whole question is triggered by a candidate. According to my research, there has never been a candidate who has complained to the Public Service Commission. Therefore, the provisions of the Section have never been triggered. Thus, we have no way of knowing what exactly is in Section 32 of the Act.

I plead with the House to get this matter cleared up. Let us get the question aired. Let us get the whole problem out of the way by sending the matter to a committee of the House which will sit down and take decisions as it should. The committee does not expect the Commission to take those political decisions at election time. It is up to parliamentarians to look at the question of political participation by public servants and air the matter completely. It is up to us to take a decision with respect to what the legislation means. In that way, public servants will be better off.

There is all sorts of documentation on the matter, Mr. Speaker. I know Members have in their offices a great deal of research that we could use in discussion of the matter. I encourage the House to adopt the motion before us and get on with the work.

Public Service Employment Act

Mr. David Daubney (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, I am happy to have this opportunity to rise and speak on the motion before us. I commend the Hon. Member for Ottawa-Vanier (Mr. Gauthier) on introducing it today. As he mentioned in his opening remarks, he has been a Member of the House for a long time and has spoken on similar Bills or motions over the years. The political rights—indeed, the basic civil rights—of public servants have been a question of importance to me and to other Hon. Members on this side of the House for some period of time. I first rose to speak on the issue in November of last year in my maiden speech when I called for the restoration of political rights for public servants. Hon. Members may know that I was the only public servant elected to this House in last year's election.

This motion raises basic questions about the essential liberties of the Canadian people; whether a group of Canadians has the right to free speech, free assembly, and the right to work peacefully and lawfully for democratic change. On the surface, it would seem that there would be no question about this, but serious objections have been raised and have dominated this discussion for more than half a century.

Those who believe it is justifiable to deprive public servants of political rights make three basic arguments, Mr. Speaker: First, the case is made that public servants must not be permitted to participate in the political process, or to speak freely about public issues because there might be a conflict between the loyalties to Party and the loyalty to the Minister. This argument suggests that any perception of such a conflict of interest would undermine public confidence in the Public Service.

The second argument suggests that if public servants have the right to participate as other citizens do in the political process, or have the right to make public comment on public issues, that this might influence the decisions they have to make as they implement Government policies. They might give preference, for example, to their political friends when letting contracts or hiring new staff.

The third argument is that public servants would use their positions as advisers to Ministers to promote their own political philosophies. How, it is argued, could Ministers be assured that the advice they receive is not motivated by partisan or other types of considerations.

These are, indeed, serious questions, Mr. Speaker, and they are not questions which those who favour restoration of political rights should casually dismiss. If public servants are to have their basic rights restored, those of us who seek this restoration must answer these objections. If they could not be answered, there would indeed be some reason to consider abrogating the basis rights of freedom of speech and affiliation. However, if reasonable arguments can be marshalled against these objections, then we must not take the dire step of depriving adult Canadians of their basic liberties.

If we look at other jurisdictions, Mr. Speaker, we see that Canada's restrictions on these civil liberties exceeds those of most other advanced western democracies. In the United States, Great Britain, Australia, France and Sweden, public servants have the right of free public expression. Where there are restrictions on political activity, these restrictions are clearly spelled out as they are in the United States, for instance. Where there are not clearly spelled out restrictions, as in Australia, for example, public servants are given the benefit of the doubt in their permitted action. While American law does not permit public servants to run for public office, it does clearly permit them the right to express an opinion on public issues, either privately or publicly, to display political badges and stickers, to be a member of a political party and to attend political conventions, although not, interestingly enough, to be a delegate to a convention. The limitations on their actions, in other words, are also clearly spelled out.

In the United Kingdom, there is a clear delineation of political rights for different categories of public servants, running from complete freedom for some public servants in jobs of low political sensitivity, to restrictions similar to those we have in Canada for a small group of senior public servants.

The basic criteria guiding the British rule, as the Fulton Committee in the U.K., a committee dealing with the civil service, stated, was that, and I quote:

> Officials should not be drawn into expressing personal views on policy matters which could be represented as in conflict with those of their Ministers.

Only Japan and the Federal Republic of Germany, among the industrialized democracies, have restrictions greater than those we have in Canada.

With the passage of legislation governing the Civil Service in 1908 and 1918, political rights of civil servants in this country were strictly limited, initially with the laudable intention of reducing the debilitating effects which unbridled patronage had created in the Public Service and throughout Canada. For 50 years thereafter these restrictions continued until the Public Service Employment Act of 1967 gave public servants the limited rights to attend political meetings, to contribute money to a political party and to request, although not to be automatically granted, a leave of absence without pay if they wished to run for public office.

The report of the Task Force on Conflict of Interest in the Public Sector which reported last year said, and I quote:

> The practical effect of Section 32 of the Public Service Employment Act has been to extend virtually full political rights to roughly 90 per cent of public servants.

The remaining 10 per cent who were deprived were presumably deputy heads and senior public servants.

I must say, Mr. Speaker, that I disagree strongly with the view of the task force as expressed in that quotation. If, in fact, Canadian public servants were treated as are those in other jurisdictions and, if, where legislation describing their political rights was vague and the benefit of the doubt was given to the public servant, then what the task force suggested might be true. This Act does not spell out all the restrictions on public servants. It spells them out in really nothing more than a cursory manner. It leaves interpretation of the Act up to the Public Service Commission.

Unfortunately, for public servants, the interpretation of Section 32 of this Act has been notoriously fickle. Until last year many public servants in the National Capital Region did in fact participate in elections, working for candidates and all three political Parties represented in this House. The Public Service Commission in most cases overlooked this activity. However, outside of Ottawa, it often tended to act more severely, limiting the rights of public servants.

Federal departments governed by this Act interpreted this Act in different ways, and other federal agencies, not subject to the Act, have varied from permitting almost complete political freedom to public servants in some agencies, to putting severe limits on others. What this means, Mr. Speaker, is that some public servants have been denied rights which other public servants of equal status have been granted, and that in all cases, public servants have had their rights defined not by Parliament, the guardian of our civil liberties. Rather, these rights have been deprived by the whim of unelected officials or regulatory agencies.

Had the Task Force on the Conflict of Interest had the opportunity to consider the Public Service Commission's interpretation of Section 32—referred to by the Hon. Member for Ottawa-Vanier in his remarks—I am convinced its members would not have said that the practical effect of Section 32 was to extend virtually full political rights to public servants. In fact, this interpretation had the practical effect of prohibiting public servants from working for political parties in any capacity. It prevented them from attending political conventions or from making public comments on public issues.

It prevented those Canadians who happen to be public servants from taking part in the simplest of tasks in connection with the last general election. The result was to force those who did decide to work for a candidate stuffing envelopes, typing letters or answering phone calls, to look over their shoulders for fear that big brother, watching from the safety of the Public Service Commission, would catch them.

The campaigns of all three of the political Parties in this House, particularly in the National Capital Region, were assisted by workers who defy this ruling. These same campaigns were harmed by the loss of many capable individuals who were forced out of the political process by fear of the Public Service Commission. I think we should be clear about this, Mr. Speaker. These were the results, not of the acts of this Parliament taking a clearly thought out and detailed decision on a fundamental issue of civil liberties, but rather the results of administrative fiat, which arose from the vagueness of an ill-defined law, a law which allows unelected officials to deprive a group of Canadians of their democratic rights.

The fickle interpretation of the Public Service Employment Act extended also to decisions as to who should be allowed to take a leave of absence to run for political office. I was a public servant who was fortunate enough to receive the permission of the Commission to run. However, other equally competent individuals who could have served all three Parties, and all Canadians in this House, have been deprived of the right even to seek the nomination of a political Party.

Section 32 of the Public Service Employment Act does not deal with the rights of public servants to comment on public issues in public. Limitations on freedom of expression for public servants have evolved largely through regulation by government agencies—not by legislation. The Public Service Staff Relations Board has set stringent limits on freedom of expression by public servants, banning criticisms of public policy.

It has done this even if it cannot be shown that such comments affect a public servant's effectiveness in the performance of his or her duties. The question has not become one of depriving people of their rights because it interferes with their public duties, but just depriving them of their rights.

However, we have a Charter of Rights today, enshrined in our Constitution, and this Charter guarantees everyone in Canada the freedoms of conscience, of thought, of belief, of opinion and expression. The Charter clearly says that these rights are subject only to "such reasonable limits prescribed by law as can be demonstrably justified in a free and democratic society." In my view, the current restrictions of Section 32 go too far to be reasonable. The law turns the basic rights of a large number of Canadians over to the whims of unelected officials. The interpretation and implementation of this law has resulted in unreasonable limitations on even the smallest and most innocuous of political activities by public servants.

If we believe that the Charter of Rights is more than just easy rhetoric, then it is clear that we cannot permit unelected administrators or regulatory agencies to define who has rights and who does not. If there are to be restrictions, the burden of denying a group of Canadians their basic rights must be borne by the elected representatives of the people, who can spell out these restrictions in detail, and after sober reflection. We must act on the principle that fundamental rights cannot be casually abrogated, least of all by officials who do not represent the public will. We must proceed on the basis that unless fundamental rights are specifically denied in law, they are retained. If we are to deny these fundamental rights, then we must specify in law what this means in practice, as other countries have done.

This is an issue which affects a large number of Canadians. Two hundred and twenty-two thousand Canadians are governed by the Public Service Employment Act, and there are more than three hundred and sixty thousand more who work in Crown agencies and the Canadian Forces, but are not governed by this Act. Of this additional number, many thousands are deprived of political rights by decisions of the agencies for which they work. The situation is getting worse, Mr. Speaker. The number of Canadians directly governed by the Public Service Commission, or its predecessor, the Civil Service Commission, and thus automatically denied their political rights, has grown by almost one hundred thousand in the last 25 years. Among the people denied these rights by the Public Service Employment Act are 90,000 women; this in a society which is just beginning to deal with the fact that women have been grossly under-represented in Canadian public life.

The effects on the political life of this country are huge. Two thirds of all public servants live outside of the National Capital Region, so almost every community in every constituency, in every province of this country has people who are now, or could easily be deprived of their basic rights. The effects on the political life of this city, and region and our neighbours across the Ottawa River, are profound. What we have here, Mr. Speaker, is an attempt to isolate, to render politically steril a very large number of Canadians. They have been isolated in the attempt to make them politically neutral. Some people think that doing this will ensure that Ministers receive impartial advice, notwithstanding the personal opinions of the public servants working for them. These, then are the basic arguments which have been used to justify the denial of free expression to so many Canadians.

We have seen, Mr. Speaker, that the scope of these limitations is profound. What we must ask ourselves now is, first, will these limitations have the effect we want them to have, that is rendering the Public Service completely neutral and impartial; and, second, are there no alternatives to the severe and capricious limitations now imposed? What about the argument that public servants must not participate in the political process, because this would allow them to use their official positions to promote their personal political philosophies? Are we to assume that the only people who have a political philosophy are those who are active members of a political party? Preventing party membership will not sterilize the minds of public servants. Just as there are active members of political parties, although I am sure none in this House, who have no discernible political philosophy aside from self-interest, we are all aware from recent example of just how profoundly the political philosophies of supposedly neutral public servants have affected the development of public policy.

The fact is that whether public servants belong to a political party or not, their political philosophies will remain intact. Preventing them from speaking, or from participating in the political process will not stop them from thinking. It is naive, to the point of gullibility, to assume that all political views, or even the most important political allegiances, are revealed by party membership or by outspoken public comment. It is true that the public and Ministers have rights here. They have the right not to the illusion that public servants have no political opinions. Instead, they have the right to know what those opinions are, so that they may know if those views are biasing their judgment. There is no protection for the public in a muzzled Public Service, only an increased chance for the unobstrusive influence of their personal, hidden political views. The open admission of political affiliation is the clearest guarantee that Ministers will be able to judge the motives of their public servants when they give their advice. With the restoration of political rights to public servants, and openly declared political affiliation, any public servant with active party affiliation will be constrained to behave in an objective manner when dealing with the public, to demonstrate that political bias does not exist.

Nothing in the restoration of political rights to public servants removes the burden on the Public Service of behaving in a non-partisan manner in the execution of public duties. The rules requiring non-partisan, unbiased behaviour in their dealings with the public would still apply, and might be easier to enforce, because political affiliation, and thus possible bias, would be clearer. There is nothing unethical in expressing a political opinion. The only threat to our ethical standards occurs if those opinions, whether privately held or publicly expressed, result in bias in the performance of official duties. Certainly, if there is bias in the actions of a public servant, it must be dealt with. The essential question is whether public servants will act to implement government policy in a non-partisan manner, not whether they have personal views on politics or political philosophy.

Of course, it is essential that Canadians be assured their treatment by public servants will not be coloured by their political affiliation. They should also be assured that their treatment is not affected by their sex, their race, their language, or their ethnic origin. We make every effort to restrict discrimination on these grounds. We have laws and regulations prohibiting discrimination on these grounds, not prohibiting people from having bigoted views because that is impossible, but regulations which prohibit public servants from manifesting any such views in the execution of their public functions. Those who feel they have been poorly treated by public servants have means for appeal. Political descrimination by public servants can and should be handled in the same way. If we implement some of the changes suggested by the Starr-Sharp report, then there will be additional mechanisms in place which can review the behaviour of public servants to ensure that political bias is no more prevalent than linguistic, racial or sexual bias. We expect the Public Service to treat members of the public with the dignity they deserve, regardless of sex, race, age, language or ethnic origin—or political affiliation. We must treat public servants with the same dignity, the same recognition of their rights, as long as they do their job.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, may I say that I support the suggestions of the Hon. Member for Ottawa-Vanier and, as I said before in this House, the recommendation of the D'Avignon Committee which he referred to and which would divide the Public Service basically on the British model into three categories, giving full political rights to most public servants, particularly those unionized, limited political rights to those in the centre, and basically status quo for those at senior levels.

Mr. Mike Cassidy (Ottawa Centre): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to participate in this debate. It is now the third time the matter has been debated in the last six months in the House of Commons. I hope that early action will be taken by the Government to ensure that Private Members' Hour can be devoted to other subjects besides the subject of political rights. Because the Hon. Member for Ottawa West (Mr. Baubney) has spoken eloquently on this subject, this time the subject has been proposed by the Hon. Member for Ottawa-Vanier (Mr. Gauthier), supported by myself as the Hon. Member for Ottawa Centre, it indicates there is all Party support for the concept of implementing the promises made by all three Parties on political rights. The message should surely now be conveyed and thus I hope the Parliamentary Secretary will convey to the Minister that all sides are getting a bit impatient about delays when action could and should have been taken previously.

I commend the Hon. Member for Ottawa-Vanier for introducing this subject. It is in my recollection the first time the matter has been raised in this House by a Liberal Member since the Liberals promised in the election campaign of 1980 to support the concept of political rights for people in the Public Service. The Liberals forgot that promise when they were in office from 1980 to 1984. It is my great regret that when the Hon. Member for Regina East (Mr. de Jong) put forward specific legislation to provide political rights for people in the Public Service, it was my predecessor, the Member for Ottawa Centre, a Liberal, who was instrumental on more than one occasion in talking out that legislation and indicating that far from supporting the position taken by the Member for Ottawa-Vanier and apart from the right to put up lawn signs, he did not think that people in the Public Service should have increased political rights.

The Liberals have been equivocal on this. I hope and trust that the Member for Ottawa-Vanier is expressing the views of all in his Party. I certainly welcome the commitment that he has made on a number of occasions now that he is sitting in Opposition.

I would comment on one thing he mentioned in his presentation. He stated that he favours the D'Avignon Report approach in terms of providing for political rights for members of the Public Service, but doing so on a qualified basis. I would say that a qualified basis, which puts the rights of any Public Service employee at question, that they must have proof or possibly risk being challenged, is a situation which could still leave many people in the Public Service feeling insecure and unsure of their rights. That is why I have come to the view that as far as members of bargaining units are concerned, they should unequivocally enjoy full political rights. We can rely on them to be responsible in exercising those rights should they happen to be in a position which has any sensitivity, but they should unequivocally enjoy the same political rights as any other person in Canadian society.

A qualified approach, similar to the D'Avignon Report might conceivably then apply to the 10 or 15 per cent of members of the Public Service of Canada who are in managerial, supervisory or exempt positions. I would like to avoid a situation where that qualified business of "do you have rights or not" would apply to everybody, including a truckdriver, a carpenter, a secretary or a statistical clerk in Stats-Canada. I would like to see that avoided.

There is real urgency in this debate. I think the mandate of any Government begins to unwind after its first year, and we have had that now.

A firm promise was made on this subject by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) who was then Leader of the Opposition during the course of the election campaign. He was quite unequivocal in terms of making his promises. It seems to me that if this matter is allowed to wait for too long, Mr. Speaker, we could face the situation where the promise will be forgotten. The now Prime Minister said during the summer of 1984:

> We believe that this matter should be addressed by an all-Party parliamentary committee in consultation with Public Service organizations and we believe the situation can be quickly resolved.

Further he stated that the restrictions on Public Service political activity, and I quote:

> —are unnecessary and likely not justifiable under the terms of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

I do not agree with the Prime Minister on every point but I agreed with his judgment at that time. I welcomed the promise he made. When I stood for Parliament in my riding of Ottawa Centre this was a key issue among my constituents. I made a personal pledge to continue to work for legislation to ensure that Section 32 of the Public Service Employment Act is changed and that members of the Public Service of Canada do enjoy full political rights. I made this commitment not just to my constituents but also to people in the Public Service across Canada.

We are not just talking about 220,000 people who are governed by the Public Service Employment Act. The PSCA has influence far beyond that. The Member for Ottawa West mentioned that employees of Crown corporations and people in National Defence bring the total number to something around 600,000 who are tinged or affected by the Public Service Employment Act. He might have mentioned that close to one worker in every four in Canada works in some level of Government, for a Crown corporation or for some other quasi-governmental body. Federal legislation in this, as in other matters affecting labour standards for public employees, has an effect on legislation affecting provincial and other Government employees as well. We are talking about a potential impact that could touch 2.5 million workers across the country, depending on what kind of leadership is being offered by the federal Government.

As far as my own concern about this, in the first place I strongly support providing full political rights for public employees. I have done this for a long time. I first began raising this issue when I was an Ontario MPP 12 or 13 years ago. My first private Members' Bill on the subject was introduced in the Ontario legislature around 1974 and debated around that time, Mr. Speaker. I have been raising this issue in whatever forum I could because I think it is important that people in the Public Service not be treated as second class citizens.

More recently, this matter was raised on April 15 in a resolution I put forward to have the matter of political rights referred to the Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Estimates and debated in this House. I regret to say that while it was debated, it was subsequently talked out by Members of the Progressive Conservative Party. The resolution at that time read:

Public Service Employment Act

That the Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Estimates be empowered to study the question of granting to federal public employees the full political participation enjoyed by other Canadians and, that the Committee report its finding to the House no later than June 28, 1985.

On September 13, I took the opportunity to raise the matter anew although I could not debate it. My colleague from Regina East debated it on my behalf representing the New Democratic Party. Again the matter was bogged down when Government Members suggested that the date we suggested be shifted to was perhaps inappropriate.

I raised this matter in early April in connection with the Ontario election. A number of people who are federal public employees were finding that the lack of political rights was causing them problems. One, a Transport Canada employee, has subsequently had to resign his position on the executive of a local riding association at the risk of otherwise losing his job. When the Parliamentary Secretary suggested, as I understand it, on September 13 that this was not really a matter of grave urgency because we had four years to sort it out, or three years to the next election, I wished I could have risen then to remind him that many provincial elections will take place in a very short time. All three prairie provinces are expecting to have elections within the next year or so. Quebec may be calling an election within a month of the election of its new Premier and leader of the Parti Quebecois. Ontario could have an election at any time. Certainly after two years from last May one would imagine that open season on an election in Ontario is going to be present. Federal employees working in provinces representing two-thirds of our population could find themselves still circumscribed in elections that are due to come very shortly.

This matter is urgent and cannot wait to the very end of the mandate. Let me say to the Parliamentary Secretary, and through him to his Minister, that if the Government is prepared to bring forward legislation, which can be debated here and referred to a legislative committee, by all means let it be done. Let it be done now. I am prepared to work on it. I am sure my colleagues from Ottawa-Vanier and Ottawa West are. Others have expressed support. Do not put us off by promises of early action, such as I had from the Minister when I raised this matter in Question Period in early April, by saying he hoped to have a report to the House very soon and then use it as a means of obfuscation or delay. This matter cannot and should not wait. I say to the Government be aware as well, and I recognize that I have some potential conflict in this, that this matter is going to come up in the Federal Court of Canada in a few weeks. Over the course of the summer, Justice Department lawyers and lawyers representing four members of the Public Service Alliance and myself have been resolving the nitty-gritties of the case so that the principles about whether restrictions on political rights violate the Charter of Rights and Freedoms can be discussed and rules upon by the Federal Court of Canada. Frankly, I would prefer to see a situation wherein the Government, having made a solemn pledge in its election campaign, fulfilled that pledge by bringing forth legislation, therefore possibly making the need for a court case nugatory. I would prefer to see that. I and other people as well have gone forward because of the fact, among other things, that the action which we had been led to expect from the Government had not yet come forward.

Recently I sat on the subcommittee of the Justice Committee looking at the question of equality rights. I made submissions with respect to that question and the implications of the particular section of the Charger which indicates that every individual is equal before and under the law and has the right to equal protection and equal benefit under the law without discrimination. As Hon. Members know, this is qualified only by such reasonable limits as can be demonstrably justified in a free and democratic society. If we legislate restrictions on senior policy analysts and Deputy Ministers, I think the courts will uphold those as being reasonable limits in a free and democratic society, but not for truck drivers, secretaries, mining inspectors in the Yukon or the vast range of people who work in the myriad employment of the Public Service of Canada.

In its brief before the equality committee, the Public Service Alliance made essentially the same points. This matter keeps coming up in one way or another because, to give them their credit, Public Service unions are not prepared this time to stand back and accept the promises made by Parties in the election campaign or to wait for something to happen. They are pressing hard. I am pressing hard. The Hon. Member for Ottawa-Vanier the Hon. Member for Ottawa West and other Hon. Members, particularly the Hon. Member for Gatineau (Mrs. Mailly), are concerned about the issue and are speaking positively about the need to take action to ensure that people in the Public Service are not treated in a second-class way. Of course, we now have a situation where all three Parties are in fact committed to the issue, even though the Liberal commitment is perhaps somewhat more ambiguous.

The President of the Treasury Board (Mr. de Cotret) initiated discussions with the Public Service unions on this subject back in March or April. It is offered, as an excuse for the delay, that there were some problems in terms of misunderstandings, if I can be gentle about it, over the question of the deindexing of Public Service pensions and over the fact that the Public Service Alliance was also a political body which had some internal decisions to make about who should become the President at its convention in June. Recently I spoke with its new President, Mr. Daryl Bean, who had been involved because he was a member of the executive of the Alliance before the change of presidency as well as afterward. I learned essentially that no specific proposals had been put forward by the Government to the Public Service unions saying what it would like to do. There has been some canvassing of opinion, but it is not necessary to do canvassing because through the joint council and other means the Public Service unions have made their positions very clear. If they want it spelled out again, it can be done in 24 hours. They can give us a memo and we will get it for them; we will simply give all the briefs which they presented before.

What is needed now is a response from the Government that within a month's time or within a short period of time it will come up with specific guidelines from which legislation can in fact be drafted. The unions are ready. They are frustrated because of the inaction on the part of the Government. They are also frustrated, as I am, by the thought that this is part of a series of measures which could be traded off against action on pensions, on the master contract or something like that. I have been assured in private by the President of the Treasury Board that that is not the case and that the Government's commitment in the election campaign stands. However, the actions of the Government argue otherwise and suggest that it is in fact holding back until it gets action on these other areas. Since this is a matter of fundamental right, I say quite strongly that that is unacceptable and should not be tolerated, particularly in view of the fact that the discussions and negotiations in those other areas have taken perhaps longer than the Government initially expected.

In conclusion I would say that we need to maintain momentum on this subject. My colleagues and I are prepared to continue to give it Private Members' time and to raise it by other means in the House of Commons and in committee. If the Government indicates that it is acting now, so be it; let it go ahead. If not, we will have to find a way to maintain the momentum. My proposal in the spring that the Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Estimates look at the matter is a way of maintaining momentum. The Government rejected it at the time by talking it out.

The resolution of the Hon. Member for Ottawa-Vanier today simply asks us in the House to reaffirm the position which all of us took through our political Parties and through our Leaders during the course of the election campaign a year ago. If we were prepared to make that affirmation a year ago, then the Government should decide at this point in time, at five to six, that no further speaker will rise. I appeal to all Hon. Members not to rise to speak to this matter but to allow it to come to a vote. At least that would give an indication of our support to the Government and reinforce its determination to act in line with the promises it made.

The resolution of the Hon. Member reads as follows:

That, in the opinion of this House, the Government should consider the advisability of amending the Public Service Employment Act and other related statutes in consequence thereof, in order to permit greater participation in the political process by federal public servants than is now allowed under the aforementioned statutes.

It is a weak resolution, but I think the intent would be clear if it were adopted. I call upon all Hon. Members to adopt this motion now.

Mr. Doug Lewis (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, I listened with great interest to the speeches of the preceding Hon. Members, especially that of the Hon. Member for Ottawa West (Mr. Daubney) who put forward a good and well-reasoned argument as to the position which should be taken on the question of political rights for public servants. I think it is fair to comment upon the remarks of the Hon. Member for Ottawa-Vanier (Mr. Gauthier). I compliment him on proceeding once again with this issue. I appreciate that that is somewhat easier now that he is in the Opposition and able to bring these matters forward as a Private Member. He is not as stymied as he was as a member of a Party in Government which never really got around to doing anything with respect to political rights for public servants.

As far as the remarks of the Hon. Member for Ottawa Centre (Mr. Cassidy) are concerned, I note with interest that he is following our election promises diligently. I am sure he sees the definite progress which is being made on all fronts. I assure him that some progress has been made on this front. However, it does not suit our purpose to bring forward discussions which were held with the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. de Cotret) in private and to lay them on the floor of the House of Commons as part of the daily debate. I will not comment upon those negotiations. I do not think it is fair or appropriate to do so. I appreciate his comments with respect to impending elections. I would like to set the record straight, however, with respect to the Province of Ontario. There is no possibiity of an election in this province because the provincial Liberal Party has sold out to the devil. Under the agreement reached and etched in stone, the Liberal Party, propped up by the NDP, will govern without any fear of having to go to the people. I appreciate that its Members are quite concerned about that, financially and politically. I think the record should be set straight on that score.

With respect to the question of Private Members' Hour, it is fair to say that we treat it as an opportunity for Hon. Members to participate in debate and get on the record. I would not say that I resent the allegation that we are talking it out, but I would rather make it positive by saying that the Hon. Member will know that I asked one of his colleagues if someone on that side wished to speak. We made sure that the Hon. Member for Ottawa Centre had an opportunity. I have talked with my colleagues, and the Hon. Member for Ottawa West will confirm that we wanted to ensure that Hon. Members representing Public Service constituencies had an opportunity to put their views on the record. That is the process of Private Members' hour.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Charest): The hour provided for the consideration of Private Members' Business has now expired.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 46 deemed to have been made.

Adjournment Debate

PUBLISHING INDUSTRY—PRENTICE-HALL COMPANY TAKEOVER. (B) GOVERNMENT POLICY

Ms. Lynn McDonald (Broadview-Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, last week in the House I raised a very important question about the proposed takeover of Prentice-Hall Publishing by an American non-publishing company called Gulf and Western.

This is a rather complicated issue because it is an indirect acquisition of some of the concerns which have been raised by the publishing community having to do with the fact of a publishing company being taken over by a firm not in publishing which will not have the interests of publishing at heart, quite apart from the issue of American or Canadian control. Nevertheless, the Government has made a commitment to deal with indirect acquisitions. It has made a very firm commitment to increase Canadian control in the publishing sector. This was made by the Minister of Communications (Mr. Masse) on July 6 and I very much welcomed that statement. It is a concern that in fact there really will be implementation of the principles that were declared at that time.

Let me quote from the Minister's statement and it is here. I will read it quickly:

> This policy confirms the government's commitment, as enunciated in the Investment Canada Act, to maintaining Canada's cultural sovereignty and supporting the economic viability of the nation's crucially important cultural industries.

Let me continue:

> In particular, the Government recognizes that the Canadian publishing industry must have opportunities to grow within its own domestic market and that foreign investment should not be allowed to jeopardize such development.

That is a very important matter in an industry which is largely under foreign control; largely under American control.

Concerning direct investment, the Minister stated, and here I am quoting again:

> The Government will look with favour on proposals to establish new businesses or to acquire directly existing businesses, whether Canadian or foreign controlled, provided the investment is through a joint venture with Canadian control. For direct ecquisitions of foreign-controlled businesses, allowances will be possible if the divestiture of control to Canadians occurs within a reasonable period of (two years) at a fair market price.

Indirect acquisitions will be considered case by case, and again that is a question of divestiture.

The Government's policy is very clear. What we are concerned about is why it is not acting. This question of Prentice-Hall has been before the Government for nearly a year and there have been extensive delays in dealing with it.

I note that there are three other cases of a similar nature before Investment Canada: Ginn and Company; Copp Clark Pitman and New American Library.

The pressure from the arts community in the meantime is mounting. Let me quote from concerns which have been raised I think very cogently by the Association of Canadian Publishers. The Association of Canadian Publishers now looks forward to a directive by the Government which calls for the divestiture of these companies to Canadian owners. They are saying "act", and I think that is pretty clear.

The Writers' Union of Canada also has noted in terms of the subject matter why we need this control. Canadians have their own history. We have our own culture and we have our own view of others. Let me quote from their submission: "Only Canadian originated books (rather than Canadianized versions of American or British or French texts) can express those points of view and make them part of the consciousness of every Canadian".

It is a really important matter, Mr. Speaker. What we look forward to is a publishing industry in which textbooks which are the most lucrative part would also be Canadian originated, and that is not what is happening. We have companies like Prentice-Hall and others which we would like to have controlled by Canada so that the textbook publishing industries which does make money can then support other Canadian ventures.

Who is subsidizing, who is publishing the Canadian books right now? I am afraid it is not these big corporations, not like Prentice-Hall and certainly not under the control of Gulf and Western. That act of publishing comes from the small Canadian companies, and let me be specific. Up to 90 per cent of Canadian books are actually being published by smaller Canadian-owned companies. Specifically, in fiction it is 88 per cent, in biography it is 92 per cent, and in art books it is 87 per cent. The small companies are subsidizing this much more difficult field of publishing by paying small salaries and wages to their workers and by providing small royalties. In a healthy situation, we would have the textbook companies Canadian owned and the infrastructure being used to subsidize the production of important books for our Canadian culture, books that will not be bestsellers. That is how publishing works in other countries.

In other countries, the moneymakers support the production of scarcer, rarer kinds of books, books which are nevertheless extremely important for cultural purposes. That is what we must have in Canada. I call on the Government to act on this policy and not to hold back on all of these other cases as well.

I might add that the book distribution situation will run into the same problem. The merger of Classic Books with W. H. Smith will reduce opportunities for Canadian authors to have their books put on the market. We do not want a policy that is mere rhetoric. What we want is action. It is important that every case reflect this policy, and that the Government be true to the policy that it has enunciated on a case-by-case basis. Mere words are not enough.

Mrs. Monique Bernatchez-Tardif (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Regional Industrial Expansion): Mr. Speaker, may I say, first of all, that when the Investment Canada Act was still in the draft stage earlier this year, the Government clearly stated the importance it attached to the cultural sector. In fact, it demonstrated its awareness of sensitive areas in this sector in two sections of the Act.

First, Section 15. As the Hon. Member is aware, investments made by non-Canadians with a view to acquiring directly, in Canada, a business with assets of less than $5 million, or with a view to taking control, indirectly, of a business with assets of less than $50 million or with the intention of establishing a new business in this country, are not generally subject to review. The only exception to this rule has to do with investors who are associated with Canada's cultural heritage or national identity. The Government reserves the right to review such cases.

There are four sectors where the investment must be compatible with Canada's cultural heritage or national identity. Here they are: the publication, distribution or sale of books, magazines, periodicals or newspapers, either in printed form or readily assimilated by a processing machine; the production, distribution, sale or presentation of films or video materials; the production, distribution, sale or presentation of audio or video musical recordings; the edition, distribution of sale or musical compositions, either in printed form or readily assimilated by a processing machine.

Mr. Speaker, the second part of the Act which attests to our very special conviction in this field can be found under Section 20.

Section 20 lists the factors to be considered to decide whether or not an investment will likely be of significant benefit to Canada.

Subsection (e) of Section 20 requires the Government to take into account the compatibility of the investment with national industrial, economic and cultural policies, taking into consideration industrial, economic and cultural policy objectives enunciated by the Government or Legislature of any province likely to be significantly affected by the investment.

During oral question period last September 17, when the Hon. Member for Broadview-Greenwood (Ms. McDonald) asked the Minister of Regional Industrial Expansion whether the takeover of the Canadian publishing firm Prentice-Hall would be permitted, the Minister explained that the administrators had informed him that they would like some time to weigh the communications policy that his colleague, the Minister of Communications (Mr. Masse), made public some time ago. The Minister added: "Of course, we have facilitated their deliberations by giving them more time."

Mr. Speaker, I would now like to review the policy of the Canadian Government as concerns the Canadian book publishing industry.

Last July 6, the Minister of Communications announced this policy which states that: The Government feels that the existence of a vigourous book publishing and distribution industry controlled by Canadians is essential if this sector is to play its full role in the social and cultural life of Canada. The book publishing and distribution industry must benefit from policies aimed at protecting our cultural sovereignty, just as the newspapers, periodicals and broadcasting industries must do.

As concerns direct investments, according to the Minister, the Government will consider favourably any proposal to establish a new business or to acquire an existing business, whether it is controlled by Canadian or foreign interests, if this investment is projected for a joint venture under Canadian control.

In the case of the takeovers involving companies under foreign control, such transactions could be allowed if it is expected that Canadians will take control within a reasonable time, namely within two years, and at a fair market price. The Minister concluded that this policy is reflected in practice by the commitment made by this Government in the Act to establish Investment Canada to safeguard cultural sovereignty and support the financial position of cultural industries which play a vital role in our collective life. More particularly, the Government recognizes that the Canadian publishing industry must have the means to ensure its growth on the Canadian domestic market and that foreign investment must not prejudice this development.

TRUST COMPANIES—PIONEER TRUST—PLIGHT OF UNINSURED DEPOSITORS. (B) UNINSURED INCOME AVERAGING CERTIFICATES

Mr. Simon de Jong (Regina East): Mr. Speaker, on April 2, I asked the Minister of State for Finance (Mrs. McDougall) two questions. I asked her whether she was still negotiating with the Minister of Finance of the Province of Saskatchewan for federal government assistance to help bail out the uninsured depositors of Pioneer Trust of Regina which went into liquidation. She did not really have too much to say in the way of an answer. I then suggested to her in a supplementary question that financial institutions were falling down like ten pins. I pointed out that the CDIC stamp was placed on income averaging certificates, suggesting that they were covered by CDIC insurance when, in fact, they were not covered. I indicated that there should be some federal Government responsibility for those accounts.

At the time of my asking the question the Minister was quite incensed at my remark with respect to financial institutions falling down like ten pins. She claimed it was an irresponsible statement and added:

> I can tell you right now that financial institutions in this country are not falling like then pins, and I am producing results.

Since April 2, we have seen the Canadian Commercial Bank go under, the CCB mortgage investment go under, Northland is on the verge of going under and Western Capital Trust has gone under. Some estimates are that this will cost some $4 billion, either to CDIC or to the Government directly. Admittedly, from hindsight, I claim that financial institutions have been crashing around the Minister's ears since that time.

The point is that I am not happy with the Minister's answer. How much responsibility does the federal Government accept for the uninsured depositors of Pioneer Trust? Hon. Members will remember that the Government did bring in legislation and that some federal money has gone to uninsured depositors of Pioneer Trust. I assume, and I hope the Parliamentary Secretary will make this clear today, that the federal Government considered it had some responsibility because there were these averaging certificates of over five years which had the CDIC stamp of approval.

It is important, Mr. Speaker, that the Government quite explicitly explains to the House and to the public when it accepts responsibility and when it does not. It should be clear when it is going to bail out uninsured depositors and when it is not. I have asked the Minister this question in committees and on various occasions and I will continue to do that in the days and weeks ahead.

There seems to be, Mr. Speaker, no clear policy. One day the Government decides to bail out the uninsured depositors, as it has done with the Canadian Commercial Bank and as it is apparently committed to do if Northland should go under. The Government had a partial commitment to Pioneer and there are other financial institutions which have gone under like Western Capital Trust in which the uninsured depositors have not been bailed out at all. I have received phone calls and representations from people who have lost money. They were uninsured depositors in these various trust companies and financial institutions and they are hopping mad. They ask me why the Government is bailing out foreign depositors in the CCB and not them.

I believe it is important, Mr. Speaker, that the Government, as soon as possible, lay before the public of Canada what its policies are, when it will bail out uninsured depositors and when it will not. I think it is important for depositors and for financial institutions in this country to know the answer to that question. In particular, Mr. Speaker, for my own personal interest as well, and for the record, I reiterate my question: Did the Government bail out in part uninsured depositors in Pioneer Trust because it felt it had some responsibility because of the lack of regulation and enforcement of CDIC with respect to Pioneer Trust during its years in operation and, particularly, concerning the CDIC stamp on forwarding averaging annuity certificates which were really not covered by the Deposit Insurance Corporation?

Mr. Claude Lanthier (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, Pioneer Trust was plagued with serious financial problems because of the high percentage of outstanding mortgages in its loan portfolio. The company voluntarily wound up and a liquidation order was issued on February 15, 1985.

Shortly after the Pioneer Trust liquidation order, the Hon. Barbara McDougall, our capable Minister of State for Finance became interested in the situation of the 650 or so guaranteed income-averaging certificates issued for a period of more than five years, and therefore uninsured by the Canada Deposit Insurance Corporation.

Our able Minister was mainly concerned with the many representations received from holders of such certificates, who submitted that they were not aware their investments were not covered by deposit insurance.

The Minister's concerns with the circumstances relating to those guaranteed income averaging certificate holders led her to conclude with the Saskatachewan Governemnt a special arrangement compensating the uninsured depositors, and to introduce the legislation needed to enact such an arrangement.

The purpose of the legislation was to grant the Minister authority to take the necessary steps to have payments made to the holders of income averaging certificates for up to the $60,000 limit that would have been applicable had those certificates been insured. In other words, the purpose was for the Canadian Government to contribute to the package for compensating the uninsured depositors of Pioneer Trust up to an amount shifting them to the position they believed in good faith they were in, namely up to the well-known $60,000 limit.

The Province of Saskatchewan assumed responsibility for all payments amounting to $60,000 and over, owed under the guaranteed income average certificates. Moreover, the Saskatchewan Government also undertook to pay back principal and interests accrued at the time of liquidation order to all holders of US dollar deposits, and all holders of deposits in excess of $60,000 in savings or chequing accounts, guaranteed income certificates or registered retirement savings plans.

In view of the above circumstances, I believe it was reasonable for the Government of Canada to act in this way to make sure all holders of guaranteed income averaging certificates remain in the position they had every reason to believe they were in, namely that they were protected up to the well-known $60,000 limit. As I said, the action taken by the Canadian Government was part of a plan involving the Province of Saskatchewan as guarantor for all other uninsured deposits, including those with deposits exceeding $60,000.

Regardless of any reference to false representations, Mr. Speaker, it was a matter of being reasonable with people who acted in total good faith.

REGIONAL INDUSTRIAL EXPANSION—EMPLOYMENT OPPORTUNITIES IN CAPE BRETON

Mr. Lawrence I. O'Neil (Cape Breton Highlands-Canso): Mr. Speaker, I rise at this time to expand on a question I directed to the Minister of Regional Industrial Expansion (Mr. Stevens) last week. I have the honour of representing a constituency in Nova Scotia, Cape Breton Highlands-Canso, an area which includes some of our most impressive geography and certainly Canadians of outstanding good judgment, having chosen to elect me to Parliament in September, 1984.

Regrettably, Mr. Speaker, it is also a region of high unemployment. This is a problem which has been faced by successive generations of my constituents. The previous Government did nothing to address the problem in a meaningful way. Our Government has taken important measures to effect full-time employment for my constituents. The Minister, in his response to my question, underscored these incentives, which include the Cape Breton tax credit and the topped-up IRDP assistance. These are generous measures. However, it appears that more must be done.

The urgency of the situation is highlighted by the fact that employees laid off from the heavy water plants really have no place to apply for new jobs at this time. I was most pleased to hear from the Minister his optimistic projections for new employment opportunities. The Minister is trying very hard and that is not disputed. Nor is the difficulty of finding a solution disputed.

This problem has been faced by successive federal and provincial Governments. However, I believe there are some other meaningful initiatives which can be taken at this time to create long-term employment. It is easy to complain that results have not been achieved. The real test of leadership for any Member of Parliament is not solely his ability to identify problems, it is also reflected in his ability to present solutions. That is the challenge which was not met by the previous Government. Today I will present a partial package which outlines some opportunities for new employment in my constituency. Exploitation of these opportunities will require the targeted expenditure of money by all levels of Government. I do not believe these initiatives will result in a net financial loss to the Government of Canada. Many of the people who will benefit from these expenditures presently receive incomes from one level of Government or another. In short, I am speaking about an investment by the Government of Canada, a good investment which will yield benefits for my constituents and, therefore, Canada.

In accordance with a general principle of common sense, we should first look for new economic opportunities by further utilizing our natural resources. In keeping with that bias, the following is suggested. We have an excellent environment for forest regeneration and therefore I am proposing that a greatly enhanced forest management program must be put in place. In addition to putting hundreds to work planting trees and harvesting old and decaying stock, we will be securing the raw material for the region's major industrial employer, Stora Forest Industries. We will therefore be securing existing jobs and facilitating corporate planning. Who knows, maybe a more sensible approach to our forests will mean expansion of those companies who use our forests. Perhaps another newsprint machine is possible.

We must consider the further utilization of waste wood as a fuel, perhaps to heat our institutions. Such a program would require wood chips and would put people now out of work back to work in the woods, for example. We must also view opportunities for further expanding the Strathlorne Nursery, a source of tree seedlings which we require for an enhanced forest management program.

In the fishery we have opportunities to improve our fish quality, thereby adding to the value of our exports and permitting a greater reinvestment in our communities. We must further enhance the small crafts and harbours' programs so our fishermen will have the best possible facilities for harvesting the sea's wealth. We must be sure that our fish are further processed here and get away from exporting semi-processed product. We must examine the potential for utilizing even more species.

In the tourism industry there are greater opportunities for lengthening the season. Presently it is not uncommon for an operator to exist on a 90-day season. Surely we can improve upon this. I advocate increased spending on promotion and the enhancement of our tourism facilities and services.

The agricultural sector is growing in importance and its contribution to the economy of Antigonish County alone is $8 million. That is an impressive achievement over the last 10 or 15 years.

There are other specific measures that can be taken to achieve permanent employment. For example, I advocate the construction of a coal fired electrical generating station at the Strait of Canso. We, in Nova Scotia, have a desperate need for new electrical capacity and we must move away from the utilization of oil. In addition to putting in industry at the Strait of Canso, we will be putting miners in industrial Cape Breton to work.

I advocate the construction of an underwater institute at the Strait of Canso to complement the Nova Scotia Nautical Institute presently under construction.

I advocate the further expansion of the Strathlorne nursery, which has already been mentioned. I advocate the construction of the Grassy Island Museum in Canso, a remote part of my riding. I advocate the upgrading of the highway so that the tourism potential of this region may be further utilized.

The Cheticamp harbour must be upgraded. Millions of pounds of fish are landed there each year, much of which is trucked out. There is an opportunity for making Cheticamp the boat service centre for the Gulf region. It is a natural initiative and one that must be strongly supported. We must put capital in our shipbuilding industry.

We must further develop the potential of the Mulgrave harbour as an offshore service centre, and for international trade. We must consider the relocation of public service employment to this high unemployment region, something that we call decentralization.

These initiatives, Mr. Speaker, will require the expenditure of money, but this money will be a wise investment of our region. In promoting these we must, at all times, keep in mind the importance of being cautious and realistic.

For decades my constituents have had false hopes held in front of them, called carrots. It is time for that to end, for results to be delivered and for us to be totally realistic.

[Translation]

Mrs. Monique Bernatchez-Tardif (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Regional Industrial Expansion): Mr. Speaker, Cape Breton has a workforce of some 69,000 which represents 18 percent of that of Nova Scotia as a whole. Out of that figure, 14,000 are now jobless, and this accounts for a 20-percent unemployment rate. It is therefore essential that Cape Breton be the target of all industrial efforts.

The Canadian Government strategy for Cape Breton encompasses the following:

A grant package, intended to provide Cape Breton native investors and others with the incentive to apply the human and financial resources to the creation of long-term jobs;

An advisory committee to ensure the monitoring of tax incentives and recommendations on long-term job creation; and, finally,

Co-operation with the Provinces to ensure co-ordination and efficiency.

The Federal Development Bank has a program offering seminars for informing laid-off AECL employees on how to set up a business. Some of these employees have shown an interest in Cape Breton.

The RIE, the Cape Breton Development Corporation and Skita are now working together to ensure coordination in the promotion of efforts to help Cape Breton.

[English]

The Minister is looking forward to receiving the report of the Cape Breton advisory committee expected to be delivered to the federal and provincial Governments later this month. While the advisory committee is looking at long term economic development issues, the federal Government has done much to address the immediate needs of Cape Breton's unemployed. Through the ongoing and special programs of a large number of federal Departments and agencies, thousands of jobs have been created in Cape Breton to help ease the immediate crisis of unemployment.

Canada Employment and Immigration programs have created 2,500 short-term jobs in Cape Breton in 1985. Devco's coal division has put roughly 1,200 people to work on projects this year.

The Department of National Defence programs have resulted in short-term jobs for 140 Cape Breton youths. Construction at the Coast Guard college is creating about 1,200 person weeks of employment. Another Coast Guard project, particularly the wharf expansion and transit shed construction in North Sydney will create 1,500 person weeks of employment. Taken together, this will amount to about six months work for roughly 108 people.

Federal support this fiscal year for projects under two federal provincial forestry agreements will produce over 6,240 weeks of work for Cape Bretoners to improve the Island's forest resource, the equivalent of six months work for 250 people.

Much of the work being done under the major program of CDIC and Devco will improve the infrastructure base and quality of life in Cape Breton and make the Island more attractive to industries capable of creating long-term jobs. This Government will help Cape Breton.

ALLOCATION OF TIME TO CONSIDER SECOND READING STAGE OF BILL C-70

Hon. Jake Epp (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I move, seconded by the Minister of State for Canadian Wheat Board (Mr. Mayer):

That, in relation to Bill C-70, an Act to amend the Family Allowances Act, 1973, one sitting day shall be allotted to the consideration of the second reading stage of the said Bill; and

That 15 minutes before the expiry of the time provided for the consideration of government business on the above-mentioned sitting day, any proceedings then before the House shall be interrupted, if necessary, for the purpose of this Order and, in turn, every question necessary to dispose of the said stage of the said Bill shall be put forthwith and successively, without further debate or amendment.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the time has come to have a vote on Bill C-70, and that is why this motion is before the House. For many years Members of Parliament have argued that when a Budget is introduced in the House of Commons and is passed after six days of full debate, the Bills which flow from it should also be passed after a reasonable period of time.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Epp (Provencher): That position has been taken by the very people who are now exercising their lungs and not their heads. The point is that this budget provision has been approved by the House, and it is time to get on with its examination in committee.

One might even say that with a majority of 211 seats, even more consideration should be given to the Opposition. That would be a valid observation, if the Opposition were responsible. However, opposition Members have shown very clearly on the record that they have no intention of being either responsible or co-operative or that they do not want to make the House work. For example, the Liberal spokesman for social policy is quoted in an article which appeared in la presse on September 11 as saying that he intended to hold up the House to the end of this calendar year on this Bill. That is not responsible opposition. In his very first statement in the debate on this Bill, the Hon. Member for Davenport (Mr. Caccia) said: "Mr. Speaker, it will not be easy to say something novel in this debate". I am not quite sure whether that statement referred to the quality of his speech or to whether he had anything to say. However, I will accept either argument from him.

I think the most significant statement was made yesterday by the NDP House Leader. If we look at yesterday's Hansard, we find that that comment is missing. I was here when he said it, as was the Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Dick). However, it is quite clear in the "blues" and it is quite clear in my recollection and in the recollection of the Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Privy Council and other Members who were here at the time. Although it does not appear in Hansard, I will quote it from the "blues":

You can applaud, Jake, but you will get nothing through from now until Christmas.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I interrupt the Minister, with respect, to remind him of the citations which indicate that quotations from Hansard are appropriate but that quotations from the "blues" are not.

Mr. Epp (Provencher): Mr. Speaker, I thank you for that observation. I thought I might be corrected, but I notice that while NDP Members might not like the method, they have not denied the words.

Mr. Blaikie: We have more respect for Parliament than to debate the "blues".

Mr. Epp (Provencher): When we look at editorial comment on the issue, it is also very clear that the time has come to vote on this Bill. For example, I quote in part an editorial which appeared in The Globe and Mail on September 18:

And the Liberals, who fathered so many of the imperfections and irrationalities of the present system, remain creatures of their past. The Tories have cause . . . to lead—

In addition, I should like to refer to an editorial which appeared in The Toronto Star, a newspaper which is known to support our policies from time to time. In part the September 20, 1985 editorial reads:

The intent of the reforms is to get more bang for the taxpayer's buck by giving more to those who need it most and less to the rest. That's a good idea at any time; it's a particularly good idea now when the economy is sluggish and government revenues aren't growing very fast and when there's a $34 billion federal deficit.

Their argument is that we have not gone far enough and that we should go further; that is their criticism of the Government, rather than what we are doing. Also I refer to an article which appeared in The Chronicle Herald of Halifax, which reads:

Family allowance has been deindexed before, fully in 1976 and partly, in accordance with six and five, in 1982. This tinkering was mostly done by the Liberals, who would now deny anyone else the chance to make the system work better.

The evidence is in. The evidence is in, on the floor of the House of Commons. The evidence is in, in that the Budget has been passed. The evidence is in, in that the Budget had a six-day debate. The evidence is in from editorial comment. More than anything else, the evidence is in from their own mouths.

The people of Canada voted for change on September 4, 1984.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Epp (Provencher): They voted for a Government that would act, and we are acting. Mr. Speaker, I say to them, they can shout, they can dance, they can be concerned, they can do what they will but the Liberals know that they were the ones who fully deindexed at one point, in 1982, on the basis of the six and five. They also know that from their record they stand condemned and should say very little about this.

• (1110)

I have a little more patience with the NDP, although only a little more. That is because they have the ability and the right of impunity to say whatever they will, knowing that, in the first place the Canadian people will never give them the responsibility to carry out that which they say they will do. So I give them a little bit of time and I give them also a little bit of respect because they have not had an opportunity to do what the Liberals did.

Lastly, Mr. Speaker, the example I would give regarding the motion is the mother of Parliament itself. Many people in this House have sat on parliamentary reform. All of us, including the Hon. Member for Winnipeg-Birds Hill (Mr. Blaikie), have argued in part that we should follow the British system. That is, that Government should have the right, after it has brought in a Throne Speech, after it has brought in a Budget, after it has brought in its legislative priorities and plans, within a period of time to say these are the Bills we will debate, this is the period of time we will give. There is a general agreement in the mother of Parliaments that that is the approach. Mr. Speaker, that is what he and others have been recommending in the last parliamentary reform package. That is what has been recommended time after time in the years we have been here, and I say to the Opposition, oppose if you have a better idea. Don't oppose without any reason, or without any rationale or without any idea whatsoever as to how long you want to keep going.

I say, Mr. Speaker, that it is time that the Canadian people had the right to take a very clear look at this House, and vote through their representatives. I suggest that that vote take place immediately.

Mr. Jean-Claude Malépart (Montreal-Sainte-Marie): Mr. Speaker, it is really deplorable and disappointing—

[English]

Mr. Speaker: The Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Epp) on a point of order.

Mr. Epp (Provencher): I apologize for interrupting the Hon. Member. The only point I want to make, I said that it was not in Hansard. We have double checked and find at page 6866 that it is not only in Hansard but obviously—

Mr. Speaker: Thank you.

[Translation]

Mr. Malépart: Mr. Speaker, it is really deplorable and disappointing that the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Epp), after four days of debate, is doing the "dirty work" the Prime Minister has asked him to do, in other words, gagging the Opposition and presenting a motion of closure.

Mr. Speaker, after four days, this debate has only just started. The Government has not told us why it is in such a hurry to adopt a Bill that will not become effective until January 1.

The Government has not answered our questions. Why did the Minister of Finance (Mr. Wilson), the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) and the Minister of National Health and Welfare not transfer the $15 million they are going to squeeze out of families with children in 1985-86 and the $40 million in 1986-87 to the child tax credit, by increasing the child tax credit and raising the cut-off point for families with modest and low incomes? Mr. Speaker, the Government has failed to answer that question. Why is it trying to gloss over the cuts in family allowance increases starting in 1986, when everybody knows that family allowance payments benefit poor families and families on modest and low incomes, since these payments are taxable? Nor has the Minister of National Health and Welfare told us why he is going to wait until 1987 to reduce the Child Tax Exemption, a measure that benefits those with higher incomes.

If we refer to the Blue Book signed by the previous speaker, Mr. Epp—I think it was Mr. Epp—and if we look at the table on page 17 under Child Tax Exemption, we see that families whose incomes are less than $10,000 receive no money at all under the Child Tax Exemption; families whose incomes are less than $20,000 receive a tax exemption of $203; but families with an income of $80,000 receive $363.

Mr. Speaker, the Government has failed to answer the question. It does not want this matter to be discussed. I can see why the Prime Minister is ashamed of his Bill. I can see why the Prime Minister wants to rush through the House a piece of legislation that is going to hurt families with modest and low incomes.

Mr. Speaker, on the weekend I met a number of mothers, and I think many Hon. Members will remember what these mothers told me and what my mother used to say. Children used to ask their parents, and many Members will remember such moments, for $5 or $10 to buy school supplies, or a boy might want to buy a hockey stick or a pair of skates and a girl a pair of boots, and their mothers would say: Wait until the middle of the month when I get my family allowance cheque. Even today, Mr. Speaker, I meet families in the riding of Rosemont, a Conservative riding, in the riding of Hochelaga-Maisonneuve, also a Conservative riding, in the riding of Gamelin which is also a Conservative riding . . . Even today, mothers tell us it is often very humiliating when they have to ask the teacher whether they can put off paying for some school activity for a week or two, until the family allowance cheque arrives.

Mr. Speaker, I do not understand why the Prime Minister, who was not brought up in a rich family . . . I can understand people who were raised in a rich family, where the family allowance cheque was not important. However, for the vast majority of families in Quebec, the family allowance cheque was often the only budget that the mothers administered, because the father kept all the money. Mr. Speaker, very often . . . Some Hon. Members will remember, for instance those from Quebec, that when they were little, they got a pair of winter boots because their mother could count on her family allowance cheque. Very often, girls were able to take part in activities like the majorettes as soon as their mothers got their family allowance cheques, Mr. Speaker. And they used to have large families in Quebec, and some of those families had food on the table thanks to their family allowance cheque!

I suppose the Hon. Member for Hochelaga-Maisonneuve (Mr. Desrosiers) is going to say: $4 a month is peanuts. Mr. Speaker, when families do not have enough money to start with, it is not peanuts. How can anyone understand why the Government wants to squeeze $55 million out of families with low incomes? The Government could have done what all the agencies recommended, and that was to reduce the tax exemption which benefits the rich and increase the tax credit as much as possible, and thus give families on modest and low incomes a bit more. How are people going to believe that the Government had no trouble finding $1.2 billion to help companies and individuals with bank deposits of over $60,000? These people knew the risks they were taking, Mr. Speaker. Why are all those other taxpayers, all those families going to have to pay for the mistakes made by this Government?

Mr. Speaker, I think it is unconscionable that after only four days of debate, the Government should decide to use closure. I can assure the Government that although it may be able to manipulate the proceedings and try to gag the Opposition here in the House, and I can also assure the Minister of social injustice of Canada that he will not be able to gag the Opposition in the streets. There will be a meeting tomorrow in Montreal. Tomorrow, Quebec families are going to start organizing in all ridings, and the Prime Minister will not be able to manipulate and gag these people. The debate will shift to the streets, to all kitchens and to the offices of Members, and the social injustice minister will always have in mind the shamelessness he displayed this morning, he who under normal circumstances, like all previous Ministers of National Health and Welfare, Liberals and Tories alike, ought to stand up in the House to defend the interests of poor families and elderly Canadians. For the first time in Canada's history a Minister of National Health and Welfare acts as a hatchet man against families.

Mr. Speaker, the former Minister of Fisheries and Oceans had the courage to resign. Considering his pitiful performance in the debate on deindexation of old age security pensions and his failure to speak up against taxes on prescription drugs and additional levies on families with children, the Minister of National Health and Welfare should have the courage to tender his resignation and ask for another portfolio. Mrs. Bégin would have never put up with that, she would have resigned rather than do the dirty work of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Wilson). The social injustice minister can be satisfied with himself, his $40,000 and his driver. He has it made and could not care less about others, but one of these days he will have to face up to the music when all those families come up here to challenge him.

Mr. Speaker, when we recall the Government promises we understand why the word of the Prime Minister does not mean much any more. The Government did make a commitment not to reduce the deficit at the expense of families, but after listening to the Minister of National Health and Welfare we have to ask what his word is worth today. Nothing. Before consulting with the various interest groups, the Minister of National Health and Welfare rose before the parliamentary committee to ask: Would the interest groups prefer that all funds be redistributed in the form of tax credits? Yes, they said. So he did exactly the opposite.

I see that my time is running out, Mr. Speaker, so I want to tell Hon. Members that for now this may be the end of the debate in the House, but I can assure them that I will take to the streets and strongly denounce both the social injustice minister and the Prime Minister.

• (1120)

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have an opportunity to speak in this debate. It is my first chance to speak but, unfortunately, in so doing, I am not speaking on the issue itself because the Government has now introduced a time allocation motion. This is a motion which is known to most of the world as a closure motion.

It is interesting to note that in the opening of his speech the Minister mentioned that the former Liberal Government used this measure often in its term of office. That is quite true. It is also true that we New Democrats have often not spoken against the principle of time allocation because we agree that there must be some mechanism to ensure that there is orderly debate and some conclusion to debate in the House of Commons.

However, with regard to the particular issue before us, we are talking about a fundamental change in the universality of social programs in the country. The Government has slid over that point in debate. The Minister, in his long quotations from various newspapers, mentioned editorials from various parts of the country which spoke out in support of him. He did not mention those editorials which point out that the Government is, indeed, moving away from universality in this important area.

The attack on family allowances is just the beginning of the crack in the dam which we have in place to defend social programs in Canada. In his speech, the Minister spoke about the fact that we approved the Budget. With 211 Tory Members in the House of Commons we have to approve everything which is put forward. Let me remind the Minister that even though the House approved the Budget, the Government backed down with respect to the deindexing of old age pensions.

We have a right—an obligation—to stand up in the House of Commons to debate Bills and the philosophy behind them. We have a right to ensure that the public has an opportunity to know what is really in the legislation which the Government is presenting.

In defending his legislation, the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Epp) said that the money will be going from those who have a lot of it—the hypothetical banker in this nation—to peole who need it the most. That is the myth out there which is the foundation of the editorials from which the Minister has quoted. I would like to quote from another editorial. It is one which takes the opposite side. It is an editorial which appeared in yesterday's Winnipeg Free Press. I am sure the Minister is aware of it. This is an article written by Leonard Shifrin. First, it points out that the Government is again breaking another promise. The headline reads: "The Tories broke their word". The article points out that the Minister himself said that the Government would not be taking money from the old age pension, family allowances, et cetera, to reduce the deficit. The article further points out that in the long run, after a three-year period, it will not just be the middle-income earners, those with a fairly reasonable salary or those who are rich in Canada who will be losing the benefit of a fully indexed family allowance. It will be all Canadians who receive the family allowance, including those at the lowest level of the Canadian income scale. And the Government also plans to deindex the child tax credit which it is so fond of saying is the recipient of this money is going to be saved through the reduction to the full indexation of family allowances.

What the Government is doing is what we have always said is the dangerous thing about the move away from universality. It is a two-step operation. First, it reduces the dependency of middle-income earners on the family allowance by taking away the protection of full indexation. In other words, over a period of time the real money which the average woman will receive from the family allowance—and let's make no mistake about it, that money in most cases goes to the woman and is spent by her for the necessities of the family—will be worth less and less to that family. The reduction by 3 per cent a year of the real value of the family allowances means that it will provide for less and less of the basic necessities for food, clothing and other items for the children of that family. That is the first step.

The second step is to deindex the child tax credit, the money which goes to the poorest families in this land. We see that as dangerous, Mr. Speaker, because the Government will take away broad public support for family allowances by making it worth less to a large percentage of the population. After it has done that, three years down the road, it will take the protection from those who need it the most. That is something of which the public is not aware and that is why we need a full debate.

My colleague from the Liberal Party mentioned that we have had only four days' debate on this issue. That is not very much. This is an issue which is fundamentally changing the way we deal with universal programs in this country.

The Government failed in its first attack. It failed to deindex the old age pensions. The new frontal assault now is to attack family allowances. That is a dangerous precedent and it is very important that the public be aware of exactly what the Government is doing.

It is also just as important, Mr. Speaker, that we have a chance to hear from that same public. As the public becomes more and more aware of what the Government is doing, as it realizes this is not just a short-term cut-back to reduce the deficit, as it becomes aware that this is not an attempt to take money away from those who are rich to give to those who are poor, as the public becomes more and more aware of what is really happening, there will be more and more groups who will tell this Government not to deindex family allowances.

That is what happened in the pension debate. It became a national issue. It took some time to get it going but after one month of debate, after one month of petitions, and after various groups came to the House of Commons saying that the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) had broken his word, the message got through to the Government.

It is now one week since the debate started in this House on the deindexation of family allowances and the Government wants to take this legislation away from the House of Commons. We have televised debates and the people who are out there can find out what is really in the legislation and will have a chance to respond to their Members of Parliament and the Minister responsible for this legislation. They will have a chance to tell the Prime Minister that he has broken faith once more with the population of this country. But the Government wants to shuffle the legislation into some committee room. That goes against the whole intent of televising the debates of the House of Commons.

We want the public to know what is going on. We want the public to know not only what is going on but to come back to us and tell us that they want to protect family allowances, that they want to protect the universality of Government programs.

We built a social net in this country, and I give full credit to all three political Parties for building that social net over many, many years. Now we have a Government dedicated, in a sneaky, two-step fashion, to breaking down that social net.

I think it is very important that we not be limited, as we are today, to a two-hour debate. Members from all Parties should stand up for the right of the public to know what is really going on in this legislation. They should stand up and tell the people of Canada that this is not just something which will deindex family allowances with the money going to the poor. They should explain what is really happening three years down the road when that money is going to be taken away not only from the rich, from the bank president the Prime Minister is so fond of referring to, but from the very people who need it most.

There is a public clamour for this Government to stop deindexation of family allowances. Some of the groups who have come out in support of full indexation of family allowances include the National Anti-Poverty Organization and the National Advisory Committee on the Status of Women. I met with 15 different groups in Nova Scotia two weeks ago and not one of them wanted to see this Government move ahead on this proposal. I am asking this Government and Members of Parliament to let the public participate in this debate, not in a closed hearing room but in this House of Commons itself, so we have a chance to make sure people know and approve of what this Government is doing, because they do not.

Mr. Doug Lewis (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, I also appreciate the opportunity to engage in this debate. I want to tell the House that this speech has been six years in the making. I am not suggesting that is going to make it a better speech, but it is a speech I have waited six years to make.

I feel very strongly about the subject of how the time of the House is used. The House of Commons is a forum where we debate and decide, not denounce and delay. We were sent here to debate the issues of the day and decide how to deal with them. It is the job of the Government to consult, draft policy and legislation, and bring it in for debate. It is our job as Members of Parliament, and your job as Speaker, to make sure that the rules of debate which we have all agreed upon are observed. I appreciate that it is the job of the Opposition to review government legislation, attempt to improve it, and object and debate. They also, I suggest, may obstruct. But I also suggest to the Opposition that the sword of obstruction is a two-edged sword.

In 1982, my friend from the Liberal Party will remember, we rang the bells for 18 days—

Mr. Blaikie: Sixteen.

Mr. Lewis: —because of the odious omnibus Bill brought in by the Liberal Government. We suggested the Bill should be split and we shut down the House for 18 days.

Mr. Blaikie: Sixteen.

Mr. Lewis: The result was that public opinion was on our side and the Bill was eventually split almost exactly the way we suggested originally. That was a case for obstruction because the Bill was wrong and we knew the public would understand that. At that time the NDP, which supported the Liberal Party throughout the NEP debate, also supported the Government and fought against what we were trying to do for the people.

Now, let us look at Bill C-70. This Bill flows from the May 23 Budget.

Mr. Blaikie: Point of order, Mr. Speaker. I hate to interrupt a speech which has been six years in the making, but six years has not enabled the Member to get a grasp of the facts. I think if he checks the record he will see that we were not supportive of the Government throughout the national energy policy debate.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I regret that is not a point of order.

Mr. Lewis: I think if the Hon. Member had spent six seconds before he spoke he would not have thought—

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Blaikie: Try again.

Mr. Lewis: Had he spent six seconds thinking he would not have spoken. I had all the right words it was just a matter of order.

The point I want to make is this. We had a Budget on May 23 and we had a formation of public opinion about deindexing the first 3 per cent of old age pensions. That is true and we reversed our position. Everyone agrees that during the budget debate there was a focus on only that one issue. Four months later my friend the Hon. Member for Montreal-Sainte-Marie (Mr. Malépart) says we should give them a minute to let public opinion formulate. What is your hurry, says the NDP, four months later! Where is this great groundswell? My friend from Sudbury is in the audience. He always comes to hear my speeches and I appreciate his being here today. He is the one who said there was going to be this groundswell of grandparent power. Grey power. Where is it on this Bill? Where are the petitions? There is no public opinion groundswell.

Mr. Lapierre: They are coming, don't worry.

Mr. Frith: You are going to have them, Doug. Don't worry.

Mr. Lewis: The Hon. Member for Montreal-Sainte-Marie said they want time to mobilize public opinion. Well, he has to do some mobilization, I guess. I hope he will be back with that mobilized public opinion.

Mr. Frith: Wait for family week. Jake is going to be in China.

Mr. Lewis: Let us look at what the legislation does. Let us look at what the Liberals and NDP are delaying. I want the House to understand that this Bill respects universality. This Bill is of benefit to low-income families because we are increasing the child tax credit 36 per cent. So the NDP and Liberals are against increasing the child tax credit. They are against the $70 increase in 1986, and a further $35 increase in both 1987 and 1988. Be very sure, my friends, as to what you are against. We want that legislation passed so that we enhance the income of low-income families and reduce the income of the higher income families. That is exactly what you are against.

I believe that the Government should have its bad legislation. That is what Churchill said. The question of whether it is bad legislation or not remains for the court of public opinion.

I suggest that the Opposition has failed miserably to mount any public opinion against this Bill. They know that, and they know it well. I believe very strongly, Mr. Speaker, that we should pick our spots when we bring in closure. We should have a full debate. If you check the record you will find that I have not spoken very often against closure. Check that. But when it comes to whether or not we are delaying unnecessarily the time of the House, as the Liberals and NDP did on Friday—they did not have enough speakers to carry the debate so what was their great, brilliant political tactic on Friday? The great brilliant political tactic was to shut down the House. Now, isn't that intelligent political opposition? We do not have the speakers so we shut down—yes, 30 speakers out of 70 in the Opposition had spoken by Friday. All right, track them down, where are they going to be on Thursday when we debate this Bill, or Friday?

Mr. Frith: That is 45 per cent of our Members. What percentage of yours have spoken?

Mr. Lewis: We gave you the opportunity. We do not want to take up time debating something we already debated in caucus. When the Liberals were in power we knew there was no debate in caucus. This Bill has had debate in caucus and it is going forward.

In closing I want to say that the Government has given the Opposition every minute they need to debate this Bill fairly. We have given the Opposition all the time they need to mobilize public opinion. Well, ladies and gentlemen, you do not have it mobilized, you have been four months at it, and how much longer do you need to do your mobilization? My colleague from Montreal-Sainte-Marie has had the time, he did not do it, it is not there and he knows it. We intend to proceed. We have given them the time and I hope maybe they will see the light and shut down this debate now so we can go on to more important matters.

Hon. Douglas C. Frith (Sudbury): Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member is quite correct, it is a rare occasion when he makes an intervention in this House and I was very happy to be in my seat to be able to hear that kind of an intervention. I hope that the people in his hometown will take the opportunity to listen to what he said. If they do, they will realize that the intent of this Government measure is a massive tax grab from middle income Canadians.

I would like to refer to a point made by my colleague from Montreal. It comes as no surprise to us on this side of the House that the Government has chosen to introduce time allocation in order to end the debate with respect to Bill C-70 on the floor of the House of Commons. The Government does not want to have the debate widened, as we do, in order to ensure that Canadians fully understand more than just the import of deindexation of familly allowances.

The Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Epp) quite properly read into the record from an editorial in last Friday's edition of The Toronto Star. However, he read selectively from it. The last paragraph of that editorial is the telling one. It indicates that Opposition MPs are misdirecting their fire by concentrating simply on he deindexation of the baby bonus, however popular a cause that may be with middle class voters. They should, instead, the mounting be barricades for the kind of meaningful reform of the tax and transfer payment system that would lead Canada to a better system of social security for its neediest citizens. That is what we have been attempting to do in this debate rather than simply focussing, as the Government wants us to, on its plan to deindex familly allowances.

I am looking forward to the debate that the Minister of National Health and Welfare will introduce on the floor of the House of Commons when the Government brings forward the omnibus tax Bill to deal with those other measures in the Budget which will impact on low and middle income Canadians in a manner in which the Government does not want average Canadian citizens to find out about.

When considering the Government's proposals we must include the plan to deindex personal exemptions. As a result of those two measures, at the end of 1990 a family of four living on $15,000 a year will pay an additional $1,700 in income taxes and a family of four living on $35,000 a year will pay an additional $3,600 in taxes, but a family of four living on $80,000 a year will only pay $1,125 more in taxes. In other words, the import of the over-all tax change is to make the rich richer and the poor poorer. That is what is at the heart of this debate.

The Government wanted Canadians to focus on its plan to deindex family allowances because it knows it can get away with this measure. The Government wants us to focus on what it is doing in the left pocket while it is taking thousands of dollars of income out of the right pocket. The net effect on Canadians will be that in four years the disposable income of the poorest of the poor in our society will be four per cent less, while the rich in our society will have an additional .6 per cent of disposable income.

I am not surprised by the fact that the Government has introduced time allocation, but I am surprised that it chose the Minister of National Health and Welfare to introduce it. The Minister of National Health and Welfare should have ensured that if time allocation had to be introduced, it was the Minister of Finance (Mr. Wilson) who introduced it. I know the quality of the Minister of National Health and Welfare and I am sure that he must have fought extremely hard around the Cabinet table, but lost the battle. I find it difficult to believe that the Minister of National Health and Welfare could defend budgetary measures that will put the burden of deficit reduction on the backs of low and middle income Canadians rather than advocating, as he should, the overhaul of the tax system to introduce a minimum tax for the rich and to ensure that the transfer does not make the rich richer and the poor poorer. That is what middle and low income Canadians expect from the Minister of National Health and Welfare.

The previous Minister of National Health and Welfare, Monique Bégin, made a name as a defender of the interests of poor and middle income families in our society. She fought well at the Cabinet table to ensure that the interests of her constituents were well represented. They certainly have not been in this debate.

The Minister indicated that, rather than simply obstructing every piece of legislation, the Opposition should bring forward proposals to improve the system. In the intervention that I made on September 16 I indicated the proposals and principles on which the Liberal Party will stand with respect to an overhaul of the social security system in the country. I indicated that we have certain premises with which we began. One of the premises is that amongst the OECD countries Canada ranks in the bottom third in terms of the percentage of GNP that goes to our social security system. That is a fact.

Mr. Epp (Provencher): That is not true.

Mr. Frith: From that assumption we can go to the Macdonald Commission which took two years to make some of the most important analyses of the economic system as we know it. Among its recommendations the Macdonald Commission said, with regard to our social security system, that it does not fear for the future sustainability of our income transfer programs, nor does it believe that short-time budgetary problems, which this Bill and this Budget are all about, should be solved through cut-backs in the programs for social development.

One year ago, during the election campaign, the Government indicated that never, ever would the burden of deficit reduction be taken out on the backs of poor and middle income Canadians, and never, ever would deficit reduction be taken out on the social envelope. Yet, one week ago, in introducing Bill C-70 on the floor of the House, the Minister of National Health and Welfare defended his Government's intentions to reduce the size of the social envelope and to take out deficit reduction on the backs of poor and middle income Canadians on the basis that the economy is not going as well as it should.

Under a Cabinet system the function of the Minister of Finance is to indicate over-all fiscal policy for the country. I would hope that the Minister of National Health and Welfare would exercise his responsibility and indicate his displeasure at the direction which the Minister of Finance took on May 23.

The over-all thrust of the Liberal Party's position is that something has to be done to ensure that the issues of poverty and of the burden of social programs does not fall inordinately on middle and low income Canadians. We want to expand this debate to include measures other than deindexation. I look forward to the debate which we will have in the House of Commons when that omnibus Bill does come forward in order that Canadians can understand.

I have done some open line shows on this subject in the last several days and it comes as no surprise to me that Canadians do not understand the debate that is occurring here in the House; it is very complex. Because of its complexity, and the Government's knowledge that it would not be fully understood by the average Canadian, the Government undertook deficit reduction on the backs of middle income Canadians through sneaky measures, such as the deindexation of personal exemptions. Canadians will not even understand what happened to them until they file income tax returns in the spring of 1986. They will not understand what is happening because the monthly family allowance cheques will not get any smaller. It is very insidious and sneaky. Even the Minister of National Health and Welfare knows that under Bill C-70 the poorest of the poor, the family which lives on $9,000 a year and has four children is going to lose purchasing power by the year 1990.

I will conclude by saying that the notion that this Bill helps the poorest of the poor is only another indication that the Government prefers to put a little grain of truth in its measures. In fact, even they will lose as a result the introduction of Bill C-70.

[Translation]

Mr. Pierre Blais (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I listened to the Hon. Member for Montreal-Sainte-Marie (Mr. Malépart) who happens to be in the House rather than on the street to participate in the debate, as he usually says—

Mr. Malépart: We are here to defend real people—

Mr. Blais: Real people . . . Just what did you do to defend real people over the past twenty years? We did not see you anywhere, you were glued to your seat here in the House for twenty years, never getting up while your Government prevented—

Mr. Malépart: We had you reverse your decision on old age pensions—

Mr. Blais: —prevented the full indexation of family allowances, which meant a $20 loss for every Canadian family. That is one incident you would rather forget.

Mr. Malépart: Elderly Canadians have fully indexed pensions thanks to the Opposition!

Mr. Blais: That is one incident you would rather forget. When it was time to speak up you did not do anything. That is all you have ever done—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I would urge the Hon. Member to direct his remarks to the Chair so as to avoid debates between two Members.

Mr. Blais: I apologize, Mr. Speaker! Compared to me, my hon. colleague enjoys considerable experience, but he does not seem too eager to share it with us, unfortunately. We seldom have the opportunity to hear debates—

Mr. Malépart: Tell us about the tax on drugs!

Mr. Blais: It is unfortunate for the Hon. Member. Apparently, he needed more than the ten minutes which had been allocated to him. I am sorry, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member quoted all sorts of data concerning tax exemptions. He mentioned for instance that a family earning $80,000 a year would have a tax exemption of $363 while a family earning between $10,000 and $20,000 would have a tax exemption of $203. He may be right technically. But he overlooked the fact that the family earning $80,000 a year—

Mr. Malépart: Is going to pay more than the rich.

Mr. Blais: No . . . I think they also pay income tax. I think that families earning $80,000 pay income taxes too. First of all, that is an exemption, and I suggest that like all the other Members of the Opposition, the Hon. Member for Montreal-Sainte-Marie should keep his mouth shut, open his ears and eyes, and realize that 285,000 people have returned to work since last fall, that these people will be paying income tax and that they are very satisfied with the present Government.

An Hon. Member: That is not true!

Mr. Blais: As my colleague stated a while ago, I think that the Government has clearly indicated its proposals to the Canadian people through its May 23 Budget, and that is what we are working on today.

There have been a number of debates, so that the Opposition has had the opportunity over the past few months to state its case and tell all sorts of stories to the Canadian people. We end up today . . . The Canadian people support the Government, Mr. Speaker, as evidenced by the most recent surveys. That is important!

I realize that the Opposition's duty is to stand in the House, to deal with the various issues, and to try at least to get to the bottom of issues that are of concern to them. But when it is shown that the Canadian people fully support the policies which are on the Government's agenda, I suggest that they should recognize it. They have had every opportunity to deal with this Bill on second reading, Mr. Speaker. In my opinion, the Hon. Minister has put forward quite a legitimate proposal. The House has already spent enough time on this matter.

Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member for Montréal-Sainte-Marie (Mr. Malépart) referred a while ago . . . I almost started to cry when he mentioned that his mother was waiting for her family allowance cheques. But I suggest that what Canadian families have been waiting for in the past 20 years . . . I prefer to see the people waiting for their pay checks, which hundreds of thousands of Canadian families had to do without because of the previous Government's disastrous policies. That is important! I think that Canadian families need pay cheques much more than they need family allowance cheques. On this basis, the Government has been working very hard on this since September last, something the Opposition should realize and understand. That is clear enough. And the Canadian people realize it.

If Canadian families felt enormously penalized, they would let us know. They have the necessary means to do so. Such is not the case. Because what the . . . The Hon. Member for Montréal-Sainte-Marie should listen instead of continually shouting. I understand that because you have kept quiet for the past 20 years, you want to open your mouth for the next 20 years. You would have been better advised to speak out a little more every year instead of trying to say everything now in six months. Perhaps this would have been preferable.

Mr. Malépart: We never worked for the rich!

Mr. Blais: Is that so? Your Government was looking after them. It is not a matter of working either for the rich or for the poor, but of working for Canadian families. The legislation now before us, Mr. Speaker, is aimed at restructuring in the best possible way the Canadian family's economy. And the starting point is that we should . . . I realize this is something they cannot understand. They never known that. They never had the urge to give jobs to working families and try to restore confidence. All they are trying to do—

An Hon. Member: Stop that nonsense!

Mr. Blais: Try and listen! At least, be polite! You could at least be polite! We listened when you had the floor, even if you had nothing to say. We listened just the same. Therefore, you could at least have the decency to be polite . . . There are people here and they can see who is defending the widow and the orphan. There are people here who can judge your behaviour in this House; you should listen to other Members who have something to say.

An Hon. Member: We are not here to defend our jobs!

Mr. Blais: No, I have no job to defend, and my record is a guarantee for the future. I have not been depending on this. You perhaps, because you have been here a long time, but not me. I was doing something else before. Ask no questions if you will hear no answers.

Mr. Speaker, I still have a few moments left, and I think that if they could . . . I see smiles on the faces of members who last week were almost in tears. Apparently, as soon as the debate becomes serious, they forget that. All they do is play to the gallery.

Mr. Speaker, the serious thing is to put our Canadian families back to work, which this Government is committed to, that is restructuring the family sector. This is important!

Mr. Speaker, we need the Opposition just as we need the Canadian people, to feel that we are recovering our Canadian dignity, to tell ourselves that Canada is not a country that should simply be in constant struggle but that is based on a social fabric. The social fabric is a protective fabric. It is supposed to be a safety net for people who need it. But since there was no economic structure, and this country was going adrift, clearly they never thought of structuring economic and social policies intended to create jobs. Actually people want a pay cheque before a family allowance cheque. This is what I am working at, like each and every one of my colleagues in the Government, Mr. Speaker.

And this is important, just as the Minister of National Health and Welfare has provided Canadians with jobs. It is important to give a pay cheque even before a family allowance cheque. Listen, they stopped at nothing. They reduced the family allowance cheque by $20 during the last 10 years. This includes the Hon. Member for Laval-des-Rapides (Mr. Garneau), who at that time was not concerned with the universality of social programs.

An Hon. Member: He is not here.

Mr. Blais: No, but he was somewhere else, and was saying that universality did not matter.

Concerning the two Members who have been railing at me for the last 10 minutes, including the Hon. Member for Montreal-Sainte-Marie, they have not said anything for 20 years, while they were sending our—

Mr. Lapierre: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The Hon. Member for Shefford (Mr. Lapierre) on a point of order.

Mr. Lapierre: Mr. Speaker, I would like to remind you that 20 years ago I was barely nine and not in this House.

Mr. Malépart: On the same point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The Hon. Member for Montreal-Sainte-Marie (Mr. Malépart) on a point of order.

Mr. Malépart: Nine years ago, I was a member in the Quebec National Assembly, while the Hon. Member did not yet know where he was going and is still all mixed up.

[English]

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg-Birds Hill): Mr. Speaker, I should like to begin by commenting on some of the things said by previous speakers. I was interested in the benefit of the doubt which the Hon. Member for Sudbury (Mr. Frith) gave to the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Epp). he hypothesized that the Minister had fought hard at the Cabinet table but had lost in the battle for family allowances. I hold no such theory. As far as I am concerned, I think the Minister is captive to the total economic philosophy of the Government. I do not think he fought very hard at the Cabinet table to prevent the partial deindexation of family allowances. I do not give him that benefit of the doubt. I have seen how the Minister of National Health and Welfare fights at the Cabinet table for other things, particularly for his own province, and he has been a miserable failure at that. If he fought at all to prevent the deindexation of family allowances, his record is equally miserable in that regard. I doubt whether he actually fought.

I was disappointed by the speech of the Hon. Member for Simcoe North (Mr. Lewis) who said that he had been waiting to make such a speech for six years. Instead of making a reasoned defence of the need for the Government to pass its legislation—and indeed such a reasoned defence can be made—it turned out to be a political tirade totally captive to the present context. I was disappointed because I thought we might actually receive some erudite parliamentary advice from the Hon. Member.

In respect of the reason for closure, we have not debated the Bill at great length. The real reason is a political one, that the Government is afraid public opinion may be mobilized. Some people have argued that four months have gone by since the original suggestion was made. We have to remember that the political agenda is often crowded, as it has been since the time the proposal was first made. If the Government was confident that its measure had the support of the Canadian public, I think it would have been much more relaxed about allowing the debate to continue in the House for a decent period of time.

Before the summer recess the House was preoccupied and seized with the question of the deindexation of pensions, and there have been many items on the agenda since our return. One of the functions of delay in the parliamentary system is that it gives people time to catch on to what the Government is up to. I am unhappy, although I understand it as a political tactic, that the Government has decided to try to prevent that from happening. However, let us be clear about why this is being done.

Unfortunately the Minister of National Health and Welfare tried to make light of the position of the Opposition on family allowances. What he did not do or what he could have done—and, in doing so, I think he could have enhanced his own image—was recognize that what we have here is a debate about fundamentals in so far as social policy is concerned. He could have dwelled on matters of principle, but he did not do that because the Conservative approach to the whole question of family allowances and other social policy changes has been completely devoid of principle. It is no accident that the Minister did not try to get into that higher level of debate which was available to him.

We see a total lack of principle on the part of the Government. The real principle in the backs of the minds of many Progressive Conservative Members, whether they be in Cabinet or on the back-benches, is that they do not like universal social programs. I would much rather that they had the guts to say it and to initiate a debate on universality. This is what they should be trying to do instead of trying to get rid of universality by the back door and not having the commitment to their own fundamental view of social policy. We are not afraid to travel around the country saying that we stand by universal social programs even when some people in the social policy area have questions about universality. We are willing to take that heat, but the Conservative Party is not willing to take the heat about its own real position. Its Members are not able to do that or are unwilling to do that.

There was a second position which they could have adopted on principle, which they did not do. They could have stuck by their contention that whatever reforms they made, the money saved through such reforms would have been passed on to those people who needed it the most. That was the position of principle which they took in the paper released by the Minister of National Health and Welfare back in January, I believe it was, but they abandoned that principle. They did not have the guts to stick by it. Now we find that the money which is to be saved from the deindexation of family allowances will eventually find its way into the cause of deficit reduction rather than into the pockets and budgets of families who need it most. By doing this, the Government made a serious political error, if I may give it some unsolicited advice. Had its Members stuck by the second principle, they could have divided their critics. Had they stuck by that principle, groups which are now forming a coalition against the deindexation of family allowances would have been divided over the issue because some of them would have said that if the money was actually going to those who needed it most, they would support the Government. Certain groups have taken that position over the years, but the Conservatives did not have the guts to stick by that principle. Now we see a coalition of people from various groups that have held various views about the benefits of universality over the years coming together to say that this is bad social policy in every respect because it erodes universality without adopting the most beneficial aspects of selectivity. Also they say that it is a retreat on promises made by the Government in January in respect of where money saved would go and, before that, the promises made by its Members during the election campaign about whether family allowances would be hit at all.

I recall that the Progressive Conservative candidate who was my opponent in the last election had conniptions when I distributed a pamphlet indicating that the Conservatives would tamper with family allowances. He said that that was a lie, that I was a most irresponsible person and that the Progressive Conservative Party had no intention of doing anything with family allowances. He asked how I could be so dishonest and make those kinds of allegations. I said the same about pensions. Of course many members of the New Democratic Party did, because we know the real social policy agenda of the Progressive Conservative Party. Unfortunately the Conservatives are unwilling to come forward to say so, so that we can have a real debate about the fundamentals of social policy. I think that would be instructive for all of us; we could find out where people really are in respect of these issues.

It is not only questions of social policy, it is also the question of who is pro-family, if anyone is completely. There has been much rhetoric about who is pro-family and who is anti-family. However, the deindexation of family allowances and the erosion of universality over time will not be an attack only upon families. It is an attack on communities and on the sense of what it means to be a community.

One of the reasons we are in favour of universal social programs is that we believe a community has the right to say that it regards certain matters as important. In this case it is the family. It might be education or retirement for the elderly. We say that these things are provided to people because we believe that that is what it means to be part of a community. We believe that they ought to be allocated to people on the basis of the fact that they are part of the community, not because they are at one end or the other of the income scale, nor because we hold to a view of society which sees us as isolated individuals.

We have a notion of what it means to be a community. That is also at stake here, in terms of the philosophical debate wich we ought to be having. We will not have the time to do that. In fact, we will not have as much time as we need because the Government has chosen to move a closure motion. It goes against everything its Members said in Opposition. When it comes down to it, they did not mean it in any event. It is too bad that we will not have time for the debate we ought to be having.

Mrs. Monique Landry (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I am very happy to take part in the debate on the motion moved by my Hon. colleague, the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Epp). I believe that Bill C-70 should immediately be referred to the legislative committee which is empowered to make an in-depth study of its provisions. I want to express my support for this Bill. Being myself a mother who received family allowances for her four children, I understand the crucial importance of this debate for all recipients of family allowances, especially women.

Mr. Speaker, the purpose of my intervention is twofold. First, I shall emphasize the universal nature of family allowances and the progressiveness of the federal child benefit system. Second, I shall outline the main reasons which motivated our Government to index family allowances yearly to the consumer price index over 3 per cent.

Mr. Speaker, I believe it is my duty to reassure the Canadian people that the principle of universality of the family allowances system will be maintained. This system, after being established in 1945, soon became popular with Canadian society as a whole. Through this system, the Governments recognize the invaluable contributions made to society by parents who are raising tomorrow's citizens. In 1985, some 3.6 million Canadian families will receive $2.45 billion under the family allowances system. These 3.6 million Canadian families can be assured that the Conservative Government has no intention of jeopardizing the universality of this system. In spite of the recommendation by the Commission on the Economic Union and Development Prospects for Canada to the effect that family allowances and other Federal transfers should be replaced by a universal income security system, my colleague, the Hon. Minister of National Health and Welfare, clearly stated that the Government had preferred to maintain the principle of universality and indexation. I find it very regrettable that our friends opposite would remain silent about the fact that the universality of this program is being maintained. Throughout this debate, they have tried to scare the Canadian people, but it should be emphasized that the Government of which I am a member is in no way contesting the universality of family allowances.

Moreover, Mr. Speaker, I believe that this Bill must be viewed as only one component in the federal child benefit package. Consequently, it must not be considered in isolation, but should instead be analyzed in conjunction with the other two components, namely the child tax credit and the tax exemption for dependent children.

In a spirit of social justice, our Government has shown its desire to reinforce the progressive nature of the programs designed to provide financial assistance to people with children. Is it not more equitable, Mr. Speaker, to pay higher benefits to the poorer recipients and the lower benefits to the wealthiest? A report of the National Welfare Council entitled The Reform of Child Benefits tabled in March 1985 concluded that "the benefits received by a family from the child benefit system have no logical or equitable relation with its financial needs". According to this same report, "the Canadian child benefit system is inconsistent not because it provides benefits to high income families, but rather because their benefits are too high. It is a problem of equity".

Improving the progressiveness of family allowances is therefore a basic objective to which our Government has committed itself. A number or organizations dedicated to the defence of the disadvantaged have for many years requested from the Federal Government income redistribution measures which would be more equitable to low income Canadian families.

The budget tabled by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Wilson) last May takes these representations into account. Thus by increasing the child tax credit and by reducing the tax exemption for dependent children, low-income families now will benefit from an increased assistance from the federal Government. According to the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Epp), families with children and earning an annual income of $25,000 or less will be the big winners of our assistance policy to families. This is a policy which we should all applaud. I readily agree with it as did the Minister of National Health and Welfare in the previous Government when she said: "We have to ask ourselves in the first place whether it is proper in our society for families with income in excess of $26,000 to receive the full child tax credit.

Mr. Speaker, with your leave, I will now state the various reasons which led our Government to introduce a measure providing for partial indexation on the cost of living. The reason is quite simple and unfortunately does not require a lengthy demonstration. In September 1984, the Conservative Government had to tackle the problem of our public debt. It is a sad reality with which we have to deal. It seriously threatens our capacity to promote constant growth. It alone represents in simple terms the sum of all deficits since Confederation. A hundred years or so were needed to pile up a $18 billion debt. Now less than 20 years later, our debt is close to $200 billion and increasing twofold every five years.

Moreover, if it is not controlled right now, the deficit could jeopardize at medium and long range the future of some of our social program. In a thorough analysis of the federal deficit and debt, the President of the Economic Council of Canada, Mr. David Slater has said: "Left alone, the federal deficit could in the future create serious problems restricting among other things the capacity of the Government to provide public services." By talking immediate measures to reduce the deficit, our Government is guaranteeing the future of our social programs.

With respect to the same issue, Mr. Speaker, I should like to object to a statement made by my colleague the Hon. Member for Vancouver East Ms. Mitchell). She pointed to the House that it was easier to encroach upon the rights of children, because they cannot vote. The stringent measures taken to control the deficit are meant to be effective right now so that our children will not inherit economic conditions over which the public debt prevails. We do not have the right to evade our economic responsibilities. The next generation should not expect to be required to pay for the excesses of the previous generation.

Those are the policies, Mr. Speaker, which the Canadian taxpayers will surely appreciate. The President of the Economic Council of Canada has applauded the budgetary measures of our Government. According to Mr. Slater, the implementation of constructive measures was necessary to maintain the deficit at a proper level and to ward off long term problems for Canada. By tackling the deficit right now, we are thinking in terms of the future of our children.

Mr. Speaker, I also want to deal with several alarmist statements made by our colleagues opposite. Some opposition members suggest that they are the unwavering champions of social programs—

Mr. Boudria: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The Hon. Member for Glengarry-Prescott-Russell (Mr. Boudria) on a point of order.

Mr. Boudria: Mr. Speaker, I had been listening attentively to the Hon. Member's speech until I noticed, as you did yourself, that the speech was read in its entirety, and I am sure you will agree that under the Standing Orders, Members may not read what they say in the House without good reason.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The Hon. Member for Glengarry-Prescott-Russell (Mr. Boudria) may be technically right, but I think the Chair has been tolerant in this respect with junior Members of the House.

The Hon. Member for Blainville-Deux-Montagnes (Mrs. Landry).

Mrs. Landry: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Perhaps I prefer to read what I say and say something sensible, instead of speaking without a text and speaking at random.

Mr. Speaker, some Members of the Opposition are inferring that they are steadfast defenders of our social programs. I think they have a bad case of selective amnesia. Although they may not want to hear it, I may remind them it was the previous Government that fully de-indexed family allowances for 1976, when Canada was faced with an annual inflation rate of 11.2 per cent.

In 1983-84, the previous Government again acted by capping increases in family allowance payments at 6 and 5 per cent respectively. I suggest that our friends opposite stop their posturing.

One of the Ministers at the time stated that it was impossible to deal effectively with our own deficit and that of the provinces unless taxpayers helped to reduce these deficits by limiting their income. Those words should be an inspiration to the Opposition today.

In concluding, Mr. Speaker, I would like to stress that the two Opposition parties do not have a monopoly on compassion. Our Government's family assistance policies are dictated by the principles of social justice. The principle of universality is not being challenged. In addition, the whole family assistance program is more progressive than it was under the previous administration. Finally, our fight against the deficit sparked the economic recovery which makes it possible for all Canadians to look forward to better days.

Mr. Speaker, I fervently hope that Bill C-70 will be referred to a legislative committee as soon as possible.

[English]

Mr. David Berger (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, if, one year ago, someone had told me that I would be rising to make the speech that I plan to make in the next 10 minutes, I really would not have believed it. Who would have thought that the Conservative Government, elected with such a huge majority, would have succeeded in disappointing so many Canadians so quickly? The Conservative Government was given a mandate to better the lives of Canadians, to find a better way of doing things. One year later, I invite you, Mr. Speaker, to read the year-end reviews. Even the staunchest Conservatives supporters are having doubts.

[Translation]

It did not take long to realize that the promises of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) were not sincere. The moment the new Government took office, we witnessed a whole slew of political appointments which even the most staunch Conservative finds revolting.

[English]

It did not take long for Canadians to discover—

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. If the Hon. Member for Glengarry-Prescott-Russell (Mr. Boudria) has a minute, he might advise his colleague, the Hon. Member for Laurier (Mr. Berger), not to read his speech.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The Hon. Member for Laurier (Mr. Berger) has the floor.

Mr. Marchi: That's sleazy. You're desperate to get on t.v.

Mr. Berger: It did not take long for Canadians to discover—

Ms. Copps: The only thing you're going to finish is Canadian families.

Mr. Berger: I will try again. It did not take long for Canadians to discover that P.C. meant not Progressive Conservative but "Patronage Canada".

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Boudria: Well said, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Lewis: Well read.

Mr. Berger: I think that most Members of the House and many members of the public probably read Gary Lautens' column which revealed why the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) travels with two planes. He has one filled with empty seats and the other with empty promises.

To understand the sense of betrayal of Canadians, there is no better example than the sleight of hand performed by the Prime Minister and the Government over child and elderly benefits. Could anyone have predicted that the Conservative Government would act in such an underhanded manner, playing games with the trust of Canadians, flip-flopping on the most basic promises?

[Translation]

First, the Mulroney Government fails to live up to its commitment not to reduce social spending.

In the famous consultation paper tabled last January concerning child and elderly benefits, we were promised, and I quote:

> Any net savings which may then remain, whether resulting from reductions in expenditure or additional revenues, should be applied to other priority concerns in the social affairs envelope.
> No such savings—

—and I emphasize this—> —should be transferred to deficit reduction.

All we need do is read the first sentence of the speech delivered by the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Epp) to appreciate the complete about-turn of the Mulroney Government in the space of four months. A week ago, in his remarks to introduce this Bill, the Minister said that the Government announced its intention to restructure the federal child benefit system to provide greater assistance to families with lower incomes while at the same time moving to bring our national debt under control.

The Mulroney Government says one thing in January and does the opposite four months later. No wonder the Government has lost public support.

All told, Mr. Speaker, the Budget will reduce by half a billion dollars the benefits that had been earmarked for families from now until 1990.

[English]

That the Government reneges on its promise not to cut social spending is one thing but what is worse is that the combined effect of the Budgetary measures hurts poor people more than the rich. It is hard to believe that in 1985, a Government would table such a regressive and anti-social Budget.

The Bill provides that, starting in 1986, family allowances will be indexed only on that portion of the inflation which exceeds 3 per cent. Hon. Members will know that family allowances now amount to $375 a year and are fully indexed to the cost of living. The Government is therefore making the families pay for the first 3 per cent of inflation.

The child tax credit will increase, but fewer families will be eligible as the level of family income at which the tax credit begins to diminish will drop from $26,330 to $23,500 beginning in 1986. The Women's Health Center located in my constituency has stated the following:

> The consequence of the proposed reform will be to minimize and marginalize family allowances which are the only true form of completely universal benefits and to give more importance to selective types of benefits such as the tax credit.

I should add that fewer families will be eligible to the tax credit.

The budget also announced a number of other tax changes, changes to the tax exemption for dependent children, to the federal rebate, to basic personal exemptions, to tax deductions, to registered pension plans and to Registered Retirement Savings Plans or RRSPs.

The National Council on Welfare, in a study report published last July, showed that the combination of all those measures is punishing lower- and middle-income families while benefiting rich families.

An Hon. Member: A Government for the haves.

Mr. Berger: Tax deductions allowed to the rich for registered pension plans and RRSPs—and it is important to understand that—make up for losses due to changes in child benefits and tax credits, with the result that the budget is reducing taxable income in the case of rich families.

In its calculations the National Council on Social Welfare uses as an example a working couple with two children and makes a comparison between poor families ($15,000 income), middle-income families ($35,000 income) and rich families ($80,000 income).

Over the next five years, poor families will lose $1,879, while rich families will only lose $1,125. Where is the justice, Mr. Speaker? We dare not even mention middle-income families. They are the big losers, to the tune of $3,452.

[English]

The National Council on Welfare also analysed the effect of the Budget on single parents. I am particularly distressed by these results because of the impossible situation of most single-parent families and because in the riding of Laurier there is twice the national average of such families. Almost half of single mothers were below the low-income line in 1983 and their average income of $17,585 was only 44 per cent of the $39,554 average for two-parent families. These stark figures would seem to be evident to everyone except Members of the Conservative Government.

I would remind you, Mr. Speaker, that the rich one-parent family with $60,000 per year in revenue actually ends up some $404 ahead after the Budget. The poor one-parent family with $15,000 in average income will lose $1,844 between 1986 and 1990. The middle income family with an average income of $35,000 will lose $3,504 over the same period of time.

I would like to point out that the analysis of the National Council on Welfare only takes into account the Budget's changes to child benefits and the personal income tax system. It does not analyze the effect of increases in consumer taxes, which could add about $200 to $300 a year to the tax bill of most Canadian families. It does not consider the effect of the capital gains exemption which will benefit only the most wealthy in our society.

The bottom line on the Budget of the Prime Minister is this. First, it breaks the promise not to reduce social spending. It then attacks the poor and the middle class. The Conservative Government attacks those in our society who are least capable of defending themselves. It seems the Government can find $1 billion to bail out depositors with deposits of more than $60,000 but cuts precious dollars from family benefits. In the case of the elderly, the injustice was obvious and caused the Government to retreat at the end of June. In the case of family benefits, the injustice is more difficult to perceive at this point in time.

I started off my remarks by saying that if someone had told me a year ago that I would be standing in the House today delivering this sort of speech I would not have believed him. However, given the pitiful record of the Conservative Government one year later it is not surprising how many people have concluded that this Government will last but one term.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Gordon Taylor (Bow River): Mr. Speaker, when I listen to opposition Members I am reminded of what happened when I was training as a young man at Sarcee Reserve in Calgary. We were shooting at a target and the sargeant was behind us. The chap next to me was shooting and not hitting the target. The sargeant came up to him and said: "Where in the world are those bullets going?" The young man looked up and replied: "Well, sir, I don't know where they are going but they're sure leaving here with an awful bang." That is the feeling I get from speeches made by opposition Members. They do not know where they are going. The only way we could make the Opposition happy would be to continue to borrow and borrow and borrow and live on borrowed money. That is the only way we could make the Liberals and the New Democrats happy. That is what they were doing for the last 16 years. They thought they could borrow themselves out of debt.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An Hon. Member: Louder!

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. Could we allow the Hon. Member for Bow River (Mr. Taylor) to make his speech?

Mr. Taylor: What they have done is left a heritage, a heritage of—

Some Hon. Members: Louder, louder!

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. Could we please allow the Hon. Member for Bow River to make his speech?

Mr. Taylor: Mr. Speaker, when you throw a stone into a pack of dogs and a dog starts to yelp you know you have hit one of them.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Taylor: Mr. Speaker, they never stopped once to realize what they were doing to the country when they were borrowing and borrowing. The greatest threats to the social programs in Canada are the Liberals and members of the New Democratic Party. They were going to borrow and borrow and borrow until there was nothing left to borrow.

Mr. Tobin: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Might you advise the Hon. Member opposite that we have now moved into the 20th century? We have electronic means of being heard in the House and it is not necessary to yell. His speech is both offensive to intelligent people and offensive to our ears.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The Hon. Member for Yorkton-Melville (Mr. Nystrom) on a point of order.

Mr. Nystrom: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Taylor: In the 20th century they know what a point of order is. They have been in the House for a number of years and they still do not know what a point of order is.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The Hon. Member for Yorkton-Melville on a point of order.

Mr. Nystrom: Is that not a case of the kettle calling the pot black, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The Hon. Member for Bow River has the floor on debate.

Mr. Taylor: I hope you will not be taking the time they have spoken off my time, Mr. Speaker.

Ms. Copps: We hope you are.

Mr. Boudria: Repeat what you said.

Mr. Taylor: I have said before that the only way you can get anything into opposition Members' heads is to cross a woodpecker with a carrier pigeon. In that way they could carry their message and pound it into their heads.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Taylor: Members opposite still think that borrowing is all right. It is no wonder that they jump up and down like jumping jacks when we talk about the effect of their policies because what they will do is ruin the social programs of Canada. Social programs depend on the productivity of a country. When a country borrows, borrows and borrows, that productivity is eventually eliminated.

Ms. Copps: Are you the woodpecker or the pigeon?

Mr. Taylor: They would do that until the point where they could not borrow any more. Then they would leave the widows and the children and the crippled without any help whatsoever. That is the end of their program.

Some Hon. Members: Shame, shame.

Mr. Taylor: That is where they would lead us. They do not know where they are going but that is where they would take us.

This Government is looking ahead. We know where we are going and what we are trying to do. We are trying to make Canada a place which has no debt and a balanced budget so that our people can keep more of the money in their own pockets and not have so much taken off their pay cheques. I look forward to the day when Canada as a united country will be happy right from the Arctic to the 49th and from the Pacific to the Atlantic with people earning their living and the Government only looking after those who need help—not the rich.

An Hon. Member: What about the banks?

Mr. Taylor: It makes me laugh when I hear members of the Liberal Party and the New Democratic party talk about helping the rich. Who is it who wants to help the rich?

Some Hon. Members: The Tories.

Ms. Copps: You do.

Ms. Mitchell: What about the oil companies and the banks?

Mr. Taylor: This program will help the poor and not the rich. The rich are part of this country, too.

Ms. Mitchell: Help the banks.

Mr. Taylor: I do not criticize the rich. Most of them got rich through hard work. Now, members of the NDP want to take their money away from them.

Ms. Mitchell: Give it to the banks.

Mr. Taylor: I want to get the country to a place where we can earn our keep and where we will have more rich people. I will not hurt the poor. This Bill does not hurt the poor. It takes from the rich and adds to the poor.

Mr. Lapierre: Not at all.

Mr. Taylor: I wish Hon. Members opposite would get that into their heads.

Mr. Lapierre: Read the Bill.

Mr. Taylor: It takes from the rich and adds to the poor.

Mr. Malépart: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The Hon. Member for Montreal-Sainte-Marie (Mr. Malépart) on a point of order.

Mr. Malépart: I will let the Hon. Member put his translation phone on but I am afraid he is not referring to the right legislation. The Bill that robs the poor to give to the rich—

[English]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The Hon. Member for Bow River has the floor on debate.

Mr. Taylor: Mr. Speaker, I wish the Hon. Member opposite would read the Bill, in his own language, if he likes—in French or English. If he did so he would definitely see that we are paying a greater amount to poor families with children than we are to rich families with children. That is what hurts Hon. Members opposite. They keep talking about hurting the rich. They are trying to deceive the poor. That is what Hon. Members opposite are trying to do. The last Hon. Member who spoke, whom I respect highly, was saying that we are helping the wealthy. That is completely silly. This Bill will raise today's maximum of $384 to $524 by 1989 for the poor—not for the rich. Why do Members opposite try to deceive the people out there when they talk about the time allocation motion?

When I was in England with a delegation I asked Labour Members and Government Members if they agreed with the policy of the mother Government. What do they do in England? Almost every Bill which comes in has written on it: "This Bill will have 'x' number of days for debate." I said to a Labour Member of Parliament, since he sits in opposition: "Do you support that measure?" He replied: "Certainly. Parliament has to make progress. We have to deal with things." We do not want repetition after repetition after repetition as we have heard in the debate thus far.

An Hon. Member: Could you repeat that?

Mr. Taylor: Last Friday, because they were so repetitive, they ran out of Members to speak on the Bill and they had to adjourn the House.

Mr. Tobin: You have not had an original thought in ten years.

