House of Commons Debates

OFFICIAL REPORT

Monday, May 22, 1922

The House met at three o'clock.

AGRICULTURE AND COLONIZATION

On motion of Hon. Mackenzie King the name of Mr. Bouchard was substituted for that of Mr. Stein on the Committee of Agriculture and Colonization, the Banking and Commerce Committee, and the Committee on Miscellaneous Private Bills.

GENOA CONFERENCE

Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING presented a return showing correspondence exchanged between the Government of Italy anad the Canadian Government with reference to the International Conference at Genoa, including Order in Council appointing delegates from Canada and instructions given to such delegates by the Canadian Government.

SOLDIER SETTLEMENT ACT AMENDMENT

Mr. JAMES MALCOLM (North Bruce) moved for leave to introduce Bill, No. 108, to amend the Soldier Settlement Act, 1919. He said:

Section 57 of the Soldier Settlement Act contains the following clause:

"From all sales and grants of land made by the board all mines and minerals shall be and shall be deemed to be reserved—"

And so on. This clause works an unintentional hardship on men located in the province of Ontario purchasing land and tendering the same to the board as security for the loans. Take an illustration from my own district. Tracy J. Anderson, a returned soldier, desires to continue his occupation of farming in his own county. He buys a farm, and conveys it in security for a loan to the Soldier Settlement Board. When he pays off his loan he finds that the title given him has a reservation as to mines and minerals, while the title he conveyed to the board, had no such reservation. This bill simply covers that point as follows:

Section 57 of the Soldier Settlement Act, 1919, Chapter 71 of the Statutes, of 1919 is amended by adding thereto the following proviso—

"Provided, however, that the provisions of this section shall only apply to sales or grants of ungranted land belonging to His Majesty in the right of the Dominion, or lands heretofore granted by His Majesty in the right aforesaid, in which His majesty reserves the mines or minerals and which lands are situated in the provinces of Manitoba, Saskatchewan or Alberta, or in the Northwest, or, the Yukon Territory, or are lands that have been transferred to His majesty in the right of the Dominion of Canada by the Government of the province of British Columbia."

The lands in Ontario which have a clear title when given to the Soldier Settlement Board as security should not come under this provision for reservation of minerals.

Motion agreed to and Bill read the first time.

BANKRUPTCY ACT AMENDMENT

Sir LOMER GOUIN (Minister of Justice) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 107, to amend the Bankruptcy Act. He said: The Bankruptcy Act was first passed in 1919, amended in 1920, and brought into force by proclamation on the 1st of July of that year. It is based largely on the English act as revised and consolidated in 1914. Certain substantial alterations however were made in the English act to accommodate it to the different conditions existent in Canada.

The Dominion act has been in force, therefore, for less than two years. The period of its application has been one when business conditions have been adverse and insolvency more prevalent than is the case under normal conditions of trading. Furthermore, it is to be remembered that an act of this character, making substantial changes in the law governing the commercial life of the country, must result necessarily in some confusion and uncertainty in the early stages of its application. In these circumstances it is not surprising that some criticism has been forthcoming, but I venture to think that to make substantial changes in a highly technical statue such as the Bankruptcy Act before it has been in force for two years would necessarily tend to increase rather than diminish the difficulties. For these reasons I consider it essential that the statute be allowed to remain substantially as it is for the present, with the object to consider its complete revision at the next or subsequent session of Parliament, if it should appear necessary. The amendments I propose therefore will not disturb the scheme of the act and are calculated merely (1) to enact an amendment in one instance where the statute does not afford adequate relief to creditors seeking to prevent the dissipation of insolvent traders' assets (section 2); (2) to dispose of certain doubts that have arisen as to the meaning of certain provisions of the act (sections 3 and 6); (3) to provide for the more expeditious and satisfactory administration of the act by the court, trustees and creditors (sections 4, 5, 7, 8 and 9).

I will explain shortly the amendments proposed to be made by this Bill.

Section 2: It is proposed by these provisions to enable creditors to apply for a receiving order against any debtor who gives notice to any of his creditors that he has suspended or that he is about to suspend payment of his debts, or who ceases to meet his liabilities as they become due. It has been found that a fraudulent debtor may stand off his creditors for a sufficiently long time to enable him to dissipate his assets. It is proposed by these provisions to enable creditors to take possession where the debtor has acknowledged that he suspends payment or ceases to pay his debts as they become due. Provisions similar to these are to be found in the Dominion Insolvency Act of 1875. By this means the delay required to obtain judgment and execution before proceedings can be taken under the Bankruptcy Act will be avoided.

Section 3. This amendment is intended merely to clear up a doubt that has arisen as to the effect of section 30, which provides to avoid general assignments of book debts.

Section 4. This amendment is to provide merely that the trustee when calling the first meeting of creditors shall supply them with a list of creditors and their addresses. A good deal of criticism against the statute depends upon the fact that in some cases the trustee, selected by the debtor, is able to control the situation because the creditors have not got together in advance and decided upon a course of concerted action.

[Mr. Malcolm.]

Section 5. This amendment is to require the trustee to verify the debtor's statement of affairs and make an inventory of his physical assets. Trustees frequently show a disposition to submit to the creditors the statement of affairs and inventory prepared by the debtor and accept no responsibility therefor.

Section 6. This section is intended to dispose of a doubt that exists in section 63 of the statute, which invests the provincial courts with jurisdiction. Under this section as it stands the view has been taken that federal courts are thereby established each of which has original jurisdiction in bankruptcy throughout Canada, consequently that a creditor, say in Manitoba, may apply to a court in Manitoba for a receiving order against a debtor carrying on business in Saskatchewan. By striking out the words which purport to constitute the provincial courts into federal courts the doubt which exists will be cleared away.

Section 7. This amendment is to repeal the provision of the statute which vests in one judge of each provincial court jurisdiction in bankruptcy, that judge being selected by the Minister of Justice. Inconvenience and delay have resulted from this provision and the expenses of proceedings greatly increased and it is proposed to repeal this provision with the result that all judges will have jurisdiction in bankruptcy as in any other matter, civil or criminal. At the same time, it might be desirable that the Chief Justice of each province assign especially, but not exclusively, to one or more judges of the said court, the administration of the Bankruptcy Act.

Section 8. Is simply to require registrars and other officers of the courts to account to the provincial authorities for fees collected by them under the Bankruptcy Act.

Section 9. Is to impose a penalty upon trustees for failure, without reasonable excuse, to observe and comply with the provisions of the act. It has been found in some cases that trustees have neglected to observe the provisions of the act, and section 96 is inadequate as it stands to compel such compliance since the penalties thereunder may be imposed only in case of fraud of the trustee. It is proposed to extend this penalty provision to cases where the trustee fails to comply with the act without reasonable excuse.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

LIQUOR IMPORTATION—SASKATCHEWAN

On the question being called:

1. Has the Legislature of the Province of Saskatchewan, or any person representing said Legislature, made representation, verbally or in writing, to the late Dominion Government, that could be properly construed as an effort to prevent the importation of alcoholic liquor into the Province of Saskatchewan for purpose of export to other Canadian Provinces?
2. If so, what was the nature of such representation?

Mr. MILLAR: Before this question is answered I would like to explain that a slight error has crept into it, probably a printer's error. This makes quite a material difference in the question, and I would therefore like to ask that it stand over until I have had a chance to correct it.

Question stands.

MR. W. F. O'CONNOR, K.C.

Mr. GORDON:

1. What sum was paid to W. F. O'Connor, K.C., for his services during the years 1919, 1920, and 1921?
2. Was any deduction made by the late Government, from Mr. O'Connor's retainer, while he was engaged in election operations in West Peterborough, in January and February, 1921?
3. If so, what were the amounts by which Mr. O'Connor's retaining fee was reduced?
4. Does he still claim an amount unpaid for his services?

Hon. Mr. COPP:

Department of Justice—

1. In 1919-20, $1814.49; 1920-21, nil; 1921-22, $8,000.

2 and 3. Mr. O'Connor's employment having terminated before the mentioned dates no deduction was necessary.

4. Mr. O'Connor has intimated that he will apply for a more equitable valuation of his services in connection with revision of the statutes.

Department of Trade and Commerce—

1. Fiscal year 1919-20, August 12 to March 31, $5,096.72; Fiscal year 1920-21, April 1 to June 30, $1,999.98; total, $7,096.70.
2. Mr. O'Connor resigned June 30, 1920.
3. Answered by 2.
4. No information.

Department of Secretary of State—

1. 1919 and 1920, nil; 1921, $1,500.
2. No information.
3. Answered by No. 2.
4. No information.

CARTIER SQUARE, OTTAWA

Mr. GARLAND (Carleton):

1. Is the shed which was erected during the late war, on Cartier Square, Ottawa, by the Militia Department, still in use?

2. Is the Government aware that the City Council made strenuous protests against the building of this shed as its erection was a violation of the civil by-laws?

3. When does the Government intend to have this building removed?

Hon. Mr. GRAHAM:

1. Yes.

2. Yes, but it was necessary as a war measure.

3. This building is now being vacated by the Militia Department, and, as soon as empty, will be handed over to the Department of Public Works.

MOUNTED POLICE—SQUADRONS A AND B

Mr. GARLAND (Carleton):

1. How many officers of A squadron of the North West Mounted Police enlisted in the Canadian Expeditionary Forces during the late war, and saw service in France?

2. How many non-commissioned officers and men of the said squadron were so enlisted and saw such service?

3. What monetary loss was sustained by the said officers, non-commisioned officers and men, on account of the difference between their civil and military pay while on this service?

4. Is it the intention of the Government to reimburse such loss to the said officers, non-commissioned officers and men, as was done in other Government departments?

Hon. Mr. GRAHAM:

1. Twelve.

2. Two hundred and nine.

3. Officers, $3,874.86; non-commissioned officers and constables, $33,289.41; total $37,164.27.

4. Not known.

Mr. GARLAND (Carleton):

1. How many officers of B squadron of the North West Mounted Police enlisted in the Canadian Expeditionary Forces during the late war, and saw service in Siberia?

2. How many non-commissioned officers and men, of the said squadron, were so enlisted and saw such service?

3. What monetary loss was sustained by the said officers, non-commissioned officers and men on account of the difference between their civil and military pay while on this service?

4. Is it the intention of the Government to reimburse such loss to the said officers, non-commissioned officers and men, as was done in other Government departments?

Hon. Mr. GRAHAM:

1. Seven.

2. Thirty-six.

3. Officers, $3,654.98; non-commissioned officers and constables, $5,259.55; total, $8,914.53.

4. Not known.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS— RESTAURANTS AT RIVERS AND MELVILLE

Mr. SALES:

1. Are the railway restaurants at Rivers and Melville operated directly by the Canadian National Railways or indirectly by lease?

2. If by lease, to whom are they leased, for what period and for what amount?

3. Are they leased, furnished, free of taxes and with free light and fuel?

4. What control, if any, is there to insure the public of fair prices in connection with meals at these restaurants?

Hon. Mr. KENNEDY:

1. Operated under lease.

2. Leased to the Canada Railway News Company from year to year. The rent is included in general arrangement covering the operation of news service over entire system which is on a percentage basis.

3. The lessee supplies all equipment and furnishings and pays all taxes; the restaurants being located in the premises of the railway company, the latter supply light and fuel.

4. The railway company control prices through their local superintendents.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS—MAIL CONTRACTS

Mr. SPENCER:

1. Do the Canadian National Railways have the contracts to carry the mails when they run parallel with the Canadian Pacific Railway?

2. If not, why?

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: This inquiry is answered by the reply to Mr. McQuarrie's question, No. 3, April 10, 1922. See unrevised Hansard, page 859.

OTTAWA-PRESCOTT HIGHWAY

Mr. GARLAND (Carleton):

1. Is any portion of the Federal grant for Highways applicable to the planting of trees on the Provincial highway from Ottawa to Prescott?

2. Is the Government aware that hundreds of trees planted along this highway are dead?

3. If the Federal grant can legally be used for tree planting, will the Government insist that the contractor who supplied the trees be compelled to replace those which are dead?

Hon. Mr. KENNEDY:

1. Yes; where trees are considered necessary to protect the road surface from the effects of sun and storm.

2. Oak, maple, ash or elm trees to the number of 5,070 were purchased from local farmers at 25 cents per tree, and planted, 75 feet apart, on portions of the highway, aggregating thirty-six miles, where no natural protection had been afforded. In addition, some 2,000 pine trees, the cost of which was not charged to the highway, have been set out. All tree planting has been under the supervision of a provincial forester. It is estimated that possibly 500 trees have failed to survive transplanting; it is understood that these are to be replaced at once by the provincial Highways Department.

3. Answered by No. 2.

MILITIA COUNCIL

Mr. LANCTOT:

1. What was the total amount expended on salaries or otherwise, in connection with the Military Council, for the year ending March 31st, 1922?

2. Are the Minister and Deputy Minister of Militia ex-officio members of the Militia Council?

3. If so, do they receive any additional remuneration in this connection?

4. What do these additional salaries amount to?

5. What officers are members of the Militia Council?

5. Do these officers hold any other position?

7. If so, what are their respective salaries?

8. Are the sittings of the Militia Council fixed by regulation or statute, or are said sittings left to the discretion of the council?

Hon. Mr. GRAHAM:

1, 3 and 4. There is no expenditure in connection with the Militia Council, except in so far as the vice president is concerned. He is an officer of the permanent force seconded for duty in accordance with paragraph 4, sections 8, 9 and 10, Militia Pension Act, and is entitled as Vice President of the Militia Council to the pay fixed by pay regulations, i.e., $4,500 per annum.

2. Yes, the minister is the President and the deputy minister is the Vice President of Militia Council.

5, 6 and 7. Military Members: The Chief of the General Staff, the Quartermaster General, the Adjutant General and the Master General of the Ordnance, are the members of Militia Council. Their salaries are as follows: Chief of the General Staff, $8,000; Quartermaster General, $7,500; Adjutant General, $7,500; Master General of the Ordnance, $7,500. The position of Master General of the Ordnance has been abolished from 1st June, 1922. These officers are receiving no extra emoluments as members of Militia Council.

8. Sittings are left to the discretion of the minister.

WAR VESSELS AURORA, PATRIOT AND PATRICIA

Mr. ARTHURS:

What was the expenditure for 1921 on the cruiser Aurora and the two destroyers Patriot and Patricia (a) for repairs, (b) for maintenance, (c) for equipment and supplies, and (d) for pay and allowances?

HIGH COST OF COAL

Mr. CHURCH:

1. Is it the intention of the Government to hold an inquiry into the high cost of coal in Canada, to the small consumer, in view of the falling prices at the mines?

2. What action, if any, does the Government intend to take to regulate this commodity?

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE KING:

1. An inquiry having been held last year into the matter of fuel by a special committee of the House, the Government does not deem it necessary to hold another inquiry at present.

2. Any action deemed advisable will be made known in due course.

POSTAL REVENUE

Mr. HUMPHREY:

1. What was the gross postal revenue of the Portage la Prairie Post Office for the year ending March 31st, 1922?
2. What was the gross postal revenue of the Prince Rupert Post Office for the year ending March 31st, 1922?
3. What was the gross postal revenue of the Nelson Post Office for the year ending March 31st, 1922?
4. What was the gross postal revenue of the Nanaimo Post Office for the year ending March 31st, 1922?

2. $34,515.22.
3. $41,164.96.
4. $27,070.72.

CARRIAGE OF MAILS

Mr. SPENCER:

1. What is the total amount paid to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company in payment of contracts for carrying the mails on parallel lines with the Canadian Government Railways?
2. Is the Canadian Government Railway equipped for carrying said mail?
3. Is there any reason why the Government Railways could not handle these mail contracts satisfactorily?

Hon. Mr. MURPHY:

1. The question is so indefinitely worded that figures cannot be given.

2 and 3. See reply to Mr. McQuarrie's question No. 3, April 10, 1922. Unrevised Hansard, page 859.

GOVERNMENT RAILWAYS—DINING CAR SERVICE

Mr. SPENCER:

1. Is the cost of the dining car service on the Government Railways kept separately?
2. If so, was there a deficit in 1921, and how much?

Hon. Mr. KENNEDY:

1. Yes.
2. Yes; $176,394.22.

ROAD PROJECTS IN ONTARIO

Mr. WILSON:

1. What road projects have been submitted to the Department of Railways and Canals by the Ontario Department of Public Works?
2. What road projects have been approved by the Department of Railways and Canals?
3. What amounts of money have been paid to the Ontario Department of Public Works upon the approved road projects and the amount paid on each project?

GRAND TRUNK RAILWAY EMPLOYEES—PENSION RIGHTS AND STATUS

Mr. J. W. KING (Huron) moved:

For a copy of all letters, telegrams, correspondence and other documents that have passed between the officials of the Grand Trunk Railway, the officials of the Brotherhood of Railway Trainmen, and the Order of Railway Conductors, and all agreements signed between the officials of the Grand Trunk Railway and officials of the Brotherhood of Railway Trainmen and the Order of Railway Conductors, regarding the strike on the Grand Trunk Railway System, of trainmen and yardmen, in 1910, and particularly the correspondence and agreements affecting the seniority rights of the men who worked during this strike.

Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, this is a pretty large order for which my hon. friend has moved. I am not sure that it is possible for the Government to get all the letters, telegrams, correspondence and other documents that have passed between the officials of the Grand Trunk railway and officials of the Brotherhood of Railway Trainmen and the Order of Railway Conductors relating to a strike that took place in 1910.

The Government, of course, has control of some of the correspondence; how much of it is in existence at the present day it is difficult to say. I fear, if all the correspondence were brought down, it would make a prodigious load. Perhaps my hon. friend would intimate more particularly what documents he desires, and it can be ascertained whether they can be brought down or not. I think he has one or two documents more particularly in mind, and if he will intimate just what he desires. the Government will endeavour to obtain them. I doubt, however, if it will be possible to obtain from the Grand Trunk officials all the correspondence that is asked for in this motion, and to have that brought down, at this session of Parliament, at any rate.

Mr. KING (Huron): I would be satisfied if the Prime Minister would bring down the two agreements that are in existence between Charles M. Hays, of the Grand Trunk Railway Company, and the trainmen.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Two agreements, my hon. friend says?

Mr. KING (Huron): Yes.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The Government will undertake to endeavour to obtain those agreements for my hon. friend. Will that satisfy him in regard to this motion?

Mr. KING (Huron): Yes.

Motion agreed to.

UNOPPOSED MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

Mr. NEILL:

For a copy of all letters, telegrams, correspondence and other documents exchanged between the Government of Canada and any other parties, relating to the appointment and residence in the County, of the Junior County Court Judge, for the County of Nanaimo, British Columbia.

Mr. NEILL:

For a copy of all letters, telegrams, correspondence and other documents exchanged between the Government of Canada and any other parties, relative to the claims of H. W. A. Page.

Mr. RAYMOND:

For a return showing the origin of all goods purchased by the Purchasing Commission, distinguishing such as are of Canadian manufacture from those of foreign origin, from the first of April, 1921, to date?

Mr. McQUARRIE:

For a copy of all letters, telegrams, correspondence, reports, and other documents, exchanged between the Government of Canada or any minister thereof, and the Government of British Columbia or any minister thereof, or received from any person, relative to the advisability of transferring the control or administration of the Canadian fisheries on the Pacific coast, to the Province of British Columbia.

INQUIRY FOR RETURN

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Centre Winnipeg): Mr. Speaker, I should like to call attention to the fact that an order was passed by this House for a return covering copies of all letters, correspondence, etc., exchanged between the Minister of Labour or any member of his department and Alfred J. Andrews, in connection with the strike in Winnipeg, in the year 1919. About fifteen letters and telegrams only have been brought down, none prior to July 5, 1919, and all extending over a period from July 5, 1919, to May 26, 1920. It is simply incredible that, during that great strike and those long-drawn-out trials, only some fifteen letters and telegrams should have been exchanged. Have all the documents in the possession of the department been brought down, or have certain of these papers been destroyed? Any other alternative, I do not understand.

Hon. JAMES MURDOCK (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, there were some other telegrams and letters marked "personal" or "private," which I showed to the hon. member for North Winnipeg (Mr. McMurray), and I asked him if it would be proper and necessary for the purposes that he had in mind, to make those telegrams or letters public. He suggested to me that such as were brought down would be entirely sufficient. But I shall be indeed glad to let my hon. friend see the entire file, including those to which I have just referred, if he desires to do so.

PRIME MINISTERS' CONFERENCE

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. J. T. SHAW (West Calgary): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Prime Minister if he would be prepared to fix a date for a full discussion by this Parliament of the report of the proceedings of the last Imperial Conference.

Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I think the subject is one of sufficient importance to have it fully discussed in the House, and the Government will be pleased to arrange a time; I cannot say, at the moment, just when.

COOLIE LABOUR ON BRITISH SHIPS

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Centre Winnipeg): Mr. Speaker, according to the May number of the Official Journal of the Marine Engineers of Canada, I notice that British ships manned by coolie crews are engaged in coastwise port traffic on the Atlantic seaboard. In view of the discussion and the resolutions which were passed the other night in this House on the oriental question, I should like to know if the Government will take steps to protect Canadian seamen against the unfair competition of coolie labour on board British ships engaged in coastwise trade.

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Marine and Fisheries): The matter has been engaging the attention of the Department of Marine and Fisheries, and steps are being taken to meet the views of my hon. friend.

SUPPLY

NAVAL SERVICE

The House again in Committee of Supply, Mr. Gordon in the Chair:

Naval Service—To provide for the maintenance of the Royal Canadian Navy, $1,500,000.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I believe, a year ago last December, there was a balance of some $115,000 due from the New Brunswick Roller Mills in connection with the sale of the Niobe. Has that balance yet been paid?

Hon. GEORGE P. GRAHAM (Minister of the Naval Service): The situation is this. The Niobe and two submarines were sold for $135,000; $20,000 was paid and the balance remained. The Government took action against the purchasers to recover the balance due; but discovered, through the Justice Department, that there was not much to be realized, and that the best thing they could do, acting on the advice of that department was, as some say, to run to cover. As a result the department got back the Niobe, $5,000 in money, and the amount of costs. The Niobe was advertised for sale by auction recently and sold for some $41,000.

Mr. EULER: Has the money been paid?

Mr. GRAHAM: A cheque has been received for it.

Mr. CALDWELL: To whom was she sold?

Mr. GRAHAM: To an American firm, H. B. Hintner's Sons Co., I believe.

Mr. CALDWELL: What was the original cost of the Niobe?

Mr. GRAHAM: I cannot answer offhand; I will get that information and submit it later.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I have that information available. The original cost was $1,200,000. Do I understand that the total amount received by the Government for the Niobe and two submarines was $60,000?

Mr. GRAHAM: It was $66,000 odd.

Mr. CHURCH: When the House adjourned the other evening I was discussing the naval policy, past and present, of the Liberal party in regard to Canada's contribution towards maritime freedom, and I shall conclude my remarks in, I trust, a very few minutes. The Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) intimated to the House that the policy of the party which he leads was, is now, and ever shall be, the provision of adequate support to the naval forces of the Empire. May I ask the hon. gentleman if he considers that a miserable contribution of 17 cents per head on the part of our people is Canada's conception of what she owes Great Britain for the maritime freedom that has always been afforded her? The Mother Country this year is spending $400,000,000 on naval defence, which works out at about $10 per head of her population. And, as I pointed out the other night, Australia is spending some £3,245,000, which, taking into account the exchange, represents between $16,000,000 and $17,000,000, or about $3.10 per head of the population of the Commonwealth. With a population of 9,000,000 in Canada, estimates are brought down in this House for $1,500,000; last year it was $2,500,000; this year it figures out at about 16¾ cents per head of population. Again I ask my hon. friend who leads the Government and Liberal party, is this his conception and the conception of the Liberal party of Canada's responsibility in the great patriotic question of maritime freedom? Was that the view of the late Hon. George W. Ross, the leader of the government party in the Senate in 1910-11? Or is it the conception of the Liberal party as laid down in their 1911 campaign literature in which they give one hundred and one reasons for maintaining an adequate fleet unit that would not only protect Canada's harbours and shores, but, in time of emergency, would, like the Australian fleet in the late war, render signal assistance in sweeping an enemy fleet from the Atlantic or Pacific or any other ocean? This policy which it is sought to be established is far from adequate. I say, on the shoulders of the Prime Minister and his Government rests the responsibility of upholding the honour and dignity of this country and of giving Canada maritime protection. The duty is their's, as long as they are there, to see to it that nothing shall be done which may hinder this Dominion from vindicating itself in case of peril. On their shoulders is the burden of the naval defence of Canada.

I contend that the fleet units should be kept up and be increased from year to year. At all events, nothing should be done, until after the next Imperial Conference, that might tend to its disintegration. It is true that a Disarmament Conference was recently held in Washington, the object of which was to reduce arms and create a naval holiday. But it will be remembered that Mr. Harding's policy, and that of the Republican party in the last American election, was one of opposition to the League of Nations. On every platform of the United States they voiced their opposition to the League, and although after their election public opinion forced that government to summon a new conference, the one recently held at the American capital, the American shipyards have nevertheless been kept busy. The conference at Washington declared a shipbuilding holiday, but so far as Canada is concerned there was no necessity for this: Canada has always enjoyed a maritime holiday. She has been content to sponge on the hard earnings of the British taxpayers, who have had to pay heavy taxes on sugar, bread, coffee, tea and all sorts of other necessities in order to maintain a navy to protect our shores. Now, while the conference at Washington recommends a curtailment in the building of capital ships of war, this does not prevent President Harding's administration from going on with the construction of a merchant marine. And after all is said and done, as I pointed out the other night, the merchant marine has always been the backbone of British maritime strength, from the days of Drake and Frobisher and Hawkins down to the present time. There is nothing in the recommendations of the Washington conference to prevent the people of the United States from launching a great shipbuilding policy and building as many merchant marine ships as they please. And they are doing so. You go down the New Haven and Hartford road, passing through all the towns from Boston to New York, and down the Atlantic seaboard, and at every seaport you will find shipbuilding plants, which were closed for some time—they were formerly war plants—but are, most of them, now busily engaged executing orders both from private individuals and from the government. The object is to supply a fleet of merchant ships that shall carry the American flag into the seven seas to secure trade for that country. They are spending millions of dollars in expanding the merchant marine, in the hope that eventually, notwithstanding the sentiments or the recommendations of the conference at Washington, they may out-distance the British merchant marine fleet, to which this Empire owes so much. I tell you, Mr. Speaker, that we are living in a fool's paradise, so far as that conference is concerned. The world has witnessed similar conferences before. Such conferences have been held at various times in the last hundred years; they were held in Gladstone's day; and they have always failed to a greater or less extent of their purpose. We need not, therefore, be over sanguine as to the efficacy of the latest assembly at Washington. Take the Genoa conference, again. What hopes can we entertain in respect of it when we think of the secret treaty between Germany and Russia. Russia to-day has a million and a quarter men mobilized and she is in a warlike mood. The conference at Genoa has virtually failed, and the outlook in Europe is far from reassuring to-day. As one leading French statesman said the other day, as reported in the various newspapers, war is as imminent to-day as it was immediately prior to August, 1914. I want to emphasize as strongly as I can the inadequacy of the present vote. I think the Government should at least retain the fleet unit they now have as it has been.

At the Naval College at Halifax there are forty cadets now undergoing training. In a couple of years' time they will have graduated, and what is to become of them then? What also of the forty who have graduated now on our fleet unit? What is to become of the college itself? I should like to see that college continued and the fleet unit maintained until another Imperial Conference is held at any rate. Talk about economy! We shall pay up in millions a little later for our folly in reducing this vote. It will prove to have been no economy at all.

Now perhaps the Government will inform the committee, with whom they consulted in framing their policy. Have they consulted the British Admiralty? Have they even consulted their own experts? If so, where are the written reports? Who is responsible for the recommendation to reduce the vote from $2,500,000 to $1,500,000? I do not see how it is that this is the only department—that of defence—that is singled out for a forty per cent or fifty per cent reduction. Is this an honourable policy? Is it, indeed, a justifiable policy?

Are we to go back a hundred and fifty years to a Crown colony status and be dependent on the army and navy of the Mother Country in time of trouble? Are we going to continue to sponge on the British taxpayer? If so, it is a most humiliating position for this country, especially in view of what Canada did in the great war.

New Zealand and Australia have coordinated their naval policies, and to-day they have real, effective navies instead of a few fish trawlers. Following the example of those dominions, I think it would be a good thing to ask the British Government to have Admiral of the Fleet, Lord Beatty, make a report on the naval defence of Canada so that it may be available for the next Imperial Conference.

I am very much disappointed with the policy of the Government because had they continued the policy of building up a fleet unit we would obtain some tangible results. It has been said that, as an Empire, we came into being by the sea, and that we cannot exist without the sea. The sea is His, and He made it. Great Britain, as we all know, is primarily a maritime nation, and I think it will be generally agreed that Canada, with her 6,000 miles of coast lines on the Atlantic and Pacific, should also be, and is to a great extent, a maritime nation. She leads in rowing, canoeing, yachting, fishing and lumbering, but what opportunities do the Government propose to give our young men who excel in aquatic sports and would make good sailors, to develop themselves as mariners so that in peace or war the country could rely on them to man its merchant marine and its navy and fleet units? The only opportunities are in the shape of a couple of weeks' drill in fire halls or armouries each year! I disagree absolutely with this policy, for it cannot possibly be of any use to us. I venture to say that those landlubber, three-weeks-trained young men, on their first ocean trip, would prove toy sailors, and get seasick, and many in that time would be unable to even swim a stroke. They would be quite unsuitable to man the magnificent fleet of our First Lord of the Admiralty.

Last week the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Gould) said the next war would be fought in the heavens above. I do not agree with him; I think the next war will be fought in the earth beneath. But apparently Canada's First Lord of the Admiralty is under the impression that the next war will be fought among the fishes in the waters under the earth. This magnificent toy fleet of his, which is to be maintained at a cost of 17 cents per capita, will be a myth, so far as any effective defence for our shores goes: it may, however, keep a few fish in order.

The Prime Minister said that his Government was prepared to continue the naval policy of Sir Wilfrid Laurier of 1910. In that year the Liberal party moved the following amendment in the House of Commons to the naval resolution proposed by the Borden Government:

> This House regrets to learn the intention of the Government to indefinitely postpone the carrying out by Canada of a permanent naval policy.
> It is the opinion of this House that measures should be taken at the present session to give effect actively and speedily to the permanent naval policy embodied in the Naval Service Act of 1910 passed pursuant to the resolution unanimously approved by this House in March 1909.
> This House is further of the opinion that to increase the power and mobility of the Imperial navy by the addition by Canada under the above act of two fleet units, to be stationed on the Atlantic and Pacific coasts of Canada, respectively, rather than by a contribution of money or ships, is the policy best calculated to afford relief to the United Kingdom in respect to the burden of Imperial naval defence, and in the words of the Admiralty memorandum, to restore greater freedom to the movements of the British squadrons in every sea and directly promote the security of the Dominions; and that the Government of Canada should take such steps as shall lead to the accomplishment of this purpose as speedily as possible.

That could be done under the act of 1910. I am informed that it is the intention to construct three battleships under his bill. If hon. gentlemen or the government of the day wanted four or five, they could build them wherever they pleased under the act of 1910.

Further on he says:

> No disunion; the Admiralty and House of Commons all one in defence of the Empire; that is the position in which we should be to-day.

Again he says:

> Under the Laurier Act of 1910 provision was made for the training of men on board training ships, and in naval schools and colleges, so that the ships, as soon as constructed, would be prepared to go to sea and fill their place in the naval defence of Canada and the Empire as the case might be.

That was the policy of the Liberal party. In conclusion he states the principles of the Liberal party in the matter of naval defence as follows:

> It stands for the defence of the Empire, from Australia to the Pole. Not on the North sea alone, but on every sea where the British flag floats in time of danger.
> Secondly, we stand for as many battleships of the most modern type as are required; at any rate to the limit of our resources.

Thirdly, we stand for a permanent Canadian navy to guard our coast and trade routes and commerce with Great Britain, and all other nations at peace with the Empire.

Fourthly, we stand for the construction of a navy and shipyards, using for that purpose the product of Canadian industry and building it by the industry of our people.

Fifthly, we stand for the training of our own seamen in naval schools and colleges, and on board training ships, so that when our ships go out to sea they will represent Canadian blood and bone and flesh, and sentiment.

Sixthly, we stand for placing our ships at the disposal of the King in case of emergency, or at any time, at the expense of Canada, and not at the expense of the British taxpayer.

The leader of the Liberal party in the Senate argued in favour of contribution; and if ever there was a time when we should make a contribution, it is here and now. Canada owes it to the Mother Country and its magnificent fleet—that the awful horrors of war were not visited upon our own soil and that the war did not cost us many millions more than it did. Sir George Ross says further:

Our hearts, hopes and money to go with the ships wherever they are called to fight for the integrity of the Empire.

Seventhly, we stand for co-operation with His Majesty's dominions beyond the sea in forming one solid phalanx if need be, with all the powers they represent, in the defence of Britain for the peace of the world.

Eighthly, we stand for unity and defence if the emergency arises, and we do not propose to question the wisdom of the Admiralty as to how or where that emergency has arisen, or with whom or why we are called upon to fight for the Empire. If you can get any better foundation, I will go with you, and I will stand on a stronger platform than any own if you build me one. We want to be in the strongest position and we want to do that in perfect independence.

Where does the Liberal party stand today? By their seventeen-cent-a-head policy they have discarded the eight planks laid down by Sir George Ross which I have just read.

In conclusion, Mr. Chairman, I may say that the people of Canada are disappointed and humiliated by the attitude of the Government of the day. It has been stated that we are a nation; but notwithstanding the great part taken by Canada in the war, notwithstanding the status which we are supposed to have attained, in the matter of naval policy we are going back to the state of affairs which existed one hundred and fifty years ago—Canada—a so-called nation—is to continue to sponge on the British taxpayer and, through the action of the Government in this matter, is reverting to the position of a Crown colony.

[Mr. Church.]

Mr. H. C. HOCKEN (West Toronto): Mr. Chairman, I do not flatter myself that anything I can say will change the policy of the Government. At the same time, I think it is my duty to voice a protest against the reduction that has been made in the naval estimates. There can be no doubt whatever that the amount put in last year was the absolute minimum to be 4 p.m. of any service whatever, to be of any value in keeping a naval organization of some small degree of efficiency. The Government have thought it wise to reduce the appropriation to the point where practically no reasonable result can be obtained. Now, sir, if they were wiping out the naval appropriation altogether, there might at least be some ground of economy upon which they could argue; but what they have done is to make an appropriation for an expenditure of a million and a half which can produce no result whatever. Two or three trawlers out on the Pacific and two or three trawlers on the Atlantic, with a torpedo boat, is to be the naval establishment of this country for the next year. I do not believe, Sir, that this meets with the approval of the people of Canada. I know how anxious the people of this country are for economy; I am as keen as any member of the House to reduce the expenditure; but I think that at a time like this there should be some appreciation of our duty in the matter of providing for the defence of Canada and of showing a desire not to continue to lean entirely upon the navy of the Mother Country.

In discussing this question the other night the right hon. leader of the Opposition (Mr. Meighen) made a remark which indicated that, in his mind at least, the state of affairs existing throughout the world was not such as to justify our dispensing with the little degree of efficiency that we had in our naval service. I want to read to the committee the opinion of a man who ought to be a competent authority on that particular subject. When Right Hon. Lloyd George reached London yesterday he presented a picture of Europe which must make every man harbour a fear of the possibility of another outbreak on that continent; and if that is the case, surely it behooves us at a time like this not to wipe out the effectiveness and efficiency of the naval establishment that we have, but, if anything, to increase it. Mr. Lloyd George, referring to the Genoa Conference and to the Hague Conference which is to be held, said:

> You must remember that a few weeks ago there were armies massing on frontiers extending over thousands of miles with every evident intention of marching against each other, and the whole centre of Europe was in a state of fear and trembling because they were expecting the march of these armies and a renewal of the terrible conflicts of the last few years. By the Genoa conference the march of these armies has been arrested, and I believe that an order will never be given for a single battalion to go forward.

Let me draw your attention, Mr. Chairman, to the fact that the march of these armies has been arrested for a period of eight months. That is all that any nation in Europe is committed to do; and if that was the state of affairs two months ago; if all they have been able to do by a conference of two months is to enter into an armistice or a truce for eight months, I think we must regard the situation as one of very great seriousness—certainly one which does not justify this country in destroying what little naval establishment we have.

I am not a militarist, Mr. Chairman, but I hope I am a self-respecting citizen of Canada who is prepared to do his part in defending his country; and I believe that is the attitude of the people of this country generally. For that reason I believe they will not be content with the appropriation which has been made, and the plans which have been outlined, for carrying on our small naval operations. It is not a question of economy, because I think I can convince the committee that more money is being expended in ways that are entirely unnecessary than has been cut off these estimates.

My hon. friends to the left, a short time ago, went down to the city of Quebec. I do not know who was the personal conductor of that expedition, but I understand the purpose of it was to convince those hon. members that an expenditure of a million and a half for improvements to Quebec harbour was a wise and necessary expenditure. Well, I was greatly interested upon their return from Quebec to hear one of these hon. members stand up and say he did not at all approve of extending the facilities there, because the existing facilities were sufficient to handle twice the amount of business that was done last year or that will be done this season. I point out there a wasteful expenditure of at least a million and a half of dollars on the harbour of Quebec. I have no objection to an expenditure of $5,000,000 on the harbour of Montreal, because I believe that additional facilities, especially for loading and unloading, are required there. I think that, perhaps, is an expenditure that can be justified and which is reasonable in its character, but why this House should spend a million and a half dollars on unnecessary work and cut a million and a half of dollars off the naval estimates is something I cannot understand and something, I think, which will not be justified by the people of this country. We must either make it plain that we are going to adopt efficient action, or else do nothing at all. It cannot be argued that this reduction has been made on the score of economy. I want to make my protest against wasteful expenditures of the kind alluded to and the cutting off of necessary expenditure such as we find here in this particular branch of the service. As my hon. friend from North Toronto (Mr. Church) said a few moments ago, there has been a large amount of money spent, and a very large organization created, in this country for the development of any naval talent, or desire for naval service, that may be latent in the youths of the country. That work has been accomplished by voluntary contributions and expenditure. In many points in Canada the Navy League is developing what talent or inclination there may be for naval service among our boys, and they hope to direct that talent or inclination to the service of the country. What inducement is there for them to go on and spend money collected from private sources on a service of that kind if we are going to cut out and destroy the naval establishment we have had in the past? I submit, the Government is making a great mistake; and they will be apprised of that in an unmistakable manner by the Canadian public when the time comes. I want to join my hon. friend from North Toronto in registering a protest against the destruction of the naval service of this Dominion.

Mr. J. H. MACKELVIE (Yale): I would like to ask the minister if he has fully taken into consideration the responsibility which, I think he must admit falls to some degree upon the Government with respect to the students who have taken a course in the naval college, and some of whom, perhaps, have put in two, if not three, years in that institution. These lads have selected the navy as their career; they certainly entered the institution with the idea that they had a chance of securing the training that would fit them for commissions in the navy; and I cannot conceive how the Government can escape from a certain responsibility by reason of failure to realize these plans. I am acquainted with some of these young men—one belongs to my own constituency—bright lads who would be a credit to the navy. Yet they are now deprived of the careers upon which they had entered although they have spent two or three years studying at the naval college. In view of the time so spent I do not think they are in a position to enter a university from the naval college. The training they have received would be of service in a science course in the university, but I do not think it would be of material use in classics. I therefore want to ask the Government if they have fully taken into consideration any scheme whereby justice can be done to the lads referred to.

Hon. GEORGE P. GRAHAM (Minister of the Naval Service): The matter of the Royal Naval College at Esquimalt was one of the difficulties of the situation, which confronted the Government, and I am going to explain it frankly to the House. My hon. friend has asked me if any care or thought has been given to the students who are in course of training at the college or have graduated from it. Some of the students who have graduated have gone to other universities. The Naval Department made arrangements previously that students from the naval college could enter the universities either of Queen's, Toronto, or McGill before completing their second year. We are now endeavouring to ascertain if arrangements can be made with the universities so that those who have attained their second year in the naval college may be given matriculation standing in those institutions. As to the school itself it is a remarkable institution, there is no question about that, but for the last two years only four students each year have gone from it to finish their training in the Royal navy. Even if there had not been any change in the system no graduate would have gone this year from the naval college to the Royal navy, so that, so far as opportunities of service to the country from that college are concerned, they have come to an end, at least for some years. At the present time we have in the Royal navy some forty young men and Canada is paying for their training which will take some years to complete.

[Mr. MacKelvie (Yale).]

The Government intends, under its scheme, to allow those young officers to finish their training as was anticipated. The cost of that training alone for the coming year is estimated at $73,000. As I said before, no graduate from that naval college can find entry into the Royal navy for training; we have come to a blockade in that regard. I therefore ask the committee, in all fairness, of what use is it to the young man that he should be allowed to continue his naval course when at the end of the term of three years there would be no place to which he could go?—it would not be fair to him, and would not be fair to the country.

Now let me point out what the naval college is—and as I said before it is a wonderful school of training. The young men there are being trained ostensibly for a naval career, but that career, no matter what policy is adopted by Parliament, so far as the navy is concerned does not exist for the present. The committee can readily understand that while the British navy will probably retain all the officers we have there in training and for whom we are paying, there is no great career ahead in the Royal navy when that navy at the present time is dismissing its officers day by day and cutting down its staff. There are forty-two students at the naval college; but so far as conditions are concerned we cannot compare the present with the past. It will be found as the days go by that the taxation that may be imposed on the people of Canada is all that they can stand. I want to emphasize that: The taxation that the Canadian people will have to bear is all that they can stand; and wherever the country is not getting what it believes to be value for money expended, that expenditure ought to be dispensed with. Nobody can accuse me of not being in favour of such institutions as the naval college because I am. But if we are not going to get any value for the country, and if there is no career for the young men that we are sending to the naval college, why keep up this expense merely for sentiment?

Now, let me give a little statement as to conditions in connection with the Royal Naval College. The cost of that college is $175,000 per annum the number of cadets at present at the college is 42; and the cost of training each cadet for three years is $12,000.

Mr. CRERAR: The cost of training each cadet?

Mr. GRAHAM: The cost of training each cadet for three years is $12,000.

Mr. CRERAR: That is $4,000 a year?

Mr. GRAHAM: Yes, $4,000 a year. At the present time 25 graduates are serving in the Royal Canadian navy, and a number are undergoing further training in the Royal navy. The complement of the college is 12 officers and 41 instructors and 12 civilians, a total of 65. I will not say that number of officers, instructors and civilians in various employment are not necessary, because each branch has to be taught, and a man could instruct a hundred, perhaps, as easily as he could instruct two, but in this line of instruction 65 people are employed under pay to instruct 42 young men; that is, merely to finish their education so that they can go into the second year in the university, after this training as midshipmen. And the cost to each pupil is $12,000. In the face of the fact that there is no future for the boy, either here or abroad, for some years at least, should we continue that? Perhaps you will say that it is useful in that it trains the young men in other walks of life. But surely that is not part of the federal authority's duty. Education belongs to the provinces, and the reason for the institution of this naval college was that it might train boys for the naval service. When we consider that each graduate costs $12,000, and after the training they are only fit for a second year in a university, without any naval career ahead of them, I believe the country will agree that we ought for the time being to close down the naval college.

Mr. MacKELVIE: What the minister has said may be taken as an argument for the discontinuance of the college, as far as new pupils are concerned, but I still think he must recognize the fact that some obligation rests upon the Government regarding these lads who are there, who have entered in good faith, on the understanding that their training was to be completed. Did I understand the minister to say that the Royal Navy now refuses to take any further graduates in the school?

Mr. GRAHAM: No, I did not say that.

Mr. MacKELVIE: How is it that no career is open for them in the navy?

Mr. GRAHAM: The Royal navy does not need officers, and is dismissing officers every day at the rate of something like 2,000 I think. What young man would care to enter on that career? As a matter of fact, during the last two years, before that took place, only four went from the college to the Royal navy.

Mr. McKELVIE: I would like to have an answer from the minister with reference to the point I raised, as to whether he concedes that the government has any responsibility in connection with those lads who are already taking the course, having in good faith entered the institution.

Mr. GRAHAM: The boys who are just on the first year have not lost much, as their junior training would stand them in good stead anywhere. In the second place, we are endeavouring to get various universities to accept second year boys as matriculants, without examination. The third year boys come to the universities and are credited with the second year work.

Mr. GUTHRIE: They may go to the university if they are fortunate enough to have parents or friends sufficiently well off to finance them through their university career, but, if I understand aright, a number of those boys are not so situated, and a nice question arises as to what is to be done with the boy whose father is not able to give him a university career and who may have spent two or three years at the naval college, having gone there in good faith hoping to complete his education and enter the navy and make that his calling for a lifetime. A difficulty arises in connection with the cadets of the naval college, but I think, perhaps, a greater difficulty will arise in connection with those who have gone through the naval college. I was always under the impression that the British Admiralty had made an arrangement with the Government of Canada that they would accept a certain limited number of our naval college graduates each year. I do not know what the number was, but I think probably those who graduated from the college were entitled to a course in the British navy and to become fully equipped in every respect. Judging from what the minister has intimated to the committee to-day, I gather that this arrangement is still in force. There has been no intimation from the British government that it will not continue that practice and accept from Canada or the other Dominions such men as we may prepare and send forward. Of course, if we stop the college we certainly will not have any boys to send forward. But I do not think the trouble is with the British Admiralty. I doubt if they would send any information to this country that in future they will not accept all the qualified cadets we are able to send them. I think there may be a greater difficulty in the case of the boy who has passed through the naval college and has entered upon his course of training in the Imperial fleet or, having qualified there, has taken a position in the Canadian navy. What is to be done with the officers on our own Canadian ships who went into Canadian naval service on the faith of an act of Parliament, went through the whole course of training, passed through the college, through the rank of midshipman, obtained rank as officers in the various units of our Canadian navy, or are holding positions in the British navy? Are you going to demobilize these men? Are you going to turn them adrift? And if so, upon what principle are you going to act? I have a communication here from the parents of some of these boys. The parent of one lad living in Guelph, where I reside, has also communicated with me on the subject of his son. His son, I think, in the coming month is to become a lieutenant? Of what? I assume he will be cast adrift. Another one writes as follows:

> We have say, 60, officers of the Royal Canadian Navy serving in our own ships and with the Imperials. Their service extends from one year to about twelve years. Before going to sea these officers put in three to four years of study to qualify; since 1910 at the Royal Naval College.
> If these officers are turned adrift now or urged to retire on the small gratuity offered, a great injustice will be done.
> The midshipmen who went to sea last year will of course be the least affected. Their training is such that they can enter the 2nd year at McGill in engineering and the break will not be severe, and they can more easily adapt themselves to some other line of work. Take, however, the officer who has put in five years or more at sea after his college course; it will take at least three years of hard work to fit him for some other work, and the officer who has served from the outset will find it will take him longer. It may well turn out that he will find it impossible to fit into something else. That will be his misfortune. All the country can do and what it ought to do is to start these officers towards any new calling they might choose.

Mr. GRAHAM: Where is he now?

Mr. GUTHRIE: I take it he is in the Canadian navy.

> Consideration should also be given for the money they have been compelled to put into the expensive uniforms of the service.
> I do not know exactly what England is doing but it is freely reported she is treating her officers generously. I have heard it stated that they are paying lieutenants £1,000 and allowances for uniforms.

[Mr. Guthrie.]

What are we doing with these Canadian officers in the British navy and those Canadian midshipman officers in our own Canadian navy? Certainly, it will be unjust, wrong in every sense of the word, to cast these men adrift. They will have to be taken care of; something substantial will have to be granted to them, not only for their disappointment, but for their actual outlay in payment of very expensive uniforms which they are bound to provide.

At this point, I should like to refer to one other matter. When this question was up for discussion in this House on Tuesday last, the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), made some quotations from a report of, I think, the Public Accounts Committee of the British House of Commons, and the inference which has been drawn in some quarters from that quotation or a part of it, has been, I think, an entirely wrong one. A wrong impression has been created; and, as in the interval I have been able to make some inquiries, I want to place the result of those inquiries before the committee. The quotation to which I refer is to be found in unrevised Hansard at page 1951, and in part, it reads:

> What happened was that the domi[illegible]made requests for certain vessels which w[illegible]usually in their waters, were not required by the Admiralty for further use and probably to them had not much more than a scrap value, and the view of the Cabinet was that when a dominion made a request of that sort it should be acceded to.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The hon. gentleman is not quoting my words.

Mr. GUTHRIE: No, this is a quotation from the report of the proceedings of the Public Accounts Committee in England.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It is a quotation of a sworn statement by a witness before that committee.

Mr. GUTHRIE: That is the statement which, I think, has given a very improper impression. The impression seems to have gone abroad that the five ships which we have in Canada have nothing more than a scrap value; that they were amongst the ships which were in Canadian waters either during or after the war; and that they were ships referred to by this witness who appeared before the committee in the British Parliament and who said that they had only a scrap value to Great Britain. That statement is not in accordance with the facts at all. As a matter of fact, the five ships which we have are thoroughly modern, thoroughly well equipped, up-to-date in every way, and exactly suitable for the purpose to which we are putting them.

An hon. MEMBER: When were they built?

Mr. GUTHRIE: I will take the largest of them first. The Aurora is described as a light cruiser, adapted for coast, river and harbour defence. I assume that that is what we want particularly. She is an oil-burner, built in 1914, and her armament is as follows: Two six-inch guns; six four-inch guns; one four-inch anti-aircraft gun; eight torpedoes. She has a speed of 28.5 knots.

Mr. GRAHAM: I think she has exceeded that.

Mr. GUTHRIE: She has at present a complement of 19 officers and 307 men, the great majority of whom are Canadians. I think I am correct in saying that 13 officers and 230 or 235 men are Canadians, but I cannot establish the correctness of those figures by the latest reports. She is a very fast ship, and the minister, I think, intimated a moment ago that she had attained a greater speed than 28.5 knots an hour. She is particularly adapted for the work which we require in Canada. She is an excellent training ship, an excellent coast and harbour defence ship, modern in every respect.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Am I not right in understanding that that ship is of the Arethusa type? And if so, is it not true that she is the only ship of that type in active commission at the present time, and that other ships of that type are at present being scrapped?

Mr. GUTHRIE: I cannot give the information to my hon. friend, but I think he has been in his department long enough to get the information.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think that is the fact.

Mr. GUTHRIE: The Aurora was not in Dominion waters either during or after the war, and she could not be one of the ships refrred to in the statement made by that witness before that committee. The ships in Dominion waters were the Sheerwater and the Algerine.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The statement said "usually" not "always".

Mr. GUTHRIE: The Aurora never was.

Mr. DUFF: That is right. She never was.

Mr. GUTHRIE: The hon. member for Lunenburg (Mr. Duff) says that I am right, and he probably knows.

Mr. DUFF: Right, for once.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Well, we agree for once. The two destroyers, the Patricia and the Patriot, are what are called sister ships. They are both oil-burners, built in 1916. Their armament is as follows: Three four-inch guns; one two pounder; five machine guns and four torpedoes. They have a speed of 35 knots an hour, and each of them a complement of five officers and 76 men, the majority on each ship being Canadians. Neither of these ships was ever in Canadian waters, either during or after the war. The two submarines are known as the C.H. 14, and the C.H. 15. They were built in October, 1918. They have each a complement of 3 officers and 18 men, nearly all of whom, I think, are Canadians. They are both thoroughly modern in every respect. These are the five ships which were transfered by the British navy to Canada within the last year or two, and which have been kept in commission since then by the Dominion of Canada. I am informed that the total expense in connection with the naval service, including the maintenance of these ships, is in round figures, only about $2,000,000 a year. The statement appeared this morning in one of the daily papers that $2,000,000 would cover the whole outlay, although $2,500,000 was the appropriation. I have not seen the returns and I cannot verify the figures. I know, however, what the maintenance was. To-day the Government submitted answers to the following questions:

What was the expenditure for 1921 on the cruiser Aurora and the two destroyers Patriot and Patricia, (a) for repairs, (b) for maintenance, (c) for equipment and supplies, and (d) for pay and allowances?

The answer was that the total under all these heads for the Aurora was $819,516; for the Patriot, $267,294; and for the Patricia, $254,227; a grand total, on the three ships, of $1,541,037. No question was asked in regard to the two submarines, and no answer was given in respect of them; but I would imagine that the expenditure in regard to the submarines would be much less than in regard to the other three ships.

The proposal now is to take that cruiser and practically tie her up, to disband her crew. You cannot keep a crew on a ship tied up to a dock. The alternative would be to return her to Great Britain, and I think that was the intention of the Government when the estimate was first laid before the House. I assume, however, that this fine ship is to be tied up to a dock. Some kind of a crew will have to be kept on her; but whether she has a crew or not, she is going to deteriorate very rapidly. The two destroyers, these long knife-like ships, which are not adapted for training purposes, are to be kept as training ships.

Mr. MARTELL: Does the hon. member speak of the Niobe and the Rainbow in the same way?

Mr. GUTHRIE: As training ships the Niobe and Rainbow were excellent. But they are not like the destroyers of modern times, which are in no sense of the word training ships, and which have never been used as such. They are not used except for the special purposes for which they are designed.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: What was the purpose of the government in acquiring them?

Mr. GUTHRIE: They were acquired as destroyers, as complementary ships to the cruisers.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: What were they going to destroy?

Mr. GUTHRIE: A man has to be trained for work on destroyers as well as on other ships.

Mr. GRAHAM: Then they are training ships?

Mr. GUTHRIE: They form part of the auxiliary craft which accompany the cruiser, and certainly you must have some trained men upon such craft. But I would ask the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) to consult his own naval department. If he does so he will ascertain to what extent destroyers are used as training ships. The Aurora is splendidly adapted for the purposes of a training ship, while destroyers are ill adapted. They may be used as a makeshift, and that is evidently the object in view in this case. This good ship, however, is to be tied up at a dock and left to deteriorate.

Mr. CRERAR: Would the hon. member suggest that the cruiser should be used for training purposes and the destroyers tied up?

Mr. GUTHRIE: I suggest that the Government continue to keep them all in commission. It is poor economy to allow these vessels to deteriorate under the circumstances, when a real benefit would accrue from maintaining them in the modest way in which they have been maintained in the past. Now what is to happen to the submarines? They are to be tied up at the docks, I suppose. Any one who inquires into the matter will discover that a submarine tied to the dock rapidly depreciates. A submarine has certain delicate gas, electric and other machinery which has to be operated occasionally to be kept in trim. If allowed to stand idle, without being occasionally submerged and tested, the machinery gets out of order, and after a very protracted period of disuse the vessel becomes absolutely useless. I have brought these matters to the attention of the committee only because I felt, since the debate in the House last Tuesday, that probably a wrong impression had gone abroad about these ships. I believe they are suitable in every way for the purposes for which they were procured.

I should like to know what was the entire cost of the naval service last year. If, as has been suggested by a morning paper in this city to-day, the whole expenditure last year was only two million dollars or thereabouts, surely my hon. friend (Mr. Graham) could manage to keep the service going for another year without any great strain upon the treasury. There are undoubtedly other avenues and other departments in which we could lop off half a million dollars in order to maintain this service. I make an appeal to the minister. I do not suppose it will have any effect, but I appeal to him that in his treatment of the men whom he is going to let out, these young men who have been trained and are now qualified and ready for lieutenancies or higher ranks, he will make sure that they are not cast adrift. I hope he will accord them very generous treatment. They have gone into the naval service with the best of intentions. The naval course is hard and exacting and they have gone through with it successfully and now that they are qualified for lieutenant's rank, are they suddenly to be told, "You can cut loose, we are done with you"? They should certainly be generously treated, and I appeal to the minister accordingly.

Mr. DUFF: I want to say a word in answer to the member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie). I am glad, and I am sure the committee is glad, to get the information from him with regard to the different ships he has mentioned. I presume he took the matter up last year when he was over in London. He had a very nice trip, having visited France and other places, at a cost to this country of $9,180, and I take it for granted that he got the information over there. Now, he is not quite right in saying that the Aurora is a modern ship. She is eight years of age, and it is a well known fact that when a cruiser or a man-of-war reaches the age of five she is considered obsolete. The member for South Wellington did not tell us what work the cruiser did during the war. Let me say that she did important work in the North sea. She steamed between 70,000 and 80,000 miles with the result that she was practically worn out at the close of the war. Any ship that steams 70,000 or 80,000 miles is not much good for anything after that; her machinery especially is no longer serviceable. It is common knowledge that when she returned to this side a very large sum of money had to be spent by the Canadian government in an attempt to repair her machinery. Last year when the people of Nova Scotia wanted to get a government boat to accompany the sailing ships in the international race, I telegraphed the Minister of Naval Affairs in the matter, and in his own telegram in reply he said that the boats, the Aurora, the two torpedo boat destroyers and the two submarines, were in dock being refitted. In other words, the whole five boats comprising the Canadian navy were in the dock at one time being repaired with their machinery in the repair shop. These are the kind of boats we accepted from Great Britain. They are absolutely no good for defensive purposes, because a cruiser or a torpedo boat destroyer which is over five years old is absolutely useless for that purpose. With reference to the Aurora, this vessel did such good work during the war that her guns are no longer fit as weapons of war. If my information is correct the Aurora took part in the battle of Jutland and also in some previous engagements off the English coast when the German cruisers came forth and attacked some of the coast towns. As a result of her activities her guns have been entirely used up, if I may put it that way; and before she could be of any further service in the way of defence she would have to have new bores fitted into her guns. What, therefore, is the use of the hon. member for South Wellington telling the committee that the Aurora is a proper ship to defend the Nova Scotia or the British Columbia coast? Then he says that she is good for training purposes. The Niobe was far better than the Aurora ever was or will be, for the reason that the Niobe could take twice as many men as the Aurora can. The Aurora is not a training ship; she is a fast cruiser. Any cruiser that can steam 28 knots is no good for training purposes. The old Victory in Portsmouth harbour is a better training ship for young men than the Aurora. And yet the hon. member for South Wellington, who never smelt salt water in his life, tells us that the Aurora is a better training ship than the Niobe. It is all very well for him to read letters from men who have boys training in the colleges, but this country is not going to spend much more money in training boys who have no prospect of being able in the future to put their naval education into practise. It is bad enough to have wasted $4,000 a year, or $12,000 for the training of each cadet, as the hon. member says, and it is time for this or any other government to consider carefully all the circumstances and the possibilities before spending $12,000 in order to make a midshipman or a lieutenant who will not be engaged afterwards. The minister, I think, said that the British Navy let out 2,000 men. My information is that they turned out 20,000 officers and men in the past two or three months. So that if we did keep these boys and train them there would be no career for them, because the British government would look after their own men before Canadians. The right policy, therefore, is either to tie these vessels up, sink them, or use them for breakwaters on the New Brunswick coast. Perhaps Grand Manan would be a good place to put the Aurora, while one of the destroyers could be placed at Campobello and one at Fredericton on the St. John river, in the constituency of the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson). They would serve a good purpose in this connection, perhaps. But at all events the Government is doing wisely in tying them up.

Mr. MacLAREN: I believe I represent the views of my constituency, as I do my own, in expressing the opinion that the proposed reduction in the naval estimates is unwise and unjustifiable. Before I proceed to say what I purpose saying, I shall refer to the remarks of the hon. member for Lunenburg (Mr. Duff). I believe he stated that the expense for naval students was $12,000 a year.

Mr. DUFF: No, I said $12,000 per cadet.

Mr. MacLAREN: I understand the minister said it was $4,000 per cadet.

Mr. GRAHAM: Yes.

Mr. MacLAREN: At first blush that seems a large amount, but those of us who have boys or girls at boarding schools or universities will not be very much impressed by the figure.

Mr. DUFF: When we send our boys to school we pay the expense ourselves.

Mr. MacLAREN: And I trust we will pay for a fair navy before many years are past. If you are sending a boy to a university or boarding school where there may be two or three thousand or two or three hundred, other pupils, you are obtaining for him the advantages in training that result from his being among a large number of fellow pupils, and the expense will run about $1,500 a year. Therefore I do not think it out of the way that the rate for a naval student is about $4,000 a year, considering the small number of about fifty cadets. Now, Mr. Chairman, I believe that throughout the country there is a feeling of war-weariness, and that the people are impressed with the magnitude of our national debt; that is natural. But we must remember that this applies to the Mother Country and to our sister dominions also as well as to other countries; the condition is not exceptional, and a certain time must elapse before matters are completely adjusted. In the meantime I submit that in view of many estimates which have already been passed and in view of what the Mother Country and the other dominions are doing in regard to their navies, there is no occasion to reduce our naval estimates by so large a sum; the economy is altogether too drastic.

I have just had placed in my hands the Ottawa Evening Journal containing a Canadian Press cable from London dated to-day, and I should like to read it to the committee. It is as follows:

> Premier W. F. Massey, of New Zealand, replying to a speech made by Lord Lee, First Lord of the Admiralty, to the Colonial Institute in London on May 10 in which His Lordship regretfully referred to the shrinking of the navies of the Dominions and intimated that the result might be that the Royal Navy of Great Britain would be compelled to shoulder the entire responsibility for the protection of the commerce and liberties of the Empire, asserts that New Zealand will do her part, says a Reuter despatch from Wellington. Premier Massey points out that the resolution on the naval question passed at the Imperial Conference stated plainly that the matter of the naval contributions from the various Dominions was held over until after the Washington conference.
> The responsibility of the British Empire has not been lessened thereby, Premier Massey says, except in so far as an understanding being reached respecting the Pacific. He takes the stand that whatever each of the Dominions contributes can be settled on at an Empire conference subject to ratification by each of the Parliaments.
> Premier Massey adds: "I have stated definitely that New Zealand will give her full share and I am quite confident that our Parliament will shoulder its responsibility but while this should be done as soon as possible we must have an opportunity to readjust our finances and recover, to a certain extent, from the effects of the war, in which we played no unimportant part."

That is the attitude of New Zealand in regard to naval defence.

I submit that no one is urging upon the Government an enormous naval expenditure, but simply that such an amount be expended as will give the country something effective and tangible in the way of naval defence. Last year's estimate was what might be termed the irreducible minimum, and if the minister continues to press for this reduction it will resolve itself into a reductio ad absurdum. Undoubtedly the sentiment of the country is in favour of our doing what is reasonable and proper and self-respecting in bearing our share of the naval burden of the Empire. No one asks the Government to go beyond what, under the circumstance, should be considered the minimum.

Yesterday was observed all over the country as Empire Sunday; next Wednesday will be observed as Empire Day. It is a striking coincidence that, at this time when our people are about to engage in fittingly observing this great day, the Government should propose such a reduction in the naval estimates as to reduce our navy's effectiveness to futility. But that is the condition. Yesterday I happened to be in Toronto and heard an admirable sermon on the text, "If I forget Thee, O Jerusalem, let my right hand forget her cunning." I do not know whether the learned preacher had in mind the present naval programme of the Government, but I think there would be ample reason to infer this from the aptness of his text. I submit that the naval policy of the Government is a most clumsy handling of what so vitally affects the Empire. Our country has done nobly; no one can question that. Nor need we despair of our country, notwithstanding the discouraging and trying circumstances of this naval policy. May it never be truly said, Sir, of Canada, as Edmund Burke said long ago: "The age of chivalry is gone; that of sophisters, economists and calculators has succeeded."

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax): I was very glad to hear the remarks of my hon. friend from South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie) in connection with the treatment that should be accorded to young boys now in the Naval College at Esquimalt. I very heartily concur in his recommendation to the minister that ample justice be done these boys. I would ask the Minister of Naval Affairs Mr. Graham) not to deal lightly with this suggestion; I hope he will take sufficient time to understand every fact in connection with the situation and, in the end, do what is nothing but justice to these boys. I am not prepared to make any definite or what I would consider practical suggestion in the matter, but I do feel there must be many cases where great injustice will be done to some of the boys at least, who entered the naval service, and now find that the career which they had hoped to follow is not further open to them.

I should like to say just a few words in connection with the naval policy which was was laid before the House a few days ago by the minister. I cannot say that I am very enthusiastic about it personally; at the same time I am not in a position to submit to the House any proposals which I think would be more practicable. At least, I cannot put myself in a position to recommend with confidence any other proposals. I want to point out, however, that so far I have heard no hon. member, unless it be the hon. member for Lunenburg (Mr. Duff), has recommended that there be no expenditures for naval defence. That being the case, it means that the House has not absolutely declared against the principle of naval defence. Considerable criticism was made of the militia estimates, but I do not recall that any hon. gentleman went so far as to say that we should have no militia expenditure in this country. I should hope that no man would be so foolish as to make such a suggestion.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: May I just say that I was one who was "so foolish" as to say that I was here to advocate absolute disarmament? I want to make my position clear.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax): Then I am very sorry that my hon. friend makes what, in my judgment, is such a foolish suggestion—and, of course, I do not intend by that to be personally offensive to my hon. friend. I shall take the opportunity of reading his remarks again; I thought he spoke very guardedly, indeed. Nevertheless, if he did make that suggestion I would feel myself on very strong ground in opposing it absolutely. In this country and in all countries of the world, the maintenance of law and order depends upon force, and there must be some instrument for that purpose, and it would be utterly preposterous to say that in Canada we can safely pursue our national course without some arm of defence.

I sympathize with the Government in their endeavours to practice economy; that is quite necessary. But any campaign of public economy on which we embark must have some intelligent, and uniform basis; and there should be no unfair discrimination as between the different public services. By a vote which the Minister of Railways (Mr. Kennedy) will present to Parliament presently, he will ask for $4,000,000 on account of the merchant marine, a service which it is not necessary for the Government of this country to carry on. Economically it is of no value; it cannot now or ever perform a service which could not be as well performed by the world shipping, yet it involves an annual expenditure vastly greater than the amount by which the Minister of Naval Affairs has reduced his vote for defence since his estimates were first submitted to Parliament. When we talk of practising economy in public expenditures we must do so upon some fair basis as affecting all the national services. My fear as to the policy which the minister has announced is that it is not practical enough. I am quite willing that it be given a fair trial, but I fear that at the end of the first year's experiment it will be found to be ineffective. I hope that experience will prove that I am wrong. However, I really rose to express the hope that in the meanwhile, for a year at least, the minister would see that proper care was taken of the Aurora and of the submarine vessels so that in the event of the commercial and economic outlook of this country being brighter a year from now, these ships might be returned to the service in proper shape. I hope the minister will be able to take due and proper care of the boats which he now proposes to put out of commission.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Mr. Chairman, I express my appreciation very gladly of much that has been said by the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Maclean) and of the spirit that animated all he said. He evidently has been anxious to do one thing only, and that is to get to the rights of the question. I am, of course, no authority of my own knowledge on the value of vessels for fighting or for training purposes, and in so far as that is an issue here I would like to see the committee favoured with the report of the best officers of the department, of the best experts in the service of the country, as to what the values of these vessels are that have constituted the nucleus of the naval service of this Dominion; and by that I would be very largely guided. I do not, in all respects, think the hon. member for Lunenburg (Mr. Duff) is an informed critic on that question. Were he a public officer, possibly, with some training, one might give some weight to what he says; but he is a party man, he is a follower of the government; and I do not think, speaking from that position, in view of his lack of acquaintance with naval matters in the military sense, that his judgment is really very dependable.

Mr. DUFF: Is the right hon. gentleman any less a partisan on the other side than I am on this?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Certainly; but I am not affecting to give personal opinions as to the value of these vessels. That is the difference between me and the hon. member.

Mr. DUFF: The hon. gentleman did, the other night.

Mr. MEIGHEN: No, not at all.

Mr. DUFF: Oh, yes.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Not at all. I stated when they were bought; I stated the character of them. I do not know how they are fitted for these things, save to the extent I have been advised. I think it would be fair to the committee if the committee were favoured with the opinion of the officers—I do not know who they would be. I have heard Commander Hose mentioned by the minister; Admiral Kingsmill is now out of the service; there may be others. Let us have their opinions. My opinion would be —judged only by what I have been advised; judged only by the information that came to me when they were purchased—that these vessels were admirably adapted for the purpose. But of personal knowledge or expert opinion I have none; I am just in the position of one who, as the hon. member for Lunenburg says, knows very little about salt water and salt water matters. It is my recollection—and I give it only as my recollection—that this vessel is not one of those of the type which is being scrapped by the Imperial Navy. It may be that the words quoted by the Prime Minister referred to covered this vessel, but I do not think so; it is more likely, I think, they referred to a vessel of the type of one that had been under negotiation, for which subsequently the Aurora was substituted. The Aurora was understood at the time, I know,—and was so represented to us—to be modern in every way, fitted in every way for coast, harbour and river defence, and for training purposes. Let this point be remembered as well: If we are to do any training we ought to have ships fitted to do the training upon. And if the Niobe was a ship of the right class why did the government sell it?

Mr. DUFF: The Tory government did it, not this Government.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Certainly, because we did not think she was of the right class.

Mr. DUFF: You did not know that.

Mr. MEIGHEN: My hon. friend's style of reasoning may have the effect of exposing his reasoning powers to the committee even if it does not have other effect. We determined the character of our naval service on the advice of the officers of the department, and we decided that the Niobe was not useful at all in view of present naval conditions. Consequently we determined to sell her, and did so. They took her back and sold her again. Yet my hon. friend says the Niobe is just the ship for training purposes.

Mr. DUFF: I do not say that.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Well, far better than the Aurora, and still they sold her for $41,000.

Mr. DUFF: I would like to know why? You ought to be able to tell me, it was your government that did it?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I say she was not a vessel of the requisite type. I have gone far enough to expose the hon. member's strange reasoning; it is certainly not worth pursuing further.

Now I come to the other question, as to the value of the ships for the purposes for which they are intended. Acting on the best advice we could get the late government felt they were. If the present Government has different advice let it present that advice to the committee; let it present the advice of men who are at least in the best position to judge of the character of these vessels. In that connection, I only suggest this: We have to decide whether we are to have a naval service or not; we have to decide what our fair portion of the burden of naval defence is and undertake that portion in a naval service; we ought to get the best results we can obtain for our expenditure. We are now at the point of deciding—this is what I emphasized when I spoke first, but really it seems to me it is the whole question we have to discuss—are we not in the place where it is our duty to establish a modest but a real unit of naval service? Hon. members say we are in difficult financial circumstances. They say we have a great debt, more debt than we had before the war. Very well, that it correct; we have more debt than we had before the war. But are other nations not in the same condition? Is Britain not even more emphatically in that position than we? Is the British debt per capita not two to three times what ours is per capita, and their resources, their natural resources, per capita very much less? Are we not in a position fairly camparable with Australia? Yes, fairly comparable with Australia, for her debt would run, I think, about three or four per capita to ours—two or three anyway—and New Zealand the same. But we find all these countries maintaining naval services on a scale far transcending ours—yes, by hundreds of per cent. Then the question comes: Are they doing more than is essential? Is there extravagance in naval construction? Are the Mother Country and Sister Dominions going anywhere at all beyond the margin of safety itself? Has any hon. member discussed that point in this committee? I have not heard the point debated by any hon. member opposite. Now, does any hon. member think these countries are doing too much? What are they doing? They are striving to maintain a one-power standard as the aggregate naval strength of the British Empire. Now, do we say that is too much? Will even the hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Woodsworth), will any hon. member, stand up in this House and say that in his judgment that is too high a standard for the British Empire to set for itself? I do not think any one will.

Such being the case have we a right to say, "Oh, we will do nothing; let the other fellow do it." We have a duty to perform. How would the Prime Minister feel, sitting before the Prime Ministers of the other Dominions and the Prime Minister of Great Britain, telling about what the debt of Canada is? When the debts of the other Dominions were shown him to be far greater than ours, and much harder for them to bear, would he not consider the argument closed on that score? If he has any further argument at his disposal to advance in answer I would like to hear it; I personally do not know what it could be. Very well, is it the part of honour, is it the part of manhood, is it just to the sense of honour of the Canadian people, is it fair and right and just to the manhood of our country, to stand up and say "Oh, we will unload ourselves for a while. We will build wharves, we will expend money on facilities here and there at home, and we will let you, Australia, you, New Zealand, and you, Great Britain, take care of naval defence"?

It may be all right to economize, undoubtedly it is; but as the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Maclean) says: We must take care where we apply economy. I would suggest this maxim: That it does not do an individual or a nation great credit to apply economy at the expense of somebody else. Let us economize first at our own expense; let the Government go into any department and make a saving as we of the late government did; let the Government go into any one department and apply the knife there as we did in three departments—and we took the political penalty for our action—and in any one of eight departments they can save more than the additional amount that is necessary for the continuance of the nucleus of the navy that we have.

Of course, if we were an independent people we might stand bravely before the world and say: "We throw down our arms; we have more common sense in these enlightened days than to build instruments of destruction." That would be courage; —most people would call it insane courage, but at least it would be courage. But such is not what we are doing at all. No; we are in effect saying this: "We don't throw down the burden of defence, we just lay it on somebody else; we just expect Tommy Atkins and the Weary Titan to carry it. We expect our Australian brother and our New Zealand brother to carry it. While we are spending 28 cents"—as we were last year—"to your $2.80 in Australia, we will reduce our 28 cents to 17 cents, and all that even though now we have reached the stage where we realize the aggregate responsibility of the Empire." I cannot understand the course of reasoning which arrives at that conclusion.

An hon. member read some reference to reductions having been effected by New Zealand; I do not know whether he included Australia or not. Is it any wonder when they look over here and see us contributing only a fraction in the matter of handling this naval burden—only a mere fraction of their burden—and they see no reason for it; is it any wonder that they feel like taking that course? They may feel that in this way they will bring the matter to a head. Perhaps it will be brought to an issue. I cannot but think, from what experience of life I have had, that by allowing the Dominion of Canada to pursue this course the Government is ultimately going to drift our nation into a shoal where it will pay a disastrous penalty for playing such a part as this. I never knew a similar course to be pursued by an individual, where that individual did not ultimately reap the bitter reward. The fire in the end came upon his own head. He finally had to pay in shame and in suffering more than he would have paid if he had pursued an honest and an upright course. In what form our penalty will come I do not know, but I cannot conceive that we can successfully play the part recommended by this Government, virtually dissolving the naval service, and relying more and more upon others to do what we know those others must do, and of which we get the advantage, the same as they—we cannot so act and not at some day take our punishment.

But if the Government cannot come to that conclusion, then do not make a farce of the whole service. Do not pretend to be training men for the defence of this country in naval service by putting them an hour or so a day, for two or three weeks, in an armoury, or sending them out on a fishing scow or a trawler on the Pacific for two or three weeks to get sick. Do not let it go abroad that we believe such conduct is a naval service. I could not but admire the euphony of the hon. member from Halifax (Mr. Maclean) when he expressed the fear that this would turn out to be no good, and a negligible factor at the end of the year. It will turn out to be a joke; in fact it is an obvious joke to-day. No other nation ever attempted such a thing. If this is all we can do, it is better to do nothing. Let it all go, and let us stand before the world in our true position. This policy simply adds the offense of waste to the offensive poltroonery and national mendicancy.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If the hon. member means what he says, why does he not bring in a motion to that effect?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Because it is not my policy.

Mr CRERAR: I would judge from the tenure of my right hon. friend's argument, that it is based on the assumption that Canada should do her share in Empire defence.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes, precisely.

Mr. SHAW: Do I gather from the remarks of the leader of the Opposition that Canada is bound and obligated to the policy of the one power standard?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Canada's obligations are purely bounded by a sense of duty. I believe in the one power standard as a standard for the Empire. I do not believe the Empire dare in the vital interest of all of us go below it. I do not believe many in Canada take any other view, nor did I ever hear anybody in this House subscribe to any other belief, and I am prepared to take the responsibility of endorsing the one power standard, and if the hon. member feels that it is the will of the country that the British Empire go below the one power standard, in my judgment he does not know the will of the Canadian people.

Mr. GRAHAM: My hon. friend asked about the suitability of the Aurora for training. I am not going to shield myself behind my officers or anything of that kind. This matter has been discussed and the concensus of opinion is that the Aurora is not by any means the best type of ship for training. In the first place, she is so speedy and narrow that she is loaded down with machinery, and space and draught are sacrificed for speed. The Aurora is 410 feet long and 39 feet wide, a very narrow boat. Her draught is only 13½ feet and she would go over the sills of one of the St. Lawrence canals. I think any person, even though not a naval officer, would say that a boat of that size, with a speed of 28 to 30 knots an hour, would not be an ideal boat for training, although training could be done on her. The Niobe, in her class, was a superior boat for training, but I am of opinion that when she was sold recently she was in such a condition that it would have taken almost as much to refit her for training work as it would to buy a first or second class new boat of the same size. Now we are all striving to ascertain what is best in this situation, and it is my firm belief that what the Government proposes is superior to what the Government found to be in existence, for the benefit of Canada, and for the performance of her share in the defence of the British Empire when the programme reaches its culmination. The Government is beginning at the bottom, and not at the top. We are starting to train men to be ready for the service, instead of getting the service and then starting to look for the men. It is said that no country in the world would take this attitude. In other words, that they would not have a naval reserve force. The United States has 30,000 of these men now.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Trained in this way?

Mr. GRAHAM: Thirty thousand trained in the naval service.

Mr. MEIGHEN: They are defined in our act. This then does not provide to really train a naval reserve in the sense that the United States does so?

Mr. GRAHAM: Yes. My hon. friend asked me to give him the view of the technical officers in the United States. I am going to give it to him. I will show him our authority with regard to this scheme:

> A great deal of criticism has been levelled at the policy of developing a naval reserve system. The main arguments have been that with two or three weeks training in a year you cannot make a sailor.
> Such an argument confuses the function of the permanent naval officers and men with those of the volunteers.
> To produce the highly skilled officers and men who must necessarily form a large proportion of the complement of modern men-of-war ranging from the battleship to the submarine undoubtedly requires years of training.
>
> Permanent work and study of the problems of defence against the types of vessels and weapons by which the shipping making and leaving our ports and coasts may be attacked, is also essential for a certain number of officers and men in order that the complicated organiation of coast and port naval defences may be put into operation in quick time when necessary.
>
> But there are large numbers of officers and men required to carry out defence work afloat which calls for but a small amount of technical training combined with principles of discipline, knowledge of technical terms and orders, which may be acquired by men who are anxious to learn in a very short time.
> The essential defence work of minesweeping, patrols, examination service etc. was very largely carried out by all countries in the last war by these "amateur sailors" organized by a nucleus of permanent men, and the story of their work and its value will be undying.
> If money spent in such methods of defence were useless one can hardly conceive of Great Britain including in her naval estimates provision for the maintenance of a naval volunteer reserve of 484 officers and 5,000 men—men who are not sailors by profession—in addition to a naval reserve of merchant seamen of 2,029 officers and 9,000 men. The latest information from the United States is that they have a naval volunteer reserve of some 2,000 officers and 30,000 men.

That is just what I am describing as the naval volunteers, and I want hon. members to bear in mind that this is only part of the naval reserve scheme. These are volunteer naval reserves. There are men who need not necessarily be sailors to attend to the work I have outlined here, and surely in modern warfare the laying of mines and mine-sweeping, and all the other similar duties, form the most modern style of defence against any effective attack. In this scheme, the development of which will come later, there is the naval reserve, and this will be composed of seamen who can be given technical training, discipline, gunnery and all that kind of thing, and do not have to acquire the process of seamanship, because the men will be selected when the time comes from seamen themselves. It looks then as if, instead of running away from our duty, the Government have taken the risk of some adverse criticism in arriving at a substantial basis from which a navy of any size can emanate in years to come.

I do not know that I can say any more except in reply to the hon. member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie) and the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Maclean). I was somewhat worried in regard to the boys in the naval college; but I do not think much stress need be laid on the few months' work that these boys have done at Halifax because they have been started on a career; they have done a few months' work of initial service that will stand them in good stead wherever they go. As I have pointed out already, all those who have graduated through the naval college at Esquimalt are, if they so desire it, in the Royal Navy now, paid, not by the Royal navy, but by Canada, and this Government does not propose to change that system. Therefore, every boy who has graduated up to the present time will be paid during his training overseas. The fact that the situation has been changed in Canada does not decrease that boy's chance of a career in the Royal navy; but at the present moment, no matter what navy we might have had in Canada, no difference would have been made in the standing or in the opportunity of the boys who had graduated through the naval college. If any of the officers who have graduated through the naval training college wish to retire, they can retire on a gratuity scheme under the Naval Service Act; but we believe that the young men in the Canadian navy can be absorbed and used in this new scheme.

During the first year, of course, nothing much can be accomplished, and the hon. member for Halifax will probably be right, because we shall have approximately half the year gone under the old expenditure, so that there will be probably three or four hundred thousand dollars left for the reorganization and all that sort of thing.

But I am convinced, from what I have read, from the discussions which I have had with members of the naval staff, that Canada can save quite a large amount of money and yet begin a system that will not lessen our ability to protect ourselves and serve the Empire, but that will, in a few years, prove the foundation for a service that will intensify our ability for service and protection. I say quite plainly that if the cost were the same under the scheme that has existed and under the one now proposed by the Government, I would suggest to Parliament to accept the new scheme, because I believe it gives a broader and wider opportunity for doing the thing that Canada in years to come will probably have to do, and for launching on a permanent naval policy. There is to be an Imperial Conference where all these things will be discussed. I must not forestall any attitude that any member of the Government might take; but these things will be all discussed in a friendly manner, and if I were Prime Minister of Canada with the scheme outlined by the Government, I would not be ashamed to sit in with and face any of the prime ministers of the Empire and say: "This is our policy which, when developed, will give us a medium for performing our whole duty to ourselves and to the British Empire."

Mr. HUGHES: The leader of the Opposition (Mr. Meighen) made the statement that there were eight departments of the government service where economies could be practised that would amount to more than the present Government proposes to spend and, I think, he said more than the late government spent, on the navy. At all events, he said that the economy would amount to a very large sum of money. I would ask the right hon. gentleman to name those departments and to tell the committee and the country how those economies can be practised, how those savings can be made. In my judgment, as a member of this House and a citizen of this country, any man who has information of that character and who does not give it to Parliament and the country, is not fulfilling his whole duty. Another question which I have to ask is this. What, in the opinion of the leader of the Opposition, is our share of the one-power standard? I do not know whether he would feel like answering that question or not, but that is information which I should like to have.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I am sure it is the duty of the leader of the Opposition to inform members on the Government side on matters of policy, and just as far as he can to answer their hunger for information, long unsatisfied in looking around them. In the first place, the hon. member for King's, P.E.I. (Mr. Hughes) will, I hope, be more accurate in listening to what I say now than he was in listening to what I said before. What I said before was this, that there were departments in which more could be saved than the Government was saving to-day, more than would be necessary to keep up the necleus of the navy that was kept up. The hon. member wants to know what the departments are and how to effect this saving. Just the way we effected savings in connection with the departments which we took up. For example, in the Printing Bureau alone, not a large department, by any means, nearly $600,000 a year was saved, and that is more than the Government is trying to save this year over the expenditure of last year in the matter of naval defence. In the Post Office Department we effected a still greater saving, and in the Department of Customs and Inland Revenue, still more, by their amalgamation, not by merely nominal amalgamation, keeping all the staff. That is how the saving was effected. An organization was put into these departments to make recommendations that would enable us, through the Civil Service Commission, to effect the saving.

Mr. HUGHES: Was that done by reducing the staff?

Mr. MEIGHEN: By reducing the staffs, almost altogether.

Mr. HUGHES: When was that done?

Mr. MEIGHEN: That was done during the last two or three years when my hon. friend was back in Prince Edward Island.

Mr. ROBB: When was the staff increased to enable the late government to make this reduction?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Mostly during the fifteen years preceding 1911. That is when the increases came in that were unnecessary. Certain necessary increases were made during the war.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Thirteen thousand were replaced by 26,000.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The reorganization undoubtedly effected very great savings in those departments, and similar savings can be effected in other departments of the Government. A saving can be effected in the Department of Trade and Commerce presided over by my hon. friend (Mr. Robb), in the Department of Public Works, and in the Department of Marine and Fisheries.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Building another merchant marine.

Mr. MEIGHEN: But I despair of this ever being done the way the minister has started out. A considerable saving can be effected even yet in the Department of Railways and Canals, in all the large departments of the Government. That is where the Government has an opportunity of applying its reorganization efforts. We got through with three of them and we effected great reductions, indeed.

Mr. CLARK: The question has been asked whether or not the responsibility resting upon this country to take part in Empire defence is recognized. Personally, I thought that point was well and clearly established; that this House was unanimous upon the question whether or not we would contribute to Empire defence. But if it is not I think it should be brought out in this debate so that we might know where the members of this House stand on this question, because I do not think we can come to an intelligent conclusion on the subject unless we know where the members of the House stand. The resolution which was adopted by this House in 1909 and which was referred to before in the debate, will be found in volume 2, of Hansard of that year at page 3564. This resolution represents my view as regards the obligation of this country to take part in Imperial defence, and particularly the last two paragraphs of the resolution, which state:

> The House will cordially approve of any necessary expenditure designed to promote the speedy organization of a Canadian naval service in co-operation with and in close relation to the imperial navy, along the lines suggested by the admiralty at the last imperial conference, and in full sympathy with the view that the naval supremacy of Britain is essential to the security of commerce, the safety of the empire and the peace of the world.
> The House expresses its firm conviction that whenever the need arises the Canadian people will be found ready and willing to make any sacrifice that is required to give to the imperial authorities the most loyal and hearty co-operation in every movement for the maintenance of the integrity and honour of the empire.

I understood the Prime Minister himself (Mr. Mackenzie King) to refer to that resolution and to intimate that he endorses the sentiment expressed therein; and if there is any section of this House which does not stand behind that resolution we should have an emphatic declaration from each and every hon. member. We should know where we stand on the subject. That resolution says that the House stood for a speedy recognition of the policy mentioned therein. That was in 1909, and very little has been done yet.

Now, several members have asked the question whether or not we have had the opinions of experts as to the policy of the Government this year. I have before me an opinion which is certainly concise and terse, expressed by Vice Admiral Sir Edmund Pears, K.B.E., C.B., R.N., a retired officer of the royal navy. He says:

> To reduce the present very small naval force means the killing of the Canadian navy.

That is his opinion with reference to this year's estimates, and it is my own view of the subject. My feeling has been that the reduction which has been proposed recognizes the principle of doing away with the navy; it recognizes the principle of shirking the responsibility of taking any part in empire or national defence. So far as I have been able to observe, the great argument that has been urged against the maintenance of a navy and in favour of the present proposed reduction in the estimates, has been that the present taxation is all that we can stand. Well, I agree, and I think that every one else agrees, that our taxation is practically all that we can stand. But, as has been ably pointed out before, are we not in the same position as all other countries in this respect? Can it be said that to-day the people of Great Britain are suffering less from taxation than we are? Or can it be contended that our duty is any less than that of the Mother Country or any other partner in this Empire of nations? If we recognize the principle that we are a part of the Empire—and the fact is so often brought to the front, that we are an integral part of it—then we must recognize our duty as a partner; and if there is a responsibility for the maintenance of a navy for Empire defence we must assume our share of that responsibility. whatever it may be. I am not expressing any opinion as to what our share should be. I do say, however, that, whatever it may be, we should play the part of men and declare without hesitation that we are prepared to do our duty to the fullest extent.

Now, are we suffering in any material sense from the contribution we have been making towards our national defence? Let us compare the positions of Australia and Canada. The comparison has already been made, but I want to place the positions of Australia and Canada before this committee in a slightly different light from that which has been shown heretofore. Australia in 1921-22 had a total expenditure of approximately $275,000,000; our expenditure for the same year was approximately $650,000,000, about two and a half times Australia's. And yet Australia was able to spend, out of that $275,000,000, the sum of $30,000,000 for national defence, while we, on the other hand, were able to find, out of our $650,000,000, a total of only some $15,000,000. The fact is that taxation has nothing to do with this question; our contribution to naval defence is only an infinitesimal part of the total expenditure of the country. There is no country in the world where the expenditure on national defence is such an infinitesimal proportion of the total expenditures as Canada's naval expenditures were last year. If we recognize our duty as a partner in the Empire we must recognize the principle that was laid down by Mr. Lloyd George recently, with reference to the weight he carries in the conferences of nations. He said:

> My word in conference is as strong and efficacious as is the muscle represented by the British navy.

If it is a fact that we are a partner in the Empire, can we honestly say that we are doing the right thing in scrapping our navy or even in taking a breathing spell? It seems a rather strange thing that the Liberal party should find it possible, in view of their past attitude towards the naval situation, to repudiate, as this proposed reduction does, their declaration as stated in the resolution to which I have referred. I do not approach this subject in a partisan spirit, and I only refer to that attitude because I believe this fleet unit which we have now represents exactly the declared policy of the government many years ago, and again affirmed by the Prime Minister last week. If that is the policy of the Government, surely it cannot be considered a waste of money to add another $500,000 so that the navy can be continued in force until we know what is the best course for Canada to adopt.

Some hon. member said: Well, you have offered no concrete proposal as to what we should do. It seems to me a very simple thing to determine upon the course that we should pursue. If we are still a part of this great Empire,—and no one will assert the contrary—then it seems to me that a conference of the partners should be able to solve in a comparatively short time the exact policy that it is desirable for this country to adopt. I for one am absolutely prepared to see this country take part in a conference of the components of the Empire; and, further, I am prepared —and I think the people also are prepared —to stand behind the policy that such a conference shall lay down. Unless we are prepared to do that, our action must amount to a repudiation of our position as a component part of the Empire.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): I have listened to the remarks of my hon. friend from Burrard (Mr. Clark) with a great deal of interest, and as one who had the opportunity of sitting in this House in the days when the resolution to which he referred was first discussed, and when his party so valiantly fought against the assertion of the principle contained in that resolution, the changed conditions prompt me to say a word or two in this debate.

The Prime Minister in the early part of this debate declared most emphatically where the Liberal party stand. We stand to-day where we stood in 1909 and 1910—for recognition of the fact that Canada will share in the naval defence of the Empire along the lines of developing our own defence on the sea in conjunction with the British navy. That is where we have stood all through these years; but in 1911 my hon. friend's former leader and associates "sold out" the whole question of the participation of Canada in the naval defence of the Empire to the men in Quebec who declared that they would never take any part in naval defence—men headed by Henri Bourassa, who put his Conservative friends in power in 1911 as the result of that union.

Let us see what happened after that date when the responsibilities of office were assumed by the Conservative party. At once they absolutely disregarded the resolution to which they gave unanimous assent in 1909. They proposed a contribution of $30,000,000 to the British exchequer instead of carrying out the policy of building up a Canadian navy. Is there a man in this country to-day who in view of the events of the war would undertake to say that Canada would have done wisely in making that present of $30,000,000 to Great Britain? I venture to say that no hon. gentleman who understands the position of matters would support that policy to-day.

We hear of Australia participating in naval defence. Well, what happened in her case? She scorned the idea of a contribution, and whatever share she took in naval defence was based on the principle that she should work out her own problem in her own way. Australia is essentially interested in this question, because she is an island-continent, every foot of her shores is washed by the Pacific ocean, and she is in close proximity to the nations of the East who at all times might menace her security. And New Zealand is situated in exactly the same way. That is the position of those two great dominions.

But when the responsibility of dealing with the situation came upon the Borden government in 1914, what did they do? They proceeded to tie the Niobe up at the wharf, and to scrap whatever existed in the way of naval facilities for defence as created by the Liberal government in 1911. In looking back upon the debate in this House in 1916 I find that at that time there was only one vessel in any position to defend our shores, and that was the small gunboat Canada. We in the Maritime provinces who are not dependent upon time provinces who are not dependent for our knowledge in the matter upon windy orations, know that in the days when German submarines were off our Atlantic coast we had to depend upon the cruisers and torpedo destroyers of the American navy to defend us.

Mr. HANSON: America was not in the war from the beginning.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): My hon. friend who comes from an inland point up the St. John river probably does not know what happened to the people who live along the shores of Nova Scotia, but I repeat now the assertion, that we were dependent upon the United States cruisers and torpedo boats for the defence of our coast from attack by German submarines.

Mr. HANSON: You are making a mistake; the United States did not enter the war until 1917.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): I made the statement then, and perhaps I may inform my hon. friend that the then leader of his party undertook to send it to the First Lord of the Admiralty, and that correspondence took place, which perhaps it might be interesting to give to the House in full, as to why certain criticisms were made and certain discussions took place at that time. My hon. friend will allow me to remind him that along the shores of Nova Scotia numerous fishing boats were sunk by German submarines in 1917. Off the port of Halifax, outside of the mine sweepers which are so much despised to-day, the only active force upon which we depended was the cruisers and torpedo destroyers of the United States navy. That illustrates in a striking way how the leaders of my hon. friend's party discharged their responsibilities in regard to the naval defence of the country. Millions of dollars were thrown away in the construction of vessels of no value whatever in the way of defence and which were sent up and down our coast for no purpose.

That is the history of the policies of the two great parties in so far as our participation in naval defence is concerned. Last year my right hon. friend (Mr. Meighen) attended the Imperial Conference in London which solemnly decided that action by the dominions and the Mother Country in regard to naval defence should be postponed until another conference was held following the then proposed Disarmament Conference in Washington. The latter conference took place and resulted in an agreement for naval disarmament by all the great naval powers. Therefore the Prime Minister, realizing, as we of the Liberal party do, that with our enormous railway deficits and burdensome taxation, and with the many serious problems facing us, this is not the proper time to decide our naval policy, declared that for the time being we hold by our original policy on this question until after the next Imperial Conference, and that in the meantime we should not spend $5,000,000 or $6,000,000 on a naval service which would be neither an effective defence for Canada nor a contribution of any value to Empire defence.

Mr. MANION: I understood my hon. friend to say that the United States previous to 1917 supplied torpedo boats for the protection of our shores. He knows, of course that the United States did not come into the war until April, 1917. I wanted to know if he meant that her vessels protected our shores prior to that time.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): After the United States came into the war the situation was this: by arrangement with Great Britain, American torpedo boats and destroyers patrolled the coasts of Nova Scotia and of the Maritime provinces generally. They were the vessels which protected our coasts and our fishing vessels and acted very largely as convoys of the steamers which crossed the ocean.

Mr. HANSON: Will my hon. friend inform the committee whether the sailors who manned those destroyers were trained in drill halls, as is proposed here?

Mr. GRAHAM: The hon. member for South Wellington says that men cannot be trained on torpedo boat destroyers.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): My hon. friend's friends did not attempt to train any of these fishermen who live down by the sea under their Volunteer Reserve Act, which was on the statute book at that time. In fact, when Hon. Rupert Guinness came from England, supposed to be looking for men to serve in the British navy, my hon. friends sent him into the agricultural counties to find men instead of into Lunenburg and other counties along the Atlantic coast where any number of men could be found who had been trained on the sea. That was the wonderful effort which was made by my hon. friend's friends to create a naval service in this country; so that if my hon. friend wants to know whether or not these men were trained in drill halls, he will have to consult some of the hon. gentlemen who were in Parliament at that time, and whom he supported; probably they will inform him.

In view of the conclusions arrived at by the Imperial Conference; in view of the arrangements in regard to disarmament made at Washington last year, why should we spend millions at this time when there is no necessity for doing so? There is full recognition of the principles, so far as we on this side are concerned, set forth in the resolution which we placed upon the record of Parliament in 1909, principles which were embalmed in the Naval Service Act and in respect to which hon. members now of the official Opposition sold us out for the support of the Nationalists. That is where we stand; and as matters develop and the necessity arises, this policy will be carried on. In the meantime, why should we spend any money unnecessarily?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Will the hon. member tell the committee what progress his party had made in October, 1911, when they went out of office? While New Zealand and Australia were building their navy, how much had the Liberal party, of which the hon. member was a supporter, accomplished?

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): My hon. friend, if he was in the House the other day, heard the statement made in regard to that. He will recall that after the act was passed in 1910, the Government of the day proceeded to call for tenders from all parts of the world for the construction of a certain number of vessels. But when the hon. gentlemen's friends came into office they refused to go on with these tenders; they cancelled the whole business.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Did not the hon. gentleman's party leave these tenders pigeon-holed during the whole summer?

Mr. HANSON: Why did you not let the contracts?

The CHAIRMAN: Order.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): My hon. friend is aware that we arranged for and obtained the Niobe and the Rainbow. In dealing with questions involving millions of dollars it was wise for the government, knowing that they were going to the country, to await the result of the election. No one would have raised a more terrific row than the hon. member for South Oxford (Mr. Sutherland) if the government of that day had undertaken to let these contracts in the face of an approaching election.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: They did not let them.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

After Recess

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. LEWIS: In answer to a question this afternooon the minister said there was a volunteer force in the navy of the United States and also in the navy of Great Britain. My understanding is that the United States has a regular navy and Great Britain also; but what I wanted to find out is this: If we are to have this volunter naval reserve force, is it contemplated by the policy of the Government to have any kind of regular navy at all?

Mr. GRAHAM: It depends on what my hon. friend would call a regular navy.

Mr. LEWIS: A permanent force, a small one?

Mr. GRAHAM: The present arrangement will provide for a destroyer and small vessels on the Pacific, and a like number of vessels of the same type on the Atlantic for training purposes.

Mr. LEWIS: Will there be a permanent force on these vessels or will they be taken care of by this volunteer force?

Mr. GRAHAM: We would require to have on each of these vessels a permanent force. I think the permanent force required to begin with will probably amount to about 300 men, speaking from memory.

Mr. CALDWELL: I would like to revert to the question of the sale of the Niobe. Why was the New Brunswick Rolling Mills allowed to back out of the contract for the purchase of the Niobe?

Mr GRAHAM: I do not want to say that the firm was insolvent. As a matter of fact, if I remember the circumstances rightly, the bank had practically all the assets of that company as security for advances made.

Mr. CALDWELL: I would like to quote from the discussion which took place on this matter on May 27 last year, when the estimates of the then Minister of Marine were being considered. In reply to a question from Mr. Fripp, of Ottawa, Mr. Ballantyne said:

> We did make careful inquiries with regard to the standing of the New Brunswick Rolling Mills, and the information was that the financial standing was good.

Then, in another place, Mr. Ballantyne said:

> I do not see any reason at all for letting this firm out. They knew what they were doing when they tendered for the Niobe and the submarines. We have $20,000 of their money, and we have the Niobe. The firm is financially good and it is the intention of the government to see that they pay for the Niobe and the submarines according to the contract price, $135,000.

If that firm were good financially they should not have been allowed to back out of this contract; if they were not I would feel like censuring the former Minister of Marine for awarding a contract to them at all. The former Minister of Marine further stated that he had received an offer last year from an Ottawa firm of $100,000 in cash, for the Niobe alone without the submarines. At least an offer of $88,000 was made but it was not accepted, and the tender was then increased to $100,500. Another firm offered $135,000 for the Niobe and the submarines, but could only pay $20,000 down and were willing to pay $10,000 a month, if I remember aright. Now, if this firm's financial standing was good they should have been compelled to stand by their agreement. If their financial position was not good, their tender should never have been accepted. How long is is since the Niobe and the submarines were bought in the first place.

Mr. GRAHAM: The Niobe was bought in 1910 and the submarines in 1914. The Rolling Mills paid only $25,000; the three ships were purchased by them for $135,000. We got back only the Niobe. I may say that the government entered suit through the Minister of Justice and the company made application for release of the judgment. The Finance Department sent down a man to investigate conditions and he made a report to the Minister of Justice. On the advice of the Justice Department we got all we could, $5,000, and they paid the costs and we got the Niobe back.

Mr. CALDWELL: The minister says he got $5,000. Was the $20,000 that the New Brunswick Rolling Mills put up as a deposit returned? Did the Government hold that and get $5,000 more?

Mr GRAHAM: As I said this afternoon we got $66,000; the sum of $41,000 for the Niobe, and $20,000 from the New Brunswick Rolling Mills first. That made $61,000 and there was also the $5,000 referred to, making $66,000 received altogether.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Did the Government ever issue an execution on the judgment taken out by the previous administration?

Mr. GRAHAM: I think not. We were advised not to do it because there was nothing to base an execution on.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The usual way to find out is by return of the sheriff's writ. What ground had the Government for compromising the judgment obtained for the full amount? Why did the Government not issue a writ of execution and endeavour to collect the money?

Mr. GRAHAM: The situation was that the Government was trying to get all the money it could, and having received the report that it could get nothing on execution, as the bank had all the assets of the New Brunswick Rolling Mills, after full investigation the Government accepted $5,000. Then the Rolling Mills paid the costs and the Government took back the steamer.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The bank might have all the assets assigned to it by way of security, but that would not say that the company was bankrupt by any means. Why did not the Government get out a writ of execution?

Mr. GRAHAM: I am not posted on the legal niceties of the matter. Those proceedings would have added more costs without obtaining any results for the Government. An officer was sent down to report to the Government as to what it would likely get if it issued an execution. The report was that the Government would get nothing, if I remember rightly.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Would it not have been a lot cheaper to have had the sheriff make a seizure than to send an officer from Ottawa? A private individual acting in this way certainly would not be acting in his own capacity. The Government did not exhaust its remedies to collect that money.

Mr. GRAHAM: Would the position not have been this, that if we had gone on with that method of procedure we would not have got the $5,000?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Maybe you would have got a lot more.

Mr. GRAHAM: Not so far as the Justice Department ascertained, and it strikes me we would not have got the Niobe back.

Mr. CALDWELL: Did they get delivery of the Niobe? The late minister told us they did not deliver the Niobe at all—that they would not give delivery till the purchasers made payment. Can the minister tell me on what date judgment was secured?

Mr. GRAHAM: June last, I think.

Mr. MEIGHEN: No, much later.

Mr. GRAHAM: Perhaps it was. The deputy informs me it was last summer, he thought last June.

Mr. CALDWELL: I know the late Minister of Marine on the 7th May last told us it was in the hands of the Justice Department, and he expected action to be taken at once. After the judgment was secured last May or June, why was it allowed to run all summer? The right hon. leader of the Opposition (Mr. Meighen) criticised the present minister for not issuing a writ. It was in their hands until last December. I think there has been some easy work somewhere. I do not know where to lay the blame, and I am not particular where it lies.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I think the hon. gentleman is very particular.

Mr. CALDWELL: Indeed, I am not.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes, he is very anxious to have it lie to his right, and not across the floor. When his line of thought hurts any one opposite he changes his tune right off. I have never been able to understand the geography of the hon. member. I cannot see why he does not sit with these gentlemen opposite. He would feel much more at home.

Mr. GRAHAM: We would like to have him.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The writ was issued some time in the summer, I cannot recall the date, nor can I recall the date when judgment was rendered. I think judgment was taken out pretty late in the fall. At all events these parties were endeavouring all the time to get some settlement, and did their best to get a settlement, but we did not make a settlement. We resisted. However, when the new Government came in they had no trouble in getting a settlement. They did not even issue execution although the judgment was in their favour. An officer of the Finance Department went down there, came back and said the company had made an assignment of its assets, and I suppose the present Government, feeling they would score on the late government more by sacrificing the Niobe, pursued their own course. The sale of the Niobe by auction was about the best method to get the least money they could get. If they had advertised for tenders, as the late government did, and if, in their opinion the offers were not high enough and they had tried again, they would have secured higher bids for this vessel. We would have sold it for a smaller sum if we had taken the first offers by tender, but we went back and got larger offers. The reason we accepted this offer was because it was the largest, and we thought that, with $20,000 down, we were safe. If we had sold to a lower tenderer, even though it was all cash, we would have been criticised and told that we should have had $135,000 out of it. It was in the exercise of the government's best judgment to get the largest amount possible and we took that course. To say that the government could not get the Niobe back—well, perhaps, the minister did not know, but the Justice Department would know, that, even though the Niobe were delivered, which I understand it was not, the subject matter of the sale can always be taken in execution. I am not satisfied by any means. I would like to have the report that this financial officer read to the House so that we could see how far he went into the assets of that company. We would like to know just what his report was, to support the statement that the Government were not in the position to realize the sum they desired.

Mr. LAPOINTE: The leader of the Opposition is an artist. He is trying to lay the blame on this Government for a bad transaction of the late government. That government sold that ship for an amount which seemed rather large, $135,000, and, I think, they only got $20,000 out of the transaction, and accepted promissory notes for the balance. The judgment was delivered later, on the promissory notes. Did the minister collect the notes? He allowed the company to become insolvent, and when this Government had to deal with the matter, and to close it up, it sent experts to ascertain what the conditions were, and they reported that the best way out of it was to take back the Niobe, keep the $20,000 the late government had received, to get another $5,000, and to try to make the best of the Niobe afterwards. This Government considered the matter very very seriously and thought that was the best way out of it. That company was far from being a friend of the present government. We thought it was the best way to get out of a bad situation created by the late government.

Mr. MEIGHEN: How would it be for the hon. member to answer my question after he has told us what we all knew?

Mr. LAPOINTE: Nobody asked me a question.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I asked the minister a question and the hon. member undertook to do the answering, but he did not answer.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Not at all. I undertook to place the blame where it belonged.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): It looks to me as though neither side was in a position to criticise the other. I think the late administration made a fair deal in a mighty bad proposition, but the present government made a mighty poor deal with a good concern. I would like to know why the loss of $8,000 or $9,000 was necessary. The present government has sold the ship for a very much reduced sum, which means a loss of $8,000 or $9,000 over the first contract price.

Mr. GRAHAM: The first contract was made at a time when scrap was very much more valuable than at the present time. I think I am safe in saying that the scrap value of the ship would not be over 50 per cent, at the time we were compelled to dispose of it, of the value at the time of the first contract. The value is getting less all the time.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Were tenders asked for?

Mr. GRAHAM: Oh, surely. I was going to correct the impression I left on the mind of the right hon. leader of the Opposition (Mr. Meighen) when he suggested that I should advertise for tenders. We did advertise and sold to the highest bidder.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The hon. member in his first statement said it was sold by auction.

Mr. GRAHAM: I meant to say by tender. It was advertised and sold by tender.

Mr. MEIGHEN: How many tenders were received and what were the amounts?

Mr. GRAHAM: There were three tenders received as follows:

John Simon..	$ 7,000
J. Lipsitz & Co., Chelsea, Mass...	16,600
H. H. Hinteris & Sons, Philadelphia, Pa.. ..	40,175

We sold for the latter amount, which, under the circumstance, and considering the value of the ship as scrap, I consider a good price.

Mr. CALDWELL: Notwithstanding the sting which the right hon. leader of the Opposition manages to get into every little fling, I want to give the late Minister of Marine credit for not having accepted the first tenders that were sent in last year. He got one for $20,000, another for $80,000, and another for $88,000. He did not accept any. He called for tenders again. He got one tender for $80,000 and another for $88,000. He did not accept them. I think the minister was well advised in not accepting the first tenders. It looked like a cheap price for a vessel that cost over a million. He called for tenders and the party who had tendered for $88,000 put in a tender for $100,500.

Mr. GRAHAM: That was for the three boats, I think.

Mr. CALDWELL: But the point I am making is that these people kept tendering higher and higher when these tenders were not accepted. A. Garson & Co., St. John, offered $110,000 and the New Brunswick Rolling Mills offered $135,000, which they did not get. If our marine vessels are going to run down in value at this rate, it does not look encouraging for this Parliament to vote money to provide ships for anything more than is absolutely necessary at the present time. I want to commend the minister for not putting into commission all the ships which he had. I think the hon. member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie) spoke this afternoon in regard to how fast vessels deteriorate in value when they are not in use.

Mr. DUFF: That was the whole trouble with the Niobe.

Mr. CALDWELL: I do not know whether those vessels were in use all the time, but it looks like very fast deterioration in value for a vessel to come down from $1,000,000 to $41,000.

Mr. GRAHAM: On one occasion they were bought as ships to be used in commission. In this case they were sold merely for the value that could be got out of them as scrap. They are not being used in commission at all.

Mr. CALDWELL: Was the Niobe a new vessel in 1910?

Mr. GRAHAM: No. She was an old vessel in 1910. She was purchased by the then government for a training ship.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): It strikes me that the reason why the Niobe was tied up was that she met with an accident on the shores of Nova Scotia.

Mr. GRAHAM: I understand she was repaired after that accident, and was in commission afterwards.

Mr. BOYS: I understand that the settlement was made on the report of an officer of either the Justice Department or the Finance Department. Surely, it would be proper for us to have that report before this estimate is passed. Is there any reason why we should not have it?

Mr. GRAHAM: That is a matter altogether with the Justice Department. That was a question that was handed to the Justice Department before this Government came into office, and on the advice of that department after it had all the information, we made the settlement.

Mr. BOYS: That would not be a reason for withholding this information from the committee. An officer was sent down to see whether or not this judgment could be realized. The ordinary course would have been to have awaited the issue of an execution by the sheriff, and that may have been done; but I understand the settlement was made on the advice of an officer of the Justice Department. We ought to have a report from that officer, whether he was from the Justice Department or this department.

Mr. GRAHAM: I do not see what advantage is to be gained by bringing down that report, because the matter has been settled and we have the money. I have given every detail; in fact my hon. friend (Mr. Lapointe) has given more details than I have. Acting in the capacity of minister in charge, I advised the Justice Department that we were satisfied, and I thought that was the best settlement that could be made. I submit that it was a good settlement, considering the price of scrap at that time. Had the settlement been delayed for five or six weeks or two months, we would not have secured as good a price, as scrap was going down rapidly in value. The hon. member will remember that nations the world over are busy scrapping ships, and the price will soon be at rock bottom.

Mr. BOYS: The settlement was made on information which the minister received from somebody, and surely it is reasonable for us to have the report before dealing with the matter.

Mr. GRAHAM: The ship has been sold. Of course, if my hon. friend takes the ground that he would not care to decide as regards our naval policy until he finds out what that report says, he has a perfect right to take that attitude; but the Niobe was sold, and the money is in the hands of the Receiver General. The Minister of Justice (Sir Lomer Gouin) is here, and I will ask him to send over to his department if he has that report handy, but it seems to me it has a very remote connection with the question before the committee.

Mr. BOYS: I got the information from the minister himself, and if it has no connection, I do not know why it was given. I am not seeking to criticize; I am only endeavouring to find out the reason for the minister doing what he did.

Mr. BROWN: It seems to me generally agreed that this matter of naval expenditure in Canada is one of the most important subjects to which we give attention; and since there seems to be a disposition in some quarters to believe that those who sit in this corner of the House are necessarily opposed to all naval and military expenditures, I should like to state briefly my views on this subject in general. First, I would wish most emphatically to dissociate myself from any policy that might follow from sentiments expressed by the hon. member for Centre Winnipeg (Mr. Woodsworth). While we all look forward to the coming of the time when men's swords will be beaten into ploughshares, yet at the present time we must come down to solid facts, and just as long as we need policemen on our streets, I am afraid human nature will be such that we shall require some military and naval defence. As soon, of course, as we are able to get rid of policemen on our streets, we shall probably get rid of all military and naval expenditure. This question has concerned the people of Canada for a number of years, and I have no hesitation in saying that the views that I have held in the past have been to the effect that Canada should assume her fair share of the responsibility that ought to rest upon her as one of the nations of the world.

The time was when we considered this from the standpoint of our duty to the Empire. We may not consider it from that standpoint to-day; but I should like to consider it from the standpoint of what part Canada, as one of the community of civilized nations, should bear in assuming the burdens of the world. The position in which we stand to-day is that our real status is not, perhaps, very clearly defined, and until such time comes I think we might very well adopt what might be termed a "marking-time" policy. The present is not a time certainly to enter upon any agressive military or naval policy. The present condition of affairs in regard to naval expenditures generally is such that no person knows what an up-to-date battleship is. No person, in view of the advances that have been made in aircraft and in other directions, knows just what service the most modern battleship can render or how long it will remain modern. Therefore, it seems to me that, in view of the present financial position of the country and other conditions, we might very well adopt what might be properly spoken of, although the Government has not named it such, as a "marking-time" policy.

There are, in the proposition of the Government certain things that have made some appeal to me. I do not propose to express any opinion on the technicalities of naval affairs; like many other hon. gentlemen, I know absolutely nothing about them. I accept the general proposition, however, that we have had navies in the past, and probably for some time we shall have navies; but just what navy we shall require, or what Canada's share of this world's responsibility is, we are not in a position at the present time to determine. Whatever the future may lay upon us, for my part, I would prefer that we, as a self-respecting people, should be willing to bear our fair share of what we might speak of, if we like, as the white man's burden.

One thing is the suggestion of the minister made some appeal to me, although I am not in a position to criticize the merits or demerits of one policy or another, and that was the establishment of a volunteer reserve. That is a policy that was advocated for many years by that good old newspaper, the Montreal Witness, a paper that, I think, perhaps, has done more to mould my thinking along public and economic lines than anything else in this Dominion. The suggestion was made again and again that we might pursue a naval policy that would secure the establishment of a naval reserve along the coasts of the Maritime provinces. Now, some criticisms are made in this regard that have no point at all. It is argued, for instance, that a few weeks' training given to men from the country must necessarily be entirely inadequate. Well, I agree that it would undoubtedly be inadequate if given to men from the prairies or from the constituency of my hon. friend from South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie), which also happens to be the county in which I myself was born. But the matter has been very well placed before the committee by the member for Lunenburg (Mr. Duff); and while I cannot agree with all that that hon. gentlemen says in the House, yet I think he did emphasize a good point, that there were thousands of men in his own constituency—

Mr. DUFF: At least ten thousand.

Mr. BROWN: —who were already initiated in the elements of sea-faring life. I readily understand that while a short term of training would be absolutely wasted upon men from the interior of the country who do not know the first thing about the elements of sea life, men who have been accustomed all their lives to the sea and are already welll instructed in the rudiments of a seaman's education, would quickly respond to a few weeks' training in the technicalities. So that while I would not undertake to pronounce an opinion as to the merits of one policy or another, or as regards the technicalities of the subject, and while I would not offer any view on the question as to whether a certain amount of good could be achieved by the expenditure of a certain amount of money, at the same time it does seem to me that this particular feature of the policy enunciated by the minister (Mr. Graham) might very well commend itself to us. And in view of all the considerations, among the most important of which is our present financial situation, in view of the fact that we are already oppressively burdened and that the men who passed through the late war have a tremendous claim upon us which we can hardly meet, this is an opportune time to pursue what I have referred to as a marking time policy, provided we are heading in the right direction; and for the present, having regard to the unsettled condition of naval matters in general, I think we might well adopt some such policy as has been recommended to us by the Government. For my part I have no hesitation in supporting the policy that has been submitted to Parliament.

Mr. MEIGHEN: While I cannot express surprise at the conclusion of the hon. member, I must make some comment on the reasoning by which he arrives at it. He states that this is an opportune time to adopt a marking time policy. He has well described the policy he purposes supporting. The reasons he gives are these: First of all, our status within the empire is not clearly defined as yet; consequently mark time in the matter of assistance in naval defence. Secondly, we do not know how long it will be before a modern battleship is obsolete; that is to say, how long it will be of actual service; consequently mark time in naval defence. Thirdly, we have a heavy burden, and therefore so long as we are marking time in the right direction he is satisfied to do very little. Now, let us examine the last first. Surely it occurred to the hon. member that we are walking in exactly the opposite direction to the one he assumes we are pursuing. We are not walking forward at all; we are going backwards. If there was anything to be complained of in what we have been doing, it has been that we have not been doing our share; our contribution has been much below our share. There were special reasons for that, none like those my hon. friend advances, but reasons of a very practical character. We did not know whether or not there would be armaments to any extent at all necessary. Now we are informed on that point, and we are going in precisely the opposite direction to what the hon. member says we ought to go. Consequently he will vote for such a policy. But he states that we are hard pressed for money, and because we are we must not undertake now to bear our fair share of the white man's burden. Well, are not the rest of the white men pretty hard pressed for money, and have they not their burdens to bear? Every thousand dollars we throw off we simply throw on to someone else.

An hon. MEMBER: No.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Is not that so? Any hon. member who denies that statement becomes sponsor for the theory that the British Empire, in undertaking to maintain an equality with every other power, has assumed more than she ought to. Unless he is prepared to back that up there is no logic in his position whatsoever. So much for the last reason. What is the first? It is this: We do not know our exact status. I have not the least doubt as to my hon. friend's sincerity in advancing that position, but let me tell him this. I think our status is just as clear as it ever was or is ever likely to be. The status of a nation within the empire, yea, the status of a nation in the world, is a matter of evolution, a matter of growth; and the more you attempt to fix it within the terms of a definition, the more harm you do the status. Our status to-day is on a solid footing; it has been established by our history, by our record, by our achievements. Men establish their status in the world in that way, and so do nations. There is no dispute about our status; no contention of ours as regards the rights of Canada is met with a negative by the British government or the British people. There is no controversy whatever as regards the relations between us and the empire as a whole, and consequently we cannot advance any argument in that direction, and that excuse for marking time is gone. Indeed, it never existed.

Now, the hon. member's second reason is this: We do not know how long a battleship is going to remain modern. I admit that, and I ask the hon. member if he expects that we ever shall. Does he think that twenty years from now the most advanced type of battleship will be any more certain of remaining in the first class than any other ship? If Britain accepted the theory of my hon. friend and acted upon it, then she would cease to have any muscle at all on the sea, and Britain's representatives in the conferences of the world might just as well be the representatives of Uraguay or of some island in the Pacific. The words of the Prime Minister of Great Britain are as true as human lips ever uttered. His voice in world's conferences and among the powers of the world counts for as much as the muscle behind it as represented in the British navy. We may deplore that fact, we may weep over it, we may lament it; but it is true, and those words would be supported, endorsed, affirmed by every prime minister, I venture to say, of any power in the world to-day. So I repeat that if Britain followed the theory suggested by the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Brown) there would be no arm of defence at all. And are we or are we not interested in the arm of defence of the Empire? If we are not, very well; let us stand out on our own feet. That is the logical manly thing to do for those who hold these premises. I do not hold them; I say we are interested; we are interested because of the traditions of this country, because of the sentiments and the feelings of the people of this country; we are interested as well because of the tremendous economic advantage it is to this country to join the rest of the empire in matters of defence, thereby lowering the burden on each. That is the plan we are following. But that plan will fail, and collapse sooner or later—probably sooner —if other parts of the empire pursue the course which we, under the leadership of this Government, now propose to take.

Before I conclude I wish to deal with one other point which the minister (Mr. Graham) mentioned shortly before six o'clock. I was asking that he read to the House some expert authority, preferably in his own department, if he has it, but an expert authority within the empire, to the effect that he is actually going to get practical results by training men the way he proposes. He read some memorandum, but he did not give us the author of it. That memorandum did not go to the extent that the hon. minister seems to think. True, it did speak in favour of a volunteer naval reserve. That is all right; we have always stood for a volunteer naval reserve. I think it is section 19 of our Naval Service Act that provides for such a reserve. But I assert that no country has ever attempted to produce a volunteer naval reserve or any other kind of reserve by this process. It is the process of education and development that I complain of. I understand that something of the kind, not like the hon. minister says, but bearing a faint resemblance to it, was attempted by Newfoundland. I venture to say, however, that the United States do not produce their naval reserve by training men a few hours a day for two or three weeks in trawlers, or by putting them on trawlers to patrol pelagic waters; you cannot produce a naval reserve in that way. I am quite prepared to admit that boys, such as those described by the hon. member for Lunenburg (Mr. Duff) and the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Brown) will learn more readily and probably more perfectly the ways of the sea and the technique of naval training than will inland boys, but to say that they are getting anything whatever of the technique that comes from the five or seven years special concentrated training that men must have to be of any value at all on a naval ship under war conditions is, I venture to suggest, to contradict the plain dictates of commonsense. It could not be done, no matter how assiduously the minister might address himself to the task. Experience shows that it cannot be done.

Mr. GRAHAM: I never said it could be done.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Then when he is through, what has he got in the event of trouble? He has good material, we will assume that the men must have the technical training to be of any value at all on active service. These men will have merely the atmosphere of naval life, but they will not have the requisite technical training. How are you going to give them that training? After all, that is what naval service is for. You could do that to a very useful extent under the modest expenditure that was made before. That is to say, to the extent that you get the boys in, to that extent you make them really valuable in the event of trouble as trained naval men; but the course proposed by the minister does not get him anywhere, the only result is to get rid of the money, and I do not think it is good policy to be prepared to spend money so long as we are quite certain that in our expenditure we do not contribute anything effective to naval defence at all.

Mr. GRAHAM: My right hon. friend does not mean, of course, to misconstrue what I said, but I confess that I do not see how he could misunderstand it. It was pointed out in the memorandum I read that Great Britain had thousands of what have been referred to in the course of this debate as "amateur sailors," men engaged on trawlers doing work which I described, such as mine-sweeping and mine-laying, work which is absolutely necessary. During the war these men made a name for themselves that will never be forgotten. They did not need the intensive training as sailors that the ordinary naval seaman needs; they are engaged in coast and harbour protection. The officer who gave me that memorandum described what their duties were, and he pointed out that such argument as that used by my right hon. friend now was beclouding the issue, mixing up the work of what might be called a naval reserve force consisting of trained seamen with the work of these other men.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Will the minister permit me two questions? Will he say that Great Britain trained those men to be useful in that way by the process he advocates here, that is, by two or three weeks' training annually, partly on land and partly afloat? And will he say that those men, except in co-operation with the rest of the navy, would be of any value at all under war conditions?

Mr. GRAHAM: They would be absolutely of value unless my technical officers are all wrong. So far as my information goes, thousands of these so-called "amateur sailors" performed the duties to which I alluded, and they were seamen only by partial training.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Not like this training.

Mr. GRAHAM: But my hon. friend does not know.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Will the minister say it is?

[Mr. Meighen.]

Mr. GRAHAM: My right hon. friend asked me this afternoon to give him the opinion of a technical man on that point—

Mr. MEIGHEN: And the minister did not get it.

Mr. GRAHAM: —and I gave it to him. It was the opinion of the head of our Canadian Naval Service, Captain Hose.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Will the minister himself say that Britain's method of training was what the minister now proposes for these very men, or comparable to it in any way? The memorandum did not say so.

Mr. GRAHAM: The memorandum was given by the head of the Canadian Naval Service, who received his training in the British navy. He did not get his suggestions from imagination; he must have got them from his experience and knowledge. He pointed out in his memorandum that the use of these men must be recognized, as Great Britain used thousands of them during the war, and I think she still has five thousand of them in service at the present time. I will read the memorandum again so the House will be seized with what he says concerning the whole scheme.

Mr. EVANS: I feel it a duty at this time to enunciate my views as I think the question of naval defence is perhaps one of the most difficult to decide as well as one of the most important that has yet come before this Parliament.

During our childhood as a nation we have been guarded by the Great Mother and have felt safe in that guardianship. We are looking now to attaining, and indeed we have attained, to all intents and purposes, the status of nationhood. But even now we must not entertain the idea that the problems of empire are any the less for us in view of the condition of world affairs to-day. We have to take our place now as one of the grown up members of a great family of nations, and it does not matter who owns the ships, or who from now on commands the naval forces, we are part of that great empire and its defence will still be conducted over the Seven Seas. Although it is our first duty to guard our own shores, and that is the share of empire defence that is assigned to us, even that is necessarily an empire duty. We shall still shelter in the guardianship and strength of the great Empire to which we belong, and I hope we shall go on belonging to it. The defence of the Empire will still have to be maintained, and it is for us now to decide whether we want the status of nationhood by accepting our share of that defence on the Seven Seas.

We shelter under and share in the strength of the Empire to which we belong, and we must do our part to maintain that strength. It is a national duty, it is a duty we owe to the Empire, it is a duty we owe to civilization. It is true that Britain has agreed to considerable disarmament in response to the proposals from Washington. She has lowered, too, her two-power standard, thereby relieving herself of the boasted position of mistress of the seas. Even at that the burden is great, and she fairly claims our aid. Indeed, Sir, I am afraid that a great portion of our people, living as they do, so far from the sea, have but a small consciousness of the interests of empire to-day, and are quite willing to join in the cry of "No navy." If it ever comes to pass that the strength of the Empie is weakened in proportion to the strength of other nations, we shall be unprepared, not only in time of emergency, but even in the days of peace; and we shall be made to feel the effects of that condition in one hundred and one ways of which we can now form no conception. Particularly is this true in view of the fact that we have become a world-trading nation. If there has been one outstanding feature of the British Empire for the last hundred years, it is that her subjects have been safe in any part of the world; she has been willing to spend millions of dollars to rescue even the most insignfiicant of her subjects from any danger in which they happened to find themselves.

In a recent issue of the London Times I saw the report of a statement made by Lord Lee of Fareham, now First Lord of the Admiralty, I believe—who, by the way, is very heartily in sympathy with the Washington arrangement—in which he expressed rather forcibly the disappointment of the Mother Country in the fact that while demanding full equality of nationhood, the sister nations of the Empire have left the burden to be borne by the Mother Country at a time when she most needs help. I take it that this is an appeal, this is a challenge to Canada at this time; and what is our answer to it? There is no doubt that everyone in this House is in accord with the Washington policy of reducing armaments, but the fact remains that the Empire of which we are a part, and of which we shall remain a part, needs defence. Do we, as a nation, consider that defence a part of our duty? We see that Australia is maintaining her navy. I believe if we were in Australia's place, and not alongside the United States of America—whom Miss Canada has come to look upon as a great big, protecting brother—we would realize our inconsistency, and take part in the defence of the Empire on a scale consistent with the size and dignity of Canada as a nation.

I believe the amount to which it is proposed to cut down this estimate is so small as to render the whole thing a waste. We should, at least, maintain a nucleus around which effective training on a larger scale may be carried on whenever we see fit. We must go on, I think, along safe lines of policy, even though something has been accomplished by the various conferences which have been held throughout the world. We do not want to make Canada a military nation, but she has an obligation to fulfil. I believe that we might well cut some millins off other estimates rather than be too scant on this one.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: This question is of such vital importance, not only to this country but to the world in general, that I would not like the item to pass without expressing my views in regard to it, particularly in view of some of the arguments advanced by supporters of the policy of the Government before the committee rose at six o'clock.

National defence is a problem with which every country has been confronted throughout all the ages, and it is one which will engage the attention of people as long as the world lasts—as long, at any rate, as human nature is what it is. Much as I would like to see the world reach that stage where all disputes should be settled by more conciliatory methods than have been adopted in the past, I hardly think we can hope for very much in that direction at present. In spite of the terrible ordeal through which the world has just passed, we find that to-day conditions are probably more unsettled than they were prior to the outbreak of that terrible conflict which began in August, 1914. That being the case, can we afford to take chances on any policy which might not provide for our proper defence in case of another emergency arising? It is true that years might pass, and quite a number of them, without any occasion arising under which we would have to employ those methods of defence which nations considered it wise to adopt.

I cannot recall that during the last general election the policy of the present Government with respect to naval matters was dealt with before the electors. I cannot recall a single instance, in the province of Ontario, at least, nor have I seen any reported, in which the Prime Minister enunciated the policy now being advocated by the Government. I would ask hon. members whether it is fair, whether it is right, that we should change the policy that we have been endeavouring to carry on, without informing the people of what we intended to do? Hon. gentlemen opposite claim to be a very democratic party, particularly during the last few years, and have been asserting that the autocratic party was the one which was in power when they were in opposition. The hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Macdonald) before the committee rose at six o'clock, was proclaiming in a very loud voice that the policy of the Liberal Party prior to 1914 was the policy which would now continue. All the different branches of national defence are now to be merged under one head—the militia, naval service, and air force.

I was much impressed by the question which was asked by one of my hon. friends to my left this afternoon with regard to the students who were taking courses in the naval colleges, and what was to become of them when you close the naval colleges? These young men are being trained to be of service in the defence of our country should necessity arise. One hon. gentleman made a comparison of the cost of an education in ordinary civil life and the cost of educating these naval students, and asked why the country should be put to the expense of training these young men in methods of skill in naval defence. But the comparison is not a fair one. These young lads intend to devote their lives to the service of their country; the other young men referred to are being trained for an entirely different purpose. It is quite true that in the event of trouble large numbers of civilians might volunteer for naval service. But has it not been proven conclusively that the efficiency of the Canadian forces during the late war was owing to the fact that we had trained men to take command, that we had quite a large number of officers who were thoroughly competent, by reason of the training which they had received, to lead and to train other men for service.

The hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Maclean) spoke in rather a doubtful tone this afteroon as to whether the policy which the Government is now advocating was the correct one or not. I am not surprised that he should do so, if he remembers the speech which he delivered in the House just prior to the outbreak of war in 1914. I wondered whether the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Macdonald) had forgotten the speeches which were delivered during the debate at that time. As late as June, 1914, taunts and sneers were being thrown across the floor of the House at the Prime Minister of that day because of the emergency which he had foreseen. These hon. gentlemen declared the emergency had passed away, that the sky was clear, that everything was lovely, and no occasion existed for making the preparations to which the Prime Minister of that day alluded. Yet the need for those preparations was well established by the information placed before Parliament at that time and the confidential information to which the then leader of the Opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) was given access.

What did the Prime Minister of that day do? Did he retaliate when those jeers were indulged in; did he debate the matter with the opposition of that day, some of whom now confront me in this Chamber? No, he realized that the question was all too serious, that party politics should not be allowed to obtrude in a matter of that kind, and I am going to point out what he did in spite of the disparaging attitude of the opposition. His promptness in acting accounts for the fact that Canada was able to quickly mobilize her men and send a contingent across the seas in a credibly short time.

The then Prime Minister made absolutely no reference to the speeches which were made by the leader of the opposition and his chief lieutenants on that occasion. But he organized a committee empowered to report to him from time to time, a committee composed of the following: The Under Secretary of State for External Affairs, the Governor General's Military Secretary, the Deputy Minister of Militia and Defence, the Deputy Minister of the Naval Service, the Deputy Minister of Justice, the Commissioner of Customs, the Deputy Minister of Marine and Fisheries, the Deputy Postmaster General, the Deputy Minister of Railways; with the Director of Military operations; Major Gordon Hall, the Director of Gunnery, and Lieutenant R. M. Stevens. The work commenced in January, the necessary arrangements were practically completed during July. Every department of the government was instructed to follow one line of action in detail, and the whole was subsequently co-ordinated and incorporated into one scheme, indicating the course to be followed by the government as a whole upon the outbreak of war. The committee's work resulted in the preparation of a war book which was completed only a few weeks before the appalling struggle began. Such was the view of the government at this time, and the methods adopted were such as I have described—methods adopted in spite of the attitude and protests of the hon. gentlemen opposite and my hon. friends from Halifax and Pictou were among the opposition at the time. Now the officials that I have enumerated are responsible heads of branches of the public service of to-day, and they will confirm the statement which I have made as to the methods pursued at that time.

In spite of the attitude of the opposition at that time hon. gentlemen sitting opposite to-day get up and confidently again assert that there is no danger. According to them we can afford to take a naval holiday. The hon. member for Pictou stated the other day; it is time we were having a naval holiday. Well, in view of the report which appears in the press of to-night containing the statement of the Premier of New Zealand I am afraid we are inclined to take a little more of a holiday than our self-respect warrants us in doing. Why, the impossibility of anything happening in 1914 was referred to by numerous speakers at that time. For example I have before me the speech of the hon. member for Halifax and I will quote a few paragraphs from it. Speaking on January 20, the hon. gentleman said:

> There was presented to parliament last session a measure providing for an expenditure of $35,000,000 for the construction of three battleships and the presentation of them to the British Admiralty. This policy was urged upon the ground that Britain's supremacy was imperilled and that a great conflict was imminent between two great European Powers. Tokens and signs we were told were not wanting. There were pealings of thunder and flashes of lightning, premonitions of this terrible naval conflict between two great Naval Powers, and upon this ground we were urged, cajoled and threatened to support this measure of the government, we were told it was purely an emergency policy; that the government had in mind the adoption of a permanent policy which they would shortly present to parliament. Several months have at least elapsed since then. The evidence of the emergency conditions and of the European Armageddon has vanished: Time has vindicated the position which the hon. gentlemen on this side of the House took upon that occasion.

The hon. member for Halifax to-day was a little bit doubtful of the wisdom of the policy which is now advocated by the Minister of Militia and the Government. The Prime Minister the other night in dealing with this question referred to the co-ordination of the three departments concerned and the object which was had in view, and discussed the arguments which had been advanced that it might be the part of wisdom to wait until another Imperial Conference was held before deciding upon any policy with regard to this question. In dealing with the matter he said:

> We are seeking to consolidate the great departments of defence and to bring into one department, under one minister, the naval, the military and the air forces. What is the object? Avowedly, it is for the purpose of economy; avowedly, for the purpose of retrenchment. If we are ever to have retrenchment in military and naval expenditures this is the one moment in which it is possible to bring about something of that character. The government regards that as its first duty, its first obligation. It is sensible of all its larger duties and obligations, but it feels that it will best serve the interests of the British Empire as a whole when it helps to enlist, in the matter of defence, whether on land or sea, the sympathies of all our citizens throughout the Dominion, rather than antagonize their just sentiments by experiments of different kinds which will only tend to increase taxation and render no effective service in the long run.
> He emphasized the value of sympathy.

The Prime Minister was also very emphatic in condemning the dreadnaughts which it was the policy of the government in 1914 to assist in building in order to prepare for the events which later developed. He said:

> The large dreadnaughts were of little or no service and supposing that resolution had carried, what would be the situation as regards those ships to-day? They would have been in British waters throughout the whole period of the war without being of any real service at all, and to-day they would have been among the number of capital ships consigned to the scrap heap.

Let me ask hon. gentlemen opposite where the war was won? Was it not in the North sea by the Royal navy? Was it not the Royal navy which was stationed day and night in the North sea, that policed from that point the waters of the world? Did Colonel Roosevelt not publicly proclaim at Oyster bay, when the United States entered the war that the only reason why war had not been brought to the shores of the United States was that the British navy had been on the alert to prevent it. He paid a tribute to the British navy for what they had done during the war, and, in the face of that, in the face of history which is there for every one to read, was a government ever more justified by events in the methods which they pursued than the government of that day? Would they have been justified in building navy yards at that time to build men-of-war to sent over, years later, after the war had begun? What use would they have been?

The hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Macdonald) referred to what Australia and New Zealand had accomplished. Yes. They entered upon the task of carrying out the arrangement which had been reached at the Imperial Conference, but did Canada do so? The government called for tenders, it is true, in July of 1910. The tenders were opened in the department on the 1st May, 1911. The government did not go out of office until October of that year. Those tenders remained in the office of the Minister of Militia or Naval Service. Not a keel was laid, not a contract was given during the years the hon. gentlemen opposite were in power. That was the manner in which they endeavoured to carry out their part of the Imperial compacts upon that occasion, and those are evidently the methods by which they are prepared to meet any other emergency which may arise, but we cannot afford to take chances on anything of that kind happening. Our self-respect as a people and the fact that the youth of this country expect a better example from those who are older and who are administering public affairs, are things we cannot afford to lose sight of.

But is there a policy at the present time? What is the policy of this Government anyway? They are introducing items in the estimates and cutting them down. Anything in the nature of effecive national defence meets with disapproval at the hands of the Government. Why is this the case? The Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) in a very loud voice, proclaimed the attiude of the hon. members on this side of the House during the election of 1911, where they were appealing to the people.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: How many years ago?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: In 1911. He said:

> But I can remember how he and his friends in the province of Ontario went up and down the back concession declaring that Laurier's creation was a tin pot navy. They told the people that he was a French-Canadian and would do nothing for the Empire; and while they were making these representations in one province, other of the right hon. gentleman's friends were going up and down the province of Quebec saying that Sir Wilfrid Laurier and his party were too imperialistic, and were trying to force Canadians, by conscription, upon warships in order that they might be brought into European and Japanese broils.

This is the charge that the Prime Minister of Canada throws at those of us who were in opposition to him in 1911. As far as the people in the constituencies near where I reside are concerned, I say that no reference was made to such a matter at all. We had been told on previous occasions, by hon. members on our left, that Reciprocity was the issue in that election, and that we did not do our duty by the country when we rejected Reciprocity. The hon. Prime Minister finds it convenient to-day to sneer at the Opposition and states that they were condemning the government of that day because of their tin pot navy, and making base appeals to the passions and prejudices of the people of Ontario. For my part, I resent any such imputations being thrown at me.

The Prime Minister came into my constituency during this last election and brought with him the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Robb), who, I believe, came there to deliver a certain message, in regard to the fairness of the people of Quebec, and how they absolutely refused to discuss any question of that kind. He asked the people there to remind their member, the next time he referred to any such matter, of the absolute fairness of the people of the province of Quebec, and how they avoided any appeals of that kind. I wondered at the time what particular message they came there to deliver, but looking over the report of their meeting I came to the conclusion that this was the message. There is not a man, woman or child in the constituency of South Oxford who has ever heard me make such an appeal in that constituency or elsewhere. The rebuke which the people of South Oxford gave the right hon. Prime Minister and one of his lieutenants was evident on the night of the election. We have however had some by-elections in Quebec recently. There was one election down in Yamaska, when the House was in session a year ago.

Mr. LAPOINTE: And we won.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: I will quote from a Canadian Press despatch in the Ottawa

Journal of May 18, 1921, some of the arguments which were being advanced on that occasion, to show that the naval question has been a real live issue in some constituencies, even if it did not reach western Ontario. Mr. Boucher was the Liberal candidate in that constituency.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: He is a member now.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Yes, this despatch is as follows:

> Mr. Boucher said there was no knowing when war would break out again, and he clung to the argument for the "solid block" in Quebec, urging that if it was necessary in 1917, it was no less necessary now.
> The Farmer candidate, J. Lambert, did not appear for this meeting. Yesterday at St. Bonaventure Mr. Mondou challenged his opponents to declare themselves in tariff matters. Mr. Boucher, on the other hand, claimed that with civil war in Ireland, India on a volcano, Japan and the United States at daggers drawn, France mobilized and the British navy ready for action, war might come at any time and the Liberal party want no change in relations between Canada and England and further do not want any commitments engaging Canada to the expenditure of a cent for military or naval purposes. Mr. Boucher said there had been Liberal traitors who had left Laurier, such for instance as Hon. W. S. Fielding, and like L. J. Gauthier, recently.

These are the arguments which have been advanced. Mr. Boucher who is a member of the House at the present time, was elected in Yamaska constituency and re-elected in the last election. I quote now from the Ottawa Evening Journal a few words in reference to a by-election in Hull in September of 1919—

> Deafening applause greeted Mr. Lucien Cannon when he went to the platform to speak. Like the other speakers, Mr. Cannon practically confined his remarks to praises of Dr. J. E. Fontaine and strong condemnation of the present Government. The member for Dorchester declared that Dr. Fontaine was known for his great devotion to his constituents and his party.
> Must Fight For Rights
> "I have gone into the House to vindicate the rights of the French-Canadians," stated Mr. Cannon. "I do not regret in any way the battles that I have fought and I consider that they are an incentive to greater effort. I am not here to preach revolution, but I do say that we, having come here first, are the masters in this country. We have the right to vindicate the rights our forefathers won, but if you want victory with respect then you must fight with courage and with all your heart. I regret to see that in Ontario there does not exist that bond of fellowship between the Irish and French races that is so desirable."

Further on:

> He spoke at great length of the manner in which Hon. W. L. Mackenzie King had supported Sir Wilfrid Laurier during the dark times, and he was sure that all French-Canadians would give the new Liberal Chieftain the support they tendered to Laurier.

And they did.

An hon. MEMBER: They did.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: They surely did. I have a quotation from the Toronto Globe during the campaign in 1911, and I might as well give the views of the present Prime Minister on that occasion. The Toronto Globe reports the Prime Minister as follows:

> Hon. Mr. King read extracts from Hon. Mr. Borden's speeches in the House of Commons in which the Conservative leader referred to the danger of war with Germany, and urged the Government to go to Britain's aid with a dreadnaught or a cash contribution.
> "Are the people of this country going to place at the head of affairs a man who will be precipitated into such a position as this, who will take from the treasury of this country and who would have taken enough money to build two dreadnaughts and send that money to England so that they could spend it as they pleased? And against what country? He was ready to send money to build warships to fight Germany."

Actually to fight Germany. These are things that are on record and that indicate what the policy of the party which is in power to-day is. There is a solid block from the province of Quebec; they are in the saddle and they are riding hard. There is no question of that. I know the Minister of Militia (Mr. Graham), in his heart, disapproves the policy which he is advocating; he cannot do anything else. The hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Maclean) does not approve this policy. I question whether any but a very small percentage of the people of this country favour any such policy. You are going to destroy absolutely everything that we have that has a tendency to create efficiency in training men for national defence. You are going to spend money, it is true, but for what? For national defence? No, nothing of the kind. You are going to spend a great deal of money to keep friends of the Government employed here, there and elsewhere. That was made quite evident by a letter that was read in this House the other night from the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Lapointe), with regard to the dismissal of the harbourmaster at Quebec. Was ever anything more apparent than that it was the policy of the Government to remove from office those who could not be made partizan servants of the Government? There was no charge against the harbourmaster at Quebec; on the contrary, he had demonstrated that he was an efficient public servant and soldier and he had created reforms there that were a credit to him. For the first time and under his administration there was a substantial surplus in connection with the management of the Quebec harbour.

There is another item in connection with national defence, because the militia, the navy and the air service are all being merged. The air service is, as some one has pointed out, being absolutely destroyed, and the Government are attempting to hire out what will be left of the force to the different provinces as fire rangers. Five million dollars worth of aeroplanes were given to the Government by the British authorities in order to maintain and keep up a small air service; but instead of doing that, the Government, if they can, are now going to hire these young men out as fire rangers to the different provinces, if the provinces wil take them over, and in the event of the provinces not doing so, we do not know what they are going to do. Is not this a magnificent system of self defence that the Government are adopting? In one province they state that they will not countenance the spending of a dollar for militia purposes or for naval defence and they come before this House and ask us to reduce this estimate so the balance will be of no effect; will not be efficient or of national service in the event of trouble arising. The Prime Minister laughs, and he thinks that it is a light matter. Well, it may be a light matter to him, but it was not a light matter to many people in this country when the nation was in danger and they had to make sacrifices on behalf of the nation.

An hon. MEMBER: Everybody made sacrifices.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Yes, everybody made sacrifices. I know some people think they made tremendous sacrifices, they think, because they could not turn out so much stuff at high prices as they would have done, if they had only been able to get more help, that they made great sacrifices in that respect. I am speaking however of the real, actual sacrifice of those who took their part in the battle line; and to the credit of our system of national defence be it said, those who had training in military service or in the navy were not slow to respond when the call of duty came. It will be a dark day for this country, if the occasion arises for the rest of the Empire to look upon the people of Canada as spongers; we cannot consider ourselves anything else if we adopt such a policy as is enunciated by the present Government. If in years gone by we have refused to do anything in the way of national defence, during the war crisis the people of Canada responded nobly, made great sacrifices and fought as bravely and gallantly as it was possible for men to do. But you cannot afford to stop there; you cannot afford to permit those, who refused to recognize Canada's duty to participate in the war and to do what she did on that occasion, to control the affairs of this country under present conditions. I stand here to-night to register my protest against any such policy as that. You may say that conditions in Canada do not justify the Government in making this expenditure. The first call upon the people of any country is that of national defence; the duty of the citizen to the state is the first duty of the citizen. In the time of Chatham, it was a maxim that the navy was the standing army of Britain. Are you going to force the old land to take care of these vigorous young colonies which have grown up to nationhood? Are they still willing to allow the old land to bear the whole burden of defence? Look at the burden which Britain is contending with to-day in the East, yes, and fighting heroically at conferences of Nations to prolong the peace of the world. Until the very last minute the British exerted every ounce of energy which they possessed in an endeavour to prevent the outbreak of war which took place in 1914. It was through no desire on their part that the world was plunged into that war; but it was in spite of every effort which human ingenuity could gring to bear that that war occurred, and that, I am satisfied, will be the policy of Britain in the future. As has been pointed out by the Prime Minister of Great Britain, Britain's power and influence in this world will depend upon the energy and force that she is able to throw into a conflict in the event of its taking place. I am absolutely opposed to a reduction in this item of expenditure, even under present conditions. I think our self respect demands of us that we shall do our duty in the future, even if we did not do it in the years immediately preceding the war.

Mr. AIME BOUCHER (Yamaska) (Translation): It was not my intention, Mr. Chairman, to take any part in this debate, but seeing that my name has been mentioned by the hon. member who has just resumed his seat, with reference to the election which took place, a year ago, in the county of Yamaska, I deem it my duty to give this House some explanation on the subject.

First, let me state that the newspaper extract from which the hon. member has just quoted, contains in parts the words which I used in May of last year, at the meeting held in St. Bonaventure. However, I take exception to that part of the article in which the newspaper accuses me of having said that the hon. Mr. Fielding, at present Minister of Finance, had been a traitor to Sir Wilfrid Laurier. I strongly protest against such language being attributed to me, and I wish to state emphatically that never were such words uttered by me against the hon. Mr. Fielding, in whom we all have—on this side of the House at least—the greatest confidence and for whom we also have the highest esteem. There is another point to which I want to draw the attention of the speaker who has just preceded me in this debate. It is still in reference to this election which took place in the county of Yamaska, and if I remember well, it is a question which was put, in this House, to the hon. Minister of Marine of that day (Mr. Ballantyne), by the present Minister of Marine (Mr. Lapointe), to ascertain if the Conservative party had a candidate in the field, and the hon. Mr. Ballantyne answered that the Government's candidate was my opponent, Mr. Mondou. Now, what was the principal argument which I brought forth in this contest against Mr. Mondou? I made use of the newspaper, "La Presse," which had published an interview given by Mr. Mondou, and in which he declared that the Conservative party by choosing Mr. Meighen to replace Sir Robert Borden, had given itself a tyrant instead of a leader, because in his opinion, Mr. Meighen was an autocratic tyrant, owing to the way he had treated Quebec during the war. However, this did not prevent the right hon. Mr. Meighen acknowledging Mr. Mondou's candidacy in the county of Yamaska.

It is not, Mr. Chairman, by crying down imperialism or censuring the naval policy that I won my election. I won it through the weakness of the candidate who was put up against me, because of his lack of sincerity in supporting Mr. Meighen's policy, the same individual that he had accused, some time previous, of being an autocratic tyrant.

Mr. FORKE: A little while ago we had the pleasure of listening to an hon. gentleman who first saw daylight in our little island far across the sea, and I thought perhaps I might take a few minutes to express my views along a different line. We have heard a good deal to-night about patriotism, and it seems to be generally assumed that those who advocate further armaments and greater expansion in naval affairs are more patriotic than those who urge the opposite course. I have been astonished to listen to some of the arguments advanced to-night. Now, I do not want to take a critical attitude or to suggest that things might be done somewhat better or debated from a different standpoint, but I do protest against having to sit in this House and listen hour after hour to the recapitulation of ancient history with which we were all perfectly familiar before we came here. The right hon. the leader of the Opposition (Mr. Meighen) was rather severe in his criticism of the member for Lisgar (Mr. Brown). I think that if he had paid attention to what that hon. gentleman said he would have realized that the member for Lisgar was not so much concerned with Canada's status as a nation as he was in regard to the question as to what position Canada was going to take in the Empire in reference to naval and military matters. We know there is going to be a conference of the premiers of the various parts of the Empire, who will assemble to discuss this question; and perhaps some mutual arrangement will be arrived at whereby each part of the Empire will know what it is expected to do. That is what the hon. member was referring to when he spoke about our status.

We have heard much about conditions as they exist to-day. I heard one hon. member to my right make the statement that after every war the view was always put forward that never again would war occur in the world. But conditions have never existed before in the same degree as they exist at the present time. Never was war so horrible, nor its ugliness and sinfulness so patent as it is to-day; and those who have studied the question cannot but realize that every nation and individual will look upon the possibility of future wars with feelings of horror and terror. War in the future will not be war in the ordinary sense. Going back over the ages, we see the time when warfare consisted in hand to hand conflict; then armour and machine guns were introduced; and after every war, it is true, men have felt almost convinced that warfare would be improbable in the future. But what is the situation to-day? War has passed from individual bravery on the battlefield and is carried on by the chemist in his laboratory. To-day it is the scientists and mechanics who really wage war, and not the men on the battlefield; and I venture to make the statement that the nations of the civilized world will ponder a very long time before going to war under present scientific conditions. At the close of the last war it was said that an American chemist had invented a poisonous gas that would devastate whole countrysides. What would battleships avail in such a case? I can assure hon. members that the nations will think twice before going to war, and we in this country should carefully weigh matters before spending money to-day on a scheme the benefit of which we cannot foresee.

I want to say a word in regard to the naval reserves. I am not a seafaring man myself, but I was born in a seafaring country and I know a little about the conditions as they exist around the coasts of those wonderful little islands over the sea. I have lived a long time in Canada and am a good Canadian, but, if I may be allowed to say so, I hope the day may never come when I can look across the ocean and not be sensible of a warm spot in my heart for my native land. So that it will be understoood, I trust, that it is not because of any lack of fervent regard for that land that I am not ready to vote for the expenditure of vast sums of money at the present time for the purpose of building up naval armaments. With regard to the naval reserve, let me say that the fishermen in the villages around the coast of England, from Grimsby to Hull, manned the boats and ships that swept the seas around Britain for mines. And this work was done by these men without any long training, because I know that friends of mine in the Old Country were engaged in that work a short time after the mines were laid by the Germans around the British coasts. I am perfectly certain that the naval reserve scheme is a good one, and that the naval reserve can be created from the ranks of the fishermen. I shall not follow the arguments of the leader of the Opposition. If we had been discussing the policy of spending twenty or thirty million dollars on a naval programme, I could understand the length of time that has been devoted to this debate. But we have taken up a day and a half discussing what an hon. member said could be entirely covered by $500,000. Surely there is not such a tremendous difference between the two policies that it takes so much of the time of this House to discuss such a small matter. Had it been $30,000,000 or $40,000,000 that hon. gentlemen on my right were advocating should be expended, then I could have understood the stand they are taking.

A good many slurs—perhaps that is too strong a term—statements are sometimes made that we do not take a wide enough view, that we are not patriotic. I repudiate that statement. I believe every hon. member is patriotic. Perhaps we view things from different standpoints, but I think we ought to treat one another as patriotic gentlemen, no matter what part of the country we come from.

Mr. MEIGHEN: If I rise to say one or two words anent the remarks of the hon. member for Brandon (Mr. Forke) I hope he will not feel that I resent anything he has stated; indeed, I have confidence that he was addressing himself sincerely to the question. I would be the last man in the world to question his patriotism. I do not know whose patriotism has been questioned in this debate. Such taunts are usually flung merely for the sake of the reply. The patriotism of hon. members never is called in question at all. Now, while I am sure the hon. member's heart beats just as true for the Old Land as mine, and that he has just as keen a sense of national obligation as I have, I am afraid that some pre-conceived ideas have warped his judgment at this moment. While I am afraid of that, I express confidentially the hope that the time will come when he will decide that the hour for action, rather than aspiration, is at hand, and that he will be just as ready to do something practical as myself. He says I misconstrued the words of the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Brown).

Mr. FORKE: Misunderstood.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Well, misunderstood. I do not think so; and that is really my only reason for rising. The hon. member for Lisgar expressed the view that the question of our status within the Empire is in doubt. He may have had in mind merely as to our share in defence; however, he did not use those words. I do not think myself that he had reference merely to our share in defence. But suppose he had? The hon. member for Brandon says: "Let us wait until at some Imperial Conference the share of each is agreed on—the share of Canada, the share of Australia, the share of New Zealand, the share of South Africa, the share of Great Britain." I believe the hon. member for Brandon sincerely looks forward to that consummation. Well, let me tell him that if he does he will sit in this House and he will be a resident of this country a good many years before he will ever see it come to pass.

Let me ask hon. members opposite, let me ask those supporting this policy, if they are ready to wait and have the share of this country fixed at any Imperial Conference held this year or any other year. Will any of them say, "yea"? Not one who supports the Government in backing away from our naval obligations will do that—not one. Years before we adopted the principle that we must ourselves determine what our share is, that we cannot be dictated to at a conference. Very well, that must go concommitantly with the honest and practical effort to do our share from year to year. I am pointing out to the hon. member that he will look in vain for an agreement at the Imperial Conference that this country will feel to be binding, or that any hon. gentleman opposite will feel to be binding upon our country.

Mr. CANNON: Will the right hon. gentleman permit me one question?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes, or two.

Mr. CANNON: While the right hon. gentleman had the honour to represent our country in London last summer, did he make any engagement to the Empire on naval defence?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The right hon. gentleman has answered that question at least six times in the course of this debate. The only acknowledgment is that contained in the one resolution, which is as clear as sunlight, and which lays upon the Parliament of Canada the obligation of determining what this country should do in the matter of naval defence. It is wholly a question for Parliament to decide. I quite aprove of that principle. I believe anything else is impossible. But while I approve of that principle, I say it essentially follows that we must here and now determine what we will do, and not be forever preaching that some day in the future there is going to be another Imperial Conference. We have been putting this decision off on the plea of conferences for many years—we put it off twenty years ago on that plea, we put it off thirteen years ago on that plea, and we have kept out of our just obligations all that time. When the war was on we were prevented from carrying out our obligations. Under the late government we were quite prepared to do so. And much that has occurred in this debate would indicate that there is a whole lot to be said, even in ordinary times, in favour of some system based on contribution.

If I felt hon. members were right in saying: You cannot do anything effective in the way of naval defence by spending $1,000,000 more, $2,500,000 more, $6,000,000 more, or even $7,000,000 more,—I would think they could not make a stronger argument in favour of contribution. In fact, that argument is unanswerable, but, for myself, I do not think it is correct. I believe we were doing something of some value before. But now that we know what the whole collection of nations known as the British Empire must do, we know, too, that the measure of help we were giving before was not our fair share; we must do more than that. But let me point out to the hon. member for Brandon that the error is this: Instead of going forward we are going behind, humiliatingly behind, indefensibly behind, we are moving in exactly the wrong direction; and that is why that movement is resisted in this vote. If the Government were making a serious effort to really place Canada in a respectable position before her sister nations, then there would be little cause for opposition in this House; but instead of that the Government is yielding to the demands of those who do not want to do anything practical and effective in the matter of naval defence.

Mr. CRERAR: I wish to ask my right hon. friend one question to elucidate, if possible, a point upon which there has been a good deal of discussion. Is it a fact that at the last Imperial Conference, or at any previous conference, the question of defence was made a joint affair for the Empire or was it not? Is that the position we are in to-day, that we are under an obligation to contribute? True, we fix the measure of the contribution—

Mr. MEIGHEN: And the method.

Mr. CRERAR: —and the method. But is it a fact that we are under an obligation to make a contribution to Empire defence? And to what extent are we under that obligation?

Mr. MEIGHEN: We are not under any contractual obligation at all—no obligation based upon a resolution. The whole obligation to defend ourselves is just the same as the obligation of every nation on earth, and when we are part of the Empire we share in the common obligation. It is an obligation that is incident to our existence, and from which we cannot escape save by loading it on someone else.

Mr. CRERAR: But my right hon. friend is skating around the point.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No, no.

The CHAIRMAN: Order.

Mr. CRERAR: Perhaps I am uncommonly dense this evening, and unable to see the point, but I think a very great deal, Mr. Chairman rests right upon that question. In 1917 it was definitely understood that a constitutional conference would be called after the war to define Canada's status within the Empire. That was the agreement reached in 1917 at the Imperial Conference held that year. Now, as I understand it from my reading of all the literature dealing with the question, our position as far as the defence of the Empire was concerned would not be determined until that constitutional conference was held and we knew what our status within the Empire was. I may be wrong in that, but if that is correct, then I submit that the whole ground upon which my hon. friends to the right are arguing this question is absolutely and entirely wrong. If we take the ground that Canada as a matter of right, in her own defence—as has been argued here—should create the nucleus of a navy, should engage in naval training on the assumption that that navy is absolutely her own and that she may send it to war when she cares to send it and keep it at home when she cares to keep it, then there is a fair ground for argument. But as I understand the discussion that has taken place here to-day—and indeed, before to-day—one of the strongest reasons urged by my hon. friends to my right why this vote should not be reduced is that we are not making our fair share of contribution to Empire defence. Consequently, I think it is a fair question to ask, when was that obligation reached? When was the understanding arrived at that we should make aa contribution to Empire defence? We have not had that elucidated, and I submit that if my hon. friends to my right are to be on sound premises in the argument they are making, they should explain that point.

Now, we come back to the general question. It was not my intention, Mr. Chairman, to take part in this debate, because in my judgment this vote should have been passed two days ago. However, the matter is being discussed, and now that I am on my feet there are one or two observations that I should like to make upon it. I support the reduction made by the Minister of Militia. My regret is that the minister, if I may say so, did not stick to the first programme he laid down, because I think the second programme involves a further expenditure of money which at the present time this country is not in a position to face. My hon. friends argue that we must have a navy, and they have argued also that our militia establishment must be kept up. Against whom must we have a navy? That is a fair question; against whom is Canada to arm?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. CRERAR: Some of my hon. friends say, "Oh, oh." Well, what is the result of the Washington conference? Who has Canada to fear? Are we going to build a navy against the United States?

Mr. MEWBURN: What has the United States got a navy for?

Mr. CRERAR: That is their affair. What I am asking my hon. friends is this: are we to arm against the United States? Are we to arm against Japan? Canada is a party to the treaty which resulted from the Washington conference, a treaty which will be presented to this House for ratification.

Mr. BAXTER: Against whom are they arming?

Mr. CRERAR: They are disarming.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Not half as fast as we are.

Mr. CRERAR: That is all very well; but my right hon. friend knows that a treaty was signed as a result of the Washington conference—we are signatories to it—whereby all the great nations who could possibly be the source of any danger to Canada have by mutual understanding agreed to adopt a peaceful method of settling their disputes. That is one reason why—putting it on the very ground upon which my hon. friends debate the question—we can reduce this expenditure this year. The second reason has been mentioned several times to-day.

Mr. RYCKMAN: After the United States has proportionately disarmed, and after Japan has proportionately disarmed, who is England proportionately arming against?

Mr. CAHILL: India.

Mr. CRERAR: My imagination is not vivid enough to enable me to see the relation of my hon. friend's question to my argument.

I come now to another point. Reference was made to-day, and has been made several times during the course of the discussion, to the financial position of this country. I wish to direct that point to the attention of my hon. friends who are advocating this expenditure. What do we see in the United States to-day? What do we see in Great Britain? In both those countries we see reductions in expenditure and reductions in taxation. My hon. friend the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) is coming down to-morrow to deliver to this House the annual budget. I may be mistaken—I hope I am—but I venture the prediction that the Minister of Finance, if he discharges his duty to Canada, will not take the way of reducing the taxation, but must find additional taxation; there is no way out of it if this country is to meet its obligations. In the face of that situation, therefore, are my hon. friends on good ground in arguing that we must spend a million dollars more on the navy this year?

My right hon. friend the other evening, and some of the other gentlemen to my right, dwelt at great length on the extent to which Canada had sponged on Great Britain in the matter of defence. They cited what Australia was doing, what New Zealand was doing, what Britain was doing. Why, they said, Britain is spending $10 per head on her navy; Australia is spending $6; New Zealand is spending $2.50, and we are only spending 17 cents per head on our navy. Well, how are my hon. friends going to do away with sponging? By having the Canadian people spend another 11 cents per head on the navy.

Mr. MEIGHEN: We did not say that.

Mr. CRERAR: Well, then I do not know what my hon. friend is arguing upon. I presume he contends that this vote should remain as it was last year. I may be mistaken; if I am, I am doing him an injustice. But he has not made his position clear in the House, and if he made his position clear I think I am correct in saying that it would mean another 11 cents per head to be paid by the Canadian people. The thing is absurd. My hon. friend from Lunenburg (Mr. Duff) made the other day what was, to my mind, the most sensible suggestion that has been heard in this debate, namely, that if we are going into the naval business we should go into it in earnest and quit playing with it. I think this country could well take a naval holiday for five years. My hon. friends who are opposing this reduction in the estimates say: "Oh, Canada must make her fair contribution to defence." Has Canada done nothing for the defence of the Empire—placing it even on that basis? What did we do in the war? We sent 500,000 men overseas. Canada did her part in the war toward the defence of empire. But she did more than that, if her contribution rests upon something more than men and ships. We discovered during the late war that food, for instance, was just as vital a thing in the waging of war as were munitions and ships. And what has Canada done in that respect? It is not a fair comparison to put Canada on an even keel with Great Britain in the matter of these expenditures. We have spent hundreds of millions of dollars in the building of railways and in the opening up of new country, and every time we built a mile of railway; every time we opened up new parts of this country and brought additional areas under cultivation; every time we contributed to the material wealth of this country, we were adding to the strength of the Empire. Canada has made her contribution, and a very notable one, in that respect. And I would point out for the information of my hon. friends to my right that the doctrine I am preaching in this respect is not a new doctrine; it was preached by one of the most eminent men of the Conservative party in this country, the late Sir Charles Tupper. In the last decade of the last century, the question was mooted that Canada should make her contribution to the British navy, and Sir Charles Tupper took the ground that Canada should not be expected to do that. He argued that when Canada built her railways across the Dominion, linking up New Zealand and Australia with Great Britain, she was contributing to Empire defence. Alluding to things I have just mentioned, he says:

> These actual facts illustrate, in my opinion, the best mode of contributing to the strength and defence of the Empire. In my judgment, instead of adding to its defence, the strength of a colony would be impaired by taking away the means which it requires for its development and for increasing its defensive power if it were asked for a contribution to the army and navy.

He was alluding there to a contribution, and the same thing would apply to the expenditure of a similar amount of money in the building of ships.

> Any such contribution would be utterly insignificant in its value compared with what is now being accomplished.

Those are not my words, those are the words of Sir Charles Tupper. I submit that is the line along which Canada can make her best contribution to Empire defence.

Mr. RYCKMAN: Will the hon. member permit me a question?

Mr. CRERAR: Certainly.

Mr. RYCKMAN: Does the hon. member think that in the building of the Canadian Pacific railway, Canada has contributed her part to the naval defence of the Empire?

Mr. CRERAR: I am not going to give my hon. friend my opinion. I have given him the opinion of Sir Charles Tupper which was that Canada had done so. If my hon. friend wishes to repudiate that great statesman of the past, that is his affair.

Mr. LAPOINTE: The party has changed since.

Mr. CRERAR: This question, I think, must be considered in the light of what Canada can do at the present time. I have stated time and again—I have said it so often that I am afraid hon. members in this House and people in the country will get tired of hearing the assertion—but I repeat it here, that the most pressing thing before this country to-day is to get its finances in order. The Finance Minister comes down to-morrow possibly with a programme of increased taxation. I do not know, I hope not; but if he does not, I do not know how he is going to make his budget balance this year. But say he comes down with that proposition, what is the problem before this country, and before this House? It is to keep our taxation down. If you run your taxation up in this country in view of the scattered area of the Dominion it becomes a question how long will you hold your people. To my mind that is the most serious question pressing upon us financially, and for that reason I gladly support the reduction suggested by the minister in these naval estimates. Moreover I will tell the committee I would have been prepared to go a great deal further than he has gone.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: I would like to ask the hon. member if he would wait until the enemy was at his gate before preparing to do anything to defend himself?

Mr. SPENCE: In all my life I have never heard such a system of quibbling as that advanced by hon. gentlemen opposite, and some other hon. members, in order to make excuses to get away from assuming our share of responsibility for naval defence. The statement has been made that this is one of the most important subjects which has been taken up this session. I agree with that statement; I say it is just as necessary to maintain the navy at proper strength as it is to support the Canadian National Railways, and we all know how absolutely necessary that is. Because if you have no navy then you have no support for your merchant marine; and if your merchant marine suffers then your National Railways will be prejudicially affected. I am not so familiar with naval affairs as I probably am with matters concerning the militia and therefore I do not propose to go into the discussion of details. But I heartily endorse everything that has been said in favour of the maintenance of the navy, and I do hope the Government will see to it that at least a sum equivalent to the expenditure of last year will be provided to keep our navy in as efficient a condition as possible.

The maintenance of the navy should not be regarded as a political matter. It is absolutely a matter of business and every hon. member here should give his support to the maintenance of an efficient navy. Let there be no suspicion entertained in the outside world that we as Canadians, are not prepared to do our share towards the upkeep of the British navy. We should be British enough—because we are all Brittishers in Canada—to wish to continue to sing "Rule Britannia, Britannia Rule the Waves." This country owes a great deal to Britain and we ought to show, in some tangible way, that we appreciate what the Mother Country has done for us. A number of hon. members opposite have been talking about events of the past. Well, a great many of us here do not want to hear so much about the past; what we are interested in is the future. I hope the Minister of Militia will see to it that a substantial contribution is made towards the maintenance of the navy.

Mr. CHAIRMAN: Shall the resolution carry?

Mr. CANNON: Just before the item is carried I have one or two observations to make. I understand that while I was out of the chamber the hon. member for South Oxford (Mr. Sutherland) made certain references to speeches which I had made in the province of Quebec. I wish to inform the hon. member, and other members of the committee that I do not take back one word of what I said. My stand to-day is exactly the same as it was during the last election, and years before. My opinion is the opinion expressed by the leader of the Liberal party in this House —that this question should be dealt with from a purely Canadian viewpoint and from no other viewpoint at all.

Item agreed to.

MILITIA AND DEFENCE

Dominion Arsenal, Lindsay—for the pay of caretakers and general maintenance, $25,000.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I want to ask the minister if I understood him aright on the last occasion upon which these estimates were up in regard to the arsenal at Lindsay. I understood him to say that he was negotiating for the sale, or other disposal of the property. Has the minister definitely decided on the abandonment of the Lindsay arsenal as a government arsenal in the future.

Mr. GRAHAM: I may say that the department has been approached in the matter but the parties who made the advances were told that if they came prepared to talk in a definite way we would discuss the matter with them. My own view is that there is no definite need for the Lindsay arsenal—that the arsenal in the province of Quebec can provide all the ammunition we need in Canada for our annual training. If that be the case why should we have two arsenals to do the work of one?

Mr. THURSTON: May I ask the minister if he has seriously considered this matter. I understand that the Lindsay arsenal is an up-to-date factory, the most up-to-date and modern factory on this continent. If there is any question of disposing of an arsenal why not dispose of the one at Quebec instead of that at Lindsay?

Mr. GRAHAM: There is one strong reason, and that is that the Lindsay arsenal only manufactures small arms ammunition and the Quebec arsenal manufactures both.

Mr. THURSTON: The hon. minister (Mr. Graham) has not answered my question. I have wondered at times why the Lindsay arsenal, a new building, modernly equipped and more centrally situated than the Quebec arsenal, should be closed down, instead of the Quebec arsenal. The minister states that the arsenal in Lindsay only manufactures small munitions, but I cannot see what other ammunition we need. Why do we need larger ammunition?

Mr. GRAHAM: In military training we use other ammunition, outside of the small arm ammunition, and, although we possibly have a supply on hand now, if we have our annual training, it will not last very long. The munitions are turned over every seven years.

Mr. MEWBURN: It would only mean moving machinery from Quebec to Lindsay.

Mr. THURSTON: Did I understand the minister to say the other evening that he negotiated with some four firms in connection with disposing of the Lindsay arsenal, but at the present time he has nothing definite view?

Mr. GRAHAM: Parties waited on the Government and discussed the question of the disposition of the Lindsay arsenal. Some discussion had taken place between a deputation from Lindsay and myself and afterwards between the Minister of Railways and myself. I thought some use might be made of the building by the Canadian National Railways, but I have been rather discouraged along that line during the last week or two by the Minister of Railways. Another party approached the department, but had nothing definite in view. I suggested that if they had anything definite to discuss to come back.

Mr. THURSTON: Could the minister tell us what the Lindsay arsenal cost?

Mr. GRAHAM: Land $39,943.97, buildings $813,915.94, equipment $909,897, making a total of $1,763,755.

Mr. HARRIS: I did not hear all the answer. The reason why the arsenal at Quebec was kept on and the one at Lindsay closed was not quite clear to me. Another point struck me very forcibly was this: All hon. gentlemen know the geography of this country fairly well, and in case of aggression from outside, I think, they will agree that it is quite possible the arsenal at Quebec could be blown to pieces much more quickly than the one at Lindsay. Although I am not a militarist, never having fired a gun, perhaps, in my life, it seems to me it would be more practicable to retain the arsenal at Lindsay, which is situated far enough inland to enable us to maintain our position against attack much longer than we could in the case of the arsenal at Quebec. With regard to making small arms at Lindsay, I think it is quite possible to make larger arms there if necessary. In my humble opinion, it would be well if both these institutions could be kept running. In case of aggression, we would be in a much better position with this arsenal at Lindsay than with simply one at Quebec. Has this matter been taken into consideration? I would like to get the views of the minister with regard to the possibility of something happening the arsenal at Quebec, in case of aggression, and as to the position we would be in if the arsenal at Lindsay were closed.

Mr. GRAHAM: Of course there is a possibility that the arsenal at either place might be destroyed. At the present time I do not see any danger of the Quebec arsenal being destroyed by any foe. In the second place, I might say that the Quebec arsenal is an old established arsenal, employs over a hundred men more than the number employed, even for the short time, at Lindsay. Its machinery is up to date, as is the Lindsay machinery. As I stated before, it is equipped for manufacturing 18 pound explosives, while the Lindsay only manufactures small arm munitions.

Mr. THURSTON: The question was asked the other evening as to what amount of munitions has been shipped out of the Lindsay arsenal. Could the minister give us that information?

Mr. GRAHAM: No munitions from the Lindsay arsenal went overseas. There were used in training approximately 3,000,000 rounds. That would be the annual training.

Mr. GUTHRIE: How much has been manufactured a Lindsay since the factory was opened? Was it 3,000,000 rounds only?

Mr. GRAHAM: No, there was more than that manufactured. The local munitions manufactured at Lindsay since the arsenal was opened were:

Cartridges S. A. bore 303, mark VII= 34,997,293.
Small arm rounds for American Government 896,925.

Mr. HARRIS: Is it the policy of the Government to dispose of the arsenal at Lindsay?

[Mr. Harris.]

Mr. GRAHAM: The policy as to the disposal of the arsenal at Lindsay would be that, if conditions did not change very materially and very rapidly, the Government would be prepared to dispose of that arsenal, if it got a proper price for it, or to lease it for a term of years.

Mr. FORKE: We voted $243,000 last year. Could the minister tell us how many rounds were manufactured in the arsenal last year?

Mr. GRAHAM: About 3,000,000 rounds.

Mr. GUTHRIE: And how much money was spent?

Mr. GRAHAM: Spent, $174,000.

Mr. CHAPLIN: Is there not a sufficient quantity of small arm munitions and of heavy ammunition on hand to warrant the closing down of the Quebec arsenal, so that a holiday would be taken there, as well as at Lindsay?

Mr. GRAHAM: I am informed that the amount of reserves we should maintain is 90,000,000 rounds, and these munitions must be turned over every seven years. At the present time we have on hand 45,000,000 rounds. In that case, it is necessary to continue the arsenal at Quebec.

Mr. CHAPLIN: In the ordinary course of events, how long would it take, in ordinary military training, to use up 45,000,000 rounds of munitions, and how much with the reduced training?

Mr. GRAHAM: About 10,000,000 rounds a year.

Mr. CHAPLIN: We have on hand about four years' supply. I think we could readily take a holiday.

Mr. GRAHAM: But we must maintain a reserve.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I think this reserve is one of the things that we should eventually aim at. The reserve was fixed by a suggestion made by the present Lord French, then Sir John French, in the year 1910, when he came through Canada at the invitation of the Liberal government then in power and made an examination of all the military establishments in the country. In his report he stated that 40,000,000 rounds, the quantity which was then the reserve of our rifle ammunition, should be doubled. I have never seen where the figure 90,000,000 was used.

Mr. PARENT: Was that a private report?

Mr. GUTHRIE: No. I have it here. It is in the Library; it is circulated, and everybody knows about it. Our reserve may have been climbing up to that figure, but we have never reached it. We have maintained a reserve at just about the figure at which it stands to-day, namely 40,000,000 or 45,000,000. The annual training and the Rifle Association will use probably eight or ten million rounds. I think that is the case when the whole volunteer establishment is trained. The effort, however, has been to get up to the proper reserve limit. I will ask the committee to note that this appropriation is entirely for small arm ammunition; nothing is asked for in this appropriation in the nature of artillery ammunition, and this kind of ammunition can all be made at Lindsay. I have had occasion to go through both the arsenals, and they are both very good institutions. The one at Lindsay is, of course, the more modern, and I think the hon. member for East Hamilton (Mr. Mewburn) is quite correct when he says that at this date it is the most up-to-date ammunition factory in America. In round figures, it cost $1,750,000,000, and it is only three or four years old. I do not believe it can ever be sold for anything approaching the figure which it cost. There is room in that arsenal to manufacture, not only our rifle ammunition, but our heavy ammunition, and I know that during the last two years the proposal was made to remove the heavy machinery from Quebec and to bring it to Lindsay. The reason for the suggested change was that Lindsay strategically was the proper place for an arsenal, whereas Quebec did not offer the same advantages on account of the exposed situation. There is no doubt that one cruiser in the river could, with a single shot, put the Quebec arsenal out of business.

Mr. BUREAU: The same thing might be done at Lindsay by an aeroplane.

Mr. GUTHRIE: But that can be said of every arsenal in the country. One is in an exposed situation; the other is remote from our frontier, well inland, and I think any military man in the department —and the minister can make inquiries for himself—will agree with me when I say that, from a military point of view, Lindsay is the best situation for an arsenal.

We know that we have on hand in the way of rifle ammunition, because we have just been told that, and we know approximately how long it will last. We have also a general idea of what we have in the way of heavy ammunition for our artillery. If we did not know that; the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) tried to inform the country last fall as to what we had, and he said: "this country is becoming literally a storehouse of high explosive shells and the like." We know what the quantity is; it is 500 rounds per gun. It has been so stated on oath before the Public Accounts Committee. That was our reserve before Lord French came to this country to make his report, and we have that reserve of 500 rounds per gun. The question for the committee to decide is whether the suggestion of the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Chaplin) is not a good one, whether we cannot afford to take a holiday at both arsenals,—if the one, why not at both? The most modern arsenal is at Lindsay; the best situated is at Lindsay; all they propose to manufacture is .303, the small arm ammunition, which could be made at either of them. It is for the committee to decide where that ammunition ought to be made.

Mr. THURSTON: How much land is there in connection with the arsenal at Lindsay? How many acres?

Mr. GRAHAM: I have the cost of the land, $39,943. I have not the acreage at hand.

Mr. THURSTON: I have been told on some authority that the gentleman who owned the land received $10,000 for it. Where did the balance go?

Mr. HALBERT: How many employees are there at Lindsay?

Mr. GRAHAM: There are 171 at Lindsay and 281 at Quebec.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: When did the Government decide upon its policy of disposing of Lindsay arsenal? Negotiations have been on foot, and apparently it ts the intention of the Government to dispose of it. I do not believe this matter was discussed during the campaign last December, and it must have been very recently when the Government discussed it.

Mr. GRAHAM: I could not exactly give the date, but the Minister of Militia and Defence recommended to his colleagues that, as the Lindsay arsenal was not necessary, a large amount of money could be saved annually. That suggestion was accepted by his colleagues, and consequently the recommendation is made to the House.

Mr. RYCKMAN: Will the minister kindly tell us first, what product of the Quebec arsenal went overseas and next, what is his argument in favour of the Quebec arsenal as against the Lindsay arsenal?

Mr. GRAHAM: There are two or three arguments which I have given. I will give them again.

Mr. RYCKMAN: What product of the Quebec arsenal was actually shipped overseas and used at the front?

Mr. GRAHAM: Cartridges, small arm bore, .303, mark VII, approximately 16,000,000 rounds; cartridges, filled, B.L. 12-pounders, 15,000 rounds; shrapnel and blank, 97,000 rounds. As I have pointed out to my hon. friend before, the Quebec arsenal is an old institution which manufactured both heavy and small arms ammunition and the eighteen pounder. It employs over 100 men more than the other arsenal. It would cost a great deal of money to move that machinery to Lindsay. A very strong argument in favour of disposing of Lindsay arsenal was that the Quebec arsenal could not be sold to any such advantage as the Lindsay arsenal could as a building. As to the suggestion by the hon. member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie), as regards the danger at Quebec, the great danger to hospitals as well as to arsenals is from the air and not from the land or sea, as our boys found out in France.

Mr. CANNON: Did I understand the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. Thurston) to state that when the Lindsay arsenal was built, the land was bought by the government for $39,000, and that the owner of the land received only $10,000. Where did the other $29,000 go?

Mr. THURSTON: Can the minister tell me from whom the land was purchased, if he cannot tell me the number of acres?

Mr. GRAHAM: This land was purchased by the Public Works Department, which does all the building for the various other departments. I have not the information with me.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Mr. Rogers was Minister of Public Works at the time.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I would suggest that if the hon. member for Victoria (O.), (Mr. Thurston), has any charges to make in respect of that purchase he make them in the usual way. I will ask for no special formality; let him demand an investigation by the Government without delay.

Mr. CANNON: The member for Victoria (O.) is under no necessity to lay any formal charge.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not think he will.

Mr. CANNON: He is entitled to ask for information just as my right hon. friend (Mr. Meighen) is, and that is what he is doing now. If the Minister of Militia has the information it is time that the committee were given it. When was the land bought, and from whom?

Mr. GRAHAM: The Public Works Department carries on that part of the business for the other departments; I have not the information available. I should think that the land was bought in 1916 or 1917.

Mr. BUREAU: Perhaps the hon. member for Victoria (O.) has the information.

Mr. GRAHAM: Does the hon. member know the date?

Mr. THURSTON: I do not know the date, but I am told by Lindsay people that this man owned a hundred acres and that he received $10,000 for the land, and I was wondering why the cost should be represented as $39,000.

Mr. CANNON: Do you know the year?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I should like the minister to give the information before the vote carries. I object to leaving the matter in the shape of an innuendo.

Mr. McBRIDE: We have heard a great deal for the past two days about cutting down expenses, and we have listened to that sort of thing until we are almost tired. Now if there is one item that has come before this committee, since the House met, that can stand cutting down it is this item of $425,000. The militia is cut down, the mounted police estimates are cut down, and the navy is practically abandoned. That being the case, why do we want ammunition? I move in amendment that this item be reduced by $110,000 for the Quebec arsenal.

The CHAIRMAN: The hon. member for Cariboo (Mr. McBride) moves that vote No. 96 be reduced by the sum of $10,000.

Mr. McBRIDE: No, Mr. Chairman, $110,000.

The CHAIRMAN: I must call the hon. member's attention to the fact that the committee is considering vote No. 96 which calls for an expenditure of only $25,000.

Mr. McBRIDE: I stand corrected, but I thought that we had passed that item and were on No. 97.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: The location of an arsenal is an important matter to the whole country. There are two arsenals in Canada, one of which is about to be closed, and this perhaps might be approved by many. But the Government have intimated that they have entered into negotiations for the disposal of one of these arsenals without consulting Parliament or bringing the matter before the people. Now, the location at Lindsay was selected because of its distance from the international boundary and the facilities at hand for its proper defence, while the other one at Quebec is in a more exposed position. During the war the arsenal at Quebec was exposed to danger. This was recognized by no less a personage than the leader of the Opposition of that day, who, in the city of Quebec on December 8, 1916, delivered an address from which I shall quote a paragraph to show the danger in which Sir Wilfrid Laurier supposed that arsenal to be, from its exposed position.

The CHAIRMAN: I must point out to the hon. member that we are on item 96 "Dominion Arsenal, Lindsay—$25,000."

Mr. SUTHERLAND: The location of an arsenal, Mr. Chairman, is a matter of great importance to the country, and the abandonment of the arsenal at Lindsay has a direct bearing upon the remaining arsenal at Quebec. I contend therefore that I am in order in discussing the relation of the one to the other.

The CHAIRMAN: Provided the quotations are relevant to the item under consideration, and conform to the rules, they may be read.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: If I contravene the rules I bow to your decision, Mr. Chairman. But my contention is that the policy of the Government in regard to the location of the arsenal at Lindsay is a matter that has a distinct relevancy to the other arsenal at Quebec. Of course, if I am not in order I do not wish to proceed in that direction.

The CHAIRMAN: If item 96 is passed it will be quite in order for the hon. member to discuss it in connection with the following vote, as he is doing.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: I take it that if this particular item is disposed of I shall be out of order in later adverting to it. I hold, Sir, that we should not dispose of the Lindsay arsenal as the Government proposes to do. I was stating some reasons why this should not be done, and I think I am well within the rules of the House in doing so. I was going to quote from the words of Sir Wilfrid Laurier, spoken on December 8th, 1916, in the city of Quebec, when he pointed out the danger to which the arsenal there was exposed at that time.

Sir Wilfrid then read extracts from a plan prepared by the German General Staff and published before the war, showing that it was their intention to add two more provinces to those taken from France. He could prove that the German idea was the imposition of Deutsch tum, or German domination, on the world, and he added that the war had shown how near they had come to succeeding.

Mr. CANNON: Will my hon. friend allow me a question?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Let me finish the quotation.

Mr. CANNON: What document is the hon. member quoting from?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: If you will permit me to read the extract I shall be glad to answer any questions afterwards. The report goes on:

If it was possible for merchant submarines to enter United States ports it was possible for armed submarines to enter Halifax, St. John and Quebec ports.

Mr. CANNON: What document are you quoting from?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: From the Toronto Globe of December 8, 1916.

Mr. CANNON: Reporting a speech which was supposed to have been made at what place in Canada?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: At Quebec. Now, Sir, we have had an intimation from the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Lapointe) as to what the policy of the Government is in regard to the harbour at Quebec. I also desire to draw the attention of the House to another matter. I hold in my hand the Canada Gazette of April 6, 1918, in which I find an Order in Council passed by the government on the 4th April of that year. It is in these words:

Whereas on the 28th day of March last the opposition of a large number of the population of the city of Quebec to the enforcement of the Military Service Act 1917 and the regulations thereunder broke out in open violence and serious riots ensued on that day—

The CHAIRMAN: Order. I must call the hon. member's attention to the fact that this Order in Council, so far as it has been read, is not relevant to the item under discussion, the Dominion arsenal at Lindsay, and therefore he is out of order.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Mr. Chairman, I do not desire to be out of order, but I have read only a part of the recital. I think if you will permit me to read the remainder of the order I shall be able to demonstrate that I am well within my rights, and that this Order in Council proves conclusively that Quebec city is not a suitable place for a Dominion arsenal.

And whereas—

The CHAIRMAN: Order. The hon. member has already been advised that the Order in Council he is attempting to read is not relevant to the item before the committee. Therefore under Rule 13 (5) he is clearly out of order.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Mr. Chairman, I am not going to appeal to the House from your ruling, although I think if you had permitted me to read the Order in Council you would not have taken exception to it. I was endeavouring to point out that the location of the arsenal at Lindsay was much more suitable than at Quebec, and my reason for doing so was the danger with which we might be confronted in the event of a national crisis. I pointed out that the arsenal at Quebec is situated on an international waterway which in all probability will be the main international artery of this continent in a very few years. During 1918, while we were tested and tried to the limit of our national capacity, we found that Quebec was the one point in the whole Dominion where martial law had to be enforced in order to suppress rioting and an outbreak of its citizens—at a time, I repeat, when we were being called upon to exert our utmost energies in the successful prosecution of the war, and yet I am prevented from reading this Order in Council to substantiate my statement.

The CHAIRMAN: Order. I have already declared the hon. member to be out of order in regard to the reading of that document.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Would it not be well if hon. gentlemen opposite were kept in order and some decorum observed in this House? That is infinitely more important than the mere wisdom of reading a particular order-in-council.

The CHAIRMAN: I think the right hon. gentleman is quite right, and that an effort should be made on the part of hon. members of this committee to give a courteous hearing to every hon. member discussing these items. I would ask hon. members to follow that practice.

[Mr. Sutherland.]