Mr. Taylor: Mr. Speaker, we want a reasonable time for debate. I would like to see the Government bring in a policy by which every Bill has a set number of days for debate so that we can debate measures fully and thoroughly, but not repeatedly and repeatedly.

• (1240)

Those Hon. Members talk about helping the rich with capital gains. I wish they would go out to the west, to some of the farm homes which I visit. The only nest-egg those farmers have is the land they have worked on for 50 years. That is their only nest-egg. The Government is saying to them, "When you sell your nest-egg at the age of 65 or 70 years, you can keep it all. We are not going to grab part of it because you have been paying taxes all through the years".

Ms. Mitchell: You'll take away from their grandchildren, though, won't you?

Mr. Taylor: Now when those farmers sell their nest-egg they can keep the returns and enjoy their last years on the earth.

Mr. Cassidy: Let's hear it for the speculators.

Mr. Taylor: That is what those Hon. Members say is helping the wealthy. The farmers of Canada are not wealthy. They deserve the nest-eggs they have built over the years.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please.

Ms. Copps: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I understand why the Minister is repeating the same arguments he made during the senior citizens' Bill which was repudiated by the people—

Mr. Lewis: That's not a point of order.

Ms. Copps: —and by the Prime Minsiter (Mr. Mulroney). My point of order deals with the fact that the Hon. Member is supposed to be speaking to this Bill; his ruminations on capital gains exemptions have nothing to do with this particular motion.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The Hon. Member for Bow River (Mr. Taylor) has the floor on debate.

Mr. Taylor: Mr. Speaker, if the Hon. Member has left her manners at home, I wish she would stay home with them.

Those Hon. Members started the debate on capital gains. This is a closure debate, in case the Hon. Member does not know it, and I am arguing why it has to be a closure debate. It is because of the nonsensical attitude of the Opposition in this House. They want to continue to borrow and borrow. They keep talking one way and acting another. What did they do for the poor people of Canada when they were in office? They talk about the results of deindexing in the 1990s. If we had deindexed the way the Liberals did on family allowances, we could have said every family would lose "x" dollars too. That is a silly argument. We live by the laws of the House of Commons and—

Mr. Cassidy: The law of tooth and claw.

Mr. Taylor: —and we endeavour to help those who need the help, not those who do not. This Bill will reduce payments for rich families and it will increase them for the poor families. That is the way it should be. It might be an entirely different attitude and policy—

Mr. Cassidy: Let's go back to the dark ages.

Mr. Taylor: It's a foreign policy to the Liberals and the New Democratic Party but it is a policy of this Government to help the poor. We must get productivity going so that everyone in the country will have a chance to live and to survive. We built this country not on debt but on productivity, with people producing. That is the way to build a country, Mr. Speaker. We are building unity among our provinces and among our management and labour unions. We are doing so because the greater our productivity the greater the social programs we can provide. The more we produce, the better we can treat the poor people of this country—

Mr. Cassidy: Bring back the cartels. Long live the 19th century.

Mr. Taylor: —and eliminate the poor people of this country.

Mr. Cassidy: Yes, eliminate them.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Taylor: —so that they will not be poor, so they will have enough to live on and will not have to depend on Government subsidies. That is what we want. We want our poor people to become richer and richer.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The Hon. Member's time for debate has elapsed.

Mr. Nunziata: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. A few moments ago the Hon. Member referred to my colleague, the Hon. Member for Hamilton East (Ms. Copps), and suggested that my colleague should stay home now that she is married.

Ms. Mitchell: Oh, oh!

An Hon. Member: He didn't say that.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: That is not a point of order on debate.

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, we are debating a motion which will have the effect of choking off consideration of a measure which will affect 3.6 million Canadian families.

Mr. Lewis: Something you never did, eh?

Mr. Gray (Windsor West): This Bill, if it passes, will hurt 3.6 million Canadian families by reducing the purchasing power of the family allowance. No wonder the Conservatives want to choke off debate on this Bill after only five days. The Conservatives hope this Bill will slip through this House before Canadians, especially middle and lower income Canadians, fully realize what harm the Conservatives want to do to them.

The Conservatives now say that there has been enough debate on this whole issue of deindexing the family allowance. The last speaker, in particular, cast doubt upon the commitment of the Conservatives even to the most elementary of social programs. Yet back in 1980, the Conservatives had a massive ad campaign opposing any suggestion of deindexing. That ad said in part that deindexing "is a form of taxation that will have staggering consequences for every Canadian taxpayer, especially the low income earner". It said that "deindexing is a scheme to guarantee that you will pay higher federal income taxes year after year". If that was true in 1980 with respect to income tax, it is true today, not just for income tax but for family allowance.

Yet the Conservatives today are trying to cut off debate on a measure aimed at slipping through a cruel blow to a key part of our whole fabric of programs to support families and all Canadians. No wonder the Conservatives want to rush through an amendment to the Family Allowance Act which is something as I have said, that severely weakens and undermines the objectives of one of the fundamental elements of our national social security framework.

The Bill which this motion wants to bring to a vote reduces the indexing of family allowances and therefore its purchasing power. This not only contradicts promises made by the Conservative Party in the last election campaign, it absolutely contradicts the assurances of the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Epp) who stated in this House last December 21, and I quote from Hansard at page 1444:

Mr. Speaker, I can confirm that the regular indexing of the Old Age Security, Guaranteed Income Suplement, and family allowance will be increased as of January 1, 1985, and the Canada Pension Plan will also be increased 4.4 per cent—

The question asked of the Minister at that time did not include any reference to the family allowance system which is under attack today. However, the Minister went out of his way to include the family allowance in his commitment to increase regular indexing for 1985. The indexed family allowance benefits will increase by 4.4 per cent in 1985 but will be 1.4 per cent, more or less, in 1986, because of this cruel and heartless Bill.

The Family Allowance Bill of 1973 was introduced by the Liberal Government of the day and was approved by this House with the support of all Parties. That Bill had as its objective the strengthening of an income supplement program for Canadian families which was created by a Liberal Government almost 30 years before. This law was passed with the full recognition that income from employment does not request family size, that family bread winners working at or near the minimum, part-time or full-time, often do not have sufficient earnings to support more than one or two dependent children.

The Family Allowance Act also embodies a recognition that the family bread winner may only be able to obtain work on a seasonal or intermittent basis. Parliamentarians realized that these families constantly struggle to keep off the welfare roles because of their pride in their ability to make their own way. Indexing was and is very much part of the program to preserve the purchasing power of the family allowance, a vital instrument, therefore, of social justice.

It is not only this particular Tory Bill under debate today which violates the objectives of the Family Allowance Act and our entire social security framework. This legislation is just one part of a total package of Conservative Government Budget measures which runs against the grain of every positive step taken by successive federal Governments—yes, Liberal Governments—to help lower and middle income Canadian families to improve their economic and social standing in the society of our country.

Further, the May Budget of the Conservatives is not just fundamentally flawed in its brutalizing collision with the values which have shaped our national social policy tradition and consensus, it strikes particularly at lower and middle income Canadians at a time when we are still in a period of recovery from a severe world-wide recession. Lower and middle income Canadians have borne the brunt of general economic difficulty.

The May Budget of this Conservative Government will drive an expanding wedge through an already widening gap between rich and middle-income and poor families. At a time when federal Government anti-poverty efforts should be renewed and reinforced, at a time when federal government efforts to assist families should be strenghened, this Tory Government has chosen to redistribute income from lower and middle-income Canadians to rich Canadians.

This Government's first priority is an impersonal passion for the bottom line. It intends to apply what it calls savings, actually money taken from the pockets of middle and lower-income Canadians in the billions of dollars through cuts in social programs, to reducing the deficit.

First it tried to do that with the old age pension and the outrage of Canadians generally forced it back. But it still wants to do this to the family allowance program, the subject of the Bill which this motion will bring to a vote. It intends to do the same thing to the indexing of the personal income tax. The so-called savings are to be applied to a reduction of the deficit and the Government intends to do this as a priority in total disregard of its own promise, stated for example by the Minister of National Health and Welfare on December 14 of last year, that none of the money saved by reducing social benefit payments would be used to reduce the deficit. So much for credibility. So much for accuracy. So much for a commitment to social values by this cruel and heartless Conservative Government.

Even this cynical passion for deficit reduction fails to completely explain Tory Government motives which result in the unfairness of the Budget of which this Bill is just one part. While the Government has been forced to withdraw its measure to deindex the OAS, it continues to try to put into effect tax policy which would provide a small group of individuals who receive handsome profits from capital gains with unconditional exemptions which will cause lost tax revenues estimated at $1.2 billion in 1990 alone.

The Budget proposes a swath of changes to child benefits which, according to the superficial arguments of the Government, appear to provide an advantage for low-income families. But on closer examination we find this Budget will bring about a partial deindexing at the 3 per cent threshold after 1989; that the cut-off point for the planned child tax credit reduction will be lowered from $26,330 to $23,000 in 1986; and that the child tax exemption will be reduced from $710 per child to $560 in 1987, $470 in 1988, and to the level of the family allowance in 1989. Every Canadian family will lose necessary benefits as a result of the impact of the Conservative Budget. But even the poorest of the poor will lose benefits after 1990 because of the deindexation of the child tax credit along with the deindexation of the family allowance which the Conservatives are trying to force through this House today against the interests of Canadian families and children. All families will get less, even the poorest will get less, because of this Conservative measure.

If we consider the cumulative impact of the budget measures to change the child tax credit and the current tax exemptions for dependant children, and the indexation of income tax, then we find working parents who together earn $15,000 annually and have to feed, clothe and provide a home for only two children, will lose $1,844. The husband and wife who earn a combined annual income of $35,000 will lose $3,452.

There is no reasonable and objective standard of evaluation of the Conservative Budget, of which this Bill is just one harmful part, which can avoid yielding the conclusion of unfairness and injustice. The consistent and undeniable theme throughout is a redistribution of disposable income away from lower and middle-income taxpayers to upper-income taxpayers. Over the next five years those earning $15,000 a year will have to absorb a 36 per cent tax increase, those earning $30,000 an 11 per cent tax increase, those earning $100,000 only a 4 per cent tax increase, and those few taxpayers, great friends of the Tories obviously, earning $200,000 a year will only have to pay 2 per cent more in taxes. That is Tory fairness. That is Tory social justice.

To conclude, in December of last year the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) appeared to base the entire argument for his Government's unsuccessful attack on the universality of certain social programs on the justice he saw contained in his tirelessly repeated and meaningless anecdote of how bank presidents should not be receiving social programs benefit payments which they do not need or want. He tried to give Canadians the impression that his Government would redirect and enrich social program benefits to Canadians most in need. Well, the Canadian people were not taken in when it came to the OAS and in spite of Conservative efforts to choke off debate on this Bill they will not be taken in by its measures.

Certainly the imbalance, unfairness and injustice of the Budget in general and this measure in particular have only been made more patently obvious by the Government's total mismanagement of its reponsibility in the $1 billion fiasco involving the Canadian Commercial and Northland Banks. While the Conservative Government places an onerous burden of taxation on lower and middle-income Canadians, it is ready to spend more than $1 billion of the taxpayers' money to make up for its mishandling of the CCB affair. The Government should withdraw its Budget and keep its promises to lower and middle-income Canadians. This Bill, as one step to withdrawing this Budget, should be defeated; the first step is to defeat this motion aimed at unfairly choking off debate on this important measure.

Ms. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, we are debating a motion to limit debate on Bill C-70. As we all know, this means we are debating the Government's intention to close debate; a closure motion. This is a really damaging—

Mr. Dick: Point of order, Mr. Speaker. Perhaps the Hon. Member does not know and understand, but we are not debating a closure motion. If she knew what the procedure was, she would know we happen to be debating a time allocation motion. Closure is under an entirely different section and is rarely used.

Ms. Mitchell: Mr. Speaker, perhaps the Hon. Member would listen to what I am saying. I said it has the effect of a closure motion.

We have had less than 10 hours of debate on this Bill and until today there have hardly been any Conservative Members willing to stand up and say why the Government is putting forward this Bill which is so damaging to families and children. I think it is disgusting, Mr. Speaker! Conservative Members would debate the Crow Bill for hours. I don't care about woodpeckers and carrier pigeons but the Member who spoke a little while ago will remember how long he debated the Crow legislation tailing along after the NDP. Members opposite do not care about children. They do not care about families or women, the ones who are going to be affected most by this Bill. This Government wants to suppress debate because it is afraid. It is afraid that the people of Canada are going to find out what this Bill will do in reality and what it symbolizes as the first of many terrible measures in the Budget affecting families. We are going to continue to keep the public aware and get the message out to people as to just what this damaging Bill is doing. The Government is giving an erroneous impression that this Bill is insignificant. It is a very, very damaging Bill and I hope to continue and conclude after lunch.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Yes, the Hon. Member will be able to complete her speech later.

It being one o'clock I do now leave the chair until two o'clock this day.

At 1 p.m. the House took recess.

LABOUR RELATIONS

THUNDER BAY—KRESGE DEPARTMENT STORE STRIKE

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay-Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, for more than five months a number of employees of the Kresge department store chain in Thunder Bay have been on strike in an attempt to win a first contract and ensure for themselves a reasonable degree of recognition and remuneration for their work. Ninety-four per cent of these employees are women and, as is the case far too often when the majority of employees are women, the management of this company is trying to ignore them. These employees receive an average wage of only $4.51 per hour, which is far below the poverty line for a single mother. An employee with 30 years of service with the company will receive a whopping pension of less than $90 per month.

These workers have every right to demand fair compensation for their work, and the company has a social responsibility to deal with them fairly and to accept their right to form a union to speak with a collective voice. If the company refuses to live up to its responsibilities, then it is up to society to impose sanctions. The workers are asking the consumers of Canada to boycott this department store chain, and the other chains, K-Mart, Jupiter, and Big Top which have the same owners.

This boycott has been offered support from the CLC, the OFL, the Roman Catholic Bishop of Thunder Bay, and the United Food and Commercial Workers. I hope it will also be endorsed by all consumers of Canada who understand that fairness and a decent standard of living are the right of all workers in this country. I ask that they join with me and my colleagues and say: "I can't shop at Kresge's any more!"

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY

ELIMINATION OF PENSIONERS' TRAVEL PASSES

Mr. Bill Gottselig (Moose Jaw): Mr. Speaker, I would again like to bring to the attention of the House the matter of the elimination of pass privileges by CP Rail for CP Rail pensioners. When the issue first came to light last summer CP Rail indicated that it was a decison arrived at during union-management negotiations. CP Rail has now indicated that passes for pensioners and employees were a privilege and not a right, and that they have been replaced by a comprehensive health package at no cost to the pensioners. Pensioners, as well as all residents of my constituency, are already fully covered by our provincial health plan.

The letter of September 16, 1985, from the President of CP Rail addressed to all CP Rail retirees falls far short of providing an adequate explanation regarding the elimination of these pass privileges.

There was a clearly documented agreement between union and management, dating back to 1936, that employees of the CPR, and pensioners who retired in good standing, were entitled to pass privileges for life.

The CPR received land grants and mineral rights as well as many financial advantages during the planning and construction stage. In view of this, Mr. Speaker, I call on CP Rail to accept its corporate responsibilities and restore pass privileges to all pensioners.

REQUEST THAT GOVERNMENT WITHDRAW BILL C-70

Mr. Jean-Claude Malépart (Montreal-Sainte-Marie): Last weekend, Mr. Speaker, I had an opportunity to meet with several mothers and a good many people responsible for family organizations, and they all wanted to know what the word of the Government is worth. They reminded me that the consultation paper tabled by the Government last January concerning child benefits contains a sentence which goes like this: "The commitment of the Government is that no savings resulting from program changes should be transferred to deficit reduction". A few months later, Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Wilson) tabled a Budget document stating that net federal expenditures will be reduced by $15 million in 1985-86 and by $40 million in 1986-87. All this money, $55 million, will come from cut backs in income support programs for families with children.

Those people are also wondering why the Government did not implement the unanimous recommendations made by various groups whereby the child tax credit exemption should be reduced because it benefits wealthier people. According to the document, a well-to-do- person with an income of $80,000 will get $363 more whereas a man with a $10,000 income does not get anything. Those people would just like to know why the Prime Minister and his Conservative Government do not honour their words and commitments and withdraw Bill C-70.

WAR CRIMINALS

OPPOSITION TO SOVIET AUTHORITIES PROVIDING EVIDENCE

Mr. Andrew Witer (Parkdale-High Park): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the Deschenes Commission of Inquiry heard arguments regarding the possibility of the Commission travelling to the Soviet Union to gather evidence. Taking into consideration the abominable record of human rights violations by the U.S.S.R., does the Commission really expect to find evidence that has not been tampered with and tainted?

Members of Parliament asked to appear before the Commission to address this very question of Soviet evidence and the merits of such a proposed trip. They were denied the opportunity to voice their views and those of their constituents. How can the Commission naively believe that Soviet authorities have justice in mind when they themselves committed atrocities during the war and continue to be the most repressive Government in modern times?

It is even more surprising, Mr. Speaker, to hear groups which so effectively discredited the Soviet judicial system, especially with regard to trials against Soviet citizens, now argue that the Commission would be shirking its responsibility if it did not go to the U.S.S.R. The Commission would be in a jurisdiction where the presumption of innocence and judicial independence are not the rule of law. If such evidence is accepted by the commission established by the Government of Canada, it will, in effect, be approving and accepting the present legal system of the U.S.S.R., a system that is corrupt. Canadians will never give approval to such abrogation of fundamental freedoms.

APARTHEID

SOUTH AFRICA—DEMAND FOR STATEMENT OF GOVERNMENT POLICY

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, comments made by the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Clark) in response to questions asked about South African controlled mining companies operating in Canada are a result of the Government's lack of a definite policy toward South Africa. Canadians in one-industry towns such as Flin Flon and Snow Lake in Manitoba feel extremely nervous as a result of the Minister's spontaneous remarks. Fear has been created in these communities, yet the Government has no clear policy.

Personally, I continue to support strong sanctions that will affect the South African Government's oppressive policy of apartheid. However, there must be a clear statement of this Government's policy. Without that we suffer from vague remarks that create unnecessary fears. Let us hope that this is the last example of another Minister, another foot, and another mouth.

SHIPBUILDING

NEED TO BUILD FRIGATES AT LAUZON, QUE.

Mr. Gabriel Fontaine (Lévis): Mr. Speaker, it has already been brought to the attention of this House that Versatile-Davie is going to build the equivalent of one and a half frigates in Lauzon, thus creating jobs for 650 workers in this area for four years. This decision was made by the company's management after considering the following factors:

The alternative site had not been used for shipbuilding since 1968;

Shipbuilding in modular phases had already been tried in Lauzon but never at the other site;

Human resources and equipment at Versatile-Davie were in a better position to accelerate the development of Canadian expertise and thus strengthen Canada's competitive position throughout the world.

The management of Versatile-Davie does not expect any interference from the Government in selecting the site because it has already been said that this Government trusts the private sector to develop and enhance this country's economy.

The Government will neither obstruct nor interfere with the private sector's initiative, creativity, profitability and expansion. The development of Canadian expertise and our competitive position internationally make it imperative that the frigates be built in Lauzon.

THE PRIME MINISTER

Mr. John Parry (Kenora-Rainy River): Mr. Speaker, in a recent television interview the Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. Mulroney) demeaned and insulted new Canadians by referring to an alleged syndrome that neither I nor any other new Canadian I have spoken to has ever observed. Specifically, the Prime Minister implied that immigrants tend to salute uniformed persons, something that I have never seen in this country.

One of the things that attracts immigrants from all countries to Canada is that it is a free country. That freedom is, of course, in no way threatened by the Prime Minister's rather feeble sense of humour. However, given the influence of his position, he should know better than to make any remark which would initiate or perpetuate negative stereotyping, however minor it may appear to him.

AIR TRANSPORT

NEGOTIATIONS WITH EMPLOYEES AND TRANSPORTATION COMPETITIVENESS

Mr. Gilbert Chartrand (Verdun-Saint-Paul): Mr. Speaker, the present situation with respect to the conflict between Air Canada and the Canada Air Line Flight Attendants' Association deeply concerns me as all other Canadians.

Our national carrier has from now on to behave as a true competitor of the private sector with the same tools but also with the same limitations. This commercial aggressiveness has been Air Canada's slogan for several years, but we wonder whether the officials of the corporation have adequately conveyed to their employees the message about their change of outlook. Apparently, they have been unable to apprise their staff of that dractic change of behaviour in view of a major restructuring of that Crown corporation. No doubt it explains the present conditions in which a climate of frustration is obvious.

Unfortunately, emotional factors seem increasingly to override basic issues, that is people are drawing a parallel between conditions in which CALFAA members are working and those enjoyed by employees of other air lines, and wondering whether a preferential treatment for Air Canada by way of Government subsidies is justified.

Several foreign air carriers would like to do business in Canada as a result of the deregulation process announced by the Government. To allow a Crown corporation to compete with those air lines as well as with Canadian private corporations, the rules of the market must prevail during the negotiations with the union and as far as its sources of income are concerned.

TEXTILES

Mr. Alain Tardif (Richmond-Wolfe): Mr. Speaker, the former Leader of the Opposition, who is now Prime Minister, stated in Sherbrooke on May 4, 1984: "The quota policy would remain unchanged . . ." And the Prime Minister, the then Leader of the Opposition, spoke against free trade in those sectors. He went on to say he would not "bow" to the pressures that might come from Common Market countries, the United States, for less stringent quotas on shoes and textile products. He added this, and I quote: "I will make no bones about telling this to President Reagan when I meet him in Washington next month. I will see to it that our interest are protected at all times. Friendships have their price. Neighbours like us are worth a lot . . ."

Today, Mr. Speaker, over 15,000 jobs directly depend on those three industries in the Eastern Townships, and it is therefore vital that the Government should take initiatives, and adequate steps needed to protect and save 15,000 jobs as well as the economy of the whole Eastern Townships area.

INDUSTRY

ACHIEVEMENT OF CARREFOUR DE LA SOUS-TRAITANCE

Mr. André Plourde (Kamouraska-Rivière-du-Loup): Mr. Speaker, the major event in the industrial sector over these last 20 years is beyond controversy the achievement of "Carrefour de la sous-traitance" for Eastern Quebec, on October 16, 17 and 18 in Rivière-du-Loup.

The fact that "Carrefour de la sous-traitance" involves both the industries in Eastern Quebec and the public sector is in my view exceptional for the present and most significant for the economic future of our area.

In this respect, I cannot but commend the officers of the Chamber of Commerce and Industry in Grand-Portage for that worthwhile initiative. The industrial potential of the Kamouraska-Rivière-du-Loup constituency and Eastern Quebec will never have been so well represented within a single event.

This will give entrepreneurs, potential investors, Crown corporations and the various Government departments an awareness of the vitality of our industrialists. By pursuing as its main objective the economic development of the area, "Carrefour de la sous-traitance" will give both the public sector and private participants an opportunity to meet, explore new markets, and indeed make good deals.

It is within that spirit that the Department of Regional Industrial Expansion and the Department of Employment and Immigration were actively involved in the achievement of "Carrefour de la sous-traitance" by funding a major part of the operating costs connected with—

GOVERNMENT APPOINTMENTS—CONTENT OF GUIDELINES

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry-Prescott-Russell): Mr. Speaker, in a Canadian Press article of September 18, the Minister of the Environment (Mr. McMillan), the "Peeping Tom" of the House of Commons as he became affectionately know in his previous role as Minister of Tourism, stated:

> There may have been some excesses or abuses.

He was referring to the handing out of patronage appointments. According to the Minister, the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) has recognized this and has introduced tough new guidelines, the toughest of any western democracy.

Let us examine the tough new guidelines. First, the review process which the Prime Minister announced applies only to Order in Council appointments. People appointed by contract would still be exempt from scrutiny, like Sam Wakim.

Second, the Prime Minister said that there will no longer be nepotism such as there was in the past—no more appointments of brothers, sisters, sons and so forth. However, the law still permits relatives who have been previously hired to keep their jobs, like Peter Clark, Mr. Speaker.

Next, there are no sanctions in the new guidelines. It should also be remembered that there is a brand new loophole in these so-called tough guidelines. All one has to do to avoid the guidelines altogether is to incorporate as a numbered company. You then consult your favourite Cabinet Minister and he hires on contract. This loophole then provides a tax advantage and bypasses all the new conflict of interest provisions. Some tough guidelines, Mr. Speaker.

FISHERIES

SALE OF CANNED TUNA—REJECTION BY DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL DEFENCE

Mr. George Henderson (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister. Knowing that the Deputy Prime Minister should have been concerned about the health of all Canadians, did he inform the Prime Minister or the Prime Minister's Office that two shipments of rancid tuna were rejected by the Department of National Defence? When did he communicate that information to the Prime Minister or his office? Or, did he keep the fishy details to himself?

Hon. Erik Nielsen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of National Defence): That information, Mr. Speaker, came to my attention on Wednesday, September 18, and it was part of the over-all circumstances that were taken into account by me—

Mr. Broadbent: What?

Mr. Nielsen: —on the instructions of the Prime Minister, in the immediate action that was taken by the Government to meet the situation.

PREMIER HATFIELD—COMMUNICATIONS INQUIRY

Mr. George Henderson (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the Prime Minister. Did the Prime Minister have any telephone conversations or written correspondence with Premier Richard Hatfield? What discussions took place between himself and his Minister of Forestry regarding this situation?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): I can only respond for myself, Mr. Speaker. The question to me was whether I had conversations in this regard with Premier Hatfield. The answer is no.

PRIME MINISTER'S RESPONSIBILITY

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Saint-Maurice): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a question of the Prime Minister. According to the press reports we have, and compiling a list of all the people who knew about the tuna situation, we know that as of today—

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Order.

Mr. Chrétien: —the Deputy Chief of Staff for the Prime Minister, in addition to the man in charge of his liaison with the caucus, Mr. MacAdam, the Minister of Fisheries, the Minister of Health and Welfare, the Minister of Consumer Affairs, and the Department of Justice were aware of it.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Order.

Mr. Chrétien: When will the Prime Minister start to accept some responsibility for that mess and stop looking for scapegoats, forcing the wrong people to resign?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have accepted responsibility. The former Minister of Fisheries in a value judgment that he made submitted his resignation as an honourable gentleman, a concept that would be entirely alien to a Liberal Minister.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Deans: That is true.

Mr. Mulroney: The Liberals had a simple premise: no indictment, no resignation.

Ms. Copps: Hold it. You will get yourself into trouble telling the truth.

Mr. Mulroney: As far as we are concerned, Mr. Speaker, the response to the question is that as soon as it was brought to my attention, as I indicated yesterday, in the circumstances I acted properly and with celerity to resolve the matter, and I think that was done.

ROLE OF PRIME MINISTER'S OFFICE

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Saint-Maurice): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary for the Right Hon. Prime Minister.

According to our information, the Prime Minister's Office had been aware as early as July that Canada's two largest English language television networks were working on a story on the tainted tuna issue, as it is now referred to. Did the Prime Minister give his office instructions to be concerned, above all else, about the Prime Minister's image rather than the health and well-being of Canadians?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): What a surprising question from such a well-known and respected Member of this House!

Yesterday, I answered all questions fully and frankly. Unfortunately, the Hon. Member was not in the House. We have acted at all times with dispatch and in the interests of Canadian consumers.

My hon. friend mentioned the fact that one or two members of my staff were aware of the matter. It is true that Mr. MacAdam, a member of my staff, became aware of the existence of rumours around the first week of July. He got in touch with the Executive Assistant to the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and received the assurance that there was no problem.

The second time was around the middle of July when Mr. Anderson, who works in my office, was visited by two staff members of the Minister concerned. He was given the assurance there was no health threat of any kind, and secondly, that the Minister was acting entirely within his authority as a Minister and that there was nothing improper about the situation.

Since the Minister was absent, Mr. Anderson was asked for advice on what to do if the issue was mentioned on the evening news. Mr. Anderson said: Take your most senior official at Fisheries and Oceans and make him fully available to the media, to answer any questions they might have. And that was it. I think my staff acted quickly, in the national interest, and I believe my hon. friend will agree that was the case.

• (1420)

REQUEST FOR PARLIAMENTARY INQUIRY

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Saint-Maurice): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the Prime Minister. According to what we know about the problem, a lot is unknown to the public. Not only one Minister was responsible. The Minister of National Health and Welfare should have been involved, if he was not, and I would say the same about the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs.

Would it be possible for the House to look into the matter to know exactly when the problem became a serious one, who was really at fault, and whether the Prime Minister's Office had any responsibility, rather than avoid the problem as the Prime Minister is doing right now?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I regret that my hon. friend, who asked me a question and gets a direct answer, thinks that it is inadequate and insufficient. I told my hon. friend with regard to my knowledge that it happened on the Tuesday night and that I acted immediately on Wednesday morning at caucus.

Mr. Lapierre: At caucus!

Mr. Mulroney: That was the first knowledge of it—at caucus on Wednesday morning.

Mr. Chrétien: You defended it in the House.

Mr. Mulroney: Yes, I think I indicated that in response to a question yesterday.

With regard to my personnel, on or about the first week of July, Mr. MacAdam picked up some scuttle-butt to the effect that there was a story floating around. He, one of my personnel, conveyed it to the Chief of Staff of the Minister of Fisheries, who told him that there was no problem.

About mid-July Mr. Anderson was visited by two members of the personnel of the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans who conveyed or gave him the assurance that there was no health hazard, that the Minister was acting within his authority and that there was nothing wrong. They queried, in the absence of the Minister, that if this was aired that night, what advice would he provide? And he said: "My advice to you would be to get the most senior member of the Department of Fisheries and Oceans and make him available to the media so that he can respond fully to all questions". I think that is sound advice.

PRODUCT DECLARED UNFIT FOR HUMAN CONSUMPTION

Hon. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Mr. Speaker, I remind the Prime Minister that, when he was answering questions on the first day that the issue broke, he kept using the phrase that there was no health hazard then. He soon realized that tuna fish, unfit for human consumption, ought to be taken off the shelves. It is "unfit for human consumption" which is key here. Since the Prime Minister has used that phrase time after time, is he telling us that in the summer, when we knew that the Ministry of Justice, the Ministry of Fisheries and the Ministry of National Defence, as well as Pat MacAdam and Ian Anderson, intimately associated with the Prime Minister, were discussing the matter, no one conveyed the message to any of the Ministers involved or to the Prime Minister himself that the product under discussion—and they well understood it by then—was unfit for human consumption? Did no one know that?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, it was my personnel that brought the scuttle-butt to the attention of the Fisheries officials.

Some Hon. Members: What happened?

Mr. Mulroney: Mr. MacAdam received the assurance in early July from the Chief of Staff or the official at the Department of Fisheries that indeed he was aware of a possible CTV story but that it caused no concern or problem; that there was no problem. With regard to the substance of the question of my hon. friend as to whether the product was unfit for human consumption, my friend is quite right when he refers to the fact that there was no health and safety warning. When it was brought to my attention that indeed there was an allegation that it was unfit for human consumption, notwithstanding that, I immediately instructed the Deputy Prime Minister to meet with the Minister of Fisheries and the Minister of Health and Welfare and arrange, with their co-operation, to have that product removed from the shelves. That is exactly what transpired.

OFFICIALS' KNOWLEDGE

Hon. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Mr. Speaker, I want to know from the Prime Minister—and, more important, the people of Canada want to know—that if we had in this city senior officials who were aware that the tuna was unfit for human consumption, why was it not brought to the attention of the Prime Minister? How could we have a million cans of tuna, unfit for human consumption, out there on the shelves and not have it brought to the attention of the Prime Minister? Is he saying that it would still be on the shelves had the program not appeared on television?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am saying no such thing. I am saying that the matter was raised—

Mr. Gauthier: That is exactly what you are saying.

Mr. Broadbent: That is exactly what you are saying.

Some Hon. Members: What are you saying?

Mr. Mulroney: Mr. Speaker, I have been asked a question; I think I am tempted to try to answer it. I am saying no such thing. I am saying that in both instances involving staff members this summer, this question was not raised. In the first instance it was raised by Mr. MacAdam who communicated himself with the Fisheries Department. In the second case the matter was placed in an entirely different perspective for Mr. Anderson. In fact the query related to an interview which the Minister had given on June 26. The Minister being out of town, they sought advice as to how they ought to respond in the event that it aired that evening.

With regard to the product being unfit for human consumption, when that was brought to my attention—all I can do is tell my hon. friend what transpired—I immediately communicated with the Deputy Prime Minister and caused him to convene a meeting of the Minister of Health and the former Minister of Fisheries, plus other senior officials of the Government, so that they could find a way to remove this product from the shelves immediately. That is exactly what I did.

GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Mr. Speaker, as I understand the facts, by mid-summer the Ministry of Defence, the Ministry of Fisheries and the Ministry of Justice, to name three, were all aware because of tests that had been conducted or because of impending legal action, as was the case with the Ministry of Justice, that tuna, unfit for human consumption, was on the shelves of stores throughout Canada.

Is the Government so incompetent that the knowledge of that in a number of Ministries was not brought to the attention of the Minister or the Prime Minister? Is that the kind of incompetence we have in the country?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, we have the kind of competence which indicates that when this matter is brought to the attention of the Prime Minister of Canada, he immediately acts on behalf of the consumers and the citizens of the country. That is what happened.

ISSUANCE OF FORMER MINISTER'S STATEMENT

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber-Port au Port-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister's answers would indicate that he believes he is the only competent person in Cabinet. It is interesting to note and tragic to realize that the Prime Minister defended the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans when the Minister's actions threatened the public good. However, he swiftly canned that same Minister when the Minister's actions threatened the Prime Minister personally; suddenly this tuna was not good enough.

I have a direct question for the Prime Minister. Is it not true that the Prime Minister instructed his Minister of Fisheries to issue a clarifying statement last Friday night after the Minister had publicly disagreed with the Prime Minister's version of events on Friday afternoon? Is it not also true that the Prime Minister only decided to can his Minister of Fisheries after that Minister had publicly corrected the Prime Minister's flawed version of events in respect of the tuna?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the answer is no in those cases. The only flaw is in the question, and it is gravely and irretrievably flawed.

OFFICIAL'S DUTY

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber-Port au Port-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, will the Prime Minister tell the House whether or not his assistant, Mr. MacAdam, was aware of this matter because Mr. MacAdam had been lobbied by New Brunswick MPs, in particular the MP in whose riding this plant is located? Is it not normally the duty of the Atlantic assistant of the Prime Minister to report to the Prime Minister when members of his caucus bring matters to his attention?

• (1430)

Is the Prime Minister telling us that Mr. MacAdam did not communicate—

Mr. Speaker: Order. You have already asked two questions.

Mr. Tobin: —did not communicate directly with the Prime Minister?

[Translation]

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I gave a complete answer to that question just a few minutes ago.

PRIME MINISTER'S INFORMATION

Mr. Ray Skelly (Comox-Powell River): We have been told emphatically that the Ministry of Health had this problem, the Ministry of Justice, the Ministry of National Defence, the Prime Minister's Office had been contacted twice, the Privy Council Office had this matter in detail, and the Prime Minister is attempting to tell this House he knew nothing about it. Is the only time the Prime Minister ever finds out anything when he watches television? Is that the only time he gets information?

Mr. Deans: Sitting in your jacuzzi.

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I know that the NDP, having done what they have had to do, are now sitting there chuckling. They think they have scored a few points. You will pay heavily for that kind of jocular attitude with the Canadian people, I can tell you that.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mulroney: I have responded fully and honestly to the inquiries of my hon. friend.

An Hon. Member: Getting under your skin, eh?

Mr. Skelly: Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Fisheries in an emphatic statement said this matter was, in detail, in the hands of the Prime Minister. We have had seven examples of how it should have gotten there. Would the Prime Minister admit in this House that he cut the Minister of Fisheries' throat in order to cover his own backside?

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An Hon. Member: No way.

PRIME MINISTER'S KNOWLEDGE

Mr. George Baker (Gander-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, it is becoming increasingly difficult, in listening to these answers and questions, to avoid the conclusion that the Prime Minister knew about this matter along before he has indicated in this House previously that he did.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baker: Was he blind, deaf, and dumb?

An Hon. Member: Just dumb.

Mr. Baker: My question to the Prime Minister is this. In view of the questions that have been asked here today, in view of the information that has become public in recent days, in view of that, can he now stand in his place, in retrospect, and say quite honestly that he knew absolutely nothing, nothing at all about this incident prior to that Tuesday night?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I can say that and anybody who says anything to the contrary can bloody well put his seat on the line, because it is false.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

An Hon. Member: Getting under your scales, Brian?

INQUIRY OF THE PRIME MINISTER

Mr. George Baker (Gander-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, the bigger scandar here is that the Prime Minister did not know—

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: If the Government benches will permit a question. Supplementary question immediately, please?

Mr. Baker: With a 54 per cent increase in his staff and 120 people working there—

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: I invite the Hon. Member to come immediately to the question.

Mr. Baker: My question quite simply, Mr. Speaker, is this. Don't you think you should have known?

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Gauthier: Where does the buck stop?

CUSTOMS AND EXCISE

PLANNED REDUCTIONS IN INSPECTION PERSONNEL

Mr. Bill Attewell (Don Valley East): My question is directed to the Minister of National Revenue concerning the planned cut of customs and excise jobs over the next five years and the planned centralization of examination of international parcel mail. Some Canadians fear that this move may increase the risk of pornography and illegal drugs coming into the country. Would the Minister allay the fears of the Members of this House, and Canadians, about this risk?

Hon. Elmer M. MacKay (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the Hon. Member for a very topical and pertinent question and to assure him the reductions in numbers that have been referred to are not nearly as great as those which have been reported. This in no way affects the capacity of the Department to carry out with vigilance what is required to keep prohibited imports from coming into this country. The reductions are designed to improve the payment and delivery and streamline the service, and do not affect the enforcement ability of the Department.

TUNA AFFAIR—REQUEST FOR EXPLANATIONS CONCERNING TWO OFFICIALS

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister.

Everybody is aware now that Ian Anderson, the Head of Communications, and Pat MacAdam, a long-standing friend and adviser of the Prime Minister, were aware of the "Tuna affair" in late July. But curiously enough, neither Anderson nor MacAdam were fired.

My question is this, Mr. Speaker. Must we infer now that they properly did their duty and informed the Prime Minister of the "tuna affair"? If not, the Prime Minister being responsible for his staff, as any other Minister is, why did he not sack them? Why did he not sack them both just as he did the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, here you have a perfect example of the NDP problem.

The Hon. Member prepared his question before coming to the House. In reply to about a dozen questions, I gave some clear and precise explanations; just the same, the Hon. Member did not change his question. He read it just as it was. He had absolutely no reason to do that. I provided all the necessary information concerning the behavior of the two persons concerned, and I want to repeat it for the benefit of the Hon. Member.

[English]

Some Hon. Members: No, no.

An Hon. Member: Definitely no.

Mr. Nystrom: The Prime Minister did not answer the question. He is a phoney. He is a phoney and the people of Canada know it.

Mr. Speaker: Order, order. Both sides. Order. Supplementary question immediately.

Mr. Nystrom: My question is a new question, Mr. Speaker, and I want the Prime Minister to answer it. The Minister of Fisheries was fired in this country because he was derelict in his duties.

Mr. Speaker: Order; no. I invited the Hon. Member to come to a question immediately; he did not. No. The Hon. Member for Montreal-Sainte Marie.

SOCIAL SECURITY

SOCIAL PROGRAMS POLICY

Mr. Jean-Claude Malépart (Montreal-Sainte-Marie): Mr. Speaker—

[English]

Mr. Speaker: Order, order. Could I ask all Hon. Members, particularly the majority, to please allow the questions and the answers to be heard.

[Translation]

Mr. Malépart: Mr. Speaker, the question I am directing to the Right Hon. Prime Minister deals with such an important issue as the income supporting policy to help families with children.

Last January, Mr. Prime Minister, your Government promised that no savings resulting from changes to the programs would be used to reduce the deficit. Could the Prime Minister explain to us now why his Government has not kept his word and has reduced by $15 million in 1985-86, and $40 million in 1986-87?

[English]

Hon. Jake Epp (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member opposite will know that this matter is in debate in the House at the present time. I would also like to indicate to him that if he looks not only at the consultation paper but also at the expenditure increases for both this Department and, for that matter, the total social policy envelope, he will find that the expenditure increase is well beyond any of the figures that are now incorporated in Bill C-70.

REDUCTION OF FAMILY ALLOWANCES

Mr. Jean-Claude Malépart (Montreal-Sainte-Marie): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Prime Minister.

Families in Quebec and the rest of Canada would like to know why his Government has decided to reduce in 1986 the family allowances which help middle and low income families, preferring to wait until 1987 to change—

• (1440)

[English]

Hon. Jake Epp (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, again this matter was included in the Budget. I would point out to the Hon. Member again that this is not the first time. In fact it was his Government which in 1976 fully deindexed family allowances and which did it again in 1982 with the six and five program. In fact if this had not happened, family allowances would now be substantially higher. I simply say to the Hon. Member that he should look at his own record to see why what he is saying today is quite opposite to what members of his Party said then.

FISHERIES

SALE OF CANNED TUNA—RESPONSIBILITY FOR INFORMING PRIME MINISTER

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. He has now made it clear in the House that he learned of the tuna scandal by hearing that it had been on television and on the national news. My question to the Prime Minister is very simple. Who on his staff or in his Cabinet should have been responsible for telling him about this before that date?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the responsibility is a ministerial one. The former Minister, whom Hon. Members quite properly saluted yesterday, exercised his judgment in the circumstances. He felt that he was doing the proper thing. He no doubt reconsidered in the light of developments and did the honourable thing by submitting his resignation. This was within the purview of ministerial authority and the former Minister exercised his authority as he so indicated to me and to the House through earlier questioning last week. I have already explained the other circumstances under which members of my staff brought the matter to the attention of the Ministry.

FORMER MINISTER'S STATEMENT

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is again directed to the Prime Minister. I would like to know why the Prime Minister has challenged the Hon. Member for Vancouver South to put his seat on the line. Last Friday the Hon. Member said very definitively that full details had been provided to the Prime Minister's desk several weeks ago. Is the Prime Minister saying that that statement made by the former Minister of Fisheries and Oceans is false and that those full details were never provided to him?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I think my hon. friend, if he checks the record, will find that what he has said is seriously inaccurate. That is not the situation that prevailed then nor does it prevail today.

PRIME MINISTER'S STAFF

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, my question is also directed to the Prime Minister. I have heard him state before, and now again in this House, that the reason he was not personally involved in the dossier was that when members of his staff heard about it, they went to the Ministry involved but, because it was not on television, it did not become an issue. Is the Prime Minister telling the people of Canada that it was not his and his staff members' responsibility to act on one million cans of tuna that were potentially unfit for human consumption, and that his staff's responsibility is only to manipulate the media and television shows?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I think I indicated quite clearly the circumstances in which two members of my staff were involved, however peripherally, in this matter. In the first instance Mr. MacAdam conveyed what he had learned to the Department of Fisheries. In the second instance, Mr. Anderson, in the absence of the Minister, was asked for advice as to who ought to be available in the event that the matter was aired. The dimension of television was incidental to the questions that were being put. I thought that in both cases Mr. Anderson and Mr. MacAdam acted very properly.

ACTION TAKEN BY PRIME MINISTER

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister now says that Mr. MacAdam was peripherally involved. Earlier on today, he stated that he and his office had taken a lead in the issue. Which was it ? Was he peripherally involved or had he taken a lead in the issue? If the Prime Minister was so concerned about the tuna that was unfit for human consumption, why did it take him more than 24 hours to get it off the shelves of Canadian consumers?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I think I have explained completely the circumstances and the celerity with which I acted upon being apprised of the matter. In regard to Mr. MacAdam's involvement, all I meant by the use of the word "peripherally" was that it was peripheral to the main issue. Mr. MacAdam picked up information which he passed on, as I think he should have, to the Ministry of Fisheries and they dealt with it at that level.

AIRING OF TELEVISION PROGRAM

Mr. Ian Deans (Hamilton Mountain): Mr. Speaker, my question is also to the Prime Minister and it is simple enough. If the Fifth Estate program had not been aired—

Mr. Crosbie: What would you be asking about?

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Order, order.

Mr. Deans:—would the rancid tuna still be on the shelves?

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. May I invite the Hon. Member to phrase a question that is not so hypothetical?

Mr. Deans: Mr. Speaker, let me put it another way. It is not a hypothetical question because in July there was a rumour that a program was going to appear, the Prime Minister's staff looked into the rumour, the program did not appear and nothing was done about the content of the rumour. If conditions had remained the same and the program had never appeared on the air, what assurance can the Prime Minister give us that his staff would have acted responsibly, having full knowledge of the possible health effects of that rancid tuna, and made sure that the House of Commons was informed of what had happened and that the tuna would have been taken off the shelves?

Mr. Speaker: Order. That question is just as hypothetical as the first question. The Hon. Member has his views but that question is just as hypothetical. I will invite the Hon. Member to ask the question one more time.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Crosbie: Next.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I would like the Hon. Member to ask a question of fact.

Mr. Deans: Mr. Speaker, I do not think that there is very much doubt about the import of the question. Let me put it another way. Was it the fact that the program appeared on television that caused the Government to move to have the tuna taken off the shelves in spite of the fact that it knew about it in advance?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, whether the question is hypothetical or not, I would be happy to respond to the thrust of the question of my hon. friend. As I understand it, the program aired on a Tuesday night. I did not see the program but it was brought to my attention that in fact it aired on that Tuesday night. Wednesday morning, I immediately charged the Deputy Minister with the responsibility of assembling all the details and immediately thereafter, the next day, the tuna was off the shelves. I think that that is very swift action on behalf of the people of Canada.

Mr. Nystrom: Government by television.

TRADE

SHOE IMPORT QUOTAS

Mr. Sid Fraleigh (Lambton-Middlesex): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister for International Trade. There is presently a great deal of concern and uncertainty in the minds of the 20,000 Canadians who are employed in the shoe industry concerning the possible lifting of quotas on the importation of footwear into Canada. The industry wants to be assured of fair trade before free trade.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Fraleigh: So that this uncertainty is removed, can the Minister tell the House when there will be a decision made regarding the industry's request for limited protection?

Hon. James Kelleher (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, as the Hon. Member is aware, the tribunal handed down its decision in the latter part of June. We were aware of that decision. We immediately consulted not only with the manufacturers and the unions but with the consumers, the importers and the exporters of shoes. We have heard from them. We are presently working on a response to that and will be reporting in due course to Cabinet.

ENVIRONMENTAL AFFAIRS

ACID RAIN—MODIFICATION OF SMELTERS

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the Minister of the Environment whom I wish well in his new portfolio. In view of the fact that last week at the conference in Muskoka on acid rain he indicated his wish to accelerate the process of modification of smelters in Canada, how does he intend to proceed with this?

Hon. Tom McMillan (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, may I begin my answer by thanking the Hon. Member for his congratulations and his good wishes. I look forward to working with him and his colleagues on our common environmental concerns.

To answer his specific question, my priority is to see, in concert with the provinces, that the provinces give effect to their individual commitments made on February 5 of this year to reduce acid rain-causing emissions by 1994 to 50 per cent of the levels prevalent in 1980. Only Quebec has come forward with a specific program to put into effect its own commitment. I am confident, however, that the other provinces will be following suit before long.

A federal-provincial conference is scheduled for next week, at which time I think each of the provinces will be eager to report to one another, and to me, on their respective progress.

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, will the Minister take a public stand, while the process which he has just announced proceeds, with respect to rejecting in no uncertain terms the request by the American Environmental Protection Agency for an additional three years of study in order to examine a request by the U.S. Judiciary which ordered the agency, in July, to proceed in the interest of Canadian and American forests and resources with respect to acid rain reductions? Will the Minister take a public stand in this regard?

Hon. Tom McMillan (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I am a little puzzled by the question because I have done nothing else but take a public stand on the issue since becoming Minister.

FINANCE

EXCHANGE VALUE OF UNITED STATES DOLLAR—MEETING OF FIVE FINANCE MINISTERS

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops-Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. Yesterday the Minister of State for Finance said that to the best of her knowledge the weekend meeting in Washington to which Canada was not invited was just another routine meeting of Ministers of Finance of the Big Five. United States Treasury officials today said it could be called "a very special meeting conducted in utmost secrecy". Was the Minister of Finance aware of this special meeting? Was he aware of the important agenda items to be discussed at that meeting? Which of the Big Five was representing Canada's interests?

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, let me try to bring the Hon. Member up to date with respect to various events which have been taking place over the years.

Mr. Broadbent: Starting in which century?

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): It will only take a few minutes, Mr. Speaker.

The meeting of the five industrialized countries which took place was part of a long process of meetings which have been going on for a number of years. However, most recently, it has been the culmination of meetings at which I have been in attendance with the IMF, the OECD, and the summit meeting in Bonn which were all directed at the same problem of inflation and divergence of economies and, also, the important problems with respect to exchange rates between various currencies. The particular meeting to which the Hon. Member has referred was supposed to resolve some of those problems as they relate to the five countries.

ABSENCE OF CANADIAN REPRESENTATION

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops-Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, what the Minister has said is interesting since it has been indicated by the office of the Minister of State for Finance that "the thing just hit us", in terms of the topic being discussed at that meeting. My original question to the Minister of Finance was: Because of the important implications which this meeting had for Canada, in terms of a depressed United States currency relative to ours, and the implications of that, who was representing Canada's interests—which of the Big Five?

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I would like to make it clear to the Hon. Member that nine days before the meetings in New York I was in Washington. I met with Secretary Baker, Chairman Volcker of the Federal Reserve, and Chief of Staff Regan in the White House. At each of those meetings I brought to their respective attention the problems which we are facing in Canada, and the importance of the relationship with the United States and those policy matters which we felt important to be dealt with at IMF meetings—at any meetings prior to this.

I should also say to the Hon. Member that the G-Five meetings are normally held at this time of year. They are a prelude to the G-Ten meetings, which are meetings of other industrialized countries. We are part of that process and will continue to be a very important part of that process.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

SELECTION OF NEW HEADQUARTERS SITE

Mr. Reg Stackhouse (Scarborough West): Mr. Speaker, my question for the Minister of Communications is addressed to his Parliamentary Secretary. The City of Scarborough is giving CBC the chance of a lifetime to locate its headquarters in Canada's fastest growing city, at a savings of $95 million. What action will the Government take to assure the taxpayers of Canada that the question of the location of the CBC headquarters is still open and that this proposal will receive objective and thorough consideration?

Mr. Geoff Scott (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank the Hon. Member for his timely question which I know he asks on behalf of other Hon. Members from Scarborough. The Minister of Communications is aware of the proposal by the City of Scarborough. I am informed that the CBC has also been made aware of the Scarborough proposal. The Minister of Communications is certain that the CBC will be giving the proposal all due consideration.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

CANADA-UNITED STATES TRADE TALKS

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Agriculture. It concerns the Canada-U.S. negotiations on free trade. Government documents indicate that the agricultural sector may not be exempt from negotiations on free trade because, in the documents, it is indicated free trade would increase productivity and accelerate the transfer of farmers out of agriculture. As the Minister well knows, without certain programs agriculture would be in a more desperate situation than that which it is in already. Will the Minister assure Canadian farmers that support programs and marketing systems, such as we have in place with respect to dairy and poultry products and Wheat Board commodities, will not be bargaining chips in the Canada-U.S. negotiations on free trade?

Hon. John Wise (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, in response to the Hon. Member's question, those of us who have been involved in the agri-food industry over a number of years would certainly recognize the sensitivity of the industry if we make a decision to go forward. However, I think the Government is determined to bring about a fair and better deal for Canadian agriculture.

STABILIZATION AND INSURANCE PROGRAMS

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, agriculture is facing the worst crisis since the 1930s. Why will the Minister not give a categorical commitment today that programs such as the Western Grain Stabilization Program and the Crop Insurance Program, which are so desperately needed in western Canada, will not be bargained away in the free trade negotiations with the United States?

Hon. John Wise (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, part of the reason we are suffering such a tight situation in the agricultural industry today is because of the fact that for many years the previous Government completely and totally ignored the agri-food industry year after year, after year.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: Two wrongs do not make a right.

Mr. Wise: I hope the Hon. Member would want to take advantage of an opportunity, if the opportunity presents itself, to attempt to eliminate some of the border irritants which have gone on and on and which impact detrimentally on Canadian agriculture. I think that he would want to take advantage of that opportunity.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

CLOSING OF TWO DOMINION TEXTILE PLANTS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Mike Cassidy (Ottawa Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Regional Industrial Expansion and concerns the closing of the two Dominion Textile Plants in Saint-John and in Valleyfield, resulting in the loss of 550 jobs.

In view of the investment by the Canadian taxpayers in these plants, will these decisions of Dominion Textile cause the Government to stop immediately all additional payments to Dominion Textile by the Canadian Industrial Renewal Board and will the Minister immediately undertake an in-depth examination of the management of the grants received by Dominion Textile?

• (1500)

[English]

Hon. Sinclair Stevens (Minister of Regional Industrial Expansion): As the Hon. Member knows, that question was raised earlier. It is under review by the Government.

Mr. Cassidy: Supplementary, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: No.

APPOINTMENT OF INTERNAL ECONOMY COMMISSIONERS

Mr. Speaker: I have the honour to inform the House that the Deputy Speaker, Marcel Danis, the Hon. Ramon John Hnatyshyn, the Hon. Robert de Cotret, the Hon. Herb Gray, the Hon. Robert Howie, Gerry St. Germain, the Hon. André Ouellet and Ian Deans have been appointed to act with the Speaker of the House as members of the Board of Internal Economy for the purposes and under the provisions of Chapter 39 of the Statutes of Canada, 1985, entitled An Act to Amend the House of Commons Act.

PRIVILEGE

DRAFT DOCUMENT—TASK FORCE ON FREE TRADE

Mr. Speaker: I am in receipt of a Notice of a Question of Privilege from the Hon. Member for Hamilton East (Ms. Copps).

Ms. Copps: Mr. Speaker, I have written to you on a question of privilege and I have raised it at the earliest possible opportunity.

It came to my attention recently that there is in existence a Government document, supposedly a draft document, produced in September of 1985 by the Communications Task Force on Free Trade appointed by the Prime Minister's Office, which violates my privileges as a Member of Parliament.

On page 8 of the document, it states, and I quote:

> Members whose ridings can be expected to benefit from the initiative will likely be under a complicated and conflicting set of pressures. These can be productively exploited.

The document continues and specifically targets myself for attention, and I quote:

> As examples . . . Sheila Copps, whose Hamilton, Ontario riding has the steel industry to represent—

I believe this to be a violation of my privileges as a Member of Parliament and draw to your attention to Beauchene's Fifth Edition, Citation 67 and Citation 71. Citation 67 states, and I quote:

> It is generally accepted that any threat to a Member, attempting to influence his vote or his actions as a Member, is a breach of privilege.

Citation 71 states, and I quote:

> Direct threats which attempt to influence Members' actions in the House are undoubtedly breaches of privilege.

I conclude, Mr. Speaker, by stating that if you find a prima facie breach of privilege, I am prepared to move the necessary motion.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Mr. Speaker, I do not have a long presentation to make to you, Sir, because it is clear that the Hon. Member has no case of privilege at all on the basis of the information she has brought forward.

The Hon. Member refers to an alleged document which she has in her possession which I have not seen and upon which I am not able to comment except to say that I believe the Hon. Member will recall that when reference was made in this House to a document of similar ilk, there was an indication that there was no knowledge on the part of the Government as to where this document came from, what it was, and in fact there was absolutely no acceptance of it as a document or despatch of the Government. We are going to look into these matters, whether they be by way of press reports or synopses or documents of which I have no knowledge. I think that is not the basis upon which any prima facie case can be established and, accordingly, I would ask you to rule in this instance that there is not a prima facie case.

There has been no demonstration, even from what I have heard, Mr. Speaker, of any suggested threat against any Hon. Member. If that were the case, certainly with respect to polls being taken as to whether or not a Member of Parliament is accepted or not accepted, the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Turner) would be first in line, because apparently he is having polling done as to which Ministers are the most formidable in this House, and I do not feel threatened at all.

Mr. Speaker: The Hon. Member for Hamilton East (Ms. Copps) did in fact send me notice of her intention to raise her question. It is a serious accusation and I fully intend to reserve and give the matter the proper attention it deserves.

If I may say to the Hon. Member, just as a matter of form, the Hon. Member has quoted from a document and I would ask her, please, in order to bring her complaint within the form, to provide me in my chambers with a copy of the document.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Hon. Ray Hnatyshyn (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I wish to announce the business for this afternoon and, indeed, into tomorrow.

Mr. Gauthier: You announced that yesterday. Have you changed your mind again?

Mr. Hnatyshyn: I know the Hon. Member for Vanier—

Mr. Gauthier: Ottawa-Vanier.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: —the Hon. Member for Ottawa-Vanier (Mr. Gauthier) missed me yesterday. I had some discussions with the Opposition House Leaders, Mr. Speaker, concerning the matter of the order of business and, in order that we can proceed with items of business and that there be no misunderstanding on the part of anyone, we have changed the order of business now to continue to deal with Bill C-71, an Act to amend the customs tariff. Bill C-72 will be the next Bill, which is an Act amending the statute law and the Income Tax Act and the Tax Court of Canada Act. Bill C-73 will be the next item of business, which is an act to validate certain ordinances in the Yukon Territory and the Northwest Territories. That will be followed by Bill C-74, an Act to amend the Constitution Act, 1867, and the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act. Then Bill C-55, an Act to amend the Immigration Act.

Discussions will continue, Mr. Speaker, and if there be a change in that sequence of business, or any other item is brought forward, I will rise in my place and make an appropriate announcement so that all Hon. Members will be apprised at the earliest date.

Mr. Deans: Mr. Speaker, I just want to say that that is in fact what resulted from conversations and discussions we had this morning. I am pleased to return to the orderly way of doing business.

PETITIONS

FULL INDEXATION OF FAMILY ALLOWANCES AND CHILD TAX CREDIT

Mrs. Thérèse Killens (Saint-Michel-Ahuntsic): I have the honour to present a petition from residents of my constituency of Saint-Michel-Ahuntsic and of Beauharnois, Papineau and Rosemont. They ask the Government to review its position and to re-establish full indexation of family allowances and the child tax credit for all Canadian families.

I therefore ask the Government and the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Epp) to consider the concerns of these people and to take action to correct this injustice.

Mr. Speaker, I have more petitions from residents of the Hochelaga-Maisonneuve constituency and of Saint-Denis. The petitioners humbly sheweth that, while the Prime Minister promised Canadian citizens during the 1984 electoral campaign to maintain full indexation of family allowances and the child tax credit, cut backs of $55 million will be effected in family assistance benefits if the Government does not review its budgetary measure, that it is unacceptable that the Canadian Government—

Mr. Speaker: If I may interrupt, I believe that the Hon. Member is well aware that it is forbidden to read the petition, but that she may give a brief summary.

Mrs. Killens: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, the summary is as follows: That the Government of Canada make the necessary changes so that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Wilson) can amend the budgetary measures to maintain full indexation of family allowances and the child tax credit.

Mr. Speaker, I have a third petition from constituents of Longueuil, of Laval and of Gamelin. These residents and petitioners also ask this Government to review its position and to reestablish full indexation of family allowances and the child tax credit for all Canadian families.

This is the last petition, Mr. Speaker! It comes from the federal constituencies of Gamelin and Rosemont in Quebec. The petitioners are also disappointed by the Government's decision to de-index family allowances and the child tax credit. They pray the Government to review its position and to reestablish full indexation of family allowances and the child tax credit.

Hon. Jean Lapierre (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, I also have a number of petitions given to me by the people of Lotbinière and Mégantic-Compton who cannot rely on their Members of Parliament to represent them in the House. They asked me to act on their behalf and present a petition to urge the Government of Canada to restore the full indexation of family allowances and of the child tax credit.

Mr. Speaker, if there were only the people of Lotbinière and Mégantic-Compton, it would not be too bad, but a lot of ridings have asked us to represent them here. The people of Rosemont, among others, were unable to get in touch with their Member, so they asked me to act on their behalf and present a petition to urge the Government of Canada to restore the full indexation of family allowances and of the child tax credit.

As you can see for yourself, Mr. Speaker, there are a lot of dissatisfied people in Rosemont, for I have here another petition from residents of Rosemont who have asked me to present this petition to you where they urge the Government of Canada to restore the full indexation of family allowances and of the child tax credit.

I have another petition from Rosemont, Mr. Speaker. There are a lot of dissatisfied people in that riding. They too have told me they insist that the Government of Canada should restore the full indexation of family allowances and of the child tax credit.

Now, Mr. Speaker, a petition from the people of Montreal-Sainte-Marie who first told me how proud they are of their Member of Parliament, adding that they agree with him when he urges the Government of Canada to restore the full indexation of family allowances and of the child tax credit.

Mr. Speaker: Does the Hon. Member have other petitions to present on the same subject?

Mr. Lapierre: It is different, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: The Hon. Member well knows that he has the right to name the constituency or to present petitions to the House. That is all that is needed. I cannot allow the Hon. Member to continue with such a list, except if he wants to name other constituencies. Is that the case? He only wants to name other constituencies?

Mr. Lapierre: Yes, Mr. Speaker. The residents of Saint-Léonard-Anjou would never have forgiven me had I not told you that they too are dissatisfied, as is another group—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Hon. Member is fully aware of the Standing Orders of the House concerning petitions. If he has a series of petitions on the same subject, all he has to do is rise and indicate the number of petitions and where they come from in Canada. A brief summary is allowed, but not for each petition. I know the Hon. Member is aware of that. The Hon. Member for Montreal-Sainte-Marie (Mr. Malépart).

Mr. Jean-Claude Malépart (Montreal-Sainte-Marie): Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to present to the House a number of petitions from confederations and family agencies representing millions of Quebec families in which the Prime Minister is asked to reinstate full indexation of family allowances and the child tax credit, and who are asking the Prime Minister not to cut $55 million from family assistance programs.

Mr. Speaker, of course, the people of that great riding of Montreal-Sainte-Marie have asked me to table a petition in which they humbly pray the Right Hon. Prime Minister to refrain from cutting family allowance payments and the child tax credit.

Mr. Speaker, I have another petition from the people of the riding of Rosemont. They want to know and are asking the Right Hon. Prime Minister to reinstate full—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Did the Hon. Member say three times: "a petition to the Prime Minister"?

Mr. Malépart: No.

Mr. Speaker: No? Now I would like to know whether these petitions are addressed to the House.

Mr. Malépart: To the House.

Mr. Speaker: Thank you.

Mr. Malépart: Mr. Speaker, I will repeat this for the record. The petitions are addressed to the House and they are asking the House to humbly pray the Prime Minister.

Mr. Speaker, I have another petition from a beautiful riding, whose people are a long way from Ottawa and Montreal, from the people of Chicoutimi and Sherbrooke, who also humbly pray the House that all Members urge the Prime Minister to reinstate full indexation of family allowance payments and the child tax credit and to refrain from cutting $55 million from the income assistance program for families with children.

Mr. Speaker, from a beautiful region of Quebec, from the people of Trois-Rivières. They too have asked and urged us and all Members of the House to invite the Government to restore the full indexation of family allowances and to refrain from cutting $55 million from income support programs for families with children.

Mr. Speaker, I conclude with the people of my neighbouring constituency, the fair constituency of Hochelaga-Maisonneuve. Feeling like they have been abandoned by their Member, unfortunately, the residents of Hochelaga-Maisonneuve and Rosemont want all Members of the House to ask the Prime Minister to restore the full indexation of family allowances and of the child tax credit.

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa-Vanier): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise and present to the House a petition signed by many residents of my constituency of Ottawa-Vanier who now exercise their ancient and unchallenged right and ask the House to urge the Prime Minister to restore the full indexation of family allowances and of the child tax credit.

Mr. Speaker, I have another petition, this time signed by many residents of the constituency of Ottawa-Carleton, who now exercise their ancient and unchallenged right and ask the House of Commons to bring pressure to bear on the Government and the Prime Minister so they will restore the full indexation of family allowances and of the child tax credit.

Mr. Speaker, I will not take advantage of the House, I have another petition, the last one today, a petition which comes from the Ottawa region generally in which the petitioners urge the House to fully restore such Government programs as family allowances and the child tax credit, and they also ask for the full indexation of family allowances and of the child tax credit.

Mr. Alain Tardif (Richmond-Wolfe): Mr. Speaker, many constituents, many people also came to my office to bring petitions, especially two from Montreal-Mercier and Rosemont wherein the petitioners strongly deplore the Government's insistence on wanting to deindex family allowances and tax credits. They urge the Government to reconsider the situation and to grant full indexation.

Another petition from Montreal-Sainte-Marie and Hochelaga-Maisonneuve in which the people again blame the Government for its savage attack against family allowances.

I have two more petitions, Mr. Speaker, the last ones, whereby the petitioners voice their objections to deindexation of family allowances and see in this shameful measure a sign that the universality of social programs might eventually come under review. Those people ask the House and all Hon. Members to reconsider the situation so as to maintain full indexation.

Mr. Fernand Robichaud (Westmorland-Kent): Mr. Speaker, I also am honored to present petitions to this House and I can tell you there is quite a wave of protest somewhat similar to the one experienced last spring when there was an attempt by the Government to deindex old age security pensions. So the people in my constituency, the people in Shédiac, are joining the people in Rosemont, in Sainte-Marie, in Verchères, in Hochelaga-Maisonneuve, and all these people, Mr. Speaker, are asking the Government not to proceed with partial deindexation of family allowances.

REPRESENTATION AND ELECTORAL DISTRICTS READJUSTMENT ACT (ONTARIO)

MEASURE TO ENACT

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-249, an Act to readjust the representation of Ontario in the House of Commons and to readjust the electoral districts in Ontario.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House that the Hon. Member shall have leave to introduce the Bill?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Foster: Mr. Speaker, this Bill is designed to maintain the representation from northern Ontario, which occupies 88 per cent of the land mass of the great Province of Ontario, of 11 Members of Parliament as it now exists. We believe that the present Government legislation before the House threatens this representation and, thus, the entire representation by Members of Parliament from northern Ontario.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to, Bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

PERSONAL USE OF CAR

Question No. 310—Mr. Gagliano:

Are any moneys paid out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund to the Minister of State (Small Businesses) for the use of his car and driver other than for government business and, if so (a) is the Minister's Chief of Staff driven in the car when not accompanying the Minister on official business (b) does the Minister take the car on private trips and does this include trips either to or in his Constituency (c) what other uses are made of the car and driver and on what occasions?

Hon. André Bissonnette (Minister of State (Small Businesses)): No. (a) No. (b) Yes. Cabinet Ministers may make personal use of the departmental vehicle assigned to their offices for official use. They must declare their intended personal use of the vehicle and such use must be paid for on the basis of a kilometric/mileage rate. Cabinet Ministers must report all personal use, from which a taxable benefit is calculated and added to their taxable income at the end of each taxation year. (c) None.

CUSTOMS TARIFF

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed from Monday, September 23, consideration of the motion of Mr. Epp (for the Minister of Finance) that Bill C-71, an Act to amend the Customs Tariff, be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee.

Mr. Stan J. Hovdebo (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity to say a few words on this particular Bill. I would like to approach this topic of customs tariff from the direction in which we seem to be moving with regard to trade with other countries, particularly with the United States.

Just a week or two ago I spoke to a number of Congressmen and asked specifically about their position on trade. From those to whom I spoke I got the very distinct impression that there is a real mood for protectionism among Congressmen. A number of those Congressmen are not only in a protectionist mood, but have moved in that direction. Consequently, before we pass Bills such as C-71, we should consider the entire subject of trade. I think it is wrong for the Government to proceed with changes in the trade structure without knowing the direction in which we are moving.

Right now there are nearly 300 pieces of legislation before Congress which contain protectionist measures for a variety of industries in the United States. In considering Bill C-71, which changes the customs tariff on a number of products coming into Canada, we must recognize that the rules are changing. It somehow seems incongruous on our part to eliminate the small tariffs we have in some areas before we know the basis upon which trade will be carried out in the future.

When I was speaking to those Congressmen I got the very distinct impression that they are very concerned that they are not in the best possible position regarding the General Agreement on Trade and Tariffs which is presently in place. They are concerned that the commitment that Congress has made over the years toward free trade is no longer the direction in which Congress or the Senate wants to go, and that in this particular case the administration is not going to win. The constitution of the United States allows two-thirds of Congress to force legislation through not allowing the President of the United States the power of veto. Congressmen to whom I spoke feel that they have more than a two-thirds majority supporting them in Congress. Consequently, they feel quite secure that their protectionist direction is going to be upheld.

With protectionism rampant in the United States, Mr. Speaker, why are we eliminating the small protection that we have? Free trade seems to be a favourite topic among Cabinet Ministers at this time. It is a whole new area of concern and we do not know what the effects of free trade would be. It is all very well to say that we will get certain products cheaper if we have free trade, but it may also mean that those products will no longer be made in Canada. We do not know what the trade missions to Canada mean when they say that all they want is a level playing field. We have no idea what is meant by a level playing field in terms used by the United States. Does it mean that our relations with other countries with which we trade now, other than the United States, will be the same as those that other countries have with the United States? Are we going to find ourselves operating under the same kind of restrictions which the States presently operate on in its relations with many countries? Is that what is called a level playing field? Will we have the same access to markets that are presently our markets now, or will that access disappear?

In passing Bills like Bill C-71, we are going along a route that is not necessarily the route we will have to look at tomorrow. Why give away what we have before we know what the future is going to do for us? Let us slow down the process of changing tariffs until we know what the new rules are going to be. If we give away what little leverage we have, we will find ourselves without any weapons or any basis to say to any country that we want to keep Canadian industry going. Let us not give away the leverage we have by casually passing every customs tariff change that is brought forward by this Government.

I recognize that customs tariff changes were part of negotiations that we got into long before the present Government came into power. They were part of a direction decided many years ago, but decided when the rules were know, not decided under the circumstances we now find ourselves.

We keep being told that what we need is a level playing field. I am from a heavily agricultural area. I want to know before we start negotiating away our present tariffs that that level playing field will not negate our agricultural boards; for instance, the dairy commission, the poultry commission, and the Canadian Wheat Board. Those boards are very important to the continued stability of the agricultural industry across Canada. Will those boards disappear because the U.S. will demand a level playing field?

What do we know about the negotiations? What about things like stabilization for farmers and crop insurance, elements that are very important to the stable and continued development or even continued production in many farm areas? If you do not have stabilization and insurance, more farmers will go bankrupt than are going bankrupt now. If those things are not in place, many parts of our industry will disappear. Before we go ahead with casually passing Bills that will change the rules or the protection we have, let us be sure we know the rules we will be playing under next month or next year.

Although this Bill does not affect us a great deal, I think we should be careful about it. I expect this Bill will be passed, but nevertheless we should be very careful in our understanding of the rules by which we play. We should be very careful that the direction we are going is one that we control. Instead of tearing down the protection we have, we should be looking at areas where fair and free trade are taken into consideration, where we can protect ourselves from the large colossus to the south.

I wonder what a level playing field will be. A U.S. team is made up of 10 players. Canada's team is made up of one player. The U.S. is 10 times as large as Canada. Granted, if you kick the ball you have 10 places to kick it; but you only have one if you are in Canada. The whole process of free trade must be looked at very carefully within the bounds of what we have to keep us operating as we are now.

I just wanted to put those points on the record. When we start talking about trade, let us be sure we know the rules under which we will operate in the future.

Mr. Taylor: Mr. Speaker, I have one or two comments. I hardly know what the Hon. Member means when he says "Let's keep what we have and let's not give anything away". At the present time a number of my constituents are having difficulty. There is some rule that states a person must go to the customs office himself or have a broker go to pick up a parcel. One professional living in Strathmore has to hire a broker at $40 an hour, because he could not leave his practice, to pick up what was a $25 parcel. If that is keeping what we have, I do not go for that at all. The Minister is looking at such things and he should be able to change them.

Second, the Hon. Member has mentioned "giving away" several times. I do not know what he means by "giving away". If this is now going to eliminate the custom's charge that has been placed on the chassis of a fertilizer machine, we are not giving anything away. We are simply making it more reasonable for our farmers to operate. The Hon. Member coming from an agricultural area surely knows that farmers cannot pass on those costs. They have to absorb them, adding to the cost of producing food.

I think the Minister is very wise to bring in these measures. Many of the articles that I see in this Bill are protecting items made in Canada. We are not discussing free trade here at the present time. We are discussing the situation as it is. Certainly I do not agree with everything the way it is right now, but a lot of these changes are very good. Some of the changes will help people to get work. Doing away with customs charges on cutting machines for coal mines, for instance. These are very expensive machines not made in Canada. They come in from other countries. By eliminating that duty, that may enable many of our coal mines to get started again. We have a tremendous amount of coal and very little of it is being mined today.

I do not understand what the Hon. Member means when he says, "Let's keep what we have". Let us change and make things fair and sensible is what I say.

Mr. Hovdebo: Mr. Speaker, I too can quote a litany of cases where the process under which customs charges have been put into place and administrated has been unfair. I recognize that. I think the Hon. Member for Bow River (Mr. Taylor) really underlines the point that I was trying to make, that in many cases I wish we did not have customs duties. We could get things cheaper for the whole agricultural industry. If we look at this on the basis of national interest, making things available cheaper right now might sound like a good thing.

The direction we are going is based on rules put in place 15 years ago when we started the GATT negotiations. We established the direction in which we were going, and we continued in that direction because free trade was a basis of the GATT negotiations. However, if we change the ground rules, we become the same to the rest of the world as the United States. We eliminate the possibility of trading with other countries and perhaps we will have to go in another direction in order to start protecting what we have. Although our direction before seemed acceptable, it is not necessarily acceptable under new rules if we start a free trade direction in the future. Let us not eliminate the structure which is in place that allows Customs duties to be charged on certain items. We must not eliminate that, because tomorrow we may be going in the other direction. The United States has demanded a level playing field in its free trade negotiations because it has protections in place which it may not want to give away.

Mr. Angus: Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Hon. Member. During his remarks he made reference to the possible impact of the level playing field concept on the Canadian Wheat Board. As someone from Thunder Bay, a major port on the St. Lawrence Seaway, I was wondering whether he could expand his arguments and indicate what dangers he would foresee for Thunder Bay and therefore the movement of grain in a level playing field concept?

Mr. Hovdebo: Mr. Speaker, my concern is that Canadian farmers do not have the same kinds of subsidies as American farmers. Therefore they do not have the same ability to sell their grain as their counterparts in that country. We feel that both farmers should be on the same level in the playing field concept.

Farmers in the United States would love to have the Canadian Wheat Board or some similar organization through which to sell their grain. If farmers in the United States sell their grain after harvest, they might receive $2.50, whereas if there is a shortage six months later, it might be as high as $8. In Canada that is levelled out and every farmer receives $4.50 or something in the middle. Farmers go broke in the U.S. because they sold at the wrong time. This does not happen in Canada. If that protection does not remain, we will return to the system of handling grain where the longer one holds on to it, the better price one receives. If farmers were doing well in that case, Thunder Bay would receive much more grain than it could handle at the end of the season, but at the beginning of the season there would be none. That was one of the problems which led to the establishment of the Canadian Wheat Board and it led to the granaries of farmers being full when Thunder Bay was empty. Those are the types of things which might be affected by the level playing field concept.

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to participate in this debate. A number of issues were raised by the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Lanthier) when he launched the amendments to the Customs Tariff Act. In his comments he pointed to the need for certain Government measures to protect, for example, Canadian domestic automobile markets from the rising tide of protectionism. Obviously this begs a question as to what our country will do on the issue of free trade.

As the Hon. Member for Hamilton East, I happen to represent the most industrialized riding in Canada. I should like to shed some light on Canadian experiences with respect to the so-called free trade by referring to the steel industry. In a Government document which was exposed in the House last Friday, the Prime Minister's Office suggested that somehow I, as Hon. Member for Hamilton East, could not fight any kind of free trade initiative simply because it would be embarrassing to me from the point of view of my constituency.

In fact, the Government suggested that other Hon. Members and myself should be exploited because of our particular industrialized constituencies. I tell the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) and his Government that as the Hon. Member for Hamilton East, the most industrialized riding of Canada, I have no hesitation in telling them to proceed cautiously. I have seen to what the so-called free trade agreement with the United States in the steel industry led. By all accounts, Canadian steel makers are fair and free trading partners with the United States. They had to spend $1 million in 1984 specifically to protect their interest in respect of the rising tide of U.S. protectionism when it came to the importation of Canadian steel. What was the result of that expenditure of $1 million? When the Prime Minister came back from the Shamrock Summit—and I think for the first time he put "sham" back into the word "shamrock"—he was gloating. He told Canadians that we had a new relationship with the United States, that the President and he were buddy-buddy. The President does not know it, nor do the major monetary partners. In any case, the Prime Minister of Canada was to get the message across that we are fair and free trading partners in steel.

However, the record in the first seven months of 1985 has shown that the bended-knee approach of the Prime Minister in negotiations with the President of the United States is simply not working. If we examine one specific sector, that is the steel sector, we see quite clearly that in the first seven months of this year shipments of Canadian steel to the United States in a fair and free trading market were down 9.3 per cent. Half that reduction in shipment was a direct result of Canadian industry, in response to rising American protectionism, voluntarily cutting back on its imports. Also in the first months of the mandate of a Prime Minister who was to have a wonderful and productive relationship with the President of the United States, we see that the Canadian share of the U.S. steel market has dropped from 3.2 per cent to 3 per cent. Sources within the U.S. steel industry would like to see that percentage further reduced to 2.4 per cent. Instead of the Prime Minister and the Government spending money on developing sophisticated communications documents in an attempt to infringe upon the responsibilities of opposition Members, they should tell the House why, in light of this new relationship between the President of the United States and the Prime Minister of Canada, the Canadian share of the steel market was reduced this year as a direct result of those measures. Why is it that the Canadian Government is not responding to American measures which would see a loss, if in fact the Canadian share of the U.S. steel market was reduced to 2.4 per cent, as suggested by certain sources in the U.S. steel industry, of almost 6,000 Canadian jobs? Where are the Prime Minister and the Government when it comes to fighting the rising tide of U.S. protectionism?

The Prime Minister did not comment in the House today on press reports dealing with the response of the President of the United States to protectionism. He is setting up a $300 million American war chest to help U.S. exporters compete against subsidized foreign exports in markets abroad. We saw, in fact, the U.S. response when it came to consulting Canada on the devaluation of the U.S. dollar. Was the Prime Minister of Canada even in the picture? Was the Minister of Finance (Mr. Wilson) at the meeting? Was the Minister of State for Finance (Mrs. McDougall) involved in a decision which could obviously impact very directly on steel jobs and other jobs in the so-called international market between Canada and the United States, and I think of the auto market? Where was Canada when it came to this new, important role as espoused by the Prime Minister when he went to New York and said, "We are open for business".

In fact, the blind, bended knee, hands on approach of the Prime Minister with respect to embracing the notion of free trade is just another example of the Schefferville solution to Canada's economic problems. I would suggest to the Prime Minister and to his colleagues, whether they be the tuna tacticians in his office or other experts in communications, that they should spend less time trying to verbally assassinate the Opposition in documents such as the one which was given to the Speaker today.

I am not surprised. We heard about the interview that the Prime Minister gave to Fortune Magazine in which he said quite clearly that in his opinion Canadians cannot compete. I am not surprised when there is this kind of second rate, second class mentality that he suggests in this document that the strategy for selling free trade should rely less on educating the general public than on getting the message across that trade initiative is a good idea—in other words, a selling job.

The so-called public support generated for the Prime Minister's grand scheme of global free trade negotiations should be recognized as extremely soft and likely to evaporate rapidly if the debate is allowed to get out of control, and thereby erode the central focus of the message. Talk about doublespeak, talk about Orwellian overtones of political and media manipulation. In fact the Prime Minister, through this document, through his office, has suggested that we should attempt to contain debate on the most important issue that is facing this country in this decade and that is the question of free trade.

The Hon. Member asks what this has to do with the Customs and Excise tax. Presumably, Mr. Speaker, I am following along the debate which was opened—I understand the Hon. Member for Burlington (Mr. Kempling) is commenting on the validity of what this has to do with the question at hand. I would like to refer him to Hansard, page 6868, Commons Debates, September 23, in which the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance is suggesting that one of the reasons for the speedy passage of Bill C-21 is because the protectionist trend typical of international exchanges today demands our serious attention. Presumably we are attempting to respond to that attention by comments here in the House.

When you look at specific comments from the Government's communications strategy it is unfortunate that the Government does not want to have a full, fair and free debate on the issue of free trade. He states:

> Members whose own ridings can be expected to benefit from the initiative will likely be under a complicated and conflicting set of pressures. These can be productively exploited. Research should be undertaken to identify economic and trade interests of the 70 ridings now held by the two Opposition Parties as well as those held by the Government.

He goes on to further state:

> With respect to individual members of the Liberal Party, a survey of key members and constituencies will identify circumstances where non-support of the government's initiative would be either difficult or hypocritical. As examples, the riding of the Leader of the Opposition, the Right Honourable John Turner, is in the Province of British Columbia—a province whose forest resource sector must ensure and enhance trade opportunities in the United States and which is currently coming under fire from congressional and individual state protectionist policies; Sheila Copps, whose Hamilton, Ontario riding has the steel industry to represent, and Don Johnston whom in the previous Liberal administration leadership campaign was a key spokesperson for economic enhancement and increased trade relations with the United States.

I suppose I should be flattered to be considered in the Government's document as a so-called member of a key constituency. Obviously the constituency of Hamilton East is the constituency in Canada which is key when it comes to international trade, but I further point to the example of the trail of broken promises and the trail of protectionist policies which has led in the first seven months of this year to a reduction of almost 10 per cent in the amount of Canadian steel that has been exported to the United States.

I know the Government Members would love to hearken back to the sins of past Liberal administrations, to point the finger at us as they have done with the demise of the Canadian Commercial Bank, a sin which hangs solely on their backs, I might add. However, I want to tell the Hon. Member that in fact the reduction in steel exported to the United States has occurred as a direct result of this Government's refusal to act and its refusal to say to the United States Congress as well as to the President of the United States that we are, we have been and we will continue to be fair trading partners. For the Prime Minister to suggest that this somehow—

Mr. Brisco: Hogwash.

Ms. Copps: Hogwash? You don't feel we are fair trading partners? If the Hon. Member does not believe that the Canadian steel industry has been a fair trading party I would urge him to stand in his place and correct the record because he will find from every major steel industry, from Hamilton, from Sault Ste. Marie, from Cape Breton Island and across the country that Canada has constantly been pointed out as one trading partner which has been fair with the United States. We are not dumping our steel. We are selling our steel productively in the United States on a competitive basis, more competitive than any other nation in the world.

If the Hon. Member has information to show otherwise I would suggest that he have the guts to table it in the House. He does not have the guts because he knows that the Canadian steel industry has been competitive.

What has been our thanks for that from the U.S. Congress? What has been our thanks from the U.S. Government? A further reduction in Canadian exports to the United States and a cut into the market share which is further exacerbated and if continued, if accelerated, could lead to the loss of almost 6,000 Canadian jobs in the steel industry. Contrast that with a Prime Minister who goes to the President on bended knee and says, "Please, Mr. President, will you join us with fair trading and free trading practices in other arenas? Will you, in fact, be prepared to consider discussing with us free trade in a number of other sectors untouched, for example, by auto industry and steel industry fair trading practices? Will you, Mr. President, consent to speak with us on these issues?"

The Prime Minister of Canada has sold out his deck before he has even played his first card on the free trade issue. I would suggest if anyone wants to do an analysis—

Mr. Brisco: Garbage.

Ms. Copps: Garbage. The Hon. Member again says garbage and I wish I could identify the Hon. Member, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Brisco: Your memory isn't long enough.

Ms. Copps: My memory isn't long enough? It is unfortunate that we do not hear much from a lot of the Government Members, 211 though they may be. I have not heard from them on the family allowances debate. I have not heard from them on the Customs and Excise debate. I have not heard from them on the free trade debate although we did see one Hon. Member stand up and speak his piece very eloquently during Question Period today. The reason we do not hear from most of them, Mr. Speaker, is because just like the surfers they came in with the tide, they are here to collect a pay cheque and they are not fighting for the interests of their constituents over and above political considerations. I would suggest that is true of some of those Members with the exception, of course, of the Fisheries Minister who had the guts to tell the truth in the House of Commons, and we saw where that got him. He got sacked. He got axed. He got dumped. He got canned by the Prime Minister because he had the guts to tell the truch on who was responsible for the tuna scandal. But what do we hear from the other Members? Silence, abject defeat, dejection. They are not prepared to stand up to the Prime Minister when they know these series of events were not stated quite correctly in the House.

Mr. Speaker, back to the issue at hand. If the Hon. Members on the Government side of the House has facts which can dispute my analysis of the steel situation he should so inform this House. The Prime Minister signed a handwritten letter which went to every constituent in my riding saying, "Don't vote for me, vote for your Conservative candidate because your Conservative candidate is going to be there fighting for steel jobs with me". The proof of the pudding is in the eating. Since he has become the Prime Minister, the percentage of the Canadian market share of sales to the United States for the steel industry has dropped by almost 10 per cent. Why should we take the word of the Prime Minister on free trade negotiations when he cannot even clean up the mess that is being made in his own backyard with respect to the protectionist tendencies in the United States?

The record is clear. The reduction in the market share that Canadians now hold in the U.S. steel industry should be a flag cautioning those Members, and in particular the Prime Minister, who are willing to barrel holus-bolus into a global negotiated free trade agreement without considering who is going to be on the giving end and who is going to be on the receiving end. The question must be one of a far wider, global nature.

What happened to our initiatives in the Far East? What happened to Pacific Rim discussions? What happened to a global trade enhancement that would not pit Canada and the United States against the rest of the world when it comes to certain protectionist measures but would develop a long-term global economy that would allow every economy to compete on an equal footing? Instead, the Prime Minister of Canada, through his office, is attempting to downplay the genuine concerns of Canadians like Premier David Peterson of Ontario. I might add that the number of such Canadians is growing. The more people examine the specific implications of an expanded negotiated free trade agreement with the United States, the more concerns they have.

A valid request of the Prime Minister and Members on the Government side is to table the information. We do not want the Canadian public hoodwinked by communications strategies which talk about undermining legitimate Opposition Members. We do not want the Canadian public steamrollered into an agreement which could impinge on our economic and cultural sovereignty for the next century. We want to have a full and open public discussion and that discussion should be led and not muzzled by the Prime Minister.

Unfortunately, we see that Government Members do not have the political will to embark upon that kind of a discussion. We heard a question today reflecting the concerns of the textile industry and we heard another question today reflecting the concerns of the footwear industry. I know that there are a number of government Members who have been contacted not only by manufacturers in their own ridings but also by employees of those manufacturers.

In the community of Hamilton, Susan's Shoes is the seventh largest employer in the whole area. I know that Susan's Shoes has contacted the Hon. Member for Burlington, the Hon. Member for Hamilton West (Mr. Peterson) and the Hon. Member for Lincoln (Mrs. Martin) to ask them to give the Canadian footwear industry a chance, to save their jobs and to get a fair market share so that the seventh largest employer in the City of Hamilton can be protected. Unfortunately, we do not hear from these Members because they neglect to use their opportunities to speak up in the House on these issues which are of urgent and pressing public importance for all Canadians.

Mr. Brisco: Tell us how many grants they have had.

Ms. Copps: How many grants they have had? As a matter of fact, if the Hon. Member were apprised of the dossier, he would know that it is not seeking grants. Unfortunately, in typical knee-jerk Conservative response, all he can think of is grants. The typical Conservative response is that the private sector will do it all. We know what the private sector did with Inco. We heard what the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Miss MacDonald) had to say about the largest employer in Sudbury. Obviously there comes a time when there must be a mix of a public and private economy. It is unfortunate that the kind of knee-jerk private-sector capitalism as expressed on numerous occasions in this House by a number of Government Members fails to recognize the basic fact that in this country, we have a history of working together.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Order, please. I regret to inform the Hon. Member that her time has expired. Questions or comments?

Mr. Angus: Mr. Speaker, I listened with interest to the Hon. Member's speech. In the Schedule under this Act, there is to be no tariff under general tariffs or general preferential tariffs for machinery and apparatus for use in mining, quarrying, the development of mineral deposits or the processing of ores, metals or minerals and machinery and apparatus for use in the processing, smelting or refining of ores, metals or minerals. What impact does the Hon. Member think it will have on Canada and particularly Ontario that we are still allowing mining machinery to be brought into this country free of charge? Will that in any way help to develop a mining manufacturing facility anywhere in this country?

[Translation]

Ms. Copps: Mr. Speaker, it is clear that if we proceed with the fiscal decisions not to collect tax on all manufactured goods that can be used to process minerals, we will never have in this country a secondary industry manufacturing machinery for the processing of minerals.

Indeed, in Ontario, I know that the City of Sudbury has had in mind for a long time having in this country an industry to manufacture machinery for processing our minerals.

Unfortunately, with free trade in that class of machinery, we would always have machinery from abroad, foreign machinery, that would come here and perpetuate our vision of a Canada that is not a processing country, as was said by our former Prime Minister, but——that we are the hewers of wood and the drawers of water. It seems to me that this particular tax measure which again will facilitate the importation of machinery from the United States and elsewhere will prevent the kind of made-in-Canada processing of minerals that we should be seeing. That simply reinforces what I believe to be the Conservative view of Canadians which is that we are the hewers of wood and the drawers of water. Conservative Members look to the South when it comes to excellence in manufacturing expertise and salesmanship.

The Hon. Member has outlined a point which is very crucial to the ongoing discussion of free trade and that is that we consider ourselves number one. We in the Liberal Party do not believe that we are second-class citizens. We believe that Canada can compete and it has competed in the steel industry. We have constantly had the boots put to us on this particular issue by a number of U.S. trade and tariff barriers and non-tariff barriers. We will continue to fight that even though we believe that the Conservative or Schefferville mentality if one that sees Canadians as the hewers of wood and the drawers of water for American and foreign manufacturing.

CUSTOMS TARIFF

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Epp (Provencher) (for the Minister of Finance) that Bill C-71, an Act to amend the Customs Tariff, be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee.

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex-Windsor): Mr. Speaker, I must begin by saying that this is not the most exciting and dramatic Bill that has come before the House of Commons in the last year, but it does afford us an opportunity to look somewhat critically at the trade policy approaches that this Government has been taking. That is what I would like to do now if I could, Mr. Speaker. I have some specific comments with respect to the Bill as well. I will turn to them in the latter part of my speech. However, I think it striking that the items of concern to the House of Commons with respect to trade which have been brought before us are, for the most part, housekeeping and technical matters which are dealt with in the Bill as opposed to the more dramatic and, hopefully, more effective and more important new directions in trade for which I think a great many people voted a year ago in this country.

Above all, it seems to me that the Government is characterized by a lack of strategy in the area of trade. I can think of three particular illustrations in this regard which face us as a country at the moment. First, if we look at the trade patterns of Canada we will see that our second largest trade partner by far is Japan. That is a demonstration of the tremendous importance of the Pacific Rim countries to the present economic health and to the future economic prosperity of the country. Korea has also emerged as a major trade partner. Indeed, even China has begun to develop as an important potential partner for Canada. Yet, we have not had any type of trade strategy set before us with respect to the Pacific. In fact, during the election campaign the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) talked about the importance, the great priority, which should be attached to Pacific Rim trade. Indeed, many Ministers have taken the Cook's tour of Southeast Asia and the Pacific. I am certain they have had interesting trips. We have seen grand pictures of the Minister of Regional Industrial Expansion (Mr. Stevens) taking part in social occasions in Japan. What we have not had has been any direct and forceful articulation of a strategy to develop those markets more effectively in order that Canada can have the type of benefits from that trade which we need for our economic revival.

Second, beyond the particular parts of the world to which we could point as areas in which we would like trade strategy to lead us, it is clear when we talk of trade concerns that to effectively make our country more competitive, and to open up the potential for trade with other countries, that we need to have in place in our industrial structure the capacity to adjust, to be flexible and to take account of the problems which emerge to face our workers when imports from other countries begin to flow into Canada. It is in this area that we have seen the serious failure of strategy on the part of this Government.

The previous Government put in place a Labour Adjustment Benefits Program which was extended to certain communities which had been hard hit by downturns in the economy or by increased imports. That particular program was extended to cover automotive communities in Ontario between 1978 and 1984. However, the previous Government saw fit to cut off the extension of that program in February of 1984. The result of that move has been that workers who now lose their jobs in automobile parts producing plants in Ontario can no longer turn to the Government for labour adjustment assistance. The people who lose their jobs are often older workers who have long-term commitments to the industry in which they work. We all know from the experiences of workers over 50 years of age who come into our constituency offices just how difficult it is for them to suddenly find new jobs when faced with lay-offs. This is a crucial area in which labour adjustment benefits should be made available. Workers in my constituency who have faced this type of problem, even if they come from plants such as the Champion Spark Plug Co. factory in my constituency, which was eligible for this type of assistance in the past, have not been eligible for assistance from the Government.

I have spoken with the Minister of Labour (Mr. McKnight) with respect to this problem. I have put forward the case on behalf of workers in my constituency as forcefully as possible. However, all the Minister has been able to reply is that he hopes there will be a federal-provincial program to assist such older workers put in place some time within the next eight to nine months. I think that is excellent, if it happens; but there has been no commitment as yet to make certain that it will happen. If we are to have more open trade in the country and if we are to talk about freer trade with the United States, then the unanimous recommendation of the special joint committee which met last summer with respect to the need for better assistance programs has to be put into effect. In this area as well there has not been any leadership shown by this Government.

The same is true with respect to a point raised today by Conservative Members of Parliament. I am speaking of the question of renewal of the quota arrangements for our footwear industry. Our footwear industry has faced serious difficult import pressure for many years. Commitments were made by the Conservative Party, when not in power, that it would respond positively to the problems which the footwear industry has been experiencing. Yet, now, when that industry looks for a commitment from the Government with respect to a renewal of the quota arrangements, and when it looks for better forms of assistance to be put in place, there is no positive message from this Government. There is no sense of strategy and no sense of direction.

We think that sense of direction has to come. It has to be put into effect aggressively. Putting that direction into effect does not consist of pronouncements in favour of freer trade with the United States. The United States has always been, and I am sure it will continue to be, the most important trade partner which this country enjoys. However, it cannot be the solution to our problems. It cannot be the Good Humour man who brings to us some type of easy answer to our economic difficulties. It cannot be the pot of gold at the end of the rainbow which gives us an answer to the great difficulties which our economy is now experiencing. That seems to be the strategy which this Government is adopting. It is a strategy to find the answers and the whole thrust of our trade policy in terms of a new organization of trade liberalization with the United States. As this Bill shows us, tariff levels are already falling on category after category for Canada because of the General Agreement on Trade and Tariffs of which we are a part. Instead of the easy answer that a free trade arrangement with the United States will somehow solve our problems, we have argued that we should be looking at case after case in which the United States, despite the fact that we havetariff free situations, is putting its back to our mechanisms to block us out of access to that market. This has happened with respect to steel and with respect to pork. It has happened with respect to fish products and it has happened as well with respect to a great many parts of our economy which feel the threat of these kinds of protectionist measures in the United States.

We have argued very strongly that the Prime Minister if he has a close relationship, as he suggests he does, with the President of the United States, should be sitting down with that administration and coming up with answers to these particular problems, these threats to our present access to the U.S. market. The priority should be to deal with those problems, to counter those threats, to get support for our producers who are facing that kind of crisis blockage of their access to the United States in so many different parts of our economy.

I think we can do that by establishing a new agency which will assist Canadian and American producers to work out some of their problems. It should be an agency which will provide, for instance, neutral statistics with respect to the sectors which are facing trade problems. In many cases what we have discovered is authorities on both sides of the border having quite different statistics to explain what is happening in the trade context in steel or in lumber. We could get help from that agency to assist us in working out agreements between Canadian and American producers in order to solve our problems. This is what has happened with respect to the steel industry, for instance. It is what we should be doing as a priority with respect to lumber, pork and with respect to fish. If we do not take that approach, Mr. Speaker, we run the danger of entering into negotiations with the United States for freer trade under blackmail conditions and under conditions in which the United States has already initiated backdoor protectionist moves against us. We will have to get the United States to give this up and in return we will have to give up important concessions. Its a mugs game, Mr. Speaker, to enter into negotiations under those conditions.

If we take that approach, if the Prime Minister of this country leads us into negotiations when we face this guillotine, this axe over the heads of many of our important trading sectors, I predict that we will find ourselves a year or two years down the line forced to give up very, very important concessions in order to get some kind of agreement out of the United States. I would predict, for instance, if we enter into a free trade agreement under these blackmail circumstances, we will have to accept informal limitations on our lumber exports to the United States. We will have to cut back the support we provide our fishermen in eastern and western Canada. We will have to give up the protection safeguards in the auto pact which have been so crucial to my community and to thousands of other people across Ontario and Quebec.

If we enter into negotiations for free trade with an axe hanging over our heads, it will not mean job gains. It will mean job losses. In my own constituency, I can see thousands of workers who will lose their jobs if we have to give up the production safeguards in the auto pact. If we have to accept limitations on our lumber exports, it will cost thousands of jobs in British Columbia and Atlantic Canada. If we have to accept a cut-back in support for our fishing industry, that will cost us thousands more jobs as well in Atlantic Canada and British Columbia. We will find our pork farmers across Canada facing more concessions. Free trade, then, Mr. Speaker, under those circumstances, will mean job losses for this country and it will mean the loss of a capacity on our part to take the economic initiatives which can rebuild our economy. We feel that this country can be a magnificent competitive and effective economy, able to export throughout this world, able to win thousands more jobs, but only with a tough, aggressive trade strategy which recognizes just how serious the challenges are in a world in which multinational companies are increasingly making the decisions which shape trade flows.

To tackle that challenge, we are going to need every possible instrument of trade policy we have. We will have to use our tariffs effectively. We will have to use our quotas effectively and we will have to bargain with those international companies just as this Bill itself bargains with those international companies. This Bill has an interesting provision within it. It is the provision that I like to call the Hyundai clause which states that after January 1, 1987, exports from South Korea and other countries which benefit from the GPT will be subject to duty in this country of 6 per cent. That clause has already forced the Hyundai Corporation to accept a commitment to put production into this country of the Pony and Stellar models which have gained such a market in this country. That is the kind of effective, tough trade approach which should be applied not just to Korea. It is very easy for us to be tough on Korea because Korea cannot fight back. What we have to do is take that kind of shrewdness, that kind of use of every policy mechanism we have, to force the giant companies which are making their investment decisions throughout the world to start making those investment decisions in the interests of this country. You cannot do it by simply legislating free trade with the U.S. You have to work at it; you have to be effective, strategic and, above all, tough. I challenge this Government to take that kind of tough, effective, hard-hitting attitude in defining its trade strategy. Above all, I challenge the Government to define that strategy because, so far, it has not.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Questions or comments?

Mr. Angus: Mr. Speaker, having listened to my colleague and his very excellent presentation, I want to pursue the question I asked the previous speaker. In this Bill we have in effect free trade in mining machinery. Not having a mining machinery manufacturing component in this country, I would like to ask the Hon. Member what other avenues are left to Canadians in order to develop that sector? Is it going to take subsidies from the Canadian Government in order to get them on their feet so they can compete, or is it going to be some other mechanism?

Mr. Langdon: Mr. Speaker, I thank my colleague for raising an interesting question. One of the exciting things we learned this past year in looking at the export potential of this country is that there is a very fascinating relationship developing between some of our electronic firms and the Mining Association of Canada. They are attempting to develop an approach to the production in Canada of mining machinery by making use of some of the new high-tech breakthroughs which have occurred in electronic control systems, and adapting those to the specialized equipment we use in our mines. I do not think the way to realize this opportunity is by cutting back all our tariff protection. The answer is to try to work out agreements with the large mining multinationals in this country whereby they commit themselves to purchasing mining machinery in Canada in return for some of the tax assistance they receive from the Canadian Government. We have argued consistently in this House that this kind of conditional tax assistance makes more sense than the unconditional tax give-aways which have characterized both the Liberal and Conservative Governments.

We challenge the Government to help companies like Spar and Inco in carrying forward this development partnership. If that is done there is a potential for a tremendous number of jobs being created in Canada. I do not think it will take direct subsidies of the kind my colleague feared might be necessary, but it does have to be part of a broad and effective industrial strategy which this country has always lacked and which it so desperately needs.

Mr. Brisco: Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member made reference to the need to assist Spar. Does he have any idea of the type of contracts which Spar has handled over the past four or five years? For example, the total value of their contracts for 1985 amounted to $159,345,000. Does he really believe that Spar needs help?

Mr. Langdon: Mr. Speaker, the question that was asked had to do with mining machinery which I am certain my friend realizes is a new field for Spar. Despite that, Spar is quite intrigued with its potential. They have formed a partnership with Inco Corporation to explore this potential. Inco is contributing expertise regarding mining machinery and Spar is contributing expertise in electronic data control systems.

This country imports something in the order of 92 per cent of its mining machinery. To me it is shameful that a country with a mining sector which is so important to its economy has not developed over the years the capacity to supply that sector with machinery. I am very pleased to see the private sector taking the lead in this area. That is the kind of good corporate citizenship we on this side hope will come from more private sector companies. I also think, and perhaps this is an area of disagreement between the Party opposite and myself, that it is an important responsibility of Government to offer some leadership and support to the private sector as it takes on new challenges. This kind of partnership between Government and the private sector in areas such as this where we import such a high percentage of equipment is one way of ensuring the creation of thousands of much needed jobs.

Mr. Brisco: Mr. Speaker, I suggest that the Hon. Member look at the business practice of the Canadian industry in this field and compare it to those of the European sector. When equipment utilizing the latest technology is developed in Europe and finds its way to Canada, it goes to the door of a major mine and they are asked to try it out. On the Canadian side, we go to the door of a major mine and say here it is, it costs $150 million, will you buy it? That is the difference. That is why the Europeans have the market.

Mr. Langdon: Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member has demonstrated my point that Government leadership and support is required to open up the imagination of Canadian producers to this massive market. As I said already, this partnership between Spar and Inco is an exciting development and it should make us a more aggressive and more effective player in the mining machinery sector. If that happens, then perhaps some of the inadequacies of past marketing practice with respect to our producers can be overcome. I hope the Hon. Member will join with me in trying to press his Government to take that leadership and remedy some of the problems he has identified.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Questions and comments are now terminated. Is the House ready for the question?

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Mr. Speaker, there have been discussions between the House Leaders of the Parties represented here. I think you will find a disposition to have the following motion accepted at this time without debate. The motion is as follows:

● (1640)

That notwithstanding any Standing or Special Order of this House, when the motion for second reading of Bill C-71, an Act to amend the Customs Tariff, has been disposed of in this day's sitting, the said Bill shall stand referred to a Committee of the Whole and that not later than the end of the time provided for the Government Orders at this sitting, all questions necessary to dispose of the said Bill at the then remaining stages shall be put forthwith without further debate or amendment.

Mr. Guilbault (Saint-Jacques): Mr. Speaker, we on this side of the House would like to co-operate with the Government House leader (Mr. Hnatyshyn) and certainly would not object to this particular Bill going to a Committee of the Whole. However, with regard to completing the debate by five o'clock, which is part of the motion, I am afraid that in view of the great interest which the subject has elicited on the floor of the House of Commons, it may not be easy to agree to that particular part. I think it will be a fact of life that it will simply not happen. Maybe the Government House Leader would like to rephrase—

Mr. Hnatyshyn: That was my understanding of the arrangement, otherwise we will go to a legislative committee.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): There does not seem to be unanimous consent. Is the House ready for the question?

Some Hon. Members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Mr. Epp (Provencher) (for the Minister of Finance) seconded by Mr. MacKay, moves that Bill C-71, an Act to amend the Customs Tariff be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to, Bill read the second time and referred to a legislative committee.

TAX COURT OF CANADA ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

Hon. Elmer M. MacKay (for the Minister of State (Finance) moved: That Bill C-72, an Act to amend the statute law relating to income tax and to make a related amendment to the Tax Court of Canada Act, be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee.

Mr. Claude Lanthier (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the purpose of Bill C-72 is to propose certain amendments to the Income Tax Act and to make a related amendment to the Tax Court of Canada Act.

Tax Court of Canada Act

Bill C-72 derives from the notice of ways and means motion tabled in the House of Commons September 9 last. This notice includes under the same cover the measures proposed in two notices of ways and means motions tabled in the House earlier this year. The first, presented last January 30, dealt with contentious assessments, the second, tabled last May 9, contained a great many technical amendments to the Income Tax Act.

The amendments related to contentious assessments are a result of the Government's commitment to allow taxpayers who object to an assessment to delay the payment of contested taxes, interests and penalties until their case has been heard by a trial court. In that respect the Bill provides for repayment of amounts already paid, to the extent that they are the subject of appeal. The proposed amendments relate mainly to three points: first, collection restrictions; second, the repayment of contested taxes; third, preventive measures against abuses of the new system.

Although an assessment established by Revenue Canada under the Act is payable by the taxpayer without delay, the amendments pertaining to collection restrictions provide that no formal collection measure may be taken by Revenue Canada within 90 days of the assessment. During those 90 days the taxpayer may, as is the case now, appeal the decision of the Minister by producing a notice of objection to the assessment.

If a taxpayer does not produce a notice of objection and does not pay the assessed amount, according to the amendments, formal steps to collect this amount may be taken 90 days after the date of assessment. However, if the taxpayer does produce a notice of objection, formal steps to collect the amount in controversy shall be delayed until Revenue Canada has concluded its review of the objection and until the period the taxpayer has to appeal from Revenue Canada's decision on the objection has expired. If a taxpayer decides to appeal before a court, within the 90-day period provided under the Act, to challenge the assessment as confirmed or modified by Revenue Canada, the Bill provides that formal steps to collect the amount in controversy shall again be delayed until the court hands down its final decision.