Mr. SUTHERLAND: The location of our dominion arsenals is of too great importance to be passed over lightly, what has happened indicates what the policy of the Government is with regard to our national affairs. We have extracted from the Government at different stages information as to their policy in regard to national defence, and while a great proportion of the party opposite sit back and say nothing, yet the ministers who are responsible for the administration of their departments express in a half-hearted way what has been taking place behind the scenes. I ask this committee whether they consider it to be in the interests of good government that the Administration should negotiate for the disposal of one of the most important features of our system of defence without consulting Parliament or the people. When a policy of that kind is entered upon the people are entitled to know something more about it than has been furnished so far. And when by insinuation and innuendo it is made to appear that the people of Ontario are absolutely opposed to the best interests of this country, I think the Government have to put up some better arguments than they have advanced so far. The insinuations thrown out by the Prime Minister were such that every self-respecting citizen of Ontario will, I am sure, resent when the proper time comes they will call him to account. I refer to the campaign which he claims was carried on in Ontario in regard to national defence. Now, Mr. Chairman, notwithstanding the evident desire that certain things should be kept from the public, so far as I am concerned I may say that I am going to protest as vigorously as I can on behalf of my constituents against the disposal of the Lindsay arsenal and the maintaining of the arsenal in the city of Quebec. In doing so I do not wish to be understood as advocating the manufacture of large quantities of munitions at the present time; but we should have at our disposal the facilities for turning them out in the event of their being required, and, above all, we should have an arsenal located at a point where there will be absolutely no danger of any interference with those who would be there carrying out there duties in the event of a crisis arising.

Item agreed to.

Dominion Arsenal, Quebec, $425,000.

Mr. LAPOINTE: As intimated the other day by the hon. Minister of Militia (Mr. Graham), I beg to move that this item be reduced by the sum of $50,000.

Mr. McBRIDE: I beg to move an amendment that the item be reduced by the sum of $110,000.

Mr. GRAHAM: It strikes me as peculiar that when we shut up one arsenal some hon. gentlemen object, saying that we should keep it open to manufacture munitions; yet they now show signs of being in favour of cutting $110,000 off the vote for the other one.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It was ruled, the minister will remember, that we could not discuss the proper location of the Quebec arsenal while the other vote was under consideration.

The CHAIRMAN: I would draw the hon. gentleman's attention to the fact that it was not ruled that for purposes of comparison it could not be discussed. But an Order in Council dealing with certain riots and lawlessness alleged to have taken place in the city of Quebec was ruled out of order on the discussion of the item in respect to the Lindsay arsenal. That was the intention of the Chairman, at least.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Does the Chair contend that that had no relevancy at all to the question as to the proper location of the arsenal?

Mr. GRAHAM: There is no point of order in this, that I can see. I have made my statement as to the inconsistency of assuring the House that the Government should not think of shutting up the Lindsay arsenal, because of its being required to manufacture small arms ammunition, and of thereupon arguing that the Government should take $110,000 off the vote for the other arsenal. I could understand the attitude if hon. gentlemen were in favour of not cutting either down. Now, the Government proposes, as moved by the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, that this item be reduced by $50,000. This, together with the reduction in the case of the other arsenal, is, I think, a big jump in the reduction of expenditure so far as these two items are concerned.

Mr. MEIGHEN: How much was spent last year at the Quebec arsenal?

Mr. GRAHAM: For ten months, $311,000.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Will the minister inform the committee who is propounding the policy of the Government, the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, or himself? There is a motion to adopt this item, and the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, another member of the Government, proposes to reduce it by $50,000. I am wondering whether or not we have any government at all. This is surely becoming a spectacle such as has never before been witnessed in any civilized country. It is a peculiar procedure for one minister to move the adoption of an item and then for another minister, in order to forestall our friends to the left, to jump up and introduce a motion to cut the item down by a large amount. Surely this is an innovation in responsible government. I would like to know from either one minister or the other, which is the policy of the Government?

Mr. GRAHAM: My hon. friend I know, is thirsting for information. I would ask him this: if the vote related to works in the county of South Oxford, would he move a reduction, as the Minister of Marine did? I rather think he would say, on the contrary, that he wanted more. However, owing to the ruling of the Chair that the minister in charge of the estimates cannot properly move a reduction, as has been the custom in the committee for many years, it becomes necessary for someone else to move that reduction.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Why does the minister submit the estimate, then?

Mr. GRAHAM: My hon. friend will permit me to answer his question. As a matter of fact, if someone other than a member of the Government, had moved the reduction which I told the House some days ago we intend to move, the hon. member would immediately have raised the point that although the Government were responsible, they were getting a private member to move the reduction. So we make it absolutely governmental; a member of the Government living in the city of Quebec has asked the reduction.

Mr. CHAPLIN: The minister says that $311,000 was spent during ten months of last year at the Quebec arsenal. The proposal now is to spend $425,000 for this year; that is the economy the Government practices, it is not economy as I view it. We have a tremendous amount of large am munition; we certainly do not want any more of that. From what the minister has told us to night, we have 45,000,000 rounds of small arms ammunition, enough to last, under ordinary circumstances, for four years; yet the minister proposes to reduce this item by $50,000 as an evidence of practical economy. It is economy, is it?

Mr. GRAHAM: Yes.

Mr. CHAPLIN: If that is economy as you have been preaching it for some time, it is not economy as I view it. You do away with the need for this ammunition by partly doing away with the annual camps; yet you now propose to make more ammunition.

Mr. GRAHAM: Not so much. My hon. friend is mistaken; he forgets that some ammunition was manufactured at Lindsay last year.

Mr. CHAPLIN: I understand that perfectly well.

Mr. GRAHAM: In the second place, we are taking $50,000 off the $425,000, which will leave $375,000. The amount 11 p.m. expended last year would have been $396,000, so that you have this year $375,000 instead of $396,000, notwithstanding the fact that the arsenal at Lindsay is closed.

Mr. CHAPLIN: I do not think the minister's explanation is very clear. It is quite plain that all the ammunition that was made at Lindsay was small arms ammunition. Now, nothing but small arms ammunition is to be made at Quebec, and that amounts to $425,000. But according to last year's estimates, some large ammunition was made there. Does the minister give us that information now, or does he try to make us believe that all the ammunition that was made last year was small arms ammunition. I would like to ask him how much small arms ammunition and how much large ammunition was made in Quebec last year?

Mr. GRAHAM: In this estimate we propose to make at Quebec 5,000 rounds of the 18-pounder shells.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Has that the approval of the Prime Minister?

Mr. CHAPLIN: It is not so stated in the estimates.

Mr. GRAHAM: If the committee desires it, I will read what the estimate is based on:

7,000,000 cartridges, S. A. Ball, .303.
200,000 cartridges, S. A. Ball, .303. for Dom. Rifle Association.

[Mr. Chaplin.]

10,000 cartridges, S. A. Ball .303. Tracer, Mark VII.
500,000 cartridges, S. A. Dummy .303.
7,710 boxes for .303 ammunition.
144,000 bandoliers .303 ammunition.
1,500,000 chargers, cartridges .303.
900 boxes for Long Rifle ammunition.
1,000 puffs, powder, 4 Drachms, R.F.G. 2.
1,000 puffs, powder, R.L.G. 2.
500 puffs, powder 4 oz.
500 puffs, powder 2 oz.

Mr. CHAPLIN: It is exactly as I pointed out a few minutes ago: There is not one dollar's worth of 18 pound ammunition in the estimate that I can see; it is all for rifle cartridges.

Mr. GRAHAM: I think my hon. friend is right but I have the 18-pound in my explanation and it is an error that it does not appear in the estimates, surely.

Mr. CHAPLIN: I submit that it is not an error, for the reason that the price of this ammunition as laid down in this specification amounts to $425,000 and that is the total amount of the estimate. Consequently there can be no 18-pound ammunition there. As the deputy minister is here, I hope the information asked for in reference to the division of the ammunition for which $311,000 was spent last year will be given, that is approximately how much was spent on 18-pound ammunition and how much on rifle ammunition?

Mr. CANNON: The patriotic spirit in the hon. member for Lincoln has always been known in this House, but this year he is evidently changing his attitude. I do not understand how my hon. friend can think of putting questions to the minister of such a nature as to cause our military secrets to be divulged. The hon. gentleman has always been a very strong supporter of the British Empire, has likewise always been in favour of our taking part in the defence of the Empire. Is it fair therefore that my hon. friend should to-night ask the minister such questions that tomorrow every foreign power will know exactly the amount of ammunition we have in this Dominion. I think the hon. gentleman is treading on most dangerous ground and I appeal to you, Mr. Chairman, to protect our military secrets from disclosure.

Mr. MANION: I rise to say that I think that when the conditions of this country have got to the pass where my hon. friend from Dorchester (Mr. Cannon) taunts my hon. friend from Lincoln with lack of patriotism, we really should reconsider this vote. In view of the cuts that have been made in the various estimates—in the militia estimates, in the navy estimates, in the estimates for various other branches of defence—it is only reasonable that the hon. gentleman who has moved a reduction—and he informs me that it is quite in proportion with the other cuts that have been made—should be supported. I find that as a result of the different motions which have been made in the House we have a nation without defence; we have a navy without sailors; we have a militia without annual training; we have estimates without consistency; and now hon. gentlemen opposite are proposing ammunition without an army. In view of these circumstances I am going to have very much pleasure in supporting the hon. gentleman who has moved the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. CHAPLIN: I am thankful to the hon. member for Dorchester for referring to me in the very kindly way in which he did. Let me say to him that we have very much missed his voice in the discussion of these estimates. But his voice was not lacking last year; he was one of those hon. members who were very persistent in moving for reductions. As I say we have missed him very much this session, we would like to hear something more from him; and yet to-night we find him defending an estimate which cannot rightly be defended. Let me say one word in respect to the accusation of giving away military secrets. I only asked for what is published in the estimates. That information is set forth there in black and white; it is there for anybody to see from one end of the Dominion to the other; and anywhere else for that matter. While I am on that question I may say that I have had placed in my hands a copy of last year's estimates and I find, although the minister would not give me the information, there is a matter of some six or seven thousand rounds of artillery ammunition referred to. I do not know what the price was but I think a reasonable figure to put it at would be about $25 a shell, which would represent a sum in the neighbourhood of $175,000 or $200,000. If I said the minister was misleading the committee, you, Mr. Chairman, would probably call me to order, but I certainly would like to have an explanation from him.

Mr. CANNON: I am very grateful to the hon. member for his statement that he has missed my voice this session. If I have not taken as active a part in the debates this session as I did in former years, the reason, I may inform the hon. member, was that I was studying the Roumanian question.

Mr. CHAPLIN: If it were in order, Mr. Chairman, I might ask my hon. friend what he learned from studying the Roumanian question so hard.

Mr. CANNON: Axes sometimes cut.

Mr. CHAPLIN: If the Chairman wished to be fair to the committee he would tell my hon. friend that he has no business to talk about such a matter at such a time.

Mr. CHURCH: Surely the minister in the case of a large item like this, is going to tell the committee that he is acting on the advice of his technical experts. I may say that the freight charges for the carriage of small arms and ammunition in Canada is very great and that is one reason why an arsenal should be more centrally located. It certainly should not be established near the border of the country; that lesson has been driven home to us by examples during the great war. Surely from the standpoint of national defence a Dominion arsenal should be located where it is not easily open to attack. Suppose a hostile fleet ever sailed up the St. Lawrence what would become of the arsenal at Quebec? Is the minister going to depend on a few fishing boats and trawlers to protect the place, or does he expect it to be defended by the British fleet?

Mr. GRAHAM: The suggestion for a reduction of $50,000 has not been made without full consultation with the officers responsible in the department. As I pointed out a few moments ago danger to any building in the future, as shown in the recent great war, will likely come from the air rather than from approaches by sea or land. There is no part of Canada, as far as I know, that could not be attacked by bombs from an aeroplane.

Mr. RYCKMAN: The minister was asked, what portion of this sum of $428,300 had relation to small arms last year and what proportion to heavy arms or bombs? I should like an answer to that question, notwithstanding the pleasantries of the hon. member from Dorchester (Mr. Cannon), and upon that answer I shall make a further inquiry.

Mr. GRAHAM: The amount expended last year was divided between small arm ammunition and artillery. I think there were about 6,000 rounds of artillery ammunition—

Mr. RYCKMAN: Give it in dollars and cents. That is the only way, in my ignorance, I can interpret it. How much of this $428,300 was for small arms, and how much for heavy ammunition? I am told there was $311,000. How much for small arms and how much for 18-pounders? It seems that the answer is not readily forthcoming, and I would almost think that the member for Dorchester, in that happy manner of his, has to draw aside an intelligent answer to that question. What do we find? This Government has proposed, and has succeeded in its proposition, to strike $700,000 from militia service estimates, and $1,000,000 has gone from the naval service estimates. That means that $218,300 have gone from the appropriation which was made last year to the Lindsay arsenal, and the proposition now is that, notwithstanding that $1,700,000 have been stricken out of the amount this country is going to have for its defence and, that $218,300 have gone from the Lindsay appropriation, we shall strike only $110,000 from the amount that is voted for the Quebec arsenal. Under all the circumstances, from the amounts that have already been stricken out, this amount of $110,000 should be increased. Upon any reasonable solution of this proposition there is no question the amount should be larger, and if hon. members opposite want to justify the larger vote than the vote, minus the $110,000, they ought to explain it to the members of this House. In view of these large amounts that have been proposed, not by the Opposition not by the Progressive members, but by the members of the Government themselves, to be stricken from the naval and militia estimates, I have great pleasure in supporting this $110,000 rebate which the Progressive member asks, but which I think is altogether too small a sum, and I would support a proposition to strike off any other sum which could be saved to this country on this deal.

Mr. BAXTER: I do not propose to approach the consideration of this question from any political point of view. I have sat several hours in this House through what I would like to characterize, if it would not be too harsh, as a succession of farces. It seems to me the navy has sailed back again into the Militia Department, and really when hon. members ask for information from the minister, I do not know whether they are asking it from the Captain or "Little Buttercup." The nearest thing we get is that it is shady—it is shady, for we cannot obtain any exact information. I do not propose to vote for the amendment to the amendment moved by the hon. member for Cariboo (Mr. McBride) unless I am forced to do so for want of information. It does not square with my idea of the manner in which military or naval subjects should be treated in this House. I am prepared to give here an absolutely non-partisan vote in support of any estimate that the Government will bring before this House with a sense of responsibility and with a courage that faces the House and the country and says the amount is required for the defence of Canada. Anything else would be exceedingly small politics indeed. I invite the hon. minister to give us frankly the advice that he surely must have had from his experts and show us what this vote is for. Evidently what appears on page 29 of the Estimates is either a mistake or a sham. Let him give us what ought to replace that, and show us what they intend to do with it. I will assume that what was done at Lindsay last year is to be done at Quebec this year. That is a question of territory, and a question of politics, but if ammunition is required for the Canadian militia it must be made somewhere. The Government has to settle that question. The hon. member thinks the only danger is from the air. I think there is too much danger from the air in this House. We want to bring the thing out of the air, and get it down to concrete form, so that we can understand it and vote intelligently upon it. Can we have a plain direct statement as to the ammunition, not that some political body has recommended, but that the officers of the Militia Department have recommended, as being necessary. Tell us the reasons of it and the cost of it. For one, I am prepared to vote for that cost, but I want more information and I want it here. I would like, at the same time, although it is not so important, to have an explanation to this House of why, when the estimates, which are supposed to be thoroughly considered and prepared by the minister with the assistance of his staff, were brought before the House they were brought down with apparently $50,000 more demanded than the minister thinks necessary now. I make no cavil with regard to the fact that the Minister of Marine, or some other member of the Government moves an amendment, but why should it be necessary to amend the estimates? Will the Minister of Militia tell this House one single bit of technical advice he has received from his experts since these estimates were laid on the Table of the House weeks ago, that he can transmute into $50,000, and show as a justification for cutting off that amount? Is this a real bona-fide reduction because his technical officers advised him that the original estimates were prepared in error, or is it a bit of cheap political stage play before the members of this House and the people of Canada? Let us have the reason. After all that, even if he finds it is only because the political club has been shaken, or because he wants to gain favour with some members of the morganatic alliance, if he will say he cannot stand the reduction suggested by the hon. member for Cariboo, I will vote for what he proposes, because I do not propose to take the responsibility in the matter. If, some months later, an emergency should arise, I do not propose to be counted as one of the men who refused to do what the military authorities of this country said was necessary.

Mr. BROWN: Two or three times since this session opened, we have heard something about alliances. The leader of the Opposition (Mr. Meighen) spoke, in the early part of the session, of a proposed alliance of which the banns were forbidden. The hon. member for St. John city (Mr. Baxter) for the second time has used the term "morganatic alliance". When those expressions were used, I for one could not but recall a certain illicit alliance that was entered into at one time, an alliance of which hon. members to my right have been reminded two or three times by hon. gentlemen opposite, an alliance that was entered into, as such illicit relationships are often entered into without very much regard for the consequences,—consequences that at one time threatened to be serious to the people of Canada, and consequences which were serious. I should like just to remind our hon. friends who speak of morganatic alliances that they ought to remember some of those alliances of the past—

The CHAIRMAN: I should like to draw the attention of the hon. gentleman to the fact that while he introduced his remarks on the appropriation for the Dominion arsenal at Quebec, his remarks in the committee up to the present have not been relevant to this particular appropriation.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go ahead.

Mr. BROWN: I submit that my remarks may not be relevant; but neither were the remarks of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Baxter).

Mr. GRAHAM: My hon. friend (Mr. Baxter) rather suggested that I was concealing information. The decision to reduce by $50,000 was not made by the Government. That made, of course some little difference in the details. I read out to my hon. friend a few moments ago all that the Government proposed to manufacture at Quebec with the $425,000. The change would be that we would drop some of the small arms and manufacture 5,000 rounds of 18-pound shells.

Mr. BAXTER: What is that in money? No one has told us that yet.

Mr. GRAHAM: I have informed one hon. gentleman that I have no calculation as to the cost and I cannot possibly give that to him to-night.

Mr. BAXTER: I want to know if I understand the minister aright, that at the time the estimates were brought down to the House, he did not know that shell ammunition would be required; that he has been informed since then that shell ammunition is required, and that he will have to cut down the small arm ammunition in order to make room for the other.

Mr. GRAHAM: I want to give my hon. friend all the information. As I stated a few moments ago, an error was made in leaving out the 5,000 rounds of artillery ammunition.

Mr. CHAPLIN: In reference to the 5,000 rounds of 18-pound ammunition, we have no information as to the cost. I ventured the opinion a while ago that it would be worth probably somewhere between $20 and $25 a shell. Might I ask the minister, as his deputy is present, if that includes the explosive, the cartridge and the primer, the whole thing complete, loaded?

Mr. GRAHAM: I am informed by my deputy that that is the whole shell complete.

Mr. CHAPLIN: At $25 apiece, that would mean that the small arm ammunition would be cut to the extent of $125,000.

Mr. GRAHAM: I did not finish my remarks. I did not state any price.

Mr. CHAPLIN: The minister has not done so yet.

Mr. GRAHAM: I am doing my best to do so. I am informed that the complete shell will cost from $18 to $21.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The committee is in just the position in which it was when this estimate was first brought up. The estimate is for virtually the same amount as that of last year. The only reason advanced so far by the minister for its reduction is that some 5,000 rounds of 18-pound shells extra are required. That might be a reason for increasing the estimate. No reason at all is given for the reduction; but, of course, we all know the reason; the reason is simply a demand made that it be done. But inasmuch as everything else is reduced that is of service, I for one do not know any reason why it should not be $110,000 less, or even $150,000 less, just as much as $50,000 less. We have no information on the subject at all. I need not comment on the inconsistencies of the Government. The Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) went through the last campaign—and ever since, indeed, he has continued the process—storming against the quantity of ammunition that was in the country, promising all sorts of exposures, all sorts of scandals about it, complaining that ammunition that we owned was brought here at the mere cost of carrying it, and now he comes to Parliament and wants us to vote $375,000 to make some more.

No reason whatever has been given as to why the Lindsay arsenal is closed and this one continued. The minister says: "There is danger as regards both being destroyed in the event of hostilities." We all know that there is possibly equal danger from the air; but the one is in very grave danger from the chief source of peril, and the other in no danger from that source at all. In point of danger, as regards geographical location, the argument is wholly in favour of the Lindsay arsenal. The minister never attempted to make any reply to that, nor to shift from the shoulders of his Government the very obvious explanation that it is merely a political move, keeping the one and abandoning the other. Inasmuch as we have no explanation at all why $110,000 cannot go off just as much as $50,000; inasmuch as the minister has reduced the provision for the rest beyond what he admitted, once at least, was the margin of safety, and inasmuch as he had virtually abandoned the training or, at least, the greater part of the training, can he show us that there is not on hand sufficient to enable them this year to get along with the quantity that would be allowed by the amendment of the hon. member for Cariboo (Mr. McBride)? Indeed, so far as information is given to the committee, there would not require to be any made at all, except perhaps of one line. If I have understood all the information given, there is enough of the rest on hand to last from four to nine years. Why then go ahead except with the line as respects which there may be some shortage? In a word, unless we are to get information that puts the responsibility up to us, I know of no reason for voting money here at all. We have enough to produce just what the minister says we need.

Mr. HOEY: I want to make my position clear on this item in just a word or two. I want first of all to congratulate the minister on his courage in making these reductions, not only this particular reduction, but reductions in other items that we have already considered. It is my judgment that these reductions will be received throughout this country with considerable satisfaction, if not with enthusiasm. It is my hope—and I trust I am justified in that hope—that these reductions will be interpreted as economies effected in the interest of soldiers' civil re-establishment. Even this afternoon and for several days I have been moved—and I possess a somewhat phlegmatic nature—by the kindling eloquence of the leader of the Opposition (Mr. Meighen). His speeches in the interests of Canadian defence were eloquent. He says that the policy of a country—referring to its defence—is reflected in the moral character of the citizens of that country. I was deeply moved by his appeal. But I cannot understand his position at the moment.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Well, I do.

Mr. HOEY: I cannot understand the attitude which hon. members to my right are taking. Even allowing that we have no militia at all, would not common sense tell us that ammunition itself is a factor in national defence in view of the thousands of trained men we have throughout the country? Now, these are the men that talk about national defence, and sing "Rule, Britannia." I do not take second place to any member in this House in my loyalty to the British Empire. I had the good fortune, or the misfortune, whichever you like, to come from a part of the country that has suffered more than any other part of the British Empire in the determination to adhere to that Empire. But I say I cannot understand at all the position taken at the moment by the right hon. gentleman to my right, and I want to congratulate the minister (Mr. Graham) on his courage in giving way to the wishes of Parliament in this regard and in making these reductions in the interests of economy, thus relieving the people from the oppressive and ponderous burdens under which they are labouring.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. LAPOINTE: Speech No. 34.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I am grateful to hon. gentlemen for the applause they have seen fit to accord me.

Mr. DUFF: Will the hon. member allow me a question? Is this the first time he is speaking?

Mr. MEIGHEN: If it is your will, Mr. Chairman, and the will of the committee that we convert ourselves into an entertainment association we might import movies here with some degree of success.

Mr. DUFF: We do not have to when you are here.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The subject is treated as one purely of levity on the part of hon. gentlemen opposite. They seem prepared to spend money so long as it is spent just in the way they want, and when they get sufficient fun out of it in the House. I am not at all surprised at the position taken by the hon. member who has just spoken (Mr. Hoey). I make no comment on any alliances; I let the facts speak for themselves. The records of this House is a pretty good disclosure to the people of the country as to just the relationship between that hon. gentleman, at least, and some others near me, and hon. gentlemen opposite. He says that he does not understand me. As soon as it is shown to me that the further manufacture of ammunition to this extent is necessary, as soon as the minister states it on his responsibility and gives me the facts to prove that it is necessary to have this ammunition on hand for our purposes, I will support him, and support an increase in the vote.

Mr. HOEY: He has already given that explanation.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The hon. gentleman (Mr. Hoey) is easily satisfied. And if any hon. gentleman thinks the action courageous of a minister who brings an estimate to Parliament, declares it is the minimum for the safety of the nation, and, because a roar is raised behind him, reduces it, then the relationship is pretty easily established between him and such a minister. The minister has stated that he cannot give any figures at all to show the cost of the extra ammunition he wants, nor will he tell us what it is proposed to make. We do not need to know accurately at all, but we should like him to give, even roughly, an estimate as to how long what is on hand will last, and what the cost will be of what it is proposed to make. As soon as we have that information and it is shown that we need that extra ammunition I am prepared to vote every dollar of the $50,000, every dollar of what in the first place he said would be required.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: The Minister of Militia before leaving the Chamber said that he anticipated the greatest danger to the arsenal from the air. I would ask the Minister of Marine (Mr. Lapointe) who has moved to reduce the item, when the Government decided on this reduction? Was it after the estimates for the air force had been reduced by $617,000? This reduction was made in the expenditure on the Canadian Air Forces a short time ago in connection with the policy of the Government on national defence. The minister informed the House that he anticipated a greater danger from the air than from any other source. Possibly that is the reason why the arsenal has been removed from Lindsay to Quebec. Now it will be a long way from the headquarters of the remnant of the air service which was and might be situated at Camp Borden, and I think that Lindsay would have been a much more suitable place for the arsenal. Does the minister anticipate danger to the Quebec arsenal from our own air force or from some foreign force? Will he inform the committee as to when it was decided to reduce the item $50,000? He has told the committee that he made an announcement to the effect some days ago. Evidently I was not in the House at the time.

Mr. GRAHAM: That has been explained already.

Mr. CHAPLIN: In last year's estimates the total amount of small arms ammunition proposed to be made was seven and a half million rounds, or perhaps about eight million. According to the estimate, at page 29, this year it is proposed to make seventeen million rounds. This is what the minister calls practising economy. He proposes to make nearly seventeen million rounds of ammunition as against seven or eight million rounds last year.

Mr. CANNON: Does not the hon. member think that the reduction proposed is a fair one in view of the fact that a truce has just been signed for eight months at Genoa by thirty-four nations of the world?

Mr. CHAPLIN: There is no reduction. I have just pointed out that there is an increase of some nine million rounds of ammunition this year.

Mr. GRAHAM: My hon. friend does not understand the facts. The nine million which he has added to the seven million have been deducted from the list.

Mr. CHAPLIN: Well, you never said so before. At page 29 of the Estimates, there are two figures, seven millions and nine millions.

Mr. MEIGHEN: How many years' supply have we on hand in the way of reserve? Can the minister tell us that, and on what authority? The only information I have heard has been that we have forty-five million rounds and that the utmost that has been used were ten million. There will be less used this year on account of the reductions in the other estimates. What is the minister's policy, and what does he base it on, as to the number of years' reserve that should be on hand?

Mr. GRAHAM: If I remember correctly the figure given by the hon. member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie), it is eighty million rounds.

Mr. MEIGHEN: There is that reserve?

Mr. GRAHAM: No. I do not say that any Canadian government has maintained that reserve, but it is the opinion of Lord French that a reserve of eighty million rounds should be maintained. I imagine that provides for ten million rounds in addition being used each year.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is for a very much larger force than the minister contemplates by his policy. What is the minister aiming at himself, and on what does he base his opinion as to what we ought to have by way of reserve?

Mr. GRAHAM: My officers think that we ought to have eighty million rounds in reserve, but we have not anything like that number of rounds.

[Mr. Chaplin.]

Mr. MEIGHEN: The hon. minister's officers also think that we ought to have much more training.

Amendment (Mr. McBride) to the amendment negatived.

Amendment (Mr. Lapointe) agreed to.

Item as amended agreed to.

Adjustment of War Claims—Militia and Defence, $7,380,000.

Mr. GRAHAM: Mr. Chairman, one of the amounts in this item is $500,000 for the battlefield memorials. I admit without any hesitation that I think it should be separate. A committee composed of members of both Houses was named to deal with this matter. I might by repetition detail the history of the appointment of that body, but as the hon. member for East Hamilton (Mr. Mewburn) is chairman of it, I would suggest that he give to the House a resumè of what has been done.

Mr. MEWBURN: Mr. Chairman, I agree with the minister that this item should have been placed among the miscellaneous votes, but I do not criticise its inclusion in this vote.

For the information of some members of the House who were not then members, I may say that in 1920 a committee of the House was appointed to consider the question of Canadian battlefields' war memorials. That committee sat for some time, took evidence, and made a report to the House, recommending that certain memorials be erected in France and Belgium. Eight sites were selected as follows: No. 1, St. Julien; No. 2, Passchendaele; No. 3, Observatory Ridge; No. 4 Vimy Ridge; No. 5, Drury Crossroads; No. 6, Bourlon wood; No. 7, Courcelette; No. 8, Hospital Wood.

Subsequently a commission was appointed consisting of the Hon. Mr. Lemieux, General Sir Richard Turner, Colonel Leonard, Senator Turriff and myself, a purely voluntary commission, to consider the erection of these war memorials. A competition was held for designs, open to architects and sculptors all over Canada, and very complete rules were printed and issued. Something like 160 competitors submitted designs. The assessors appointed to consider those designs were, Professor C. H. Reilly, representing the Royal Institute of British Architects; M. Paul P. Creats, representing the Société Centrale des Architects (Paris); and Mr. Frank Darling, representing the Royal Architectural Institute of Canada. Those assessors selected seventeen designs for the second stage, and from those two awards were made, one to Mr. Allward of Toronto, the other to Mr. Clemenshaw of Regina.

The memorial designed by Mr. Allward, of which a photograph has been on exhibition, and I think is now in the Speaker's room, was proposed by the commission to be erected at Vimy. It is on a large and magnificent scale and has received great commendation throughout not only the length and breadth of this country but of England and France.

Working in conjunction with the Imperial War Graves Commission, we discussed the perpetuation of the names of Canada's missing. As you are all aware, the Imperial War Graves Commission is a body incorporated by Royal charter of which the Prince of Wales is chairman, and with which all the overseas dominions are associated. They are charged with perpetuating their quota within the war cemeteries by a headstone of simple design placed over the grave of every officer, non-commissioned officer and man. It has been unanimously decided that we should consecrate the names of Canada's missing within this one large memorial which we propose erecting at Vimy. Those names at the present time, I regret to say, run to about nineteen thousand.

The other seven memorials, exactly similar in design but on a very much smaller scale, will be erected at the other seven points. Land has been acquired at the eight different points at very low cost, one of the areas having been presented to the Canadian Government. General Hughes has been over there as engineer in charge; he has laid out the plans for the grounds, arranged for the grading of roads, and so on. We are hoping at an early day to complete the contracts for the erection of these memorials. I may say that this vote was brought into the House by myself in 1920 and again in 1921; it is now again presented this session. It was strongly recommended by the committee of the House appointed in 1920, and it has been practically a revote ever since. As I have already stated, this work is being carried on voluntarily by the gentlemen whose names have been given. We hope this vote will pass the House unanimously, in order that we may be enabled to make some headway with what we look upon as the least this country can do to perpetuate the deeds of heroism of those Canadians who fell in France and Flanders.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I wish to say just one word in regard to this vote and to the work of the War Memorials Commission. The hon. member for East Hamilton (Mr. Mewburn) has spoken of what has been done in the way of the proposed erection of monuments. I hope the commission will consider very seriously indeed—I know in fact it is considering it—the advisability of acquiring a very considerable tract of land along Vimy Ridge as a permanent memorial. Whilst sculpture may do a great deal to commemorate the sacrifices of our men, Vimy itself is one of the world's great altars, on which a perceptible portion of our manhood has been sacrificed in the cause of the world's freedom. As a national memorial nothing can equal the preservation of the ridge itself, if it can be acquired. I hope the commission will go just as far as it can in acquiring what to Canada will ever be consecrated and hallowed ground.

Mr. MEWBURN: I am glad the Prime Minister referred to that; there is just one word that I omitted to say. We took expert evidence as to the location of these memorials from all the officers, from the corps commander down, and in the decisions we arrived at we have been backed up by their opinion as well as by that of Professor Reilly, who went over and viewed the sites. The unanimous opinion was that the large memorial ought to go to Vimy. Many of the army officers held that Vimy was by no means the most important battle that was fought by the Canadian corps; yet it is agreed that there is something distinctive regarding Vimy that comes very close to the hearts of Canadians. We have a small site there and we feel that sufficient of that ground should be acquired; we trust that Parliament will approve whatever recommendation we may finally make with that idea in view. The base of this memorial will occupy very nearly an acre of ground, and we hope we can acquire at a reasonable price certain portions of Vimy to perpetuate for all time the outstanding features of Canada's exploits on that ridge. That, I think, is what the Prime Minister referred to. I may say that all the members of the commission are unanimously of that opinion, and General Hughes has agreed to continue the negotiations with the French Government and some of the owners with a view to seeing just what land we can acquire for that purpose.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I quite agree with the suggestion that additional land be procured on Vimy Ridge. I was familiar with the work of this commission, because it is under the Department of Militia and Defence, as is also the War Graves Commission. I had an opportunity of personally inspecting all the eight sites which have been referred to by the hon. member for East Hamilton (Mr. Mewburn). At the time I examined the sites, the work on them was progressing. A good deal of work has been done on some of them in the way of levelling, cultivation, and the construction of permanent roadways, which have made them very accessible and also very beautiful. But what struck one on looking at the eight sites was that Vimy Ridge was too far removed from the main road and that many people might pass by without their attention being specially called to the fact that this site had been chosen as the location of the memorial. Originally the memorial was to have been erected on Hill 62, near the Ypres salient, but on further consideration, those more concerned than I was with the matter—the officers who had charge of it—decided that Vimy would be a more suitable point. It so happens that there is a large tract of the ridge running right out to the main highway which can be secured, I believe, on very reasonable terms from the government of France, who still own it. I quite agree with my hon. friend from East Hamilton and with the Prime Minister that the Vimy site should be secured right to the main road. It cannot cost very much, and the result will be to add materially to the value of the property as a monumental site.

Mr. SPEAKER: As this is a non-political matter, Mr. Chairman, I may, perhaps, be allowed to say a word. I had the honour to be appointed a member of this commission by the late government, and have attended all its sittings. The work has been most harmonious, and I must thank the late government for the appointment of my friend from East Hamilton (Mr. Mewburn) as chairman of that commission. I have asked the new Government, since there has been a change, to maintain him as chairman of that commission. Very little has been said in the Canadian press about the monuments which have finally been selected, but in looking over the British and the French press—and, I may say, the American press, because our secretary has collated all these reports and comments published in the newspapers—we find with pride that the monuments designed by Canadian artists equal, if they do not surpass, the memorials to be erected on that great battlefield by other nations. It has been stated—and I repeat, word for word, I think, what I have read in one of those most artistic reviews from France—that as regards grandeur, simplicity and reverence combined, there is nothing to equal the masterpiece that Allward, a Canadian, has produced. I re-echo the views expressed a moment ago by the Prime Minister. To Canadians, Vimy Ridge is hallowed ground, and it will be acquired by the commission if that can be done. I have nothing more to say; I repeat that I would not have taken part in this debate had the subject not been a non-political one. I am proud to serve on that commission and under my good friend the member for East Hamilton.

Mr. GRAHAM: Mr. Chairman, as this commission comes under the Department of Militia and Defence, I want to assure the committee that up to date everything connected with the commission has been most harmonious. The commission has had but one object in view, that of carrying out the wishes of Parliament in order that honour may be done to our dead and a lesson be thus taught to the living. I have visited some of the battlefields overseas, and take this opportunity or assuring any hon. gentlemen who are personally interested in the cemeteries over there that they are being taken care of in minutest detail.

When the work of the War Graves Commission is completed Canadians who go overseas will find places not only of beauty but places of reverent instruction, places helpful in forecasting the possibilities of the future viewed in the light of what has happened in the past. When I went overseas two years ago I was waited on by some gentlemen there who wished to get the views of the Canadian people on the suggestions that had been made, that the remains of the boys who had fallen should be brought back to Canada. It is a delicate question to discuss, but after having consultation with the War Graves Commission, and after visiting the cemeteries, I have no hesitation in giving it as my view that the boys ought to be left to rest where their day's work was finished. I believe that is best in the interest of the world as a whole because, in the years to come, these monuments erected to the memory of the Canadian boys will stand as a part of the history, in a sense, of the world's revolution, and if these bodies were to be removed we would lose one of the great lessons of the war. These cemeteries will form in the years to come a monument to Canada's ideals, to Canada's courage, and to Canada's devotion to what the people of this land deemed to be the right. I hope in a year or two, if I live, to visit these graves again, and I feel assured, from the sites that have been located for the erection of these battlefield memorials, that every Canadian who visits that land will feel a greater thrill of pride when he surveys these memorials.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Last Mountain): I am sorry the leader of the Progressives party is unavoidably absent at this moment, but having talked this matter over with him I know that had he been here his voice would have been raised in commendation of the work of the commission in reference to these war memorials. I believe too that he would have supported the idea of the Prime Minister that the commission should acquire a larger acreage in connection with the memorial at Vimy, and that this wonderful piece of work should not suffer for lack of space. It has been my privilege to view a photograph of these memorials and I am sure that all Canadians will feel great pride that we are to have such a memorial to commemorate the work of our men on Vimy Ridge as well as the smaller memorials at other points in the battle area.

Mr. SHAW: I wanted to make one observation which I am sure the hon. member for East Hamilton (Mr. Mewburn) would have uttered had it not perhaps inadvertently escaped him, and it is this: I think the public should know that these monuments are being placed on spots which, to Canadian soldiers at least, are all historic ground. It is unnecessary to say that the monument at Vimy Ridge is essentially one of that character; but perhaps it may not be known that numbers of the others too, commemorate probably some of the greatest engagements in which the Canadian soldiers took part. I need only mention that the contemplated memorial at the crossroads near the little town of Dury commemorates the successful attack on the Hindenburg line, in which the Canadian corps formed the spearhead on that particular day in September. Might I also mention that the memorial proposed at Bourlon Wood commemorates the Cambrai attack in the latter part of September, 1918. So too it will be recalled that the proposed memorial at Courcellette commemorates the attacks on the Somme; and similarly with the remainder. There is just one thing which occurs to me, as a tragic incident in connection with the war, and which probably will bring home to people who perhaps, at this distance, are not sufficiently impressed with the tremendous and awful horrors of war, and that is that to-day there are 19,000 Canadians, out of a total of 60,000 dead, who are missing. I think that is a tragic circumstance, and one that perhaps will not lose its significance upon those who seem to think that the horrors of war are overstated.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall the resolution carry?

Mr. GUTHRIE: The resolution comprises the whole war claims vote, whereas the item we have been discussing only refers to a sum of half a million. I understood my hon. friend wanted this particular item to pass. There was some arrangement with my hon. friend from East Hamilton (Mr. Mewburn) that it should be discussed, but I know that my leader was under the impression that the rest of the vote would not go through to-night.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Very well, we will hold it.

Mr. GRAHAM: With the exception of this item; we are through with this particular resolution.

Mr. GUTHRIE: That is perfectly satisfactory.

On motion of Mr. Mackenzie King for the adjournment of the House

Mr. GUTHRIE: We will have the Budget to-morrow?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes. I may say that once the debate on the Budget is commenced the Government would like it to proceed until it is disposed of.

Mr. GUTHRIE: That is, the debate should proceed each day after routine business?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes.

Motion agreed to and House adjourned 12.10 a.m. Tuesday.

Tuesday, May 23, 1922

The House met at three o'clock.

MEMORIAL TO THE LATE COLONEL G. H. BAKER, M.P.

Mr. W. F. KAY (Missisquoi) moved, seconded by Mr. Ethier: That the following members of parliament, namely Messieurs Ross (Kingston), Boivin, Kay and Mewburn be appointed a special committee to act with a like committee of the Senate in further considering and determining the form of the national memorial to be erected in the Parliament building to the late Lieut.-Colonel Baker, M.P., who lost his life on the field of battle, and that a message be sent to the Senate to acquaint their honours accordingly.

Motion agreed to.

PRIVATE BILLS

FIRST READINGS

Bill No. 109 (from the Senate), for the relief of D'Eyncourt Marshall Ostrom.—Mr. Church.

Bill No. 110 (from the Senate), for the relief of George Herbert Stanley Campbell.—Mr. Ross (Kingston).

Bill No. 112 (from the Senate), for the relief of Robert James Owen.—Mr. Boys.

Bill No. 113 (from the Senate), for the relief of Gibson Mackie Todd.—Mr. Boys.

Bill No. 115 (from the Senate), for the relief of Margaret Thompson.—Mr. Sheard.

Bill No. 116 (from the Senate), for the relief of Daniel Calvin Bell.—Mr. Sheard.

Bill No. 117 (from the Senate), for the relief of Stanley Davidson Morning.—Mr. Duff.

Bill No. 118 (from the Senate), for the relief of Johnston Nixon.—Mr. Rankin.

Bill No. 119 (from the Senate), for the relief of William Andrew Hawkins.—Mr. Ryckman.

Bill No. 120 (from the Senate), for the relief of James Malone.—Mr. Boys.

Bill No. 121 (from the Senate), for the relief of Marjorie Elizabeth Wickson.—Mr. Maclean (York).

Mr. SPEAKER: Bill No. 111, for the relief of Deliah Jane Mills, and Bill No. 114, for the relief of Mary Agnes Flynn Donoghue, have no sponsor, and their first reading must be postponed.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): It was understood that we would go on with the Budget; but might I ask the committee if they will kindly take up, in the first instance, Order No. 12, on the Order Paper? The Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) has been delayed for a few moments in coming into the House, and we might proceed with that Order if hon. gentlemen opposite are agreeable.

[Mr. Kay.]

ANIMAL CONTAGIOUS DISEASES ACT AMENDMENT

On motion of Hon. W. R. Motherwell (Minister of Agriculture) Bill No. 62, to amend the Animal Contagious Diseases Act, was read the second time, and the House went into committee thereon, Mr. Gordon in the Chair.

On section 1—maximum compensation reduced.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: As this Bill went through its second reading so quickly, I had not an opportunity of making a few remarks at that stage, but they probably can be made just as well now. As most hon. members are doubtless aware, since 1906 an act has been in force providing for certain compensation for animals on account of their being slaughtered to prevent the spread of contagious disease. That act has been changed from time to time with regard to the amount of compensation in proportion to the increase in value of animals on the market, whether pure bred or animals for commercial purposes. Now it is thought advisable to reduce the compensation to correspond with the reduction in value of animals on the market. That is the purport of this bill. There may be a difference of opinion as to the amount of this reduction on the various classes of animals; but I do not think there will be any difference of opinion in the committee as to the principle of reducing the compensation in proportion to the reduced value of animals on the market today. As a matter of fact, many animals are not worth one-half what they were two years ago; and as this bill is for the purpose, not of purchasing animals, but rather of indemnifying owners who have had animals examined and slaughtered, it is obviously inadvisable to leave these indemnifications at the high rate at which they are at present. It seems to my officials and myself that the amounts named in the bill are about right, but they are not fixed arbitrarily, and I shall be glad to have any suggestions made in cases where it is considered they are left either too high or too low.

Mr. CRERAR: What is the amount of the reduction that has taken place?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I have in my hand a statement showing the various amount of indemnities during the years since 1906, and I have a copy of this for my hon. friend. The statement reads:

Between 1906 and 1913
Pure breds—
Horses	$300
Cattle	150
Pigs or sheep	50
Grades—
Horses	$150
Cattle	60
Pigs or sheep	15
Between 1913 and 1918
Pure breds—
Horses	$500
Cattle	150
Pigs or sheep	50
Grades—
Horses	200
Cattle	60
Pigs or sheep	15

Then, as the act was amended in 1918:

Pure breds—
Horses	$500
Cattle	250
Pigs or sheep	75
Grades—
Horses	200
Pigs or sheep	20

The figures provided for in this amendment now before the committee are exactly identical with what they were from 1906 to 1913, just before the war, which I have already read. It is within the judgment of the House to indicate in what instance they are still too high or may be made too low. It was not originally intended to purchase the animals, but to encourage the inspection of them. The object was to identify and destroy diseased animals and indemnify the owners to the extent of these amounts, leaving the animals as salvage to the owners in addition to the indemnifications. It must be remembered also that we have only a certain amount of money to do the work with, the reasonable compensation like the foregoing will clean up a larger number of herds than if we left the indemnifications too high. In other words, you get more useful work done by this fair indemnification proposed in the bill than by the present rate, and at the same time give to the owners a fair compensation on the basis of the valuation of the animals.

Mr. JOHNSON (Moosejaw): Is the full value of the animal paid or only a percentage of the value?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: It depends on the relative value of the animal, but the inspector will take this amount proposed as a maximum. The compensation for each individual animal will depend upon the inspector's appraisal of its value.

Mr. JOHNSON (Moosejaw): I do not think the minister grasps my point. Is the indemnification a percentage of the value of the animal, or is it the entire value?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: It is two-thirds of the value.

Mr. JOHNSON (Moosejaw): That is what I thought.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: And it is based upon the inspector's appraisal.

Mr. SALES: The inspector, I understand, may give what compensation he thinks is proper according to the value, in his estimation, of the animal destroyed. But the maximum is $150?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Yes.

Mr. SALES: Does not the minister think that this maximum is rather low? Here we have the question of tuberculosis confronting us. This is an important matter, as it effects the health of our people, especially young children who drink the milk from these animals. Many of these animals cost more than $150, some of them two, three or four times as much; and I think that, considering the way in which we were voting money for ammunition last night and for various other matters, we might well increase the maximum compensation paid to the owners of these animals. I urge this point not because it is a matter of agriculture; it is something that is of vital importance to all our people, from the point of view of health. I suggest that the maximum be increased by $50 at least, making the compensation $200. Horses are not used for food, and I am quite satisfied to let the compensation in regard to these animals, and in regard to swine and sheep, stand as it is.

Mr. HODGINS: I am not quite clear as to the meaning of the bill. Does the minister mean that the compensation to be allowed is two thirds of $150? He might explain that point.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: As the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) is ready to deliver his Budget I move that the committee rise and report progress.

Motion agreed to and progress reported.

THE BUDGET

ANNUAL FINANCIAL STATEMENT BY HON. W. S. FIELDING, MINISTER OF FINANCE.

Hon. W. S. FIELDING (Minister of Finance, member for Shelburne and Queens), moved:

That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair for the House to go into Committee of Ways and Means.

He said: Mr. Speaker, eleven years have passed since I last had the pleasure of delivering the Budget Speech in this House of Commons. During these years, and particularly since the year 1914, a great change has come over the financial position of the Dominion. I am sometimes afraid that the full character and the consequence of that change are but inadequately appreciated and understood by the majority of our people. That Canada has built up a very large public debt; that the interest alone on that debt calls for an enormous sum of money, greater indeed than the total expenditure of Canada but a few years ago; that we have a large pension list; and that in various ways we have added enormously to our obligations, are facts well understood by all close students of our public affairs. I think they may possibly be understood in a way, a vague and hazy way perhaps, by the broader public whom we sometimes typify as "the man in the street." He has an opinion, no doubt, that things are a little more serious than they used to be; but I do not think he has quite appreciated the full consequences of the change. Some things are happening as in the good old days. The board of trade, the chamber of commerce, the city council, the town council, and all the other excellent organizations which exist for the advancement of the community, hold their meetings and pass their resolves. They decide at once that for some particular thing which is dearest to their hearts they must instantly have a large appropriation, and then they send sheaves of resolutions to that effect, sometimes following those up with delegations in carload lots to impress upon the Government the necessity of complying with their request. Have these people no notion whatever of the situation? It would hardly be fair to say that. Yes, they have a notion in a way; they have a formula of their own; and they will say to the ministers: "Gentlemen, of course we understand that the situation is a little more anxious than it was wont to be; of course, there is need of economy. But the particular thing we want, everyone must admit, is entirely an exception to the rule." We are all in favour of economy for the other fellow, but we are not so ready to recognize the need of economy in the case of the things that are nearest and dearest to us ourselves.

I must to-day present two thoughts which are of paramount importance. The first is as to the need, the deep and earnest need, of economy. That means that we must appeal both to members of Parliament and to the people to pass what I may call self-denying ordinances. They must not expect all the things which in the good old days they got so readily,—it may be a railway, a bridge, a public work of some kind, a public building, a breakwater, a pier, or any one of the numerous things which we should all like to have, all in their way useful in the development of the community, all desirable, some of them even urgent under better conditions. But it is unpleasant to have to tell people, in most cases, that these things must for the present stand aside. The second thought is that, with all the economy that we can practise, there will still be need of severe examination into our taxation system. It is not pleasant to have to increase taxes, but the fact is that under our present taxation system, I am afraid, with all the economy we can practise, there will not be sufficient means to meet the various obligations of the country. And so we will have to ask the consideration of hon. members and of the public in order that there may be a proprer appreciation of these new conditions that have arisen.

The accounts for the fiscal year 1920-21 have been published and distributed, so that one need not dwell upon them to any extent. The budget speech necessarily takes some account of three years—the year which has passed and for which we have the public accounts, the year that is sometimes current—in this case it happens to be just finished;— and we have to have some regard to the year ahead.

Income and Expenditure

For the year 1920-21 the public accounts show what is called a surplus, to the amount of $73,268,391. Old members may recall the discussions that have taken place in this House from time to time with regard to the manner in which a surplus is declared. A Finance Minister who has the good fortune to produce a surplus—I have had that good luck on a number of occasions—may find, and very often will find, that he meets with this criticism: Oh, you have no such surplus; you actually have run into debt during the year. The method in the past of showing a surplus has been to take what is called the ordinary expenditure of the country—the everyday expenditure, if I may so call it—and set against it the revenue of the year, which left you either a surplus or a deficit. If that revenue is more than the ordinary expenditure you will have a surplus; if it is less than the ordinary expenditure you will have a deficit.

But every year there are expenditures which do not appear in that calculation. The objection made in times past was well founded. It was and is a fact that there are always expenditures of a special character, and the criticism that has been made in times past is in that respect correct. The distinction that is drawn between capital expenditure and ordinary expenditure has often been a subject of debate. This much is clear, that where you have important public works, large undertakings—such, for example, as this building—they are a legitimate charge to capital account. There is very often much dispute as to what is a proper charge and what is not, but I have observed that notwithstanding criticism of that character, whenever a change of government occurred the new Minister of Finance coming into office fell into the old ways and claimed a surplus even when the country was running into debt.

It is not an unfair claim to make if the facts be clearly understood. It has always been the method by which our public accounts have been conducted. So when the accounts for 1920-21 claimed that there was a large surplus of $73,000,000, the method of bookkeeping was being followed that had existed in the past, yet as a matter of fact during that year there was actually an increase in the public debt of $92,000,000 and over, the difference, of course, representing the charges to capital and special account and that now ever-growing account, the railway service of the country.

If we turn to the year 1921-22, the year that has just closed, although the accounts are not quite complete we are sufficiently informed to be able to make a substantially correct statement of the outcome.

The income tax and business profits tax for this last year show an increase of $14,276,774 over the receipts of the previous year. That, of course, is very gratifying; but on the other side the Customs Department shows a decrease of $57,000,000. The total revenue from all sources we place at $381,271,000, against in 1920-21 $434,386,000. There was, therefore, a very large decrease in the revenue of the year.

The expenditure charged to consolidated fund was $348,145,000, a decrease of $12,972,000, as compared with the previous year. With a revenue of $381,271,000, and an expenditure on consolidated fund of $348,145,000, there is therefore an apparent surplus, according to the method which I have spoken of, of $33,125,000 on the year just closed. There were, however, other expenses on capital account of $23,073,000, cost of loan flotations $80,218, demobilization $9,180,000. Then there are other payments which are classified as investments, active or non-active; only the active investments are taken in the reduction of the public debt.

The result of the operations for the year just closed is that while we have according to one calculation a surplus, we have to acknowledge an addition to the public debt of $86,417,000.

For the fiscal year 1922-23, on which we have entered, on the basis of our present taxation I would estimate that the revenue would be $332,629,000. In this we are including customs at $103,000,000, which is $2,500,000 less than the receipts of the past year. If our anticipations of improving business are realized, we should do a little better than this.

With regard to income tax we could not expect to be so fortunate. This tax is levied on the income of the past year, which was not a good business year; indeed, I think it was a year of exceptional depression, and the effect of that depression will be marked in the reduction of our income tax receipts for the present year. We received last year from income tax and from business profits tax $101,500,000. We would not feel justified in estimating for the coming year more than $60,000,000 from that source.

With a loss of revenue last year as compared with the previous year of $53,000,000, and with a prospect of a shortage of $40,000,000 on the income tax for the current year, the House will see that the situation is a very serious one indeed.

From these and other receipts we estimate a total revenue for the present year of $332,629,000, based, of course, upon our present system of taxation.

The estimates of expenditure which we have submitted to Parliament called for a total of $466,983,359. Supplementary estimates yet to come will add something to this total, but I hope not much.

From our present sources of revenue we could provide for all our ordinary expenditure and have a modest surplus—in the way that surpluses are now made up—but there would still be a large expenditure on capital account and for the railways, and this would have to be provided for by additions to the public debt. That would not be a very cheerful prospect. We must soon begin to consider the question of the reduction of our public debt rather than aim to increase it. Great Britain with all her troubles has since the war paid off £500,000,000 of her public debt. The United States is making efforts to reduce her public debt. We have not only made no reduction, but we have to acknowledge a steady increase in the public debt every year since the war. Last year, three and a half years after the armistice, we increased our debt by $86,500,000. If we cannot reduce our debt, we should at all events make strenuous efforts to guard against increasing it. We should endeavour to balance our budget, that is, to pay all classes of our expenditure. It would be a joy to me if I could tell the House that we have an expectation of that during the present year. I am afraid, however, the situation will not permit us to do so much. Let us ever recognize our obligation to move in that direction and make every possible effort toward the end in view. We cannot do this if we are content to rest on our present methods of taxation. Even if our estimates of revenue, which are conservative, should be exceeded —and I hope they will—we shall find ourselves short by a considerable sum. If we are to avoid that situation we must accept the responsibility of additional taxation.

The Public Debt

I want to call attention now to the increase of our public debt. Against the gross debt are set off what are called the assets of the Dominion. In former years practically all our assets were treated as good. When the amount was not very great in proportion to our business, perhaps there was no need of any discrimination, but when these assets, under the operation of our railways, grew to very large figures, it became desirable or necessary that there should be discrimination. My predecessor in office, very properly I think, made that discrimination by dividing those assets into active and non-active. It makes no difference with regard to the general expenditure, but if only the good assets are set off against the gross debt we get a fairer statement of the real debt of the country. Now, we are continuing this method of treating the assets: we treat these railway moneys as loans. Perhaps there can be some just objection to that. The Grand Trunk and the Canadian Northern are now virtually owned by the Dominion of Canada, and when we advance money to them we are, in a sense, lending money to ourselves. When we represent these debts as assets, a keen critic might find some fault. But it may be that it will be necessary to continue that system; we are following out the accounts for 1922 in that way. There may be an advantage and a convenience in separating the railway operations from the rest of our expenditure. However, there is another view of the matter. We have a justification for charging to capital or to a special account some particular thing—the building of a railway, for instance. Various classes of public expenditure having permanent results may properly be classified as assets, may properly be classified under capital account. But if from year to year we are to provide for the ordinary expenses of the railway; if we are to provide for the deficit, the difference between receipts and expenditure; if we are also to provide large sums for interest on the bonds and other securities of these so-called railway companies—if we are to do that unfailingly every year, with a reducing figure we may hope, it will be open to some to say, with much justice, that this is no longer a special account but part of the ordinary expenditure of the country; and if so, that ordinary expenditure should be included before we undertake to declare a surplus. However, as I said a moment ago, there may be some advantage in keeping the accounts of the railways for the present as separate and apart from the others. If we clearly and definitely understand the nature of the transaction, I suppose there may be no serious objection to it.

The net debt on the 31st March, 1914—I am taking that year as one of great events —was $335,996,850. That was the accumulation of half a century of confederation. It included what remained of all the old provincial debts taken over by the Dominion. It included the construction of great public works. It included what we once thought were large expenditures. The result of it was that that debt in 1914 was a shade under $336,000,000. That was considered in its day a large debt, and many a speech was made in this House as to its magnitude, many a cautious member wondered how we were ever going to stand it. But what are we to say of it to-day in comparison with the enormous debt that we now have? As against a little less than $336,000,000 in 1914, our estimated net debt on the 31st March of the present year was $2,427,296,798. Our largest increase was in 1920—$674,000,000; the smallest increase was in the year recently closed—$86,000,000.

Loans

During the year four Canadian government loans have been floated. Three of these have been in the names of the railway companies and one a direct government obligation. We still keep up the theory of corporations in regard to these railways; the railway loans are issued in the names of the railway companies, with guarantees by the government. As a matter of fact, the government to-day are both makers and endorsers of those securities; so that practically they are now government loans. Three of these loans, therefore, have been railway loans guaranteed by the government; the fourth was a direct government loan, of which I shall speak in a moment. In July, 1921, there were sold $25,000,000 of 6½ per cent Canadian Northern Railway bonds guaranteed by the government. These were sold at 92½; they were afterwards sold to the public at 96¼. There was thus on that transaction a clear margin of profit to the buyers of 4 per cent—the spread between what the government got and what the investors who got them paid. This, I think, indicates that it was rather a better transaction for the buyers of the bonds than it was for the government. In September, 1921, a $25,000,000 fifteen year 6 per cent loan of the Grand Trunk, guaranteed by the government, was placed. It was sold in New York to realize 92; subsequently it was issued to the public at 95¼, a spread in this case of 3¼ per cent—a little less than in the case of the previous loan, but still a pretty large margin for a transaction of that kind. A third loan was one of $11,000,000, floated by the present Government in March of this year, $11,000,000 of three year Canadian Northern Railway five per cent notes guaranteed by the Government. We needed $11,000,000 to retire obligations of the Canadian Northern Railway arising in New York and London. We thought the arrangements that had been made on former occasions for the sale of these bonds had not worked out to the advantage of the Government, and we adopted a different method; we invited tenders in New York for the loan, received the bids, awarded the contract, and sold these notes at 99.03. They were sold again to the public at 99⅝, a spread between what we received and what the investor paid of 59 cents on the $100, as against $4 on the hundred in one case and $3.25 on the hundred in the other.

Then, we come to the $100,000,000 5 per cent loan which we recently placed in New York. That loan was to run thirty years, with our right to redeem it, if we wished to do so, in twenty years. It was sold at 97½; it was afterwards placed on the market at par. Some reference has occasionally been made to commissions. I ought to say that the word is not appropriate. In all these transactions to which I have referred there was no question of commissions; the price mentioned in each case was the net price received by the Government. Our $100,000,000 loan sold for 97½ net; there were no commissions or charges of any sort to reduce it. We shall probably need for our financial operations some further borrowing at no distant date. I am hoping that when the moment arrives the condition of the money market in Canada will be such that we can have a domestic loan. I think many people regard it as important that we should place our loans at home, because the interest then is payable to our own people. That is an excellent idea, but it may be pushed too far. There are times when it would be manifestly advantageous to Canada to go abroad. But to begin with, times are not so favourable now for placing loans at home. The loans which were so successfully placed a few years ago had for their support the war spirit and the war fever of the time. Men entered into these transactions largely from patriotic purposes, and they had money to invest in those days, for money was being made. That situation is not exactly repeated to-day. The last year has not been a good business year. Not many men have made money. Not many men have money to invest in government bonds to-day, and there is no longer the patriotic zeal for the war. A loan to-day must be looked upon as a cold-blooded proposition. It might be you would have to offer, to induce our Canadian people to invest in a loan, a higher rate of interest than could be obtained elsewhere. On anything like even terms I should prefer the domestic loan, if the money is available.

There is still another thought. Canada is still, I won't say an undeveloped country, but a partially developed country; Canada will still have to be a borrowing country for many years. We shall have to go abroad for capital. If we have too much money locked up in government bonds at home, there will be less money available for mortgages and industrial enterprises in this country. Much will depend on the condition of the money market. If there is an abundance of money, it may be wise for us to have a domestic loan. If there is not an abundance of money, it may be wise to go abroad, because if foreign capital is to be brought in it is easier for the government to bring it in probably than it would be for others. We may still hope, however, that conditions will favour a domestic loan when the moment arrives for us to make another move of that kind.

There is an interesting account that we have with the British government of which it is perhaps worth while passing mention should be made. In the early days of the war, arrangements were made by the government of the day with the British government whereby moneys were advanced by the Mother Country for the payment of our troops in England and France. For a considerable time that continued, and at one time we owed a very considerable amount to the Imperial government. In 1915, on December 31, we owed the British government almost $141,000,000. Then a change took place. The British government desired to buy munitions and supplies of various kinds in Canada, and they arranged with the Canadian government that advances should be made in Canada to the charge of the British government. Since that point was reached, the account has turned the other way, and we have ever since that been the creditor of the British government to a large amount. At one time, on the 31st of August, 1919, the British government owed us the enormous sum of $333,000,000. On March 31, 1922, the year just closed, subject to some questions of readjustment with regard to exchange, Great Britain owed us on that date, $117,859,630. Arrangements have now been made by which this account is to be paid off in installments of $5,000,000 per month. We have received two payments of that character and no doubt in due course the whole matter will be settled.

Trade

Coming to the question of our trade, the effects of the depression of the past year are clearly seen in the returns of our import and export trade. As compared with 1921 our imports from the United Kingdom fell from $213,000,000 to $117,000,000, and our imports from the United States dropped from $856,000,000 to $516,000,000. Our exports to the United Kingdom held better, the amount for 1922 being $299,000,000, and for 1921 $312,000,000. Our exports to the United States showed the course of the decline, being $293,000,000 against $542,000,000 in the previous year. I do not wish to ask the privilege of the House to put in many statistical documents, but there is one statement prepared by our Bureau of Statistics which I shall ask the House to let me insert. It shows in a condensed form the trade of Canada with each country of the world for a number of years. It will not occupy a great deal of space, and it presents that aspect of the matter in a very quick form. If the House has no objection, I shall see that it is included in my speech.

Trade Agreements and Negotiations

Several things have happened with regard to the tariff lately with other countries. An agreement was made by the late government, as the House will remember, with the British West Indies, which came into operation at an early date, and affected most of those islands. One of the islands, however, which remained outside for a considerable period, was Jamaica, but she has now joined the arrangement, and the agreement of that day is in force as between Canada and all the British West Indies.

We have many inquiries with regard to our relations with Australia. There have been communications for some time, under the late government, and under the present government, with the Australian government in relation to that. In the early days of our preferential arrangements, one of the Australian colonies received the benefit of the preference. New South Wales was a low tariff country and she was entitled to the preference. The neighbouring colony of Victoria had higher tariffs, and was not entitled to the preference. Soon after the Australian Commonwealth was formed a new tariff was adopted, which was less favourable than that of New South Wales, and from that time forward Australia has not had the benefit of our preference. Efforts have been made by the late government and by this to bring about a friendly arrangement between the two countries. Recently a member of the Australian government passed through Ottawa and we had an opportunity to discuss the subject with him. He manifested a warm interest in the matter and gave us every reason to expect that the Australian government would take a friendly view of our proposal. Thereupon we proposed to the Australian government that they should give us the preference which the United Kingdom enjoys, and we in return would give them the benefit of our preference. That proposal has not been accepted nor have we received any counter-proposal. However, we fully anticipate that some opportunity will occur for further negotiations, and our hope is that we will be able to make a satisfactory arrangement with the Australian Commonwealth.

Not many months ago this House ratified a treaty that had been made with France. It seemed to have been of a temporary character, contemplating a larger treaty at a later date. I believe the French Consul General approached the late government with a view to further negotiations, but the time was not then deemed opportune and nothing was done. We have recently been asked by the French Consul General to take up the matter, and have intimated our willingness to do so. That is the way the matter stands at the present. I hope at no distant date we shall have some further negotiations, and possibly we may be able to revive the old treaty with France, or make some other treaty which will be fair and just to both sides.

Tariff Revision

Now I come to the question of tariff revision. In the Speech from the Throne His Excellency the Governor General said:

> You will be invited to consider the expediency of making some changes in the Customs Tariff. While there are details of revision, the consideration of which will require time and care that are not at present available, there are features of the tariff which it is felt may properly be dealt with during the present session.

The work of tariff revision may be divided into two parts. What I shall call part 1, the part which most concerns the public, I think, is that which touches the revision in the direction of re-

4 p.m. duction, if there is to be a reduction, in the duties of customs. That is probably the subject most keenly interesting both to those desiring the reduction and to those who do not desire it. The other part relates to what I may call readjustments in a different way. With the progress of time new conditions arise, new interpretations of the Customs tariff are given, new questions come before the Board of Customs, allegations are made that there is inequality between the duty on the raw material and the duty on the finished article. Many questions of that kind arise, not of wide concern to the public generally, but each of concern to some interest which is affected by it. There may be questions of that character to which we shall have to give attention at another time. Some of such there certainly will be, perhaps not so many as some people imagine, but with that portion of the question which relates to the matter of tariff reduction, we propose to deal at once.

The line upon which we ought to be expected to deal, and upon which we intend to deal, is expressed in a resolution that I had the pleasure of moving in this House a year ago:

> That, while recognizing that existing financial requirements of the Dominion demand the maintenance of a Customs Tariff, the House is unable to concur in the declarations by the Government that the tariff should be based on the principle of protection; the tariff is a tax, and the aim of legislation should be to make taxation as light as circumstances will permit;

That the aim of the fiscal policy of Canada should be the encouragement of industries based on the natural resources of the country, the development of which may reasonably be expected to create healthy enterprises, giving promise of enduring success;

That such changes should be made in the Customs duties as may be expected to reduce the cost of living, and to reduce also the cost of implements of production required for the efficient development of the natural resources of the Dominion;

That, while keeping this aim clearly in mind, the House recognizes that in any readjustment of the tariff that may take place, regard must be had to existing conditions of trade, and changes made in such a manner as will cause the least possible disturbance of business.

This resolution declares for tariff reduction—a tariff reduction that should be made with great care, guarding against any interference of a serious character with the business of the country. The policy so laid down is the policy we are prepared to carry out to-day. With the exception of one item, an increase for strictly revenue purposes, every change I shall propose to-day is a reduction in the Customs tariff; it is a revision downwards at every point.

British Preference

We maintain the British preference which the Liberal government established in 1897 and 1898. When that principle was adopted by the Canadian government it gave offence for a while to some of the people of other nations. Germany, in particular, took offence at it, and for a while undertook to penalize us because of the action we had taken. Other countries, perhaps, did not like it, but still took no very strong part against us. Germany and Belgium were in a particularly favoured position. Other nations had the benefit of what is called "Favoured nation treatment". That is, that any nation having what is called a "Favoured nation" treaty shall, at all times, be on even terms with any other nation. That is the general principle of what the favoured nation condition requires. Germany and Belgium had more than that. Germany and Belgium had made treaties—Lord Salisbury called them "those unlucky treaties"—under which they had a right to claim not only the same conditions that were extended to other foreign nations, but the same terms and conditions that were extended to our Mother Country. We had to get rid of those old treaties before we could establish the British preference, and in the end we did.

In the United States some objection was taken, but not in an official way. There was a good deal of discussion in the American press as to this, as was said, "unfriendly act"; but the American government never took objection. When the matter came up they understood that it was entirely a question within our own family circle. And that is the situation to-day. We stand by the British Preference to-day, and the world recognizes that it is our right to make any arrangement we desire within the Imperial family without any other nation having cause to take offence at it. So we adhere to the British Preference in the arrangement we make, and the effect of the change that we make will be to increase, in some respects, that preference.

Trade with the United States

For many years we regarded the United States as pursuing an unfriendly policy towards Canada in tariff matters. I do not think it was ever deliberately intended to penalize Canada; but we were the nearest neighbour and the tariff policy of the United States unquestionably did seriously affect us, and produced a good deal of hostile feeling in Canada; for years we had reason to complain and we did complain. There came, however, a happier moment when a change occurred. There came a moment when the American government sent representatives to Ottawa to ask us to reopen negotiations, and see whether we could not come to a friendly arrangement. The result of that negotiation—first held in Ottawa and afterwards in Washington—was the making of a comprehensive agreement. It was not a treaty but a comprehensive agreement which was entered into in 1910-11 as the House will remember. I am wondering whether we did not miss the golden opportunity then.

> There is a tide in the affairs of men
> Which, taken at the flood, leads on to fortune.

The flood tide of goodwill in trade matters from our American neighbours came to us in 1910-11, but unhappily the Canadian people did not accept the agreement. I do not want to dwell upon that further than to have the fact clearly understood that though, in former years, we had reason to complain of unfriendly action, at that moment we had every reason to recognize the fairness of the American government. A happy combination of circumstances arose then which has not arisen since; which perhaps may not come again. A Republican administration, an administration representing the party of high tariff, was in power at Washington; and yet that Republican administration had come to us with a willingness to give us what we thought was a fair deal. The Democratic party was traditionally a low tariff party; and so, with the Republican administration supporting the agreement, the Democratic party naturally gave it their good will. The agreement was confirmed by the American Congress. It was not confirmed by Canada, much, as I think, to the regret of many of the people to-day who at that time did not view it with favour. Now many things have happened since that time. The Democratic party coming into power established trade arrangements which, for some years, gave us some of the benefits which reciprocity would have given us. The Democratic tariff gave us a chance still to do business, and we did a very extensive business. Unfortunately, however,—no I should not say that; we do not want to meddle in the politics of our neighbours—the people of the United States in their wisdom turned out the Democratic party, and the Republican party were restored to power. Since they were restored to power they have introduced what is called the Fordney Emergency Act, which deals largely with agricultural products. That Act unquestionably worked great harm to the Dominion of Canada, and especially to our western provinces. There is no doubt in the world—we may frankly acknowledge it—that the trade relations that had grown up between the two countries were sadly marred by the Emergency Tariff Act, and our western country in some branches of industry—notably the cattle business—has suffered severely in consequence. Now there is another Tariff Bill at Washington—a bill that has passed the House of Representatives and is now before the Senate—which proposes to enlarge on the Fordney Emergency Act. It includes, I think, all the duties of that Act, and in some instances they are increased. It proposes to establish a schedule of duties which is very high indeed. We have no right to complain of our American friends for doing that; but if they assume that position they cannot expect us in Canada to be as willing as we otherwise would to deal liberally with them. If our American brethren try to persuade themselves that you can sell all the time and never buy, we can only regret that they are failing to understand an economic truth; but since they want to pursue that policy we regret it because it must affect our own attitude towards them. I have had the privilege of being at Washington to discuss this question. I have had the opportunity to say to the President of the United States, and to the leading Congressmen of the Union, that Canada, notwithstanding the events of 1911, was prepared to open negotiations. We were glad that we had a friendly offer before. We were sorry on account of the difference with respect to it amongst our own Canadian people. However, we thought that was past and gone. We thought that the Canadian people to-day were prepared—at all events we the Government of Canada were now prepared—to undertake negotiations with the desire to obtain something like the agreement of 1911. Anyhow we took that course feeling that it would bring about better relations, believing that good relations will be better for both countries. We do not say that we are dependent on the United States, and still less that the United States would admit that they are dependent on us; each country can live and prosper and flourish without the other, but both will live and prosper and flourish more if they have friendly relations and intercourse as good neighbours should. A distinguished American, who himself was closely identified with the reciprocity movement in 1911, said some months ago that if the reciprocity movement was ever to be revived it must come from Canada. The United States, having made a friendly offer which was rejected, could not be expected to come to Canada again. That was a fair criticism. It was our move; we have made the move, and we have intimated to the American government in the way that I have described, that we are quite ready to re-open negotiations, with every desire to make a friendly arrangement. Whether anything will come of that or not remains to be seen. For the present, while our American friends are not prepared to meet us in the generous spirit they did in 1910 and 1911, while, in their judgment, it is necessary to adopt the high tariff policy which is now before Congress and which, in all probability, will become law, they will surely admit that, at such a moment, they cannot reasonably expect us to make concessions towards them. Therefore, we propose to hold our hands in that respect and to await the turn of events at Washington. We shall be open at all times to friendly negotiations; but for the present, we are about to make tariff reductions which we are not prepared to extend to them. Whether we shall later be able to extend any of them to the United States or not depends entirely upon the attitude which they assume. I think myself there is a hope for better things. The bill at Washington is not universally popular; there is very strong opposition to it, and there is a possibility that it may not pass. But at all events, I think—and I am sure the House will agree with me—that until we have a clear understanding of what our American friends are going to do, we should hold our hands as regards the United States.

The reductions which we are going to make are almost entirely in the British preference. We are not going, except in a few cases, to reduce duties on American goods, which come to us under the operation of the general tariff. There are a few things which we desire in Canada which can be obtained most conveniently from the United States. As regards agricultural implements, for example, to offer a reduction of the British preferential tariff on agricultural implements would only provoke a smile, because such things are not brought from Great Britain; they are made in the United States. In that case, and in a few similar cases, we reduce the tariff on American goods, that is the general tariff, because that is the tariff that applies; but speaking broadly and generally, our reductions are being made in the British preferential tariff and not in the general tariff which would apply to the United States.

Marking and Valuation

I shall come shortly to the details of what we propose in that direction. Meantime, let me say that there are some other features to which I wish to call attention. The budget of last year introduced a number of features which, though I am sure they were well intended by the minister who introduced them, did not work out well. They have proved to be unsatisfactory, and I think there is no question about that now. One of these provisions was an amendment to the Customs Tariff Act providing that all goods that were imported should, where possible be marked, stamped, branded and so forth, and penalties were imposed for failure to do this. The government which passed that regulation evidently had occasion to reconsider their judgment on the matter; at all events they were reluctant to enforce it. The law required that the act should take effect on the 31st of October, 1921, I think it was; but when that date arrived, the then government decided that they would not enforce the act, and they gave notice by Order in Council that its enforcement was postponed until the 31st of December. When the 31st of December came, another Government was in power by one day—it got in on the 30th—and the Minister of Customs and Inland Revenue of the present Government shortly after advised that the thing was unworkable and that it be postponed until the present Parliament should be consulted. We are now in a position to determine what to do. Our opinion is that, as a general law, this provision should be repealed. We propose, in any particular case of an exceptional character, when there are reasons why articles imported from abroad should be marked, that we should have the right by Order in Council to deal with the matter; but we propose that, as a general law, this provision shall be repealed.

Another provision of that kind was with regard to the valuation of goods. The time-honoured system of Canada was that the value of goods for customs purposes was the fair market value in the country of production. That has been our custom for ages. A proposal was made last year to enact that the customs officer must determine the value; that the value for duty must be not less than the cost of production in the country which produces the goods, plus a fair profit. How an unfortunate customs officer, any one of the hundreds scattered throughout Canada, was going to be able to determine the cost of production of these things in a far-away country, I cannot readily understand, and still more would be his difficulty to determine what, under all the circumstances, was a fair profit. However that may be, we are of opinion that that also is an unnecessary interference with trade, and we propose to wipe it out.

Another regulation of a somewhat similar character dealt with the question of depreciated currency. The German mark, for example, is normally worth nearly twenty-four cents; it is actually worth today one-third of a cent. The act of last year provided that in no case should depreciation of currency be recognized below 50 per cent. That is to say, in the case of German trade, whatever might be the value of goods for customs purposes, the mark was to be declared worth 50 per cent of its original value; that is, roughly speaking, it should be worth about 12 cents. The normal value of the mark is 24 cents; it is declared to-day to be worth 12 cents, whereas, the actual value to-day is one-third of a cent. What you do by this is really to multiply the duty by a fictitious value, to multiply it by 36 times to-day. That is to say, the thing which is worth only one-third of a cent, you say shall be worth 12 cents. That multiplies its value, as I said, 36 times. So, while you keep up the pretence of a duty of 35 per cent, you are actually taxing those goods 1,000 per cent. If you want to say that German goods shall be prohibited, say so; if you shrink from saying that in such a direct way, then put on the 1,000 per cent duty; but do not humbug the world at large by pretending that we have a duty of 35 per cent when the real duty is about 1,000 per cent.

Another feature of the matter to which I should like to draw attention is this: The design, no doubt, was to give an enhanced protection to some industries which desired it; but what was the effect? The late government have not succeeded in shutting out German goods. What they have succeeded in doing is in shutting out the Canadian merchant from an opportunity of doing direct trade and in obliging him to pay tribute to somebody else. For example, if a merchant in Holland buys goods in Germany, takes them to Holland and then sells them to a merchant in Canada, the invoice is expressed, not in German marks, but in the currency of Holland which is not depreciated. The Hollander is allowed to purchase the goods at their real value, and the Canadian merchant can go to Rotterdam and buy the goods; but he has to pay the real German price plus the cost of transportation to Holland, plus the Holland merchant's profit—that is, the invoice price of the goods. The Canadian merchant can bring the German goods into Canada in that way; but he cannot bring them in direct. He can do better than that: he can go to England, where there is no duty. The English merchant can buy the German goods at the real value of the mark; he takes them to England, and he sells them to the merchants in Canada at an English price. The merchant in Canada still gets the goods; he is getting them to-day; but he has to pay tribute to the merchant in Holland or in London, and the real effect of this is to prevent the Canadian merchant from doing a direct trade and to oblige him to pay tribute to somebody else. We propose to abolish the whole thing.

Another regulation at that time—it was a busy time in the Budget last year—contemplated the establishment of commercial agencies abroad and the requirement that a commercial agent of Canada should have his certificate attached to every invoice of $100 or more. It could be seen at once that if that was to be effected, we would have to have a large army of commercial agents, scattered throughout the wide world. After adopting that, the government seem to have had some hesitation in applying it. They did not bring it into force at once. They provided that it should be brought into operation by order of the Governor in Council. They have never brought it into operation. To-day it is a dead issue and we propose to make it doubly dead by wiping it out.

We are making a numerous list of reductions. I shall not detain the House by giving every one. My recollection is that there are forty-nine or fifty items in the tariff that are affected. The resolutions to be placed on the Table immediately will give them all in detail. In the meantime I can state some of the particular items. Last year an arrangement was made whereby the duty on alcohol was increased to a very high figure. It is now $9 per proof gallon. Provision was made that in the case of men engaged in the making of pharmaceutical preparations, where they are largely engaged in the business, and are put to the expense of keeping a bonded warehouse, they are allowed to get alcohol at $2.40 per proof gallon as against the rate of $9 charged others. Now, the druggists of Canada, a very large and respectable body, require alcohol in the making of various preparations, and they are obliged to pay a duty of $9 per proof gallon for it, while the man who has a big warehouse and does business on a large scale pays only $2.40. We think that is inequitable. It was a great mistake on the part of the late government to adopt that scale, and we propose now that the druggists of the country shall be allowed—and we think we can devise a scheme whereby this can be done—to obtain alcohol for their own legitimate purposes, for the manufacture of the preparations they make, at the same rate enjoyed by the large manufacturing concerns. Of course, it is a matter that might easily lend itself to abuse. I realized that, and my first thought was that there might be a danger of that kind. The druggists of Canada, however, are a most respectable body. They are, as a rule, among our foremost citizens, being organized under provincial laws, and I do believe that they will be only too anxious to see that this privilege is not abused. We believe, at any rate, that we can surround it with devices that shall make it absolutely sure that the druggists will use the alcohol only for their legitimate purposes and in no other way. We are doing this in order to meet what we feel to be a reasonable demand on the part of a large section of the Canadian people.

Now I shall give an intimation of some of the reductions in duty that have been made. We are making some changes in the law respecting tobacco, and these I may as well mention. It is proposed to change the duties on cigarettes and cigars and on Canadian raw leaf tobacco when taken into a licensed tobacco or cigar manufactory. The excise duty on all weights of cigarettes is increased $3 per thousand. The present rate is $6 per thousand for cigarettes weighing not more than 3 pounds per thousand, and $11 on cigarettes weighing more than 3 pounds. It is proposed to increase the rate in the customs tariff on imported cigarettes from $4.10 per pound, and 25 per cent, to $5.25 per pound and 25 per cent. It is estimated that the increase in both excise and customs tariff will give an additional revenue of over $5,000,000 per annum, after allowing for a reduction of 10 per cent in the consumption owing to the increased rate. The consumption of cigarettes has grown to immense proportions in Canada, the number consumed last year being equal to 267 for each man, woman and child in the country. It is proposed to readjust the duties on cigars. This will have the effect of reducing the duties on the low priced, and increasing it on the higher priced, cigars. The intention is to impose a graduated rate according to the value of the cigars. At present there is a tax of $6 per thousand irrespective of the value or character of the cigar. We want to introduce something like the principle of ad valorem, so that a cigar of medium character will still pay about the same rate, while the more expensive cigar will pay a higher rate. We think it is only reasonable that the cheaper cigars should be allowed to come in and be sold at a lower rate than the expensive cigars, and one effect will be to increase largely the consumption of Canadian native leaf.

Then with regard to the duty on raw leaf tobacco. There is a duty of 5 cents per pound on raw leaf tobacco. At present raw leaf tobacco is of very low value. I was told the other day—possibly the case was an extreme one—that the value in some cases is little more than the tax, and therefore the tax seems to be a heavy burden. We propose now not to abolish the duty altogether, but to abolish it when the tobacco is taken into a licensed tobacco or cigar factory. We think that in that way it will lead to an increased quantity of native tobacco being used in the cigar factories, and when the tobacco is used in the factories we shall get the duty of 20 cents per pound. This, therefore, is a move that is intended to help the native tobacco industry, which we all desire to see flourish, while it will not involve us in any considerable loss of revenue.

Reductions and the Industries

There are some reductions in duties to which I desire to draw attention. These reductions of duties will benefit the several industries on the following articles. First, I take the farming industry, in relation to which reductions include:

	Per cent
Mowing machines, harvesters, binders and reapers, reduced under the general tariff	2½
Cultivators, harrows, horse-rakes, seed drills, manure spreaders and weeders, reduced under the general tariff	2½
Ploughs and threshing machines, reduced under the general tariff	2½
Milking Machines, reduced under the general tariff	5
Vegetable grading machines, reduced under the general tariff	5
Nearly all other agricultural implements are reduced under the general tariff	5

There is a corresponding reduction on these articles under the British Preferential Tariff, but practically all are imported under the General Tariff. Tractors for farm purposes valued at $1,400 or less and parts thereof, are now free by Order in Council: It is proposed to make these articles free by Act of Parliament. Wrought iron tubing four inches and under in diameter is reduced five per cent under both preferential and general tariffs. Wrought iron tubing over four inches and not over ten inches is reduced five per cent under the preferential tariff. Tools are reduced five per cent under the preferential tariff. Harness is reduced 2½ per cent under the preferential tariff. Farm waggons are reduced 5 per cent under the preferential tariff and 2½ per cent under the general tariff.

For the dairying industry a reduction is made on paper milk bottle caps of 7½ per cent under both the preferential and general tariffs.

Glass Milk Bottles are reduced 5 per cent under both tariffs.

Dairy tin hollow-ware and cans for milk and cream are reduced 2½ per cent under the preferential tariff and 5 per cent under the general tariff.

Milking machines are reduced 2½ per cent under the preferential tariff and 5 per cent under the general tariff.

In regard to the fruit-growing industry, fruit-grading machines are reduced 2½ per cent under the preferential tariff and 5 per cent under the general tariff.

In the lumber industry there are several reductions. Machinery for saw mills is reduced 2½ per cent under the general tariff. Wrought iron tubing 4 inches in diameter or less is reduced 5 per cent under both tariffs. Tools and cantdogs are reduced 5 per cent under the preferential tariff.

For the mining industry. Porcelain parts of pumps are reduced from 20 per cent preferential tariff and 30 per cent general tariff to free under all tariffs. Wrought iron tubing 4 inches and under in diameter is reduced 5 per cent under both tariffs; and tubing over 4 inches and not over 10 inches is reduced 5 per cent under the preferential tariff.

For the fishing industry; Gasoline over .725 specific gravity and not exceeding .750 is reduced from 2½ cents per gallon to 1 cent under the general tariff. Manila rope not exceeding 1½ inches in circumference is made free of duty to all fisheries,—under the present tariff it is free only for holding traps used in the lobster fisheries. Oiled clothing is reduced five per cent under both tariffs. Oiled hats are reduced 2½ per cent under the preferential and 5 per cent under the general tariff.

The plumbing industry benefits by the reductions already stated on wrought iron tubing and tools.

For the general public there are a number of reductions. Certain liquid medicines, non-alcoholic, are reduced 35 per cent under the preferential tariff and 20 per cent under the general tariff. Cocoa, unsweetened, is reduced I cent per pound under the preferential tariff; cocoa, sweetened, one-half cent per pound under the preferential tariff, and cocoa in powder form five per cent under the preferential tariff; and preparations are reduced 2½ per cent under the preferential tariff. On refined sugar the preference is increased from one-quarter off in the general tariff to practically one-third off.

Other reductions include the following:

	Per cent
Enamelled ware reduced under the Preferential Tariff	2½
Window shades reduced under the Preferential Tariff	2½

Blankets, cotton, reduced under the Preferential Tariff	2½

Clothes wringers—2½ per cent. reduction under both Tariffs.

Dairy tin hollow-ware reduced 2½ per cent, under Preferential Tariff and 5 per cent under General Tariff.

Automobiles are now entitled to be entered as settlers' effects by farmers only. It is proposed to admit automobiles valued at not more than $1,000 by other settlers as well as by farmers. It is also proposed to admit boats for fishing purposes by settlers as settlers effects.

This is a long list, Mr. Speaker, and one which I hope will find favour with the House.

I have already intimated that while we could with our present taxation system meet what might be called ordinary expenditure, we are not content to do that. We could with our present sources of revenue probably meet what is called ordinary expenditure, possibly even some of our capital expenditure, but it is quite certain that if we do not adopt some other method of taxation we should be adding enormously to the public debt, and I think I speak the wish of the House when I say that that is a course to be guarded against. So we are proposing some new rates of taxation.

The sales tax we propose to increase by 50 per cent. We propose that automobiles up to $1,200 shall pay a tax of 5 per cent, and those above $1,200, 10 per cent. On confectionery we propose a tax of 5 per cent; on ale, beer, etc., 15 cents per gallon; on mineral waters and other soft drinks, 10 cents per gallon. Cheques now pay 2 cents. We maintain that 2 cents up to $50, but we impose a tax of 2 cents on each additional $50. We propose a small tax of 5 per cent on certain classes of insurance premiums which are not at present reached. We propose that telegrams and cables, which are now taxed 1 cent shall hereafter pay 5 cents. On transfers of stock which now pay 2 cents per $100 share, we propose 5 cents. Beet sugar is to be subjected to an excise duty of 49 cents per 100 pounds.

The beet sugar industry is in a very fortunate position. The ordinary refiner imports his material from abroad and pays duty on it. The value he gets in the way of protection, if you call it such, is the difference between what he pays on his raw material and the duty fixed on the refined article. But in the case of the beet sugar refiner he has no duty to pay on his raw material at all, and therefore when the duty was increased, as it has been increased largely on sugar, he is getting the full benefit to an extent which he really does not need. We think he can well afford to pay a duty of 49 cents per 100 pounds, almost half a cent a pound on beet sugar made in Canada. This will not affect the price of sugar because the price is governed by the duty on the refined article, and that is not increased.

These taxes are all to be made under what is called the Special War Revenue Act excepting beet sugar which will be under the Inland Revenue Act.

I have already explained the change we propose in the cigar duty.

Last, but not least, we are going to ask the banks to bear some share of these new burdens which we all have to shoulder. There is at present a nominal tax of 1 per cent on the circulation of the banks, but when you come to the income tax you find that whatever the banks have paid as tax on their circulation as deducted from the income tax. We propose to abolish the exemption and say that the 1 per cent tax on circulation shall be paid and shall come into the revenue of the country. As the circulation in the beginning is really supplied by the Government—by the people of Canada, who give the banks large privileges in this way, we think this demand they shall pay us 1 per cent tax on the circulation in not unreasonable is these hard times.

Financial Situation

I am not going to detain the House by referring to all the items dealt with. I shall lay the resolutions on the Table, and they of course will be scanned carefully by hon. members as opportunity occurs.

I have deemed it proper in this address to present very clearly what I regard as the gravity of the financial situation. I would not, however, have any one draw the impression that I have a gloomy view of the future. There is, happily, a brighter side. I have unbounded faith in the resources of our country and in the intelligence and patriotism of the Canadian people. The worst of the commercial and industrial depression is, I believe, over. Already the sun of better times is beginning to shine. I do not look for any rapid restoration to prosperity, but I believe that from this time forward there will be a quiet and steady improvement. Everywhere there seems to be hope and confidence that such improvement is coming. That hope and that confidence will have much influence in bringing about a better day. If Providence sends us a blessing of good crops this year, we may look for the beginning of the prosperity of former times. While we have diversified industries, all of them entitled to careful consideration, we shall do well to remember that agriculture is and will continue to be the occupation of the largest class of our people and the industry that has the widest influence on general prosperity.

No nation in these days liveth to itself. Whether we like it or not, every country is in some degree dependent upon events in other countries. It has been a topsy-turvy world that we have been living in, and we cannot look for satisfactory conditions until the world generally recovers in some degree its balance. In our own country, if one thing more than another is necessary, it is the establishing of better relations between labour and capital.

Admirers of the British constitution claim as a virtue for it that wherever a grievance exists a way of relief can be found. Why should it not be so with labour and capital to-day? In nearly every relation of life we are obliged to submit to the judgment of authority. Why cannot labour and capital agree upon tribunals to which disputes can be referred? The lockout and the strike of to-day are evidences that our so-called civilization is still far from perfect. Why should either labour or capital deem it necessary to resort to force? The general public, whose interests are so often affected by the conflict, have a right to expect that both capital and labour will endeavour to find a better way of settling their disputes. If labour at times seems to be unreasonable, let us not forget that in the days that have gone, too often the workingman, so-called, did not receive a fair share of the wealth which his labour created; too often he saw his employer grow rich and prosperous while the workingman had little more than an existence. There has been a happy change in this respect. We cannot return to pre-war conditions. The workingman's position has advanced. His standard of living has improved. He is unwilling to go back to pre-war conditions, and nobody should expect him to be content to do so. He has a right to expect better conditions for himself and his family than in former days. But he has duties to perform on his part. Labour has come to a sense of its power. Has it come to a sense of the responsibility and duty which should always accompany power? We cannot doubt but the mass of the working men, as we call them, wish to be good citizens of Canada. They hold interests in common with other classes of the community. They have wives and mothers and children and homes to protect, and protection for these can only come when law is upheld and order observed. There are so-called labour leaders who, unfortunately, preach the doctrine that the employer is the enemy of the workman. They preach the doctrine that the workingman should play an entirely selfish part, that his duty is to get all that he can in the way of wages and give as little as he can in the way of labour. Such men are a menace to the true interests of labour as well as to the interests of society generally. There are in Canada many labour leaders who refuse to preach these dangerous doctrines and who, while zealous in defending the interests of labour, are no less zealous in maintaining the interests of society. Let us pray that on this vital question capital and labour may alike recognize their responsibilities, that they may put aside every temptation to play a selfish part, and co-operate in efforts which will mark Canada in the eyes of the world as a land of peace, and progress, and prosperity.

[Mr. Fielding.]

RESOLUTIONS

I beg to give notice that upon the House resolving itself into committee I shall move the following resolutions:

Resolved, That it is expedient to amend the Customs Act and Amending Acts, including the Department of Customs and Excise Act (Chapter twenty-six of the Statutes of 1921), as follows:—

1. By repealing section six of the Department of Customs and Excise Act, being Chapter twenty-six of the Statutes of 1921, and amending section thirty-one of the said Customs Act accordingly.

2. By repealing section seven of the Department of Customs and Excise Act aforesaid, and amending section forty of the said Customs Act accordingly.

3. By amending section fifty-nine of the said Customs Act, as follows:

(1) By striking out subsection three thereof, and substituting therefor the following:—

"(3) Whenever the value of a currency has not been proclaimed, or whenever there is no fixed standard value, or whenever from any cause the value of a currency has become depreciated or appreciated, there shall be attached to the invoice of the goods imported the certificate of some Consul or Canadian Trade Commissioner, resident in such place or country, or the certificate of a Bank, showing the extent of such depreciation or appreciation, or the true value at the time of the exportation of the goods of the currency in which such invoice is made out, as compared with the standard dollar of Canada: Provided that the Collector of Customs and Excise may compute the value for duty at the rate of exchange certified by the Bank through which the same is drawn as current at the time and place when and whence the goods were exported to Canada."

(2) By amending subsection four of the section fifty-nine by adding after the word "Consul's" in the second line thereof the words "or Canadian Trade Commissioner's".