Should the court's decision be favourable to the taxpayer, the latter must either pay the amount in controversy or provide security for that amount to Revenue Canada, even if he appeals from the decision to a superior court.

As in the present Act, interest on the amounts finally determined payable by the taxpayer is calculated from the date on which those amounts were initially determined to be payable.

In addition to provisions limiting the right of Revenue Canada to commence collection procedures before the taxpayer has had an opportunity to apply to a court, there are certain amendments allowing the taxpayer to ask that the amount in controversy that he has already paid be refunded to him or that the collateral provided for that amount be returned to him until he appeals before a court from the assessment or the new assessment established by the Minister of National Revenue.

Moreover, if Revenue Canada has not replied to an objection filed by a taxpayer within 120 days from the date he served his notice of objection, the taxpayer may ask that the amount in controversy be reimbursed to him or that the security offered by him be refunded, without having to appeal to another court.

In addition, the proposed Bill includes safety features against possible abuses of the new system. Where there are reasons to believe that the granting of a delay could jeopardize the collection of the amounts in controversy, the Bill allows Revenue Canada to take forthwith recovery action. On the other hand, the taxpayer has a right to ask a judge to review the opinion of Revenue Canada that the collection of the amount in controversy would be jeopardized by such a delay.

There is in the Bill another safety clause which authorizes the courts to collect an amount not exceeding 10 per cent of the amount in controversy in the case of an appeal which they deem unfounded and made essentially for the purpose of unduly postponing payment of the amount of an already owed contribution.

Mr. Speaker, the inclusion in the Income Tax Act of provisions dealing with the payment of amounts in controversy is a concrete effort to ensure the equitable application of our tax collection system, based more on a spirit of natural justice than judiciary procedure. Thanks to these provisions, taxpayers will not have to pay taxes which they feel they do not owe as long as their cases have not been heard by an independent court. In other words, the taxpayer will not be deemed guilty until fairly dealt with by the courts. This is a major step in the implementation of a fair and equitable tax collection system for all Canadians.

The other proposals in Bill C-72 have been introduced in the Ways and Means Motion tabled on May 9, 1985. Being for the most part technical, those legislative proposals are aimed at improving and updating the Income Tax Act.

The new overall budgetary objectives had a limiting effect on the number of amendments proposed to the taxation legislation. The result of this is that the most important amendments are part of the budgetary process, while the other required changes however of a technical nature and perhaps secondary and of a lesser economic impact, are often indefinitely deferred. The introduction of a procedure to implement that kind of change outside the budgetary process therefore appears to us to be essential and necessary. The procedure thus chosen is to periodically table an Income Tax Bill providing for subsidiary technical changes. The substantial changes deriving from public and major policy initiatives will remain within the budgetary process.

The amendments proposed in this technical bill have been chosen on the following grounds: first, they dispel uncertainty; second, they include legislative measures of relatively little complexity; third, they have a minor impact on revenues, and fourth, they tackle real problems. Moreover, many amendments improve the currently unsatisfactory French version of the Income Tax Act.

The motion tabled on May 9, 1985, was later referred to the Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Matters. Generally speaking, the committee report is most positive. On the one hand, it unreservedly supports the principle that matters of a technical and administrative nature be treated separately from major policy issues. On the other hand, it comments very favourably on the large number of changes proposed in order to make the French version of the Income Tax Act more accurate.

During the sittings held in early June, the Committee considered each of the changes proposed in the 118 technical clauses of the Bill. Of that number some clauses, in the opinion of the Committee, should be examined more thoroughly by the Government. However, the comments pertaining to six of those seven clauses, far from criticizing the technical amendments involved, dealt with points of policy and administration that clearly go beyond the scope of amendments. Therefore, such matters will not be solved by rewarding the amendments, but will be considered whenever future amendments are proposed within the framework of the budgetary process proper. It should be added that following the Committee's comments, there was one amendment made to the Bill. This is the amendment adding subsection 162(2.1) on the late filing of income tax returns due to corrections made to foreign income tax, and this amendment has therefore been withdrawn.

Furthermore, technical amendments cover a number of other proposals, all of which are also strictly technical and arise from documents and representations received since the Ways and Means Motion was tabled in the House on May 9 of this year.

The Bill before the House today contains many technical amendments relating to a wide range of questions. I shall summarize the most important ones. Deductible charitable donations not deducted in a given year may be carried forward to a subsequent year. Persons afflicted with a total and permanent disability are entitled to roll over a life insurance policy into an annuity, without paying income tax. A taxpayer who buys a house, rents it and subsequently uses it as his principal residence may defer the capital gains accrued during the rental period until the house is sold. Furthermore, he may designate the house as his principal residence during the four last years, or less, of the rental period, in order to be eligible for the exemption from capital gains tax on a principal residence during that period. Moreover, the period allowed to acquire goods tax free as the beneficiary of an estate will be extended from 15 to 36 months. When a corporation reports a loss or tax credit for a previous taxation year, the interest on the tax refund resulting from that report will be calculated from the filing date on the taxpayer's return for the subsequent year. At the present time, the interest is not calculated over the period prior to the final filing date. When a refund is made following overpayment of income tax by a corporation for a given taxation year, any interest will be calculated from the 120th day after year-end and not from the day six months after year-end, as is the case at the present time.

Losses deductible as business investments which cannot be fully deducted will be converted into net capital losses, and will thus be calculated over a longer period.

A corporation will also be able to benefit to a greater extent from the foreign tax credit for a given year by increasing its taxable income for the year and by creating a loss other than a compensatory capital loss, which is then deductible over other years.

A taxpayer will no longer be required to tell his creditor that he has elected to declare every year the interests on his debt; he will simply have to indicate that election in his tax return.

A corporation which, under a tax convention between Canada and another country, is deemed to be a resident of that other country but which would otherwise reside in Canada, will be considered as not being a resident of Canada.

Mr. Speaker, this Bill ought to be considered and passed as soon as possible in the best interest of all Canadians. We would then be in a position to introduce the legislation related to the Budget tabled last May 23. It should be noted that many of the Budget provisions will call for changes in the tax forms of Revenue Canada which must be printed and distributed before the end of the year.

On behalf of all Canadians anxious to benefit from the fairness inherent in our national renewal, we urge all Hon. Members of the House of Commons to act quickly and adopt this Bill, technical though it may be but essential for the well-being of our taxpaying fellow Canadians.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Are there any questions or comments? There being no questions or comments, we will resume debate. The Hon. Member for Gander-Twillingate (Mr. Baker).

Mr. George Baker (Gander-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, only one minute remains but I simply want to say that we have no objections to the technical amendments in this Bill. Some of them are good. I do not think it is an outrageously differing opinion than the hon. gentleman outlined but I have to point out to the hon. gentleman that this Bill also makes an amendment to the Tax Court of Canada Act. We wish to put on the record, perhaps after today's sitting, in more comprehensive terms why we object to not having more substantial changes made to the Tax Court of Canada Act since the Government of Canada has decided to crack down on people collecting unemployment insurance.

The Tax Court of Canada actually deals with the determination on every claim which is made by the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. MacKay). At a time like this when the Government of Canada is cracking down, and perhaps we will have thousands of appeals against a determination made by the Minister of National Revenue go to the Tax Court of Canada, we feel that the Government of Canada should have taken other measures. The determination process should be put right back into the lap of the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Miss MacDonald) and not be kept with the Minister of National Revenue with the extensive changes that are coming in.

Perhaps on the next sitting day I will outline in greater detail the problem with the amendments as they relate to the Tax Court of Canada Act. May I call it five o'clock, Mr. Speaker.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Order, please. It being five o'clock, the House will now proceed with the consideration of Private Member's Business as listed on today's Order Paper.

INCOME TAX ACT

SUGGESTED AMENDMENT RESPECTING WORKMEN'S COMPENSATION BENEFITS

The House resumed from Thrusday, February 14, 1985, consideration of the motion of Mr. Dingwall:

That in the opinion of this House, the Government should consider the advisability of amending the Income Tax Act, in order to eliminate the hardships brought about by previous amendments, which now make Workman's Compensation reportable as "income" for Guaranteed Income Supplement purposes.

Mr. Bruce Halliday (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have an opportunity to speak on this issue again today. I am somewhat surprised that the Hon. Member for Cape Breton-East Richmond (Mr. Dingwall) does not want to bring forward his points again and discuss them in some detail. However, I know his commitment to this subject and I certainly share his feelings.

The history of this problem goes back a number of years. In fact, it is fair to say that all of us in the House have been anxious to see what could be done for old age pensioners and, in particular, to give higher priority to those who are in some kind of special need. As a result, over the years a number of steps have been taken to provide assistance to our pensioners. I think all of us have supported that move, in the main.

For pensioners who have had more difficulty facing the financial demands placed upon them, over the years we have provided two plans which are income-tested and are of special help to them. The first plan is known as the Guaranteed Income Supplement, a supplement to the Old Age Security system. It is income-tested, as I said, and is a means of helping to support those pensioners who are in greater need. More recently we introduced as a second measure of help the spousal allowance program. It is designed to help widows and widowers between the ages of 60 and 64 years who are having difficulty because of low incomes. There has been a commitment on the part of Parliament over the years to support such people.

Now I should like to turn to the history of the motion before the House, its source and the reason for it. Early in 1983, an amendment was passed to the Income Tax Act under the previous Government which required that workers' compensation benefits had to be counted in or regarded as income but were not subject to tax. The fact that they were not subject to tax was of no concern to most pensioners receiving GIS payments. However, approximately 25,000 people who were receiving workers' compensation benefits and were over the age of 65 years were also receiving GIS payments, and the amendment had the effect of reducing significantly the GIS payments; sometimes they were reduced to zero if the benefits they were receiving under the workers' compensation plan were sufficient. A problem arose which came to light in the House, if I remember correctly, sometime in late December, 1983. I recall Mr. Burghardt from London, who was a Member of Parliament at that time, and myself raising this problem in questions in the House before and after Christmas. It was a new problem. Even the officials in the Department of National Health and Welfare in Toronto and London were unaware of it. Not only did we find that we could not receive an answer from the Government of the day, but it had not given the problem any consideration because it was not aware that it was a significant one. A number of Members in the House, including the Hon. Member for Cape Breton-East Richmond and the Hon. Member for Beaches (Mr. Young), raised questions from time to time with the appropriate Ministers of the Government, only to obtain no significant answers of a positive nature in respect of making appropriate changes. Currently the following motion is before the House:

> That, in the opinion of this House, the Government should consider the advisability of amending the Income Tax Act, in order to eliminate the hardships brought about by previous amendments, which may now make Workman's Compensation reportable as "income" for Guaranteed Income Supplement purposes.

As an aside, I notice that the Hon. Member for Hamilton East (Ms. Copps) is not present in the Chamber. According to the Order Paper, she has seconded the motion. I am a little surprised that she seconded a motion using the words "Workman's Compensation" instead of the currently acceptable term "workers' compensation". However, that does not affect the essence of the argument. For her to have missed that point—and I see the Hon. Member for Cape Breton-East Richmond smilling—makes us laugh somewhat. The wording of this motion is such that we really do not need to have a debate at all, because it is already being done. Perhaps that is why the Hon. Member did not rise in his place a few moments ago. The Government is giving serious consideration to the advisability of amending the Income Tax Act. Unfortunately, from my point of view, the officials, along with the Minister, have not yet been able to come to an agreement and understanding as to what would be an appropriate change to make. In a sense the intent of the motion has been fulfilled.

Be that as it may, it might be worth while to review some of the history behind the Guaranteed Income Supplement and how workers' compensation benefits are intertwined with it. In 1966, the Government of the day introduced the Canada Pension Plan to compensate senior citizens and assist them with income during their retirement years. At that time it was felt that the plan would probably be at its maximum benefit in about 10 years and that it would provide about 25 per cent of the income of retired persons. When combined with OAS payments, employee-employer sponsored plans and private savings, it was hoped that that amount would be sufficient to allow pensioners to retire on adequate incomes. It soon became evident that that was not the case. As a result, in 1967, the Government found that it was necessary to bring in amendments to the Old Age Security Act which provided for the Guaranteed Income Supplement. It was a mechanism by which to help many pensioners who were badly in need of income support. In actual fact, to indicate the number of people who required help, it has since become evident that roughly 50 per cent of our pensioners because of low incomes, rely on some benefits from the Guaranteed Income Supplement. A significant number of Canadians depend upon it. As I mentioned earlier, we have now added the spousal allowance for people between the ages of 60 and 64 years who are widowed and are similarly in need of further income.

In order to protect the rights of persons to work on their own and to have some income of their own and not lose it all, a criteria of the Guaranteed Income Supplement allowed for them to earn income apart from their Old Age Security benefits which would be deducted from the GIS at the rate of $1 for every $2 earned. In other words, if a person earned $200 over and above his Old Age Security, $100 would be deducted from his payment that year under the GIS. This mechanism was put in place to encourage people to save in their earlier years and feel that they were somewhat better off than persons who depended entirely upon the Government for support in retirement. The mechanism which was used to determine whether a person was entitled to GIS benefits was the definition of "net income" under the Income Tax Act. We should look briefly at the provisions of that Act as they relate to net income and recognize that various factors are taken into consideration when one arrives at one's net income on the income tax form which is returned each year. For instance, certain deductions are allowed from one's net income which, when taken into consideration for someone receiving GIS, are of assistance to that pensioner and mean that his net income is reduced. I am referring to such items as 50 per cent of a capital gain or loss which can be deducted from net income on the tax form, allowable contributions to a Registered Retirement Savings Plan or a Registered Home Ownership Savings Plan, and certain tuition fees. In addition to those kinds of reductions which alter the amount of net income for tax purposes, certain definitions of "income" are excluded for the purpose of the supplement. These include income from sources such as war service and compensation benefits, income of Indians earned on the reserve and certain other pension and compensation payments. It was under this latter category that the workers' compensation benefits were excluded up until the change in the Income Tax Act which was effective, I believe, for the 1982 taxation year.

On the other hand, we have to recognize that the Government felt that there were certain sources of income that were received by pensioners, even though they represented income for tax purposes that should not be included for Guaranteed Income Supplement purposes. Thus we have under the Old Age Security Act certain specific exclusions as far as applications for GIS payments. These include family allowances, Canada and Quebec Pension Plan death benefits, home insulation grants and means tested assistance provided by the provincial Governments. All of these, of course, are programs that either had special designations for certain specific reasons such as the home insulation program, or those moneys that were already income tested such as certain death benefits and so on. Therefore, there were definitely certain factors taken into account in determining how one should arrive at the definition of what would be income that had to be reported and be considered in arriving at the benefits that a person was going to get for his Guaranteed Income Supplement.

The point that I think has upset a lot of us in the House is the fact that the amendment that was created in 1983 affected 25,000 pensioners who at the same time were receiving workers' compensation benefits. The officials of our Government and I think perhaps Ministers both in the present and previous Government felt there was some need to consider this as ordinary income. I think it is very important that we stress the difference between income that we get from earnings, called earned income; income that we get from a pension plan or income that we get from a disability plan. These are all plans where the employee or the taxpayer has paid a premium into it. He has put in money with the expectation of having some benefits at a certain time under certain conditions. The difference in a benefit under the workers' compensation plan is that it is not a payment, it is really compensation. It is compensation for having sustained an injury. When a worker loses a leg, Mr. Speaker, I would suggest to you that the best we could do for that person, if our technology would allow us to do it, would be to provide that person with a new leg and then there would not have to be any benefits whatsoever. We cannot do that. We must give that person an artificial limb which has certain disadvantages, which are more serious in the case of loss of eyesight. Being unable to replace those lost bodily parts we provide a payment that may be a payment on a monthly basis or it may be a lump sum payment. It is my understanding that the name of this payment that we are talking about here through the Workers' Compensation Board is a payment called active for life pension. It is a different kind of pension than any of these other kinds of pensions that we are talking about. It is my contention that if we are going to be fair to these people who are receiving that benefit from the Workers' Compensation Board that that money they receive should be considered not as income, because it does not resemble ordinary types of either earnerd income, investment income or pension income where premiums have been paid. It is entirely different. I think it is incumbent upon us as a Government to recognize that fact and to proceed accordingly.

I am pleased to be a member of a Party which is dedicated to helping our senior citizens, particularly those who have a special need and have requirements for financial assistance. That is indeed the feeling of this Government, but I will feel much better if I see the day come when this particular amendment to the Income Tax Act, going back to the previous Government of 1983, is removed from the books and that those pensioners who now receive that kind of a workers' compensation benefit will again be able to receive that benefit and not suffer a drop or a loss in their GIS payments because of that. I hope that the House will agree to that.

I have no objection to this going to committee but I also feel that there is active work going on now by our officials in several Departments and I would certainly be happy to see that progress. I would hope that all Members of the House would encourage those officials and those Ministers to expedite this matter as quickly as possible.

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It is not my intent to speak very long on the motion that was brought forward by the Hon. Member for Cape Breton-East Richmond (Mr. Dingwall) but I do want to express, as the Hon. Member for Beaches (Mr. Young) and the Hon. Member for Nickel Belt (Mr. Rodriguez) have done in the past, that our caucus is in complete agreement with the proposal that he has made. As the Hon. Member is aware, when the Liberal Government introduced the changes to the Income Tax Act we opposed those changes for the very reasons that the last speaker spoke about so well; first, that workers' compensation has to be treated differently from other sources of income.

As was mentioned by the previous speaker, when someone has lost a leg, an arm, the use of one eye, other bodily functions, or has a disabling back injury he or she should be compensated, we should recognize that he or she should be compensated and we should recognize the special circumstances under which that person has to live for the rest of his or her life.

I find it ironic that even though this matter has been in debate for the last four years that neither the previous Liberal Government nor the present Conservative Government could move very quickly. That is one of the major complaints that I have with what has been said by Government Members in this House both now and a couple of years ago under the Liberal administration. They said that we cannot move quickly, that it is a complicated area; there is the whole problem of inequity in the tax system and inequity in the pension system. That is the reason why they cannot move quickly.

Today we had a closure motion or a time allocation motion which would have the effect of reducing the family allowance or deindexing the first 3 per cent of the family allowance. There was a quick move by the Government to try to change old age pensions last year. There is an attempt which will be coming up later on which I am sure the Government will try to move quickly which will exempt the first $500,000 capital gains from any income tax. Those are examples of how Government moves quickly when it wants to move quickly. This Government has decided that it wants to deindex family allowances. It brings in closure after four days of debate. The Government has decided that it wants to give people who make their money through capital gains a $500,000 tax free exemption. There is no tax on the first $500,000 made through capital gains. It can move quickly in that matter.

What happens to someone who has had a disabling back injury? What happens to someone who has lost his or her leg? The Government finds that it takes much study, that it requires a look at the whole system of Guaranteed Income Supplements, that it must look at the whole tax system in order to move on this very specific need.

I think anyone who has lost bodily functions, who has lost a leg, an arm, an eye, deserves quick action by this Government. It deserved quick action by the last Government but it did not receive that. If this Government wants to prove that it is any different from the previous administration, its Members should not give the same speeches as those given by former government back-benchers. It should actually move on this matter.

I have yet to hear anyone in the House from any of the three political Parties say that we should treat workers' compensation beneficiaries or victims of the system in the way that we are treating them. No one has risen to defend the system; yet we refuse to act.

I am not going to take up any more of the time of the House. I think this is a matter on which we should express an opinion and for which Members of all three Parties who speak in favour of action should vote.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Order, please. If the Hon. Member for Cape Breton-East Richmond (Mr. Dingwall) rises, he will close off debate. Therefore, I recognize the Parliamentary Secretary. I am sure he has a few words to say.

[Translation]

Mr. Claude Lanthier (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, yesterday and today I made all the speeches of my Ministers in French, so I will take this opportunity to practice my English in answering the question.

[English]

I am very pleased to join in the resumption of this debate today on the motion made by the Hon. Member for Cape Breton-East Richmond (Mr. Dingwall). This is a matter which raises some issues which are very important to many Canadians and I think the Hon. Member should be comended for raising it in Parliament. I know that there was no hint of partisanship in his bringing the motion before the House and that his concerns are sincere and deeply held. I also know that Members of all three Parties share his concern for those affected by the provisions in question.

If I could take some of the time of the House, I believe that a brief examination of the process through which the present situation developed will help us come to understand why these provisions are in the Act and why it seems to me that it would be inappropriate at this time to support the Hon. Member's motion. From the outset, though, I must emphasize that the Hon. Member's concern for the welfare of our senior citizens is one which I certainly share deeply. My words today are dictated by another concern, equally strong, with the concept of equity and fairness to all Canadians. This concern surely is and must continue to be at the base of all our actions.

As Hon. Members are aware, the Income Tax Act amendments in question were first raised in the Budget presented in November 1981. They were part of an effort to simplify the provisions of the Income tax Act and to improve its fairness. The amendments to Clauses 56, 81 and 110 of the Income Tax Act were clearly proposed and were not questioned during the debate on Bill C-139 which took place during the First Session of the last Parliament. Perhaps I may refer to documents issued at that time to explain the proposal. It is clear that the amendments were intended to put all similar programs on the same basis with respect to the calculation of eligibility for payments under the Guaranteed Income Supplement and child tax credit provisions.

Specifically, the then Government wanted to deal with cases of some recipients of the GIS already receiving substantial income from Workers' Compensation while being placed on par with those who had no other income. The Government also wanted to clear up a problem in a more general area of taxation. Previously a person claiming the dependent deduction did not have to take into account any income from Workers' Compensation which his dependent might have. This provision was deemed to be incompatible with the concept of tax fairness. Where is the fairness to other taxpayers in allowing as a full dependent someone who is in receipt of substantial workers' compensation payments?

It is important to recognize that the changes did not alter the special status of the workers' compensation payments which are not subject to tax themselves. The changes extended only so far as to include as income payments which are already granted special treatment. As well, this was done within very limited parameters.

In 1984, a number of Hon. Members including the Hon. Member for Cape Breton-East Richmond raised the matter in the House when it became clear that one effect of the change was to reduce GIS payments for certain persons. The matter was also raised by some columnists in the press. In the debate on Bill C-40 during the second session of the last Parliament, this issue was thoroughly considered both in the House and in the standing committee.

The standing committee consideration of the question now being raised was most interesting and the basic principals underlying the debate emerged from it with some clarity. One very important point raised was with respect to the GIS program itself and another related to the Income Tax Act and its approach to the sources from which taxable income is derived. There was also raised the question of whether workers' compensation payments are viewed as replacement for income or as payment for the injury itself. Finally, the testimony of the then Minister of National Health and Welfare pointed out the question of the amount of work needed to deal with the problem, something which she admitted had not been anticipated by her or her officials. I think it is worth while to look at each of these points.

My concern in taking the time to deal with these points is that I do not want the House to rush headlong into actions which may be regretted by some Members, particularly when hasty action may actually exacerbate any problems which now exist. I also believe that many of the issues raised should quite properly be left for more careful study in a more general context. Perhaps the greatest mistake we could make at this point would be to consider just one small matter without competent examination of the principles underlying it and without consideration of its place within the policies and goals of the Government.

Because the motion deals with the Guaranteed Income Supplement, I would first like to consider that program. It is important to remember that the Guaranteed Income Supplement is a program directed to the poorest of our senior citizens, those whose income would otherwise consist solely of payments from the Old Age Security Program and possibly other small incomes. It is designed to aid those people who are not able to provide for themselves in their later years and who would otherwise be left in a very depressed state economically.

Because the Government does not want to penalize those who have small additional incomes, there is a threshold below which benefits are not reduced by added income. Above that threshold, Guaranteed Income Supplement entitlement decreases by 50 cents for every dollar of income until benefits are completely eliminated. Surely this demonstrates that the Guaranteed Income Supplement is not and never was intended to be anything other than a program directed at low-income members of our society. Even the requirement that persons in receipt of the GIS must apply each year is evidence that the program recognized that changing circumstances might raise an individual's income and so reduce the need for GIS.

Let me take a moment to point out that in the current year, the threshold below which people no longer qualify for Guaranteed Income Supplement is over $11,000 for a single person and over $16,500 for a couple when Old Age Security payments are included. Obviously at this level, people are not well off and deserve the help that can reasonably be provided. However, there are many who are worse off like those whose incomes would otherwise be below this level. I believe that it would be more the act of a caring, responsible Government to direct our resources to those in this lower income group. It would be irresponsible to commit ourselves today to a change which would put those receiving worker's compensation benefits in a position superior to those who have no income other than Old Age Security payments and the Guaranteed Income Supplement. In all fairness, I believe that the Hon. Member has raised an issue which merits careful consideration. I believe it should be studied and, if it is found to impose undue hardship on those receiving both worker's compensation and the Guaranteed Income Supplement, then it should be amended so as to address that hardship.

Such a study is being undertaken at this moment. I think it would be in the best interests of all to await the results before acting. The Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Epp) has commissioned an internal review of what is and is not considered income for the purposes of the Guaranteed Income Supplement. This review goes beyond the relatively narrow question being debated here today. However, it certainly will address fully the question of worker's compensation payments and their relationship with the Guaranteed Income Supplement system. This type of thorough, detailed study will allow an informed, proper decision to be made with respect to this matter—one which will take into consideration the many humanitarian, practical and policy concerns which must be addressed in any final decision. I fail to see how any action taken now, or any decision reached before the completion of this review, can possibly be fair. Is not the bottom line in any debate of this type fairness?

This debate also affects the principles which form the basic foundations of the Income Tax Act. This Act attempts to consider all income and to treat it fairly with respect to its source. The Act is certainly not perfect and improvements are always possible. All I suggest is that we be careful before we act hastily. Unless the decision is based on information which is complete, we may support a move which will reduce the equity of certain provisions in the Act, not increase it. The question, as I see it, is one of equal treatment of income, a concept which is important to the Income Tax Act. We ought not move away from that principle except for very good, deep reasons.

I know that it is urged that worker's compensation payments are different in kind from most other sources of income. Some view them exclusively as compensation for injury, in the sense that crutches attempt to compensate for an injured leg. Surely, worker's compensation is not that alone—that may not even be its main thrust.

Last June, many members of the standing committee made clear that they accept that worker's compensation payments are intended to replace, in whole or in part, the income which an individual would otherwise have earned, and which that person would, of course, be liable to pay tax, or to have assessed for the purpose of GIS eligibility. How can we state categorically that compensation payments are different in kind from other types of payment when they are not viewed as being different in kind by the very bodies which decide on their duration and amount?

I agree with the Hon. Member who moved the motion that individuals who may have received reductions to GIS payments unexpectedly were, not unreasonably, unhappy. However, we must look at the broader picture. Before the changes which sparked this debate became effective, some people who received relatively large incomes from worker's compensation awards would still have been receiving the entire GIS payment.

An additional complication which might result from an ill-judged amendment along the lines of the motion before us today concerns the implications for the provinces. Hon. Members may be aware that prior to the changes we have been discussing today it was necessary to pass remission orders every year to ensure that certain maintenance payments made by provincial Governments were not to be viewed as income for the purposes of GIS eligibility. The changes made in the 1981 Budget in this area ensured a greater uniformity of treatment for all similar payments, whether federal or provincial in origin, and did away with the necessity for repeated remission orders. I am inclined to think that any step which decreases the number of remission orders and other administrative steps is one which should be accepted as a step in the right direction.

I do not want to seem to be unfeeling toward those who were affected adversely by this measure. However, I have to take into account that legislation, especially the Income Tax Act, has to be of general application. When it becomes necessary to amend the Act in response to social and economic developments, it must be done in a manner which has the appropriate effect on the majority of those affected. Inevitably, there will be some people whose circumstances differ in some significant way from those of the majority. Every situation cannot be anticipated and dealt with individually. Surely, we are coming to realize that what is needed is not more complication but less so that basic equity can be preserved as easily as possible and as few persons as possible see fairness denied by an Act which is too complicated to understand or administer equitably.

We also have to take certain facts into account when we are considering what action is appropriate for us to take in response to this motion. A large amount of money is not at stake here when compared with the current level of spending on the GIS program—some $3.5 billion. However, I am informed that although 39,000 Canadians over 65 are currently in receipt of worker's compensation payments, all but about 2,000 of these people are considered to have 60 per cent or less disability and only about 800 are permanently and totally disabled and receiving the maximum amount. Therefore, money is not the main problem in this narrow context. It is more a question of equity, of fairness and of general principles.

We should remember that the people affected by the sections of the Income Tax Act before us do, in fact, have as much income—or more—than many others. Like other disabled persons, they continue to have access to other provisions of the Income Tax Act which assist the disabled and other programs which recognize the special needs of the disabled in general.

Finally, I would point out that even within the group of 39,000 persons who receive worker's compensation payments and who are over 65 years of age, many, in any case, are disqualified from receiving the Guaranteed Income Supplement as other pensions and personal revenue raise their income levels above the threshold.

In closing, I would like to return to the comments I made at the outset of my remarks this afternoon. I hope that I have made clear that my own feelings about the motion before us have no basis in partisan politics. I know that the Hon. Member who moved the motion raised this question in the last Parliament and in political circumstances different from today's. I appreciate that Members from both sides of the Chamber agree that the problem he raises is one that is real for those affected and one which should not be viewed in a purely partisan way.

I hope that I have also made it clear that it is not a matter of seeing a need and formulating a simple response to it. There are questions of equity under the law which are raised by it. The motion begs me to ask whether those supporting it really intend that this one source of income should be set apart and should not be considered in the administration of one of our major social programs.

Can it really be in the best interests of any of us to act in haste, out of emotion, possibly at the expense of the most equitable, most practical and fairest solution? When all the necessary information is known, then the problem can be addressed.

The mechanism which has been suggested as a means of dealing with a specific situation involves general issues of taxation and income under one Act. However, the thrust of the question, the substantive issue, is one which underlies the GIS Program and our approach to those citizens who have little else to support them.

Mr. Speaker, I would suggest that the fresh wind of equity which is blowing on our Government should reflect the remarks I have just made, and that both the spirit of justice and the spirit of compassion do prevail.

CANADA SHIPPING ACT, ARCTIC WATERS POLLUTION PREVENTION ACT, MARITIME CODE ACT, AND THE OIL AND GAS PRODUCTION AND CONSERVATION ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

Hon. Ray Hnatyshyn (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I will be very brief. Earlier this day under Routine Proceedings, a Bill was introduced in the name of the Minister of Transport (Mr. Mazankowski) intituled an Act to amend the Canada Shipping Act and to amend the Arctic Waters Pollution Prevention Act and the Maritime Code Act in consequence thereof. The Bill as introduced contained an error. It has been redrafted and a new royal recommendation has been obtained.

I have had discussions with my colleagues, the other House Leaders, and I believe if you sought the unanimous consent of the House, Mr. Speaker, you would find that such consent would be forthcoming to have the records show that the Bill introduced earlier this day is actually the new redrafted Bill now in the possession of the Clerk, intituled an Act to amend the Canada Shipping Act and to amend the Arctic Waters Pollution Prevention Act, the Maritime Code Act and the Oil and Gas Production and Conservation Act in consequence thereof.

Mr. Angus: Mr. Speaker, I just wanted to indicate to the Government House Leader that we do, as always, try to assist the Government in correcting its errors and we will be most pleased to give unanimous consent.

[Translation]

Mr. Gauthier: We also agree, Mr. Speaker, but are we still talking about Bill C-75?

[English]

Is it Bill C-75 we are talking about?

[Translation]

Mr. Hnatyshyn: I think that the Bill introduced today by my colleague the Minister of Transport—

[English]

It is a small area in the title with respect to the Acts which will be amended, but we corrected that and a new royal recommendation is obtained. But it is, indeed, the Bill only for first reading and it will be published in proper form so that all Hon. Members have the correct Bill before them tomorrow morning at the latest.

Mr. Gauthier: Mr. Speaker, just to follow up—I want to make sure—the reason I asked, and the Minister will understand this—is that the striking committee is meeting tomorrow as it does when we have Bills for first reading. I just wanted to make sure that we have the right number, that we are talking about Bill C-75, and if we are, that is fine.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: The Hon. Member is right.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

INCOME TAX ACT

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Dingwall:

That, in the opinion of this House, the Government should consider the advisability of amending the Income Tax Act, in order to eliminate the hardships brought about by previous amendments, which now make Workmen's Compensation reportable as "income" for Guaranteed Income Supplement purposes.

Mr. Doug Lewis (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity to rise and address the motion which my colleague, the Hon. Member for Cape Breton-East Richmond (Mr. Dingwall) has moved, and did so last February. I want to make some remarks, if I may, to the general matter of detailed study which was addressed by the previous speaker. I believe it is indicated in Hansard that this matter first came up on February 14. At that time, it seemed to me to be a reasonable motion. We have now had an opportunity to hear the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Lanthier) indicate that there will be a further detailed study. I would like to say through you, Mr. Speaker, to the bureaucrats who are doing the study that we all think it is about time the detailed study became a little more immiment so that when we discuss matters such as the Private Member's Motion put forward by my colleague, we can have the benefit of the detailed study on which the bureaucrats somewhere in the Department of Finance or in the Department of Health and Welfare, or whatever, are progressing, we hope.

We, as elected representatives, when we debate this type of motion, put our comments on the record. We are, therefore, prepared to say where we stand as individuals in the course of this Private Members' hour. Sometimes it is easy to support a motion such as the motion put forward by my colleague, and sometimes I must say, whether we are on the opposition or Government benches, it may be a little difficult. However, the fact is that we put our names to what is said in this Chamber and it is recorded. It is recorded not only for the bureaucrats in the bowels of the Department of Finance, but it is also recorded for people back home who we represent.

When we are asked to debate and give our comments, we have to bear in mind that our primary responsibility in this Chamber is to represent the people who sent us here. We represent them whether we do it in committee, in debate or in Private Members' hour. We are prepared as elected representatives from all Parties, to go back home and support what is said. I would hope, therefore, that somewhere some bureaucrat who is doing this long detailed study of this particular matter, will take to heart what I have just said because I intend to put it in writing.

Having said that, I want to address myself to the substance of my colleague's motion. The Guaranteed Income Supplement was introduced some years ago in 1967, I believe, and it was an effort on behalf of the Government of the day—and I am sure would be supported by all colleagues in the House now—to redress the situation where old age pensioners live below the poverty line and/or that is all the income they have for subsistence purposes. In other words, they do not have enough income to meet their basic needs, they cannot get by on their old age pensions. We, therefore, introduced the Guaranteed Income Supplement, and when that was combined with the Canada Pension Plan, the idea was that the senior citizens of our country would have adequate provision for themselves.

It is a fact, Mr. Speaker, that in many cases—I believe I heard the figure of 39,000 used in reference to workmen's compensation payments—senior citizens cannot get by on the old age pension and the Canada Pension so we have the Guaranteed Income Supplement which, let us just say, works.

My office, as I am sure are the offices of my colleagues in the Chamber, is besieged in the months from January through to April and May with requests from people for advice on their Guaranteed Income Supplement. I am not fully conversant with the form but my staff in both my Orillia and Midland offices help these people to complete the forms. However there is a gap, Mr. Speaker, which could be addressed on the basis of workmen's compensation.

However, the most interesting gap is the one which exists in the year they turn 65, in, let us say, April or May. They would qualify if they could submit a Guaranteed Income Supplement form but they cannot do so until the following January. I suggest that is something which can be looked at. If a person qualifies in April because they do not have enough income, I do not see why they should have to wait until the following January when the forms come out to make their application for the GIS. The fact remains that the GIS is based on income. That has advantages and disadvantages. It minimizes the Government's involvement in an individual's financial affairs, but at the same time allows for a verification of income. However, there are some deductions which reduce the net income, such as contributions to an RRSP.

I think we all agree that if a person is making contributions to an RRSP, they can hardly be in a position to qualify for the GIS. There are also some forms of income which are excluded, such as war service compensation, income earned by Indians on reserves, and certain other pensions. I think we have to address ourselves, and I would ask those bureaucrats in the bowels of the Ministry of Finance to do so as well, to how compensation for injuries suffered on the job is different from those types of pensions. I am sure I speak for all of us when I say that workmens' compensation legislation does the job. Maybe it does not do the job as nicely or to the extent we all want to see, but there is no question that it benefits the people who work for a living should they have an injury. As my colleague from Oxford said, we cannot put the leg or the arm back on but we as a society can say we are going to do our best to compensate the people concerned. For that reason I have considerable sympathy for the motion my colleague has put forward.

This is a question we all have to examine very carefully. Should this type of income be included in calculating income for purposes of the GIS? I do not think it should. I really do not. These compensation payments are an effort by society to compensate someone who has made a contribution to society during their working life, someone who is paying income tax, unemployment insurance and otherwise supporting the system. When that person suffers an injury then society has to make an effort to put them back in the same position they were in before the injury. We sort of give it with one hand through the compensation payment and take it away with the limit on the GIS. I am not really sure that would be seen as fair by any political Party or any elected representative, so when we examine the GIS limit and the definition, we should consider ways to eliminate hardships brought about by previous amendments.

My colleague across the way knows it is not always easy to be a member of the Government and do things that one cannot support. However, it is part of the game because of the solidarity required in Government. It does not happen every day but it does happen and I know that it happened to my colleague from Cape Breton-East Richmond. I know he fought his battle in caucus. I am not sure he fought it on the floor of the House, that may not have been appropriate, but I am sure, knowing how effective he is as a member of his Party—I do not want to go any further than that for fear it goes to his head and that would be the part of my speech that he did send home—when he did fight it as a member of the Government, he did so with conviction. I can understand some of his reasons. He said that the Ontario Federation of Labour and the Nova Scotia Federation of Labour both support this change. He mentioned the United Mine Workers and senior citizen groups. I can understand their support.

He made the comment that we all have to speak our mind in this Chamber and represent our people. I know I have had constituents come into my office having suffered an injury at the plant and they are now partially disabled. I do not think I have had many people who have been fully disabled but I have had people partially disabled. They feel that these payments are compensation for their injury. Well, monetary compensation can never, as everyone knows well, put a body back together. But compensation on that basis is a recognition by society that they have suffered a wrong and society has compensated them. They then find themselves in a position where they are at the poverty line or very close to it and when they fill out the GIS form they have to include this income and there is a contradiction here.

I notice that not only do we have the bureaucrats in Finance looking into this, but we are fortunate enough in having the bureaucrats in Health and Welfare doing so as well. Therefore, I want my remarks with respect to the bureaucrats in the bowels of the Department of Finance also directed to the bureaucrats in the bowels of, and I guess that is most appropriate, National Health and Welfare. If they are studying this thing they should get along with it and do it seriously and bring it back because the next time this is debated they may not find every Member wants to get up and support any more bureaucratic delay.

May I call it six o'clock, Mr. Speaker?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): You may. I regret that I cannot recognize the Hon. Member for Cape Breton-East Richmond (Mr. Dingwall).

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 46 deemed to have been made.

SOUTHERN SASKATCHEWAN FARMERS—REQUEST FOR ASSISTANCE. (B) AID TO CATTLEMEN

Mr. Stan J. Hovdebo (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, yesterday in the House I raised the question of federal Government assistance for hard-pressed farmers in western Canada. Harvesting in Saskatchewan is only about 35 per cent complete as of this week. By this time in most years harvesting would be totally complete. To make matters worse, yesterday in Saskatchewan there was additional rainfall and even some snow.

The problem of the late, wet harvest is only the latest of the misfortunes which prairie farmers have faced. Drought has ravaged much of the grain and pasture land in southern Saskatchewan and across the Prairies. Grasshoppers have plagued the same area. These two curses have resulted in a total crop failure for thousands of farm families. The livestock sector has also been affected because when there is no grain and no pasture there is nothing for cattle to eat.

Our farmers are tough, resilient, and optimistic, but for many of these farmers this is the second, third, or even fourth year of severe crop and livestock losses due to drought and grasshoppers. These farmers are doing everything possible to help themselves out of the desperate economic hardship which they have been experiencing. The problems they are facing now are not of their own making, so it is only fair that they should received adequate help to overcome them. Yesterday I asked the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Wise) to make an immediate commitment to provide prairie farmers with adequate and timely relief. I asked for that commitment, Mr. Speaker, because the Hon. Member for Assiniboia (Mr. Gustafson) refused to make that commitment to the farmers during the summer and the Minister has only hinted at the commitment, refusing to make it. I ask for the commitment now because relief is needed by farm families now.

The situation is desperate. Many farm families must rely on donations to make ends meet. The Farm Women's Action Committee and the Southwest Drought Committee are collecting and distributing donations of food, clothing, livestock feed, and other supplies to those in greatest need. I have been informed that commercial market gardeners near Regina are donating garden produce to the cause. Donations of clothing are coming from as far away as British Columbia and Ontario. Surely this illustrates the urgency of the situation. Surely the Government can see that the time for action is now. Farmers, their families, and the farm organizations have been asking why the Government is so reticent to act now in this time of need. The Government did not hesitate to act with haste in committing $1 billion to its scheme of bailing out the banks. Foreign depositors are receiving federal Government compensation, but Saskatchewan grain farmers are still waiting to learn if their Government will help them.

Drought, unlike floods or earthquakes, does not happen over night. We have known about the drought and grasshopper conditions in western Canada since June and July. Why delay making the commitment to the grain producers? Yesterday the Minister of Agriculture said he needed time for consultations. Mr. Speaker, Government consultations are sometimes dangerous things. The Minister had consultations with his Conservative counterpart in Saskatchewan regarding drought assistance to livestock producers. That kind of consultation was not worth the time it took. That consultation resulted in every dollar of federal Government aid going, not to the farmers, but directly into the coffers of the Saskatchewan Government. The Saskatchewan Government took all of the credit for the program and then took the money from the federal Government for itself.

Farming is a difficult business, Mr. Speaker. Among their other concerns, farmers are constantly at the mercy of the weather. Drought, flood, and grasshoppers are disasters which confront farmers all too often. If we had in place a regularized, structured disaster relief program, the farmers would not have to worry about whether or not relief would be forthcoming when they face a disaster.

• (1805)

I urge the Government to act without delay and put in place a contingency plan to deal with farm crises, such as the one we faced this year. I asked for a commitment because during the summer when the Hon. Member for Assiniboia the Parliamentary Secretary to the Prime Minister, was asked he refused to give that commitment to the farmers of his area.

As I pointed out yesterday, the immediate concern is for Government assistance to Prairie farmers now. This is the time of year when farmers traditionally have large bills and need help. This fall the farmers have the added burden of costs incurred to poison grasshoppers during the summer. Many farmers face certain bankruptcy, bankruptcy which the Government could help them avoid if the aid were forthcoming.

I urge the Government to accept its responsibility and provide Canadian farmers with desperately needed economic assistance now.

Mr. Pierre Blais (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Agriculture): First, let me say to the Hon. Member that the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Wise) said yesterday that maybe within the next week or 10 days we will be in a position to come forward with phase 2 of the program. I understand the Hon. Member is in a hurry, but the Minister does what he can.

I am pleased to elaborate on the answer provided by the Minister of Agriculture yesterday, in response to the question posed by the Hon. Member for Prince Albert (Mr. Hovdebo) on financial assistance to farmers to the drought affected areas of the Prairie provinces.

As the Minister told the House, the federal Government has already made an announcement with respect to a $48 million program of assistance to prairie livestock producers. That is a lot of money, Mr. Speaker. In making that announcement on August 14, the Minister of Agriculture said federal assistance would be integrated with suitable provincial aid programs pending consultation with the four western provinces.

I am pleased to report that through the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Administration we have nearly completed our negotiations with the four western provinces. We should be in a position to sign agreements with them soon. The mechanisms for making payments to producers are being prepared. In Saskatchewan, payments to producers are already being made through the program announced by the Premier of that province in mid-July. In total, federal payments could amount to $48 million.

The Minister also said in his August announcement that the Government would continue to monitor the situation in the Prairies and further action would be taken as needed. A task group, chaired by the Member for Assiniboia and including provincial Government representatives was to advise the Minister in this regard. I am sure that my honourable friends will admit that the Member for Assiniboia did a very good job during the summer.

The task group, assisted by a technical committee of federal and provincial officials, has been engaged in this pursuit and will be meeting again during the first week of October. We expect further recommendations to be made as a result of that meeting. Without prejudicing those recommendations, I should mention that the rain that has fallen in the southern prairies in recent weeks has certainly had an impact on the situation. I am sure my hon. friend will not think that we are responsible for rain and snow.

In part, because of the downgrading of many grain crops due to moisture damage, there is no shortage of feed grain in the southern prairies at this time and prices are extremely reasonable, at least from the livestock producers point of view.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT—DESIGNATION OF AREAS IN ALBERTA UNDER FEDERAL DEVELOPMENT PROGRAM

Mr. Jack Shields (Athabasca): Mr. Speaker, I would like to put on the record a comment with regard to a question I asked of the Minister of Regional Industrial Expansion (Mr. Stevens) last Thursday. I asked the Minister whether he had taken action to designate areas of Alberta to tier 2 so that areas within Alberta that are presently experiencing high unemployment would then be able to take advantage of the Industrial and Regional Development Program offered by the federal Government. IRDP is the principal program of the Department of Regional Industrial Expansion or DRIE for providing direct financial assistance to industries in Canada. It has been in operation since July, 1983, and is administered primarily through DRIE's 12 regional and 25 local offices.

• (1810)

The objective of the program is to promote regional industrial expansion and development through the support of private sector initiatives with particular emphasis upon projects, industries and technologies with the greatest potential for economic return, sustained growth and international competitiveness. In other words, it is a massive program offered by the federal Government to encourage private enterprise to invest. It will assist private enterprise with grants and low-interest loans to create employment in areas where unemployment is very high.

When the former Government introduced its National Energy Program, it literally wiped out the employment and economic development which was taking place in Alberta. I draw the attention of the House to the tier system. If a district is classed as tier 1, it is eligible for very little in the way of incentive grants or assistance from the federal Government. In tier 2, there is automatic assistance to various companies which wish to invest and create employment. In tier 3, the Government hands out a lot more in the way of incentives. In tier 4, the Government just about hands out blank cheques to companies so that they will come into areas and develop new industries.

Before referring to the results of July, 1984, I should like to backtrack for a moment to say that the tier system is dependent upon census districts and each census district is looked at to determine how much unemployment exists. In July, 1984, in Newfoundland, there were seven census districts under tier 4 and three under tier 3; in Prince Edward Island, two under tier 4 and one under tier 3; in Nova Scotia, six under tier 4, three under tier 2 and one under tier 1; in New Brunswick, seven under tier 4, six under tier 3 and two under tier 2; in Quebec, there were 14 census districts under tier 4, 46 under tier 3, 13 under tier 2 and three under tier 1; in Ontario, there were six under tier 3, 27 under tier 2 and 20 under tier 1; and in Alberta, every census district is under tier 1. I think I have made my point. In other words, Alberta is the only province which is fully tier 1 and fully denied any access through the tier system to the economic development funds which are available to other provinces. I find that to be totally unacceptable. We have had the Minister rise in the House and say that they were attempting to do away with the tier system. I would suggest that it is long overdue and that it should be done away with.

In some areas of the Province of Alberta there is massive unemployment, unemployment to a level unheard of in the past 10 to 15 years. We have experienced a downturn in the economy which businessmen and other people in the province are calling a depression, all due, I might add, to the National Energy Program introduced in the House by the former Government. Fair is fair. There is massive unemployment. The province cannot do it on its own. The citizens of the Province of Alberta are only requesting that they be treated in exactly the same way as citizens in other parts of the country. It is obvious when one goes through, as I did, province by province and finds that of 15 census districts, all of the census districts of Alberta, not one census district is eligible for regional economic expansion funds under any other tier but tier 1, it leaves them very little by way of assistance. I hope that the Minister will take my suggestion and move quickly to right an injustice that I feel is taking place at present.

Mrs. Monique Bernatchez-Tardif (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Regional Industrial Expansion): Mr. Speaker, I rise to respond to the question from the Hon. Member for Athabasca (Mr. Shields) concerning the possibility of designating parts of Alberta as tier 2 under the Industrial Regional Development Program.

Tier designations for purposes of IRDP as originally designed are based on an index of development which is a little more than the unemployment my colleague was talking about. It classified the country's 260 census divisions into four tier groups according to selective measures of economic need. The statistical measures used consist of the level of unemployment, the level of personal income and the fiscal capacity of the province in which the census division is located.

According to the Act and regulations, tier designations are reviewed once a year for possible adjustment in light of changing economic conditions. This is done by recalculating the development index using the latest annual data available in each census division on income and unemployment.

As a result of the latest update of the tier designation announced on July 1, 1985, Alberta's 15 census division are still in tier 1. The new 1985 designations are based on indicators that measure employment and income conditions during the period 1982-1984. As such, the new index reflects changing economic circumstances as well as the differential impact of these changes in Alberta and various parts of the country.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, it shows that classification and reclassification of census districts under the IRDP is being done on the basis of objective statistical data, using a formula provided under the Act and Regulations. The annual review of the development index is mandatory under the Act and constitutes the only procedure for updating tier classification in accordance with the requirements of the Industrial and Regional Development Act and Regulations. Any attempt to change the classification would require an amendment to the legislation.

Mr. Speaker, I realize there is no regional designation system that operates perfectly in all circumstances and is able to guide Government assistance to industry with absolute fairness and objectivity. The Minister is also aware of the shortcomings of the system and continues to consider other ways of improving the criteria now being used for tier designation. That is why the development index and the tier method used by the IRDP are being reviewed by the Department.

As soon as a more objective and useful method is developed, Mr. Speaker, the Minister is prepared to formulate recommendations for making the legislative changes that will make it possible to implement such a method.

Meanwhile, Mr. Speaker, the ERDA program now in effect could be used to arrange a subsidiary agreement with Alberta, and the Minister soon hopes to be able to sign an agreement of this kind that will be beneficial to the people of that province.

FISHERIES—SALE OF CANNED TUNA. (A) REQUEST FOR MINISTER'S RESIGNATION. (B) BASIS FOR MINISTER'S RULING

Mr. Ray Skelly (Comox-Powell River): The last remaining question, Mr. Speaker, in the great Canadian tuna scandal relates to whether the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) in fact knew of this issue many weeks or even months before the matter reached its culmination in the House of Commons recently. On Friday, September 20, in a press conference the Prime Minister said that he had only heard about this problem the day before and had acted immediately on it. He said that in quite an explicit and firm way. The former Minister of Fisheries and Oceans, on the same day, in a scrum after Question Period said that that in fact was not true. He said that this whole issue in detailed form was in the Prime Minister's Office several weeks ago. It is interesting to note that the former Minister of Fisheries and Oceans survived the Star-Kist affair but what he did not survive was the enormous contradiction that he had set up between himself and the Prime Minister. When the former Minister subsequently tried to heal the problem, the Prime Minister sacked the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans.

To return to the question at hand, there seems to be information indicating that the Prime Minister would have had several matters before him. First, David MacDonald publicly rejected this product weeks if not months before. On July 5, a close friend of the Prime Minister seems to have been given information that this scandal was upon us. On July 28, Ian Anderson who is now Deputy Principal Secretary, allegedly heard of this matter from two offices of the Department of Fisheries and Oceans. I believe tonight's answer will reveal that Mr. Anderson had a lot more information of which he either advised or failed to advise the Prime Minister.

The Department of National Defence had the information. Why did the Deputy Prime Minister (Mr. Nielsen) not have the information? The Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Epp) should have had the information. Justice and Fisheries informed the Prime Minister's Office that this matter was pending. It is absolutely unthinkable that the Prime Minister of Canada would not have been briefed about the possible impact on a $2-billion industry and 100,000 jobs and the possibility of health problems arising from having a million cans of rancid and decomposing tuna at loose in the country.

It is amazing that we have been led to believe by the Prime Minister that none of his staff members and none of the Ministers briefed him on this critical matter and that he had to see it on television after which he knew that the right thing to do was to get that stuff off the shelves. It is pretty damned obvious that it should not have been on the shelves in the first place.

Only a few things make sense to Members of the House of Commons and the people of Canada. We have to make the assumption that the Prime Minister's staff has some common sense and fulfils the responsibility of briefing the Prime Minister on matters that are important to this nation. If we do not believe that, we have to believe that his staff is incompetent and the Prime Minister knew nothing. We have to believe that he gets his information about the nation's business from television.

Tonight we may see a clarification of this matter when it will allegedly be aired on television that information of this nature was in fact given to Mr. Ian Anderson, now Deputy Principal Secretary. One would think that he would have informed the Prime Minister of a very serious matter affecting a $2-billion Canadian fishing industry, a $1.7-billion exporting industry, 100,000 jobs and relating to the releasing on the Canadian market of a million cans of rancid and decomposing tuna. There is no way that we can accept the story that Mr. Anderson had not informed the Prime Minister of that. If that is in fact the case, the Prime Minister should have his head first thing tomorrow morning and be prepared to make a statement in the House of Commons about the reorganization of the Prime Minister's Office and the Privy Council Office so that this country can run with some effectiveness and safety, something which has not been demonstrated by the Prime Minister to date. Other than that, the Prime Minister should stand up in the House and admit that he in fact knew about this issue weeks before, as the former Minister of Fisheries and Oceans, a man whom many people know to be an honest gentleman with a tremendous political conscience, stated unequivocally in the period before the scrum on Friday.

The questions which have been asked in the House are still wide open. The people of Canada have not been given an acceptable answer by the Prime Minister. The questioning will have to continue until the Prime Minister comes clean with us and tells us that, in fact, he has either reorganized his office and fired the people responsible, or until he comes clean with us and tells us that he did know long before and failed to act. Ultimately, we might see that it is the Prime Minister who puts up his damn seat in response to this very serious matter.

Mr. Mel Gass (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Mr. Speaker, I am delighted to be able to respond to the original question asked by the Hon. Member for Comox-Powell River (Mr. Skelly) which was the basis for the Minister's ruling. My statement today is intended to set out clearly the decisions taken by the former Minister with respect to the release of certain lots of tuna products.

Over a period of months, beginning in late 1984, selected lots of canned tuna production inspected by DFO Inspection were detained from release to the public because of inspection decisions that these lots did not meet the minimum quality standards set out under the Fish Inspection Regulations. It must be stressed that large quantities of Star-Kist production did pass inspection testing throughout this period and were distributed to the market-place in the normal manner. It must also be stressed, and underlined, that at no time were any doubts expressed about the health or safety attributes of any Star-Kist products, including the detained products.

Beginning in late 1984, the Star-Kist Company, the Hon. Member for Carleton-Charlotte (Mr. McCain), and other interested persons approached the former Minister with criticisms of the quality standards applied by Fisheries inspectors to tuna production. He personally met with representatives of Star-Kist at St. Andrews at that time to see for himself what problems existed and how these could be corrected. In January 1985 the Government of New Brunswick contracted the Research and Productivity Council to conduct an independent assessment of Star-Kist production methods and issues of difference between the company and Inspection. Departmental staff co-operated with this RPC study. A report from RPC was presented to the New Brunswick Government on February 11, 1985, with a copy being provided to the former Minister.

Following receipt of the RPC report of February 11, the former Minister instructed that sampled of detained Star-Kist products should be released to RPC for further testing. No detained products were released to the market at this time.

Normal inspection processes were continuing at Star-Kist. Some production passed and some did not. The former Minister formed an independent review committee to advise him on the resolution of differences of opinion between Star-Kist and Fisheries inspectors on March 4, 1985, and also to advise him on how to dispose of Star-Kist products which were still detained in accordance with the Fish Inspection Regulations.

The independent review committee presented a summary report to him on April 24, 1985. On the basis of this report, and also taking into consideration the information given to him in the RPC report of February 11, 1985, he decided to release all product under detention to Star-Kist for whatever disposition it chose to make. His decision was formally communicated to the Department on April 29, 1985 and Inspection released the product to the company during the first week of May. At all times he had been fully assured by his inspection staff, and by other interested parties, that health and safety concerns did not exist for these products.

All the products in question were placed under Star-Kist control from the first week of May. The former Minister understood that Star-Kist continued to work with RPC but that this was an arrangement between those two parties. This process obviously had nothing to do with his decision to release.

In the period since the decision to release detained Star-Kist products, the former Minister requested that an industry-government working group be convened to review in detail the inspection guidelines applying to canned tuna. That working group met twice this summer and revised guidelines have been agreed upon. These revised guidelines now apply to the inspection of all tuna products sold in Canada, whether produced domestically or imported from abroad, and will be reviewed again in January 1986.

CORPORATE AFFAIRS

MITEL CORPORATION—DANGER OF TECHNOLOGY TRANSFER

Mr. Dave Dingwall (Cape Breton-East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I rise today with regard to the situation concerning Mitel and the subsequent infusion of some $300 million into that corporation which is located here in the Ottawa region. I must say that we are very concerned about all the issues surrounding this particular bid by British Telecommunications and the amount of money that it is going to be putting into that company.

There have been many, many lay-offs, both in Kanata and in Quebec, in regard to this particular company. At the same time as workers are being laid off we read in the newspapers where substantial salary raises have gone to senior members of the management of Mitel Corporation. Yet when we question the Minister of State for Small Businesses (Mr. Bissonnette) regarding the agreement between Mitel and the Government of Canada with regard to the transfer of technology we are not given any assurances that that particular agreement will be in place after the takeover takes place.

As a Member of Parliament I am very concerned that if that commitment, which was negotiated by the previous Government and the management of Mitel, is not continued, that the transfer of technology will take place and it will leave Canada, thereby causing further and greater job losses to this particular community here in the Ottawa region. We don't have any answers—

Mr. Speaker: I advise the Hon. Member that his time has expired.

AUTHORS' ROYALTIES

PAYMENT FOR PUBLIC USE OF LIBRARY BOOKS

Ms. Lynn McDonald (Broadview-Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the announcement of the Minister of Communications (Mr. Masse) of an agreement with the provinces for a plan for payment for public use of library books. This has long been a demand of authors, as a means of compensation for the loss of royalties that they would otherwise receive from book sales.

The federal Government will be providing $2.5 million a year for this plan, assuming cabinet approval. The announcement constitutes a moral victory for the artists and their lobbying organizations.

Economically, however, this proposal is far from making up the $100 million lost to the arts and cultural community in budget cuts. Even if 5,000 writers benefit from this plan, that is only $500 a year on average. Yet the CBC cuts alone took $75 million, costing these same writers jobs, free lance contracts, and professional opportunities. Thus I join with the artists attending a conference on culture in Halifax this past weekend in calling for the full restoration of arts funding and, let me be perfectly clear, to the independent arts agencies.

THE LATE VACLAV PIVRNEC

DEATH IN CZECHOSLOVAKIAN JAIL

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Mr. Speaker, I regret to inform the House of the death of Vaclav Pivrnec who died in a cell in a Czechoslovakian jail.

Mr. Pivrnec was the manager of Omni Trade activities in Canada until he was forced to return to Czechoslovakia. When he returned to Czechoslovakia his wife Jana and their two children declared and were granted refugee status here.

Mr. Pivrnec attempted to return to Canada, but was prevented by the Czech Government from doing so. Indeed, he was convicted by the Czechoslovakian state of the offence of trying to join his wife and children in Canada, and has, in fact, been separated from them for nearly four years.

The House will recall that a petition bearing nearly 500 names of Canadians was presented last Wednesday to the House calling upon the Czechoslovakian Government to release Mr. Pivrnec. Unknown to me and to this House, Mr. Pivrnec was arrested again by security forces as a result of protests made on his behalf, and was under an inquisition from September 15 until he died last Friday.

His plight and his concerns have been the subject of our Government's many representations to the Czechoslovakian Government. Czechoslovakia refuses to abide by the Helsinki Accords and refuses to treat its citizens with any sense of humanity. I call upon the Government to curtail immediately the activities of Omni Trade and other Czechoslovakian companies doing business in Canada as these companies are essentially a front for espionage in Canada. Czechoslovakia is a police state that has no place—

Mr. Speaker: I must advise the Hon. Member his time has expired.

INDUSTRY

CONSEQUENCES OF TEMPORARY ABANDONMENT OF ALCAN ALUMINUM PLANT PROJECT IN QUEBEC

Mr. Jean-Pierre Blackburn (Jonquière): Mr. Speaker, you are undoubtedly aware that the world's largest aluminium smelting complex operated by Alcan Aluminium Ltd. is located in my riding of Jonquière. During a press conference given yesterday by that company management it was learned that the $1 billion major investment project unveiled in April 1984 has been shelved sine die, owing to the slumping aluminium world market.

The temporary cancellation of this project is a hard blow to the social and economic interest groups of the Saguenay-Lac-Saint-Jean region. We could have been witness to an economic recovery, but the impact of this news is nothing short of disastrous. It entails the loss or at least the delay of a $1 billion new capital injection in our region, along with dire consequences for a number of local contractors, not to mention the direct or indirect loss of hundreds of temporary jobs among contractors, subcontractors and material suppliers.

As if that were not enough, one can only sympathize with the taxpayers since they will not be able to benefit from the taxes which the new smelter would have generated.

Still, Mr. Speaker, the construction project would have had a negative impact since 600 permanent workers would have been laid off at the Jonquière plant. It is a reprieve for the federation of united aluminium workers.

The monitoring committee responsible for protecting jobs in the aluminium industry will have to make the best of this reprieve and double its efforts to find other solutions to this problem.

FISHERIES

SALE OF TAINTED TUNA

Mr. Carlo Rossi (Bourassa): Mr. Speaker, the tuna affair is starting to smell worse and worse for the Prime Minister and his party. Pretending to be shocked at the very idea, the Prime Minister claimed he was not aware that the tainted tuna, which was not good enough for Ethiopia and was turned down by the Canadian Forces, was on the shelves of our food stores.

Premier Hatfield of New Brunswick knew about it, the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans (Mr. Fraser) knew about it, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources knew about it, and a number of officials at the Department of Justice, the Department of National Health and Welfare, the Department of National Defence and the Department of External Affairs knew about it. The man in charge of caucus relations in the Prime Minister's Office, Mr. MacAdam, knew about it, and the Prime Minister's communications assistant, Mr. Anderson, knew about it as well, and now the Prime Minister, Mr. Speaker, that clown, would have us believe that he was the only one who was not informed.

Funny way to run a Government, Mr. Speaker. One thing is certain, however, that without that television broadcast, the tainted tuna would still be on our shelves.

HOUSING

SOCIAL HOUSING PROGRAMS—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Mr. Neil Young (Beaches): Mr. Speaker, the federal Government has played a major role in the supply of assisted housing since the early 1940s. For the first time in over 40 years there is a real possibility that it will hand over this control to the provinces. A leaked B.C. cabinet document calls for increased emphasis on shelter allowances and more participation by the private sector in developing and managing social housing programs.

Government assistance to the private sector has never ensured a long-term supply of well maintained, affordable housing. In contrast, the non-profit and co-operative housing developed by non-profit voluntary associations are quality affordable accommodation. These programs are at stake in the federal-provincial negotiations.

The federal Government must continue to take the leadership role because of its control over interest rates, tax policy, income support programs and policies affecting native communities. Transferring housing policy to the provinces can only lead to greater disparity in the "have-not" regions of Canada.

The future of non-profit and co-operative housing has been uncertain for the past few years. It is time for the federal Government to map out a long-term housing policy and programs that include a strong and continuing federal presense in the housing field.

It is time the Government started to think about policy and programs rather than following its ideological drift with no policy and programs.

THE DISABLED AND THE HANDICAPPED

PLIGHT OF YOUNGER DISABLED ADULTS

Mr. Lee Clark (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, while most Canadians fortunately enjoy good health, I would like to remind those who are active in all levels of Government of the particular needs of the younger, chronically disabled adults between the ages of 18 and 59.

● (1410)

There are 249 young disabled adults who currently reside in personal-care homes in Manitoba, many of whom are afflicted with multiple sclerosis. Moreover, the average age of the younger disabled resident is 50 years, substantially and significantly lower than the 83 years, substantially and significantly lower than the 83 years which is the average age of all residents of personal-care homes.

These younger persons have specific accommodation needs which are not always met by many of the personal-care home programs. Younger disabled adults often require more than the elderly in terms of rehabilitation, therapy, recreational and job opportunities. They desire and need more community contact and involvement as loneliness is more apparent due to the fact that they are often separated from young families and spouses. In addition, and of great importance, their intellectual needs are often not met.

The development of programs and the provision of separate accommodation for younger chronically disabled persons are necessary because present living conditions sadly, and even tragically, lead to a regression in their state of health.

CULTURAL AFFAIRS

ESTABLISHMENT OF CULTURAL CENTRE IN CHILLIWACK, B.C.

Mr. Ross Belsher (Fraser Valley East): Mr. Speaker, I think every Member of Parliament from a rural riding must from time to time wish that his or her constituents had the same opportunities to receive as varied and enriched a cultural life as residents in urban constituencies. It is a fact of life that urban areas with their greater population bases receive a larger portion of funds from government. I do not think anyone would argue that such a practice should change, but I think that everyone must recognize that cultural matters mean as much to rural constituents as they do to urban ones.

Recently the Minister of Communications (Mr. Masse) approved a cultural grant to one of the communities in Fraser Valley East. This grant, along with funds raised locally, when coupled with money from the province, made a Cultural Centre for Chilliwack a reality. The Chilliwack Community Arts Council which worked long and hard thanks the Minister and his Department for his co-operation and for his appreciation and support of cultural matters.

AIRPORTS

EXPANSION PLANS FOR VERNON, B.C.

Hon. André Ouellet (Papineau): Mr. Speaker, I have a request from the residents of Okanagan Landing, British Columbia, showing concern about the Vernon airport expansion plans. Apparently the Airport Commission came up with a contract that will produce a licensed facility of only 2,000 feet. This is way below the 4,000 feet originally recommended in the Zolton Report, and below the 3,115 feet considered minimum for municipal use.

It is felt that NORD directors and their appointed airport commission have over-stepped their own mandate, ignoring the first of their prime objectives which is to locate and obtain a suitable airport site to serve the needs of the entire regional district, notwisthstanding future expansion and commercial usability being major considerations in this selection.

I would like to know why the Government is putting money into a project that will be totally unsuitable to the needs of the entire Regional District of Vernon.

WELFARE

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL AGREEMENT TO ASSIST WELFARE RECIPIENTS ENTERING EMPLOYMENT

Mr. Bill Attewell (Don Valley East): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Epp) announced last week that he and the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Miss MacDonald) have reached a historic agreement with the provinces and territories that will break the deadly cycle of welfare dependency. Disincentives have been replaced by hope, encouragement and, most important, opportunities.

Up until now there have been precious few incentives for welfare recipients to work. Any money a person earned while on welfare was deducted from his or her Government cheque. Hence, it was easier to stay totally dependent on welfare than to risk getting a job. This is a cruel and soul-destroying development.

We know that most people have pride in themselves and would like to work. To their great credit, people prefer self-sufficiency to hand-outs. Under this new program, by enrolling in federal job-training or work programs, people on welfare will be able to earn up to $158 per week without any reduction in benefits. The new Job Strategies Program assures people on social assistance of a fair share of the opportunities at entry and development levels. This is just as true for youth, for women, and for the disadvantaged. I commend the Ministers for their brilliant success in such an important area of concern to all Canadians.

FISHERIES

SALE OF CANNED TUNA—PRIME MINISTER'S KNOWLEDGE

Right Hon. John N. Turner (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. I do not want to ask him about tuna. I want to ask him about integrity.

Last week the former Minister of Fisheries and Oceans told the country that the Prime Minister had received detailed information about the rancid tuna in July. Under pressure the former Minister changed his story and he was fired.

This morning the Hon. Member for Carleton-Charlotte, the riding in which the tuna factory in St. Andrews, New Brunswick, is located, contradicted the Prime Minister by saying that since Parliament has reconvened in September he has raised the issue repeatedly in caucus before it became public. Under pressure from Pat MacAdam of the Prime Minister's office, this morning the Hon. Member attempted to change his story. I ask the Prime Minister what he has been asked before. I urge him to take the question seriously and to think carefully before answering.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): Does the Prime Minister still hold to the position that he never heard of this affair until one week ago?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Yes, Mr. Speaker.

KNOWLEDGE OF OFFICIALS

Right Hon. John N. Turner (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, CTV has reported that Ian Anderson, who was Director of Communications and who is now the Deputy Principal Secretary to the Prime Minister, received a transcript delivered to him eight weeks ago with a full account of the story which has since become public. The Prime Minister's caucus liaison officer, Patrick MacAdam, and old college room-mate, and buddy—

Some Hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): —also knew of the matter in July. Is the Prime Minister asking Canadians to believe that the matter was serious enough to cause the resignation of a Minister of the Crown and yet not serious enough to be told to him by two of the most senior officers in the Prime Minister's Office? Is that what he is asking us to believe?

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am not asking the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition to believe anything. I was asked a question, one which I have been asked for the last three days while he was absent from the House, and I told the truth. That is what it is, absolutely.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mulroney: Mr. Speaker, I have indicated to this House—and I have no need for a period of reflection—under interrogation by my hon. friend, the Leader of the New Democratic Party, and others, that this matter was brought to my attention for the first time on Tuesday night of last week. That is the fact. Any statement at variance with that is false. I have invited anyone who so contends from whatever side of the House to put his seat in play.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

ALLEGATION OF MINISTERS' KNOWLEDGE

Right Hon. John N. Turner (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, we have had a statement by a former Minister and a statement by a Member of Parliament. We have had admissions that the Minister of National Defence knew, that the Minister of Justice knew—

Mr. Crosbie: I did not know.

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): —and that the Minister of National Health and Welfare knew.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Get your facts straight.

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): I am suggesting to the Prime Minister—

Mr. Dick: You are wrong again.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): Mr. Speaker, we are dealing with a very serious issue reflecting upon the integrity of the highest office in the land.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): The issue is not fish. We do not have fish before the House any more; we have the possibility of a cover-up.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I would invite the Right Hon. Member to come to his question, please.

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): Mr. Speaker, I think Canadians—

Some Hon. Members: Order, order.

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): —demand to know the truth. Sir, you know this is a very fragile place. If the Prime Minister has any respect for this institution, I urge him to come clean with the whole story of what he knew about this affair.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the Leader of the Opposition says that the Minister of National Health and Welfare knew. That is false.

● (1420)

He says that the Minister of National Defence knew. That is false.

He says that the Prime Minister knew. That is false.

He says that the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans knew. He acknowledged it and took his responsibilities in a way which is completely alien to the Liberal Party which has no respect for the truth or for Parliament.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear.

VANCOUVER NEWSPAPER REPORT

Mr. George Henderson (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, if all those people in Cabinet did not know, you must have some caucus on that side.

My question has to do with a column in the Vancouver Sun which stated on Monday, and I quote:

One fisheries source said Mr. Mulroney issued directives on the matter in April and again . . . after lobbying by Maritime Ministers and MPs—

—in May.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: What Minister?

Mr. Henderson: My question is directed to the Prime Minister. What Ministers and Members of Parliament, other than the Hon. Member for Carleton-Charlotte, lobbied the Prime Minister? And can the Prime Minister honestly say to Canadians here today that he knew absolutely nothing about this affair until Tuesday night, September 17, 1985?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend asks me about a statement in the Vancouver Sun on September 23, which reads:

One fisheries source said Mr. Mulroney issued directives on the matter in April and again in May, after lobbying by Maritime Ministers and MPs.

The statement is absolutely false.

OFFICIALS' KNOWLEDGE

Mr. George Henderson (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the Prime Minister. It is becoming, of course, more apparent than ever before that there has been more than just scuttlebut floating around in the Prime Minister's Office. There were facts about rancid tuna, and decomposed tuna and the Prime Minister's office knew this. Will the Prime Minister tell this House today just exactly what his senior aides knew, Mr. Anderson and Mr. MacAdam, about this story? Did they know at that time that this tuna was unfit for human consumption?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I thought I responded fully to that question yesterday but I will be happy to go through it again for the Hon. Member.

In early July Mr. MacAdam picked up the comment or the scuttlebut, here in Ottawa, to the effect that a network might be airing that kind of—or a story of some kind. He communicated with the official in the office of the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans who advised him that there was no cause for concern of any kind.

The second meeting to which I referred yesterday involved Mr. Ian Anderson who was visited by two members of the Minister's staff. They gave the assurances that there was no health hazard, that the Minister was acting within his authority and that there was nothing wrong. They asked for Mr. Anderson's view—in the event the program aired that very evening—as to what they ought to do because the Minister was absent from Ottawa. Mr. Anderson immediately advised that they get the most senior official available and make him or her available to the media to respond fully to all inquiries.

One of the things which was given to Mr. Anderson was the transcript referred to by others where the Minister says: "First of all, you must remember that none of this product was unfit for human consumption". This was a flat statement which was made by the Minister in a television interview on June 26. This is a transcript which Mr. Anderson was given.

In light of this, Mr. Anderson gave the advice he gave, which I felt—and I hope my hon. friend would agree—was appropriate in the circumstances.

STATEMENT ATTRIBUTED TO MEMBER FOR CARLETON-CHARLOTTE

Mr. Ray Skelly (Comox-Powell River): Mr. Speaker, the transcript in the hands of the Prime Minister refers to a million cans of rancid and decomposing tuna. It is a serious matter affecting a $2 billion industry and 100,000 jobs in Canada. It is unthinkable he would not have informed him.

The Hon. Member for Carleton-Charlotte today contradicted the Prime Minister. My question to the Prime Minister is this. Does the challenge to put your seat up apply to the Hon. Member for Carleton-Charlotte? If he is wrong and he did not inform caucus and the Prime Minister at the same time, would the Prime Minister have the Hon. Member for Carleton-Charlotte put his seat on the line? Or, would the Prime Minister quit the charade and tell the truth to the House of Commons?

Some Hon. Members: Order!

Mr. Speaker: The Hon. Member—

Some Hon. Members: Throw him out!

Mr. Speaker: No, no.

Mr. Forrestall: Why not?

Mr. Speaker: Everyone just calm down, please. The Hon. Member knows there is an implication in the second part of his question which is improper and I simply invite him to rephrase it. Only the question without that part.

Mr. Skelly: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Forrestall: Talk about charades!

Mr. Skelly: —my second question to the Prime Minister is: Does the Prime Minister know the price of defending a lie?

Some Hon. Members: Oh, come on!

Mr. Mazankowski: That is way out of order!

Mr. Skelly: The loss is honour. The loss is the integrity of his Government.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Why don't you sit down?

Mr. Skelly: Does he know that it is a very serious problem?

An Hon. Member: You are wrong.

Some Hon. Members: Withdraw.

Mr. Speaker: The Hon. Member is skating very close and he knows it. It is not proper—

Mr. Forrestall: He thinks he is walking on water right now.

Mr. Speaker: It is not proper—order, please. All Members, order, please! What is improper is not made proper by yelling about it.

The Hon. Member is skating very close to the line. He knows it is improper to do indirectly what cannot be done directly. Making an accusation of that sort with regard to character is improper in this House. I, therefore, invite him to withdraw the earlier question and put a simple question of fact if he has one.

Mr. Skelly: Mr. Speaker, the simple question of fact is—

Some Hon. Members: Withdraw!

Mr. Skelly: —that a Minister of the Crown has given contradictory—

Some Hon. Members: Withdraw!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Hon. Member for Port au Port-St. Barbe.

MEMBER'S STATEMENT

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber-Port au Port-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, the issue before this Parliament today is not about tainted tuna.

Some Hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Tobin: Any more than the issue more than a decade ago in the U.S. was about a bungled break-in at Democratic headquarters.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Tobin: I repeat the question my colleague attempted to put to the Prime Minister. Given the Prime Minister's challenge yesterday that anyone who contradicts his version of truth should put his seat on the line, will he inform this House whether or not the Hon. Member for Carleton-Charlotte has resigned, or how does he explain the statement made this morning by a member of his caucus?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): The statement I made yesterday applies to any Member of this House irrespective of where he sits. I can tell my hon. friend that the Member of Parliament to whom he refers has since—

Mr. Ouellet: Changed his mind.

Mr. Mulroney: —issued a statement which substantially alters the impact of the first statement. I can tell my hon. friend that he has not been here. He has, as I understand it, been ill. Apparently this is sort of funny to the NDP.

Mr. Andre: He has never been to caucus this year; he is ill.

Mr. Mulroney: The statement was that this came up in September. The Hon. Member in question has been ill and not been in Ottawa since last June.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear.

ROLE OF PRIME MINISTER'S OFFICE

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber-Port au Port-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, I want to say that I have the greatest respect for the Hon. Member for Carleton-Charlotte. I sat on the Fisheries Committee with him for four years. He has a very sharp mind and he fights hard for his area. I believe he raised the matter in caucus—

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some Hon. Members: You believe?

Mr. Tobin: —and I ask the Prime Minister again—

Mr. Kempling: He wasn't here.

Mr. Tobin: I ask the Prime Minister again. How can he square the fact that both the Minister of Fisheries and the Hon. Member for Carleton-Charlotte have issued clarifying statements under pressure from his office? Does that not represent a very dangerous and frightening pattern of Members being pressured by his office to conform to the Prime Minister's idea—

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I too, have the same kind of respect for the Hon. Member for Carleton-Charlotte who has been ill for some time. I have not followed his movements—

Mr. Tobin: He has a good memory.

Mr. Mulroney: —exactly but my information is that he has not been in Ottawa hardly at all, if at all, since the month of June. But in any case, let me just say this. The Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition and the Leader of the New Democratic Party will, I am sure, agree with the basic principle that matters which transpire in caucus are, of course, secret. I will, however, without hesitation, make an exception to that rule today and say that at no time was that matter raised in my caucus by that Member in my presence.

PROCEEDINGS IN CAUCUS

Mr. Ian Deans (Hamilton Mountain): Mr. Speaker, lest we misunderstand what the Prime Minister is saying—

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Ouellet: It might have been raised in caucus while he was not there.

Mr. Nielsen: You clarify it.

Mr. Deans: I'll try. I learned from you. Is the Prime Minister saying categorically that the Member for Carleton-Charlotte did not ever raise that matter in the caucus of the Conservative Party during the period leading up to the time when it became public knowledge on September 18—that he never at any time raised that?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have just said that not only that Member, but no Member, raised that issue in our caucus in my presence.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

CAUCUS INQUIRY

Mr. Ian Deans (Hamilton Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I left "in your presence" out. I know the Member whom we are talking about very well. Is the Prime Minister saying that, whether or not he was present, at no time did that Member raise that matter in the Conservative caucus prior to September 18?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, we have a pretty big caucus.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Blaikie: Enjoy it while it lasts.

Mr. Mulroney: The NDP says "enjoy it while it lasts". You just keep up this kind of character assassination and you are going to be reduced to zilch in this country. That's what will happen to you.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mulroney: I will repeat for my hon. friend that I heard of this matter for the first time on Tuesday night of last week.

Mr. Deans: That's not what I asked.

Mr. Mulroney: This matter was never raised by anyone in our caucus at any time in my presence or, I am informed, in the presence of anybody else.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

STATEMENT ATTRIBUTED TO OFFICIAL

Mr. Dave Dingwall (Cape Breton-East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, Sir Walter Scott once wrote:

> "Oh, what a tangled web we weave,
> When first we practise to deceive!"

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Dingwall: I remind the Prime Minister that yesterday he said of Mr. Pat MacAdam:

> He got in touch with the Executive Assistant to the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and received the assurance that there was no problem.

Today Mr. Pat MacAdam denies that he received any assurances. Will the Prime Minister indicate to the House who was telling the truth; he or Mr. MacAdam?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, with regard to that statement of my hon. friend attributed to Mr. MacAdam, I took the liberty of inquiring of Mr. MacAdam prior to Question Period, and that statement was never granted by him. It is inaccurate.

Mr. Guilbault (Saint-Jacques): Amazing.

STATEMENT ATTRIBUTED TO MEMBER

Mr. Dave Dingwall (Cape Breton-East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, is the Prime Minister telling the House that the objections in the representations by the Member of Parliament for Carleton-Charlotte were never raised in his caucus? The report says he did raise them in September of last year, not this year.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Tobin: Since September of last year.

Mr. Dingwall: Since September of last year.

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, we only formed the Government on September 17 last year. I do not know when the caucus met after that.

Mr. Tobin: Over the last year.

Mr. Mulroney: No, you asked me about September. You said it was not this September because the Member is sick, so it has to be last September. Now you change your mind on that.

Mr. Marchi: You are the one changing your mind.

Mr. Mulroney: I first acquired this information last Tuesday night. It is just as clear cut as that, and that is exactly the case.

NUCLEAR ARMAMENTS

EXPORT OF URANIUM TO UNITED STATES

Hon. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. Canadians believe that all uranium exported from our country is to be used exclusively for peaceful purposes. In fact, we have an agreement with the United States which contains a specific clause about Canadian uranium which says that it "shall not be used for any military purpose".

I have given the Prime Minister notice of this question. Would he agree that the only possible interpretation of those words is that no uranium exported from Canada to the United States should be used for anything but peaceful purposes?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): That is generally our interpretation. The Secretary of State will be in the House tomorrow to provide more ample information for the Member. This policy is one that has been unchanged. It goes back to a decision by Mr. Pearson in about 1965, and that is the general thrust of what successive Governments have followed.

USE MADE OF URANIUM

Hon. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Mr. Speaker, I agree with the Prime Minister that that is what the policy is supposed to be, and that is what the words of the agreement between Canada and the United States are. Has the Prime Minister been informed by the Secretary of State for External Affairs, or by any of his officials, of the very serious evidence that has been brought forward to show that Canadian uranium is now being used in the United States for the construction of nuclear weapons?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): I am not aware of the specifics of that, but as I indicated, the Secretary of State will respond very fully to the question tomorrow in the House.

REQUEST THAT INQUIRIES BE MADE

Hon. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Mr. Speaker, given the very great importance of this issue to Canadians and other people around the world, will the Prime Minister assure the House that he will have people in his office look into this immediately to find out if the evidence, which I understand to be quite conclusive, is conclusive? Once that is established, will he find out how it ever came to be that we would allow that to transpire with our uranium? Finally, will he take immediate steps to ensure that no uranium exported from Canada is used in any way for military purposes?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, as soon as we received notice of the question of my hon. friend I began the process of conveying those instructions. A fuller response will be delivered by the Secretary of State tomorrow.

ENERGY

STIMULATION OF CANADA LANDS EXPLORATION

Mrs. Barbara Sparrow (Calgary South): Mr. Speaker, my question, through you, is directed to the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. The Petroleum Incentive Program terminates in March, 1986, as is stated in the Western Accord. What is being done and what discussions are under way to formulate a new federal policy to stimulate Canada Lands exploration? When might the Minister make an announcement in order that resource companies can make plans for future activity in the frontier?

Mr. John McDermid (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, the Minister is having discussions with the industry, the provinces, and the Minister of Finance and others in the Government involved in this particular program. She will have something to announce to the House, hopefully before the end of the year.

BANKS AND BANKING

CANADIAN COMMERCIAL BANK—MINISTER'S MARCH STATEMENT

Miss Aideen Nicholson (Trinity): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of State for Finance. On March 29 the Minister assured us that, with the exception of the Canadian Commercial Bank, no financial institution was in any difficulty. On that very same day, Western Capital Trust closed its doors after months of negotiations with the Minister's officials. Will the Minister explain why, only two days ago, she again said in the House that her March 29 statement was true?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, as I have explained in the House before, Western Capital Trust closed its doors voluntarily on that day while I was in the House. Through discussions with Western Capital we learned that they were trying to come up with a plan which my officials advised me had a chance of succeeding. When they closed the doors they informed me after the fact. I repeat that the reason I made the statement in the House that day was because it was true.

● (1440)

MINISTER'S KNOWLEDGE OF BANK'S PROBLEMS

Miss Aideen Nicholson (Trinity): Mr. Speaker, I would have thought the circumstances which the Minister described indeed did indicate that the institution was in difficulty.

May I move on to another example of perhaps different understandings, Mr. Speaker? During the debate on the CCB bail-out in March, the Minister told us very definitely that there was no indication before March 14 that there were serious problems within this bank. We now know that is not so.

Can the Minister explain what happened? Was she not briefed? Why was she not able to be more factual?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, if there is anything I have dealt with in this House, it is the facts. The problems that were brought to our attention on March 14 were the facts on which we acted on March 25, namely, that there had been, obviously, in the Inspector General's office monitoring of financial institutions.

There is always monitoring of financial institutions. The problems that we moved to resolve we moved to resolve after the problem was brought to our attention on March 14.

FISHERIES

SALE OF CANNED TUNA—RETRACTION OF STATEMENTS

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor-Walkerville): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the Prime Minister. The Minister of Fisheries retracted his statement on Friday that he had informed the Prime Minister's office about the great tuna scandal.

Mr. MacAdam has retracted his statement about his sources of information about the tuna problem—

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Question.

Mr. McCurdy: Today the Member for Carleton-Charlotte has retracted his damning statement made recently.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Question.

Mr. McCurdy: How many retractions of this kind are the Canadian public to have before the people lose confidence altogether in this Government?

An Hon. Member: Where is your question?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, there are 210 Members of the Conservative caucus sitting here, and they will all give you the same answer.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

An Hon. Member: They have it written on the palm of their hand.

INQUIRY OF PRIME MINISTER

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor-Walkerville): My supplementary question is for the Prime Minister, Mr. Speaker. Does the Prime Minister remember Richard Nixon?

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Beatty: Remember Joe McCarthy?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Order. May I remind Hon. Members that questions are supposed to have something to do with eliciting information about government policy.

The Prime Minister wishes to respond?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Yes, Mr. Speaker. I remember Mr. Richard Nixon who was an unindicted co-conspirator, I understand, in a matter in the United States, a very tragic figure in American history. His problem was that he failed to respond fully and completely to legitimate questions, unlike me who responded completely before the House and the Parliament of Canada.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crosbie: They are twisted turkeys. It is the New Demogogic Party.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

BANKS AND BANKING

REQUEST FOR REASON GOVERNMENT DID NOT APPOINT PERSON TO CHECK TAXPAYERS' INTERESTS IN ADMINISTRATION OF CCB

Mr. Raymond Garneau (Laval-des-Rapides): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance. Canadians read in the papers this morning that as far back as March 22 of this year, the President of the Toronto-Dominion Bank and other bankers had asked the Government to appoint a senior official to take charge of administration at the Canadian Commercial Bank, in order to protect the interests of Canadian taxpayers.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the Minister of Finance why his Government, the Government to which he belongs, failed to designate anyone to protect the interests of taxpayers by monitoring the Bank's administration?

[English]

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, this question has been answered time and time again. In the spring we moved as rapidly as possible to try to find new directors for the Canadian Commercial Bank. I have no power to change the management of any banking institutions. I would also like to point out that the problems of this Bank began for two reasons, two reasons, Mr. Speaker. They began because of the National Energy Policy that destroyed the western economy—

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mrs. McDougall: —and they continued because that Government never did anything about increasing the supervisory capability of our regulators to look after our depositors.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Mr. Garneau: Mr. Speaker, I have heard similar nonsense from the Minister and the Prime Minister two or three times before.

Mr. Speaker, I am referring to Hansard of March 25, in which the Minister herself stated the causes of the Bank's bankruptcy and referred to the situation in the United States. Never, in the initial paragraphs of her statement, did she mention—

Mr. Speaker: The question, please!

Mr. Garneau: I wish to put a question to the Minister. Why did she not appoint anyone when the bankers gave a list of former senior officials of their institutions who were retired and who were willing to come back and go to work to protect Canadian taxpayers?

[English]

Mrs. McDougall: Mr. Speaker, the Inspector General proceeded to do his job by sending in inspectors following the rescue package for the Canadian Commercial Bank. At a later time, people were sent in from the private banking sector. I want to remind the Hon. Member that——during the years when the Liberal Government was in power, your Government never did a single thing. Never!

[Translation]

[English]

REQUEST FOR LIST OF UNINSURED DEPOSITORS

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops-Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, my question is in response to the Minister's decision to keep secret the list of depositors with over $60,000 who are receiving their pay-out from the taxpayers.

The Chairman of the Finance Committee has now come forward saying that a list of the uninsured depositors should be made public. That position is also supported by the President of the Toronto Dominion Bank, and other bank chairmen have indicated that the decision is really a government decision. Would the Minister now stop stonewalling, or covering up, and make this list public?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, I have indicated that I will provide a categorical breakdown of the finest possible degree to satisfy the kind of information that is required by the committee. I would also point out that other bank chairmen and other members of the public, other lawyers and many people agree with my decision not to release these names at this time.

REQUEST FOR JUDICIAL INQUIRY

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops-Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. In recent days it has become perfectly clear that the Government is not prepared to give the Finance Committee the necessary powers or information to conduct a thorough investigation into the fall of the Canadian Commercial Bank and Northland.

Rather than continue this charade, will the Prime Minister get to the bottom of the CCB mess and ask that a judicial inquiry take place into the demise of these two banks?

Hon. Ray Hnatyshyn (President of the Privy Council): Let me first say, Mr. Speaker, that I have had the opportunity of discussing these matters with the Hon. Member's House Leader. We have a firm rule that we will not have our Members make false statements in this House respecting negotiations. The Hon. Member ought to learn that right away because what he is saying is without foundation. We have been as open as possible with respect to every facet of the request being made. We are interested in getting to the bottom of this thing, even more so than the members of his Party, and we have taken steps to ensure that the full truth comes out. I would ask the Hon. Member's House Leader not to go about discussing what goes on in negotiations in public again.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Deans: Sensitive. He didn't ask about the negotiations.

Mr. Broadbent: Did you hear the question?

TRADE

ENTRY OF CANADIAN TECHNICIANS TO UNITED STATES

Mr. Bill Kempling (Burlington): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of International Trade. I am sure the Minister is aware that as a result of a court action in California by the International Union of Bricklayers and Allied Craftsmen that Canadian tradesmen and technicians are being denied access to the United States to install and service Canadian commercial and industrial equipment. Could the Minister inform the House of the status of this situation and whether any progress has been made to eliminate the problem?

Hon. James Kelleher (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, immediately following the court ruling in California, we contacted the Acting Solicitor General for the United States and asked him to launch an immediate appeal and also to apply for a stop order. We then went back to the judge in question, that is the Solicitor General did, and he issued a partial reprieve in which he ordered that any contracts entered into prior to August 28, 1985, would not be subject to his ruling. So people going down to repair machinery delivered under contracts prior to that date will not be stopped. That was a partial reprieve. The Solicitor General is now appealing that ruling as well.

BANKS AND BANKING

CANADIAN COMMERCIAL BANK—OFFER TO REVIEW ASSETS

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (Saint-Henri-Westmount): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of State for Finance.

[Translation]

What a nerve! She just said we as a Government never did a thing! But I can tell you—

[English]

—this Government never blew $1 billion and no other Government in Canadian history has ever blown a billion dollars. We want some answers here in the House of Commons.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Perhaps members on the Government benches could allow me to hear the Opposition's question.

Mr. Johnston: Thank you. And no bank ever went bankrupt either. Yesterday the bankers finally made clear something that the Minister has waffled about consistently in this House, that they were ready, that they were willing and they were able to move in and review the assets of the Canadian Commercial Bank and they could have saved the taxpayers of Canada a billion dollars. Why did the Minister or the Minister of Finance or the Prime Minister refuse to accept that offer? Tell us this time. You have not told us yet.

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, there have been a number of statements made by different bankers as to how long it would take to examine the books of the Canadian Commercial Bank. There were some commercial bankers in there looking at that loan portfolio. They have made that clear. Some of them said that it would take quite a bit longer than others have said it would take.

We came to a collective decision that we had to make a decision quickly on this bank. We brought our collective judgment to bear on this and in the end everyone agreed that that was the action that was necessary, by Monday morning.

GOVERNMENT DECISION

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (Saint-Henri-Westmount): Mr. Speaker, what was the collective decision? Who were part of the collectivity? Neither the Minister nor the Minister of Finance sat in that meeting during that fateful weekend. Will the Minister not confirm—we will throw her one more life-jacket—will she not confirm that the decision had already been made by the Prime Minister on the Friday so there was no point in reviewing the assets of the Canadian Commercial Bank?

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

An Hon. Member: Right on.

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, this was a collective decision on behalf of this Government that was made by a partnership and a collective action by the Government—

Mr. Ouellet: Answer the question.

Mrs. McDougall: —a Government that stands together and makes its decision together in conjunction with the banking system—

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, order. It seems reasonable if I ask members of the Government to let me hear the Opposition's questions that members of the Opposition would let me hear the Government's answer.

An Hon. Member: There are no answers.

Mr. Speaker: Maybe that will get on camera.

Mr. Ouellet: You are on camera now.

CHARTER OF RIGHTS

PROPERTY RIGHTS—REQUEST FOR INCLUSION

Mr. Jim Jepson (London East): My question is for the Minister of Justice, the Hon. Member for St. John's West, and it is on the subject of property rights.

Until property rights are given full protection under the Charter of Rights and Freedoms, Canadians truly will not enjoy either the freedom or the security that is inherent in being a citizen of this great country.

Can the Minister tell us when we might expect this very important matter to be brought before Parliament?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. gentleman probably knows, that provision would have been in the Constitution and the Charter of Rights were it not for the members of the New Democratic Party and their fellow travellers snuggled in the bosom of the Liberal Party.

I am happy to be able to tell the hon. gentleman that I have already asked that this item be put on the agenda for the next federal-provincial meeting of Attorneys General and hope to have some action on it, always keeping in mind that we wish to protect the rights of the women of Canada with references to family law. We will try to accomplish both of these things when another constitutional amendment comes forward.

BANKS AND BANKING

CANADIAN COMMERCIAL BANK—COMMITTEE EXAMINATION

Mr. Simon de Jong (Regina East): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of State for Finance. Given what we have just heard from the Government House Leader that the Government is anxious to move the question of the CCB into committee, and given the fact as well that the committee's report on the CCB is just riddled with statements that the committee could not complete its report because it did not have access to the proper information and that the Inspector General of the Banks was not forthcoming with information, how can she expect the committee to get to the truth of the matter if all these documents and information are not fully available to the committee?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, I have indicated that I will give every document to the committee that I am legally entitled to give them. I have offered to break down the categories of depositors in a way that should meet their satisfaction about the legitimacy of these claims. We are working through other channels to attempt to get the report from the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation in the United States. We have bent over backwards to indicate that we will provide the committee with this information.

REQUEST FOR REASON JUDICIAL INQUIRY REFUSED

Mr. Mike Cassidy (Ottawa Centre): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the Prime Minister. Considering that the auditors have indicated that the Canadian Commercial Bank loan portfolio would not be available, that the Minister will not provide us with the list of depositors, and that the bank inspector has refused—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

[English]

It must be Wednesday. Does the Hon. Member have a question?

[Translation]

Mr. Cassidy: With that in mind, why can we not have a judicial inquiry to shed light on all facts pertaining to the Canadian Commercial Bank collapse?

[English]

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, we have indicated from the beginning that we want the facts public on this very serious situation. I take this as a very serious situation which the Hon. Members on the other side do not seem to do. At my request I was in committee to give them an early explanation as soon as we made the announcement. I have offered to bring everything that I can possibly bring to the committee. I do not know what more the Hon. Member expects that we can do. We have been far more forthcoming than your Party has.

Mr. Deans: We have given you everything we have.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

COMPENSATION FOR SINKING OF THE LADY MARJORIE

Mr. Howard Crosby (Halifax West): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of National Defence concerning the case of Walter Theriault. I know he is familiar with the sinking of the Lady Marjorie because it has been brought to the attention of the House by my colleague from South West Nova. Over six months have gone by since this unfortunate incident. The Minister knows that justice delayed is justice denied. Can he indicate to the House what action is being taken and when we can see this claim settled for the Theriault family?

Hon. Harvie Andre (Associate Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I am well aware of the interest of the Hon. Member in this unfortunate situation. A board of inquiry is looking at it. I gave instructions to officials in the Department that they should make haste so that this matter can be put to rest finally and in the near future.

FISHERIES

SALE OF TAINTED TUNA—PRIME MINISTER'S POSITION

Hon. Jean Lapierre (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Right Hon. the Prime Minister.

After today's oral questions period, does the Prime Minister not find it passing strange that he should be the only one to be in step? His friend MacAdam never said that. The former Minister of Fisheries and Oceans withdrew his statement. The Member for Carleton-Charlotte is ill and cannot possibly have said that. He claims that the news media are imagining things.

I would like to know whether the Prime Minister thinks he can fool Canadians? How does it feel to have a monopoly on truth?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I never claimed to be in secure possession of truth. In answer to a question I simply said that I gave the only answer possible, I told the truth.

My hon. friend blames me for telling the truth! It is unfortunate but I can assure you that the facts as I related them to the Leader of the Opposition and the Leader of the New Democratic Party were in accordance with the situation—

However, I very seriously urge the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Turner) that when he asks questions to not make statements as to so-called facts. I did not know about the tuna issue until Wednesday morning last week. THE CABINET

RESIGNATION OF MINISTER OF COMMUNICATIONS

Hon. Marcel Masse (Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, this morning I was informed that I was the subject of an inquiry concerning an alleged violation of Sections 61 and 63 of the Canada Elections Act during the last election campaign, in the riding of Frontenac.

Although no complaint was lodged against me, today I have asked the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) to relieve me of my duties as Minister of Communications. I made this decision since the prospect that a complaint might be lodged against me would cast doubts on my integrity, which would reflect on the Government. That is why I tendered my resignation to the Prime Minister today.

I am convinced that upon completion of the investigation, my innocence will be established.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

MINORITY RIGHTS

ESTABLISHMENT OF LITIGANT ASSISTANCE PROGRAM

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Secretary of State of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to announce today, on behalf of the federal Government, a new and expanded litigant assistance program.

The advent of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms has focussed the attention of Canadians and led to a host of projects by volunteer agencies. In the Throne Speech in the fall of 1984, the Government stressed its commitment to social justice and equity for all Canadians, especially for those who, in the course of our history, have suffered from discrimination. During the last election campaign, and on several occasions since then, our Government has said repeatedly that it supports the concept of providing financial assistance in cases based on the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms and expected to have a national impact. The creation of a Committee on Equality Rights is one example of the many steps taken by our Government to bring the Charter to the people and to respond to the needs of volunteer organizations. The implementation of a new and expanded litigant assistance program is a major adjunct to this series of Charter-related initiatives.

Mr. Speaker, I am happy to say that the new program will not only support cases where language rights are at stake but will also provide for financial assistance in cases based on Section 15 (which says that all Canadians are equal before the law, without discrimination and, in particular, without discrimination based on race, national or ethnic origin, colour, religion, sex, age or mental or physical disability), Section 27 (which deals with the preservation and enhancement of the multicultural heritage of Canadians) and Section 28 (which stresses equal rights for men and women) of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms. The new sections of the expanded program will apply only to matters that fall under federal jurisdiction. It was thought that as far as equality rights are concerned, the federal Government should take the initiative and set an example to help Canadians in their search for clarification of these rights which are protected under the Charter. This is a very positive step which, it is hoped, will encourage the provinces to follow suit.

One of the important aspects of this new measure, Mr. Speaker, is that the Government, in addition to offering Canadians financial assistance in this very vital area, has done so in such a way that it can no longer be construed as in any way affecting the content of these court challenges. The new expanded program will be more directly concerned with areas under federal jurisdiction.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I am sorry to have to interrupt the Hon. Minister, but perhaps Hon. Members who want to have meetings could have them somewhere else.

Mr. Bouchard: I appreciate your intervention, Mr. Speaker.

Were one to assume that the federal Government will directly administer this program, one might very well suggest there is a conflict of interest if the Government were to decide which challenges against itself should be funded. This initiative is an example of the novel relations this Government wants to have with volunteer organizations. Therefore the Government did not elect to fund only a few organizations because it thought that many groups should have ready access to these funds, especially individuals who might not belong to non-profitable groups. It thought as well that many questions such as systematic discrimination were of great interest to several groups—women, visible minorities, native people and the handicapped, to name a few—and not only to the official languages communities. To a certain extent, the creation of the new body for which we have opted will reduce the possibility of duplication.

[English]

I therefore wish to announce at this time that the expanded program will be entrusted for its operation to a respected organization in the voluntary sector—the Canadian Council on Social Development. This national, non-governmental and non-profit organization provides a forum for citizen participation in the formulation of progressive social policy. The Council has undertaken, over the past four years, a number of initiatives to increase Canadians' awareness of and preparation for the impact of the new Constitution. Of particular note was the establishment of a task force which explored the judiciary's expanded public policy responsibilities, proposed a series of action strategies in such key areas as research and information support and examined the role of Constitution-based advocacy by the voluntary sector.

• (1510)

The council will be required to establish an independent body which will be charged with deciding which court challenges merit the provision of financial assistance under the program. The body so constituted will be composed of Canadians who are prominent in the fields of language and equality rights. This body will also deal with outstanding cases presently being considered for financial assistance.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Bouchard: Under the terms of the arrangement with the Canadian Council on Social Development, it has been agreed that the council will report annually to the Department of the Secretary of State.

The program I am announcing today will provide an amount of $9 million over the next five years to support this important development in the clarification and expansion of fundamental rights and freedoms for all Canadians. This represents close to a tenfold increase in the level of funding that existed under the original program.

[Translation]

As Hon. Members well know, Mr. Speaker, this program was set up in 1978 to support challenges related to the linguistic rights of minorities. Extended in June 1979, it was limited to challenges based on Sections 93 and 133 of the Constitution Act of 1867 and Section 23 of the Manitoba Act of 1970, for those provisions were the only ones that could be used to provide a constitutional base for official languages rights. Section 93 protects denominational rights in respect of education, whereas Section 133 of the Constitution Act of 1867 and Section 23 of the Manitoba Act of 1870 sanction the use of English and French in the legislatures of the federal Government, Quebec and Manitoba, as well as before the courts of those two provinces.

As a result of the proclamation of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms, the Court Challenges Program was updated in December 1982 so it would apply also to typical challenges where the plaintiff claims his rights concerning the official languages or his right to education in the language of the minority, pursuant to the provisions of Sections 16 to 23 of the Charter. Generally speaking, Sections 16 to 22 deal with the status and use of French and English in Canada, at the federal level, and in New Brunswick. Under these sections, it is the right of anyone to obtain services in either of the two official languages, when dealing with federal and New-Brunswick institutions. Charter Section 23 guarantees the rights to education in the language of the minority.

[English]

To date, 17 cases have been funded in whole or in part under the program. A number of cases which enhance minority language education rights have been assisted in Prince Edward Island, Quebec, Ontario and Alberta. The issue of the use of official languages before the courts has been dealt with in Quebec, Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Alberta and the Yukon. The results of these cases have been encouraging and have underscored the important role that such a program has played.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, our Government is committed to promote social justice and equality for all Canadians and this new expanded Court Challenges Program is one way to achieve our purpose. This fresh approach signals a new era in relations between the federal Government and volunteer organizations.

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa-Vanier): Mr. Speaker, I should like to start by congratulating the Minister on his promotion which, I think we can rightly say, is a token of the Prime Minister's confidence in the Minister's competence and capacility. We have high hopes and great expectations, and we trust he will be able to respond to the needs of various groups, whether they are official language groups or represent other linguistic communities.

Mr. Speaker, "expanding the litigant assistance program" is undoubtedly something many Members of this House have been looking forward to for some time. Since last April, when Section 15 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms came into effect, many of us have asked this Government when it would be considering an expanded program to include Section 15.

As we know, and the Minister already said as much, the cases heard before the courts since December 1982 have dealt with Sections 93, 133, 23 of Manitoba and 23 of the Charter. The Government, that is the Liberal Government at the time, had established the program in 1978 and expanded it to include the schools issue, which is covered by Section 23 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

Mr. Speaker, we feel it is absolutely vital that Canadians should be helped financially in bringing before the courts cases of national importance based on the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms. I think it is a very good thing that the majority, that Canada as a whole should bear the costs incurred by those Canadians who want to challenge the Charter of Rights before the courts.

Mr. Speaker, I also approve because it gives Canadians across the country a chance to acquire a better understanding of the rights we have all been given under this Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

Therefore, my colleagues and I can only applaud the Minister and the Government for their decision to expand the Court Challenges Program to include Sections 15, 27 and 28.

[English]

The purpose of this program is for the federal Government to make available financial and human resources to assist litigants in establishing before the courts the full meaning of equality and the full meaning of the rights given by the Charter in Section 23, 15, 27 and 28. Speaking for my colleague, the Hon. Member for York West (Mr. Marchi), who speaks as critic for multiculturalism, I can tell the Minister and the Government that indeed ethnocultural communities of Canada will be very happy to hear that the Government is enlarging the program to include Section 27 of the Charter. However, ethnocultural communities and other minorities have great concern regarding the limitations of the funds available. Until we know the criteria under which the program will apply, we cannot applaud too loudly. Hopefully we will see these criteria soon. Therefore, we will reserve judgement on the applicability of this program.

Speaking for my colleagues on this side of the House, I understand the Minister's concern about avoiding conflict of interest. I understand that the Government wants to give this to an outside agency so that the Minister of Justice (Mr. Crosbie) will not be in conflict with the Secretary of State (Mr. Bouchard) when deciding which cases will be financed and which will not. I, for one, endorse the idea that an outside body or bodies should be asked to administer this program. I am pleased the Government has heard the message clearly that there could be some conflicts. We all know that, for example, the Minister of Justice (Mr. Crosbie) was not too hot on the issue of allowing groups and individuals to have financial assistance from the federal Government.

The organization which will be charged with the administration of this program, the Canadian Council on Social Development, is a serious and competent body in social matters. I have hesitation with respect to language questions. To ask the council to perform the work which has been traditionally performed by the Secretary of State leaves me asking whether or not this is the proper organization to deal with language issues. It has not been my experience that the Canadian Council on Social Development has that expertise in matters of language rights. Therefore, I can tell the Minister that, with that reservation, I am happy to hear that the Government has adopted this arm's length position.