(3) By repealing section eight of the Department of Customs and Excise Act aforesaid and amending said section fifty-nine accordingly.

Resolved, That any enactment founded on the foregoing resolution shall be deemed to have come into force on the twenty-fourth day of May, one thousand nine hundred and twenty-two and to have applied to all goods imported or taken out of warehouse for consumption on and after that day and to have also applied to goods previously imported for which no entry for consumption was made before that day.

1. Resolved, That The Customs Tariff, 1907, be amended by reapealing section 12A, added thereto by section 5 of The Customs Tariff Amendment Act, 1921, and by inserting in place thereof the following section.

12A. The Governor in Council may from time to time as he deems it expedient, order that goods of any description or class specified in such order, imported into Canada, shall be marked, stamped, branded or labelled in legible English or French words, in a conspicious place that shall not be covered or obscured by any subsequent attachments or arrangements, so as to indicate the country of origin. Said marking, stamping, branding, or labelling shall be as nearly indelible and permanent as the nature of the goods will permit.

All orders made by the Governor in Council under this section shall have effect from and after the day on which the same are published in The Canada Gazette, or from and after such later day as is appointed for the purpose in such orders, and during such time as is therein expressed, or if no time is expressed for that purpose, then until the same are revoked or altered.

Provided that all such goods imported into Canada after the date of the coming into force of any such order of the Governor in Council which do not comply with the requirements of such order, shall be subject to an additional duty of ten per centum ad valorem to be levied on the value for duty purposes, and in addition such goods shall not be released from Customs possession until they have been so marked, stamped, branded or labelled under Customs supervision at the expense of the importer.

Provided further that if any person shall violate any of the provisions so established relating to the marking, stamping, branding or labelling of any such imported goods, or shall deface, destroy, remove, alter, or obliterate any such marks, stamps, brands or labels, with intent to conceal the information given by or contained in such marks, stamps, brands, or labels, he shall be liable on summary conviction to a penalty not exceeding one thousand dollars, or to imprisonment not exceeding one year, or to both fine and imprisonment.

The Minister of Customs and Excise may make such regulations as are deemed necessary for carrying out the provisions of this section and for the enforcement thereof.

2. Resolved, That schedule A to The Customs Tariff, 1907, as amended by chapter twenty-six of the statutes of 1914, by chapter five of the statutes of 1914 (second session), by chapter seventeen of the statutes of 1918, by chapter forty-seven of the statutes of 1919, by chapter twenty-seven of the statutes of 1921, and by Orders in Council be further amended by striking thereout tariff items:—20, 21, 22, 23, 134, 143, 208, 219a, 220, 326, 398, 399, 427, 445, 446, 446b, 447, 448, 517, 520, 521, 522, 523, 565, 566, 567, 568, 575, 591, 611, 611a, 612, 619, 621, 631, 638a, 657a, 660, 682, 705a, the several enumeration of goods respectively, and the several rates of duties of customs, if any, set opposite each of said items and to repeal section (b) of the Orders in Council, P.C. 2654, dated twenty-seventh day of November, 1907, designated as item 715 of The Customs Tariff, section 2 (b) of Orders in Council, P.C. 16/1556, dated fifth day of June, 1912, designated as item 762 of The Customs Tariff, P.C. 224 and P.C. 2/233, dated thirtieth day of January, 1919, and P.C. 383, dated twentieth day of February, 1919, and to provide that the following items, enumerations and rates of duty be inserted in schedule A:—

4. Resolved, That schedule C (prohibited goods) to The Customs Tariff, 1907, shall be amended by adding the following:—

1214. (a) Common mongoose (Herpestes griseus) or mongoose of any kind;

(b) Common mynah, Chinese mynah, Crested mynah, or any other species of the Starling family (Sturnidae);

(c) Java sparrow, rice bird, nutmeg finch, or other species of the weaver bird family (Ploceidae);

(d) European chaffinch (Fringilla coelebs);

(e) Great titmouse (Parus major).

5. Resolved, That any enactment founded on the foregoing resolutions shall be deemed to have come into force on the twenty-fourth day of May, one thousand nine hundred and twenty-two, and to have applied to all goods mentioned in the foregoing resolutions imported or taken out of warehouse for consumption on and after that day, and to have also applied to goods previously imported for which no entry for consumption was made before that day.

1. Resolved, That it is expedient to amend The Inland Revenue Act, as amended by chapter six of the statutes of 1914, and chapter twenty-eight of the statutes of 1918 by repealing sub-sections (e), (f), (g) and (h) of section two hundred and seventy-nine thereof and sub-section three of section three hundred and twenty-eight A., and substituting therefor the following:

279 (e) On cigars of all descriptions, made from raw leaf tobacco, three dollars per thousand;

(f) On all cigars when put up in packages containing less than ten cigars each, four dollars per thousand;

(g) On cigarettes made from raw leaf tobacco or any substitute therefor, weighing not more than three pounds per thousand, nine dollars per thousand;

(h) On cigarettes made from raw leaf tobacco or any substitute therefor, weighing more than three pounds per thousand, fourteen dollars per thousand.

328 A. (3) There shall be levied, collected and paid an excise duty of five cents per pound on all tobacco grown in Canada for consumption therein, except when such tobacco is taken into a licensed tobacco or cigar manufactory.

2. Resolved, That any enactment founded on the preceding resolution shall be deemed to have come into force on the twenty-fourth day of May, one thousand nine hundred and twenty-two.

3. Resolved, That it is expedient to amend The Inland Revenue Act as amended by chapter six of the statutes of 1914 and chapter thirty-four of the statutes of 1921, and to provide:

That when any druggist is licensed by the Minister of Customs and Excise to prepare prescriptions for medicines and pharmaceutical preparations in the manufacture or preparation of which spirits are used, where such spirits are purchased for such purposes by a druggist so licensed the following duties of excise shall be imposed, levied and collected, that is to say:

On spirits testing not less than fifty per centum over proofs in such limited quantities as may be prescribed by the Minister of Customs and Excise—

(a) When the material used in the manufacture thereof consists of not less than ninety per centum, by weight, of raw or unmalted grain, or when manufactured from sugar, syrup, molasses or other saccharine matter not otherwise provided for, on every gallon of the strength of proof by Sykes' hydrometer, two dollars and forty cents and so in proportion for any greater strength than the strength of proof, and for any less quantity than a gallon:

(b) When manufactured exclusively from malted barley, taken to the distillery in bond and on which no duty of customs or excise has been paid, or when manufactured from raw or unmalted grain, used in combination, in such proportions as the department prescribes, with malted barley, taken to the distillery in bond and on which no duty of customs or of excise has been paid, on every gallon of the strength of proof by Sykes' hydrometer, two dollars and forty two cents, and so in proportion for any greater strength than the strength of proof, and for any less quantity than a gallon;

(c) When manufactured exclusively from molasses, syrup, sugar or other saccharine matter, taken to the distillery in bond and on which no duty of customs has been paid, on every gallon of the strength of proof by Sykes' hydrometer, two dollars and forty three cents, and so in proportion for any greater strength than the strength of proof and for any less quantity than a gallon.

(d) Where such spirits are purchased from a government vendor or other person lawfully authorized to sell the same and where the duties imposed by law have been paid thereon, the said druggist may be entitled to a drawback of all such duty in excess of the rates of duties set forth in this resolution.

4. Resolved, That it is expedient to provide that no person shall receive spirits under the preceding section without a license of the Minister of Customs and Excise, that there shall be payable for such license a fee of two dollars per annum and that a license shall not continue beyond the end of a fiscal year unless renewed; and to provide that a licensee shall jointly with a guaranty company approved by the Department enter into a bond to His Majesty in the sum of one thousand dollars which bond shall be conditioned that the licensee shall use all spirits specified in these resolutions exclusively in the preparation of prescriptions and pharmaceutical preparations on his own premises and that he shall keep books and accounts and make such entries and returns as are called for by the regulations of the Department and to faithfully comply with all the requirements of such regulations; and to provide that a person who violates any of the provisions of these resolutions or of any regulations of the Department made thereunder shall incur a penalty not exceeding two hundred dollars recoverable in the manner prescribed for recovery of penalties in the Inland Revenue Act and that in addition he may incur other penalties under the provisions of the said act; and also that if a licensee is convicted for any violation of these resolutions his license shall be cancelled and shall not be renewed within a period of two years from the date of conviction; and to provide that the Minister of Customs and Excise may make such regulations as are deemed necessary for carrying out the provisions of these resolutions.

5. Resolved, That any enactment founded on the preceding resolutions numbered three and four shall be deemed to have come into force on the first day of July, one thousand nine hundred and twenty-two.

6. Resolved, That it is expedient to amend The Inland Revenue Act, chapter fifty-one of the Revised Statutes, 1906, and amended by chapter six of the statutes of 1914 and chapter thirty-four of the statutes of 1921 by adding the following:

There shall be imposed, levied and collected on all sugar produced in Canada from sugar beets, the following duties of excise:

Sugar, sugar drainings, melado, sugar concrete and molasses testing over fifty-six degrees and not exceeding seventy-five degrees of polarization.

per one hundred pounds.. .. ..25 cents and for each additional degree over seventy-five degrees per one hundred pounds.. .. .. .. 1 cent provided that fractions of five-tenths of a degree or less shall not be subject to the tax and that fractions of more than five-tenths shall be subject to the tax as a degree. Provided that such duty of excise shall not be payable when such sugar is exported.

7. Resolved, That it is expedient to provide that no person shall produce sugar in Canada from sugar beets without a license and that a fee of two dollars per annum be paid for such license and to further provide that all the provisions of Part 11 of The Inland Revenue Act respecting licenses and the obligations of persons holding them, the keeping of books or accounts, the payment of duties and making returns and the general regulations as to bonding and warehousing, so far as applied by departmental regulations, and all provisions respecting penalties, so far as applicable, shall have full force and effect with respect to the manufacture of sugar made from sugar beets.

8. Resolved, That any enactment founded on the preceding resolutions numbered six and seven shall be deemed to have come into force on the twenty-fourth day of May one thousand nine hundred and twenty-two.

Resolved, That it is expedient to amend The Special War Revenue Act, 1915, as amended by chapter forty-six of the statutes of 1918, chapter seventy-one of the statutes of 1920 and chapter fifty of the statutes of 1921 and to provide:

1. That sub-section two of section five of the said act be amended by removing purely mutual companies from the class of companies exempt from the tax imposed by said sub-section, and by adding to said section five the following sub-sections;

(11) Every person resident in Canada, who insures his property situate in Canada, or any property situate in Canada in which he has an insurable interest, with any British or foreign company or British or foreign underwriter or underwriters, not licensed under the provisions of the Insurance Act, 1917, to transact business in Canada, or with any association of persons formed for the purpose of exchanging reciprocal contracts of indemnity upon the plan known as inter-insurance and not licensed under the provisions of the Insurance Act, 1917, the chief place of business of which association or of its principal attorney-in-fact is situate outside of Canada, shall on or before the thirty-first day of December in each year pay to the Minister for the Consolidated Revenue Fund, in addition to any other tax payable under any existing law or statute, a tax of five per centum of the total net cost to such person of all such insurance for the preceding calendar year, and for the purposes of this section every corporation carrying on business in Canada shall be deemed to be a person resident in Canada.

(12) Every person to whom this section applies shall on or before the thirty-first day of December in each year make a return in writing to the Superintendent of Insurance stating the names of the companies, societies of underwriters or associations with whom the insurance was effected by him or on his behalf, the amount of such insurance and the net cost thereof in each case.

(13) Every such person who fails or neglects to make such return or pay to the minister within the time limited by sub-section (11) hereof the tax hereby imposed, shall incur a penalty of fifty dollars for each and every day during which such default continues.

2. That sub-sections two and three of section eight of the said act be amended by providing that the tax imposed on cable companies and telegraph companies shall be increased from a sum equal to one cent upon each despatch or message therein mentioned to a sum equal to five cents upon each such despatch or message; and that every company may charge the five cents to and collect the same from the person paying or liable to pay the regular charges for the transmission of the despatch or message.

3. That section twelve of the said act as amended by chapter seventy-one of the statutes of 1920 be amended by striking thereout sub-sections two and four and substituting the following:

(2) No person shall issue a cheque payable at or by a bank unless there is affixed thereto an adhesive stamp or unless there is impressed thereon by means of a die a stamp of the value of, if the amount of money for which the cheque is issued

(i) does not exceed $50.00.. .. two cents
(ii) exceeds $50.00, for every
$50.00 or fraction thereof.. two cents

and every adhesive stamp affixed to a cheque shall be cancelled by the bank at which the cheque is payable at or before the time of payment.

(4) No person shall sign a receipt for money paid to him by a bank chargeable against a deposit of money in the bank to his credit until he has affixed to the receipt an adhesive stamp or unless there is impressed thereon by means of a die a stamp of the value of, if the amount of the money for which the receipt is signed

(i) does not exceed $50.00.. two cents
(ii) exceeds $50.00, for every
$50.00 or fraction thereof.. two cents

and every adhesive stamp affixed to such receipt shall be cancelled by the bank at the time the money is paid; and that said section twelve be further amended by providing that wherever sub-sections three (a), three (c), three (d), and three (f) of said section twelve provide for payment of a tax at the rate of two cents for every one hundred dollars, the said sub-sections be amended to provide that the tax shall be at the rate of two cents for every fifty dollars of the bills, notes, advances or overdrafts therein mentioned and by providing that sub-section thirteen of said section twelve be amended by increasing the tax imposed on sales or transfers of stock or shares of any association, company or corporation from two cents for every one hundred dollars or fraction thereof to five cents for every one hundred dollars or fraction thereof of the par value of the stock or shares sold or transferred.

4. That section thirteen of the said act be amended by striking thereout sub-sections two and three and by substituting the following:

(2) Every express company carrying on business in Canada shall before the issue of a money order or traveller's cheque affix thereto an adhesive stamp of the value of, if the amount of money for which the money order or traveller's cheque is issued

(i) does not exceed $50.00.. .. two cents
(ii) exceeds $50.00, for every
$50.00 or fraction thereof.. .. two cents

and the company may charge the amount of the stamps so affixed to and collect the same from the purchaser of the order or cheque or from the payee thereof. The company shall before delivery of the order or cheque cancel the stamp by writing on or across the stamp —initials or other identification of the company together with the date of the issue of the order or cheque.

(3) No money order shall be issued under the provisions of the Post Office Act until there is affixed thereto or to the relative advice a postage stamp of the value of, if the amount of money for which the money order is issued

(i) does not exceed $50.00.. .. two cents
(ii) exceeds $50.00, for every
$50.00 or fraction thereof.. .. two cents

to be paid for by the purchaser of the order. The postmaster or other officer of the Post Office Department issuing the order shall cancel the stamp by impressing thereon when affixed the date stamp of the post office at which the order is issued.

5. That sub-section one of section sixteen A of the said act as enacted by chapter forty six of the statutes of 1918, be amended by adding thereto the following:—

Provided that when matches are put up in packages containing not more than sixty and not less than thirty matches each, the tax shall be payable at the rate of one-half of one cent for each package, and when matches are put up in packages containing less than thirty matches each, the tax shall be payable at the rate of one-fourth of one cent per package.

6. That section nineteen A of the said act as enacted by chapter forty-six of the statutes of 1918 be amended by adding thereto the following:

Provided that in computing the "duty paid value" of tea purchased in bond in the United Kingdom the amount of the customs duty payable on tea for consumption in the United Kingdom shall not be included in the value of such tea for purposes of this act.

7. That Order in Council 2031 dated the thirteenth day of June, 1921, shall cease to have force or effect and that sub-section one of section nineteen BBB of the said act as enacted by chapter fifty of the statutes of 1921 be struck out and the following substituted therefor:—

(1) In addition to any duty or tax that may be payable under this section, or any other statute or law, there shall be imposed, levied and collected an excise tax of two and one-quarter per cent on sales and deliveries by Canadian manufacturers or producers, and wholesalers or jobbers, and a tax of three and three quarters per cent on the duty paid value of goods imported, but in respect of sales by manufacturers or producers, to retailers or consumers, the excise tax payable shall be four and one-half per cent and on goods imported by retailers or consumers the excise tax payable shall be six per cent on the duty paid value.

Provided that in respect of lumber an excise tax of three per cent shall be imposed, levied and collected on sales and deliveries by the Canadian manufacturer and of four and one-half per cent on importations, and that no further excise tax shall be payable on re-sale.

Provided also that the taxes specified in this section shall not apply to sales or importations of:—

Bread; flour, oatmeal, rolled oats and cornmeal; rolled wheat, buckwheat meal and pea meal; animals living; live poultry; meats and poultry, fresh; milk, including butter-milk; cream; butter; cheese; oleomargarine, margarine, butterine or other substitutes for butter; lard, lard compound and similar substances, made from animal or vegetable stearine or oils; eggs; vegetables, fruits, grains and seeds in their natural state; bran, shorts, middlings, alfalfa meal; oil cake, oil cake meal; grains mixed or crushed for cattle or poultry feed; hay; straw; hops; nursery stock; chicory, raw or green; bees; honey; sugar; molasses; salt; other farm produce sold by the individual farmer of his own production; ice; fish and products thereof not canned or medicated; ores of metals of all kinds; fuel of all kinds; gold and silver in ingots, blocks, bars, drops, sheets or plates unmanufactured; British and Canadian coin and foreign gold coin; logs and round unmanufactured timber; fence posts, railroad ties, pulpwood, tan bark, and other articles the product of the forest when produced and sold by the individual settler or farmer; newspapers and quarterly, monthly and semi-monthly magazines and weekly literary papers unbound; materials for use only in the construction, equipment and repair of ships; ships licensed to engage in the Canadian coasting trade; calcium carbide; radium; electricity; gas manufactured from coal, calcium carbide or oil for illuminating or heating purposes; materials for use solely in the manufacture of oleomargarine or any substitute for butter or lard; artificial limbs and parts thereof; artificial eyes; donations of clothing and books for charitable purposes; settlers' effects; War Veterans' badges; memorials or monuments erected in memory of soldiers who fell in the Great War; articles imported for the use of the Governor General; articles imported for the personal or official use of Consuls General who are natives or citizens of the country they represent and who are not engaged in any other business or profession; Bibles, missals, prayer-books, psalm and hymn-books, religious tracts, and Sunday school lesson pictures; articles admitted to free entry under Customs Tariff item 682; manila fibre for use only in the manufacture of rope not exceeding one and one-half inches in circumference for the fisheries; boats bona fide purchased by individual fishermen for their own personal use in the fisheries; articles and materials used in the manufacture of boats bona fide built for individual fishermen for their own personal use in the fisheries; fibre for use only in the manufacture of binder twine; job printed matter produced and sold by printers or firms, whose sales of job printing do not exceed three thousand dollars per annum, and the Governor in Council shall have power to add to the foregoing list of articles exempted from the excise taxes on sales, as he may deem it expedient or necessary to exempt from the said excise taxes.

Provided further that the excise taxes specified in this section shall not be payable on goods exported, or on sales of goods made to the order of each individual customer by a business which sells exclusively by retail; and provided that the tax as specified in this section shall be payable on sales of goods manufactured for stock by merchants who sell exclusively by retail.

A drawback may be granted of ninety-nine per cent of the said taxes paid on materials used, wrought into or attached to articles exported, provided that payment of a specific sum in lieu of such drawback may be authorized by the Governor in Council in cases where specific rates of drawback of Customs duties are granted under the provisions of section 288 of the Customs Act.

8. That there shall be imposed, levied and collected upon goods enumerated in Schedule I to this part, when such goods are imported into Canada or taken out of warehouse on and after the twenty-fourth day of May, one thousand nine hundred and twenty-two, on the duty paid value in addition to any duty or tax that may be payable under The Special War Revenue Act, 1915, or any other statute or law, the rate of excise tax set opposite to each item in said Schedule I; and there shall also be imposed, levied and collected when any such goods are manufactured in Canada and sold on and after the twenty-fourth day of May, one thousand nine hundred and twenty-two, in addition to any duty or tax that may be payable under The Special War Revenue Act, 1915, or any other statute or law the rate of excise tax set opposite to each item in said Schedule I on the price for which the same is sold.

There shall be imposed, levied and collected upon all goods enumerated in Schedule II to this part, when such goods are imported into Canada or taken out of warehouse or when any such goods are manufactured in Canada and sold on and after the twenty-fourth day of May, one thousand nine hundred and twenty-two, in addition to any duty or tax that may be payable under The Special War Revenue Act, 1915, or any other statute or law the rate of excise tax set opposite to each item in said Schedule II.

Where the goods are imported such excise tax shall be paid by the importer and where the goods are manufactured and sold in Canada such excise tax shall be paid by the manufacturer; provided that if an automobile is, on the twenty-fourth day of May, one thousand nine hundred and twenty-two, in the hands of a dealer and not sold to a bona fide user the tax shall be paid by such dealer when such automobile is sold.

The minister may require every manufacturer to take out an annual license for the purposes aforesaid, and may prescribe a fee therefor, not exceeding two dollars, and the penalty for neglect or refusal shall be a sum not exceeding one thousand dollars.

Provided that such excise tax shall not be payable when such goods are manufactured for export, under regulations prescribed by the Minister of Customs and Excise.

Provided further that the value on imported cigars shall be the duty paid value as defined in section 19A of The Special War Revenue Act, 1915; the value on cigars manufactured in Canada shall include the amount of the excise duty payable thereon.

9. That section 19D of said act as enacted by Chapter forty-six of the Statutes of 1918 and subsection four of section three of chapter 71 of the Statutes of 1920 be struck out and the following section substituted therefor:

(19D). Every person, who being thereto liable, neglects or refuses to pay any war excise tax imposed by part four of The Special War Revenue Act, 1915, shall be liable, on summary conviction, to a penalty of not less than fifty dollars and not exceeding one thousand dollars.

10. That, notwithstanding the provisions of The Bank Act and The Bankruptcy Act, or any other statute or law, the liability to the Crown of any person, firm or corporation, for payment of the excise taxes specified in the said Special War Revenue Act, 1915, and amendments thereto, shall constitute a first charge on the assets of such person, firm or corporation, and shall rank for payment in priority to all other claims of whatsoever kind heretofore or hereafter arising save and except only the judicial costs, fees and lawful expenses of an assignee or other public officer charged with the administration or distribution of such assets.

11. Resolved, that any enactment founded on paragraphs numbered five, six, seven and eight of the preceding resolutions shall be deemed to have come into force on the twenty-fourth day of May, one thousand nine hundred and twenty-two, and to have applied to all goods imported or taken out of warehouse for consumption on and after that day, and to have applied to goods previously imported for which no entry for consumption was made before that date.

12. Resolved, that any enactment founded on paragraphs numbered two, three and four of the preceding resolutions shall come into force on the first day of July, one thousand nine hundred and twenty-two.

Schedule I.

Automobiles adapted or adaptable for passenger use, valued at not more than twelve hundred dollars each.. .. .. five per cent.

(e) Valued at more than two hundred dollars per thousand, per thousand.. .. .. sixteen dollars.

Resolved, That it is expedient to amend subsection five (a) of section four of The Income War Tax Act, 1917, as enacted by chapter fifty-five of the Statutes of 1919, by providing that the provisions of the said subsection five (a) shall not apply to a bank as defined by section three of The Special War Revenue Act, 1915.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON (West York): Mr. Speaker, I intend to avail myself of the usual custom and to move the adjournment of the debate before attempting to answer my hon. friend (Mr. Fielding) at length. Not having knowledge of the resolutions—indeed, not having heard them—I could not be in a position to discuss the matter in detail. Perhaps, however, there are one or two things to which I ought to allude before moving the adjournment.

My hon. friend has referred to the question of loans, and he has given us particulars as to loans made, either railway loans or government loans. Of course, the question of the rate at which you should put out your securities, depends entirely on the state of the market at the time the issues have to be made. Let me say to my hon. friend at once that he chose a rather favourable time for his large issue in New York when he chose the date he did. But I was sorry, and I am still sorry, that my friend went to New York for the purpose of getting that money instead of getting it at home. He points out that to-day we have not the urge of war and the whip of necessity on our people, and that there might be difficulty in getting the money in the domestic market. Sir, I do not anticipate any such difficulty. The urge of war was over in 1919, when we raised a very large sum of money and had a very successful taxable issue. My hon. friend has referred to costs. Well, I think I should also refer to the question of costs in connection with these loan issues.

I would like to contrast the cost of doing business in our own country with the cost of doing business in New York, and to point to the advisability of raising money in our own country, thus saving the additional cost, except, of course, where the money has to be spent in the foreign market. To-day we have no maturities in

New York; our next maturity there, if I remember rightly, is in 1926. The money, therefore, was not required for New York purposes. Well, we raised $100,000,000 in 1915 at a total cost to the country of .425 per cent, considerably less than one cent on the dollar—less, indeed, than one half cent on the dollar. In 1916 we raised another $100,000,000 at a cost to the country of .797 per cent, again less than one per cent. The third war loan of 1917 cost .888 per cent. The Victory loan of 1917, when there was a most intensive organization and a tremendous amount of work was done, and when the amount of $397,591,200 was raised, cost us 1.185 per cent. The Victory loan of 1918, when we raised $638,176,250, again cost less than one per cent—.903 per cent. The taxable issues of 1919, involving an amount of $607,691,300, cost us 1.061 per cent.. I point out also to my hon. friend that over and above all the considerations that he has mentioned in favour of a domestic loan as against a foreign loan, there is the further circumstance that when the loan is domestic we get a return in income taxes on the interest which we have to pay, and that is a very substantial amount.

The minister has referred to commissions paid on other issues. Well, Mr. Speaker, commissions that are paid, as well as rates that have to govern, depend on the state of the market. Where the risk is small, where the offerings of money for investment are great, money can be raised more cheaply from the point of view of interest as well as from the point of view of commissions to be paid. In the present year, as everybody knows, we have had a culmination of the collection of gold in New York; we have had an accumulation of idle money which cannot to-day be used in American commerce, and is awaiting investment.

I am not going to make a comparison of the values of our own issues at different times, but let us take the issues of Great Britain sold in the New York market. In 1917 Great Britain issued twenty-year bonds at 5½ per cent, payable in 1937. The obligations were issued at par, with a commission cost to the British Government of 4.4 per cent. In 1919 sales were made of this issue as low as 93; in 1920 the issue sold down to 81⅜, and in 1921 to 83¾. On April 25 of this year, when our $100,000,000 loan was marketed, that issue sold at a premium of 103, 19¼ points higher than the low of 1921—that is, there was a difference between the time our loans were brought out and the time the $100,000,000 loan was made of 19¼ points—and 21⅝ points higher than the low of 1920, a rise of ten points as against the low of 1919.

In 1919 an issue was made through the Morgan house by the British Government of 5½ per cent ten-year bonds. The issue sold on a basis of 96¼, yielding over 6 per cent. In 1920 these bonds sold as low as 83⅞; in 1921, as low as 88¼. On the 25th of April of this year, when the large issue was made, this issue sold at a premium, the price being 107½, an increase of 19¼ points over the low of 1921 and of 23⅝ over the low of 1920. A further issue of three-year notes was also made by the British Government in 1919 and marketed at 98, yielding 6¼ per cent. This sold down in 1920 to 90½, and in 1921 to 94¾. On the 25th of April of this year that was up to 107½, an increase of 12½ points over the low of 1921 and an increase of 16½ over the low of 1920.

So, Mr. Speaker, it is as I say, in making loans questions both of commission and of cost are matters which have to be governed by the rates obtaining and the scarcity or plenty of money available at the time. I think it will usually be found that the smaller the issue, the less difficulty there is in placing it, and my hon. friend is entitled, of course, to consideration upon that point. I would point out that he has had two loans in this very good period. As to his first loan, of $11,000,000, he disposed of that on a cost basis of .59 per cent, a little over half of one per cent. There he is approaching something like the cost of domestic loans, a little lower than some of them, perhaps lower than most of them. A very short time afterwards, however, when there was still a bull market, he pays two and a half per cent on a loan of $100,000,000. That was the only matter that I ever questioned at all one way or the other. There is no doubt, as I said, that it was a good time in which to get the money. Other people also found it was a good time. This issue is costing us to-day, with all the costs incurred, something like 5.20. If I am wrong, my hon. friend will correct me. At that same time, the Greater Winnipeg Water District sold on the New York market, according to the New York press, bonds to yield 5.1. The City of DesMoines, Iowa, sold their bonds at a price to yield, 4.2. The New York issue of $45,000,000, which came about the same time, was sold to the syndicate that took it over to pay on the basis of 4.12 and it was offered to the public to yield 4.06. The only profit there on a transaction of $45,000,000, going through on the 25th of April, was the difference between 4.06 and 4.12.

As I said, Mr. Speaker, there are difficulties in connection with all these matters, and on the whole I think my hon. friend went at the right time for his money, and possibly got just what he was entitled to: I do not think he got any more. I do not think, these other issues I have referred to are of such a character as to make us feel that we have got the best of the New York investor upon this issue. Why at that very time, the province of Ontario had bonds offering in New York to yield on the basis of 5.05.

I do not think I should at the present time offer any further observations, and I therefore move the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

SUPPLY

MOUNTED POLICE

The House in Committee of Supply, Mr. Marcil (Bonaventure) in the Chair.

Royal Canadian Mounted Police, $2,991,599.11.

Sir LOMER GOUIN (Minister of Justice): We are asking this year for a vote of $2,991,599.11, which shows a decrease as compared with last year of $5,335,971.64. The estimate is based upon a strength of 1,559 as compared with last year's strength of 1,725 men, or a decrease of 166. While we have a decrease of only 166 men we have a reduction in the cost of over $500,000. The cost per capita in 1921-1922 was $2,044.37, and the estimated cost per capita in 1922-1923 is $1,918.92, a reduction of $125.45. The items are as follows:

5 p.m.

Pay of force		$1,456,532 00
Maintenance		844,297 50
Clothing and equipment		107,100 00
Transportation		177,110 00
Contingencies; Printing and stationery, criminal investigation branch	$185,000 00
Buildings	216,559 61
Compensation	5,000 00

Which gives the total I have already mentioned.

Mr. GUTHRIE: The minister mentioned an item for "buildings"?

Sir LOMER GOUIN: That includes heating and repairing, and everything concerned with the lodging of our men.

Mr. GUTHRIE: The minister does not contemplate the erection of any buildings?

Sir LOMER GOUIN: Not in this estimate; if there is anything of the kind it will come under a later vote.

Mr. MEIGHEN: There is a reduction in the strength of the force from 1,700 odd—I do not remember the exact figures.

Sir LOMER GOUIN: A reduction from 1726 to 1559.

Mr. MEIGHEN: A reduction of 167.

Sir LOMER GOUIN: Yes.

Mr. MEIGHEN: When was the reduction made?

Sir LOMER GOUIN: It has been taking place gradually from April 1 last year until now. The strength is down to the latter figure now.

Mr. MEIGHEN: There is really no change of policy at all?

Sir LOMER GOUIN: There is no change of policy but we intend to decrease the number. We are informed by the chief of the branch that we can do that, and we intend to do it gradually.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is not a change of policy, it is just the same as our policy in decreasing the army after the war. I do not know whether the minister has read the flaming speeches of the Prime Minister in regard to this vote, how he contrasted in the language of terror, the vote for the mounted police last year and the year before with the vote some ten years ago and claimed they should be alike. The minister, I understand, does not agree with that doctrine at all?

Sir LOMER GOUIN: I will not undertake to pronounce on that point.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The estimates are the pronouncement.

Sir LOMER GOUIN: The number of men engaged in the force in 1904-5 was 810; in 1906-07, 684; in 1908-9, 649; in 1910-11, 649; in 1912-13, 654; in 1914-5, 1268; 1916-17, 797; 1919-20, 1600; in 1920-21, 1671; and in 1921-22, 1628. I must say that we intend to decrease the number gradually and we hope to arrive at the figure 1200.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The minister would agree that there is not nearly the need to-day that there was, say, in the year 1919?

Sir LOMER GOUIN: In the year 1918-19 we had only 483 men.

Mr. MEIGHEN: No, no, not in 1919.

Sir LOMER GOUIN: Yes in 1918-19 we had 483. I understand many of our men were overseas. In 1919-20 we had 1600.

Mr. MEIGHEN: If men were at the front others were employed in their places. The minister read the figures a minute ago year by year?

Sir LOMER GOUIN: Most of the force were at the war in 1918-19 and the strength of those at home was 483. In 1920-21 the number was increased to 1600.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Solely by the return to their positions of the men who had been in the service before. The minister would not suggest for a moment that we should not hold their positions for these men when they came back from the war?

Sir LOMER GOUIN: They came back and were given their positions.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The minister will admit that was the right course to take? I am sorry the attention of the minister was not directed to the subject earlier because he might have rebuked his leader for taking an opposite course.

Mr. JACOBS: Would the leader of the Opposition divide the House against itself?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not need to do that. That is done frequently enough without my assistance.

Mr. JACOBS: By whom?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Sometimes by the hon. member himself, I am informed. I notice some reduction in the second item. How much of that is accounted for by a reduction of costs?

Sir LOMER GOUIN: Let me give my hon. friend a statement showing the expenditure in connection with the maintenance of the force:

Year	Average strength	Expenditure estimated	Per capita rate
1905-6	748	$1,004,079 19	$1,342 36
1910-11.. ..	638	710,663 45	1,113 89
1914-15.. ..	1,055	1,549,144 42	1,468 38
1919-20.. ..	1,537	3,384,389 26	2,201 49
1920-21.. ..	1,841	3,081,438 08	2,092 23
1922-23.. ..	1,559	2,991,599 11	1,918 92

Now as to Forage, Fuel and Rental of Buildings:

Year.	Forage.	Fuel	Rental of buildings per month.
1920-21—
Hay	$32 00	Coal $12 50	$55
Oats	1 10	Wood 8 00
1921-22—
Hay	$30 00	Coal $12 00
Oats	.80	Wood 8 25	$55

In 1922-23, we estimate coal at $11 per ton and wood at $8.75 per cord. Rental of buildings per month is about the same. In 1920-21 it was $55 per month for each building; in 1921-22, it was $55 per month, and for 1922-23, we estimate it at $50 per month. There is no change in the pay. The cost per ration in 1920-21 was 63 cents; in 1921-22, it was 67.5 cents, and the estimate for 1922-23 is 41 cents. The cost of stabling has decreased from $1.25 to $1.15 per diem.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I gather from the minister's figures that the great part of the reductions in this estimate is due to reduced cost of subsistence, and I understand his answer is in the affirmative. I should have asked this question at the same time: Is it not also a fact that the Dominion Police were incorporated in the Mounted Police between 1919-20, and that that accounts mainly for the increase then as well as the men returning from the front?

Sir LOMER GOUIN: They were incorporated in 1920. We had, I understand, in 1920, 200 men in the Dominion Police and an average of 800 men in the Mounted Police.

Mr. WARD: I think, if we are to be expected to respect the minister's statements and to take them seriously, there should, in all fairness, be a substantial reduction in this estimate. The minister advised us that he intended reducing the force to the lowest possible point, and to confine it as far as possible, to what we might call the unoccupied areas of Canada. If he carries out that policy, I imagine that we could surely reduce this estimate by at least the $456,000. I do not think we have had from the minister a satisfactory statement as to the need for the $1,456,000.

Sir LOMER GOUIN: I intend myself to propose a reduction of $150,000, $75,000 for pay of force, and $75,000 for subsistence.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What was spent on the whole last year?

Sir LOMER GOUIN: For the year $3,527,570.75.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is the estimate?

Sir LOMER GOUIN: In 1921-22, the expenditure was $2,874,197.59.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is less than the minister proposes to spend this year and, with the $150,000 off, almost equal to what he proposes to spend.

Sir LOMER GOUIN: I understand there is a balance not spent of over $300,000.

Mr. MEIGHEN: More than that. I do not want to starve the Mounted Police at all; but I think the minister could stand a little larger reduction than the one he has mentioned and continue the policy which he found in vogue when he took office.

Sir LOMER GOUIN: I do not think we shall need the full amount that I have mentioned, even with the reduction of $150,000; but, as I say, we cannot say exactly at what date we shall bring down the strength to 1,200 men. Last year there remained a balance unspent of $300,000. I hope the committee will give me the same confidence, and I do not see why any one should believe that we would spend money if it was not necessary to spend it. I move that a reduction of $75,000 be made in the first item and a reduction of $75,000 in the second item. That makes a reduction of $150,000.

Mr. KNOX: Not wishing to delay the passage of the item in any way, I want to speak to the last part of it, namely, the item of $5,000 to compensate members of the Mounted Police for injuries received while in the performance of duty. There are some members of the force who saw duty many years ago and who are to-day suffering from the performance of that duty, but who are not recompensed to the extent that I feel they should be, and I am sure many other hon. members feel the same. This matter has been brought up in this House on a number of occasions, on one occasion by the hon. member for Centre Vancouver (Mr. Stevens), at another time by the hon. member for Victoria, Alberta (Mr. Lucas), and I have discussed it myself. These men never had an opportunity of building up homes for themselves or of providing for themselves in any way. They spent many years on the force in the early days when the pay was so small that, as a consequence, the pension which they are to-day receiving is totally inadequate to keep, I might almost say, body and soul together. Many of them are receiving pensions which would not provide more than one meal a day, and I personally know some of them who are not able to earn a day's pay. I am sure it was not the intention of the government or of the country that these men should be left in that state. I know it would be objectionable to open up the pensions question, but these men could be provided for in some other way. I would ask the minister to look into the matter and if possible make some provision for them, so that they may not suffer. They deserve everything that can be done for them, for they have done their best for the country.

Sir LOMER GOUIN: If we were to pay the bonus proposed it would represent some $14,000 a year. If we were to pay them as we have paid our men since 1913 it would mean an increase of over $30,000. I am considering the question, and if it is possible to do anything for these men I can assure the committee that I am favourably disposed towards them.

Amendment agreed to.

Item as amended agreed to.

SOLDIER SETTLEMENT

Soldiers' Land Settlement—Advances to soldiers settling upon the land and cost of administering the Soldier Settlement Act, including salaries, $12,000,000.

Hon. CHARLES STEWART (Argenteuil, Minister of the Interior): I have to confess that there is a good deal of information that I am not in possession of with respect to this vote. Like many of the new members of the House, I have been looking on with considerable interest to see whether or not the land settlement scheme would prove successful. I do not care to discuss that particular phase of the matter, inasmuch as the committee is now dealing with matters of recommendation for improvements, etc., in connection with the working out of the scheme. I have a good deal of information with respect to what has been done. I have had some figures prepared which I thought would be of interest to the committee. This year we are asking for $12,000,000 based on the estimate in connection with the men who are in training and who have made applications not yet dealt with. The board estimates that this amount will be required. I have learned that while there are a very considerable number of what might be described as failures, and while I am unable to assign the cause of these failures, there are at the same time a vast number of these men who are doing remarkably well. They are not confined to any one province. I notice in the perusal of the work of the board that a very large proportion of the soldiers have been settled in western Canada. I have heard that a great many of them will not succeed and something will have to be done in respect of them. I shall not take up that aspect of the question, because the whole matter is before the committee, who no doubt will be prepared to make recommendations to the Government. I have a statement with regard to what has been done in connection with the abandonment of farms by the soldiers, or their failure to make good. That statement, I think, will be of interest to the committee and I shall therefore read it:

1. (a) Total abandonments as at January 21, 1922			2,352
(b) Total amount of public moneys invested therein			$9,889,535 02
2. (a) Total number of cases completely foreclosed			567
(b) Total number of completely foreclosed cases on which financial statement has been received			532
(c) Amount invested in land and perm. improvements	$1,651,237 79
Amount received for land and permanent improvements	1,852,334 58
Capital appreciation			201,096 79
Amount invested in stock and equipment	$539,853 77
Amount received for stock and equipment	376,466 95
Deficit			163,386 82
Capital surplus			$ 37,709 97
Less refunds repayable to ex-settlers			73,240 22
Net capital deficit (532 cases)			$ 35,530 25
Average capital deficit, per case			66 79

That, of course, leaves a very large proportion of the claims still to be settled. I have given those cases that have been adjusted up to date. There are a number of other figures but as they are hardly relevant to the question before the committee I do not think I shall read them. I shall content myself with answering any question hon. members may ask.

Mr. BOYS: Of the appropriation of $35,017,000 last year, how much was actually spent?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Perhaps I had better give the total spent year by year:

[Mr. Charles Stewart.]

Fiscal year	Expenditure
1917-18	$ 3,733 20
1918-19	1,637,310 38
1919-20	47,220,145 55
1920-21	36,964,129 07
1921-22	13,268,623 66

Mr. WARNER: Is it intended to have a revaluation of these properties in view of their deflated values?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): That matter is before the Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment Committee.

Mr. HOEY: What percentage of the $12,000,000 is required for administration?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): These are the details, based on 1922-23:

General office expenses	$ 225,000
Travelling expenses of inspectors, appraisers, officials, field supervisers and adjusters	265,000
Salaries of commissioners and staff	1,100,000
Legal expenses and disbursements	30,000
Printing and stationery	20,000
Motor cars and accessories	45,000
Advertising	5,000
Miscellaneous expenses	50,000
Total	$1,740,000

Mr. EVANS: What is proposed to be done with those men who have had to abandon their homesteads? Some of them I know who had homesteads before they went to the war took advantage of the aid given by the Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment Board and borrowed money on the security of their homesteads. Those men have lost all they had. I do not think our obligation to them ends there. What is proposed to be done?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Was that the case in which the homestead was pledged as security for a further purchase, and now both are gone?

Mr. EVANS: Yes.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I have noticed that that is the case in several instances where adjustments have been made. I suppose much the same policy would be pursued as in the case of an ordinary foreclosure, that any balance left over would go back to the individual. Your statement that that leaves him in a very bad position is one that, during my short tenure of office, I have not had occasion to give any consideration to as yet. I presume that that will need consideration.

Mr. BOYS: Is the security held by the department?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): In every case it is held by the board.

Mr. BOYS: I do not understand what the minister means by saying that any balance would go back to the individual.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): The security being held by the board, the individual would not receive any of the proceeds of re-sale until the encumbrances had been discharged.

Mr. CALDWELL: How many salvage cases have you had where the settler has been reimbursed the money he put into the venture?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): We have not those figures at hand. Noticing the few cases as they pass through my hands day by day, I have been struck by the fact that the land is selling for almost the amount of the purchase price. That may be because that is the very best class of security the board holds. But that is not true so far as the stock is concerned.

Mr. BOYS: How many forced sales have taken place during the past year?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Forced sales?

Mr. BOYS: As I understand, when the settler is in default the department seek to recover the money advanced on the security of the land. How many cases are pending in which proceedings are being taken by the department against defaulters?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I am told five hundred cases out of some twenty-three hundred.

Mr. BOYS: That means defaults?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): No, cases in which proceedings have been taken.

Mr. BOYS: As many as that up to date?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Yes.

Mr. CALDWELL: I think the minister missed the point of my question. Does he mean that in the cases that have been salvaged enough money has been realized to discharge the indebtedness to the Government and also to reimburse the settler the money he originally put into the land?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): No.

Mr. CALDWELL: This is what I am anxious about. I am told that a great many settlers will eventually lose all the money they put into their homesteads, due not to the failure of the scheme in the first place, but because the farms, stock and equipment were bought at a time of inflated prices. Now that prices have gone down I fear that these soldiers will lose all their original investment. I should like to know how many have been salvaged in which not only the Government received the amount of the mortgage against the property, but the settler has received all that he has sunk in the venture.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I am informed there are very few such cases. I judge from the report here of the five hundred and twenty-three odd cases I mentioned as being held for final adjustment, that that is with a view of distributing any balance among these men. The case mentioned by my hon. friend in which the homestead or other property was pledged, is quite a different case from one in which no property was pledged, or from the purchase of both land and equipment without any other property being pledged. In that case I am free to say I doubt if the settler would get any return; the government, owing to the inflated values at which this property was purchased, would, I think, lose on it. I am also informed that no action has been taken by the board where there is any possibility of the settler making good. I am hopeful that the recommendation of the committee will be such as to give those men a chance to make good if there is any possibility of their doing so.

Mr. CALDWELL: I feel that the soldiers should not bear the whole burden of the deflation of prices. The committee will admit that it is a pretty serious situation for the soldier who comes back from overseas, goes into a venture that looks good to him at the time—that possibly looked good to us all—pays ten per cent down on his property and later makes further payments, and then, because he fails to meet subsequent payments, is sold out and loses not only the money he has put into it—amounting in some cases to quite a considerable sum—but one, two or three years of his time, as the case may be. He is turned out on the road, possibly with a family of small children to support—absolutely destitute. The situation is a serious one, and I think the Government has responsibility in the matter. Just how far the Government realize that responsibility is what I would like to know. In reading the report of the chairman of the board, I find, although it is a very full statement—no reference to this aspect of the question. The report is a very rosy one; it shows that the Government has realized more money out of these properties than it invested in them, but there is no mention of the soldier or how he is going to come out financially on the venture. That is the feature which, I think, we must consider.

There is one other thing I would like to mention to the minister. I have had a number of letters from assessors and tax collectors all over the province of New Brunswick inquiring what they are going to do about collecting the taxes on farms which were formerly occupied by soldier settlers. I believe that invariably the Government has refused to pay the taxes on these farms. It is well known that Dominion lands are not taxable, and it is open to question whether or not that principle is a correct one to follow. But in the case of these farms, there should be no question whatever. The soldier settler who has been operating the farm has been paying the taxes on it; he must furnish his tax receipt to the board every year. But when he leaves that farm—and I know one or two cases of this kind—and the farm is leased, producing a larger return annually than would have been obtained from the soldier settler by way of rent, the Government refuse to pay the taxes. In some cases the result is to cripple the school district. There is one such case of a small district adjoining mine, a district which is having a hard struggle to keep the school running. There is only one farm in that district, fortunately; had there been three, it would have meant the closing of the school. I imagine that other districts are affected in the same way. I think, therefore, that this is a situation that Parliament must deal with. Certainly the Government should pay the taxes on these farms. They are very different from wilderness lands which have never paid taxes.

Mr. FORKE: Mr. Chairman, I had intended to direct this matter to the attention of the minister. I do not think it is necessary to say very much to the minister on this subject, because he knows as much about it as we do. Last year I was secretary and treasurer of the Union of Manitoba Municipalities. I sent a resolution on this subject to the minister, to the leader of the Opposition, and to all the western members. I do not think I got the courtesy of a reply from many of them, though I did get one or two. The difficulty is more apparent in the Western provinces, I think, than it is in the East. We have several school districts where as many as four different quarter-sections, on which taxes have been paid for thirty years, have been thrown up. Debentures have been issued and money borrowed on that security; those debentures have to be met and the school taxes have to be paid. The government has refused to pay those taxes. In many cases these soldier settlers—and my sympathies go out to them—have not paid taxes during all the time they have been on the land. I believe the arrears of taxes have been paid by the government, but they refuse to be responsible for them after the soldier leaves the land. I think something ought to be done to remedy that condition.

Mr. BROWN: This whole subject will be discussed in the special committee that is dealing with the matter, and when their report is brought in we can deal with it fully. But I assume that part of this amount of $12,000,000 will go to the further extension of the scheme that has been followed. How many applications are in hand from those who wish to take advantage—for it was supposed to be an advantage—of the scheme?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Perhaps I can answer that question best by giving the hon. member the following statement:

Certificates of qualification, entitling the holder to participate in the benefits of the act, have been granted to 23,786 returned soldiers who have not thus far received any loan privileges. There is no way of estimating exactly how many of these men may be applicants for loans, but a considerable number will undoubtedly desire to be established on the land. Loan applications have been received from 576 men during the month of April, and inspection of the land is under way. Advices from district offices indicate another 700 as pending. In addition, there are 416 men in training, who must be provided for. Provision must also be made for additional loans for settlers only partially established in previous years. Loans authorized during the past year have in some cases been unexpended as yet, and provision must be made for meeting the requirements of the settlers concerned. The estimate of $10,260,000 for loans must cover all these requirements, and with the utmost care in administration and in the granting of loans, the appropriation will barely cover the applications already in hand and pending, and the settlers in training.

As to the question of taxation of these lands when they fall into the hands of the board, and therefore become Crown lands, I may say that this matter will be further discussed in the committee. I have a great deal of sympathy for the school boards and municipalities concerned; for I have some knowledge of the effect of such conditions in our school districts in western Canada, having had to deal with the exemption of the railway lands in our own province. It would be hoped that the period during which these lands are in that position would be short. But as I say, the matter will come before the committee and I should like to attend its meetings when that discussion takes place. We may then be able to learn what is the general concensus with respect to this matter. Therefore, I am not to-day taking any definite stand in connection with this particular matter.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I have some interest in the Soldier Settlement Board and its work still, and I am anxious if it is within my power to make any suggestion that may be of value. I am glad for my part that if this important trust is to be committed to hon. gentlemen opposite, it is in the hands of the Minister of the Interior. He understands as well as any other member of this House general farming conditions in Canada, and particularly in those provinces where the great body of soldier settlement is. I am glad that he has found the general policy, the general features of the enterprise, and the general organization efficient, and that he is proceeding along the lines we pursued. I would not be disposed at all to suggest a reduction in the appropriation that he asks for, in the face of the statement he has just read to the committee. I am surprised rather that there should be so many applicants yet seeking to come in under the plan. I thought by this time the number would have been much more reduced. That information is to me encouraging, and I am sure is to the minister as well.

As to the matter of taxation, there is something to be said for the relief asked for. I know there is danger there, just as there is in meeting the request of the hon. member for Brandon, but because there is danger, it does not mean that a distinction cannot be drawn in such a way as to place the department safe. I do not purpose, however, to make now any specific suggestion in that direction. As to the complaint raised on behalf of the settler himself, there are of course some who have failed in the work. Their number is small in proportion and is mainly due, no doubt, to the reversal in prices of lands and products that has been general throughout the whole farming community of our country, and indeed has had its repercussion in every other calling in life. We ought rather to be surprised that the number of failures is as low as it is, and that the consequences of failures to the government at least have been so slight. The difficulty is to meet such a situation in a manner that will not involve further insurmountable obligations all down the whole line of the returned soldier list. I know that difficulty because I have faced it myself. If the soldier who fails is to be regarded as still in a sense a government cestui qui trust, a man to whom the government owes special obligation because of his failure, that doctrine has very far reaching implications and would carry the liabilities of our country to a prodigious extent.

This suggestion I offer as a commencement. In the case where the soldier, being a homesteader either prior to the war or after the war, enters into obligations and as a consequence loses his homestead, say, in the case where he buys another piece of land and mortgages his home, and then because of that obligation finds himself submerged, there might, it seems to me, be a rule that the board should hold that his homestead right was not exhausted and that he could come in under the class of cases that homesteaded before 1894 and have the right to homestead again. It seems to me that would only be an extension of the principle of aiding in the development of cultivation, by giving special assistance for the purpose of securing more cultivation, more farming in this country.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): If you give the right to the soldier to take up another homestead, how would you finance him until he got a start?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I had not made any suggestion in that direction. The government, of course, ordinarily does not finance a homesteader, and I did not suggest financing him if he is given the right to homestead again. I am afraid to do so would carry our obligations very far. But put him in the same position as though he never had entered at all. It would not, of course, be a restoration of the man to the position he hoped to be in; I know that; I do not pretend it is doing a great deal for him, because good homestead land now is very hard to secure. If the government found it in their power to do more, no one would be more pleased than I, but it seems to me it could safely do that much. If there are difficulties in the way they do not occur to my mind at present.

Of course, hon. gentlemen to my left must bear in mind that a new day has just dawned for the farmers of our country. A new light, a "larger liberty", a "new freedom" has dawned to-day for Canadian agriculture. No doubt the returned soldiers, when they know that the duty on their implements is to be reduced by two and a half per cent, will take new heart and courage. They will hereafter see in their balance sheets at the end of the year, no doubt, a vastly improved return. Even those who have abandoned their farms, will at this encouraging news surely make haste to return and take up the pursuit of agriculture once more.

Mr. CALDWELL: I would suggest that this item stand over until the sub-committee that is considering land settlement have reported, because I know a number of hon. members who do not wish to discuss this item until that report has been made.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I might remind the hon. member that passing this item would make no difference to any recommendations the committee might make. The committee can make any recommendation at all, and when that report comes down this whole matter could be discussed.

Progress reported.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

After Recess

The Committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. WARD: Mr. Chairman, representing as I do a constituency which, I think, has the second largest number of returned soldiers settled under the Land Settlement scheme in the Dominion, and having observed to some extent the conditions surrounding these settlements, and the effect the present scheme is having not only upon the soldiers themselves but upon the country as a whole, I must say that I am absolutely opposed to another dollar being spent for the encouragement of new settlements under that scheme. I do not, however, wish to be misunderstood in making such a statement. I do not for a minute accuse the Soldiers Settlement Board, or the late government, of insincerity. I believe they both started out in all sincerity, believing they were going to do something really effective for the returned soldiers. Unfortunately the moral status of the human race has not developed to a stage where selfishness does not enter into these matters. Consequently the moment the board came into being, it became surrounded with a group of land speculators, grafters and job seekers, whose operations defeated the very purpose for which the board was created.

The conditions surrounding these soldiers are such that unless immediate steps are taken to relieve the prevailing economic conditions under which they are labouring, a very large percentage of those in my constituency will be forced to leave their farms. It is humanly impossible for them to continue operations if they are to pay the inflated prices at which these farms and equipment were bought. As we all know, in the years 1919, 1920, and 1921 the prices of materials of all kinds were at the peak. In some cases those prices were inflated to a figure many times beyond their real value; inflation was witnessed to an extent we had never before seen in western Canada. Unfortunately too, we have had, as yet, no definite statement from the minister, nor from the committee that they are considering this question, as to what is proposed to be done with these returned soldiers that are now settled on the land.

I have visited a great many of these homes and made a personal inspection of their conditions and I am convinced that if a practical man were sent in to re-value this land the valuation would be reduced by at least 200 per cent in many cases. It has been suggested that the interest paid by these men might be withdrawn for three or four years. Even if that were done it would only be deluding the settlers with false hopes, because where the land has been bought for 200 per cent above its fair value it is not humanly possible for the returned soldiers ever to make good. In many cases they bought binders at $330, waggons at $150, horses at $450 a team, and cows at $100 a piece. Burdened with such overhead charges as these even the most experienced farmer could not achieve success. In the area known as the lake Manitoba district, which is possibly the largest district settled by returned soldiers in Western Canada, the land is only of third class quality; and yet many of these quarter sections were bought for sums approximating $2,500,$3,000, and $3,500. There is not a man in this House would value those farms at a price exceeding eight or nine hundred dollars if he knew anything at all about farming. I think, therefore, we should have some definite announcement from the minister as to what he intends to do with the settlements that have been made in the West under such conditions. If he will give an assurance that full recognition will be given to the claims of these soldiers before entering upon any fresh scheme of settlement I am perfectly willing to support the voting of any amount of money deemed to be necessary for the maintenance of our returned men, who are now settled on the land. But I certainly am opposed to another dollar being spent under the old scheme, because I think it is physically impossible for that scheme to be a success. If the minister can give us a suggestion along those lines, I would be perfectly willing to allow this item to pass; but if he cannot, I certainly am opposed to any further settlement being made under such a scheme that ties the soldier up financially, morally, and every other way.

I may say that I never was in favour of the soldier land settlement scheme, not because of any prejudice against the government or the board or anyone else, but simply because I believe that it was humanly impossible for such a scheme to be worked out satisfactorily, and I think my fears have been quite borne out. I have in mind at the present time several cases. For example, I know of a young man who had clerked in a store all his life. He and a farmer's son enlisted together from my district in the fall of 1914; they went over to France, and after serving about three and a half years in France, they were fortunate enough to come back. The government said to the boy who had been reared as a farmer and who was inclined to go on to the land: "We will lend you four or five thousand dollars to go on the farm." On the other hand, they said to the other boy who had clerked in a store and who was inclined to go back to his old job: "We will not give you anything."

I am inclined to ask why discrimination was shown, and I am convinced that the majority of the people of Canada will bear me out in this, that had the late government made some sort of a cash settlement, if it had been only $500 apiece to the returned soldiers, it would have cost the taxpayers much less and been more satisfactory than the settlement that was made. I have seen people throw up their hands in horror and say: "Where would you have got this money to make a settlement with the soldiers?" I ask: "What would have happened had the war gone on for another year?" Would the soldiers in France have thrown down their arms, or the people of Canada withdrawn their sympathy and their money? Of course, they would not. The war would have gone on just the same; it would have been won just the same, and it would have cost the people of Canada probably another billion dollars.

In all fairness to the returned soldiers, it is up to the government to take off the farms at the government expense those men who are facing impossible conditions of which there are many, and to repudiate their debts and at least set them free. A large percentage of them are facing an impossible proposition; and while in some cases probably the soldiers may make good, every case should be considered on its merits, and a revaluation made of the land and equipment, and the returned soldiers given a fair show to make good. I have had it said to me: "If we had made a cash settlement with the returned soldiers, they would all have gone broke in a short time." Well! If they had gone broke, that was their own business, and they would have been dealing with their own money. But I have too much faith in the men who went over to France, who endured what they did there and who saved this country and helped to save the British Empire, to believe that a large percentage of them would have squandered their money in any such manner. If they had been given a cash gratuity, a much larger percentage of them would have made good than is making good as under the present scheme, and would have done just as well as any other class. All we have to do to-day is to give the returned soldier a fair show, and that is something which he has not had in Canada up to the present time.

I do not wish to open up a new question; but I cite this merely to point out that, when many of these boys came back from France, they were single men on their own resources, and if they had squandered their money, they had nobody dependent upon them and nobody to blame but themselves. In what situation do we find them to-day? We find them away out on homesteads to-day absolutely stranded; their hope is gone; their morale is wrecked; and when these principles are lost you have lost about all there is in the human life. Many of them have now a wife and a family of small children. Nothing is left for them to do but to drift back to our towns and cities and fill up the bread line. Is that what the people of Canada want t ohand out to the returned soldiers? I think not. That is exactly what is being done in my constituency, although it may be the only constituency in Canada in which that treatment is being meted out.

I therefore could not allow this estimate to pass without registering my protest against conditions that now surround the returned soldier settler. I should be glad if the minister would give us a statement of what he intends to do in the future and how rigidly he intends to examine every settlement that is made. It may be said that the soldiers have the privilege of going out and examining these farms before purchasing. That is very true; but in my district there are very few farmers' sons who, after they examined the soldier settlement scheme, would take land under it. It was only the men and boys who did not understand farming or conditions surrounding the primitive stages of agriculture, who took land under that scheme. That proved that had the scheme been a good one, the farm boys would have taken land under it; but they simply would not take the risk. If I to-day were given a choice between stepping into the shoes of some returned soldiers in my district and spendig the rest of my days one one of their farms, and undergoing a term in a penitentiary, I would prefer to take a term in the penitentiary. I would then know when it ends. I trust the minister will make some definite statement in regard to this matter.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Many members who are present to-night were not present when I made my explanation before the committee rose at six o'cloc.k I said then that I had to accept the Soldier Settlement Board as I found it. I say now that I cannot very well give any explanation of what is past. My hon. friend is dealing very largely with past history in regard to the Soldier Settlement Board, and I thoroughly agree with him in his statement that the purchases were upon inflated values; but they undoubtedly were the prices prevailing at the time the purchases were made for livestock, implements and land. I am not going to argue with my hon. friend as regards his statement that land purchased in his locality was purchased at too high a figure, even under inflated values, because I do not know anything about that. But, for the future, there will not be so much difficulty in that regard, because if we admit that livestock was inflated in value at the period when most of these men were re-established, that is not the case to-day, and one would not have that difficulty to encounter in re-establishing men on the land at the present time. Something might be said still about the price of implements, and to come to the main question, that of the purchase of land, I think a great deal of care should be exercised with respect to the settlement of the man upon the land and the price that is paid for the land. I do not wish to be dragged into a general discussion of this matter; but so far as I am able to influence the board and its officials, my efforts shall be to the end that every purchase of land that is made for the re-establishment of a soldier may be made at a rock-bottom price. There are two reasons. First, it will be necessary that the security of the Government in that land be maintained; and, secondly it is desirable to give to the man himself the most favourable opportunity possible to make good.

Now, as to the general question raised by my hon. friend as to what we are to do in the present circumstances, that is a matter which I trust will be thoroughly threshed out by the committee who are dealing with this whole subject, and who will recommend to the Government what, in their opinion, is the best method to be pursued in order to meet a very difficult situation. I do not think there can be any difference of opinion on the fact that the deflation in values has left not only these men, but every man who is engaged in agriculture, in a very difficult position; but more particularly has it affected these men who are just only entering into agriculture on their land.

I hope the committee will give this matter their very serious consideration. I am anxious to co-operate with them when the question is being discussed, because I fully appreciate its importance, and the difficulties it presents. I do not want to go minutely into the matter to-night. There are a great many phases of it that will have to be carefully considered by the committee before any conclusion can be arrived at as to what will be the best course to take. As to the future I can assure my hon. friends that the greatest care will be exercised. When I say that I fully realize that the difficulties that existed in the years just passed will not be so great henceforward. The situation will not be as difficult as it was at the time when so many of the men were being settled on the land.

Mr. WARD: Many of the returned soldiers who settled in the locality between lake Dauphin and lake Manitoba did so in the expectation that the Rorketon line of the Canadian Northern would be built. In fact it is only reasonable to suppose that the board made this promise. The grade is already completed from St. Rose to Rorketon. Many of the soldiers are between 15 and 25 miles distant from the railway and it is not reasonable to expect that they will remain on the land unless they are afforded transportation facilities. I am sorry that the Railway Department cannot see its way clear to relieve the soldiers of the handicaps to which they are subjected, at least to the extent of laying the steel on the line between these two points. To delay this work is simply breaking faith with these men, and the Government may rest assured that they will not remain in that district much longer unless this line is built in the very near future.

Mr. MILLAR: I do not feel like blaming the late government, as some do, for the course they took. It was a sincere effort to meet a difficult situation. I cannot see that the officers of the government could foresee the deflation in prices that would follow the establishment of the board and the attempt to place soldiers on the land. I know that there are few business men who could have foreseen it, at least to the extent to which it occurred. But I should like to say a word or two in regard to the men who were chosen to appraise the land. Now, I will not repeat the rumours I have heard, but I will give two instances to show the importance of the greatest care being exercised in the choice of the men who carry out the scheme, if it is the intention to purchase more land. There is quite an impression throughout the country that those who have been sent to appraise land have, in some cases, got a little rakeoff themselves. I am not prepared to prove the assertion in any case and therefore I will not repeat the rumours that have come to me. I will, however, mention two cases as matters of fact.

The land belonging to a certain man was to go to a returned soldier who had been working for him and in whom he was keenly interested. After the appraiser had looked it over he got the seller by himself and asked him: "How much is there in it?" The seller of the land is quite convinced that the question that was really implied, although the actual words were not uttered, was: "How much is there in it for me?" He replied that there were 320 acres. In another case a certain man told me he had driven one of the appraisers signed a receipt for $12 but got only $6. Of course, if there are only one or two isolated cases of that sort they are hardly worth mentioning; and I cannot say whether or not there are more. But it just goes to show the importance of being exceedingly careful in choosing men who will do the honest thing. I have no doubt that care was taken in the choice of these men. I do not suppose that the late government picked up anybody and everybody; but there is an impression in some cases that farms that were suitable were turned down by the appraisers in favour of poorer farms. That would be a great injustice to the soldiers who were to occupy the land. As I say, I cannot give any actual proof.

I had thought that when money was expended to place soldiers on the land and assist them, the scheme might have gone a little further and given assistance to men who wanted to engage in mercantile business or in any other occupation for which they were fitted by previous training. While it is a difficult matter to deal with, some re-adjustment of values ought to be made, and land, implements and horses bought at inflated prices should be re-valued in order to give the returned men some chance of escaping from the burdens they are carrying at present. According to what has been said, some of them cannot possibly, under the most favourable circumstances, throw off the burden. That, I believe, is quite true. Many of these men, if compelled to pay a hundred cents on the dollar would, I doubt not, go to the wall, and the most careful consideration should be given them. I realize that the minister has been in office only a short time,—in fact, too short a time for him to be able to map out any policy that can settle the matter immediately. I feel willing, therefore, to allow the item to pass in the hope that he may find a way out of the difficulty.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Millar) ought to give by letter, to the minister the facts upon which he bases the statement he has just made as regards the two officers of the board. I personally would ask, no matter who appointed them, that the member give the facts to the minister and that the minister investigate each case and deal mercilessly with the individuals if they are found guilty.

In this connection I may say that in the three sessions that passed during which I came before the House with estimates for the Soldiers' Settlement Board, I heard only three hon. members criticise the honesty and fidelity of officers of the board, either in relation to valuations or to services of any other kind. In each of those three cases I had the chairman of the board communicate directly with the member, earnestly asking him to give the name of the officer, the description of the lands, and such other facts as would enable identification, and promising definite and immediate investigation. In each case the member declined. In each case we pursued the matter, pressing to the utmost to get the facts, but never were we able to secure any. One of the hon. members I refer to is to-day a member of the Government. Now I hope the minister will press that the facts be given in this case, and if they are—and I do not wish to intimate that the hon. member for Qu'Appelle will decline to furnish the required information—I ask that a searching investigation be made and the result reported to the House, and that if any party is guilty he shall be punished. As respects remedying these matters, I do not know anything to hinder the minister doing so. He has been in his office four months, this is not an arduous task, all the pioneering work has been done, the trail is blazed, and it is merely a matter of pursuing a definite policy, which I have confidence the minister is quite able to do. If there is anything waiting to be done I for one ask him to get busy and have it done.

Mr. MILLAR: I am not at all unwilling to give the names of my informants, provided I can secure their consent. I shall try to do so.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I might as well say here and now that so far as I am personally concerned, whether a member of Parliament or any one else raises any question with regard to the honesty of officials in any department over which I have charge, if he will give us any evidence upon which we can work, a thorough investigation will be held at once. I have heard very frequently statements made that too high a price has been paid for the land upon which these men have been settled. Members of Parliament can help the board very considerably by at once bringing to our attention any such cases and I shall welcome their co-operation.

Mr. LEWIS: I do not know what method was in force in other constituencies, but in my constituency it was generally the returned soldier that endeavoured to make the bargain in the first place. He looked over what he considered would be a suitable farm, then he inquired the price, and later on he made application to the Soldiers' Settlement Board, and the board as far as possible acquiesced in his wishes. I do not know of any case where the board authorized a higher price than the soldier wished to give. I think the same is true in regard to implements and other things. But at the same time it must be remembered that these farms and implements were bought at inflated prices, although they were generally recognized as being fair at that particular period. I do not know whether the minister has under favourable consideration a revaluation or not, but in view of the serious conditions, and of the charge made by my hon. friend on my left, I would ask the minister if he could tell us what percentage of money has been repaid to the department by the returned soldiers, as that would give us some conception of their success or failure on the land.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): The money received in payment on contracts?

Mr. LEWIS: Yes, which is paid back.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): These are the repayments on principal account:

On land—
From commencement to March 31, 1921	$ 1,625,596 88
Year 1921-22	614,246 62
Total	$ 2,239,843 50
On stock and equipment—
To March 31, 1921	$ 1,175,316 91
Year 1921-22	913,466 77
Total	$ 2,088,783 68
Repayment of interest on land—
To March 31, 1921	$ 680,312 89
Year 1921-22	740,452 83
Total	$ 1,420,765 72
Repayment interest on stock and implements—
To March 31, 1921	$ 10,690 73
Year 1921-22	40,612 78
Total	$ 51,303 51

Refunds—
On fire losses	$ 370,512	81
On stock and equipment	599,690	74
On initial payments (Ten per cent deposit of soldiers)	$ 5,114,881	49
Total	$11,885,781	45

Mr. LEWIS: What percentage of success does this $11,800,000 represent?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I think that in fairness you should separate the initial payments and payments for fire losses from the other items mentioned, in order to get the actual return made by the settlers upon the land.

Mr. HUGHES: What was the total amount paid out by the department under this scheme?

Mr. CALDWELL: If the minister would give us the respective percentages of the soldier settlers who made their due payments in full, the percentage who have made part payment and the percentage who made no payment after the initial payment, we would get a better idea of how successful the scheme has been.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Of total payments due, thirty-five per cent was received up to April 30 of last year.

Mr. CALDWELL: That is, thirty-five per cent of the money due has been paid; but what percentage of the settlers have made their due payments?

Mr. SPEAKMAN: Perhaps it would be in order for me to say a few words on this matter, because I am, perhaps, as deeply interested in it and possibly as conversant with the facts of the case as most of the hon. members here. I had not proposed to speak on the subject to-night; as chairman of the special committee which has this matter under consideration with a view to bringing forward recommendations, I felt it would be out of place that I should speak now, preferring to reserve anything I had to say until our report was laid on the Table and opportunity for a full discussion could be afforded. But in view of the line of debate that has been followed and in view of some of the statements which have been made, it might be of interest to the committee if I should give them an idea of the activities of the special committee which is dealing with this matter. I shall not go into detail, nor shall I anticipate the report. I simply wish to say, in all justice to the minister, that he has placed the matter entirely in the hands of that special committee; and he is deferring any action until its recommendations are forthcoming. The matter was turned over to that committee in its entirety; there were no strings on it. We were told to go ahead; we were given free access to all books and the right to call any witnesses we wished to examine and to question the officials of the department; then to make up our own minds and submit our recommendations to the House. I am fully cognizant of the condition of the returned men on the land at the present time; I think I can say so, because I believe I was the first man in the House to advocate this measure of revaluation. We are fully cognizant, I say, of the condition of the returned man, and we are giving it full consideration. At present all I can say is this: When our report is brought down we shall have done what we could to alleviate his condition and, I believe, will be able to have considerably improved his prospects for the future. I am expressing only my own opinion, but it seems to me that further discussion on the policy to be pursued might more profitably be carried on when our report is brought down and hon. members know just what our recommendations are.

Mr. HUGHES: If the minister has the information for which I asked him, I should be glad to have it.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I have already given that; it is on Hansard.

Mr. KELLNER: If I understand this resolution correctly, it is the intention of the Government to spend about $1,500,000 in connection with the duties of the board and about $10,500,000 by way of loans. I would like to ask the minister if that is the intention. The statement was also made that the difficulties in the past had been greater than they would be in the future; and the minister has been the recipient of a bouquet or two from across the floor of the House. I would like to ask him if in his opinion he does not think that as soon as conditions improve, fifty per cent of these soldiers will vacate the farms they are now on? If he is to come on the floor of the House as a judge in this matter, he will be able, no doubt, to give us an intelligent idea of whether or not that is to be the case.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): The hon. member (Mr. Kellner) has asked a very difficult question. I made it clear to the committee before six o'clock that I was not here in the position of a critic of what had heretofore been done. When I came into the department I accepted things as I found them. From that date forward, of course, I shall have to be responsible for the department. The hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Speakman) has just covered the whole ground, in my opinion. If the soldiers are to remain upon their land; if they are to make a success of agriculture, there is no doubt that some remedy, some relief, will have to be provided in respect of the conditions which exist. But the whole matter is to be discussed by the special committee who, we hope, will recommend a solution to the Government; and I think I am safe in saying that we will do our very best to carry out the recommendations of that committee. It has been pointed out that anyone who wishes to make representations to the committee will be given a full hearing, and I shall be glad if any hon. members who have recommendations to make in the matter will attend the meetings of the committee and make them there.

Mr. CALDWELL: This vote is for the cost of administering the Soldiers' Land Settlement Act. We have had a good deal of information as to the repayment of loans by the soldiers. I should like to know what the cost of administering this act has been from the beginning to the present. That is an item, I take it, that is not taken into account in the statement of the standing of the Soldier Settlement Board, as that statement deals wholly with loans to the soldiers and their repayment.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): The total cost of administration up to the end of last year was $7,751,074.20.

Mr. CALDWELL: From which there has not been, and will not be, any return.

Mr. STEWART: (Argenteuil): I do not know how we could ever get a return from that.

Mr. CALDWELL: With regard to the statements made by the hon. member for Qu'Appelle, I am not at all surprised that in an organization of this kind there may be an occasional crook, or a man who will fake his expense account. However, I have had a very close connection with the work of this board in New Brunswick since the work first started, and I just want to say this: I wish I had the same faith in all departments of government that I have in the Soldiers' Land Settlement Board, both as to its honesty, its selection of suitable officials, and so forth. There is no doubt they will get a crook once in a while, but so far as New Brunswick is concerned, I think the men who valued the farms there were the best men that could have been got in the province. I think—no, I will say I know—that we bought these farms cheaper in New Brunswick than private individuals were able to buy the same farm for in many cases. Sometimes we refused to buy farms that we did not think were value for the money asked, and within two weeks the owner would sell to a private individual at the same price we refused to pay. I say "we" because I was on the loan committee that bought the farms the first summer, and was also chairman of the qualifications committee that judged of the men's qualifications for holding, so I was in a fair position to judge of the ability of the men who valued these farms, and I think that the work was well done. The men who went out and bought the stock, say, a team of horses, did not handle the money, but they made the deal and bought the team for the man, the bill was sent to the superintendent of the Soldier Settlement Board, and the cheque was sent direct from the board to the man from whom the stock was bought. The procedure was the same in buying farms. The committee, of which I was a member, which bought the farms did not handle any money, but they put the deal through, and the money was paid by the officials of the board direct to the owners of the farm. I think the scheme was well conceived and well carried out. I have no doubt there were some cases of faking of accounts, but from my experience of the board, in any case of this kind that was brought to their attention the culprits would get short shrift.

Mr. McBRIDE: I had not intended to say anything about this matter, as I think it is only a waste of time to discuss it until the committee's report has been brought down. However, I will say this. During the campaign I heard a great number of insinuations against the officers of the Soldier Settlement Board, and after the election campaign was over I spent the greater part of my spare time until I came down to Ottawa sifting these matters out. There was not one insinuation that I heard of before the election that I did not try to follow up after the election in order to get the facts. In some cases I asked for an affidavit from those who made the charges, as I thought I was entitled to that before bringing the matter up on the floor of this House. I might say that in every case they refused to make an affidavit. I do not think insinuations should be made against officers, especially on the floor of this House, unless there is a good foundation for them backed up by an affidavit. I am not by any means satisfied with the officers as a whole, who are looking after the returned soldiers, and I intend to have a good deal to say about that when the report comes up for discussion. In the meantime I will reserve my remarks.

IMMIGRATION

Immigration and Colonization—immigration outside service, salaries, $640,000.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): When the civil government immigration estimates were up, I promised that when the general estimates were under consideration I would have something to say about the policy to be pursued in connection with immigration for this year at least. One cannot say very much about immigration without taking into consideration the condition in which Canada finds herself at the moment. During the past winter this committee has had evidence with regard to conditions in this country in the amounts they are being asked to vote, and will be asked to vote in the future, for unemployment relief, from one end of Canada to the other. Furthermore, in what we fondly call these reconstruction days, we find a great many people apparently dissatisfied with conditions as they find them, a great many who are loath to engage in enterprises that will provide employment, and on the part of labour we find no desire to accept a reduction in wages and thereby help us to get back to normal times. These conditions have been fairly general from the Atlantic to the Pacific. Then when we look abroad to the countries from which we hope to secure immigration, we find that by far the larger proportion of the people who would be willing to emigrate are men desirous of obtaining employment. They constitute by far the greater proportion of those who are willing to settle in Canada. Of course, there is a fairly large number of people who are anxious to change their home and would be willing to come to Canada, who are in a better position and have the necessary funds to establish themselves here. I hope I am not too pessimistic when I make the assertion that probably not for some time to come shall we be able to receive all those who would be willing to come to Canada and who would make desirable citizens, and by that I mean those who are mentally and physically fit and are desirous of finding employment here and becoming Canadian citizens.

I think at the moment it would not be wise to encourage, or to invite, any large numbers of people who have to maintain themselves particularly by manual labour, but I do hope that that period will pass very rapidly. That is the condition of affairs we must face. With respect to our policy for immigration, and the amendments made to the Order in Council dealing with the subject to which I will allude later, some criticism has been offered inasmuch as we apparently have been closing the doors to all but people with means to purchase or to become agriculturalists, agricultural labourers, and household workers. But taking into consideration the situation that I have outlined, these apparently are the only classes of individuals that we can absorb in Canada at the moment, and therefore any amendments to the Orders in Council in existence have been made with that object in view.

I do not think it is necessary to touch upon the question of oriental immigration at this moment. Let me say to my hon. friends from British Columbia that I am endeavouring to find a solution that will meet, in a large way, the desires expressed by those gentlemen the other evening. Let me also say, in passing, that I sympathize very much with them in their desire to have a larger percentage of the population in British Columbia of the white race.

It being a fact that we can only absorb the three classes I have mentioned at the moment, I have endeavoured to organize the forces we have, for the purpose of securing for Canada its fair share of those classes both in the Old Land, in the United States in Scandinavia and to some extent upon the continent of Europe. One matter that I would like to speak about, an allegation that frequently appears in the press of Great Britain, is that we in Canada are setting up too rigid an inspection of the immigration that would come to us. It has been frequently stated that has been, and still is, the attitude of the department. Well, Mr. Chairman, clearly there is no use in augmenting the ranks of the unemployed. As I said to you a moment ago, we could undoubtedly get a great number of people who would come to Canada and would go to swell the ranks of those who are out of employment at the moment; but we are making the endeavour to get every agriculturalist from Great Britain that we can induce to come to Canada. That work is being carried on there by our agents, and through the medium of lectures and advertising, we are endeavouring to reach all of that class of people that it is possible for us to reach. The same may be said of agricultural labourers and household workers.

Before I leave the subject of immigration from Great Britain, I want to mention one other class of immigration that has been found very desirable in the past, and that I think we can very well encourage to the fullest extent—that is the child immigration coming to this country. I was astounded the other day, when discussing this matter with Mr. Smart, who is in charge of this work, to hear from him that last year 1,500 children were brought to Canada, and that there were applications for 15,000 more. In other words, the department could have placed 15,000 children in the homes of Canadian citizens. There seems to be a wide field there; and the policy of the Government will be to secure a larger proportion of the "teen-age" boys and girls who would come to Canada and fill this demand that appears to be prevalent for those children. Mr. Smart is about to leave for England on this mission, to see if we cannot, in a larger way, secure those boys and girls.

Australia has become a very strong competitor with Canada, and South Africa as well, for the immigration of adults as well as of children. Ever increasing inducements are being offered for British immigration to go to those two countries; and, in some measure, we will have to meet that competition. It is possible, therefore, that I will ask for increased grants for the purpose of encouraging the assistance of the people who are engaged in this class of work in the Old Land. Before leaving this question I would like to say, Mr. Chairman, that this is a class of immigration I think it is very desirable we should get to Canada. It is the class that appeals to me very much, because these children will go to our Canadian homes, grow up in our schools and become thorough Canadians if we can express the sentiment in that manner. Of course they are British stock but, I think, will turn out to be settlers much more desirable than persons more advanced in years. And I say that I am rather keen on the question of securing for Canada all of the child immigration that it is possible for us to obtain.

In the countries of Scandinavia and Iceland—indeed in Holland and in Belgium as well—although I am told that a year ago immigration and immigration propaganda were not looked upon with favour we to-day find that condition changing. I am hopeful we will get from Iceland this year a fair amount of the Icelandic people who, it is needless to say, make splendid settlers upon our western lands. We also entertain the same hope with respect to Scandinavia which has also furnished many fine settlers to western Canada. In these countries there is an ever increasing interest in immigration and I believe the authorities there will be willing to consider allowing their citizens to leave their homeland for Canada. In Holland we have a complete change with respect to immigration to Canada. Whereas a year, or a year and a half ago, the Dutch government were unwilling that their people should leave that country and come to Canada, to-day they are anxious to assist, and are assisting us in a very large way in bringing a splendid class of people to this country, and we are working that field for all it is worth.

Mr. JACOBS: Will the minister permit me a question? Can he say why it is that the Dutch government are so anxious to have their people leave Holland in order to settle in Canada? What is the reason of it?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): One of the reasons, perhaps, is that they have more people than they can absorb at home; I am speaking now purely and simply of the agricultural class; I am not referring to any other class of citizens.

Mr. WARNER: They are all right; let them come.

Mr. JACOBS: But Holland has its own colonies to which it can send its people, and in that way they would not be lost to the home land. Why have the Dutch shown such a strong desire to settle in the West at the present time? Is it because they have heard, from the remarks of the farmer members in this Chamber, of the splendid conditions there?

Mr. CAMPBELL: I should like to draw the minister's attention to a letter which I have just received from one of my constituents and which bears upon this very matter. He encloses a clipping from a Regina paper showing a despatch dated May 4, to this effect:

> The provincial Government, in co-operation with the federal Department of Immigration, has made arrangements to bring contingents of farm labourers from Holland, it was announced officially to-day.

My correspondent says in part:

> I might say that the people of your constituency are not in favour of voting money for agricultural purposes, nor are we in favour of spending money to bring in immigration, as it is almost impossible for the people who are here to make a living.
> In December last, there were 246 quarter sections of land sold for arrears of taxes in this municipality, a total in this and the two adjoining municipalities, of 846 quarters, 137,160 acres in all.

I very much question the wisdom of bringing in immigrants at the present time, when it is, as this correspondent says, and it is undoubtedly correct, impossible for the people in that district to make a living.

In that connection also, I might say that when we are inducing immigrants to come to Canada, we should at least endeavour to give them a square deal. I have a matter that I have been dealing with and corresponding with the department over for some time, the case of a Highland Scotch family, who sold their home and their few chattels in May, 1921, preparatory to coming to Canada. They purchased their tickets, and they were all ready to sail, when the doctor passed on a little girl of the family as feeble-minded. The family were left in a very awkward position. Their baggage had already come forward to Canada, and it had to be returned. They were left in that way for nearly a year, and they spent almost the last cent they had. In fact, when they came to Canada just recently, it was only through their relatives sending them money that they were enabled to continue the voyage. They were held up for a whole year on account of something that, I think, is radically wrong in the Department of Immigration. I will read just a statement from the report dealing with the explanation given recently why these people were held up for a whole year. The report reads:

> This decision was conveyed to the Superintendent of Emigration, in London, by letter of November 16, and on January 25, he replied, by cable, to the effect that the medical officer of the Health Department recommended the admission of the girl and, moreover, was of the opinion that the Assistant Deputy Minister of Health would understand that the girl was a characteristic Highland country girl and not feeble-minded.

I would ask hon. gentlemen and particularly the minister if he can see any connection between a normal Highlander and something that is feeble-minded. I appealed to the department to give justice to this family, at least to do something for them to help them to come to Canada, in view of the fact that it was carelessness on the part of the officials that was responsible for their being held up for a whole year and being compelled to spend their last dollar. But nothing was accomplished, and it was only through the charity of some of their friends that they were enabled to come to this country. If we induce people to come to Canada, we should at least give them a square deal.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): When my hon. friend (Mr. Jacobs) interrupted me about immigration from Holland and the hon. member (Mr. Campbell) interrupted me in connection with the matter in which the medical examiner appeared to have been in doubt or to have made a mistake, I was endeavouring to cover the field in a statement of what we hoped to do in connection with immigration into Canada. Before I have finished my remarks, I will deal with some of the matters raised by my hon. friend.

I wish to make my statement as brief as possible, and yet I want in a fairly comprehensive way to cover the field. From Poland we hope to get and I think we undoubtedly will, a large number of people who will go upon the land. That fairly well covers the field in Great Britain and on the Continent. In the Scandinavian countries outside of Iceland we are not permitted, as I said before, to canvass or to advertise for settlers, and we have newspaper advertisements appearing in Iceland at this moment. As regards the Continent, We have taken three of our best trained men, one from Vancouver, one from the central office and one from Niagara Falls and sent them over to Mr. H. M. Mitton, who is the agent at Antwerp. Our idea in doing that is to endeavour to avoid some of the difficulties that have resulted from having to send back a considerable number of people who arrive at our shores. I can scarcely conceive of any people with Scotch blood in them not being mentally sound, but there might be an odd case. If there is, however, it is important; and if my hon. friend knows anything about conditions in the Western provinces where a large percentage of immigration that has come to Canada has settled, he must know that too large a percentage of people who are mentally unfitted to come to this country have been allowed to enter Canada. I mentioned that the other day, and I know whereof I am speaking, because our mental hospital in Alberta has had too large a percentage of people allowed to come into Canada who were mentally unfit.

Mr. SPENCER: Were the majority of those people who were mentally unfit drawn from country or from city life?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Far too large a percentage of them came from our homesteads in the earlier days.

Mr. LEWIS: Was that due to their mental deficiency in the first place, or to the terrible conditions that exist on the farms in the West at the present time?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): My hon. friends who have settled in Western Canada and gone through homesteading experience know very well that if one was not sound in body and mind—and this was the case particularly with women who went through the trials of early settlement—very frequently when there was a weakness, one broke down under the strain.

Mr. SALES: And when there was not a weakness. My wife spent six months one winter without seeing a woman whom she could speak to. If that is not enough to drive a woman crazy, I should like to know what is.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. SALES: I do not exactly see the reason for the laughter. Perhaps, I am a little Scotch, but that does not mean that I am feeble-minded. From a woman's standpoint, lack of social life is important. What would some hon. members do if for six months they did not see a man to speak to? Some hon. members might be all right.

Mr. CAMPBELL: My contention was that the feeble-mindedness was on the part of officials of the department and not on the part of immigrants.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I know a great deal of criticism is levelled at the officials. I am not making any defence of them; I am speaking simply of conditions as we are facing them to-day, and, indeed, in my short tenure of office, I have had the most strenuous representations made to me, after medical inspection, that individuals should be allowed to enter Canada, it being represented that otherwise families would be separated and also that these individuals would be able to maintain the members of their families who were living under very severe conditions; and I frankly admit these things do appeal to one. But after all, one must do his duty. One must keep in mind the fact that every time one of these individuals gets into the country he too frequently becomes a public charge on the community. Undoubtedly mistakes will be made, and I anticipate that perhaps at the next session of Parliament, if I am here occupying the same position, there will be innumerable cases in which hon. members will be able to criticise me severely. But while I am prepared to deal with these cases from the most sympathetic standpoint, we must remember that we are trying to build up a strong and virile race in Canada, and it is necessary that we should keep that ideal constantly before us.

I do not expect that we shall get a large number of people of the character and class I have mentioned to come to Canada; I mean agriculturists from Great Britain. I think, however, that it is our duty to get as many of these people as we can possibly secure from the Motherland. I am not unmindful of the fact that some of the people whom we call alien enemies to-day, who have come from countries that were our enemies in the Great War and are now settled in western Canada and elsewhere, have made splendid settlers and have been successful on the land. There is no doubt about that; I do not think that any one who has lived among them will deny the fact. It is said that they are not accustomed to the comforts which we find indispensable, and that they will put up with more hardships than we do. That is true. Some of the people whom we are endeavouring to get from the Highlands of Scotland are coming in at present. Some are settled in Ontario and they will undoubtedly make splendid settlers. They are hard workers and will do well on the land. Probably they will be satisfied with very much less in the way of returns than the people coming from the United States or those people of the Old Country who were in much better circumstances before moving here. I am not suggesting that we should get that class of people, because I realize that it is difficult to make a livelihood on the land. Before concluding I shall deal with the question which has been raised with regard to the difficulty of living on the land. I think I know something about the question.

I want to deal for a moment or two, however, with the possibility of getting immigration from the United States. We are trying to get as many as we can of the Canadians who left Eastern Canada, particularly Quebec and the Maritime provinces, who are now settled in the New England states, and are showing a desire to return to this country, to come back and once more take up farming in the Dominion. In the central states, also, our agents are busily at work. Many of them are on the way at the moment owing to the conditions that have arisen there. During the war land and the products of the land became so inflated, and such high prices were paid for real estate, that the people in the United States, in common with the farmers of Canada, now find themselves in a difficult situation. Many of them are forced to surrender their lands and are looking for some place in which to make a fresh start. Our propaganda has evoked a counteracting campaign on the part of the central states which are making a great effort to hold people. Montana and the more northerly states are making a great effort to hold their population. I feel confident, however, from the reports I have just received from the superintendent, that a very large number of desirable farmers who know the conditions in western Canada will cross the line and take up land there this year.

Let me deal with the question as it affects us in western Canada. I quite agree that farming was never more unprofitable than it was in the past year, and probably we never suffered to such a serious extent as we did during last year and the year before. One farmer will blame one set of conditions, while another will attribute the trouble to other causes. We have had adverse weather conditions on top of a falling market, and all our difficulties seem to come at one time. We had taken on very large obligations in the hope that the inflated prices of live stock and farm produce would continue as they were; and as every one knows, those prices dropped over night and left us in a precarious financial situation. But to say that because of the inability of the people to pay their taxes, and because of the difficulty that our farmers find themselves in to-day, it is unwise to place more agriculturists on the land in Western Canada and in other parts of the Dominion is, I think, a mistake.

While admitting all these difficulties, Parliament is asked to vote large sums of money to carry on the National Railways, part of which money is for deficit in operation, to say nothing about interest charges that are accruing from year to year and that undoubtedly must be taken into account and paid from revenue, seeing that it is doubtful whether they will ever be paid by the operations of the railways. Within twenty miles of practically all these lines of railway that are now in operation to-day, with school houses built, with towns established, and with all the facilities for carrying on business, it will be admitted that there is indeed a very sparse population. We do hope that conditions will change and that agriculture will be made at least reasonably profitable, because, if that hope is not fulfilled, there will be very little done in any other line of business in Canada. If we cannot place the people on the land and assist in production so as to create business generally in the Dominion, if we cannot fill up these vacant spaces, all within twenty miles of railways, then we have a very dreary outlook indeed in Canada. I am not suggesting for a moment that these spaces are immediately to be filled up; we cannot fill them up in a hurry. But I should like to see policies adopted that would make possible a genuine success on the land throughout the country. While perhaps we have not been as prosperous on the land as we should like to have been, and while we may not have made all that we had hoped to make by reason of the inflated values of farm land, it must be remembered that other businesses in Canada, although they may have had prosperous days, are probably themselves in a rather difficult situation to-day.

In bringing immigrants in I think it is a mistake to tell them that the moment they get upon the land they are going to be prosperous. Speaking of my own experience in western Canada, I know it was a few years before I began to get prosperous at the homesteading game; but I am not going to say that I did not make a considerable amount of money out of farming in Alberta. I am not afraid of the future of western Canada so far as agriculture is concerned. I know that the difficult situation depicted by many of my hon. friends opposite is absolutely true, but I may refer the committee to a period in our history, 1892 and 1893, when I was farming in the old province of Ontario. In those days prices for produce dropped very much lower than they have dropped at the present time. You will retort by saying: But living conditions were very different then. I reply that they were not so very different from the conditions under which we are living to-day, bearing in mind the prices we were receiving then compared with those we are receiving now. We survived that trying period, and the farmers of Ontario are perhaps richer to-day than they were in those days, having made more money perhaps because they were established more firmly than we were. But I do say, through the mouths of our immigration agents both in the United States and Great Britain, where we are seeking to get settlers upon our vacant lands, that while this is not a country in which immigrants can pick up gold on the streets, yet it is a country where they can do as well as, indeed better than, in any other country that may invite them. I hope I shall not be misunderstood as holding out glowing hopes for settlers coming here under present conditions, but I do say that if we are to be successful we must get more people on our vacant land. I am not going to deal with the question of how greater success can be attained; that will be dealt with at another time.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What other time has the minister in mind?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): There will be a discusion on the Budget, mentioned by my right hon. friend to-night, and perhaps we will then have an opportunity to discuss that matter. Let me deal for a moment or two with the question of regulations. There was a regulation in force providing that each immigrant must be in possession of at least $250. We have not altered that provision in so far as it affects oriental immigrants, but we have removed what is claimed to be to a certain extent a disability in another connection. We are anxious to let all people—except of course orientals—into Canada who can maintain themselves. There is a class that I have mentioned, the labour class, and similar people without means who are desirous of obtaining employment, but we cannot permit them to enter at the present time. We do hope by the establishment of agents on the Continent and a more rigid inspection of intending immigrants before they leave home, to avoid some of the unfortunate incidents that have happened. Such incidents will perhaps happen again, but by viséing of passports by our own agents we hope that when people sell up their homes on the other side and embark for Canada there will be the least possible difficulty in their passing the test at our port of entry. In the changing of these regulations that is the principal feature I had in mind, so that many of the hardships complained of may be eliminated.