I would indicate to the Minister that we are worried about the lack of consultation which went into this issue. I have personally phoned several organizations and have been told by them that they were not consulted on how this program would be put together. That worried me because there are different interests, be they covered by Sections 15 or 27. We have a panel which will be chosen, I take it, by the Canadian Council on Social Development, or on the advice of someone who will represent various interests. We do not know how large the council will be, nor do we know how the people will be named to it. All we know is that there will be a panel of competent, we hope, and understanding people, who will report annually to the Minister. We still have to see the modalities, as we say en français—

[Translation]

—in French, modalities of application, criteria, and we are anxious to hear the answers to these questions.

Mr. Speaker, I must also tell you that I consulted with my colleague from Outremont (Mrs. Pépin) and she made it quite clear that women do not agree. In this field she knowledgeably speaks on behalf of the Liberal Party. They do not agree because they had a council—the Women's Legal Education and Action Fund, if my memory serves me right—which was funded and whose role was to support legal or other action to promote the cause of women.

Through you, Mr. Speaker, I say to the Minister that perhaps the whole approach will have to be reconsidered so as to involve several organizations, not just one. I had suggested the Canadian Bar Association because I thought it was an independent body which, at least in case of litigation, might have given a reasonable judgment devoid of any special interest. My recommendation was rejected, but there are many other such organizations.

For instance I can tell you that the Fédération des francophones hors Québec has not been consulted. It feels frustrated, it feels ignored and it even feels hurt because the Prime Minister had told all those groups: "We will consult with you." Well, they were not consulted. So we are faced with the imposition of an administrative measure which makes us feel somewhat hesitant.

The Secretary of State (Mr. Bouchard)—I conclude with this and wish him well—must become the champion of official languages minority groups, the champion as well of all individuals affected by this court challenges program, be they handicapped, women, official languages minority groups or anyone covered under Sections 15, 27 and 28; the Secretary of State will be their spokesman in the House. We warn him that we expect much from him and we hope he will keep the House up to date on the program and its operation.

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby): On behalf of all my colleagues of the NDP caucus, Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to address the very important issue of the establishment of a fund to achieve equality rights in Canada.

Mr. Speaker, I emphasize that I am speaking on behalf of all these Hon. Members, including the Hon. Member for Vancouver-East (Ms. Mitchell) who is our party's critic on the status of women, the Hon. Member for Beaches (Mr. Young) who is our critic on the rights of the handicapped, as well as the Hon. Member for Churchill (Mr. Murphy) who is our critic on federal-provincial relations.

Mr. Speaker, I wish the Liberal Party critic had spoken out on this issue, because I am well aware that she does not agree with the views of the Government's spokeman and, frankly, I share her disappointment.

[English]

Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to indicate that while we in the New Democratic Party welcome at long last the announcement by the Government with respect to the funding of challenges of national importance under the provisions of Sections 15, 27 and 28 of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms, as well as the language rights provisions of the Charter, we are disappointed with the process which led to this announcement, as well as with significant elements of the substance.

It was with the objective, which I believe all Members of the House would share, that Canadians should not be forced into the courts that we welcomed the adoption of Section 15 of the Charter of Rights on April 17, 1982. However, we had hoped that in the three years which was given by Parliament and by the provincial Governments to change laws and practices to bring them into conformity with the spirit and letter of Sections 15, 27 and 28 there would have been far more substantial work done and that Canadians would not have to go to the courts. We were most disappointed with the minimal response, both by the previous Government and by this Government, to the challenge posed by Section 15.

Indeed, as a member of the committee of the House of Commons on equal rights, which travelled across the country, from one side to the other, I have heard from many witnesses who emphasized the importance of adequate funding for Charter challenges. In August of 1984 the Prime Minister announced that there would be adequate funding mechanisms established to ensure that potential litigants who wanted to bring forward important challenges under Section 15 of the equality rights section would have the resources to do so.

We know that the Minister of Justice (Mr. Crosbie) was not too excited about this prospect. In fact, in May of this year in response to a question from me he said:

> Mr. Speaker, there is a Charter of Rights here in Canada. It is alive and doing well. Any citizen or any group can apply to the courts if they believe they have a case under the Charter. They do not require financing by the Government. If they believe they have a good cause, they can find the money for that cause. That, Mr. Speaker, is the way it is and always has been in our country.

Fortunately, saner heads prevailed. I am pleased to note that the view of the Minister of Justice was a minority view. In fact, it was recognized that funding was essential to make equality a reality in Canada today. Now, over a year later, the Government has in fact established a fund. What about the fund?

First, in the brief time I have available I wish to speak about the process which led to the establishment of this fund. There was an excellent proposal made by a very respected organization in Canada. I am referring to the Women's Legal Education and Action Fund, a group which represents women from right across Canada.

[Translation]

The Women's Legal Education and Action Fund has carefully examined how the money should be spent to defend equality rights. In the opinion not only of this Fund but also of the New Democratic Party, it is essential that women should be able to choose among significant issues and decide on which to take action, as well as use the money as they see fit, and not as others might see fit.

That is why the Women's Legal Education and Action Fund has applied for financial assistance from the Government of Canada. It has a very specific purpose, Mr. Speaker. It applied for a grant of $20 million.

This amount would yield some $2 million in interests per annum, which is exactly what is required by a small organization the purpose of which is to defend public interests. And the Fund has emphasized that it is often necessary to go to courts to have the guarantees of the Charter enforced.

• (1530)

[English]

A concrete proposal was put forward for funding. What happened? Not once, not twice, but 13 different times they tried to talk to someone in Government—anyone; the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Hnatyshyn), the Secretary of State (Mr. Bouchard), the Minister of Justice, but no one would talk to them. This is the Government which prides itself on consultation. So much for consultation, Mr. Speaker. There has been no consultation whatsoever on this important question.

Had the Government consulted, Mr. Speaker, it would have found that this proposal is fundamentally unacceptable. It is a proposal which is a slap in the face to those groups who most hoped for action on equality, on the woman's movement, on the disabled, on visible minorities and other minorities. It is a paternalistic approach and one which denies the equality which Government is supposed to be promoting.

As Shelagh Day of the Legal Education and Action Fund said:

> Once more, women are going to have decisions made for them by others. The point of equal rights at this particular time, you would think, would be to give women power to make decisions for themselves and to honor their capacity to do that. This is not a good equal-rights decision.

We echo that concern, Mr. Speaker, which has been expressed as well by representatives of the disabled and the ethnic communities in Canada, including the Canadian Ethnocultural Council.

I emphasize, Mr. Speaker, that we are not opposed to the principle of an independent arm's length agency which would have the power and, I might say, adequate funds to assist in funding important challenges under the provisions of the Charter of Rights. However, we say that the two principles are not exclusive. One can have a respected independent agency such as the Canadian Council for Social Development involved in funding decisions and, at the same time, recognize that it is women who should be determining priorities for women, that it is the disabled who should be determining priorities for the disabled, and that it is the representatives of minorities who should be determining their priorities, not others on their behalf.

Mr. Crosbie: We agree.

Mr. McLean: We agree. That is exactly what they've done.

Mr. Robinson: The Government says it agrees, Mr. Speaker. Yet it is bringing forward a proposal which flies in the face of that fundamental principle.

Mr. Crosbie: Narrow-minded McCarthyism.

Mr. Robinson: The New Democratic Party believes—and we will hear from the braying Minister of Justice in due course—that the amount of money which has been allocated for this fund—

Mr. Crosbie: I'm not allowed to speak here because the loud-mouthed NDP are hogging the floor.

Mr. Robinson: —is not adequate.

Ms. Mitchell: The unjust Justice Minister.

Mr. Robinson: The Legal Education and Action Fund estimated that it would cost some $2 million a year merely to pursue the very serious and historic inequities against women. This program would allocate $2 million for all court challenges, including challenges under the provisions of language rights. The structure which is proposed, Mr. Speaker, is awkward. It will result in delays and in reviews on a case-by-case basis and not on a priority basis.

In fact, as Mary Eberts, a chairperson of the Legal Committees of the Women's Action Fund, said:

> The potential for the whole thing to become bogged down is really quite substantial. I'm convinced the method is guaranteed to slow down the pace of litigation to that of a snail.

Justice delayed is justice denied, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Dick: Where did you hear that before?

Mr. Robinson: And justice has been denied to Canadian women, to the disabled and to other minority groups for far too long. We in this Party believe that the establishment of a fund or funds is long overdue, and while the resources must be beefed up, we are most disappointed with the failure of this Government to consult with the groups affected and to bring forward recommendations which would have responded in a meaningful way to the concerns of the groups which are seeking equality in Canada today.

Mr. Crosbie: You are a bleeding heart with a mouth.

PETITIONS

REQUEST FOR FULL POSTAL SERVICE

Mr. Barry Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, as a follow-up to a letter I wrote recently to the Acting President of Canada Post Corporation, I have the honour to present a petition on behalf of the residents of the 79 unit condominium in the Greenboro area of Ottawa-Carleton. They request that Canada Post commence full postal service in the Greenboro area of the City of Ottawa immediately.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE—USE OF PENSION INCOME

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops-Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, it is my pleasure to present a petition on behalf of a number of residents of Kamloops, British Columbia. They are concerned with the announcement of the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Miss MacDonald) that workers laid off after December 31 of this year will have their pension benefits deducted from their unemployment insurance benefits, thus effectively eliminating the benefit to the worker of the pension package he or she is about to receive.

Mr. John R. Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present a petition signed by several hundred residents of Sydney, Nova Scotia, who call upon Parliament to review and to recall the proposed section of the Unemployment Insurance Act which would see pension income being used as earned income for purposes of unemployment insurance.

FAMILY REUNIFICATION PROGRAM—REQUEST FOR CHANGE OF REGULATIONS

Mr. Dan Heap (Spadina): Mr. Speaker, it is my honour to present a petition from a number of residents of the City of Toronto in the Province of Ontario. They ask Parliament to amend the immigration regulations so as to allow sons, daughters, brothers and sisters, regardless of their marital status, to immigrate under the family reunification program.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

CONSIDERATION AT ALL STAGES OF BILLS NOS. C-71 AND C-72

Hon. Ray Hnatyshyn (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, there have been discussions between House Leaders and I believe that if you were to present the following motion, you would find it would pass by unanimous consent without debate. The motions is as follows:

That, notwithstanding any Standing or Special Order of this House, the Order of Reference to a legislative committee of Bill C-71, An Act to amend the Customs Tariff, shall be discharged and the said Bill shall stand referred to a Committee of the Whole for consideration as the first item of business under Government Orders later this day;

Provided that not later than 15 minutes before the end of the time provided for the consideration of Government Business this day, the Speaker shall interrupt, if necessary, any proceedings then before the House and shall put forthwith all questions necessary to dispose of the then remaining stages of the said Bill without further debate or amendment;

That when the motion for the third reading and passage of Bill C-71, An Act to amend the Customs Tariff, has been disposed of, the House shall proceed to consideration of the motion for the second reading and reference to a legislative committee of Bill C-72, An Act to amend the statute law relating to income tax and to make a related amendment to the Tax Court of Canada Act, and when disposed of at the second reading stage the same shall stand referred to a Committee of the Whole;

Provided, that not later than the end of time provided for the consideration of Government Business this day, the Speaker shall interrupt, if necessary, any proceedings then before the House and shall put forthwith, all questions necessary to dispose of the remaining stages of the said Bill without further debate or amendment.

Mr. Speaker: It is totally clear.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: In short, Mr. Speaker, there is an agreement that Bill C-71 and Bill C-72 will pass all stages today. There will be an opportunity, of course, to debate in Committee of the Whole, but we have agreed that we will dispose of these two items of legislation so that their Honours in the other place will be able to deal with them at their early convenience.

Mr. Gauthier: Mr. Speaker, I rise in my place just to congratulate the Minister for the clarity of his statement today. If we continue to have such clear and printed statements, it will be a lot easier for us to operate in this House. I give our Party's consent to this.

Mr. Deans: Mr. Speaker, as always, when consulted in advance, we co-operate.

Mr. Speaker: Somehow political connotations sneak into everything we say here, don't they?

The House has heard the proposal. Is there unanimous consent for the introduction of the motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: There being such consent, shall the motion as read carry?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

COMMUNICATIONS AND CULTURE

CONCURRENCE IN FIRST REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. Gabriel Fontaine (Lévis): With leave of the House, Mr. Speaker, I move, seconded by the Hon. Member for Kamouraska-Rivière-du-Loup (Mr. Plourde), that the first report of the subcommittee of the Standing Committee on Communications and Culture on the review of copyright which was tabled in the House today be concurred in.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt this motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

Mr. Paul Dick (Parliamentary Secretary to President of Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, the following questions will be answered today: Nos. 253 and 422.

[Text]

BELL HELICOPTER TEXTRON INC.

Question No. 253—Mr. Blenkarn:

Were any studies done by the Government with respect to the marketability of twin engine helicopters of the class and kind proposed to be built in Canada by Bell Helicopter Textron Inc. in accordance with the agreement the Government made with Bell Helicopter and, if so (a) what were they (b) will they be published?

Hon. Sinclair Stevens (Minister of Regional Industrial Expansion): Yes. (a) The market studies employed to assess the marketability of light twin engined helicopters, as the class of helicopter that is proposed to be built in Mirabel, were as follows:

(1) A Study of Helicopter Manufacturing in Canada, April, 1981. E.A. Owen/Aerospace Systems Division, Transportation Industries Branch, Industry, Trade and Commerce.

(2) Civil Helicopters/World Market Review, B. Metcalfe/ Market Research & Analysis Division, Defence Programs Bureau, July, 1982.

(3) Canadian Civil Helicopter/Market Analysis and Forecast, Aviation Planning Services Ltd., July, 1982.

(4) World Helicopter Forecast/Defence Marketing Services, (published annually).

(5) Aircraft Forecast (Military & Civil)/Forecast Associates Inc., (published annually).

Order Paper Questions

(6) Assessment of Historical and Projected Segments of U.S. and World Civil and Military Rotorcraft Markets 1960-1990/National Aeronautics and Space Administration. NASA CR-166151.

(b) Some of the marketing forecasts are available from professional agencies and can be obtained by contacting their publishers. Referenced studies Nos. 4, 5 and 6 cannot be published or copied by the Department for reasons of proprietary rights of the authors.

The Owen's study (No. 1) and the Aviation Planning Services study (No. 3) have been made available to the industry and can be made available on request. The remaining market study (No. 2) was an internal departmental working document, was never published and contains copyrighted information which the Department is not authorized to release.

In addition to the listed studies, the Department had access to various confidential market forecasts from helicopter and engine manufacturers. These forecasts contain proprietary information and cannot be released by the Department for reason of commercial confidentiality.

TRAIN SERVICE BETWEEN CANADA AND U.S.

Question No. 422—Mr. Robichaud:

1. (a) How many trains are there from Canada to the United States yearly (b) how many daily trains are there (c) what are the points of departure and arrival of such trains (d) what is the frequency of such trains?

2. (a) How many trains are there from the United States to Canada yearly (b) what Canadian destinations are served (c) how many daily trains are there?

3. Will the number of trains from Canada to the United States increase or decrease in 1985?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Minister of Transport): 1. VIA Rail operates one daily train service across the international border. This train, named the "Atlantic" operates from Montreal, Quebec to Halifax, Nova Scotia via the State of Main. Stops in Maine are made at Jackman, Greenville, Brownsville Junction, Danforth and Vanceboro.

2. Amtrak operates two daily trains into Montreal. One train operates daily from New York City to Montreal Via Albany. The other daily from Washington, D.C. to Montreal Via Springfield, Massachusetts and New York City.

Amtrak and VIA Rail operate two daily services from Toronto to U.S. points. One train operates from Toronto to New York City with VIA responsible for its operation from Toronto to Niagara Falls. The second train operates from Toronto to Chicago with VIA responsible for its operation from Toronto to Port Huron.

3. The number of trains from Canada to the United States increased by one daily train with the restoration of the "Atlantic" on June 1, 1985.

[English]

Mr. Dick: Mr. Speaker, I ask that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

Mr. Speaker: The questions enumerated by the Hon. Parliamentary Secretary have been answered. Shall the remaining questions stand?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

MOTION TO ADJOURN UNDER S.O. 31

Mr. Speaker: I am in receipt of a notice of motion under Standing Order 31 from the Hon. Member for Hamilton Mountain (Mr. Deans).

Mr. Ian Deans (Hamilton Mountain): Mr. Speaker, as you know, my Leader filed with you on two previous occasions a request for the adjournment of the House in order to discuss what we and I think others consider to be a matter of urgent and pressing necessity, the current financial situation at the Northland Bank. If you were to decide there is a prima facie case for allowing such a motion today, I would be prepared to move that motion.

Mr. Speaker: Members of the House were apprised of my view earlier on the question of emergency which must be met under this Standing Order, and also some of my preliminary views about urgency. Therefore, I find that the conditions of Standing Order 31 have in fact been met.

I, therefore, ask the House if the Hon. Member has leave to move the adjournment of the House under Standing Order 31 for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter?

Hon. Ray Hnatyshyn (President of the Privy Council): No, because we are still discussing the matter by consent.

Mr. Speaker: Is it agreed?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Some Hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: All those in favour please rise?

And more than five but less than twenty Members having risen:

Mr. Speaker: The Standing Order indicates that if 20 or more Members rise, consent is automatic. If more than five but fewer than twenty Members rise, I am required to call in the Members.

Therefore, call in the Members.

Before the taking of the vote:

Mr. Speaker: On a point of order, the President of the Privy Council.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Mr. Speaker, the rules provide that if 20 Opposition Members do not rise then you have no alternative in this instance but to call in the Members. I have had an opportunity of discussing with the Opposition Leaders the motion with respect to the adjournment of the House. I think you will find that there is a disposition by all Parties to have a debate on this matter commencing at eight o'clock tonight, and I would think under those circumstances we are quite prepared to proceed with the debate. If there is a disposition, since there is agreement to proceed with debate on this matter—

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Hnatyshyn: If the Liberals insist on having a vote, that is fine, we are prepared to vote for the debate. Otherwise we can save the time of the House and get on with the business without a vote. If the Opposition wants a vote, Mr. Speaker, you may as well go ahead and call the question.

Mr. Speaker: On the same point of order, the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Turner).

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member for Hamilton Mountain presented his motion with proper notice to Your Honour. After having properly considered the matter within the perview of Standing Order No. 31 of the Rules of the House of Commons you allowed him to seek leave.

The Hon. Member then rose to seek leave by unanimous consent which was refused by a voice from the Government side. That is the reason Your Honour rang the bells to convene the Hon. Members for a vote. That is perfectly clear. In other words, the Government side of the House by voice, requiring calling in of the Members, refused debate and in effect were overruling Your Honour allowing this emergency debate. If we want to talk about wasting the time of the House, the Hon. Members opposite and the House Leader brought it upon themselves by refusing the Hon. Member for Hamilton Mountain to present his motion for leave. We take the position, and since this goes to your authority in this House, we want a recorded vote to assure you that from all sides of the House you have the authority of the House and this debate should be allowed.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Order. I fully appreciate the continuing devotion and support of the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition. I take it that the President of the Privy Council is seeking to revert to the calling by the Chair as to whether there is consent that leave—order, please—I take it that that is what he was doing. I did not call for yeas and nays. I called for those who were in favour to rise, and fewer than 20 Members rose. That therefore precipitated the need for calling in the Members.

If the President of the Privy Council is suggesting that he is seeking that the House revert unanimously to calling verbally for those who support granting leave, I take it that consent for reversion has been refused. Is that correct?

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): You asked me a question, Mr. Speaker. I want to say that the Government side forced this vote which would have put the authority of the Speaker in jeopardy. We will not consent and we want—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Such an interpretation is not consistent with our traditions.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Mr. Speaker, I think that the way in which you articulated the circumstances is clearly the way things transpired. Unfortunately, there were not enough Members to rise in their places in order to have the vote. We are prepared to go ahead. We have been prepared to go ahead with the reference and with this matter for some days now. We are prepared to have a reasoned debate on this issue and I assure you, Mr. Speaker, that the people of Canada will understand our position.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The Hon. Member for Hamilton Mountain does not need to indicate consent because it has been refused.

Mr. Deans: Mr. Speaker, I have two concerns. One is that never since 1931 has consent for the moving of such a motion been denied by a Government. Therefore, the red herring of the 20-Member stipulation is quite obviously a stalling tactic on the part of the Government in an attempt to make it look as if it were in favour of having such a debate.

More importantly, I hope that nothing which has transpired here will stop this debate. It is an emergency matter and one that should be debated in the House of Commons.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I understand that the Hon. Member was seeking consent and that that consent has been refused. The Hon. Member for Hamilton Mountain has requested leave to move the adjournment of the House for the purposes of discussing a specific matter requiring urgent consideration; namely, the financial difficulties of the Northland Bank. The question is that leave be given to the Hon. Member to move such motion.

The House divided on the request (Mr. Deans) which was acceded to on the following division:

NAYS

Messrs.

Mr. Speaker: I was hoping for a tie. Accordingly, debate on the proposed motion will stand over until eight o'clock p.m. this day.

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

AGREEMENT BETWEEN GOVERNMENT AND BELL HELICOPTER TEXTRON INC.

Mr. Paul Dick (Parliamentary Secretary to President of Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, would you be so kind as to call Motion for the Production of Papers No. 4 in the name of the Hon. Member for Mississauga South (Mr. Blenkarn)?

That an humble Address be presented to Her Excellency praying that she will cause to be laid before this House a copy of any agreement signed between the Government and Bell Helicopter Textron Inc. of Fort Worth, Texas with respect to the Government's investment with Bell Helicopter Textron Inc.

An Hon. Member: Transfer.

Mr. Speaker: Given the comment of the Hon. Member, the matter will be transferred for debate.

Mr. Dick: Mr. Speaker, I ask that the other notices of Motions for the Production of Papers be allowed to stand.

Mr. Speaker: Shall all other notices of Motions for the Production of Papers stand?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: I must inform the House that because of the ministerial statement earlier today consideration of Government Orders will be extended by 30 minutes this day.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

CUSTOMS TARIFF

MEASURE TO AMEND

House in Committee on Bill C-71, an Act to amend the Customs Tariff—Mr. Epp (Provencher) (for the Minister of Finance)—Mr. Paproski in the chair.

The Deputy Chairman: Order, please. House in Committee of the Whole on Bill C-71, an Act to amend the Customs Tariff.

Clause 1 to 7 inclusive agreed to.

On Clause 8—

Mr. Baker: Mr. Chairman, with respect to Clause 8, I would like to ask the Government representative the purpose of this Clause.

Mr. Nunziata: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman. My colleague, the Hon. Member for Gander-Twillingate, has asked the Government to provide an explanation with respect to Clause 8. We have been waiting patiently for someone on the Government side to explain what Clause 8 is all about.

The Deputy Chairman: Order, please. That is not a point of order.

Will Hon. Members wait until the chair and table is put in place for the officials of the Department?

[Translation]

Mr. Lanthier: If I understand well, it is a general matter. You want to know what the purpose of section 8 is. Well, excuse me then.

As stated in the speech delivered yesterday, Mr. Chairman, it is meant to update the French text in which there were a few inaccuracies. Now it is a technical clause which will make the French text more acceptable and more consistent with universal French usage.

[English]

Mr. Baker: Mr. Chairman, I asked what the purpose of Clause 8 is.

Mr. Chairman, I wonder if the hon. gentleman can tell us what the purpose of changing the wording in Clause 8(1) was?

[Translation]

Mr. Lanthier: Mr. Chairman, it is so obvious that it is almost funny. For a change in this House! We had the words combiné d'arrosage in the singular as against combini d'arrosage. Is that it? Yes. It is merely a technical matter. Note that it is an "é" rather than an "i".

Now we have batterie d'arrosage instead of combiné d'arrosage. That is all.

Mr. Gauthier: Mr. Chairman, the last explanation given by the Parliamentary Secretary answers the question. However I would like to know what the difference is between a combiné d'arrosage and a batterie d'arrosage?

Mr. Chairman, to gain time and avoid further delay, the Parliamentary Secretary could perhaps send me in writing the definition or the difference between both terms.

Mr. Lanthier: I have to answer that I studied the legislation in depth. I even learned about terms I had never seen in my life, but these never caught my eye. However, we will be pleased, as a Government, to send him that technical definition.

Again, I repeat that the term and the Bill itself are of a technical nature. Therefore, this is a technical definition which we failed to notice, I am sorry. But it certainly will be sent to you.

Clauses 8 to 11 inclusive agreed to.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall Clause 12 carry?

On Clause 12—

Mr. Baker: Mr. Chairman, on Clause 12, this section will come into effect on January 1, 1986. We just passed a clause in which certain sections of the Act came into effect May 24, 1985. Can I ask very simply and to the point why there is such a distinction between the dates? Was it because of the Budget date and the effectiveness of the Budget measures?

When one dates back an item such as this, it leads to a lot of problems. Perhaps the Parliamentary Secretary could supply us with the answer in writing as to why there is such a difference between the sections coming into force in Clauses 11 and 12?

The Deputy Chairman: Will the Parliamentary Secretary undertake to give the reply in writing?

[Translation]

Mr. Lanthier: Very well, we will provide that reply also in writing, you may be sure.

[English]

Clauses 12 and 13 agreed to.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall Schedule 1 carry?

[Translation]

Mr. Gauthier: Mr. Chairman, this is for my information.

In the Ways and Means Motion, there was reference to a change in the amount of goods Canadians may bring back when they go abroad. I think the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Lanthier) should tell us without making a long speech, with respect to this $100 change in goods which we will now be allowed to bring back with us each time we go abroad, whether the $300 cumulative total is to disappear or whether it will simply be $100 per visit for tourists or other persons travelling—

Mr. Lanthier: As I said in my statement, Mr. Chairman, one can now use a $100 exemption for a two-day stay abroad. In theory, one could now use 182 exemptions a year, but the $300 amount remains. It is not cumulative, of course. The $300 amount in any year remains in force. It is not changed. It is only the $100 amount for a 48-hour stay abroad, which was formerly allowed every three months and that now becomes unlimited, within the limit of the number of days in a year.

Mr. Gauthier: I would like to be very clear on that, because this is of interest to Canadians in general. A Canadian tourist coming back from a visit abroad is allowed to bring back one hundred Canadian dollars' worth of goods every 48 hours, without affecting the $300 he is entitled to once a year when travelling abroad. Therefore, we would be allowed, in principle, to bring in from abroad $300s' worth of goods and, 48 hours later, go back and return with $100s' worth of goods again. Did I understand correctly?

Mr. Lanthier: Yes. Of course there is a difference, in that for the $300 amount, one must be away for seven days, while for the $100 amount one must be away for two days. Therefore, if we want to figure it out, if one goes abroad on three two-day trips, one still has the $300 but has three trips to make. What you said is perfectly right.

Mr. Ouellet: Mr. Chairman, I have a question for the Parliamentary Secretary. Since we allow people who re-enter Canada after spending seven days abroad to bring back only for $300 of goods, would it not be more logical to allow people to bring back a lot more once a year since, as my colleague has just said, we are about to allow someone who leaves Canada for two days to bring back for $100 in goods? There is no limit to this allowance. Theoretically, someone could therefore go abroad every two or three days and bring back for thousands of dollars in foreign goods. If the Government is willing to make this concession to Canadian workers, and as the Government is always promoting free trade these days, it should understand that it would be appropriate to allow people who are away for seven days once a year to bring back for many hundreds of dollars in goods because what is permitted for someone who is away for only two days is not permitted for someone who is away seven days. I would like the regulations to be fair to those who travel abroad only once a year and I would like them to be allowed to bring back for a higher amount because this discriminates against those who are not that well-off. Not everyone has the opportunity or the means to travel abroad two or three times a week. It is only businessmen or people with lots of money who can travel abroad several times a year. Those who go on holidays once a year and who travel abroad, whether to the United States or to Europe, are penalized because they can only bring back for $300 in goods. I find this unfair and I would like the Parliamentary Secretary to correct this situation.

Mr. Lanthier: That is debatable. I see here in my notes, Mr. Chairman, that the amount was adjusted in 1983 to compensate for inflation. Naturally, the amount was adjusted. However, I question the distinction made between the wealthy and the not so wealthy travellers. People who can afford to take holidays of seven days or more can naturally spend more than those who take only one-day trips. We could debate this issue, but as it was pointed out earlier, the law reflects an effort to dip one toe in what will be the great sea of free trade. In fact, I think this measure is a boon for people with modest incomes who make short trips outside the country and cannot afford to go very far. For instance, they might be going from my hon. colleague's riding or my own to Plattsburgh or Burlington. On the other hand, they should not be encouraged to do all their shopping down there. Nor should they be encouraged to go and buy a colour TV or a bedroom set, for instance, across the border.

Obviously, the Government's purpose in proposing this measure was to make things easier for the travelling public. In fact, such trips are becoming increasingly common, not necessarily among the rich and unfortunately not among the poor, but they are common among people with average incomes. People can take advantage of these exemptions without seeing them as some kind of complex problem. It used to be that when you went on a two-day trip, you would try to remember whether it was three months ago or two and a half months, and so forth. I think this is going to simplify things. A seven-day trip is a holiday, it is something you remember, and I believe it will add fairness and consistency to the new measure.

The Deputy Chairman: The Hon. Member for Papineau (Mr. Ouellet).

Mr. Ouellet: Mr. Chairman, I thank the Hon. Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Lanthier) for his excellent reply. I think he provided us with a sound and defensible explanation. But I should like to push him a little further in his reasoning. If it is, as he stated, in order to promote free trade, he must be aware that some countries, especially in Europe, have eliminated all these custom barriers. People travelling within countries of the European Common Market no longer have to make declarations when they return to their respective countries.

Would it be possible for his Government to consider the possibility of fully eliminating the obligation for Canadians to report their purchases when they return from abroad? I think that customs officers would still have a part to play in controlling the incoming of drugs and goods deemed unacceptable. But in the case of souvenirs, pieces of clothing, etc., things that tourists normally buy and bring back with them, could his Government consider the possibility of sparing Canadian tourists upon their return to this country the aggravation of submitting a report and being searched and auscultated by our custom officers?

• (1700)

Mr. Lanthier: I am sorry, Mr. Chairman, but let there be no misunderstanding. We are not trying to encourage free trade. I said that we were trying out a series of measures that seem to be popular throughout the world.

My hon. colleague referred to the Common Market. Heaven knows that we have not reached that point yet! We are still at the very beginning. And, as I said, it is nothing more than a little bit of toe dipping in the sea of free trade.

Also, the European countries have achieved their free trade after considerable negotiations and time. We have not reached the starting line yet. That is for the first part.

Second, the whole point of our Customs and Excise system is not to catch the person who crosses the border with $110 or $90 worth of goods or to find out whether he spent 48 hours or 47 and a half hours away from home. The point is to intercept certain people and goods at the border.

In this country we have a relatively simple situation, since we have only one neighbour and only one border, with the United States, so it is easy to establish rules, and of course we also have airports where people and goods can be intercepted.

In Europe, they had to compromise, because they have borders everywhere. A European country may have common borders with three or four other countries, cutting through areas where people can swim across or walk across on mountain paths. They had to cut down on all kinds of administrative formalities because they just could not cope.

However, in our case I do not think we should remove these controls. We must not go to protectionist extremes, but I think we have the right kind of controls here in Canada and we should enforce them. Of course, we want to get rid of administrative red tape. Now, if a person has nothing to declare over $100, no declaration is necessary.

Personally, I believe that our Government's policy favours some kind of control. We are not about to open the borders. People who think that free trade would mean opening the borders must be daydreaming. I believe that free trade must be controlled. Now controls may be mitigated or they can be very elaborate.

[English]

Mr. Redway: Mr. Chairman, as I understand it, the purpose of this particular clause is to provide that someone returning to Canada after an absence of 48 hours will have a $100 exemption. This is in addition to the existing exemption of $300 once a year if you are out of the country for seven days. Can the Parliamentary Secretary tell me if it is possible to have a cumulative exemption? In other words, once a year, if you are out of the country for seven days, can you combine the $300 exemption and the $100 exemption and have a $400 exemption once a year?

[Translation]

Mr. Lanthier: Mr. Chairman, the answer to that is a short and sweet no. These things cannot be combined. If a person wants a $400 exemption, that person has to make four two-day trips. He has to take the trouble to make four two-day trips if he wants to get an exemption of more than $300, and he can do so 182 times a year, theoretically speaking. However, exemptions cannot be combined. Each exemption is separate.

Mr. Lapierre: Mr. Chairman, I see that the Parliamentary Secretary is giving all kinds of explanations. I was looking at Schedule I, and I would like to ask the Parliamentary Secretary why, under item 49105-1, bolted steel tanks would enter this country duty free?

Mr. Lanthier: Could the Hon. Member please repeat the number? He said it so fast I did not quite catch it.

Mr. Lapierre: It is tariff item number 49105-1 on page 21.

Mr. Lanthier: I am delighted, Mr. Chairman. This is the first time I have been asked a question about engineering in the House. I feel right at home.

This item belongs to the broad class of goods that are either manufactured or not manufactured in Canada. This particular item is considered not to be manufactured in Canada.

I might add, in passing, that as far as the engineering aspect is concerned, steel tanks now tend to be welded instead of bolted.

This is an item that existed previously and it has now been included in the class of goods either manufactured or not manufactured in Canada.

Mr. Lapierre: About the same item, I was wondering whether there is any connection with the kind of containers required for heavy water, for instance? Is this technology used for heavy water containers?

Mr. Lanthier: Though I cannot vouch for it, and as I said before, it is more a matter of engineering than anything else.

According to my knowledge of engineering, all heavy water containers are usually welded. Now, with due respect, the Hon. Member is asking me about a very specific question. If he is agreeable, I shall make enquiries at Customs and Excise and give the Hon. Member his answer in writing in due time.

Mr. Lapierre: I think the Parliamentary Secretary is asking me to buy a pig in a poke. If this is passed and I get a written reply in two months, the Bill will have become law by then, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Chairman, I notice quite a few items and that surprises me. You say that no company in Canada makes surveying instruments, among other things. Your argument would also apply to instruments, hearing aids and similar items, yet as far as I know I thought Bell Canada for instance was also a leader in hearing aids technology. I would like to follow your line of reasoning.

Mr. Lanthier: Mr. Chairman, all tariff items listed here have been reduced after inquiries and consultations with the private sector. Canada's entire private sector has been made aware of the fact that we were about to establish new tariff item numbers or to adapt the new numbers to current conditions. So if you have cases which were not considered by the technical or consultation committees that had been established I would suggest it is a bit late to raise the matter. There have been specific consultations, ongoing consultations with respect to the questions I examined in the Bill and those people who had representations to make were welcome. But now we have to make a decision today.

The Deputy Chairman: The Hon. Member for Papineau.

Mr. Ouellet: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I read with care the speech delivered the day before yesterday by the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance in his opening comments on the Bill. He referred particularly to the Quebec Summit where the Prime Minister was very chummy with the President of the United States. I refer more specifically to page 6868 of Hansard where he said: "The Prime Minister of Canada and the President of the United States decided among other trading initiatives to put an end to protectionism in the exchange of goods and services between our two countries."

Does that mean that from now on large American engineering firms may compete on the Canadian market against Canadian companies? We know, Mr. Speaker, that Canada is very much at the forefront as far as engineering is concerned. Our prominent Canadian architects and engineers have no lessons to learn from any other firm.

Of course, our large firms do not have the financial resources nor the organization of some large American engineering firms and I am somewhat concerned following the speech made last Monday by the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance, because indeed I am wondering whether his Prime Minister did not sell himself off bound hand and foot not only in areas such as Star Wars but also in one area which was then overlooked, yet is most important, namely Canadian technology as developed by large firms of architects and engineers in Canada.

Mr. Lanthier: Mr. Speaker, first, I would like to put things in the proper context. It is not necessarily my Prime Minister, but the Prime Minister of all Canadians as well as your own, my Hon. friend. He is everyone's Prime Minister.

Second, I would have liked him to have quoted my words properly. I said "our valiant Prime Minister". I do not know if this was heard, but I said "our valiant Prime Minister".

To come back to the essence of this question, without speaking about free trade, but only about the issue under consideration, the agreements which have been concluded have not been blank checks, to use an expression that is very dear to Members Opposite. These are agreements in principle which will be phased in and include terms that take into account the production of goods and services in both countries.

You mentioned a specific issue. There are much more vulnerable areas in Canada than our engineering firms which have competed throughout the world. In this sector, Canada has proportionately the largest and best established firms there are. In fact, I believe that we shall now have to get ready to compete against the major American firms. As for not having the necessary financial means, I believe that our major engineering firms can be compared with and do compete against firms in other countries, whether the United States or even Germany, and that they have already been successful on the international market. I must point out incidentally that the American firms are not the ones we fear the most in Canada.

As for the architectural or engineering firms, I believe that there are much more vulnerable economic sectors in Canada and that Canadians will eventually have to do like almost everyone else in the world and try to find the markets where they are. I believe that our Canadian firms will benefit from the opening up of the American markets much more than the American firms will benefit from a freer access to ours.

[English]

Mr. de Jong: Mr. Chairman, would the section that allows a person to bring in $100 worth of goods every 48 hours allow a farmer to haul a tank down to the United States and get $100 worth of gasoline every 48 hours?

Mr. Lanthier: If he stays outside Canada 48 hours, yes.

Mr. de Jong: Does that mean that if he stays out for seven days he is able to bring back $300 worth?

Mr. Lanthier: Yes, once a year.

Mr. de Jong: Mr. Chairman, if he brings his whole family over he will be able to get his year's supply of gasoline in the United States, if he has three or four sons above a certain age. What is the age limit here?

Mr. Lanthier: Mr. Chairman, I can answer that question with ease due to the fact that I am a fourteenth child. If my father had had a car, which unfortunately he did not, he would have been able to do such a thing.

Mr. de Jong: Mr. Chairman, I have one more question. What is the age of eligibility for the $100 every 48 hours and for the $300 once a year? Is there any age requirement?

Mr. Lanthier: Aside from the restrictions on alcohol and cigarettes, there is no age limit. If you bring your baby with you, he is allowed his $100 every 48 hours.

[Translation]

Mr. Ouellet: I would like to go back to the remarks made a few minutes ago by the Parliamentary Secretary. He is quite right. In the remarks he made on Monday, he called his Prime Minister a valiant Prime Minister. I realize that the way vacancies are coming up in the Cabinet, the Parliamentary Secretary has to be most polite and kind to his Prime Minister. That might prove to be in his interest sooner or later, and he has my best wishes in any case. However, his statement is very disturbing in my view, because if indeed the Prime Minister of Canada and the President of the United States agreed to allow free trade in goods and services, as he stated in his speech, unless his words went beyond his thoughts or beyond the facts, if indeed the Prime Minister of Canada and the President of the United States agreed to end protectionism in the trading of goods and services, the example I gave him earlier, Mr. Chairman, concerning engineering firms, the example I used because knowingly the Parliamentary Secretary until very recently belonged to a large Montreal engineering firm, and that example would strike his imagination more than others. But I must say, Mr. Speaker, that services are not exclusive to engineering firms.

I used that example because it was an easy one to understand for the Parliamentary Secretary, but there is a whole range of services which are offered by Canadian firms to Canadians that could be jeopardized by such a decision to end protectionism which benefits small Canadian entrepreneurs performing important services for the Canadian people. I agree with the Parliamentary Secretary that there are three, four, or five large engineering firms in Canada that are capable of measuring up easily to any big firm in the world. But apart from those few larger ones, there is a considerable number of medium-sized and small firms that could lose important contracts to American firms under too harsh a competition. What I am concerned with, and I would like the Parliamentary Secretary to not only alleviate my fears but send a very clear message to all small entrepreneurs who provide Canadians with services and who might be forced into bankruptcy by too harsh competition from the United States.

Mr. Lanthier: Mr. Chairman, there was no reference to free trade in the speech. The reference was to put an end to protectionism. Speaking of protectionism, very seldom do countries have laws to promote protectionism as such. Protectionism has a bad connotation. Whether one is for or against protectionism, the connotation is always bad.

So, I did not say that the two heads of state agreed on free trade. They agreed to end protectionism in both our countries. And I added: given time and the right circumstances. Understood? The idea is to put an end to protectionism in the exchange of goods and services between our two countries. So, there is a difference between putting an end to protectionism and establishing free trade. This is my first point.

Second, I must discuss market principles from a standpoint I am especially familiar with. I would remind my hon. colleague that the smaller firms which are now enjoying a high level of technology in Quebec and more generally in Canada are already competing against bigger firms. And I would point out that small engineering firms do not use the words big or small firms. They use the words large and small firms. There is a difference.

In that sense, of course competition is already there. It is not a matter of looking at the existing market, but of asking ourselves whether we will have another market. The larger and bigger engineering firms in Canada—and smaller ones too, and let me point out that there are engineering firms with no more than ten people which are now operating in Africa, Europe and the United States. It is a matter of opening up to markets. Then when we talk about ending protectionism with regard to goods and services, we mean that markets have to be opened. When you tell me that you are worried about too much open-mindedness in protectionism, I do not think that small firms would be threatened in Canada. You would have to find another issue, because we are surprisingly well equipped from a technological viewpoint to compete anywhere in the world. If markets are opened, our Canadian technicians will be competing for them.

[English]

Mr. Redway: Mr. Chairman, could you help me on a point of procedure in connection with this discussion? It seems to me that we are no longer on first or second reading nor are we any longer discussing general principles. We are into specifics in Committee of the Whole and we are into a clause by clause debate. My understanding is we have already passed, in discussions, up to Clause 12 and we are now looking at Schedule 1. Surely the remarks of Hon. Members should be relevant strictly to the matters set out in Schedule 1, which are particular tariff items setting out particular tariffs. There is nothing in there as far as I can see, Mr. Chairman, that indicates we are now going to be in a period of free trade. There are a great number of tariffs set out in that Schedule. I would hope all of the remarks will be relevant to that Schedule, which is the matter we are now discussing.

The Deputy Chairman: I agree with the Hon. Member. The Chair has been very lenient concerning the debate. I felt we should have some debate in this regard.

Mr. Ouellet: We appreciate it.

The Deputy Chairman: I agree with the Hon. Member's comment. I will allow the Hon. Member for Shefford another question.

• (1720)

[Translation]

Mr. Lapierre: Mr. Chairman, my concern . . . and I readily agree with my colleague that Schedule 1 is important, but there are underlying principles to the schedule which have to be discussed. I think it is important for our Parliamentary Secretary to give us the opportunity to benefit from his great learning.

And, as it happened, he made that speech on Monday last and the following day, the President of the United States (Mr. Reagan) announced a war chest of some $300 million.

I would like to ask the Parliamentary Secretary whether that is some sort of protectionism according to his definitions?

[English]

The Deputy Chairman: It is a general question. I would hope the Parliamentary Secretary would just answer it.

[Translation]

Mr. Lanthier: Mr. Chairman, I believe that you have already ruled on this point. This is a general question and we are now having an item-by-item discussion. Once more, I do not want to get into general discussions. I believe that the call to order of my colleague earlier was quite appropriate and we should follow his advice if we want to get anywhere.

[English]

Schedules 1 and 2 agreed to.

Title agreed to.

Bill reported.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): When shall the Bill be read the third time? Pursuant to an order made earlier this day, now?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Hnatyshyn (for the Minister of Finance) moved that Bill C-71, an Act to amend the Customs Tariff Act be read the third time and passed.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Lapierre (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, I am very happy to take part in this important debate, especially as the Government House Leader is here.

Mr. Speaker, we have tried to obtain explanations from the Parliamentary Secretary about the Customs Tariff, and instead of answering, he simply said that the industry had been consulted.

However, Mr. Speaker, I am certainly convinced that all industries were not consulted. For years, Mr. Speaker, this department has had problems setting tariffs, and it is not because we have a new Parliamentary Secretary that the department has changed. What we have found is that the tariffs are set by a small group of initiates.

My colleague for Papineau (Mr. Ouellet) mentioned small engineering firms. The situation is exactly the same as concerns the setting of tariffs.

I can see the Minister of State for Small Businesses (Mr. Bissonnette), who used to be a prosperous businessman. I would like this Minister to tell me later when he speaks on this bill whether or not he was consulted about various tariffs when he was in business. Did the officials in the Department of Finance or the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce call the Minister to ask him: What do you think of this? Do you find this reasonable or not? I would like to know how many calls he received during his brilliant career as a businessman.

That is a fact and I am sure Hon. Members will agree with me it looks as if some insider groups are being consulted and often on issues which directly concern us.

The third reading stage affords us an ideal opportunity to review the remarks of the Parliamentary Secretary who got sidetracked in a lengthy explanation on the merits of free trade, or rather on the disadvantages of protectionism. The Parliamentary Secretary had his say against protectionism but I would like to know whether he thinks that, in some cases, Canadians simply have to protect their industries.

I have two industries in mind, the footwear industry, for example, which at this very moment is trying to convince the Government to take a protectionist approach to save jobs in that sector. I regret having to say this, Mr. Speaker, but I have the impression that the Parliamentary Secretary had his speech drafted by officials of the Department of Finance who live in a world of their own. In today's real world thousands of jobs are on the line in the footwear industry. The Hon. Member for Saint-Jean (Mr. Bissonnette) knows full well that the textile industry employs thousands of workers in his own riding. That is why I find it hard to believe that the Parliamentary Secretary—presumably a Member who remains true to his origins—does not know the real situation in Quebec and in Canada, and I think he should not rise in the House to deliver speeches written for him by public servants who have lost touch with reality.

Mr. Speaker, I am convinced that the people from LaSalle, many of whom I know are employed in the textile and footwear industries, would not support the position of their elected representative who has stated that we should fight against protectionism at all cost. Even at the cost of many jobs in the Saint-Jean riding? I am sure that the Minister of State for Small Businesses (Mr. Bissonnette) would not accept that. I hope he will succeed in the representations which he is making and which I support, because that would also mean jobs for my own riding, as well as the whole textile, clothing and footwear industries in the Eastern Townships. It is all very well for the Parliamentary Secretary to introduce a bill and praise the virtues not only of free trade, but especially of the Prime Minister. We understand why he is praising the virtues of the Prime Minister.

Mr. Speaker, I suggest that, as an elected member of Parliament, the first and foremost duty of the Parliamentary Secretary is to protect his constituents, and he should place the interests of his constituents above the advancement of his own career. He should not take everything the Prime Minister says as Gospel truth. That is a mistake on the part of the Parliamentary Secretary. He should not let his desire for a ministerial appointment blind him, Mr. Speaker.

Over the past few weeks, we have had the opportunity to hear debates concerning matters of which the Parliamentary Secretary was perfectly aware. For instance, the Commercial Bank of Canada fiasco. Mr. Speaker, I just cannot understand how the Parliamentary Secretary can accept without flinching to share the responsibilities in this matter.

• (1730)

Mr. Speaker, I wonder to what extent, in the current debate ... and I regret the Minister's decision to entrust his second-in-command with the responsibility to explain to us not only the details of this important legislation, but the whole philosophy behind it. That is an aspect of this Government which I find somewhat disquieting. A while ago, there were hardly any Ministers in the House; now, there are a few of them, but they do not appear to be too concerned about the consequences of the Parliamentary Secretary's statement. I can see the Minister of State for Small Businesses and, because he is a very realistic man, I know that he did not agree with the Parliamentary Secretary when he said that we have to fight against protectionism at all cost. Over the next few weeks and months, Mr. Speaker, we are going to—

I think the Minister would like to rise on a point of order. Please.

Mr. Bissonnette: Mr. Speaker, when the Hon. Member for Shefford (Mr. Lapierre) says and makes the assumption that I do not agree with the Bill, I would like to have some explanation as to why the Hon. Member for Shefford thinks I do not agree with this legislation.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): We are not in the period provided for questions and answers, and that is not a point of order. The Hon. Member for Shefford (Mr. Lapierre) has the floor; the Hon. Minister can reply later.

[Translation]

Mr. Lapierre: To accommodate the Minister, who is not acquainted with our Standing Orders, I certainly will answer him, and I hope he will soon be on this side of the House so he can ask more questions and we will be able to answer them in greater detail.

Meanwhile, Mr. Speaker, let me explain what the real situation is. This Bill, and especially the speech made by the Parliamentary Secretary to introduce the Bill ... The Parliamentary Secretary said we had to fight protectionism at any cost. Now, on the assumption that the Minister of State for Small Businesses (Mr. Bissonnette) is an intelligent man who protects the interests of his constituents, I also assumed that he could not go along with the statement that protectionism had to be controlled at any cost.

Mr. Speaker, I know the Hon. Member for Saint-Jean and Minister of State for Small Businesses is concerned about the well-being of his constituents, and if that were not the case I would be terribly disappointed. I am sure that in the months to come, his constituents will be able to test him and find out to what extent he is prepared to defend their interests. Then we will know whether the Minister of State for Small Businesses is Quebec's spokesman in Ottawa or whether he is now, as he told the press, Ottawa's spokesman in Quebec. Mr. Speaker, I would ask him quite frankly to come right out and talk about the virtues of protectionism. I ask him to give us his perception of the future of the shoe industry. I invite him to give us his perception of the future of the textiles industry. The Minister knows all about the industry.

If he agrees with every single word the Parliamentary Secretary has said, this means that the Minister is prepared to let a vital sector of the economy in his riding go down the drain. I cannot believe a Minister could be so irresponsible, and that is why I assumed the Minister did not agree with his colleague for LaSalle (Mr. Lanthier) on protectionism and probably a host of other subjects as well.

Now to get back to the substance of the Bill, I believe that where certain items have been removed or tariffs have been substantially reduced, in some cases this will be very useful, and I am thinking for instance of hearing aids for the deaf and safety face-shields for workers. However, what I really hope is that instead of saying: We are going to allow greater penetration of the Canadian market by imported products, the Minister of State for Small Businesses, and others with him, will encourage the manufacture in Canada of most of the items we have here. Before opening up our markets, I wish the Government would take a look at appliances that are not manufactured in Canada,—and I hope the Minister has looked at everyone of them,—and let us know which products we are now importing duty free cannot be made here in Canada. I am thinking, for instance, of earthenware and other clay tiles and a lot of other items for which I am sure Canadian manufacturers could be found.

All this means that in the coming months we will have a chance to start a real debate on free trade.

Beyond the amendments to the Customs Tariff, we are going to talk about principles and, in that respect, I think it will be very important for all Hon. Members to realize how serious the decision of the Prime Minister might be when his only concern is to please his American big brother. I think everyone will have to realize how dangerous it is to have a Prime Minister who is used to taking his orders from the States. And you know, that's the way things worked in his professional career. Besides, we notice that since coming into office he has been following the very same pattern. Therefore, you cannot blame the Opposition for wondering how sound is this Bill and how sound are the remarks of Hon. Members opposite. That is why I believe it is our role to make sure that their rhetoric is not detrimental to our Canadian workers.

Mr. Speaker, Canadian workers will never accept to lose their jobs for the sake of the so-called friendship with the American big brother, which is what the Government here is prepared to do. Therefore I invite them to be careful and moderate in their remarks, because I think that an over-all move towards free trade might be detrimental to the future of Canadian workers and of Canada as a whole.

In conclusion, Mr. Chairman, I know that this Bill is of minor importance in relation to this whole debate, and I am sure that in the months ahead we will have the opportunity to further discuss it at length together.

[English]

Mr. Alan Redway (York East): Mr. Speaker, I listened with great interest to the comments of my hon. friend. They were most surprising to me. He spoke as if we were debating a Bill which would do away with all the tariffs of this country. In fact, we are dealing with a Customs Bill which will put in place some modest changes to some of those tariffs. It is not a revolutionary Bill at all. It is in many respects a housekeeping Bill. In fact, I suppose the most significant feature of the Bill is to increase the dollar amount of exemptions that a visitor coming back from the United States to Canada within 48 hours can bring with him which, after this Bill is passed, will be $100. That seems to me to be something that my friend should be applauding.

• (1740)

In addition to that he singles out the fact that tariffs are being removed on hearing aids and protective equipment for workmen as something that is frightening and that the Canadian public should shrink with fear when they hear about it. Surely my hon. friend cannot object to providing hearing aids at the lowest cost possible for those who have problems hearing and surely my hon. friend cannot object to providing protective equipment at the lowest possible cost.

The other item that he mentioned had to do with footwear. In fact there is nothing in this Bill at all that affects footwear. It does not change the situation one iota. There continues to be a tariff; there continues to be a quota.

My hon. friend seems to have missed the point of what we are talking about here and I hope that in future he will listen a little more carefully to the debate on the Bill in principle.

[Translation]

Hon. André Ouellet (Papineau): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to take part in this debate on Bill C-71 and I will take this opportunity first of all to remind the previous speaker that he has misunderstood the statements of the Hon. Member for Shefford (Mr. Lapierre). Obviously, the Hon. Member for Shefford does not take exception to some clauses of Bill C-71 but to the general principle of the Act to amend the Customs Tariff. The purpose of this Act to amend the Customs Tariff is to show once more to the Canadian people that the Conservative Government is kowtowing to important American interests. This legislation is simply unveiling another aspect of the total abdication of authority of our Prime Minister to the President of the United States.

One remembers the Polar Sea incident, when the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Clark (Yellowhead)) rose at the beginning of the sitting of the House and made great statements of policy, telling us that this time, he was decided to act, while the American ship crossed our borders without our permission and nothing was done over the whole summer to advise American authorities of our deep concern.

Secondly, Star Wars. One has the feeling that the Conservative Government, under the pressure of public opinion, said "Nyes" to the President of the United States, that is a private yes and a public no in order to save its neck because the Canadian people do not want the Canadian Government to take part in Star Wars.

Since a statement was made on this matter, we now know that some Crown corporations and the National Research Centre might take part in Star Wars with the blessing of the Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of National Defence (Mr. Nielsen), when the Prime Minister said to us in the House that the Government would not be involved.

Thanks to Bill C-71, we now know where the Conservative Party really stands as shown in the statements made by the Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance (Mr. Lanthier) himself. Mr. Speaker, I want to quote from the speech made in the House by the Parliamentary Secretary during the debate on second reading of Bill C-71. He said that at the Quebec Summit, and I quote the Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance:

> At the Quebec summit, our valiant Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. Mulroney) and the President of the United States (Mr. Reagan) decided, among other trading initiatives, to put an end to protectionism in the exchange of goods and services between our two countries.

The Parliamentary Secretary, with his close relationship with the Minister of Finance, must know what he is talking about. Something certainly happened at the Quebec Economic Summit. What happened is that once again the Prime Minister of Canada abdicated his responsibilities as the Prime Minister of a sovereign state before the President of the United States. Mr. Speaker, the Americans now consider us as a 51st State much more than as an independent and autonomous neighbouring country, and we cannot accept this situation.

The Minister of State for Small Businesses, who is in this House today, knows very well what that means: the abolition of protectionist measures. A decision will have to be made very soon by the Cabinet whether the Government of Canada will maintain the quotas imposed by the previous Liberal Government, with special protective measures in the textile, footwear and garment industries. A number of the decisions made by the previous Government are coming to an end, and I do not have to remind the Minister of State for Small Businesses that Dominion Textile has just closed its plant not only in the most important town in his constituency, Saint-Jean, but also in the most important town of the neighbouring constituency, Valleyfield. Hundreds of workers were laid-off because of that decision by Dominion Textile, and why? Because that company is in a difficult position, because it has to face very tough competition from abroad.

The Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance tells us that the Prime Minister of Canada and the President of the United States embraced in Quebec City, and that they decided to put an end to protectionist measures. Well, I cannot support Bill C-71 which amends, which reduces certain customs tariffs to let Canadian products compete with American or foreign products; that is what will happen. What will the passing of that bill bring? The possibility that Canadian manufacturers will lose jobs. All these liberalizing, free trade measures, all those measures putting an end to the protectionism put in place by the previous Government, will jeopardize job security directly for hundreds of Canadian workers.

I hope the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance when he spoke on Bill C-71 was wrong, that he did not say precisely what happened behind closed doors during the discussions held between the Prime Minister of Canada and the President of the United States and that this Progressive Conservative Government will continue to accept its responsibilities and protect thousands of jobs in the Canadian textile, footwear and clothing sectors.

The House resumed from Monday, September 24, consideration of the Motion of Mr. MacKay (for the Minister of State (Finance)) that Bill C-72, an Act to amend the statute law relating to income tax and to make a related amendment to the Tax Court of Canada Act, be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee.

Mr. George Baker (Gander-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, as I was about to point out yesterday, this particular Bill before the House includes some minor changes to the Federal Tax Court of Canada Act. It does not really make an amendment of any substance but it does provide that someone must justify a request for an in camera proceeding before the Tax Court. The Bill also makes amendments to other Acts including an Act to amend the statutory law relating to income tax and to make related amendments to the Canadian Pension Plan and the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1971.

I believe a problem will arise with the overload of cases that will appear before the Federal Tax Court of Canada as a consequence of the actions of the Government which decided to cut back in various government Departments. When the unemployment insurance scheme is cut back by $250 million, for example, more cases end up before the Federal Tax Court of Canada.

Why do they end up there? When people are judged ineligible for unemployment insurance, they appeal that decision and a determination of the question is made by the Department of National Revenue. If that decision is appealed, it is appealed to the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. MacKay). The Minister of National Revenue, 99.9 per cent of the time, agrees with the Departmental ruling and then the only recourse people have is to the Federal Tax Court of Canada.

When looking at extreme cases of hardship created by laws that we have on our books, one need not look any further than the cases that go before the Federal Tax Court of Canada relating to the determination of a question of eligibility. Let me give a few examples of this so that the record will show exactly what I mean.

When the Unemployment Insurance Commission is given orders to cut down on the numbers of people drawing unemployment insurance, all unemployment insurance applications are automatically reviewed. Take for instance the case of a student who is attending school in the day time and had worked during the evenings prior to going to school. Say that student felt as though he had a case in favour of drawing unemployment insurance because he was looking for work in the evenings. Say that that application was turned down by the Commission on a determination of eligibility made by the Department of National Revenue. That student would then carry that application through to the Minister of National Revenue and then to the Federal Tax Court of Canada.

Sometimes it is very difficult to try to figure out what is wrong with our system. People who collected unemployment insurance for working certain hours doing certain jobs are not allowed to collect benefits if they are not available between nine and noon. That kind of a case would go to the Federal Tax Court of Canada.

As another example, say there was an employer who was in the wholesale business and had an employer's number with the Department of National Revenue. Say he hires someone to do some building. Under the present system within the Government of Canada, there are 700 employees in the unemployment insurance trying to knock people off the unemployment insurance rolls. Therefore, a case like the one to which I just referred would be sent to the Department of National Revenue to determine whether or not that person is eligible. We will see more and more of those kinds of cases. What happens when a case goes to the Department of National Revenue? A person who received unemployment insurance benefits from doing building for an employer whose business is not normally building things will be judged to owe the Government of Canada all the money he received from the fund.

There are a great many cases like the one to which I just referred before the Federal Tax Court of Canada today. People are getting stuck having to pay back $10,000, $15,000 or $20,000. Whether it is right or wrong—and it is wrong—it is the law. That is the way the judge will interpret the law when cases come before the Federal Tax Court of Canada.

Cases will now be referred to the Federal Tax Court of Canada because of the policy of the Government to cut back. People will be judged ineligible because they are not available for work. What does that mean? If a person was receiving unemployment insurance benefits and helped someone build a barn or a house, he is judged by the law not to be eligible for unemployment insurance and this case would go to the Minister of National Revenue who would make a judgement which, if appealed, would go to the Federal Tax Court of Canada. Because of the policies of this heartless Government many cases that never before would have been referred to the Federal Tax Court of Canada will now be referred there.

A great many cases that will be referred to the Federal Tax Court of Canada will involve women. Women who work in non-traditional occupations are usually ruled ineligible by the Department of National Revenue when it comes to collecting unemployment insurance. There will also be an over-abundance of cases before the Federal Tax Court relating to women and men in the fishery industry because of mistakes that are made by employers. These are mistakes with which employees have absolutely nothing to do.

Instead of amending this Bill to deal with in camera proceedings at the Tax Court of Canada, it would be more worth while if the Government were to do one of two things. First, it should take that responsibility away from the Federal Tax Court of Canada because it does not belong there. The Minister of National Revenue should have nothing to do with the determination of questions of eligibility for unemployment insurance. This is the first action the Government should take. The second action would be that all such cases be simply referred to an umpire, as is the case with most questions concerning unemployment insurance. The same situation would occur, that is, a Federal Court judge would be the umpire. In both cases, they are Federal Court judges and must be addressed as "My Lord". The point is that they are two completely different courtroom situations. When something is referred to the Tax Court of Canada not only is the judge referred to as "My Lord" but a statement of fact must be prepared by the Attorney General's office. This is a statement of fact which is used in the determination of the question for the Minister of National Revenue. Therefore, what is being done when one appears before the federal tax court is proving, by additional evidence, that the determination was incorrect.

A great many of the cases which I have outlined cannot be disproven on the basis of additional information. Nor can they be disproven on the basis of additional witnesses. A great many people who are faced with this situation cannot afford to hire a lawyer. Some 90 per cent of them do not know the courtroom situation. However, if the Federal Court judge is looked at as an appeal judge, say, an umpire for the determination of Unemployment Insurance Act issues, then the normal courtroom situation does not prevail. It is not necessary to prove on the basis of new evidence that the determination made by the Attorney General's office was wrong. The case can be argued before the Federal Court judge and a fair hearing could be held.

Basically, what I have stated is what we wish to put on the record. We wish to put it on the record because of the changes made by the Government of Canada and because we now now that there will be hundreds and hundreds of cases which will clog the system because of what the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Miss MacDonald) has had to do because of here being forced by the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. de Cotret) to cut $250 million from her Department's budget. We recommend and encourage all these people who will be latched on to by the Unemployment Insurance Commission to appeal to the federal tax court. If representatives of the Unemployment Insurance Commission say to these people: "You are not eligible because it has been determined by the Department of National Revenue that you are not eligibile," what I say to those people is: "Appeal your case to the Minister of National Revenue. If the Minister says that you do not qualify, you have 90 days in which to appeal to the federal Tax Court of Canada." That is what will happen because of the cuts to the budget of the Department of Employment and Immigration. When that happens the system will become clogged and there will be just too many cases before the federal Tax Court of Canada. Too many people will be receiving a statement in the mail which reads: "In the Tax Court of Canada pursuant to—" and then there will be the appellant's name and the respondant will appear as the Minister of National Revenue. Following that will be the statement of fact. The poor person receiving this document will wonder what it is all about and how on earth he will defend himself. He will say: "I know that I am right and that the Government is wrong." What can a person do in that situation? Most Members of Parliament have appeared before the federal Tax Court of Canada. I am sure they have appeared before it in order to fight for their constituents because their constitutents cannot afford a lawyer. It is quite a different thing to go before the federal Tax Court of Canada with respect to a case which is similar to another case which is simply a hearing by an umpire. Both situations involve Federal Court judges but in different courtroom situations.

I see that the time is passing quickly and that we have to go through all the clauses of the Bill, as I understand it, as well as third reading, before we conclude today's sitting, which will be at 6.30 p.m. I hope that if we conclude by 6.20 p.m., the Government House Leader will call it 6.30 p.m.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops-Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have this opportunity to say a few words with respect to Bill C-72, a 239-page Bill, inclusive of 150 amendments in an effort to simplify the Tax Court of Canada Act.

This is something which actually happens two or three times a year when Members of Parliament are faced with 200 or 300 pages including somewhere between 125 and 175 amendments to the Income Tax Act in an attempt to simplify and clarify the existing Act. When one begins talking to an average citizen about tax provisions, or changes to the Income Tax Act, there is about the same amount of clarity as there is with Egyptian hieroglyphics. Believe me, what we have before us is no Rosetta Stone. In looking at Bill C-72 we see that it is simply one more step in the march toward complexity, misunderstanding and baffle-gab. I do not think it is the intention of anyone here to create a more confusing tax system. However, that is the process in which we find ourselves today.

Mr. Blaikie: Just another job-creation project for lawyers.

Mr. Riis: As the Hon. Member for Winnipeg-Birds Hill (Mr. Blaikie) says, it is just another job-creation project for lawyers, tax accountants and all those folks who live in the backrooms drafting this type of legislation.

If there is one thing which has become clear in the last while it is that the tax system of the country is too complex for virtually anyone to comprehend. I can remember distinctly a year and half ago when the Minister of Finance (Mr. Wilson) stood up in the House and said: "Listen, I have just an average income. I have no complex financial affairs and I have to go to the tax adviser at the corner in order to have my tax return filled out at the end of the year." If the Minister of Finance cannot do his own income tax return, then I think it is indicative of the point we find ourselves in today in terms of a document which is impossible for any ordinary Canadian citizen to comprehend, let alone fill out and submit.

Perhaps there is a more important aspect to this issue. When one looks carefully at the Bill before us, as I am sure all Members in the House have, and when one tries to understand each of the amendments put forward, what becomes clear is that our tax system is geared in favour of certain groups within our society and, in a sense, it acts against other groups. To be more blunt, it is an unfair tax system. It tends to be biased in favour of upper income earners at the expense of ordinary Canadians. It tends to be biased in favour of the large corporate sector at the expense of the small business sector. That is one of the reasons we in the New Democratic Party have decided it is time to take the matter seriously—to take the bull by the horns. That is why we have indicated we plan to spend the next number of months criss-crossing the country in order to hold public hearings. We intend to talk with tax experts and those who understand the tax implications of their sectors of the economy. We intend to do this in an effort to find ways and means of making the tax system not only more fair but more simple, so that people do not have to hire a contingent of legal experts and tax accountants to fill out some of the most simple business forms when it comes to taxation.

We are anxious to get out into the countryside. We will be sending out something in the neighbourhood of 2,000 questionnaires to ordinary Canadian citizens. We want them to indicate to us in these questionnaires how the tax system in their particular line of work could be made more fair, more simplified and how it could reflect the concerns of the average working man and woman in our country. One of the concerns our Party has is that more and more of the economy of Canada is moving underground. One of the reasons it is moving underground is because of the feeling that the system is unjust. The average earner hears about all those wealthy, or perhaps not wealthy, but upper income earners who pay no income tax at all year after year. The average earners out there paying his or her taxes each year faithfully and not being able to take advantage of the avalanche of loopholes and concessions the Tax Act provides for certain upper income earners, get the impression that it is an unfair system. The owners of those small business enterprises who file their tax returns are well aware that Shell Oil and the Royal Bank of Canada, just to name two large corporations within the Canadian context, and international corporations in their scope of involvement, pay no income tax at all in some years, not a single cent. When Shell Oil does not pay any income tax and when the Royal Bank of Canada does not pay any income tax in a certain year, we know who is paying more than they should be paying, and that is the small business sector and the ordinary working Canadian. This is something which has worked its way into this system so that people now feel it is time to be a little less than honest. As a result, much of the economy of Canada, something in the neighbourhood of $30 billion and $50 billion each year, is driven underground and no taxes, of course, are paid on those transactions. The barter system is taken advantage of or cash is used instead of cheques so there is no record of the transaction. This just gets worse every year and the result, of course, is that the taxes which ought to be flowing into the federal Government's coffers from sales tax, personal tax and corporate tax, simply are not there. That is one of the reasons we have a large and growing deficit. It is because the tax flow simply is not there any longer. Part of the reason that tax flow is not there is because people have lost faith in the system. They have lost any faith that the Government is interested in a fair and equitable tax system and I would challenge anyone, particularly those from the Government benches, to stand and tell us our tax system in this country treats all Canadians and all types of businesses fairly. I do not believe anyone can make that claim any longer.

There is a positive aspect to Bill C-72, and it is a refreshing change. Over the years, I recall whenever we were dealing with a number of very technical amendments, the Liberal administration would always include them with controversial legislation. They would bring in technical amendments with some very controversial aspects in an attempt to bury the controversial tax amendments in amongst all sorts of technical rather minor bookkeeping changes. It would take a lot of ferreting to find out exactly what was going on. To give the Government credit when it is due, I would say, having gone carefully through 150 items in Bill C-72, that I found they are by and large an attempt to clarify various issues and update practices which have been in place for some time. It is a new approach, Mr. Speaker, and I do hope we see this on an ongoing basis in the years in which we are forced to have a Conservative Government.

There is one aspect of this Bill which I would like to point out as being of particular importance to the taxpayer. That is the change in the statutory provisions regarding the payment of those taxes which are in dispute. In the past, when a taxpayer wanted to dispute the tax assessment made against him or her by Revenue Canada, they first had to pay the taxes allegedly owing to the Government of Canada and only then could they begin proceedings in the Tax Court of Canada to have a judicial reassessment. We are told and there is adequate information to believe that this practice has been discontinued. I think that is appropriate. Now Revenue Canada will await the outcome of the judicial proceedings before requesting payment of tax owing.

This is a welcome reform. I am sure all Hon. Members have been urged to work toward its implementation. Many of us are only too familiar with those constituents from our own ridings, or from elsewhere in the country, who have been before the courts and have had to pay up in some cases vast sums of money, particularly in the corporate and small business sector, only to find that Revenue Canada has made an error and there might have been $2,000, $20,000, $50,000 taken out of the accounts of those small businesses which the Government held over a period of time. No longer will this be the case, Mr. Speaker, and it is a welcome reform. We welcome this change of heart. Bill C-72 will simply implement into law what is now being practised by Revenue Canada.

On the other hand, Mr. Speaker, without getting too excited about accolades or recognition of positive changes, I think there is a bit of a myth in the land that now things have changed in terms of the attitude of Revenue Canada toward the taxpayer, that there is a change in practice in terms of dealing with the taxpayer. We on this side are still receiving too many letters and representations, too many briefs, too many telexes and communications from people who are still being harassed by officers of Revenue Canada. I do not know if Hon. Members opposite are receiving the same types of communication, but people are still concerned about the attitude of Revenue Canada toward the hard-pressed Canadian taxpayer. It is out there still, if I can use the term, using "jack-boot" tactics on innocent taxpayers.

Let us recognize, Mr. Speaker, that while there might have been some progress made toward an attitudinal change in some parts of the country with some Revenue Canada officers, it has certainly not been universal. There are still serious attitudinal problems and practices in terms of how Revenue Canada is behaving these days.

We have an understanding that we are going to deal with this Bill today. This is basically a technical Bill. As I said, there is nothing particularly controversial. However, there are many things which still have to be done in terms of improving the tax system, for example, the quarterly income tax payment system for seniors who now have to pay in the first quarter tax on bonds and so on, when they do not really receive the money until the end of the year. That is blatantly unfair and it punishes unfairly vast numbers of senior citizens in this country.

Mr. Blaikie: They are taxed on money they don't have.

Mr. Riis: As my colleague, the Hon. Member for Winnipeg-Birds Hill indicates, they are taxed on money they do not have.

Mr. Blaikie: The Conservatives promised to do something about it.

Mr. Riis: No one says that is an appropriate practice. The Conservatives promised the seniors that this would be a priority when they became Government. A year has passed and it is a simple item. It would require five minutes of the time of the House of Commons because I know there would be no opposition to such a progressive element. However, here we are today debating a tax Bill which could have included such a measure.

Again, I urge Hon. Members opposite, including the Minister of Transport (Mr. Mazankowski) who I know is concerned about these kinds of issues, to use his good office and his voice within Cabinet to ensure that a Bill bringing fairness to the taxpayers as it pertains to senior citizens is brought forward as quickly as possible. I believe I have said what I wish to say about this particular Bill. Bill C-72 is welcome. It is not very exciting. It is 239 pages of attempts to simplify the tax system which somehow to me seems to be a contradiction. Nevertheless, Mr. Speaker, we will do what we can to facilitate as a New Democratic Party the passage of this Bill through all stages today.

Mr. Alan Redway (York East): Mr. Speaker, I want to make three brief comments about Bill C-72. The first is to comment on the remarks of the Hon. Member for Kamloops-Shuswap (Mr. Riis) relating to the main change contained in this Bill with respect to the Income Tax Act. That, of course, is the whole concept of making sure that the taxpayer is considered to be innocent and not guilty from the outset. In the past our tax laws and the Income Tax Act assumed that the taxpayer, once the assessment was made, was guilty and had to pay the tax bill before appealing the matter. This has now been changed and there is a presumption of innocence, not guilt. However, Mr. Speaker, I was most disturbed by the remarks of the Hon. Member for Gander-Twillingate (Mr. Baker) because he made no reference to this aspect of the Bill. That is remarkable because when the Ways and Means motion relating to this Bill was introduced, his Party actually voted against the motion and opposed the concept that the taxpayer should be assumed innocent rather than guilty from the outset. That, of course, was the system under the previous Liberal Government of which the Hon. Member was a part. Apparently he and his Party want to see that continue because they opposed the change and called for a recorded vote when the Ways and Means motion was before the House. I hope he and his Party are going to change their attitude when this Bill comes to a vote today.

There are two other points I want to make which were raised by my friend from British Columbia. They have to do first of all with the simplifying of the tax system and, secondly, with the question of fairness of the tax system. As far as simplification is concerned, my hon. friend is quite aware that there were discussion papers released with the Budget which provide for discussion this whole issue. We now have that opportunity, it is out there for discussion, and I hope he and his Party will be commenting on it. The second question is that of fairness. Once again, the Budget indicated we were going to be bringing in legislation regarding a minimum tax effective January 1, 1986. It provided for the elimination of tax shelters and income splitting. All those things will be contained in legislation to be brought forward shortly to implement the Budget. This Bill is strictly a housekeeping measure, as my hon. friend points out, with the exception of that very important principle that a taxpayer is considered innocent from the outset. I trust, having said all that, that there will be unanimous agreement by all Parties very quicly on this Bill.

Mr. Baker: Mr. Speaker, just a very short comment. I just wanted to say that if the principle of being innocent until proven guilty were applied to all cases before the Federal Tax Court of Canada, it would indeed be a very good Bill. As I pointed out in my remarks, the point is that most of the cases before that court really do not relate to taxes at all; they relate to other matters which the Minsiter of National Revenue is responsible for such as the Unemployment Insurance Act and other Acts. Certainly this principle is not carried through.

As far as the Liberal Party being against the Bill is concerned, I think I pointed out why we wanted more changes in this Bill. The fact is that we are really objecting to the fact that this Government got elected on a lot more promises than that simple change to the Income Tax Act.

Mr. Mazankowski: And we are fulfilling them one by one, and you know it.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is the House ready for the question?

Some Hon. Members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Accordingly, pursuant to an order made earlier this day, the Bill stands referred to Committee of the Whole.

Motion agreed to, Bill read the second time and the House went into Committee thereon, Mr. Paproski in the chair.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. House in Committee of the Whole on Bill C-72, An Act to amend the statute law relating to income tax and to make a related amendment to the Tax Court of Canada Act.

Shall Clause 1 carry?

On Clause 1—

Mr. Riis: Mr. Chairman, the Parliamentary Secretary will probably be well aware of the points raised at second reading concerning the quarterly payments seniors are prepared to pay and the problems associated with that. Are we going to be seeing some rapid legislation brought forward on that matter in order to bring some relief to those hard-pressed seniors?

[Translation]

Mr. Lanthier: Mr. Chairman, we consider that it is a matter of policy and as we already said in our statement on second reading, it is a rather technical bill which deals with a special political aspect. My colleague's proposal is now under consideration.

[English]

Mr. Riis: Mr. Chairman, I hate to say this but I switched all the dials and I could not pick up the translation. Is it my problem or is it the system's problem?

Mr. Lanthier: Again, this is a more technical Bill aiming toward a principal item and we considered that the point raised by the Hon. Member is a point of policy and that will be discussed eventually. The Department is studying this matter right now.

Clause 1 agreed to.

Clauses 2 to 150 inclusive agreed to.

Schedules 1 to 3 inclusive agreed to.

Title agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): It being 6.30 p.m., I do now leave the chair until eight o'clock p.m., at which time the House will proceed to the question of the financial difficulties of the Northland Bank.

At 6.30 p.m. the House took recess.

[Editor's Note: For continuation of proceedings see Part II.]

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Wednesday, September 25, 1985

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

[Translation]

MOTION TO ADJOURN UNDER S.O. 31

FINANCIAL DIFFICULTY OF NORTHLAND BANK

Mr. Speaker: The Hon. Member for Hamilton Mountain (Mr. Deans) has been authorized to move the adjournment of the House pursuant to S.O. 31 for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter requiring urgent consideration, that is the financial difficulties of the Northland Bank. Therefore the motion is as follows:

Mr. Ian Deans (Hamilton Mountain) moved:

That this House do now adjourn.

[English]

He said: Mr. Speaker, I have for some time been contemplating the possibility of a debate such as this, especially over the last two or three days. I want to put it into a somewhat different perspective from that which might be expected. This is indeed a crisis, but the crisis confronting the banking system is equalled, I would offer, by the crisis confronting the parliamentary system as we try to find a way to deal with the problems.

There is no doubt, and I think the majority of those who have viewed the events of the last month or more, that there is a problem not only with the Northland Bank—the Northland Bank is unique but nevertheless not a single situation, unique in its own right—but also with the Canadian Commercial Bank. Our problem is that while we get hints of the difficulties of both of those institutions, the House of Commons, ultimately charged with the responsibility of approving, if not deciding upon a solution to the problem, receives very little information. We are being asked to make decisions on a day-to-day basis about events occurring in the banking system, and, in particular, within the two banks we are talking about, without sufficient knowledge of what is taking place.

I want to begin by saying to the Minister of State for Finance (Mrs. McDougall) that not all of the problem is hers, not all of the difficulties that we have confronted rest solely with her. I do not deny for the moment that certain of the information we have sought could well and legitimately be claimed to be outside of her responsibility. I do want to say that certain of the information that has been sought with regard to these two institutions is within her responsibility to provide. As a result of decisions that she has made that information is not forthcoming, will not be forthcoming, as we understand it. Yet we, as a House of Commons, and the committee that will be struck as an arm of the House of Commons, will have to make some kind of decision based on that scanty information currently available. It is that we want to concentrate on tonight, Mr. Speaker.

We read in the newspapers from a variety of different sources the concerns of those who are most expert in the field about the information flow currently available. We hear from the President of Northland, for example, that the Government, together with others, has not provided the necessary support to enable that institution to become more viable and, in the process, to become capable of operating within the normal business practices.

When we ask questions about the appropriateness of those comments we are given information from the ministries that serves no useful purpose in our search for the truth. For example, last weekend we suggested that it would be appropriate in the light of the circumstances that had come before us as a result of a statement made by the President of Northland, that the Finance Committee of Parliament be asked to sit during the weekend in order to come to grips with what was the truth.

We agree that this is an extraordinary request, that this is not the way we normally deal with things, yet the Government's response was "We do not have to do that. If you just accept the committee everything will be fine. If you just accept the reference presently on the Notice Paper then the Finance Committee could get on with its job and look into these things."

The problem is, and the Minister well knows, that the information being sought by the Opposition in particular, and I suspect by many back-benchers in the Government, is not forthcoming. Therefore, to approve of the terms of reference as they presently exist would be to hamstring that committee in its efforts to get to the bottom of what is a very serious problem. We recognized that, and we understood the ongoing nature of the discussions that were under way. We were sensitive to the problems confronting not only the Government but confronting the banks in question and others who have associated with the banks over many years. We decided that rather than press on with the reference to the committee of both CCB and Northland it would be appropriate taking into consideration the President's own concern, that an extraordinary session of the parliamentary committee ought to be undertaken.

What did the Government do? It said no. It was not prepared to do that. It was not necessary. It was not a crisis. But what in heavens name is a crisis, Mr. Speaker?

Mrs. McDougall: I am.

Mr. Deans: The Minister says "I am". Let me put to the Minister as she quietly mumbles under her breath, the crisis, my dear lady, was created by you, not by me. I sat with you during the deliberations on CCB in the early going.

Mr. Towers: Order.

Mr. Deans: Through you, Mr. Speaker, I sat with the Minister during those deliberations and made very effort to facilitate the requests made by the Government at the time. I defy her to deny that. We made every effort to accommodate what the Government wanted to see done, albeit we were opposed to the measure, but we still recognized that the crisis in the CCB was serious enough that we ought to prolong the debate.

We said we were opposed. We said we thought the measures offered were wrong. We said that what the Government was doing could not possibly bring about the result which the Government, through the Minister, was claiming would happen. Nevertheless, acting responsibly in the case, we said we would not delay it. We would allow it to happen though we opposed it. Unlike the Official Opposition, as its Leader said, we were not misled. We understood the consequences of the Government's actions and what would happen. For the Minister to suggest that somehow or other, or in one way or another, we are involved in the crisis is not true.

The difficulty has been, from that day to this, that although we set up a committee to look into the problem the committee was not given the information it needed in order to come to some reasonable conclusions about the problem. Our fear now is that the same kind of situation will pertain to the committee which is about to be structured for the purpose of looking into CCB and Northland.

What is it that we are asking? What is it that we would like to see which is so difficult to produce? We suggest, for example, that the information available to the Government, upon which it is basing its decisions, must be made available to the members of the committee in order that they too can look at it, deliberate upon it and make reasonable decisions about it. We are not suggesting that it be made public in the sense that everyone has to know everything about what is going on.

We appreciate the sensitivity of certain aspects of the banking industry and the sensitivity of certain matters within those institutions. However, there is no effort on the part of the Government to guarantee that the Members of the House of Commons, who ultimately will have to vote on the bail-out package, will have available to them, in the kind of detail that the Government has, all available information. That is the crux of the cricis in a parliamentary sense. That was what was wrong with the original review of the CCB situation. That is what is wrong with what is being offered now. That is why we believe that the Parliament of Canada is being bypassed, ignored and snubbed by the Government. We are not asking for more than is reasonable to expect. We are saying to the Government that if it is necessary for it to act in order to save the financial institutions of Canada, it is equally necessary that the Parliament of Canada be taken into the confidence of the Government. Unfortunately that has not been the case.

What did we ask for? We asked to be given the information which the Inspector General of Banks had available to him. We suggested that it was not unreasonable that we should know about the cash flow of both banks, about the loan portfolios of both banks and about the auditors' conclusions about both banks. If we are to pay out nearly $1 billion in one case and, hopefully not, but nevertheless perhaps, some half a billion dollars in the other case at some point, it is not unreasonable to ask that the people who are to receive the taxpayers' dollars be identified. Why? Because it is unreasonable to suggest to the public of Canada that we can find $1 billion to hand over to unnamed individuals.

We say to the Minister that we should deal with this bankruptcy as we deal with all other bankruptcies. Those who are creditors, depositors in this case but nevertheless creditors, and are to share in the assets of the institution, remembering that the assets in this case will be made up by the Government to 100 cents on the dollar for those who are depositors, should have to go through the same process as all other people in similar circumstances who are faced with having an asset claim against any other bankrupt institution. We are saying that banks are no different in this instance.

We are suggesting that there is in place now protection to the level of $60,000 for those who had deposits with either of the banks. We are saying more than that. If people put in more than that amount, and if it is deemed advisable by the House of Commons—and at this point we are not sure whether or not that might be true—to pay them more than the insured value, a value which they well knew was the insured level, then the taxpayers who have to foot the bill are entitled to know who is to get the money.

We cannot solve this problem, this crisis, and we cannot maintain or redevelop the confidence of the people of Canada in this system which we now have unless they feel that the Parliament of Canada has a handle on it, unless they feel that the Parliament of Canada understands what caused the problem, understands how the problem is to be solved now and what changes will be made to ensure that these kinds of things will not occur in the future. That confidence cannot possibly be gained from the public unless it knows that its parliamentarians have been given all information upon which to base their decisions.

I put to the Minister that it is not good enough to hide behind sections of the Bank Act. When it was drafted and considered by Parliament, the Bank Act was never considered in the light of a collapse of a major institution. It was written for the ongoing operations of the Banking system. It was written to protect people from prying during the ongoing and normal operations of banks as they had operated in Canada for some 10 years, 50 years or more. This is a different situation and must be seen as such because it is the first bank collapse in 60 years.

The problem is that when the Bank Act was written, modified and reconsidered, no one thought for one minute that there would be a collapse of a bank or a near collapse of a bank, as may well be the case in Northland. No one thought that that secrecy provision in the Bank Act would ever be applied when the assets, deposits or otherwise of a bank were to be distributed among those who were entitled to claim.

In order that this crisis situation can be resolved, we require the Government to be more forthcoming and more straightforward. When we ask questions in the House of Commons—and there is no other place which can claim precedence over the House of Commons regarding the right to ask questions and to receive answers to questions—we do not appreciate for one moment that the Minister would hide behind the possibility that some phony inquiry might take place. If the Government had dealt openly, honestly and fairly with the House of Commons in the first place the crisis we now face could have been avoided.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Deans: If we had received straightforward answers from the Minister of Finance (Mr. Wilson) or from the Minister of State for Finance, rather than vague references, I doubt very much if the situation that now pertains in the country with regard to both of these institutions would have created the sense of crisis in the country or the sense of crisis in the House of Commons which is now felt.

● (2020)

I say to the Minister on behalf of my colleagues that our requests are not unreasonable. What we are saying in essence is that if, as a country, the taxpayers are to be asked to bail out institutions in this country, financial or otherwise, it is the responsibility of the Government to make sure that those who are asked to vote the money are given all the information. That is the key to it, that those who are being asked to vote on it are given all the information.

I apologize to the Minister. I cannot take just on faith that she and the Minister of Finance know what they are doing. I would like to do that.

Mr. Broadbent: You can take on faith the opposite.

Mr. Deans: I would like to be able to take it on faith like Tory back-benchers that somehow or other the Government knows exactly what it is about and everything is working exactly as it should.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Broadbent: You are the only people in Canada who believe it.

Mr. Deans: I would be delighted to stand here and say that I have so much confidence in those two Ministers that they will always make the right decisions that I am prepared to place my entire trust in their abilities to both understand the problem and to seek the solutions. To be quite honest with you, Mr. Speaker, reluctant though I am to say it, the events of the last few months have led me to believe that that would be asking too much.

So what I am saying now on our behalf is that this crisis was brought on by this Government's neglect; this crisis is the result of this Government's inability to see beyond a few advisers who were ill advised; this Government asked for the Parliament of Canada to assist it in finding solutions to problems without making available the necessary information upon which to base decisions. We are saying that that is not good enough and we are saying to the Government if you want Parliament to operate effectively, if you want to be able to deal with the problems then bring us the information.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

An Hon. Member: All 12 applauded.

Miss Aideen Nicholson (Trinity): On Sunday, September 1, the Minister of State for Finance (Mrs. McDougall) announced that the Canadian Commercial Bank and the Northland Bank were no longer viable, that curators had been appointed at 7 p.m. that day to take over the bank's affairs. The Canadian Commercial Bank would be wound up but Northland would be given, "a limited time period to reorganize its affairs or amalgamate with another financial institution".

At this point the first question that comes to mind is about the wisdom of the Government's actions in this matter. By dealing in one press release with both institutions, one of which was being wound up immediately, the other which was being given a certain time limit to arrange a merger, did the Minister imply doubts that Northland would survive? Did she or her officials, by dealing with both institutions together, help create a climate in which Northland would not be a welcome partner in a merger? Was the language of the press release such as to imply that Northland too would close?

For example, on page 3 of the press release, we read:

It is legally necessary to launch immediately a winding up application for each bank. In the case of Canadian Commercial Bank, it will be proceeded with as quickly as possible. In the case of Northland Bank the court will be asked to postpone the appointment of a provisional liquidator to allow time to work out a reorganization or amalgamation. The legal requirements necessary to allow CDIC to make payments to insured depositors will, however, be taken as quickly as possible.

This may all be factually correct but does it enhance confidence? Would this be reassuring to any institution considering an amalgamation with Northland?

The Department of Finance backgrounder which was attached to the same press release also uses language which, although technically correct, would certainly not encourage confidence or does not give the impression that the Government had any great confidence in the ability of Northland Bank to find a solution.

I think we must ask the question then, if the Government had doubts about the ability of Northland to survive, on what were these doubts based? The Canadian Commercial Bank bail-out in March from the non-answers we get in the House looks more and more like a political decision made without any rational economic analysis. We have heard now from three banks that they offered personnel to do a full appraisal of the loan assets of the Canadian Commercial Bank before the bail-out was done but that their offer was refused. We hear that the banks were prepared to offer as many as 50 experienced personnel from each bank to go in and examine all the loan assets and their offer was refused for two reasons: one, that the Government representatives at the meeting, and neither the Minister of State nor the Minister of Finance were at that meeting but one of the Government officials who was there said there was not enough time as the decision had to be made by Monday morning. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Wilson) confirmed that he had presigned the winding up order.

The other reason that we were given in committee was that the Canadian Commercial Bank said they did not want their competitors looking at their books. I find it almost unbelievable that a bank which has come to Ottawa asking for a bail-out of $255 million, was in a position to dictate terms and that those terms would be accepted by the Government; but quite clearly the decision to go ahead with that bail-out was made on the basis of the figures provided by the Canadian Commercial Bank itself on a segment of its bad loans, not on the total picture. So that decision was clearly taken without full knowledge and we have to ask, was the decision about the Northland Bank taken on the basis of any fuller knowledge or was this another leap of faith?

In the September 1 release the Minister stated:

The conditions of these banks—

Again joining together the bank which was being wound up immediately and the other which we were told might have a chance, the Minister continued:

—are unique and reflect the unusual concentration of business in the commercial real estate market in Alberta which continues to be depressed.

At different times in the House and in committee other reasons have been given for the failure of the Canadian Commercial Bank or for the difficulties prior to the March bail-out. We have heard that the difficulties were due to the California energy situation and certainly in committee we had a lot of information about the lending practices of the bank and the management of the bank, which were certainly a factor.

• (2030)

In the case of Northland, what does the Minister know? Is its circumstances entirely different from the circumstances of the Canadian Commercial Bank? The treatment of those two banks, of course, has been quite different. The Government bailed out the Canadian Commercial Bank in March and gave many assurances that it would then be viable. The Canadian Commercial Bank operated for five months thereafter in the glare of publicity which may very well have hurt Northland. However, in the case of Northland, there was no bail-out; it was simply a period of time. One must ask why the treatment was different.

The Department of Finance background paper which was attached to the Minister's press release referred to loss of depositor confidence in both banks following the bail-out. One must ask if government actions contributed to the loss of confidence in the case of Northland. The question of dealing with the two banks together in the Minister's press release is, I think, very important and that is why I have mentioned it more than once. Surely the comparison must inhibit any organization considering a merger.

The Minister held a press conference in early September, perhaps September 1 or September 4, and again it was interesting to note that in the press conference, the Minister dealt with both banks but the journalists' questions for most of that press conference dealt with the CCB's lending practices and its bad loans. When questions about Northland came at the end of that session, surely a certain implication was drawn that must have made it difficult for Northland to continue.

In fact, Northland has been in limbo since September 1. Last week the president met with the Minister of State for Finance and was obviously unhappy with that meeting because after the meeting he called a press conference to express his unhappiness with the situation. He said that in his view, the Government was not seriously trying to assist the bank in finding a merger or a reorganization. I think we should know why the president had such a lack of confidence in the Government and what had led up to that lack of confidence.

I do not want to point a finger at the Minister of State for Finance alone because she has often said here in the House that this was a decision taken jointly by her, the Minister of Finance and the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney). However, quite clearly the decision to bail out the bank that was taken during the weekend of March 22 to March 25 was taken without full information. I think we are entitled to know whether or not the Minister had better information on September 1 and whether or not she has full information now. Should the Canadian Commercial Bank rescue have been attempted in the first place?

The Official Opposition was asked and agreed to let the resolution and the legislation authorizing the bail-out go through the House with minimum debate. We agreed with that because we accepted the word of the Government that it was important to take these steps in order to restore confidence or to avoid a crisis of confidence in our financial institutions and that given this amount of help the bank would be viable. We accepted this because we thought the Government was speaking with knowledge. We later discovered that the Government had not done a full examination of assets and that this decision was not soundly based.

The Minister has repeatedly said in the House that the decision was made on the best advice available at the time. Unless the Ministers have information that they have not given us, there was very little soundly based advice on which to make the decision because the books had not been examined.

Let us look at what happened after the bail-out. The Minister of State for Finance and the Minister of Finance both referred to monitoring the situation during the summer. Of what did this monitoring consist? The Inspector General has also referred to some kind of supervision or monitoring occurring during the summer.

It seems as though it was not until mid-August that the Government knew that the Canadian Commercial Bank's loan assets were really very much lower than the figure originally given. While the bail-out was based on a worth of approximately 55 cents on the dollar, when it came time to dispose of those assets, 30 cents on the dollar seemed to be the working figure.

What was happening throughout the summer? Although a proper asset evaluation would surely have given the Government the correct figures in March, that was not done. Looking at the kinds of loans the CCB was making during the summer, with the limited amount of information available to us, we find that some very high loans at very high interest rates were being made. Was anyone monitoring that? Was anyone checking to see that the loans made after the bail-out were sound?

An interesting article entitled "Did the Northland fall or was it pushed?" appeared in an Alberta paper. While the writer of that article has a particular bias that I would not share, some interesting facts are raised. For example, the writer of the article said that the highly publicized rescue of the CCB had shaken faith in other western-based lenders, notably the Northland in Calgary, and that it too began losing large corporate depositors who reckoned that the Northland might be floundering. In August the Northland denied press reports of a run on deposits but somehow on September 1 we learned from the Minister's press release that the Northland too was about to be closed down.

Traditionally, of course, banks have operated as much on confidence as on capital. Can confidence be maintained by stonewalling? This surely is the issue that is facing us now. We have heard very few straight answers in the House since this entire issue came up. There was a referral to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs where we were refused access to a number of essential documents. Conflicting statements have been made in the House. The Minister of State for Finance has said that there was no indication the Canadian Commercial Bank was in trouble before March 14. On another occasion, the Minister of Finance said that the Inspector General of Banks consulted with him last September. We know that there were reports from the U.S. regulatory authorities in mid-February which triggered a great deal of activity, such as telephone calls and visits between the Inspector General and the American regulators.

All this evasion does not enhance confidence; it merely sets off more and more speculation. In refusing to answer questions, the Minister has often suggested that we wait for the committee to convene. However, what guarantee have we that we will receive any better answers in committee?

This is an important matter and perhaps it is time to recognize that confidence will have to be based on disclosure and knowledge; it cannot be based on secrecy. Both the Minister of State for Finance and the Minister of Finance have often spoken about the need to be responsible in relation to depositors. We can accept this, provided we know who the depositors are. For instance, if the Province of Alberta is one of the main depositors and if, as has been rumoured, it has deposits amounting to $10 million, is the Minister seriously suggesting that the taxpayers of Canada should make up that amount of money? To ask Canadians to give a blank cheque with respect to the reimbursement of uninsured depositors without knowing the circumstances, even in a broad brush sense, is surely unreasonable.

The other matter on which we will need more information or discussion concerns shareholders.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Charest): Order, please. I am sorry to interrupt the Hon. Member but her time has expired.

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, the House Leader of the New Democratic Party has indicated that the current situation is one of crisis. The critic for the Liberal Party has indicated that the situation is one of crisis. I would not deny in any sense whatsoever that we face a very difficult situation in the House on an issue which we have tried to bring before committee where it can be discussed with some sort of calmness and rationale. However, the crisis is not as described. The crisis has to do with the regulatory environment in which we live. The crisis was not created by this Government, it was created by the former Government, which ignored, ignored and ignored the problems which arose.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Deans: That is a compelling argument!

Mrs. McDougall: Our laws regarding financial institutions are antiquated, particularly the federal laws in this country. Despite many proposals for reform and modernization many key federal statutes, such as the Trust Companies Act, the Canadian and British Insurance Companies Act, the Loan Companies Act, the Foreign Insurance Companies Act, and others, have not been reviewed in any significant respect for decades. We have too long relied on overburdened regulators to use the limited tools available to them so imaginatively as to remedy the defects in the existing system. In order to remedy the defects some action is required.

Even the Bank Act is outdated despite its decennial revisions. The last revision unleashed fundamental changes in the Canadian financial system. I am speaking of new Canadian banks, subsidiaries of foreign banks and new definitions of their authority. This involved substantial new responsibilities for the Inspector General of Banks. However, the implications of those changes were not thought through and adequate regulatory authority and staff were not provided. In fact, they were treated in a totally desultory and offhand manner.

In Ontario the Crown Trust-Greymac-Seaway Affair clearly demonstrated problems with the regulatory system. Ontario faced up to its responsibilities under the Progressive Conservative Government of the day. It produced two major reports, a discussion draft of an entire new law and a restructuring of the supervisory system. Until the advent in Ottawa of the present Government nothing was done, despite the obvious relevance to Ottawa of the happenings in Ontario and even apart from the fact that they cost the Canada Deposit Insurance Corporation, a federal institution, hundreds of millions of dollars.

In the meantime, there were changes in the market-place. A review and change of our institutions and our supervisory structure would be necessitated in any event by those very vast and profound changes, not just in Canada but changes around the world. Technological change is reshaping how the markets operate. However, our regulators are prevented from reacting flexibly and quickly because they are restricted by rules written in the age of the quill pen. Futures instruments, options and other new trading vehicles can vastly increase risk; but properly used they can aid the conservative investment manager. Internationalization of the trading markets is steadily increasing. All these fundamental changes have been largely ignored by our laws by that Government.

The CDIC developments since 1982 abundantly demonstrate the need for action to decrease the risk involved in its further exposure, the exposure of other institutions and of Canadian depositors.

There is additional competition through smaller entrants into the business. No one is more committed than we are to the importance or regional banking and the need for greater competition in the financial services market when business conditions warrant and when they can be made within a suitable regulatory competitive environment.

The prior Government accepted the constraints of ownership restrictions and therefore tried to meet the need for competition through the admission of foreign-controlled and free-standing Canadian corporations which tended to be small because they could not have major investors. Some fine companies have entered the market under this approach but the desirable level of competition has not been reached. A new approach is needed because that competition was achieved without proper regulatory supervision.

For the first time this Government has attempted to take some action around this regulatory environment. We have a Green Paper which proposes a new regulatory pattern which would meet the need for more effective competition by permitting greater flexibility in organizational arrangements. However, regulatory concerns are at the forefront. In the principles laid out in the Green Paper, consumer protection is at the top of the list.

The Green Paper proposes a modernization of all federal statutes in this area. We produced this paper as a priority item. We have moved ahead with it and we are prepared to proceed as quickly as possible after the conclusions of the parliamentary committee have been made known. We have attempted, for supervisory purposes, for the first time in Canadian history, to deal with the financial services industry, as an industry in which all depositors have an interest. And we have attempted for the first time in Canadian history to harmonize our policies with those of the provinces in a responsible way so that our regulatory and supervisory capability is enhanced across this country and under every jurisdiction.

This Government also commissioned Mr. Robert Wyman and his colleagues to produce a far-ranging report on the Canadian Deposit Insurance Corporation. I have already announced that I will be implementing important aspects of their report in the very near future. I have also announced my intention to appoint a private sector advisory panel to recommend improvements to the federal financial institution regulation system so that we can go down a little deeper. This committee will concentrate on operational details, staffing, procedure, co-ordination and the use of technology.

Hon. Members may be interested in some of the issues I would like to place before a committee. There are many issues to be explored. As I have said, they relate to operational arrangements as well as to broad structural issues, and as such are meant to round out the matters dealt with by the Green Paper and the Wyman Committee.

We want to co-operate with the provinces. They carry, and will continue to carry, major responsibilities for regulation. Co-operation exists now but it must be constant and instantaneous if the public, the depositors of this country—my responsibility for whom I take very seriously—are to be protected. How can this be done? Should they be co-ordinated through data banks and computer links for regulatory and examination purposes? What other steps can we take? Parliament can help me reach those decisions.

With respect to co-operation amongst federal agencies, the Green Paper recommends that the office of the Inspector General of Banks be combined with that of the Superintendent of Insurance to improve co-ordination at the federal level. Close links are also needed with the director under the Corporations Act, and perhaps also with the director under the Combines Investigation Act. I am looking for guidance from the committee as to what is necessary here and how it can be put in place with maximum efficiency and minimum cost. These are issues, Mr. Speaker, that I would very much like to bring before committee so that Parliament will have a chance to comment on those aspects of our regulatory system. These are some of the thoughtful things to which we think Parliament should make a contribution.

There should be some early warning signals, some red flags, to identify at an early date when a financial institution may be encountering problems. Low earnings are one signal, obviously, but may not be serious from the depositor's standpoint. Above market interest rates on deposits can be more troubling. Mismatched maturities on assets and liabilities, speculative investment activities and unusually rapid growth are other signs.

What I am not interested in this evening, Mr. Speaker, is that while I am speaking, the people on the other side of the House who want to discuss this issue have taken it upon themselves not to listen.

Mr. Deans: I have listened to every word. The question I have for you is when do we get involved in the process?

Some Hon. Members: Order.

Mrs. McDougall: I am involving you right now.

In the United States there has been much work done on how these signs can be studied to determine when problems are on the horizon. I know Canadian regulators have also worked on the problem. But I will ask the committee to guide me as to whether more can be done, and should be done. I am interested in the use of technology. I mentioned two or three ways in which technology can help regulators, improving the quality of supervision. This seems to be an area of great promise to which I hope the committee will give particular attention. Technology has reshaped financial institutions and it should now reshape the regulators.

We must always remember, Mr. Speaker, that while the current problems are serious, they effect only a small portion of financial institutions and their assets in Canada. The system is a healthy one and it is our job to ensure that it continues to serve Canadians well. This Government has demonstrated its commitment to improving the system further by removing some of the constraints, by giving the regulators the access they need to take a more pro-active role, and everything that we have done, and will continue to do on behalf of the depositors, will be in the context of effective supervision and regulations in the public interest.

Mr. Waddell: Mr. Speaker, I seek leave of the Minister and the House to put a short question to the Minister.

Some Hon. Members: No.

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, it is quite incredible to think of what is happening tonight.

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops-Shuswap): Let me remind you, you were forced into this debate tonight. This was not your choice. We are not here discussing this crisis because you thought it was appropriate. It is because of the responsibility of the New Democratic Party that this discussion is taking place.

I simply want to point out that the Speaker has indicated this is a crisis situation. It was called to the Speaker's attention by the Hon. Leader of the New Democratic Party (Mr. Broadbent), and subsequently by our House Leader, the Hon. Member for Hamilton Mountain (Mr. Deans). The Speaker agreed that this was in fact a crisis and today we have an opportunity, for the first time, to debate the collapse of two banks in Canada, the first in 62 years, because the Opposition Parties thought it was an appropriate thing to do, not the Government. And I want to make the point that when we discussed this in the House the last time it was the New Democratic Party which said at that time that we do not believe we have adequate information to bail out the Canadian Commercial Bank with $60 million—

Mr. Blenkarn: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. This debate is in connection with the Northland Bank. It has nothing to do with the Canadian Commercial Bank.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

S.O. 31

Mr. Blenkarn: The Hon. Member for Kamloops-Shuswap (Mr. Riis) knows that. He and his Party proposed this motion. It has to do with the Northland Bank. It has to do, then, with information to do with the Northland Bank—

Mr. Gauthier: Tell the Minister that.

Mr. Blenkarn: —and with administration of banks and the inspection of banks. I say to you, Mr. Speaker, that any reference to the Canadian Commercial Bank is totally out of order.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Charest): I think the Hon. Member for Mississauga South (Mr. Blenkarn) did make his point. In his last phrase the Hon. Member for Kamloops-Shuswap (Mr. Riis) did refer specifically to the Canadian Commercial Bank. I would like to remind all Hon. Members of the House, in case there may be any confusion, because it would be quite—

Mr. Gauthier: How about the Minister?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Charest): Order, please. It is quite easy to confuse the two issues but the motion is on the Northland Bank.

The Hon. Member for Kamloops-Shuswap.

Mr. Riis: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. The point I was getting to before I was rudely interrupted by the Hon. Member for Mississauga South (Mr. Blenkarn) was that the reason there is a problem with the Northland Bank today is because the Government mismanaged, mishandled and misdealt with the Canadian Commercial Bank. Had the Government dealt with that bank failure appropriately from the beginning, the Leader of my Party would not have called for an emergency debate.

• (2100)

The President of the Northland Bank precipitated this discussion tonight. A few days ago he decided to break an oath that he and his colleagues had with the Government of Canada because in their minds the Government had cut loose the bank. It was their impression that the Government had turned its back on western Canada. In the President's opinion the Government had turned its back on western financial institutions. He said that the Government of Canada was scuttling, sabotaging their efforts to make that bank viable. Without debating the merits of those comments, we felt they were serious enough allegations to call for an emergency debate. We thought it was important enough to hold a special session of the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs last weekend in order to hear the President of the Northland Bank, the Minister of State for Finance (Mrs. McDougall) and the Minister of Finance (Mr. Wilson) to get to the bottom of this. However, the Minister of Finance said that is not necessary. The Minister of State for Finance said that is not necessary, "trust us". These are the same two people who, along with the Governor of the Bank of Canada and the Inspector General of Banks, repeatedly said over the summer that the banking system in western Canada is safe, there are no banks in trouble, the Canadian Commercial Bank is viable and there are no serious difficulties in western Canadian banking. We know those statements were absolutely false. I am not suggesting for a moment that they were purposely misleading people. Either they did not know what was going on with those two banks or they did. I will give them the benefit of the doubt and suggest at this point that all the information we have indicates that all those people did not have a clue what was going on with those two banks in western Canada. Not a clue. I am not convinced by anything we have heard in the last few days that things have changed much.