[Mr. Charles Stewart.]

I think I have covered the ground sufficiently, Mr. Chairman. Possibly hon. members will be desirous of asking a number of questions.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Where do the homes exist for the 15,000 child immigrants?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): In Ontario and the eastern provinces.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): In what sort of homes?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Largely farm homes.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Will the children be adopted or merely engaged as helpers?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): In some cases they will be adopted, in other cases they will be taken for a certain term.

Mr. FORKE: I was rather pleased, Mr. Chairman, with the remark the hon. Minister of the Interior made that, "they were all right when you caught them young." Unfortunately I was not caught very young, but I have done the very best I could since I came here to make good.

Now, I do not know if I am going to talk in a strain that will be very pleasant to some of my friends on this side of the House; I am going to speak very much along the same lines as the minister in regard to the necessity for further immigration. I think we all recognize to-day that the greatest difficulties we have to meet in business, on our farms, or in any other calling are our large overhead expenses, the rate of taxation, and our railway deficits. I believe I mentioned once before that if we could double our population we would halve our difficulties in that respect. I know agricultural conditions are unsatisfactory at the present time, but I believe that point of view has been stressed quite enough. I will, however, read a very short extract from a communication received from a private association which has been looking toward Canada as a field for immigration. This is the extract:

> It is our considered judgment that while the serious condition of the agricultural industry may have been exaggerated in some quarters, its position is nevertheless sufficiently grave to justify reasonable measures to improve the lot of the settler now on the land. The prosperity and happiness of the people already in the country is basic to the success of any great immigration movement.

As I have already said, I think perhaps we have stressed that point enough. I do not know what its effect may be outside, but I am sometimes just a little afraid of the psychological effect it is having upon ourselves. We are looking upon the black side so much that probably we are beginning to lose heart at the very time when we ought to take courage and move forward resolved to do better in the future.

Of course, it may be asked: Why invite more people to come to this country when conditions are not satisfactory for those who are already here? I should like to point out some of the remedies that I think might help to mitigate the evils under which we suffer. It has been mentioned frequently that we have gone through a series of bad seasons. But we believe things are mending. Already the weather is making a decided improvement in that respect, and we hear nothing but glowing reports from the western prairies these days about the conditions under which the seed is being put in the land, and that dried out districts are getting a good wetting. Consequently I am looking towards the future with renewed hope. However, I believe that we can have better marketing conditions in the future than we have had in the past.

There is another matter I would like to speak of, and that is the question of the distribution of our labour and our goods. I believe that we can obtain greater benefit from satisfactory distribution than can be obtained in almost any other line of business. The question of distribution has not been sufficiently considered in our economic life. We have specialized and specialized until we find that in every line of business there is over-specialization. I want to mention a circumstance in this connection; it is of a personal character, but I think the committee will pardon my referring to it. During the campaign this fall I had the pleasure of staying at a very humble home—and I think it was a happy home. The head of the household had a few sheep, and I found that the good wife was carding the wool, spinning the yarn, knitting the stockings to supply all the members of the household, and selling her surplus stock at $1 a pair. At the same time, I, who had a large flock of sheep, had them shorn and shipped the wool, did not get enough money to pay for the cost of the sheep-shearing and the transportation of the wool to its final destination. Now, there is a case of difference of method. I am not advocating that we go back to the old system where the blacksmith and the millwright did all the work in the village, but I do believe we have over-specialized in a great many ways; it takes too many men to do a single job. I was told the other day that when the headlight on an engine goes out of repair—and I want my labour friends to pay attention to this—it takes six men to repair it, whereas a few years ago one handy man could have done the job. That is the result of specialization. We have distributed our labour into too many quarters, and it is costing too much to run the machine. I believe that farm life and the distribution of our goods can be improved very largely in this respect.

Then, we are going to have cheaper transportation; we see signs of it coming. In regard to our markets, I think we are waking up to the fact that we must seek for markets in all directions. Of course, we realize the difficulties that we have to meet so far as our neighbours to the south are concerned, but there are markets and plenty for the produce of our farms over in Europe, when they are in condition to buy them. I think I mentioned this once before—and I am speaking only of the Prairie provinces, because it is with the conditions there that I am most familiar and of which I am, perhaps, best able to speak. But I believe that the day of large farms has passed and that we have come back to smaller holdings and more intensive cultivation. I think that the practice of holding large tracts of land is one of the great mistakes we have made during the last few years. When we first went to those prairies we went not so much to establish a home as to grow thousands and thousands of bushels of wheat, to make a fortune and to retire, wealthy men, in a very short time. That idea has passed away; what we are looking for to-day more than anything else is to establish comfortable and happy homes out on these prairie lands.

We hear a great deal to-day about the trekking to the cites. I think I know something about city conditions. I had the honour and the privilege of serving on the Public Welfare Commission for three years in the city of Winnipeg. Evidence was placed before that commission from all classes in the city, including philanthropic and benevolent societies, and I can assure you, Mr. Chairman, that I came to know something about the seamy side of city life. I know that all is not gold that glitters and that the city has its troubles as well as the country. Now, I am not one of those who believe that every boy and every girl should be kept on the farm. If boys or girls show an aptitude for certain lines or display ability in matters pertaining to business vocations and other lines of life, by all means let them go. But I would like to see the conditions made such that all our bright boys and bright girls should not leave the farms for the cities.

One of our troubles to-day is not so much over-production as it is under-consumption. We find our warehouses full of goods; we find people without clothes. There is something wrong, something has to be made right. I wonder who is going to solve the riddle? What is the trouble? What is the matter?

Now, I believe we can better our conditions by having more people on the land. I realize the importance of industrial Canada. Some of our friends seem to think that we farmers do not realize the importance of industrial life. I think we do; I for one am proud of any implement, well made, when I find it has been manufactured in Canada. And I want to make the statement here, Mr. Chairman, that I have farmed for forty years and I do not know that I ever bought an implement that was not made in Canada—and I am a bit of a free trader, all the same. Now, coming to immigration: Where are we going to seek for immigration, and how are we going to get it? The minister has dwelt on this matter to some considerable extent. We can look towards the United States, and I believe that in that country can be found the very best class of people we are likely to get, because they understand the conditions and can adapt themselves readily to our social and political conditions. Not only that, but I believe we should do everything possible to bind ourselves to those people on the other side of the line; the more we encourage a friendly feeling towards them, the better it will be for Canada as well as for the United States. Then, we may look to the British islands for immigration. Unfortunately, Britain is an industrial country. Her agricultural population is not very numerous, and most of them can find employment at home if they wish it. At the same time, I know exactly what it means: to the agricultural labourer or to the small farmer who is paying a large rent for land over in the Old Country, the idea of owning a farm of his own makes a very strong appeal. I think quite a large percentage of immigration can be got from the British islands if we go the right way about it.

The minister spoke to-night about the efforts Australia was making to get British immigration. I do not know whether sentiment is a thing that goes very far in this House, but it is a fact that you cannot lose sight of sentiment; it has a great deal to do with human life, with human affairs, with everything with which humanity is concerned. And when you come to deal with British immigration you are dealing with something upon which sentiment has an important bearing. When a man decides to leave England, do you not think it means something to him that the old flag flies over the public buildings of the Dominion of Canada? I think that gives Canada an advantage to begin with. It may be said that Australia makes the same appeal to his patriotic feelings. But I would like to point out the difference so far as distance is concerned. Those who leave the British islands to go to another country always have the feeling that they will go back either for a visit or, perhaps, to remain there altogether. We know that as a matter of fact they do not go back. If they do return for a visit, they realize, much as they love their native land, that it is not their country; that Canada, after all, is their home and their country. Nevertheless, as I say, when they leave home first they imagine that some day they will go back. Canada is only seven days from Great Britain, but to go to Australia means a long sea voyage—and that militates to a large extent against Australia and in favour of Canada. Canada appeals to British people in many ways. The part we played in the war, the close contact which took place on that occasion between Canadians and the British people—for a great many reasons, there is nothing but the most friendly feeling towards Canada over in those British Islands. I believe if we go about it in the right way we can get a good many people from the British Islands, especially from Scotland and the north of England. From those places and from the north of Ireland you will get the very best class of settlers for Canada. Not that I have anything to say against the south of England or the other parts of the British Islands, but the climatic conditions of those sections to which I have just referred are more like those which prevail in Canada, and the people who come from that part of the Old Country can, perhaps, adapt themselves more readily to the circumstances than those who come from other districts. Very many splendid people have come here from all parts of the British islands and have been successful.

The minister spoke of the countries of Europe, of France and the Scandinavian countries, of Iceland, and Holland. There are no better people than these, and we should try to get them. I think we can get them if we try. They would be only too glad to come here and make a success. Some other parts of Europe have been mentioned and the inhabitants of those parts severely criticised, sometimes rightly and sometimes not. I do not know if they deserve all the criticism that has been levelled against them. I met a Canadian Pacific Railway land inspector the other day, who had been inspecting land away up northeast of Edmonton and he said he had found in that rough country, settled on quarter sections of land, Ruthenian people who were hewing down the wood and cleaning up the land and making a success of farming. They were happy and contented, and raising families who are going to be farmers for the next three and four generations. That is worth remembering. Perhaps their idea of comfort is not the same as ours, but they are bringing into cultivation land that our people would not touch under any circumstances, and I would think twice before I condemn these people. They are creatures of circumstances, to a very large extent. I wish to quote a short extract from the literature of an association for the encouragement of immigration. In speaking of the Ukrainian people in the cities, it says:

> There are, for instance, in the city of Winnipeg many hundreds of hardy Ukrainians, who came to Canada direct from the soil of eastern Europe, and who have saved a few hundred dollars, and who with a little direction and assistance would "make good" on the land. The fact is, that the majority of continental Europeans, now resident in Canadian cities, migrated to the Dominion with a view to tilling the soil. By force of circumstances they have drifted to the urban centers, and many of them would gladly return to the occupation from whence they sprung if they only knew how.

I believe it was the force of circumstances that brought these people into our cities and that has been responsible for a great many of the troubles they have caused, owing to the conditions under which they lived. I would not advise bringing in too many of these people. We should be very careful as to the numbers admitted, because their circumstances and way of living are so different from ours. All the same, I do not like to hear them condemned offhand. Let me point out that 18 per cent of the students in the University of Manitoba today are of foreign extraction, and they are taking the highest places in the university. They are going to make good Canadians.

Coming down to Ottawa for the first time, for the opening of the session, as we passed at dusk through that rough country north of lake Superior it was snowing heavily, and the country looked very wild. I went on the rear platform and 10 p.m. saw the men who were patrolling the track; they were the men with the skeepskin coat that Sir Clifford Sifton speaks about. Mr. Chairman, we can go into the pullman and tuck ourselves into our berth and feel quite safe and contented, and yet the very men who are patrolling the right of way and ensuring our safety are those despised people whom we are told it is not safe for us to trust. While we do not want too many of these people in our country, at the same time we should not despair of those we have here, if they are treated properly.

I am going to say a few words now on the immigrant and his welcome to this country. A great deal depends on first impressions. Perhaps there are a few in this House who can understand the feeling of an emigrant as he stands on the deck of the westbound steamer and takes a last look at the receding shores of his native land. I do not blame him if emotion surges over his soul and he feels a little bit downhearted. But "Hope springs eternal in the human breast, man never is but always to be blest." He turns his face westward, looking with hope towards this new land. I had an opportunity along with other members from the West to visit the city of Quebec some little time ago, and we all enjoyed the beautiful scenery and the splendid harbour, and looked with interest on the historic places that are so numerous in and around that city. We enjoyed the hospitality of that fine people. I had the opportunity on the same occasion of visiting the immigration buildings at Quebec. I have no word of criticism to offer, no fault to find, but at the same time I could not help thinking of the immigrant's feelings as he disembarked from the ship and came up that gangway and into those buildings. I am not criticising at all, but I want the minister to realize just what an effect it has upon the people who are coming into this country. I think we should adopt a sympathetic attitude towards these newcomers, the glad hand should be extended and a welcome given. It will go a long way towards helping these newcomers to get a right start. I am not criticising the immigration buildings at Quebec; I think they are splendid, but they are in an unavoidable condition. I have no doubt the attendants there are courteous and kind, and we know that the officers of the railway company as a rule are very good in looking after the immigrants and seeing them to their destination. Nevertheless, it needs courage, and courage of the best kind, to face a new life in a new country, and the Government has not done its full duty, it has not gone to the end of the story or fulfilled its duty to these immigrants until it has followed them up.

I am ready here to-night to pay a tribute to the Canadian people. They are a kindly people. Perhaps this comes with better grace from me than from many other members of this House because as you know, Mr. Speaker, I had attained the age of manhood before I came among the Canadian people. My heart warms to them to-day. I am one of them. Never for one moment has my birth on the other side of the water militated in the least degree against my advancement in any walk of life in this Dominion. I point to that with pride, because I think it is one of the advantages we have to offer to the immigrants who come to our shores, but unfortunately, in this very imperfect state of human affairs, there are exceptions everywhere, and all Canadians are not of the type of the great majority in this country. I think it is the duty of the government to see that incoming immigrants shall not be taken advantage of through their ignorance of conditions here. They should rather be assisted and looked after. The new settler should be helped and guided towards the vacant land adjacent to the railways that can be had for a moderate price. I for one believe that land that can be got at a moderate price within a few miles of the railroad is a very much cheaper proposition than a free homestead away out in the wilderness. I do not think I would be at all inclined to advise any one, except perhaps these settlers who come with the sheepskin coat, to settle any distance from the railroad, if they are going to make a success of farming under present conditions. I have been told that the Canadian Pacific have some five million acres of land, the Hudson Bay railroad something like three million acres, and the Canadian National railways eight hundred thousand acres. I do not know if these figures are correct, but I believe they are approximately so. I have no doubt the railway companies themselves, including the National Railways, will do something towards colonizing these lands, but we have still twenty million acres of land held by speculators along the line of our railroads in western Canada.

Now I want to say a few words about the speculator. There was a time, Mr. Chairman, when the word "speculator" had very much the same effect on a western farmer as the holding up of a red flag to a bull. But conditions have somewhat changed. I am going to speak more particularly for the province of Manitoba, because I know the conditions that exist there to-day. All land in Manitoba to-day is assessed by unprejudiced valuators at its actual valuation, and there is also a wild land tax such as they have in the other Western provinces. Now no speculator is going to hold land very long and pay the taxes that he has to pay at the present time; he will be willing to sell if he can at a fair valuation. But there is a point worth considering—and I want the minister to pay attention to this: I believe that a lot of land held by speculators and offered for sale ought to be fixed at a special price for a certain number of years so that if we had an influx of settlers it would not immediately raise the price of that land, as we know often occurs when the demand increases.

Now I do not know that I have very much more to say. I am not going to elaborate any plan of settling those lands. There is an association at the present time that is willing to undertake some of the work. I cannot say much as to the capabilities of the promoters; perhaps the minister will look into that matter and see whether or not the scheme is worth putting through; but I do know there is such a corporation or association making an attempt to settle vacant lands at the present time. I hope the government will devise some well considered scheme whereby the settler who is seeking land will obtain land that is suitable for him, and get every chance to make good under proper conditions. I believe in the future of this great land. I know that the people on our side of the House have stressed, and naturally perhaps, the hardships and the vicissitudes, to a very large extent, of farm life. I know the conditions which have existed and I can appreciate the suffering, and perhaps hardship, which has prevailed during the last few years; but I can look back and recall that we have had good times in the three Prairie provinces. As I have already said, I am speaking for the Prairie provinces because that is the only part of Canada I am well acquainted with. Let me say that I believe there is a great future for this country of ours. We have a virile and energetic population, we have great natural resources; and the climatic conditions, with all its faults, are just as good as are to be found in the great majority of other lands. Then why should we lose hope? I for one intend more and more to look with hope to the future, believing that there are better days in store, and that some of us who are now living will yet see good and prosperous times in this Dominion of Canada.

Miss MACPHAIL: I really think that immigration to Canada has now reached the point where it is no longer a question of getting people on the land but a question of keeping them there. I, for one, do not favour the sort of immigrant who wears a sheepskin coat unless he has a better one some place else. Of course, we have to have sheepskin coats and we all wear them at home sometimes; but by that reference I mean the class of people who go upon the land, but whose standard of living is lower than that of others who are already located there, and that is low enough. Such a policy would be a good thing for Canada rather than one of an opposite nature that would work to her final detriment. Because my own opinion is that the difficulty with the Canadian farmers has been that their standard of life has not been high enough. They have been willing to work long hours and to receive from their investment far less return than any other class of people; and if those immigrants who come to Canada are willing to work longer hours and receive less pay than the existing farmers are, then the condition of affairs instead of being improved will rapidly be rendered worse.

The minister has spoken in favour of bringing a large number of children to Canada; he has pronounced himself in favour of further developing child immigration. If those children were very carefully selected and came from the rural parts of the Old Land there might be something to be said in favour of such a policy, but in the past a great many children that have been brought from Britain have come not from the country but from the city, and they were not always carefully selected either. They were brought out here and placed in homes where sometimes they did not have a very nice time but where, on the other hand, they did not return very much value for their keep. The result in most cases has been that between the ages of seventeen and twenty they have drifted into the cities and, not being experts or skilled in any certain line, and not having a very excellent education—possibly not as much as, or at all events not any more than, any other class—they have helped to form bread lines when such were needed; and then the country that helped to bring them out here has had to keep them. It would seem that we have come to a time in the history of our country when we must be very careful about further immigration. Agriculture is no longer an occupation that poor people can afford to engage in. Many people would like to farm but cannot afford it; it is too much of a luxury.

Do you know that old Ontario, with which I am quite familiar—it is the only part of Canada with which I am familiar—is losing its rural population at a truly alarming rate. The condition is one that we should all try to understand if we love Canada. Many a time in the past I have wondered, when we were spending thousands and hundreds of thousands—yes, millions—of dollars to bring immigrants from the Old Land and settle them in the West, why that same encouragement was not held out to the young men and women of old Ontario, to say nothing of the young men and women of Quebec and the maritime provinces. Why were they not given the same opportunity as that accorded to those who came from other countries? Do you know that in my own riding of Southeast Grey and the ridings that touch upon it—South Bruce, Wellington, Dufferin and North Simcoe—we have lost from the farms over 18,000 people since 1911, and so it would seem to me—

Mr. JACOBS: Will the hon. member permit me to ask a question?

Miss MACPHAIL: Yes.

Mr. JACOBS: Is it not possible those people went to the Northwest, because, as I understand it many of the people have come from the various districts to which the hon. member has alluded?

Miss MACPHAIL: It is quite likely that before 1911 a number of them did; but western conditions have not been so splendid for farming that there has been a very great trend from the East to the West. Rather is it a fact that those who were lucky enough to leave the West have come back to the East. And so I think my hon. friend's explanation is scarcely applicable this time; I think they have not to any consirable extent gone upon the land elsewhere. This I know to be true. I went to some little trouble to find out how many women and children used to live on a tract of 2,000 acres of which my father's farm of 150 acres forms a part, and fifteen years ago there were sixty-five women and girls on that much land. To-day there are about twenty-three and of the number mentioned only about four or five live on land elsewhere. Taking that as a guide I would say that not a very great number are living on the land in other places. Rather than spend any lavish sum of money to bring other people to Canada it would be well for this Parliament to bend every energy it has towards making farming conditions liveable for its own citizens.

Mr. HARRIS: I am afraid the minister who has charge of the immigration policy of this country has laid down for us only half a policy. He has outlined the course the Government is going to pursue with regard to the encouragement of further immigration to Canada; but I failed to gather from his remarks that he had any very definite plans with regard to the discouragement of undesirable immigrants. I have, perhaps, more particularly in mind a movement on foot by our transportation companies to bring large immigration into this country. Mr. Beatty, president of the Canadian Pacific, on May 3 urged that greater immigration should start forthwith. As he is a transportation man, to my mind, his only motive for urging this would be, of course, to get transportation, and, perhaps, it would not worry the Canadian Pacific very much what class of immigration came to this country, provided that the Canadian Pacific got the fares.

As hon. members are well aware, we have in our large centres many people who come from central European countries, and at the present time a large number of people in central European countries want to come to our shores. I disagree with the hon. member for Brandon (Mr. Forke) in his view that these people want to come to Canada to settle on the land. My experience has been that they drift very quickly into the large centres, and the result is that they take hold of the rougher class of work in those centres and deprive our English, Irish and Scotch Canadians of the opportunity of doing that work. They are able to do this largely because their mode of living is so much cheaper than is the mode of living of the average Canadian, and to my mind, it is going to be a question with the average Canadian labourer whether or not he is going to get down to their standard of living if he is going to compete with them on the labour market of Canada.

What do you find in the city of Toronto —"Toronto the good", as it is very often called? You find that 50 per cent of the cases that are in the municipal wards of our hospitals are those of people of foreign extraction who have no intention of staying in this country. We also find in our jails and penitentiaries not quite that percentage of people of foreign extraction. I would like very much to have heard from the minister some concrete suggestion or policy on the part of the Government towards the discouragement of this class of immigration.

A month or so ago when we were discussing the Speech from the Throne, I made some suggestions in this House in this connection, and with your permission, Sir, I will repeat them now. We recognise that the average English, Irish or Scotch Canadian labourer is, as a rule, a man who wants to have a stake in the country, who intends to stay here and to raise a family. In my riding, which, perhaps, contains the largest number of the class of people I have in mind, these people out in the suburbs of our great city are working nights, holidays, Saturday afternoons and sometimes Sundays in order to build a little two or three-roomed shack to cover themselves, paying for the lot; and when they go back to their day's work, what do they find? They find that they have to compete with these aliens, and at the end of the year they have to face a tax in this country for the little bit of land and the house that they have. They find also, if they are moderately prosperous, that they are subject to a provincial and, perhaps, even a federal tax. The same condition does not obtain with the foreigners right in the centre of our large cities, for this reason. They, as hon. members know, herd together in houses. I have known houses to contain upwards of twenty of these people, and their conditions of living are such that they are not under the same expense as are our Canadian labourers.

During the discussion on the Speech from the Throne, I suggested that it might be well, if it were at all possible, for this Government to bring down legislation which would tend to tax transient aliens who want to come to our shores and stay here for a little while until they make a little money on which they can return to the country which gave them birth and, perhaps, spend the rest of their days there. If they intend to stay here, I would gladly welcome them; but if they intend to stay here, they must become Canadians. On the night that it was reported that Lord Kitchener was drowned, I remember seeing twenty or thirty of these people—and this will give the committee an idea of the British spirit imbibed by these Serbians, Bulgarians, Albanians and Greeks —who immediately they heard the news, rushed out and procured three kegs of beer, and they had a celebration because Lord Kitchener was drowned.

Mr. JACOBS: All of these people were supposed to be in Kapuskasing camp and other places. Were they not interned? How could they possibly be in Toronto at that time when the law declared that they had to be interned?

Mr. LAPOINTE: They were interned in Toronto.

Mr. HARRIS: The hon. gentleman, (Mr. Jacobs), I think knows a little more about conditions in Canada at that time than to suggest that. Large numbers of them were not interned. Our alien enemies, I will admit, were interned; but does my hon. friend contend for a moment that Serbians were alien enemies at that time?

Mr. JACOBS: The hon. gentleman, I think, referred to Bulgarians.

Mr. HARRIS: Yes, I referred to Bulgarians but many Bulgarians were not interned. It was only the dangerous ones who were interned at that time.

Mr. JACOBS: They were interned in Toronto.

Mr. HARRIS: Perhaps, if they had been in Montreal, they would have run a little more rife than they did in Toronto. The point that I had in mind was that some sort of drastic tax should be imposed on these people if they do not intend to become Canadian citizens. If they intend to become Canadian citizens, to secure a stake in this country, to stay here, to work on our farms or in our large centres, if they intend to raise families here and will assimilate, let them come; the more of those that come, the better I shall be pleased. But if they are going to be only transients, I would say: "Tax them to the hilt." I am glad the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) is in his seat at the present time. He was in a bad way this afternoon wondering whether or not this Budget which he brought down would provide sufficient money wherewith to run this country. Let him tax these people. From my experience with them—and I have had considerable experience with them—they would be submissive to this tax; they would still come to our country and work in our factories and pay this tax and, perhaps, be glad to do so. That might be a suggestion, although only a small one, for the Minister of Finance in regard to taxation. To-day I received a resolution passed by the Union of Canadian Municipalities at their 1921 convention, and with your permission, Sir, I should like to read it because it is thoroughly in accord with my ideas in this matter. The resolution reads:

> Whereas representations have been made to the Union of Canadian Municipalities that an apparently organized campaign of propaganda is now under way with the obvious purpose of resisting public objection to foreign immigration and alleging that the restrictions upon immigration by the United States of America provide a golden opportunity for Canada to increase its population;
> And whereas the reasons which impelled the United States to impose almost prohibitive restrictions upon intending immigrants to that country apply with equal if not added force to conditions in Canada;
>
> And whereas it is not seemly that Canada should receive as future citizens persons of foreign birth, who are considered undesirable by a neighboring country, especially in view of the unfavourable experience of our larger cities with the disproportionate foreign population which they already have;
> Be it resolved that the Union of Canadian Municipalities regards with serious apprehension the efforts of transportation interests to encourage the immigration into Canada of persons of alien birth more particularly in view of the unemployment problems now confronting this country, and directs that a petition be addressed to the Federal Government asking that the Immigration Act be amended to prohibit further immigration of aliens for urban occupations and to ensure that such aliens as may be admitted to Canada shall be bona fide settlers on the land and capable of successfully establishing themselves in that capacity, and that the official, medical and other examination of intending immigrants be made at the port of embarkation, instead of the Canadian port of entry as at present.

I might add that I have had a resolution from the Ontario Convention of the Great War Veterans' Association along the same line, more particularly with regard to the taxation of transient aliens. In conclusion, Mr. Chairman, I would ask the minister who has charge of the Immigration Department (Mr. Stewart) whether he cannot give us a little clearer idea as to the policy of the Government with reference to the suggested discouragement of transient alien immigration.

Mr. CRERAR: The subject of immigration is a very large one, and not only is it exceedingly interesting, but it is natural that there should be, in this House as well as out of it, a variety of views as to the best methods and, indeed, as to the desirability, of promoting it, as well as concerning the sources from which immigrants to Canada should be drawn. I have frequently stated that in my judgment immigration to Canada is needed, and badly needed, and I cordially support the minister (Mr. Stewart) and the Government in the efforts they may make to bring to our shores immigrants of a desirable type who will go on the land and in time become adapted to our Canadian institutions, get our Canadian spirit, and be assimilated into this Dominion as good citizens of it. I do not think that we can have too many immigrants of that type. In the discussion this evening a good deal has been said regarding the need of adding to our agricultural population, and, in order to do that successfully, of improving the conditions surrounding agriculture. To my mind that is a very essential thing in connection with the whole subject of immigration. Without doubt at all, the best immigration officer, the best immigration agent you can have in the Dominion is the contented settler whom you bring to these shores. Experience, I believe, has shown that. If we bring to Canada the Scotsman, the Englishman, the Irishman, the Scandinavian, or the man from the United States, when he comes here and gets located and finds conditions onerous, when he finds he is not accorded the welcome which perhaps he thought he should have, what is the effect upon him? He writes home to his friends and gives them the impressions he has formed of the country to which he has come. He recounts to them the experience he has had in Canada, and they are influenced accordingly. Consequently I say that the best immigration agent you can have in Canada is the contented, happy and prosperous settler. For that reason, the conditions that make agriculture prosperous and that enable those who are engaged in it to succeed are of the very highest importance. The minister and the Government will be taking altogether too narrow a view of the question of their energies and efforts are confined alone to the expenditure of so many hundreds of thousands of dollars in this or that country for the purpose of inducing people to come to Canada. That is altogether too narrow a view to take up this important question. I believe that efforts directed within the Dominion along the lines I have indicated, as well as along the lines suggested by a good many of my friends from this side of the House, are just as important and essential to a successful and practical policy of immigration, as is the securing of good agents and sending them abroad. There has been a good deal said in the House by some of my hon. friends around me as to the dreadful condition that agriculture is in to-day in this country. It may be that some hon. members think the picture is overdrawn, and perhaps at times we are inclined to stress that aspect too much. But the facts that were pointed out by the member for Southeast Grey (Miss Macphail) to-night should not be lost on the Government or on the House. It is a fact that in the finest agricultural counties of the province of Ontario there has been an actual and very serious decline in the rural population in the last ten years. Indeed, not only in the last ten years, but in previous decades, has that occurred. My hon. friend from George Etienne Cartier (Mr. Jacobs) suggested that possibly those farmers descended of sturdy Scottish stock, in the old counties of Ontario, the Bruces, the Middlesexes, the Hurons and the Greys, had gone to Western Canada. Some of them have gone; but that does not account by any means at all for the decline in the population there. And I will make this prediction to my hon. friends from the province of Quebec, that as time goes on they will find the same condition obtaining in that province. We have had a tremendous growth in our city population in the last decade. There are certain causes that conduce to that. I am not at present going to discuss the fiscal question, but I do hold most firmly that the fiscal policy of Canada, the policy of protection that we have practised in this country, has been the greatest single agency in retarding the development of agriculture in Canada. If you are going to make agriculture prosperous you cannot ignore these facts. We have proceeded in Canada on the assumption that we should be largely an industrial people, and our policy for the last forty years has been directed to that end. What are the fruits of that policy? What are the fruits of it in Ontario, where it has been in full bloom and effect? Its fruits have been a tremendous increase in your city population and a decline in rural population; and that will follow inevitably in a country such as Canada is, at this stage of its development. I know that the conditions in the West are in many cases onerous and difficult. We may as well frankly recognize the fact that there are difficulties and handicaps to the success of agriculture in Western Canada, although it has progressed with tremendous development in the last thirty years. But let me point out to hon. members that the greatest single factor in promoting the development of agriculture in Western Canada in the last thirty or forty years, and in attracting people to that part of the country, were the cheap fertile lands available there. The people were looking for cheap lands. Our immigration agents could go to Europe, to the United States, and advertise the fact, as they did: You can get 160 acres of the finest land you wish to fix your eyes upon in Western Canada for $10. That was the lodestone that drew people to Western Canada. What are the conditions to-day? Our homestead lands are practically a thing of the past, and the immigrant to-day to that portion of the Dominion must pay from $10 to $25 an acre for land. Consequently that has narrowed the area from which our immigrants can be drawn.

The questions of freight rates and tariff as far as the West is concerned, Mr. Chairman, are pressed upon the House and the country by my hon. friends around me not because of purely selfish local reasons, but because the proper solution of those questions is essential to the development of our agricultural industry; and I would point out to my hon. friends from Ontario, and particularly to the hon. gentleman who preceded me in this debate, that if your factories there are to be kept running you must have a market for their output. When did our manufacturing industry develop at its greatest speed, when did it find its greatest prosperity? When people were flowing into western Canada by the hundreds of thousands and that country was opening up at a rate never known before. If our manufacturing industry is to continue to develop, you must lay the foundation and create the conditions that will keep the country prosperous.

What is the position of western Canada so far as its products are concerned? We are fortunate at the present time in that Russia, that great competitor of ours in supplying wheat to Europe, is out of the market. Bad for Russia, but good for us. In 1914 Russia exported 175,000,000 bushels of wheat to the western countries of Europe. And Russia will again be a factor in that market. Therefore I say to the House and to the Minister of Immigration that to have a permanently successful policy of immigration one of the vital factors is to reduce our cost of production in agriculture so that we may successfully compete with other countries in the markets of the world. Consequently in this whole question these issues to my mind are involved, and they are vital issues.

A good deal has been said to-night about our immigrants from central Europe. I wish to say a word for the people whom we brought from that part of the world fifteen, twenty or twenty-five years ago. My hon. friend from Brandon (Mr. Forke) informed the House that 18 per cent of the undergraduates in the University of Manitoba were of foreign birth. Without doubt in twenty-five years' time the decendants of those people who came from Europe in their sheepskin coats twenty-five years ago will be among the leaders in our professional life. Is that an undesirable type of settler to bring to this country? I submit not. The Slav is one of the most adaptable of our immigrants. He can be assimilated as quickly at any rate as the immigrant of any other nationality, for his temperament is such that he quickly responds to his environment. While I agree with the observations made by some hon. members that it is unwise to open our gates full width to these people, I do submit that we can take a considerable number of wisely selected settlers of that type and they will prove a useful asset to the Dominion. I hope my hon. friend. the minister, will not overlook that in his plans for promoting immigration. Without doubt we can also secure settlers of a very desirable type from the Scandinavian countries, from the Old Land and from the United States.

But when we bring those people to this country, let us do a little bit more for them than we have done in the past in holding out the hand of welcome to them. That is a suggestion I would offer to the minister. I do not know what plans he may have to carry out that idea, but I do know it has often happened in the past that we have brought immigrants from the United States and from Europe who naturally were entirely unacquainted with conditions here, and far too frequently they have been the prey of the exploiter who has traded upon their ignorance in order that he might enrich himself.

I repeat, Mr. Chairman, that what we need is more population. It is the only way by which our taxation and our railroad problems will be ultimately solved. The Minister of Immigration has a position of the greatest responsibility in that respect. I am glad to say, Mr. Chairman, that knowing the minister as I have for a great many years, I have full confidence in his ability, his desire and his intention to make a success of this very important work.

There is one other suggestion I have to make to the minister. Our immigration statistics give a very full record of the number of people who come to Canada but we have no record, so far as I am aware, of the people who leave Canada and where they go to. I am informed that for the expenditure of a few thousand dollars a year this information could be secured, and in view of the importance of the question I would impress upon the minister the desirability of his department taking the necessary steps to secure such records. If we study the census statistics for the last decade we find that something like a million and a quarter people have gone somewhere who should be in this Dominion. Where have they gone, and why have they gone? Are not these questions of the greatest importance if we are going to handle this problem in an intelligent manner?

Like my hon. friend from Brandon, I have great faith in the future of Canada. We have a great country, but in order to assure its complete development there must be the fullest co-operation among all sections of our people, and if we work with determination for that goal there is little doubt that success will be ours.

This vote is probably as important as any in the whole department that the minister presides over. I trust that when he comes back to the House another session he will have a year of progress to report, and that in the meantime his department and the Government will make every honest legitimate effort possible to bring to our shores the class of people that we stand so badly in need of to-day.

Mr. SPENCER: We have heard a great many facts during the debate this evening, but there are a few that have not been touched upon. This question goes back a great many years. We have been trying to build this Canada of ours for some twenty years, but during that period we have increased our population only by a little over 3,000,000. During the last ten years, as the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Crerar) has just told us, we have lost 1,500,000 people. Now, from what part of the country have those people gone? They have gone from the land. The whole policy for years past has been to people the land; the whole cry has been "Back to the land." And what do we find at the present day? In Ontario, the province of mixed farming, the province nearest the home market, there are no less than 5,000 vacant farms. I would be the last to try to stop immigration into this country when we are ready for it; when we can welcome it; when we can find a place for it. But what is our position? Never before in the history of our country has our financial position been so difficult; never before has there been so much unemployment. I want to point out that there is a very close relationship between unemployment and the condition of the farms. If the conditions on the farms were economically sound there would not be enough men in the ranks of the unemployed to go round. The whole trend of our immigration policy has been to bring people into the country to go on the land, but what is the good of bringing them in and having them go on the farms if they do not stay there? One would think, from some things that are said, that the people on the farms and those in the city belong to a different class. If the conditions are better in one place than they are in the other, the people will naturally drift from one to the other. I would like to make mention, for a moment of those people from Central Europe who were mentioned by an hon. member here a moment ago. It has often occurred to me that when these people are brought into Canada to go on the land they are good Canadian citizens, but when they drift into the cities they are usually termed enemy aliens. Yet they are one and the same people; and I assure you that no one knows the value of the dollar more than they do; when wages are good they will ask for the higher wage just as quickly as anyone else.

Just before this debate started we were given some figures in regard to the cost of soldiers' settlement. Now it has always appeared to me that instead of being known as a soldier settlement scheme it should have been called a land settlement scheme, because there was no attempt to settle the soldier who did not go on the land. It has cost this country, I understand, a little over $7,500,000 to administer the land settlement—money that will never come back. We also find that some 2,352 of these soldiers who went on the land, with government assistance, have failed, and abandoned their farms. We have to-day over 200,000 unemployed in Canada. I say again that there is a close connection between our unemployed and the state of agriculture. We also have marching on Ottawa at the present time some 3,000 unemployed soldiers. If conditions on the land are such that we need to have all our newcomers make their homes there, why should we to-day have 3,000 unemployed returned soldiers marching on Ottawa? We are told that the immigration from the old land is some 60 per cent less than it was last year; the reason is because the people who have come from the old land are so discontented with the present conditions that they are writing to the people they know and warning them about coming here. The only sane way of bringing people to this country is, in my opinion, to make the actual conditions in this country such that they will be the source of attraction, not the advertising medium on the other side.

We find that no less than 28,000,000 acres of arable land within 15 miles of railway in western Canada are held by speculators. We also find that there are just about as many farmers living in districts from 15 to 100 miles from the railway as there are farmers who live on lands close to the railway. Demands are continually being made for extensions of railway lines—extensions that have been promised for the last ten, twelve, or fourteen years. The people have asked for these railways; their construction has been promised, but has not been carried out. This year the Government, in their wisdom, say they are not going to spend any money on construction. Can we, in the face of that—knowing full well that the people in the West are dependent upon railway facilities; knowing that hundreds of men are ready to pick up their belonging and leave, because of their being cut off from transportation—can we honestly ask others to come to share their fate?

I was just looking up some figures in regard to the amount of grain produced in this country per head of population, and I find that in the year 1871 we produced some eight bushels per head; to-day with our improved machinery, we are producing no less than 42 bushels per head; yet we find the conditions of agriculture so bad that we have a continual drift from the country to the city. If that is the state of agriculture, one at once asks: who is getting the extra profit arising from that increased production?

The census that was taken last year was in many respects very complete. I noticed that the questions asked went into detail as to what was in the country in the way of stock, land, fruit, grain, poultry, and everything else, and the result was to show that the country has enormous wealth. But although they showed the enormous assets of the country, they did not show a single liability. I would like to have seen these questions asked: How much is owing to the banks? How much is owing to the mortgage company? How much is owing to back payments to the Canadian Pacific Railway? How much is owing in back payments on the school lands? If we had these figures, the people of this eastern country would be surprised to learn how little of the great wealth of western Canada is owned by the people on the land. I do not want the Minister of the Interior to think that I am criticising his position. I have a great deal of sympathy with him; I think he has one of the hardest positions to fill of any minister. But if conditions are not altered on the land so that people when they come to this country will be induced to stay on the land, then whatever plan the minister brings forward, however many people he brings to this country, his scheme is doomed to failure. There is no one who does not see the great possibilities and the enormous potential wealth of this country, but we must pay more attention to the building up of homes in this country so that the people will stay, and until we do that, it is not much good trying to bring more people here.

Mr. LUCAS: I see in the Edmonton Journal of Friday, May 19, this headline: "Four Hundred Thousand Settlers for the Prairies, Shandro's Plan." Mr. Shandro, who I know has been in close touch with the minister for some time, states that the minister has given this plan very serious consideration. I should like to know if it is the minister's intention to bring in these 400,000 settlers from Galicia and Bukowina, and if Mr. Shandro is to be employed for this purpose.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Mr. Shandro has been in my office half a dozen times. He has also been to see the Canadian Pacific Railway Company with reference to bringing in a great number of settlers from his home land. The great difficulty is, of course, as was pointed out by my hon. friend from Marquette, that these people have little or no money. When they came in before there was any amount of free land. Anyone who was in Alberta in those days will remember that although they are a splendid class of settlers and have done well on the land, not very many of them have money when they come to this country, and consequently they would not be in a position to buy land. Mr. Shandro is not in the employ of the Government, and the Government have no intention of employing him. Any statement he made was without consulting me at all.

Answering my hon. friend from East york Mr. Harris) the alien enemy is taken care of by legislation and regulations. With reference to the other point raised by an hon. member as to records of the people leaving Canada, the idea rather appeals to me, because we ought to know why people are leaving the land. It is my intention, if I can interest the provincial governments in the matter to the extent of appointing officials who will assist to some extent in a follow up policy with regard to the people who settle upon the land, to assist in inaugurating community clubs for the purpose of endeavouring to settle people in congenial surroundings. By that I do not mean colonies of any particular nationality, but that the people shall get into congenial surroundings where possible, and that a real interest will be taken in trying to make things as comfortable as possible for them in a social way.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Would the minister say whether or not he has made any arrangement or come to any understanding as to the admission of Hutterites into this country?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): No.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Does the minister say that the law and the regulations in that regard stand just as they did when this Government came into office?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Yes, they do at the moment, although I cannot very well see why the law should be continued against the Hutterites and the Mennonites.

[Mr. Lucas.]

However, the law has not been changed up to the moment.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Is that law being enforced?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): You mean, for the absolute exclusion of these people?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Is the law being enforced—the law that is now in effect?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): The law as it stands shuts them out absolutely, Mennonites, Hutterites and Doukhobors. That was done by Order in Council; I do not know just what the date was. I would not say that a few Mennonites have not entered Western Canada.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Recently?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Yes, by the permission of the minister.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The law is not being enforced at all as respects Mennonites?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Not to their absolute exclusion.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Is it as respects Hutterites?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I have no recollection of anyone making application under the name of a Hutterite.

Mr. EVANS: What is the objection to the Hutterites?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I do not know of any particularly, but I suppose there were reasons at the time the Order in Council was passed.

Mr. EVANS: Just during war times?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): No, because the Order in Council is dated later than the war.

Mr. MEIGHEN: There was an Order in Council passed, I do not know the exact year, but shortly prior to 1900, which gave special privileges to Hutterites entering Canada in the way of immunity from war service. That Order in Council was repealed by the late government, but before its presence was discovered a number had entered this country, and the fact that they were allowed to enter was one of the chief campaign cries utilized against me in my former constituency,—the admission of those Hutterites, though it was under an Order in Council of a previous government.

11 p.m.

Mr. JACOBS: It's an ill wind that blows nobody any good.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It was just of a piece with most of the cries that were used in the campaign.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): So far as Hutterites and Mennonites are concerned, I see no reason why they should not enter Canada, but I can see good reasons why they should be subjected to all the obligations of citizenship. They should not be allowed to come in under any promises of immunity from service or anything else that a Canadian citizen may be called upon to do.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The minister knows they are conscientious objectors, and no matter what he may do they would refuse to serve.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I have made my statement, and it is my intention to submit the matter for the approval of the Government. I have not done so as yet.

Mr. COOTE: I want first to show the minister that he has my sympathy, and next to assure the House that I do not intend to inflict on them any speech. Any thunder which I had has been stolen already. I rise simply because of the old saying that silence gives consent, and because one thing has been said here to-night to which I take objection. It is said that we are going to spend money to bring children from Great Britain to this country. I think it is a shame to bring out these young people, because I do not think they realize what they are going to be up against when they get here. I have seen some very sad cases of children who have been brought here from other countries and put out with people who had no children of their own, or if they had, had driven them away from home, and did not know how to use them. I want to register my protest against any such policy.

There has been a good deal said here to-night about the class of people we should encourage to come to this country. I must confess that this immigration problem and the advice offered upon it is certainly inexplicable to me. A couple of weeks ago we discussed in this House for a whole day the question of excluding two races of people from this country. I gathered from the debate that the chief objection to these people was that they were too good workers, and that Canadians could not compete with them. That advice came chiefly from our friends from British Columbia. Now, I think there is no class of Canadians who have advocated the exclusion of that class of immigration to a greater extent than the people in Vancouver. I have here a clipping from the Vancouver Sun, and I am totally unable to understand why that newspaper should have given utterance to such expressions as it has. It says:

> What Canada needs is a tremendous influx of broad-backed, short-legged people who can get close to the work of digging a living out of the ground; and who will be satisfied with just whatever kind of a living they can dig, until, as the result of their own industry and economy they climb up to better things.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Last Mountain): Beavers.

Mr. COOTE: If there are any hon. members in this House who know exactly what class of people is referred to in this excerpt I will be glad to be enlightened. We have on the prairies an animal that is very short-legged, and is a good digger, but he is not popular with the people there; we call him a badger. I wonder if the editor of this paper expects the class of people he is going to bring in to dig holes for themselves to live in like badgers; it almost sounds that way. The last part of the editorial is the worst part; it is the cruelest cut of all, as we say. It reads thus:

> Our present stock of Bachelors of Arts and Students of Botany can keep the Chautauqua tents well filled all summer without any assisted additions.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the Minister of the Interior told us to-night, and he spoke from his own experience, that a great many people on the prairies had been driven to the state where they had to be put into homes for the feeble-minded because of the lonesome conditions on the prairies. When the prairie people try to mitigate that condition and hold Chautauquas for the entertainment of the people that is the kind of drivel we have from the Vancouver Sun. Now for the enlightenment of the committee let me state that the Premier of Alberta had a statement prepared last year showing the amount collected in amusement taxes in the cities, towns, villages and rural districts of the province, and this will show just how much amusement the people in the rural districts get. In the cities the per capita tax collected was 92 cents; in the rural districts it was 6 cents. Is not that a sufficient answer to the Vancouver Sun?

Has agriculture—which several hon. members have already described this session as the basic industry of Canada—come to the condition where we must employ people such as are described in this editorial to come here and engage in that occupation?

Now, there has been enough said here to-night as to the conditon of agriculture, and I am not going to say anything more about it—I think, perhaps, the committee realize what the condition is—but I do want to mention this: If the department is going to spend money to bring in more people, speaking from some experience derived in a business way and on a farm, I think that money should largely be expended in the United States. The very best class of immigrants that Western Canada has had, and the class we need most to-day, come from the adjoining republic. If those immigrants are going to remain with us they must be of the class that have enough money to start in the farming business; and so far as I know nearly all the immigrants that come to Western Canada with any money to speak of and make a success of farming are people from the United States. I would say further that there is no use in bringing these people here unless we treat them properly when they do come. How do we treat the people who come from the United States? Why, if they get to bothering us a little in political affairs we say, "Oh, they come from Missouri." Now, I submit it is time that we Canadians woke up and treated in a decent manner the people that do come here, if we are going to spend money on immigration. I would like to say a lot more on this question, but I realize the hour is late and I appreciate the hearing that hon. gentlemen have given me. I will therefore reserve anything I have not said for some future occasion and possibly when that occasion comes I will not be in that House and therefore will not inflict that speech on them.

Mr. MANION: I wish to point out to the minister the fact that some two or three weeks ago I took the liberty on two occasions, I believe, of requesting him when he was going to bring forward his immigration estimates to let me know. I told him at that time that there were two or three members who were expecting me to tell them because they wished to say something upon this question. My hon. friend promised to do so, but he either forgot that promise or did not have the courtesy to adhere to it.

[Mr. Coote.]

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I have to plead forgetfulness.

Mr. MANION: I accept the minister's statement that he forgot to implement his promise. At the same time I would like to point out that I have sat in this House now for some six sessions and have never during that period seen the estimates go through as quickly and with as little obstruction and opposition, as they have this session. I do not believe that at any previous session we have had such a large proportion of the estimates passed at so early a period as we have had this session; and I wish to remind the minister that if he and his confreres expect to get estimates through in the future they will need to not forget a promise of that kind. Because, let me tell the minister, it puts me in the position of not informing my friends and induces some of us to feel like doing a little obstructing on our own account.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Everybody should be here when the business of the House is going on.

Mr. MANION: My hon. friend from Quebec made some remark which I did not catch, but I can very well remember him, and many of his friends, obstructing the estimates on different occasions without any reason at all.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Oh, no.

Mr. MANION: In fact last year, I may say for the information of hon. members to my left, the closure had to be enforced in order to get estimates through at all. This session there has been no sign of obstruction, and I merely wish to express the hope to the minister that he will in future recognize the courtesy we are showing him. Because of his failure to do that I am going to ask him not to insist that this vote shall go through to-night.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Oh, yes.

Mr. MANION: As far as I am concerned I am not ready to have the vote go through. There are some remarks I desire to offer and I do not wish to talk at this late hour. I think that the House—bearing in mind that we have heard the budget speech and allowed the Soldier's Settlement estimates to pass—has done a good day's work and the minister ought not to insist upon these estimates passing to-night.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I regret very much that my hon. friend did not raise this matter before six o'clock. I must frankly confess that I had forgotten the promise to notify him.

Mr. MANION: How could I have raised this question before six o'clock when I did not know the minister was going on with his estimates?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I think my hon. friend was in the House before six o'clock.

Mr. MANION: Yes, but we were not dealing with the immigration estimates before six o'clock but with the estimates of the Soldier Settlement Board.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I beg my hon. friend's pardon; he is right.

Mr. MILLAR: I have been up and down so often that I am a little bit like the young Scotchman who came from the Old Country. His first experience was not very good, and he worked about fifteen hours a day. On one occasion, he said he was going upstairs, and he was so sleepy that he fell against the stairs and relapsed into slumber. On awaking he did not know whether he was going to bed or getting up. At this late hour I am not going to make any extended remarks on this important question, save as to foreigners and the kind of settlers they make. I would like to speak briefly on that subject. Those who have had experience of the settlers coming from European countries, as well as those coming from the United States, must have been struck with the fact that they are splendid settlers. Allusion has been made to some foreigners who, it was said, appeared to be disloyal at the time Lord Kitchener was drowned. I can refer to a case where a number of young children of foreign birth, having a new teacher come to their district, after a few days went to him and said they had been accustomed to sing "God Save the King" when the school was opened. That was the kind of new settlers they were. Just one more reference to that. Some two or three years ago, I believe it was, a very important educational conference was held in the city of Winnipeg, and there were brought from the United States two of the greatest educational experts in the land. One of these was an Italian who had come to the United States some twenty years before with his father and mother as an Italian immigrant. That shows the progress that some of these people will make.

In the budget speech this afternoon, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) made a remark that struck me. During this session I have been watching to see whether this House fully realises the seriousness of the condition of agriculture, and I was struck by his remark to the effect that he was afraid that the country did not fully realise the seriousness of our financial situation. In answering a question, the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Stewart) stated that those whom he thought of bringing out would be settled in eastern Canada. I just wondered, and I feel like asking now what kind of settlers the minister proposes settling in western Canada. I differ with some of my colleagues in their attitude towards bringing immigration to western Canada. Conditions in the West are as bad as has been stated, and while I am not going to harry the House by reiterating them, I will say this. While some have prophesied that some farms are going to go back to grass; that they will cease to be cultivated, in the main that is not so. Those farms must be cultivated. Many of those who are on the farms at the present time must give up farming. Some gave up last year; some will give up this year; nothing that this Government can do will save them; but those farms are to the speculator, to the incoming settler, to those who have money, a very desirable purchase. Think what it means to see a farm that could have been sold for $60 an acre two years ago, offered for $30 an acre to-day. That is the case however, and a man who has the money will buy such a farm, and it will be worked. Even though it may not be profitable this year, it will be cultivated and kept up. That is one reason why I would urge upon the minister the necessity of bringing in, as far as he possibly can, settlers who have money. That is one class of settlers that the West needs. Another class is the class to which he has referred. Many farmers in the West are short of help, and yet they cannot afford to pay the wages of the men who are available and of the girls who are available for housework. Help in the house is undoubtedly very hard to get and very high in price when obtained. If girls, as well as boys, of, say fifteen years of age, were brought to Canada they would be well and gladly received, and they would be a great help in developing the West. Reference has been made to the bad treatment that some of these have received in the past. I have no doubt that occasionally such may have occurred; in fact, I know of some cases where it did occur; but in the main, they would be well treated; the boys would be given an opportunity of learning farming, and in a few years when conditions became better, they would become farmers themselves and would be very desirable farmers.

In these times of economic stress, I think I might strike a hopeful note in this. The financial and industrial greatness of Great Britain was laid in a time of low prices, a time which we are now approaching, just after what were called the Napoleonic wars. The United States had the same experience, their greatness was laid after the Civil War. We are coming to that time; the price of farm products has gone down very materially and other prices must come down. Therefore, while conditions are very bad, we cannot afford to lie down on the job. Agriculture must proceed.

While I had a few other points on which I wished to speak, as the hour is getting very late, I will not speak further to-night.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Do I understand my hon. friend (Mr. Manion) is quite in earnest about not wishing to proceed any further?

Mr. MANION: Absolutely.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: There are two items in connection with Immigration, which have been held,—this one for $640,000, and an item for contingencies amounting to $1,170,000. Perhaps, the hon. member would not object to our passing the first.

Mr. MANION: Provided that we can speak on any branch of the subject on the item for contingencies.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Certainly.

Mr. MANION: I do not wish my hon. friend (Mr. Stewart) to misunderstand me. I endeavour to show courtesy to the other side on all occasions, and I appreciate what the minister has said; but I do not think it was quite right for him to forget the conditions. I do not consider I am so important or anything of that sort; but as we usually show courtesy to each other, we expect courtesy in return, and I think on all occasions our side has endeavoured to show courtesy. I do not wish to appear unreasonable; but a number of members wish to speak on this matter, and as I happen to be one on this side of the House who was more or less in charge of this subject, I, therefore, wish this to be held up in order to give those hon. members an opportunity to speak. It will not be held up for any length of time.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If the committee will allow this item to pass, there will be the item of immigration contingencies on which it will be possible to discuss any phase of the question. The Government does not wish to press unduly the matter of hastening through the estimates; but I think all hon. members are anxious that the session should be brought to a close as quickly as we can bring it, and there are certain evenings when we can make a little more progress on the estimates than others. If we could spend another half hour on the estimates of the Department of Marine and Fisheries, leaving out all the contentious items, we might make more progress to-day; but if hon. members feel that they have sat late enough, I do not ask them to stay. Perhaps every member present will feel that, if we can get through some more of the non-contentious items and hold in each case an item for discussion at a later date, we might make a little more progress.

Mr. MANION: On this side of the House we are quite willing to go on for another half hour with some other items, and we are willing to let this particular item go through. The hon. member for St. John city (Mr. Baxter) would like to ask a few questions on this item.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I should like my hon. friend (Mr. Manion) to understand that I personally absolutely forgot the promise made to him that these estimates would be held.

Mr. MANION: I do not dispute that.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Four or five members came to me and asked me to notify them when these estimates would be brought up, and I certainly was quite convinced that I had covered the whole list. I am sure my hon. friend understands that I would not have in any way endeavoured to deceive him.

Mr. MANION: I do not doubt the minister.

Mr. BAXTER: There is one phase of this subject in reference to which I should like to say a few words. I cannot profess to give this committee any real information upon the subject of either agriculture or immigration, and I do not intend to do that; but there is one matter in reference to immigration to which I should like to direct the attention of the minister and also of the members of the committee. I do not start with the least bit of fault-finding in regard to the devotion of the energies of this country towards filling up the great West. The policy has been a good one, a necessary one, and I am in entire accord with the remarks made recently in the House by the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Crerar), when he spoke of immigration placed along the lines of our western railways, affording, at least a partial solution of the very grave question which confronts the country at the present day.

At the same time, I think the House will be broad enough in its view to realize that some consideration ought to be devoted to the provinces down by the sea. I do not feel that members of the House will consider that we are obtruding our views on the country, but will rather receive any remarks made on the subject in the light of a presentation of the hopes of those provinces that they may yet be admitted to share in the prosperity which we hope will ultimately come to this country, as a result of wisely selected immigration. Will hon. members consider for a moment that immigration to the maritime provinces is almost nil. In my own province there is immigration of a valuable character. In the northern part of the province, where the forest has been invaded and replaced by settlers, we are adding to our population. That applies to several counties. That immigration has given settlers of a fine type who are splendid agriculturists. But they are simply coming over the line from the province of Quebec. We are glad to have them, of course; they are adding to our population. But as hon. members will see, that represents no addition to the population of the Dominion. It is only, so to speak, a shifting of ballast. Whether they are in the province of New Brunswick or in the province of Quebec, they are doing equally valuable work; but they do not add to the productive power of the country. There is only a change in location.

We have running through the province of New Brunswick, almost diagonally, the Transcontinental Railway. That railway, from Edmundston down to Moncton, runs through what is practically nonproductive territory. I will not say that none of the land in that territory is occupied, but a very large part of it is not. Rails have been laid there at great cost and are not affording any local development. There are certainly in the province districts much more fertile, I believe, than that territory to be. But you must realize that every question of immigration in New Brunswick is practically met by conditions that differ from those in the West, and are more difficult perhaps to deal with. In the West, as I understand it, there is no clearing of the land to be done. The land has to be broken, but not cleared. In the maritime provinces, on the other hand, you have to clear the land; and when you ask a settler to go there, though he travels a shorter distance to reach that part of the country, he is faced with a greater immediate task in turning the portion of land he settles upon to profitable use. It is not all settlers that can come with money enough to buy farm land that has already been worked. Many of them, a quite desirable class, will face difficulties and hardships; but having broken up the land, in time they can make use of its latent fertility.

I want to suggest two things to the minister. One of them is that it might be found worth while to give to the proper class of settlers some sort of bonus for settling in Eastern Canada. Some compensation might be given them for bringing land into such a condition as will make it equivalent to the state of the land in Western Canada. I do not think that this is unfair, because, unless we are to have our population greatly increased in the maritime provinces, I fear we shall gradually dry up. I do not think that we shall altogether blow away, but at all events there will be no growth there. It is desirable to promote and stimulate growth in the maritime provinces, because they are useful, in the things they possess, in the rounding out of the whole Dominion. In the second place, that policy might be considered from the standpoint of the railways, in which the Government has so largely invested in that part of the country. It is worth while to settle people along these lines of railway and thereby add to their earning power in that quarter.

What I have to say is not affected in any degree by considerations of political partisanship. I can, I think, quite fairly include every preceding government in about the same condemnation. Every government in its immigration policy has seen only the western part of Canada and no other portion. As I say, I do not altogether complain, nor do I wish to rob the West of anything. The East does not wish to do that; but we do say that the immigration policy ought to be for the whole of the Dominion, and that Eastern Canada should not be neglected or overlooked. I would ask the minister to pay some special attention, through his agencies overseas, to the end of securing for the Eastern provinces, not the whole of the immigration that is coming, of course, but a reasonable percentage of it. Let us help all the Dominion and in doing so realize that population is just as valuable in the East as it is in the West. And considering the history of Canada, considering the growth of the Western provinces, and the fact that, judged by the scale of representation in this House, the West is going ahead magnificently while the East is not able to hold its own, I think the question is well worth the careful attention of the Government if bringing to Eastern Canada some relief from the unfortunate condition into which it is falling for lack of population. The class of people required for the East would, of course, be different from the class that can be assimilated and probably be made happy in some portions of the West. For the East we must have people who are either accustomed to farming or else are of such an age that they can be broken into farming. And we must have them either of the English or of the French type. It is no use asking the East, with its slender population, to assimilate a large population from Central Europe. I would suggest immigrants from France, Great Britain, or the Scandinavian countries.

Mr. JACOBS: Do you object to German immigration into New Brunswick?

Mr. BAXTER: My hon. friend can have the German immigration and the German measles together. We want none of them in New Brunswick.

Mr. JACOBS: Surely the grand old United Empire Loyalists stock would stand up against German immigration.

Mr. BAXTER: I am glad my hon. friend has such confidence in that stock, but perhaps he would be surprised to discover how few of the original settlers of New Brunswick are now represented in the public and the commercial life of that province. The stock has gone to the United States and to the West of Canada and has done very good work. But it is not a question of old or young Loyalist stock. We do not want Germans. We shall do very well without them. It has cost the life-blood of 60,000 Canadians to prevent them from dominating the world, and we shall extend no invitation to them to settle in New Brunswick, Nova Scotia or Prince Edward Island.

FISHERIES

Fisheries—salaries and disbursements of fishery officers and guardians and fisheries patrol service, $683,000.

Mr. MANION: Would the minister assure us that even if this item does carry a general discussion may be permitted, at a later date? I am not particularly interested, but my hon. friend from Northumberland (Mr. Maybee) and hon. members from the Pacific coast who are interested are not in the House.

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Marine and Fisheries): Yes, there will be some supplementary estimates which will afford an opportunity for general discussion.

Mr. BAXTER: Has the hon. minister given any consideration to the advisability of putting the fisheries under a deputy who will have sole charge? It is a subject of very great importance with us in the maritime provinces and with our friends on the Pacific coast, and it seems to me that the country cannot give too much intensive consideration to the development of our fisheries and to the marketing of our fish. A predecessor of my hon. friend, now the Chief Justice of New Brunswick; did much during the war period to have people, as far west as Toronto at least, taught to consume more of the products of our fisheries. Fish is a good, palatable, wholesome food, and it seems to me much may be done by providing the means of transportation to bring the fish to our people inland while it is still fresh, and so teach them to rely on it as a substitute for other forms of food which are more expensive and cannot really replace fish as a diet for mental and bodily efficiency. To do that it seems to me you need to appoint an official who can devote his whole time to the fisheries alone as a separate department.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Since I took charge of the department I have received many resolutions from associations and individuals making the same suggestion. Of course, I have not had sufficient time to make up my mind as to the desirability of the suggested change, and, furthermore, as strict economy has to be practised, the formation of another department might involve expenditure which would not be altogether welcome. But the matter is engaging my attention.

Mr. TOLMIE: I am very glad indeed to hear that the hon. minister is interested in this subject. The fisheries on both our coasts are of great importance. As has already been pointed out, the fishermen on the Pacific coast have long felt that the fisheries there would be much more rapidly developed if a separate department were created and placed under a deputy minister. I am sure the minister will find on further investigation that the little extra expenditure required will be well spent and give excellent returns.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I must admit that this suggestion seems to have the support of all those who are interested in our fisheries.

Item agreed to.

Building fishways and clearing rivers, $40,000.

Mr. MILNE: I come from an inland district where probably we do not have a chance to buy the excellent fish that is obtainable along the coast. However, we have fish commonly called suckers that come up our streams in the spring. While the water is cold they are somewhat of a delicacy to people who have never had an opportunity of tasting other fish. I live on a little stream called White Mud river, and on it there are two dams, one in the neighborhood of Gladstone and the other in the neighbourhood of Westbourne, built by the Canadian Pacific Railway Company in order to hold back the water for their railway tanks. For the last eight or ten years at least we have been trying to get fishways in those dams so the suckers may get upstream to the shallow water and spawn as nature intended. While the war was on I myself sent two or three telegrams to the food controller and the fisheries department, but by the time any move was made it was too late. The fish come up to those dams and in a short time most of them die, the survivors returning to the lake. We were assured that before the next fishing season the necessary slides would be put in. That has been the promise year after year, and I am informed that this season the fish have died in large quantities and the stench along the river is almost unbearable. There is no reason why those fish should not be allowed to get up into shallow water, and there is no reason why the settlers along the streams should not get the benefit of this fish diet. While the water is cold the settlers eat large numbers of these suckers. I would impress upon the minister that we want those fish to come up our streams. We do not see any reason why the Canadian Pacific Railway Company should have the privilege of erecting dams to the detriment of the fish and of the settlers who are thus deprived of what is a very valuable article of diet.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I may inform my hon. friend that under the law it is possible to compel the owners of such dams to provide fishways, and if they fail to do so we can perform the necessary work at their expense. I can asure my hon. friend that the matter will be considered by the department, and if possible something will be done.

Mr. CALDWELL: In this connection there is a matter I have already called to the attention of the minister, and I cannot help but think that his information in regard to it is not correct. It is with respect to a dam on the Salmon river, so-called, in my riding in Victoria county, New Brunswick. This river derived its name from the fact that so many salmon used to go up it. I am advised there is a dam on that river at the present time with no fishway. The former dams that went out with the spring freshet were provided with proper fishways. I received a reply from the minister that this river dries up in the summer. If it had not been such a serious thing I would have been amused, for I know the river well. It is navigable for lumber drives for at least fifty miles, and I could not imagine there was ever a time when the water would be so shallow that the largest salmon could not come up stream. There might be times in a very dry summer when the water would get low, but at such times the water is very low in all our rivers. However, I cannot believe that the information is serious; I cannot believe that the water gets so low in the Salmon River that the salmon cannot go up. Of course, the mill owner, the man who builds the dam to hold the water, does not like to put in a fish-way. In order to do that, he must waste a certain amount of water. I think, however, the regulations might be such that when the water is very low this fish-way might be closed. It is when the water is high in the spring that the fish go up. I would strongly urge on the minister the necessity of putting a fish-way in this dam on the Salmon river. As I say, the mill owner will put up all kinds of objections; but the statement that the river goes practically dry is too absurd to be entertained.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I am informed that there have been fish-ways in that dam for many years, but that no salmon have been going up.

Mr. CALDWELL: I can hardly credit that, either. I have no doubt the minister has that information, but I cannot help thinking it has been given to him by some interested person. This river was called the Salmon river because of the fact that at one time it was well stocked with salmon. It is a tributary of the St. John river. There is a hatchery near the mouth of this river which we are maintaining at large expense for the hatching of salmon fry to supply these streams with fish. I believe that a quantity of these fry have been put into the Salmon river. I would urge upon the minister the necessity of making a thorough investigation and getting information upon this subject from a reliable source.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I shall be glad to do anything in that respect.

Mr. FORKE: I would call attention to the fact that these fish chutes do not fill the bill, if I may use a colloquial expression. I have received complaints from the reeve of a municipality out west; it is evident that the conditions are such as have been described by the hon. member for Neepawa (Mr. Milne). Thousands of fish are unable to get up and die at the bottom of the chute. I remember writing to the game guardian about the matter, and the reply I got was that the Canadian Pacific had fulfilled all the conditions of the law. I think something more might be done if the minister could point the way toward making these fish chutes more easily ascended by the fish. These prairie fish do not jump like the salmon, as you can readily realize; and that is one of the difficulties they have to contend with. They are good food; they are relished by the people of the prairies, and it is a pity that so many of them die every spring, being unable to get up over these chutes.

Mr. WARD: We have the same complaint to make against the Canadian National at Dauphin. There is a dam across the river there which the fish are unable to get over. Several requests in regard to the matter have been made at the Department at Ottawa, but nothing has ever come of it. When the minister is looking into this matter, I hope he will not forget Dauphin.

[Mr. Caldwell.]

Mr. LAPOINTE: We will at least make the Canadian National railways observe the law.

Mr. CALDWELL: There is one other matter to which I wish to refer. I know that the provisions of the Canadian law with regard to the pollution of streams by mill owners with sawdust and other refuse material are very well enforced. That is the case in Carleton county, and the minister assures us that steps are being taken to have the law observed by the mill owners in Victoria county. What jurisdiction have we over the mills situated on the American side of the St. John river where the St. John is the boundary between the United States and Canada?

Mr. LAPOINTE: We have no authority there.

Mr. CALDWELL: What are the regulations in the United States.

Mr. LAPOINTE: The authorities in the United States take action only upon petition signed by a certain number of citizens in the locality asking for it. I understand that the regulations there are very inadequate.

Mr. CALDWELL: The petition must be signed by residents of the United States?

Mr. LAPOINTE: Yes.

Mr. CALDWELL: Then we have no recourse?

Mr. LAPOINTE: No.

Mr. CALDWELL: Is there not an international fisheries commission which could take up a matter of this kind?

Mr. LAPOINTE: There is no such body at the present time.

Mr. CALDWELL: There is an international joint commission.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Yes, but that does not apply to fisheries.

Mr. CALDWELL: I would like to see something done in this connection. While our fishery guardians are enforcing the law on the Canadian side, the mill owners on the United States side are dumping sawdust in the river, and there is little to induce our own mill owners to observe the law. In fact, the sawdust floats down and destroys the salmon fishing in that river. If there is any possible way of taking the matter up with the United States with a view to concerted action, I would urge that that be done.

Mr. LAPOINTE: The department is in communication at the present time with the American authorities on the subject.

Item agreed to.

Fisheries—to assist in the conservation and development of deep-sea fisheries, and of the demand for fish, $25,000.

Mr. TOLMIE: May we have a brief explanation of that item?

Mr. LAPOINTE: A publicity and marketing division of the department has been established. A press bulletin is prepared monthly and distributed to the newspapers throughout Canada. Specially illustrated articles have also been supplied to household periodicals. As a result, the press has never been so much alive to the great asset Canada has in her fisheries. There are competitions in writing articles on the fisheries, engaged in by the school children of the country. Photographers are engaged to picture the Atlantic fishing industry. The vote is to cover work along these lines.

Item agreed to.

Fish culture, $370,000.

Mr. SPENCER: Would the minister give some explanation of this vote?

Mr. LAPOINTE: The increase is due to the necessity for extending the ponds for rearing young salmon in British Columbia and the Maritime provinces, and for the establishment of a retaining pond for parent salmon on the St. John river.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): What value is there in this work? If I remember aright, some criticism was made by some hon. members during this session to the effect that this work was of no value whatever.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I understand that this is the only way to improve our fisheries. The result of the work of the department does not indicate that my hon. friend is right in the view which he expresses. It has been a great source of developing the fisheries. As a matter of fact, those who are interested in the industry are asking for new hatcheries in almost all the provinces.

Mr. MILLAR: I live within twenty miles of one of these fish hatcheries and I never heard any complaint of its being useless. I know the lakes nearby are pretty well provided with fish, and that the hatchery is appreciated by the people.

Mr. CALDWELL: There is a fish hatchery in the county I represent, and we believe that if it were not for that, the salmon would be depleted very rapidly. I am glad to find the increase in the vote is for the development of fish hatcheries. I do not know whether the minister has any information on the subject, but I understood there was a still being run in connection with one of the hatcheries in the province. I did not know but that the $5,000 was to provide for the still.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I am surprised there would be such a thing in my hon. friend's riding.

Mr. CALDWELL: I did not say it was in my riding, but in the province. I did not say it was not, either.

Mr. WARD: The hon. member for Lunenburg made the statement some time ago that he would be in favour of abolishing the hatcheries entirely. I agree with that myself. Now we have another hon. member coming forward and upholding the hatcheries. Personally, I think we could very well expend more money in connection with the development of our fisheries, but I do not see very much sense in doing so if we do not get greater returns than we have in the past. I would like to see the Fisheries Department protect our fisheries a little more than they have in the past. I think the sum of $370,000 is a lot of money to spend on the development of hatcheries.

Item agreed to.

Steamboat inspection, $114,810.

Mr. LAPOINTE: The expenditure last year was $104,178.13. The increase is accounted for by the annual statutory increases and the appointment of two stenographers, one at Collingwood, Ont., and the other at Victoria, B.C., at $960 and $1,020 respectively.

Mr. SPENCER: Are any fees collected for this service? Is the service self-supporting?

Mr. LAPOINTE: There is a scale of fees for this inspection.

Item agreed to.

To provide for the maintenance of the Sorel shipyard, comprising offices, shops and labourers, $90,000.

Mr. SPENCER: What is this for?

Mr. LAPOINTE: This is to provide for the maintenance of the shipyard at Sorel, where the government boats, the dredges for the deepening of the channel, and so forth, are repaired.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

WEDNESDAY EVENING SITTING

Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved:

That on Wednesday, the 31st of May instant, and on all subsequent Wednesdays to the end of the present session the sitttings of the House shall in every respect be under the same rules provided for other days.

Motion agreed to.

DOMINION IRON AND STEEL COMPANY

On the Orders of the Day:

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I observed in the press recently a report that the Government had made a settlement of the damage action of the Dominion Iron and Steel Company against the Government for the sum, as the report stated, of $4,500,000. The gist of the report was that the Government had settled without proceeding with the action. May I ask if the report is correct?

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Marine and Fisheries): Yes, the report is correct. The action was settled for the balance of $1,500,000, that is $100,000 less than the arrangement agreed to in January or December.

[Mr. Lapointe.]

Mr. MEIGHEN: There was no arrangement agreed to in either January or December by the late government. There may have been one in January by this Government; there was none in December.

Mr. LAPOINTE: There was certainly a settlement; $3,000,000 had been paid, and there was another amount of $1,600,000 to be paid one month later. Of course, if that other installment was not paid, the agreement was null and void. So it was; but the present Government had the matter studied by various counsel, and the opinion was that it was better to effect a settlement. The Minister of Justice (Sir Lomer Gouin) succeeded in obtaining a reduction of $100.000; the costs were paid by the company, and we are not paying interest on the amount.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I only wish to correct one statement of the minister. The late government made no agreement whatever. The term the minister uses is incorrectly applied. The company made in December a proposal of settlement of $4,600,000, which proposal we declined to accept; but on the understanding that the matter would be held over for the new government either to accept or reject as they saw fit, a sum of $3,000,000 was paid. No agreement or, no recommendation whatever, was made as to the balance; the whole matter was left over for the new administration to deal with. I accept their statement as to what they did.

Mr. FIELDING: Except the payment of the $3,000,000.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The $3,000,000 was paid, because that was acknowledged, but there was no agreement as to the balance —none whatever.

Mr. FIELDING: When the right hon. member said that the whole matter was left over for the new Government, I said, "except for the payment of the $3,000,000."

Mr. MEIGHEN: The whole matter was left over. That is precisely what I said.

Mr. LAPOINTE: May I correct a slight mistake I made in my answer to the right hon. gentleman? It was on November 25 that this arrangement between the late government and the company took place; $3,000,000 was paid on that date, and a period of two months was given—I said one month—to pay the balance. This was one of the first things that this Government had to consider when it took office.

ITALIAN IMMIGRATION

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. G. G. COOTE (Macleod): Mr. Speaker, I should like to call the attention of the Government to a despatch in the Montreal Herald of May 23, stating that more than six hundred Italian immigrants were being landed from a steamer on that date. In the House the other night, I understood that only agricultural labourers were being brought to this country at the present time. Can the Government tell us whether these are agricultural labourers, or whether this new regulation is in force at the present time?

Hon. CHARLES STEWART (Argenteuil): I have no actual knowledge of the number of persons who came in as quoted from the despatch by the hon. member, but I can assure him that whoever came in, came in under the regulations that are now in force.

DEBATE CONTINUED ON THE ANNUAL STATEMENT PRESENTED BY THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The House resumed from Tuesday, May 23, the debate on the motion of Hon. W. S. Fielding (Minister of Finance), that Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair for the House to go into Committee of Ways and Means.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON (West York) (Resuming): Mr. Speaker, one of the first things I should like to do is to make one or two references to my hon. friend the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding), and to assure him that while politically we are forced to differ with him very largely, at the same time, with his other friends, we greatly rejoice to see him so well, and congratulate him on his unique record. And it is, of course, a unique record. My hon. friend has been associated with public business since, I believe, the year 1882, becoming Prime Minister of his native province in 1884, when he was only thirty-six years of age; and coming down here in 1896, he remained with us until the elections of 1911, when he stayed at home. Fortunately he was returned to the House through the war elections and has been in this Parliament since. It is, I say, a unique record that he has established in delivering, as he did the other day, when he is seventy-three years young, his sixteenth budget for Canada. I only regret that I cannot proceed very much farther along the same line of thought.

Well, Mr. Speaker, we have been living now for some six months under the "fuller life", the "larger liberty", the "new freedom"; and the trouble about the matter is that the longer we live under this new regime the worse it seems to get. It is having very bad results to-day upon my hon. friend. Why, just think of what was said in the Speech from the Throne at the beginning of this session: Canada was then in a better position than any other country; we had come through the war splendidly; our credit was high; and everything was just what we would have it. And yet, the tune is different when my hon. friend brings down his Budget. I do not know what it was that clouded his optimism, whether it was the "fuller life", the "larger liberty", or the "new freedom",—or a bad pair of spectacles. At any rate, the point of view has entirely changed: we are in a bad plight and the revenue has dropped. Of course it dropped; and, after all, the drop in revenue, instead of being something to lament about is under the circumstances, a matter for congratulation. Sir, we came through the worst period of deflation last year; we came through a year which the minister himself described as a very hard and difficult one, a year of bad business, and we came through it with a drop of only $53,000,000, or 12.2 per cent, in our national income. I wonder how many business concerns can make anything like the same boast. While we dropped 12.2 per cent, our income nevertheless was no less than $32,000,000 greater than in the year 1920 and was $69,000,000 greater than in the year 1919. I repeat, therefore, that instead of being downcast at the present time, recognizing, as we ought to recognize, the difficulties not only of the situation here, where they are less formidable than elsewhere, but the difficulties of the entire world, the Canadian has every right to be pleased and thankful with the condition things are in, and should again thank God that he is a Canadian and living in Canada.

But my hon. friend's pessimism does not stop at disregarding these facts. Why, in that "bad" year we had a customs revenue of $105,500,000. It is true it represented a large decline from the previous year's, it was undoubtedly a considerable drop; but in making his estimate of the business of this year my hon. friend cuts that total, unsatisfactory as it was, to $103,000,000. Mr. Speaker, what a tremendous difference the mere question of being here or there, on this side of the House or that, makes! The fact is no doubt familiar to you, Sir, that when finances were formerly discussed and the difficulties of the country were being considered, the great remedy, the great elixir which my hon. friend and his associates proposed, as a means of solving the problem, was simply to restore to power the finance minister of golden years. That done, we were told, everything would be right. Well, that has been done, but instead of everything being righted, the gloom seems to thicken; and a year that was "bad" is better than the year that is foreshadowed—this year. Now, I submit that we need, in this country and throughout the world to-day, two things: one is optimism and the other is work. And instead of looking forward to a decreasing revenue and a falling business—unless my hon. friend thinks that his tariff changes are of such a character that he is seriously disturbing his tariff revenue, which I hasten to assure him is not the case—we ought to look forward with confidence to better times and larger revenues from customs. The period of deflation is pretty well over. Many things are not only low but are being produced at less than proper cost. Shelves and inventories generally are low, and we ought to get an increase in the revenue, as I have no doubt we shall.

But there is another forecast made by my hon. friend which I am free to admit fills me with absolute amazement. I remember all the things that were said,—which, I desire to assure my hon. friend, I know were never said by him,—both in this House and out of it, as to the manner in which the income taxes were being collected, or rather were not being collected. I recall the charges made against the former administration of not collecting the business profits tax, or of neglecting the collection of the income tax and the non-collection of a huge pile of arrears. And to-day, with all the arrears resultant from what was alleged to have been a lack of efficiency on the part of the previous administration, or worse, we find that the minister's best estimate for direct taxation from the income tax this year is only $60,000,000. Oh, again, Mr. Speaker, what a difference there is! We are here; they are there.

Let us see what those direct taxes are. Imagine what would have been thought of anyone who a few years ago would have said that Canada would have raised last year—not a good year for collections, but a year of many business troubles and difficulties—the enormous sum of $101,500,000 by direct taxation. I hope my friend will do a little better than $60,000,000. I am quite sure he is going to do the very best he can, and I have every confidence that again he is a little too low.

Naturally we are very pleased to see that our friends are following up the question of closer relations with our sister dominions. We have already got a good start made. The hon. minister refers to the West Indian agreement — there are other agreements—and to the Australian negotiations. I hope he will be successful in concluding an arrangement with Australia. I think the position in which the case is now left is such that he may look forward with a very reasonable degree of hope of affecting a preferential arrangement with our sister dominion that will afford a very much needed outlet for many of our products, particularly those from the Western provinces.

In connection with the French treaty, we are entirely with him again. We did have an arrangement made with France, with which the House is familiar, an arrangement negotiated by the right hon. Sir George Foster, and further work in connection with it was done by Senator Beaubien, acting in conjunction with Sir George. We were always willing and anxious, and there was not a time when the late government would not have been very much pleased, to make that temporary arrangement permanent, to properly enlarge it so as to give proper access for our products to the French markets, having particular regard to our agricultural products.

My hon. friend quarrels with what we were trying to do last year in connection with customs valuations. Customs valuations and foreign currency are both related to the underlying difficulties which render it advisable to continue the policy we laid down. In approaching a consideration of the question we ought to bear in mind that last year the government were correct in foreseeing the deflation which took place. They foresaw the efforts which would be made by one country and another to dump and to undersell; they knew the absolute disarrangement of foreign markets, and they knew that to a large extent the best market at the time which was at all to be relied on by the Canadian producer was his own home market.

The government were also familiar with what was being done in connection with that market. It is said that customs valuations, drawback provisions, debased currency and the like are difficult questions, difficult to administer. They are difficult; but everything that is new is more or less difficult. That would hardly seem to be a reason why we should not attempt to do a certain thing if it is right. My hon. friend introduced the first dumping clause in our legislation. It was a very good clause. It sometimes was applied, it sometimes was not. It very often was not applied because it was not known about in time; but in hundreds and hundreds of cases where it was known about it was never applied because it was so easy to evade.

Mr. hon. friend has referred to difficulties in connections with customs valuations, but those difficulties are no greater than the difficulties encountered in determining what are bona fide sales in the local market. In this connection I should like to give the House an illustration of how the matter works out. Before that customs valuations provision was adopted we had a peculiar case submitted to us. We were endeavouring to follow the movement and to see to it that to the fullest extent possible we had the minimum of unemployment. At the time I noticed some importation in a particular line of cloth that I could not understand. I had an investigation made, and this is what was revealed to us: The buyer of the firm showed us three bolts of cloth, all of which looked to be exactly the same quality, prices $2.56, $2.50 and $1.50 respectively. In reply to his question if I could see any difference in the cloths I said, "no." There was none. The $1.50 cloth happened to be distress goods imported from the States, and the manufacturer made that extra profit in his business. He could buy no more goods of that particular kind at that price because, being distress goods, the order could not be repeated. But at a time when our woollen mills were not running, when we had people out of work and walking the streets, that order—and it was a large one—was put through without the buying public getting a single cent advantage. Being distress goods the price could not be repeated, and the merchant here could not very well change all his price lists in connection with that single order. At any rate the public, as I say, got no benefit out of the transaction, and, further, the unemployment situation was aggravated.

But that whole transaction was justified by evidence under the old dumping clause. It is so easy for the outsider to have three or four wash sales and send in evidence of them to the customs appraiser—very, very easy. That was the kind of thing we wanted to stop, and to a large extent we did stop it. Therefore I regret the change that my hon. friend is making. I believe he desires to enforce his dumping provisions in the interests of Canadian labour, but I am afraid he will find that the results of the proposed change will not be what he desires or expects.

My hon. friend in dealing with the currency question picks out the German mark and makes his argument upon it. He is perfectly right in so doing, because it was the German mark which we had in mind in the course we took. We knew that the debased living conditions applying in Germany enabled production to take place at a very cheap rate; we also knew that there were two standards of value for the German mark, one international and the other domestic, the domestic value being much greater than the international. So, it was entirely impossible for the Canadian producer to compete against his German rival under such conditions. Frankly, that was the reason that we adopted that provision. My hon. friend points out that in any event it is not working well. Well, it worked pretty well for some time. In the case of all laws, some method of evasion is discovered. We had the thought that with this provision fortified by the Marking Act, we would be able to police these importations, and we were doing it pretty well. My friend points out that it became a practice to ship through Holland instead of direct from Germany, or through some other country where the currency provision would not apply. Well, that was an evasion of the law, and it could have been provided against; the practice of indirect importation could have been made illegal, with the penalty of seizure of the goods if it were persisted in. That would be the course to follow, if my hon. friend had the idea that we ought to protect our markets and our workingmen from the effects of German competition.

I do not think there is any question about the fact that there are two standards of money values in Germany. But in case such question should be raised here I wish to quote an interview given by Mr. Fry, who returned from Germany after spending some time there, as published in the Montreal Gazette of May 9 last:

As examples Mr. Fry mentioned that in making some recent purchases in Berlin, a fine leather hand-made pigskin bag was obtained for 3,400 marks, or approximately $17, while the same bag when priced in New York was $92.50, marked down from $125. A pair of Goerz binoculars cost $8.40 and a spring overcoat of the best Scotch woollen tweed was bought in Berlin for $10.50. While in Berlin Mr. Fry rented a large 18-roomed house in the best part of the city for 4,500 marks, or about $15 per month while the household staff, consisting of two housemaids, a cook, scullery maid and chauffeur, were quite content with a wage of $3 per month each.

And that is the kind of competition that I do not think—and I know this is the view of the country generally—the workers of Canada ought to be subjected to. Mr. Fry stated further:

Conditions in Germany are improving rapidly and the country's transportation and other public services are now functioning normally.

In view of prices like that, in view of a wage scale such as that, a tariff against Germany becomes a farce. This budget might well be called a 2½ per cent British preference and German free trade.

In the case of the Marking Act the same considerations apply. Of course, there are difficulties in connection with the Marking Act, but other countries have experienced similar difficulties and have met them. It is true that exceptions have to be made; but I do not think that even this Government take the position that the Canadian people have not the right, in connection with such goods as can properly and conveniently be marked, to know from whom they are buying; on the contrary, the minister points out that he is adopting the principle where he can put it into effect. But what an extraordinary way he is going about it. He does not make it a matter of general law and then provide for exceptions in connection with such goods as commercially ought not to be marked—not at all. Here we are going to have a very important trade matter dealt with, not by the House, not by statute, but by Order in Council—and by the very gentlemen to whom even the word was a horror and a shame. I am quite sure that so far as my hon. friend himself is concerned, he would handle the matter of Order in Council fairly and properly and without undue regard to the representations of political friends; but I do not know whether I would be quite as confident in making a prediction as to how and with what recommendations the matter will get to him. The difference in the policy is simply this. We admit the difficulties in administering a new law; we started to work it out; we commenced a list of exceptions, and it was merely a matter of time for the adjustment to take place. The other policy is to extend special favour by Order in Council to this favoured industry or to that favoured industry. Our idea was that it should not be a question of there being a favoured industry here and there; we thought the Canadian people had the right to know from whom they were buying—whether they were getting goods from Germany or from the United States, or, perhaps, from the country from whom they would be much more anxious to purchase them from—England. My hon. friend misses what ought to be the underlying principle of the whole thing—the right of the Canadian producer to know from what country he is making his purchases.

I did not notice in the budget any reference to the Income Tax Act except, perhaps, a passing reference to the banks. I offer no criticism of my hon. friend's action in that connection, but there are some omissions which I am sorry have not been covered. Perhaps they have merely been overlooked. Many representations were made to me with regard to provisions of the Income Tax Act. I have no doubt that they have been made to my hon. friends opposite. But there were two classes of cases which seemed to me to be peculiarly deserving of some sympathetic action. We have the case of widows and widowers; the special exemption which the married person gets disappears when the helpmate in life is, unfortunately, lost. At a time when they are handicapped in every way, their feelings torn and lacerated, and their expenses increased, the exemption is taken away from them. My view was—and I intended to give effect to it had I had the opportunity—that the law should be amended for the purpose of covering those cases. There is another class of cases which I think also deserves favourable consideration, and that is the commercial travellers, who, as the law stands to-day, cannot get and do not get a proper allowance for their expenses. It is undoubtedly true that it costs the commercial traveller ever so much more to live in hotels when travelling than it does at home. I sincerely trust my hon. friend will take both these cases under his consideration and deal with them favourably.

Speaking generally of the tariff changes, I do not know that I have the right to delay the House very long in that connection, as they hardly seem to be of sufficient importance. Whatever qualms Sir Charles Gordon may have had before he left for Genoa were entirely unwarranted. The agricultural implement business may be hurt; I do not know. The duties ought to be reduced undoubtedly to the point where the industry can carry on, but they ought not to be reduced to the point where the industry stops. In that condition I think I should again point out that the policy of this party is to reduce as and where reductions can properly be made, and a reduction properly made, in our view, is a reduction made every time that it can be made and production be carried on and employment given.

Let me point out also that under the old Liberal tariff as left by my hon. friend when he gave his fifteenth budget speech, the average duty on agricultural implements was 20.2 per cent;—or as he would have provided under the reciprocity pact, 17.3 per cent. As we reduced it, it was 14.6 per cent; or a change from 20.2 to 14.6. I am not going to say that the much smaller reduction now made, practically 2½ per cent, is right or wrong; I do not know. It is right if it can be stood; it is wrong if an important industry properly indigenous to this country is injuriously affected to the extent of cutting down output. It is an important industry, important in itself and important in connection with a good many different activities. Take the Massey-Harris Company, for instance. They distributed in the years 1920 and 1921 in Canada, for labour, $8,583,000, and for Canadian purchases, $7,319,000, or a total of $15,902,000. I do not know, I say, that they are hurt at all. I do not know that I mind very much if their profits disappear, but I would mind very, very much if because of a cut so small as to give practically no help whatever to the farming community, many, many deserving Canadians were thrown out of work.

There is another feature in connection with the present tariff that requires perhaps a little consideration. The other day some hon. member to my left was referring to rebates of duty, and the like, and how they worked out. I think it is a good thing for us to take a concrete case sometimes, just to see the effect in the case of some particular article that we know about. The particular drawback that was being discussed at that time was the drawback in connection with steel duties, and I am just going to give the House a few illustrations how that drawback works out. Drawbacks, I may say, are things which so far as the people in the steel industries of the country are concerned, are very unpopular. They hurt steel production. Steel production now is pretty poor in Canada. We have not very many blast furnaces running. We have smokeless chimneys down in Nova Scotia, and at other points we find very many plants that are not running properly. These drawbacks hurt far more than to the extent of the drawback itself, because a good deal of policing is required to trace the materials. Take the case of a sixteen marker Western drill, with single disc attachment. I will give the weights, and the duty on the material entering into that drill, having regard to the steel industry. There are 450 pounds of bar iron, which carries a duty of 35 cents, per hundred pounds, making a duty charge of $1.58; sheet steel 65 pounds, which carries a duty of 12½ cents, making a charge of 22 cents; pig iron 656 pounds, with a duty of $2.50 per net ton, making a charge on the pig iron entering into that drill of 82 cents. Now those duties are already subject to a drawback of 30 per cent for the domestic market. My hon. friend, as I read his tariff, increases that drawback to 40 cents; I am not sure that that is the exact figure, but it is approximately so. There is also an export drawback of 99 per cent, and it works out in this way. In connection with that sixteen marker Western drill, the net duty on a machine for domestic consumption, amounts to $1.81, and for the export article 3¾ cents. I take that Western drill and put it in the western market, say at Moosejaw, which is a point of central distribution. That drill with its single disc attachment weighs complete 1,260 pounds. The freight to Moosejaw from Hamilton is $1.33½ per hundred, or $16.82 for cost of freight delivery, as compared with the net duty of $1.81 on the material in the machine. I do not know what the present value of the drill is, but I think the last time I was looking into the matter in the West it was $155; if I am wrong, hon. gentlemen will be able to correct me, but I think that is approximately correct.

I have here also the figures with regard to a 10-foot horse rake and a 6-foot binder with bundle carrier and transport attachments. I ask leave of the House to incorporate this whole statement in Hansard without reading further.

(The statement referred to is as follows)

AGRICULTURAL IMPLEMENTS

16 Marker Western Drill, with single disc attachment, value about $155.

—	Weight	Duty	Amount of Duty	Deduct Drawback		Net Duty
				Domestic 30%	Export 99%	Domestic	Export
Bar iron	450 lb.	35c. 100 lb.	$1.58	·47	1·56	1·11	·02
Sheet steel	65 lb.	12½%	.22	·09	·21¾	·13	·00¼
Pig iron	656 lb.	2·50 NT	.82	·25	·81	·57	·01
			$2.62			1·81	·03¼

16 Marker Western Drill, with the single disc attachment, weighs 1,260 lbs. and the freight to Moosejaw from Hamilton is $1.33½ per 100 lbs., or $16.82, cost of freight delivery, as compared with net duty of $1.81 on material in machine.

10-ft. Horse Rake, value about $55.

—	Weight	Duty	Amount of Duty	Deduct Drawback		Net Duty
				Domestic 30%	Export 99%	Domestic	Export
Bar iron	350 lb.	35c. 100 lb.	$1.23	·37	1·22	·86	·01
Sheet steel	10 lb.	12½%	.03½	·01	·03½	·02½	·00
Pig iron	79 lb.	2·50 NT	.10	·03	·09¾	·07	·00¼
			$1.36½			·95½	·01¼

10-ft. Horse Rake weighs 460 lb. and the freight to Moosejaw from Hamilton is $1.33½ per 100 lb., or $6.14, cost of freight delivery, as compared with the net duty of 95½c. on material in machine.