A few weeks ago the Minister of State for Finance said there will be no more trust company bail-outs in Canada. A few days later she said, "except for Pioneer Trust. We are going to bail out that company". Then she said in the latter part of August that there would be no more bank bail-outs in this country, we are finished. A few days later she said there was at least one exception, possibly two. They decided to bail out the CCB, including all of the uninsured depositors, and if need be they would do the same for the Northland Bank. Mr. Speaker, when you have one opinion one week and exactly the opposite opinion the next week, does that build confidence in the ability of this Government to properly manage the financial institutions of this country? Absolutely not!

When the original bail-out request first came to this House we said we did not have enough information. We were asked to provide $60 million of taxpayers' money and we felt we did not have enough information. However, we had faith at that time in the Minister's suggestion that this had to be done. We said we will not support it because we do not believe in principle that this is the right thing to be doing to ensure a stable banking system and maintain the confidence of domestic and foreign investors in Canada. We said it was not an appropriate thing to do but we would take her word for it. In retrospect, God knows why we did it, but we did it. In return for our co-operation we demanded an inquiry take place. This was putting the cart before the horse just a little bit, but we took her word this had to be done. She said if we take this step the bank will be viable. That is what she said. She said to the people of Canada, the depositors, the shareholders, debenture holders, and everyone else, that the bank would be viable. We said this at least merits a full-scale inquiry by the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs. Thanks to the NDP we got that inquiry, albeit after the fact.

During that inquiry, as we peeled off the layers of the banking system, what emerged was a financial horror show in the CCB. Loan officers were being financially rewarded; the more loans they wrote, the more chances they would get on a condominium in Maui. Commissioned loan officers! This is unheard of in prudent banking practices. During that inquiry we had people lie to us and provide incomplete and inadequate information. People refused to provide information; for example, the Inspector General of Banks. In other words, it turned out to be a bit of a sham.

We wrote a report that pointed out to the best of our knowledge these were the problems in the banking system and there were many, many more but we could not get any co-operation from the people appearing before the committee. Then the Government comes along and says it is going to cost the taxpayers $1 billion but don't worry, it is going to carry out an inquiry where the witnesses can mislead Members of Parliament, lie to us, leave out information and refuse to answer questions. We have asked for documentation we feel is appropriate to carry out a decent, responsible inquiry and the Government says no, we cannot have that information.

Mr. Holtmann: You just don't have any clout, that is all.

Mr. Blenkarn: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Will the Hon. Member table in the House or tell us the exact information and the exact documentation he believes the Government ought to supply in the proposed motion the Government has before the House?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Charest): The Hon. Member knows full well that is not a point of order.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, the Chairman of the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs ought to know because what he has requested is public information. What he is asking for has been filed and if he does now know that, he should bloody well know it.

Mr. Blenkarn: Tell us. Put it on the record right now.

Mr. Riis: We asked for details of the loan portfolios but Price-Waterhouse said they would not provide that to the committee.

Mr. Holtmann: They don't trust you with it.

Mr. Riis: They said that publicly. They don't trust us with it?

Mr. Deans: They trust the Minister.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, if that is the attitude of Government Members toward that committee, then they better have a discussion with the chairman. They have no faith in the ability of this committee to carry out this inquiry properly.

Mr. Blenkarn: Mr. Speaker, I want to make it very clear that I am asking the NDP to outline in detail in this House what they insist be made available to the committee because I think it is important that it be on the record.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Charest): Order, please.

Mr. Blenkarn: Everything will be made available if at all possible.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Charest): Order, please. Once again, that is not a point of order.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, it is not a question of whether Government Members trust what is going on in the committee. It is a question of whether the people of Canada have the right to know what has been going on.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Riis: At the moment the Government has refused to provide what it says is reasonable and responsible information.

Mr. Blenkarn: We agree.

Mr. Riis: I want to mention one critical point, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Blenkarn: I want to know what you want.

Mr. Riis: It is the list of the uninsured depositors who the Government says will be receiving about $1 billion of taxpayers' money. These are phantom depositors. Faceless! Nameless! They have only $200,000 on deposit or maybe $10 million. They may be the Bank of Hong Kong, the Bank of Singapore, the Bank of America or Wells Fargo. We do not know who these people are and the Government refuses to provide the list. The chairman of the committee has said that in his opinion that list should be provided. The Chairman of the Toronto-Dominion Bank, who was a participant in the original bail-out of the CCB, says that list should be provided. No way should we be taking taxpayers' money, writing out cheques to nameless depositors who had their money in the bank knowing full well it was not secure at all. It was not insured. But that is all we are asking. We are asking for a list of depositors.

Mr. Blenkarn: Is that all?

• (2110)

Mr. Riis: The Minister of State for Finance has indicated that this will not be forthcoming and neither will other pieces of information such as the details of the loan portfolio. We are concerned about the Hitchman report. We recognize that it may be beyond the ability of the Minister to provide the report of the United States Reserve Board, yet, based on all the other items which the Government says it cannot provide, we wonder how hard it tried to get that report which describes the problems of the Canadian Commercial Bank's subsidiary in California.

Mr. Benjamin: Pick up the phone to Ronnie.

Mr. Riis: We, as responsible parliamentarians, are being asked to carry out an inquiry into the collapse of the Canadian Commercial Bank and the problems associated with the Northland Bank knowing full well that nothing has changed since the last committee, the work of which was incomplete.

We are dealing with a unique situation in this country, Mr. Speaker. There has never been a bank failure like this in Canadian history. I know it is easy for the Government to tell us not to worry and to have faith because it is going to take care of things by shovelling taxpayers' money into the sacks of the uninsured depositors. We are concerned about the banking system of the country. We are concerned that the right steps be taken. The Minister of State for Finance is somewhat correct when she says that we would not have got into this problem so deeply if we had decent regulatory and supervisory powers. Because for years and years the previous administration did not bother to do anything about this, a very serious situation has developed in our country. However, the Minister of State for Finance refused to act when she had the opportunity.

Mr. Blenkarn: I have a point of order.

Mr. Waddell: Sit down.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, we have heard on a number of occasions—

Mr. Benjamin: Don't see him.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Charest): The Hon. Member for Mississauga South (Mr. Blenkarn), I presume on a point of order.

Mr. Blenkarn: Mr. Speaker, it is clear that it is a point of order. The Minister of State for Finance has said she was prepared to act and go to the committee. The question is—

Mr. Waddell: You can't ask a question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Charest): No, no.

Mr. Heap: Sit down.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Charest): May I point out for the benefit of all Members of the House that in this debate they will all have an opportunity to rise and debate the issue. It is the sincere hope of the Chair that they will rise when their turn comes, rather than on points of order. The Hon. Member for Kamloops-Shuswap (Mr. Riis).

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, I suggest that the Hon. Member is making these interventions because he is afraid to speak his mind. I would like to conclude my remarks by suggesting that the Minister of State for Finance had an opportunity to act at the very beginning. The banks tell us that they were prepared to provide experienced bankers, with considerable expertise, to evaluate the situation in the Canadian Commercial Bank. They knew that their information was incomplete. The Minister of State for Finance and the Minister of Finance took the material presented by the management of the CCB as fact.

Mr. Blenkarn: But not the Northland.

Mr. Riis: It was perfectly clear to any prudent banker that these individuals had carried on imprudent banking practices, but the Minister of State for Finance said that that was good enough for her, that she had full faith in these characters. Mr. Speaker, the bankers involved did not and they offered to send in SWAT teams of sophisticated bankers to examine the Canadian Commercial Bank. The Minister of State and the Minister of Finance did not take advantage of that offer. They said that they had all the faith in the world in the ability of the Inspector General of Banks and of our old friend, the Governor of the Bank of Canada. They obviously did not know what was going on but they did not need that information.

We found out today that all summer long the bankers were saying that they thought there was a real problem in the bank and were prepared to send in expertise to assist. They asked to be allowed to participate. They were told no, no, no. Mr. Speaker, that tells me that the Minister of State for Finance and the Minister of Finance have not carried out their responsibility to protect Canadian citizens who invest, deposit money, or do business through our banking system. To ask us now to have faith in their ability to deal with the situation any further, or to deal with the financial management of this country after they have failed so abysmally, is asking too much. We in the New Democratic Party no longer have faith in the two senior Ministers with regard to banking, and I do not think the people of Canada have faith in them either.

If we ever get this whole affair into the open, Mr. Speaker, I suspect we are going to be smelling an awful lot of tuna. An awful lot of messy material will come to the surface. We will open up a hornet's nest with regard to what the Government, its senior Ministers, and the senior officials in the office of the Inspector General of Banks have failed to do. Mr. Speaker, that is why we, as responsible parliamentarians, plead for an opportunity to do the job that we were elected to do, that is to ensure that every dollar of taxpayers' money is wisely spent. To ask us to buy a pig in a poke, to shovel a thousand million dollars of taxpayers' money into sacks of uninsured depositors who remain faceless, is something that we in this Party simply cannot accept.

Hon. Harvie Andre (Associate Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, in his opening remarks the House Leader of the New Democratic Party (Mr. Deans) said something to the effect—and I paraphrase, but I think not inaccurately—that what we are talking about tonight is not a banking crisis but a parliamentary crisis.

Mr. Deans: I said it was both.

Mr. Andre: Well both, okay, a banking crisis and a parliamentary crisis.

Mr. Deans: Right.

Mr. Andre: Mr. Speaker, I have to agree with the latter part of that because for years and years he and I, on that side of the House—unfortunately I spent a lot of time over there, but not as much time as he is spending—spent our time fighting with the then Liberal Government to please allow Parliament to work, to please allow committees of Parliament to look into issues that came up from time to time. We fought and fought but that was not the practice of the Liberal Government. It was only in 1979, during the short Conservative Government, that we had freedom of information legislation. With the new Conservative Government, we now have committees that can set their own references. However, the pattern of Mr. MacEachen, the denizen of the other place, was to stonewall by keeping everything on the floor of the House of Commons where he knew full well that an issue could only last a few days then would disappear from the psyche of the angels up on high in the press gallery, and therefore the public.

That is not our pattern. There was a change of Government last year which the House Leader of the New Democratic Party apparently does not recognize. Right from the start the Minister of State for Finance (Mrs. McDougall)—

Mr. Waddell: It doesn't seem any different.

Mr. Heap: We can't see any difference.

Mr. Andre: —said that we want Parliament to look into the banking crisis of western institutions. We want Parliament to study why it happened and how it happened and to make recommendations on what can be done to ensure that it does not happen again. That was the position of the Minister of State for Finance and it is still her position. Several times in this House the Minister of State said that she would provide every bit of information that she is legally allowed to provide. The NDP say, "Stonewall, you are trying to cover up". We want Parliament to study all aspects and we will provide all the information that can legally be provided.

• (2120)

That is not good enough. "We want you to provide information that is illegal. We want you to break the law. Furthermore, we are not going to let Parliament work. We are not going to let committees of Parliament meet until you agree to break the law and provide us the information that you are not allowed to provide by law." That is the position of the House Leader of the New Democratic Party, Mr. Speaker. He says we have a parliamentary crisis. You are darn right we have, as long as we have Members like him espousing such absurdities as we have heard here tonight.

The NDP Member says, "Do the people have a right to know?" The question answers itself. Of course they do. We believe the people have a right to know. That is why we have changed the rules of Parliament to allow committees to meet at any time. That is why the Minister of State for Finance said that we want a committee in this House to look into all aspects of this question. That is why she said that we will provide all the information we can legally provide because Parliament, in that proper forum of a committee, can look at and study the figures. The NDP says no. Why does the NDP say no, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. Young: Why?

Mr. Althouse: You won't find the answers.

Mr. Andre: You know and I know, Mr. Speaker, because the New Democratic Party is not interested in getting to the bottom of the matter. The New Democrats are not interested in doing good, honest work in committee. They want scandal.

Mr. Althouse: We want answers.

Mr. Andre: They want hints of impropriety. They want to try and create some evidence of wrongdoing—

Mr. Axworthy: We keep finding it every day. We find more and more.

Mr. Andre: —so the House Leader of the New Democratic Party can get red in the face in righteous indignation and say that he is concerned about the people.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Axworthy: Take a look at your own face.

Mr. Andre: Yes, the House Leader of the New Democratic Party says "I am defending the people. I am concerned about the taxpayer." What absurdity. If he and his colleagues in the New Democratic Party were responsible parliamentarians they would not have been stonewalling and preventing the Government House Leader from getting this committee established. That committee would be meeting tonight.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Andre: Instead we are sitting here tonight engaged in this debate where we are not getting at the facts. The New Democratic Party Member over there says he is interested in getting at the facts. But that committee could be sitting tonight looking at all the information. If Members of the New Democratic Party were responsible parliamentarians, which they are not, that is what we would be doing tonight.

Mr. Althouse: The committee can get no more facts than we are getting tonight.

Mr. Young: Resign.

Mr. Andre: Every single person in the Province of Alberta, at least, and I would not be far wrong if I said western Canada knows what the fundamental problem is.

Mr. Lapierre: The Government.

Mr. Andre: Yes. It was the Government, the Liberal Government in 1980 that brought in the National Energy Program. There is no question about that.

This is a good opportunity, Mr. Speaker, to remind those of short memory what that National Energy Program did.

Mr. Lapierre: U.S. loans.

Mr. Axworthy: Where did you get your lobotomy?

Mr. Andre: On October 28, 1980, applauded by the Hon. Member for Vancouver Kingsway (Mr. Waddell) and the New Democratic Party, the Hon. Marc Lalonde brought in this document which put western Canada on its knees.

Mr. Gauthier: Baloney.

Mr. Andre: If the New Democratic Party is interested in facts, let them bring out the documents and look at the facts. Let them look at the Budget of November 1981 when the NEP was in place and let them look at the taxes that were being collected.

An Hon. Member: What has this got to do with the Northland Bank?

Mr. Andre: It has everything to do with the Northland Bank.

In fiscal year 1980-81, the Government of Canada collected about $2.3 billion in taxes from the oil and gas industry, representing about 10 per cent of corporate taxation. The oil and gas industry was about 10 per cent of Canadian industry.

Mr. Young: What about the companies you were involved with?

Mr. Andre: The next year under the the National Energy Program the taxes doubled. The next year the taxes doubled again. In the course of four years, the NEP took out $20 billion from the western Canadian economy. Let me repeat that. the NEP took out $20 billion. That is not the complete story, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Young: Poor Rosenberg and Eaton. Those are the boys you are protecting.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Charest): Order.

Mr. Andre: As I indicated, the New Democratic Party is not interested in facts. Facts have a way of destroying a good issue, I agree. I understand their fear because facts are not of interest to them over there.

The National Energy Program introduced on one industry, not corporate income taxes which apply evenly and equally across the country—

Mr. Waddell: To oil companies.

Mr. Andre: —but the Liberal Government introduced in addition the Petroleum and Gas Revenue Tax. That only collected $82 billion, $83 billion, $84 billion.

Mr. Gauthier: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. Some half an hour ago, Mr. Speaker, you brought to order a Member of the New Democratic Party because he was talking about the Canadian Commercial Bank. I wish you would bring it to the attention of the Minister that we are talking about the Northland crisis tonight and not about something that happened in 1981. Get back to the facts.

An Hon. Member: It is all relevant.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Charest): An Hon. Member in the House says it is all relevant. It is relevant. I would like once again to invite all Members to keep in mind that the subject matter of debate tonight is a motion concerning the Northland Bank. The Hon. Minister is referring to the reasons that the Northland Bank is in difficulty now.

Mr. Axworthy: Alleged reasons.

Mr. Andre: The National Energy Program imposed on one industry, one sector of the country, Mr. Speaker, these extra taxes borne by no other industrial sector. The Petroleum and Gas Revenue Tax in 1982-83 raised $3.7 billion from one industry in extra taxes. The incremental oil revenue tax, the natural gas and gas liquid tax, the oil export tax, the Canadian ownership charge, only five separate different taxes to collect a total of $20 billion. Any economy, any nation, let alone a part of a nation, subject to that massive increase of exorbitant taxes will feel economic pain. In addition, the National Energy Program provided for confiscation of 25 per cent of oil and gas company assets offshore. It imposed a new regulatory regime, the Canadian Oil and Gas Lands Administration with a bunch of bureaucrats to look after the regulations and, FIRA was instructed to take a fine look at any transactions of oil companies.

What happened as a result of that, Mr. Speaker? According to estimates of, I believe, the Conference Board, something like $18 to $22 billion of Canadian capital left Canada. Let me emphasize that, $18 to $20 billion dollars. That translates at a bare minimum to 250,000 jobs that were poof, gone.

Mr. Axworthy: This is fantasyland.

Mr. Andre: It was because of that program. The Hon. Member for Winnipeg-Fort Garry (Mr. Axworthy) got jobs for half of those people in his office.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Axworthy: That's right. Only half as many in your office now.

Mr. Andre: It took a quarter of that many to fly him around. There were pictures on television every day in western Canada. Admittedly people here in the east remained blissfully ignorant of drilling rigs lined up for miles at and above the border heading south. The Member for Winnipeg-Fort Garry laughs. That is why the Liberal Party did so well in western Canada in the last election.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Andre: That is why the Liberals did so well because of the attitude of the Member for Winnipeg Fort Garry.

Mr. Axworthy: I just appreciate a good clown.

Mr. Andre: What happens when you lose $20 billion of capital in a short period of time? Your dollar plunges, interest rates shoot up, they were high generally but Canada's were five to six points higher than in the United States. That supposedly great national Liberal Government imposed an extra $20 billion of taxes on one region, and the predictable happened—property values sank and businesses went bankrupt. The economic carnage was tragic to everyone with any sense of concern for their fellow Canadians.

• (2130)

Mr. Axworthy: Is that what happened with your companies?

Mr. Andre: It happened to the companies with which your Leader was involved; I read that in the paper.

Mr. Axworthy: What about yours?

Mr. Andre: Not mine.

Mr. Axworthy: What about the ones which went bankrupt?

Mr. Andre: The Hon. Member does not have to seek advice across the aisle on bankrupt companies; he should ask his Leader who was the chairman—

Mr. Axworthy: You were under investigation.

Mr. Andre: I was not the chairman of any bankrupt companies as was your Leader.

Mr. Axworthy: Tell us about the investigations you were under.

Mr. Andre: Ask your brother.

Mr. Axworthy: I am asking you; it is your companies.

Mr. Andre: You will have a chance to speak.

Mr. Axworthy: Yes.

Mr. Andre: When that kind of massive damage is done by a federal Government, the inevitable happens. In Alberta or in western Canada we did not suffer a recession; it was a depression. Thousands of young families had to abandon their homes because they lost their jobs. The companies could not carry them. Interest rates were exorbitant. I should like to refer to the list of projects which were actively under way and were cancelled as a result of the NEP—the Syncrude expansion, the Cold Lake project, the Alsands project, the Petro-Canada/Nova oilsands project, the Saskatchewan heavy tertiary project and Judy Creek light tertiary project. As a result, tens of thousands of important high-tech jobs were wiped out. People without jobs cannot pay their mortgages. People without jobs do not buy, and businesses go bankrupt. That is what happened as a result of the National Energy Program. That was the carnage as a result of the Liberal Government. Any bank with a primary market in that area was bound to feel the consequences. That is what happened.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Andre: Any responsible Member of Parliament will acknowledge that. I do not put members of the Liberal Party and the NDP into the category of responsible Members of Parliament.

Mr. Riis: You are a Minister now; you are above that.

Mr. Andre: Many of my friends were forced into bankruptcy, were forced out of Alberta and were forced into foreign countries. I doubt whether we could find a resident of Alberta who does not have a friend, acquaintance or family member that was not personally or financially devastated by the National Energy Program and the policies of the Liberal Government supported by the NDP. The fact that in the last year, because of the Western Accord and a change in attitude, I am happy to report to the House—

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Andre: I hope opposition Members will applaud the fact that things have changed and are changing. In fact, growth—

Mr. Waddell: What about the banks?

Mr. Axworthy: Tell us about the banks.

Mr. Andre: Members of the Liberal Party and the NDP find good news about the western economy to be atrocious. They become excited and upset when I tell them that things are looking up since the Western Accord.

Mr. Althouse: Why don't the banks believe that?

S.O. 31

Mr. Andre: Opposition Members think that is terrible. They were happier when the National Energy Program was destroying people; that made them happy. When the Western Accord is giving people hope again, they are upset. Dare this Government actually come to the aid of a western Canadian financial institution, my goodness! What a travesty! Dare this Government look beyond Ottawa and to western Canada! We are concerned about those who do business with the banks. We are concerned about depositors and the impact of these bank difficulties on the people and the economy of western Canada. The Opposition says: "That is terrible". We have nothing to hide. This is why the Minister of State for Finance said: "Let's take it to committee". She will provide all the information she can legally provide so that it can be studied, and the New Democratic Party does not want that. Its Members would rather stand in the House of Commons, look for scandal, look for misrepresentation and look for problems, so that they can sing in righteous indignation. They feel that that is more fun than getting to the truth and being responsible, worth-while Members of Parliament. We dismiss that, and the people of Canada dismiss that.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Mr. Raymond Garneau (Laval-des-Rapides): Mr. Speaker, this evening's debate falls within a very special context not only from a procedural standpoint but also with respect to the matter under consideration.

I do not think that the failure of a bank and the shutdown or eventual bankruptcy of another financial institution should be taken lightly. Quite a large number of our fellow citizens, as depositors, will be affected by these incidents. I have in my riding—as undoubtedly most Members have in theirs—borrowers, businessmen who provide work for hundreds and thousands of Canadians. This debate therefore is set in a context which I would describe as "the black years" or "the black days" of the administration of this country.

What is at stake here—and I want to look at it from that angle because we will eventually have an opportunity to dig deeper into this matter in committee—is a matter of credibility, the credibility of a Government, the credibility of a Minister of Finance (Mr. Wilson), and the credibility of a Minister of State for Finance (Mrs. McDougall).

If I may, I should like to go back in time, back to last March 25th when the Minister of State for Finance made a statement in the House, a statement I would like to quote, keeping in mind the remarks made by the previous speaker.

Here is what the Minister of State said, and this, Mr. Speaker, is the first time the House was officially told about the matter. I hope the Minister of State for Finance will listen to what she said, perhaps she might not repeat the nonsense we heard from her in the House today. I quote from Hansard of March 25th, 1985, page 3310:

HON. BARBARA MCDOUGALL (MINISTER OF STATE (FINANCE)): Mr. Speaker, I would like to advise the House that an agreement was reached this morning to provide the Canadian Commercial Bank with an infusion of capital which will ensure the long-term viability of this Edmonton-based bank. The agreement is a co-operative effort which brings together three Governments, six banks, and the Canada Deposit Insurance Corporation to provide a support package which will enable this bank to remain viable, thereby protecting the interests of small- and medium-sized business in western Canada.

The Minister went on to say in the House:

The bank—

—referring to the CCB—

The bank recently experienced a sharp deterioration in its U.S. loan portfolio, particularly as a result of lower oil prices. This situation significantly depressed the value of the Canadian Commercial Bank's loan portfolio. The management of the bank realized that they could not continue to operate a viable banking operation given the magnitude of the problem loans. While many of these loans had been considered manageable, it became evident in recent weeks, given the severity of the situation in the U.S., that a high proportion of them should be written off or significantly reduced on the books of the bank.

That is what the Minister of State for Finance (Mrs. McDougall) said in the House on March 25th of this year. Nowhere in her statement did she make a connection between the bankruptcy or financial difficulties of the Canadian Commercial Bank and the National Energy Program. I could go on to quote what the Minister had to say in answers she gave on March 29th of this year, in reply to questions by my hon. colleague, the Member for Ottawa-Vanier (Mr. Gauthier). This is what she said in answer to a question from the Hon. Member for Ottawa-Vanier: "Mr. Chairman, the Bank invested in California through an agency. It purchased a 40 per cent interest in the Westlands Bank. The Westlands Bank was involved in real estate. The agency was involved with oil rigs. I am trying to separate out a very complicated corporate structure". Those were the words of the Minister.

I wish she would stay in the House and listen and refrain from repeating the nonsense she uttered today. "The Westlands Bank", said the Minister, "went through some difficulties with its real estate. The agency, on the other hand . . . " The Hon. Member for Beauce (Mr. Bernier) will have time for a speech later on, if he wants to make one. He can tell us what he thinks of all this. "The agency, on the other hand, was involved with these oil rig loans. Those have become a problem really very recently. I want to read from something that appeared in the New York Times describing what had happened in a similar market in Texas". Mr. Speaker, I could go on reading passages from the Minister's statements in this House, clearly establishing that the root of the problems experienced by the Canadian Commercial Bank lay in its operations in the United States. At least, that is what she told us.

I would like to go back to what I said at the beginning of my remarks, when I suggested that today's issue revolves around credibility. I would like to quote from what the Minister said on March 25th. You heard what was said by the Hon. Member who spoke before me.

I would also like to raise another question, and this will bring me to the subject of my motion, the Northland Bank. On March 29th, in this House, an Opposition member from the NDP asked the Minister if other financial institutions might face difficulties. Referring to page 3513 of the Debates of March 29th, 1985, and I have here before me the English text, here is the answer given by the Minister of State for Finance:

• (2140)

[English]

Mr. Chairman, this situation was caused by an isolated incident. There are no other financial institutions in the country at the moment that are appearing to be insolvent in any way.

[Translation]

This was on March 29th, 1985, the very day that Western Capital ended its operations.

At the time we were told, on March 29, that there were no . . . and here are the words used—

[English]

The words that are being used are pretty clear:

There are no other financial institutions in the country at the moment that are appearing to be insolvent in any way.

[Translation]

And thus on the strength of the Minister's comments, having faith in the figures we were given concerning the Canadian Commercial Bank, accepting as true and verified the facts reported in this House, we supported the bail-out package on behalf of the Canadian Commercial Bank. But because of this Government's incompetence, we came to be faced on September 1st with another statement that flew in the face of what the Minister had told us. I am now referring to a press release issued on September 1st: "The Minister of State for Finance, the Hon. Barbara McDougall, today announced that the Inspector General of banks has informed her and the Minister of Finance that the Canadian Commercial Bank and the Northland Bank are no longer viable and cannot honour their commitments falling due".

Mr. Speaker, this is indeed a very serious situation when a Cabinet Minister rises from her seat and states that no other financial institution appears—let alone is—to be in difficulty, but a few months later, CCB and Northland are bundled up in the same basket. I submit that precisely by doing this, the Government of Canada, the Minister of Finance, the Minister of State for Finance had signed the death warrant of a financial institution. A financial institution, Mr. Speaker, for which, according to information published recently in the Financial Post, a trustee was appointed and a liquidation order applied for. That is what the press release told us on September 1st. We were told that an application had been filed for the liquidation of a financial institution about which the following figures were published in the Financial Post:

[English]

For the three months ended January 31, 1985, net income was up 24 per cent to $777,000 or 72 cents per share—

For the year ended October 31, 1984, net income rose to $3,347,000—

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, putting in the same bag a financial institution called the CCB and the Northland Bank doomed the second institution. During the long debate which has taken place in this House throughout September on the banking affair and the tainted tuna affair, we always come back to the same issue, namely credibility. How can we believe a Minister who stated that the CCB would be saved with $255 million? How can we now believe a Minister who, a few days later, said that no financial institution seemed to be in trouble? How can we believe a Minister who tells us that the whole bail-out operation was effected in close co-operation with the banking sector when the newspapers are full of statements by bankers who appeared before the Finance Committee and said that they had accepted this operation only because their arm had been twisted nearly out of its socket?

We asked the Minister to examine the assets of the CCB. This was refused. We asked the Minister to appoint qualified administrators to replace a management who had lost the confidence of the financial sector. This was refused. Today, during the oral question period, my colleagues and myself were told that no one had been found. Yet, one after the other, the bankers informed us that they had provided the Minister with the names of qualified people, of respected retired bankers who would have accepted such responsibilities.

Mr. Speaker, how can we believe a Minister who says that she is working tirelessly to save the Northland Bank when, in Calgary, the president of this same institution gives a press conference to inform the public that, before it is too late, he wants to state publicly that he has taken position against a Government whose mismanagement will cause the bank to close?

Mr. Speaker, we are certainly faced with a question of credibility. When I look at this whole operation, I say to myself: Here are two institutions, one worth $3 billion, or $2.7 billion, and one worth $1 billion. The one with assets of $3 billion has already been loaned $1.3 billion by the Bank of Canada. However, we were told in committee, Mr. Speaker, that the $1.3 billion were guaranteed by assets worth $1.8 billion. In an institution worth $2.7 billion, this means a difference of $1 billion, I wonder how come, in view of the direction it took earlier, the Governement is now asking the taxpayers to pay out $1 billion when there will no longer be any bank in Western Canada. Borrowers will continue to have problems for months and even years before that problem is solved.

The depositors who have placed their savings . . . There is at least one of them in my riding who has been living in anguish since then because he deposited at this bank the $160,000 he had managed to save in his lifetime. Why waste the taxpayers' money, send it down the drain, for all practical purposes, because there will not be a single job left when the banks go. The problem is the same with the Northland Bank. How much money did it get from the Bank of Canada? What is the real value of its assets? We have no accurate and up-to-date figures. Those which are available date back to October 31, the end of the fiscal year for the banking institutions, and indicate $1 billion in assets. I checked . . . A major part consists in very worthwhile investments. I ask myself: If we are to use the taxpayers' money, is there no way we could save the Northland Bank?

The purpose of my remarks, Mr. Speaker . . . I returned from Quebec City to take part in this debate for one single reason. I suggest that we could save the Northland Bank if the Government withdrew . . . and found a way to get out of the unthinkable maze in which it got stuck by placing the CCB and the Northland Bank in the same bag. You can imagine the reaction of the depositors when they read in a press release from the Minister of State for Finance (Mrs. McDougall) that the Government was asking for the liquidation of the bank but was asking the court to postpone its decision on a liquidation application. If you had $100,000, Mr. Speaker, would you place it in a financial institution for which the Government of your country has sought a liquidation order? It does not make sense, and the whole operation, day after day, is a further demonstration of the incompetence of the Minister of Finance and the Minister of State for Finance.

My colleague the Hon. Member for Saint-Henri-Westmount (Mr. Johnston) and I have often pointed out the empty seat across the floor that is reserved for the Prime Minister, and I urged very strongly my hon. friends to read from A to Z, as reported now by the Canadian Press, the various stages of this operation, and all evidence points in the same direction, the same as in the tuna fish disaster: The Office of the Prime Minister . . . As I said, I believe the Northland Bank could still be saved. It is a regional institution. Personally, as a Quebec Francophone, I would feel terribly humiliated if I heard that our "caisses populaires" were on the brink of bankruptcy. However, today, I feel that western Canadians have heard just about enough of the Prime Minister's statements.

But if I were a westerner, Mr. Speaker, I would be humiliated to see a regional bank go belly up, after years and years during which those people kept asking for their own financial institutions—two banks established during the 1970s. I will not launch into a political debate as did the Associate Minister of National Defence (Mr. Andre) earlier this evening. They were established under a Government and prospered for a while. Some errors were made. If on March 25th I had been told that nothing could be done, that the institution was bankrupt, but with no request for taxpayers' dollars to put it back on an even kneel, I would have understood, I would have accepted the situation, difficult though it would have been to do so. But in this case they asked for $225 million, not to save one or two individuals but to save a financial institution which was, in my judgment, the result of years of work and negotiations by the people of Western Canada to have their own financial institutions. So they are going to spend taxpayers' dollars to repay all depositors, they will clean up the whole mess. Perhaps it will end up costing $1 billion by the time this is over, but then when will the residents of Edmonton, Calgary, Winnipeg or Regina get back on their feet and try to get another regional bank going? I am saying that the full responsibility should be borne by the Prime Minister, the Minister of Finance and the Minister of State for Finance.

If the Government had been more serious and had taken the time it needed instead of panicking and trying to avoid the effects that such a decision could have had on the Summit organized by the Prime Minister, we might have been able to save some money in closing the CCB. With half these amounts, we would probably have been able to save Northland and to keep a regional bank in the Prairies to continue to serve the population, not only of Canada as a whole, but especially of the Western provinces.

In my opinion, it is a shame to have acted in this way and the debate this evening has at least had the advantage of clearly showing the incompetence of the Minister of State for Finance and the Minister of Finance who both washed their hands of the whole business and let the Prime Minister make the political decision.

In all the issues that are being raised one after the other, we see how badly the credibility of this Government is affected and how the Western provinces and financial institutions will have to pay for it.

[English]

Mr. Doug Lewis (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, before I begin my remarks, I would like to say to my colleague, the Hon. Member for Laval-des-Rapides (Mr. Garneau) who just spoke, that when we talk about credibility, we talk about being here for the beginning of the debate.

Mr. Gauthier: You've got to be kidding.

Mr. Lewis: I welcome him back to the House. I am pleased to have this opportunity to enter the debate with the perspective of a Member of Parliament from central Canada. This matter goes to the very heart of what this country is all about. It goes to the very fact that this is a country of various regions which is tied together by a common bond and that common bond is the fact that when one region encounters difficulty, the other regions pitch in to help out.

For most of the past 20 years, the help in this country was distributed to Liberal ridings. That is all finished because we are distributing the help in this country right across the country.

Mr. Garneau: You killed two banks and you're happy with that?

Mr. Lewis: You were not here but you know darn well that that is what your colleagues did. That is why there is only 40 of you in the House. There are only three here now but 40 all told. For years the Liberal Party either ravaged the West or ignored it depending on its whim. It is necessary to know the background to realize why we are having this debate tonight.

During the 1980s, under the Liberal Government, we saw the worst recession since the 1930s. This recession was visited upon most of the world but only in Canada did we have a government that helped it along. As a result, we had high interest rates, high unemployment, plants closing down, foreclosures, housing starts plummeting and no action was taken by the Liberal Party.

What kind of action did the Liberal Party take? It did take some action and it was called the National Energy Program. The recession was complicated by a deliberate action on the part of the Liberal Party in the form of the National Energy Program. If the National Energy Program was the child of the Liberal Government, its godparents were the NDP. There is no question about that.

When the NEP came along, the economy of the West ground to a halt and that is not something that is known only by MPs from the West, it is known throughout the country. We know exactly who ground the economy of western Canada to a halt. It was the Liberal Party helped by the NDP.

Mr. Waddell: Why helped by us? We voted against the program more than you did.

Mr. Lewis: I want the House to know what happened. When the NDP and the Liberals shut down the economy of western Canada, do you know what it meant to eastern Canada, Mr. Speaker? Factories in my riding shut down and people were laid off. Do you know what that meant to the City of Orillia, Mr. Speaker? It meant that it became filled with cars with yellow licence plates. Young people from Orillia went out West to work, worked hard, had good jobs and then the Liberals and the NDP shut down the energy industry and they had to come back home. That is what my colleagues said.

During this time, new banks were established. I think we all agreed that some competition in the banking industry would not hurt so several new banks formed in Canada including several in the West. These banks took advantage of the opportunities that existed out West in the 1970s. However, the Liberal Government—there being no members of that Party in the House to refute this—failed completely to put in place a regulatory regime which would take care of the problems banks might encounter under the new legislation and which we might wish them to avoid. I will refer to that point in a minute.

As a result, we saw a concentration of loans in the energy industry. There was a concentration of loans in one region. The failure to put in place a regulatory regime by the Liberal Party, complicated by the recession and the National Energy Program, led to problems. We saw falling real estate prices and falling real estate values. We saw bankruptcies. As a result, banks could not collect on their loans. They could not collect the interest or the regular payments and more and more of their loans became non-current.

I appreciate this debate is about the Northland Bank. However, I think it fair to suggest that the Canadian Commercial Bank encountered the same problems as those encountered by the Northland Bank. The House knows that the Government, along with the banks, the provinces of Alberta and British Columbia, and the CDIC, moved in with a support package which was designed to restore depositor confidence and to assist a fledgling western bank maintain its confidence in the Canadian banking system. At the same time we all know that there were difficulties with the American banking system.

Our efforts were justified by our responsibility as a national Government to help all regions of this country. We felt the support package would rectify the problems of the Canadian Commercial Bank and that that would spill over and strengthen all banks regardless of location. We felt it would enable all banks in the West to remain as players in the game and to bring some competition into the system. We all know that the situation did not get better. We all regret that. I think all Members of the House share that point of view. We found that the loan portfolios were in more serious condition than we first felt. We found that the market confidence was not restored. Thus, the Minister, on September 1, moved to take over the CCB and put curators in place at the Northland Bank.

There was a feeling at that time, and there still is, that with the directors in management and with the Government that the bank could be preserved. We gave, have given and are giving the Northland Bank time to rearrange its affairs. I am sure all Members in the House want that to happen. We want the confidence in the banking system maintained. I am sure that on behalf of all depositors and shareholders we would like to see that the Northland Bank has an opportunity to survive.

What we should look at in this situation is what we have learned. First, we have learned there is a desperate need to examine and improve our regulatory regime. There is no question about that. It was left in chaos by the Liberal Party. I suggest to Hon. Members that any Government is entitled to rely on auditors and is entitled to rely on inspectors.

Mr. Dick: There is but one opposition Member in the House.

Mr. Lewis: I am addressing my remark to that one member of the Opposition who is in the House. I know him as a hardworking colleague and I am certain he is listening to my remarks.

We are entitled, as is any Government, to the best information possible. Thus, what we have done is set up a committee to investigate the regulatory reform situation. We have released discussion papers. We have had the benefit of a private sector task force report on the CDIC. We intend to introduce legislation which will strengthen the regulatory powers of the federal Government. We will demand that federal regulators place realistic values on real estate which is held by the institutions which we regulate. We will institute legislation to empower the Minister of Finance to prevent the transfer of ownership of federally-incorporated financial institutions in cases where we deem that transfer to be against the public interest. We will take action to enable the supervisors to fully examine all activities.

I commend to the House an article by Seymour Friendland of the Financial Times of Canada dated September, 16, 1985, wherein he goes a couple of steps further. He suggests that if we are to have regional banks and trust companies—and I think we are all in favour of that—that we force them to diversify their loans. I think that makes some sense. We should look at that situation in order that we do not have all of the loans in one industry and in one region. It is just the same old story of having all your eggs in one basket. Mr. Friedland suggests we take a look at that point when we put in place the regulatory reform regime. That makes sense.

What can we learn from this situation? We have learned that we need a new regulatory regime for federal financial institutions in this country.

Second, we have learned the real interest of the Official Opposition, none of whom are in the House to hear my remarks. I hope they will read them in Hansard. When the debate commenced there were two Members out of forty in the House. I commend my colleagues from the New Democratic Party. They were serious about this debate. They had people in the House to participate in it. We all listened to the well researched, several-page address, of my colleague from Hamilton Mountain.

Third, we heard unbased allegations made by both the Hon. Member for Hamilton Mountain (Mr. Deans) and the Hon. Member for Trinity (Miss Nicholson) with respect to what we will divulge to the House. They have asked for the following. They have asked for the auditor's letter to the Board of Directors. We have agreed that the letter shall be released to the committee. They have asked for the letter from the Inspector General of Banks to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Wilson) dated September 24, 1984. We have agreed that the committee shall receive that letter. They have asked for a copy of the participation agreement of the support package. We have canvassed permission from all parties involved and they have agreed to release it to the committee. They have asked for the report of the U.S. Federal Reserve Board. We have asked permission of the Federal Reserve Board, both through official channels and diplomatic channels. It is U.S. officials who refuse to release the document to us. However, we are still pursuing the matter. They have asked us to release the names of the uninsured depositors. Members of the House know that Section 251 of the Bank Act and that Section 24 of the Access to Information Act make this disclosure impossible. Those sections protect the privacy of individuals, which is fundamental to the banking system. It is fundamental to our beliefs.

What is ludicrous about this is that the Hon. Member for Hamilton Mountain has suggested that we put in place retroactive legislation. He suggests that since this was not thought of when the Bank Act was drafted and amended that we should think of it now, pass an amendment and have retroactive legislation. I can think of nothing more odious, nothing more undemocratic than the passing of retroactive legislation as the Hon. Member for Hamilton Mountain proposes.

It has been suggested we are stonewalling. I suggest to the House that the New Democrats and the Liberals are far more interested in television time than they are in the truth. They know they can stonewall this matter in negotiations between House Leaders and prevent the matter from going to committee. They know they can come back to the matter with question after question in Question Period, none of them making any sense. In this way they can have their cake and it too. I do not really think they will find that the Canadian people will believe them.

Perhaps the most important thing we have learned is that we have one of the best Ministers of State for Finance that this House has ever seen.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lewis: The Minister entered the house in 1984 after a varied career in financial circles. She had an excellent reputation in our Party as a political organizer and as a very competent person. I suggest to the House, Mr. Speaker, that since then she has been tested as no Minister of State for Finance, has been tested, in my experience, and perhaps as no Minister of this Government has been tested. At no time, Mr. Speaker, has she been found wanting either by our Party, by the Government, by the Cabinet or by the Opposition. She has made the difficult decisions and she has stood by the difficult decisions. She has answered the questions. She has made the statements. She has been the witness in committee. She has done everything and she has done it in a determined, forthright and convincing manner. As colleagues, we are all proud to serve with her. I suggest that that would include Hon. Members of the Opposition. I have watched their daily frustration because they have thrown their best questions at her and have not made a dint.

• (2210)

The best line the Opposition can take up is the $1 billion bail-out. I would like to specifically address that issue in this national House of Commons.

We, as a Party, campaigned on national reconciliation. We said that every region of this country is important, and it is important to us all. I suggest to the Liberals and I suggest to the New Democratic Party, that if we put $1 billion worth of transfer payments into the Atlantic region, we will bail out that bank and the depositors in western Canada. If we put $1 billion into bailing the eastern banks out of the Dome situation, we will put $1 billion into trying to rescue this bank and these banks. If we put $1 billion into Canadair in Quebec so that we could maintain an aircraft industry in this country yes, we will put $1 billion into this effort on behalf of western Canada.

We make no apologies whatsoever for what we have done on behalf of western Canada. I say that as a proud Member of Parliament and especially as a Member of Parliament coming from Ontario. I want the entire House, especially the New Democratic Party and the Liberals, to understand that. I suggest to my colleagues who go back to towns and cities like Yorkton, Regina, Kamloops and Prince Albert, that on Saturday and Sunday they walk down the street and tell people that they were ridiculing what we were trying to do for western Canada. They should try that on for size when they go back home.

We have learned something else, Mr. Speaker. We have learned that the Liberals, bereft of policy, with their leadership problems, are fastening on to this issue as their only hope to divert attention. We have learned that the New Democratic Party, which does not have a leadership problem—yet—has western Members of Parliament from Manitoba, Saskatchewan—none from Alberta—and British Columbia, who ridicule our efforts to help western Canada.

We have learned most importantly, Mr. Speaker, that the Progressive Conservative Party is determined to make Canada work. We are determined to eliminate regional differences. We are determined to stand by our friends in all regions of this country.

I say to you, Mr. Speaker, that we support unequivocally the efforts of our colleague, the Minister of State for Finance (Mrs. McDougall), in the case of the Northland Bank.

Mr. Simon de Jong (Regina East): Mr. Speaker, the debate which is occurring tonight is a very important one. The stakes are high. In a period of economic restraints and contraction, the sums of moneys involved are indeed very significant. It is with some regret, Mr. Speaker, that I heard the Minister of State for Finance (Mrs. McDougall) deliver her speech this evening. It is unfortunate that she said very little about the state of the Northland Bank. I was hoping that the Minister would tell the House and the nation where things are with the Northland Bank in terms of the negotiations and trying to work out a financial package with some other financial institutions which would allow that financial institution in western Canada to survive. Unfortunately, she said absolutely nothing.

It would seem to me that this opportunity for a debate on the Northland Bank, in particular, would have been used by the Minister to explain to the House what the situation is, where things are right now and why she has committed herself and the Government to bail out all of the uninsured depositors if that institution should go into liquidation. Again, it is unfortunate, Mr. Speaker, that so far no member of the Government has risen in the House and really addressed this central question.

Something I find similar between the Canadian Commercial Bank and Pioneer Trust of Regina, Saskatchewan, is that in both places we have Conservative Governments who have the reputation of being business like and knowledgeable in the business world but which are making business decisions without knowing all the facts. They did not know what they were getting into when they made certain decisions. And when they made those decisions, Mr. Speaker, they committed their respective Governments and the taxpayers to millions of dollars.

In the case of the Province of Saskatchewan the Minister of Finance wrote a letter, which became public, stating that the Government of Saskatchewan would guarantee a preferred share issue which, in turn, would bail out Pioneer Trust. He did it without having a look at its books. What business person in his right mind would make a commitment of millions of dollars without having a look at the books? It's unimaginable. Of course, he did finally get around to looking at the books and discovered the true situation. In the words of the Minister of Finance of Saskatchewan, they discovered it was an endless pit and decided that they had better draw back from the brink. It has cost the Province of Saskatchewan some $24 million or $28 million. Who knows what the final number will be? In terms of our national Budget, that is not a great sum. To the people of Saskatchewan, that is a very great sum because the Government of the Province of Saskatchewan is cutting back on health care and road construction, on social assistance and on all sorts of important programs. But there is money for the banks.

On the federal level, we have the case of the Canadian Commercial Bank. The same mistake is made. A Tory Government, a Government of men and women who pride themselves on their business acumen, who stated in the last election campaign, "Elect us because we have a good business sense and we are going to restore sound business practices to Government", makes a commitment which is going to cost well over $1 billion without having a proper look at the books. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Wilson) and the Minister of State for Finance have told us they had the best information available. We must now, Mr. Speaker, as guardians of the public purse, ask that one central question: Was that good enough? Should they have known that that information was not sufficient? Were there enough indications, warnings and signals that the Government at that time should have realized that the information which was available was not good enough? I believe the answer is a resounding "yes".

One could stand here, Mr. Speaker, and speak for many hours on all the incidents and indications which showed that the Canadian Commercial Bank had some major problems. I understand that when the Minister took over there were warnings about CCB in her briefing book. The very fact that such financial actors as Rosenberg and Howard Eaton were involved in that bank should have been reason enough for the Government to know that things might not be all right. The Government should have known that the figures the Inspector General of Banks had were not sufficient on which to base a sound economic decision.

Tonight the Minister of State for Finance lambasted the Liberals for leaving behind a regulatory regime which was inadequate and inefficient and I totally agree with her. But surely that should have been reason enough for her to mistrust the figures they were supplying her. She knew the regulators did not have the proper manpower or the mandate to get the proper figures. Why did she trust the figures they supplied to her? Therefore, there is every reason to believe that the Government should have rejected the figures that were available.

Those figures are important, Mr. Speaker, because an investment decision was based on whether the package was adequate to meet the needs. If the figures supplied by the management and auditors of the company, and by the Inspector General of Banks, were as accurate as they said they were, then the rescue package would have been adequate and it would have worked. But the fact is the figures were not adequate. They were not correct. The loan losses were much higher. The Government should have known that but it proceeded on the basis that those figures were accurate.

The bankers themselves warned the Government. Every banker we had in front of the committee stated, one after the other, that they warned the Government they did not trust the management of that company or those figures. They proposed to send in teams, sworn to secrecy, to bring back a more accurate picture on the state of that company and the Government refused. That was sin number one from people who pride themselves on having good business acumen.

Sin number two was that the Government did not seem to have any game plan. Once the Bank of Canada had been committed to opening its vaults and providing continuous liquidity to the CCB, which in the end came to around 1.3 billion, the Government did not have a game plan. These Ministers did not say they were going to supply the rescue package today; on day two they were going to change the board of directors; on day three they were going to start changing the management and management practices and get this institution back on track.

Well, Hon. Members opposite laugh and say this is a socialist scheme; Governments are not into banking. No, they are just into bailing out the banks. Yet in the United States, when the Continental Illinois Bank was going under, the U.S. regulators insisted that all the directors of the bank resign. A new management team was put in. Those regulators insisted on that before they put one cent into the bail-out of that bank. That is the U.S. experience. Had this Government, once it was committed, thought through the whole process to step number two in order to get the bank properly on track, meaning a new board of directors and new management, this package might have worked. We might still have had a viable bank in western Canada. But mistake number two was committed.

The Government had every reason to know the management of CCB was not adequate, and nor were the board of directors. The board was often totally out in the cold as to what management was doing at that bank. When the bail-out package was put together on that weekend, the bankers themselves warned the Government—and some of them were very insistent—that management changes should occur. Again, unfortunately, the Government chose to ignore that advice. The Minister has said she made some attempts to recruit some new people to the board of directors but she had some difficulty. We understand from testimony given by the other banks that they had nominated people, and certainly one thing we will want to look at with intense scrutiny is why the Government failed to immediately appoint a new board of directors and new management once this commitment was made. Again, mistake number two.

So we have two fatal mistakes: not knowing what the proper state of the bank is; and, having committed the Government of Canada, not having a game plan in place to make sure that this financial institution would remain a viable institution. With those two mistakes this Government did a tremendous disservice to western Canada. The Government greased the already deteriorating skids under that financial institution.

Why did the Government proceed with this bail-out, Mr. Speaker? I have to come to the conclusion that it was totally naive and believed the management of CCB, accepted it all in good faith despite the warnings of the bankers and—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Charest): I have been listening very attentatively to the Hon. Member for Regina East. He has been referring for quite a while to the situation at the CCB and the whole subject matter of this motion concerns the Northland Bank.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Charest): Oh yes. I have been listening very carefully. In all fairness, I have been listening very attentatively for some time and I feel I may suggest to the Hon. Member that he should refer more specifically to the motion.

Mr. de Jong: Mr. Speaker, I would point out that I doubt if the Minister in her remarks once mentioend the Northland Bank.

Mr. Gauthier: She didn't.

Mr. Waddell: The Associate Minister of National Defence (Mr. Andre) spent all his time talking about the Bank of—

Mr. de Jong: All right. The point I am trying to make ties directly into the Northland Bank and whether it will become a viable operation or not. I used the experience of the CCB in order to show the mistakes this Government made, the mistakes it should avoid making with the Northland Bank.

I come back to the question of the bail-out. Why do we have a bail-out of the CCB? There was very indication that the support package was inadequate and a game plan for changing management and so on did not exist. So I wonder whether this Government is capable of dealing with the situation of the Northland Bank. Why did we have this bail-out of uninsured depositors? The Government has given the reason as being the Governor of the Bank of Canada, the Inspector General of Banks, the Minister of Finance, and the Minister of State for Finance, have all made public statements as to the viability of the bank and, therefore, the Government has a moral responsibility to the uninsured depositors. But they never made that commitment to the Northland Bank.

Why bail out the uninsured depositors of the Northland Bank? In the past the Minister stated that she will not bail out any more banks but will let the discipline of the market take place. For example, before the collapse of the CCB and the reported demise of Northland on Labour Day a statement of the Minister was reported in The Globe and Mail as follows: "Henceforth, she declared, depositor insurance levels will be adhered to religiously". That was before the CCB bail-out, Mr. Speaker. There is a double standard here.

I stood in my place day after day and asked the Minister if she was going to enter into an agreement with the Province of Saskatchewan to bail out the uninsured depositors of Pioneer Trust. She played cat and mouse and said, "No, because we have to draw the line somewhere". Finally the Government admitted that it had some responsibility because Pioneer Trust had issued guaranteed income securities for longer than five years with the CDIC's stamp. The Government took responsibility for those depositors but not for the others. A group of small trust companies have gone under and uninsured depositors have lost their money.

There is a double standard in this country. If you are big, if you are a foreign bank, the Bank of Nova Scotia, or the Toronto Dominion Bank, and you have several million dollars on deposit you will be bailed out. But, if you are a retired farmer in Saskatchewan with life savings of $100,000 or $120,000 in a small institution, forget it. What a signal to send out to the Canadian people through the financial institutions of the country. The Government must become clear on when it will bail people out and when it will not. It must make some public statement as to what its policy is. So far the Minister has totally skirted that issue.

We are beginning to suspect that the reason for the bail-out is political. The Associate Minister of Defence and a fair number of his friends were probably applying pressure within Cabinet to have these people bailed out. I note an article in The Toronto Star today by Diane Francis in which she wonders about the political connections between the Northland Bank and the Conservative Party. It reads:

> Richey B. Love, Q.C., partner in one of Calgary's most respected law firms and a Tory bagman in Alberta, bailed out of Northland in August, selling about 550,000 shares. Did he sell on information other shareholders lacked? Love says he knew nothing about the impending receivership on Labour Day.

I suspect that the Government is afraid to let a committee of Parliament with the proper powers study this because some dirt will be uncovered. I suspect that the Northland Bank and the Canadian Commercial Bank, like Pioneer Trust in Saskatchewan, were known as the Tory Banks.

The Government has stated that the bail-out was to save the economy of western Canada. It can save the economy of western Canada by spending $1 billion helping the farmers who were hit by drought and rain in my province. However, helping foreign depositors and multinational banks with deposits in the Canadian Commercial Bank is not going to help western Canada. The Government has done a disservice to western Canada and the financial institutions there, and on that they will hang.

[Translation]

Mr. Claude Lanthier (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, it may seem rather odd for a junior Member of the House to rise at this stage in the debate, before those Members who are particularly well versed in parliamentary procedure and who spoke previously to the subject of this special debate on the Northland Bank.

I believe, however, that as a new Member fresh from the business world, I could shed some light on this matter by removing it for a moment from the political subtleties of a debate that seems to be getting us nowhere and putting it in a more business-like perspective.

There were some allusions, and I am thinking more specifically of the Hon. Member for Laval-des-Rapides (Mr. Garneau), who said that he was going back to March 22nd of this year, when the whole affair started. Mr. Speaker, you do not have to be an experienced politician to realize that there was a very close connection, as the Hon. Member said, between the Northland affair and the Canadian Commercial Bank.

However, the problems of the Northland Bank did not start with the events of March 22nd. In fact, they started with the Liberal energy policy. If the Hon. Member for Laval-des-Rapides, and especially the old Liberal Opposition—I said the old Liberal Opposition to make myself perfectly clear—would have us govern by extrapolating the outdated methods of a party that had cost its vitality in recent years, I think they are mistaken.

The Liberal Party should have, as it has a right to do, delegated two of its Members to the Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs. They would have gone to Western Canada to see for themselves where the whole problem started. And it did not start on March 22nd It started as a result of the energy policy imposed by a Government, by an Old Opposition and a small Opposition.

Mr. Speaker, I would first like to inform the House of the circumstances that led to the problems experienced by the Northland Bank and a number of other financial institutions in Western Canada. The entire country was hard-hit by the recession in 1982. But as a junior Member and as a businessman who knows what it means to invest his own money in a business, however small it may be, let me tell you that the trip made by the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs to western Canada, to Vancouver, Calgary and Winnipeg, opened up a whole new world to us. We found out how our brothers in western Canada had suffered, yes, just listen . . . Unfortunately, we were not altogether aware of this in Quebec, and I must admit that we were ignorant of the terrible impact of the energy policy of the old Liberal Government that was tottering towards the end of its reign.

Mr. Speaker, in 1982, as I said earlier, there was an economic recession everywhere in Canada. However, I believe, as a Francophone out there told us, that western Canada was literally paralyzed by the constraints imposed on its economic development, constraints that were imposed by the Old Opposition, the aging Government at the time, and by the small Opposition, who, as our valiant Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) said recently, "were holding hands behind the curtains".

Mr. Speaker, why did the Liberal Government's National Energy Program aggravate the recession in western Canada? Everyone knows, everyone has seen the exodus, as indicated a while ago by an experienced man who lived in his constituency when he was in the Opposition and I would say to the Members who are shouting on the other side that I may not have been a member of the Government like he was . . . Moreover, let me tell you that as a Canadian citizen, I was then a victim. And today this gives me the right not only to speak but also to complain officially during the time allotted to me in this House, and to tell once and for all the Members opposite that they are directly responsible for that crisis. It did not originate on March 22nd, Mr. Speaker. It all started with the energy policy: it is actually responsible for the financial problems in western Canada.

• (2240)

Mr. Lapierre: Why did you vote for the Liberal party then?

Mr. Lanthier: I make a distinction between the federal Liberal Party—

Mr. Speaker, the National Energy Program destroyed the drilling industry in the West. Indeed, how many times have we not heard about complete drilling rigs leaving Canada to settle definitely in the United States where they found better conditions for economic development? Almost 50 per cent of drilling rigs left us. Throughout the world, we were listed as a country ready for development which had fantastic energy resources. Unfortunately, our Canadians had to leave the country if they wanted to make some progress in that area. The real troubles of the Northland Bank, because we are dealing with that bank even if we are trying to relate the issue, as the member for Laval-des-Rapides (Mr. Garneau) said a while ago, to the Canadian Commercial Bank, originated with the energy policy of the old Liberal government.

Mr. Malépart: The Liberals are also responsible for the tuna problem—

Mr. Lanthier: But what is more serious, Mr. Speaker, the small Canadian businessmen who were part of a secondary or ancillary industry revolving around a major industry in a given area . . . I come from the great constituency of LaSalle where the people of Ville-Emard and Ville-LaSalle work in co-operation with large basic industries and I would have been worried that perhaps one day a Liberal Government could have prevented the growth of our industries thus giving rise to the bankruptcy of all those small surrounding industries.

When we were travelling, and especially in Calgary, we had the opportunity to see what trouble can result from ill-conceived policies.

Mr. Lapierre: You should have stayed there!

Mr. Lanthier: I believe that what we saw in western Canada during our trip was that the Liberal delegation could have been more important. They had one worthy representative in the Hon. Member for Trinity (Miss Nicholson). She did her duty, but, in the first place, she was chosen at the last minute, and second, she was alone in her group. I must here pay tribute to the New Democratic Party which had permanently delegated two Members of Parliament who were familiar with this issue. There were two of them to defend at least the interests of their own party.

What is still more serious, Mr. Speaker, is that the small Canadian businessmen in the support or secondary industries, such as small suppliers, were even more affected than the large oil companies. Naturally, the major oil companies had branches throughout Canada and they were able to absorb these disastrous losses by distributing them throughout the country. However, what do you think happened to the small industries in Western Canada, to the small businesses which are so dear to our hearts in Quebec? Those which got their money from financial institutions—

Mr. Lapierre: That was not where they did business.

Mr. Lanthier: —what do you think happened to them in Western Canada? Well, I can give you my word about this. I am sorry, but I believe that with assets of at least $60,000, you qualify as a small business.

Mr. Malépart: Business was good.

Mr. Lapierre: He does not know anything.

Mr. Lanthier: The Opposition Members have not been in business for a long time, Mr. Speaker, if they do not know that you are still a small business with assets of $60,000 or more. The Western economic infrastructure based on energy was destroyed by the Liberals, by the Federal Whigs. The ones that suffered the most were the construction, service and maintenance companies and the small manufacturers. All the financial institutions which operate in western Canada must act in consequence. The financial institutions which supported these companies were naturally affected too. The true story of the financial trouble of the Northland Bank does not therefore begin on March 22, but with the energy policy of the former Government. The same is not true of financial institutions which have their main office in western Canada. Indeed, the great majority of loans granted by these institutions are directly or indirectly related to the energy industry. If this industry has problems, the financial institutions suffer the consequences.

Mr. Lapierre: What about the United States? Tell us about the American loans.

Mr. Lanthier: Mr. Speaker, something was mentioned earlier and I think it is unfair. I am not too familiar with Parliamentary procedure, but I thought that a debate was an opportunity for us to have an exchange. However, it is somewhat unfair because the last ones to talk can speak about the first speakers, but the reverse is not possible.

Mr. Lapierre: The last ones will always be first.

Mr. Lanthier: There was a reference to twisted arms earlier. It was mentioned a while ago that certain bankers are supposed to have said that their arms were twisted. For my part, I can say that I was there, which is not the case for all the Liberal Members, as we saw at the Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs that the Liberal Party was absent when we were interviewing those who appeared before us.

However, having heard all the bank presidents, especially the president of the Bankers' Association, Mr. Speaker . . .

Mr. Lapierre: Guilty!

Mr. Lanthier: . . . who said that all the banks supported . . . the Bankers' Association . . . was asked by a New Democratic Party member whether his arm was being twisted by the Minister.

Mr. Lapierre: Were you there?

Mr. Lanthier: They answered with a formal no. First, these were concerned people who were directly involved in the negotiations, when those people formally stated and directly answered questions, the same questions that were raised in this House earlier. Second, we asked them: Did you feel forced to endorse such a bail-out package? The answer was yes. But forced by whom? The Government? Again the answer was no, by the events themselves. Everyone was convinced there was nothing else to do at that point.

Mr. Malépart: He meant the Government.

Mr. Lanthier: You can rest assured that these events did not originate with this Government. If ever they were created, it was by the previous Government.

Mr. Malépart: So, the bank president issued the list.

Mr. Lanthier: Second, I would like, Mr. Speaker, to take up something the Hon. Member for Laval-des-Rapides (Mr. Garneau) said earlier, namely that there were anxious people in his constituency.

Mr. Speaker, we cannot be blamed for having done two things. If this Government decided to assume its responsibilities and compensate everybody, even people with more than $60,000, they cannot blame us on the one hand for compensating people with over $60,000 and on the other for getting people anxious. There is no anxiety, the Government discharges its responsibilities. All depositors are insured, on the one hand, by the Federal Deposit Insurance up to $60,000, and over and above that, following the joint commitment entered upon by the Government with its associates at the time of the bail-out, the major Canadian banks, everybody came aboard to say we were compensating everyone. The Government is assuming its responsibilities.

Therefore, the anxiety which the old Liberal Opposition is trying to stir up has no hold on people, in my view, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Malépart: You are taking money away from families to give it to the rich!

Mr. Lanthier: Everyone will be compensated. That is clear. There is no doubt about that, everyone will be compensated as soon as the Opposition understands that this Government's responsibility is to make full payment.

Now, they referred earlier to the Caisses populaires. Last night, Mr. Speaker, we heard in the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Matters representatives of the Caisses populaires Desjardins from Quebec, a group that is given as an example both of financial solidity and citizen involvement in their banking institutions, not only in Quebec but all across Canada.

Mr. Lapierre: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: The Hon. Member for Shefford (Mr. Lapierre) on a point of order.

Mr. Lapierre: Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member is referring to what goes on in committee. Can the issues debated in committee be debated in the House as well? Would you explain to me what the Standing Orders are?

Mr. Speaker: Hon. Members know very well that committee proceedings cannot be discussed in the House but from what I heard I wonder whether the Hon. Member used committee evidence to shore up his argument here? He may do that. Hon. Members know that very well.

Mr. Lanthier: Mr. Speaker, you are right if you assume that the only source of my remarks, irrelevant though they may appear, are arguments which have already been made.

Last night the Caisses populaires—represented not by one individual or only by the president but by the entire board of directors—stated formally that they supported the Minister. We did not have any choice, it was our moral and contractual responsibility to do what we are doing now, it was quite clear. The people were disappointed when they asked that question. Their answer was unequivocal and there was no arm twisting, Mr. Speaker.

Those people support the Government. The National Bank which had been accused of being a regional institution but has branches in five Canadian provinces where it is strongly represented said the same thing last night: those people fully support the Government in this operation, not only the rescue operation but the other operation whereby all depositors will get their money back.

So if I may, Mr. Speaker, I think those things need to be said if we want to set the record straight. If anything at all has been twisted, it was not the arms of bankers but rather the truth as the tired Liberal Opposition sees it.

Mr. Speaker, I think reference was then made to decisions taken without full knowledge of the facts. Earlier someone said something about remarks allegedly made by some bankers who apparently offered the services of their staff to make an audit. What they omit to say, Mr. Speaker, is that the offer was accepted. The books were audited by the Inspector General of Banks with the help of experts sent by the banks.

Of course, we were under pressure. But the banks . . . the Canadian Bankers' Association said that it had been involved in the study. The Bankers' Association was invited. All the big bankers, that weekend, were not on holiday but on duty. And the bail-out of the Canadian Commercial Bank was endorsed by all and they all had the choice to open or not to open the bank on Monday morning. Everybody decided to open the bank. It was a common decision, a joint venture, a partnership. This decision was not imposed by the Government.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, the decision regarding both banks that some tried to lump together in the debate tonight, in particular the Northland Bank, was I believe a difficult one to take. I am proud that it was taken by such a responsible and able person as our Minister of State for Finance (Mrs. McDougall). Her integrity is unquestionable and her decisions have been endorsed by all the leading experts on banking institutions in Canada. I wish I had been there when they took the reverse position and when the Opposition Leader was called to order by our valiant Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) when they said to him: Bring out the real facts or, if you are unable to prove them, say it outside the House, and then we will be armed to ask you questions.

As I said before, Mr. Speaker, this institution was endorsed by the leading banking institutions. We have taken our contractual and moral responsibilities towards all Canadian citizens and the decision was not only made by an honest and able person but also with full knowledge of the facts . . . I am happy not to have been cornered into taking that decision and I am proud as a Canadian that it was taken by such an able person.

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa-Vanier): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the House whether we could let our pages go, as well as some of those who work for members of Parliament in the lobbies, before we go on with the debate. I wish to thank them and if there is unanimous consent, we might let the pages go home.

An Hon. Member: This is very kind of you.

• (2250)

[English]

Mr. Speaker: I am sure the Pages also appreciate, as I do, the suggestion of the Hon. Member. That possibility has been investigated. As you can imagine, I was interested in that subject a little while ago, and I am told by the Pages that, this being such a rare experience, they would be interested in staying.

However, what I am going to do is to advise the Clerks in charge of the system that those Pages who wish to stay may stay and those Pages who wish to go may go.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Except for the two right in front of me. I am not put into a difficulty, but I think rotation will solve that problem.

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg-Fort Garry): Mr. Speaker, I think your comment—

An Hon. Member: Let's hear the truth now.

Mr. Axworthy: Mr. Speaker, I think your comment is an opportune introduction to my remarks, when you say that the Pages would be most reluctant to leave as this is such a rare opportunity.

There is no question that Canadians would have found in these days in Ottawa an incredibly rare and rich opportunity to tune up on one of the most bizzarre and incredible occurences in the history of the Government of this Canada. I am sure that Canadians tuning in on their television sets mistakingly thought that they had found a new comedy series calles "Amateur Night on the Rideau". When trying to look at their new Government, they are seeing perhaps one of the most incredible records of bumbling and fumbling and stumbling that has ever been accomplished in so short a period by so many people at this time. Really, we do not have to go through the events of the last 48 or 64 hours, because each day and each hour adds one more illustration of a group of people who lurch from lamp post to lamp post trying to find some support for something they know nothing about. It looks like a delegation of drunken sailors have arrived en masse here in Ottawa, simply to find themselves—

An Hon. Member: Tell us more!

Mr. Axworthy: —simply to find themselves without any direction, any development, any way of knowing what they are doing.

An Hon. Member: We will listen to your comedy routine. I can bet you know what you are talking about.

Mr. Axworthy: And Mr. Speaker, for all of the mistakes that have been made, for all of the errors that have been committed, for all of the droppings and fumblings and misinterpretations, nothing was more incredible than the performance tonight of the Minister of State for Finance (Mrs. McDougall).

We have watched that Minister for the past two or three weeks adopt the fetal defensive posture trying to defend the indefensible. But tonight was the most incredible performance, because here we are having an emergency debate on the future of the Northland Bank, a very valuable institution in western Canada, an institution which those on the Tory benches have said is their sacred trust to try to defend. And, Mr. Speaker, not once did she mention the Northland Bank!

An Hon. Member: That is true.

Mr. Axworthy: Not once did she ever give any evidence that she knew it existed; not once did she even show that she cared in the slightest for the thousands of depositors in that bank who live day by day in a state of limbo, not knowing whether they will be secured, protected; not once did she show that she even understood the kind of predicament in which she and the Minister of Finance (Mr. Wilson) and her Government have put the people of that bank, the depositors and investors in that bank, by simply not being able to make a decision.

There is an old phrase that they used to use in sociology classes talking about academics, that they lecture on navigation while the ship is going down! What a prime example of that was the Minister of State (Finance) tonight, coming to this House to lecture the Members of the House of Commons on the need for "regulatory reform" in our financial system when a ship called the Northland Bank was going down.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Axworthy: What an incredibly incompetent performance, and it only indicates—

Mr. Speaker: A point of order, the honourable Parliamentary Secretary.

Mr. Towers: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. The Hon. Member (Mr. Axworthy) should be known as the last Liberal west of Ontario when he makes these comments.

Mr. Axworthy: What a truly pertinent observation to make! The Conservative backbenchers are showing such great acumen in parliamentary procedure!

An Hon. Member: Get the wind out of your sails or you will not be here next time.

Mr. Axworthy: They are showing us that they are able to strike so incisively to the point. We stand in awe of the parliamentary skill and dexterity of the Members opposite. If that is the best they can do, it is no wonder they are in trouble. Believe me, it is no wonder they are in trouble!

An Hon. Member: We couldn't find a good cartoon so we came here to listen to you.

Mr. Axworthy: Mr. Speaker, let's get back to the point. We are talking about the responsibility of the Minister of State (Finance) and her colleague the Minister of Finance for the banking system, and in particular in this case the fact that the Northland Bank has been hung on the peg and is still left dangling day after day with no resolution. We have to ask ourselves why.

The first reason, Mr. Speaker, is the incredible state of the illusion that exists in the Progressive Conservative Government as to what the problem is. We saw it tonight in the incredible performance of the Associate Minister of Defence (Mr. Andre). I was reminded, listening to him speak, of a news item I reads in a magazine a couple of weeks back about a new defence acquisition by the United States called the "Sergeant York gun," a weapon on which they spent about $1.5 billion. After all that investment of time and money it was found that it made a lot of noise but did not function.

Well, Mr. Speaker, we have our own "Sergeant York gun" right here in the House of Commons in the person of the associate Minister of Defence. Our new acquisition! We didn't invest $1 billion in him. One couldn't even begin to get that price. One couldn'teven get $1 for him. But he certainly is the Canadian equivalent of a "Sergeant York gun": a lot of noise, a big bang—but it doesn't work. It can't hit the target; it has no ammunition. The Secretary of State of the United States junked the Sergeant York gun and I suspect, from what we have seen in the last several days, that it will soon be the turn of the Associate Minister of National Defence to be junked by his Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney), just like he is junking everyone else as he proceeds down the pathway of glory. He used the argument that somehow, in the convoluted sense of logic across the way, everything was a result of the National Energy Program, that the real cause was the NEP. That is fantasyland. I do not ask you, Mr. Speaker, to take my word for it. You should take the word of the Minister of State for Finance. What did she say in her September 2 statement as to why they had to take action against the Canadian Commercial Bank and Northland? It was because of the bad U.S. loans they had made and because of the bad management of those loans. It had nothing to do with the nonsense and fiction which we are hearing from other Hon. Members. At least the Minister of State for Finance, probably reading from a press release of her officials, got that one straight. There were $300 million, or whatever is the figure, of bad loans in energy development in southern California and in bad real estate speculation on the West Coast. They were a large part of the problems of those western banks.

● (2300)

Hon. Members opposite became involved in a debate about the NEP. Obviously I am a great servant of the Speaker of the House and would not want to deviate from the rules.

Mr. Towers: Oh, oh!

Mr. Axworthy: I know the Hon. Member opposite does not read much, so I will draw to his attention something which came out on the wire today concerning the great energy policies of his own Government. A Canadian Press report today indicated how the Conservative Government, this so-called great Government based upon wise business experience, has just lost another $1 billion of taxpayers' money by making a ruling on the Gulf take-over which allowed the particular company involved to find a loophole in the tax system so that it would not have to pay $1 billion in taxes on that particular energy deal. Let us see all those Members rising in their places and cheering, as they did five times during Question Period, for that particular piece of brilliance on the part of their Government in its energy policy. It only lost $1 billion on the banks and another $1 billion this week on the Gulf take-over! We are reaching the point where "what's a billion" is the label of this Government. It just does not care. It does not even understand it any more. The fact of the matter is that that financial institution overextended its capacity and, when it came time to make a judgment on what to do about it, the problems began. In that event a Minister of the Crown must be held accountable.

Let us look at the record of what took place. The auditors for Canadian Commercial Bank were not even asked for their opinion on that weekend. In a statement before the Finance Committee, representatives of Clarkson Gordon, the auditors, said that they were not even asked for their advice. These were the people who were looking after the financial affairs. The bankers who were invited to come in—and they said so in very clear terms—had their own misgivings. The Royal inspection team which was asked to inspect it indicated that it made no recommendation because it could not uncover enough information. Also, according to the CP story, the fact that the bankers could not do a detailed analysis of the Commercial's books was making them nervous during the meetings that weekend. One banker complained that when additional information was requested, the Government handed out the same quarterly statements which were given to shareholders. A decision of incredible and major proportions was being made by the Government and the people who were asked to investigate could not get the information they requested. Then, these so-called brave guardians of the new economic order, the Minister of State for Finance and the Minister of Finance, were not even at the meetings. They could not be bothered. I suppose there was a party down in the annex which they had to attend. They could not get around to going to the meetings when $1 billion was at stake. The Minister of State for Finance said: "That is not my responsibility; it is that of the officials".

Just this week a Minister resigned because he overruled his officials and stepped in on the tuna fish case. Now we have the Minister of State for Finance saying that it is only $1 billion and that it is only the first failure of a bank since 1923. She had something else to do that weekend and could not be bothered to attend. The Minister of Finance, the Minister who is ultimately accountable, could not be found either. Is that ministerial accountability?

They want to know why Canadians were worried and were asking who was in charge, when the two accountable Ministers were nowhere to be found on a weekend when $1 billion was going down the drain. Perhaps we should ask where the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Miss Carney) was at the time of the Gulf deal. We know that she was on an island somewhere in the Straits of Georgia. She was not around when these rulings were made, either. Yet, they want to know why Canadians are concerned and why we are having an emergency debate. The fact of the matter is that that serious misstep, that incredible lack of accountability displayed by the Ministers of the Government on that March weekend, set in motion the sequence of events which is now putting the Northland Bank in jeopardy. It is an incredible fallacy for the Prime Minister, the Minister of Finance and other Ministers to rise and say that they are defending western Canada. They are the ones who started to put the Northland Bank down the drain on March 22. Rather than taking the action they should have taken on that weekend, they began to pull the plug. As the officials of that bank said, they were going through their own rescue operations beginning in the summer. At the very time when they were getting their line of credit reduced down to zero and beginning to reorganize their portfolio, the Government stepped in on the September weekend, tied the two banks together and said that Northland was in the same predicament as CCB. Suddenly they want to know why people get nervous and start pulling out their deposits and why Northland is in trouble. Is this the saviour of western Canada? Is this a Government which stands up for the West? It had the opportunity to provide major support for at least one of those institutions and, instead, we will lose both of them. That is the simple equation, that is the simple result. Because of a serious lack of judgment and a serious lack of responsibility on the part of the two Ministers responsible for our financial arrangements, we are not only in the position of losing one major financial institution in the west; we are in danger of losing both.

As one of my colleagues said earlier in the debate, the reason for this emergency debate is to say that we still do not believe that it has to happen. We still believe that Northland might be saved, if only the Government would start exercising its responsibility, acting like a Government and making decisions, rather than dodging, weaving, defending, protesting and misinterpreting day after day in the House of Commons. We have heard the Minister of State for Finance and the Minister of Finance plead: "Oh, if you only understood" and say that if the Opposition acted as their spiritual counsellor, everythig would be all right. We ask them to stand up and act like Ministers. We ask them to do their duty and to live up to their responsibilities. They are not doing these things. As each day goes by, the situation becomes more perilous and the future of Northland Bank looks more dim. That is why this emergency debate was called. I pay my respects to the members of the New Democratic Party for putting forward the motion against the opposition of the Government.

I know that I am not supposed to say that there is a distinct lack of ministerial representation in the House. We are talking about hundreds of millions of dollars of Canadian money in the bank and about a potential $500 million bail-out. Mr. Speaker, look at how much care and concern there is on the part of Members of the Government, especially the Ministers responsible. Ask yourself whether that is the way to behave. Is that the way the Government will win plaudits, justify its mandate and go on to the new millennium which has been promised? It is hardly likely. I know that it has been a tough day, a tough week, a tough month and a tough year for Government Members. It is going to get a lot tougher because the track record up to now simply shows that they are becoming confused and immobilized, and there is a wonderful word "immobiliser" that was attached to all the French Governments during the 1950s and 1960s. It described a state of mind of members of the Government at that time in the French Fourth Republic which was an incapacity, an inability to decide, to know what they wanted to do, to give direction. That is the problem that we see prevalent. That is the disease that is spreading day by day on the government side of this House.

We can go to the sources. I do not necessarily want to start saying who is to blame although in our system there is only one person to blame and that is the person who forms the Government, sets the tone, sets the framework. What we are seeing in this financial institution is that very same state of paralysis. My colleague tonight laid out some steps that should be taken to come to grips with the Northland situation, to try to deal with that bank's problems and responding to them. Instead we have, in hockey terms, a team that only knows how to play defence and doesn't know how to shoot the puck any more, it doesn't know to go on offence. It simply does not any longer know how to mount a well co-ordinated attack upon a problem.

I stand here as a westerner who has managed to survive there. I fully agree, a mandate was given, but mandates can be burned out. I only remind the House of the wonderful mandate that was given to the Diefenbaker Government back in 1957-1958. They burned that out in four years and wore out their welcome very quickly for exactly the same reason, confusion, indecision and lack of direction. If there is any lesson in history it should be that lesson how a strong mandate given by the Canadian people was frittered and flustered away by a Government that did not know what it wanted to do or how to get there.

History is repeating itself day by day. That is what we are seeing taking place. The tragedy is that a lot more was expected. There was a lot more benefit of doubt being offered and it is still there but the fact of the matter is that it is not being earned.

I believe that if the Minister of State for Finance could somehow forget the posturing, get away from the excuses, get away from trying to defend what is indefensible and begin zeroing in on the problem we could still have a Northland Bank working in western Canada, as a viable institution, but I do not think there is much time left for her and her colleague, the Minister of Finance to take that action.

If there is any message that should come out of this debate tonight it is that the clock is ticking, the time is short and a lot of Canadians are looking to them for some decisions very soon.

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, we called for this emergency debate because we are not satisfied that the Government is prepared to give all the information which is required by the people of Canada through their Members of Parliament who represent them, to know what ought to be done with the Northland Bank. Indeed, Mr. Speaker, we have every reason, based on past experience, to believe that not only is the Government not prepared to give us all the information but the fact is that the Government does not have all of the information. I say that because when we ask questions about the Northland Bank we are not talking about one isolated case of a financial institution which is in trouble. We have had a whole series first of financial institutions and trust companies and now banks which are in trouble.

How did the Minister try to deal with our criticisms, with the questions we asked tonight? She had two arguments. First of all, she blamed the difficulties of the financial institutions on the former Government. She said quite properly and correctly that the former Government had not passed the necessary legislation, did not have the adequate monitoring or supervisory system to deal with the kinds of problems that have arisen in recent years.

She was correct, and for that the former Liberal Government needs to be criticized in the strongest terms. But we have had three very serious financial situations, two failures and one probable failure, the one we are discussing tonight, since this Government took office. We had the Pioneer Trust problem; we had the Canadian Commercial Bank problem and now we are dealing with the Northland. When this Government took office it knew that there were tremendous problems. We have been accused by members on the Government side of using scare tactics. We have been told that we do not know anything about business. It is as if, Mr. Speaker, because we are frequently critical of the way the so-called free enterprise system works that therefore we cannot contribute anything useful.

We are not the only ones saying these things. A recent issue of The Globe and Mail "Report On Business" lists 17 financial institutions, trust companies and banks, which have gone sour, which in fact have gone bankrupt since 1980. According to Arthur Johnson who started one of these articles in this "Report On Business", the headline on his story is "A Billion-Dollar Bailout":

Belying its pinstripe image, Canada's bank, trust and loan industry is in a mess. The cost of cleaning things up: $1.2 billion of public money.

Mr. Speaker, I believe Arthur Johnson underestimated the cost because what he did not include there was the money which the Canada Deposit Insurance Corporation is going to have to put in. I understand that they will be required to put in $1.5 billion and that they have more than $1 billion in property which they took over as a result of the collapse of the Rosenberg trust company. That money which the CDIC will be putting in comes through premiums paid by the banks but we ought to be under no illusions, the premiums paid by the banks have become part of the cost of the banks' operation and will be paid for by the banks' customers, by the people of Canada, so we are talking about billions of dollars of public money.

I say, Mr. Speaker, yes, the seeds of the difficulties were created by the failure of the former Liberal Government to put into place the kinds of laws and the kind of monitoring and regulatory system that would have obviated the difficulties, but this Government had enough time to learn the facts of life so that we should not be in the situation which we are at the present time with the Northland Bank.

I was asked by my colleagues to be a member of the finance committee last May and June when we were looking at the Canadian Commercial Bank. The committee held a great many meetings. We heard evidence from officials of the banks, from the Inspector General, from the Governor of the Bank of Canada and from representatives of two of the largest auditing firms in this country. We heard one story of disaster after another. We heard one story of misrepresentation and failure to act after another. When it was all over, the Government did not listen to the evidence or realize that the system was not working. It did not realize that the Inspector General had neither the ability nor the desire to do the job he should have been doing and that the Governor of the Bank of Canada vouched for the Canadian Commercial Bank without any information at all. After all the evidence had been given, he still maintained that in his view the officers of that bank were still capable of managing the bank.

At that time, we said that the Inspector General of Banks had been derelict in his duties. At that time, we said that the Governor of the Bank had vouched for the bank without having any knowledge on which to base that kind of statement. We did not have all the evidence before us and as has already been pointed out by some of my colleagues, the Inspector General, who we thought worked for the Government and people of Canada although his salary is paid by the banks, refused to give us this very important evidence that was required.

Did the Inspector General learn of the difficulties of the Canadian Commercial Bank only a few weeks before the crisis came up? I say that if he did, he is totally incompetent. About two years before the bank got into the difficulties which became known by everyone, the Superintendent of Insurance became aware that Leonard Rosenberg of whom we now know a great deal had become involved with the Canadian Commercial Bank. The Superintendent became aware that either he himself or other members of his family had control not of 10 per cent of the bank's shares, the limit permitted by the Bank Act, but that he controlled more than 20 per cent of the shares. He became aware as well that Mr. Rosenberg was involved in some very fancy financial deals with the then President of the Canadian Commercial Bank, Mr. Eaton.

We never learned whether or not the Superintendent of Insurance contacted the Inspector General of Banks to tell him about these things. Surely that was the point at which the Inspector General should have known that he ought to keep a very close eye on the operations of the Canadian Commercial Bank. However, he did not do so.

There was another point at which the Inspector General would have heard a warning bell if he were listening. That was when the regulatory agency in the United States which monitors bank operations took a look at the Westland Bank which was 100 per cent owned by the Canadian Commercial Bank. At that time, the regulatory agency in the United States put the Westland Bank on notice that it was operating contrary to the rules and regulations of the policies of the American banking system. What happened then? The Directors of the Canadian Commercial Bank proceeded to buy, rather than a minority part of the Westland Bank, 100 per cent of it.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Order, please. I would like to know when the Hon. Member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow) will deal with the Northland Bank. He has a few minutes left. I hate to call anyone to order on relevancy and particularly a senior Member of the House. However, I would hope that he would deal with the Northland Bank.

Mr. Orlikow: As I indicated at the beginning of my speech, Mr. Speaker, we are not merely dealing with the Northland Bank. Unfortunately, this is not an isolated case. It is one more illustration of the failure of our system to see that these kinds of things do not happen.

I cannot deal in detail with the Northland Bank as I can with the Canadian Commercial Bank because we have not yet held hearings. We do not know about all the things which happened at the Northland Bank. However, we do know some of what happened at the Canadian Commercial Bank. I am saying that the Government should have learned a lesson and it did not. That is the point which I am trying to make.

The Inspector General was derelict in his duties. If he did not have the staff or the authority—both of which are possible—then he could have come to Parliament to say that he could not do his job because he did not have the staff or authority and I would not have been critical of the Inspector General. However, he did not do any of those things.

Let us take a look at the Governor of the Bank of Canada. When the financial sections of newspapers began to report that there was trouble at the Canadian Commercial Bank, the Governor of the Bank of Canada did something which was unprecedented. One evening he called The Globe and Mail to say that he vouched for the Canadian Commercial Bank as a viable operation. How could the Governor of the Bank of Canada have said that? That was when the Canadian Commercial Bank was in trouble.

A couple of days ago, the Governor of the Bank of Canada made a speech in Toronto. Let me read part of what the Governor of the Bank of Canada said as reported by The Globe and Mail of September 25, 1985:

"The Bank of Canada," ... "is not involved in monitoring the financial soundness of individual banks and supervising their behaviour. Parliament has not given us that responsibility or the powers that would enable us to fulfil that function. The Bank of Canada has no bank auditors, no bank examiners, no power to require details of individual loans, deposits or any other kind of private transaction."

The Governor of the Bank of Canada has condemned himself with his own words. If that is true, and of course it is true, then the Governor of the Bank of Canada had no business vouching for the Canadian Commercial Bank. Not only did he vouch for the Canadian Commercial Bank before it became obvious that its survival was very unlikely but he came before the committee of which I was a member in June after we heard evidence from the bank officials, the Inspector General and the auditors to say that he still had confidence that the officers of the bank could do an adequate job. The mistake this Government made was to take the advice of the Inspector General of Banks and the Governor of the Bank of Canada.

I wish to say something about the auditors as well. I hope that the organization of auditors will take a serious look at what happened at the Canadian Commercial Bank and at the responsibility of the auditors, not just to their customers who pay their auditing accounts, but to the people of Canada. What did these auditors do? They reported to the directors of the bank that the bank had serious problems. They did that, I presume, after a fairly careful examination of the bank's business operation. However, that was in a report given to the directors of the bank, a report which was never made public. What they provided to the bank was a statement which was made public that the bank was a viable operation. I say there is something seriously wrong with a situation in which auditors would carry out that type of action. They helped in misleading the people of Canada. They put the depositors in great trouble.

I would like to conclude my remarks by saying to the Minister, and to the Government, that we accept her criticisms of the former Government. We accept her promises that there will be better regulations in upcoming legislation. If we had not looked at the record of this Government since it took office and how it has failed to look at the realities of the situation, and how it has failed to take the advice of the top officers in Government service, we would have reason to believe that something better would come about in the future. When the Minister promises she will encourage more companies to get into the financial services field and when she promises more competition, I ask: How many regulators? How many monitors will we have? What more competition will mean is more failures and hundreds of millions of dollars more down the drain.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Mr. Jean-Claude Malépart (Montreal-Sainte-Marie): Mr. Speaker, for all Hon. Members to have to sit in the House at 11.30 p.m. is a sign that the situation is very serious, that hardly one year after assuming power, this Government, which had been in the Opposition for sixteen years and which, during the last election campaign, had promised the moon to the Canadian people claiming that it would know what to do once in power, Mr. Speaker, we have reached the point where, because of incompetence—

Mr. Speaker, the impossible situation in which the Government and especially the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) have placed Canadian men and women, the disastrous failure of these two western banks and the absence of satisfactory explanations concerning the decision made by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Wilson), the Minister of State for Finance (Mrs. McDougall) and the Prime Minister to save these two banks—

Mr. Speaker, when the Minister of State for Finance introduced a Bill for the purpose of spending $250 million of the taxpayers' money to try and save this bank, I must say I left the House because I would not vote on it.

Some people told me: Claude, you do not trust the Prime Minister enough. Perhaps they were right, but I do not want to be stuck and to have to vote with him to help these banks, because at the same time he was seeking to de-index the Old Age Security Pension and the family allowances, while taxing sick people. Today, the time has proved me right! I would not vote because I did not want to be an embarrassment for my party. I would rather leave than vote with the current Prime Minister.

At the time, Mr. Speaker, we were going to spend $250 million of the taxpayers' money; today, because of the Government's incompetence, it is $1 billion we will have to spend to try to help the individuals and corporations who have accounts of over $60,000 with these banks.

This afternoon, I was in my riding visiting a number of mothers from the Montreal region, and I can tell you that none of them had a bank account of over $60,000. The challenge, Mr. Speaker ... In front of the media, these mothers were begging the Prime Minister not to de-index the family allowances. These mothers had to submit to the humiliation of coming before the media and explaining how they use their monthly family allowance cheques and tax credit.

But despite that, since they could not make themselves heard by the Conservative members from around my riding, they came before the television cameras and told the Prime Minister: "Do you know how we spend our family allowance cheques every month? We use them to make both ends meet in the middle of the month so that we can buy food. Do you know, Mr. Mulroney, what we do with our family allowance cheques? We use them to buy boots and winter shoes for our children. We use them to buy school supplies."

And this Government, this Prime Minister would have us give a blank cheque to the investors, the depositors in that banking institution for the over $60,000 accounts.

But this Government, this Prime Minister do not even want to give us a list of the names of those people who are going to dig in the pockets of the taxpayers in my riding, in the riding of Valleyfield, and in the riding of Lévis, to give it to those people when we do not even know who they are. Why should the taxpayers pay for the mistake—

Mr. Fontaine: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Order! The Hon. Member for Lévis on a point of order.

Mr. Fontaine: Mr. Speaker, I was referring to Standing Order 39 because we feel that the Hon. Member is totally off topic. This is called "irrelevance and repetition". I just wanted to raise that point, Mr. Speaker.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I have made a note of the Hon. Member's remarks. I realize he will be coming to the financial difficulties of the Northland Bank very shortly.

[Translation]

The Hon. Member for Ottawa-Vanier (Mr. Gauthier), on a point of order.

Mr. Gauthier: Yes, Mr. Speaker, I have a point of order.

If the Hon. Member would go on to read the appropriate citation in Beauchesne's, Fifth Edition, he would see under relevance that a Member may be given the benefit of the doubt, and in this case I think the Hon. Member is addressing himself to the subject before the House.

• (2340)

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I appreciate the Hon. Member for Ottawa-Vanier (Mr. Gauthier) bringing that to my attention.

[Translation]

Mr. Malépart: Mr. Speaker, the comments made by the Hon. Member for Lévis (Mr. Fontaine) reflect the ignorance and incompetence of the Progressive Conservative team. Mr. Speaker, this insignificant gentleman has just made it clear he did not know it was going to cost Canadian taxpayers one billion dollars to make amends for the mistake made by his Prime Minister—his and not mine—to compensate depositors with deposits of over $60,000. He did not know that. The Hon. Member for Lévis is ignorant of that fact and I think that is absolutely shocking!

Mr. Speaker, just think what we could have done with one billion dollars. Just think what the Canadian taxpayers could have done with that money. Here, not a word about the deficit, Mr. Speaker. Well, they will not be able to use Brian's deficit to play on the public's emotions anymore, because we remember the $56 million wasted on changing our military uniforms. We remember the party they had with the President of the United States. The honeymoon is over now and this kind of show certainly must not go on.

If we think of the excess staff in the Ministers' offices, it is easy to see why things are such a mess with all those scandals. There are just too many employees, and nobody knows who is running the show. Mr. Speaker, with all the scandals around us, Ministers resigning . . . actually, they should schedule these events because we are running out of time to discuss them and the newspapers are running out of pages to print the news about the scandals cropping up in this Government. How can Opposition Members, Members who are responsible, and certainly not incompetent, be expected to give the Minister of State for Finance a blank cheque for one billion dollars, without blinking an eye, and it does not matter who is getting the money?

Mr. Speaker, I am a factory worker, I belong to a union and I am still paying into a company pension fund. I would like to know who they are talking about when they refer to small pension funds. I would like to know who is administering my pension fund and whether he was gambling with my money by investing it in a bank that was not very reliable, Mr. Speaker. The pension fund administrator will have to answer for his actions, because these people knew that all amounts exceeding $60,000 were not insured. These people gambled with the money and savings of the average taxpayer. They went to the races and bet on the nose, and now these incompetent administrators whom we do not know, have lost their shirt, and the Progressive Conservative Government wants to sign a cheque for a billion dollars and give the money to God knows who.

Mr. Speaker, I find it intolerable that Members of this House who are supposed to be responsible people should ask the Government to do this, while at the same time, the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Epp), the Minister of social injustice, the first one in the history of Canada and this Government, are proposing a motion of closure in order to cut $55 million—not one billion, but $55 million.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Order, please. From the family allowance program.

Mr. Malépart: Mr. Speaker, $55 million, you are right, from the family allowance program. If they had not goofed . . . If the Government had not made this mistake and had listened to the bank presidents, it would have said: Just a second! Before advancing $250 million, we are going to retain the services of banking experts and we are going to check the situation. If that had been the case, today the Minister would not be obliged to table a motion of closure to keep us from talking about this subject as well, because we have two scandals. One billion dollars for the rich, and they are taking away $55 million from families on modest and low incomes, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker, there was a newspaper article—

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Order, please. I believe I have been very patient. I am sure the Hon. Member realizes and I know that the whip of the Liberal Party and the Acting House Leader understands what relevancy is. I feel the Chair has been very kind and I would like the Hon. Member to get into the difficulties with respect to the banking institution, particularly the Northland Bank. I hope he will take my words into consideration.

Mr. Cassidy: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I was listening to the Hon. Member with attentiveness. He was talking about the spending priorities of the Government—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Order, please. I think the Chair will decide that, and if the Hon. Member for Ottawa Centre (Mr. Cassidy) would like to speak, I will listen to him also.

[Translation]

Mr. Malépart: Indeed, Mr. Speaker, I was just wondering how much it is going to cost taxpayers. The money belongs to the taxpayers, Mr. Speaker, not to the Conservative Party, and it will be spent on two financial institutions, the Northland Bank and the other one in Western Canada. This money will come from the pockets of the taxpayers in my riding and in your riding and they have absolutely nothing to do with that banking institution, yet the Government would rather we did not talk about that and focus the debate only on the mismanagement of those financial institutions.

Will the presidents of the Northland Bank and of the other western financial institution which has failed, explain to the people why they are in this mess? The Toronto-Dominion Bank president made a suggestion which ought to be kept in mind, I think. He said that the names of any individual or corporation, or anyone else for that matter, that will accept the grant—it is a grant, money from the taxpayers—to bail out those depositors who stand to lose more than $60,000, ought to be made public. Anyone who would rather not have his or her name made public has one simple way out—turn down the Government grant.

Mr. Speaker, we are talking about $1 billion provided by all taxpayers throughout Canada for the select few whose deposits exceed $60,000.

Although there are probably very few people watching the debate tonight, I think it is important to let Canadians know what is going on. It is amazing what we could have done with this $1 billion if we did not let the Government throw it down the drain. It will be a total loss resulting from mismanagement on the part of this Conservative Government, notwithstanding the claim of my colleague for LaSalle (Mr. Lanthier) who has been trying to make us believe that the whole mess can be traced back to the energy policy.

Mr. Speaker, the mistake was made when the Government did not come clean and failed to tell everything it knew; things simply got worse when this inept and incompetent Government decided to go ahead without even knowing whether those two banking institutions would be able to pull through. Without knowing the actual figures the Government put up $250 million and forced the other banks to be party to this so-called rescue operation.

We Quebecers know all about such shenanigans, Mr. Speaker. We had our caisses d'entraide, but at least the Quebec Government was a responsible administration—it was the PQ Government for which I hold no brief. Then Quebec Finance Minister Parizeau was involved in a similar situation. Having called in the management of the banking institution, the Minister of Finance acted openly instead of attempting to sweep everything under the carpet to save the face of the premier. He did not want to have anything to do with the likes of our camera-conscious prima donna, no Sir, he brought in responsible people and laid all the cards on the table because his only aim was to make it as easy as possible for the depositors. They did not simply appropriate the taxpayer's money without having a clear financial picture of the situation. That is what I call responsible people.

Mr. Speaker, I am not afraid to say that it was a party I fought against, the Parti québécois. However, I tip my hat to them because they have shown what they could do. Now, without knowing what is going on, the Federal Government decides to come in and organize a bail-out by using the taxpayers' money. Mr. Speaker, we have to say who will pay for all this. I said that it would be families with children. It is my duty to say so. I understand . . . there is not a single Conservative Member left in the House, Mr. Speaker! They have all gone. They are all absent.

Mr. Speaker, I understand that these people would not want to hear about it. If I were in their place, I would be ashamed because it is a scandal. It is our duty to denounce it. If we look at all that has happened, when it comes to the point when a Government accepts, to save its so-called friends and help a certain company, to put on the market tainted fish, we have to be twice as careful because we can expect nearly anything from this Government. How many times . . . I woke one up, Mr. Speaker.

● (2350)

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The Hon. Member for Lévis (Mr. Fontaine) on a point of order.

Mr. Fontaine: Mr. Speaker, I see here in Section 2 of Standing Order 39 that the Speaker, if a Member —persists in irrelevance, or repetition, may direct the Member to discontinue his or her speech.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Thank you for bringing that to my attention. I appreciate that. The Hon. Member still has two minutes to go.

Mr. Nunziata: Mr. Speaker, we are debating an issue which has been deemed by you, Sir, to be an emergency issue and we in Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition agree. I am somewhat shocked by the fact that—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Order, please. I do not find that to be a point of order, I find it to be a point of debate.

[Translation]

Mr. Malépart: Mr. Speaker, there are two Conservative Members in the House, including the most incompetent of the lot.

Mr. Speaker, . . .

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I would like to bring to the attention of Members the fact that it is getting quite late in the evening. There are some Members outside the curtain, and whether they are in the House or not, I do not want to see a Member saying there are Members in or outside the House. It is not up to the Member to do that, please.

[Translation]

Mr. Malépart: Mr. Speaker, this is the second time but I shall continue my speech. I shall not rise on a point of order, but it is the second time that the Hon. Member for Lévis (Mr. Fontaine) has risen on a point of order. As usual, he is beside the point. As responsible people, I believe that we should . . . When you do not know what you are talking about, you remain seated and stay quiet instead of talking nonsense.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to come back to the issue under discussion. Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member will rise for a third time. Our Lord said: "You will disown me three times before you understand." There he is again!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The Hon. Member for Lévis (Mr. Fontaine) on a point of order.

Mr. Fontaine: Mr. Speaker, Standing Order 40 deals with "disrespectful or offensive language". In my opinion, the Hon. Member should use a somewhat more reasonable vocabulary in this House and show his own awareness of the facts instead of repeating himself for 20 minutes.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): That is a point of debate.

[Translation]

Mr. Malépart: Mr. Speaker, I am quite willing to pay compliments to those who deserve them, but I have to speak the truth about the calibre of the Hon. Member.

To come back to the subject under discussion, Mr. Speaker, I believe that it is very important, even though the Hon. Member for Lévis does not want me to repeat myself: I understand his point and his desire to prevent us from speaking about the serious situation of the Northland Bank because, if I were in his place, I would be ashamed.

However, Mr. Speaker, he will have to live with it. I shall conclude with that comment.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I regret that the Hon. Member's time has expired.

Mr. John R. Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, there are as many Members on the Government side for this important debate this evening as there are inspectors in the Department of the Inspector General of Banks. Actually, there is one more.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: There are more people on the Government side than there are people watching you on television.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Order, please. The Hon. Member is a very senior Member and he knows that one is not to comment on the presence or absence of Members in the House. He knows what is happening behind the curtain this evening. There are other functions. I am sure that Members are listening to the Hon. Member for Nickel Belt.

Mr. Rodriguez: I must confess, Mr. Speaker, I am not aware of what is happening behind the curtains but I suspect we can nose it out, as Shakespeare said.

I wanted to participate in this debate and not be long because I want my comments to be very precise and exact.

Mr. Nunziata: As they always are.

Mr. Rodriguez: As they always are, correct.

One of the sacred cows in our society is, of course, the banking system. In fact, we were told that banks never go bankrupt because we Canadians have done it better than the Americans have done it. We have a Bank Act and we have not had a bank go belly-up for 62 years, until the Canadian Commercial Bank, of course, and the spin-off effect on the Northland Bank. Everyone has come to think of banks as pillars of strength in the economy. Somehow or other these banks are the pillars of Canadian society. They are symbols of stability and continuity. Indeed, last spring I suggested that the Minister of State for Finance was launching a new bank when she came in here and said they were going to rescue this bank and restore the confidence of Canadians in the banking system. We will not let them down! She called on Members of Parliament to support her in this bail-out effort, this rescue attempt. But we on this side of the House recognized what was happening; that the Minister of State for Finance and the Minister of Finance were like the Captain on the deck of the Titanic rearranging the deck chairs as the ship was going down.

As we have witnessed over the last few weeks, this thing has become more an more curious. It has unfolded in strange and bewildering ways. Let us look at how this thing has happened. You have to imagine this. We have a Bank Act and an Inspector General of Banks. You do not get a title like a general unless you can give some orders. So they have nice titles such as the Inspector General of Banks. I will bet you always thought this chap investigated banks. I bet you think and the public always thought that the Inspector General had an army of inspectors; that they would march up to the great columns, to the very stability of the capitalists in this country, to the very halls, to their Valhallas and knock on their doors and say: We have come to inspect your bank!

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Rodriguez: I thought that. In my naivité I thought that was the way it worked.

Mr. Riis: A lot of people did.

Mr. Rodriguez: But I found out since this episode that that ain't the way it is. It ain't the way it is!

Mr. Riis: How is it?

Mr. Rodriguez: Well, you see, the banks inspect themselves.

Mr. Nunziata: No.

Mr. Rodriguez: Yes! That is like putting Count Dracula in charge of the Red Cross Blood Bank.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Rodriguez: Mr. Speaker, someone said that was like asking Evel Knievel to park your car!

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Rodriguez: This thing is laughable, it really is. But when these chaps come and knock on the doors and say they have come to inspect, it is actually Royal Bank employees coming to inspect the Royal Bank's books. They will check everything and report back to head office that the branch is fine. Head office then sends this report to the Inspector General of Banks. One would think that he would send out his inspectors, but he only has seven inspectors. I always thought that the Inspector General was paid with taxpayers' money. I thought that we allotted a sum of money to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Wilson) to pay the Inspector General and his army of seven inspectors and 42 stenographers and filing clerks.

● (0000)

Mr. Riis: Who pays them?

Mr. Rodriguez: That is a good question. I found out that they are paid for by the commercial banks. They put money in a pot.

Mr. Riis: The bank inspector is paid by the banks?

Mr. Rodriguez: Yes, that's it. You got it. Mr. Speaker, he's got it. In that way you can be assured that you are getting a real tough inspection. The poor chap does not know what the devil is happening in the branches. He is sequestered in the basement of the Bank of Canada building with a few pictures on the wall. He sits there stamping documents thinking he is working hard.

I thought that the Bank of Canada had a role to play in this. What role does the Governor of the Bank of Canada have? We all thought this guy spoke with some knowledge of what was going on in the bank, but he said:

> The Bank of Canada is not involved in monitoring the financial soundness of individual banks and supervising their behaviour. Parliament has not given us that responsibility or the powers that would enable us to fulfil that function. The Bank of Canada has no bank auditors, no bank examiners, no power to require details of individual loans, deposits or any other kind of private transaction.

Mr. Riis: How does he know what's going on?

Mr. Rodriguez: That is the thing, he doesn't know. The Minister of Finance and his sidekick, "Billion Dollar Barbara", are sitting over there and they have a problem. They wonder from whom they should seek advice. They ask advice of the Governor of the Bank who doesn't know a bloody thing about the loan. They also ask the Inspector General of Banks, the minion of the dominion banks. Can you imagine that, Mr. Speaker? That reminds me of the story of the fellow who brought an elephant to two blind fellows and asked if they could feel the animal and tell what it was. One of them felt it and said that he thought it was a camel because it had a hump. The other one said he thought it was a coyote, but they were both wrong. That is the same problem we have here.

Mr. Riis: Who is in charge?

Mr. Rodriguez: Well, that is a good question. No one is in charge.

Mr. Nunziata: Who's supposed to be in charge?

Mr. Rodriguez: The Government has the responsibility.

There are no regulations enforcing how the banks operate. I want to put on record a case history of how they do operate.

I received a letter from the firm of Pharand Kuyek, Barristers. That firm appeared for a poor fellow by the name of Robert Newcombe in a bankruptcy trial involving the National Bank of Canada. I will read the relevant parts. This is a public document so I am not revealing anything that is secret. The letter reads in part:

I acted for Mr. Robert Newcombe who was involved in an action with Mr. Tom Leroy and Leroy Trucking Limited. Mr. Newcombe had gone to the bank, purchased trailers and financed those through the bank and entered into an oral agreement with Mr. Leroy to the effect that Mr. Leroy would make all bank payments, maintain the trailers and that those sums paid and the maintenance of the trailers would be equivalent of lease payments to Mr. Newcombe who was leasing the trailers to Mr. Leroy.

Of course, Leroy went belly-up and they came against Mr. Newcombe. The evidence disclosed that the bank loaned the sum of $60,000 to Tom Leroy and a second amount of $60,000 to Leroy Trucking Limited. They could not lend any further moneys to Mr. Leroy or his company because the supervisors in Toronto would learn that the second loan to the trucking company in the amount of $60,000 was contrary to the rules and regulations of the bank. That is why they set Mr. Newcombe up as the strawman in that loan. It was interesting when they go to the bankruptcy hearing and put one of the bank agents on the witness stand. The court transcript reads in part as follows:

Q. I see. So, what you're really saying is that you were working for the Bank and you were preparing false reports, is that what you're telling us?

A. Not on my own accord.

Q. But you were doing it?

A. Well, under supervision, yes.

Q. You were all doing it?

A. Yes.

Q. So the employees at the Bank were actually creating false reports, credit reports, so that people could borrow money?

And the answer, Mr. Speaker, was "yes". That is just one small example of how the regulations governing the Bank were never enforced. In the same way, the Canadian Commercial Bank made loans that were not secured and the regulations that should govern those transactions were never enforced.

It is not only this Government that is responsible for not putting the proper mechanisms in place to enable the banks to live up to the regulations Parliament set out in the Bank Act. The responsibility has to be shared by the previous governments which, from 1968 to 1984, with the exception of the nine-month Clark fiasco, were all Liberal. The previous Government must take responsibility for the fact that it never lived up to its responsibility to ensure that the proper procedures were put in place. With these two fiascos on the horizon the present Government is running for cover. It will not produce this document and that document and the big cover-up is on. It did not even want this debate to take place tonight. It wants the matter to go before a committee, but there is no point in having a parliamentary committee if the conclusions of the committee are already ordained. If the committee cannot have all the necessary documents, it obviously cannot come to any conclusions that would give confidence to the Canadian people again.

When the Minister brought forward the Bill to save the bank in the spring I remember telling her that she was launching a bank. We were told that everything would be fine now and that they would never have to come back to Parliament again. Considering she was depending on Bouey XIV and the other fellow, the Inspector General of Banks for advice—two peas in a pod who knew as much about the banking system as the Minister of State for Finance (Mrs. McDougall)—they blindly led the blind and all four fell into the pit. Now they are asking the taxpayers of Canada to bail them out.

This deposit insurance covers people with deposits up to $60,000. It is great for those folks, the ordinary Canadians. But the Government wants to go beyond that. It is talking about picking up people with deposits of over $60,000. If people have more than $60,000 to invest, they ought to have more brains than to put their money in that institution.

Furthermore, I can say it bluntly, one has to question that if it was not a matter of good old-fashioned greed trying to grab for greater interest rates on their deposits, then they went for what might only be called rather questionable investments that promised higher rates than they could get at the other domestic banks. One has to wonder about that.

Mrs. McDougall: This is also a domestic bank. It shows how little you know.

Mr. Rodriguez: You knew a lot. That is how much I know. I am not the Minister of State for Finance.

Mrs. McDougall: At least I know it is a bank.

Mr. Rodriguez: You are the Minister. You made the boo-boos. Who is bailing out the bank? I am not. I could not bail out my friend the Hon. Member for Windsor-Walkerville (Mr. McCurdy). She is the Minister of State for Finance. She says to me "That is how much you know about banks". She knows a lot about banks.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Rodriguez: I just wish she knew more about banks, Mr. Speaker. Then we could save the taxpayers $1 billion.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Rodriguez: There is "Billion Dollar Barbara". She earned that name. She did not inherit it.

I heard this Government talk about fighting the deficit. I cannot disagree. We did not start with this $1 billion. Now we have another $1 billion. I do not know what we will deindex next. I think we have to have a few more Cabinet Ministers—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Could I, in the interests perhaps of the rule of relevancy, ask the Hon. Member every 30 seconds or minute or two simply to say Northland Bank?

Mr. Rodriguez: Mr. Speaker, as I was saying, the Northland Bank is connected to the Canadian Commercial Bank which is connected to the other domestic banks which are connected to the Government.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Rodriguez: I do not want to introduce a tone of levity into the proceedings this evening. I do not mind that the banks put their money up to save the Commercial Bank which ultimately, hopefully, would save the Northland Bank.

Incidentally, I see that there is a Northland Bank over on the plaza. I did not see any lineups there today.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Rodriguez: I did happen to see one person standing at the Northland Bank at, believe it or not, the withdrawal booth. It was the Minister of State for Finance.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Rodriguez: I understand the bank chairman of—they do not call it Imperial Bank for nothing—the Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce said that he will consider legal action if Ottawa does not repay the bank's contribution to the bail-out of the Canadian Commercial Bank. I think that guy deserves to get his $22 million back if everyone else can get back their $60,000. We do not want the Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce to be out of pocket $22 million. One of the bank presidents was laughing. Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I see the time is drawing to a close. I wish I could go on.

Some Hon. Members: You can have unanimous consent.

Mr. Rodriguez: I have the unanimous consent of my colleagues on this side of the House, Mr. Speaker.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Rodriguez: It is early in the morning. Frankly it has been a delight to expose the intricacies and the machinations of the banking system in this country. I would be prepared to carry on and do an examination of the way they operate.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Lapierre (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, I am both very happy and very disappointed to take part in this special debate which has no precedent in the history of this Parliament. In fact, the last time Parliament was faced with a similar situation was in 1923. Mr. Speaker, it is late for everyone, especially for my neighbors, but to have to sit so late to discuss such a fundamental issue, an issue which goes to the heart of the credibility of the Government, the credibility of financial institutions, certainly the credibility of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Wilson) and his Minister of State for Finance (Mrs. McDougall), as well as the credibility of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney), and naturally, I was going to forget it, the credibility, such as it is, of the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Lanthier).

On March 25, 1985, you heard the Minister of State for Finance announce officially that this Government was committed to bail out a Canadian financial institution faced with bankruptcy, by way of a $200 million plus package. The Minister assured the House that the bank would be safe and viable. But to our surprise and yours certainly, a few months later we saw that this Government's great promises and the word of the Prime Minister and his Ministers were not worth more than the bank's own assets. We found out that this Government had miserably failed on the whole issue. And this became more serious still when we learned that not only did the Government make a disastrous blunder but that the taxpayers would be called upon to foot the bill. In that sense, Mr. Speaker, at a time when money is so hard to earn, so hard to get by for Governments, so scarce, seeing that a Government which claims to save on expenses, which claims to be sparing of its money, can afford to spend $1 billion simply to save, first, the Prime Minister's ego, second, the Minister of Finance's ego, and third, the Minister of State for Finance's ego, to name but a few. This is because I am also making fun of the Hon. Member's ego. Mr. Speaker, after rigging that huge historic fiasco, because they like the term "historic", I say this is a historic fiasco. And then, to save their skins, these great champions of national unity claimed they had goofed all the way simply to save an institution that was highly popular in western Canada.

Mr. Speaker, I took it upon myself to call friends of mine living in western Canada and enquired as to how much that institution was basic and important in the minds of our westerners.

Let me tell you about their experience, their experience as ordinary westerners. You know, Mr. Speaker, that if you were applying for a loan of less than $1 million and were told to get lost . . . Those who would compare that kind of bank with the caisses populaires are way off, because that institution was strictly reserved for very, very, very large borrowers and the ordinary John Doe had no access to their golden room. So, trying to have us believe here in this House that such an institution was close to the hearts of westerners is sheer fabrication. That institution only served the interests of the richest people, especially friends of the Government.

[English]

Mr. McDermid: Now I know why you have trouble in the west.

[Translation]

Mr. Lapierre: The nitwit on the other side, Mr. Speaker, does not understand anything and will never understand anything.

[English]

Mr. McDermid: I know how many seats we have in the west and why you don't have any.

An Hon. Member: Why don't you go back to bed?

Mr. Lapierre: Why don't you go back to bed? That is a good suggestion for you. You have lost your head already.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McDermid: I know who wins in the west. It is obvious why you don't.

[Translation]

Mr. Lapierre: Mr. Speaker, you know the Hon. Member always speaks from his seat but seldom rises. I would like him to speak more often from the floor, because it would be a tribute to everything that can—

But I would rather not comment, Mr. Speaker, lest I use unparliamentary terms, and rouse your displeasure.

What I can tell you is that they are just dragging a red herring when they claim now that Central Canada was against Western Canada, suggesting that because we were concerned about $1 billion of the taxpayers' money, we were against Western Canada. This, Mr. Speaker, is a novel argument. Because in March when the Minister of State for Finance (Mrs. McDougall) rose to explain the situation in which those famous banks were caught, she never referred to western problems; she merely referred to the problems those banks were facing with respect to their loans in the United States. This is the funny thing about their elastic conscience. They have now decided it is no longer a matter of American loans defaulting but, for obvious political reasons, this has become western loans, in an attempt at covering up a major scandal. Coming from people who say they speak for national unity, they should be ashamed of trying to divide the country simply to cover up their own mismanagement.

Never have we seen such a flop in the history of Canadian banks, never have we seen such incompetent Ministers buying what we call in the Magdalen Islands a pig in a poke. The Minister of State for Finance decided that she would do the utmost to rescue that bank without even looking at its assets. Have you ever seen such a thing, Mr. Speaker? I am sure that as an experienced business man you would never have purchased a business without at least looking at its financial statements and assets. There is no so-called businessman on the other side of the House who would have been naive enough to buy a company without looking at its assets. However, this is what the Government did with regard to those two banks and it is absolutely aberrant.

I refer to the testimonies made during the past few weeks, of which that some chartered banks offered to send inspectors.

But no, it was too urgent! But, why the rush to attempt a rescue when everything was coming out in the open? It was urgent because it happened the same weekend that the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) was performing on his televised show. It did not coincide with the Prime Minister's public relations plan for that weekend.

[English]

Mr. McDermid: A point of order.

Mr. Speaker: A point of order, the Hon. Member for Brampton-Georgetown.

Mr. McDermid: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I hate to interrupt my hon. friend, because I always enjoy his discourses here in the House—

An Hon. Member: That does not show from your comments.

Mr. McDermid: I have been listening now for exactly 11 minutes. I understand that this debate is on the Northland Bank and its trials and tribulations and what it is going through at the present time. For the last 11 minutes I have listened to this speech and I have heard no reference to the Northland Bank or the problems it is experiencing. The Hon. Member is discussing another bank and another issue entirely. I feel we should get back to the subject matter of this debate or else adjourn the House.

Mr. de Corneille: A point of order.

Mr. Speaker: A point of order, the Hon. Member for Eglinton-Lawrence.

Mr. de Corneille: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Is the Hon. Member in his seat.

An Hon. Member: No.

Mr. Speaker: Then, the Hon. Member cannot raise a point of order.

The Hon. Member for Shefford.

[Translation]

Mr. Lapierre: Mr. Speaker, the futility of the point of order raised by my colleague shows to what extent he does not see the relation between the status of the Canadian Commercial Bank and that of the Northlands Bank.

Is the Hon. Member now suggesting that the two are entirely different?

Mr. Speaker, we all know that since March the survival of those two banks has been closely related. And I think that the Hon. Member, rather than trying to raise futile points of order, should listen and learn something from what the members of the Opposition are telling him. If he were to make a self-examination, he would perhaps feel guilty.

Mr. Speaker, not only—

[English]

Mr. McDermid: I haven't heard a thing about the Northland Bank yet. What is your solution to the problem. Come on!

[Translation]

Mr. Lapierre: Mr. Speaker, my colleague a while ago offered his apologies for interrupting me but he is still doing it.

I should like—

Mr. Speaker: With due respect, the speaker who now has the floor does the same thing during other debates. The Hon. Member for Shefford (Mr. Lapierre) did the same thing an hour or so ago.

Mr. Lapierre: Mr. Speaker, I could not have interrupted my colleague because he did not speak. I agree with your comment. It is sweet of you to try and generalize the rule, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker, to come back to that very important issue, that dark spot in the history of Canada which is the Northland Bank affair, whether my poor friend likes it or not, I am thinking of the Hon. Member for Portneuf (Mr. Ferland) who does not understand anything about banks or any other political issues, because as the president of his association told us on television, the Hon. Member for Portneuf is ignorant but I urge him to continue with his English lessons.

In my opinion, Mr. Speaker, the incompetence of the Government and the Prime Minister is obvious to any objective observer. The Government Member will surely tell us that there is nothing there, that the Prime Minister is a great one, as the Hon. Member for LaSalle (Mr. Lanthier) was saying a while ago. I understand the eagerness of the Hon. Member for LaSalle to praise the Prime Minister. He is so anxious to get a ministerial appointment that his nose is turning brown.

But, beside that . . . The reason I want to take part in this debate in the wee hours of the morning, Mr. Speaker, is to tell you just how concerned I am to see how easy it is to find $1 billion overnight and to spend it to bail out big depositors. In fact, it is not your ordinary Joe Blow in Calgary who is a depositor of $60,000 and over. It is not your ordinary Joe Blow in Edmonton either.

I find it strange that the Government would want to rescue these depositors, while refusing to provide us with their names, Mr. Speaker. They insist that we should not debate this issue in the House, claiming that a committee would be a more proper forum. Mr. Speaker, why is it that the Minister of State for Finance is not in the House? Why is it that the Minister of Finance is not in the House either?

An Hon. Member: He is nowhere to be found.

Mr. Lapierre: I think it is against the rule to mention the absence of Hon. Members, and I can see in your eyes that you were about to remind me of that. However, I can tell you, Mr. Speaker, without mentioning any names, that there are only four or five Government Members present in the House, which worries me no end because this is a major debate, $1 billion being at stake. Although this is an item of over $1 billion, the Progressive Conservative Members behave like so many Pontius Pilates, they wash their hands off the whole mess, preferring to follow blindly the Cabinet Members who have disappointed them so much over the past couple of weeks. My only hope, Mr. Speaker, is that tonight's debate will at least give them a little guilty conscience, because if all Parliamentarians did wash their hands of such an important matter, how could we convince the Canadian people that we are not operating under a double standard in the House?

When large sums of money are involved, the Government reacts immediately; however, when ordinary citizens are faced with difficulties which are enormous in their eyes, it is always very slow to react, claiming that we are stuck with the deficit.

That is double standards, and I hope that my Progressive Conservative friends, who visit their ridings to praise the Government and complain about the deficit, will remember that the night the House dealt with this $1 billion of our taxpayers' money, they were safely tucked away in bed.

• (0030)

[English]

Mr. Mike Cassidy (Ottawa Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to begin my remarks with a reference to Jesus Christ. Jesus Christ threw the money-changers out of the temple; the Conservatives bail them out. That is what we are talking about in the debate tonight. We are talking about a $1 billion bail-out of two banks—the Northland Bank and the Canadian Commercial Bank. I regret the fact that the Hon. Member of State for Finance (Mrs. McDougall) hardly talked about that during the course of her remarks. In fact, during the last 4.5 hours, Progressive Conservative Members talked about the national energy policy and how they think the NDP has been delaying matters. However, they did not come up with cogent reasons why the Government got us into the present mess with regard to the Northland Bank and CCB.

Mr. McDermid: To whom are you referring?

Mr. Cassidy: I am referring to the Party of the Hon. Member for Brampton-Georgetown (Mr. McDermid). His Party is the Party which is bailing out the money-changers.

Mr. McDermid: Who made a derogatory remark about you? Name them.

Mr. Cassidy: I am referring to all members of the Conservative Party. The Conservative Party is bailing out the money-changers at very great expense to the people of Canada. That is what is happening right now.

In this emergency debate we are talking about the competence of a Government which was elected just over a year ago today. Many Canadians may still be watching the debate tonight. It is surprising the number of people who watch us on television. Ever since we returned on September 9 they have been wondering what on earth is going on in Ottawa. First they hear about "Billion Dollar Barbara" and her blank cheque to the banks. They wonder how on earth we can get out of such a mess. They know about the CCB perhaps vaguely, because of a bail-out which took place six months ago. They know that over Labour Day weekend the Government said there was another bank in which there were $470 million of uninsured deposits and that it would pay those off as well, to bring the total up to $1 billion. Then the Minister of State for Finance assured the House that we were not losing any money at all because they knew back in March that they would have to pay that much, or words to that effect. She turned around and said: "Of course I was acting on the best judgment I could act on". Also she repeatedly told the House that they were acting because the bankers told them that it was okay to act.

I took the opportunity to participate in the hearings before the Finance Committee. I listened to some of the bankers over the course of the last week and a half. They were quite consistent in saying that they felt that the CCB was a can of worms. If they had been asked back in the spring, I suspect they would have said the same thing about the Northland Bank. However, they were being asked then for a judgment on the Canadian Commercial Bank.

Let us face it, the CCB and the Northland Bank are inextricably intertwined and the money which we will have to pay for the two of them is inextricably intertwined as well. The bankers said that they only went in because they were told that the CCB was viable by the Inspector General of Banks and by the Government of the Bank of Canada. They went in, not because they were able to make an independent judgment, but because they were told to go in by the Government or perhaps by a Prime Minister determined to do something for western Canada.

The questions of competence which have arisen boggle the mind. Suppose, Mr. Speaker, that you had not been elected to the House of Commons. In fact, you were in business in Toronto before coming to Parliament. Suppose your business considered the take-over of a substantial operation, some business that was up for sale. Would you have put a downpayment on that particular concern and made an irrevocable commitment without looking at the books of that particular company? Would you have looked at its receivables, its credit rating, its accounting system, its management or at its track record over the course of the previous few years? The answer is that if you were a competent businessman, of course you would have done all those things. However, in the case of CCB, none of those things were done.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I do not like interrupting Hon. Members on the question of relevancy. At one point I was asked to rule whether the Canadian Commercial Bank was the subject of discussion, and I said that it was not. Therefore, I invite the Hon. Member to restrict his comments to the matter before the House under an emergency debate, the Northland Bank.

Mr. Cassidy: I would point out, Mr. Speaker, that during the course of the speech of the Hon. Minister of State for Finance, as I recall it, the Northland Bank was not mentioned once, and she was not called to order. Just because I happen to be the final speaker in this debate—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Cassidy: I suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, that it is extremely relevant because the two banks are closely intertwined I am talking about the Northland Bank—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The Hon. Member is coming awfully close to challenging a comment of the Chair. Therefore, I simply make the point to the Hon. Member which I have made to other Hon. Members tonight. The Hon. Member may not have been here to hear it, because all Hon. Members have not remained throughout the entire debate; I accept that fact. Whenever I have felt that someone was departing from the relevancy rule, I have tried to return the Member to the relevancy of the debate. I have some difficulty with the Hon. Member's suggestion that I am acting differently as between Members. I choose deliberately never to do that.

Mr. Cassidy: I accept your judgment, Mr. Speaker. Of course several officers were in the chair, and possibly there may have been some discrepancy there as well.

I have spoken to Canadians who wonder what has happened to $1 billion of their money, particularly at a time of deficits. They know that the Government is in serious financial difficulty and that that difficulty has been greatly worsened by actions over the last few weeks.

Over the course of the spring a run took place in which a great amount of liquidity was withdrawn from the Northland Bank as well as from the CCB. The money was taken from Northland Bank as a consequence of questions about the viability of two western banks, both of which shared a number of things in common. It is difficult to comment fully about the Northland Bank because that we do not have as much information as was made public about the CCB.

In commenting upon the Northland Bank and in calling for this emergency debate, we were moved to do so because of unprecedented actions last week. After being taken into trusteeship, and after the Government said that it would seek new management or some form of maintenance of the Northland Bank, the President of the Northland Bank—and that was approximately 18 days after it had been put into curatorship—said that contrary to the assurances of the Government on September 3, the Government appeared to be doing everything possible to put it under.

I should like to raise the following question of competence. If the Government was wrong about the one bank, then in fact it may well be wrong about the other. If the Government was wrong in failing to look at the assets of one bank, it seems to me that it may well have failed in looking at the assets of the other. If the Government was wrong because it failed to send in anyone to look at what was happening in the one bank where we had the details, it seems to me that it was wrong in failing to find out what the devil was happening with the Northland Bank. If the Government was wrong in saying that the one bank was viable, as was said by the Minister of State for Finance, the Inspector General of Banks and the Governor of the Bank of Canada, one has to believe that it was wrong as well in stating that the Northland Bank was viable. If the Government was wrong in permitting or telling Mr. Bouey of the Bank of Canada to pour billions of dollars into the Canadian Commercial Bank, one has to say that it was likely wrong in putting large amounts of liquidity into the Northland Bank as well.

Now I admit that we are talking about far more questions than we are answers. We have heard repeatedly, as these two subjects, which are intertwined, have come up in the House over the course of the last couple of weeks, the Government say let us get it off to a committee and the committee can decide. I am sure there are some people watching this debate who have heard members of the Government say that and then suggest that it is our Party which has prevented this matter from going to committee.

I would point out to you, Mr. Speaker, that the Government has the carriage of the business of this House in their hands. They could very easily have brought forward their motion and simply pushed it through. They have the numbers to enable them to pass the motion if they had chosen to send the matter out to committee regardless of the fact that there was disagreement over the terms of reference to the particular committee.

I would point out as well, Mr. Speaker, that we in the New Democratic Party wanted to avoid having a committee that would simply serve as a whitewash for the waste of $1 billion of taxpayers' money on the Northland Bank and on the Canadian Commercial Bank. We felt that at the very least the people of Canada were entitled to some basic information and that we had to have some assurance that the committee could do an effective job.

We asked for the report that was prepared on the one bank that was investigated. We were not assured we could get it. We sought auditors' reports. We were told that they would be barred. We sought material from California. We were told that the Americans would not give it up. We sought the list of depositors who were going to be bailed out regardless of the fact that the depositors in the Northland Bank and the CCB were uninsured and had absolutely no legal claim on the Government of Canada or the Bank of Canada, and finally the Minister of State for Finance told us unequivocally in response to a question of mine the other day, "No, you will not have that information".

It was not just the Hon. Member for Ottawa Centre speaking when I put that particular question; it was not just me as a spokesperson for my Party. I was speaking on behalf of taxpayers across Canada from Vancouver Island to St. John's who were saying, if we are going to spend $1 billion we want to know who is going to get that particular money. What I was hearing from the Minister of State for Finance was that not only was she refusing to make that list of depositors available so that we could judge about the bank itself, so that people would know where the money was going, but I think the Government was going a step further.

I think that the Government is saying that when the Public Accounts come out in a year or two years time the whitewash job will have been applied to the statements about spending of the Government of Canada to the point where it will be impossible to know to whom payments have been made in the light of the failure of the Northland Bank and the Canadian Commercial Bank. The Government is so intent on protecting the interests of the financial community, the large investors and depositors who will stand to get the largest amount from this particular bail-out, they are prepared to distort the Public Accounts of Canada in order to keep that material away from the people of Canada, even though it is a year or two years hence.

Mr. McDermid: I thought you defended individual's rights.

Mr. Cassidy: That is why when a company does business with Canada and when it enters into a contract with more than $5,000 or $10,000—I am not sure what the figure is—the sums paid to that company are identified and the company is identified by name.

All we have said is that if a company does not choose to take the money for the bail-out then it can keep its confidentiality. But if it wants to receive a cheque that I am paying for, and the Hon. Member for Brampton-Georgetown (Mr. McDermid) is paying for, as well as all of our constituents, surely we should know. But no, the coverup is a coverup of incompetence of the Government in handling this banking situation. We may never know for sure exactly why it got that bad.

It is fair to say that the problem began with the former Liberal Government. They failed to put into place an adequate system of bank regulations. Six months after the new Government took office they cannot claim that this was something that was simply inherited. They cannot claim irrelevantly, as one of the Ministers claimed in this debate, that it was the national energy policy that "made us do it".

I remember the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) making cracks about patronage and suggesting "It was the devil that made John Turner do it," and it was very funny during the course of the election campaign, Mr. Speaker. But a year after they took power, almost on the anniversary of September 4, 1984, Mr. Speaker, the new Government cannot claim that they were simply landed with a mess from the previous Government and that they can abdicate responsibility.

I commend the Minister of State for Finance for the coolness with which she has faced the situation, but I cannot commend her for the competence she has shown in this particular affair. She worked in the financial industry. She was a consultant and a former vice-president of an investment firm. She was in a position, as was the Minister of Finance who was in fact a president, I believe, of a financial firm on Bay Street, to know that no one loans money without first checking out the recipient. No one loans billions of dollars without looking at credit ratings, or buys a pig in a poke without checking to see if the things that they have been told are true. We cannot allow ourselves to be stonewalled, Mr. Speaker, as has happened with the banks in question by managements which have proven themselves to be questionable, whose credibility is at stake and whose stewardship in terms of their responsibility to the public was seriously in question.

This debate is coming to a close. The matters we have raised are going to continue to be matters of debate. I want to say to all Hon. Members of this House that we in the New Democratic Party are going to continue with every device at our disposal to find out who is getting that money from the taxpayers and why $1 billion of taxpayers' money is being wasted on these bank bail-outs when that money need not have been spent.

Mr. George Baker (Gander-Twillingate): Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Perhaps I could conclude what most people have observed here this evening and all through the day and over the last month.

An Hon. Member: That is a Tory plot.

Mr. Baker: That is a Tory plot—a serious problem of contradictions, of absolute and incredible contradictions. If someone watched this debate or read the debates afterwards, they would see incredible contradictions, particularly if they knew what happened in the Standing Committees and in the House of Commons the last several weeks.

Members stand up here tonight in this debate and claim that the bankruptcies of the banks in western Canada were due to the Liberal policies of years ago. Then we had, as anybody knowledgeable on this subject would know, the Minister of State for Finance (Mrs. McDougall) stand in this chamber and say that the problems of these banks were created in recent months. In fact she even said to the Liberal Opposition "I have never said that the problens of the western banks were ever created by the national energy policy". Those are the exact words of the Minister of State for Finance. She went further and said in this chamber on March 29:

—how recently this had bubbled up from underneath.

Quoting figures from the United States she said:

—2,175 drilling rigs are operating in U.S., down 612 from December . . . 299 from last February.

The problem really came out of nowhere. . . . how recently this had bubbled up from underneath.

Then we had the incredible statement by the Minister of State for Finance when she even said, as has been mentioned in this debate:

There are no other financial institutions in the country at the moment that are appearing to be insolvent in any way.

Then she went on to say "the bank is a solvent bank", referring to the CCB. She said "that the bank is not failing," and "could we please make that very clear. I find the vocabulary somewhat hysterical", and "this is not a failing bank". The Minister of State for Finance made those statements yet Conservative Members stand up in this chamber and claim that the responsibility lies with the previous Government because of the national energy policy. We have the Minister of State for Finance contradicting that clearly. Even their own Minister contradicted what those Members have been saying. Even a Cabinet Minister from western Canada made a statement totally contradictory to what the Minister of State for Finance said.

The other main point that was missed must be put on the record. Here is a good question. Who was it who said, "We looked at a number of possibilities and we came up with what we felt was the most attractive solution for everyone. If a bank gets into trouble and gets merged into one of the "Big-Five" banks, we could end up with no regional banks. We indicated that we felt it was responsible for the Government to get involved."

Is this the Government of Canada not wanting a bank to merge with another bank when it was in trouble?

What happened with Northland? When the Bank of Canada cut off its deposits, the curator was brought in and the Minister of State for Finance said, "You go ahead and merge. We will even give you a bank that wants to merge with you". That particular bank did not know what she was talking about. It was a complete reversal of the policy stated by the Minister herself in this Chamber. It was the Minister of State for Finance who said the words to which I referred earlier. The contradictions are amazing. If I were outside of this Chamber, I could use another word which I am not allowed to use in the Chamber. It is absolutely incredible.

With what are we left? A Member of the New Democratic Party rose to make fun of the Inspector General of Banks. He said that the Inspector General of Banks is paid by the banks. That is not exactly correct, Mr. Speaker. The Inspector General of Banks is paid by the depositors to the extent of one-tenth of 1 per cent of depositors' money. That is the way it was until this Minister came along and tripled that amount. Why did she do that? Because the Canada Deposit Insurance Corporation brought in about $37 million last year and about $125 million this year. The Canada Deposit Insurance Corporation is broke and owes over $1 billion. What does it have to do to fulfil the commitment in the legislation and pay the insured depositors? It has to borrow money. From where does it borrow that money? It borrows it from the Government of Canada. From where does the Government of Canada get the money? It borrows it and increases its own deficit. That is very interesting, Mr. Speaker.

That borrowed money covers the $420-million worth of insured depositors. From where does the money come for the $900-million worth of uninsured depositors? Does that come from the Government of Canada? Yes. Why does it come from the Government of Canada? Because this Government made an error. The Government made a moral and legal commitment to guarantee a return on the money of the depositors of that bank. It was a $900-million error.

Add that error to the money that has been borrowed to cover the Canada Deposit Insurance Corporation funds, another $420 million. Let us not forget the $255 million used for this infamous bail-out which will supposedly be recovered on the sale of the assets for which the Government may only receive 50 cents on the dollar.

Who made the error? We can talk about the Inspector General of Banks who is indirectly paid by the banks through the depositors. Who is responsible for the state of Northland today? Who took this action? The banks said that they did not want to have anything to do with this. If they did want to have something to do with it, they should all be fired. What bank manager would give the ordinary man on the street $60 million with no evidence at all? However, that is what these bank executives did. Surely they had something upon which to base their decision.

Was it the Inspector General of Banks who made the error? No, because let us not forget that he was not allowed to look at the figures. He was allowed to look at an American report for a moment but he was not allowed to take a photocopy of it.

Was the error made by General Bouey, as some people refer to him? No, it was not his responsibility. He does not know anything about the banks. Who was at fault? Who was responsible for making this commitment? I will tell you who was responsible, Mr. Speaker. I am going to make a guess because nothing else makes sense.

On the one hand there is the Government of Alberta and on the other there is the Government of British Columbia which dealt with subordinate debentures. The Government of Canada shared equally with the Government of Alberta. Then the banks came in with money. Surely someone somewhere made the decision to put it all together. Who made that decision? The only conclusion to which I could come is that this happened as a result of a phone call from a provincial premier. Perhaps that is the answer. Perhaps a provincial premier, in this new spirit of federal co-operation, phoned the Government. It was not a premier from New Brunswick this time but probably the Premier of Alberta.

The taxpayers of Canada were committed to something through a political judgment which influenced the banks. Why else would the banks have loaned this money? The banks would only give the money if they got certain guarantees. They wanted to be able to write this money off on their bottom lines and they wanted to be recognized as depositors so that they would be covered if this thing did not work out. However, they really did not think that this was a good deal.

After all of this occurred, the Minister of State for Finance rose in the House to say the following, as reported on page 3518 of Hansard:

> Mr. Chairman, I have tried to explain to the House that this solution was arrived at because, in the judgment of knowledgeable people—including the Governor of the Bank of Canada, a group of six chartered banks, the Inspector General and the Province of Alberta—the bank would have been a viable operation if the capital was provided to resolve its loan problems.

Who made the judgment relating to Northland? Again it must have been a political judgment. It was made because the CCB bail-out did not work out. The Bank of Canada froze its assets as deposits. The curator went in and ordered that this bank would merge with that bank and that bank did not know what they were talking about. However, the Minister of State for Finance has made it pretty clear. She said that the previous judgment was made on the recommendation of the six banks, the Governor of the Bank of Canada and the Inspector General of Banks.

The evidence before the committee indicates that the banks say that they did not recommend this. The hon. gentleman who sits behind me has just said that someone is not telling the truth. As Hon. Members know, I cannot say that someone is not telling the truth here in this Chamber. In fact, I cannot even say it in such a way as to even suggest it. I wonder what the people of Canada are saying? We have heard nothing but absolute and total contradictions beyond any scope of the imagination. How can the Minister of State for Finance make a statement one day and then make a different statement the next? How can the bank make differing statements? How can the Inspector General of Banks make differing statements? Now, every single one of the presidents and chairmen of the boards of six banks are making statements contradicting each other. The conclusion one has to come to is that the aftermath of all this is an awfully big bill.

We now have two banks involved in similar situations. We have uninsured depositors being paid by a deposit insurance corporation which is almost broke. That corporation is borrowing from the Government of Canada to the tune of $1.4 billion. The Government is borrowing money when its policy is to not increase the deficit. Thus, our taxes have got to go up. Then there are the uninsured depositors. They are the ones who are being paid directly by the Government. Then there is the Government of Canada adding on to the deficit and having to borrow to make up the difference. It is pretty clear to an ordinary person like myself from Newfoundland that this is a bloody disaster. It is a scandal of the first order.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baker: It is an absolute political scandal of the largest magnitude that one can imagine. It is one which involves a couple of billion dollars. It also involves unfair treatment to the Northland Bank. To put it more succinctly, it involves contradictory statements. It involves the contradiction of other statements. It involves statements made by the participants which are completely opposite to what the Minister of Finance (Mr. Wilson) has said. The Minister of State for Finance says one thing one week and another thing the next. Where has that got us? The Minister of State for Finance, like a great many Ministers in this Chamber, was simply following the orders given to her by the Government. She was following the orders of the chairman of the board. The chairman of the board is the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney).

Can anyone figure out why the decisions which have been made regarding the two banks have been made? No one who is a rational person can come to the conclusions which these Ministers have come to—no one. It could not be concluded that it was the Inspector General of Banks who was definitely responsible. It could not be concluded that it was the Governor of the Bank of Canada who was definitely responsible. Nor can it be concluded that it was the six banks which were responsible. The administrations of the two banks we are talking about were not responsible for this $2 billion bail-out. It was a political decision. Sometimes people do not believe how much influence a Government can have, even on financiers and on experts in banks who should know better to sit down in a room and commit $60 million.

I am glad to see that the Conservatives voted in favour of the motion which is before us.

Mr. McDermid: Why did you vote for it?

Mr. Baker: The Hon. Member asks me why I voted in favour of the motion. I will tell him why, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Gauthier: What a fool you are. Listen to him, fool.

Mr. Baker: The Minister of State for Finance said in the House that she had the backing of two provincial Governments and six banks. She told us that a vote against this measure would be a vote against western Canada. She told us there was an emergency which had been checked out, double checked and triple checked and that the measure would save the bank. "This is a solvent bank," said the Minister. Who are we not to believe a Minister of the Cabinet who come to the Chamber with a rescue package on behalf of western Canada? After all, that is the way the Minister put it. I can guarantee Hon. Members that never again will we ever take the word of this Government with respect to any emergency Bill which involves money.

I note that you are indicating, Mr. Speaker, that I should conclude my remarks.

In conclusion, I would like to say that the aftermath involves $2 billion. That is the aftermath. The conclusion we come to from the Statements of the Minister of State for Finance is that she makes statements at any time depending upon the mood she is in. That depends on what she says, which determines exactly what the policy of her Department will be. The statements do not make any sense.

Who is responsible? None of the participants are responsible. As I mentioned before, the responsibility goes back to a political decision made between a provincial Premier and the Prime Minister of Canada. As we all know, those telephone calls have got this Government into one heck of an amount of trouble.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber-Port au Port-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, thank you for giving me this opportunity to speak. I wish to be brief, unless, of course, I am provoked into being expansive. I wish to say that I came here to this Chamber after having spent hours preparing my contribution to this debate. However, having heard the words of wisdom and having been witness to the skill and the powers of persuasion of the Hon. Member for Gander-Twillingate (Mr. Baker) I have come to realize that anything I could possibly add would be mere trinkets lost in the hurricane of logic which has been put before the Members of the House this evening.

Having said that, I simply wish to say to the Hon. Member for Gander-Twillingate touché and touché again. May God bless you and may you continue these contributions.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Gauthier: Just a brief interjection, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: The Hon. Member for Ottawa-Vanier (Mr. Gauthier).

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa-Vanier): Mr. Speaker, I know we are all impatient to bring a close to this debate.

Mr. Speaker: We can stay here all night if you like.

Mr. Gauthier: I will be brief and tell the House that, indeed, there are still some members of my Party who would like to participate in this important debate because there is a crisis which preoccupies Canadians and which has preoccupied our thoughts. I was perplexed today to see how reactionary this Government can be. What we have today in Canada is a Government which reacts. It does not lead anything; it reacts to events, whether it be fish or banks or something which happens to a member of its Party. By God, this Government reacts. My second point, Mr. Speaker, is that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Wilson) and the Minister of State for Finance (Mrs. McDougall) showed us how logical one can get in this House. They voted in their places today that, indeed, they wanted this debate. They wanted this emergency debate. They voted with the opposition and said, yes, there is an urgent, pressing emergency in the banking business of this country.

• (0110)

The Minister of State for Finance made a very partisan speech. She never mentioned the Northland Bank once. The Minister of Finance we did not see. Yet he voted in this House with all of us that there was an emergency. In protest against his absence, Mr. Speaker, and in his neglect and lack of understanding of how serious this question is, we are trying to make an issue of this crisis. We are trying to make you, Mr. Speaker, and the people of Canada, understand that, indeed, we are preoccupied with this problem. As the Hon. Member for Gander-Twillingate (Mr. Baker), and other Members of my Party have said today, we are, indeed, very preoccupied with this problem.

Mr. Marcel Prud'homme (Saint-Denis): Mr. Speaker, I will be very brief. Hon. Members opposite know my style.

Mr. McDermid: That's what I'm afraid of.

Mr. Prud'homme: I will be brief, but if otherwise provoked, Mr. Speaker, I will deliver as violent and as partisan a speech as the Minister of State for Finance (Mrs. McDougall). She did not address herself to the question. She only wanted to play politics. I can tell you, Mr. Speaker, that nothing would please me more, even at this late hour, to do the same.

The point I want to raise, Mr. Speaker, is of great concern to me as an Hon. Member who has been here for many years. We will come back to it because I know this is not the end. My concern is this new approach that the Government seems to be developing as it tries to say that we on this side, we in this Party, do not care about what is going on in western Canada. If that is to be the approach and the defence of the Government, it is an immense mistake as was so well described by my colleague, the Hon. Member from Newfoundland, who spoke prior to me. I think we will have to object. I think we will have to prolong the debate. I think we will have to ask for a new debate on the same issue.

It is my view, Mr. Speaker, and also those of us who read very attentively the mood of the country—which is well expressed by various editorialists from western Canada as well as from central Canada and the Maritimes—that the attitude that seems to be developing here will be very bad for the unity of this country. It is an attitude that the New Democratic Party or what is more important to us, the Official Opposition, which governed for so long—perhaps too long, and that is what Canadians decided—are not concerned about western Canada. The Canadian people decided to give the new Government a chance to show what it could do but if that new Government is going to pretend again and again, either directly or indirectly, that this debate, which was suggested by us, means that we do not care about western Canada, I believe we will play into the hands of those who believe in the division of this country. It is not healthy and I do not beg of my colleagues but I certainly urge my colleagues to tackle this very immense difficulty. We see the credibility of the banking system in this country being attacked and that is very serious.

I come from a province where the people are very conservative minded when it comes to the question of money. Many do not have the same faith in the banking system as some of my colleagues opposite. It is traditional. It is historical. It is well known that—

[Translation]

In French, we refer to this as la politique du bas de laine.

[English]

They prefer to keep their money at home instead of putting it into the system. If there would be no more confidence in the banking system of our country, it would be disastrous economically for those who want to invest and for those who want to borrow money in order to create employment, because people will say, "We will invest somewhere else and not in Canada's banking system."

I was very saddened and upset and so were a lot of people when I, as well as the country as a whole, heard the Righ Hon. Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. Mulroney) say, "This country is bankrupt". Let us analyse this phrase, "the country is bankrupt". What is the meaning of that phrase outside of Canada? I just happen to have been to a banquet tonight given by Her Excellency the Governor General, for the President of Tanzania. I was asked by one of the guests who sat not far from me to try to explain to him what the effect on foreign aid would be if a country as wealthy as Canada, so well respected as Canada, so generous in external aid as Canada, was to be known as bankrupt. I must admit I forgot partisanship. When we talk to outsiders, we have to defend the country as a whole and not as a representative of a political Party. I had to agonize to find a good argument. I did not say the country was bankrupt. I was trying to explain that it is a phrase and did not mean exactly what it inferred.

For that person, however, it meant exactly that. For the people in my province it means it is a terrible situation, that the banking system does not work. If we are going to go on and on pretending that the banking system in this country is going down the drain, I can imagine where the people who have some wealth—I am not talking about those people who have $60, but those people who have more than $60,000—are going to recoup their money. I am in agreement with the President of the Bank who said, "Tough luck. If the workers of this country, the little people, through their tax, are going to bail out a lot of people, we want to know who is going to be bailed out. We want to know how much it will cost and what kind of money those people will receive". I am in agreement with that.

I could go on, as I said, Mr. Speaker. It was because of the tone of the Minister of State for Finance that I felt I must speak. The Minister made a very partisan speech and tried again to sneak into the debate the question that this Party does not care about the interests of western Canada. That is the reason I rose to speak tonight. I want to put on record that we in this Party try to the best of our ability to give fair treatment to all parts of this country. To try to make Canadians believe that we are debating the issue because we do not care for western Canada would only be divisive and anything which would be divisive is not good for the country. Therefore, I would like to bring to the attention of my colleagues who like to participate again and again in this debate not to use that kind of argument. If they were to do so—which is their right because, after all, we live in a democracy—I can assure them that in a much better prepared way, we would tackle any Hon. Member who would like to use that as an argument. I repeat, and I conclude, Mr. Speaker, that any Hon. Member who uses that kind of argument will find us standing and answering tit for tat any insinuation that we are going to divide this country, that we do not care for western Canada and that these people of this new Government care more than we do.

• (0120)

Some Hon. Members: Say it in French!

Mr. Prud'homme: My colleagues are asking me to repeat the same thing in French. Although we have an excellent interpretation system, I will say that this is an argument which my hon. friends should not use, to wit, that the Party of the Official Opposition does not give a darn about Western interests, because the history of our party is there as evidence to the contrary, and that if they did continue to use these arguments, they would play right into the hands of those who want to divide Canada, something which would not be healthy for the unity of our country. This is not a matter of partisan politics, but a matter of saving our institutions throughout Canada.

An Hon. Member: Excellent!

[English]

Mr. Speaker: Pursuant to Section 13 of Standing Order 31, I am satisfied that the debate has now been concluded and I therefore declare the motion carried.

Prior to adjourning the House, may I thank the pages, the clerks, the translators, the Journals Branch, and all of the rest of the staff who have had to stay late tonight. I think they understand as well that this was important.

The House stands adjourned until this morning at 11.00 a.m., pursuant to Standing Order 3(1).

The House adjourned at 1.22 a.m.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

FAMILY ALLOWANCES ACT, 1973

ALLOCATION OF TIME TO CONSIDER SECOND READING STAGE OF BILL C-70

The House resumed from Tuesday, September 24, consideration of the motion of Mr. Epp (Provencher):

That, in relation to Bill C-70, an Act to amend the Family Allowances Act, 1973, one sitting day shall be allotted to the consideration of the second reading stage of the said Bill; and

That 15 minutes before the expiry of the time provided for the consideration of government business on the above-mentioned sitting day, any proceedings then before the House shall be interrupted, if necessary, for the purpose of this Order and, in turn, every question necessary to dispose of the said stage of the said Bill shall be put forthwith and successively, without further debate or amendment.

Ms. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, the motion to limit debate on Bill C-70 which will deindex family allowances by 3 per cent is a cheap attempt by the Government to suppress debate and keep the following facts from the public. A 3 per cent deindexation of family allowances is an unfair attack on children, families and women and particularly on single-parent mothers. Family allowance deindexing will not be offset by changes to the child tax credit and even the poorest families will be worse off by 1990. Cut-backs to children will amount to $600 million by 1990 which can be added to the increased sales taxes, excise taxes and income taxes already imposed on families by this Budget. This places an extraordinary burden on middle and low-income families.

While cutting the family allowance to save for the deficit and increasing taxes on families as well, the Government at the same time somehow finds $8 billion to give to the oil companies, $1 billion to bail out the banks and has increased tax loopholes for the rich. We believe that this is immoral, inequitable and unfair.

In closing, I say again on behalf of the New Democratic Party that we call on the Government, in the name of fairness, to reverse its position on Bill C-70. We call on the Government to index family allowances fully and to show that it cares for Canada's children, women and families.

Just this morning I came from a very large gathering of labour delegates to an Affirmative Action conference sponsored by the Canadian Labour Congress. It was attended by 550 women and a few men from across Canada. These delegates were very concerned about the impact this Bill will have on family allowances. It is just the beginning of an erosion of programs and services for families which must be stopped. We cannot have our universal family allowance eroded.

Mr. Speaker: It being 11.06 a.m., the two hours provided for the consideration of the motion now before the House, under the provisions of Standing Order 84, have expired. Accordingly, under the terms of the Standing Order, it is my duty to interrupt the proceedings and put every question necessary to dispose of the motion.

Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Some Hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: All those in favour please say yea.

Some Hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Speaker: All those opposed please say nay.

Some Hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Speaker: In my opinion the yeas have it.

And more than five Members having risen:

Mr. Speaker: Call in the Members.

The House divided on the motion (Mr. Epp (Provencher)), which was agreed to on the following division:

Mr. Speaker: I declare the motion carried.

CONDOMINIUM ORDINANCE VALIDATION ACT

MEASURE TO ENACT

Hon. David Crombie (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development) moved that Bill C-73, an Act to validate certain ordinances of the Yukon Territory and the Northwest Territories, be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee.

He said: Mr. Speaker, this morning I ask Hon. Members to turn their attention to a matter concerning residents of Yukon and the Northwest Territories. I am introducing new legislation, the Condominium Ordinance Validation Act, which will remove a conflict between territorial and federal laws that has held back the construction of new condominium housing in the North.

It is a pleasure to note that all Parties in the House, through a unanimous resolution of the Standing Committee on Indian Affairs and Northern Development, have already given their support to this Bill which validates territorial ordinances. I might say, parenthetically, that I received a telephone call from the Hon. Member for Spadina (Mr. Heap) on the weekend who has a concern, which may be peripheral to the Bill, that he would like to raise in committee. Aside from that, we have had excellent co-operation, which speaks well for all those people involved, particularly the Hon. Member for Western Arctic (Mr. Nickerson) who spearheaded the effort to resolve the matter.

The federal legislation with which the existing territorial condominium ordinances are in conflict is the Land Titles Act of 1894. It is long forgotten in most of Canada. It applied to northern and western territories which Canada acquired after Confederation. As the western provinces came into being, they passed their own legislation dealing with land ownership and real estate. However, the old law, amended from time to time, that is to say, the law of 1894, remained in force for Canada's northern territories. Unfortunately, the technicalities of the old law no longer fit today's circumstances. In fact, they hold back the introduction of new kinds of home building and home ownership.

Today, Yellowknife and other northern communities face severe housing problems. Mr. Speaker, you may have seen press reports on the special committee which the Northwest Territories Legislative Assembly set up on housing indicating that the committee found the situation in the Northwest Territories to be no less than a crisis. A few months ago the Mayor of Yellowknife, His Worship Mayor Don Sian, explained to the Standing Committee on Indian Affairs and Northern Development what the housing situation means in everyday life to northern people. Of the larger centres in the North, the City of Yellowknife has almost one-quarter the population of the Northwest Territories. Many more people are moving there to work at mining and exploration, at new head offices, in the Government, in the new regional hospital and so on. However, when it comes to finding a place to rent, they can almost forget it. The vacancy rate in Yellowknife is zero. I have heard that a single apartment will often have a waiting list of over 100 people.

As for buying a house, Mayor Sian estimated a housing shortfall in the immediate future of at least 250 units. He explained that available housing falls into two ranges, both of which are expensive compared with the South because of transportation costs for materials and other difficulties of building in the North, particularly as a consequence of the climate. A trailer on a privately owned lot will set one back $75,000 to $95,000, and a new single family housing unit of modest size will cost $160,000.

The Mayor added:

> Yellowknife is a fairly young community and for a young family to get together the down payment to move into a single family home of . . . $160,000 is quite simply beyond their means.

Obviously condominiums do not provide all the answers. However, they will probably help fill the gap between the trailer and the single family house and provide private housing at a relatively reasonable cost. Condominiums would seem to make especially good sense in places like Yellowknife, where the rocky Canadian shield makes it difficult to run in services such as water and sewage. When multiple units can share services, it cuts down the costs.

The legislators who wrote the Land Titles Act dealt only with conditions which they saw in their own time, in the 1890s—an owner had a piece of land with a building on it, and that was how land titles worked. The Act made no provisions for title to condominiums. In 1969 in the Legislative Assembly of the Northwest Territories, and in 1968 in Yukon, ordinances were passed respecting condominiums. A later opinion by the federal Department of Justice found that the ordinances could not be fully effective because of the deficiency in the Land Titles Act respecting title registration. This put the legal registration of titles to condominiums in doubt. The result was and is that no condominiums have been built in the Northwest Territories. Some buildings built with that intention ended up as regular rental units. Developers who would otherwise build condominiums today, and their financial backers, are reluctant because of the uncertainty surrounding the security of condominium titles.

The territorial and federal Governments have been concerned with this problem for several years. The previous federal Government twice tried to pass Bills addressing the issue, but they fell by the wayside. That delay in addressing the matter has made it all the more urgent. The Hon. Member for Western Arctic highlighted the matter by putting forward a Private Member's Bill, Bill C-214, affecting the Northwest Territories only. I am pleased, after discussions with him, the Deputy Prime Minister (Mr. Nielsen), who is also the Hon. Member for Yukon, and the Member for Nunatsiaq (Mr. Suluk), to build on his initiative. Therefore, I offer a Government Bill which will resolve the matter for both the Northwest Territories and Yukon.

On May 28 of this year the Standing Committee on Indian Affairs and Northern Development offered its unanimous support for such legislation in these words:

> In accordance with its Order of Reference of Friday, December 21, 1984, in relation to the subject matter of Bill C-214, an Act to validate the Northwest Territories Condominium Ordinance, your committee has held one meeting and has heard the testimony of Gary MacDougall, Registrar of Land Titles, Don Sian, Mayor of the City of Yellowknife and Dave Nickerson, M.P. and has agreed to recommend the following:
> That the House of Commons support the early enactment of legislation which would have the effect of deeming valid for all purposes the territorial ordinances dealing with condominiums and of making valid everything that has been done to date under the territorial ordinances.

The legislation I propose to you will do exactly what the standing committee recommended. And besides the support of the standing committee, this action has the support of the City of Yellowknife, of the N.W.T. Association of Municipalities, of the Yellowknife Chamber of Commerce, and of MLA's and the Territorial Governments themselves. This is one of those rare Bills that everyone supports. It will not cost the federal Government a penny. It has no effect on native land claims or Crown lands; it only deals with property already privately owned, making it possible to put up condominiums rather than single-owner buildings.

It is a Bill that will bring more affordable houses to many families. It will protect the interest of condominium owners and it will help the northern economy. It will not solve all the housing problems overnight, but it should be a big help.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crombie: Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I recommend consideration of the Bill to all Hon. Members.

Hon. Douglas C. Frith (Sudbury): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise in my seat today and give support to this legislation which should help to resolve the urgent needs for affordable housing in many northern communities.

I want to indicate to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Crombie) that this Bill being presented in the House of Commons today is a reflection of a process of devolution that began years ago. I am glad to see the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development is following through with that same process of devolution to give to the Northwest Territories and the Yukon more and more power given more priority to local input that to central agencies, such as the federal Government.

My personal thanks goes to Members, on behalf of the Hon. Member for Cochrane-Superior (Mr. Penner), who unfortunately is unable to be here and whose notes I am using. I acknowledge the work he has done on the Standing Committee of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, as well the work which the standing committee did to facilitate the passage of this legislation we see here today.

I have some general comments on the thrust of the Bill. While this Bill deals with what might be considered a relatively small issue on the national agenda, I wish to draw to the attention of the House the significance of what we are actually doing. The Bill before us should give us cause to reflect on the nature between the Territorial Governments and the federal Government. The Governments of the Northwest Territories and the Yukon are still, even today, subject to much federal dominance, and I think the process that began in the last several years and is speeding up will go a long way toward giving them more and more powers.

This Bill itself resolves a conflict in jurisdiction. It will allow the Territorial Governments to proceed with legislation legally which they enacted over 15 years ago. We are dealing here with an outdated federal Act conflicting with modern reality.

Parliament is being called upon to deal with condominiums in the Territories because Parliament has an overriding jurisdiction over the Territories. Territorial ordinances are subject to overriding federal legislation. I hope the Minister can bring forward legislation that will allow the Territorial Governments to establish their own Acts for Land Titles and enable those same Territorial Governments to repeal the Land Titles Act themselves.

Devolution seems to be a very arduous task. Many interests have to be taken into account. I presume that lack of consensus probably inhibited the implementation of old Bill C-52, which supposedly was going to deal with this problem of housing in the Northwest Territories and the Yukon.

However, I urge the Government to proceed expeditiously where there is agreement among northerners to transfer more and more responsibilities to the Territorial Governments.

In addition, I want to pay tribute not only to members of that committee but to a number of other individuals who, I believe, were instrumental in assisting in obtaining quick passage of this Bill. Some Members, among whom I am sure is the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Crombie), would agree with me that even in as small a Bill as this, because of the way in which the complexities of government machinery work here in Ottawa, we lost this season's building time. It is unfortunate that this Bill could not have been passed, for instance, in May, allowing the Territorial Governments to go ahead with construction this season. That is no fault of the Minister, Mr. Speaker. It is the fault, basically, of the machinery of Government in getting Bills onto the floor of the House of Commons.

The Minister has outlined the specifics of the Bill. Let me point out that the Mayor of the City of Yellowknife appeared before the committee and testified, for example, that his city has a zero per cent vacancy rate. A trailer on a privately owned lot costs from $75,000 to $95,000. A newer single family unit costs between $140,000 to $160,000. Very few Canadians understand the cost of doing business in the Northwest Territories and the Yukon. Things that we take for granted in the southern part of Canada are not taken for granted by the residents of the two territorial areas. Believe me, one can understand why special tax considerations have to be given to people living in the Territories. Without special tax concessions, it is beyond me how they could make ends meet.

Housing is clearly out of reach for most of the people in the territorial areas. Condominiums could fill a very important but intermediate gap in the housing market. I want to pay some tribute to the Hon. Member for the Western Arctic (Mr. Nickerson) who was instrumental in bringing this problem before the committee.

Without taking up the time of the House, the Bill, its intent and its direction have the full support of the Liberal Party. I welcome the fact that we are finally able to deal with this legislation in such an expeditious manner.

Mr. Jim Manly (Cowichan-Malahat-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the New Democratic Party, I am pleased to indicate that we are prepared to deal with this Bill in a expeditious manner.

As has been pointed out, Bill C-73 is designed to enable condominiums to be built, sold and owned in the Northwest Territories and the Yukon. Basically it is a technical Bill, but it is a technicality we should not be dealing with in this House. The Northwest Territories and the Yukon should have full power to deal with this matter in their own Legislatures. Amending the Land Titles Act will authorize the condominium Acts in the Northwest Territories and the Yukon.

While we are glad to give our consent to the speedy passage of this Bill, we also want to emphasize that housing is in crisis across Canada and particularly in the Northwest Territories, the Yukon and in Indian communities across Canada, the areas for which the Minister has responsibility.

It is interesting that this past spring a Northwest Territories housing study pointed out that lack of housing was so severe throughout the North that up to 18 people are having to share three bedroom homes in some Inuit communities. Many of the Government's 4,000 rental units did not meet health and safety standards. People in more affluent communities, such as Yellowknife, are forced to camp out in shacks, tents or in the backs of tractor trailers during the long winters owing to the lack of rental units. The few two bedroom apartments that occasionally become available cost up to $1,100 a month.

It is especially important to note that the committee has warned that the desperate housing problem is most likely related to the dramatic increase in spousal assaults, family breakdowns and the dropping out of high school students throughout the North. In other words, when we look at the question of housing we are not simply dealing with an isolated physical situation. We are dealing with a dimension of the total situation facing people in the north. The crisis in housing stimulates crises in other areas of social life there as well. The possibility of condominiums may open the way for some people. Others, however, may need rental accommodation, and a 1983-1984 survey in Yellowknife by the Government of the Northwest Territories Bureau of Statistics indicated that of 1208 rental units 703 were leased by the Government of the Northwest Territories and 505 were leased privately. There is a vacancy rate of zero. The average rent in December of 1984 for a one-bedroom apartment was $613 and for a two-bedroom apartment was $773. This represented a 10 per cent increase from December of 1983.

The Hon. Member for Spadina (Mr. Heap), the housing critic for the New Democratic Party, pointed out that there is one concern that he has with this Bill as it stands, and that is, that it may endanger the 505 private rental units in Yellowknife. As alderman in Toronto when he worked with the present Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Crombie) when that Minister was the Mayor of Toronto, he and the Minister became very concerned that a number of rental units were converted to condominiums, which forced people out of rental units and so they had nowhere to go.

Between 1969 and 1985, 1799 rental units were converted to condominiums in the City of Toronto. The present Minister, as Mayor of Toronto, led the City Council in establishing a policy which blocked conversion as long as vacancy was less than 2 per cent. The Hon. Member for Spadina suggests that the Condominium Acts of the Northwest Territories and Yukon should be amended so as to prohibit the conversion of rental units to condominium so long as there is a rental shortage.

Referral of this to committee will, of course, give the opportunity for the committee to discuss this with the Governments of the Yukon and of the Northwest Territories.

I would like to make just a few comments about the situation on native housing across Canada. This is a longstanding problem, one that the Minister inherited from previous Governments and which has been increasing over a number of years. The backlog of new houses required has been estimated at a conservative figure of between 10,000 and 11,000. That has been the same for a number of years. Some other estimates state that that backlog is as high as 17,000.

The last federal census had some interesting figures on native housing across Canada. It pointed out that nearly one-quarter of Indian dwellings have more than one person per room and that the percentage of Indian dwellings which had more than one person per room was just over nine times that of all other dwellings in Canada. Nearly one-half of Indian dwellings in the Northwest Territories had more than one person per room. It pointed out that nearly one-fifth of all Indian dwellings need major repairs, almost three times that of all other dwellings in Canada. Among Indian dwellings, the Northwest Territories had the highest percentage, 28 per cent, in need of major repairs. The census also pointed out that one-third of Indian homes lacked a central heating system. The percentage of Indian dwellings which lacked a central heating system was almost four times that of all other dwellings in Canada. Just over one-half of Indian dwellings in Yukon had no central heating. Close to one-half of Indian dwellings in Saskatchewan and the Northwest Territories did not have central heating. Nearly one-fifth of Indian dwellings lacked a bathroom and the percentage of Indian dwellings which had no bathroom was just over 15 times that of all other dwellings in Canada.

Mr. Speaker, these figures from the latest census indicate that Indian housing is a national disgrace and I urge the Minister to make strong representation to his Cabinet to ensure that attention is focused on this issue this coming year. We cannot allow this kind of disgraceful situation to continue in a country that prides itself, as Canada does, as being a modern and a progressive nation.

We have had continued representation from Indian communities about the lack of proper infrastructure. The Indian community of Tyendinaga in southern Ontario has for years been waging a battle to try to get decent water and sewage in a new subdivision area that they have because they fear that the present arrangements are very likely to lead to a serious health risk. It is interesting that when the present Minister was the Minister responsible for health and welfare in 1979 in the Clark Government he appointed Chief Justice Berger to look at the whole question of Indian health at the time. One of the recommendations of Chief Justice Berger pointed to this central situation of Indian housing and said that that was absolutely crucial in terms of Indian health and that when people are crowded together there is no possibility of their having a decent life or a decent community life.

This again goes back to the findings of the Northwest Territories housing situation, that when you have bad housing you have an increase in family violence, an increase in a great many social problems. Yet this summer we saw a cut-back of $455,000 to Operations Beaver, a co-operative project of Canadian churches for the past number of years which has a very good track record of working with Indian communities, working with Indian young people and young people from other parts of Canada and indeed other parts of the world in constructing housing on Indian reserves and also some off-reserve housing. Yet this group was cut back by $455,000.

Also this summer the Ekos study was released, which had been commissioned by the Department of Indian Affairs, and it confirmed the sort of statistics that I read from the latest census. It said that 47 per cent of all Indian housing is substandard. It indicated that our past mistakes are coming home to roost and I regret that the present Minister is having to pick up the pieces from mistakes that have been made by past Governments. I want to emphasize that he has that responsibility to pick up those pieces and to make sure that something is done. The Ekos study pointed out that 15 per cent of the houses built as late as 1983, two years ago, are substandard simply because the financing for those houses was substandard. Indian people have repeatedly raised problems with the whole question of funding, and the funding delays often mean that it is impossible for them to get their programs in place, to get their material in place in time to meet the short construction season. This summer the Minister promised some $600,000 to the Dene people for housing. The Dene are now being told that this $600,000 is being given for more general purposes. I urge the Minister to make that $600,000 available specifically for housing so that the Dene people in the Northwest Territories can meet their housing needs.

I wanted to lay all of these concerns before the House of Commons because I think it is very important that we be aware of this disgraceful and tragic situation. I know the Minister is aware of the situation. I hope that he will fight with all his strengh to get a decent program from the Cabinet so that one year from now, we will be able to report substantial progress in this situation.

Mr. Crombie: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if I might have the consent of the House to put a question to the Hon. Member who just spoke? I recognize that it is not normal procedure, but there are two matters of fact which were raised on which I simply wanted to ask a question and seek the Hon. Member's views.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Charest): Is there unanimous consent for the Hon. Minister to put a question to the Hon. Member?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Crombie: Mr. Speaker, I would associate myself with many of the remarks made by the Hon. Member with respect to the standard of housing in Canada and with respect to the report which he discussed at length, a report with which I am intimately familiar. I am looking forward to making some changes in it this year which I will be presenting to the Cabinet and the standing committee of the House.

There were two matters that the Hon. Member raised. I think it is important to understand the way we are approaching housing which is that Indian communities are now able to determine on their own how money ought to be spent. The Hon. Member's first point dealt with Operation Beaver and his second one with money flowing to the Dene.

I will put a question to the Hon. Member and ask him to offer his views. Does the Hon. Member appreciate that housing selections are done through the community or the band itself? In the past, the federal Government gave money to organizations, which then took the money to Indian communities. I want to know whether or not the Hon. Member feels that the process by which housing operates according to the choice of the community is, in his view, an appropriate way of doing things.

Mr. Manly: Yes, Mr. Speaker, certainly the communities themselves should make the basic determination of the way in which they will do things. However, the fact is that some $455,000 was cut from the housing allocation to Operation Beaver. I would be interested to know where the money cut from Operation Beaver went.

Mr. Crombie: Mr. Speaker, having understood that point of view, I would ask the Hon. Member if he is aware that the only reason the allocation did not go to Operation Beaver was that it went elsewhere. There was no general cut made. The money did not go to Operation Beaver because, at that point, Operation Beaver did not have sufficient requests from Indian communities.

Mr. Manly: Mr. Speaker, I was not aware of that particular problem but I appreciate the Minister's assurance that no absolute cut was made. In fact, I hope that there has been an addition to the budget.

The Minister also raised the question of funding to the Dene. My understanding is that the Minister made a direct commitment of $600,000 to the Dene for housing needs, but instead that money is now being made available under the recently announced Human Resource Development Strategy Program rather than specifically for housing.

Mr. Crombie: Mr. Speaker, could I ask a further question? Is the Hon. Member aware that housing for the Dene in the Northwest Territories is primarily a responsibility of the Government of the Northwest Territories and that in housing matters we deal through that particular Government? Second, would it not be in line with his own views that when giving money to communities, it is much better for them to have the choice as to how the money is spent rather than having the federal Government directing them?

Mr. Manly: Mr. Speaker, again the Minister might be quite right in saying that housing is the specific responsibility of the Government of the Northwest Territories. However, I am under the impression, and the Minister can deny this if he wants, that the Minister made a specific commitment of $600,000 to the Dene people for housing, money which is not forthcoming at the present time. Rather, $600,000 has been made available for other purposes.

The Minister knows that Indian communities across Canada have a large agenda of needs and that the needs are many, varied and serious. Housing is one of those needs, but it is only one of those needs. Promising $600,000 specifically for housing and then making it available for a more general economic development program means that the specific housing needs in the Dene communities, needs which the Minister acknowledges are very serious, will not necessarily be met. Again I urge the Minister to make at least $600,000 available specifically for Dene housing.

Mr. Crombie: Mr. Speaker, this is my last question. I appreciate the patience of Members of the House. Would the Hon. Member not agree that the most appropriate way for the federal Government to deal with housing in the North is in conjunction with the Territorial Government? Second, is he not aware that our particular role in these matters is one of providing funding for Indian communities but allowing them to choose where they would like to put the money?

Mr. Manly: Mr. Speaker, the points the Minister makes are quite valid. In the Northwest Territories it is appropriate for housing programs to be designed through the Government of the Northwest Territories. The point is that when the Minister was speaking to the Dene Assembly, he made a commitment of $600,000. The Minister shakes his head and denies that he made that commitment.

Mr. Crombie: Not for housing, for housing-related matters.

Mr. Manly: The point is that quite apart from the best way in which funds should be allocated, when a specific commitment is made, I believe that that specific commitment should be followed through.

Mr. Girve Fretz (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasant duty for me to speak to Bill C-73 today, a Bill which the Standing Committee on Indian Affairs and Northern Development requested us to put forward. As most Hon. Members may be aware, one of the first things that the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Crombie) did was to travel north to meet with and listen to northerners. I would like to take a few moments to pay tribute to the Minister.

The Minister is a person who listens. He is someone who gets right into the fray and wants to see firsthand the experiences of the people for whom he is responsible. He wants to see how they are living and the conditions under which they live. He wants to see what he can do to change those conditions.

The Minister is a people person, one who cares and has seen firsthand the problems that native people are experiencing.

I will continue in this brief tribute to the Minister by saying that he is a Minister who is acquiring a knowledge and expertise of our vast North not only in a formal way through books and meetings but by getting out and meeting with the people and learning from firsthand experience. I think it important that the House know about it and that the people of Canada are made aware of this extraordinary Minister who has these extra-curricular activities. I wish to pay tribute to him. He is a person who listens to the northerners. Not only does he listen to them, he acts. It is one thing to listen but another to act. He does both.

My Minister found that all the people of the North are very much aware that they are on the verge of an exciting moment, a moment in which history and destiny will meet. The people with whom he met are, in a very sophisticated and politically mature fashion, trying to deal with a number of needs. Housing was identified as an area which required immediate attention. At the urging of my colleague, the Hon. Member for Western Arctic (Mr. Nickerson), the Mayor of Yellowknife told the standing committee what the situation means in human terms. When we talk about legislation in the House, or when we talk about it anywhere, it should be in human terms, in terms of how if affects people. His Worship Mayor Sian estimated that there is a housing shortfall in the immediate future of at least 250 units. If we said that there was a housing shortfall in Metropolitan Toronto of some 250 units, that would not bother us too much. However, when we speak about a housing shortage in the City of Yellowknife, a comparatively small city, then we are talking about a very serious matter.

On May 28, 1985, members of the committee unanimously requested that the House take early action on a Bill to amend the Land Titles Act, the purpose being to allow construction of condominiums in Yukon and the Northwest Territories. What has been introduced is legislation which will do just that. In pushing for change, Hon. Members had in mind at that time that condominiums could provide reasonably priced housing to ease this terrible shortage in the North.

In our own time, condominiums have, of course, become popular. They are popular in southern Canada because of their cost. The tremendous cost of servicing land today has continued to sky-rocket. If we think the cost of servicing land in southern Canada is expensive, then we should go to the North and see what it is like there. By sharing costs and services among all the owners in a multiple unit, builders can provide private ownership, generally speaking, at a lower cost. Condominiums make particularly good sense in northern centres, in places such as Yellowknife.

I am perhaps one of the privileged people in Canada since I have had an opportunity to visit our Far North on a number of occasions. I travelled this summer with a colleague of mine and we spent some time in the North. I have been in Yellowknife on a number of occasions. I have seen firsthand the rocky Canadian Shield where it is much more expensive to provide a building lot with water, sewerage and other services. Condominiums allow builders to cut down the costs by sharing them among a number of buyers. Developers and their financial backers who would otherwise have built condominiums have held back. They have done this because of the technicality which prevents a condominium owner from registering his or her title.

In the Northwest Territories, a few builders who started to put up condominiums ended by using them as rental units because of the problems with titles. I know this has caused some concern. In the Yukon, 200 condominiums were built anyway but, given the legal situation, some uncertainty hangs over the owners' titles.

Last year, the Legislative Assembly of the Northwest Territories set up a special committee on housing, which found no less than a crisis. The special committee put forward 82 specific recommendations with respect to housing which gives Hon. Members an idea of the amount of concern regarding northern housing. As for opposition, we have heard none so far. The proposal will only affect property which is already in private hands. It will have no effects on Crown lands or native land claims.

Besides his other energetic work to bring this matter to parliamentary attention, my colleague, the Hon. Member for Western Arctic, put forward a Private Member's Bill, Bill C-214, to amend the law for the Northwest Territories only. In discussion with the Hon. Member, and others, the Government put its weight behind a similar but broader Bill for both the Northwest Territories and Yukon. It was to speed up passage of that Bill that the standing committee gave its unanimous support for early action. Today, the Bill is in our hands.

Perhaps it is unnecessary to say more except to thank all Members from each side of the House, those Members who have spoken today, as well as those Members who worked in committee, for moving this matter along so quickly.

In the future, the federal Government will play what I think will be a diminishing role in the administration of northern affairs. We are prepared to give the Territories more responsibility. The Minister has committed himself to giving them more responsibility, as has the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney). How quickly, though, depends in part on the wishes of the Territorial Governments themselves.

The Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development has spoken often of his desire to see northerners, through their Territorial Governments, take on greater responsibilities for the decisions which affect their daily lives. This stems from a genuine belief that the role of Government can often be most effectively carried out when it is closest to those most affected by its decisions. It recognizes that the federal Government in Ottawa, however well intentioned, cannot be as sensitive to many of the needs and priorities of northerners as are their own Territorial and local Governments. In many areas, the federal Government is anxious to see a devolution, with which the Minister agrees, toward more participation and a greater degree of responsibility at the territorial level.

Mr. Ian Waddell (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, I would like to say a few words in response to the remarks made by the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Crombie) who is one of the Ministers I most admire in the Cabinet—

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Waddell: —if he is still in the Cabinet. According to The Globe and Mail of today, all the Ministers in Cabinet will be gone by certain dates and only the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) will be left if the Government continues to receive ministerial resignations.

I note it is this Minister who is bringing forward this Bill with respect to condominiums. I know he is the one Yuppie Minister in the House, a young urban professional—maybe not so young anymore. Perhaps we should call him a Muppie. He is from Rosedale where there are a great many condominiums. It is somewhat ironic that he brings forward a Bill to aid in condominium construction in the North.

I understand why the Bill is being brought forward. It has to do with the technicalities of the law in the territories and the difficulties with respect to condominium development. The reason I rise today is not to tackle my friend and get into debate with him, as I like to do, or even to talk about Rosedale. The fact is that I happen to have lived in Yellowknife for a couple of years. It did not stunt my growth—I can see the Minister smiling. At least, it did not stunt my physical growth. My spiritual growth was enhanced by living in Yellowknife for a couple of years and by being a member of the bar of the Northwest Territories. That entitles me, I suppose, to practise law from Yellowknife right up to Eureka.

I would like to say a couple of things so the Minister and his Department can flag them, although I may be a bit out of date and perhaps the Minister will dismiss the suggestion. When I was in Yellowknife, housing was also difficult to obtain. I heard my colleague, the Hon. Member for Cowichan-Malahat-The Islands (Mr. Manly), speak about the scarcity of native housing and the fact that the scarcity of non-native housing was quite incredible. There is a lot of Government housing in Yellowknife. When I was there, that was what most of the housing was. There was always the feeling around town that there were a lot of Government houses standing empty at a time when people were trying to get housing. Five and six people were living in a two-bedroom house which they rented at an exhorbitant price and there was a lot of Government housing just sitting around empty. So I ask the Minister to talk to his bureaucrats. The bureaucrats in Yellowknife were very helpful and I am not criticizing them, but it is easy to get into a situation where a Government just leaves houses empty. I would ask the Minister to take a look at the possibility of providing some of that Government housing on a lease basis to non-government people. I know there have to be some houses empty because people rotate in Yellowknife. They usually stay up there for a couple of years and then return home. But the native people are there permanently.

The other thing I would like to mention in the debate is the nature of cost in the North as compared to the South. It may be that southern Canadians should be subsidizing northern Canadians for two reasons; first, we are all part of the North. We feel like northerners even though 90 per cent of us live along or near the borders of the United States. But we all have this kind of northern feeling that this is Canada and we are a northern country. We are quite proud of the pioneers in the North and we have a great deal of respect for the survival of our native people both Indian and Inuit in the North. So I feel we should be thinking about the cost of living in the north, not just in housing but in energy as well.

People in the North pay 80 cents a litre for gasoline. People in Toronto pay 40 cents a litre. Compare the price of gasoline and housing in Rosedale with the price of gasoline and housing in Yellowknife. It may be that if people in the South pay one tenth of a cent a litre more for gasoline there will be a sort of postage stamp price for gasoline in the North so that people pay the same price. A postage stamp costs the same in Yellowknife as it does in Rosedale or in Vancouver-Kingsway. Perhaps gasoline should be treated like that, and perhaps housing should as well.

We want to see our North developed in good ways. We can look at how the Soviets have developed their North. I am not suggesting we follow along in their way. I do not like the way they deal with culture and so on. However, if we compare the number of people the Soviets have living in their North to the number of people we have living in our North—a much lesser amount—the Soviet way could be instructive. This, of course, fits in as well with the Government's wish, which we support, to proclaim in the loudest possible terms Canadian sovereignty in that area.

We support the Bill, Mr. Speaker. We understand the technical principles of what has to be condominium development. There are other housing problems in the North which the Minister should look at, and perhaps we should look at, and that is, the broad picture of some sort of northern subsidies so that people can live in the North at a cost equal to the cost of living in the South. I said that my remarks would be brief, so I had better sit down.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Charest): Questions or comments? Resuming debate?

Is the House ready for the question?

Some Hon. Members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Charest): Mr. Crombie, seconded by Mr. Epp (Provencher), moved that Bill C-73, an Act to validate certain ordinances of the Yukon Territory and Northwest Territories, be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to, Bill read the second time and referred to a legislative committee.

IMMIGRATION ACT, 1976

MEASURE TO AMEND

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Charest): Mr. McLean, for Miss MacDonald, the Hon. Member for Kingston and The Islands, seconded by Mr. Crombie, moves that Bill C-55, an Act to amend the Immigration Act, 1976, be now read a second time and, by unanimous consent, referred to Committee of the Whole.

Hon. Walter McLean (Minister of State (Immigration)): Mr. Speaker, first of all I wish to indicate my pleasure at speaking to this Bill and the important matters relating to immigration for which the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) has asked me to assume responsibility along with my colleague.

As Hon. Members of the House will be aware, Bill C-55 proposes several amendments to our present Immigration Act. These amendments, Mr. Speaker, are minor in nature. They are designed to increase the flexibility and capacity of the Immigration Appeal Board to deal with a greater number of cases.

Under the current Act, the maximum number of board members is restricted to 18. Bill C-55 would increase this number to a maximum of 50. The Immigration Appeal Board reviews appeals of family class applications which have been refused abroad. It hears appeals against deportation orders by certain people who have come to Canada and have not been admitted or who, having been admitted, have run afoul of the Immigration Act. The Board also makes a redetermination of refugee claims which have been evaluated by the Refugee Status Advisory Committee but subsequently rejected by the Minister. All of these categories of cases are important, but the Board has far more work at present than it can do. Hence, the urgency to pass this legislation.

Bill C-55 will permit the appointment over time of new members to cope with the workload. In addition, the number of vice-chairs will be increased from five to 13, giving the Board even greater flexibility. The Bill would also require that not fewer than half of the vice-chairs be members of a provincial bar for at least five years.

To ensure that board members are used effectively, the Bill would permit the chairman to delegate responsibility on technical matters to one-member panels. In previous committee discussion there were some concerns expressed regarding the matter of one-member panels. I have had an opportunity to talk with the spokespersons for the opposition Parties and we are agreed that it would be in the interest of all that a three-person panel be maintained. We will encourage the adoption of an amendment in committee in this regard.

There are two distinct reasons for the Immigration Appeal Board requesting expansion over the last two years. The first is the increasing volume of appeal cases in such matters as family class applications, deportation orders and other rulings by the independent immigration adjudicators. At present the Board has a backlog of some 1,400 of those cases. The load is growing at the rate of over 140 per month. These appeals usually require at least half a day for disposition, and some can take as long as two weeks or more. In addition to that burden, the IAB is also responsible for hearings regarding redetermination of refugee status. The Board has faced an increasing number of cases concerning refugees in the past few years. The rate of increase exceeded the Board's ability to respond and this has created a backlog in refugee matters as well. This backlog increased dramatically as a result of the Supreme Court of Canada's ruling in the Singh case. Prior to that, the IAB dealt only with refugee redetermination. That is, the Board heard appeals from the Refugee Status Advisory Committee. The Singh case has changed the procedure and requires that the Board hold an oral hearing for every person who wishes a redetermination of his or her claim to refugee status. Thus the IAB now faces a backlog of some 14,000 refugee cases. This extraordinary backlog has also limited the Board's ability to deal with the backlog of other appeals. Clearly it is important that we respond to the Supreme Court of Canada decision and do it quickly and not appear in any way to be questioning the validity of that decision. This is the aim of the Government in introducing this legislation.

Before returning to the workload of the Board, I should mention briefly the work of Rabbi Gunther Plaut. As Members of the House will know, for the past year Rabbi Plaut has been studying the Board and the delicate question of refugee determination. His report, which was tabled in the House by my colleague, the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Miss MacDonald), last June, treats this problem in a sensitive and thorough manner. Later this fall legislation will be introduced stemming from both a review of Rabbi Plaut's report and the views of interested Canadians. This legislation will form the basis of a new refugee determination system, a new commitment to those in need. What I should like to make clear at this point to all Members of the House and the public is that the legislation we are discussing today is in no way connected to this larger legislative reform which will be proposed later in the year. What we seek to do now is to equip the IAB to deal with its immediate and pressing needs. Hence, the proposal to increase the membership of the Board to a maximum of 50 members. Because there have been some concerns expressed that this adjustment might in some way affect the commitment regarding the refugee redetermination review and proposed legislation, I have agreed, in discussion with concerned members and the opposition critics, that it may be important to accept an amendment regarding the length of time new members will serve in order to indicate clearly that this is an emergency reaction to a specific situation.

In addition to the refugee claims' backlog there are also more than 1,000 family sponsorship appeals pending. Families which cannot be reunited because of a legal prohibition must now wait for more than a year to determine whether relief may be possible. I do not need to remind Members of this House that family reunification is a corner-stone of the Immigration Act and Canadians are confused as to why, if this is so, we cannot act on family reunification. I know, from my contact with Members of Parliament that their constituency offices are inundated with questions about the time taken up by these procedures. Therefore, it will be important that we move quickly to have these amendments made in committee and have the Bill completed.

Some of these cases, of course, involve the parents of Canadians for whom long delays cannot be sustained. Bill C-55 goes further than simply reducing the delay for these people. It extends the right of appeal to permanent residents, that is, those whom we refer to as landed immigrants, as well as to Canadian citizens. At present, the right of appeal is available only to sponsors who are Canadian citizens. It is the Government's view that this is not consistent with the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms, and therefore we wish to act and act quickly on this matter. Hence, Bill C-55 will grant the right of appeal to landed immigrants who are permanent residents as well as to Canadian citizens.

The amendments to the Immigration Act contained in this Bill are the result of careful consideration and our desire to meet the requirements not only of Canadians but also of the Supreme Court ruling. I believe these amendments will address the serious backlog and other operational issues now hampering the process. I am happy to seek an accommodation of concerns, as I have already mentioned, regarding the size of the panels, and to answer that concern. I am also prepared to recognize the importance of a stated time period for appointments which will indicate that this is an emergency measure and not a long-term permanent arrangement that would in any way threaten the present discussions about refugee determination.

This House knows that Canada has long extended a hand to those suffering repression or displacement. We have offered countless thousands of people an opportunity to start new lives here. We have also shown compassion and sensitivity regarding the desire of families to be reunited. This Bill will retain our humanitarian traditions in these areas and I ask all Members of the House to give it their support so that we can move speedily on this issue in order to begin to alleviate the present backlog and with it the human hardship and agony that is involved.

I thank you, Mr. Speaker, and Hon. Members for your attention to this important matter.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Charest): I must bring to the attention of the House that in my reading of the motion I made an error and I am very disappointed that no one in the House brought it to my attention. To make things clear the motion should be:

• (1240)

The Hon. Walter McLean (for the Minister of Employment and Immigration) moved that Bill C-55, an Act to amend the Immigration Act, 1976, be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee.

That is how the motion should read. The Bill is referred to a legislative committee rather than to a committee of the whole. I am very disappointed in all Members.

Mr. Gauthier: Mr. Speaker, on that same point of order, we on this side were polite and did not want to bring it to your attention, but we are happy that you corrected the record.

Mr. Waddell: Mr. Speaker, I apologize to the Minister and to the House, but I missed the first part of the Minister's speech. I have a question that is important for our position on this Bill. I would like to seek unanimous consent of the House to put a question to the Minister. I know questions come later, but I would like to get unanimous consent.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Charest): Is there unanimous consent for the Hon. Member to put a question?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Waddell: I thank you and the Members of the House.

First, the Minister has announced some changes to the original Bill. Would he confirm that the change is that the Immigration Appeal Board remains at a quorum of three members to hear sponsorship appeals?

Second, did the Minister mention in his speech any reduction in the number of board members? The Bill proposes to increase the board members from 18 to 50. Is he staying with the number of 50 or going to a smaller number? Those are my questions.

Mr. McLean: Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the Hon. Member for his question of clarification. On the first point, I have heard representations with regard to the three-person panels and I am prepared to accept that. However, three-person panels require more person-power. It would defeat the purpose to insist upon a lower number. You cannot have it both ways. If you are going to have increased panels, then you need the capacity. The Bill specifies a maximum of up to 50 members and, in concert with the chairman of the IAB, these members have to be found, trained, and phased in. There is some flexibility to allow for greater sensitivity in carrying out this work, but I will be open to a definition of the term of office of these new appointees which will indicate that they are not intended to provide long-term solutions.

Mrs. Lucie Pépin (Outremont): Mr. Speaker, I would like to speak to Bill C-55, introduced in the House today by the Minister of State for Immigration.

Although we have had several meetings with the Minister, I have a few comments and observations regarding this Bill, whose purpose is to amend the Immigration Act.

I hope, in my comments, to clarify the motives of the Liberal Party for objecting to its passage. Bill C-55 would increase the maximum number of members of the Immigration Appeal Board to 50 and the maximum number of vice-chairmen to thirteen, and would permit the Immigration Appeal Board to hold hearings.

On April 4 of this year, in its ruling in the Singh case, as the Minister mentioned earlier, the Supreme Court of Canada ruled that the Immigration Appeal Board had to hold oral hearings of claimants seeking refugee status. The present procedure does not provide for oral hearings. At the first level, the Advisory Committee on the Status of Refugees, a decision whether or not to grant refugee status is made on the basis of the transcript of an interview conducted by an immigration officer upon the claimant's arrival in this country.

At the second level, that is, the Immigration Appeal Board, the same transcript serves as the documentary basis for the appeal decision.

I would now like to speak more specifically to Bill C-55. One of the reasons I am opposed to the Bill is that legislation that is supposed to be a provisional measure will probably become the cornerstone of the future process for determining refugee status. The Minister is giving us the assurance that it is a temporary measure, but we all know that when the Government says temporary, a measure may be temporary for as long as five or ten years.

As the House is aware, a new Bill to reform the entire procedure is to be tabled shortly. The Minister of Employment and Immigration (Miss MacDonald) has started a series of consultations on the subject which are to be concluded shortly, as soon as the Standing Committee on Labour, Employment and Immigration has heard a series of witnesses. In fact, I know the Minister will be in Montreal next Saturday. We can therefore expect a new Bill very shortly, and I think adopting Bill C-55 at this stage would be prejudicial to future reform. One of my reasons for making this assumption, Mr. Speaker, is based on the selection and mandate of Immigration Appeal Board members.

At a hearing held by the Standing Committee in February of this year, it became clear that to attract competent and committed members to the Immigration Appeal Board, it was advisable to provide for terms of as long as five and even ten years. The reasoning behind this position was that a person could not be asked to give up a career temporarily to work on the Board. The Minister told us today that they are perhaps willing in committee . . . the Government would therefore be willing to change and we would have terms varying from three to five years instead of ten years. Last February, no one challenged this reasoning and I believe the Members of all three parties were in agreement.

But to get back to Bill C-55, I would like to point out to my colleagues opposite that the Bill is proposing the exact opposite. It is suggesting an increase in the number of members, which would be a temporary way of dealing with the painful problem of case backlogs at the Immigration Appeal Board.

However, quite frankly, how can we expect to attract competent people if they are told their services will no longer be required in another six months or a year, that is, when the new determination process will be implemented?

Mr. Speaker, despite the reform, I believe the Minister of Employment and Immigration has already decided on the structure and membership of the Immigration Appeal Board, and has done so while ignoring the suggestions made in the Plaut Report and the many critical comments regarding the Board made by the Supreme Court.

The Plaut Report does not really allow much room for the Immigration Appeal Board. To be more specific, I would say there is no mention of the Board in any of the three models proposed by Rabbi Plaut. Appeals are included in the models, but their exact form is not clearly defined.

I think it is rather significant that the Appeal Board was not even considered as a possible alternate solution in the Plaut Report. Incidentally, I might point out that the Minister of Manpower and Immigration released the report exactly ten weeks after she received it, and seven weeks after she announced that it would be made public in a matter of days.

The Board's adversary system has been challenged by many lawyers and organizations which look after refugees. A colleague reminded the parliamentary committee of some cases where the Board insisted that an applicant for refugee status prove that he would be subject to persecution. Well, that is not what the Act provides, it does not require applicants to prove that they would be subject to persecution in their country of origin, but only that they are afraid of being persecuted, and that is altogether different.

Some people believe that the backlog of cases would melt away if Bill C-55 were to be adopted. Unfortunately this suggestion does not take into account the fact that cases now before the High Court—the Federal Court—will go back to appeal where the backlog will swell beyond limits. The main objective of Bill C-55 is therefore unattainable the way things are now. This fact was emphasized during a standing committee hearing last June and I am surprised that the Conservative Government still wants to steer this course to nowhere.

The whole exercise is off on a tangent and badly documented because the initial proceedings do not include a hearing with refugee status applicants, and it is sheer aberration to believe that increasing the number of commissioners will guarantee better equity. When the first stage of a proceeding is marred by injustices, the situation will not be redressed at the second stage of the proceeding, no matter how extraordinary it may be.

Bill C-55 is an attempt to restore some form of equity in a process which we all know cannot possibly accomplish what it is supposed to do in the first place. Consequently, Bill C-55 is useless.

I would also like to point out that during a parliamentary committee hearing in June we learned that, besides reducing the backlog of refugee cases, increasing the number of Immigration Appeal Board members would also expedite the settlement of cases of sponsored immigrants and of deported immigrants.

● (1250)

There is nothing untoward in that, Mr. Speaker, but then nobody should pretend that refugee status applicants will be denied justice if we prevent the passage of Bill C-55.

That was the main argument of the Conservative Government in June when it attempted to get a consensus from all three parties to adopt the Bill. In that respect, allow me to quote the remarks of a lawyer who appeared before the standing committee in June:

> As a lawyer I have the clear impression that, from September to December when hundreds of cases will be brought back to the Appeal Board, those people will have to be represented by counsel. The lawyers will have to work with files full of shortcomings with respect to the presentation of the cases themselves. I therefore have the impression that a new backlog will be created at the Appeal Board. There are so many outstanding cases at this stage that we have a feeling in Montreal that the middle-term temporary solution being considered by the Appeal Board could not sufficiently reduce the backlog of refugee cases that justice would be done and that we could look to a reform in due time.

The Liberal Party is opposed to Bill C-55 because it contains the basis for part of a new process to grant refugee status and because this does not take into account the Plaut Report and all the requests which have been made by the organizations dealing with refugees.

If the Progressive Conservative Government is serious and honest when it consults these organizations before any reform of the process for granting refugee status, it should not try to pass a bill which contains the basis for the future process.

This view is largely shared by immigration lawyers and many humanitarian organizations. They include the Table de concertation auprès des réfugiés, SOS-Réfugiés, the Civil Liberties Union, the Société québécoise de la solidarité internationale, the Immigration Lawyers Association, the Association des Juristes québécois, the Inter-Church Committee for Refugees, the Standing Conference of Canadian Organizations concerned for refugees, Amnesty International and the Inland Refugee Society of British Columbia.

As you can see, Mr. Speaker, the Liberal Party is not opposing Bill C-55 simply for the sake of it. This is not a partisan issue, but a question of common sense.

It is time to reform the process for granting refugee status and to undertake a comprehensive information compaign on refugees. The very great majority of Canadian men and women do not differentiate between a refugee and an immigrant.

In the case of the immigrant, the host country has the right to set criteria and to accept only those who meet them. It is quite different for the refugee. Indeed, Canada has international obligations. According to the Geneva Convention, the applicant for refugee status is entitled to get help; this is not a privilege, but a right.

Most of our fellow citizens and many Members of Parliament are not aware of this. Many forget about the difficult political situations which exist throughout the world. When we are familiar with the international situation of apartheid in South Africa, of the military dictatorships and police repressions in many Latin American countries, of the religious intolerance in Iran, of the invasion of Afghanistan and so on, we are more willing to welcome those who are afraid of persecutions in their own country and who seek refuge in Canada.

As Rabbi Plaut emphasizes, compared with the scope of the worldwide refugee problem, the task of recognizing the status of people who apply for refugee status here in Canada is relatively small.

In addition to establishing the difference between immigrants and refugees, the information campaign that we need should emphasize the economic contribution of the new-comers. We have to eliminate the myth that foreigners steal jobs from Canadian men and women.

Many economic studies on immigrants show that it is impossible to establish a cause and effect relationship between the number of foreigners admitted to the country and the economic situation. However, some economists state that by increasing the number of potential consumers in a market, the immigrants make a positive contribution to the economy.

In other words, it is our entire approach to immigration which must be improved as we must become more open-minded while maintaining the generous attitude which has long been the characteristic of Canadian men and women.

This urgently needed change in attitudes should go hand in hand with the reform of the process for granting refugee status. It seems to me that the implementation of this new process gives us an ideal opportunity to initiate a nationwide debate on the refugee issue.

The band-aid solution now proposed by the Conservative Government in Bill C-55 therefore seems to me both useless and harmful. If the bill is passed, I believe that it would unfortunately take a lot of time for the Government to reform the whole process for granting refugee status, contrary to the wishes of a great many organizations working with refugees.

[English]

Ms. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I am somewhat concerned that the Government, on such an important matter as immigration, did not give immigration critics, in particular the critic for our Party, very much notice of its intention. Unfortunately our critic was unable to be present because of that fact. I feel it is a disservice to immigrants to be dealing with Bills in this ad hoc manner.

However, because I represent the riding of Vancouver East, which has a very high proportion of immigrants, both landed immigrants and their families and refugees from many countries of the world, I am pleased to have an opportunity to speak on their behalf. There are a number of reasons for our being concerned about the Bill. We are very concerned, as is the Government, about the backlog of cases. Many immigrants who have been trying to get their families into Canada have been waiting, in some cases, for years. It has been very difficult for them when they are refused a proper hearing. The change in procedure to allow oral hearings—and certainly it is a change in the right direction—has increased this backlog. I understand that there is something like 20,000 cases in total in the backlog; perhaps it is even more than that at this time. Some 13,800 of these cases are refugee cases. I can imagine the concern of these people who are desperate to remain in Canada or to have their relatives come to this country.

We agree completely that the situation is very critical, but our real concern is about the ad hockery of this legislation which deals with only a small aspect of the problem.

WOMEN

APPORTIONMENT OF FUNDS TO CANADIAN COUNCIL ON SOCIAL DEVELOPMENT

Mrs. Lucie Pépin (Outremont): Mr. Speaker, the Conservative Government's announcement that it would allocate all funds for defending victims of discrimination to a single agency was a mistake. I believe that funds earmarked for defending women should have been allocated to the Women's Legal Education and Action Fund, and I deplore the fact that the Government put all its eggs in one basket by directing all funds for defending victims of discrimination to a single agency.

Mr. Speaker, I have absolutely nothing against the Canadian Council of Social Development, but it is not the ideal vehicle for women to organize and take significant action to defend their rights.

[English]

If the Government had given the Legal Education and Action Fund the money to defend women, it would have permitted them to set their own priorities. Now with the Canadian Council on Social Development, the money will be given on a case by case basis. The same work will be done twice and we will lose time and money.

My enthusiasm is squarely blasted when I think of the bureaucratic process and the delays women will have to face with the new program of legal contestation established yesterday by the Tories.

NATIVE PEOPLES

ESTABLISHMENT OF NATIONAL POLAR INSTITUTE—LACK OF INUIT REPRESENTATION

Mr. Jim Manly (Cowichan-Malahat-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, last week the Minister of Indian and Northern Affairs (Mr. Crombie) appointed a three member committee to make recommendations for the establishment of a National Polar Institute for Canada. Unfortunately the Inuit are not represented on this committee. Inuit people will not be involved in making basic recommendations for an institute dealing with their home territory.

It is important for southern Canadians to remember that when it comes to dealing with the Arctic, Inuit people have expertise which cannot be duplicated by academic degrees or scientific and organizational know-how.

In any future development in the Arctic, the Inuit are the people most directly affected. Surely the Minister must know that the time has passed when southern based academics and bureaucrats can make basis decisions affecting Inuit people without their involvement. Time for their involvement is at the beginning of the process, not halfway down the line. I urge the Minister to remember his responsibilities and to add at least one Inuit to the committee.

NUCLEAR ARMAMENTS

DANGER CREATED BY FRENCH NUCLEAR TESTS IN THE PACIFIC

Mrs. Suzanne Duplessis (Louis-Hébert): Mr. Speaker, I read in the press that the French Prime Minister was to attend underground nuclear tests of neutron bombs to be conducted on an atoll in the Pacific Ocean.

As a Member of Parliament and as a Canadian, I find it intolerable that any country on this planet should continue to conduct nuclear tests without knowing the possible impact on the earth's crust and without advising other countries.

I therefore urge the Right Hon. Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Clark) in my Government to enquire about the exact date of the last nuclear tests conducted in the Pacific by the French. There is no doubt in my mind that all Canadians and the various peace movements in Canada are opposed to the conducting of any tests of this kind.

AGRICULTURE

GRAIN ELEVATOR IN BIG RIVER, SASK.—LOCAL FARMERS' SUCCESS STORY

Mr. John Gormley (The Battlefords-Meadow Lake): Mr. Speaker, the House of Commons should be aware of the efforts of some innovative farmers in north central Saskatchewan.

One year ago the Saskatchewan Wheat Pool announced it would be closing the grain elevator in Big River. Farmers in the surrounding area, after protesting the closure in vain, formed a co-operative to explore some possibilities on their own. As their member of Parliament, I worked closely with these farmers and met with them on several occasions.

The farmers were also successfully helped by their MLA, the Hon. Colin Maxwell, and on one occasion we met with Canadian Transport Commissioner Jim McDonough, who provided technical advice. The farmers were able to purchase the Big River elevator from the Saskatchewan Wheat Pool, sign a lease with CN Rail and enlist the assistance of Pioneer Grain to help them manage the elevator. Special thanks should be directed to a former Member of this House, the Hon. Otto Lang, now of Pioneer Grain. Mr. Lang was instrumental in aiding the farmers' cause.

I would like to pay tribute to all the farmers who made this venture possible, particularly Big River farmer Eugene Swanson. At a time when there are many problems in Canadian agriculture, it is reassuring to hear a farming success story.

CHARTER OF RIGHTS

COURT CHALLENGES PROGRAM

Mr. Roland de Corneille (Eglinton-Lawrence): Mr. Speaker, while it was very good news to learn on September 25, 1985, from the Secretary of State (Mr. Bouchard) that the federaL Government has finally committed itself to providing funds to assist with legal expenses for those seeking their rights to equality in accordance with the Charter of Rights and Freedoms, my colleagues and I are greatly concerned about the way in which the Government proposes to administer and allocate these funds.

These funds are needed to pay for the cost of challenges in court. They are needed by many groups which have been disadvantaged until now by unequal treatment, namely, the women of Canada, the native people, the handicapped, and members of various multicultural groups. These groups constitute a huge majority of the people of Canada who, until now, have been denied equal rights.

Why does the Government seem to insist on giving all these important funds on a case by case basis through the Canadian Council on Social Development? In asking this, I want to affirm my respect for the outstanding work of the Canadian Council on Social Development, which has been entrusted with responsibility for assigning financial support for court challenges.

It is how these funds are assigned that is of critical importance. The principle of the Government being at arms length is also important. But why does the Government not guarantee, as these constituent groups have demanded, that adequate funds be given to the organizations responsible for an over-all approach? They are the groups affected, and they are the ones who are qualified to decide the priorities, timing, and issues that are appropriate. Women understand the issues of women. Canadian natives understand those that concern natives, and the handicapped know what their approach must be. Each of these major groups has its views—

Mr. Speaker: I must advise the Hon. Member that his time has expired.

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY

ELIMINATION OF PENSIONERS' TRAVEL PASSES

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, the year 1985 marks the one-hundredth anniversary of the Canadian Pacific Railway. It is unfortunate that this anniversary also marks the rescinding of an historic right for railway employees, namely, the suspension of all CP Railway travel passes for retired employees.

Railway employees have had travel privileges on Canadian railways since 1856. Canadian National continues to honour this right of retirees.

The CPR has given no reason for this mean treatment of those who have given the railway so many years of faithful service. The only explanation offered has been that it is a matter of "principle". It is apparently a CPR principle to cut off this small concession to retired workers at the same time it is celebrating 100 years of successful operation made possible by the work of its employees.

It is apparently a CPR principle to stop any rail travel by over 65s at the same time that it is paying salaries to senior executives well in excess of $500,000 annually.

This display of unparallelled meanness and lack of understanding leads me to bestow on the CPR the title of "Corporate Scrooge of the Year" for its failure to keep faith with its former employees.

As part of this award, I wish that all CP executives and board members be forced to watch repeated showings of their own television advertisements which proclaim that an employee "is never just a number with CP". This, of course, is true. The CPR continues to show by its actions—

Mr. Speaker: I must advise the Hon. Member that his time has expired.

WORLD MARITIME DAY

MARITIME SEARCH AND RESCUE WORK

Mr. Darryl L. Gray (Bonaventure-Îles-de-la-Madeleine): Mr. Speaker, it is with great honour that I bring to the attention of this House the celebrations today throughout the world of World Maritime Day.

On behalf of Canada, I would like to offer congratulations on this occasion to the International Maritime Organization based in London, England, and to its esteemed Secretary General, Mr. C.P. Srivastava for a very successful year.

During its 26 years of existence, IMO has been instrumental in improving maritime safety. Canada was a founding member and has played a significant role in the development of IMO. At present, Mr. W. A. O'Neil, president of the St. Lawrence Seaway Authority, is Chairman of IMO Council.

The theme of World Maritime Day for 1985 is Maritime Search and Rescue. The survival of persons in distress at sea depends ultimately on the speed with which they are located and rescued. The most important provisions on global search and rescue are embodied in the International Convention on Maritime Search and Rescue adopted by IMO in 1979. The Convention adopts improvements to existing procedures and introduces new requirements in order to facilitate speedy and effective action at both national and international levels.

It is with great honour and personal pleasure that I commend the convention and its objectives to the Canadian maritime community on this occasion. May I, on behalf of this House, convey to the International Maritime Organization, to seafarers in Canada and throughout the world, our greetings and good wishes on their continuing efforts—

• (1410)

Mr. Speaker: Order. Order, please. I take it that is in effect a message of congratulations, which is out of order.

FISHERIES

CALL FOR CANADIAN OWNERSHIP OF FACTORY FREEZER TRAWLERS

Hon. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, at the present time the Canadian Government does not permit the ownership of factory freezer trawlers by Canadian companies. The international market, however, recognizes that supply of fresh product is assured from freezer trawlers, as the appropriate technology has proven.

The nations that operate FFTs are benefiting from this market preference at the expense of Canadian companies. The ability of National Sea Products to remain competitive in the world market is therefore limited unless it is granted the requested licence to avail itself of FFT technology.

There are some people in Atlantic Canada who are saying that one freezer trawler will affect the supplies of northern cod. This statement is not in line with the facts since we presently have operating within our 200-mile-zone a total of 74 factory freezer trawlers: eight from Cuba; eight from West Germany; nine from France; one from East Germany; seven from Japan; one from Poland; eight from Portugal, and 32 from the U.S.S.R.

I believe that the time has arrived when we must reassess our priorities as they relate to quotas for foreign and Canadian fishermen within our 200-mile zone. FFTs will enable Canadians to find new job opportunities and open up markets now lost to foreign competition. Seventy-four factory ships for foreigners in Canadian waters and none for Canadians is no longer acceptable. It is time that we got on with the job.

SCIENCE AND TECHNOLOGY

CRITICISM OF GOVERNMENT POLICY

Mr. David Berger (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, Canada is on a disastrous course:

> This Government has embarked upon a course which could propel Canadian scientific inquiry backward and leave the country far behind other countries in scientific achievement.

These are the words of Nobel prize winner Gerhard Herzberg. And what is the Government doing about this situation which threatens Canada's future?

At a meeting with his provincial counterparts recently the Minister for Science and Technology said: "Canada faces strong international economic challenges". But this sober assessment is betrayed by his cowardly conclusion: "We have recognized the vital importance of science and technology to meeting these challenges".

This is not good enough. Canadians will not accept that the Government completely ignore their future. Time after time, blunder after blunder, the Government has shown that it cannot recognize a problem until it is too late. Mr. Speaker, this stinks.

It is time that the Government do something about Canada's future and chart a course for Canada's science community. Unless more resources are allocated to this important sector, it will take a miracle for this country ever again to have a Nobel prize winner.

CANADA POST CORPORATION

STANDARDIZATION OF SERVICES

Mr. Maurice Tremblay (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, according to Canada Post official statements published recently in the newspapers, not only must the corporation reduce its deficit, but it has to show a profit as well.

Though I agree with that statement, I want to warn the corporation that it should not be done at the expense of the Canadian people for it might unnecessarily create a new category of second class citizens.

Unfortunate though it may be, Mr. Speaker, I have to say that an ever growing number of my constituents keep complaining and asking for improved postal services.

We all agree on the need for new rationalization standards, but we have to keep in mind that the ridings are not all the same, that most of them are located in rural or semi-urban areas. Perhaps it would be better to make those standards reflect the reality of such ridings so that highly urbanized ridings will not get better services at the expense of other ridings.

Mr. Speaker, I respectfully urge the Minister responsible for Canada Post to pay particular attention to the situation and keep a close watch on the development of the Crown corporation with a view to making appropriate changes and restoring a fair balance.

NUCLEAR ARMAMENTS

URANIUM EXPORTS—DISPOSAL OF RADIOACTIVE WASTES—SALE OF TRITIUM

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg-Birds Hill): Mr. Speaker, the concern expressed yesterday by my Leader about the possibility of Canadian uranium being used for nuclear weapons should cause all of us to pay more attention not just to that but to nuclear issues in general. I would like to bring three of them to the attention of the Government.

There is a conference in London this week having to do with the disposal of pollutants at sea and I would like to encourage the Government not to support the American position that the two-year moratorium on the disposal of radioactive wastes in the ocean should be discontinued. I would encourage the Government to support the extension of the moratorium.

I would also encourage the Government to take a serious look at whether or not the sale of tritium could be included in the agreements which now exist with respect to prohibiting the use of Canadian uranium for the development of nuclear weapons.

Finally, I would like to encourage the Government to remember the promise of the Conservatives in 1979 that they would set up an inquiry into the whole nuclear fuel cycle in this country, from uranium mining to radioactive waste disposal, and cause that inquiry to begin so that Canadians can have a say, for a change, in the nuclear future that was imposed on them by the Liberals and seems to be business as usual by the Conservatives. We would like to see an opportunity for Canadians to have a say.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

Mr. Speaker: The Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition.

Right Hon. John N. Turner (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have a question or two to put to the Prime Minister who will be appearing here at three o'clock, I am sure, to read his statement. Is he coming in?

Mr. Hnatyshyn: I expect so.

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): I would prefer to put the questions directly to the Prime Minister.

Mr. Speaker: The Hon. Member for Egmont.

THE MINISTRY

EXPRESSION OF OPINIONS

Mr. George Henderson (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Prime Minister I will address my question to the Deputy Prime Minister.

When a Minister contradicts the Prime Minister, he is fired. When a member of caucus contradicts the Prime Minister, he is asked to withdraw those comments or resign. I ask the Deputy Prime Minister, is this new jackboot mentality the way the Prime Minister is going to deal with every member of his caucus who may have a legitimate difference of opinion with the Prime Minister or with the Deputy Prime Minister?

Hon. Erik Nielsen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, the jackboot mentality in government ceased last September.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

INQUIRY OF THE GOVERNMENT

Mr. George Henderson (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is also to the Deputy Prime Minister. I would like to know what kind of atmosphere exists on the Government side. Is it fear, and I want to emphasize the word fear? The Hon. Member for Carleton-Charlotte, having repeated a statement five times, asked: "Am I contradicting the Prime Minister?" What kind of bunker mentality exists in your Government?

Hon. Erik Nielsen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I as most Canadians deplore the atmosphere of any cesspool but I can assure you that that atmosphere exists on the other side of the House and not this side.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

APARTHEID

SOUTH AFRICA—RECOMMENDED SANCTIONS

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor-Walkerville): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Prime Minister I address my question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Last week South Africa once again invaded Angola to protect its continued occupation of Namibia. There was a new threat to displace 42,000 blacks from their homes, and there were further arrests of UDF leaders, one of whom, Mr. Mbotya, died mysteriously in police custody. Finally, President Nyerere has urged the Prime Minister to impose stronger sanctions against South Africa.

What will Canada's response be to Mr. Nyerere's specific recommendations to ban interline ticketing to South Africa by Canadian airlines and to impose an embargo on South African agricultural products?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to report that the Government of Canada not only had very useful conversations with President Nyerere yesterday but I was able in New York to have meetings during the deliberations of the United Nations General Assembly with other Foreign Ministers of other Commonwealth countries and, indeed, with Foreign Ministers of the summit countries, at all of which, not only did the question of South Africa come up, but at all of which Canada indicated the leadership we have shown and the leadership we intend to show.

With regard to specific proposals that President Nyerere might have made we invited him here to have the benefit of his advice. We are going to be considering very seriously the recommendations that he made to us.

REQUEST FOR ARMS EMBARGO

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor-Walkerville): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary for the same Minister. Does the Prime Minister of the Government of Canada intend to review the legislation, regulations and implementation mechanisms governing the embargo on arms sales to South Africa?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, first of all, I would like to congratulate the Hon. Member, who, like me, is a "Francophone", on the ease with which he expressed himself today.