6-ft. Binder with Bundle Carrier and Transport Attachments, value about $240.

—	Weight	Duty	Amount of Duty	Deduct Drawback		Net Duty
				Domestic 99%	Export 99%	Domestic	Export
Bar iron	800 lb.	35c. 100 lb.	$2.80	2·77	2·77	·03	·03
Sheet steel	110 lb.	12½%	.38	·37½	·37½	·00½	·00½
Pig iron	483 lb.	2·50 NT	.60	·59¾	·59¾	·00¼	·00¼
			$3.78			·03¾	·03¾

6-ft. Binder weighs 1,560 lb. and the freight to Moosejaw from Hamilton is $1.33½ per 100 lb., or $20.83, cost of freight delivery, as compared with net duty of 3¾c. on material in machine. If drawback was 30%, the net duty would be $2.65, as compared with freight $20.83.

Sheet Steel is figured at $2.75 per 100 lb.

For the moment I say nothing more about the tariff items, for the very reason I have given. I note my hon. friend's action in connection with alcohol. I congratulate him on the fact that he has been able to arrive at a solution with the help of the trade. When this matter was first before the House last year, we were faced with a difficulty which had to be met. The nine-dollar rate had to apply, unless there was some method arrived at under which the druggist could get his liquor at the low rate which applied at places where at the cost of the user, the alcohol was followed until it took the form of medicine, and followed by the Government. The then government said that they would be very pleased to adopt any regulations which hon. members could show them would protect the revenue, and none were suggested. Since that time I had deputations waiting on me, which did point out the methods which my hon. friend has since adopted. As a matter of fairness to the chemists, we should do what we could for them, so they would at least be at no disadvantage in connection with their business. But I am sorry to say my hon. friend has overlooked two very important considerations in connection with alcohol which we were considering during the last session of the House. What about the country doctor? The country doctor looks after a great deal of the medicaments used in the country. In many places there are no drug stores at all, and I would have thought the country doctor would not have been selected by my hon. friend as one who ought to have less trust imposed in him than is imposed in the druggist. We also had the question of alcohol to be used for medicinal bathing brought very prominently to our attention. These questions were exactly the same in principle as the druggist's case, and there is no difference at all. I suppose they were merely overlooked by my hon. friend, and when we get down to the resolution we will find that probably he has covered that case. I note with interest his action in connection with sugar beets. I was down in the sugar beet section while the tariff investigation was being held, and a large number of farmers came to us and stated that the farming industry was very very much interested in the production of sugar beets, that there was every opportunity for a very large increasing acreage, and that all they required was a sufficient tariff on sugar beets to enable them to go ahead and make a profit. The only change that I know of that has taken place in the meantime is that these gentlemen down there have exchanged their former representative, Mr. McCoig, for the hon. Minister of Labour (Mr. Murdock). I do not know whether the views of the hon. Minister of Labour are that not only is there no duty required to protect the farmers down there, but that their industry should contribute a 49 cent tax per 100 pounds. It seems to me that the Hon. Mr. Manning Doherty was also very much of the view that for the proper protection of the farms the duty was necessary. Be that as it may, I wonder what has become of that old friend of ours we used to hear so much about, the old complaint and the old cry, that we exempted the rich and oppressed the poor with a full burden of taxation. What has become of the allegation that all our budgets were rich men's budgets, that the rich man paid nothing and the poor man everything? I wonder what has become of those cries. It all disappears in the simple translation from here to there. The whole thing depends altogether on the angle or the point of view in some minds.

Referring to the sales tax, you remember, Mr. Speaker, what a dreadful thing that was in the minds of hon. members opposite when it was introduced. You remember how it was characterized as an iniquitous scheme evolved by a dreadful government to add to the burden of the poor and enhance the gains and the relative position of the rich. I remember when it was stated that a tax on lumber of 33 1/3 per cent less than the tax now suggested was going to stop building and production. But I need not stop at lumber, it is practically the same down the whole line. However, this dreadful thing becomes all right, so long as the burden is made big enough, and there it is.

Regarding luxury taxes, you know, Mr. Speaker, that they have a familiar and yet at the same time a dreadful sound have they not—nuisances that they were. Well, they are back again. I remember what was said about automobiles in connection with luxury taxes. I remember the hon. minister objecting strongly to taxes on automobiles. I remember his saying that an automobile of a value of a thousand dollars or under was not a luxury, but a necessity, and that it ought not to be taxed. Do any of us forget the heart-breaking appeal made by the present Solicitor General (Mr. McKenzie) for the kid's candy, for the candy that the young man was going to present his sweetheart with, and his description how the dirty hand of the then Minister of Finance bent round her shoulder and extracted just so many candies? But this is all right now; again the whole thing depends on the angle from which one views it.

I wonder if we remember what happened in the House in regard to cheques, notes and overdrafts. There was not so much fuss in connection with cheques. We left the tax on cheques at 2 cents, because we felt that people would suffer great inconvenience if they had to set to work to figure out just what they had to pay in connection with every cheque they wrote or else be liable for a $50 fine. Cheques are things that have to be, and are written out quickly and regularly. But now if you make a mistake in connection with the tax which is .04 per cent on your cheques, you are liable to a $50 fine. We did not impose on cheques a tax in proportion to the amount; we dealt in that way with promissory notes and overdrafts, things which admit of much more time, and upon which, therefore, the amount of the tax can be much more easily calculated. We imposed a tax of two cents per $100 on promissory notes and overdrafts, and there was great grief in Israel when we imposed that tax. My hon. friends thought that was a dreadful thing. I remember the Minister of Customs and Inland Revenue (Mr. Bureau) making a plea for the man who had to make out a note or had an overdraft; but again to-day, as a result of the change in the angle, that two-cent rate, which was then an imposition and an outrage, is a reasonable and proper tax to impose when doubled.

I wonder what was particularly iniquitous about the telegrams that they should be especially picked out. We must have money; my hon. friend requires all the money that he can get. In fact, in view of the estimates and of the way in which some of them have gone through, I am afraid that he requires more money than he can get. But what is the matter with telegrams in particular that the tax on telegrams should be increased 500 per cent? What is the trouble? Of course we do not pick out telegrams for especial attack, because we ourselves own one of the largest telegraph systems; but if there is anything particularly wrong in doing business at a distance as against other kinds of business activities, why is the long distance telephone overlooked? Why are we not getting some revenue from it? Why should there not be, perhaps, a spreading of the revenue on that ground between telegrams and telephones?

But after all, the chief difficulty about the budget is that I am afraid it takes us nowhere, leads us nowhere, settles nothing, but, on the other hand, adds to doubt and uncertainty. My hon. friend pointed to the fact that business is very bad; he thinks it is so bad, for example, that out of business—and business pays very largely income taxes—he can get only a much reduced revenue. Yet the budget is full of little nuisances and pin-pricks, all adding to the cost of doing business, all making business just a little more difficult.

What, after all, is our real trouble, economically? Does not every hon. gentleman know that, apart from the absolute necessity of obtaining proper markets for our farm produce, our chief difficulty is the one-sided trade which we have with the United States and which they are determined to make still more one-sided? The year before last, for every dollar's worth of goods that we sold to the United States, we purchased $1.58 worth of United States goods or produce. Last year, although the totals themselves are cut down, for every dollar's worth of goods that we sold to the United States we bought $1.75 worth of their produce. At present $294,000,000 worth of the goods that we sold that country in the year ended March 21, last, are subject to heavy duties, largely prohibitive, and what do we do? We go on and still import breadstuffs, butter, cheese, eggs, lard, meats, vegetables and fruits to an amount of over $60,000,000, the larger proportion of which comes from the United States. Then this budget has to turn around and help the American out just a little, in cases where we buy from the American, by cutting down the duties that we now charge upon his materials coming into this country. The budget seconds the efforts of Mr. Fordney and his associates. We are decreasing in part, although, it is true, not to a large extent, our duties on United States' shipments. Are we, according to this Budget, in such a way that we are to consider ourselves an adjunct of and assistant to the United States Congress?

And what does this budget do for one of the chief evils from which this country has been suffering, namely, unemployment? What is done in the Budget to make it more likely that one extra wheel will turn, or that there will be one job for one other man? Hon. gentlemen will search for that in vain, and after all, so often a small re-adjustment can produce great results. There is no doubt as to the necessity of action. I am wrong—there is a reference made by the minister to this very question, although he does not deal directly with unemployment. The minister said:

> We cannot return to pre-war conditions. The workingmen's position has advanced. His standard of living has improved. He is unwilling to go back to pre-war conditions, and nobody should expect him to be content to do so.

Would it not appear to any one that the foregoing is an extraordinary statement to find in the same paper and in the same Budget that exposes these men to the conditions that we know exist among Germany's workmen? Those conditions, we are aware, are deplorable. Germany's workmen are often not properly clad, they practically never see meat; and, as we saw from the Gazette to-day, you can get a chauffeur willing to work for $3 a month. Yet that is the kind of competition to which the workers of this country, so referred to in the speech of my hon. friend, are made subject, as a result of the manner in which the hon. gentleman has dealt with these questions of currency, valuation, etc.

There is another matter to which I want to refer, and that is the question of ordinary political honesty. I have already pointed out that nothing has been said about the income tax; nothing has been said about implementing the pledges which were given in connection therewith; nothing has been done in connection with business profits or anything else; there has not been a word in regard to these things. Now, my hon. friend has my greatest sympathy in the burden which he carries in raising money, but in his efforts to meet that necessity we find merely a hampering of business, a spreading of consumption taxes, while there is not a word on these other questions. I desire to read the platform of the Liberal party in this connection. I am not now referring to what has been mentioned so often, namely, the tariff resolutions. With regard to the question of raising the extra revenues so much required, however, that platform reads:

Be it and it is Hereby Resolved:

1. That the serious nature of the country's financial situation calls for the profoundest consideration of all patriotic citizens, and the exercise of the severest economy by the Government;

2. That increase of revenue must be sought from an equitable and effective imposition and collection of graduated taxes, on business profits and income, applicable to all incomes above reasonable exemptions;

3. Taxes on luxuries.

That is the platform; that is the promise. And in the working out of this "fuller life," "larger liberty" and "new freedom," how much regard do we find given to that pledge? Taxes on luxuries! Where are they? There are no such taxes, unless the Government think that they are discharging their pledge in this respect by imposing taxes on candy and on automobiles. We are told that "increase of revenue must be sought from an equitable and effective imposition and collection of graduated taxes, on business profits and income, applicable to all incomes above reasonable exemptions. What do we hear about that now? We have, instead of that, a tremendously increased sales tax and 500 per cent increase in telegrams and a lot of other small things that will not amount to a great deal apart from the annoyance they create.

Political honesty is perhaps one of the most important questions, if, indeed, it is not the most important, in the public life of a country, and it should be scrupulously observed. Realizing how essential this is, Mr. Speaker, I beg to move, seconded by my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition (Mr. Meighen), the following resolution in amendment to the motion before the House:

That all the words after the word "that" be struck out and the following be substituted therefor: The Liberal Party assembled in Convention in August 1919 adopted a resolution which, after reciting its professed purposes, contained the following specific and unqualified pledges:

"That to these ends, wheat, wheat flour and all products of wheat; the principal articles of food; farm implements and machinery; farm tractors; mining, flour and saw mill machinery and repair parts thereof; rough and partly dressed lumber; gasoline, illuminating, lubricating and fuel oils; nets, net twines, and fishermen's equipments; cements, and fertilizers, should be free from customs duties, as well as the raw material entering into same.

"That the British preference be increased to 50 per cent of the general tariff.

"And the Liberal Party hereby pledges itself to implement by legislation the provisions of this resolution when returned to power.'

That such pledges were restated as the policy of the Liberal Party in an official handbook issued just before the general election, namely, in October 1921, under the authority of its leader, Honourable W. L. Mackenzie King.

That candidates contesting on behalf of the Liberal Party in the said election, used widely the promises therein set out as a means of securing support.

That the Liberal Party having been returned to power the budget proposals of the Finance Minister now brought down, constitute, on the part of the Government, an utter failure to implement such pledges by legislation.

That the making of such solemn pledges, the utilization of them to secure support, and their flagrant violation after the attainment of office reveal a disregard of political honour and tend to lower the standard of public life.

Hon. J. A. ROBB (Minister of Trade and Commerce): When presenting his sixteenth annual budget, my colleague the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) made a most fervent appeal for economy. Following that appeal I propose this afternoon to economize in the time of the House, so that you, Mr. Speaker, and other hon. members will not be compelled to add to the expenditure which every additional day this House remains in session incurs upon the people. The Government invite criticism. Indeed, we welcome fair and honest criticism of all measures submitted to Parliament; and so soon as the motion before the House is disposed of we shall, in order to legalize the reforms suggested by the Minister of Finance, go into committee, when we hope to have the free and frank advice of every hon. member. Listening to the speech of the Minister of Finance a few days ago, looking into the faces of my hon. friends opposite, and observing that great barometer of public opinion, the press, I asked myself this morning: Is it too much to hope that at last the Canadian people have decided to stand shoulder to shoulder, to work together and advise together with the purpose of restoring to all classes confidence in the future of our country? That hope was somewhat weakened this afternoon by the amendment moved by my hon. friend the former Minister of Finance (Sir Henry Drayton).

The reforms we are attempting to introduce to-day are reforms long overdue. We have the statement of an hon. gentleman, once a supporter of the Union Government and the Conservative party, made in this House three years ago, that even then these reforms were long overdue. Therefore I had hoped that our hon. friend who had promised reforms so often and delayed them so often would upon this occasion help us in such legislation as would restore confidence and stability throughout every province.

My hon. friend, the ex-Minister of Finance, devoted the greater part of his speech to a criticism of the Government's measures for the reductions we had already promised, and he concluded by moving an amendment condemning us because we have not made greater reductions. In view of this attitude I asked myself: Is it to be the same old game which was started eleven years ago when the party of reform were divided and when Canada allowed to go by —I will not say to lose forever, but at least to delay for a period—those reforms which we had all sought to introduce since the days of Sir Charles Tupper?

My hon. friend in introducing his amendment attacks us for reductions in the tariff, and then complains that those reductions are not sufficient! In doing so he criticises the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), representing that during the last campaign my leader led the people to believe that the policy enunciated in the Liberal platform of 1919 would be introduced literally. Let us examine the facts. I have before me a copy of the proceedings of the National Liberal Convention held in Ottawa on August 5, 6 and 7, 1919, containing a verbatim report of the speech made by the Prime Minister of to-day when he accepted the leadership of the Liberal party. Let me quote from that speech so that my hon. friends opposite may judge for themselves whether or not the Prime Minister has broken any pledges to the people, or whether on the contrary he has not literally and truly carried out those pledges. I quote from page 199, as follows:

> I should be unworthy of any measure of the confidence you have so abundantly bestowed were I not fully conscious of my own lack of parliamentary experience, my own lack of training in public life, my own limitations in a thousand and one directions adequately to meet the obligations of this great duty, this great honour, which you have conferred. I should despair altogether of being able even to attempt to discharge its obligations were it not that I know that one who is called upon to accept the office of leadership must first and foremost be the willing servant of all, and that in seeking in the spirit of service to meet the wishes of those who have chosen him as their leader, he may look for guidance and counsel to the great forces assembled about him. . . . .
> I shall rely upon the counsel of those who are outstanding in the ranks of the party, the Liberal members of the Senate, the Liberals in the House of Commons, the leaders of the party in the several provinces, the representative men who are gathered together here; and that in this way I shall find a compass which will point the direction that ought to be taken, and will point it aright.

Sir, was not that statement repeated by the Prime Minister during the recent campaign when he visited all the provinces? He then stated that the resolutions adopted in the plaform of 1919 would be the chart directing him in the policy of the party, and that he would be supported and guided by the representatives that were sent to Parliament. That, Sir, is what we are doing to-day. We are going to-day just as fast as the people will allow us to go. And I ask you, Mr. Speaker, to remember that that has always been the policy of the Liberal party, and that when in 1911 we attempted to introduce the reforms asked for by the Western provinces we found we were going faster than the people were willing to follow us, and we went down to defeat because there was division where there should have been union. Are we to-day to have a union of the forces of reform in this Parliament, or are we again to be divided and again have the reforms which we are now seeking to introduce delayed for another decade?

Is this the time for division among our people? Is it not rather the time for union?

Four years of war with all its attendant extravagance has not only lost to Canada sixty thousand of her bravest men and crippled many other of her soldiers, but it has imposed upon the people an obligation to their fighting men and their dependents which we must not and have no desire to repudiate. But not only has it imposed upon the country that obligation and left us with an immense debt, it has brought extravagant habits. Not only is extravagance rampant in federal affairs, but also in provincial, municipal and private affairs, so that throughout the country there has been a period of extravagance that has contributed very much to the condition that we as a nation find ourselves in to-day.

During the war period fortunes were made and fortunes were lost. Capital was inflated, labour made its own price and selected its own job. But it was a period of intoxication. This, however, is the day after, the day when we must sit down together, we the representatives of the people, and consider what is the best method to restore to our country that confidence which we all desire to see restored.

We have recently had a general election. In that general election there may have been differences of policy, but there was one plank in the policy of all parties, —the National Liberal and Conservative party, the Progressive party, and the Liberal party—one plank upon which all were unanimous: we all appealed for economy, urging it as necessary if we were to save ourselves from national bankruptcy. And I think we all preached that we should have wider and larger and better markets for the products of the farm and the factory. We were divided, perhaps, to some extent on the question how these markets could best be obtained. There were those who thought that our market should be in Canada only and that we should pay attention to no others. There were those who had not very much regard for the Canadian market; they were looking only to a market in which they could sell their products. And there were others—those who are represented here to-day on this side of the House—who believed that in the interests of Canada we should not only help to build up a home market, but should go out and seek other markets for the products of our country. That, Sir, is the policy that we to-day are attempting to introduce to this Parliament. When my hon. friend says that we have failed to carry out all our promises, he conveniently forgets that not very long after we assumed office, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) went down to Washington and consulted the people there in a friendly way. He said: "Neighbour, we are prepared to trade with you upon a fair basis"; and the reply he received from the representatives of the United States was: "We cannot just now trade with you as you desire, because there is in our Congress a farmers' group who will have no business relations with the farmers of Canada". Under these conditions, Mr. Speaker, was it not well that we should by legislation say to our good friends of the United States: "If you take that attitude, we cannot help it; you are mistress in your own house; but we are mistress in ours, and we propose to introduce such legislation as will encourage trade with those who are willing to trade with us." That is the measure that we bring before you to-day. We do not claim that it is perfect, but we do claim that it is an honest attempt to lighten the burden upon those who can least afford to bear it, and to collect the necessary revenues from those who are best able to pay.

Now, what remedy does my hon. friend the ex-Finance Minister propose? His only remedy is by way of criticism of the Government because we did not further reduce the tariff and practically destroy—

Mr. MEIGHEN: Will my hon. friend permit me a question? Where does he find that in the resolution?

Mr. ROBB: The Leader of the Opposition will have an opportunity to speak in this debate, and I am sure he will analyze that resolution as he has analyzed other resolutions, to the satisfaction at least of his own party. May I remind him, however, that there is nothing original or new in the resolution presented to-day? Practically the same resolution was presented to this Parliament on the 28th of March last—a resolution embodying the same principles. Now, why is it that we look with longing eyes—and we may frankly admit it—to the great market to the south? Is it not because we know that in that great market there are millions of industrial workers who are dependent upon the products of the farm for the sustenance of life? Among those millions employed in the New England factories are hundreds of thousands of Canadians; if those Canadians were employed in Canadian factories there would be no hostile tariff keeping the products of Canadian farms away from them. So, I say, Mr. Speaker, having in mind the attitude of our friends in Washington, the one thing left for us and the one thing we should keep in view is to build up our own market and at least to keep something that we can call trade with other countries. But the United States is not the only market. Canada has other markets. Canada has a market in Great Britain. Great Britain buys freely from us, and we offer to her a preference in our tariff, in the hope, we may frankly put it, that Great Britain will offer still greater concessions to the products of Canada. Now, it is sometimes preached that the trade of Canada has been falling.

Mr. CRERAR: If my hon. friend would permit me a question there: Would he elucidate in what way Great Britain could offer greater concessions to Canada?

Mr. ROBB: Well, I have in mind just now that there is an embargo against Canadian cattle. We do not believe in the "big stick." We do not deny that Great Britain has the same right to manage her own affairs that Canada has. But we have reason to hope, and the press dispatches would indicate, that Great Britain may look favourably upon Canadian trade and that some day there may be a better market for Canadian cattle in the United Kingdom.

I was proceeding, Mr. Speaker, to point out to the House that to measure our exports and imports by dollars and cents is not a fair barometer to indicate the actual conditions. In these days of falling values it is not exactly fair to measure the increase or the decrease of exports in dollars and cents. I do not like to detain the House in quoting figures, but with your permission, and for the benefit of my hon. friends opposite and of the country, I should like to place on Hansard a few statistics prepared by the Bureau of Statistics regarding Canada's foreign trade. In 1921 we imported 17,000,000 odd pounds of coffee and chicory for which we paid over $4,000,000, and in 1922 we imported 21,000,000 pounds, which cost us only a little over $3,000,000. In 1921 we imported 98,000,000 pounds of raw cotton, which cost us $28,500,000, and in 1922 we imported 95,000,000 pounds at a cost of $16,000,000. In 1921 we imported 695,000,000 pounds of raw sugar costing us $76,000,000; in 1922 we imported 864,000,000 pounds, costing us $39,000,000; in other words, we imported 170,000,000 pounds more in 1922 than in 1921, at about half the cost.

Let us turn to the exports. In 1921 we exported 133,000,000 pounds of cheese, for which we were paid $37,000,000. In 1922 we exported practically the same quantity of cheese, but we received only $25,000,000 for it, or $12,000,000 less. The same argument applies to dried codfish and salmon. Coming now to wheat, we find that in 1921 we exported 129,000,000 bushels, for which we received $310,000,000; in 1922 we exported more wheat, 136,000,000 bushels, but we only received $179,000,000. The figures for flour are in the same proportion

What is the conclusion from all this? I am sure we all desire the progress and development of Canada, but if we are to progress and develop, it cannot be a lopsided development. If the factories in eastern Canada are idle and the workmen are unemployed, they are trouble-makers in the towns and cities; they have no money to buy the products of the farms, and the farmer suffers in consequence. If, on the other hand, the farmer on the prairies has a poor crop, or gets very little for himself and his family for that crop, if he is compelled to pay one-half the value of the crop to the railway for carrying it to market, and the other half to the hired man, he has no money to buy the products of the factory workers in eastern Canada. So I say we are all linked up together, and if we are to have progress and development in this country, it must be a progress and development that will not only help the worker who buys the products of the farm, but the farmer who buys the products of the factory. England was made great by her coal at a time when coal was fairly cheap. Coal in England to-day is not as cheap as it once was, but do you know, Mr. Speaker, that coal in England to-day is cheaper than it is in Canada, and that it is being offered in England to coal vessels on the coast of Nova Scotia? What cheap coal was to England cheap water-power is to Canada. We have great natural resources in this country, developed and undeveloped, and we have opportunities for development, if we only have confidence in our own country. Why should we not as Canadians decide that hereafter we will build tariffs and frame policies to suit Canada, that we will go out and trade with whoever is willing to trade with us on fair terms?—and in passing let me say that I was never afraid to trade with anybody who would trade with me. I am not willing, however, to reduce the Canadian tariff to a minimum, while the other fellow keeps his tariff up against our products. It seems to me that in considering the different resolutions in committee, when we shall have the benefit of the advice of all classes and of all groups represented in this Parliament, we might well keep in mind what is best for Canada, and let that be our chart.

My hon. friend the ex-Minister of Finance a few moments ago in discussing those features of the tariff just presented, and referring more particularly to the value of the German mark, attempted to represent that we were giving greater privileges to Germany than to the Mother Country. He apparently forgot that the Government still retains the right to the Marking Act, and that we still have the dumping clause. He also forgot that Germany cannot sell to Canada unless she is willing to buy from Canada. Germany cannot sell to any nation unless Germany buys, and if there is one country in the world the development of whose export trade depends on buying from other countries, it is Germany. I am not going to discuss the finer details now as they may be discussed later on when we are in committee, but for the information of the House I desire to indicate briefly the business of Canada with Germany. We will not go far back. Let us keep in mind that in 1913 Canada imported from Germany, in round figures, $14,000,000 worth of goods, and in the year of the war, 1914, $14,500,000 worth. We sold to Germany in 1913 only $3,000,000 worth, and in 1914 $4,000,000 worth. Coming to more recent years, we find that in 1921 we exported to Germany $8,000,000 worth of goods, as against $1,500,000 of imports, and in 1922, the last fiscal year, we imported from Germany $2,000,000 worth of goods, and sold to her $4,500,000 worth. Does my hon. friend wish to stop this export trade we have with Germany? Let me just give a few of the articles that we export to Germany. The principal items are asbestos of which we exported in 1922, $537,000 worth; lard, $102,000; nickel, $399,000; oats, $210,000; rye, $531,000; wheat, $1,580,000; wheat flour, $319,000.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I would like the hon. gentleman to explain why it is that Germany particularly requires to buy in order to sell. I would think it would be the other way about.

Mr. ROBB: Germany cannot sell unless she buys, because she has not the raw materials that Canada has, and she must go into the markets of the world to buy her raw materials. It is contended that through the expertness of her workers Germany in the past has led many of the countries of the world in turning raw materials into finished products.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Hear, hear.

Mr. ROBB: I am not going to enter upon an argument on that with my hon. friend. I have quoted sufficiently I think to show that it is not a one-sided trade arrangement. The figures show that in the last two years Canada sold more to Germany than Germany sold to us, and my thought would be, if Germany wants more of the products of the prairies, why should we not sell them to her? She cannot buy these products unless she buys them with Canadian dollars, at the Canadian value.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Who objects to that?

Mr. ROBB: If I am to keep my promise to economize time, I have already spoken too long. I appeal again to all members of this House to keep in mind that the Government have made a fair attempt to bring down a budget that will lighten the burden upon those least able to carry it and that will collect the revenues from those best able to pay; that the Government have made, and are making, a fair attempt to look out for wider and larger markets for the products of our country, always keeping in mind that the experience of the world shows that if Canada is to grow and prosper we must get down to such conditions in this country as will enable us to export to all the countries of the world who have money with which to buy our goods, thus bringing back money from those countries to employ additional Canadian labour. Thus, and thus only, can we enlarge and extend the trade of Canada.

Mr. R. J. WOODS (Dufferin): In continuing the debate, which is now fairly well on its way, I desire to make clear in opening my address that whatever commendation I feel I can give the Government in regard to the tariff question—because I purpose confining my remarks solely to that question—I am willing to give it, but I am just as free to offer whatever criticism I can honestly offer; and I desire to have it thoroughly understood that I am speaking entirely for myself, from my own observations of the fiscal policy of this country in years gone by.

The tariff has had some history. Every hon. member in this House is familiar, at least to a great extent, with the history of the tariff. We look back to 1865, when there was a general tariff of 15 per cent. The Mackenzie government came into office about 1873, and, as I understand it, increased that tariff to about 17½ per cent. I think I am correct in my figures; if not, I am open to correction. In the year 1878 the late Sir John A. Macdonald launched his national policy, and the tariff went up along general lines to about 30 per cent. From that time till the present, in every general election held in this country, the tariff question has been fully discussed; both sides have been argued out, and the people have viewed it from both sides to some extent, but in past years a great many of the common people, and especially, I think, the farmers of this country, in the back concessions, did not thoroughly investigate the fiscal policy of the country and the tariff question, but each settled down and was satisfied to support the policy of either of the great political parties, whichever their political leanings would lead them to.

We have three classes of tariff, the general tariff, the British preferential tariff and the intermediate tariff. These have different bearings on different articles to some extent, and the Finance Minister, in the policy that he has launched before the people of this country and before this House has made some slight alterations. We have been looking for a downward revision of the general tariff, for something that would make it a little easier for the poor man to live. It is true we have that downward revision to some extent. The Finance Minister in his Budget has given us a little reduction of the tariff, not very much so far as the general tariff is concerned—something pertaining to agricultural implements and so forth, which, if we have to purchase from a foreign country, undoubtedly will be purchased from the United States. So that we have a little handed out to us; we might call it possibly something of a handout. Of course, a thankful heart is thankful for small mercies, and half a loaf is better than no bread. But the reductions which have been brought before us are more particularly reductions in the preferential tariff. That tariff will apply to those goods coming from Great Britain, and we are glad that there is a slight reduction, even along those lines. But does that cover to any great extent the general commodities of life? Does it cover to any great extent what the masses of people use in their homes, what we might term the general commodities that are used by the common people? I have in my hand the report of the Department of Trade and Commerce for the year ending 31st March, 1921, and I find that the dutiable imports from the United Kingdom amount to $170,135,906, and from the United States $544,010,980. So that the dutiable goods coming in from Great Britain, in comparison with the amounts brought in from the United States, are very little over one-quarter. If nearly 75 per cent of the general commodities of life which are dutiable, and which have added to the customs revenues of Canada come from United States, the people who use those commodities are not going to be benefited to such a wonderful extent with the reduction of the preferential tariff.

While we have those reductions in the tariff, we are told that the sales tax is to be increased by fifty per cent. If I, as a green parliamentarian, am right in my judgment, and understand the business of this country to any extent, I understand that a sales tax is an added burden to the consumer. As regards the inland revenue or sales tax or other taxes of that character, when the manufacturer or producer puts his commodity on the market, he will simply add the sales tax to the price, and the cost to the consumer will be thereby increased. That seems to me to be rather unfair to the consuming masses of this country. While this tax will undoubtedly bring in a revenue, yet it seems to be collecting that revenue largely from those who are least able to pay. I think my hon. friend (Mr. Robb) made reference to the idea of taxing those who are best able to pay, but in my judgment, by increasing the sales tax by fifty per cent, we are adding that much more to the burden of the consuming masses of this country, and I do not look upon them as being the best able to pay. Taxes of that character should be collected largely from those who are best able to pay, and not from the ordinary individual who is least able to pay. Therefore, on the one hand, while we may, by the reduction in the tariff, relieve, to some extent, the burden, on the other, an extra burden is imposed by the increased sales tax. This looks as though we were simply taking the burden off one shoulder and placing it on the other.

Another matter to which I wish to refer is the anti-dumping clause. This seems to be of some assistance to Canadian manufacturers by increasing the value of their goods. The anti-dumping clause, as I understand it, applies to goods, possibly cheap goods, that are put on the market from a foreign country, and by this clause they are not permitted to be sold at less than cost of manufacture and so forth in the country from which they are exported. I see, from the report of the Manufacturers' Association of their meeting in this city in February last, that they are in favour of a strong anti-dumping regulation that will guard against unseasonable goods being dumped into this country. In some countries in which the seasons are ahead of ours, goods may be carried in stock by manufacturers and wholesalers when the season has practically expired, and this will apply possibly more to ladies' wear than other things. By this anti-dumping clause, manufacturers and wholesalers are prevented from putting such goods on the market unless they are sold at the regular price of production and so forth in the country of origin at the time when the goods were sent over. It appears to me to be unfair to deprive the masses, the common people, of an opportunity of purchasing in the open market. If Canadian merchants can buy to advantage, bring the goods into this country and sell them at a reduced price to the consuming masses, those who wear clothes—and we are all subject to that—it seems to be unfair to protect manufacturers and wholesalers along those lines, instead of giving the common people the benefit of reductions that might take place.

I want to itemize a few articles in connection with the tariff, and if I am wrong, I am willing to be corrected in regard to anything which I may mention. Aluminum, the raw material, ingots, blocks, bars, rods, strips, and so forth, are permitted to come into this country free. Every household uses aluminum ware, which is considered a very good article for household use, and the ladies buy it very extensively; indeed, everyone in this country uses that kind of ware. The manufactured article, however, is protected by a general tariff of 30 per cent and by a preferential tariff to the Old Country of 20 per cent. That seems to be too great a spread. We want to give everyone justice; we want to live and let live; but it seems to be hardly fair when manufacturers are permitted to bring in their raw material free and to manufacture it in this country, and then the manufactured goods are protected by a tariff of from 20 to 30 per cent.

As regards bamboo cane for furniture, the raw material comes in free, but furniture is taxed from 20 to 30 per cent. Raw broom corn for making brooms comes in free, but brooms and whisks are taxed from 15 to 20 per cent. These are articles which are used in every home: the labourers, the poorer classes, and, indeed, all of us, use these articles, and, therefore, are subject to the burden of taxation upon these commodities. Consequently, I consider it hardly fair to the consumer for the manufacturer to have the privilege of bringing in his raw material free to manufacture these goods to be placed in the homes of the people, and then for him to be protected by a high tariff. Steel and steel wire are brought in free, and nails are taxed from 50 to 60 cents per 100 pounds. We hear a great deal about the necessity of building and making accommodation in our great cities for the common people, for the labouring people. Nails are something that go into building construction, yet while the raw material is permitted to come in free, the nails that go into our houses are taxed as I have stated.

We are told about the protection that the farmer gets, and I want now to refer to oats. The farmers are protected by a tariff of 10 cents a bushel on oats. We are not asking for that protection. Corn is shipped into this country free of duty, and I do not know that Canadian farmers have ever raised any protest against the importation of free corn from the United States. That corn is put on the market in this country to compete with the coarse grain that we grow. We have, however, no complaint about its coming in free; we find no fault. We are willing to buy from other countries and we are willing to sell; we are willing to stand by open competition and by the world's markets. A tariff, however, of ten cents a bushel is put on oats to protect the farmers of this country. Now, almost every individual, rich or poor, high or low, is a consumer of oatmeal, and the man who manufactures the oats into oatmeal is protected to an extent of 60 cents per 100 pounds. Therefore, while the farmer is given a protection of 10 cents a bushel on oats, the miller is protected to the extent of 60 cents per hundred. Ten cents a bushel would amount to only 30 cents per hundred, or just half the protection afforded the man who produces the oatmeal for human consumption. There seems to be an injustice in that regard.

Now, as regards clothing: woollen goods, worsted, etc., come in under the British preferential tariff at 30 per cent, and a reduction is now made of 2½ per cent. But the general tariff on these goods is 35 per cent. Clothing is a universal necessity; and these goods are needed by the common people as much as by any others. Yet the home manufacturers are given a protection of 27½ per cent under the preferential tariff and 35 per cent under the general tariff. This is another article in regard to which the tariff is unsatisfactory, for it is unfair to the ordinary consumer, to the masses of the people, and, in a word, to every one who buys clothing of this description.

Let me now refer to automobiles. There was a time, when they were first introduced some years ago, when they were looked upon as a luxury which could be afforded only by the rich. To-day, however, they can no longer be considered in that light. Almost every one who can possibly raise the money to buy an automobile feels that it is practically a necessity. At any rate, if it is not a real necessity it is a great convenience to all classes of the community. Automobile parts come in free. In other words, automobiles can be brought into the country free of duty if the separate parts are brought in individually; while, I understand, the tax on the assembled car is 35 per cent. As I construed the remarks of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding), I took it that the changes in the tariff in this respect had reference to conditions as they exist on the farm. I presume that people coming in from the United States to settle in this country can bring in their farm implements and automobiles free of duty; but this privilege does not extend to any one who goes over from Canada to the United States and buys an automobile which he brings back. Such a purchaser, as I understand the law, has to pay the duty of 35 per cent; and there is an excise tax, I believe, of 5 to 10 per cent added according to the value of the automobile. Now, I may be somewhat crude in my calculations, but if I understand the thing at all clearly, that excise tax will be so much more added to the cost of the automobile, although it will undoubtedly bring in so much more revenue to the treasury. Let us look into this automobile question for a moment. You can buy a Ford car in Detroit for $348. Of course, the sales tax, exchange, etc., must be added, but the actual f.o.b. price of the automobile in Detroit at the Ford works is $348, as I have stated. Thirty-five per cent on that is $121.80. So that when you go to Detroit and buy that car and bring it into Canada that $121.80 goes into the revenues of this country. A Ford automobile is sold f.o.b. Ford, Ontario, according to the company's own advertisement which I took from one of the Ottawa newspapers, at $535. The Ford car bought in Detroit, Michigan, costs only $348 net, and even when you add the tax of $121.80 to that price it is not as high as the price you pay for the car at Ford, Ontario. Possibly, however, when you have taken into account the exchange and one thing and another you may be able to get the same car a trifle cheaper in Ford, Ontario, than in Detroit, Michigan. But here is the point I want to emphasize: If they can manufacture a car in the Ford works at Detroit for $348 net, they ought to be able to manufacture it in Ford, Ontario, at practically the same cost. And when you pay $535 for the car at Ford, Ontario, the difference between that price and the smaller amount you pay at Detroit does not go into the revenue of the country, but into Henry Ford's pocket. It seems to me, therefore, that there is room for a readjustment of things along these lines that would make for improvement generally.

I shall now refer for a moment to the question of drawbacks. Let me say at once that I am not favourable to drawbacks, and I do not see why they should be allowed. I do not see why manufacturers should not pay a duty on some of the raw material that they bring into the country even if they do reship the finished product to the country from which they got that raw material. I do not think it is at all right that they should be given a drawback of 99 per cent of the duty they pay on the raw material when it comes into the country. In the year 1921 no less a sum than $12,839,914.41 was paid in the way of drawbacks; and in addition to that, according to the Auditor General's report, the sum of $71,000 was expended on paid investigators who were charged with looking into the system of drawbacks. Now, it appears to me that instead of returning to our manufacturers nearly $13,000,000, or 99 per cent of the duty they have paid on their importations of raw material, that money should be retained in the exchequer. In a word, I am opposed to the drawback system.

We are told that our farmers are protected, that in building up our manufacturing industries we are building up a home market for our farm products. But, as I view it, so long as we farmers produce a great deal more than we consume we must sell our surplus products in the markets of the world. While it is true that there may be comparatively few farmers in close proximity to our large manufacturing centres where they can sell their products direct to local consumers, the great majority have to place their products on the open market and meet the competition of the world. This is borne out by our exportations of farm products for 1920, when we sent abroad vegetable products to the value of $482,924,672 and animal products to the value of $188,359,937. So long, then, as we produce more than we consume, it appears to me that it is misleading to speak of our agriculturists as having a protected home market; obviously they must sell their surplus in markets where they face competition from other countries. We are not complaining of that condition of affairs, but we feel that our manufacturers ought also to be able to compete in the markets of the world.

Now, I want to draw the attention of the Government to some of the statements made by the Prime Minister of to-day during his western tour in 1920. I am not going to express an opinion as to whether the budget really carries out the promises contained in those statements; I leave it to the Government themselves to answer the question. I am quoting from the Canadian Annual Review for 1920. Speaking at Victoria, B.C., on September 28, the Prime Minister's speech is thus reported:

> The Leader started by describing this as a period of transition; he expressed a fear that the war had made the rich richer and the poor poorer; he considered the present situation one in which there were forces of might and greed and power on the one hand, and forces of ampler freedom on the other.

Of his speech at Edmonton, I find the Review has the following:

> He traced a great similarity between the Liberal and Agrarian party policies: "They are alike in that they stand for freer trade, not for free trade; they are alike in that they aim for freedom rather than restriction in matters of trade; they are alike in that they would rather reduce than increase the burdens of taxation which are imposed upon industry and upon the people by a custom tariff."

And again, in the course of the same speech:

> "We believe that the tariff as at present existing needs revision, and that in this revision we unquestionably would wish to be guided by due regard to the position and legitimate needs of all branches of our national industries; we feel that a downward revision of the tariff, and, in some instances, its complete elimination should be immediately effected."

At Wetaskiwin the hon. gentleman is reported as stating:

> "We demand a revision downward, certain classes of articles to be substantially reduced, such as food, clothing, boots and shoes and other articles which enter into the home."

I am going to leave the Government to decide for themselves whether or not the Budget carries out what was stated by the Prime Minister on those occasions.

It appears to me that the fiscal policy of this country is a dual policy, in that it permits our great manufacturing firms to bring in their raw materials practically free and protects their finished products. In other words, they stand for free trade so far as the importation of their raw materials is concerned—for in looking over the list I find that there are over 1,000 articles on the free list, and those articles largely enter into their manufactured goods. So that it looks as though we had a dual fiscal policy that stood for permitting the rich men—because I look upon the manufacturers of this country as belonging to the rich class—to bring in their raw materials free of duty, while at the same time the finished product is protected to such an extent that the great masses of the people are taxed for the benefit of the manufacturers. I think there should be some alteration made in that system. That is, if we are going to continue to have a high protective tariff for the finished products, I think the raw material imported for their finished products should be taxed. In that way we would add to our revenues. Either that alteration should be made, or there should be a great reduction in the tariff on the finished products which have to be bought by the masses of the people who of course have to pay this tariff in the added cost of their purchases.

This policy of protection not only affects the farmers, but it affects our business men, our retailers in our cities, towns and villages, in this way. The higher the price of the goods to the retailers, the higher price they have to charge their customers, and on the whole I do not think our retailers are making fortunes out of their business. We want our retail men to live, but they have got to add to the actual cost of the goods their overhead expenses, and the consumer has ultimately to shoulder the whole burden. So that the higher the price of the goods, the less goods the retailer will sell; the less he sells, the smaller his percentage of profit. The high price of goods, therefore, militates against all classes of the community.

In conclusion, I wish to give one striking illustration of the point that I have been trying to make. In the fall of 1920 the manufacturers of agricultural implements increased the retail prices of binders by about 20 per cent. An implement dealer for the Massey-Harris firm in a little town close to where I live and do business, sold fifteen Massey-Harris binders in 1920, before the price went up; in 1921, after the increase, he sold only one. You can see, therefore, that the increase in the price militated against that man in his business. In 1920 he had his percentage of profit on the sale of fifteen binders; in 1921 he had the percentage on only one. So that these conditions affect not only the farmers, but the masses of the people, the consumers of the country. And that is the result of a protective tariff that makes the rich man richer and the poor man poorer.

Mr. ONESIPHORE TURGEON (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, my genial friend the ex-Minister of Finance (Sir Henry Drayton), in opening the debate this afternoon, extended his congratulations to our present esteemed Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) on the succinct budget speech which he delivered on Tuesday last. I wish also to express to the Minister of Finance my sincere appreciation of his long career and of the fact that he has so well set forth in his budget the present conditions of our country and the provision we must make for the future. I recall the fact that when the present Minister of Finance took office with the Liberal Party in 1896, he found the affairs of the country in a similar dilapidated state, but with his vision of the future he was able, during the years that his party were in power, to make of Canada one of the most prosperous countries of the world. That prosperity, continuing from year to year, was felt by the workingman, the fisherman, the lumberman, the school teacher—all classes of wage earners in the country. I felt the other day when he was delivering his speech that with his vision of the future we may now commence to prepare for the enjoyment of a degree of prosperity which will recall the conditions which existed during the former regime of the Liberal party. When the effects of the war have become less burdensome I am confident that conditions will be such that every one of us, every Canadian who was at the front as well as all those who contributed to the maintenance of our soldiers, will feel impelled to give credit to the veteran financier of Canada, the present Minister of Finance.

It is evident that the budget speech delivered the other day does not altogether meet with the approval of many hon. members who sit in front of me. Under present conditions it is impossible to bring about a state of prosperity in the course of a few days. If I were to lean unguardedly upon my economic proclivities and tendencies, the budget is not one which I would like to have. But in that budget we see at once the wisdom of the Minister of Finance. We see that he has estimated the true conditions prevailing in Canada and throughout the world, and I am sure that when the conditions following upon the war have disappeared, we shall have a return of that prosperity which we enjoyed in past years. It is my view, however, that in the preparation of the budget, in the statement of the economic conditions under which the country is to be administered in the future, the Minister of Finance, whoever he may be, should always at least keep in sight the free trade beacon, the only light which will guide the ship of state through tortuous channels and along rocky shores to the haven of prosperity, contentment and happiness. But the Minister of Finance has adopted all measures which, according to his judgment and in view of the critical condition of the country, could reasonably be expected. Any revision he has made of the tariff has been downward, according to the principle which I cherish for the betterment of Canada and of the world. If we cannot immediately enjoy the prosperity which we had during the previous years when my hon. friend was minister of finance in the Laurier administration, it is only because conditions throughout the world and the aspirations of nations have changed. In 1911, when my hon. friend proposed a measure destined to bring about the greatest degree of prosperity and happiness on the part of the Canadian people, he was not charged by his opponents with having not well administered the country during the preceding fifteen years, but he was told that he should "leave well enough alone"; that we had been enjoying so much prosperity that it would be dangerous to go further. Owing to circumstances which I do not wish to recall—circumstances which are the occasion of sorrow and regret on the part of many of our people—the reciprocity pact, proposed by the Liberal party of that day and accepted by the American people in the form of an enactment on their statute book, was rejected by the majority of the people of Canada. At once we saw the industry and commerce of Canada decline in every direction from its prosperity to a state of dilapidation. To-day we are faced with the fact that the United States has turned her back on us and refused to put into operation the reciprocity pact of 1911. But it is to the greatest honour of my hon. friend the Minister of Finance, in my judgment of the conditions of the country and looking to the future, that on taking office, notwithstanding the adverse conditions, he made his way to Washington and again offered to the President of the American republic the means whereby the two countries could come into mutual agreement and restore the reciprocity pact of 1911, or something equivalent under present conditions. One may think, because that step did not meet with immediate success, that everything has been lost to Canada, but for the fact alone that the step was taken, impelled not only by his consideration of the future happiness of Canada, but by her future relations with the United States, facing as the two countries do the oriental problem which makes a mutual understanding highly desirable—for that fact alone he is to be commended to present and future generations, and I personally wish to express my admiration for what he has done. In a satisfactory solution of that problem is bound up the happiness of the western hemisphere and of the great nations of Japan, China, and the Pacific Islands. Great Britain, under the beneficent smile of Providence, and by the power of her love beaming across the seas, has been able to unite her millions of subjects on every shore into one common soul, as was witnessed on the outbreak of war in 1914 when the people of her world-wide empire sprang to the common defence, impelled every one by an invisible power, the love and admiration of the British Crown which they were bound to save for the maintenance of Christianity and the happiness of the world. Likewise Canada in the near future, with the breadth of her love mingled with the democratic sentiments of the people of the American Republic, will instill in the minds of those oriental people, in their very soul and heart, sentiments of humanity, which alone will be able to bring peace to the world. Patriotism alone is not enough, patriotism must be fortified by considerations of humanity; and it must be learned and remembered that the word of the scriptures: Do unto others as ye would that they should do unto you, applies not alone to individuals, but as between nation and nation. I say that this step taken by the Minister of Finance in going to Washington will certainly contribute to bringing the people of the United States to a better appreciation of the Canadian people, and it has already been vindicated by the change in public opinion of the people of the United States. Six or eight months ago one would have thought that the Fordney measure, promulgated by those extra-protectionists in the United States, was about to come into force. It passed Congress in a few days, but the Senate has not yet passed it, and day by day more difficulties are being met with by these extra-protectionists who inspired the farmers of the United States with the idea that they should keep out the farm products of every other country. The people now find that they have been deceived by this extra-protectionist doctrine, and to-day there are difficulties in the way of enacting the measure. After all, it may not be adopted, and it may be the pleasure and the happiness of the Minister of Finance before many months, perhaps when we come back next session, to say that he has been treated differently by the American people, and that he is in a position to propose some trade relations with the United States which will eliminate from the present budget those extra tariffs of which my hon. friend has complained—and I do not altogether find fault with him for doing so, but we must have the prospect of the future relations between Canada and the United States in mind. Only the day before the Minister of Finance presented his budget, I read of an event in New York which ought to inspire confidence in the heart of every Canadian. On the 22nd of May, the executive committee of the American Bankers' Association, a body which undoubtedly commands respect in the United States and in this and every other country, made a declaration to the people of Canada, which I shall read as it justifies the step the Minister of Finance took some three or four months ago.

> We declare our faith in the value of a closer community of interest between the United States and our great neighbor, Canada. These two countries constitute the greatest geographical union of English-speaking people in the world. There is a natural unity of purpose, unity of political ideals and unity of business interests between the two that should be emphasized rather than obscured by the border line between them. We bespeak from American business, American banking and American public development of friendship between the two.

Such is the declaration of one of the greatest commercial and financial bodies of the United States with respect to Canada.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

After Recess

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. TURGEON: When the House rose at six o'clock, Mr. Speaker, I was about to discuss the public debt and the question of taxation. The hon. Minister of Finance in his budget statement showed that during the last fiscal year although there was an apparent surplus of $33,125,000, expenses on capital account, cost of loan flotations and demobilization have increased the public debt by $86,417,000. The income tax and business profits tax showed an increase of only $14,000,000 odd, and the Minister of Finance told us that he expects a shortage of $40,000,000 on the income tax for the current year, which will not surprise any of us when we realize the industrial depression through which Canada, in common with the rest of the world, is passing. The estimated revenue for the current year is $332,629,000—a very large amount compared with our revenues in pre-war years—with an expenditure of $466,983,000, besides supplementary estimates yet to come, but which no doubt owing to the rigid economy which is being practised by the Government will not add very substantially to this total. If we add to that estimated expenditure the railway deficits to be provided for, we must realize the wisdom of the minister's appeal to the country for the practice of rigid economy.

In common with my hon. friend, the Minister of Finance, I fear that the people at large, having been so long accustomed to think in millions and billions during and since the war, have not yet appreciated to its full extent the necessity of economy. Perhaps some of our people are inclined to think that the country can continue to shoulder further deficits and obligations without limit, but it is time for them to realize that we are now in a period of transition, and must face the alternative of bankruptcy or prosperity, according to whether we are prepared to restrict ourselves to only absolutely expenditure or to continue to indulge in our war-time extravagance.

As is well known, our chief competitors in the manufacture of farm implements are our friends to the south, and although it may be a subject of complaint on the part of some people that the Minister of Finance has not made a very substantial reduction in the tariff on farm implements from Great Britain, it must be remembered that we can manufacture these implements in sufficient quantities and at as low a price as that at which they can be imported from the Old Country. Perhaps no one in this Parliament is more anxious to have the fullest possible freedom of trade between Canada and the other parts of the Empire. I have always supported the British preference, and I would view with pleasure such an increase in the preference as would eventually lead to perfect freedom of trade with the Mother Country. But this is not practicable under present world conditions, and again we have to admit that the Minister of Finance could not well go much further than he has done in the generous extension that he has made in the British preference. The development of trade with Great Britain would not only reduce the price of many of our commodities, but it would provide return cargoes for our merchant marine, and furthermore increase our railway traffic, which of course would reduce our railway deficits considerably, and it is conceivable that with our railway traffic increased to a sufficient degree our railways would not only be able to meet their expenses of operation but show a surplus.

I sympathize with the farmers of the West if they feel that they are not getting perhaps all that they had expected from this budget, but they must realize that this is only a beginning undertaken under the worst possible industrial and financial conditions in the history of our country, and under the circumstances I am sure they will be prepared to accept this budget as an earnest intent of what the Government will do as conditions improve. As I said this afternoon, the time will soon come when we will be able to promote greater freedom of trade with our neighbours to the south. Already public opinion there is veering around in favour of removing restrictions on trade between the two countries, and I fully believe that eventually the farmers of the West will get every reciprocal advantage which the United States can offer them.

The reduction on farm implements may not be regarded as a very large one, but it applies to all the articles needed by the farmer for the maintenance of himself and his family, and, taken in a general way, I think it will be found that the result of all these small reductions will be a great benefit to the farmer. Many other commodities besides what the farmer may require are either placed on the free list or reduced to a very great extent.

The fishing industry has been well looked after by the Minister of Finance in his budget. This is an industry which has not perhaps received the consideration it merits from the people of Canada. The value of the product of the fisheries is about $60,000,000 annually, and that is of the same economic value to the country as $60,000,000 worth of farm products, because all these products are food for the people. The operations connected with the fisheries help us in the maritime provinces to keep our young people at home. It is therefore greatly to the benefit of the large families which we have in the maritime provinces that this industry should prosper—as it is, of course, a benefit to the country at large. The toiler of the sea deserves just as much consideration from the people as the tiller of the soil, and when the Minister of Finance reduces the taxation on many of the things required by the fishermen he is doing something which our fishermen have been waiting for and which, I am sure, will be approved by the people of Canada generally. The fishermen in the maritime provinces are taking new courage. Their industry has recently been given an impetus by the building of a large number of gasoline boats for the carrying on of their operations. In the harbour of Shippigan there are sixty or sixty-five gasoline boats, each manned by three or four fishermen, engaged in bringing in the product of the sea and thus helping to reduce the cost of living. The minister has effected a reduction in the duty on gasoline required for the boats of the fishermen, and that is a great benefit to them. If there is one man who spontaneously expresses his appreciation of this action on the part of the minister, it is the humble representative of the county of Gloucester, the largest fishing constituency in New Brunswick, second only in the maritime provinces to that of my hon. friend from Lunenburg (Mr. Duff). The fishermen of Gloucester and of all the maritime provinces, as well as those of the British Columbia coast, who, no doubt, also require encouragement in the development of their industry, will appreciate this reduction. There is no doubt that in the aggregate the cost of production of the necessities of life and, as a consequence, the cost of living, will be considerably decreased as a result of these provisions of the budget.

The lumber industry has also received consideration at the hands of the minister. I would like to mention also the benefit which will result from the reduction from $9 to $2.40 a gallon on alcohol for medical and surgical treatments. The druggists have had to pay $9 on every gallon of alcohol they used in medicinal preparations, not for the landlords or the millionaires of Toronto or Montreal, but for the masses of the people, for the carrying on of surgical operations and for use in hospitals, both civil and military, in every province. These differences in prices will be of great benefit to the tiller of the soil as well as the toiler of the sea. The farmer of the West will benefit to a greater extent, perhaps, than he has realized. Surgical and hospital treatment is expensive in the prairie provinces and the beneficial effect of this reduction will be very much felt. Every druggist in my own town has called upon me and spoken of the difficulties to which he was subjected owing to the false interpretation by the public of their motive in charging these high prices, and it was my duty to tell them that when the next budget came down I was confident the Minister of Finance would give this matter consideration. I wish now to convey to the minister the thanks of the whole population of the county of Gloucester; and I am sure the people all over the country will have the same feeling.

Some of the farmers of the West may not be satisfied, I know, with the additional sales tax which the minister proposes. But the necessity for this tax has arisen out of war conditions; it was really a tax imposed on the people of Canada to meet the expenses of the war. It will, of course, bear equally on all classes of the people, but let us all as Canadians and as British subjects remember that but for the winning of the war, instead of being happy British subjects to-day, we would be German slaves. Therefore, each and every one of us should bear willingly his share of the taxation necessitated by the war.

I know that some people with different economic views would suggest different sources of taxation. Hon. members who have been here in past parliaments have heard my pronouncements on other sources of taxation. A plank in the Farmers' platform has been the taxation of land values. I am in favour of that mode of taxation, and I am sorry to say that for the last three or four years I have been alone in this Parliament in developing the idea of the taxation of land values in this country. I had expected last year, and again this afternoon when I saw my hon. friend from Dufferin (Mr. Woods) rise, to hear an appeal for the taxation of land values. If my hon. friend had made such an appeal this afternoon, I would have seconded him in an effort to educate the people of Canada to the benefit of such a mode of taxation. Of course, the Minister of Finance was not in a position to introduce the taxation of land values at the present moment because the people of this country have not been sufficiently educated to accept it, but having given it years of consideration I am convinced it would be a great benefit to this country. If it were only introduced as a special tax for the reduction and elimination of the war debt, we could realize a large amount from it, and it would save to the people of this country an enormous sum in the aggregate in the interest we are now paying on the war debt. We are already paying interest on a debt of two billion dollars, and in fourteen or fifteen years time we shall have paid in interest an amount equal to the whole war debt, and every score of years thereafter we shall go on paying the like amount and succeeding generations after us, unless we start now to reduce the debt. I hope the people will come to realize in another year or two, and the day cannot come too soon for me, that it would be a splendid thing for this country to follow the example of France and impose special taxation to be applied to the reduction and elimination of the war debt. In 1870 France was placed under an immense war debt to Germany and given a number of years in which to pay it off. The people of France imposed special taxes on themselves and paid off in the course of three or four years that whole debt, which in the ordinary course of events would have taken them thirty or forty or fifty years to pay off. I know the time has not yet come in this country, but I cannot allow this opportunity to pass without suggesting the taxation of land values for the purpose of the reduction and elimination of the war debt, and I appeal more particularly to the Liberal and Progressive members of Parliament, because it has been a plank in the Progressive platform.

[Mr. Turgeon.]

We are warned by hon. members on the other side not to follow the convention platform of 1919. Are we in a position to-day to put that platform into effect? We have made a start, and we can do it by degrees, just as the Minister of Finance in 1896 gradually brought the country to the fifteen years' prosperity of which I spoke this afternoon. I hope that the Minister of Finance will consider every possible means of restoring happiness and contentment to the people of Canada, but the happiness and prosperity of a country can never be attained without raising to its greatest possible limit the purchasing power of the nation, and by that I mean the purchasing power of the fisherman, the farmer, the labourer, the professional man and all classes of people. Unfortunately, the first thing we hear of, in trying to bring about that happiness, is the cry: Decrease the wages, decrease the salaries, and then decrease the freight rates. I say that we should commence by increasing production; open up every possible avenue of production and every possible channel of distribution, which is as essential as production itself. The purchasing power of the people is the custodian of industry. Keep the people employed every day in the year, give them a wage corresponding to the cost of living, and you will keep the wheels of industry turning, and the labouring man will be able to buy the products of Canada in preference to imported products.

9 p.m.

Before leaving this question of the tariff and taxation, I refer with pleasure to the appeal of the Minister of Finance at the conclusion of his budget speech the other day, for unity and harmony between capital and labour. The principles of humanity which must guide both capital and labour have been so well defined in that book entitled "Industry and Humanity" that I will not attempt to add one word. It is an admirable expose of those principles and should be introduced in every home in Canada and given all possible publicity. It should be read not only by every labourer and capitalist, but by everybody, because the principles contained therein are well enunciated and would appeal to the ordinary intelligence of the people of Canada. If those principles are well applied, a new world of contentment, happiness and prosperity will be created.

The question of railways and the question of immigration go together. We need immigration and we need railways, to assist our immigration, and we must select the immigrants who will settle on the farms, or who will help the farmers already settled in the country. We do not require any additions to the labourers in the city for some time yet, until conditions become normal, because immigration in that direction would only tend to aggravate unemployment. Let the Minister of Immigration (Mr. Stewart) follow the policy which he has enunciated in Parliament, and bring only that class of immigrants, and I am sure they will find happiness and prosperity when they come here, and that is the best advertisement we can possibly send to Great Britain or to the Scandinavian people in the future. If we make our immigrants happy and contented at once, and they report their happiness and contentment to their families and neighbours whom they have left, a larger number of people will come to Canada, and that will contribute to the prosperity of our country.

Our railways are in a serious condition owing, perhaps, to the fact that they have deficits, and we must expect those deficits for a certain number of years, although I hope there will soon be a marked decrease in them. The people of Canada today are looking upon government administration of our railway system with apprehension, and those in favour of government operation cannot promise success for some time to come. Some people in Canada represented by, perhaps, men of the higher finance are utterly opposed to government ownership. Only a few railways have succeeded under private operation. I respect the views and the principles of those who are totally opposed to government operation, as well as the views of those who are in favour of it. During the last fifty years, since I have had some knowledge of railways, I have always believed that a certain mileage of the railroads should be under government operation if, for nothing else, than to afford competition between government lines and privately owned lines, in order that the people may not be oppressed by heavy freight rates imposed by private corporations in control of the roads. I respect and sympathise with the opposition to government operation of a great many of our colleagues on both sides of the House. Meanwhile, whether we favour government operation or private operation, we have to do the best we can in the situation which has been imposed on the Liberal party and upon the country.

I will not find fault with either party on account of the situation to-day. It is known to the people of Canada. But let us consider what we have to do under these circumstances. The Government have decided to give government operation of the Canadian National Railways the fairest kind of a trial. We must give them every possible chance, and do it seriously and honestly, or not at all. If we can make public ownership a success and if we can ameliorate the condition of the people of Canada, we will certainly have rendered a great service. I have great faith in the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Railways (Mr. Kennedy). Members who know me in this Parliament will realize that I speak my convictions, and if I did not have confidence in those ministers, I would say so. The present Minister of Railways is a man of large commercial and financial experience, and his heart and soul are in the business he has undertaken, which is for the benefit of the country, and, perhaps, for his own glory. We can only decrease those deficits from year to year by the selection of men not only of good reputation, but of high intellect in the business world; and men, particularly in the various eastern divisions, possessing railway experience and capacity. These men will be able to make a success of government operation of Canadian roads.

Of course, there is one company that is held up before the public as an example by all those who have confidence only in private ownership and operation. It is the great Canadian Pacific Railway Company. That company, no doubt, has deservedly won the admiration of the people of Canada and of the world; but in a sense also, it has been generously treated by the people of Canada, by having been given immense tracts of land which, if they belonged to this Dominion, would be a great asset to us. These grants covered the expense of the first construction of the road. We have been told that the Transcontinental has cost $160,000,000. If we had put in reserve for the payment of the Transcontinental one-half the quantity of land that was given to the Canadian Pacific, we would have realized over $200,000,000, and the Transcontinental would not have cost a dollar of money to the people of Canada, because the land would have covered the cost. Therefore, I say that while Lord Shaughnessy, Mr. Beatty and all their staff may deserve the admiration of the people of Canada, after all, if we grant them all their virtues, possibilities and potentialities, in the exercise of their qualities and virtues they are only human beings; and if the Canadian Pacific can always find human beings to come, one after another, and manage their railway, the Government, the nation of Canada surely ought to be able to find human beings of equal potentialities and possibilities to manage the Canadian National Railways in such a way as at least to give them a fair trial. These people are not angels dropped down from heaven for the purpose of operating the Canadian Pacific; they have acquired their virtues by the development of their energies. Let the men whom the Minister of Railways (Mr. Kennedy) will select, put forth the same energy and effort, and I am sure they will also succeed in a very short time, if not in making a great success of the Canadian Natonal Railways, in at least in giving the people of Canada an equally advantageous service to that of any private corporation.

Many experiments will, of course, have to be made. When the hon. member for St. John city (Mr. Baxter), who, I regret, is not in his seat at present, spoke on that subject a few days ago, he advised the Minister of Railways and the members of the board that the minister has to select, to work in close harmony with the Canadian Pacific, and thereby, as he thought, ensure the successful operation of the two roads. I hope and I wish that the members of the board whom the Minister of Railways will select, will be possessed of all the virtues of harmony and co-operation, and they will certainly at times receive advice as regards efficiency of operation, labour and other matters. But I must tell the hon. member for St. John city and the people of Canada that those same members of the board whom the Minister of Railways will select, will also require to be endowed with a strong power of resistance against the natural cupidity of the private owner. The private owner will look after his interest first of all; that cannot be otherwise. Therefore, while we want co-operation, we want also a certain distance between the two boards, so that each of them may give the best possible service to their enterprise and to the public.

When Sir Wilfrid Laurier and the Liberal party in 1904 proposed to the people of Canada the construction of the Transcontinental, which was destined, if not diverted from its proper function, to bring about the prosperity of the West more particularly, and also that of the East, and to bring the products of the West from Winnipeg by the natural channel to Quebec, the Canadian Pacific opposed that project with all the force they could bring to bear against Sir Wilfrid Laurier and the Liberal party. I remember also that, when the Conservative party came into power, Canadian Pacific officials were the first to induce the Conservative party to divert traffic from the Transcontinental in order that they might benefit more by that traffic. I have not forgotten, nor shall I ever forget, that it is due to the efforts of Canadian Pacific representatives that the Board of Railway Commissioners refused to give, on grain to be transported from Winnipeg to Quebec and in winter from Winnipeg to St. John, that special preferential tariff under which the Transcontinental could have carried the products of the West from Winnipeg to Quebec, and by which a saving would have been effected of five or six cents on every bushel of grain which the western farmer has had to transport since that time. As a result of this lack of effort to give the lowest possible rate to Canadian railways, whichever they were, 65 per cent of the shipments of grain has gone from Port Arthur across the lakes to American ports, instead of coming by Canadian railways to Quebec, St. John or Halifax. These are facts, and, therefore, I say to the Minister of Railways: Be on your guard; be harmonious, but discreet, and you are sure of getting fair results. We all know—and my hon. friends from the province of Quebec who are listening to me at present know well—what a diversion of traffic there was during the last seven or eight years from the port of Quebec due to the efforts of the present board of directors of the National Railways. They know that if they had had the trade for which that railway was built, without doing any injury to other railways, the city and harbour of Quebec would have been a great haven of prosperity. I have always wondered at the docility of my compatriots of Quebec, for I am sure that if the people of Toronto had been in Quebec during the last ten years, we would have had a revolution, and it would have been to the benefit of the people of Quebec and the people of Canada. I say, therefore, to the Minister of Railways, who is not within reach of my voice at present, but whom I shall have occasion to meet again: Inspire your officials with true feelings of patriotism. If he does this and the officials direct their efforts to the proper management of the railways, I am sure that the deficits could be reduced and in time wiped out.

But I would remind my good friends from the Prairie provinces that the railways cannot be made a success without their co-operation. Do not let them imagine that Port Arthur is an ocean port, or that once their grain reaches that port that is the end of their interest in the matter as Canadians. It is not. They may feel that when their grain gets to Port Arthur it may as well go across the Atlantic through American ports, but this is not the right view for them to take as Canadian citizens who desire to see the country prosper as a whole. I say, let every bushel of grain shipped from the West be so distributed that in summer it may go by way of Montreal and Quebec, and in winter by way of Quebec, St. John and Halifax. If this were done the shippers of the grain would stand to lose nothing, while Canadian shipping would be benefited and the railways, carrying the grain to Canadian ports, would have increased business to that extent, which would naturally go towards the reduction of the deficits. Just consider what has been lost to Canadian interests by the fact that during the past few years 65 per cent of the grain shipped from the West, passing through Port Arthur, instead of going overseas via eastern Canada has been shipped by way of New York, Baltimore and Boston. In other words, Canadians have helped to build up the shipping business of these American ports to the neglect of the home ports. That is not patriotic; and as the railways would have carried all that grain, if it had been shipped through the Canadian ports I have mentioned, it is obviously an important consideration for every true and loyal citizen of this Dominion. Let us all bear in mind the fact that the railroads cannot possibly pay operating expenses, to say nothing of reducing the enormous deficits with which they are burdened, if they have not trade to keep them busy. They are not ornamental; they are not merely to be looked at and admired as we admire this building in which we are assembled to-night. The railways must be moving all the time, and they must have sufficient freight to make their operation profitable.

Now, in regard to the controversy over the question of public ownership, it is contended by those who are opposed to the principle that the operation of railways by governments has proved a failure in Europe as well as in Australia. There are many reasons for this. For instance, in Germany, which is cited as one example, the railways were practically controlled by the military authorities. During peace time they were obliged to carry troops from place to place, besides mountains of munitions, and all the freight that they carried was of no commercial value at all. They carried none of the products of industry and therefore could not be expected to pay. The same was largely true of France. These railways were being operated for the sole purpose, or practically so, of transporting munitions of war and other freight that represented no returns. The United States also tried government ownership, which apparently failed there too. They took over the railways during the war because the companies could not carry the burden that accumulated during that time. The government there was determined to make asuccess of its participation in the war and they took over the railways for that purpose. Australia also failed in government ownership and operation of the railways in that country. I might remind the House that the conditions in Australia were similar to the conditions that obtained in connection with the Intercolonial Railway at the time of Confederation.

With a small population of some 4,000,000 scattered throughout a vast territory like Canada, surplus was impossible. It was decided at that time that Canada should build the Intercolonial railway as part of the Confederation agreement with the Maritime provinces. It was felt that for 50 years at least there could be no possibility of a surplus in connection with the operation of this railway. The Intercolonial began its operations under great disadvantages, and according to the Drayton-Acworth report it accumulated deficits amounting to $6,000,000 during the last 28 years prior to the publication of that report. Notwithstanding all the disadvantages under which it laboured, however, the fact remains that many ministers, including Mr. Blair, the present Minister of Militia (Mr. Graham), and the late Conservative Minister of Railways (Mr. Cochrane), were able to show surpluses at different times in their respective administrations. And I think the fact has been demonstrated that, with proper management, this railway can be sucessfully operated. But while it is true that deficits amounting to $6,000,000 have been incurred, the railway has given excellent service to the people both of Western Canada and of the Eastern provinces, having taken lumber, coal and fish to the markets of the West, and brought back flour and other products from those provinces to the East.

Operation by the government means meeting all the expenses of operation but not necessarily showing a profit. Under private ownership railways, to be a success, must not only earn their operating charges but a sufficient surplus to pay dividends to their shareholders. Under government ownership and operation we save to the people those dividends which, instead of going into the hands of private individuals, are put back into the railways so that they may be operated with still greater efficiency for the benefit of the people at large.

The Minister of Railways (Mr. Kennedy) in his wisdom has decided to divide the National Railways into three divisions. My hon. friend, the member for St. John (Mr. Baxter), gave credit to the ex-Prime Minister for having enunciated this plan in his public addresses last year. Might I recall to the House that two or three years ago I, amongst others, endeavoured to impress upon the then Minister of Railways the necessity of dividing the Canadian National Railway system into three divisions with headquarters at Moncton, Montreal or Toronto, and Winnipeg. Last year I repeated my suggestion, but the then Minister of Railways paid no attention to it, and it was not until the ex-Prime Minister, after having visited nearly the whole Dominion without ever mentioning the idea of establishing a division of the National system with headquarters at Moncton, on his return from Prince Edward Island last October, arriving at Moncton in a wintry atmosphere and meeting a chilled audience, resorted to his ingenuity and declared, "Gentlemen, I will make Moncton the centre of a division;" but still the clapping of hands failed. That was the first word we heard of any such suggestion.

Mr. BUREAU: An election promise.

Mr. TURGEON: Yes, an election promise made too late, for after the 6th December he could do nothing in the matter. But this is the programme of my hon. friend the Minister of Railways, and I say that it is the only possible way in which to make a success of government operation, for by having these divisions the interests of the local shippers can be looked after at the divisional headquarters and difficulties settled at once without any of the delay which is entailed by having to refer everything to one central point.

I have always been of the opinion that the Intercolonial Railway must remain a government railway, and in that connection I recall an incident which happened in 1909, when the then Minister of Railways (Mr. Graham), in reply to offers that were being made by private interests to buy the Intercolonial Railway at its full cost of construction plus losses of operation up to that time, loudly declared that the Intercolonial Railway was not for sale. I have always admired him for the public-spirited stand which he took on that occasion. And when I say to the present Minister of Railways that I hope he will make a success of our National Railways, I wish to add—and I hope my words will influence not only the minds of the present but of the coming generation—that should unfortunately the Grand Trunk and the Canadian Northern Railways ultimately have to be returned to private ownership, I sincerely trust that the Intercolonial Railway never will be sold.

Mr. JOHN A. MacKELVIE (Yale): Mr. Speaker, I have followed the very detailed and exceedingly comprehensive argument of the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Turgeon) with close attention, and while I do not find myself in accord with its general trend, I should like to assure him and also the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) that I do very heartily associate myself with the well-deserved appreciation he expressed for the hon. Minister of Finance who has once more presented the budget after so many years of long and faithful service to his country. I wish to assure the hon. Minister of Finance that all the expressions of good-will and appreciation are not of necessity confined to his own side of the House. But while I appreciate greatly the labour entailed in presenting a budget at a juncture such as this when responsibilities are so great and the difficulties so manifest, I must confess that I would be greatly pleased if I could proceed to consider the minister's proposals with anything like the same degree of satisfaction which they evidently afford my hon. friend who has just resumed his seat.

I had not intended to participate in this discussion at such an early stage, but I thought it advisable, indeed imperative that I should take the first opportunity to voice, on behalf of my constituents, what I consider to be a very serious grievance on their part as a result of one of the features of the minister's proposals. I shall come to a fuller consideration of this later on, but in the meantime I wish to say that when the hon. gentleman removes from the Customs Act a dumping clause which is really effective, a dumping clause which for the first time could be depended on to operate, he is inflicting on the fruit-growing industry of Canada a serious hardship which will menace their future prosperity and advancement.

I must express, however, my satisfaction that in his proposals the hon. minister does not interfere with that specific measure of protection which is now by the tariff given our apple industry. But while with one hand he affords that measure of relief, with the other he wrenches away from us a factor which has been very considerably used during the past year in protecting that great industry. I must of necessity, I suppose, traverse some ground that I have covered in previous addresses in this House when I speak regarding the apple industry of this country. But when I say that in British Columbia this year the export of fruit amounted to some 6,000 cars, in value about $8,000,000; when I say that in my own constituency four out of the five provincial ridings which comprise it are vitally interested in the production of fruit, and that in the Okanagan valley we have an area of some 20,000 acres planted in fruit trees, containing probably well over 1,000,000 apple trees alone; when the whole life of the country is tied up in the success or failure of this great industry, I feel that I would not be fulfilling my responsibility to my constituents did I not voice, with all the force which I possess, a protest against the removal of this very effective measure of protection contained in the dumping clause. Let me first, however, deal in a somewhat more general manner with some of the features of the minister's budget which have struck me in giving it rather hasty consideration.

I wonder just exactly how this budget will appeal to my good friends to my left. So far we have had little indication as to their conception of how it will affect their interests. True, one of their members, the hon. member for Dufferin (Mr. Woods), did speak this afternoon in the course of the debate, but so far as I could gather from his remarks, he approached the subject in a rather bewildered state of mind. I remember that he did say or intimate that he considered half a loaf better than no bread; but that immediately called into my mind another quotation in which reference is made to those who ask for bread and are given a stone. I think, perhaps, that would very fully express the sentiments which must lurk in the minds of most of my friends to my left when they consider the nature of the proposals made to the people of this country by the Liberal party when in opposition—pledges vehemently reiterated throughout the length and breadth of this country during the campaign last autumn—and the manner in which those undertakings have been implemented now that the Liberal party, for the first time in some years, occupy the treasury benches and have an opportunity of carrying them into effect.

In order to make myself clear, and that I may not be thought to be placing the Liberal party in anything approaching a false position, I wish to quote very briefly from that renowned platform evolved at the historic convention of the Liberal party held in this city in 1919. Reference to that platform has, of course, been made on several occasions during the present session as well as during this debate; and no doubt it will be the subject of frequent reference during this discussion. The fundamental principle of the Liberal party with respect to the fiscal policy which they proposed to enact when they attained power is embodied in the following paragraph from the resolution passed at their convention in 1919:

> That the best interests of Canada demand that substantial reductions of the burdens of customs taxation be made with a view to . . . diminishing the very high cost of living which presses so severely on the masses of the people; That, to these ends—.

Mark this:

> That, to these ends, wheat, wheat flour, and all products of wheat; the principal articles of food; farm implements and machinery; farm tractors, mining, flour and saw-mill machinery, and repair parts thereof; rough and partly dressed lumber; gasoline, illuminating, lubricating and fuel oils; . . . . cements and fertilizers, should be free from customs duties, as well as the raw material entering into the same.

There was the pledge; there was the platform, followed by as solemn a pronouncement as words could make, that when returned to power this great Liberal party would implement to the last letter and the last dot every promise announced in this platform. Now, by the budget recently brought down by the hon. Minister of Finance, how much effect is given to those solemn pledges? Are wheat and wheat flour and foodstuffs relieved from all customs taxation? They are not only not made free, but they are left exactly where they were before; and those which have been reduced have been brought down to the magnificent extent of 2½ per cent. Am I justified in wondering how a pronouncement of that kind will be received by the members of the Progressive party who sit to my left, and by their constituents who sent them here to represent their desires in this House?

Then, the next paragraph of the resolution says:

> That a revision downwards of the tariff should be made whereby substantial reductions should be effected in the duties on wearing apparel and footwear, and on other articles of general consumption (other than luxuries) as well as on the raw material entering into the manufacture of the same.

How far has that pledge been implemented? How much reduction are you getting on your footwear, on your wearing apparel? Two and one half per cent on your footwear coming from Great Britain and a similar reduction on certain specified articles; but the great majority of the articles coming under this category are left exactly where they were before. I think I gave expression to the opinion when I spoke earlier this session that the hopes of my Progressive friends were doomed to serious disappointment when the fiscal policy of the Government should be disclosed, and I think that those hopes, which I believe I have been tottering steadily all through the course of the session, have now come down with a crash, and—

> O, what a fall was there, my countrymen!

Well, if that be the measure of relief; if that be the extent to which the great Liberal party are able to implement their pledges and sacred promises, how much dependence can we place upon any present or future announcement that may be made from the same source? Under such circumstances, was not the ex-Finance minister, who moved the amendment, justified in laying before the House this afternoon a resolution which expresses none too forcefully, at no too great length or elaboration, but in plain terms, exactly how honest and decent thinking people of this country should regard such a breach of faith? We are fresh from an election campaign. We all know what happened throughout the length and breath of Canada during the few weeks preceding the election—how on every platform where a Liberal orator appeared, this handbook of the Liberal party was held up, this platform was again brought before the electors, and these promises were reiterated,—almost shrieked into the ears of an expectant public. An hon. member reminds me that the case of Brantford was an exception; the hon. member who represented the Liberal party there out-Heroded Herod in his advocacy of protection.

Another cardinal point of the policy of the Liberal party announced in their preelection pledges was a fifty per cent reduction in the British preference. How far have they advanced along the line of implementing that pledge? I know that was a pledge very dear to the hearts of my Progressive friends. I know their own platform gives prominence to that feature. Indeed, I think it announces that their objective is complete free trade with Great Britain in the course of a very few years. Once more, then, we see a group which I suppose did rely to some extent upon the solemn pledges that were repeated during the campaign and upon the promises spread broadcast by a great political party in this country—once more we see them doomed to perhaps the most severe disappointment which ever befell a group of expectant people in this country. It is true it is only a repetition of history, and that in 1896 practically the same thing occurred, but a lengthy period has elapsed since then, and the sentiments of the Canadian people have undergone a great change since that time. We have, I believe, as a people begun to think more seriously about political affairs and other matters than we were prone to do before the war. We have, I think, probably attained to a more exalted opinion of what is due from political parties, what their duties and responsibilities should be, and although subsequent to 1896 pledges were broken that were given prior to that date, and broken brazenly, I have grave doubt if the same apathy and indifference will follow the disclosure of broken pledges by a great party in this year of grace 1922. I think public sentiment will bring to bear now a much closer scrutiny of public affairs than was wont to be the case in those days. Here we have the Minister of Trade and Commerce getting up this afternoon and making an endeavour to reply to the strictures of the ex-Minister of Finance contained in his amendment, and what does he say? He rests his whole case upon one argument, and it is simply this: Oh, he says, it must be remembered that at the convention when that platform was announced and those pledges were given, we had a speech from the gentleman who is now the Prime Minister of Canada, and in that speech he did not go as far as the platform, but simply said that he would take the platform as his chart to direct his future political course. Now, Mr. Speaker, I ask this question: If the country was to understand that, not the solemn pledges of the party assembled in convention were to guide their future course, but that the guide was to be a speech given at a time when the hon. gentleman's spirits were naturally elated because he had suddenly been lifted to the proud position of leader of a great party, and his words could hardly perhaps have been as well considered as the written declarations of his party, if he at that time did intimate—and I confess it may be read into his utterance as produced this afternoon—that he had some glimmer of a suspicion that it would be rather difficult to follow the course there outlined, and he announced in that speech something approaching a policy to govern his actions and be the guiding star and the motive which would impel the future course of the Liberal party, why was not that speech of the hon. gentleman circulated instead of the handbook containing the platform which was spread broadcast throughout this country and quoted at every political meeting, while the speech remained in obscurity so far as I know? True, the present Prime Minister in a meeting at Toronto, if I mistake not, did give expression to sentiments somewhat similar to those contained in that speech and say something about a chart and a compass. Well, I have sometimes thought that the compass which guided his party was very peculiarly constructed. I have always regarded a compass as an instrument whose needle points steadily towards the magnetic north, but I venture to say, after considering what has occurred this session, and after giving consideration to the utterances of the Minister of Finance regarding his attitude on reciprocity, and after hearing what fell this afternoon from the lips of the Minister of Trade and Commerce, who very frankly announced that reciprocity with the United States was the goal to be aimed at by his party, and that it must sooner or later come into effect—and he intimated that in his opinion it would be rather sooner than later,—I think in view of all these things we would be justified in noting the fact that this compass which guides and directs the course of hon. gentlemen opposite, rather than indicating the true north, has veered round under the influence of some constellation which rises above the Capitol at Washington. I think, Mr. Speaker, that once it sinks into the consciousness of the people of this country that the policy which they denounced so emphatically in 1911, when by an avalanche of votes they swept the reciprocity proposals into what a good many of us thought would be oblivion, when it is known that those proposals are to be brought to the fore and become the prime policy and guiding star of our friends across the way, I believe that the same verdict will be given even in a still more unmistakable manner than in 1911. For, surely, if it was justifiable then for the people to turn down those proposals, how much more justifiable is it to-day? In those days our financial situation was greatly different from what it is to-day. We did not need to raise from the tariff, for revenue purposes, anything like the sum it is requisite for us to raise in order to meet our requirements to-day. Then we did not have a great railway problem on our hands, and it was not our duty so essentially as it is to-day to foster and develop by every possible means traffic east and west along that line of communication rather than north and south. More than that, we did not have such a tremendous trade balance against us as we have now, and we were not in so good a position to judge of the effects which an increased adverse trade balance, by importing largely from the United States, would have upon our financial position. So I say, whatever may have been the verdict in 1911, if a man keeps his ear to the ground to-day, as I suppose so astute a politician as the Minister of Finance does, I should greatly wonder if he has not heard already indistinct rumblings that would indicate that any policy such as he cherishes so dearly would not find acceptance with the people of this country.

I was going to say that my principal objection to his budget proposals rested in the elimination from the Customs Act of the amendment passed last year giving us a dumping clause, as it was known, which was really effective. I have in my hand a telegram received only a few moments ago from the Traffic and Credit Men's Association of British Columbia, one of the largest handlers of produce and fruit in British Columbia. It reads as follows:

Press reports state Fielding proposes eliminate cost production amendment to anti-dumping clause on ground that it constitutes an unnecessary interference with trade. Please wire reply exact position more especially as to whether he raised any objection on principle; also advise full what possible action we can take; also if any alternative protection suggested; also what is attitude progressives. Very keen interest in matter here. Much depends on your reply.

Naturally enough, knowing the attitude assumed by the Minister of Finance last session when this Parliament enacted that amendment, I gave expression to my view during the campaign last autumn that if the Liberal party came to power they would not keep that measure of protection on the statute book. I was ridiculed by my opponent, a Liberal gentleman, who thought he had the confidence of the party in that respect, and he said that it was wildly absurd to think that any interference with the customs tariff or the dumping clause would be for one moment contemplated by the party which he represented, if they attained power. The election came on, and that gentleman was not successful in obtaining a seat, but his apprehensions and the apprehensions of his party, and of every board of trade, every commercial organization, every fruit shipping concern, practically every city council in the whole length and breadth of the Okanagan and adjoining valleys, were raised to a pitch of excitement over the dumping clause. The result was that a deputation was sent to Ottawa by the associated boards of trade of that valley, headed by my opponent and another gentleman, Mr. Cossitt, of Vernon, president of the Yale Liberal Association. That deputation interviewed the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding), the Minister of Customs (Mr. Bureau), and possibly the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King). They stayed here a few days, and on reaching home announced to the press that, after interviewing the Government at Ottawa, they had the assurance that the dumping clause would not be interfered with. Do you wonder at the British Columbia Traffic Association asking me in despair, "What will we do about it"? I will be compelled to say "I do not know." I can make the protest and will present to the Minister of Finance a plea in as strong language as I am capable of presenting, that if he wishes to do anything to injure an industry in which about forty million dollars are involved in the way of investment, and in which a great number of men, women and children are employed, an industry which exported goods to the value of $8,000,000 from that valley to other parts of Canada and abroad this year, and if he wishes to handicap their operation and make it more difficult—and goodness knows it is difficult enough to pursue these operations in the Okanagan and other sections of that province—then let him maintain his resolution to do away with the dumping clause. If, on the other hand, he has any desire, as I believe he has, to build up that industry and to give the people there some prospect of success in their endeavours, I plead with him not to maintain his resolution. I am not asking this as a matter of politics, for politically it would be a personal advantage to me to have this provision maintained as it has been announced in the budget, but I would a hundredfold rather throw away any political advantage that would come to me than to see the future of this great industry jeopardized, as it will undoubtedly be, by the proposal contained in the Finance Minister's budget.

I may say to my friends to my left that the success of this business has been very largely built up along lines of co-operation, which, I believe, they consider the proper means of conducting public affairs, as far as possible. The large bulk of the fruit is shipped by co-operative associations grouped together and selling their stuff through the agency of one central consignment association called the Okanagan United Growers, and no greater blow can be inflicted upon the spirit of co-operation than to maintain the proposal of the Finance Minister to abolish that clause in the Customs Act. A dumping clause in the Customs Act, I think, was introduced by the present Minister of Finance away back about 1903 or 1904, and for years we tried to make it effective, but without avail. There were a dozen ways of camouflaging the situation. Goods were sent in on consignment, goods were invoiced improperly, and in a score of ways we found that our efforts were rendered futile, and that we might as well give up any hope of relief from the old dumping clause. Pressure was brought to bear upon the previous government to give us a dumping clause that would really act, and, as a result, in the Customs Act of last year a clause was inserted, the provisions of which, briefly, were that, instead of basing the consideration of the cost of an article upon the marketing price in the place of production, it should be based upon the cost of production where it originated and the customs officer in any locality in Canada was given this privilege; if goods were sent in to be sold at a ridiculously low price in competition with home grown products, the customs officer could immediately ascertain what the cost of that product was at point of shipment, add the freight to that charge to bring it to the point where it was offered for sale, and then he was authorized to put on an extra customs impost, to bring it up to a reasonable selling price

The Finance Minister seems to labour under the misapprehension that it was a very difficult act to enforce, and that the poor customs officer was subjected to all kinds of hardships in ascertaining the selling price. I do not know how it would operate in all commodities, but, as far as it affects the fruit industry, it was a matter of the most absolute simplicity to arrive at the cost of production at the point of origination. We invoked that act at least twice last year, one time when the prairie markets were flooded with pears at a dollar a box. We knew the cost of production in Washington, where the pears originated, within a fraction of a cent. There was no difficulty in ascertaining that. The Credit Association of Washington had figures published week by week which were available to us. I believe they cost $1.96 to produce, without taking into consideration the freight charges. We immediately invoked the dumping clause in the Customs Act, and they were compelled to put these goods on the market at a reasonable price. Of course, a good many of our prairie farmers who think they would receive cheaper food in the way of fruit, if this clause were eliminated, are viewing the matter from a mistaken point of view To the south of British Columbia lie two great fruit producing states, Washington and Oregon They always have a surplus. Their production has exceeded the markets of the country. Their object is to sell their prime extra choice fruit at good prices, and they succeed. In order to do that, they have to get rid of their fancy or choice varieties, grades 2 and 3. They ship those to our prairie markets, and those second and third grade varieties set the price for our No. 1 on the prairie market, because they are acceptable to the average buyer, and we have to put down our No. 1 fruit in competition with their grades 2 and 3. We do not object to that very much, but object to having the market slaughtered by apples being sent there, as they were in 1912, 1913 and 1914, and offered at 40 cents a box, when it cost more than two and a half times that amount to produce them.

Mr. EVANS: We did not get any of those on the prairie.

Mr. MacKELVIE: I have seen apples offered at Calgary at 40 cents a box. Once our fruit growers are driven to desperation and throw up the sponge, as they will have to do if too many hardships are inflicted upon them, they may be ruined. If they tear up their orchards and try to go into some other branch of agriculture, it will take years because they cannot change their business without a sacrifice of a great deal of capital and a considerable amount of time. Once that happens and the markets of the prairies are controlled by the American fruit grower, I venture to say there will be no more cheap fruit. We do not ask a protection that has the effect of raising the cost of food on the prairies. The history of the business shows that protection has not had that effect. I will give the House a very convincing example. The cost of Washington and Oregon apples in Regina, or in Winnipeg, Saskatoon or Brandon, or any of the prairie cities last year or this year has been just the same to a cent as to points directly across the line in the two Dakotas. I go further than that and say this: Although the duty on apples was the only duty affected by the change in 1916, when that duty was raised from 11 1-3 cents a box to 30 cents a box, the price of apples did not advance in anything like the same proportion as the price of plums, cherries, pears and other fruits, which were not subjected to an increase in protective duty. In spite of the increase in protective duty, the difficulties of the business have increased in a greater ratio. There is a continual fight against insect pests. Farmers have to spray their orchards at all seasons of the year; they have to fertilize, they have to prune and gather the brush, and they have to irrigate at an expenditure of $10, $12, $15 or even $17 an acre. Any person from the prairies who thinks the British Columbia farmer is making an undue profit from the product of his toil, is certainly much mistaken. I, therefore, feel justified in once more placing the case before the attention of the Government and asking the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) if he cannot make inquiries in an endeavour to reach a solution which will give to those people the protection which I believe they are amply justified in asking.

I do not care to enlarge very much tonight on the general aspect of the tariff. I cannot fail to note, en passant, though, that the party which was pledged to retrenchment, the party which talks of the tremendous extravagance of the past administration and that told the masses of the tremendous burden of taxation which was placed upon them, have again failed very signally in showing any real disposition, in fact, any remote disposition, to bring down taxation by the very apparent and available means of reducing expenditure. What is the situation? In some fifty enumerated articles we get a reduction of 2½ per cent, and in one or two articles a reduction of 5 per cent in the duty, a reduction that will possibly amount to about $1,000,000 for the current year. On the other hand, we have a sales tax which last year brought in $60,000,000, and it is proposed to increase that sales tax by 50 per cent. What relief is afforded to those masses of the people who were subjected to such horrible taxation, if we are to believe the statements of the present Government while they were in opposition? The masses get $1,000,000 taken off the customs tariff; they get $30,000,000 added on to the sales tax. In other words, the masses have to pay $29,000,000 more this year than they were called upon to pay under the preceding government. Has there been any indication, I ask my hon. friends who sit to my left, of any desire, on the part of any party in this House except the group which sits around me, to effect any reduction, by a policyof retrenchment, in the burden of taxation which rests so heavily upon the people of this country? I leave that question with them. If it has been evident to them, it has not been evident to me.

Mr. GARDINER: What about the militia estimates?

Mr. MACKELVIE: I am glad the hon. gentleman mentioned the militia estimates. This great country of Canada with a budget this year of about $466,000,000, has effected, in the Department of Militia and in the Department of Naval Service, a little bit of—what shall I call it?—I cannot call it retrenchment. There has been cut off, anyhow, a million or two, with what results and effects? The present Government have absolutely ruined both services, and I have, in justification for that statement, the expressed pronouncement of the Minister of Militia (Mr. Graham) when he first brought down his estimate to this House. He told us then, on the advice of responsible officers of his department—and he mentioned the name of one of them, a man held in high esteem throughout Canada—that the irreducible minimum had been reached in the estimates presented to the House—if those are not his exact words, that is the effect of them—and that under no circumstances could the militia be kept up in anything approaching an efficient manner if any further reduction were made. Then we had the pitiable exhibition of the same hon. gentleman coming to this House a few evenings later, and with a bludgeon held over his head, being compelled to swallow his words. My hon. friend to my left says: "What about the militia?" It happened to be my privilege to-day, while I was passing up Elgin street, to see the cadets of Ottawa training, and the sight was an inspiring one. Yet what heart will be in those cadets from now on, what prospects of continuing that splendid organization will they have, when they know the attitude taken by the Minister of Militia and the present Government towards the magnificent services they are giving to the state and themselves? A man has to approach this matter from the grounds of both personal observation and experience, and from both grounds, I can say that we should not interfere with this cadet organization. When I was a boy, I did not have the advantages which boys have to-day in that respect; but I have always considered myself fortunate to have been able to enter what was called the Grammar School Cadets of St. John, N.B. We had to provide our own uniforms, to do the whole thing ourselves. We were fortunate enough to have the instruction of a retired sergeant-major of the Imperial army who had served through the Indian Mutiny. He was rather a martinet; but he succeeded in instilling into us principles of precision and decision, and he gave us a healthy respect for discipline. This worked inestimable advantages upon the physique of all the boys who attended that school. A few years afterwards I found myself in Calgary, when the North-West Rebellion of 1885 broke out. There was a time when the sparsely-settled population of the praires was in danger of being annihilated by the Indians and by those who rose under the banner of Riel, and naturally enough everybody flocked to the standard raised then to bring together a group of men to defend their homes. The little experience which I had acquired as a boy in St. John stood me in wonderfully good stead there, and I have always since then, as I said before, considered that it was very fortunate for me that I was subjected to that training in my boyhood days. Yet this is one of the things which the Minister of Militia—I do not believe in his heart he feels like doing this—is compelled to brush aside as a matter of small importance to the people of this country, and as my hon. friend to my left says: "We have a reduction in the militia estimates."