Second, I repeat that we are examining all avenues that are open to Canada. I believe that yesterday the House was informed that the Prime Minister has appointed Mr. Bernard Wood, a Canadian who commands respect on both sides of the House, as his special emissary for direct consultations with Africa countries and other members of the Commonwealth, in order to seek ways in which not only Canada but all other countries that are against apartheid can take joint action.

PETRO-CANADA

ACQUISITION OF GULF ASSETS—TAX RULING

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (Saint-Henri-Westmount): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Finance, I will direct my question to the Minister of State for Finance. All week we have been discussing how the Ministers in the Department of Finance have blown $1 billion by bungling the bank bail-out. Now we have learned that a ruling was issued with respect to the acquisition of Gulf assets in Canada, a ruling which will add perhaps another $1 billion to the deficit. Can the Minister tell us if that ruling was reviewed by officials of her Department, if the cost implications of that ruling were fully understood, and if she will undertake to table that ruling here in the House of Commons?

Hon. Elmer M. MacKay (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, perhaps I might respond to the Hon. Member. I realize that because of his experience in these matters he is well aware that the confidentiality provision, Section 241, of the Income Tax Act, specifically makes it impossible to give details of this. Unless the directors of the corporation involved want to divulge the information, the Government certainly cannot. I can assure the Hon. Member that whatever was done with respect to tax rulings was entirely within the provisions of the Income Tax Act and was proper.

REQUEST FOR COMMITTEE HEARING

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (Saint-Henri-Westmount): Mr. Speaker, I am not satisfied with that response. Looking at the provisions of the Income Tax Act with respect to the transaction, it seems to us that explanations are required. The Canadian public cannot be expected to accept this kind of story about hiding behind Section 241 of the Income Tax Act when $1 billion of the taxpayers' money is involved. Will the Minister be prepared to come before the committee with his officials to table that ruling and to explain the transaction to the Canadian public?

Hon. Elmer M. MacKay (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I can say to my learned friend that, according to the information I have, the reaction to this particular ruling has been favourable and there will be an eventual recapture. As the Hon. Member knows, there is nothing more that I can add either here or before committee that would be held to be proper under the traditions of income tax jurisprudence.

INVESTMENT CANADA

TAKEOVER OF CLASSIC BOOK STORES

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex-Windsor): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Regional Industrial Expansion who is also responsible for Investment Canada. Hon. Members may know that today the Minister has approved the foreign takeover of Classic Book Stores despite the Government's announced policy that such businesses would only be permitted to be acquired through a Canadian-controlled joint venture. Why has the Government seen fit to abandon the policy of the former Minister of Communications just one day after he resigned?

Hon. Sinclair Stevens (Minister of Regional Industrial Expansion): Mr. Speaker, as the Hon. Member would realize if he had read the press release that we sent to his office, the decision regarding Classic was made in part by the former Minister of Communications. He was in complete agreement with the communication that was issued at noon today, and the hard fact is that, as a result of the merger between Classic and W. H. Smith, there has been an agreement that up to 49 per cent of the company will be offered to Canadians. This means that, for the first time, the interest of W. H. Smith in Canada will become partly owned by Canadians—another win for the people of Canada.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

APPROVAL OF TAKEOVER

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex-Windsor): Mr. Speaker, in fact it is another loss for the integrity of the Government which cannot even stick to its own guidelines on foreign policy. Why was this sale approved with so much celerity, to use the Prime Minister's favourite word, at a time when the Government has before it a rival offer from Canadians to take over this company for $5.6 million more than the purchase price offered by W. H. Smith?

Hon. Sinclair Stevens (Minister of Regional Industrial Expansion): Mr. Speaker, it would be so refreshing if the Hon. Member would do his homework.

An Hon. Member: He did. He read the paper.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Speaker, the sum total of his research is spending 25 cents to buy The Globe and Mail.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stevens: In answer to the question, there is no alternative offer. There is the hope of an offer. The hard fact is that Classic, as is generally known, is facing severe financial circumstances. On September 30 its bankers may not be willing to extend credit. Various creditors of Classic are very anxious that they not be left in default. We felt in the interests of the Canadian book publishing industry that we had to take a step to make sure that these two enterprises carried on in a viable fashion.

BANKS AND BANKING

CANADIAN COMMERCIAL BANK—GOVERNMENT'S INFORMATION IN MARCH

Miss Aideen Nicholson (Trinity): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of State for Finance. The Minister has said that the decision to bail out the Canadian Commerical Bank last March was based on the best information available at the time. Did that information include the opinions of the external auditors and the minutes of the CCB's audit committee?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, the information on which we based our judgment was based on regulatory reports which had been discussed by the auditors, as the Hon. Member well knows, and with the banking industry, officials of my Department, and officals of the Bank of Canada. All of those facts have been made clear. The decision was made after we asked ourselves some very tough questions. We came to what we felt was a decision that was in the best interests of the depositors, the borrowers, western Canada, and the banking system.

● (1430)

RANGE OF INFORMATION

Miss Aideen Nicholson (Trinity): Mr. Speaker, my question was very specific and the Minister has not answered it. I would appreciate it if she would give a direct answer. Were those two specific items available to those making the decisions?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, it has been made very clear, I think, by the Inspector General, both in committee and in other statements he has made, that he is in touch with the auditors of banks on a continuing basis in his evaluations. To that extent the auditors' statements were taken into account. There were a number of items taken into account. I have made that very clear. I have not avoided the question at all.

RESIGNATION OF FORMER MINISTER OF COMMUNICATIONS

Right Hon. John N. Turner (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. The Canadian Press reported this morning, and I quote:

Prime Minister Brian Mulroney's office knew a few months ago that former Communications Minister Marcel Masse was being investigated by the RCMP.

Apparently Jerry Lampert, National Director of the Conservative Party, has admitted that he informed senior people in the Prime Minister's Office of the investigation so that, to use his words, "they were aware".

The Prime Minister will also know that Bill Fox, his Director of Communications, stated to members of the media that the Prime Minister only learned in general terms on Tuesday night of an investigation, and only learned the name of his Minister on Wednesday morning.

When did senior officials in the Prime Minister's Office first learn of the investigation involving the former Minister of Communications? Who was the senior official in his office who received the information? When did the Prime Minister himself first learn of the information?

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, speaking for myself, I was advised on Tuesday evening through the Solicitor General and the Commissioner of the RCMP of the fact that a Minister would be under investigation and that search warrants would issue in regard thereto. When I was advised by the Solicitor General there was a meeting, which I was assured was pursuant to conventional criteria in such circumstances. The Commissioner of the RCMP and the Solicitor General officially advised me. I was advised of the identity of the Minister involved at about 11.30 a.m. the next day. I had no prior knowledge, prior to that moment in my office, when I was advised of the identity of the Minister.

ROLE OF PRIME MINISTER'S OFFICIALS

Right Hon. John N. Turner (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I accept that. I wish to put another question to the Prime Minister.

This is the second instance of a senior official in the Prime Minister's office concealing from the Prime Minister, or keeping the facts from him, respecting two Ministers who have had to successively resign because of those facts. I suggest to the Prime Minister that he has to accept responsibility for the omissions of members of his staff. Like every other Minister he, as First Minister, must take ministerial responsibility for omissions of his staff which affect the public administration of the country. What will the Prime Minister do about that?

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, there is no evidence that any senior member of my staff was involved in any improper way or had any knowledge improperly acquired or otherwise—

Mr. Deans: Nobody said that.

Mr. Mulroney: —to give the right hon. gentleman that conclusion. I am aware of the allegation, or the statement alleged to have been made by Mr. Lampert. I can tell my right hon. friend that I am aware of no one on my senior staff who had been so advised by Mr. Lampert. I can assure my right hon. friend, and the Leader of the New Democratic Party as well, that notwithstanding the fact that as Leaders of political parties they will be aware of the manner in which inquires are made and transmitted back and forth between political Parties in the event of suggestions of impropriety being filed with the office of Elections Canada—I can give my right hon. friend the assurance that, notwithstanding that, I received no advice from anyone at all prior to being so advised by the Clerk of the Council.

REQUEST THAT PRIME MINISTER REVIEW WORK OF OFFICIALS

Right Hon. John N. Turner (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister cannot escape responsibility from these matters by merely saying that he did not know. We accept his statements in this House. However, he has been shielded by members of his staff from serious facts and allegations which have resulted in two resignations. I am suggesting to the Prime Minister that his ministerial responsibility as First Minister is at stake here. He should have known precisely because he is Prime Minister. It will not do in this House to say that he does not know—his senior staff members knew and they should have told him.

Will the Prime Minister conduct a thorough review of the senior, non-elected officials in his office to assure this House, and thereby the country, that facts affecting the public administration of Canada will not be concealed from the Prime Minister when he should be made aware of those facts?

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, in the little time that was available to me I wish to assure my right hon. friend, and all Members of the House, that to the extent humanly possible I have already made inquiries of those people who were available. In all instances I have been informed by senior staff that they were not so advised under any circumstances.

I take seriously the view of my right hon. friend. However, I wish to assure him of two things. I had no prior knowledge of any kind; nor am I aware of anyone on my senior staff who might have had such knowledge. It is really to the contrary. Inasmuch as we operate, and I hope we continue to operate, with the presumption of innocence in this country, I hope that presumption applies to the House of Commons as well.

Mr. Gauthier: It is ignorance, not innocence.

FISHERIES

SALE OF CANNED TUNA—REQUEST FOR COMMITTEE REFERRAL

Hon. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Mr. Speaker, I have a question on a related matter for the Prime Minister. As the Prime Minister and all Members of the House know, we have been preoccupied for many days now getting to the truth behind a series of contradictory statements which have used up the time of this House when other more important matters could have been dealt with.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Crosbie: Get down to business!

Mr. Broadbent: Conservative Members are laughing and telling me to get down to business. I have a proposal now which will allow us to get down to business. I wish to see how the Government will respond to it.

Considering that in the last week alone three important and fair-minded Canadians, as far as we know—I refer to the former Minister of Fisheries and Oceans, Pat MacAdam and, perhaps, in terms of its symbolism most important of all, the Hon. Member for Carleton-Charlotte—have completely contradicted themselves in regard to statements they have made with respect to the position taken by the Prime Minsiter, leaving us in the position of having to decide what is true, and leaving the House in a turmoil, and since the Prime Minister has indicated he wants to get to the truth of this whole messy affair, will he agree to have this subject matter referred to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections? In this way, these people, including the Prime Minister, could give their views and we would be allowed to get on with the other important business of the House.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I know how much the events of the last few days have dismayed my hon. friend. All the attendant publicity has offended him. If there were contradictions, I think my hon. friend would agree that there have been no contradictions flowing from my mouth.

Mr. Nunziata: You are Snow White!

Mr. Mulroney: I have been asked specific questions and I have responded in a specific and honest manner, knowing full well the traditions and responsibilities of every Member of this House, which apply no less—indeed more—to the Prime Minister. I have indicated that if any Hon. Member of this House, from whatever Party, including the Leader of the New Democratic Party, has anything at variance with what I have just said, let him put his seat on the line, and I will mine.

• (1440)

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister said the last few days should have concerned me. I can tell him that it is not my integrity which has been called into question—

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Oh, yes, it has. You haven't been right once.

Mr. Broadbent: —in the last few days. I say that to him. Nor have I, Mr. Speaker, to this point questioned the integrity of the Prime Minister, including the last question.

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): What was that last phrase? Where is your courage?

REQUEST FOR COMMITTEE EXAMINATION

Hon. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): So the Prime Minister will understand it, my question is this. Given the fact that an Hon. Member of the House on his side has said one thing which contradicts the Prime Minister and another Cabinet Minister in the past has said something which contradicts the Prime Minister, as well as someone on his staff—not judging on the truth of the issue, and I say that genuinely—if the Prime Minister wants to get to the truth, why will he not refer this matter to a committee so that we can get to the bottom of it and go on with other business in the House? That is what it is about.

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, on all of these matters, on each and every single one of these matters, I have provided Hon. Members with complete and full and honest answers. That someone may inadvertently or otherwise have a recollection at variance with a dimension of another Member, I do not quarrel with that. I simply say that in regard to the important and fundamental issues which have been raised by Hon. Members of this House at any time involving the truthfulness of my position, I have stated it categorically, I repeat it today, and we all know the consequences of anybody who can produce any evidence at variance therewith.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

REQUEST THAT PRIME MINISTER DISMISS OFFICIALS

Hon. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Mr. Speaker, all I can say is that Hon. Members on both sides of the House know that there are two other people, one a former Minister of the Crown and another a Conservative backbencher, who have said things completely different from the Prime Minister. What he is now saying is what they have said in the past is false, and we have to choose between the two.

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): Where's your courage, Ed?

Mr. Broadbent: Simply to the Prime Minister, if we are not going to have some way of getting this issue out of the House, I want to get back to the ministerial responsibility issue. Independent of honesty, I want to ask—

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Order.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Would the Hon. Member please come directly to a question?

Mr. Broadbent: I ask the Prime Minister this. Considering that we now know that there have been at least two senior officials in his office—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I invite one more time a direct question, please. No more preamble.

Mr. Broadbent: Will the Prime Minister take steps to remove from his staff important functionaries who ought to have brought certain matters to his attention and who did not do so? Will he exercise his responsibility as Prime Minister and fire them?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend I think would acknowledge, and those Hon. Members who have served in Government would acknowledge, the responsibilities inherent in ministerial resignation. It is not an easy thing. It is not something to which anyone at any time looks forward.

There were two incidents which occurred. For different reasons, the Ministers and I shared the view that resignations would be appropriate. That was an honourable, I think, and appropriate course. I realize the consequences of those resignations. I do not think any Prime Minister enjoys a resignation from his Ministry for whatever reason even though, for example, yesterday there was not even the hint of a charge. Indeed, the search warrants may of themselves completely exonerate—and hopefully they will—the Minister. But if my standards are such on behalf of Hon. Members that I believe that in those circumstances ministerial resignations were appropriate and needed, you can be absolutely certain that with regard to staff people who would not have fulfilled their responsibilities, I would dismiss them with absolute alacrity.

There is no evidence at all to prove that any staff member did anything wrong, illegal or improper.

Mr. Broadbent: They didn't do their job.

Mr. Mulroney: I think my hon. friend, if he views it in that perspective, will agree that I, as Prime Minister, and as leader of this Government, have acted properly at all times.

Mr. Broadbent: They didn't to their job.

RCMP INVESTIGATION

Hon. Allan Lawrence (Durham-Northumberland): Mr. Speaker, I too have a question for the Prime Minister. I apologize that I have not been able to give him notice. It relates to the question from the Leader of the Opposition. I wonder if the Prime Minister would agree that in most circumstances it would be totally improper for the Prime Minister to know the details of an investigation before charges are laid by the RCMP against any Hon. Member in this House.

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I had no knowledge of this question. I had no knowledge of the question at all. I can tell my hon. friend this—I agree with the thrust of that question even to the extent that in the position of being in the presence of the Commissioner of the RCMP and the Solicitor General of Canada, in my residence, I told both of them—and I convened the Clerk of the Privy Council—when advised of the fact that the search warrants would issue: "I assume that you will proceed and when you have completed your work, you will advise me of the identity of the Minister against whom you propose to execute these search warrants. I don't want to know because even that knowledge might be construed as impeding or creating the possibility of impeding justice. I do not want to know, unless it is immediately within my purvue of responsibility, of charges being laid, which may be dismissed, against members of the Opposition or Members of this House.

I believe that that is an appropriate and honourable arm's length conduct in the administration of justice in this country.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

REPRESENTATIONS MADE BY MEMBER FOR CARLETON-CHARLOTTE

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber-Port au Port-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. Yesterday the Prime Minister scoffed at suggestions made by my colleague, the Hon. Member from Cape Breton, that the Hon. Member for Carleton-Charlotte had been making representations regarding Starkist tuna since last September. In fact, he said: "We were only elected last September". How can the Prime Minister expect Canadians to believe the Hon. Member for Carleton-Charlotte's memory was faulty with respect to raising this matter in his own Party's caucus when his memory with respect to making representations to the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans was dead on?

In hold in my hands a copy of the letter the Hon. Member wrote to the Minister last September 1984, 13 months ago, regarding the Starkist question and difficulties.

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I see nothing at all inconsistent with that. I did not scoff at anyone, not my hon. friend, nor the Hon. Member to whom he referred. I think my hon. friend asked me a question and that was whether I had any prior knowledge, or if this matter had been raised in my caucus in my presence, and I said "at no time".

Mr. Tobin: That is an interesting qualifier "in my presence".

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Crosbie: If he wasn't there, how the hell would he know?

DEPUTY MINISTER'S CONFIDENTIAL MEMORANDUM

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber-Port au Port-St. Barbe): The Prime Minister has stated in the House that Mr. MacAdam of his office investigated this matter and was assured by Fisheries officials that there was no problem last July. Is the Prime Minister aware that in a confidential memo from the Deputy Minister of Fisheries and Oceans to the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans, dated January 14, 1985, the Deputy Minister says the following: "Rejection of Starkist product has been because of rancidity, decomposition, style of pack, short weight, wrong colour, wrong texture, processed defects"; in short, unfit form human consumption. What would the Prime Minister say would represent no problem or a problem to Mr. MacAdam and to the Prime Minister with respect to this matter last summer?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member says that I said that Mr. MacAdam investigated this matter and arrived at a value judgment. I said no such thing. I said that in the first week of July Mr. MacAdam picked up some scuttlebut in regard to a television program, which he conveyed to the Department of Fisheries and Oceans. He was advised by a member of the staff of the Minister of Fisheries at that time that there was no problem.

● (1450)

Mr. Tobin: MacAdam denies it.

Mr. Mulroney: He does not deny that he conveyed that information at all. The information circulated in Ottawa, he conveyed it, and he was advised there was no problem.

Inasmuch as Mr. MacAdam's name has been mentioned by others in this House, here is a perfect illustration. I know my hon. friends would not want me to act arbitrarily and unfairly. Here is a staff member who hears of something, advises the Department in question of what he has heard, and is advised there is no difficulty. He initiates the matter. He has more than fulfilled his responsibility. That indicates competence of a Prime Minister's staff. He is doing the right thing.

The consequence of it, ultimately, is again, while difficult but proper, that there is a divergence of view. The Minister of Fisheries accepts responsibility. That is proper British parliamentary practice, and respect for the House of Commons and the people of Canada.

CANADIAN ARMED FORCES

ACQUISITION OF CANNED TUNA

Mr. Ray Skelly (Comox-Powell River): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Deputy Prime Minister. Would he care to speculate on how—

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): Order!

Mr. Skelly: Pardon me, would he please indicate to this House how $103,000 worth of rancid and decomposing tuna wound up in the Department of National Defence, circulated to 32 Armed Forces bases in Canada?

Hon. Erik Nielsen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I am sure that Hon. Members would not expect a Minister of Defence to have his or her finger on the pulse of every single product that was distributed to 83,000 troops throughout this country and our Forces based in Europe. But I can assure the Hon. Member that the standards adopted in the procurement of foodstuffs for the Department are of the highest, indeed a good deal higher than the quality of the questions coming from Hon. Members opposite.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

ISSUANCE OF CONTRACT

Mr. Ray Skelly (Comox-Powell River): Mr. Speaker, would the Minister confirm for us that a member of the Prime Minister's Office did not co-ordinate this particular contract between his Department and the Department of Supply and Services to ensure that members of the Armed Forces were not used as guinea-pigs—

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Skelly: —for rancid and decomposing tuna?

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An Hon. Member: Get out of here!

Mr. Andre: Make that charge.

Hon. Erik Nielsen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I would like the Hon. Member, in keeping with the usual quality of the standards of conduct in this House, which seems to have been forgotten by himself and his colleagues, to adhere to those standards—

An Hon. Member: That coming from you, Erik?

Mr. Nielsen: —to adhere to those standards and make a charge to that effect, which is precisely what I did when I had that kind of subject to raise in this House of Commons.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

PUBLIC SERVICE

INDEXATION OF SUPERANNUATES' PENSIONS

Mr. Barry Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the President of the Treasury Board and concerns the approximately 200,000 federal retirees, or superannuates as they are commonly called, including members of the Armed Forces, the RCMP, and widowers and dependent children in some cases, who are receiving federal Government pension income. Will the Minister please explain to the House what the current state of negotiations is concerning the indexation of these pensions for those who rightfully paid for them?

Mr. Robert de Cotret (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, I would like to say first of all that I very much share the concerns raised by my hon. colleague and by many other hon. colleagues in this House about this situation. We are attempting at the moment to put the pension funds on a sound financial management basis. There are actuarial studies under way, we are awaiting their completion, and I can only say, to reassure those who may have concerns, that we are proceeding in a fair and equitable manner and that the commitments of this Party and this Government will be respected in any final agreement reached between the parties concerned, including the superannuates and the active employees.

FISHERIES

SALE OF CANNED TUNA—REQUEST FOR APOLOGY

Mr. George Baker (Gander-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, this Government is being stymied—

Some Hon. Members: Question!

Mr. Baker: —unable to address the important problems facing this nation because it is caught in a maze of its own errors which cannot be chalked up to a plain and simple lack of experience. My question is directed to the Prime Minister, and I was waiting for him to sit down.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: We are waiting for you to sit down.

Mr. Crosbie: We are waiting for you to shut up.

Mr. Baker: Does the Prime Minister realize that Canadians are totally dissatisfied with his actions in the tuna affair? Regardless of who bungled it, does not my hon. friend agree—

Some Hon. Members: Order!

Mr. Baker: —that he as Leader owes Canadians an apology?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Nielsen: They are the ones who owe the apology.

Mr. Mulroney: —I think it would be agreed that Canadians are properly demanding in their standards of their political leaders, but fair. They are demanding but fair. They fully expect in the event of any controversy to have their Prime Minister, Leader of the Opposition, or Leader of any Party, be subject to interrogation, and then listen with care to the responses. They fully expect that at all times their elected leaders will respond with honesty and integrity. I have done that in every question put to me.

I think the fairness of Canadians is based on what we have always been taught, that we are presumed, all of us in all circumstances, in the absence of proof to the contrary, to be innocent. We are presumed, all of us, in the absence of proof to the contrary, to be telling the truth out of respect for one another and out of respect for our country. That I have done in every situation, in every circumstance.

My hon. friend asks me the reaction of the Canadian people. I do not know what the reaction is, but I suspect that Canadians are sitting at home in cities, towns and hamlets across this country, and saying the Prime Minister has been seriously interrogated. He has responded fully and completely to every question, and the doctrine of fairness is now being violated by those who are indulging in character assassination. That is what is going on.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

REQUEST THAT PRIME MINISTER RESIGN

Mr. George Baker (Gander-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, we have a Prime Minister whom nobody can believe in.

Some Hon. Members: Shame!

Mr. Baker: I ask the Prime Minister for a general apology.

Some Hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Baker: If he does not want to apologize, then why don't you resign?

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Andre: Why don't you resign?

Mr. Epp (Provencher): How stupid.

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I think any fair-minded person in this House, in the Opposition, or in the press, would agree that the suggestion of my hon. friend is most unworthy and improper. There have been many of those which have been made unfairly in the course of the last few days, but—

Mr. Nunziata: You are so perfect, you have a halo around your head.

Mr. Mulroney: —we are here to be examined and cross-examined, and on all of these items the questions put have been responded to fully. I have given my hon. friend complete and honest answers. I have no apologies to make to anyone, least of all him, in the area of integrity and honesty.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Hon. Member for Oshawa, one question.

NUCLEAR ARMAMENTS

URANIUM EXPORTS—CANADA-UNITED STATES TREATY

Hon. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. As the Minister knows, Canada has an agreement with the United States which states that under no circumstances "shall Canadian uranium be used for any military purpose". Will the Minister explain to the House how it has come to be that depleted uranium from Canada is being used in the United States as an encasement surrounding nuclear warheads? Will he also tell the House what corrective steps are being taken by the Government of Canada to enforce this agreement?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member raised a general question yesterday. He knows that our treaty provisions with the United States are similar to those which we have with Sweden and other countries. They are based upon the principle of fungibility. Over the last 20 years there has been no evidence of any breach of the language or obligations of that treaty.

I do not know of the particular case which the Hon. Member is alleging. I will look into it. If he has other instances of alleged breaches of treaty, rather than dangling them out a day at a time in the House of Commons I would ask him to bring them directly to my attention or that of the Prime Minister, and we will find out the facts and get back to him and Parliament in order that we will all know the degree to which a treaty brought in by the Right Hon. Lester Pearson in 1965 continues to be respected.

CLERK OF PETITIONS' REPORTS

Mr. Speaker: I have the honour to inform the House that the petitions presented by Hon. Members on Wednesday, September 25, 1985, meet the requirements of the Standing Orders as to form.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

WEEKLY STATEMENT

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the Government House Leader (Mr. Hnatyshyn) what business he intends to call for the remainder of this week and all of next week. I would ask him, in answering the question, to be as complete and detailed as possible in order to deal fairly with all Members of the House who want to be able to plan their activities and be ready to take part in debate. It is not consistent with the traditions of the House, nor fair to Hon. Members, to have the business changed, not only from day to day, but from hour to hour and minute to minute. We expect better of the Government House Leader.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Ray Hnatyshyn (President of the Privy Council): How short these memories are, Mr. Speaker. I have spent a lot of time in Opposition, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Gauthier: You will be back.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: —and compared to what went on in years past, this is paradise for the Opposition.

If there is someone whom I see more frequently than even my wife, it is the Hon. House Leader of the Liberal Party (Mr. Gray) when I consult with him. I take that back, Mr. Speaker, my wife will kill me when she hears that.

I have been giving statements of House business as much as two weeks in advance. I have, indeed, consulted with the Opposition House Leaders, not for the purpose of making any changes, but rather to ensure that the appropriate spokespersons are present and to ensure that it meets the convenience of Hon. Members on the Opposition side as well as that of our own Members. I do not have to take a lecture from the Opposition House Leader in that regard.

With respect to the business of the House, we are now dealing with Bill C-55, an Act to amend the Immigration Act. I hope that we will progress to second reading of that Bill. It is my intention to call, as the next item of business, Bill C-42 which relates to the dissolution of Canagrex. I think Monday would be an appropriate day to have the last day of debate on Bill C-70, the Bill with respect to child allowances. That Bill will go to a legislative committee to permit examination by Members.

I have indicated the legislation for next week and I also intend to proceed with Bill C-74, the Act with respect to electoral redistribution and amendment to the Constitution. I want to deal as well with the Bills relating to the Toronto Harbour Commission, to the Canada Shipping Act, and to amendments to the Criminal Code concerning pari mutuels.

As always, in order to accommodate the Opposition and all Members of the House, I will arrange the business in the presence of a spokesperson from the Opposition who can make whatever contribution is deemed appropriate.

Mr. Ian Deans (Hamilton Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I was wondering whether the Government House Leader (Mr. Hnatyshyn) might be able to tell us whether he has scheduled, for the next few days, any further discussions with regard to the reference to committee of the matter of the Canada Commercial Bank and the Northland Bank?

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Mr. Speaker, I am glad the Hon. Member raised that issue because I do not want him to have any misunderstanding about the setting forward of this particular motion. It is my intention to continue discussions. I am sorry that I was not present last Monday. We had agreed that the matter would go forward last Tuesday. I do not want the Hon. House Leader to have any misunderstanding with respect to the order of business. I will get together with the House Leaders at a mutually agreeable time to discuss these matters. I am sure that we can make progress.

TRADE

TABLING OF REPORT OF HON. JAMES KELLEHER TO PRIME MINISTER OF CANADA

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 47(2) I have the honour to lay upon the table copies, in both official languages, of a document entitled Report by the Hon. James Kelleher, P.C., M.P. to the Right Hon. Brian Mulroney, Prime Minister of Canada.

Statements by Ministers

TRADE

CANADA-UNITED STATES NEGOTIATIONS—STATEMENT BY PRIME MINISTER

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I rise to inform the House and the country that I have today spoken to the President of the United States to express Canada's interests in pursuing a new trade agreement between our two countries.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mulroney: We hope that this action will lead to negotiations for a new trade agreement between the United States and Canada. I have asked the President to explore with Congress their interest in pursuing these negotiations. Both sides recognize that the issues are complex. Both sides are determined to see the process moved as expeditiously as possible. The President and I will be meeting in the spring of 1986 to review progress and the prospects for a new agreement.

[Translation]

Hon. Members will recall that at Quebec City six months ago, President Reagan and I made a declaration on trade in goods and services. We pledged to explore all possible ways to reduce and eliminate existing barriers in our bilateral trade. We instructed the Minister of International Trade (Mr. Kelleher) and the President's Trade Representative to report on how trade could be enhanced between our two countries. Today I will table the Minister's report to me on this vitally important subject. Of course, we will make it public, Mr. Speaker.

[English]

Throughout our history trade has been critical to Canada's livelihood. Now, almost one-third of what we produce is exported. Few countries in the world are so dependent upon trade. Trade simply means jobs. Yet, our share of world trade has been declining. This trend ultimately threatens the jobs of many Canadians and the living standards of the nation as a whole. We must confront this threat. We must, as a nation, reverse this trend. To do so we need a better, a fairer, and more predictable trade relationship with the United States. At stake are more than two million jobs which depend directly on Canadian access to the U.S. market.

Five decades ago the world was in the midst of the great depression. Restrictive trade policies made things worse. Canada and the U.S. were the first to respond to the strong protectionist pressures of the time. They began the process of tearing down these obstacles to growth. Canada and the United States indeed concluded a bilateral trade agreement in 1935. More countries joined them in 1938. The principles underlying the Canadian-American bilateral agreement formed the foundation of the post-war multilateral trading system.

● (1510)

For half a century Canada has pursued consistently a policy of trade liberalization. Today, more than ever, our prosperity and that of our partners depend on an expanding world trade and a growing world economy. In all the forums where Canada is present, we are working to remove the impediments to trade, aid, investment and development on a global basis.

[Translation]

In particular we are playing a leading role in promoting and preparing for a new round of multilateral trade negotiations in the GATT. We are consulting the less developed countries on issues of common concern; and we emphatically support their participation in the negotiations.

No responsible person anywhere today advocates protectionism as a national economic strategy. Yet, sector by sector, region by region, country by country, Canada included, there persists the impulse to protectionism, whenever the going gets tough. Protectionist measures are always advocated as exceptional cases. But the barriers grow more numerous, more ingenious and more insidious all the time. Sometimes these measures are aimed directly at Canadian products or services; often they are aimed at others, but catch us in the process. The motive may be laudable. The effect may be incremental. But in any overall reckoning, protectionist mesures are always self-defeating. This impulse to protectionism is defensive and negative—yet entirely understandable in human terms. This is what we are up against, Mr. Speaker.

[English]

Economics, geography, common sense and the national interest dictate that we try to secure and expand our trade with our closest and largest trading partner. To do so is fully consistent with our commitment to freer trade on a multilateral basis. Of course, any new agreement between Canada and the United States would have to meet the test of our overriding obligations under the GATT.

Five decades ago, national Governments turned inward to shield their peoples from economic distress. Ultimately, protectionism proved suicidal. It brought on the great depression with all its attendant misery.

The Government will be pursuing clear goals in our talks with the United States. We are two sovereign democracies in every way, sharing the same continent. It seems to me that reaching out with our maturity and strengths to seek out ways of enhancing mutual beneficial trade goals is an honourable course of action.

The need to secure our access to the U.S. market was the dominant theme of representations made in all parts of the country to the Minister for International Trade (Mr. Kelleher) during his extensive consultations last spring and summer. The same message was heard by the Senate-House of Commons committee which reported in late August. Hon. Members will have taken note of the conclusions of the Macdonald Commission, together with its impressive analysis and documentation. Canadians will also be aware of the strong representations on trade which have been made by their provincial Premiers over the last several months. I have taken care, and shall continue to take special care, as I did this afternoon by speaking personally with all provincial Premiers in advance, to consult with my fellow First Ministers on an ongoing basis as the process unfolds. To that end, I have placed this major issue on the agenda at the meeting of First Ministers in November. The Government will also arrange, if possible, a full debate in the House on the subject at a time agreeable to Hon. Members.

We must all be aware that international negotiations are complex and extremely challenging. Success is not a sure thing, but the results of success are well worth the enormous effort and good faith required for these negotiations. Moreover, we have already agreed to establish a special mechanism with the provinces, to ensure their continuing involvement throughout the process. To support Canada's negotiating effort, the Minister of International Trade is creating a new consultative arrangement with business, labour and other groups.

I emphasize that we are beginning a process of purely commercial negotiations with the United States of America, the results of which would provide sufficient time for all Canadians to plan ahead to take advantage of new opportunities which come with enhanced access. We seek to negotiate the broadest possible package of mutually beneficial reductions in tariff and non-tariff barriers between our two countries. I accept the words of prudence coming to us from some quarters, indeed from some quarters of the House, on this subject. I accept those words and I respect them. We understand the natural concerns of various sectors and regions that their interests as well be recognized both in the negotiations and in any agreement. Of course, this shall be the case.

However, there is general consensus that we must seek to secure and improve our trade with the United States. To shrink from this challenge and opportunity would be an act of timidity unworthy of Canada. It would be contrary to our national interest. Our political sovereignty, our system of social programs, our commitment to fight regional disparities, our unique cultural identity, our special linguistic character—these are the essence of Canada. They are not at issue in these negotiations.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mulroney: They will be stronger at all times in a Canada made more confident and prosperous from a secure and dynamic trading relationship with our biggest customer, our close friend, and with all the world.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Right Hon. John N. Turner (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I received a copy of the statement of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) at 1.35 this afternoon, 25 minutes before Parliament assembled on a matter affecting the future of all Canadians. I consider that to be insufficient notice, and I do not consider it to be living up to the standards which he promised for the House of civility in the treatment across the floor.

Mr. Mulroney: Mr. Speaker, with permission, may I apologize to my right hon. friend. I believed that it was delivered within the appropriate time frame. I convey sincere apologies to my right hon. friend; I thought it had been delivered on time.

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): Mr. Speaker, of course I accept the Prime Minister's apology. However, it is becoming a habit in ministerial statements to limit the Opposition's time to the minimum and to discourage free and good debate in the House.

I have not had the opportunity of reading or inspecting the report of the Minister of International Trade (Mr. Kelleher) to the Prime Minister and of course can make no comment on it. It must have some substance in it, because what the Prime Minister just said is very thin gruel indeed. If the country is to gain entry into the Prime Minister's mind on the collective direction of the Government on this issue from this particular speech, I venture to say that the country will not succeed. There is no blueprint in that speech. He does not set the parameters as to where he would like the negotiations to go. Frankly I say to him, not having read the fundamental document which he tabled, that the speech itself was not worthy of the importance of the subject to Canadians.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): The issue of free trade is the most critical issue facing the Canadian economy. Our relationship with the United States has implications for all regions and all economic sectors of Canada. Negotiations will be vital for every business, for every working man and woman in the country.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, the question has been considered very closely. I know it was dealt with in a C.D. Howe Research Institute report and, quite recently, the Special Joint Committee of the Senate and of the House of Commons on Canada's International Relations has made a full examination of the issue. I take this opportunity to congratulate my colleagues, the Hon. Member for Saint-Maurice (Mr. Chrétien) and the Hon. for Winnipeg-Fort Garry (Mr. Axworthy), on their outstanding contribution to the proceedings and especially to the conclusions of the committee.

Mr. Speaker, the position of our Party is quite simply summed up in one of the committee's conclusions. I quote from page 38 of the parliamentary report:

> The Committee recommends that there be immediate bilateral trade discussions with the United States.
> The discussions should centre initially on resolving current trade irritants, especially the prevention of the imposition of additional non-tariff barriers to trade between the two countries. Issues such as the definition of the net effect of subsidies provided by both sides and the identification of the appropriate jurisdictional authority for implementing changes in non-tariff barriers should be dealt with explicitly. These discussions should be used to explore the potential for additional trade liberalization between the two countries and for securing and strengthening access to each other's markets. Issues such as trade in services, government procurement, and reducing remaining tariff barriers should be dealt with explicitly.

Now, the following passage is very important:

> The Committee views these discussions as the natural extension of a process begun by Prime Minister Mulroney and President Reagan at Quebec City. The Committee believes that it is premature for Canada to initiate formal bilateral negotiations but that it is necessary to initiate broad discussions with the United States to determine their receptivity to liberalizing bilateral trade. After a ministerial report to Parliament on the outcome of these discussions and on whether certain conditions have been met, the government should decide whether the prospects are sufficiently promising to continue on to detailed negotiations.

That, Mr. Speaker, is our position.

● (1520)

[English]

The Government, on the other hand, has moved a stage further than that and, we believe, prematurely. I cite what the Prime Minister said this afternoon. He said, "We hope that this action will lead to negotiations for a new trade agreement between the United States and Canada". He is asking the President to advise the Congress, which is the initial step into the initiation of such negotiations. This goes beyond what the parliamentary committee recommended and for good reasons.

We are concerned that before entering formal negotiations with the United States we, in Parliament, and the country as a whole should know the full parameters of the Canadian position. We want to know what the exemptions will be, what adjustments will be required and what assistance will be given to our working force. We will want to know how the country and how the United States will respond to non-tariff barriers. We would like a blueprint of the general tactic and the general scheme of the negotiations. We have not had that.

We consider that the Government is launching upon this exercise with the United States with inadequate prior discussion in Parliament and without revealing its negotiating position or the parameters of that position in any detail. Obviously there has to be give and take in the negotiations, but we would have preferred a more specific proposition presented to this Parliament.

I can understand and echo what the Prime Minister said; that this is a very crucial negotiation for this country. We have a huge market in the United States. It has 220 million people as against the Canadian population of 25 million. Seventy per cent of our exports go to the United States, representing some $80 billion in 1984.

What we are saying, Sir, is that we must have an honest and open debate on the parameters and on the cost of benefits of any arrangements with the United States. We must know what it is that the Government is trying to accomplish. We cannot go into this discussion without having a better idea of where the Government stands.

I noticed that the Prime Minister mentioned a parliamentary debate. I have it in his text, and he has repeated it here this afternoon. On page 4 of his text we find that the Government would also arrange, if possible, a debate in this House on the subject of trade at a time agreeable to Hon. Members. Not "if possible", there must be a debate on this issue and it must be early and it must be full. We want a far better knowledge of the position which the Government intends to take and the full scope of the negotiations.

The Macdonald Commission, headed by Donald Macdonald, a former colleague of ours, of mine, and a good friend, suggested that we take what was termed "a leap of faith on free trade". But this is too big a jump. We must go into these negotiations with our eyes open. The Government is not telling us the whole story. In fact, we are not even sure which Minister is in charge.

Initially, at the time of the Quebec Summit, the Prime Minister reserved in his own office and to his own purview the subject of bilateral negotiations and bilateral relations with the United States. He delegated to the Minister for International Trade the preparation of a document of reference, which I have not had the opportunity of seeing. Two days ago he put some distance between himself and those negotiations with the President. He nominated his Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Clark), the Right Hon. Member from High River, a former Prime Minister—

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): Yellowhead.

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): Yellow River—Yellowhead.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: What about Vancouver Quadra?

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): I can say to the hon. gentleman that that constituency is on the wrong side of the mountain, but it is a very beautiful one.

What has happened here is that the Prime Minister is starting to put some distance between himself and the negotiations. He has delegated it to a senior Minister, that is true, but he is putting a little distance between himself and those negotiations and getting himself a fall-back position. This would seem to indicate to me that he is not quite as gung-ho as he was when he met the President on St. Patrick's Day in Quebec City.

What we are concerned about is the split between the United States administration and the United States Congress. The Prime Minister has recited the growing protectionist sentiment around the world.

The United States Congress is in a particularly protectionist mood. Bills are being introduced to set forth import quotas against a whole variety of Canadian products, lumber and steel. The administration is even using the health code to impede the transfer of some of our products across the border, like pork. The President is preaching free trade, that is sure. But even as he speaks of free trade, he includes in his most recent declaration mention of a war chest, strike forces to ensure—Are you raising your finger, Mr. Speaker, to tell me that I have one more minute?

Mr. Speaker: Yes.

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): Then I will ask for unanimous consent of the House. This is a fundamental issue and it is the first opportunity we have had to respond to it.

Mr. Speaker: I do not disagree with the Right Hon. Member. I am perfectly willing to have that question put, but I do normally indicate to Members as their time is expiring.

Does the Right Hon. Member have the consent of the House to continue beyond his normal time?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): I want to thank Members from all sides of the House, Mr. Speaker. This is a fundamental issue affecting this country and we want to state our position as clearly as we can at this stage on the basis of the documentation we have.

The President speaks of free trade. He includes in that speech mention of strike forces and war chests to ensure that U.S. industry and business are protected and defended from outside competition. In other words, he is protecting himself and keeping his elbows very close to his ribs. The speech has a schizophrenic view, a protectionist underpinning to a vocabulary and to a rhetoric of free trade.

There are also increasing numbers of countervailing requests filed with the United States International Trade Commission and the U.S. Department of Commerce. This country is facing not only legislative barriers but we are also facing judicial barriers that the litigious process of the United States allows so freely.

I ask the Government, and I hope we will get an answer when we get an opportunity to debate this: how does the Government propose to deal with the conflicting approaches of the legislative and executive branches of the U.S. Government and the seeming inconsistency in the President's own statement?

Another important question in our mind: does the President of the United States have the power to deliver? It is quite clear that if the Prime Minister finally finds a direction, pursues it with some vigour, pursues it with some determination, he has the majority in the House of Commons to carry it. The President has no such power. The Prime Minister knows full well that there is a separation of powers under the U.S. constitution. With every month that passes, the President of the United States has less influence with that Congress, whether it be on tax reform, on the budgetary deficit and, I venture to say and suggest to the Prime Minister, on the question of free trade as well. With every month that passes he becomes more of a lame duck. The Prime Minister and his Government have already lost a valuable first year of their mandate and a valuable first year of the President's own mandate in failing to bring this matter before the House and before the discussion process.

[Translation]

I think the Prime Minister is right to admit that the position of provincial governments will have a vital impact on the discussions or negotiations. How will purchasing policies, established in this country by the provinces, affect negotiations? How does the Government intend to respond to the needs of the provinces in trade negotiations?

● (1530)

[English]

What is the Prime Minister going to say to his provincial First Minister colleagues? Are the provinces going to believe in free trade? Is he going to move first to persuade the First Ministers of the provinces to eliminate some of the barriers between the free movement of people and goods across provincial borders? Is he going to suggest to them: "Buy Ontario, buy Alberta, achetez Québec". Is that the tenor and mood of what he is trying to suggest in our relationship with the United States?

He says that he is going to put this on the agenda at the next meeting of First Ministers with himself in the month of November.

What questions are you going to put, I say through you, Mr. Speaker, on the agenda? Are you going to be discussing provincial procurement policies? Are you going to be discussing provincial subsidies? Are you going to be suggesting and discussing provincial incentives? These are very important questions, I believe, because we would like to know how the Government intends to meet the needs of provincial Governments in the trade talks.

I think, Sir, too, it is time to end the myth that free trade means unrestricted and unfettered trade in absolutely all areas. That would be tantamount to joining some sort of economic union with the United States and I do not believe that that position is supported by a majority of Canadians.

Canadians are concerned, Sir, in these negotiations launched today by the Prime Minister and his Government about our political independence. We are concerned about our cultural integrity. We are concerned about the independence of the economic decision-making process. I do not know whether it was deliberate but on page 5 of the Prime Minister's statement he neglected to recite that in his presentation to the House, and I read that paragraph. In the text are the following words: "We are not negotiating a customs union, a common market or any other economic arrangement which would affect our own independence or our relations with the rest of the world". I take that to be his position but he did not bring it forth in his presentation to the House. We would certainly be very, very loath to be part of any such customs union arrangement.

It is time to end the myth that free trade means unrestricted and unfettered trade in absolutely all areas. Liberals have always supported freer trade.

[Translation]

The Liberals and the Liberal Party have always supported the liberalisation of trade relations, that is, a reduction in tariff and non-tariff barriers, but, as I have said many times before, never at the expense of our sovereignty, our cultural identity or our freedom of decision in economic matters. Any discussions on the subject must allow for the particular needs of our Canadian economy and society.

[English]

We will want to learn at the same time as the Government moves into these negotiations what its view is of some related questions. What will free trade or free trade arrangements or a freer trade arrangement mean in terms of the reconciliation of our stabilization policies? Our taxation policies? Our regional economic development policies? What will it mean in terms of the independence of the manoeuvres which the Canadian people have in living and governing themselves in their own way?

Mr. Speaker, there is a danger of being railroaded into a hasty decision which might later prove to be damaging to the Canadian interests. I must say that we on this side of the House or this quarter of the House, do not have much confidence in the Government's negotiating abilities. I watched the performance of the Prime Minister at the Quebec summit. The President wanted the abolition of the Foreign Investment Review Act. Yes, Sir, Mr. President, he got it. He wanted the elimination of the National Energy Program, yes, Sir, he got it.

Mr. Chrétien: What did he get in return?

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): He wanted support for star wars, yes, he got it until the Prime Minister started taking a few polls and recognized what the Canadian people were really thinking. He wanted the north warning system—in other words, the Prime Minister threw everything right on the table at those negotiations and the President walked off with the whole show. Time and again we have seen this Government cave in to the slightest pressure. How can we expect that suddenly Government Members will discover they have a backbone to stand up to the enormous pressure which will be brought by the United States to get an agreement more favourable to them than to us? How can we believe that they will stand up to that pressure when we saw the Prime Minister's response during the summer when the Polar Sea went through our Canadian waters and we get a very late—that was an excellent statement, but—

Mr. Chrétien: Too little too late.

Mr. Mulroney: Too little too late and probably—

Mr. Chrétien: We were never challened before.

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): Probably opening us up to a challenge in the World Court but—

Mr. Chrétien: They came and insulted you not us.

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): When that boat was entering Canadian waters there was no protest by the Prime Minister.

Mr. Chrétien: Not a word.

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): Or by the Secretary of State for External Affairs. They sat mute. That boat moved forward. The President did not yield. The President did not recognize those waters as being Canadian. The President did not ask the Prime Minister's Government's position. The President did not even require that American public boat to fly a Canadian courtesy flag going through Canadian waters. If it is that kind of negotiating skill and that kind of backbone we in this corner of the House really do not have much confidence in the negotiating team.

Perhaps even more disturbing to some of us are the revelations of a dirty tricks campaign to counteract any opposition. It was outlined in a leaked document, a communications paper on the issue. There is an assumption in this governmental document that Canadian people should be kept ignorant of the issue. Let me read what the document says on page 7, and I am quoting the document:

> The strategy should rely less on educating the general public than on getting across the message that the trade initiative is a good idea. In other words, a selling job.

Don't educate the public, don't sponsor a free debate, don't try to bring Canadians into your confidence. Try to sneak it by, do a selling job; in other words, image again before substance.

More specifically the document seeks in a sneaky underhanded way to discredit anyone whether it is Mr. McDermott of the Canadian Labour Congress or whether it is individual Members of Parliament, anyone who may not agree wholeheartedly with the initiative. I give another quote from this leaked document:

> With respect to individual members of the Liberal Party, a survey of key Members and constituencies will identify circumstances where non-support of the Government's initiative would be either difficult or hypocritical. As examples, the riding of the Leader of the Opposition, the Right Hon. John Turner, is in the Province of British Columbia—a province whose forest resource sector must ensure and enhance trade in the United States—

—and so on. Then my colleague, the Hon. Member for Hamilton East (Ms. Copps) is singled out and, then my colleague, the Hon. Member for Saint-Henri-Westmount (Mr. Johnston) is singled out. Surveys are to be taken in our ridings to find out what public opinion says on these issues, such as they are manipulated by the Government, trying to put pressure on individual Members of Parliament and we are going to have that issue hopefully analysed by the committee—

Mr. Chrétien: But we have backbone. We are not afraid.

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): That is a real technique. I can tell both right hon. gentlemen that they should know that I have always been in favour of freer trade. I understand the problems of British Columbia, of lumber getting into the American market, and how important it is to the province. I understand the difficulty that we have had on the coast with respect to our fishing rights. But I will tell the right hon. gentleman, as a Member for British Columbia, we are also interested not only in better penetration of the American market but in pursuing our advantages into the Pacific Rim, into the Far East, into the other parts of the world—

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Welcome aboard.

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): Starting to come around.

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): That is it, just so long as you understand that.

Mr. Chrétien: There is a risk there, the independence of Canada.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Who speaks for the Liberal Party?

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): To play games like this with public opinion on an issue so critical to the future of our country, a secret plan to try to discredit open and informed debate, a secret plan to try to put pressure on any Members of Parliament who individually may ask relevant questions or may even take a contrary position, as usual the Government puts public relations first, and pretty sleazy public relations at that—

Mr. Chrétien: Right on.

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): —before substantive economic matters and before intelligent public debate.

Mr. Chrétien: Right on.

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): It betrays the weakness and paranoia and the looking over one's shoulder of a scandal ridden Government with a bunker mentality. That is what it portrays, Mr. Speaker.

We are asking whether we have any confidence in this team. Just as disturbing is the revelation last weekend. The United States invited four major powers, a group of five they like to call themselves, the United Kingdom, France, West Germany and Japan to a meeting called quite clandestinely. As a result of that meeting, there was an agreement among those five economic powers to work out ways to devalue the U.S. dollar. Was our Government informed? Was the Minister of Finance (Mr. Wilson) informed in advance? Was the Minister of State for Finance (Mrs. McDougall) informed? I want to know whether or not the Prime Minister was informed.

Some Hon. Members: No.

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): At the Shamrock Summit, President Reagan said, "Brian, give me a call any time you have a problem". That has changed and is now, "Don't call me, we'll call you, Brian". He did not give us any warning at all.

There is no country more vulnerable to exchange movement in the American dollar than Canada. Billions of dollars cross our border every day. We have a mutual trade of $150 billion. Yet we were not informed of this. We are now entering a free trade negotiation with the United States while our potential partner did not have the decency or foresight to inform its future partner of an exchange rate movement, something which is frankly more important than the tariff levels to which I will turn in a moment. If that is the type of special relationship the Prime Minister now has with the President of the United States, it is certainly not the kind of special relationship that bears up in a matter of substance.

Tariff barriers have been reduced gradually and progressively throughout the negotiations on the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade. By 1987, 80 per cent of our trade with the United States will be free of tariffs and 15 per cent of our trade will be subject to tariffs of 5 per cent or less. That means that 95 per cent of all Canadian goods moving across the American border is already subject to a maximum tariff of 5 per cent or is not subject to a tariff at all. Movements in the exchange rate are now more important than or equally as important as the remaining tariffs. It is the non-tariff barriers about which we must worry.

The key area for discussion and negotiation continues to be non-tariff barriers like subsidies, regulations and procurement policies. The non-tariff barriers in the United States are protected under a new guise. It is a political, economic and legal one. It can be harassment of all three kinds with the way the United States economy operates. We have to know the impact of these negotiations regarding non-tariff barriers on the various regions and sectors of Canada.

In order to eliminate those non-tariff barriers, procurement policies of the provinces and of the states and exports subsidies, only a new style of treaty will work. What will work is not an agreement but a treaty binding the federal and state Governments of the United States and the federal and provincial Governments of Canada. We should not allow pressure from the United States Government to force us to include certain items as non-tariff barriers in the discussions.

Washington has a new vocabulary. The people there like to call negotiations on trade negotiations for a level playing field. A level playing field is local vocabulary for a preoccupation with hidden and overt subsidies that foreign governments provide for exports. Americans and the Congress in particular equate subsidies to so-called unfair competition. There are a whole range of subsidies now subject to countervailing duties. Among those subsidies are subsidies that go right to the heart of the regional economic development policy of this country.

We want a full declaration from the Government indicating how it intends to treat the following items in its negotiations with the United States: social programs, health care, unemployment insurance, which has already been considered a subsidy by some in the United States, family allowances and pensions. What are we going to do about the independence and integrity of our cultural industries? What about the independence, strength and ownership of our financial industries? What about agricultural support? What about the Canadian Wheat Board? What about all the marketing boards? What about the initial payment under the Wheat Board, something which has been considered by the United States to be a hidden subsidy? What about the auto pact?

We take the view that the auto pact ought not to be included in these negotiations. We take the view that a special arrangement ought to be made for agriculture and that our cultural and financial industries should remain intact.

What about equalization payments? Those could be considered hidden subsidies open to countervail unless they are specifically included in an agreement. What about export incentives for industries in the provinces that have sales directed at the American market? There is a whole range of policies and programs which, in the words of the Parliamentary Committee, are of fundamental importance to the maintenance of a distinctive Canadian identity or to keeping solemn commitments made to significant elements of Canadian society.

The issues to which I have referred should be spelled out very clearly at the outset. The Macdonald Commission has calculated the benefits of free trade but to date the Government has not provided us with an assessment of the costs by sector, by region, by industry and by worker. What will Canadian businesses and invididuals be asked to give up?

What about the footwear industry and the clothing industry? We all know that we are not going to get something for nothing through these negotiations. Is Canada going to lose entire industries as a result of the shift in economic activity? If so, which ones and where? What sort of adjustments to the system does the Government propose?

Has the Government explored all the alternatives to enhancing our economic performance? Some argue that the GATT process has already liberalized trade and that due to the complexity of our trading relationship with the United States, that process is the most effective way to increase our trade levels with the United States and other countries. Should we not, as the committee recommends, be concentrating first on settling existing irritants to trade with the United States, opening up informal discussions and setting up the parameters of these discussions with the United States? Should we not be listing the elements affected? Interprovincial trade needs to be examined and impediments removed.

What would be the impact of these negotiations on our other trading partners? Have we explored how Japan, the Third World and the European Economic Community will react? What will be the impact on Canadian jobs, regions, transitional programs and the full-employment strategy of the Government?

We have always encouraged the Government of Canada to seek ways to enhance our trade, not only with the United States but with all countries, through an effective trade strategy. We have encouraged the Government to improve our access to foreign markets. However, a debate such as this must be an open and public one and, in our view, it must precede any formal negotiations with the United States.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): So far, we have had nothing but secrecy. This Party will continue to demand a full debate in this House before negotiations are entered into. We want the parameters of Canada's position laid out. Vague phrases from the Prime Minister like, "We are going to get a better deal," just are not good enough.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: I think we might establish now that I assume that the House would show the same courtesy to the Hon. Member for Oshawa (Mr. Broadbent) as it did to the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Turner) if he sought it.

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Hon. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the agreement to your suggestion that has come from both sides of the House but I will try to stick closer to what I understand the rules to be which is that I will make a statement of about the same length as the one made on the other side of the House.

Let me begin by saying, not entirely facetiously, that I found this nationalist-oriented speech coming from the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Turner) to be very strange coming as it did from a man who not very many months ago attacked the National Energy Program. Having made that point, I would like to say that, as the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) knows full well and as the Leader of the Opposition addressed in the substance of his comments, what we are talking about here is the very future of our nation. There can be nothing more important in the life of this Parliament than the subject matter the Prime Minister has introduced today.

I would say to the Prime Minister that when I read the brief document, I was alarmed, and I am speaking frankly. Knowing something about Canadian history, I know that it was the first Leader of the Conservative Party, the first Prime Minister of Canada, who gave this nation a national policy. With the advantage of 20/20 hindsight, I did not agree with all the details of that policy. However, with what I did agree as a Canadian was a sense of nationhood and a sense of commitment which went against the prevailing continentalism which existed south of the border and in parts of this land which said that we had to do certain things to build this nation on our own. He developed what he called a national policy which provided the foundation for this nation.

About three decades ago, another Conservative Leader, the Right Hon. John Diefenbaker, made one of the finest speeches I have ever read. As a matter of fact, it was a speech he gave in Saskatchewan where he spoke as a passionate Canadian nationalist and warned of the dangers of continentalism. It was not because he was anti-American. I hope in this debate we can avoid those caricature-type arguments. He made a passionate speech warning against the need to preserve certain Canadian institutions, including economic ones, and traditional patterns of behaviour which we had built up here so that we would remain independent as a nation.

I wish to say to the Prime Minister that if he looks carefully at some of the key clauses he has included in his statement that what we have at this stage in the approach the Prime Minister is taking with the United States is a premature step of profoundly historical significance which will result, if it is carried out to its conclusion, not only in the ignoring of the warning of John Diefenbaker but the abandonment of the vision of John A. Macdonald.

Because I say that with seriousness I wish to express my concerns now. First, I wish to say that my Party across the nation, and Members from all sides of the House, would agree with the following assumptions as Canadians that we should be holding to at this point. We should begin by saying that anything we do in the economic domain of significance would involve our great neighbour to the south, the United States. We know that $150 billion of trade is involved between our two nations. We know that any sensible economic development in this country, expansion of jobs, and growth is inextricably linked to relationships with the United States. That is a given. Beyond that, it will involve the expansion of economic relationships and growth for both nations in terms of economic growth.

I also take it as a given that when we approach our American friends and neighbours we will do so without allusions. I hope we will negotiate not out of spirit of animosity but out of a spirit of tough-minded friendship, if I can put it that way, in the full knowledge that we have to look after our interests as politicians, which is what we are elected to do, just as American politicians have to look after their interests. When we negotiate we want something fair for both sides. There are a number of examples of this. I happen to come from an automotive community. I can cite that in picking up an argument which the Prime Minister has made that what he is proposing is to be consistent not only with the good of Canadians but with the good of the Third World. He made reference to the fact that what we do should be consistent with GATT. One of the interesting features of the automotive agreement is that not only did it expand trade on both sides of the Canada-U.S. border, and provide more jobs on both sides of the border, but from a Canadian point of view it was multilateral and applied to other nations, third and fourth nations. In that sense, it had a global perspective.

I say to the Prime Minister: Beware of our American friends, those tough bargainers, because when the Americans signed that agreement it was bilateral, which was not accidental. The Americans knew full well that the automotive industry on this continent is owned and controlled in the United States. They were prepared to enter into an agreement with us. It was mutually beneficial but they were thinking beyond that. They thought they made real gains, which is why they signed it. We thought we could make gains, which is why we signed it. I repeat, it was multilateral for us but bilateral for them.

There were important safeguards in it which recognized the economic reality that we are one-tenth as powerful as the United States, not because we are timed, backward looking or reserved, but simply because it is the most dominant economic power in the world, originally stronger in resources over-all, they would argue, and stronger in population. We have done well as a nation, very well indeed, with a smaller population. However, we should have no illusions about the strength of the Americans.

Any relationship we enter into with the United States ought to be one of seeing an expanded pie, if you like, for both, in the economic domain and elsewhere. As I said not long ago, what we must ensure, not because they are mean, vindictive or malicious, but simply because they are tough, competitive and pretty successful, is that when the elephant and the beaver sit down to eat this pie together that the elephant, inadvertently or not, does not unfold its trunk, pick up the pie and go home with it.

The key point we have to keep in mind is that we are dealing with a powerful neighbour. I say to the Prime Minister that I am concerned about the naivety, although I am not sure that is the right word, but the hastiness with which the Government is now committing itself to negotiations. The Prime Minister's words are important in this. He said that the Government has committed itself to negotiations. The Prime Minister had a conversation today with the President of the United States. He said that official negotiations are now getting under way.

If one considers the options, and I do not want to abuse the House in terms of time, they are really two-fold. We could do what the Government has now recommended, which is to enter into negotiations and follow the path which the Prime Minister has laid out. It cannot be any clearer than the words in his statement when he said that we seek to negotiate the broadest possible package of mutually-beneficial reductions in tariff and non-tariff barriers between our two countries. Economically, that is pretty specific with respect to what he has in mind. I will come to the implications for our institutions and the relationships to that type of economic goal in a moment.

We could have done what the Prime Minister has announced with, I take for granted, the support of his caucus, which is to embark on that path right away. Or we could have taken another approach. We could have said that there are specific and real problems of Canadians, as there are of Americans, but beginning on our side we could say that there are certain obstacles. Not long ago I was in Atlantic Canada at a time when a decision came down in the United States which, in part, responded to arguments which said that the unemployment insurance plan in Canada constituted a subsidy for the Canadian fishery and, therefore, argumentation was made that that type of program, by implication, should not exist in Canada if we are to really have a free trade arrangement. Countervailing steps are being taken.

We have problems in the fishery on the East Coast. Our fishermen thought they had access to a U.S. market which is now taking countervailing action. We should negotiate and talk about that problem.

The lumber export business in Canada is running into countervailing action, not just on the West Coast but everywhere across the country. This is because our producers are efficient, particularly in British Columbia, although not exclusively. A good job has been done in this particular sector and it is now facing countervailing action.

Our hog producers in Quebec—

[Translation]

In la belle province of Quebec and even in Ontario and the Atlantic provinces, pork producers also have problems.

[English]

It seems to me we could have started with the specific problems, sat down and said: "Let us try to resolve these problems." We could have looked at specific American problems which could well be the flip side of the ones which I have just mentioned. I say on behalf of my colleagues, and on behalf of all Canadians for whom trade matters are not an abstraction but very much involve jobs, we ought to have begun with these very real concrete problems.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

• (1600)

Mr. Broadbent: Beyond that, Mr. Speaker, I would like to suggest that we start with that kind of approach. I think we should consider some of the other details in the package the Prime Minister has presented. Instead of now saying we are going full ahead for negotiations, which I think is a serious mistake, I think we should have a conference with the First Ministers of this land. By all means, let us have the First Ministers' Conference about which the Prime Minister has talked. Let us have all the premiers for a very serious meeting. Whether or not it is before the television cameras, I do not care one whit. What I do care about is the substance which comes out of it. Before we start negotiations, let us have the premiers sit down with the Prime Minister of Canada and go through all of the items the Prime Minister has indicated—in general phrases at the end but not spelled out—which are non-negotiable. He is absolutely right that our tradition of two great cultures must be maintained.

[Translation]

As Canadians we must continue to maintain a French and English culture here in Canada, through the legislation adopted by this Parliament and provincial Parliaments.

[English]

But we have to spell out all these general phrases. The Prime Minister has made reference, I do not know if he did today, but has in the past, that when the premiers met earlier this year they said—and I remember the essence of the communiqué—"Let's have a general commitment to free trade". Then we look at all the exceptions wanted by each of the premiers. Suddenly, in going through the list from British Columbia in the west to Newfoundland in the east, every premier in Canada had two, three, four and five exceptions for his region. I can understand that. That is their responsibility. I also want to say to the Prime Minister that if we are going to have economic relationships change with the most powerful economic nation in the world which happens to reside to the south of us, by God, before we enter into that relationship, we have to spell out in great detail here in Canada first what is and what is not negotiable. That is what needs to be done.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: We know the lists; medicare, marketing boards for our farmers, the Wheat Board for our farmers, unemployment insurance, regional development incentive programs, transportation programs. All of these are needed for our nation and are non-negotiable items. As far as my Party is concerned, and I will be specific and not just raise them rhetorically, they are non-negotiable items. They should be preserved. We fought for these things over the years in Canada and we are going to keep them. I would like to suggest that the Prime Minister say, "Let's meet with the premiers. Let's sit down and discuss the future of our nation", because that is really what is at stake. Trade may be about dollars and cents but ultimately it is about what nationhood means, namely, cultural sovereignty. The shape of daily lives in every community across our land will be profoundly affected by the outcome of what the Prime Minister has set underway here.

I say to the Prime Minister that he should give some second thought to what he has set underway here today. Instead of beginning that negotiating process now, he should have the premiers meet and, first of all, try to get a concensus about what ought to be done. He should certainly look at what ought to be non-negotiable so that our sense of nationhood will be preserved, and not only our sense of nationhood, but a sense of decency from coast to coast about our nationhood. He should try to get an agreement on that and he should then—not perhaps—but certainly come back to Parliament with a concrete proposal. I say to the Prime Minister, put the proposal that you plan to take to your negotiations before this Parliament and give all the elected people in the national Parliament of Canada the right to debate and discuss it before it goes.

We have the deepest concerns about what has happened today in the announcement made by the Prime Minister. I will be quite blunt, which will not surprise the Prime Minister coming from an Opposition Leader at this time. I think I have been candid about this because I have said it publicly. When we had a change of Government last fall I said it was good for the nation to have a change. As the Prime Minister and others will understand, I would have rather our Party had that change but that is a little premature, perhaps. I thought it was good for the nation and it was good in part because the Party to my right had become, amongst other things, quite lethargic and sloppy and we needed an improvement in administration. We needed a new toughness and approach to negotiations. However, we are seeing, Mr. Speaker, not an improvement, not a toughening, but an incredible sloppiness. It was not the Liberals, it was your Government, Mr. Prime Minister, who made the $1 billion bungle with the banks.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: And you supported the National Energy Program.

Mr. Broadbent: And that is the case. It is the present Government, Mr. Speaker, which has been so slipshod on the whole question of the tuna fish story. The tuna fish story was bad, Mr. Speaker, because of what it said about a Minister willing to take certain chances with what people ate. Beyond that it has revealed a kind of incompetence in the offices of Ministers, including the office of the Prime Minister and I, for one, do not want these guys negotiating for me at this point with the United States of America.

I conclude, Mr. Speaker, by saying that we in this Party have a confidence about the prospects of this nation. We see certain problems in certain sectors but, by God, Canadians of my generation should know that we can do it here in this country. We have a sense of our capacity, whether in British Columbia, the Atlantic Provinces, central Canada or in the prairie region, and one way in which we do not want to get out of our problems at this point of maturity, if you like, is to sort of pass them off with some kind of facile and glib form of continentalism. We are confident we can do it. Before we enter into those kinds of negotiations, I say to the Prime Minister, you propose, you ought to get out and see what kind of consensus there is in the provinces amongst Canadians, what institutions we want to preserve, and then when we have that consensus, debate it, resolve it in Parliament and then, and only then, should we go to our friends who live to the south of us and say, "Let's sit down and negotiate".

CRIMINAL CODE

AMENDMENT RESPECTING PARI-MUTUEL BETTING

Hon. John Wise (for the Minister of Justice) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-77, an Act to amend the Criminal Code, (pari-mutuel betting).

Mr. Speaker: Shall the Hon. Minister have leave to introduce the Bill?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to, Bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

Mr. Doug Lewis (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, I wish to advise the House that question No. 399 will be answered today.

[Text]

LUGGAGE CARRIER SERVICES AT AIRPORTS

Question No. 399—Mr. Gauthier:

1. Did the Government establish a luggage-carrier service at various airports and, if so (a) what will be the rental cost of such service (b) what amount will be refunded when the luggage-carrier is returned?

2. Will the service be offered at international arrival points and, if so, what measures will be taken for the exchange of foreign currency?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Minister of Transport): 1. The Government is in the process of establishing pay baggage cart systems in the domestic and transborder areas of the major airports. The rental consists of a $1 deposit for the cart with a $0.50 refund upon its return to a dispenser.

2. At present there are no plans to introduce pay baggage carts in the international arrival areas. However, should pay baggage carts be implemented for this passenger sector, arrangements will be made for foreign exchange services to be provided within the international arrival areas.

[English]

Mr. Lewis: I would ask that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

Mr. Speaker: The question as enumerated by the Parliamentary Secretary has been answered. Shall the remaining questions be allowed to stand?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

IMMIGRATION ACT, 1976

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Miss MacDonald that Bill C-55, an Act to amend the Immigration Act, 1976, be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee.

Mr. Speaker: Before I recognize the Hon. Member for Vancouver East (Ms. Mitchell), may I inform the House that because of the ministerial statement, consideration of Government Orders will be extended by 55 minutes today. Therefore, Private Members' hour will begin at 5.55 p.m.

Ms. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, we fully support the recent changes in immigration policy resulting from a court decision requiring oral hearings for refugees and immigrants. This was long overdue and it is a just and sensible decision. However, as I indicated this morning, as a result there has been a considerable increase in the number of appeals and a backlog has developed which means long delays for both refugees and sponsors of immigrants who requested and were refused admission to Canada. Unfortunately, our critic on immigration, the Hon. Member for Spadina (Mr. Heap), was not able to be here today but I would like to quote from a press release of his dated April 23. He said:

"Eight years is long enough for a refugee to wait in limbo," said Dan Heap, M.P., NDP critic on Immigration. Mr. Heap demanded that the Minister of Employment & Immigration take action right away to end the waiting for 20,000 refugee claimants in Canada.

"The Supreme Court said on April 4, 1985 that they are all entitled to a hearing," said Mr. Heap, who represents many refugees and immigrants in his riding, Spadina.

Mr. Heap said that the figure of 20,000 includes people who could have been landed already, and do not need to be added to the backlog.

"For example," said Mr. Heap, a mother whose husband was killed and children persecuted for their politics back home ought to be landed on humanitarian grounds. Others with strong family ties in Canada ought to be admitted on humanitarian grounds, he suggested, as well as those who come from war zones. Besides, Mr. Heap pointed out, there are genuine refugee claimants who give clear evidence that they have already been persecuted, but are being held back by red tape.

"Why do the officials take so many months just to type up the transcript of the claimant's statement under oath for the Refugee Status Advisory Committee to read?" Mr. Heap asked. "And if they really want to reduce the backlog and save time, why do they put people unnecessarily into the refugee stream?"

We have concerns in this regard, Mr. Speaker. We are particularly concerned about the piecemal approach being used in this Bill. This is rather strange because last June the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Miss MacDonald) said:

A piecemeal approach could have very negative results for refugees who really need our help.

However, we have here a piecemeal Bill. Increasing the size of the Immigration Appeal Board from 18 members to 50 will not necessarily deal with the backlog of cases more effectively. It is important that appointees to this Board be carefully selected for their expertise, experience and sensitivity to the situation of immigrants, particularly refugees. Too often in the past appointees to the Board have been former immigration officials who, despite being well-intentioned, I am sure, have been really indoctrinated in bureaucratic procedures. It has usually been their job in the past to decide why these applicants are not eligible to stay in Canada. They often had to refuse applicants so they are hardly likely to be particularly sensitive on the other side and act as advocates on behalf of the applicants during an appeal. The process allows for bureaucratic input in the early stages, and having former officials of the Department on the IAB hardly gives a different perspective, one which is more objective and sympathetic toward the appellant. That is why we ask the Minister to be careful in appointing former bureaucrats to the Board. It is most important that appointees to the Board be from varying backgrounds, people who can be objective but who also have a particular sensitivity toward the immigrant and his or her family.

We have concerns that the expanded Board will apparently deal with refugee claims and appeals as well as other immigration cases which are often quite different in nature. Churches, community groups and lawyers have expressed concern that the IAB in the past has had very little experience and a very poor track record in recognizing genuine refugees. We are concerned about that in the present as well, Mr. Speaker. Therefore, we feel there should be a separate Board dealing specifically with refugee cases. This was recommended in the Plaut report on refugee redetermination published last June. This is most important. There are many circumstances which contribute to creating political refugees and these have been defined by the UN. However, I must say that in some cases I have been involved in as a Member of Parliament there have been times when the Board and this country appear to be much more rigid in their interpretation than is the UN. We know that most of these people cannot return to their homes and it is important that they have a genuine and sympathetic hearing.

I would like to read from some notes of my colleague referring to comments by church and community groups, as well as immigration lawyers, who have a great deal of experience in this area. They have for years demanded an oral hearing. Now that the Supreme Court in the Singh case, assisted by the Canadian Council of Churches, has declared that refugees have the right to be heard directly by those who decide their fate, there is strong insistence that the hearing process not be watered down. They fear this move would enhance the power of a bureaucracy which has been hostile to refugee immigrants in Canada, and would result in many genuine refugees being deported to a dangerous situation in their home countries. There is a better way. The Standing Conference of Canadian Organizations Concerned for Refugees, which is composed of about 70 groups and which predicted eight years ago that our refugee claim process was unjust and would fail, has been vindicated by the Supreme Court. It has proposed an alternative way to address the backlog. They point out that the Minister and several successive Ministers could have made better use of the Minister's power under the legislation to create special measures or special programs for designated groups. For example, Iranians who arrived last year were not told by immigration officers that Canada has a special program for Iranians. Basically Canada does not send Iranians back to Iran. These people were manoeuvred into claiming refugee status which requires a case-by-case examination on a narrow legal basis and which takes much more time and of course costs more than the special program. It is estimated by a well-informed source that if all the refugee claimants who should have been directed to the special programs, plus the Guyanese who ought to have one, were taken out of the refugee stream, the backlog would be reduced to a quarter of its present size. Therefore that group, at a recent consultation in Toronto, asked that the Minister declare a special humanitarian program for all those caught in this bureaucratic jungle as of April 4, 1984.

It is worth noting that Rabbi Plaut, in his report on refugee redetermination in Canada, considers that this humanitarian and compassionate system of special programs has been too little used and should be used now. We ask the Minister to consider this as a better alternative for preventing the backlog which he often faces and which this Bill is directed to in a rather expedient way.

We were pleased this morning to hear the Minister clarify one of our very strong concerns with this Bill in that he has decided to amend the Bill to re-establish a panel of three persons who will hear appeals by sponsors to bring in their relatives as permanent residents. The original proposal contained in this Bill was to have a quorum of one person. In our view that would not be an objective appeal procedure. One person can only speak for himself or herself and that results in a very subjective evaluation. Three people give a balance and provide more expertise which can be shared in a final decision.

We also support Clause 6 which provides a simpler appeal process, provided that there is a three-person board to hear the appeal. It is a good thing that permanent residents will now have the same right as Canadian citizens to appeal the rejection of a sponsorship application of a relative. Many of us who deal with many immigration cases in our ridings find it very heartbreaking when a person who is a landed immigrant, but not yet a citizen, is unable to use the appeal procedure which is available to his next door neighbour who has just completed citizenship. We agree with the changes in this regard. There must be a fair and impartial hearing process and we, therefore, feel very strongly that there must be three people.

The NDP is very concerned that piecemeal steps are being taken through Bill C-55 and that this ignores the general recommendations of the Plaut proposal which we support. I would like to again quote our immigration critic who said in June:

> Rabbi Plaut has given a just, quick and inexpensive proposal for 13,800 people in Canada.

The Member for Spadina called on the Minister of Employment and Immigration to use Rabbi Plaut's proposal. The Supreme Court said that none of the 13,800 people claiming refugee status in Canada should be deported without first having a chance to meet face-to-face, in an oral hearing, with those who decide their fate. However, he pointed out that there are many, in fact the majority, who deserve to be allowed to stay even without a hearing. Many of these come from countries such as Afghanistan, Iran, El Salvador, or Sri Lanka, to which Canada does not force people to return. These could all be issued Minister's permits to stay, except those already under deportation order. They could be allowed to go briefly to the United States to be readmitted to Canada. In Vancouver we call this the "Seattle shuffle". Many of these people have come from countries torn by war or racial violence and have families here to help them settle. It would be in Canada's humanitarian tradition to let them stay and the Minister has the power to do so.

We warmly welcome Rabbi Plaut's report and we feel that it has many—

Mr. Lapierre: Mr. Speaker, I would ask you to count the number of Members present, to see whether we have a quorum.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Charest): I see we do not have a quorum in the House. Ring the bells!

Resuming debate.

[English]

Ms. Mitchell: Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to have such a large audience for my grand finale. I hope they are all going to listen very intently. As I was saying when I was somewhat distracted by the bells, there is a great need for an over-all review and a revamping of our immigration policy and procedures in Canada. Many of us who have dealt with immigration cases have very special concerns which arrive from them and indicate a need for policy change. I would like to mention several examples which illustrate problems that I hope the Minister will explore and which should have been considered in a broader immigration Bill. Some of these involve attitudinal changes as well.

The Minister stated this morning that he wants to encourage family immigration. We all favour this goal, but we wish that the Government really meant it. While the Minister extols family immigration, there is no question that the policy of the Government has gone in the opposite direction. Family reunification is being curtailed by the Government in favour of a "buy your way into Canada" policy. Entrepreneurs are given priority over ordinary workers and families. An elite moneyed class is being favoured by the Conservative Government. I suppose the Government hopes these people will vote Conservative once they get here. It is necessary to have at least $5,000 of capital, and in many cases much more, in order to come to Canada. There is no guarantee at all that the entrepreneurs who come will create additional jobs.

We do not oppose business people coming to Canada if it will add to jobs, but we think that the priority in this regard is unfair. Many families have been waiting for years to bring remaining relatives to Canada. Many of these relatives are alone. I know of many young women who have been left in countries where it is really forbidden for women to be separated from their extended families. These young women cannot come into Canada because they are over the age of 21. We feel that there is considerable evidence and a long history of immigrants and sponsors being very responsible in caring for family members and ensuring that they are able to get housing and financial assistance and not become dependent on the Government. We should examine our priorities again in favour of family reunification.

Another issue is that of exploitation of immigrants by immigration lawyers and consultants. This has been raised frequently by my friend and colleague, the Member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mr. Waddell). This area should be explored. Sponsors and prospective immigrants to Canada should be given information freely. They should be told their rights and given help with procedures. I think we should even have interpretation services available when needed. In particular, I think they should be told how to appeal. They should not have to go to a lawyer and pay a huge sum of money to have these fairly routine procedures carried out for them. They should be aware of how to use their Members of Parliament in circumstances where they are having difficulty and need extra help. Costly legal fees are often not necessary and sometimes the somewhat unethical practices of lawyers are exploiting people unnecessarily.

A third issue is that of domestics. We still discriminate against domestics, most of whom are women. When they come to Canada on work visas they have very few protections and very little chance of becoming landed immigrants. Today one of my colleagues gave me a letter which describes a very sad and unfair situation which discriminates against a domestic and her mentally retarded daughter. This woman had been in Canada for five years and had always worked at the same place as a domestic. She had a mentally retarded daughter whom she wanted to have join her. Her employers were willing to accommodate them. She had a regular job. The Canadian Association for the Mentally Retarded supported her request for a ministerial permit, but she was twice denied permission for her daughter to join her in Canada. I think that is discriminatory in several respects.

I am surprised that the new Minister of State for Immigration (Mr. McLean) was the latest one to refuse her daughter entry. I think his reasons, in the letter which I saw, were extremely weak. We should be changing our policies and procedures to provide much greater opportunity and protection for domestic workers who come to Canada.

There also seems to be a deliberate policy to discourage immigration from certain parts of the world. We have received repeated complaints and examples of this, particularly from India, Pakistan and Hong Kong. Today I was told about a Halifax doctor who brought his parents to Canada from Islamabad. His last remaining relative, his daughter, has been refused permission to come to this country, despite the fact that there is a written policy indicating that the last remaining relative should have special consideration to join the family. This family has also waited five months for its appeal to be considered.

We need to look at our immigration policy in respect of cases involving health problems which have been treated and are judged in a very inhumane way by Immigration officials. I can think of several where there was no danger to the health of other persons, where there was a chronic situation and where the family was willing to assume all financial responsibilities. One case involved two Vietnamese men. They were the last remaining sons; the whole family had settled in Canada. They were left in a refugee camp in Thailand. They had a history of mental illness, but health officials at the refugee camp said that it was due to the stress of camp life and of not being reunited with their family. These medical authorities felt that they should be reunited with their families and that their health problem was not serious. They were refused permission to join their family, and that is still the case.

I am particularly concerned about the problems facing women who want to immigrate to Canada and those who have already come here with their husbands. I ask the Minister to give special attention to these areas because he is also the Minister responsible for the Status of Women. Women are still treated as spouses; they are not treated as individuals with rights of their own. When they come to Canada with their families and their husbands, they are treated as spouses. The husband is the individual who applies, gets the points and is recognized by the Department of Immigration. This results in a very insecure situation for women. They are really here as dependents and are second-class citizens. Often such women remain in very damaging marital situations once they have come here because they have no real rights, no financial security, no alternatives, and they fear deportation.

Another example is men who have arranged for women to come to Canada on the promise of marriage. We know of many examples where they bring over women and the immigration papers indicate that it is with the prospect of marriage or that they are fiancees. They get them here and then they do not marry them. They are exploited, they have no protection of security. I recall the slave trade—and that is really what it is—in poor women from Third World countries through agencies both in Canada and Australia, in particular. Marriages have been arranged of poor women who are desperate to survive to unknown older men. There is a history of exploitation and a loss of rights.

We require a complete review of federal and provincial policies to provide a better integrated program for refugees and immigrants. There are times when people who have been here for some time, and their families, are destitute through no fault of their own. Who could have predicted the tremendous unemployment to which we have been subjected? This has affected some people who came to Canada years ago. Occasionally such people need social assistance. The instances are rare. Our population of immigrant families has a proud history of looking after their own. They do not apply for outside help unless there is absolutely no other way of surviving. We need to look at that matter and at providing more co-ordination on the part of the federal Government and provincial Governments in the area of social assistance.

I am particularly concerned about inland refugees from Latin American countries. In Vancouver, they have been lining up at food banks because they are not given the same kind of consideration when attempting to receive refugee status as the Poles, for example. There are long delays. Many women with children cannot feed their children—they have no money, they are ineligible for social assistance, and they are destitute. Some arrangements should be made to provide them with social assistance during the waiting period.

In conclusion, I am sure there are many other concerns which have not been mentioned today. The point we are trying to make is that we should not be dealing with only a small part of the immigration scene through one Bill in an ad hoc way or in a piecemeal way. We should be introducing a more comprehensive immigration Bill to look at many items which have been substantiated. If the Minister looks at her own case-load of appeals made to her on humanitarian grounds, she will see similar cases indicating that a change in policy and often a change in attitude, on the part of Immigration officials are needed. We urge the Minister to amend the Bill to deal with our specific concerns and to work, along with all of us, toward a more just, equitable and positive immigration policy in general.

[Translation]

Mrs. Suzanne Duplessis (Louis-Hébert): Mr. Speaker, I am proud to have this opportunity to take part in the debate on Bill C-55, an Act to amend the Immigration Act, 1976, on this memorable and historic day, after hearing the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) announce that discussions will be held with the United States on the liberalization of trade relations.

Mr. Speaker, the procedure for claiming refugee status, which was implemented when the Act became effective in 1978, provides for two review levels. The first is the Refugee Status Advisory Committee, which sits in Ottawa and is responsible for evaluating the transcript of the interview under oath and informing the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Miss MacDonald) of its conclusions. The Minister then determines whether or not the claim is valid. If the claim is denied, the claimant may appeal to the Immigration Appeal Board. The decisions of the Board are subject to judicial review under Section 28 of the Federal Court Act.

Claimants who go through the whole process may be in Canada for more than three years. That is why an increasing number of people are coming to Canada for the sole purpose of claiming refugee status and thus perhaps having a chance of staying in this country permanently.

The sheer numbers have led to unacceptable delay in handing down decisions in the case of bona fide refugees. We are even unable to put claimants whose claims are not bona fide out of the country, even if their claims were obviously not valid from the start.

Pending a decision on their claims, these people have no status in Canada. We find them in our largest urban centres, where they barely manage to survive. They are not eligible for federal assistance, and access to provincial welfare programs is limited in their case.

Unfortunately, there are many such people without status in Canada, and there is also a lack of staff to conduct investigations. This means we have a class of people who want to become Canadians, who are living in a state of anxiety, who cannot buy a house, who cannot plan for the future, cannot get married, cannot raise a family because they do not know what tomorrow will bring since they are not sure they will be allowed to stay in this country.

Surely, Mr. Speaker, something should be done for all those people.

In April 1984 Rabbi Gunther Plaut was commissioned to hold consultations and make recommendations on a new refugee status recognition system, and that will eventually lead to amendments to the Act. His report was released last June and, later on in this session, Parliament will be asked to consider legislative provisions based on that report.

The Minister of Employment and Immigration (Miss MacDonald) has already launched public consultations which will pave the way for the formulation of a new application review system. Once it has received Cabinet approval, it will be necessary to amend the Immigration Act. Those consultations are a prerequisite because we must find some kind of balance between administrative expedients and outright protection for bona fide refugees who will be helped by the many Canadian organizations which take them under their wings.

For the time being, however, we need a strategy designed to reduce the current backlog of applications so as to alleviate the difficulties experienced by refugees and make sure the undue delays do not create a de facto immigrant category. That is why new resources are needed at every stage of the existing system, and the Act must be amended to make the Immigration Appeal Board rules more flexible. That is the only way the Immigration Appeal Board will be able to tackle the ever growing number of cases it must deal with once they have gone through the system's preliminary stages.

Mr. Speaker, Bill C-55 does not deal only with refugee status recognition, but with appeals as well. Certain figures might interest you. We think that this year the Appeal Board will be called upon to render 1,200 decisions on sponsorship applications. It is also expected to render 600 more decisions in other types of cases such as deportations, motions, applications for release in cases of deportation orders, and so on. With respect to refugee status recognition, we are talking about at least 2,870 decisions. In other words, to a large extent this increase applies as well to the Board's appeal caseload, not only to the number of refugees.

Unless we act soon the refugee status application problem will create personal hardships. Since it is impossible in the near future to adopt wide-ranging amendments to come to grips with the basic problem, it becomes necessary to implement transitional measures indicating that Parliament is fully aware of humanitarian requirements, that it intends to take steps to carry out fully the Supreme Court decision to which the Minister has already referred, and that it is committed to establish a long term amendment program designed to cope with current difficulties.

Mr. Speaker, it is imperative that we make fundamental changes in the refugee status recognition system. That is not the purpose of the Bill before us today. Actually it is our response to the most pressing human needs, in other words our way to deal with the growing backlog of all IAB cases, not only those which have to do with refugee status recognition applications. That is inherent in Canada's humanitarian traditions. I therefore urge all Hon. Members on either side of the House to support Bill C-55.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Mantha): Are there any questions or comments? If there are no questions, we will resume debate. The Hon. Member for Davenport (Mr. Caccia).

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, it is with mixed feelings that I enter this debate because it is one that requires much thoughtful analysis of the Bill before us and which I must say, having analyzed its clauses, is one that leaves me wondering about what the intent of the Government is with respect to changing the Immigration Act.

I will explain briefly what I mean. The Government has had one year's time to prepare a set of amendments of what is, in my view and I am sure in yours, Mr. Speaker, one of the most important social policy pieces of legislation that we have, namely, how to regulate the arrival of people who decide to settle in Canada. People from all parts of the world look on Canada as a very desirable country. People who can travel and wish to emigrate here like to obtain the highly desired landed immigrant visa and the number of people who knock on our door is immense. That number is augmented by the fact that there are people who, for political reasons, have decided to come to Canada as visitors and then seek landed immigrant status here.

There are other situations that cannot be defined in the first and second category that I just mentioned. There are people who come here by various illegal means but who, pushed by desperate economic conditions in their homeland, made a decision and chose Canada as a land for themselves and their families. The numbers in this latter category have swelled.

We all looked with anticipation and anxiety at the arrival of Bill C-55 hoping to find in it some answers that would resolve a big problem, give us a sense of direction telling the world that we are coming to grips not only with the immense backlogs of applicants but also the problems in the existing legislation which have emerged because those problems were not foreseen because of changing times.

As we look at the law, we find that one has to arrive at a rather disappointing conclusion even if one approaches it with an open mind. Community groups and volunteer groups have made representations over the past year with regard to improving the law. In addition to that we have had a report by Rabbi Gunther Plaut of Toronto. It attempted to design a new approach for the Government, a new mechanism, to resolve the movement of refugees. Therefore input has been considerable. At the other end of the spectrum, at the moment of producing the Bill, we do not find substance or inspiration accompanying these submissions made to the Government by both the immigrant community groups and the Plaut report. Therefore, what we have here before us, I regret to conclude, is an effort that can only be described as a stopgap measure. It attempts to accelerate the existing mechanism of processing people who want to become landed immigrants. Therefore we find in Sections 1, 2 and 3 the enlargement of the Appeal Board to 15 and the number of vice-chairmen going from five to 13 and other measures that are intended to facilitate the functioning of that specific Immigration Appeal Board.

To make the Bill a little bit more attractive, I suppose, there is also a measure of granting the right of appeal to landed immigrants, to permanent residents, a right that exists so far only for Canadian citizens. But the substance that is required at this stage is missing because the manner and the fairness and the quality of the decision-making process that applies so far as experienced by those who are in charge of processing people who are waiting for a landed immigrant status will not be changed. In other words, the quality of the process will not be affected by this Bill and that is the regrettable part.

We, of course, in the Liberal Party will press in committee beyond this stage of debate here in the House. We will press for amendments. We hope that the Minister will approach the whole subject in committee with an open mind and accept a number of proposals that are definitely intended to improve the quality of the Bill. However, there is only so much that can be done within the framework of this piece of legislation which unfortunately is narrow and does not incorporate the good stuff, the good advice, the well thought out ideas that, as I said, have been produced by individuals and by groups in the year past.

Any discussion on the Immigration Act must say something about certain situations, namely the fact that at the present time there are delays that go into a considerable number of years in the processing of orders in council. The landing process, in other words, for people who are waiting for their order in council is extremely long and it causes a number of hardships on the economic well-being of the families affected. The practice of issuing a social insurance number starting with the number nine to those who are approved but have not been finally landed is causing hardships for those who seek employment. They find it extremely difficult to convince employers to hire them.

In addition to delays there is the question of insensitivity on the part of officials in certain situations. There is, for instance, the case of a single mother with children who has been waiting for permission to come to Canada. She is a refugee in a camp in Austria, having fled Czechoslovakia but our officials feel she should not be assisted in coming over to join her sister who has been a Canadian citizen for many years because of a court order that has been issued in her country of origin, namely Czechoslovakia.

Here is a person who is most eager and ready to move to Canada and lives under very stressful conditions and yet there does not seem to be that sensitivity on the part of our officials that ought to accompany the processing of such an application.

There is in the present legislation, and probably it was an oversight in past legislation, a situation that affects adolescents between the ages of 13 and 18 who cannot be adopted and for whom there is no provision in the law for anyone to adopt them while they are visiting here in Canada, even when there is a family willing to adopt them. There is in other words a gap of age between that of 13 and 18 which negatively affects young people. That is a case that was widely publicized a few weeks ago in Alberta. It is only suitable that in International Youth Year we would look at this Bill in the hope of finding some of the answers that could only be the result of the experience of the last few years having seen what the shortcomings are of the existing piece of legislation.

The present piece of legislation that is before us today deals mostly with Immigration Appeal Board methods but it is called the Immigration Act. I submit to you that it lacks compassion in not bringing forward some of the changes that I am sure the Department is capable of advancing and suggesting to the Minister so that this Bill would be enhanced and enriched and improved in its quality. I would hope that once we are beyond this stage in committee the Minister will want to take the initiative himself and come to committee or, through the offices of the Parliamentary Secretary, bring to committee a number of amendments that flow from the experience in recent years and go beyond the approach that is outlined in this Bill.

We find it, as a Bill, a disappointing piece. It is true that there is, as I said, an enlargement of the Board which of course has to take place in order to process more readily and it is true that it has a measure that will give landed immigrants and residents the right to appeal. We will support those measures. We would like very much to move the debate beyond that and urge the Government to give the whole matter the broader approach and the broader outlook that this Bill is badly missing. When I gave the examples on delays and insensitivities or the example of the young people between the ages of 13 and 18 who fall between two stools and cannot be dealt with under the present legislation, I did that with the limited knowledge that I have of the subject only to illustrate a certain situation with some examples because it does not happen very often that there is legislative time to bring forwad a Bill to amend the Immigration Act. When it happens I submit it would be desirable from the point of view of everyone who feels that immigration is such an important and delicate aspect of Canada's growth and expansion that it should be as comprehensive as possible.

Faced with that dilemma of Bill C-55 we would like to seek some indication by the Government that this is not the end of it, that this is just a preliminary Bill that the Government is examining perhaps in greater depth as it should, the report by Rabbi Plaut, that it is examining the submissions made by citizens' groups and that it is engaging in that kind of constructive, productive, consultative work that eventually leads to legislation flowing from this kind of consultation. Then we will be able to see the promises translated into legislative action. Unfortunately, this Bill does not do that. It is a mechanical Bill which focuses on removing a bottleneck which definitely exists and it somehow removes the pressure to introduce reform to a system which evidently needs to be reformed. This is what troubles us on this side of the House because as we all know, every initiative in life has its own cycle and once it has served its purpose, it must be replaced by another.

It is now time for reform. We have been given the advice of those who are the practitioners in the field in a number of ways but that has not been translated into action through this Bill. That is why we are urging the Minister and the Government to make up for what this Bill does not contain. Our criticism is addressed at the absence of amendments of a practical nature affecting certain age groups and certain situations. On the basis of its statistics and the lessons learned in preceding years, I am sure the Department could produce such legislation.

I submit, Mr. Speaker, that legislation is improved by looking at how an existing law as we know it has performed and served us over the years. Since we are all frail human beings, we cannot produce perfect laws but we can improve the existing laws because we have tested them. That is the essence of the approach I am trying to outline this afternoon.

At the end of this debate, the Minister may want to enlighten us as to his stand on the following question: is this the end of this initiative or is this Bill one that will be followed by a more comprehensive Bill based upon a reformed set of criteria? If that is the case, we should know about it. We should know about it now because it will guide us when we go to committee where we will definitely by proposing amendments based on the observations that we have made in the course of this debate.

Mr. Hawkes: Mr. Speaker, I was a little disturbed by the degree of knowledge which seems to be percolating in the two opposition Parties. The Standing Committee which I have the honour to chair has held over 40 hearings on immigration matters since January and has already brought forward three substantial reports. We began an examination of the Plaut Report on Tuesday. The committee will meet again today at six o'clock to hear witnesses from the Bar Association, Sikh societies, umbrella groups and Rabbi Plaut himself. We will hear all of those witnesses between now and October 9.

The Hon. Member asked a question of the Minister in the Minister's absence. The committee is functioning very closely with the Minister and Members of all three Parties. I think there were consultations with the Minister yesterday and we heard representations from all three Parties. The very clear-cut timetable for the Standing Committee is to try to conclude its hearings by the middle of October and submit representations by the end of October so that some of the major changes relating to the Plaut Report will hopefully be in place by Christmas.

I have a question for the Hon. Member who just spoke. He is a senior member of his caucus and acknowledges that there is a bottleneck in the system. He did not say so, but I suspect he knows, as do most Members of the House, that that bottleneck is extremely hard on people who are caught in it. They find themselves in very difficult circumstances. The Hon. Member is also aware that the Government brought this Bill before the House in June and tried mightily to get it passed by the end of June so that those additional resources could be put in place and the bottleneck could open up. We are dealing with human lives here.

Is the Member signalling this Chamber that the senior members of the Liberal Party of Canada who serve in this Chamber intend to keep the bottleneck intact just because the Bill does not deal with everything in the universe of immigration? Are they really going to dig in their heels and filibuster to the point where we cannot begin to clear up the bottleneck?

Mr. Caccia: Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member for Calgary West (Mr. Hawkes) is conjuring up notions that he seems to perceive can be drawn from my intervention. He makes a lot of the fact that the Bill was introduced in June 1985. This Bill, short as it is, and with the work that had been done before September 1984, could have been tabled in the House in November or at the latest December 1984. There was no need to wait until June 1985 to produce this kind of legislation. It is a three-page mechanical Bill. Knowledge of this matter was already available before the September election. If there was a real concern with bottlenecks—

Mr. Gurbin: That's exactly right, and for five years before.

Mr. Caccia: If there was a concern with a bottleneck on the part of the so-called Progressive Conservative party, it could have introduced this legislation in late 1984.

Certainly we are not here to engage in delaying tactics. We have explained our position in principle. We feel that the fundamentals are missing from this Bill. We see that this Bill does have some mechanical value because it will facilitate an existing process. However, I must repeat, in all fairness to the Hon. Member, that this approach will not improve the fairness with which we handle the immigration process at the present time. We are not incorporating the substantial criteria advanced by the Plaut Report some time ago.

Mr. Cassidy: Mr. Speaker, I find the paranoia of the Hon. Member for Calgary West on this particular question to be unseemly and certainly unjustified. I am new to this House but I certainly know the tactics which have been used by previous Governments. Legislation is brought in immediately prior to a summer recess and then the Government of the day indicates that it would have passed the legislation if it had co-operation from Opposition Parties. I know the Hon. Member for Calgary West (Mr. Hawkes) is familiar with that provision because he sat in opposition for a number of years and exactly the same charges were levied at him. I wish that since people voted for change on September 4 that we would not have to hear the same tired type of political rhetoric coming from the Government. The Hon. Member for Calgary West perhaps might more appropriately have commented on the fact that when the Hon. member for Davenport (Mr. Caccia) was in Government, as the Minister responsible in this particular area, concerning himself with matters of multiculturalism, there was not pressure which yielded action within the Liberal Government to ensure there was no backlog of refugee cases, and to ensure that there was no backlog before the Immigration Appeal Board, and that the matters which had become so evident since the 1976 changes in the Act were, in fact, acted upon. I find it a bit hypocritical for the Liberal Party critic to criticize the Government now when, in fact, the Liberals had the opportunity to make these changes, and yet they left a plateful of unfinished business to the Conservatives.

I find it equally intolerable that the new Governemnt after one year should say: "We just arrived. We have not had time." The Government has had a year to show that it is prepared to make some decisive changes. Rather than do that we are presented with a makeshift Bill which is inadequate, which I will comment on shortly. It is a Bill with no guarantee that there will be a real determination to stop this totally inhumane backlog which requires people to wait for years upon years before they know whether their status in Canada can be determined or not.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[Translation]

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Charest): It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 46, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the Hon. Member for Algoma (Mr. Foster)—Agriculture—(a) Canada-United States trade talks (b) Stabilization and insurance programs; the Hon. Member for Comox-Powell River (Mr. Skelly)—Canadian Armed Forces—(a) Acquisition of canned tuna (b) Issuance of contract.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

IMMIGRATION ACT, 1976

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Miss MacDonald that Bill C-55, an Act to amend the Immigration Act, 1976, be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee.

Mr. Mike Cassidy (Ottawa Centre): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise and speak on Bill C-55. Our Party's critic on immigration, the Hon. Member for Spadina (Mr. Heap), regrets not being here today. The reason he is not here today is because, to put it mildly, we are a bit confused by the Government's management of House business. We have had to predict what will come next on a minute-by-minute basis. It is somewhat like predicting who will be in the Cabinet tomorrow, which one has to go on a minute-by-minute basis.

In my response a moment ago during the period for questions and comments, I said these changes to relieve the backlog of appeals on immigration could and should have been made a long time ago. I find the whole process by which refugee appeals were being considered merely on the transcripts and the quality of the judgments being made by the officers appointed to hear that particular question under the Minister's jurisdiction, and also by the Immigration Appeal Board, left a great deal to be desired. I say that because I think a great many Canadians felt that we as Canadians are fortunate in the world and that we should be a model with respect to reaching out and welcoming into our country persons who are refugees. From time to time we have done this, for example, in the case of Asians from Uganda and in the case of the Vietnamese. In those cases our record was not perfect, but it was not bad either. In other instances, however, with respect to refugees from Chile and refugees from Central America our record has been far less than perfect. There are some 13,500 refugees who are backed up in the system right now and whose appeals, as the Hon. Member for Louis-Hébert (Mrs. Duplessis) said a minute ago, are taking up to three years to be heard. In many cases they are held up not because of waiting for appeals to the Immigration Appeal Board but because of the prior process which is entirely within the Minister's discretion.

We in our Party are concerned about this Bill for two reasons. We are concerned because we feel it is prejudging recommendations made by the Plaut Commission Report, recommendations which, as the Hon. Member who spoke a few moments ago indicated, are now under active consideration by the committee of the House which looks into matters of immigration. In fact, there will be a report coming down shortly with respect to where we should go with the Plaut Report.

We feel that the proposal to take refugee appeals away from the Immigration Appeal Board makes a great deal of sense. Under those circumstances, the stopgap procedures proposed in the Bill before us just do not make an awful lot of sense. Why beef up the Immigration Appeal Board in order to deal with refugee appeals if, in fact, it is to be judged within another month or two that the policy will be to take those refugee appeals away from the Immigration Appeal Board entirely and establish an entirely separate tribunal, as proposed in the Plaut Report? For that matter, why beef up either tribunal if, in fact, the Government comes to the view, as I think it should have already, that the problem is not just at the end of the pipeline but with the number of cases which are being put into the pipeline?

Governmental policy under the previous Government, and I believe this Government as well, is that this Government will not turn people away and make them go back to their native countries if they come from such strife-torn countries as Afghanistan, certain countries in Central America or certain countries behind the Iron Curtain in the Soviet bloc, particularly the satellite Soviet countries. Under those circumstances, the failure of the new Ministry to take enough time to focus on this particular question, to decide that special measures are needed, is something which should have been done by the old Ministry. However, the new Ministry is new and not bound by the precedents of the past. It does not have to take as a given every word of advice it receives from the civil servants. In fact, it has an opportunity to bring a fresh approach to the situation. As I said a moment ago, that is what I believe Canadians voted for in the election of September 4.

My Party has been accused of being in coalition with the new Government of Ontario, the Liberal Government. That is not true. However, we have entered into an accord on a number of areas of policy which has, if nothing else, given an agenda for action to the new Government in Ontario. I am glad that after 40-odd years of Conservative Government, which deserved to be defeated, that the agenda for action which was laid down by the New Democrats is, in fact, being followed and that over the course of the last two or three months under Mr. Peterson's Government there is evidence of crisp decision making. A decision has been taken to seize the reins of power and to do something with them.

The federal Government has been elected with an enormous majority in terms of the House of Commons. It seems to be rapidly frittering away its grip on power even more quickly than the Diefenbaker Government did after its monumental victory of 1958.

As one commentator said, yesterday was Black Wednesday for this Government. We all know that when those types of affairs occur, when the competence of the Government is clearly not there, when the Government is engaged in firefighting and in dealing with the crisis of the day, that longer-term problems cannot be attended to. As early as the second year of this Government, it no longer appears to have the ability to stand back from the problems in order to come up with solutions and to show the courage, determination and political will to actually implement them.

The previous speaker suggested that if this Bill was needed as a stopgap that it could have been brought in as early as January or February in conjunction with the statement that as soon as the Plaut Report was released the Government would ask for advice of the committee which deals with matters of immigration and would then bring in its program immediately thereafter. Instead, the publication of the Plaut Report was delayed. We now have a stopgap decision taken at this time and no indication that the Government will have any capacity to take a fresh look during the three or four-year life of this Parliament, if Parliament even lasts that long.

I would like to come back to the specific measures in the Bill, apart from the measure which allows landed immigrants in Canada to have the same status as Canadian citizens in serving as sponsors, which our Party welcomes. The major feature of this Bill is to provide for an expansion of the Immigration Appeal Board. Its current maximum number is 18. The Chairperson of the Board told the Standing Committee on Labour, Employment and Immigration in the spring that the board would be expanded by seven members by September 1. I guess that provision will have to wait since the Government did not get the Bill through in June. It will be expanded by another eight members by the end of the year, almost a doubling in size from 18 to 35. Subsequently, a further 15 members will be added to bring the membership up to 50, if that numerical increase is warranted. She suggested this is a short-term program and that the new members would be brought on for two-year terms. She suggested very strongly that people were effectively being asked to keep their hand in at teaching, the law or whatever profession or trade they had because they were only being taken on for two years and after two years it was easier to return to one's former line of work than if one took on a five-year term. This is a training program for inexperienced members of the appeal board who are to be there for a short term, and who are being informed that they will be there for a short term. Yet these people will be charged with the responsibility of just about tripling the rate at which the Immigration Appeal Board considers the appeals which are before it.

Any organization which expands that fast has problems in terms of its learning curve. It takes time before the new members learn how to handle the cases. The estimates, therefore, of the amount of time that cases are going to take to be heard are likely to be very optimistic. In addition to that, as the Minister and many spokespeople have acknowledged, the number of persons, legal counsel, immigration advisers and that kind of person, who are really qualified and able to represent appellants in this particular area, is very limited and, therefore, there will be tremendous strains on them from a tripling or quadrupling of the cases before the Immigration Appeal Board. Yet the Government's answer to the crisis is not in looking at ways to reduce the people waiting in the pipeline, as our Party has proposed. We propose ways to reduce by three quarters the number of people who might be appealing rejection of refugee status. However, instead of acting in that direction, Mr. Speaker, the Government decides to try to step up the work of the Immigration Appeal Board.

This Appeal Board is very costly, Mr. Speaker. I suppose the salary for the members is in the order of $35,000 to $50,000 a year. Perhaps it will be more if the Government hopes to acquire people with legal training and able to make a lawyer's income to come in and serve for a couple of years. That means that with 30 extra members, support staff, hearing space, hearing officers and all of the other trappings of the office, we are talking about a very major investment in terms of the cost of handling cases. Many of those cases, it seems to me, ought not to be there.

The former Government refused to give oral hearings to people applying for refugee status. In my opinion, the former Government also failed to look realistically, perhaps, at ways in which the law might be altered in order to try and differentiate between people who have a genuine claim, a realistic claim, to be considered for refugee status and, on the other hand, persons who are simply trying to abuse the process. I think we all know that while substantial numbers of people who have applied for refugee status are certainly bona fide, or consider there is a bona fide case to consider them in that way, others are not. People come and clog up the process. They come from countries from which there is absolutely no reason one could conceivably imagine that a person would seek to wish to become a refugee. The only reason the person might not wish to return to their native land would be because they had committed some criminal offence which would be equally criminal if committed on Canadian soil.

The former Government did not tackle, and the present Government has yet to tackle this particular problem. Yet it has come out with this particular Bill. I would like to say as well, Mr. Speaker, that there are other areas which I think are deserving of urgent consideration. One of these areas is the authority of the Immigration Appeal Board. I can say, Mr. Speaker, that the Appeal Board pronounces, and the law says that once it pronounces, the Minister should then act on the basis of that judgment, but there is nothing to enforce action by the Minister. In fact, there is a modest fine, but goodness knows how one could ever bring the Minister into court for a six-month sentence or a $1,000 fine for failing to live up to an order of the Immigration Appeal Board. There is no other enforcement mechanism.

I have had a case in my office for about three years, Mr. Speaker. It is the case of a man who is a productive citizen. He runs a restaurant in Ottawa. He has been seeking to bring his parents and, I believe, one or two young brothers and sisters into Canada from Pakistan over the course of a period of some two and a half years. They were refused entry into Canada. The immigration officer in Pakistan decided that he or she felt these people were not genuine, that they were going to leave the kids in Canada and go back to Pakistan.

The matter came up before the Immigration Appeal Board in January of this year. It was ruled upon in April, and in April the Immigration Appeal Board ordered that the appeal be allowed. In other words, it ruled that the immigration officer was wrong and that in fact the refusal to approve the application for landing was not in accordance with the law. This particular case illustrates the kind of problems which people in my Party who are helping immigrants and sponsors have been having. The family reunification program is blocked because there is not an adequate number of immigration officers in countries where people are looking for reunification, Pakistan being a notorious example, the Islamabad office being an office where there are particular problems.

One might almost say that there is discrimination built into administration because immigration offices are to be found in every major European country but in other countries, in Asia and in Africa, applicants must travel sometimes thousands of miles to find a Canadian office where they can put in their application.

In this particular case I wrote to the Minister in April and told him the Appeal Board had ruled and would he please see that this family was unified and would he expedite this matter. The Minister wrote back and acknowledged my letter and said he would let me know as soon as he had an answer. That was in April, Mr. Speaker, and I have been waiting for a response ever since. We have been in contact a dozen times with the Minister's office since then. It maintains that it has contacted the embassy in Islamabad on numerous occasions, but nothing has happened. Most recently, the people in this particular case were called to Islamabad and they expected to receive the medical forms to finish the procedure so that they could get on a plane and come to Canada. They went there and were told that new documents were needed about the kids' schooling despite the fact that all the documentation which could conceivably be required had been handed in. They were not given the medical forms. Finally, I got on the telephone myself last week and said, "Will you please act. I am going to raise this matter in a week if I don't hear from you". I was told a telex would be sent to Islamabad. Many telexes have gone to Islamabad and it is like a black hole in terms of any action being taken. Unless the assistant in the office of the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Clark) has responded since we came into the Chamber at two o'clock today, there has been no answer.

The individual called me the other day and told me he missed his family and said he wanted to go and talk to The Citizen. I told him to wait for a few days, that I had talked to the Ministry. This is the first immigration case I have been involved in with the Ministry in a year. I am slow to anger on these things, Mr. Speaker, but this is a case where, it seems to me, the Ministry itself mocks the authority of the Immigration Appeal Board. The Government then turns around with Bill C-55 and tells us, "By the way, the Immigration Appeal Board is not adequately staffed and, therefore, would you please allow us to increase the membership in the Board from 18 to 50 members?" We could increase the membership to 500 members, Mr. Speaker, but if the Ministry is not going to take the rulings of the Appeal board seriously, then we have real problems.

If the Appeal Board continues in its tradition of ignoring prima facie evidence on such matters as refugee claims, which was one of the factors which led to Rabbi Gunther Plaut to argue for a different tribunal in refugee cases, a tribunal which would be adequately informed, you could have 5,000 people on the Immigration Appeal Board and that would not be enough.

I see that the Hon. Member for Calgary West (Mr. Hawkes) is taking a very serious interest in some of the comments I am making. I appreciate his interest. I hope that Hon. Members on the Government side take this seriously. We are opposing this particular Bill, but it is clear that second reading will pass and the Government will have the authority to increase the numbers. The Hon. Member for Calgary West knows that our concern is that we do not know what kind of appeal tribunal we are going to have. We are going to have 35 new people on the Board who will have some expectation about their job. Jobs are hard to find these days and they would hope that they could keep that job. But they may be all Tories. They may well be the constituency assistants or the people who made up Marcel Masse's election expenses return. Who knows, Mr. Speaker. It could be any quality of person at all who could be appointed to that particular Board. Criteria are not laid down in this particular case and I think perhaps they should be. In fact, and I have not checked this with my colleagues, I would like to make a very serious suggestion to the Government. This is perhaps an individual's suggestion rather than a joint one. Hon. Members may be familiar with the tradition of magistrature in the United Kingdom. Magistrates there include a substantial number of citizens who do not have legal training; they are simply concerned with administering the law. They are prepared, often on a voluntary basis, to serve in conjunction with a trained and full-time magistrate. We have some magistrates without legal training in Canada but they generally tend to work full-time. If there are backlog problems, and without pre-empting the decision surrounding the Plaut report, and perhaps as a precedent, we could amend this Bill so that two of the three members of these panels, rather than being appointed for two years, should be citizens with some competence and reputation in the community and who are prepared to give up time to sit in on a number of appeals. Some training courses could be given, but in many cases, whether they are refugee or sponsorship cases, we are not talking about a need for substantial training. We should not be making these decisions on the basis of legal technicalities or niceties. These decisions demand compassion, understanding and empathy. That is something that millions of Canadians have to offer. That might be a more productive way to work on the backlog, in addition to taking measures to reduce the potential backlog. I suggest that would allow us to tackle the backlog while leaving our options open with respect to early action on the Plaut report.

Both myself and my Party look forward to early action on that report, but for reasons I have given we have to say that we object to this particular measure. We think it is an inadequate beginning toward responding to a very serious problem.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Charest): Questions or comments.

Mr. Friesen: Mr. Speaker, I am a little surprised to hear the Hon. Member say that his Party is not supporting this legislation. I thought I heard his colleague from Vancouver East say about an hour or so ago in the House that they supported it. I am really quite surprised to hear that they are not. She commended the Government for the provisions of this Bill and felt it would provide a solution to some of the problems.

Mr. Rodriguez: You were not listening carefully. You were sleeping.

Mr. Friesen: I was here.

Mr. Rodriguez: You were sleeping. I heard you snoring.

Mr. Friesen: The Hon. Member for Nickel Belt (Mr. Rodriguez) was not even here. He must be omniscient; he knows what his colleague said.

One of the easiest accusations to make nowadays is that of discrimination. It is a word which drops from the lips as soon as there is any kind of disagreement on a given point. The Hon. Member used it in connection with the backlog. He said forthrightly that if there were only enough immigration officers to clear the backlog, including the quasi judicial process, that would take care of the problem. He said the fact that there are not enough is a kind of discrimination against the people who want to come to Canada. If we hired enough officers to clear up the backlog, would that then take care of the flow of people coming into Canada and end that kind of accusation of discrimination? I suggest that it would not. He said he just dealt with his first case. If he has any assessment at all of the flow of people who desire to come into Canada for every good reason, would hiring enough staff ever solve the problem and remove the accusation he levels at immigration officers, as well as at the Government for not providing enough staff?

Mr. Cassidy: Mr. Speaker, first may I say that my colleague from Vancouver East (Ms. Mitchell) made it clear that while we support the measure in the Bill which permits landed immigrants to sponsor, we have grave reservations about the rest of the Bill. I cannot recall specifically what she said, but I know that when we discussed this Bill in caucus we said "we are going to oppose it because we feel it pre-empts decisions which ought properly to be made in light of the Plaut report and because we think there are other constructive measures", which the Hon. Member appears not to have heard me mention, "by which the backlog can be greatly reduced." Very specifically, the use of the special measures approach would permit the Ministry to very quickly reduce the backlog by removing cases involving people from Afghanistan, Iran, Central America, certain countries in Latin America, Vietnam and Iron Curtain countries. By the time you do that you would have eliminated a major proportion of the backlog.

The Hon. Member says that he does not believe it is possible to cope with all the people who might want to come to Canada by increasing our staff. I am afraid this is a fallacy which any first year student in logic would see, because he then says do nothing about the problem at all.

Mr. Friesen: That is not what I said.

Mr. Cassidy: I said to the Hon. Member for Calgary West that I was disappointed to hear him use arguments from the old Government, and I am disappointed to hear this Member doing the same thing. In the case I refer to from Islamabad, which is one of 150 immigration matters that my office has dealt with over the last year, either the immigration officers on the ground are not up to the demands being made upon them, or they are acting in a manner which specifically discriminates against people coming from that country. Since almost all the people from Pakistan are what we call visible minorities, that is why one talks about either explicit and deliberate or implicit discrimination taking place. It does not take two and a half years for people wishing to emigrate to Canada from the U.K. or certain countries in western Europe to work their way through the system, as is the case with the one I cited here.

[Translation]

Mr. Hudon: Mr. Speaker, I would remind my hon. colleague . . . In listening to his speech, I found a number of contradictions in what he says. There is a basic contradiction when he says that the system is overloaded and there is not enough staff. If we look at the Bill, we see that its purpose is to increase the staff.

In his answer a little earlier to one of the questions, he gave a rather negative assessment of the officers. He said they did not know how to do their work. However, the system they have to work with today was voted on by us or by a Parliament and we are now trying to improve it.

Instead of trying to elucidate every individual case he encountered, I would have preferred him to elaborate on the kind of amnesty he would like to see developed with respect to cases now pending, to settle the problems of specific groups.

I wonder first of all, what criteria—if it is so arbitrary, what criteria he would apply to establish such groups or general amnesties? What we want to do in this legislation is increase the number of persons available to hear all these cases. And when we start judging the system itself . . . I think the hearings being conducted by the Standing Committee on Employment and Immigration will help, and by the way, next Tuesday, we will be meeting Rabbi Plaut who is to explain part of it. Hearings have commenced on the subject.

Mr. Cassidy: Mr. Speaker, I am surprised the Parliamentary Secretary is asking these questions, because it was his Department that was responsible for the fact that we now have about 15,000 refugees waiting to appear before the Immigration Appeal Board, pending decisions by the Refugee Status Advisory Committee, which has legal status. After being heard by this committee, and we all know it hands down very few favourable decisions, refugees whose claims have been denied are entitled to appeal to the Immigration Appeal Board, where the number of members has just been increased.

So as I said earlier, it is not a matter of amnesty but a matter of implementing special measures that were introduced in the past by Immigration Ministers, when it was the Department's practice or the Government's policy, when in fact decisions of the Immigration Appeal Board were unanimously or almost unanimously in favour of allowing refugees to remain in Canada.

For instance, does the Parliamentary Secretary maintain that we should force refugees from Poland, Hungary and other East European countries to go home? Is that going to be the position of this Government? Once these refugees arrive in Canada, do they really have a chance to go to other countries? Should we not act on what we see as our responsibility and allow these refugees to stay here? Is it the Government's position to accept them? Refugees from Europe or members of the Bahai sect, for instance are we really going to send them back to Iran? The answer is a definite no, because those refugees would not even survive if they were forced to go back to their own country.

So why are we asking these refugees to stay in the backlog with all the other refugees before they can appeal before the Immigration Appeal Board?

Briefly, instead of increasing our appeals capacity, we should be thinking of reducing the need for appeals. And that is what I and my party have proposed.

● (1740)

Mr. Friesen: Mr. Speaker, I really do not mind if the Hon. Member for Ottawa Centre (Mr. Cassidy) refutes an argument of mine or even proves me to be wrong. I do not think I have to be afraid of that ever happening, given the way he argues, but if he succeeded I really would not mind too much. However, I wish he would quote me accurately. I would like him to tell me when I ever said that if the problem is big, or large, or overloaded, that we should do nothing about it.

Mr. Cassidy: With respect, Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member said precisely that approximately eight minutes ago at the beginning of the period for questions and comments. He asked me if I thought that increasing the number of immigration officers or functionaries would in fact serve to master the flow of people applying for immigration in Canada. He was quite clearly suggesting that he did not believe that to be the case. He was, therefore, arguing that there was no point in doing anything at all to ensure that there are enough immigration officers to deal with the problems of immigration in India, Pakistan, Bangladesh, Sri Lanka, the Philippines, and other countries where delays with regard to Canadian immigration authorities were notorious under the former Government and, regrettably, remain notorious under the present Government.

Mr. Jim Hawkes (Calgary West): Mr. Speaker, I will begin my remarks today and, due to the timing of the House, will probably have to conclude on another day. It was my hope that this debate today might have been somewhat less partisan. This subject lends itself to much effort from all sides of the House to co-operate and come to resolution. As the chairman of the Standing Committee I would like to commend the degree to which that attitude has been present in the committee through 40 meetings.

The previous speaker invited the Government to act decisively and expressed concern about the fact that it had not done so. That is a very odd comment. I have been a member of the committee since I was first elected to the House of Commons in 1979. Aside from Main Estimates, that committee had not held a single meeting on the subject of immigration in the previous six years. During our first year we have had 40 meetings and three substantive reports. Bill C-55, which we are debating today, was brought forward within a very few months of our assumption of office. Any delay was due to the fact that there was a case before the courts and it behooved us to wait until that judgment was rendered before acting. We did not want to act in a manner that might have precluded desirable options. However, the case is over and the size of the backlog is known.

If the previous speaker had spent a little more time thinking, he would have recognized the wisdom of the chairman of the board in asserting to the committee that a two-year appointment for a portion of those board members would be appropriate. The chairman laid out two reasons for this and they are still compelling. The chairman has considerable experience and in her judgment she will be able to get better quality board members. If we want fairness and sensitivity in that process we must consider the quality of the people who will commit themselves to participation in the process. The second reason is that the chairman and this piece of legislation bring forward a plan which would allow the backlog to be cleared up in three years. If that happens, we will not need as many members. This piece of legislation asserts that the Minister and the board be given the legal basis to expand the staff to clear the backlog, after which time the staff would be reduced.

On Thursday morning of this week the committee began its inquiry into the Plaut report. We heard evidence from the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees and representatives of the Sikh Federation of Canada. We will hear from two more sets of witnesses today at six o'clock. The basic message of the testimony heard was that the decision to be made as to whether someone either is not refugee, and is or is not entitled to the protection which this country can provide, is basically not an immigration question. Immigration has somewhat different characteristics.

Every Member in this Chamber knows that there are problems in the current immigration system. It is a shame that all 282 Members cannot sit on the committee and hear the testimony in order to understand the focus of the problem and learn what has to be changed. The committee is spending hours and hours on the task of understanding the immigration system. It is also spending hours and hours trying to understand how things can best be arranged to deal fairly with refugees. I ask the Members opposite to think seriously about that concept. I ask them to look at Thursday morning's transcript and ask themselves whether the issue of refugee determination in this country is essentially an immigration issue or an issue of a different kind. Clearly, there are immigration concerns which flow from the basic decision as to whether people are or are not entitled to the protection of this country because they are truly refugees.

● (1750)

To what extent should it be different? To what extent should it be run by a group of people with different training? Should the Immigration Appeal Board, which is the subject of the Bill before us, in reality be dealing with appeals from a refugee board? If we follow the basic outline of the Plaut report, we could improve upon it and bring forward an even better piece of legislation than he envisaged. Is it not possible to invent a system to deal with the determination of refugee status, involving different people, different training backgrounds and considerations other than those which guide the members who serve on the Immigration Appeal Board?

It seems to me that the impulse to block and delay this piece of legislation stems from a genuine and valid concern for the plight of refugees. However, the solution does not lie in changes to the make-up of the Immigration Appeal Board.

The solution lies in the Plaut report and the examination of that report by the committee. Then the Government would be in a position to bring forward the legislation required to create a better system. Tinkering in any manner whatsoever with the Immigration Appeal Board will not solve the refugee problem.

Mr. Rodriguez: What do you think the Bill does?

Mr. Hawkes: The Bill will do something that is very human and very desirable. I am sure every Member of the House has heard representations from people who are stuck in the process. They do not wait one month, six months or one year; they wait years to have their situations regularized, to have a sense of confidence that they can purchase a home or take a long-term job. If we leave in existence a system which requires them to wait from two years to four years in a kind of legal limbo, we act in a cruel fashion toward people who are less able to protect themselves than most of us would be. I suggest that it would run against the traditions of Canada. Members of all Parties have met with the Minister. There is a willingness to modify this piece of legislation in committee if it can be improved in any way. In the interest of those people stuck in the system, their spouses and their children, I urge Hon. Members of the Liberal Party and of the NDP to reconsider the speed with which they are prepared to deal with the Bill. We have lost the months of July, August and September. We have kept everyone in the system in limbo for an additional 90 days. If it takes another month, it grows to 120 days, or if it takes another two months, an additional 150 days.

The only solution is to negotiate quickly. Let us move expeditiously, not recklessly. Let us not put a badly flawed piece of legislation in place. The committee has already spent four hours on first reading stage of the Bill. We attempted to pass it in the month of June. We almost succeeded, but not quite. The Minister is making another effort, as will the committee. However, it takes the will of the caucuses. That will exists in the Progressive Conservative caucus. I encourage Hon. Members listening to the debate today to see what they can do to create that will in their own caucuses. The faster we accomplish it, the better off many people will be.

I see that we are approaching the hour provided for Private Members' Business. I look forward to continuing the next time the Bill is before the House. However, I would be remiss if I did not pay tribute to the members of the standing committee. They laboured long and hard. I hope Hon. Members who have not had the opportunity to serve on that committee recently will consult with them about the existing situation and about the need to move as quickly as possible on this Bill, on the Plaut report and on a number of other issues.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

INCOME TAX

SUGGESTED DEDUCTION FOR PEACE RESEARCH AND EDUCATION

Mr. Jim Manly (Cowichan-Malahat-The Islands) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the Government should consider the advisability of establishing a register of national and international organizations involved in peace research and education, and consider allowing residents of Canada who pay income tax to transfer a portion of their tax to one or more of these organizations, such amount to be calculated on the percentage of the national budget allocated to defence, which is currently 10.2 per cent.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to present the concept of the peace tax fund, as it has become known. This is the second time I have had an opportunity to present a motion similar to this one. I understand that the Government will probably oppose it again this time, as did the previous Government. I am sure, given enough time, the Government will change its mind about it and bring in legislation making these kinds of recommendations possible.

Given the serious situation facing the world today, I can only express the hope that the Government will change its mind soon. The urgency of the motion must be recognized by Hon. Members on all sides of the House. It urges two actions upon the Government. First, it urges the establishment of a register of national and international organizations involved in peace research and education. Second, it asks the Government to consider allowing Canadians to transfer that portion of their income tax which normally goes to defence to one or more of these organizations. We can call the process of establishing such a register and providing for the transfer of funds the establishment of a peace tax fund.

There are two basic reasons Hon. Members on all sides of the House should support my motion. The first one is a reason of principle and the second is a more pragmatic one. The House should recognize that the payment of taxes for military purposes is a question of conscience for many Canadians or a question to which they cannot agree. The Government should recognize that the establishment of a peace tax fund provides a helpful way in which to channel funds toward peace research and education, two areas which are sadly in need of more financing. In turn, I will comment on each of these reasons. Many Canadians object to the payment of taxes to support military activities because it is incompatible with their consciences. In many cases it is a matter of religious conviction. In other cases it is a matter of individual consciences telling them what is right and what is wrong. It is directly related to the question of conscientious objection to military service.

Let me read briefly from a letter written by a woman in my constituency, a letter she wrote to the former Minister of National Revenue. In it she said:

My question is this: Will the Government of Canada establish a Peace Tax Fund for those of us who, according to our consciences, cannot pay for war, or preparation for war? Under the Charter of Rights, being guaranteed Freedom of Conscience, I trust that the answer will be "yes". I do not intend to act against my conscience in order to accommodate any law that has been made by people without regard for conscientious objection.

This is quite unlike, having "a different opinion" as you suggested, about how tax money should be spent. There are many ways of spending taxes with which I disagree, but there is only one that is against my conscience, therefore, I must act according to its direction. My conscience clearly dictates that killing is wrong. I do not expect the Canadian Government to order me to pay for war—

Conscientious objection to participation in war or preparation for war has a long Canadian history going back at least to the time of the American Revolution. At that time Mennonites and Quakers, for reasons of conscience, had not participated in the war on either side. This non participation made them suspect to the Americans and, at the same time, made them desirable immigrant prospects for the colonial Government of Upper Canada. At that time, Lord Simcoe promised them exemption from military service and this was given legal recognition by the legislature of Upper Canada in the Militia Act of 1793. The Act provided that in return for exemptions on military service those who were exempted should have to pay an annual fee toward the cost of maintaining the militia.

Members of the Society of Friends or Quakers saw a direct link between support of the militia by paying money and actually serving in the militia. Most of them refused to pay that fee levied upon them even though the penalty included such things as seizure of personal property and prison terms. Both Quakers and Mennonites lobbied to have the fee removed, which finally happened in 1849. We had similar moves in 1873 to encourage immigration of a group of Russian Mennonites when an Order in Council granted:

Entire exemption from any military service . . . to the denomination of Christians called Mennonites.

Between 1874 and 1880 over 8,000 Mennonites came from Russia to the Canadian Prairies.

In 1898 and 1899 similar Orders in Council were approved to encourage emigration of Doukhobors and Hutterites. We have this long tradition in Canada of the historic peace churches, the Society of Friends, the Mennonites, the Hutterites and the Doukhobors who have always objected to serving in the war. This has been linked in the past to making payments in lieu of that service.

During the First World War there was a great deal of pressure for universal conscription and there was a real struggle to maintain that principle of conscientious objection, but it was maintained. Similarly, in the Second World War. I want to urge upon all Members the importance of individuals acting on the basis of their own conscience. I know within our own caucus and I hope within other caucuses that this is one area where on a question of conscience individuals have the right to disagree publicly with their caucuses and to vote against their caucuses on questions of conscience. We have heard of war crimes, Mr. Speaker, where people have been condemned because they refuse to act on the basis of their conscience.

I would like to read some comments from the philosopher Thoreau in his famous essay "And the duty of civil disobedience", written over 100 years ago. He wrote:

There are thousands who are in opinion opposed to slavery and to the war, who yet in effect do nothing to put an end to them; who, . . . sit down with their hands in their pockets, and say that they know not what to do, and do nothing; who even postpone the question of freedom to the question of—

Wait for it, Mr. Speaker—

—free trade, and quietly read the prices-current along with the latest advices from Mexico, after dinner, and, it may be, fall asleep over them both—They hesitate, and they regret, and sometimes they petition; but they do nothing in earnest and with effect. They will wait, well disposed, for others to remedy the evil, that they may no longer have it to regret. At most, they give only a cheap vote and a feeble countenance and Godspeed, to the right, as it goes by them.

Thoreau continues:

Cast your whole vote, not a strip of paper merely, but your whole influence. A minority is powerless while it conforms to the majority; it is not even a minority then; but it is irresistable when it clogs by its whole weight—If a thousand men were not to pay their tax-bills this year, that would not be a violent and bloody measure, as it would be to pay them, and enable the State to commit violence and shed innocent blood. This is, in fact, the definition of a peaceable revolution.

Today we see a shift from the emphasis on direct military service to the payment of taxes which support a huge military machine. One writer, Muriel Luca from Foremost, Alberta, said:

For more than 200 years Canada has allowed freedom of conscience in relation to military service. However, today's military service is overwhelmingly in the form of paying for the increasingly expensive new weapons, much to the satisfaction of the munitions makers. My hands are just as bloody from helping finance nuclear missiles as they would be personally running another human being with a sword.

It is that sense which leaves many people to declare that paying taxes that go to military purposes is against their military conscience. More than 250 people across Canada have already taken action and have taken that portion of their taxes which would normally go for military purposes and put it into a peace trust fund. They are organizing and urging the Government of Canada to legalize this procedure so they are able to do it with Government sanction.

They point to the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms in our new Constitution of 1982. I would like to read the first two articles of that Charter of Rights and Freedoms. It reads:

The Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms guarantees the rights and freedoms set out in it subject only to such reasonable limits prescribed by law as can be demonstrably justified in a free and democratic society.

Everyone has the following fundamental freedoms:

(a) Freedom of conscience and religion—

Freedom of conscience, Mr. Speaker, is the first freedom to be guaranteed by our Charter of Rights and Freedoms. But what does freedom of conscience mean? So far Parliament has left it to the courts to interpret the meaning of what freedom of conscience means as well as what other sections of the Charter are going to mean. The peace trust people would like to see this clarified. The cost of taking a case to the Supreme Court is estimated at something like $255,000, over one-quarter of a million dollars, to have a question clarified.

I would like to quote from David Vickers, a former Attorney General of British Columbia, a very distinguished lawyer in B.C. He said:

• (1810)

The interpretation which courts will place on the first freedom, the freedom of conscience, is not really known. I suggest that if it's to mean anything, it must be a guarantee, not just to believe in something, but also to put those beliefs into action.

Freedom of conscience is not just to be able to maintain a private inward belief but to be able to act in accordance with your beliefs. Certainly when it comes to a basic question such as whether or not we are going to support the military, I think that has to be recognized. There is nothing in this motion that goes beyond what are the reasonable and just limits that any society can impose. Without waiting for a court decision I would urge the Government to make provisions so that freedom of conscience can be a reality for people instead of just nice words on a piece of paper.

The peace trust people have organized themselves into a charitable society known as Conscience Canada which is actively working to have the Government make those changes and I urge it to adopt the motion which I am presenting which would accomplish that. I urge this action to provide freedom of conscience at a practical level so that our Constitution is effective, rather than having to wait for the courts.

Secondly, Mr. Speaker, there are pragmatic reasons why this motion should be adopted. The practical reason for supporting this Bill, even if there were no conscientious objectors, is that we need to provide money for peace research and for education. Already our world is spending far too much money on weapons of destruction. This has two effects. First of all it drains money from other projects. There is still a myth abroad that somehow military expenditures create jobs, but dollar for dollar it has been shown that this is not an efficient way of creating jobs. Military expenditures, dollar for dollar, are one of the most inefficient ways of creating employment. This is one area where there has to be some education of the public. This is one area where we want to see more research so that people and industries that are already engaged in military projects would be able to make the transition to more constructive forms of human endeavour.

Earlier this week the CBC had a program marking the fortieth anniversary of the United Nations. Just as an indication of how much arms budgets are spiralling out of control, the CBC reported that today the United States spends more money on military music than it does on its budget for the United Nations. Yet there continue to be some very well orchestrated complaints about the cost of the United Nations.

Canada has a military budget of $9.4 billion, more than four times the amount we allocate to international development which is $2.1 billion. We are spending four times as much money preparing for war as we are in trying to correct the basic human situation that leads to war. This whole scale of things is completely out of control. Regarding the peace tax, people say, let us vote with our money, let us put our money into peace education and research and try to redress that balance. What is the Government afraid of? Why will it not agree to this kind of proposal?

Secondly, Mr. Speaker, world armaments threaten to destroy us all. The balance of terror is becoming badly unbalanced. The United States plans to spend $26 billion on star wars research and we are concerned about Canadian complicity in that. Even though the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) has given an official "no" to that star wars research on the part of the Canadian Government, the door seems to be open for individual Canadian firms to participate. It reminds me of the old song "Your lips tell me no, no, but there is yes, yes in your eyes". Along with the "yes, yes", there are the dollar signs in the eyes of some Canadian manufacturers who hope to make a quick buck out of increasing the balance of nuclear terror in our world.

Our leaders raise the question of Canadian complicity in the making of nuclear bombs with the use of Canadian uranium. One year ago the Prime Minister spoke at the St. Francis Xavier University, September 28, 1984, and he said preservation of peace is "the central issue confronting our generation". But what has he done since then? Very little.

In conclusion, Mr Speaker, Canadians would like to see more positive leadership from the Government on the subject of peace. They would also like to contribute directly themselves. The peace tax fund would enable them to do so. It provides a sensible alternative to the madness of the arms race, an alternative that takes account of conscience. I urge the acceptance of this motion upon all Members of the House.

Mr. Jim Jepson (London East): Thank you, Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to be speaking to this motion today. I know the Hon. Member who has brought this before the House today is a responsible and conscientious parliamentarian and his remarks in favour of the motion are made with the best of intentions, I am sure.

This motion has obviously been put forward so that this House can show its commitment to the pursuit of world peace and so that Canada can reinforce its position of leadership in the worldwide efforts for security from the dangers posed by the very existence of nuclear weapons.

Although I agree with the ultimate goal of this motion, world peace, there are enough problems with some of the implications that I hope this House will not send it on as a concrete proposal for legislation. I think every Member of this House will agree tht the people of Canada, indeed this Government, are seriously concerned about world peace and that they are anxious to take every opportunity to express this concern as a high priority.

The motion on the floor shares this goal. This motion if enacted as legislation would allow Canadian taxpayers to earmark a certain part of the taxes they pay for special purposes. This tax revenue would be committed toward the activities of a registered international organization involved in peace research and education. The funds that would go to this use would be the equivalent proportion of the tax dollar that would have gone to Canada's defence spending, that is about 9.3 cents of every dollar for the 1984-1985 fiscal year. This is obviously neither responsible nor reasonable.

This year personal income taxes amounted to about $30 billion of the Government's total revenues. To put things in perspective, this motion would make Parliament surrender control of about $3 billion each year, or close to 3 per cent of this year's total expenditures.

My first reaction to this motion was that it implies there is a disagreement between the wishes of Parliament and those of the Canadian people. This contradicts the basic belief we all hold that says Parliament provides a forum where the different views and interests of Canadians can be engaged and debated. It is hoped that the result of this process will be policy and legislation that pursues the national interest in the most effective way possible.

If we accept the principle behind this motion we will have to admit that Parliament is not succeeding in its most basic goal. In the case of defence policy I think that our Government has taken particular care to see that its defence spending priorities reflect the appropriate balance between the need for an effective military capability and, yes, an earnest desire to enhance national and international security.

Furthermore, Mr. Speaker, I think that this policy supports in a very deliberate way the traditional role that Canada has played in international affairs and that we have earned respect for, that is a role highlighting leadership in bringing about the peaceful resolution of conflicts around the world and voicing the importance of moderation and understanding in that relation between all nations.

Even more significantly, I think our Government's defence policy is an expression of the views and priorities of the Canadian public. The public has by and large supported the approach we have taken on questions relating to national defence and international security. Of course, there will always be debate over precisely the best way to achieve the goals we have set for ourselves of a nation, as part of North America and as members of the NATO Alliance. A difference of opinion is always healthy in the sense that it ensures that alternatives will be considered most carefully. This is particularly evident in the activities of the Canadian Institute for Arms Control and Disarmament. The establishment of this organization was a clear expression of the fact that the Government sees as important precisely the same objectives as the Hon. Member has brought forward in his Bill tonight.

The Government's recent decision with respect to the Strategic Defence Initiative was indicative of our appreciation for the democratic process. When concerns were raised over the merits of this proposal through the direct representation of Canadians, the media and the speeches of Members of this House, the Government took care to appeal to public participation in this decision. I believe that the final choice not to participate in SDI directly as a Government was very strongly influenced by a number of widely held reservations about this new strategy on the part of Canadians.

Defence policy is of such a crucial nature that the principles embraced by the Government, more so than in any other area of policy, must be sensitive to the prevailing attitudes among the electorate. At the same time, however, I think that this area of Government policy is most effectively dealt with by the parliamentary and Cabinet decision-making process.

I believe the views and opinions of Canadians must be considered in forming Canada's defence policy. This process, however, depends on the institution of Parliament. Parliamentarians have access to resources and information, they have opportunities for debate and discussion and they have a legislative process, all of which ensure that conclusions are reached responsibly and legitimately. Matters as sensitive and complex as defence policy rely very heavily on the testimony of experts and on healthy debate between those with widely differing views.

I am afraid that the motion being debated today would not satisfy the principles of parliamentary democracy that are the traditions of this House. To illustrate this point, I suggest that we imagine what it would be like if we could earmark our tax returns for any purpose that we might personally feel important. I am sure that this would result in a very colourful range of Government-sponsored activities. Although this would be a very clear expression of public preference, it would not be an improvement over our present arrangement. More importantly, this kind of tax provision would introduce total disorder into the duties of the House of Commons. Members of Parliament would cease to exercise their responsibilities and policy would not be the product of a deliberate and thoughtful process.

The final point I would like to make is the simplest of all. I disagree with this motion because I believe the restraints imposed by our huge deficit have made defence spending, not to mention spending on environmental protection, very inadequate. As a nation-state, Canada has to fulfil certain responsibilities, primarily to our own defence and secondly to the safety and security of our allies. In the context of other obligations and commitments, the Government has allocated certain funds for national defence. Still our forces rely on obsolete technology and deteriorating equipment. It is very questionable as to whether or not we could offer any defence whatsoever to our sovereign territory, no matter how much we cherish it. Unfortunately, we inherited this terrible state of defence from the previous administration.

As a member country in good standing in NATO which certainly enjoys benefits commensurate with our contributions, we must be careful to honour our obligations. Support for this motion would certainly bring into question our commitment to the goals of our alliance and indeed to the values of peace and security that we are trying to uphold so well.

Finally, significant reductions in nuclear armaments can only be achieved if they are verifiable. Negotiations have to be conducted from a position of credibility. I believe that support for this motion would seriously jeopardize this goal.

It is important for all Canadians to know that to protect the interests of our country, we must speak from a position of strength, not weakness. For those naive enough to believe that this is not true, I would suggest that they talk to people from Poland, East Germany, Czechoslovakia, Hungary or Afghanistan, to name just a few. The fate of these countries should serve as a constant reminder to us of the way Soviets can be trusted around a so-called negotiating table. Eternal vigilance will always be the price of freedom.

In closing, I would like to say that I think this House has benefited from the opportunity to debate this motion. I do, however, recommend that Hon. Members consider very seriously the implications of this motion and do not endorse it.

Mr. Paul Gagnon (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I listened with interest to the previous two speakers and found that I cannot support this motion because it starts off with the wrong premise. That premise is that money spent on defence is money spent on war. I do not think that can be rationalized any more than can be saying that spending a dollar on a police force is spending a dollar that will help out robbers, burglars or murderers.

I look at defence spending as an insurance policy on which we hope we will never collect. One does not buy health insurance expecting to become ill but wants the protection in case that happens. Defence spending is nothing more than an insurance policy and the people of Canada should be proud to support the buying of that insurance which protects the real estate that we call Canada.

[Translation]

Mr. Claude Lanthier (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have this opportunity to take part in the debate and to discuss this proposal which, in my judgment, is a real challenge to the imagination. I say it is "a real challenge" because the sponsor of the motion, the Hon. Member for Cowichan-Malahat-The Islands (Mr. Manly), is challenging all of us to ask ourselves whether we are doing all we can and all that should be done to promote a peacekeeping effort all over the world.

He is also challenging us to consider the role of our defence forces and determine whether they do contribute to peacekeeping.

The motion is also very imaginative and its New Democratic Party sponsor has shown a remarkable spirit of innovation by drafting this altogether novel tax proposal.

I will try to prove in my remarks that, unfortunately, such imagination and innovation can be misleading, and that the rather novel tax structure described in the motion is very much like Pandora's box—full of unpleasant surprises for anyone who opens it.

Mr. Speaker, my Government colleagues have spoken or will eventually speak on some of the significant issues raised in this motion with respect to what is being done and what could be done to promote peace and security throughout the world.

For my part I intend to speak to the tax issues raised by the motion. I have nothing against openly supporting any legitimate effort to restore world peace, but I have serious reservations concerning the tax mechanism we should use to that end.

The wording of the motion would indicate that the Hon. Member for Cowichan-Malahat-The Islands has drawn his own conclusion, namely that maintaining defence forces does not promote peace. He would fund peace research and information organizations by using some of the tax revenues allocated to the defence budget. One must conclude that he considers that peace and defence activities do not go together, like oil and fire, and that anybody who is in favour of one kind of activities must necessarily be against the other kind.

Of course, the Hon. Member is entitled to his opinion. The rest of us are certainly entitled to have ours, different though they might be in this respect. I will show that the mechanism proposed in the motion would, in a way, leave very little choice to the taxpayers who happen to believe that maintaining our armed forces contributes to peacekeeping throughout the world. I say this because the way this tax deduction would work out we would be urging the taxpayer to hand some of his income taxes over to bona fide peace research organizations, and we would also be indicating quite clearly that the money should come from the defence budget.

It seems to me that by adopting the proposal we would be offering this kind of alternative to the taxpayer. I do not think it is a clear proposal in black and white, and that the good guys are all on one side and the bad guys on the other side. In my opinion, nothing in the income tax return should indicate that the taxpayer is either for or against defence spending and peacekeeping effort.

I am wondering why the Hon. Member for Cowichan-Malahat-The Islands did not draft his motion so as to use the traditional tax mechanism available to all Canadians who want to support public welfare organizations and who want to take advantage of tax incentives to do so. Of course, we all know this mechanism, the deduction for charitable donations. The definition of charitable organization under our tax system is wide ranging. We do not see any problem if peace research organizations were to be recognized as charitable organizations eligible for this deduction. We all know how the deduction works. If a taxpayer is assessed at a marginal rate, say 35 per cent, everytime he gives $1 to a charitable organization the public treasury, federal or provincial, contributes 35 cents, so the taxpayer's donation amounts in fact to 65 cents.

This tax deduction for charitable donations has a long and honourable history. It is almost as old as income tax and it is almost part of it. It is a simple procedure whereby the State acknowledges the fact that any society derives benefits from the work done by charitable organizations. We find it hard to understand why such a simple procedure is not enough to achieve the objective of the sponsor of the motion under consideration today.

Enough of these idealistic musings. Let us get back to earth. Suppose we look at how this particular proposal would work out in practice. First of all, we must realize that this idealistic and very selective process of transferring tax revenues would have to be indicated on the personal income tax return, also known as the T-1 form. Since it would be a reduction in tax payable, the amount would have to be indicated at the end of the return.

The taxpayer would have to be asked the following question: Do you wish to have your income tax reduced by 10.2 per cent, or whatever the percentage happened to be in that year, and have this portion transferred to the organizations involved in peace research and education as specified? I am not sure the sponsor of the motion provided any explanatory notes to indicate to the taxpayer what this particular percentage represents, in other words, the percentage of the federal budget directly allocated to defence.

Mr. Speaker, there are a number of comments one could make on this kind of proposal. Indeed, it raises a number of questions in my own mind, and I hope in the minds of the other Members of this House. For instance, what strict assurance does this somewhat fanciful procedure provide that the Government's tax revenues are allocated correctly and efficiently? We believe there is no way to predict the exact percentage of tax revenues to be transferred.

I believe we could expect the peace organizations that would benefit from this procedure to launch an all-out advertising campaign, urging taxpayers to opt for such a method. And after all, the taxpayer would probably be very quick to conclude, as we all would, that it would not cost us a cent to make what could be called a pious choice. Of course, Mr. Speaker, if someone is asked: Are you in favour of peace? He will probably answer right away: Why yes. Obviously. And in the taxpayer's mind, he would be giving the Government's money and not his own.

It is quite conceivable that the transfer of tax revenues could be very significant. After all, almost everyone is in favour of peace, with the exception of a few bellicose individuals and those who benefit directly from war. The taxpayer could well be in favour of this concept, believing it would not cost him a penny. And he would probably not consider other aspects of a plan he would assume had received official recognition since it appears on the income tax return.

However, there are other aspects to be considered. For instance, what assurance do we have that the revenues thus transferred to peace organizations are well spent? Will they achieve the desired results? And if the transfer of $1 million to peace research and education achieves a certain level of results, would $10 million increase those results tenfold? Or is there a law of decreasing returns that applies to this area as well?

Mr. Speaker, these are some of the questions a responsible Government must ask when allocating its budget expenditures.

However, the problem with the proposal before the House this evening is that such questions would not be asked. The Government would have no control over the percentage of tax revenues thus allocated to these expenditures. The scope and effectiveness of advertising campaigns orchestrated by peace organizations would probably have a significant impact on that amount. We would therefore have a percentage somewhere between zero and 10.2 per cent of federal tax revenues that would escape the control of Government and Parliament.

I said a few moments ago that the taxpayer would tend to think this plan would not cost him a penny. He might be wrong. If this proposal were fully implemented, it would mean that some $4 million in tax revenues would be transferred from our personal income tax. Consequently, if the transferred amount is significant, the Government might well be obliged to increase taxes to fill the gap, unless Hon. Members are prepared to let the budget deficit increase over and above what it is now, which is out of the question, in terms of the Budget proposals formulated last May.

Supporters of this idea might maintain that the amount is relatively small, that peace is very important, and that it is worth setting aside the principles of appropriate control of public expenditures for the sake of a very noble cause. The argument is undoubtedly very seductive. But how far should we expand this principle? We would be opening the door very wide.

If we accept the transfer of tax revenues to peace research, would there be other causes we might have to accept as well? How far would we extend this new principle? For instance, Governments spend significant amounts of money on hospital care, health insurance and other kinds of public health plans. Would we accept a system under which the Canadian Medical Association could set up a private health care plan to which taxpayers could transfer a certain percentage of their tax payable?

There are Canadians who do not have children and who take a very sceptical view of the spending of public funds on education or daycare centres and the welfare and maintenance of families in general. Would we allow these Canadians to transfer another percentage of their income tax to an area closer to their interests or concerns? Would we then have as many mini-budgets as we have citizens in Canada?

I could give other examples, Mr. Speaker. The point I am trying to make is that the importance of peace research is not the issue here. We are dealing with a much more basic question, namely can Canadians shirk their social responsibilities as citizens? In our system of responsible democratic Government we use Governments to make certain decisions which benefit society as a whole. Oftentimes these are very difficult decisions to make, and now and again they are unpopular. But they are choices we cannot avoid making. I would imagine that defence expenditures fall in the last category.

But making those decisions on behalf of society as a whole is the basic principle of a responsible democratic Government elected as such by the people. Any attempt to avoid making those decisions, or some of them anyway, flies in the face of the principle of responsible Government.

We are not trying to say that citizens should not be interested in knowing how their tax dollars are spent.

We wish more people would show that kind of interest: our democracy would be stronger for it. However we must make a distinction between defence—or the acceptable promotion of defence, or the condemnation of that defence, of certain categories of public expenditures—and the fact that we can decide not to finance a given Government project through certain tax mechanisms that may be simpler.

Given our democratic Government system, the rules must be the same for everybody. We are not talking about a selective Government for certain individuals, by certain individuals, and in the interest of certain individuals.

We are sure that the sponsor of the motion did not draft it with a view to upsetting the well estabished nature of our system of Government. No doubt he is sincerely trying to draw the attention of the House to the vital importance of organizations working at the praiseworthy promotion of world peace in our troubled society. However, the so-called practical procedure which he advocates to reach that goal runs directly counter to important if not basic principles of our taxation system that are based on the responsibility of a government elected by the people. I think that it is a vital point which deserves to be stated at this time and I am pleased to have had the opportunity to do so this evening.

Mr. David Kilgour (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister for External Relations): Mr. Speaker, the motion put forward by the Hon. Member for Cowichan-Malahat-The Islands (Mr. Manly) might be summarized by saying that the Government would establish a registry of national and international organizations involved in peace research and education and basically allow you and me, Mr. Speaker, as taxpayers, to transfer a portion of our tax to one or more of these organizations, such amount to be calculated on the percentage of the national Budget allocated to defence. I know the Hon. Member is a sincere Hon. Member, albeit wrong.

The premise of the motion is that we should get out of NATO and NORAD—both New Democratic Party policies, I believe. Its premise is that we should forgive and forget events such as have happened in eastern Poland in 1939, events with respect to Finland and parts of Poland in 1940, events in Latvia in 1940, in Lithuania in 1940, in Estonia in 1940, in parts of Romania in 1940, in a part of China in 1944, in part of Czechoslovakia in 1945—

Mr. Manly: Read the motion.

Mr. Kilgour: —in eastern and northeastern Prussia in 1945, in Japan, the Sakhalin Islands, in 1945. The Hon. Member wants us to forget basically what happened in Mongolia in 1921, in Bulgaria in 1944 and 1945, in Hungary in 1944 and 1945, in Poland in 1944, 1945, in Romania from 1945 to 1947, in Czechoslovakia in 1948, in the German Democratic Republic in 1949, in North Vietnam in 1945 to 1954.

Mr. Skelly: What about the Peloponnesian wars? Have you anything on that?

Mr. Kilgour: I might note, Mr. Speaker, that the two Hon. Members of the New Democratic Party who are present to support the Hon. Member's motion obviously find it painful that I recite these matters—

Mr. Skelly: Not painful, ridiculous.

Mr. Kilgour: —but I assure them that I intend to continue recounting them.

Mr. Manly: Irrelevant.

Mr. Kilgour: They want us to forgive and forget Cuba in 1970—

Mr. Manly: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I believe that the rule of relevancy should apply to Private Members' Hour as well as to other hours in this House. My motion specifically calls for the establishment of a registry of national and international organizations involved in peace research and education and allows for the allocation of a certain portion of income taxe to those organizations. It says nothing about having to forget past instances of history. I wish that the Hon. Member would confine his remarks to the motion at hand.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Charest): I understand very well the point the Hon. Member is trying to make. The Hon. Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of External Relations (Mr. Kilgour), I believe, is linking his remarks to the other aspect of peace; war.

Mr. Skelly: A very tenuous link.

Mr. Kilgour: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. They want us to forget Afghanistan in 1979, 1980 to 1985 and longer, South Yemen in 1970, Angola in 1975—although I think in fairness, that matter perhaps is still open to dispute—and Ethiopia in 1976. Perhaps the two gentlemen from the New Democratic Party should go and see the movie "The Killing Fields" one day.

Mr. Manly: I've seen it. Think about that movie.

Mr. Kilgour: We all think about things, don't we?

I might remind Hon. Members also that a Labour Party Member from Britain was here not very long ago and I remember he said, "Democratic Socialists don't have to turn over on their backs and put their feet up when it comes to peace issues", and I think both Hon. Members of the New Democratic Party might take heed to what a Member of the Democratic Socialist Party in Britain said on the subject of that Party's defence policy about which, I can assure you, he was not speaking favourably. I should have said that Party's "non-defence" policy, that Party's "throw up our arms" policy.

As was just pointed out by the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Lanthier), there is a principle in our system of Government that people elect Members of Parliament to represent them in decisions such as the allocation of financial resources intended to serve all members of that society. I believe the Parliamentary Secretary made it clear what violation this motion would do to that principle. There is at present no provision in the Income Tax Act which allows individual taxpayers to determine the specific areas in which their taxes should be used. Any change in the allocation of personal taxes such as in the proposal would involve an amendment to the Income Tax Act. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Wilson) is responsible for both originating and amending tax legislation. My colleagues on both sides of the House will be speaking on the taxation issues when the motions come up on the Budget motion debate.

At the present time, Mr. Speaker, Canadians may receive tax exemptions on their contributions to non-profit Canadian peace organizations, as registered in publications such as the Mennonite Central Committee's, "A Directory of Canadian Peace Organizations with International Concerns". There are all kinds of organizations so listed. I am sure, Mr. Speaker, you are aware of many of them. I submit that the Hon. Members of the New Democratic Party must be aware of them as well.

It is the belief of this Government that defence and peace activities are not mutually exclusive, but are, indeed, complementary. If I may put it this way, they are the two wings which allow the bird to fly. We must have defence capability or we will not have security, and therefore we will not have peace. Someone observed long ago that every country will have an army on their soil, either their own defence force or the defence force of someone else. I think that is a very important truth in today's troubled world. We try to keep a balance between maintaining the western alliance while taking every reasonable opportunity to advance the cause of arms control, disarmament, and general global peace and security. In other words, you cannot seek an arms control agreement unless you have some credible defence force.

I would now address the ways in which Canada is promoting peace and security at the present time which negate the need to finance peace research and educational organizations by diverting tax funds from defence expenditures.

Canada's security policy has rested on three complementary foundations for the past 35 years: Deterrence of conflict through the collective security arrangements in NATO and NORAD; pursuit of equitable and verifiable arms control agreements; and commitment to the peaceful settlement of disputes, including collective efforts to resolve the underlying social, economic and political causes of international tension.

Our country and this Government recognize the need for collective efforts to deter agression against North America and Europe. We support and contribute to this defence effort. The Alliance will possess only minimum levels of armaments consistent with effective deterrence, while at the same time we will pursue dialogue and equitable balance and verifiable arms control agreements. Our object, of course, is stability and security for all people in the Alliance.

All Members know that our Alliance relies on a deterrent strategy which takes into account the reality of nuclear weapons. Deterrence, including conventional, intermediate range and strategic nuclear weapons must provide sufficient stability to enable us to negotiate international arms control agreements. Each NATO member must contribute to sharing the collective defence burden while benefiting from its protection. Our direct contributions to deterrence and defence lie in providing effective conventional forces. This is not a question of morality, it is a question of how we can best contribute to our own security given our limited resources for defence.

Our Government, I am proud to say, has made clear its intention to meet its obligations to the Allies within the scope of contributing to stability in East-West security matters. We have committed ourselves to sufficient defence spending to make our contribution effective and reduce the vulnerability of our forces in the field. In short, sir, an effective defence ensures peace better than anything else developed up until today.

It should be noted, however, that budgetary expenditures in the defence sector are manifested in a variety of non-military ways that are of direct benefit to all Canadians in the pursuit of peace in general. For example, portions of the defence budget are allocated to the activities of Emergency Planning Canada, while the Canadian Armed Forces perform a wide variety of non-military functions. These include the evacuation of communities affected by severe flooding, search and rescue operations—

Mr. Skelly: Point of order, Mr. Speaker. I wonder if the Hon. Member might consent to answer a question. I know he is in agony trying to run out the clock and we would certainly be prepared to do him a favour by asking him a question if the Chair indulges this rather unorthodox method.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Charest): It is not for the Chair to indulge, it is for the House to consent in this case. Is there unanimous consent?

Some Hon. Members: No.

Mr. Kilgour: Mr. Speaker, my speech is 15 pages long and my problem is that I am not going to be able to get through it in the two or three minutes remaining to me. If I do, I will be happy to take a question at the end.

Canada is a sovereign nation and we must devote a certain amount of our resources to the development and maintenance of defence capabilities. At the same time we do not take a back seat to anyone in terms of our efforts toward the promotion of arms control, disarmament, and international peace and security. We pursue these objectives, first, through our contributions to and participation in arms control and disarmament negotiations; second, through our contributions to and participation in the UN's peace-keeping activities. And third, through direct support to and consultation with organizations involved in peace research and education.

In the two minutes left I would like to speak briefly to each of these matters. First, may I present three key objectives in arms control and disarmament negotiations where constructive Canadian efforts to promote international peace and security are under way.

For some time Canada has pressed for the immediate and unconditional resumption of talks between the U.S. and the Soviet Union. We are delighted that the Geneva talks are going ahead. We hope and pray that there will be significant reductions in the nuclear arsenals of both countries. We pursued this objective in the councils of NATO and the UN, and continue to do so during our regular consultations with Soviet representatives. It is in the interests of mutual security that these talks bear fruit.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Charest): I regret to interrupt the Hon. Member but the hour allocated for the consideration of Private Members' business has now expired.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 46 deemed to have been moved.

AGRICULTURE—CANADA-UNITED STATES TRADE TALKS. (B) STABILIZATION AND INSURANCE PROGRAMS

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, on September 24, I asked the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Wise) if the Government would be prepared to make a commitment that our price stabilization and support programs as well as our supply management programs such as marketing boards would not become bargaining chips in the Canada-U.S. free trade negotiations. Every Member of this House knows that the most stable parts of our agricultural industry today are those involved in the production of poultry, eggs, broilers, turkeys and milk, as well as those commodities covered by the Canadian Wheat Board. They are perhaps more stable than those commodities which do not have the advantage of a marketing board.

In the Government's documents dealing with free trade there is this paragraph which is especially disturbing to myself and I believe to many Canadian farmers. It is stated the agricultural sector has been exempt from earlier free trade area agreements, including the European free trade agreement. There will undoubtedly be pressures from agricultural interests on both sides of the border to exclude the whole agricultural sector from the Canada-U.S. free trade agreement. However, it is by no means clear that this would be in Canada's interests. There may be productivity advantages to be gained by adjustments within agriculture as well as from accelerating the transfer of farmers out of agriculture.

That is the view of the Government, Mr. Speaker. It thinks if we do away with our marketing boards, crop insurance, grain stabilization and all the rest of our agricultural programs there will be greater productivity achieved and the Government will achieve its aim of accelerating the transfer of farmers out of agriculture. That seems to be the Government's attitude towards agriculture. I think all Canadians will be very concerned about this when they look at the situation between Canada and the U.S.

Approximately 22 per cent of Canadian farmers are in serious financial difficulty and are in danger of losing their farms. In the United States that figure is approximately 33 or 34 per cent. I maintain that much of the difference is due to the fact that we have a number of controlled commodities with administered prices. We also have stabilization programs provided by the federal and provincial governments and programs such as the Western Grain Stabilization Program. As well, we have marketing arrangements through the Canadian Wheat Board. Without those, I believe that another 9 or 10 per cent of our farmers would be in serious financial difficulty.

Is the Minister willing to exclude agricultural products as was done in the European Economic Community? They do have an agreement on agriculture, but it is separate. Unfortunately, the Minister was not prepared to make a commitment that these marketing systems and stabilization programs would be kept out of the bargaining with the United States. If they are put on the table, we know that they will be bargained away.

Many farm organizations, including the Ontario Federation of Agriculture, have expressed concern. An article in The Toronto Star of August 27 reads in part as follows:

> Agriculture shouldn't be part of any free trade package negotiated between Canada and the U.S., an Ontario Federation of Agriculture delegation told a Legislature committee yesterday.
> The federation brief argued that the U.S. would want to dismantle many Canadian farm programs such as marketing boards and price stabilization programs.
> In return, federation president Harry Pelissero said, Canada would probably get very little.

It is interesting to note that the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Wise), who is from Ontario, is acting in direct opposition to the Ontario Federation. Likewise, a report by the Alberta Pool indicates that it is concerned that agricultural stabilization programs and marketing systems will become bargaining chips in the high stakes which the Government will be playing in the free trade negotiations with the President which the Prime Minister announced today in the House of Commons.

I hope that the Minister of Agriculture will see the danger of bargaining away these things which have been so essential in maintaining some of the most viable parts of our agricultural industry in Canada.

[Translation]

Mr. Pierre Blais (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Agriculture): Without going so far as accusing my hon. friend from Algoma (Mr. Foster) of using a double standard in his representations, Mr. Speaker, I must say that I am always a little surprised when I hear him support the stabilization programs which exist in Canada and attack the Government position as defined in Bill C-25, because they agreed, mostly, on the fact that we are calling for their elimination.

This afternoon, I am quite surprised to hear him say something which is in part contrary to what he has been saying for the past few months.

[English]

Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to respond to the question posed by the Member for Algoma (Mr. Foster) on September 24 in regard to bilateral trade negotiations with the United States.

Agricultural trade with the United States is of vital importance, not only to the agri-food industry, but to the whole economy. The United States has been Canada's number one market for agricultural exports for the past two years. Last year, of our total agricultural exports of $10.3 billion, the U.S. market accounted for $2.2 billion. If grains and oil seeds are excluded, the role of the U.S. market becomes even more important, as everyone knows.

Last year more than half of our non-grain exports were sold in the U.S. Last year our exports to the United Stats increased by nearly 30 per cent over 1983, mainly because of the difference in the value of our currencies. At the same time, U.S. agricultural exports to Canada increased by 16 per cent, to a total of $3.6 billion. That is nearly 60 per cent of Canada's total agricultural imports.

I think it is worth while to repeat those figures—exports of $2.2 billion, imports of $3.6 billion and a deficit of $1.4 billion per year in our agricultural trade with the United States. With that kind of money involved, both Canada and the United States have an interest in avoiding trade disputes such as the one recently experienced in the hog sector. The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Wise) has been working with his American counterpart to ensure an ongoing exchange of information on agricultural trade matters. Furthermore, both Ministers are taking steps to ensure a good flow of information between industry leaders on both sides of the border. We think that is most important.

The Hon. Member for Algoma (Mr. Foster) has heard the statement of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) this afternoon regarding Canada-United States trade. Obviously it would be premature at this point to speculate what will happen down the road in respect of agricultural aspects of Canada-U.S. trade discussions. However, the Hon. Member can be assured that in any negotiations with the United States on agricultural matters, we will be consulting fully with the industry. We are only interested in a deal which is in the best interests of Canadian agriculture.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend from Algoma (Mr. Foster) is aware of the efforts made by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Wise) to improve Canadian markets. As recently as this afternoon, the Prime Minister announced that Canada wanted to open up and work with the Americans to find a way to improve our markets. This is quite clear, Mr. Speaker. Now that we have just stated that we would like to open the door partly, my hon. friend would like us to shut it immediately and set up trade barriers . . . We will have ample time to set up trade barriers. We are about to start negotiating and I think, in fact I am sure, that the future will prove us right.

CANADIAN ARMED FORCES—ACQUISITION OF CANNED TUNA. (B) ISSUANCE OF CONTRACT

Mr. Ray Skelly (Comox-Powell River): Mr. Speaker, my question this evening concerns one which I directed to the Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of National Defence (Mr. Nielsen) in the House and it revolves around the tuna scandal.

It appears that some time ago a company packed some decomposing tuna, and some of that particular shipment of tuna was packed prior to the election. The company did not have much success in convincing Fisheries inspectors to pass the tuna, as they found it to be rancid, decomposing and unfit for human comsumption. Apparently the last Government was not too favourable on overriding its inspectors. After the last election a new Government was in power. I remember the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) in an off record discussion on the campaign trail happened to say: "Yes, if I am in power, I will definitely have my nose in the trough, too, along with my friends". I am wondering whether there is a linkage between that statement and the events of the tuna scandal.

Once the Conservative Party was in power, some very influential people from Atlantic Canada began to telephone Ottawa—the Premier of New Brunswick, the Atlantic Chamber of Commerce and the New Brunswick fish producers. Of course, the Hon. Member for Carleton-Charlotte (Mr. McCain) said in September that he had raised that matter, before he retracted the statement. It was a fairly significant problem.

At one point it was mentioned that only 2 per cent to 3 per cent of the production of the company was involved, although it was close to a million cans. When October rolled around and the great pressure had been put on, the then Minister of Fisheries went down to taste it for himself. He eventually said: "Yes, I tasted three cans and two of them weren't too bad". I presume the taste test led some kind of procedure by which a contract was granted to the company to supply the Department of National Defence with $103,000 worth of the product of this company.

In November, this material appears to have been delivered to 32 Canadian Forces bases. Upon opening the cans, the cooks and the people at the bases found that it was rancid, decomposing and unfit for human consumption. Things certainly moved forward from that point, to the Ministry of National Defence removing the product. It went to fisheries inspection labs in Burnaby and Halifax, and the Ottawa Forces Base sent it to the health laboratories here. They found that the product was contaminated. Although it would not kill you, it certainly was not something you would want to eat.

As I understand it, as things unfolded, the product was sent back to the company. The company designated a second order as a replacement order. Before that order could leave the plant, fisheries inspectors designated it as unfit for human consumption.

Were members of the Canadian Armed Forces used as guinea pigs in this situation? In addition, was there an arrangement between the influential voices in Atlantic Canada and the new powers in Ottawa?

Given the testimony we have had and the kinds of information given in this House, conflicting statements, retractions and questions raised previously as well as other very questionable practices that have gone on, including early campaign statements by the Prime Minister, the questions are certainly valid. It would be very useful if the Government would come clean and tell us how this order, $103,000 worth of tuna that turned out to be, as fisheries inspectors have said, rancid and decomposing and unfit for human consumption went to the Department of National Defence.

Mr. Robert Wenman (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, as a fellow Member of Parliament from British Columbia I can certainly appreciate that occasionally we do have a rather colourful turn of phrase or that we are tempted occasionally to overstate a case, but I know the Hon. Member from Comox-Powell River (Mr. Skelly) is often a reasonable Member. He likes to hear the facts and the details. I will give him a little bit of that, and as I do I know he will appreciate the situation, the difficulty, understand and be assured regarding his question.

Certainly the Department of National Defence did enter a contract with Ocean Maid Food Limited of St. Laurent, Quebec to supply canned tuna for the Canadian Armed Forces. There can be no doubt about that. The Hon. Member should also recognize that during the current fiscal year, 1985-86, the Department of National Defence is involved with some 40,000 contracts. In what is called national procurement where food items are included there are 25,000 contracts and one million line food items. The total value of national procurement is $1.135 billion. There are over 100,000 types of food items involved.

When the Minister this afternoon mentioned that he could not be expected to be directly involved with every contract undertaken by DND, this was an understatement, not an overstatement, especially in light of the facts I have just mentioned.

The Department of National Defence, like any other Government institution, has rigid and demanding quality standards for foodstuffs in order that we can be assured that our Armed Forces are eating the best and the highest quality of food that can be purchased here. It is not an unusual occurrence that food products which do not meet out high standards in the Department of National Defence are returned to be replaced by the supplier, which was the case in this instance.

REQUEST THAT GOVERNMENT WITHDRAW BILL C-70 IMMEDIATELY

Mr. Jean-Claude Malépart (Montreal-Sainte-Marie): Mr. Speaker, last Wednesday Montreal was the scene of the official launching of the coalition of women to fight against the Government's decision to deindex family allowances.

Mr. Speaker, forty women's groups and organizations related to families with children got together—the Fédération des femmes du Québec, the AFEAS, the Fédération des associations de familles monoparentales, the Association régionale des centres de femmes du Québec, the Action Committee on the Status of Women, the Committee on the Status of Women, the CNTU, to name a few.

Mr. Speaker, I could recite the names of 41 organizations which formed a common front to get a petition campaign going throughout Quebec and urge the Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. Mulroney) to withdraw immediately Bill C-70 aimed at deindexing family allowances.

On the same day, Mr. Speaker, 250 mothers met in a hall in Montreal east and questioned the Prime Minister. Does the Prime Minister know that we use our family allowances to buy food and pay oil heating bills?

Mr. Speaker, the questions those mothers directed to the Prime Minister of Canada are—

Mr. Speaker: I regret to inform the Hon. Member that his time has expired.

UNEMPLOYMENT

REMUNERATION OF TASK FORCE CHAIRMAN

Mr. John R. Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Miss MacDonald) has set up a task force to review the unemployment insurance system. Amazingly, the Chairman of this group will be paid $750 a day plus $125 per day in travelling expenses. This is absolutely mind-boggling. Here we have a commission headed by an individual whose daily income is more than what the average claimant receives in a month.

I know that the Minister of Employment and Immigration is in agreement with me on the insanity of it all. She said on March 21, 1983, when commenting on the Macdonald Commission:

> People see the special quirks and privileges, the appointment of commissioners at $800 per day.

The Minister went on to say:

> To much of the Canadian public, Parliament has become an extravagant irrelevance. It is a circus show acting out its own fantasy in a make-believe world where neither money nor morality seem very real any more.

The Minister was right then and she is right now.

MUSEUMS

OPENING OF TYRRELL MUSEUM IN ALBERTA

Mr. Gordon Taylor (Bow River): Mr. Speaker, this week Premier Peter Lougheed officially opened the $30 million Tyrrell Museum which is nestled in the hills of the canyon of the Red Deer just west of the growing City of Drumheller in the beautiful Province of Alberta. The buildings are located not far from the confluence of the Red Deer River and the Kneehill Creek where, in 1884, one of Canada's outstanding geologists, Dr. Joseph B. Tyrrell, found the almost perfect head of a gigantic carnivore. This skull will soon be in the museum which bears his name, thanks to the Minister of State for Science and Technology (Mr. Siddon) and the former Minister of Communications, the Hon. Marcel Masse.

As I entered the museum I saw in front of me a giant globe of the planet Earth indicating that beyond we would find the colour, variety and the successful adaptation of life to a great diversity of environments. All around me were bones from the graveyards of the ages. Proceeding through a dark passage we stood looking into a vast chasm when suddenly the lights came on and I stood in awesome, silent, speechless amazement. It was as if we had just been propelled into the Drumheller Valley as it was three million years ago—a tremendous gigantic work showing skeletons of every type of dinosaur that ever existed, standing in their natural habitat.

Words cannot describe the portrayal of the earth's crust, the beginnings of life from three million years ago up to the appearance of man in the valley. It is the greatest palaeontology museum in the world. I urge every Canadian to join the hundreds from other lands to visit the Tyrrell Museum. Drumheller Mayor Bill Doucette welcomes the world to the Valley of the Dinosaurs.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

MEMBERS' INTERVENTIONS—CANADIANS' EXPECTATIONS

Mr. Nic Leblanc (Longueuil): Mr. Speaker, since the end of the summer recess, Canadians have been watching their Parliamentarians and how they are using the House of Commons, the noblest institution in this country.

Mr. Speaker, those same Canadians believe it is high time some Parliamentarians stopped using their seat in the House merely to talk about scandals and frivolous subjects. Their comments are a waste of time, and Canadians in general think their Parliamentarians should be making a more serious effort to seek a positive solution to the economic problems facing this country, not by discrediting our banking institutions but by renewing confidence in them. Furthermore, promoting investment in Canada will create jobs for our fellow Canadians, and that is what this Government is trying to do.

WAR CRIMINALS

DESCHÊNES COMMISSION—OPPOSITION TO PROPOSED U.S.S.R. VISIT

Mr. John Nunziata (York South-Weston): Mr. Speaker, one of the many aspects of the Nazi system that revolted and disgusted Canadians was its system of justice. The concept of Nazi justice is in itself a contradiction in terms because there was no justice in Nazi Germany. Individuals were jailed and often executed without the slightest regard for the principles of natural justice.

One of the other regimes which has shown contempt on a massive scale for the concept of justice as we know it is the Soviet Union. The gulags, the mental hospitals, the KGB, and the long history of Soviet human rights abuses should provide us with enough examples of Soviet justice to make us distrust that system absolutely. Yet, Mr. Speaker, the Deschênes Commission of Inquiry on war criminals is now considering travelling to the Soviet Union to hear evidence as part of its investigation.

Every Member of this House wants to see us track down those responsible for committing atrocities during the war. We all feel that these individuals must be brought to justice. But if we are to uphold the standards of our system of justice then, justice must not only be done, it must also appear to be done. The use of Soviet evidence by the Deschênes Commission must be rejected if we are to uphold our own standards. There is some powerful symbolism here. If we use Soviet evidence, are we not perilously close to adopting the same tactics as those we are seeking to prosecute?

I call on the Government to prohibit the Commission from travelling to the Soviet Union to gather evidence.

BANKS AND BANKING

CANADIAN IMPERIAL BANK OF COMMERCE—TREATMENT OF PUBLIC AND EMPLOYEES

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, it has become clear that the large banks expect the Canadian taxpayer to pay millions of dollars to bail them out for their investments in the Canadian Commercial Bank. How have these same banks treated Canadians? The Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce is one example of how the gigantic corporations have treated ordinary Canadians shabbily. Have they dealt with farmers facing foreclosure with compassion? No. Have they treated mortgage holders fairly? No.

While the Bank of Canada rate continues to go down, the Commerce has increased mortgage rates. The Commerce has a similarly negative record in its labour relations. Workers at the Commerce, many of them lowly paid women, have not had a regular wage increase since 1981. The bank wants complete freedom to reduce the hours of work whenever it wishes. It also insists upon compulsory overtime.

The Commerce also wants contract language that will prevent workers from taking cases of discrimination to the Human Rights Commission and that will exempt Commerce workers from the provisions of the Canadian Labour Code dealing with technological change. The same bank made over $400 million in profits last year.

It is incumbent upon the Government to force banks to show compassion and concern for farmers, home owners, and their own employees, before blindly pouring money into these wealthy corporations.

TRADE

SUPPORT FOR CANADA—UNITED STATES NEGOTIATIONS

Mr. Alex Kindy (Calgary East): Mr. Speaker, the economic news this morning was most pleasing. I took pride in our Government on finding that the bank rate in Canada has dropped to its lowest level in seven years, and is now at 9 per cent.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Kindy: The good economic news did not stop there. I found more pleasure in reading that President Reagan has hailed our Government's offer of free trade. As a Government which cares, and I insist on the word cares, we have realized that pursuit of a bilateral free trade agreement will return prosperity to Canada.

It should be realized that the most important aspect of our relationship with the United States is that roughly two-thirds of our trade is with that country. The management of U.S.-Canada relations can determine the success or failure of most of our economic policies. Therefore, Canada's best interests can only be achieved by forging closer trade links between Canada and the United States. We have returned to the first option and moved away from that Liberal option that was a failure, the third option.

If we are successful in our pursuit of stronger trade links, our industry will be less vulnerable to the protectionist actions taken by other industrialized nations. We will once again return prosperity—

Mr. Speaker: I must inform the Hon. Member that his time has expired.

CANADA-UNITED STATES NEGOTIATIONS—REACTION OF OPPOSITION PARTIES

Mr. Don Ravis (Saskatoon East): Mr. Speaker, I have great difficulty in understanding the negative reaction of the opposition Parties to the Prime Minister's (Mr. Mulroney) announcement yesterday that our Government is pursuing a new enhanced trade agreement with the United States. Would the Opposition have Canadians stand by and lose their jobs to hundreds of protectionist Bills currently before the U.S. Congress, threatening our lumber, agriculture, steel, and fisheries industries, just to name a few? Would the Opposition have the Government discard a hundred billion dollar trade agreement? That is what will happen if we do not enter trade negotiations with the United States.

Canada is the only industrialized nation without guaranteed access to a market of 100 million people or more. The Macdonald Royal Commission, a commission set up by a previous Liberal Government and headed by a previous Liberal Finance Minister, has strongly recommended that Canada give high priority to the negotiation of freer trade arrangements with the United States to secure market access.

• (1115)

In an effort to score political points the Liberal Opposition is ignoring the reality that our economic future and jobs for Canadians depend on these trade negotiations. It appears that its Members do not care about Canadian jobs. They cannot deal with anything which may be positive for Canada, but Canadians know that major steps must be taken to ensure a prosperous future. I congratulate the Prime Minister on this historic initiative.

RESIGNATION OF FORMER MINISTER OF COMMUNICATIONS—RCMP INVESTIGATION

Right Hon. John N. Turner (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, yesterday I asked the Prime Minister whether any members of his senior staff were advised by Jerry Lampert, National Director of the Progressive Conservative Party, about an RCMP investigation into alleged electoral mispractices involving the former Minister of Communications. The Prime Minister, as reported at page 7050 of Hansard, told me:

> In all instances I have been informed by senior staff that they were not so advised under any circumstances.

Last night millions of Canadians watched Mr. Lampert confirm that he had indeed told senior members of the Prime Minister's Office. I ask the right hon. gentleman who is lying, the National Director of the Progressive Conservative Party or senior members of the Prime Minister's Office?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): It may be, Mr. Speaker, that neither is. It may be that, as happens from time to time, one does have a problem of human error in recollection. My right hon. friend would not be astonished by that. It happens from time to time in life that our memories are not as infallible as we would like.

I was informed in the manner in which I advised my right hon. friend. I have no knowledge of why Mr. Lampert made that statement. I am advised that the statement is inaccurate. I have asked the President of the Party to conduct an urgent review and report to me.

[Translation]

REQUEST THAT PRIME MINISTER CONDUCT OWN INQUIRY

Right Hon. John N. Turner (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, it is not a matter of a misunderstanding or slight contradiction. Either the Prime Minister's senior advisers are lying or the National Director of the Conservative Party is lying. Speaking of investigations, why does the Prime Minister, as Leader of his own party and Prime Minister of Canada, not ask all the persons concerned in his office to find out who is and who is not telling the truth?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, upon receipt of the allegation in question, I immediately gave instructions to the President of the Party, the Hon. Member for Pembina, to get in touch immediately with his colleagues in the Party executive to direct the necessary queries to Mr. Lampert, who is responsible to the Party's National Executive. This does not exclude my own responsibility, of course. I have questioned all senior staff in my office. I have received the assurances I gave the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition. The questions will be put to Mr. Lampert, and it is possible, for the reason I mentioned earlier, that there was a misunderstanding. It may well be that Mr. Lampert did advise a senior official, but not a member of my staff.

REQUEST THAT PRIME MINISTER MAKE PERSONAL INQUIRIES

Right Hon. John N. Turner (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, we have had a week where information appears not to be getting to the Prime Minister. Of course, we accept his word as he gives it here in the House of Commons, but information is not getting to him on very important matters of fact and allegations which have forced the resignations of two senior Ministers. He says that he has asked the Member for Pembina, who happens to be the President of his Party, to conduct an investigation. That is not an independent investigation.

● (1120)

The Prime Minister is also Leader of his Party. He should call in his National Director, his senior advisers, and his staff, and get to the matter himself. An investigation by a Member of Parliament who happens to be the President of his Party is not going to shed any light on this matter.

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I think I responded very fully to my right hon. friend. I am responsible before the House and before the people of Canada for the conduct of the Government and the affairs of my Party. I am at a loss to understand why the statement was made by Mr. Lampert. It appears to be in conflict with the views and recollections of all members of senior staff. It may very well be that Mr. Lampert indeed informed a senior person of the fact that an alleged infraction may have been committed by the Minister of Communications, but that person was not a member of my staff.

TRADE

CANADA-UNITED STATES NEGOTIATIONS—IMPACT STUDY

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg-Fort Garry): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. He has continually said that jobs are the key issue with regard to negotiating a deal with the Americans on trade. Yesterday the Premier of Ontario reported that the Minister for International Trade told him that over 850,000 jobs would be dislocated as a result of a new free trade deal with the Americans. If that is the case, Mr. Speaker, it has to be a cause of very deep concern.

Will the Prime Minister confirm the report given by the Minister of International Trade that over 850,000 jobs would be affected and dislocated? Will he publish, on behalf of the Government, the impact study that the Government has, showing which regions and industries are affected? Most important, can the Prime Minister tell us whether he has any plans whatsoever to put forward to deal with the many thousands of workers whose jobs will be severely affected by a new trade deal?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, no one from the Government has used the figure which was quoted by the Hon. Member. It may well be that it was drawn by the Premier of Ontario from a figure in a paper prepared by an academic, one of several papers that the Government has ordered prepared so that there will be a full understanding of the implications of the debate.

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): Will you table those papers, Joe?

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): That public paper had to do with job change. Change, as the Hon. Member knows, can mean improved jobs and better jobs. In any event, that was the estimate of one academic based upon an absolute change in all tariff situations.

The one job situation that we do know about is that today Canadians in the fishing industry, forest industry, and other industries across the country have their jobs threatened by protectionist measures arising in the United States. We must have a better answer to that situation than was provided by the policies inherited from the former Government. This Government believes that there is an opportunity for Canadians, not only to protect jobs now, but to build substantial employment security in the future. That is what we are here to do.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Axworthy: Mr. Speaker, I did not ask the Minister for a paid political announcement, I asked him for some facts.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

REQUEST THAT STUDIES BE TABLED

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg-Fort Garry): Mr. Speaker, if in fact the Government has papers that detail the job loss and job dislocation, will it share them with the Canadian public rather than keeping them hidden as it has so far? Will the Minister agree to table the various studies the Government has done demonstrating what the impact of a free trade deal will be and what kind of job loss there will be? Will the Minister also tell the House whether he will be following the recommendations of the parliamentary committee and making clear to the Americans that issues like the Auto Pact and agriculture are not to be negotiated because, in those cases, we know that there will be serious job losses?

● (1125)

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, to the best of my knowledge the paper from which the Hon. Member's non-existent figure was drawn is already in the public domain. However, he can certainly be assured that, just as the Government has already undertaken a massive consultation with provinces, labour, business and other interested groups across the country; just as the Prime Minister has indicated that the question will again be on the agenda at the First Ministers' conference in November; just as we have provided the opportunity for full public debate during a joint parliamentary committee in which the Hon. Member was a participant; just as we have guaranteed that there will be a debate in the House if the opposition Parties allow that debate to occur—

Mr. Axworthy: Just table the papers.

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): —we intend to ensure that there will—be a full and informed debate in the country so that the negotiating positions that our negotiators ultimately take into any negotiations that might occur with the United States will be based upon wide public consultation.

Mr. Axworthy: What are you hiding? There goes the cover-up again.

FISHERIES

SALE OF CANNED TUNA—REQUEST FOR COMMITTEE REFERRAL

Mr. Ian Deans (Hamilton Mountain): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. I want to say to him that his integrity, which he defends constantly with vigour, is not the main issue before Parliament at the moment.

Does he not feel that what happened during the period leading up to the decision to take the rotten tuna off the shelves is not simply a question of internal Conservative concern but a concern of the public of Canada? Will he take our suggestion and refer this entire matter to a parliamentary committee in order that the public can be sure that they are protected in the process?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I think that I responded fully to that question on many occasions. The Hon. Member himself may have asked me the question in reference to my role. I think that the greatest assurance of probity and integrity of the Government and our concern for consumers and taxpayers is that when it was brought to my attention I immediately gave instructions to convene a meeting with the Deputy Prime Minister, the Minister of National Health and Welfare and other Ministers. The product was withdrawn immediately. I think that is an indication, and there has been no evidence to the contrary in this regard.

I believe the Minister has accepted his responsibility, to his credit and to the credit of the House.

Mr. Deans: That is a very interesting answer to a question that may well have been asked by someone, but it is certainly not the question I asked.

GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Ian Deans (Hamilton Mountain): Mr. Speaker, it may well be that the Prime Minister believes that a need-not-to-know policy protects him. However, it does not protect the public of Canada. Is he afraid that in the process of investigating the events leading up to the removal of the tuna from the shelves that those who had knowledge of it will bring forward additional evidence that will undermine the Government's credibility as set forth by the Prime Minister? Is that why he will not agree to a committee?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Absolutely not, Mr. Speaker. We have provided full answers to my hon. friend. There seems to be a suggestion in my hon. friend's question that the Prime Minister of Canada ought to be informed of every administrative decision made within the purview of ministerial responsibility. The very notion of ministerial responsibility is that Ministers make those decisions and live with the consequences before the House. That is what it is all about.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mulroney: That is what has transpired honourably in these circumstances.

Mr. Deans: There is another concept, that information given to senior staff of Ministers, including the Prime Minister, is information for which that particular Minister is responsable.

REQUEST FOR INVESTIGATION

Mr. Ian Deans (Hamilton Mountain): Mr. Speaker, given that there are tapes from three individuals—two Members of Parliament, one a former Minister, and a member of the Prime Minister's own staff—which have been contradicted publicly by those individuals after discussions with the Prime Minister's Office, does the Prime Minister not feel that the public of Canada has every reason to believe that some further inquiry within the parliamentary system is required? Rather than seeking the truth from within the Conservative Party itself, does he feel that there is a need now for an investigation in order that all of the events leading up to the order are made public?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The question is clear.

• (1130)

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I cannot imagine—maybe other more experienced Members of Parliament will remember, but I cannot remember where Prime Ministers and Ministers of the Crown have responded more fully, more thoroughly and more consistently to a series of questions.

Our responsibility to Canada and to the House is to be here and to respond completely to Members of the House, members of the media in other circumstances, for the conduct of our actions. That is the responsibility of Ministers. That is the responsibility of Prime Ministers.

In a notion, alien to the Liberal Party, the Minister of Fisheries concluded that a mistake of judgment may indeed have been made. He submitted his resignation in honourable fashion and it was accepted by me. That is alien to the Liberal Party and the Opposition.

Mr. Nunziata: He made the decision to put the tuna on the shelves.

Mr. Mulroney: In regard to myself, I have fully accepted my responsibilities on behalf of the people of Canada. I got involved in it immediately to the benefit of the people.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

TRADE

FREE TRADE—REQUEST THAT PRIME MINISTER POSTPONE NEGOTIATIONS WITH UNITED STATES

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Saint-Maurice): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Right Hon. Prime Minister.

In the light of the problems he himself and the Government are experiencing at this time, and the fact that many Canadians are wondering about this Government's competence, would it not be wiser, before undertaking negotiations where Canada's future will be at stake, for the Prime Minister to postpone his decision to negotiate with the Americans until this Government's credibility has been restored and the House of Commons has had an opportunity to have a debate on the matter?

[English]

Mr. Nielsen: Stop the world, I want to get off.

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): I will tell you, Mr. Speaker, that is a pretty nasty statement coming from an author.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

[Translation]

Mr. Mulroney: The Hon. Member mentioned the competence of this Government. We have a mandate, and we have a duty to conduct ourselves with dignity. The Prime Minister and his colleagues are doing so. We have a responsibility to try and create jobs, and what we are doing in this area is quite impressive. And part of the strategy is to initiate talks . . . Do you want the answer? . . . to initiate talks with our U.S. partners, to ensure that our products will have access to the U.S. market.

[English]

STATEMENT ATTRIBUTED TO ONTARIO PREMIER

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Saint-Maurice): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. Because there is so much contradiction about this problem of free trade with the United States and the consequences, Canadians are terribly worried about what will happen to their jobs.

This morning the Secretary of State for External Affairs denied that there were some employment figures put forward into the public domain by his own Ministers. Yesterday the Leader of the Province of Ontario—

Some Hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: A supplementary question, please?

Mr. Chrétien: The Premier of Ontario said that the Minister—and he said it in a speech—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I do this with respect. The Hon. Member knows that a supplementary question should not have a preamble and should just be a question.

Mr. Chrétien: Who is telling the truth? The Premier of Ontario or the Secretary of State for External Affairs?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I would suggest that in the interests of federal-provincial co-operation, which I know has never been a strong point in the Liberal Party—

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): It would be well for the critic of External Affairs for the Liberal Party to ask that question of the Premier of Ontario.

It happens occasionally that leading public figures have words put in their mouths which they did not utter. I think this may well have occurred in this case. I can certainly give the undertaking that that figure, as I said earlier, was not used by a member of this Government.

Let me also make the point with regard to the Hon. Member's suggestion that we are moving too quickly on this, that Hon. Member believed the Government of Canada moved too quickly on establishing Canadian sovereignty in the north. He waited 16 years. We acted immediately.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

FISHERIES

SALE OF TAINTED TUNA—PRIME MINISTER'S POSITION

Mr. Mike Cassidy (Ottawa Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. I watched his press conference this morning, and although the Prime Minister may be satisfied with his answers concerning the tuna affair, Canadians are not.

If the Government has nothing to hide, why is it refusing, first of all, to refer the matter to a parliamentary committee, as suggested by our Leader yesterday, and second, to allow Messrs. McCain, Fraser and MacAdam to appear before a parliamentary committee?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I think I have answered this question literally perhaps not dozens but at least quite a number of times, coming from either members of the political group which my hon. friend represents or from other Members of this House.

REASON FOR GOVERNMENT'S REFUSAL TO ESTABLISH COMMITTEE TO EXAMINE SALE OF TAINTED TUNA

Mr. Mike Cassidy (Ottawa Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary. There still are contradictions between statements by Members and people working for the party and for the Prime Minister that have not been resolved. So, why is the Government insisting on having a committee examine the bank bail-out and the judgment of its officials and Ministers in this matter while refusing to let a committee do the same for the tuna question?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have tried to explain to my hon. friend that two people may have recollections about an incident which though not wrong may not always coincide. Let me explain. I remember, if I am not mistaken, that during the campaign for the Liberal Party leadership, there was a difference of opinion between the present Leader of the Opposition and Mr. Trudeau regarding the circumstances of the Opposition Leader's resignation when he was Minister of Finance and that this difference of opinion was reported in the media.

I have never doubted the recollections or memories of my right hon. friend or Mr. Trudeau. In fact, they settled their differences amicably, but if I remember correctly, there was a publicly expressed difference of opinion as to the motives and circumstances of the resignation of the Right Hon . . . when he was Minister of Finance. I never doubted his credibility because of that.

INDUSTRY

SHOE IMPORT QUOTAS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Raymond Garneau (Laval-des-Rapides): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. Considering that the Conservative Government strongly favours the removal of most tariff and non-tariff barriers with the United States and other countries of the world, I would like to ask the Prime Minister whether he or his Government—this preference notwithstanding—intends to extend for five years the imposition of quotas on footwear imports into Canada.

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I am sure the Hon. Member is fully aware of difficulties inherent in negotiations, particularly with such strong competitors as the United States. Our position today is that the Prime Minister has suggested that the President might seek the views of the American Congress on the possibility of discussing our common interests. Should there be exchanges and negotiations, this would be done in the context of regular negotiations such as have been held in the past with respect to GATT negotiations involving several Liberal Ministers. The only change is that we have a new system to make sure that the sectors affected by negotiations will have a direct and on-going input when we draft our negotiating position.

REQUEST THAT GOVERNMENT EXTEND SHOE QUOTAS FOR FIVE YEARS

Mr. Raymond Garneau (Laval-des-Rapides): Mr. Speaker, the Secretary of State for External Affairs has just made a fine speech but he did not answer my question. Does the Conservative Government intend to extend for another five years the quotas on footwear imports into Canada?

Mr. Chrétien: Yes or no?

[English]

Mr. Garneau: I can say it in English if you want.

Some Hon. Members: Shame.

An Hon. Member: Yes or no.

Mr. Chrétien: Oui, non.

[Translation]

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I would suggest that if there is one Member who has proved that he can speak, understand and show respect for both languages here in the House, in Quebec and elsewhere, it has to be me!

[English]

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Ouellet: We will get the answer, I hope. What is the answer?

[Translation]

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): Mr. Speaker, in answer to the question about the footwear industry, the Hon. Member may rest assured that, in its current negotiations with the Americans and in its day-to-day activities, our Government intends to uphold the real interests of Canadians.

[English]

Mr. Ouellet: The answer is no.

UNITED STATES COUNTERVAILING DUTIES

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex-Windsor): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. I refer to the Prime Minister's launching today of a complicated and lengthy negotiation process with the United States. It will have its ups and downs and will not reach a conclusion until late 1987 or early 1988. In view of that, did the Prime Minister, yesterday in his discussions with President Reagan, ask the President for and receive from him clear assurances that Congressional and countervail trade moves against Canada will be prevented while these negotiations are taking place? Or is he prepared to have us negotiate with that gun to our head?

● (1140)

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, it gets more preposteorus all the time. Yesterday the Liberals said: "You are moving too fast; what you should have done was done this a year ago". Now the NDP is all over the lot.

In point of fact, I have expressed many times the position of the Government of Canada, both to the President and in all circumstances, with regard to the items the Hon. Member raised. The President does not control Congress. He is capable of vetoing legislation which impacts upon Canada. I think his record in this regard is unassailable. His intentions with regard to free trade and eliminating that kind of obstacle are consistent with what he is searching for, as we are—a fairer and better arrangement. That is what I suppose he will do if any moves are made against Canada.

DUTIES ON CANADIAN PORK AND SALTFISH

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex-Windsor): Mr. Speaker, if his record is so good, why are there countervail duties at this very time against our pork exports and saltfish exports? The fact is that he could intervene and he has not, and you have not got the assurances that you should have got—

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Langdon: My question—

Mr. Speaker: There was a question; the Hon. Member has asked a supplementary question.

Mr. Langdon: My supplementary question—

Some Hon. Members: Sit down!

Mr. Speaker: The Hon. Member has already asked a supplementary question. I have already heard his supplementary question. Would he like an answer?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, some of the regrettable countervail instances are initiated by the United States; some are initiated by Congressmen. If there is much too much protectionism, as I indicated yesterday, from their side or from ours, it is suicidal. It just builds and explodes against job creation for everyone.

What I pointed out to the President yesterday in conversation was that we are a much smaller country than the United States of America. We are unique and we have cultural institutions. We have all these matters which makes us different and make us sovereign. These are not under discussion. What is under discussion is a commercial transaction designed to facilitate the creation of jobs, and germane to that process and the reason for it is, of course, the elimination of the kinds of pernicious obstacles to which my friend quite properly refers.

POLICE INVESTIGATIONS—PRIME MINISTER'S POSITION

Hon. Bob Kaplan (York Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is also directed to the Prime Minister. Yesterday he insisted that he should not be informed in advance of police investigations against Ministers because, as he said, his advance knowledge could create the possibility of impeding justice. Does the Prime Minister not see the danger of not knowing what is going on? For example, can he work with a Minister in ignorance of the fact that the Minister is being investigated for endangering the state, or even for something less serious which puts the Minister's job on the line and maybe puts him in a desperate situation? How can the Prime Minister refuse to accept information about investigations under way against Ministers?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I was referring to a specific case. When the Commissioner of the RCMP and the Solicitor General visited with me, I asked that they follow the exact procedures that had applied to my predecessor in similar cases. I was assured that this was the process, whereby in this case I was advised that indeed search warrants would be sought against a Minister, but that the exercise of those search warrants would begin the next morning. It was not germane to me to be aware of the identity, at least in their view and in my view as well, to avoid the slightest suggestion—and I think the Hon. Member will agree that some very tenuous and difficult suggestions are made on the floor of the House—that I might have been aware of any information which might have allowed me even to suggest the inhibition of that inquiry. I sought not to be informed, having received the assurance that, immediately upon the execution of those search warrants, the Clerk of the Council or myself would be advised. That, to me, is a proper relationship between the Prime Minister and the administration of justice as it affects his Ministers.

POLICY INQUIRY

Hon. Bob Kaplan (York Centre): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister has not stated the past practice accurately, and I would ask him to look into it. Why did he agree yesterday with the Hon. Member for Durham-Northumberland that it would be totally improper for the Prime Minister to know the details of an investigation before charges are laid by the RCMP against any Hon. Member of the House? He agreed with that. It is wrong, and today I invite him to retract it.

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I suppose we could discuss this matter on a case by case basis. This was brought to my attention by the Solicitor General, a position previously occupied by my hon. friend, and by the Commissioner of the RCMP. It was a courtesy explanation given to me in advance of the execution of the document. I understand, and I received the assurance before they came to my house, that this was conventional and proper and that this had transpired in the past. The value judgment was made that it would be inappropriate in the circumstances and of no need in the circumstances for me. I was advised that it was not a case of anything other than that which has been reported.

It was not a matter involving the national security. It was a suggestion that there might be a possible charge under the Elections Act. It was also made very clear to me—and, as a lawyer, I did not have to be told—that indeed the search warrant might result in the complete exoneration of the individual involved. As a result, I thought that that arms length relationship with the police forces was proper and that my conduct was proper as well.

TRADE

CANADA-UNITED STATES NEGOTIATIONS—AUTO PACT INQUIRY

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, in answer to an earlier question the Prime Minister quite correctly said that the President does not control Congress. However, the Prime Minister controls the position of the federal Government when it comes to free trade. Specifically, is the Auto Pact up for negotiation? Is it sacred? Or is it non-negotiable?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, we believe that the auto pact negotiation indicates that it is possible for Canada and the United States to achieve agreement which serves mutual interests. We see no particular point to renegotiate something which has been successfully put in place. However, I make the point to those who would raise false fears about the advantages to Canada of entering into some kind of arrangement with the United States that we have proof in the Auto Pact that those arrangements can be made to the mutual interests of both countries.

GOVERNMENT POLICY

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, the Minister knows well that the Auto Pact is not a complete, free trade pact. It is a pact with many provisions. Will we guarantee that pact as it is or will we renegotiate it? While the Minister is on his feet, will he guarantee that our farm policies, including subsidies and marketing boards, are sacred, or will they be up for grabs? What is the Government's position?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I invite the Hon. Member to read over the debates which occurred in the standing committee and to consult with his colleague who was party to a process which was one of the most extensive in terms of consultation.

Just to return to the Auto Pact, the Hon. Member is absolutely right. So should he be straightforward and direct with the people of Canada and make it clear that what is proposed now is not a pure free trade arrangement. Of course there will be safeguards for Canadian interests. The Prime Minister of Canada made it very clear yesterday that our cultural integrity is not negotiable, that our social programs are not negotiable, and that the wide range of things which make Canada a distinctive and strong country are not at all negotiable.

The Hon. Member asked about agriculture. I am a Member of Parliament from rural Alberta. The farmers of my constituency and I know the importance to the future of our country of a strong agricultural industry. We know that that industry is threatened now. We intend to make it stronger.

AGRICULTURE

ONTARIO CATTLE DECLARED BRUCELLOSIS FREE

Mr. Barry Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, today's gentle rain seems to be dampening the enthusiasm of the Opposition. However, it is certainly most pleasing for our local farmers. Speaking of farmers, I would address my question, in the absence of the Minister of Agriculture, to the Acting Minister. There is strong concern from the agricultural community in eastern Ontario about livestock dealers who sell cattle to buyers outside this region and are forced to buy a special licence indicating that their cattle are free of brucellosis—

Mr. Speaker: Order. It is getting very long. Would the Hon. Member please come to a question?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, can the Minister tell the livestock dealers of eastern Ontario of the status of the need to continue to purchase these special licences?

Hon. Ray Hnatyshyn (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Agriculture I am pleased to respond to the Hon. Member. I, as President of the Privy Council of Canada, signed an Order in Council on September 19, declaring Ontario brucellosis free. This will be registered in The Canada Gazette on October 2, 1985. Only the complete and undivided support of the cattle industry has made this achievement possible. Cattle can now move freely between all provinces. All affected livestock industry people were notified by telephone on September 20 following internal—

Mr. Speaker: Order. Order, please. The Hon. Minister might like to use Statements by Ministers to complete his remarks.

FISHERIES

SALE OF CANNED TUNA—CAUCUS INQUIRY

Mr. Len Hopkins (Renfrew-Nipissing-Pembroke): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of National Defence. The Prime Minister has continually said that the issue of rancid fish was never raised in caucus in his presence. I would ask the Deputy Prime Minister if the issue has ever been raised in caucus by any member of his caucus in his presence and, indeed, if it has ever been raised outside caucus by any Member of Parliament, by the company in question or by Premier Hatfield of New Brunswick, in the Deputy Prime Minister's presence?

Hon. Erik Nielsen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I do not know the intention of the Hon. Member and those like him who continue along this vein to question every member of our caucus on the matter. It seems rather ridiculous to me.

I can tell the Hon. Member that, contrary to what he says, it is not true that I have denied that the matter was ever raised in caucus because, while I am not normally expansive about what goes on within the four walls of caucus, in this case since the Prime Minister has made an exception of it, I can tell him without any doubt whatsoever—and I have attended all but one or two of our caucus meetings since last September—that the matter was never raised in caucus, never raised with me, and to my knowledge was never raised with any of the other people mentioned by the Hon. Member and all other Hon. Members who asked these questions.

As I said in the House, my first knowledge of this matter came on Wednesday in caucus, as the Prime Minister has also said. I do not know how many times these details must be gone over in order to comply with the provisions of Paragraph 539 of Beauchesne's which should suggest to the Hon. Member, and all like him, that this kind of question is totally out of order.

Mr. Speaker: I would invite the Hon. Member to put a supplementary question with regard to Government policy.

PURCHASE BY DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL DEFENCE

Mr. Len Hopkins (Renfrew-Nipissing-Pembroke): Mr. Speaker, to quote Churchill, I think the Hon. Member protests too much.

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): It wasn't Chirchill. Is Nunziata writing your speeches?

Mr. Hopkins: Is it true that after the Department of National Defence purchased the first 100,000 cans of rancid tuna, the product was checked and the Department was advised not to use it but the rancid fish was distributed to military bases and was turned back by the cooks who were very concerned about the well-being of military personnel?

Hon. Erik Nielsen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I did not hear a question, I heard a statement made by the Hon. Member, a statement which was responded to fully and completely yesterday and again last night during the "Late Show". I laud the procedures that are in place within the Department of National Defence to assure a policy of of the highest possible standards of foodstuffs to be consumed by members of the Canadian Forces in this country, in Europe and elsewhere. Those standards are very high. They may not have been as high in the years when I served in the Forces but they are certainly high now, a great deal higher than the standards of quality—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

DISASTERS

APPROACH OF HURRICANE GLORIA

Mr. Pat Nowlan (Annapolis Valley-Hants): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of the Environment, if he is present in the House. In view of the concern in Atlantic Canada regarding the approach of Hurricane Gloria, I wonder if the Minister could tell the House what steps his Department has taken to alert those in Atlantic Canada and eastern Quebec of its approach status and the protection that will be necessary to meet this approaching calamity.

Hon. Tom McMillan (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I have been in touch regularly throughout the morning, including as recently as half an hour ago, with Environment Canada's top meteorologists. Apparently the storm is heading toward Atlantic Canada. It is expected to reach the western part of New Brunswick near Fredericton by nine o'clock this evening Atlantic time. It will be moving toward Newfoundland and the Strait of Belle Isle by six o'clock in the morning. It is expected that winds will be in the vicinity of 75 miles per hour.

Very briefly, we are monitoring the situation. We are providing information to all relevant people, including warnings to—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Order. Next we will be getting Blue Jays' scores.

TAPED INTERVIEWS—REQUEST FOR COMMITTEE REFERRAL

Mr. John R. Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. We now have the former Minister of Fisheries, the Hon. Member for Carleton-Charlotte, and Mr. Lampert of the P.C. Party on tapes. These tapes do exist. There is no 18-minute gap in them as far as I know. Why will the Prime Minister not permit this matter to go to a committee where those individuals can be questioned—

Mr. Speaker: Order, order. That question has been asked and answered two or three times today. Does the Hon. Member have a question on a different subject?

Mr. Rodriguez: Mr. Speaker, can the Prime Minister tell the House why he is attempting to cover up this whole smelly matter?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have responded fully to all questions including those put by all members of the Hon. Member's Party. I referred as well, for example, to the question of a conflict of recollection. I took the liberty of referring to what I seem to remember of a divergence of views between the Leader of the Opposition and former Prime Minister Trudeau in regard to the circumstances surrounding the Leader's resignation as Minister of Finance. As I remember, that matter was raised last year. It turned out that the recollections were not on all fours, as I remember. Mr. Trudeau issued a statement and there was a subsequent reconciliation of views. I was not in any way implying that anyone was telling—

Mr. Speaker: Order. With respect, I must say to the Prime Minister that since the question has already been asked and answered, I think we should leave it at that. I now recognize the Hon. Member for Davenport for one question.

ENVIRONMENTAL AFFAIRS

ACID RAIN—APPEAL LAUNCHED BY U.S. ENVIRONMENTAL PROTECTION AGENCY AGAINST COURT RULING

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the Minister of the Environment and deals with the regrettable fact that the representations on acid rain made in Washington by the Minister and the Government over the summer were so weak that we failed to prevent an appeal by the United States administration Environment Agency, something which represents a very serious setback for Canada. What action does the Minister intend to take in order to get the U.S. Government to move with us on the issue of acid rain abatement as ordered by its courts?

• (1200)

Hon. Tom McMillan (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, with all due respect to the Hon. Member I think he is being wildly naive if he thinks that the Government of Canada can interfere with a court decision in the United States. We are two sovereign countries. While we cannot be indifferent to judicial decisions which have an effect on us, we cannot interfere. We can make the strongest possible representations, diplomatically, bureaucratically, and politically. We are doing so. However, that is a far cry from getting on a charger, marching across the border and telling the U.S. courts what to do.

PRIVILEGE

ANSWER SOUGHT TO QUESTION PUT TO PRIME MINISTER

Mr. John R. Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, I rose in my place this morning to ask a question of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) with respect to the formation of a committee of Parliament to look into the question of the three individuals who are on tape with respect to the—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Will the Hon. Member come to his question of privilege, please?

Mr. Rodriguez: Mr. Speaker, you ruled that that question had been asked. I have heard the same question asked time and time again. I think Ministers, or the Prime Minister, should be given the opportunity to answer my questions.

Mr. Speaker: I take the Hon. Member's remarks as a representation. I think the Hon. Member—

Mr. Rodriguez: It is not. It is a question of privilege.

Mr. Speaker: No, it is not.

Mr. Rodriguez: I have a right to ask a question in the House.

Mr. Speaker: Will the Hon. Member resume his seat, please?

Mr. Crosbie: You have a gap between your ears and it's more than 18 inches long.

PETITIONS

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE—PENSION INCOME DEDUCTIONS

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present a petition signed by Members of the Communications Workers, Manitoba Food and Commercial Workers Union, members of the Thompson Teachers' Association, the Manitoba Government Employees Association, steelworkers, nurses and other Manitobans in which they say that pension benefits are essential for the maintenance of family income and the compensation of workers for their lifelong contribution to society. They ask that the Government ensure that all retired employees keep their pension benefits and receive their unemployment insurance benefits without deduction of pension income.

RACIAL OPPRESSION IN SOUTH AFRICA

Hon. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present a petition signed by over 800 residents of St. John's East and St. John's West asking that the Government of Canada take a stronger and more vigorous position in the UN against oppression in South Africa arising out of that country's racial apartheid policies.

REINSTATEMENT OF DEATH PENALTY FOR CERTAIN CRIMES

Mr. Nic Leblanc (Longueuil): Mr. Speaker, it is my duty to present a 4,336-name petition from residents of my region. The petitioners humbly ask that Parliament reinstate capital punishment for crimes against Canadian children.

And your petitioners will ever pray for this cause.

STANDING COMMITTEES

CONCURRENCE IN THIRD REPORT OF STRIKING COMMITTEE

Hon. Ray Hnatyshyn (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, there are three orders which I think you will find have been discussed among House Leaders. If they were presented to the House for acceptance now, I am sure they would be received and passed unanimously.

The first item deals with the Third Report of the Striking Committee tabled in the House on September 17, 1985. I should like to move concurrence at this time.

Mr. Speaker: Shall the motion carry?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

AUTHORIZATION FOR STANDING COMMITTEE TO TRAVEL

Hon. Ray Hnatyshyn (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I move that, pursuant to its order of references dated April 17, 1985, the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs be empowered to travel to Mont St. Gabriel on October 2, 3 and 4, 1985, for the purpose of drafting its final report; and that the necessary staff do accompany the committee.

Mr. Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for the motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

ACID RAIN

AUTHORIZATION FOR SPECIAL COMMITTEE TO TRAVEL

Hon. Ray Hnatyshyn (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I move that the Special Committee on Acid Rain be empowered to travel to Minneapolis, Minnesota, on September 29 and 30, 1985; and that the necessary staff do accompany the committee.

Mr. Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for the motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

Mr. Paul Dick (Parliamentary Secretary to President of Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, Question No. 414 will be answered today.

[Text]

CANADA ELECTIONS ACT

Question No. 414—Mr. Robichaud:

1. Is Tourism Canada in favour of abolishing Section 67 of the Canada Elections Act and, if so, will the Minister introduce an amendment to this legislation before the next election and, if not, for what reason?

2. Is it the opinion of the Government that this section damages the hotel and restaurant sector and was a study made on this subject and, if not, does the Government intend to commission a study and, if so, on what date?

Hon. Jack Murta (Minister of State (Tourism)): 1. A Canada-wide series of consultations have been conducted with individuals interested in promoting tourism in Canada, that will culminate in a strategy for tourism. The suggestion of repealing Section 67 was raised at these meetings. Depending upon the disucssions among representatives of business, academe and government, the Government will consider any proposals that will reduce irritants that effect tourists in Canada, including the repeal of Section 67.

2. No study has been done or is being considered at this time. Once the Government has assessed the implications of the recommendations made during its consultations on tourism, it will propose necessary measures to increase tourism in Canada.

Mr. Dick: Mr. Speaker, I ask that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

Mr. Speaker: The question enumerated by the Parliamentary Secretary has been answered. Shall the remaining questions stand?

[English]

Mr. Nunziata: Mr. Speaker, some six months ago I put approximately 40 questions on the Order Paper concerning the Richard Hatfield marijuana case. I asked the Parliamentary Secretary on September 18 when I might expect some answers to those questions. He indicated he would take the matter up with the new Solicitor General (Mr. Beatty) and that the questions would be responded to as quickly as possible. Has the Parliamentary Secretary spoken to the new Solicitor General? Can he indicate to the House when we might have some answers to my questions?

Mr. Dick: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate that a week ago my hon. friend brought to my attention the 40 questions to which he refers. I believe it is the longest series of questions on the Order Paper. The matter has been brought to the attention of the Solicitor General who, in taking over his new duties and getting up speed, has not been able to get around to answering those questions yet. However, we are hopeful they will be answered very soon.

Mr. Nunziata: Mr. Speaker, I would assume that with respect to the questions the former Solicitor General and his staff would have proceeded to answer those questions. Can the Parliamentary Secretary clarify to this House—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I understand the Hon. Member's concern with respect to the questions. That is fair. However, the Hon. Member is entitled to ask a question, with regard to a timetable, which the Parliamentary Secretary has answered. That is usually all that is done. I think the Hon. Member might want to follow the tradition in this case.

Mr. Nunziata: Mr. Speaker, perhaps a supplementary question?

Mr. Speaker: No. There is normally not a supplementary question allowed on such a question, which is the point I am trying to make. The Hon. Member may pursue this matter further outside the House with the Minister or the Parliamentary Secretary. His representations with respect to his questions have been made before the House, which is the Hon. Member's right.

Mr. Dick: Mr. Speaker, I would ask that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

Mr. Speaker: The question as enumerated by the Parliamentary Secretary has been answered. Shall the remaining questions be allowed to stand?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

IMMIGRATION ACT, 1976

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed from Thursday, September 26, consideration of the motion of Miss MacDonald that Bill C-55, an Act to amend the Immigration Act, 1976, be read a second time and referred to a legislative committee.

Mr. Jim Hawkes (Calgary West): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to be able to stand in my place for a second day to deal with the subject matter of immigration. I believe I have approximately ten minutes of my allotted time left. In that time I would like to be succinct and clear in terms of urging members of the Liberal Party and members of the New Democratic Party to support Bill C-55. I do this, first, in order that the Bill can move quickly to committee; second, in order that amendments can be brought forward to make it a better Bill; and, third, to see that it is returned to the House of Commons as quickly as possible in order that we can get on with changing the system.

It is clear that of 25 million Canadians most could not care less about this particular piece of legislation. The majority of Canadians are not involved in situations involving sponsorship of potential immigrants. However, for those who are involved, and those numbers are substantial, this is a critical and important piece of legislation.

I mentioned yesterday that the standing committee has had over 40 hearings on this subject since the month of January. Mr. Speaker, I think you will find that there is unanimous agreement in the committee that immigration levels must be increased in this country. We must turn the previous trend around. I think there is unanimous agreement in the committee that the scientific evidence is clear cut. Increased immigration leads to increased jobs. Increased immigration does not cost Canadian jobs.