I pointed out in this House the other day what an intolerable injustice was effected upon the Naval Department by the contemplated action of the minister. We have a military college at Esquimalt, and I know a number of boys in my constituency who have received training there with a view to entering the navy as a career. They have been there one, two, three years, and now that opportunity is taken away from them. They must give up their career, although their parents have been put to a heavy expense in launching them upon it. Yet I could not elicit from the minister the slightest degree of consciousness that he or his Government was under any responsibilty for this action. Nevertheless, when I speak of retrenchment all that is suggested to the mind of my hon. friend to my left is that we have cut down the militia estimates, and at a time such as this. I suppose some of us read to-day the speech delivered in the British House of Commons by that great Imperial statesman, Mr. Lloyd George. I suppose we appreciate the difficulty that confronted him at Genoa, and that most of us were glad—I was intensely glad myself—that once more he came out triumphant with his enemies at home and that, because of the underlying truth and sincerity of every word that he uttered, he was able to swing the House of Commons to a position to which he had so often brought them before. Once more triumph perched upon his banner. If there is one man in this world who has had the responsibilities of conducting the great war particularly heavily on his shoulders in the last few years, it is surely the Prime Minister of Great Britain. And yet to-day he is assuming an attitude which I believe carries with it, perhaps, on the part of the civilized world, more appreciation than even his magnificent efforts as war prime minister evoked. He can now be truly termed an apostle of peace. And it is significant, Mr. Speaker, that in this country of ours, guarded and protected during these years of strife by the British navy, which alone kept us from being overwhelmed by the German invader—

Mr. FIELDING: Except the Japanese.

Mr. MACKELVIE: Well, the Japanese did something on the Pacific coast, but no one will contend that they kept the North Sea free. I was about to say, that it ill becomes us, who have received such protection at the hands of the British navy, to say that, notwithstanding the fact that we are spending more than $50,000,000 more than the Government did last year, we cannot afford a paltry million or two for the army and navy. And this is the Government that was going to retrench. I suppose that on the Pacific coast we have reason to congratulate ourselves, though the situation is no longer as it was. The Anglo-Japanese alliance has been broadened into a four-power alliance, and we can call if necessary upon France and the United States to protect our coast if aggression were now to offer. But this is unnecessary. We can all sleep in security, resting our heads on our pillows at night in the proud consciousness that sweeping up and down the coasts, protecting us from any invader, are the two trawlers so kindly provided by the Minister of Militia (Mr. Graham).

Now, not content with tampering with the clause in the Customs Act which gives protection to the fruit industry, we now have the spectacle of a finance minister coming before the House and declaring that the time has again arrived when the inestimable privilege may be enjoyed by the Canadian people of trading freely with the Germans. It is obvious that with the depreciation of the German mark, nominally in times before the war worth 23 cents, and now worth about one-third of a Canadian cent, if you allow goods to come in under valuations of that kind, no customs tariff would afford protection. But we did overcome that difficulty last year when we inserted a clause that gave us that protection by stabilizing the currency at 50 per cent of its value. Now our factories have to be subjected to this competition. Men seeking employment here will have to compete with the German labourer, who, as we were told this afternoon, is willing to work for $3 a month, of our money. I wonder if there are no sentimental reasons that can appeal to this House in this connection. I do not think I am a man who cherishes implacable hatreds; I do not believe that in my constitution there is in any great degree a spirit of vindictiveness; but I can well remember—indeed, Sir, I do not think I am ever likely to forget it—that during the war period men and women from one coast to the other in this country denounced German atrocities and brutalities and vowed that never again would they trade with a brutal nation of that kind. I wonder if we are not justified in departing just a little from the cold commercial aspect of the question and giving some slight consideration to the sentimental view of this matter. There are men and women in this country, of whom I am free to confess that I am one, who are not inclined to forget that the blood of countless innocent babes and women, and murdered hospital nurses and wounded soldiers who were killed in hospitals, if it does not cry for vengeance at our hands, has at least a justifiable claim to remembrance. And I would rather be in the position of a government that tried to exclude a reasonable amount of German goods from coming to this country, than be one to throw down every possible barrier and allow our country to be flooded by the products of people who were our enemies a few years ago and whose ideals are yet very far, I think, from approximating our own.

Well, we come now to the amendment that has been offered. I have said that I oppose this budget primarily because of the injustice it inflicts on the fruit growing industry, in removing a dumping clause which was really effective; and yet I can also sincerely stand behind the resolution moved by the ex-Minister of Finance (Sir Henry Drayton) this afternoon, not, as the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Robb) indicated, in an effort to obscure the issue, because the party opposite are pursuing a course which I consider objectionable or wrong. It is too late to-day for me to inform the House that I am a protectionist. Protection is one of the fundamentals of my political creed, and I am proud to say that I belong to a party whose political compass has never deviated from the pole in that direction during the whole period of its history. For over half a century we have had a Liberal-Conservative party in Canada, sometimes in power and sometimes out of power. But whether occupying the treasury benches or sitting to the left of the Speaker, they have ever and always maintained, on this important question, an attitude which never left them open to the reproach that they had deserted their flag for one moment. It is not because I am anxious that the party opposite should do what we say they have not done, it is just exactly because of what the resolution expresses, that I believe they should be censured. Surely the time has arrived, as I said before, when thinking people demand from a great party some policy or pronouncement behind which there is sincerity. But take this document of theirs, this famous declaration of the National Convention, and you see that the ruthless fingers of expediency have gripped it and torn its pages off one by one, scattering them to the four winds of heaven until they litter the ground along with other historical scraps of paper which we have heard so much about during the last few years. In view of this, I feel amply justified in giving my support to the amendment proposed this afternoon.

Mr. D. W. WARNER (Strathcona): Mr. Speaker, at this late hour I do not feel like making a long speech, but I do want to express my views upon certain aspects of the budget that has been presented to the House. I have had a bitter disappointment in the budget. We in Alberta have not been asking for free trade at once; we have known that it was not advisable, that perhaps it was not even possible for us to at once enter on a free trade policy. However, we have had in the backs of our heads, and we have yet, the idea that we want to get a whole lot taken off the tariff and the burdens of our people thus lightened just as soon as possible. Our disappointment is in the slightness of the reduction. It is so small that it would make very little difference in the expense of our living or in the expense of operating our farms. Indeed, in my judgment, it is really not any reduction at all, for if I figure it correctly, our expense will be more instead of less when the sales tax is taken into account. We hoped for a greater reduction. The Liberal sentiment in Alberta has been very strong for years, the Progressive sentiment has been stronger, towards tariff reduction, and about the first thing I would have said to me by a Liberal if I undertook to talk politics to him in the last few years would be, "We have got to have the tariff reduced."

As I have said, we have not been looking for very much—and certainly we have not got very much of a reduction. Last fall, if I might approach the subject, the Liberals tried very hard to get even one seat in Alberta for a cabinet minister. This was an earnest, honest effort on the part of some of the Liberals in that province. But I believe they will have to try a good deal harder next time unless they show greater tariff reductions in their next budget. These are prophecies only. I do not like to talk politics, but it looks to me as if the Liberals by this budget had not gone very far towards strengthening themselves in the West.

I have found two articles on which there is a 5 per cent reduction of duty, and only two; all the rest less, mostly two and a half per cent. I find that the British preference on collars and cuffs is increased 5 per cent. Now, the Alberta farmer wants to dress just as well as he can afford to, but one man told me in the last campaign that he had not worn a stiff collar and cuffs for six years. Now then, this 5 per cent off his collars and cuffs is not going to do him much good. I myself have worn them a little oftener than that, but I do not know whether I and others are going to be able to continue to do so unless we have a little better tariff treatment.

There is also, I find, a 5 per cent reduction in the duty on dairy utensils. I had quite a time here a few days ago telling you people how hard it was to carry on the dairy business. I was out against oleomargarine; I am yet, and I would like to see the dairy business get a fair chance to make good. Our Minister of Finance made a strong appeal for oleomargarine. I suppose he has a tender spot in his heart, and is trying to give us something back as consolation for the hard knocks that he tried to give the dairy business in that speech. Now he is giving our dairy men a 5 per cent reduction in the duty on their dairy equipment, but I think it will be a good, long time before he can convince our dairy men that that is the proper way or sufficient to enable them to compete with oleomargarine.

The Minister of Finance also made a number of remarks regarding the lack of the need of protection of the people regarding the consumption of oleomargarine. We have been protecting the people of this country a long time. As far as I am concerned—I am speaking for myself individually—I know that we have been protecting certain people long enough, and that the farmer and the dairy man deserve a little more protection and a little more consideration than they are getting out of this budget. We have protected the people against certain things, and we have made it compulsory that their children shall go to school. But there is not very much duty taken off the wearing apparel that those children have to wear in the cold country that we live in. Wool and hides are almost given away in the West at the present time. It is very hard to sell them, and in any case you cannot sell them at a price that is anywhere near the cost of production, and we do not hope to under present conditions. But the duties on woollen goods and shoes are not reduced at all, and the only concession, if I understand aright, is a 2½ per cent increase in the British preference. We have a right, I think, to expect a reduction of the duty on woollen and leather goods and other clothing so necessary in our cold climate.

Now, as I said before, I believe that the country must provide the money to run the government. At the same time I do not hear any proposal to increase the income tax. We have seen great fortunes built up during the war, and these we are hardly touching with our income tax. When anyone has an income of from $50,000 to $100,000 a year, it seems to me that we can hit him up a little harder and let off the man who is paying all he can stand and more too for his living and is operating his farm at a loss. I think it would be no hardship to get more revenue from the income tax. It may be said that the farmers are not paying the income tax. Well, I want to tell the House that we would be mighty glad to be in a position to pay the income tax once more. I believe it would be more just and more reasonable to reduce the cost of living to the poor people of this country and to take more by way of income tax and some other lines of taxation which would have somewhat the same effect—that of placing the taxation where the people are able to bear it. It has been said to me that we must allow capital sufficient encouragement to induce it to go into business. I grant that; but if the capital gets all the encouragement and the man who needs the manufactured goods cannot buy them, what will happen then? What is happening now? That is just what is the matter with our country at the present time; the people who should buy these goods have lost their purchasing power and what we must do is enable these people to get their purchasing power back again. We are not asking for anything that we think it is unfair for us to have, but we certainly have been paying these tariff duties long enough, and we feel that there could have been more reduction, not only for our benefit, but for the benefit of the whole of Canada. When I came here—and I feel the same yet—I wanted to do everything that was possible to secure good government. I want to encourage the Government in every way that I can, but I want to see this Government consider the people who are unable to buy rather than the people who, perhaps, are not in need of employing their money. We want to see that money employed, but as in the case of our railroads, we want our people to get a chance to get back on their feet. You cannot do business with people who are not able to buy, and the Government must give consideration to the needs of those people who are the purchasers of all the manufactured goods in the production of which capital is employed.

As far as the British preference is concerned, on the agricultural implements it amounts to little or nothing. Most of the agricultural implements that we buy are made in the United States or at home. Practically all our machinery is made on this side of the water and the British preference does not apply to them. The budget proposes a slight reduction in the duties on farm machinery, but when you put that into a wagon that costs over $100 or a reaper that costs from $280 to $300, you get very little benefit from it. I think the Government might well have gone further in that line and have made up the difference by getting an additional revenue from some of the sources that I have mentioned—from people who are better able to bear it than those from whom it is now proposed to take the money in the form of sales tax. This sales tax is a thing which I confess I do not altogether understand. I do not know just to what extent the sales tax will neutralize the reduction in the tariff, but in my judgment—and it is the opinion of others with whom I have talked on the subject—it will more than neutralize the tariff reductions and will make things cost more instead of less. If that is the case, there is only one saving clause in that feature of it: the treasury, if this tax is collected, will get it instead of the manufacturer. It goes where we want it to go if we have to pay the tax. The hon. member for Dufferin (Mr. Woods) this afternoon pointed out that on automobiles made in this country the manufacturer gets an extra price on account of the tariff—from which is deducted, of course, the small amount of sales tax. On the contrary, when we import an automobile, the duty on it goes to the treasury, and we pay the sales tax in addition. Automobiles are not now considered only a luxury; I believe the people generally look upon them as a necessity. In the case of a farmer who lives twenty miles from town, the automobile has moved him up within five or six miles of town, when you measure the speed of the automobile against the speed of a team in making that distance. The farmers use as few teams as they can; they use their automobile to go to town except when there is heavy hauling to do. The farmer, therefore, feels that he is almost compelled to have an automobile, and the additional sales tax will certainly make the automobile cost him more. In fact, the increase will more than offset the other reductions of which he will obtain the benefit. However, it is unnecessary for me to dwell on this subject; I desire only to make a sort of general survey of the Finance Minister's proposals. I hope that the Government will see fit to do more than is proposed in the present budget toward reducing the cost of living to the farmers and causing them once more to feel that they are going to get a square deal at the hands of the Government.

[Mr. Warner.]

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil) moved the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to and debate adjourned.

IMMIGRATION BILL

Mr. A. W. NEILL (Comox-Alberni) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 122 respecting Immigration.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Explain.

Mr. NEILL: This is a mild and modest bill. It is non-contentious and I think it should receive the support of every hon. member. It provides that immigrants coming to Canada shall first apply for permission to do so; they shall write from the country of their origin asking for that permission and stating their qualifications, and they can be accepted or rejected at the discretion of the Government. There is a provision in this exempting people of British birth. Primarily it is intended to do away with the injustice, of which we have had evidence even so recently as during the present session, where immigrants coming to Canada from a distance are rejected at the point of arrival. Sometimes families are broken up by reason of one of their members being found undesirable and being deported. This causes great hardship and expense to immigrants, and such an undesirable condition would be obviated by the bill which I now introduce, because intending immigrants would have to state their nationality, their ages, their resources, and the facts regarding their health. The bill requires that these facts shall be stated in a letter of application, and the immigrants can be accepted or rejected as the government sees fit. That is the primary object; but incidentally—quite incidentally—I think it would solve the problem in connection with oriental immigration in the West. There is no mention of Orientals, or Japanese, or exclusion, but the exclusion of these people is secured by the simple method I have stated. I shall not detain the House on the subject at this stage; it can be discussed on the second reading. I would, however, strongly commend the matter to the serious attention of the House and of the Government. I believe that the proposed bill provides a simple and unassailable form of dealing with the Asiatic and oriental problem in the West.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

ST. LAWRENCE WATERWAY

On the Orders of the Day:

Sir HENRY DRAYTON (West York): The press has recently referred to overtures that have been made by the government of the United States to the Canadian government looking to the completion of the St. Lawrence canal. Have such representations been made to this Government? If so, will the Prime Minister state what they are and what attitude the Government is taking in the matter?

Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): A communication has been received, through the British Ambassador, from the Secretary of State of the United States intimating that the United States government is prepared to consider, with the Canadian government, the matter of entering into a treaty with regard to the St. Lawrence waterways project. The Government has replied to the effect that the present is not an opportune moment to take the matter up, that there has not been sufficient time to consider the report that has been presented, and that for the time being considering the magnitude of the project and of the expenditure involved the matter should be allowed to remain in abeyance.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Does the Government intend to table the request which the Government of the United States has made regarding the treaty, and the reply thereto of this Government?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I shall be pleased to bring down the correspondence.

WRANGEL ISLAND

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. R. J. MANION (Fort William and Rainy River): The Washington Times states that the United States government has decided that Wrangel island is properly the property of Russia and that it should be held in trust until conditions in Russia have become settled. Has this question been drawn to the attention of the Government, and, if so, is any action contemplated?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The matter is now for the first time drawn to the attention of the Government by the remarks of my hon. friend.

IMMIGRATION OF ARTISANS

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg Centre): I beg to call the attention of the Government to the following despatch, dated from London, May 26:

Many British Artisans preparing to make their Homes in Canada.

Relaxation of Dominion's Immigration Regulations Results in Increase of Men Coming Who are Out of Jobs in Britain

London, May 26,—(Montreal Gazette Cable)—A considerable increase in the movement of British artisans to Canada is expected as a result of the relaxation of the Dominion's Immigration regulations. The orders-in-council having arrived from Canada, the Dominion Immigration Offices here issued copies of the modified regulations to the steamship agencies to-day. They show that cabled reports to the British press were incorrect and that the changes are infinitely more far-reaching than reported. The removal of all occupational restrictions for British subjects is regarded here as the most important change of all. In the past, the immigration of the artisan class was allowed only where such labour was unobtainable in Canada. Now any workman may enter if he has enough funds to sustain himself until he secures employment. With industrial conditions what they are in Great Britain, it is thought that many will avail themselves of the opportunity of seeking to better their condition by going to Canada.

In view of the fact that we have such a large volume of unemployment in Canada, may I ask if there is any protection for the artisans in this country?

Hon. CHARLES STEWART (Minister of the Interior): It is true that the money qualification of $250 formerly exacted has been removed, but notwithstanding that fact care is being exercised by the officials of the Immigration Department to impress upon intending immigrants to Canada who are looking for immediate employment that no work in the artisan classes is available, but that there is abundant room for agricultural labourers, household workers, and others who are able to purchase land or have sufficient means to support themselves in Canada.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: The fact is, then, that the protection hitherto afforded the artisans of this country is removed; am I right in that?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I do not understand what particular protection my hon. friend refers to. The regulation requiring an immigrant to possess $250 no longer obtains, but full information is given intending immigrants who expect to secure immediate employment on arrival that they are in a sense in the restricted classes. If, however, they have sufficient means to maintain themselves, there is no bar to their coming in.

JAPANESE IMMIGRATION

RIGHTS ENJOYED BY CANADIANS IN JAPAN

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I desire to make a correction in an answer to a question by the hon. member for Victoria City (Mr. Tolmie) with regard to the enjoyment of certain rights by Canadians in Japan, which question and answer will be found in Hansard of May 5th at pages 1513 and 1514.

The answer relates to the right of Canadian labourers to pursue their callings in Japan. In the last paragraph of answer No. 2 it is stated that:

Foreign labourers may not pursue their callings in Japan outside the limits of the former foreign settlements or the "mixed residence" areas without the express permission of the administrative authorities.

I am informed by Mr. Ohta, the Japanese Consul General in Ottawa, that this answer is bound to lead to a misconception. The Japanese Imperial Ordinance No. 352, dated the 28th July, 1899, provides that all aliens, regardless of the fact that some of them are not entitled by treaty or customary practice to freedom of residence in Japan, may reside, move or pursue their callings in any place outside the former foreign settlements or the "mixed residence" areas.

The Japanese Government, mainly in order to ameliorate the restrictions that had been put upon Chinese labourers, promulgated the above Ordinance with a proviso that alien labourers coming from countries having no commercial treaty with Japan or not entitled by customary practice to do so, may not pursue their callings outside the limits of the former foreign settlements or the "mixed residence" areas without the permission of the administrative authorities. It is needless to say, therefore, so Mr. Ohta informs me, that Canadian citizens, irrespective of their calling —labourer or non-labourer—stand outside the scope of this ordinance and are fully entitled to engage in business, etc., in any place within Japanese territory in common with the nationals of the most favoured nation.

In connection with the matter of land holding by aliens in Japan I am further informed by Mr. Ohta, who in these matters is advised and instructed by the Minister for Foreign Affairs at Tokio, that there is provided in the Japanese Civil Code a title of lease of movable and immovable property (besides the superficies and emphyteusis mentioned in No. 2 of the same answer) which all aliens alike with Japanese subjects can obtain for a period of not longer than twenty years; and further that the lease and emphyteusis (the term of the latter is from twenty to fifty years) can be renewed and the superficies can be created for any number of years by contract, tending practically to obliterate the difference from the ownership of land.

Consequently it is maintained by the Japanese Government that foreign residents in Japan are not subject to the least inconvenience in the leasing and holding of land, nor do they complain of the restrictions which still exist with respect to land ownership by an individual alien and which the Japanese Government hopes soon to remove.

I felt, Mr. Speaker, that in view of the answer which was given on the 5th instant I should at once direct the attention of the House to this correction as soon as it was brought to my notice.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk).

RIVER ST. JOHN WHARVES

Mr. HANSON:

1. Has the Government, or any member thereof, agreed with the Government of the Province of New Brunswick, or any member thereof, to take over from the Province of New Brunswick, all provincial wharves in tidal waters?

2. If so, will such agreement apply to provincial wharves in the River Saint John and the tributaries thereof?

Hon. Mr. KING (Kootenay):

1. No.

2. Answered by No. 1.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS—TIES

Mr. LEGER:

1. What quantity of railway ties were purchased by the Canadian National Railways from the first of September, 1921, to the thirty-first of March, 1922?

2. What quantity was purchased from each province of the Dominion?

3. What are the names of parties from whom said ties were purchased, and the quantity in each case?

4. What was the price paid per hundred in each province?

5. On what date were the contracts given?

Hon. Mr. KENNEDY:

1. 4,554,653 ties.

2. Nova Scotia, 150,430; Prince Edward Island, 2,000; New Brunswick, 677,280; Quebec, 551,731; Ontario, 1,180,900; Minnesota, 123,000, ties purchased in Minnesota are included so as to account for the total amount of ties purchased for the railway company, these ties were for use on the company's United States mileage; Manitoba, 95,729; Saskatchewan, 55,000; Alberta, 478,000; British Columbia, 1,240,583.

4. The prices paid for ties in Prince Edward Island, Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Quebec (except along the Transcontinental line), Ontario, Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta, for ties purchased in these provinces in small quantities the price was: $60 per 100 for No. 1 ties; $50 per 100 for No. 2 ties, and $30 per 100 for No. 3 ties. In large quantities prices were $70 for 100 for No. 1 ties, $60 per 100 for No. 2 ties, and $35 per 100 for No. 3 ties. In the Province of Quebec, along the Transcontinental railway the prices paid were: $55 per 100 for No. 1 ties, $45 per 100 for No. 2 ties, and $25 per 100 for No. 3 ties. In the Province of British Columbia the prices paid for small quantities of ties were: $50 per 100 for No. 1 ties, $40 per 100 for No. 2 ties, and $25 per 100 for No. 3 ties. In large quantities the prices paid were: $60 per 100 for No. 1 ties, $50 per 100 for No. 2 ties, and $30 per 100 for No. 3 ties.

5. Answered by No. 3.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS—MAILS

Mr. SPENCER:

1. Are any mails carried by the Canadian Pacific Railway Company which could be carried by the Canadian National Railways?

2. If so, how much do the contracts amount to?

Hon. Mr. MURPHY:

1 and 2. Not where the Canadian National Railways meet the requirements of the postal service equally as well.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS—WATER SUPPLY

Mr. FAFARD:

What price is paid by the Canadian National Railway for water supplied at St. Pierre station and Ste. Anne Lapocatiere station?

Hon. Mr. KENNEDY: St. Pierre, $1,440 per annum; Ste. Anne Lapocatiere, $1,000 per annum. The railway was notified in January last that the rate at Ste. Anne Lapocatiere would be increased to $2,400 per annum; this is considered excessive and the matter is at present under negotiation with the authorities at that point.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS—COAL

Mr. JONES:

1. What quantity of coal, if any, was imported from the United States by and for the use of the Canadian National Railways, during each of the months of January, February, March and April, 1922?

2. What were the prices paid for such coal?

3. Are any contracts or agreements for the purchase of United States coal by the Canadian National Railways for use on its lines still in existence?

4. If so, with whom have such contracts been made, what quantities are contracted for, and when are deliveries to be made?

5. Is it the intention of the Canadian National Railways to continue the policy of purchasing coal mined in the United States for use on its lines?

Hon Mr. KENNEDY:

1. January, Nil; February, 14,963 tons; March, 9,643 tons; April, 1,457 tons. This coal is all for use in the Province of Ontario.

2. F.O.B. cars mine $1.95 per ton; Ry. and Ferry rate to Cobourg, $2.81 per ton; total $4.76 per ton.

3. One contract only is in existence.

4. The Canadian National management has a contract with the Youghioheny & Ohio Coal Co., Cleveland, expiring December 31, 1923, for approximately 1,000,000 tons per annum. This tonnage covers Railway Company requirements for western and northern Ontario and lines Winnipeg and east, and basis of price per ton including duty is substantially lower per ton than Canadian coal can be obtained within the area referred to.

5. Preference is given Canadian coal and more Canadian than American is always bought by the management, but where American coal, including duty, can be delivered at certain Canadian points more cheaply than Canadian coal the management state, they will continue to buy to best advantage.

STEEL COLONIST CARS

Mr. WOODSWORTH:

1. What was the price of the all steel colonist cars, numbered 7328, 7329 and 7330, purchased from the Canada Car Company by the Canadian Northern Railway Company in the year 1919?

2. What price would be charged by the Canada Car Company for an all steel Parlour Chair Car of the same size as the above-mentioned colonist cars?

3. What price would be charged by the Pullman Company for an all steel Parlour Chair Car of the same size as the said colonist cars?

Hon. Mr. KENNEDY:

1. $32,500 each.

2 and 3. No information.

W. P. BROTHERTON—MAIL CONTRACT

Mr. GARLAND (Carleton):

1. Was W. P. Brotherton awarded a contract by the Post Office Department for the conveyance of mails between Gascons, County of Bonaventure, Quebec, and the A. Q. and W. Railway station, to expire on June 30th, 1926?
2. Is it the intention of the Postmaster General to terminate this contract on the third day of July, 1922?
3. If so, does the public interest require that this contract be terminated?
4. In the estimation of the Postmaster General, why does the public interest demand that this contract be cancelled?

Hon. Mr. MURPHY:

1. Yes.
2. Yes.

3 and 4. Under the Post Office Act, mail contracts involving an annual expenditure of less than $200 may be entered into without inviting public tenders, provided no higher rate be paid for the services to be performed than is ordinarily paid for services of a like nature under contracts made after public advertisement; and as such authority was acted on to award the contract in question to Mr. W. P. Brotherton at the rate of $150 per year, in the first instance, the same authority is relied upon to terminate it in the public interest.

MR. JOHN J. FORAN

Mr. LANCTOT:

1. When was Mr. John J. Foran appointed to the Civil Service, and at what salary?
2. When was he promoted, to what position, and at what increase?
3. How many changes have taken place in his classification, at what dates and what increase did he receive on each occasion?
4. What is the amount of back-pay received by him as a result of the above mentioned changes in classification?

Hon. Mr. COPP:

1. May 1, 1913, at $1,000 per annum.
2. Answered by No. 3.
3. Two changes: June 1, 1920, Lithographic Expert, increase $420 per annum; August 1, 1920, Supervisor of Lithographic Purchases, increase $180 per annum.
4. $278.33.

ARMED CRUISERS ON DETROIT RIVER

Mr. CHURCH:

1. Is the Government aware that the State Government of Michigan is placing gun boats and armed cruisers on the Detroit River?
2. If so, what action does the Government propose to take to protect and ensure the safety of the thousands of Canadians and the many Canadian ships lawfully using this River?

[Mr. W. C. Kennedy.]

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE KING:

1. No.
2. Answered by No. 1.

ONTARIO—FEDERAL SUBSIDIES

Mr. CHURCH:

1. What Federal cash subsidy has been paid to the Government of the Province of Ontario during the years 1919, 1920, 1921 and 1922?
2. What Federal check is there to see that this subsidy is spent in accordance with the provisions of the British North America Act, 1867?

Hon. Mr. FIELDING:

1. Fiscal years 1918-19, $2,396,378.88; 1919-20, $2,396,378.88; 1920-21, $2,396,378.88; 1921-22, $2,396,378.88.
2. The subsidy is paid by the Dominion Government in accordance with the terms of the British North America Act. Responsibility for the expenditure of the money rests with the government of the province.

CANADIAN PACIFIC—COAL LANDS

Mr. SHAW:

1. Has the Canadian Pacific Railway Company transferred, or caused to be transferred, to the Government, the fifty thousand acres of coal lands, referred to in the Crowsnest Pass Subsidy Act of 1897?
2. If so, when was the said acreage transferred?
3. Does the Government now own the whole or any part of said coal lands?
4. If not, when, to whom and for what consideration were the said lands transferred?

Hon. Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil):

1. Yes.
2. Transferred on the 14th September, 1905, and certificate of title issued 27th November following.
3. The whole.
4. Answered by No. 3.

IMMIGRATION DEPARTMENT APPOINTMENTS

Hon. Mr. STEVENS:

May 19—Having reference to the question appearing on page 1972 of Hansard which reads as follows:—

"Has the Government received application from W. W. B. McInnes to be appointed Immigration Commissioner with Headquarters at Canton" and the answer to this as follows:

"No formal application received."

1. Has the Government received any informal application, verbal or in writing from the said W. W. B. McInnes or other persons, to be appointed to represent the Immigration Department in China for the purpose of dealing with Chinese Immigration to Canada, or for a like purpose?
2. If so, is it the intention of the department to make any such appointment?

Hon. Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil):

1. Mr. W. W. B. McInnes has discussed the matter with the minister, but the minister is not convinced that there is any necessity for such an appointment.

2. Answered by No. 1.

RAILWAY COMMISSION—CHIEF TRAFFIC OFFICER

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT:

1. Was there a temporary appointment made to replace Chief Traffic Officer Hardwell, on the Railway Commission?

2. If so, what is the name of the appointee, what is his salary, where did he reside, and was he appointed by the Civil Service Commission?

Hon Mr. KENNEDY:

1. No temporary appointment to replace Chief Traffic Officer Hardwell on the Railway Commission has been made.

2. See answer to No. 1.

L'ASSOMPTION LIGHT KEEPERS

Mr. SEGUIN:

1. What are the names and addresses of the light keepers in the County of l'Assomption who were dismissed from the service from the 21st of September, 1911, to January 1922?

2. Who recommended these dismissals?

3. What are the names and addresses of those appointed to replace the above-mentioned lightkeepers?

4. Who recommended their appointment?

Hon. Mr. LAPOINTE:

1. None. Prior to 1914, however, a light was maintained at Ile a la Bague and the keeper thereof, Louis Dubois, was dismissed for political partisanship as a result of an investigation held on representations made by Mr. Jos. Morin, K.C., of Montreal, supported by a petition from certain electors of Repentigny parish. Mr. Eloi Thouin, of Repentigny, was appointed to replace him on recommendation of Mr. Morin, K.C. On the discontinuance of this light in 1914, Mr. Thouin was transferred to the keepership of the back light of the range at Ile Lebel.

2, 3 and 4. Answered by No. 1.

IMMIGRATION—ENTRY REGULATIONS

Mr. KELLNER:

1. Have immigrants entering Canada in 1922 complied with the entry regulations?

2. How many immigrants have entered to date?

TARIFF INQUIRY 1920-1921

Mr. COOTE:

1. What was the total cost of the tariff inquiry carried on by Sir Henry Drayton, Honourable Doctor Tolmie and Honourable Senator Robertson in the years 1920-1921?

2. Has a report of this Tariff Commission been published?

3. If not, is it the intention of the Government to have the report published?

Hon. Mr. FIELDING:

1. $17,153.39.

2 and 3. A verbatim record was taken of the proceedings at the various sittings. It is not the intention to publish this.

SYDNEY INDIAN RESERVE

Mr. MARTELL:

1. Who is the Medical attendant to the Indians on the Reservation at Sydney, Nova Scotia?
2. How many persons, including women and children, are on the said reservation?
3. How many Indians, including women and children, have been treated by the Medical attendant since 1918?
4. Did the Medical attendant have an assistant since 1918 in treating and operating upon said Indians?
5. What diseases were such Indians treated for?
6. Where were they treated?
7. What operations, if any, were performed since 1918, who operated and who assisted?
8. What did each operation cost and how was the money divided as between regular Doctor and his assistant?

Hon. Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil):

1. C. J. Sparrow, M.D.
2. 137 according to last census taken.
3. No record of general medical attendance.
4. Yes.
5. Diseases requiring general medical attendance.
6. Treated in their homes. Operations performed in the following hospitals: 1 in City of Sydney Hospital; 10 in Glace Bay General Hospital; 1 in St. Joseph's Hospital, Glace Bay; 2 in Ross Memorial Hospital, Sydney.
7. Operations performed since 1918: Appendicitis, 7; peritonitis, 2; tubercular abscess, 1; tubercular femur, 1; removal ovarian cyst, 1; facial tumor, 1; abscess, 1; total, 14.
8. Operations cost as follows: Appendicitis, 1, $75 to Dr. W. H. Rice; appendicitis, 6, $450 to Dr. E. O. McDonald; peritonitis, 2, $150 to Dr. E. O. McDonald; tubercular abscess, $50 to Dr. E. O. McDonald; tubercular femur, $50 to Dr. E. O. McDonald; abscess, $50 to Dr. E. O. McDonald; removal ovarian cyst, $75 to Dr. E. O. McDonald; facial tumor, $25 to Dr. W. J. Egan.

THE BUDGET

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON THE ANNUAL FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The House resumed from Friday, May 26, the debate on the motion of Hon. W. S. Fielding (Minister of Finance), that Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair for the House to go into committee of Ways and Means, and the proposed amendment thereto of Hon. Sir Henry Drayton.

Hon. CHARLES STEWART (Argenteuil, Minister of the Interior): Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to take up very much of the time of the House this afternoon in discussing the budget; I wish shortly to direct the attention of hon. members, if I can, to the situation prevailing in Canada with which the Government has to contend at the moment. Let me first, however, congratulate my friend and colleague, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) on the long and valuable service which he has been able to render to the people of Canada, both as Minister of Finance, and, for a short time, as critic of the measures offered by the government in office. His career might well, I think, be the envy of all parliamentarians. Perhaps not many will live to sit in Parliament during sixteen sessions, much less to deliver sixteen budget speeches. Perhaps none of us will have the opportunity of being identified so long with the public life of Canada or of attaining the experience that my hon. friend must bring to matters of national finance.

One cannot very well discuss present conditions in Canada without looking backward. But in dealing with this matter I wish to approach it in no critical mood; I simply wish to trace some of the principal events which have occurred in the political life of Canada since the introduction of what was known in our young days as the National Policy. The introduction of that policy had the effect of concentrating industry in the larger centres of eastern Canada; it had a tendency to bring about the establishment in urban centres—in Toronto, Montreal, Brantford, and a few centres of that character—the manufacturing industry which had formerly been centred in the smaller towns and villages of Ontario and of eastern Canada generally. I remember very well that in 1890 I was engaged in agriculture in the old province of Ontario. It has been said that during the past year we have been passing through the most critical period, so far as agriculture is concerned, that Canada has seen in its history. My recollection is that during the years from 1892 until at least 1895, we had a much more serious condition of affairs, so far as agricultural pursuits were concerned, than has prevailed even in recent times. Not only that, similar conditions prevailed in our industrial life. I lived in the county of Simcoe in those days, and I will remember meeting a mechanic who had travelled all the way from St. John, New Brunswick, to that part of Ontario without securing employment. The conditions were said to be so severe that we might never recover from them, and it was affirmed that the policy that had been pursued by the government was not in the best interests of Canada; that a protectionist policy had brought about those conditions. Mr. Speaker, although I have been an ardent Liberal all my life, I do not think I would be prepared to blame the fiscal policy of the government of the day for all the difficulties experienced at that time. But that it had something to do with them, I think we will all agree. In 1896, you will remember, Sir Wilfrid Laurier came into power and the Liberal party took office. Although some changes in the matter of fiscal policy did take place—changes, for instance, affecting the exportation of our cattle—they were criticized by hon. gentlemen then in opposition from much the same point of view that the present fiscal policy has been criticized: on the ground that the changes were not sufficient to bring about the desired result. I do not intend to enter into the matter in detail, but it has been frequently stated that the period from 1896 to 1911 was one of the most prosperous periods that Canada has enjoyed since Confederation, nor am I going to claim that that was wholly due to the policy of the government of the day. Anyone who studies the matter closely will agree that there are cycles in the history of every country in which prosperity seems to reach the highest pinnacle and is then succeeded by a period of depression. Notwithstanding the efforts that may be put forth by governments, we do have periods of extreme deflation. At best, all the government is able to do is by legislation, in as large a sense as possible, to afford relief, in those places where it seems to be necessary from the effects that may result upon trade or upon the business of the country.

In 1911 a change of government took place. I think every hon. member who comes from western Canada will agree that at least from our viewpoint a serious mistake was made when reciprocity was rejected by the people of Canada. Be that as it may, that was the decision of the people. Those who have been in public life for any considerable length of time know that changes take place, men step in and out by the will of the people; so that no one need quarrel with their decision. But as I remember conditions in 1914 just prior to the outbreak of the war, we had in western Canada a serious situation. There was a great deal of unemployment—and I think that was true also of eastern Canada. Then the war broke out and the whole force of Canada was thrown into the war effort; political questions were, for the moment, lost sight of, and we joined hand in hand in the determination to win. Naturally this has imposed a tremendous obligation upon Canada. During all these years there have been growing up, mainly in the eastern part of Canada, but gradually extending westward, strong manufacturing organizations. And alongside of that development the plains of western Canada have been settled by farmers, little towns have grown up, and small industries have been established; but in the main the business of the people of western Canada, and indeed of the people of all Canada, is that of agriculture.

During this period some reduction in the tariff took place—I am speaking now of the period from 1911 forward—but not any very serious changes. There was a slight reduction in the tariff on farm implements, more particularly those most used on the farms. I see my hon. friends smiling. I want to be absolutely fair about this thing, so that we shall arrive at a proper understanding. There was, I say, a slight reduction in the tariff on farm implements, and in order to help the Greater Production campaign put on by the late government, tractors were put upon the free list. This, no doubt, had some effect in assisting agriculture, since any reducton in the tariff upon the implements of production, no matter of what kind, is bound to afford some relief. On the other hand, during the war period this country assumed tremendous obligations. Our public debt increased from $336,000,000 until in 1921 it stood at $2,427,296,789. This tremendous obligation was incurred through the prosecution of the war, and this public debt is an overhead charge that must be taken into account in considering tariff changes. Not only that; just before the close of the war every endeavour of the Canadian people in all lines and in every artery was directed towards the production of war material, and of war material alone, and in consequence, at the end of the war, we found our stocks for home consumption very much depleted. I well remember discussing these matters with the premiers of the western provinces on the day the armistice was signed, and the one thing we had in mind then was the securing of employment, the re-establishing of the men who would be returning from overseas, which we anticipated would be somewhat early. We did not anticipate that for two or three years there would be a period of inflation in manufacturing and business generally. The drop that we expected to occur after the signing of the armistice when we had to absorb all these men, did not come. On the contrary, the manufacturers of this country found their plants working at full speed in order to make up for the depletion that had taken place in stocks for ordinary home consumption during the war. We passed through two or three years of this period, and it was perhaps our period of greatest prosperity, for two years at least. Speaking of western Canada more particularly, in 1920 the farmer who had a crop never had a bigger one, and never got a better price for it. Unfortunately for western Canada, in many areas there was no crop at all and had not been for a number of years. A great portion of our difficulty arises from the fact that our farming industry has been patchy for the last three or four years.

Then what happened? In 1921, the increased activity in manufacturing that had followed the signing of the armistice came to a sudden stop; business was at a standstill, and manufacturers and merchants found their warehouses and shops filled with goods, with no one to buy them. The farmers who reaped a crop in 1921 had great difficulty in disposing of it, they found that the crop, which had been raised at an enormous cost had dropped back to pre-war prices. So, almost overnight, following the period of inflation, manufacturers, merchants and farmers, in fact the whole people of Canada, found themselves in an embarrassing situation. The manufacturers were forced to stop producing, and the farmers were unable to meet their obligations. These difficulties continued for a year or two. One of the reasons for these difficulties, so far as agriculture is concerned, is that we were not favoured with good crops. If I may cite the experience on my own farm, I made more money in the years prior to the war than I did during the war period. That was largely because, except in one or two years of the war period, we were not favoured with weather conditions that enabled us to reap a full crop. The conditions I have described applied from one end of Canada to the other, and to-day we find ourselves taking stock. The agriculturists complain that conditions are such as have never before prevailed in Canada. I take issue with that. I say that we did in 1892 have similar conditions, and in my opinion they were even worse, but we recovered, and we had similar conditions in the industrial world from 1892 to 1894, but we also recovered from that.

I agree with one thing that my hon. friend the ex-Minister of Finance (Sir Henry Drayton) said, that we need a larger spirit of optimism in connection with these matters than perhaps we admit upon all occasions. In addition to the great public debt with which the people of Canada find themselves saddled to-day, another obligation has fallen upon our shoulders. The great privately-owned railway system that in the days of our prosperity we fondly hoped we should require in its entirety, has practically all become the property of the government. Railways were built in all parts of Canada, and there was duplication to some extent, and to-day we find ourselves with these roads on our hands. I am not finding fault particularly with the position in which we find ourselves with respect to the national railways, but I say that there can be no question that the railway problem adds to the responsibilities of government and to the difficulties in carrying on public affairs, inasmuch as these utilities are not self-sustaining but year after year are faced with a deficit upon operation, in addition to their fixed charges. While the policy has been pursued of relegating to the future the charges that accrue from year to year upon our railways, I question if the people of Canada can continue that policy very much longer. I think many of us who are interested in the public operation of these utilities will agree that there must be a time when the fixed charges upon them must cease; that we cannot keep on piling up deficits in operation and adding fixed charges to the capitalization of these corporations. Very shortly, if not indeed at once the revenues of Canada will have to be drawn upon to take care of deficits in operation as well as the fixed charges, or else the over-capitalization upon the railways will be such that it will be utterly impossible at any time, under any circumstances, for these railways to meet their obligations. The $466,938,359 of ordinary expenditure, shown by the Minister of Finance, for this year would look like a fairly respectable burden for a population of less than nine millions of people to meet. In addition there is an overhead upon our railways of some seventy-two million odd dollars, accounted for by interest charges and expected deficits in operation.

Very little criticism, except of a captious character so far as I can learn, has been offered of the budget presented last week. In some quarters the contention has been made that there is no real tariff reduction. Indeed, I think, that is the criticism offered by the ex-Minister of Finance (Sir Henry Drayton)—that the tariff reduction made is not worth while, is not effective, and that it is more than wiped out by increased taxation. The basis of the criticism offered by the hon. gentleman rests upon the policy adopted by the Liberal Convention in this city in 1919, upon which occasion it was definitely set out that the aim of the Liberals of Canada, practically, was that there should be no duty upon the implements of production. I have not the resolution then adopted at present before me, but at all events that is what it meant. The accusation is made that the Liberal party won the last election upon the terms of that resolution. On the other hand the Minister of Finance cited a resolution moved by him at the last session of parliament which, he claimed, set out the situation as it existed at that time. We must admit that a situation has arisen, not only in Canada but in the United States as well, that we cannot help but take note of it. In 1919 we had a reasonable assurance that the reciprocity agreement negotiated in 1911 might be accepted by the United States in part if not in full, but to-day that hope has disappeared; the Fordney Bill introduced at Washington places upon imports of natural products from Canada into the United States tariff restrictions that were unheard of in the past. We have in Canada to-day a difficult situation as regards the agricultural and manufacturing industries; and I believe this is the time when the government should move slowly and carefully in the direction of removing duties on any articles instead of advancing with any rapidity. My hon. friend from Strathcona (Mr. Warner), speaking the other night said that it would be a very difficult thing for the Minister of Interior to go back and secure a seat in the province of Alberta. Perhaps it would; I did not secure a seat in that province at the last election. When the opportunity comes I shall endeavour to secure one; but until that time does come I will have to abide the consequences; I have always been willing to accept the results of any political warfare. I have little or no disagreement with my hon. friend from Strathcona, or any of my hon. friends sitting opposite. That, I think, is not the spirit in which we can secure what is necessary to revive agricultural and business interests in Canada. Rather we should all get together in this connection if that be at all possible. When it came to the question of selecting articles upon which tariff reductions should be made I think the Minister of Finance exercised due care in trying, so far as it was humanly possible, to avoid the disturbance of business and agricultural interests. That policy undoubtedly does not meet with the approval of many of my hon. friends. Perhaps it does not go as far as even I should be willing to go in this matter, but I am convinced of this fact: That it would be unwise to be too drastic at this time when there is hope—and in my opinion a very great hope—for the revival of the agricultural industry; when perhaps there is the prospect of a better system of marketing our wheat; and when more attention is being paid to the securing of markets abroad, which, I think, is one of the important things this government must undertake and pursue to the fullest possible extent. When these things are accomplished, as they must be accomplished —because it is an utter impossibility that we can thrive agriculturally in Western Canada, or indeed that business can be carried on successfully in Eastern Canada with the high freight rates prevailing to-day; and, of course, we have the assertion of the railway companies that they cannot operate with insufficient freight rates—then we can look with hope to the future.

I am not going to discuss the freight rate question at any length because it is at present before a special committee and a report will shortly be forthcoming from that committee. But let me say that this is, in my opinion, one of the very great factors in connection with the revival of our trade in Canada. It is of great importance that we should have a reduction in freight rates and better marketing facilities; these will help us in a much larger degree than any attempt at the moment to deal drastically with the tariff. The government is being criticized very severely because of the tariff reductions it has already made. For the life of me I cannot understand why that should be so, except that people get into the habit of living under a protection, and we may be sure that they will raise a commotion when you touch them at any quarter. On the other hand, we cannot ignore the fact that to-day we are largely shut out from the United States markets by the tariff wall erected by the Fordney tariff. But it must be borne in mind that we have not been slow in notifying the United States government that, as soon as they are ready to do business with us in connection with tariff reductions or interchange of trade, this Government is ready to deal with them. Therefore, all that I desire to say this afternoon is that, having in mind the condition in which we find agriculture and other business to-day, and the commercial relationships that exist throughout Canada, it seems to me that this Government was well advised to move cautiously with respect to tariff reductions.

We have been criticised with respect to the new taxation. I have tried briefly to show you the obligations of the people of Canada and to bring to your attention the fact that we cannot continue to postpone payment from the revenues of Canada of the losses accruing annually on the railways of the country, and, that sooner or later, we must take care that they shall grow no larger, if we are to make a success of this enterprise. Having these things in mind, we must, of necessity, have a much greater revenue than that obtained in the past, and, in order to secure that revenue, the policy of the Government has been, as far as possible, to avoid placing upon any industry or business an undue burden of taxation. I think it is a safe axiom with respect to taxation, that you must tax the people who can best afford to pay, and tax industry where it can best afford to be taxed. I think there is a comparative unanimity of feeling with respect to the sales tax, which, perhaps, we have made a little more severe; and it may be contended in some measure by our friends in the Opposition that we should have taxed luxuries to a far greater extent than we have. That may very well be a matter for consideration. One of my hon. friends, in discussing this matter the other day, mentioned the fact that the income tax was not sufficiently severe in so far as large incomes were concerned. It is not as severe, Mr. Speaker, as the income tax of Great Britain, one will admit, but that it is a fairly stiff tax on incomes of large dimensions, no one will deny. The question whether the individual who is in receipt of a smaller income should not be given some consideration is a matter, perhaps, which might very well be considered at some future time. It is an extremely easy matter to 4 p.m. suggest the placing of taxation upon luxuries, and I agree with the suggestion that it is an easy matter to suggest that the taxation should be heavier on the larger incomes. There may be something to be said about that. On the whole, the income tax and taxation of that character seem to be fairly well adjusted. I am not saying there should not be a readjustment. There will, of necessity, require to be a readjustment. The one object we have had in view in placing taxes upon business has been to avoid taxing the basic industries. If we have not succeeded in that— and undoubtedly many hon. members will disagree with us on that point—on the whole, I think it has met with a very favourable reception by the people of Canada, and I trust it will meet out our expectations, and that we will not be adding to the public debt of Canada, what, in my opinion at all events, rightfully should have been charged to the revenue account annually. I feel that the effort of the hon. Minister of Finance will not perhaps satisfy my hon. friends of the official Opposition in that it goes too far, and, my hon. friends of the Progressive element in that it does not go far enough; but the Government, having in mind all the conditions that prevailed in Canada, felt that this effort in reduction of the tariff, as well as in the raising of revenue, would meet with fairly generous approval throughout the whole of Canada.

Mr. J. FRED JOHNSTON (Last Mountain): Mr. Speaker, my first words this afternoon will be words of congratulation and appreciation of the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding), who has been permitted to introduce his sixteenth budget in a Canadian parliament. Those of us from Western Canada have a very warm spot in our hearts for the hon. Minister of Finance. We remember that in 1911, through his efforts, an arrangement was entered into with the United States for reciprocal trade in natural products. We remember also that, in endeavouring to give effect to that arrangement, he and his party went down to defeat, but not through any fault of the electors of the province from which I come, because we returned to this parliament ninety per cent of our representatives as supporters of reciprocity with the United States. I also wish to congratulate the hon. minister on his courage in placing before this House and the country the true financial position of Canada. It is not a nice thing to review, and I am sure the minister himself must have felt the task a very heavy one, having regard to the budgets that he had been privileged to present to this House in years gone by. In those days our revenues were buoyant, and he was able to tell the country that we had a surplus, instead of a deficit. But on this occasion he told the House that the income of Canada for the last year was fifty-three millions some hundred thousand dollars odd less than the year previous. He also informed us that the estimated revenue for the incoming year was $134,000,000 less than his estimated expenditure—not a very nice picture to present to any body of people. Nevertheless, it is a fact, and he stated it to the House. He also informed the House that, during the last year, we added eighty-six and a half millions to the national debt of the country—something for my hon. friends to the right of me to contemplate. We were told that during the period that has elapsed since the cessation of hostilities Great Britain has paid off some five hundred million pounds of her war debt while we continued to add to ours. My hon. friends to the right are always ready to take the credit for everything that was done during the war; I hope they are just as ready to shoulder the responsibility for this condition of affairs. The fact remains, nevertheless, that by reason of our participation in the war there has been added to the national debt over $2,000,000,000, while during the last decade our population has increased very slightly. The result is that the citizens of Canada have shouldered a very heavy obligation in the way of increased taxation. While I do not like being retrospective, I cannot refrain from saying that in my opinion the heavy taxes imposed upon the people at the present time could, to some degree at least, have been avoided had former governments, during the war particularly, taxed wealth where they had a chance to do so. I have no criticism for the immediate predecessor (Sir Henry Drayton) of the Minister of Finance. As a matter of fact, I think he did what he could. But the Minister of Finance who held office during the war lost a real chance, in my opinion, to tax war wealth during that period. The profiteers have escaped and taken to cover, and we are now faced with the responsibility of raising huge sums, when our people are little able to bear heavy taxation, and at a time when we have great unemployment in the country. During the election campaign we Progressives contended that this was a time when the most stringent economy should be practised in Canada, and that contention has been amply borne out by the statement of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) as presented to Parliament a few days ago.

I come now to a very brief review of the reductions in the tariff and the increase in the sales tax. I wish to say to the Minister of Finance and the Government that the reductions in the customs tariff are good in so far as they go; but the great trouble is that they do not go far enough. While I am sure we all appreciated the splendid effort of the minister in presenting his budget, I could not help thinking, while he was repeating the reductions, nearly all of which were 2½ per cent, that one might very well suppose himself out in the countryside at an auction sale where the auctioneer was experiencing great difficulty in getting the bidders to go above a very low minimum, because it was 2½ per cent, and 2½ per cent, and again 2½ per cent, all the way through. I could have hoped, for the sake of variety at least, that the minister had departed somewhat from this even tenor and taken an upward trend. I am sorry that these reductions are not greater, because I believe that if they were we should have a materially increased production in the country. In the matter of tariffs, it strikes me that we Canadians are very much in the position of a man stuck in the mire trying to pull himself out by his shoestrings; he might work very assiduously, but the only result would be that he would bury himself further, and finally be engulfed. If we are to increase production and put this country in that position which is rightly hers, we shall not do so by conceding 2½ per cent reductions on the necessities of life and on the implements of production that are needed by those people who, in my opinion, are the real wealth producers of Canada.

Now, as regards the increase in the sales tax, I can only describe this as bad; I cannot view it from any other standpoint. And in imposing this increase of fifty per cent in this tax the minister, in effect, takes away with one hand what he gives with the other. It is true that the revenue derived from the imposition of this increase in the sales tax will, or at least should, all find its way into the public treasury, while under the customs duties only about one dollar in three or four finds its way there. Having regard to that fact I favour the sales tax as against the customs tariff. But this tax is imposed at a time when our people are least able to bear it; it takes from the people not in proportion to their ability to pay but in proportion to their purchase of goods. It takes from the poor man with a family of between five and ten children and a salary of $1,000, equally as it takes from the man with the income of $50,000 or from the millionaire. No one can gainsay that. Under the imposition of the new taxes, we have not attempted, in this budget, to tax wealth, or to exact from it any heavier taxes. Why, then, should we at this time impose this fifty per cent increase upon the workers of the land? Let us view this matter in relation to immigration into, and emigration from, this country. There is no such tax levied in the United States; there is no general sales tax. If such a tax had been imposed in that country last year the government would have received $850,000,000. So that there is some inducement for our labouring classes, under the circumstances, to go to the United States. It is obvious that we are placing our people in a much worse position than the labourers of the United States are in. I sincerely hope that the Government do not view the sales tax as a permanent fixture in our scheme of taxation.

In connection with the income tax assessment, we give some regard, in the matter of exemptions, to the man with the small salary. Under that act we grant that it takes $2,000 for a married man to live, and we accordingly exempt him up to that amount. We also give him $200 exemption on every dependent child. Under the sales tax, however, there is absolutely no exemption. In the United States, on the other hand, they assume that it takes $2,500 for a man and wife to live, and they give an exemption for dependent children up to $400. We give no exemption to any classes under the sales tax, so that the man with a salary of $500 or $1,000 is in just the same position, in this regard, as the man with the income of $50,000.

So far my remarks might be termed critical; but I have always endeavoured, when I have found it necessary to criticise or tear down anything, to offer something in its place. I shall therefore try to give what seems to me to be the solution of our problems. I think these might very well be classified under three heads: First, immigration; second, increased production; and third, wider and better markets.

Now, in regard to immigration, what is the situation? We find that during the last decade we have lost over 1,250,000 of our people. We have in Canada to-day a population of 8,725,000. Had we held the immigrants that came to our shores during the past decade we should have had, with the natural increase in population, 11,000,000 people in the country to-day. It seems to me that we might be very well employed, when considering immigration matters, in giving some thought to this fact, and in trying to find out why we are losing our people. Is it good business for Canada to continue spending money in bringing people into this country by the front door while they are going oue by way of the back door? And yet that is what has been happening. No one will deny, Mr. Speaker, that we have a country capable of sustaining many times our present population. All are agreed on that. And what we should attempt to solve is the question why we cannot hold the people that we do get. I have my own opinion about this, and it is briefly stated. Before we can hope to hold our population we must of necessity change the economic conditions under which these people have to labour. I have stated in this House before that you never find people running away from a good thing; and they are not going to leave Canada if Canada gives them an opportunity to make good. I could recite many unsatisfactory conditions as they exist, but I am not here to decry the country that we all love so well, nor to paint conditions as they exist to-day in western Canada in a blacker hue than has already been done. None of us want to do that. But it seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that if western Canada is to be given any redress, plain words must be spoken in this Parliament. I submit, then, that if we are to solve our immigration problem we must remove the obstacles that prevent our people undertaking the development of our natural resources, or that hinder those already engaged in that development.

In regard to increased production, according to a recent survey, we have in western Canada within fifteen miles of existing lines of railway some 25,000,000 or 30,000,000 acres of arable land. Last year we produced about 300,000,000 bushels of wheat. Our average yield per acre is 14 bushels. If we bring this 25,000,000 acres of vacant land under cultivation we would have a return of 350,000,000 bushels of wheat, or 16 per cent more than our total yield last year. Now, in solving our immigration problem we would, in a large degree, solve our railway problem, for the increase in our population would lead to the increase in our wheat production, which in turn would help our railways. Railways exist on freight and passenger traffic—mainly the former. If we can give our railways 16 per cent more wheat to haul, and the like amount of incoming freight, we will have gone a long way toward solving that problem. And there is no disputing the fact that it is an urgent problem, because we all know that our National Railways were operated at a deficit of $72,000,000 this year, a slight improvement over the preceding year when the deficit was $2,500,000 more. These matters are fundamental and should have the earnest consideration of the Government.

As to wider markets, I would revert to the attempt made by my hon. friend, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) in 1911, and I wish to congratulate and to thank him for making another endeavour a few months ago to effect a better trade arrangement with the United States. My right hon. friend who leads the official Opposition (Mr. Meighen) and those associated with him, during their term of office put through certain trade agreements with France and the British West Indies. It may surprise my right hon. friend to know that during the late campaign I gave to him and his party every credit for widening Canada's markets to that extent. But, if it was good business for Canada to enter into trade agreements with France and the British West Indies, I submit, Mr. Speaker, that it would be much better business for us to make every endeavour to arrange a trade agreement with the United States. Last year our exports to the United States amounted to $542,322,000, with imports to the value of $856,176,000; to France $27,000,000 and $19,000,000 respectively; to the British West Indies $16,000,000 and $24,000,000 respectively. A comparison of these figures will show that we did more business with the United States in two weeks than we did with the British West Indies in the whole fifty-two weeks; and that we did more business with the United States in three weeks than we did with France during the whole year. So, I repeat, if it is good business to effect trade agreements with France and the British West Indies, it follows that it is much better business to enter into a trade agreement with the United States. But, although my hon. friends to the right negotiated those trade agreements with France and the British West Indies, yet they are opposed to closer trade relations with the United States. Their attitude is very hard to understand. In view of the fact that wider markets are so essential to the development of our country.

In connection with the question of better markets, I wish to mention a matter that has been engaging the attention of one of our standing committees for some weeks, and will very shortly be brought before this House in a definite way. For that reason I propose only to mention it; I refer to the Wheat Board. Despite anything that has been said, I feel that the farmers of western Canada are entitled to some kind of selling agency to handle their wheat crop. And I wish to dispel the erroneous idea that has gotten into the minds of the people of eastern Canada that as a result of the formation of such a board flour and wheat products will cost more to our Canadian consumers than would otherwise be the case. That is an absolutely wrong impression, Mr. Speaker. In the marketing of our wheat I have always felt that we as producers have been our worst enemies November 1 is settlement day in western Canada; when the banks, the implement manufacturing firms, and so on, are looking to the farmer to settle his accounts. The result is that the wheat is rushed onto the market and sold whether or not there is a real demand for it. Last year the United States, knowing the conditions in Britain and Europe, rushed their exportable surplus onto the market early, with the result that when the Canadian western wheat became available, the demand for wheat on the other side had been, for the time being, supplied. Our wheat was forced on the market; the producers being driven to sell by their creditors, with the result that the market was glutted and great depression in prices ensued. That is all that the western producer is asking for—an agency to step in there, take control of that wheat, supply the market when there is a demand and hold the wheat off the market when there is no demand. I believe it will result in benefit to the producer as well as to every class of people in this country if the producer is enabled to get what his commodity will bring on the open market. That is all we are asking. The western wheat producer is not asking for protection or for special privilege.

I now come, Mr. Speaker, to a brief consideration of the amendment moved by the hon. member for West York (Sir Henry Drayton). The hon. member and those associated with him are condemning the Government for not doing something which he and those associated with him would not themselves do. They are condemning the Government through this amendment for not doing what he and all the supporters of his party said during the last campaign would bring blue ruin to Canada if it were put into effect. He is condemning the Government for committing a great sin against the political morality of this country; yet he and those behind this motion are not, so far as I can see, doing anything else than carrying out a little political manoeuvering for party advantage. Having said that, Mr. Speaker, I want to make my position clear. I criticise the Government from a wholly different angle—because they have not given effect to their platform as it has been quoted in the amendment before the House. Now, I am going to read that part of the amendment, Mr. Speaker, because it appeals to me. If one goes to a restaurant and is presented with a good menu, he is apt to go back there again; and this, to me, is a very good menu. I am going to read this declaration of policy in order that it may be incorporated in the few remarks which I am making, and also to bring it again to the attention of the Government. It says:

> That to these ends, wheat, wheat flour and all products of wheat; the principal articles of food; farm implements and machinery; farm tractors; mining, flour and saw mill machinery and repair parts thereof; rough and partly dressed lumber; gasoline, illuminating, lubricating and fuel oils; nets, net twines, and fishermen's equipments; cements, and fertilizers, should be free from customs duties, as well as the raw material entering into same.
> That the British preference be increased to 50 per cent of the general tariff.
> And the Liberal Party hereby pledges itself to implement by legislation the provisions of this resolution when returned to power.

That is a good bill of fare, Mr. Speaker. I subscribe to every word of it, and I criticise the Government, not that I would have expected them to go the whole road this session, but that they have not gone further than they have. I had looked with every confidence to the Government to bring down a progressive policy at this time. To say that I am disappointed is putting it mildly, because I believe that if we as a people are ever going to get out of the woods, so to speak, we shall have to right-about-face on this policy of ours. We have been endeavouring for over forty years to make something of this country under a protective policy; we see where we have landed, and I am sorry that the Government have not given us a lead in the other direction. I can only hope that before another session the Government will have considered the matter and will come to Parliament with a much different statement from that with which we have been greeted this year.

I want to say, Mr. Speaker, in conclusion—

Mr. MEIGHEN: Will the hon. gentleman permit me a question there? He states that he would not expect the Government to go the whole road of that resolution this session. Did not he himself vote in favour of the same resolution as proposed by the hon. member for Brome (Mr. McMaster) the year before, expressing his willingness in that way to "go the whole road" then?

Mr. JOHNSTON (Last Mountain): Well, I do not know whether my right hon. friend refers to the motion of the hon. member for Brome moved last year or the motion moved some sessions ago.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The session before this resolution was passed the hon. member voted in favour of a motion requesting the government of the day to "go the whole road" then.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Last Mountain): The year before this resolution was passed?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Last Mountain): Does my right hon. friend refer to a motion of the hon. member for Brome on the address?

Mr. MEIGHEN: It was either on the address or on the budget.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Last Mountain): Well, I have to inform my hon. friend that he is entirely wrong; I did not support that.

Mr. MEIGHEN: On the budget, I think it was.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Last Mountain): I did not support the motion of the hon. member for Brome on the address in the spring session of 1919, if that is what my right hon. friend refers to. However, in conclusion, I wish to say that I have always stood for a united Canada; but I think it my duty to warn this Government that if it is thought that western Canada can be tied indefinitely to a high protective policy, those who hold that view had better revise it. I hope that some weight may be given to my words upon this matter. As I stated, I have always stood for a united Canada, and believe that a policy can be evolved that will be fair to all classes of our people and will tend to a development in this country that is so greatly needed at the present time.

Mr. J. J. HUGHES (King's, P.E.I.): Mr. Speaker, the annual national accounting was looked forward to with greater interest than usual this year, because most people in Canada knew that the times were abnormal and that all was not well with the country, but I think a good many did not realize to the full the seriousness of the situation. I think even some members of the House even now, including the hon. ex-Minister of Finance (Sir Henry Drayton) do not fully realize the gravity of present conditions.

Let us consider for a moment just what are the present conditions. To begin with, the net debt of Canada is $2,428,000,000, and that does not include the railway bond guarantees of $300,000,000 odd. If these were included, the net debt would be two and three-quarter billions, and the gross debt over three billions of dollars. We have the revenues decreasing, and the national debt increasing at the rate of about $90,000,000 a year. These figures are so large that the ordinary person cannot comprehend them; I know I cannot. Perhaps we can understand the situation a little better by looking at it from another point of view. The interest alone last year was $140,000,000, or an amount equal to the total expenditure on all accounts—consolidated fund, capital account, and all other accounts—in the years immediately preceding the war. If we add to the interest, the thirty-six or thirty-seven million dollars for soldiers' pensions, and other commitments incurred on account of the soldiers' civil re-establishment, we have nearly $200,000,000, or an amount twice as large as the expenditure on consolidated fund in the years immediately preceding the war. These obligations have to be met before we have a dollar for civil government, for transportation, for public works, and for the thousand and one other things necessary to carry on the public business of the country. That is the situation.

How are we to raise the enormous sums that must be provided? This year the estimated expenditure as already submitted to Parliament amounts, in round figures, to $469,000,000, with the Supplementary Estimates still to come, and which will probably bring the figure up to $500,000,000, after all the economies that have been practicable have been made. Where is the money to come from? Just from two sources—further taxation and from borrowing, or from both. We are running into debt at the rate of eighty or ninety million dollars per year. Can that go on indefinitely? Everybody knows it cannot. A nation can run into bankruptcy just the same as an individual. We also owe in the United States, according to an article I read in the Financial Post a short time ago, on federal, provincial, municipal, and industrial account, something like seven or eight hundred million dollars, and that is expected to amount to one billion dollars in the near future.

Can greater economies be effected? Economy can be carried too far. There is a policy that scattereth yet increaseth, and there is a policy that withholdeth but tendeth to poverty. Transportation by land and water must be provided for; the public works of the country must be provided for; for if these things are starved, the industrial life of the nation is injured or destroyed and the sources of revenue are dried up. Therefore, economy can be carried too far. Can taxation be carried too far? Yes, because if you tax an individual or a company to the point of taking all the profits, and leave the individual or the company to take all the risks and all the losses, you drive capital out of business. Individuals or companies will not take all the risk unless they have a reasonable expectation of making a fair profit. If the government steps in and by taxation takes all the profits, it dries up the sources of revenue, and the country is injured greatly.

Can borrowing go on indefinitely? I do not think so. We are borrowing money now to pay part of the interest on what we owe. What becomes of the mortgagee when he finds himself in that position? The end is not far off. I heard the ex-Minister of Finance state the other day that if future loans are needed—and they will be needed this year—they should be raised in Canada, rather than in a foreign country. That depends upon circumstances, in my judgment. If there is not a surplus of liquid capital in the country over and above what is necessary for the commercial and industrial life of the nation, over and above what the small borrower who cannot borrow outside the country is legitimately entitled to borrow—the man who wants to mortgage his farm, the village or town that wants to raise money on bonds, and numerous other small borrowers who must borrow in the home market if they borrow at all—if there is not a surplus over and above what is required for these purposes, to raise a loan in this country would be to drive these borrowers out of business and dry up the sources of revenue. So, the government cannot borrow in the home market without regard to all the existing conditions; it must leave liquid capital enough in that market to carry on the industrial and commercial life of the nation, enough liquid capital for the small borrower who cannot obtain money elsewhere. The Government can go outside; but could our commitments abroad be made larger with safety to the nation? A few weeks ago when the Minister of Finance announced in this House that he had placed a loan of $100,000,000 in New York at a very favourable rate of interest there was considerable applause in the chamber. I did not applaud. Not that I was not pleased to know that Canada could borrow abroad at a fairly good rate of interest; but I felt sad that we were obliged to do so, sad that we were obliged to put a mortgage for another $100,000,000 on the old homeland; for that was really what we were doing. If we were borrowing and the money was used for purposes which would provide for the interest and a sinking fund it would be all right; but that $100,000,000 went to pay a debt already incurred and we are borrowing now to pay the interest on what we owe, or at all events borrowing to meet the ordinary expenditure of the country. That, in my judgment, cannot continue or certain results will follow. I suppose hon. gentlemen opposite—some of them at all events—would throw a fit at the mention of the word "annexation", but would the word "absorption" be more palatable or more agreeable to them? I will be quite frank in connection with this matter. I would not be afraid of the commercial results of such a policy, but I do not want the political results that would follow. Our political institutions, in my judgment, are far preferable to those of our neighbours; and it would be a sad ending, not only to ourselves, but perhaps to the world—to the English-speaking world at all events—if we could not maintain our political institutions. But hon. gentlemen who, a few weeks ago, clamoured for the expenditure of millions of dollars on non-productive services—on the army and navy; Who clamoured for the expenditure of millions of dollars in preparation for another war, were, in my opinion, taking the first step toward the extinction of our national life, though they look at it from another standpoint altogether.

I listened to, and I read very carefully, the speech delivered by the ex-Minister of Finance (Sir Henry Drayton), and I do not think it was worthy of him. In that speech, from beginning to end, I found no helpful thought nor suggestion. My hon. friend seemed to think that no responsibility rests upon him and the other members of parliament who, as has been stated by the hon. member for Last Mountain (Mr. Johnston) were in office when this enormous debt was piled up upon the country. In that speech, from beginning to end, I could not find a suggestion where a new market for one dollar's worth of Canadian products could be discovered; I could not find a suggestion as to where one additional acre of land could be put under tillage in Canada; I could not find a suggestion as to where one man, who is not now getting it, might receive employment; I could not find a suggestion where the revenues might be increased or greater economy practised. What was to be found in the hon. member's speech? Criticism of a petty character ending with a resolution which has been so very well described by my hon. friend from Last Mountain and so accurately designated by the Montreal Gazette, the sanest paper supporting the Opposition which I read. The characterization of the Montreal Gazette is worth quoting. It says:

> The amendment recalls the couplet:
> "You shall and you shan't,
> You will and you won't;
> You'll be damned if you do,
> And you'll be damned if you don't."

The amendment has been truly named by the hon. member who has just taken his seat as a cheap political manœuvre, and an attempt to embarrass the Progressives and to condemn the Government for not doing something which the Opposition themselves hold would be ruinous to the country if it were done. Such is the ex-Finance Minister's conception of his duty to Canada under these trying and difficult circumstances. The amendment was seconded by the leader of the Opposition. In its nature that amendment resembles the handiwork of the leader of the Opposition more than it does that of my hon. friend the ex-Minister of Finance, because the latter's style of speech is good natured, wherein he differs fundamentally from his leader who seems to have a grouch against the world.

Some of the members of the Progressive party who have spoken have made suggestions, notably the hon. member for Strathcona (Mr. Warner). Let me say here that many of these hon. gentlemen appear to consider it to be their duty to help with the administration of the country and to make suggestions from time to time with that object in view. Perhaps the suggestions are not always the best that could be devised; but if a man is doing the best he can to discharge his duty to the country in the position in which he finds himself placed, such conduct will be far more effective than indulgence in petty criticism or the introduction of embarrassing resolutions. My hon. friend from Strathcona, I think, seemed to favour an increase in the income taxation. I have already alluded to that subject and, for the reason which I gave, I think it can be carried too far. I have taken a little trouble to look into the income taxation in Canada as compared with that of the United States, Great Britain, Australia and New Zealand, and I find it follows very closely the income taxation of the United States, where, I presume, the conditions are very much like our own. We do not follow closely the income taxation of Great Britain; Australia and New Zealand follow it to a greater extent than we do. Wherein does our system differ from that of Great Britain? Our income taxation is smaller on small incomes. The amount that we take for government purposes on small, medium and fairly large incomes is much smaller than that which is collected in Great Britain. On the other hand, in the case of large and very large incomes, we collect a much larger sum than is levied in Great Britain. We follow closely the United States tax. Perhaps it would not be out of place if I gave the House some figures on this matter of income taxation. To begin with, we exempt married men with incomes up to $2,000. The exemption in Great Britain is $1,000. On an income of $3,000 the income tax would be:

Canada	$ 40 00
United States	40 00
Great Britain	450 00
Australia	121 91
New Zealand	158 26

Then take an income of $5,000, the income tax would be:

Canada	$ 126 00
United States	120 00	(plus 5 per cent)
Great Britain	937 68
Australia	291 70
New Zealand	489 62

As the tax in United States is $120, plus 5 per cent on the tax, the amount is exactly the same as in Canada. The man with the small income in Canada pays a very much smaller tax than in Great Britain, Australia or New Zealand.

Mr. SPENCER: Would the hon. member give me the tax on an income of $50,000?

Mr. HUGHES: Yes, I will come to that. On an income of $10,000, the income taxes are as follows:

Canada	$ 619 50
United States	590 00	(plus the 5 per cent)
Great Britain	3,208 00
Australia	965 00	(some odd cents)
New Zealand	1,776 00

Then I come to the $20,000 income and the income taxes are as follows:

Canada	$2,889
United States	1,990	(plus 5 per cent)
Great Britain	7,150
Australia	2,945
New Zealand	5,648

Then on an income of $50,000 the taxes are:

Canada	$ 9,649
United States	9,190	(plus the 5 per cent)
Great Britain	23,593
Australia	16,645
New Zealand	18,581

The taxes on a $100,000 income are:

Canada	$32,749
United States	31,190	(plus the 5 per cent)
Great Britain	50,375
Australia	37,691
New Zealand	37,366

When we reach the $200,000 income our tax is almost equal to Great Britain, and they come pretty close together.

5 p.m. At $210,000 I think we are exactly together. On incomes of $210,000 the taxes are:

Canada	$104,989
United States	99,990
Great Britain	105,788
Australia	79,140
New Zealand	78,457

Now we come to the very large incomes. After the figures I have just mentioned we pass Great Britain. Our taxation and the taxation of the United States are much higher, and Great Britain becomes correspondingly lower. On incomes of $500,000 the taxes would be:

Canada	$318,349
United States	303,190
Great Britain	262,493

Mr. BROWN: Has the hon. gentleman any information as to the number of persons who are paying taxes on these very large incomes, such as $500,000?

Mr. HUGHES: No. In the United States and in Great Britain it would be a fairly large number.

Mr. BROWN: Is it a practical question in Canada?

Mr. HUGHES: The exceedingly large incomes are heavily taxed in Canada and comparatively lightly taxed in Great Britain.

Mr. BROWN: Is the tax on these incomes yielding a revenue? Are there enough of them?

Mr. HUGHES: I suppose so, because there are a great many wealthy people living in the Old Country.

Mr. BROWN: But in Canada?

Mr. HUGHES: I do not think we have so many wealthy here in Canada, but the point I am making is that we tax more lightly the small and moderate incomes in Canada than they do in Great Britain, and we tax more heavily the very large incomes.

Mr. NEILL: Do we have death duties in Canada, similar to those in Great Britain?

Mr. HUGHES: I am making a comparison of the income taxation in the different countries.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I think the hon. member is in error in some of his figures, and I only mention it because it should appear in Hansard correctly. I am under a wrong impression if the hon. member is correct. Does the 5 per cent super tax exist in the United States? I do not think it does. As the hon. member gave the figures, he intimated he was giving the tax without the 5 per cent.

Mr. HUGHES: Yes, it is a 5 per cent tax on the tax in United States.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I think the hon. member is in error. Our tax is 5 per cent ahead of their tax.

Mr. HUGHES: The hon. member is entitled to his opinion.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It is not a matter of opinion, it is a question of fact.

Mr. HUGHES: It can easily be verified. I come now to the sales tax, which, I think, our Progressive friends will say is very bad. However, there are some features about it that they would commend. One feature is the fact that every penny so collected goes into the treasury. Another commendable feature is that the extra amount raised under this proposed tax will not cost one extra cent to collect. It is simple and inexpensive and all goes into the treasury. That is a good feature of taxation. It may, it is true, bear more hardly on the man in moderate circumstances, or on the poor man with a large family, because his purchases will be larger in proportion to his means than the wealthy man's. But is there any system of taxation in the world that is perfect? There is not. Now, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) found himself in this position. He had an estimated revenue of $332,000,000, and he had to provide for an expenditure of perhaps $500,000,000. The actual expenditure last year was $496,000,000. He had to close up the gap somehow. How was it to be done? We must have in this country, no matter what political party is in power—it would be necessary if the Progressives were in power—a customs taxation that will give the largest revenue possible. And after that we shall have all the taxes we can pay. The customs revenue now produces only about one-fifth of the total taxation. Where is the other four-fifths to come from? About two-fifths, I believe, is provided by the excise tax, the revenue from the post office, the inland revenue tax, the income tax, and so forth. And there is still two-fifths to be accounted for. Hon. gentlemen will therefore see the difficulties of the situation and the burdens and responsibilites that rest on the shoulders of any man who is at present, or who may be for many years to come, charged with the management of the finances of Canada. There are avenues of information open to the Minister of Finance and his officials that are closed to the ordinary citizen; and if we have a minister in whose integrity and honesty we have confidence, and of whose ability we are assured, we must trust him to a very large extent. There is no getting away from that.

The men who were in office when these enormous debts were incurred, and who now criticise the Minister of Finance for not doing better, seem to forget their responsibilities very quickly. I know that extravagance and waste are the concomitants of all wars. But there were expenditures during the late war that were premeditated extravagance, and I make this charge against the late government, that at all events they did very little to curtail those expenditures. They did not do all that they could have done, and every man in Canada knows that who is prepared to admit the facts.

For the condition in which we find ourselves to-day those men, I say, are responsible, to a large extent at any rate.

The hon. member for Last Mountain (Mr. Johnston), I might here remark in passing, said that there was no sales tax in the United States, but I see that a very influential body of financial men who met in New York quite recently were considering the advisability and the necessity of introducing such a tax there. They say that it cannot be done without. Some contend that it is the best kind of tax. I will not go so far as to say that, but I have advocated that tax in this House and I support it now for the reasons I have given. It is necessary in the exigencies of the situation. Where was the minister to turn to make up the loss of revenue from the income tax and the business profits tax? He has estimated that while these sources of revenue gave us some $100,000,000 last year, this year he will do very well if they bring in $60,000,000. The business men of Canada know that their profits have largely disappeared; and incomes have fallen. So that we cannot get from these sources the revenue we got last year, and the difference must be made up. I personally disapprove of borrowing, if it can possibly be avoided; and the revenue must be raised. I have already stated that we cannot economise beyond a certain point; if we do, we destroy the sources of revenue. The public business of the country must be carried on. Canada must develop or die. We are an undeveloped country, unlike Great Britain, France or the European countries that are fully developed. We have important public works to maintain and further works are required for the proper carrying on of the national business. These must be provided or we suffer the consequences. We must have a larger population, and in order to secure more people we must develop our railways. Now, in my judgment, it is the duty of those hon. gentlemen who object to the sales tax and other forms of taxation to suggest something better. How is the money to be raised?

A few days ago, speaking in this Chamber, the right hon. the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Meighen) twitted me a little and said that when certain things were taking place in the Parliament of Canada I was back in Prince Edward Island. I do not know what the right hon. gentleman meant by the word "back". It is quite true that from 1917 to 1922 I was not a member of this House, but a good majority of the electors of King's County, Prince Edward Island, in the exercise of their constitutional rights, declared at that time that I ought to be a member of the House. The leader of the Opposition and those associated with him, however, in the blackest political crime ever committed in Canada or in any other English-speaking country, took care that I should not be a member of the House of Commons, and to make sure of this the constitutional rights of the people of King's County were violated. I say it is a political crime of the first magnitude to strike at the very foundation of the constitution. Sir, our constitution is based on the free, honest expression of the electors at the polls. Take that away and you take everything. The right hon. gentleman therefore knew why I was not a member of this House. And I wonder at his imprudence in reminding me of the fact. But apparently he is not sorry for the part that he and others that I can name took on that occasion. For myself, I would rather a thousand times have remained in Prince Edward Island than do what the right hon. gentleman and those associated with him did; I would rather remain in Prince Edward Island during the rest of my natural life than stand where he stands to-day. That is the reason.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I have presented the views that in my opinion should receive consideration from hon. members under present conditions, and having done so I feel that I have discharged the duty I owe to my country and to myself.

Mr. B. W. FANSHER (East Lambton): Mr. Speaker, as a new member I feel that I must join with those who have already expressed their appreciation of the manner in which the budget was presented by the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding). As to the substance of it, I may have views somewhat different from those held by some hon. members who have preceded me. Being as it were still a novice in this House, in rising to criticize the budget of such an experienced parliamentarian as the hon. Minister of Finance—who in the course of his public life has presented many budgets—I speak with some degree of trepidation; but I realize that it is my duty to express my views regarding the fiscal policy of this country, and I know that you will agree with me, Sir, when I say that in this budget is wrapped up our trade and fiscal policy. I have often heard it said of people who do not succeed well in business, although they and their employees and family seem to work very hard, that "there is something wrong with the management". And I sometimes think that although we are a very industrious people we have not made the progress that we should have made in the decades that have passed since the inception of our so-called National Policy. Although I do not intend to lay all the blame on our fiscal policy, I am thoroughly convinced that in a large measure that policy is responsible for conditions as we find them to-day. Of course, we all realize that prosperity cannot follow destruction, and we must make full allowance for the derangement of trade caused by the Great War. But I do claim that the fiscal policy we have pursued for the last thirty or forty years has caused an unequal balance in the development of industry. Right here I want to say that there is a growing demand for a change in our tariff policy. Indeed, there was already a growing demand for such a change prior to 1911, and although at that time there seemed to be a verdict rendered against tariff revision and better trade relations with the United States, yet I venture to say that had that issue been considered on its merits alone it would have had the overwhelming support of the electors.

In times past our tariff policy has not had that fair consideration at the hands of the electorate which it should have had, for always there have been injected into the issue other issues which were not relevant at all and which were introduced to obscure the real issue before the people This demand for tariff revision was still insistent after 1911, and even Sir Thomas White stated that such revision was long overdue. The country at large looked forward to the day when there should be a downward revision, but the Great War intervened, and domestic issues were laid aside in order that we might concentrate our efforts on the common purpose of bringing the war to a successful conclusion.

Shortly after the armistice it was considered advisable to have a revision of the tariff, and with that end in view we remember the appointment of a commission of which the hon. member for West York (Sir Henry Drayton) was chairman. That commission went all over the Dominion taking evidence in regard to the tariff, and I wish that we had before us some of the information contained in the verbatim records of the hearings, for I am sure it would be very instructive to us. For instance, I recall a meeting in one of our Ontario cities at which a certain individual engaged in the manufacture of gloves was very urgent that the protection to his industry—35 per cent—be maintained. The chairman asked the manufacturer where he procured his raw material, and he answered that his leather came from Brazil, his buttons from Concord, N.H., and certain other components from Italy and Turkey; in a word, all his raw material originated outside Canada. Yet he was asking that his protection of 35 per cent be maintained. The one and only thing that originated in Canada in connection with his gloves was the buttonhole.

Now, in contrast with a policy of that sort, I was pleased when it was stated in the budget speech that we should endeavour to encourage the inherent native industries of this country. In that regard I am heartily in accord with the sentiments expressed in the budget. But so far as the items of tariff reduction are concerned, I cannot see that much advance has been made in that direction. It is true that a reduction is made in the British preferential tariff; and with that I am thoroughly in accord. It is a policy which the Progressive party have always stood for, and which, in fact, is one of the planks in our platform. There has also been a slight reduction in the duties on agricultural implements—very slight, however, and offset, perhaps, largely by the sales tax. I admit that the Government have made some progress in the matter of the reduction of duties on agricultural implements, and I realize that if similar reductions were made yearly, in the course of five years a number of agricultural implements would be on the free list. But as I say, the sales tax largely takes away that apparent reduction. However, perhaps the sales tax is to be preferred to customs duties. The sales tax has one point in its favour: most of it is paid into the treasury of the country, whereas the customs tariff gives by way of protection two or three dollars in order to get one. In that respect I think the sales tax has some advantage over a customs tariff.

I want to deal briefly with some of the things which have been included in former budgets and might well, in my opinion, have been continued or revived in the budget of this year. An item which has been dealt with in previous budgets, for instance, and has been revived in this budget is the increased duty on automobiles. Those who were in this House a year ago will remember that the business profits tax was dropped last year—a tax which did not become effective until after a certain percentage of profit on the money invested had been made. The investor was given a reasonable profit on his money, and certain percentages were collected by way of taxation as the profits grew. That tax brought in, during the five years that it was in operation, about $180,000,000; and there are some arrears to collect which may bring the total up to $200,000,000. When this tax was done away with last year, the sales tax was increased. I notice that no reference is made this year to the business profits tax or to its revival. It is said that this tax is now largely collected by the income tax. That may be true in some degree, but it is not wholly the case. The sales tax, as was pointed out to-day, is collected from the individual even if he has made no profit, even if he has sustained a loss of 10 or 15 per cent or more. On the other hand, as I have said, the business profits tax was not collected until after a reasonable profit had been made. In that connection I think there should have been a continuance of the business profits tax rather than an increase in the sales tax.

Now, in speaking on this budget I do not wish to be narrow in the views which I express. I believe that our national existence depends largely on our fiscal and trade policy. These must be such as to develop the inherent national resources of our country. We have had it made plain to us since this debate was opened that we have a large debt which, both as individuals and as a nation, we are in honour bound to discharge. I was somewhat surprised at the comment of the hon. member for King's, P.E.I., (Mr. Hughes) when he said that the only way to meet this deficit, the only way to discharge our debt, was by taxation.

Mr. HUGHES: Taxation or borrowing, I said.

Mr. FANSHER: Taxation or borrowing. If that is the only method we can employ, we shall fall short of discharging our debt. How are debts paid? I am a farmer and I am going to give an illustration from the farm. If a farmer has debts to discharge he must apply himself to the digging out of that soil something that he can put on the markets of the world with a view to producing a return with which he can discharge his debt. His investment is in the soil; he must get the return on his investment. He must use the best business powers that he possesses; he must sell in the best market that he can obtain; he must economize, and with the amount that he receives in excess of the cost of production and shipment to the markets of the world, he discharges his debt. The same is true of a nation; we shall never get out of debt by simply developing those industries which are not native, not inherent to this country—industries which derive their raw material largely from outside of this country, as well as a good many of the things necessary in the process of converting those raw products into finished products that are of value. For instance, we import steel and iron ore from outside of Canada, and we import the coal with which to convert it into the finished article. At the same time we have in this country raw materials which might well be developed within our own borders, thus resulting in the development of our own country rather than of other countries the industries of which draw their raw materials from sources outside of Canada.

For the last twenty years we have followed a system of assistance to certain privileged industries, running all the way from 5 to 10, 15, 25 and 35 per cent. We have certain industries to-day which have a protection of 35 per cent. Now, when an industry is protected to the extent of 20 or 30 per cent, it is evident that some one must do the assisting. Twenty-five per cent to an assisted industry must come from somewhere. It comes from the consumer; and 25 from and 25 to means a discrepancy of 50 per cent. We have industries that represent a discrepancy of as much as 70 per cent, as in the case of textiles and shoes, and we think it is unjust. How can the natural resources inherent to this country be developed and the people who are developing them prosper when they have to pay toll to other industries to that extent? It may be said that I am citing an extreme case. That may be so, but we find the average duty on all articles imported into this country to be about 21 per cent.

In this connection I should just like to refer to the announcement in the House the other day, which was greeted with applause, that a loan of $100,000,000 had been effected in New York at 5 per cent. That was a good return for the money, yet we have industries whose average protection is four times the return for the money. A concern that invests its money in these privileged industries has not only the percentage that the investment will draw, but four times that in protection on an average. If we include all the duty-free goods, it brings it down to a 15 per cent return, or three times the amount the investment draws. In this way I claim that an uneven balance has been created in industry in this country. We do not notice it perceptibly from year to year, but we have travelled this course for a number of years, and just as drops of water wear away a stone so gradually we are accumulating a larger proportion of our population in the cities and towns than is natural, through this unbalanced condition of our industries. The balance is so uneven to-day that the prices obtained from the products of one industry are not sufficient to purchase the products of another industry; and the usual exchanges are not made, and hence there is a damming up of trade. Of course, transportation costs come in here largely, too. If we are ever going to make progress we must right-about-face and back-track. We must get rid of some of these protective duties, and give the industries that are inherent to this country a freer hand, give them a chance to establish themselves again and make good without paying toll to other industries which do not need it for the most part.

Coming down to specific items in the budget, I wish to say a few words on the increased tax on automobiles. You will remember that prior to last year, there was a war tax on automobiles, and that last year that was dropped. This year the tax is practically restored, though not to quite the same extent. While there is an excise tax placed upon automobiles manufactured at home, the protection that the Canadian manufacturer of automobiles receives after this budget comes into effect will be substantially the same as he received before it was brought down. The tariff was increased by 5 per cent on cars under $1,200, and by 10 per cent on cars over $1,200, and to prevent the home manufacturer from pocketing the extra increase in protection, an excise duty is imposed. The result is the manufacturer receives the same amount of protection as he did before, and the cost to the consumer is increased from 5 to 10 per cent. I submit that the Minister of Finance could very well have imposed an excise duty without imposing an extra customs duty on cars. A 35 per cent protection might well stand an excise duty that would bring into the treasury 10 or 15 per cent, or even half, of the protection afforded to automobile concerns in this country.

[Mr. Fansher.]

In that connection I wish to cite the earnings of one of these companies, the Ford Motor Company. We have protected the Ford Motor Company for years with 35 per cent protection, and sometimes higher. If we figure the extra price exacted because of this protective principle since the Ford Motor Company established itself in Canada, we find that we have paid them enough money to maintain a city of twenty thousand inhabitants and pay every worker in it $1,500 a year. That is just the extra amount paid in increased prices caused by a protective system. To put it in another way, we have paid enough in extra prices due to protection to build a highway clear across the Dominion, and provide $2,000 a mile for its maintenance. Where does this money go? Some of it goes in wages, of course. Much of the material is bought abroad and comes in duty free; there is a drawback on a good deal of it. Last year the Ford Motor Company got over three-quarters of a million dollars in drawback on raw material.

I wish to contrast this increasing of duties and the imposition of an excise tax on the automobile industry, with the treatment the budget metes out to the sugar beet industry in this country. An excise tax is placed on the manufacture of beet sugar without any increase in the duty on imported sugar. Why make fish of one and flesh of another? If it is just to increase the duty on automobiles so that the manufacturer in this country shall have the same protection he had before, why place an excise duty on beet sugar manufactured in Canada without increasing the duty on imported sugar? Then, too, why apply the tax simply to the beet sugar industry which gets its raw material at home, and not apply it to the sugar refineries which get their product from abroad? If any industry should have more consideration than another in this country, surely it should be the one that gets its material at home and furnishes employment to the people in this country. Why not put the manufacturer who gets his cane sugar from abroad on an equality with the manufacturer of beet sugar in this country, instead of penalizing the one and letting the other go scot-free. It is claimed that the manufacturer of cane sugar pays a duty on the raw material which he imports. To a large extent that is true, but he also receives a drawback on that duty; and I note that one of the large sugar refiners of Canada, the Atlantic Sugar Refineries, Limited, received in drawback last year no less a sum than $1,572,000. I would ask, does the manufacturer of beet sugar receive any drawback out of the excise that is collected on his product? There is another company which also received a substantial sum in drawback last year, the amount being no less than half a million. I am not pleading for special privilege for any industry; what I am asking is that all be placed on a footing of equality; and I hope that when the items of the budget are considered in detail in committee the discrepancy to which I have alluded will receive some consideration.

In conclusion I wish to say that if we are to free ourselves from debt, if we are, so to speak, to get out of the woods we must pay more attention to the inherent native industries of this country. We must have a policy which will develop our natural resources, which will bring business to our railroads, and which will give us a surplus of products which we may export and sell in the markets of the world and thus obtain the wherewithal to discharge our debt Our home market is held up to us as being one of great value. While this may be true, the fact is that if we trade at home all the time we shall have no more money than when we started. We must develop our natural resources so as to provide us with products that we can sell in the markets of the world and receive in return the means to aid us in discharging our debt. We should frame our national policy with that object in view. The Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Robb) said on Friday that we had made a right-about face but that we must go steadily and carefully. Let me say in conclusion that unless our pace is quickened I am afraid the government will soon be overtaken by public sentiment.

Mr. W. G. McQUARRIE (New Westminster): I listened with some interest this afternoon to the remarks of the hon. member for Last Mountain (Mr. Johnston). The hon. member being the Whip of the Progressive party, I presume that he speaks with some authority, and to a great extent, reflects the feeling of that party on this important question. I wonder how the hon. member will vote when the House divides on the amendment which has been moved? I venture to say that he will vote with the Government.

Some Hon. MEMBERS: Have patience.

Mr. McQUARRIE: I have wondered many times why the hon. gentleman was sitting on this side of the chamber at all; also why some others of the hon. members to my left are sitting where they now sit, and included in that number I would mention the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Crerar). Soon after the general elections we were told that he was going to enter the present cabinet. I have been wondering why he did not do so instead of taking a seat on this side of the House. It is also worthy of note that the hon. member for Marquette refused to become the leader of the official Opposition; and this also has been a subject of wonder to me. I think possibly the explanation is that my hon. friend did not like the methods, nor did his colleagues like the methods, which were adopted by the Liberal party to get into office. What other explanation is there when we find that whenever there is a possibility of the Government being defeated the hon. member for Marquette comes to its assistance; and he can always count on the Progressive party giving the Government sufficient support to retain it in office.

Mr. GRAHAM: Good sense.

Mr. SPENCER: Was the hon. member in the House during the last parliament when the Crowsnest pass agreement came up for discussion?

Mr. McQUARRIE: Yes, I was in the House at that time, as were some of the Progressive party including the hon. member for Marquette, and so far as my memory goes that hon. gentleman did not then do anything to support the stand which the Progressive party are now taking on that question.

The hon. member for Last Mountain said the tariff reductions were all right so far as they went, but they did not go far enough. I presume the hon. members who sit behind him entertain the same feeling—the tariff reductions are all right but they do not go far enough. Then my hon. friend proceeded to speak for western Canada. He said that western Canada was practically solid in its demand for a reduced tariff. I think the hon. member went even further and indulged in a veiled threat as to what would happen if reciprocity were not brought into effect. When my hon. friend presumes to speak for western Canada I think he is going pretty far; and I would advise the members of the Progressive party that beyond the Prairie provinces there is a very large and a very important province with great natural resources; I refer to British Columbia. I think all the British Columbia members, irrespective of their political tendencies, would be inclined, if they had the courage to do so, to stand up and take issue with my hon. friend from Last Mountain on that question. I do not think that even among the Liberals there is one hon. gentleman who would have the hardihood to stand up here and support the bringing into effect of the 1911 Reciprocity pact; I would challenge any of them to do so.

Now British Columbia, as I have said, is an important province. When the hon. member for Last Mountain speaks about united action I take it that he would not advocate the adoption of an entirely selfish policy and the forcing on the rest of Canada of the wishes of the particular sections represented by his party and himself, and yet that is exactly what he is trying to do. British Columbia does not want reciprocity; I think I am safe in making that statement. The fertile portions of that province are too close to the international boundary for them to want reciprocity with the United States. They are absolutely opposed to it. I do not believe that during the last election any candidate of the Liberal party, or of any other party in British Columbia, had the courage to stand up before the electors and say that he favoured the 1911 Reciprocity pact. If that is so, and if reciprocity would not be a good thing for British Columbia, I submit it is only right and proper for this House to take into consideration that aspect of the case. As a matter of fact, British Columbia has done very well under the old Conservative policy. Last year the output of wealth from British Columbia amounted to the following very large sums:

Agriculture—$75,000,000:
Livestock	8,000,000
Dairy Products	4,250,000
Apples, Peaches	10,000,000
Small Fruits	1,325,000
Hay, Wheat, Potatoes, etc.	51,425,000
Gold	$ 3,155,140
Silver	1,611,152
Copper	4,127,312
Lead	1,754,400
Zinc	1,723,000
Coal	11,432,644
Lumber (estimated)	68,432,077
Pulp and Paper	8,500,000

The fisheries returns are incomplete. The figures are:

Salmon	$5,500,000
Halibut	4,000,000

The manufactured products total $225,000,000, and the bank clearings, $1,000,000,000. The British Columbia resources have only been scratched. The manufacturing industry in that province is in its infancy. The question therefore naturally presents itself as to how reciprocity would affect British Columbia. I think I can say without hesitation that agriculture would be absolutely killed. This fact is admitted by farmers who formerly worked on the prairies, when they come to British Columbia—they admit that their ideas have undergone an entire change. I had supporting me during the last campaign a number of men who had formerly been farmers in the Prairie provinces. They did everything they could to elect me and they admitted that their views had completely changed, and that what they had thought was good for Canada when they lived on the prairies was absolutely wrong when applied to British Columbia.

I would suggest to the member for Last Mountain (Mr. Johnston) and also his leader that they do a little travelling, come to British Columbia and inquire of the farmers there regarding agricultural conditions. I invited the leader of the Progressive party (Mr. Crerar) previous to last election to come to British Columbia, but he did not do so. I suppose he realized the reception that would have been accorded him; he no doubt surmised what would have been told him had he gone there. So far as the farming industry is concerned, the people of British Columbia do not want reciprocity; and I am safe in saying that free trade would kill our manufacturing industry. Now, we look forward to a great future in British Columbia for our manufactories, and there is no reason why we should not, considering the vast extent of our natural resources.

The hon. member for Last Mountain, I fancy, will have to consider other places besides the Prairie provinces. He will have to take into account not only British Columbia, but other parts of Canada as

At six o'clock the House took recess.

After Recess

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. McQUARRIE: When the House rose at six o'clock I was quoting certain figures relating to the production of British Columbia in certain respects. I shall now give the rest of the figures:

well. And who will say that other parts of Canada desire reciprocity any more than British Columbia does? I have heard it said that the province of Quebec is averse to free trade. So that the hon. member and others who hold views similar to his will have to reckon with the rest of Canada and turn for a moment from the contemplation of their own selfish interests and consider what will benefit the country as a whole. I stand, as my hon. friend does, for a united Canada; but you will never get a united Canada by thinking exclusively of one section. It is a right and proper thing, of course, that the farmers should be considered. The farmers represent one of the greatest industries in the country, and they deserve and should have every consideration. But we must bear in mind that there are other interests as well that require consideration at our hands. There is the manufacturing industry, for instance. There is possibly as much money invested in manufacturing in Canada as there is in farming, if not more; and there are almost as many men employed in the factories as there are engaged in farming.

Mr. EVANS: What consideration would the hon. member give the farming population?

Mr. McQUARRIE: They should get every consideration, I take it. Now, I say to my hon. friend from Last Mountain that the manufacturers will also have to be considered. If you have free trade what is going to happen to the manufacturers of Canada? I do not think there is any doubt about the fact that, taken generally, the manufacturers would not be able to carry on under free trade, and the branches of United States concerns that are operating in Canada at the present time and employing so many men would immediately withdraw from the Canadian field altogether. If our manufacturers were seriously affected it would simply mean that a large number of workmen in Canada would be thrown out of employment.

The hon. member for Last Mountain said that three things were needed in Canada, the first of which, in his view, was immigration. Well, no doubt it is important that we have immigration, provided we have the right kind. I am not going to enter into the discussion of that subject now, or say anything about orientals, but it is exceedingly important that we get the right kind of people in Canada. The hon. member says that immigration will solve the railway problem. Well, that is what the railways say, too. The Canadian Pacific Railway and other transportation companies think of nothing else but bringing more people into the country because they believe they can make money thereby. They advocate taking down the bars and letting everyone come in so as to build up the country. They want this in order that they may be able to pay dividends. That is all very well; but you have to think about the people who are here now. We must give them the first consideration. We have marching down to Ottawa now what is known as the McDonald Army of unemployed,—returned men who are coming from Toronto to lay their claims before the Government for employment. What are we going to do for them? Our first consideration should be for the returned men; we must take care of them. In other parts of Canada there are returned men who are apparently in destitute circumstances. Last year in Vancouver one of the returned soldiers' clubs provided 3,000 men with clothing. This year there are as many more asking for clothing, and at the present time that association has advertisements in the newspapers asking that people who have winter clothing and other garments that they are now casting off should turn them over to the association in order that they may be given to those who are in need. Those are things to be taken into consideration. We ought first to provide employment for the men already in Canada before we think about bringing in others.

The hon. member for Last Mountain (Mr. Johnston) has intimated that he does not like the amendment; indeed, he suggests that it is a piece of "political trickery." That will be his reason, I presume, for voting against the amendment, because really he criticises the Government for not carrying out their pre-election tariff pledges. In his opinion the Government are entirely wrong in disregarding those pledges, and therefore the budget is unsatisfactory. At the same time he is going to vote against the amendment because it is a piece of "political trickery." Well, I do not think anyone would question the honour or integrity of either the mover or seconder of this amendment. Even during the campaign, when occasionally some rather bitter expressions were heard, so far as I am aware no charges of dishonourable conduct were levelled against the leader of the Opposition.

Let us examine the amendment and see if there is anything wrong with it. Does it contain any misstatement of fact? I suppose the hon. member for Last Mountain would have pointed out any such misstatement if he could, and his failure to do so may be taken as conclusive evidence that the terms of the amendment are correct. Therefore I submit that the amendment is a true statement of fact. The amendment recites part of the Liberal platform. I do not think any hon. member will take exception to the correctness of that recital. Then it is said that the Liberal party incorporated this platform in the official handbook which it issued. I do not suppose that will be denied, because the handbook speaks for itself. It is further stated that during the campaign the pledges contained in the platform were repeated on the hustings. I do not suppose that is disputed. It might have been added that in British Columbia, for instance, the Liberal candidates sent representatives around "on the side" to tell the people not to believe that the Liberal party was going to carry out its pledges, and to promise that there would be no free trade, no reciprocity, and no tariff reductions to any great extent. In confirmation of this those representatives said to the people in effect: You remember 1896? The Liberal party then made the same kind of promises, but when it came into power it forgot all about them. In any event I do not think that the accuracy of that part of the amendment can be disputed. The next paragraph is to the effect that the Liberal party having been returned to power does not carry out these pledges. Well, the hon. member for Last Mountain has criticized the Government for its failure to redeem these pledges. That statement, then, cannot be disputed. The last paragraph of the amendment states:

> That the making of such solemn pledges, the utilization of them to secure support, and their flagrant violation after the attainment of office reveal a disregard of political honour and tend to lower the standard of public life.

If my hon. friend does not accept the accuracy of that statement, but, on the contrary, condemns this resolution as a piece of "political trickery", then I wonder what are the standards of political honour of himself and of those who think as he does. I realize that all the hon. members who sit around him do not share his views, that there are members of his party who do think that our standard of political honour should be maintained. But my hon. friend and those who agree with him in regard to this amendment say in effect: You should not call attention to little things such as broken political pledges or false pretenses; that is "political trickery".

Mr. JOHNSTON (Last Mountain): Surely the hon. gentleman does not wish to misquote me. I did not use the word "trickery".

Mr. McQUARRIE: You withdraw the word?

Mr. JOHNSTON (Last Mountain): I withdraw nothing. I did not use the word.

Mr. McQUARRIE: You would not make such a statement?

Mr. JOHNSTON (Last Mountain): I did not use the word; that is all.

Mr. McQUARRIE: I apologize to the hon. member. I forget his exact words, but I think the effect of them is just as I have stated. The only other question is: What is the moral code of the Liberal party? Well, we have had certain examples of it out in British Columbia. We have a Liberal government in power there, and it went into office on the strength of certain promises which were made to the electorate. I hold in my hand an editorial which appeared in the Vancouver Sun of January 12, 1922. The Vancouver Sun, I might explain, is a Liberal paper and supports this administration. The editorial is headed, "Say it with flowers", and is in these words:

> John Oliver took over the Premiership of British Columbia on the death of hon. H. C. Brewster, and at a time when the provincial Liberal party had been placed in control of the British Columbia government as a result of a purity campaign waged by the Liberals.
> No more stentorious apostle of purity ever went from one end of a province to another and waged vocal war on government by caucus, control of government, patronage by political gangsters, and collection of campaign funds in exchange for special privileges, than John Oliver.
>
> It was all hypocrisy, for as soon as he got into party control, Mr. Oliver installed a system of oil-tight government by caucus and adopted bodily all the Conservative political evils he had so loudly denounced.
> Political gangsters, who came to the Liberal government, were given unrestricted scope, subject only to coming through with campaign funds at election time. John Oliver has not neglected or omitted any political infamy likely to bring the Liberal party into disrepute, and that party has been brought into such disrepute by him and by the actions he has openly condoned, that the only possible first step towards a Liberal resurrection is to cut loose from John Oliver. This is the primary duty of the Liberal meeting on the 23rd instant.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. Of course, in the debate on the address or on the budget a considerable degree of latitude is allowed to hon. members, but I fail to see what connection there is between Mr. Oliver, premier of British Columbia, and the present amendment. If the hon. member has any connecting link between the two, he should do well to bring it out at once. I do not think it is fair that the premier of British Columbia should be subject to attacks when he has nothing to do with the present amendment.

Mr. McQUARRIE: I will endeavour, Mr. Speaker, to supply the missing link. If you will permit me to read the rest of this article I will show that it is quite relevant at the present time. (Reading):

> This is the primary duty of the Liberal meeting on the 23rd instant.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): In quoting the article from the Vancouver Sun my hon. friend would lead the House to believe that that newspaper was a supporter of the Liberal party in the provincial legislature. I think he should correct that, because it is well known that the Vancouver Sun is not a supporter of the provincial government.

Mr. McQUARRIE: Mr. Speaker, I am referring to the Dominion Parliament, to the government in control of federal affairs. I will admit, as the hon. Minister of Public Works (Mr. King) has pointed out, that the Vancouver Sun does not support the provincial Liberal party. Through disgust at the practices and doings of that party from time to time, it has renounced the support which it formerly gave to it. (Reading):

> Gracefully but firmly John Oliver must be deposed and another leader selected. Address of grief at parting and banquet might be possible, but it will be better to just hand him a bouquet and let him go. Say it with flowers; and there will be no boomerang of public distrust,
> Unless John Oliver is got rid of immediately, provincial Liberalism will be consumed utterly in the flame of public indignation,—which was hot before and is now at white heat under the abuses of the liquor traffic. Electors voted for government control of the liquor traffic, but John Oliver has handed political control to his gangsters who are degrading the province and actually rendering life unsafe.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I think the hon. gentleman has failed to produce the missing link. An attack on Mr. Oliver is not justifiable, is not relevant to the amendment, and I would ask the hon. member to kindly come back to the amendment.

Mr. McQUARRIE: Very well, Mr. Speaker; I submit to your ruling. I would like to say also that as a result of some of the articles which this paper published, a libel action was instituted by the proprietor of the Vancouver World, which is now a Liberal organ, against the Vancouver Sun; the statements made in the Vancouver Sun were justified and the action taken by the Vancouver World was dismissed. Now, what was the statement that was made? The statement was that the provincial government had purchased from the president of the Provincial Liberal Association a warehouse site in the city of Vancouver at a price of something like $58,000 more than it was really worth, and that afterwards this same gentleman bought out the Vancouver World, which had been a Conservative organ, and had changed it over into a straight, out-and-cut Liberal organ, which it is to-day. Now, what I am coming to—I promised, Mr. Speaker, to supply the missing link—was this: the hon. Prime Minister knew all about these happenings. Great publicity was given to everything in connection with these various scandals—and there were others. The Prime Minister knew all about them. After the election, the Vancouver Liberals—who, of course, felt very badly because all the seats in Vancouver had gone Conservative—wired the Prime Minister and congratulated him upon his being returned to office. The Prime Minister replied, comforting them in their defeat in Vancouver by saying that he quite appreciated the fact that conditions in Vancouver had been most unpropitious. Now, they have been very unpropitious, of course; and as a result of all these disclosures the then Attorney General of British Columbia had to resign—one of the ministers without portfolio—

Mr. KING (Kootenay): If I may interrupt, I think it unfair that the hon. gentleman should make a statement of that kind. The Attorney General of British Columbia did not resign on any charges made by the Opposition, and that is well known to my hon. friend, who comes from British Columbia.

Mr. McQUARRIE: My statement is that he did resign; the hon. Minister of Public Works (Mr. King) cannot contradict me in that. The Hon. Mrs. Ralph Smith resigned from the Cabinet—

Mr. FIELDING: As a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I submit that you have already given your ruling that the hon. gentleman should desist from discussing the affairs of the provincial government.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. gentleman said a moment ago that he would produce the missing link, but he has failed to do so. I do not think it is fair that provincial ministers of the Crown should be subject to attacks in this House of Commons where they cannot defend themselves and more especially when the matter is not relevant to the amendment or to the main motion before the House. As I said a moment ago, in the debate on the address and in the budget debate, a certain degree of latitude is extended to the speakers. But hon. members must not abuse the privilege. In the present instance I think the hon. member has gone a little beyond the question, and that he should at once resume his speech and address himself to the subject before the House. British Columbia provincial politics have nothing to do with the question under debate.

Mr. MEIGHEN: In that relation I do not wish to make any comment at all; we need to be fair at all times, aside wholly from the ruling. But I submit that on motion to go into supply the rule as to relevancy to the motion does not apply, nor does the interposition of an amendment make it apply.

Mr. FIELDING: I admit there is a wide discretion given, but in the statement that the rule of relevancy does not apply I do not concur for a moment. The rule of relevancy must apply at all times.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Give us the missing link now.

Mr. McQUARRIE: I was just coming to that missing link.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: The missing gink.

Mr. McQUARRIE: The Prime Minister here knew about all these things, and what did he do? He took into his Cabinet a member of the Cabinet of the Hon. John Oliver, and he now sits here as Minister of Public Works. There you have the missing link. I have not one word to say against the Minister of Public Works (Mr. King, Kootenay) I think he is a good man. I want it to be distinctly understood that I am not criticising him in any way. Far from it; I admire his sagacity and political sense. He got out just at the right moment. After all the disclosures, he would no longer remain in that company.

[Mr. McQuarrie.]

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I think I should be allowed to correct an impression the hon. member may have given. Within the last two years the Oliver government has appealed to the people of British Columbia three times, and has been sustained on al three occasions.

Mr. McQUARRIE: How do they do it? They went up to Revelstoke—a small place on the railway—and the member for Revelstoke was made Minister of Public Works. Naturally the people of Revelstoke thought they were going to have everything fixed up, so they voted for him. Then up in the north they put in the Attorney-General because they wanted a lot of things up there, and down in Nelson they promised the people a road which they have been wanting for many years, a road that it will be impossible to build, but they said. "You put in our man, and we will give you this road." They absolutely bribed the electors of that country. I do not like to go too far. There are a lot of other things I could say in this connection but I will let things go just as they are as to this particular matter.

It has been argued here to-day that the reason why the Government has not carried out its pledges is because of the great national debt. The Minister of the Interior (Mr. Stewart) has expatiated on that theme to-day to quite an extent, and one of the members supporting the Government from Prince Edward Island has said that the national debt was so great that he really could not comprehend it. I wonder if he comprehended the extent of the national debt during the election campaign. Surely he must have known then the national debt was large. Surely he has not discovered it only since he came to Ottawa; his intelligence must be brighter than that. So we can come to the conclusion that they knew during the election campaign that the national debt of Canada was very large, and knowing that, why did hon. gentlemen on the other side go on repeating their pledges during the campaign? The national debt of Canada is large, Of course it is, and something must be done; we all agree with that. The only question is, how is the money to be raised? I submit that if you take off the tariff duty and ruin the farmers in various parts of this country, ruin our manufacturers, and put hundreds of thousands of men out of employment, you are not going to pay off the national debt in that way. I submit that the amendment before the House is a proper one, and if the facts are as therein stated, it is only right that such an amendment should be brought before the House.

Mr. McBRIDE: I should just like to correct a wrong impression which the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. McQuarrie) has given, namely, that the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Crerar) did not go to British Columbia during the campaign because he was not wanted there, or something to that effect. I venture to say that not a man in eastern Canada to-day would receive a warmer welcome in British Columbia than the hon. member for Marquette, because although some people there may differ with him in politics, they respect him as a straightforward man, just as he is respected in this House on both sides.

Mr. ROBERT MILNE (Neepawa): Mr. Speaker, I rise to make a few observations, and if I wander from the subject I hope you will be good enough to draw my attention to it. I have listened very patiently in the House to try and get the broadest viewpoint possible, and I find that there is something sadly wrong with our fair Dominion. I do not know how to express it better than by saying that we have a sick country. Now what is the trouble with our country? As I believe, it is this: Our trade seems to be sluggish. We do not seem to have a sufficient amount of trade to make times prosperous. Our factories seem to have stopped running, for some reason or other. We seem to have a discontented people generally, and on top of all that we have a large number of unemployed throughout the country.

I have spoken of Canada as a sick country, but I want to say that she has a wonderful constitution. Her constitution is made up of her natural resources, including agriculture. From my observation in the past I would say that her constitution has been sapped for years, and is still being sapped, and if it were not an exceptionally good constitution we would have been bankrupt before to-day. The people have realized that things have not been going just as they should, and they have been employing different doctors at different times. We had Doctor Conservative for a while, and Doctor Liberal for a while, and still the patient did not seem to improve. I do not know just what the trouble is, but it looks to me as though we did not have the right medicine. Both the doctors have been applying practically the same treatment, and still the patient continues to go down. To my mind, we need a new kind of medicine. I do not know exactly what is wrong with the old one, unless it is that one of its ingredients, the fiscal policy, has become too old and has spoiled, poisoning the other ingredients. We cannot expect the Dominion to get better as long as we administer the same kind of medicine. We need a new fiscal policy it seems to me; and I would suggest that if we adopt a sound fiscal policy and in connection with it introduce economy—a concentrated solution of economy—and administered it in large doses we may entertain the hope of improving the conditions in this Dominion.

I have been somewhat disappointed in the amendment which has been moved by hon. gentlemen to my right. Not being familiar with parliamentary procedure, I had supposed that when an amendment was introduced it was for the purpose of offering a better solution for the existing difficulties than was contained in the motion. But the amendment does not appear to be of that character. At least it does not have that look to the ordinary man from the wayside, if I may use the expression. Yesterday I overheard some old parliamentarians talking on the subject and they declared that the amendment was not a sound one either from the point of view of the statesman or from the point of view of the politician. Personally, I cannot see that the amendment contains any suggestions for improvement. And yet I think there is considerable room for raising the standard of political morals which, in the past, has been such that the confidence of the people has been undermined to a large extent. I claim that if a higher standard of morals had been inaugurated long ago the people would not have lost confidence in the public administration to the extent they have done. It is a very unfortunate thing that so many of our citizens throughout the Dominion have such little faith in either of the two old-time political parties. In fact sometimes it would almost seem as if they had not faith in the Progressive party. To such an extent does this loss of faith exist that a large proportion of the people will not take the trouble to cast their votes at election time. Undoubtedly there is a change coming; when one wrong-doer accuses another it is an evidence that he is in a rather tight corner, and we may look for a confession from the accuser soon.

Economy has been talked of here, but actions, not words, are needed. Economy should be practised not only under the federal government, but it should be given effect to all along the line. We should expect economy from our provincial and our municipal governments, and the individual citizen should practise it also. Perhaps the nearer we get to the individual the greater extravagance we find; but that does not alter the fact that we must have economy in high places as well as in low places. To use a homely expression the federal government should take the bit in its teeth and press forward along the path of economy. The members of the House without exception should go to the country and preach economy from every rostrum they can find—economy not only for the next year, but for many years to come. Only by adopting a policy of that kind can we bring Canada back to where she should be.

As I listened to the budget, and later read it over and reflected upon it, I could not help wondering what our tariff policy was based upon. They tell us that the tariff is needed for the purpose of raising money; but in my reading I have become more bewildered than ever in the endeavour to find out what the real basis of our fiscal policy is and how the rates imposed against goods coming into the country were arrived at. I have a few examples under my hand which may illustrate my point without an undue amount of talking. We find that yarn, composed wholly or in part of wool, pays a 30 per cent duty; and that yarn spun from mohair and alpaca is admitted free of duty. Now, for the life of me I cannot see why such fabrics as mohair and alpaca should not pay a duty when the ordinary every day wool, such as our people are compelled to use, has to pay one. We find that glass cut for the use of manufacturers for photographic purposes comes in free of duty; whereas common window glass is taxed. We go on down the list and we find that flannels, plain, not fancy, pay 35 per cent, and shirts and drawers 35 per cent. A little further down the list we see that raw silk and silk from the cocoon imported for the manufacture of silk underwear is admitted free of duty. We further find that in the reductions that have been made there is a 5 per cent reduction on collars and cuffs, and a 2½ per cent reduction on shirts. I wonder, Sir, if the collars and cuffs are for the benefit of the new agricultural immigrants that are expected to arrive in Canada?

Let me, in a word or two, show the unfairness of the tariff as between the manufacturer and the farmer. Now, I have no grudge against the manufacturer, absolutely none. What I stand for, and what the country expects, is fair play; but we find that the farmer in getting machinery to produce real wealth—and production from the soil is the creation of wealth—has to pay an average tax of about 15 per cent on his machinery, while he has to sell his products in the open markets of the world. The manufacturer, on the other hand, in a great many cases gets his raw material free of duty. For example rattan for furniture and baby carriages comes in free. It is the same with raw rubber; and when a manufacturer turns out his finished product it is protected at a figure in the neighbourhood of 30 per cent. I ask you, is it fair that one industry should get its raw materials free of duty and be protected on its finished product, whilst the other pays a duty on the implements it uses in producing real wealth and has to sell its products on the open market?

Now I have a few observations to make about the sales tax. I am not going to worry you with a lot of figures, but I will give you a concrete example, and for the purposes of my illustration I will take hon. members of the house. The hon. member for Swift Current (Mr. Lewis) who sits beside me states that he has seven children so that his family, reckoning his wife and himself, numbers nine. I have only one child and so in my home there are but three persons. I understand that the Prime Minister is unmarried, therefore there is only one person to represent his home. I ask you, is it fair that the hon. member for Swift Current should pay nine times as much in taxation as the Prime Minister does?

Mr. McMASTER: Tax the bachelors.

Mr. MILNE: Is it fair that the hon. member for Swift Current should pay three times as much taxation as I am paying? I will readily concede that he is doing more for his country than I am and yet he has to pay three times as much in taxation as I have to pay. I put it to you whether such a system of taxation is fair.

Referring to the farmer, I always have to look after him, although I do not pretend to seek any special favour for him. I obtained my figures from the returns made for income tax from a farm containing 317 acres under cultivation. In that return I find that the farmer has made actual purchases in connection with his farm operation—his binder twine, lubricating oil, small repairs and so on—to the amount of $544, which would be termed general expense. He paid a sales tax on that amount. I look down the list, and I find that he has fourteen months' board charged for hired men. I assume that $10 a month would not perhaps be too much to add for the actual groceries purchased for the hired men. That would mean that, in order to maintain his hired help, he would have to spend $140 in actual purchases. A little further down on the list I find an item of $4,506 for farm machinery, and that did not include his automobile. We are allowed a depreciation of 10 per cent. I think most people who make a study of the situation will admit that this is a fair depreciation. If the machinery depreciates to that extent, he would actually have to invest each year $450 to keep his machinery up to standard. That makes a total actual investment, which the farmer would have to make on that farm in order to maintain it, of $1,131.60. He pays a sale tax on those purchases of, I believe, 4½ per cent. That means that he would have to spend $51.92 on the actual necessities to carry on farming operations. That does not include any purchases for his own living or pleasure or anything like that, but that amount is actually paid in order to carry on his work on the farm.

Let us compare a business man, or an office man who has a salary of from three to six, or eight to ten thousand a year, with the farmer to whom I have referred. The business man goes to his office. He has his lead pencils, pens and stationery supplied. Which of the two men pays the more? Is it fair that the man who is actually creating the wealth from the soil should have to pay this tax of $50 for the privilege of farming? I am taking the average farmer. The average man who is at any kind of office work, clerical or otherwise, does not require the same investment and gets off practically free of the sales tax. Is that a fair method? Is this tariff a fair way of raising money or of taxing people?

They tell us at every turn that we must have money, and that if we increase the income tax to raise money we are going to drive people away. Surely there is not a man in our Dominion who would leave the country if we increased his sales tax in order to remove the tax from some of the bare necessities of life. Personally, for the sake of the poorer people in our country, I should like to see a budget brought down saying that we are going to allow the women and children of this country to buy coarse woolen clothes without a tax, so that they can keep warm, and that we are going to allow them to have all the oatmeal, prunes, rice and so on, that they require without paying a tax. If we take off this tax, I may be asked, where are we going to get the money to make up the loss? Surely, there is not a citizen in this Dominion who is receiving a salary of over $2,000 who would not be willing to pay a little more from his income, in order to be of assistance to those poor people.

The question has been asked "why don't you get after the farmers and get more money out of them by the income tax?" I am not going to ask favors for the farmers. If the farmers are eligible for taxation, if they are making enough money to be taxed, I say "go after them and take it out of them." We do not want any special privilege—absolutely none. But from my observation through the country in the East and through the prairies, the most prosperous districts I have seen turn out to be golf links or bowling greens. You ask where the money is to come from. Tell me where the money is and I will tell you where to go for it. There is absolutely no use in trying to bleed a stone. You say the sales tax is an invisible tax and people do not know anything about it. There is no question in the world that every five cents added to the cost of a pair of shoes is a burden to our poor people, and they can only stand so much. The money has to be raised, and we have to go where it is in order to get it.

I said in the opening that agriculture and our natural products were the foundation of our Dominion. I say—and I was convinced of it before I came here, and I have heard it a great many times since—that agriculture and our natural products are the mainstay of our country. We might as well try to put the weather vane on the top of this tower before it is finished as to try to stimulate our artificial industries before we solve the diffi-

9 p.m. culties that beset our natural industries. I say that the tariff is not a fair one. I want a tariff that will deal with and tax all classes of people and industries of the country in a fair way, and that is according to their ability to pay. I stand for the principle of a fair tax for all classes.

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Centre Winnipeg): The budget seems to me to be simply one more demonstration that there is no essential difference between the two old parties. Perhaps, if we look at the matter from the historical standpoint, we should hardly expect that there would be any great difference between the two. We remember that the old Conservative party arose originally as the political expression of the landed proprietors of Great Britain. Later on the Liberal party arose as the political expression of the rising trading classes of the towns, and still later, after the industrial developments, of the manufacturing class of Great Britain. And naturally there arose a conflict of interests between these two groups. The one, the agricultural proprietors, stood in those days for protection; they wished to be protected against the importation of free goods, especially wheat, from the outside. On the other hand, the trading classes wished to be enabled to go into all the world and trade freely, and that was the origin of the free trade policy of the Liberal party of Great Britain.

Here in this country the situation has been entirely different; and to a very considerable extent these old terms, "Liberal" and "Conservative," have designated simply, as has been well recognized, two political groups which were not fundamentally different in policy. It is quite true that the Liberal party has followed more or less the traditions of the older Liberal party of Great Britain. And there are a few very honourable exceptions, of those who are still very firmly convinced that the Liberal principles are absolutely correct, and who try to do the impossible thing, of holding to those principles in an age when the original conditions that produced them have entirely passed away. But we find that it has happened several times in this country that when a Liberal government has succeeded a Conservative administration it was almost inevitably driven to adopt similar fiscal policies. In the past the great masses of the people were very largely without political expression. Of course, up until a hundred years ago in the Old Land, it was an unheard of thing that the ordinary rank and file of workers should have even a vote. The first man who attempted to propagate the idea that the ordinary people should have the franchise was haled before the courts and charged with sedition. Gradually the common people obtained the vote, but it was very slowly that they began to have any opportunity of giving expression to the needs of the rank and file. For a long time they could elect either Liberals or Conservatives, and that was all. In Canada it has been pretty nearly the same. It was only within the last few years that, for the first time, we had, among the agricultural workers in Canada, a certain number of people who understood that the agricultural interests were entirely different from those of the business classes, whether those classes called themselves Liberals or Conservatives. It is in even more recent years that the Labour people, who form a very considerable part of the population of this country, have begun to understand that it is necessary that they too should give political expression to their views, and to realize that their policies are entirely different from those of the business classes which are represented more or less by the Liberals and the Conservatives.

From our standpoint, as Labour people, it seems as if the budget which has been presented to Parliament places the financial interests of the country before those of the common people. I do not intend to enter upon any detailed criticism of the budget, but I want to emphasize the view that the sales tax is inherently vicious in principle. I fancy that the thoroughgoing members of the old Liberal school will agree with me that any tax levied in this way, which falls very largely on the consumers, is essentially vicious in principle. Now, we have had it stated within very recent days by the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Stewart) that we are to have an immigration policy which will bring in large numbers of children from the Old Land. Personally I cannot approve of a policy which contemplates introducing into this country children gathered up more or less from the streets of the cities of the Old Country. I would suggest that we take a lesson from our farmer friends, who are very much more careful about the selection of their seed grain and their stock than we are about the selection of our human stock. But we are bringing in these children from the orphan homes of the Old Land, and at the selfsame time are continuing a policy that makes it impossible for a great many people in this country even to hope to have homes of their own where they can bring up their families.

Reference was made by the last speaker (Mr. Milne) to the fact that this tax bears most heavily on those who are trying to rear families. Some of us know what it is to buy boots and clothing for children and to provide a family with the ordinary necessaries of life. It is becoming increasingly difficult, especially in the cities, for the ordinary labouring men, who compose a very large proportion of the population, to provide even the barest necessities. I am speaking not merely of those men that work with their hands. I think, as well, of the clerks in the shops and offices, and I think of our own civil servants, many of whom to-day are obtaining smaller wages than the amount which the Department of Labour says is essential for the maintenance of even a minimum standard of living. Some of our civil servants are receiving a smaller remuneration even than the amount paid in my own city of Winnipeg to those who are assisted by the relief department of the city. And yet, with that condition prevailing in this country, we are adding taxes that will have to be paid by these people who are drawing such meagre wages and who to-day are finding it the greatest struggle to make both ends meet. I suppose this fiscal policy is but a part of the whole policy of the present administration. There is nothing here that in any sense will provide for releasing the energies of the people and thus guarding against the unemployment that is so rampant. Rather, we have a reversal to the old policies with which we have been familiar for a great many years. It would seem very much as if the present administration were attempting to carry out the policy which the president of the Canadian Pacific Railway announced about a year ago when he said that it was absolutely essential that we should have a larger immigration to this country for two reasons: First, that we should have people who would help bear the burden of taxation; second, people who would help feed the railroads.

Now, that appears to be the policy of the present administration. They are bringing in people to help us bear our taxes—not a very kind policy for the immigrants—and to help feed the railroads. Surely that has been one of our policies for a great many years. The administration seems to be bankrupt in ideas and incapable of formulating any new policy that will really meet the situation with which we in Canada, in common with the people in many other countries, find ourselves confronted at the present time.

There are no real economic changes proposed so far as I can see. It simply means that we are going to continue a principle which has been followed for a good many years, namely, that of drifting and financing by fresh borrowings. In our ordinary private business affairs if we have to borrow money to meet even the interest charges on sums already owing we think ourselves in a bad way; yet that is precisely what we as a nation have been doing for some years. There is a painting in the Canadian National Gallery by George Agnew Reid, called "Mortgaging the Homestead." Some of us remember how in our earlier days it was considered to be one of the most serious steps that any family could take when it had to mortgage the old homestead. But I take it, Mr. Speaker, that that is precisely what we are doing as a nation: we are mortgaging the old home which our forefathers left to us.

Unfortunately we are mortgaging our home to no small extent to outsiders. Two years ago the Mining and Engineering Record gave the following figures with regard to the ownership of some of our great industries:

> Americans control 95 per cent of the mining investments in Canada; 100 per cent of the pulp and paper investments in western Canada; 75 per cent of the lumber industries, and 75 per cent of the fisheries.

A few years ago all these industries belonged to Canada; to-day from 75 to 90 per cent of them are in the hands of foreign capitalists. On January 28, 1920, one of our western papers, the Winnipeg Free Press, stung by the fact that it could not obtain paper from an American company on terms which it thought equitable, printed the following editorial:

> If there is money in it for the capitalist, ship our coal out of Canada to the highest bidder and let the Canadian people freeze; ship out our lumber and leave the people houseless; ship out our pulp and paper and leave them without newspapers, and so on all down the line. The fact that in all these cases the products are primarily the property of the people themselves would make no difference to the Gazette. On with the business of exploitation! The sacred system by which millionaires are turned overnight into multi-millionaires must not be tampered with.

The particular phrase to which I should like to call the attention of hon. members is that, "the products are primarily the property of the people." Yet they have been sacrificed in the interests of a comparatively small group. Let me quote from a publication recently issued by the Department of Trade and Commerce. The article is headed, "Canada as a field for British branch industries," and it contains the following:

A significant feature of post-war development in Canada is the part played by the United States. The United States for many years past has entered into the development of Canadian resources, supplying both capital and labour and establishing industries on the Canadian side of the border. The nickle and asbestos production of Canada is largely in the hands of American companies. Many of her timber products and a proportion of pulp and paper production are also American. There are in all over six hundred United States branch factories or subsidiaries in the Dominion, among which may be cited the International Nickel Company Limited, the Montreal Locomotive Works, Limited, the Canadian Consolidated Rubber Company Limited, the International Harvester Company, Limited, the Canadian General Electric Company, Limited, subsidiaries of the International Paper Company, the Ford Motor Company of Canada, Limited, General Motors, Limited, and the Studebaker Corporation of Canada. Canada owes much to American initiative, capital and immigration.

There we have a statement as to how gradually American capital is coming in and gaining control of our great industries. The same is true with regard to stocks and bonds. Let me quote from the same publication:

Stocks, bonds and other securities held by incorporated and joint stock companies engaged in the manufacturing industries of Canada in 1918: Par values: total owned in Canada, $945,443,658; in Great Britain, $153,757,825; in the United States, $554,943,177; total in other countries, $17,221,322.

That is 34 per cent of all these stocks, bonds and securities are owned in the United States. Appended to this statement in this note:

When the compilation of 1920 figures is complete it may be found that the 34 per cent shown in the first table as the proportion held by United States capitalists in Canadian industries has increased to nearly 50 per cent, and that the British percentage has increased little or not at all.

One other quotation in this same connection, which goes into detail in regard to the ownership of the stocks and bonds of our industries. I shall quote only the percentages of these stocks and bonds owned by United States capitalists; they are as follows:

Lumber, 27 per cent; pulp and paper, 24 per cent; agricultural implements, 31 per cent; meat packing, 41 per cent; rubber, 50 per cent; patent or proprietary medicines, 86 per cent; automobiles, 61 per cent; car construction, 59 per cent; artificial abrasives, 99 per cent; automobile accessories, 93 per cent; brass and copper castings, 44 per cent, and so on all down the line.

We may say that we own, or that Great Britain owns this country, but I submit,

[Mr. Woodsworth.]

Mr Speaker, that if our natural resources are owned by great American companies, and our stocks and bonds by American syndicates, our ownership is a very empty possession. I may claim to own a house, but if that house is mortgaged for almost its entire value, my ownership is a very empty thing indeed. A good many of us are reduced to the position where we have to turn over the greater part of our income to the men who hold the mortgages; and it would seem as if in Canada we are rapidly coming to that position where we have to turn over a very considerable amount of our national income to people who live outside of this country. The latest loan placed would seem to be no exception to this rule. We had to negotiate a loan of $100,000,000 on the other side of the line, which simply means that we shall continue to pay interest across the way. If a Canadian should manage to acquire some part of that loan, as long as he remains in Canada he is taxed, but if he establishes a residence in the United States he will, apparently, be free from taxation. That is a point which I hope will be discussed when we come to that particular item.

But I would suggest that not all the mortgages are held outside of Canada. There has been in the past few years a remarkable shifting of the wealth of this country from a large group to a comparatively small group. I wonder if I may be permitted very briefly to run through some of the outstanding stages in the history of this country by which our lands and public resources have been gradually alienated. We remember that when our forefathers came to Canada and carved out for themselves homes here, the whole of this land was owned by the Crown. Possibly we might make exception and admit that there were certain trading rights conceded to the Hudson's Bay Company and that to that extent a private organization had a sort of mortgage on the country. But on the whole, all our resources were publicly owned; and had our policy been a true one, those resources and the organizations which have been built up upon them would still remain in the hands of the public. But what have we done? In the first place, the earlier fur traders exploited the Indians and out of the money they made were able to acquire other natural resources in this country. We all remember the earlier ecclesiastical and feudal grants which were made. It may seem unnecessary to review past history, but when we come to study some of the older cities in this country, we find that the present landlords are the successors of those who acquired lands in this way from the Crown in the early days. This was under the French regime. Then, under British rule, there came the granting of huge tracts of land. Lord Dufferin stated that in Ontario almost one-half of the lands then surveyed had been given away. In Quebec over half the lands were given away, and so with the other older provinces. It is not my purpose to enter into a discussion of the alienation of lands as clergy reserves and under the administration of the Family Compact, and, later, the giving of huge blocks of land in the settlement of the Hudson's Bay Company's claims. Why do I recall this past history? Because I would like to show, if I could, that the earlier fortunes of Canada were gained out of the fur trade, out of the grants of Crown lands to the pioneer settlers, and that in this way these resources which ought to have been held in trust for the whole of the people have been secured by a very few of the people.

Then, after that earlier pioneer period, our railway systems began to develop, and we have again the building up of huge fortunes. It would be a comparatively easy thing to enumerate the shareholders or directors or promoters of these earlier railway companies; in a very great number of instances the men who are prominent in our industrial and financial affairs of to-day are descendants of the men who made their fortunes by securing lands and other resources from this country without giving the community any equivalent. I am going to venture to quote a paragraph from David Mills which illustrates the reckless way in which our franchises were given away in those early days:

> "Corruption taints the majority of railway enterprises from their inception to completion," wrote David Mills, a member of the Dominion Parliament, and later Dominion Minister of the Interior. "Charters are sought, not infrequently, for the purposes of speculation. Sometimes they are used to blackmail existing railway lines. However much a railway road is needed, a charter is seldom obtained without difficulty, and stock is bestowed for parliamentary support. The names of wellknown railway men are sought to give credit to the projected enterprise, a number of shares are tendered them for their 'eminent services', and they are seldom declined.
> "When a railway scheme is finally launched, it finds a large number of friends—engineers and professional contractors, the owners of rolling mills, and the builders of cars and locomotives. The getters of land grants, and the traders in railway stocks, all come to its aid, and it may be, experience its bounty. These constitute the grand army of a private railway enterprise.
> "Besides these, there is a numerous band of camp followers, who expect in a variety of ways 'to reap where they have not sown', but about whose special services nothing need be said. It is this numerous host of allies and followers which 'can kill or keep alive' a railway project, and because they have this power, must be paid, that add to the cost of every rival railway undertaking." In his article Mills but stated a further well-known fact when he wrote: "In order to pay interest upon bonds or dividends upon stocks, a road is allowed to deteriorate. Then come accidents, in which scores of passengers are mangled or scalded."

That was the beginning of our railway enterprise; thus we had built these earlier lines which were afterwards incorporated into the great transcontinental systems. I do not need to read at length from the Drayton-Acworth report, but you will remember the immense sums which were given to the privately owned roads. We have been almost staggered during recent weeks in hearing about the enormous amounts which it will be necessary for us to raise in order to carry on our publicly owned railroads. We must not forget the way in which these huge debts were incurred; we must not forget the enormous grants which have been made by this country right along to construct our railroads. The total public assistance direct or indirect, to the Canadian Northern amounted, according to the Drayton-Acworth report, to $298,253,263. To the Canadian Pacific there were enormous grants, as well as to the Grand Trunk and to the Grand Trunk Pacific—and land grants as well. The people of Canada through their government have provided or guaranteed the payment of sums totalling $968,451,737—almost a billion dollars, and upon these huge sums we are asked to-day to pay interest. You may say: Very well; this is past history; we have to start from the beginning. But we cannot start from the beginning; we have no right to start from the beginning. If you really want to go to the beginning, you have to go back to the time when this country was free. In Great Britain you remember there came at one period of her history the enclosure of the common lands, one of the most outrageous proceedings in the history of any country—when certain descendants of the feudal lords who had previously recognized certain responsibilities respecting the rights of their peasant population undertook to fence these lands which had been regarded as common lands and to appropriate them and their revenue for their own purposes. We have had in Canada, this new, young country of ours, a much more outrageous proceeding than that of the alienation of the common lands of Great Britain. We have had the alienation of millions upon millions of acres of land and of the most valuable natural resources of this country, so that to-day the greater part of these are in the hands of private individuals, and now we are told that the public has no claim upon them. I need not go into the more recent alienation of our public resources. During the last few years I have been living more or less in British Columbia, and any one who knows the conditions there knows how recklessly our natural resources of timber and mines have been forfeited in that province, so that to-day the people practically have no control either of the better agricultural districts or of the mining or timbering properties.

We find here, referring again to the pamphlet which I have already quoted, issued by the Department of Trade and Commerce, a note with regard to the expansion of industry in this country:

> The day of the manufacturer had dawned, and in 1912 the future of Canadian industry was looming large. The growth of the domestic market demanded expansion of domestic manufactures, but this expansion went further and made itself felt in greatly increased export.

Here again the people in Canada and their welfare was sacrificed in the interest of the larger manufacturers who were benefiting by these exports. The document proceeds:

> The era of large business had begun and merger succeeded merger, with resultant increase in production. Industrial capital increased rapidly, from $445,000,000 in 1900 it rose to $1,247,000,000 in 1910; to nearly $2,000,000,000 in 1915, and to $2,787,000,000 in 1917.

Let me ask where did all this great amount of money come from? It came out of the primary producers of this country. There was no other place from which it could come; matters were so arranged that the greater part of this property was acquired by a few individuals. We find that instead of the numbers of establishments increasing, they decreased proportionately. In 1900 there were some 14,650 firms that produced a product valued at $481,053,375. By 1915 there were hardly a thousand more firms, but the value of the product had increased to $1,381,547,225.

We all know without my entering into a discussion of it how in connection with these mergers which have been going on in recent years, there has been considerable of the process which is commonly known as watering stock. We all know how in recent years enormous fortunes have been made out of the rise in real estate values, and we know that these values, which are essentially community values, have gone into the hands of comparatively small groups, and that these enhanced values and this over-capitalization remains a perpetual mortgage on the productive industries of the country.

I can go on to show how gradually our financial organizations have been concentrated. Take, for instance, the banks. According to the statement issued by the Department of Trade and Commerce, we had 18 banks having total assets of $3,091,500,000. I suppose there are only 17 of these banks to-day, but they have these enormous assets. Next in financial importance to the chartered banks are the trust companies, of which there are about 25, either independent in operation or affiliated with one or other of the chartered banks. Their operations do not conflict with legitimate banking as they are almost wholly confined to trusteeship and the management of estates. Few of us perhaps except the financiers themselves realize just how far the banks really control the industrial concerns of the country to-day. As an illustration of this, let me take the grain trade in which a good many members of this House are more or less directly interested. I quote a paragraph from the report of the Winnipeg Grain Exchange for this past year, 1921:

> Owing to the immense volume of grain marketed, and to the fact that practically all of the business is done on credit, banks have a primary interest in the system of marketing. Not many grain merchants or companies have sufficient capital of their own with which to do a large volume of business.

Let me say in passing that this throws a very important light on the real reason why the farmers of this country are asking for a wheat board. To continue:

> All of them have to borrow large sums of money from the banks, or have large lines of credit, to enable them to do business. It is not generally realized that from the moment the farmer sells his wagon-load of wheat, or gets an advance upon it, the wheat is virtually owned by the banks. Indeed, one might go further and say that from the moment the farmer parts with his wheat at the local shipping point, the banks become the owners of it, and the banks remain the owners of it until it is eaten as bread by the consumers. Elevator companies, track buyers, commission merchants, shippers, exporters, mills and bakers are financed by banks, and in their relation to the grain they are not much more than the agents of the banks that finance them.

That is the point that we must consider here. The capital of this country has become very highly centralized, and this high degree of centralization gives the financial institutions practically the control not only of the commercial and industrial enterprise of this country, but indirectly, of the very life of the labour people of this country.

Now let me go on to the later forms by which the people of this country have been exploited. I come to the war itself. We all know that some fortunes were made even during the South African war, but when we come to the Great War, there was never a more magnificent opportunity for the profiteer. It is not my purpose tonight to say anything with regard to the war contracts scandals. I think that they are fresh in the memory of any man who has ever attended a political meeting during the last few years in this country. We know the huge fortunes which were made during the war time. We know from the revelations which were given to this country by the Committee on the High Cost of Living how certain individuals and corporations were enabled to profiteer even during the time that their fellow citizens were laying down their lives in France. We know that these fortunes were made. Some of them, perhaps, have been sacrificed since; others of them are still held, and there has been no effort made by the incoming government, so far as I can see, to recover from the profiteers that blood money which they laid up during the time of the war. That has been a great disappointment to some of us, because we recognize the opportunities that were granted to the incoming administration. What happened during the war? The administration of that time made it comparatively easy for men to make large sums. Professor O. D. Skelton, of the Department of Economics at Queen's University, is responsible for the statement made towards the close of the war:

> In the four years of war Canada has met only 6 per cent of the direct principal cost of the war out of surplus revenue, as against 20 per cent met by the United Kingdom, while the United States has met the extraordinary proportion of 44 per cent the first year.

Then as to the incidence of taxation, Profesor Skelton shows that in the United Kingdom 81 per cent of the taxes were paid on property and income, and only 19 per cent on consumption. What was the condition in Canada? In 1913-14, nothing in the form of taxation on property and income; 100 per cent paid out of consumption. In 1914-15 nothing paid on property and income; 100 per cent out of consumption. In 1915-16, 1 per cent on property and income; 99 per cent on consumption. In 1916-17, 8 per cent on property and income; 92 per cent on consumption. In 1917-18, 11 per cent on property and income and 89 per cent on consumption. Great Britain is said to be a conservative country owing to the fact that she has such a considerable part of her population who are property owners and who have large fixed incomes; and yet in Great Britain, 81 per cent of the taxes were taken out of property and income, while in Canada, and that only in the last year of the war, 11 per cent of the taxes came out of property and income.

How did we do our war financing? We borrowed and we borrowed more instead of paying as we went as we might have done—for it is a well known truth of economics that we as a nation produce every year almost as much as we consume—we went through the financial jugglery, known as "borrowing". The food, and clothing and ammunition which was needed during the war was produced during the war. The high financing which we did at that time was, after all, a matter of book-keeping by which a comparatively limited group of people obtained a strangle hold on the rest of the country. I think I may obtain confirmation of my statement on this point from a pamphlet issued by the right hon. Sir Thomas White, Minister of Finance from 1911 to 1919 entitled "The Story of Canada's War Finance". I quote two short paragraphs:

> This view overlooks the fact that our War Loans were really subscribed by the public from the savings made during the War itself. There is real truth in the statement that was made frequently by economists that nations pay for Wars as they go along. Productive enterprise is, of necessity, greatly stimulated. This, coupled with the constantly increasing rise in wages and in the prices of commodities, produces an enormous amount of credit, or money so called, which finds its way into the pockets and the savings accounts of the public. This money is available for subscriptions to government loans. On the other side of the national account is the vastly increased public debt representing the money expended for the equipment of the nation's forces, the food consumed by them during the course of the War, and the immense amount of ammunition used in the field. The burden of the debt created is passed on to future generations as a legacy and reminder of the waste of war.

And again:

> From the national standpoint, it is of the utmost advantage that so large a proportion of our War Debt is held by the Canadian people themselves. I hesitate to think of what our position would be if we had borrowed, and were still owing, externally, even half the amount of our war debt. We should be kept in economic servitude through adverse exchange for a generation to come.

Mr. Speaker, I should like to comment briefly on this passage which I believe is sound economics. Sir Thomas confesses that nations pay for wars as they go along. He confesses that our war loans were really subscribed by the public from the savings made during the war itself. Now, here is the situation which we have to face: We were told that the whole of this people ought to throw itself into the great war. We were told in those days that there ought to be equality of sacrifice. Certain men went over to the front and lost their lives. Others went and gave the very best of their lives. Others stayed at home and put forth their best endeavours for the national welfare at that time; and on the other hand a small proportion of the population stayed at home and made hay while the sun shone—they coined money while their brothers sacrificed. The money that was "made" and put into war loans was made out of the war itself—let that sink into the minds of the people of this country—and we to-day have the right to say whether those people shall, or shall not, retain their ill-gotten gains. I think of some of the men who have returned from the front broken in health, broken in fortune. I think of several hundred of them who are reported to be marching on Ottawa at the present time in the hope that they will be able to present their case to this House. Have these men no claim upon the resources of this country? By the very budget that has been presented to us at this time those men, every time they buy a pair of shoes, or a coat, or a shirt to wear and every time they attempt to support any dependents that they may have, are asked to contribute still further to that war. And where does their money go? The greater part of their money, paid through taxes, goes to the very people who profiteered at the time they were fighting in France. I for one cannot conceive that the returned men across this country are going to tolerate that condition of things very much longer. Sir Thomas White says that it is a splendid thing that this money is not owed to people outside of Canada—that it is owed to the people in Canada. From my standpoint—and I think I can speak for a very large number of the common people of this country,—it does not make very much difference whether the money is held by some great corporations in this country or outside, or by wealthy people in this country or outside, the fact is that the poorer people of Canada are compelled to pay interest on these war loans to others who have not, up to the present, been required to make anything like an equality of sacrifice.

In an article published on April 1st in Maclean's Magazine the writer, Mr. John A. Stevenson, calls attention to the enormous burdens which we have placed upon our shoulders in this country, not merely by the federal taxation, but by this taxation, supplemented by provincial and municipal taxation. He has estimated that the federal taxation amounts to $435,000,000, the provincial taxation to $90,000,000, the municipal taxation to $350,000,000, a total of $875,000,000. That means that we have a taxation burden in this country of $100 per head, or, taking a family of five, which is not a very high average, we have a taxation burden of $500 per family. It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that we shall have to face in the near future the ultimate and final solution of these huge debts which we have accumulated. Personally, I can see nothing for it but repudiation or a capital levy. Some people do not like that word "repudiation." In the case of those who own large fortunes which were made during the war, I take it that it would be a highly just thing to repudiate. It would simply be the country taking back what the country ought never to have given away or allowed to be taken away. We do not call it repudiation when a man has stolen a large amount and the state comes along and takes it back. I recognize of course the practical difficulty that a certain amount of this money has shifted from one person to another, and that we cannot very well, in all cases at least, lay our hands on the war profiteers, but we can place our hands on those who, to-day, have the ability to give, and a just system of taxation surely ought to be placed on ability to pay. In Great Britain they are already advocating a capital levy. That simply means an extension of the present principle of taxation. It has long been recognized as the right of the state to step in and tax. The income tax is a recognition that the state may take a certain percentage of the income. We have heard a good deal in Canada about what splendid people the labour people in Great Britain are, and how constructive they are in their policies. Let me remind hon. members that in the draft programme prepared several years ago for the British Labour party it was suggested that the income tax should begin at 1 shilling in the pound and rise to 19 shillings in the pound. This afternoon some figures were quoted that showed that in the case of very large incomes the taxation already amounted to almost half the income. Great Britain—Conservative old Great Britain, as we sometimes call that country—has gone a great deal further than we have in taxing large incomes. We have gone a very small distance in succession dues, in inheritance tax. Why should we allow large fortunes to be passed on by one individual to his heirs? We all recognize the responsibility of a man to provide as well as he may for his immediate dependents, and arrangements could very well be made by which dependents could be provided for up to a certain amount, but I think it is generally conceded that it is no kindness to the heirs to leave them huge fortunes. As far as the public is concerned, since the individual does not pass on the food and clothing to his children, it simply means that, in some way, he passes on to his children the right to collect food and clothing and other necessities and comforts of life from the rest of the community. That is, he passes on to his children a mortgage which the rest of the community has to pay. We shall at some time have to recognize that no man has the right to mortgage a generation as yet unborn. That is precisely what we are doing in allowing huge fortunes to be passed on, as we have done and are doing.

Before passing away from the war loans, I desire to point out another inherent evil of the system. We have been depending on certain standards of value which are not constant. While the war was on and the people obtained their loans, a hundred dollars represented, we will say, 50 bushels of wheat. A hundred dollars to-day, we will say, represents 100 bushels of wheat. This simply means that not only are those war loans free of taxation, but they have to be paid twice over. Is that a proposition which we are willing to accept for ourselves and our children? Sooner or later we must recognize that we are coming almost to a standstill in our industrial enterprises. Our railroads and our banks claim the right to their dividends. People engaged in industries say they cannot get along without their profits. On the other hand, we have an ever increas-

10 p.m. ing number of people on the very verge of starvation. Unless we can in some way alter the system, or introduce another system in its place, we are going to see tens of thousands of our fellow-citizens going down and under. I submit that the Government exists to provide for the needs of the people, and when it comes to a choice between profits and property rights on one hand and human welfare on the other, there should be no hesitation whatever in saying that we are going to place the human welfare consideration first, and let property rights and financial interests fare as best they may. That is the only position we can consistently take. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) in closing his remarks the other day made reference to labour and he said:

> If labour at times seems to be unreasonable, let us not forget that in the days that have gone, too often the workingman, so called, did not receive a fair share of the wealth which his labour created; too often he saw his employer grow rich and prosperous while the workingman had little more than an existence. There has been a happy change in this respect.

I would like to ask, on behalf of the working man, when this change came about. At the present moment, with nearly 200,000 men out of work, and with some millions, presumably, of dependents involved in this unemployment, is the working man to-day getting much more than a mere subsistence? I speak not merely on behalf of the manual workers, but on behalf of others who are receiving wages, and the lower paid salaried men. Are they getting much more than a mere subsistence? They cannot get anything else, unless we make fundamental economic changes. The Minister of Finance goes on to say:

> But he has duties to perform. Labour has come to a sense of its power. Has it come to a sense of the responsibility and duty which should always accompany power?

Has Labour come to a sense of its power? Well, so long as there are two representatives in this House out of 235 members, I do not think it can be contended that Labour has come to a sense of its political power. When it does there will be a different kind of budget, I can promise you that. When we consider that Labour, of hand and brain, in shop and in office, composes a great proportion of the population of the country, we must recognize that it has not come to a sense of political power; and when we consider the state of labour organizations from coast to coast we cannot very well say that Labour has come into economic power. Rather the position has already come about which was referred to by Sir Thomas White. He said that if we owed these huge sums to people outside of the Dominion we should be kept in economic servitude for a generation to come. I submit that even although we owe the money to people in Canada the great majority of the people in this country are still subject to what can properly be termed "economic servitude." That is the thing we have to face. There is no use expressing pious wishes that Capital and Labour should get together unless we also say on what basis they are to do so. If the Minister of Finance says that they must come together on the basis of dividends for the railroads, of interest and dividends for the banks, and of big profits for the manufacturing concerns, while the labouring men of the country are on the verge of starvation, then I say Labour and Capital can never come together. I do not like to personify Capital, because it is so impersonal a thing, while the labourer is a creature of flesh and blood. But if those who represent Capital, on the one hand, and the labouring classes, on the other, are to get together with a view to solving the labour and social problems of the country, we must first of all see to it that there are certain minimum standards involving proper conditions of livelihood for every man and woman and child in the country. And until every man, woman and child is so provided for we ought not to talk further about profits and dividends. Before we can get our labour and social problems solved the great mass of the people must have, what they have not to-day, a real voice in the control of their own affairs and of the affairs of the country. Mr. Speaker, I cannot believe that any government, Liberal or Conservative, is going to be able to carry on very much longer in this country and put forward budgets such as that which has been presented by the present administration.

Mr. W. K. BALDWIN (Stanstead): If the concluding remarks of the last speaker, Mr. Woodsworth, were true, it would indeed be a gloomy day in Canada. But the debate, so far as it has gone, seems to me to reflect a spirit of optimism. We know that an appalling debt has been piled up, particularly during the war period, and as stated by the hon. member for King's (Mr. Hughes) in his lucid remarks this afternoon, we must be taxed to the limit to discharge that debt. The worst feature of the situation is that the debt is growing, and I presume that this is what is creating a feeling of despondency on the part of certain hon. members. But the debate is not marked by the same acrimonious spirit that formerly prevailed, and censure is not indulged into so great an extent as was the case in years gone by. The situation calls for the serious thought of everyone, and there is not so great a tendency to indulge in political fighting. No one charges the late government with misconduct, and I will go no further than to say that they made serious mistakes. They certainly made a grave blunder in lending money to European countries that were not solvent; and they made a mistake in allowing the Food Control Board to continue the embargo on sugar, with the result that the people suffered to the extent of some $30,000,000; because the consumers had to pay in the long run. We have had the distinction for more than twenty-five years of having cheaper sugar in Canada than in the United States, and all these things count in the problem of retaining population. The hon. member for Last Mountain (Mr. Johnston) complains that we have not held the immigrants that have come into the country in the past decade. Well, the best way of holding not only immigrants, but the people who are already in the country, is to make the country a cheap place to live in, and if the Food Control Board had lifted the embargo on sugar eighteen or twenty months ago, an enormous quantity of refined sugar would have gone to the United States at 17 to 20 cents per pound, and when it was all gone we would have started on the level and sugar would have been as cheap here as in the United States. Another great mistake the government made was in taking over the railways, an action which even newspapers that always supported the Conservative party condemned. However, we have the railways on our hands now and we must give them a trial. But I see the cloud lifting on the horizon. I notice that there is a 10 per cent reduction being made in the freight rates in the United States as from the first of July, and from four to six millions will be saved in the pay list, beginning from the same date. We have imitated the United States in many ways that were not advisable, but I hope we shall be able to follow their example in this regard. The hon. member for Yale (Mr. MacKelvie), whose remarks I have been reading in Hansard, says that the Liberal party has not consistently adhered to any principle. Let us see what we have done. We promised the people of the country during the election that economies would be practised in every possible direction; and I said in my own constituency that if the party I supported were returned to power and should spend one dime where the preceding government spent a dollar, I would condemn them. Now the Opposition on the 25th day of April and on every day succeeding, when the militia estimates were brought into the House, beat the drums and put up various speakers in order to have those estimates increased. One of their speakers was the late mayor of Toronto (Mr Church), who had a good deal to say about the navy.

Let me tell you, Mr. Speaker, that after the great Disarmament Conference in Washington the United States reduced their naval and military establishments by many thousands of men and stopped construction of several great super dreadnaughts. General Bliss of the United States army, said that if we had another war that approached the last in expenditure of money and loss of lives the united churches of the world would be to blame. Some one asked him why did he not so advise the President and Congress. He replied, "It is absolutely useless. Public sentiment must be aroused or nothing will be done to prevent another war. All the military men are keen on military training, and they are supported by the profiteers, who are great in number and possessed of vast wealth." Senator Lodge and other prominent public men of the United States have all declared that war is simply slaughter and destruction. Hon. members who favour a big navy and a strong militia force appear to imagine that there is an enemy behind every tree. Therefore, they say, "We must keep up a great war machine." They are absolutely wrong.

What does Canada want a navy for? The only useful purpose that a navy could serve, it seems to me, would be to destroy the icebergs that float down into the traffic lanes of the Atlantic. If by some invention our navy could perform that great service much valuable property and many precious lives would be saved. The United States are our friends, and they have the Monroe Doctrine. Let us remember that. We do not wish to be cowardly, but we do know that no nation upon the face of the earth would dare question the Monroe Doctrine. The United States would not let any nation invade Canada.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. BALDWIN: There is a smile on the faces of my friends opposite. I hate to make any comparison between Canada and the United States, but suppose our neighbours should take umbrage and invade this country? In spite of everything we could do, it seems to me they would cut us into about three divisions, and they could do so without making any great effort or spending very much time about it. Some hon. members of the Opposition may say, "The member for Stanstead is a pussy-footed, sissified fellow." I want to tell them that there is not a man in this House who would use cold steel and cold lead quicker than I would to put down riots or rebellion after the Riot Act had been read and ignored. But we do not need a great army for police purposes. There is no better army or constabulary in any country than a happy, contented people. I do not believe in the great labour masses of Canada depending on somebody else. I believe in their using their own ingenuity and industry and becoming home-builders, if it means only a little ten by twelve house on a small piece of land. Those are the people who will uphold law and order, and in this great country there is nobody so poor but should be able to own a piece of land in our rural districts.

It has been said that the twentieth century belongs to Canada. We believe it. For the first decade of this century Canada's career was great and glorious, but then the war came and she got a blow in the solar plexus that paralyzed her. She is rapidly recovering, however, and if we only buckle down and do things this great Dominion will soon regain her former prosperity. It seems to me that we are now in a position somewhat analogous to that of the United States at the end of the Civil War. The people of that country allowed their military machine to go to pieces and set to work to develop their natural resources, and in two decades many of her veterans were wealthy men. We have to follow their example—get to work and develop our natural resources. We should be able to find employment for all our people, and as soon as we get them employed I would empty our gaols and penitentiaries, for I would not feed a single able-bodied prisoner while there was work for him to do in helping develop this great Dominion. As a Canadian I am optimistic. We have wonderful resources. Take our great waterways—the St. Lawrence system, the Great Lakes—and consider their potentialities. Think of the possibilities of the immense resources of which the Assiniboia and Saskatchewan rivers, flowing to the foothills of the Rockies, are the centre. But these resources cannot be developed in a day; in three or four decades, when the century is half gone, Canada may have a population of fifty millions, while the United States will certainly have two hundred and fifty million people. We have to do big things in this country; we are a vigorous people and we must have an optimistic outlook. It seems to me that we can have a great waterway system from the St. Lawrence and the Great Lakes to the foothills of the Rockies—to the province of Alberta at least; and in my opinion nothing would more surely cement the different provinces together; nothing would make their union more certain.

These geographical differences bring me to this thought, in passing: there has been some difference of opinion on the question of oleomargarine. When I went recently to my constituency I was asked how it was that the farmers in the House voted in favour of the importation and manufacture of oleomargarine, while others who were not farmers voted against it. Well, it is a question of geographical differences. It may happen that some of our hon. friends are not dairymen; and perhaps that is why we differ on these subjects. It is a matter of one taking one point of view, and one another.

The ex-Finance Minister (Sir Henry Drayton) has criticised the present Minister of Finance with respect to promises. Now, it was stated by a prominent member of the Conservative party—I myself heard him say it many years ago—that elections were not won by prayers. But I would remind my hon. friends of the Opposition that Sir John Macdonald had always proclaimed his policy as protection and reciprocity in natural products. That policy was proclaimed up and down the country from 1878; I myself heard it enunciated. And I hay say that if Sir Wilfrid Laurier had not been defeated in 1911 we would not to-day be worrying about the small population of Canada. In September, 1911, large numbers of persons had located lands in the West and were prepared to invest their capital in this country in the event of reciprocity being adopted. But when the result of the election became known they packed their bags and returned to the United States without making any further investments—and I say that they had been cautious enough not to invest very much before the result of the election became known. The ex-Minister of Finance, therefore, in censuring the present Minister of Finance has charged the members of the Liberal party with doing something of which his own party is guilty.

In connection with the criticisms of the ex-Minister of Finance, I may point out that it was he who, when Sir Thomas White found it necessary to retire, took the burden of the portfolio of finance upon his shoulders; and when he came to the House with his taxation proposals, there were more criticisms of his budget from his own side of the House than there were from any other quarter. It can easily be seen that the present minister is not in any such unfortunate position. The ex-Minister of Finance, on the occasion to which I referred, tinkered with his schedules and changed them from time to time until he got them into some kind of shape. I know that in the present budget no one is unfairly dealt with, but I am sure that the minister will be pleased to correct anything that is pointed out to him in that line.

There is but one way for Canada to develop, and that is to impress the sons and daughters of this country with the fact that it is a fine place to live in and that their prospects here are better than they would be in the United States. When young men ask me for advice on this subject I tell them that there are ten or fifteen chances in Canada to one in the United States, for them to be successful. I tell them that if they go to the United States they stand a chance of being servants only, whereas if they stay in Canada they can be their own masters and be amply repaid for their efforts.

The old province of Quebec, the greatest province of the greatest dominion on earth, was at one time deeply in debt, and it succeeded in getting out of that debt not by ousting one government and putting in another, but by the administration of affairs on a sound business basis. The result is that we are developing our great resources; we are making the forces of nature the servants of mankind. We are developing our waterways; we are bringing factories into this country from the United States and are making goods for export to all parts of the world.

Water power development will make us independent of the United States for coal. In developing the deep waterway from Montreal, we would probably not need to go to ocean depth, but we could go to the depth of the Welland canal, and if we have not the whole control of the St. Lawrence route, we certainly have the whole control of the Welland canal. If this water power is developed, we shall be able to electrify all the railways of Canada, at least so far as Quebec and Ontario are concerned, and have power to supply all our industrial concerns. I know at present of a company that is waiting to come to Canada with fifteen million pounds sterling. They have a factory farther west in Ontario and they are waiting for this power development on the St. Lawrence before opening up a large plant for the manufacture of electrical transmission machinery of every kind from the wheel to the whistle. Let me assure the people of Montreal that I would not advocate any policy that would injure any part of our great country, but I could not imagine that two or three or four hundred million of money could be expended within twenty-five miles of the island of Montreal without practically all of it being spent in and around that city and when the work was completed the population of Montreal would be increased by a million, I believe, and all along the line of development there would be great industrial enterprises.

The benefits of the work would be reflected in every part of the country. My county is 130 miles away from where this great development would take place, but I believe its benefits would be reflected in all the eastern townships as well as in the West. The coal of Alberta would come down that system of waterways and canals to the great provinces of Ontario and Quebec, and the products of the coal and iron mines of Cape Breton would likewise go up that waterway. I go further and say this, although it is somewhat of an accusation against the Opposition: When the powers that were in Newfoundland came to Ottawa to enter Confederation they were turned down through haggling over a paltry sum. The Hon. Mackenzie Bowell was then Prime Minister. Let Canada force her way along and show that she is great—and if you want to know her greatness just go into the United States and see what they think about it; they say, "You do not comprehend yourself. You do not value your country. You do not see your country as we see it"—and then when this work is consummated and we get into closer union with the whole British West Indies, I believe that Newfoundland will enter Confederation. We have to make this a century of great development, and we must not wait for the end of the century before we start.

Now I come to the tariff. Some people seem to be very scared over the budget proposals, but so far as I am concerned, I am optimistic. Suppose the United States do own sixty per cent of the world's gold, and that they do not want to trade with us. It seems to me when we look around our Empire with nearly five hundred millions of people, and then at our allies in the late war, we need not fear if the United States want to fence themselves in with a high tariff. Let them do it, and we will see who will be the winner. I will guarantee that the United States will not put up any tariff so that they cannot trade with the rest of the world, and that it will come down as soon as they see Canada can stand on her own feet. Very soon we shall be able to go to the Old Country again and negotiate loans to develop our country.

We want to teach our boys and girls that we have something to do in this country besides being Boy Scouts and Girl Guides and Cadets. In olden times the boys and girls were used, and used well, and they made mighty good men and women through helping their fathers and mothers, and learning how to do things. We want them to learn to live within their means, and if they want something, to earn it. Then you get them started right. The great trouble with the country to-day is that we are aping to a large extent that great and rich country, the United States. I do not wish to say anything against the United States, but they know that we are aping the fashions of foolishness, and are forgetting to work and be prudent.

I listened with great interest during the first three weeks of this session to those who call themselves the Progressive party in this House, and I must say that I admire their fair-mindedness, honesty of purpose, and willingness to try and build up this country. As I have said it is geographical differences that separate us, and we must not forget it. It seemed to me to-day that the hon. member for Last Mountain (Mr. Johnston) rather accentuated those differences. I hope he did not mean to. Perhaps I misunderstood him. However, it is a fact that when that group of manufacturers came to Ottawa in 1877 and asked Hon. Alexander Mackenzie to give them a higher tariff, and he refused, they went down to the Russell Hotel bar, and Sir John Macdonald was there, and in a spirit of joviality said, "Elect me, boys, and I will give you what you want."

During the war our young men felt a certain amount of independence but it must be remembered that wars bring about very great changes. The young men of Canada were called into factories and there they earned $6, $7, $8 and $10 a day. When these factories were closed down the same young men went out to help the western farmers to gather their wheat. As harvesters they were paid $7, $9, or $10 a day, and you know how independent they got; they had money to blow in and they had a deuce of a time. Down in that part of the province of Quebec where I live the farmers have been having for the last two years just as hard a time as the farmers in the West. Unfortunately for them during that time Providence has not smiled on that section of the country as in former years. There never had been such a noteworthy failure of the hay crop in Quebec as within the last two or three years. Then the farmers who were short of hay had to pay $25, $30 and $35 a ton. The price of butter has dropped to 30 or 35 cents a pound. Let us remember, whether we come from the East or from the West, that our troubles are just about the same. Even the merchant to-day has goods on the shelf that he finds it hard to dispose of. Those goods have declined in value to a greater extent during the last four months than they did in the previous three years. Unfortunately for us the Textile people are now raising their prices; but I hope the time will come when we will be able to import raw materials from British possessions and so be independent of the United States, just as we would be independent in the matter of coal if we harnessed and developed our great water powers. The day will come when we shall be able to develop all our natural resources and waterways, but in order to accomplish that we must remain a united people.

I have spoken about the development of Canada and what I would do to bring it about. I have stated that this great development will take place if every man and woman in the country goes to work. I also stated that I would not feed anyone at the public expense unless such persons went on to public works and earned their maintenance. That is a policy which has been adopted in other countries, and to a certain extent it has been tried in Canada. For example the manufacture of binder twine was introduced in Kingston penitentiary but I understand the labour people objected and the practice was discontinued. Not only are the farmers in the East in the same position as the farmers in the West, but the retail merchants and many of the manufacturers are not to be envied. The last named have to provide for taxes, insurance, depreciation of plant and interest on capital, and their output has been very much reduced. So that industrially almost everybody in Canada is in the same boat. We must therefore all work unitedly to bring back prosperity. If the great railway problem were settled, and our great canal system inaugurated, it would help to greatly alleviate the existing conditions. I am not excepting either the St. Lawrence or the Georgian bay projects, or even the Hudson bay route. All will be of material assistance in bringing about that prosperity which we all look for and desire. The competition of the waterways need not be feared by the railway systems. The great transcontinental railways will always have their hands full in carrying promptly to the seaboard the products of the West.

As to the question of immigration some hon. member said that we did not want in Canada people who come in sheepskin coats with all their belongings tied up in a red handkerchief. Let me say that I have watched in New York, Boston, Chicago and even in Montreal streams of people who came to this continent from south eastern Europe whence more than a thousand people used to depart weekly for the United States. I have spoken with people who have had intimate knowledge of immigrants who came and settled in various parts of the States from Norway, Sweden, Denmark, and Germany. They have thrived and prospered and their children have intermarried with Americans. Until very recent years the United States received practically everybody that was willing to come to its shores. The adults might not easily acquire a knowledge of English, but their children soon learned the language, and were overcome with admiration at the possibilities of the country. In Canada the feeling of race hatred has got to stop; it must stop if the country is ever to become a great and prosperous nation. The yellow peril in the United States is greatly talked about, but what do we find over there? In a Californian city nearly 4,000 divorces were granted last year. A similar condition prevails in the states of Oregon and Washington. With family life such as it is over there is it any wonder that the services of the yellow races were enlisted in order to perform necessary manual labour. Forty years ago wealthy Americans bragged about their Chinese and Japanese servants. If those people, instead of getting divorces, had been raising families, the white population would have been much greater and they would not have needed immigration from outside. It is a disgrace to this country, and I do not believe these conditions would prevail were it not for the fact that we are living adjacent to a nation which has demoralized us, and they talk about all the freedom they have over there.

We in this country have to build up a national spirit—a spirit that does not fear immigration from other countries. We are always talking about the foreigners and saying we do not want them. If you go to Boston you find the people there afraid of the Irish. In the south they are afraid of the negroes. In the Pacific states and British Columbia, fear is expressed of the people that will work. In the districts this side of the mountains there seems to be a fear of the Doukhobors and the other foreigners that are settling there. If the people who are agitating against the immigration of these people had travelled through the states and made the observations there that I have, they would not have any fear of immigration.

I understand there is an army of men on their way from Toronto to Ottawa. It may be the same kind of aggregation as may be the same kind of aggression as Coxey's army that marched on Washington a few years ago. I have nothing to say against the returned boys but if they had been willing to work for the farmers they might have obtained work en route and probably would not have felt the need of coming to Ottawa. Certainly the farmers want help. Canada has nine provinces stretching across 4,000 miles. While the United States began in New England and gradually the population moved westward settling one state after another. They are not geographically different from us and just as they developed we can develop also.

I hope the people of Canada will see that you cannot get even a budget tax which will be equalized for all. A few minutes ago a member on the other side spoke about his one child, and said that a neighbour of his had seven children. How are you going to get at a thing like that, unless this member gets six children to even up. You cannot get a budget that will hit everybody alike.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): The hon. member agrees that we cannot get a budget that will hit everybody alike. Will the hon. member not agree with me that it will be better to hit at the chap who has all the money rather than the poor devil that has not any?

Mr. BALDWIN: I do not quite catch the question.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): The hon. member referred to the fact that we could not get a budget suitable to all people.—An equalized budget.

Mr. BALDWIN: Yes.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): In that case would the hon. member not prefer to have a budget brought in to tax the rich and not the poor?

Mr. BALDWIN: That is very good. Of course, the people in this world are not all philanthropists. Your heart may be right and mine may be right, but it is fair to say that the rich have built up philanthropic institutions. They have built homes for old people, hospitals for crippled children and supported schools and churches. Of course, the money must come from them for the sick. I would like to see unanimity of purpose in our Parliament. People speak of the separation of capital and labour. Capital is just accumulated labour. Everything we use, eat and wear is created by labour, and it is wrong to say anything against labour. The late Minister of Interior told us last year, when he was making his speech, what the different members had said. He said the member for Stanstead would allow anybody to come into the country that was law abiding and willing to work, and he was quite right. I even go further and say that I never saw in my life a dishonest, disreputable, thieving person who would stick continuously to work which he was asked to do. It is the same old doctrine "Satan finds some mischief for idle hands to do." If people look at it properly, there should be no disrespect whatever for the labourer who is willing to work. I would let everybody into this country who is able and willing to work. If the people in British Columbia do not want to associate with the yellow people, that is their business and no concern of mine.

It is conceded by all that this is a great country. We have a railway system that is larger than our population warrants, and it is absolutely necessary that more people shall come to the country. We must therefore be united in improving conditions in Canada so that this country may be advertised abroad as a desirable place for intending immigrants to settle in. We may fight politically, but to the outside world we must present a united front.

Mr. LEWIS: I desire to speak upon the budget, Mr. Speaker, but the hour is rather late; and when we consider that the House will sit on Wednesday evening it seems to me to be setting a bad precedent to continue this debate to 12 o'clock.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Does my hon. friend wish to adjourn the debate?

Mr. LEWIS: I should like to do so.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: By all means.

On motion of Mr. Lewis the debate was adjourned.

On motion of Mr. Mackenzie King. The House adjourned at 11 p.m.

Tuesday, May 30, 1922.

The House met at three o'clock.

ST. LAWRENCE WATERWAY—CORRESPONDENCE

Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I beg to hand my hon. friend from West York (Sir Henry Drayton) the correspondence requested by him yesterday between the government of the United States and the Govenment of Canada respecting the St. Lawrence Waterway project.

"GENERAL" MACDONALD'S ARMY

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (North Toronto): I wish to call the attention of the Prime Minister to telegrams and letters I have received from those in charge of "General" Macdonald's army which is marching from Toronto to Ottawa. The 200 men on the march are good citizens and they did their duty overseas. Their leader was disabled in the war, and his pension has since been cut off. Here is a newspaper containing a photograph of his wife and family of six children. These men—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. Will the hon. member kindly put a question to the Government instead of continuing his argument.

Mr. CHURCH: I should like to ask the Prime Minister if any arrangements have been made to receive these men and to send them back to their homes, or to have a committee meet them and go into each man's case? These men hope by a campaign of education to have something done for them.

Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): The Government will be pleased to receive the deputation to which my hon. friend has made reference as soon as they reach Ottawa. In the meantime I would ask my hon. friend to send me copies of the telegrams and letters to which he has just referred.

THE BUDGET

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON THE ANNUAL FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The House resumed from Monday, May 29, the debate on the motion of Hon. W. S. Fielding (Minister of Finance), that Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair for the House to go into Committee of Ways and Means, and the proposed amendment thereto of Hon. Sir Henry Drayton.

Mr. A. J. LEWIS (Swift Current): Mr. Speaker, I wish to associate myself wth those who have congratulated the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) on the long and faithful service that he has rendered to his country. It is a record which I think every young parliamentarian might with profit try to emulate, and I only hope that as long as I remain in this House it may be said of me that I have been as faithful as the hon. gentleman in the performance of my duty.

I notice that the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. McQuarrie) in the course of his speech last night mentioned the name of the hon. member for Last Mountain (Mr. Johnston) about fifteen or sixteen times. The hon. member for New Westminster seemed to be in a very inquisitive mood in regard to where we stand in relation to the budget. Of course, he jumped to certain conclusions as to what we are going to do, and he said repeatedly that we as a Progressive party had always come to the rescue of the government. Indeed, he seemed to be very much concerned about the defeat of the Government. I do not know whether he is afraid that if he had to stand again in New Westminster he would not be returned. As, however, he seems to think that we always come to the rescue of the Government, I thought I would look up the record of the divisions that have taken place this session. There have been seven divisions so far, and this is how the Progressive party voted on each occasion:

There was a division on March 28 in which we find that the Opposition was opposed by the Government and the Progressives. On the 10th of April another division took place in which the Conservatives and the Government, almost without exception, voted against the Progressives. On April 24, the Conservatives and the Government again voted against the Progressives; and on April 25 the Conservatives and the Government voted together against the Progressives. So that the evidence is ample to prove that every one believes he has the right to vote according to conviction. On the 5th of May there was a mixed vote; the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. McQuarrie) voted with the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Crerar) and the hon. member for Last Mountain (Mr. Johnston). On May 8, there was another vote in which we find that the Conservatives were arrayed against the Government and the Progressives. On the 15th of May there was a mixed vote, but a preponderance of Conservatives voted with the Government. So that in the final analysis there have been seven divisions in the House, three in which the Conservatives and the Government voted against the Progressives, two in which the Progressives and the Government voted against the Conservatives, and two mixed votes in which the Conservatives in one of them voted in preponderant numbers with the Government. I think, Sir, that if any one is afraid that the Government is going to be defeated, it is the hon. members to my right.

Moreover, it was said that my leader, the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Crerar), and the hon. member for Last Mountain, would feel more at home if they were sitting on the Liberal side. Well, every one has the right to his convictions, and the convictions of these hon. members are such that they sit on this side. I will not say there is not a worse side they could sit on than that which is occupied by members of the Government. Let us remember that we have come here not to play politics; we all have the best interests of the country at heart. I can conceive that hon. members to my right have the interests and well-being of the country at heart; but let them also remember that we on this side and those on the Government side also have those interests at heart, although we may view them from different angles.

Now, it was not my intention to enter into any argument with any member of this House. What I wished to bring before the House is matter relating to the budget, with a view to seeing whether a fiscal policy could not be brought forward that would remedy a great many of the evils which exist in our country to-day.

In the first place let me say that it is the easiest thing in the world to attack a budget, involving, as it does, the taxation of the whole country with all its ramifications. We certainly can find weaknesses in any budget, no matter who brings it in. It seems to me, therefore, that the only fair basis upon which a man has a right to express criticism of the budget is to try to place himself in the position of the responsible minister of the Crown, the Minister of Finance, and to realize the great problems which confront him, including the duty of imposing taxation which will be adequate to meet the needs of the country. That is the basis of my criticism. The task of the Minister of Finance is not made one whit easier by the present state of our country, the condition of depression, the crises which are taking place, the unrest which prevails, the lowering of wages which has been proceeding—all these things, in their cumulative effect, do not make the task of the Minister any easier. Moreover, it does not make the task of the Progressive party or any party in this House easier in its support or in its criticism of the budget of the day.

I would like to say a few words in regard to the fiscal policy of this country. Of course, I am a free trader out and out, and I am not ashamed to admit it. But, Sir, this is a democracy, and apparently the majority of the people of this country do not believe in free trade. They believe, perhaps in freer trade than is at present in existence. In a democracy the expressed will of the majority of the people has the right to prevail. When we who believe in free trade shall have educated and reformed the people of this country so far as their views on fiscal policy are concerned, then we shall be returned to power and have an opportunity of putting those principles into practice.

I have carefully gone over the budget speech, and I am unable to discern very much difference between the Liberal policy and the old National policy. I am not saying this merely for effect; that is as far as I am able to analyze it. I believe in a tariff for revenue purposes, and as the Liberal platform expressed approval of a tariff for revenue I was in hopes that the hon. Minister of Finance would see his ideal reached before he passed the burden of the administration of the finances of this country on to other shoulders. I would like to have seen his ideal reached in regard to reciprocity and freer trade; for I feel that is the ideal which he has in view. But for some reason of which I cannot speak —because I do not know—for some reason, he has seen fit not to follow out that policy in his budget, though there is no doubt that he had a splendid opportunity of bringing into effect a tariff for revenue purposes.

Now, we had this National policy in 1878, and surely forty-four years of the National policy of protection has amply demonstrated to this country the fact that it is based on a fallacy. Instead of bringing peace and prosperity to this fair Dominion, it makes one class of the people rich, autocratic and powerful, and the poor people poorer—so much so that they can hardly exist. To me, Sir, that has been proved in the forty-four years which have gone, and it is quite time, I think, for the Liberal party to put their tariff for revenue into effect. I was wondering as I looked over their record whether they had any faith or any confidence in a tariff for revenue. I was wondering whether it was because they lacked that faith or that confidence that they were afraid to bring it in. I will endeavour to show that if they had brought a tariff for revenue into effect they could have increased the revenue and have brought a great deal of relief to the people of Canada at large.

Before I speak in regard to this tariff for revenue, I wish to say a word about the reductions that have been effected by the present budget. It is the same old tariff, the same old protection, in spite of the reductions that have been made; but it is a step, or half a step, in the right direction—in the direction of freer trade. If the Government remained in power for a number of years and reduced the whole of the tariff by 2½ per cent each year, it would not be long before we had freer trade in Canada—and that is the consummation toward which we are working. Now, I am not speaking particularly from the standpoint of the farmer, but I wish to refer to the 2½ per cent reduction on farm implements. Take, for instance, a commodity coming from the United States valued at $100. Prior to this budget we find that there was a tax of $10.50 added to that price, plus a sales tax of $4.50, making the total price $117.00. Now let us see how much it would cost under the budget that has just been brought down. Suppose the same commodity is valued at $100. The duty is decreased 2½ per cent, making it $10. To that $110 we have to add the increase in the sales tax, which amounts to $6.60, making the total price $116.60. So as far as the Canadian consumer is concerned, this 2½ per cent reduction in the tariff means a reduction of only 40 cents, and on a commodity that cost $117 such a reduction to the consumer is very, very slight indeed.

I have gone carefully over all these items that are to be reduced, and what do I find? As far as the West is concerned, the total reduction on agricultural implements is estimated at $144,660, and when we take into consideration the British preference, we find that the estimated total relief from taxation to the people at large is approximately $500,000. Compare this with the increase in the sales tax which was spoken of last night, and which was shown to bear more heavily upon the family man than upon the man without wife and children. It is estimated that this increased sales tax will bring in from $30,000,000 to $40,000,000. So we have, on the one hand, relief from taxation to the amount of $500,000, and on the other, an increase in taxation of from $30,000,000 to $40,000,000.

Mr. HUGHES: Will the hon. gentleman allow me an explanation? I find that the exemptions from the sales tax are very numerous, and include nearly all the necessaries of life purchased by a family of small or moderate means. I have the list here and will pass it over to my hon. friend, because it gives information that I think would be useful to the House, and I think it would remove about nine-tenths of the objections raised by the Progressives to the sales tax. I forgot to mention this when I spoke yesterday.

Mr. LEWIS: I understand that the sales tax last year brought in something like $60,000,000 of revenue, when there were already numerous articles exempted. As a result of the new Government coming into power, the additional exemptions include alfalfa meal, salt radium, and job printed matter, but that is all.

Mr. HUGHES: The exempted list is already very large.

Mr. LEWIS: Yes, but if the sales tax brought in last year $60,000,000, and it is increased 50 per cent, it will bring in this year about $90,000,000, which bears out the argument I presented to the House a moment ago.

Mr. HUGHES: The tax does not weigh so heavily upon men of small means.

Mr. LEWIS: It may not seem so to my hon. friend, but if he had a large family he would think differently.

I am going to speak for a few moments on economy. I think the hon. Minister of Finance in his own heart felt that the system of government book-keeping which has been in vogue for a number of years past was not altogether satisfactory. Through some method of fictitious valuing, every government that went out of power showed that they had a surplus—but anyone knows that if we are raising a revenue of something like $350,000,000, and are expending annually at the rate of $450,000,000, whether on capital account or any other account, that deficiency must be raised —some time the chickens are bound to come home to roost. I think the time must soon come when the approximate expected revenue of this country will exceed the expenditure, and thus in a measure overtake the large expenditure of the past.

We heard a good deal last night about optimism about our fair country. Well, the West is always optimistic; we are all an optimistic people, but an optimism which is based on a fallacy does not get us anywhere, and we have no right to be so optimistic that we take authority to place an undue burden on generations to come which will be very hard for them to bear. There are various ways, I think, in which we can decrease our expenditure at the present time. This year, for instance, we are asked to vote $9,000,000 for the Welland canal. I do not think that the vote has passed yet. Surely the time has not yet come when we, a people of less than nine millions, should take upon ourselves great national undertakings of this sort which, when completed, will be a competitor against our national railways. I am glad to find that so far the Dominion Government has not replied to the United States in regard to the St. Lawrence deep waterway scheme, and I hope they will not for another twenty years. I think that so far as Canada is concerned, we have ample provision now for exporting and importing our goods. We are a people of less than nine millions, and we have no right to overburden the populace with taxes. We talk about people going to the United States or other countries to live, but is it any wonder when we place a sales tax on the family man which makes it almost impossible for him and his family to live? We had a discussion on immigration in this House some time ago. I believe that the best way to increase the population of this country is through the family, by increasing the number of children. But people will not raise large families unless they have the same conception as I have, unless they find it easier for them to live. So far as I am concerned, I believe that Canadian children are going to be the salvation of this country—far better than any immigrants we could bring in from any part of the world. I would advise my hon. friends from British Columbia, who are concerned over the Japanese problem, to look at the low birth rate of the white people in British Columbia, and to see to it that their birth rate becomes normal, and that they do not commit race suicide as the birth rate shows they are doing, and then there will not be the menace from oriental immigration. There ought to be a normal birth rate in Canada. It is a healthy sign when the birth rate is normal, and the Canadian race is one of the most vigorous on the globe. Neither the Italian nor the German nor any other nation should be allowed to make up the deficiencies in our own population.

I want to say just a few words in regard to the tariff for revenue, especially in regard to the new tax that has been imposed. Referring to the tax on cigars, in Schedule II, I find that in the year 1920 194,335,000 cigars were consumed in Canada valued at $14,102,399. Now, as regards the imports and exports it is practically negligible, and so for that reason I am not going to say anything about it. At the same time there were consumed, as we were told by the Finance Minister over 2,450,000,000 cigarettes valued at $24,000,000. The duty on those cigarettes was $15,000,000. This year the duty has been increased and the result is that the Finance Minister expects a decrease of 10 per cent in the revenue from this source. Now, I want hon. members to mark that fact: That when you increase the duty on an article, in the opinion of the Finance Minister, you decrease the consumption. That may be true in regard to cigarettes, but is it true in regard to the general commerce of the country? That is a point that my hon. friends to my right ought to consider very seriously. Now, in regard to the cigars which were valued at $14,102,399, how much do you think we got in the shape of duty? Just a litle over one million dollars; the actual amount was $1,085,866.87. Now, Sir, I am not taking any exception to this, I think that is a duty for revenue purposes only, and the minister is quite justified in imposing it; but I do not believe in the discrimination, that is all there is about it, and I will give you reasons for my belief. In my hand I now hold a cigar, and the value of that cigar is 20 cents.

An. hon. MEMBER: I will take it.

Mr. LEWIS: My hon. friend can take it if he likes; he probably smokes this kind of cigar. But this is a 20-cent cigar, and it costs $200 per thousand, and there is an "enormous" tax upon it of $10 per thousand. What does that mean? It means that when I buy this cigar I pay a duty of one cent. Very good. Now, here is a cigarette which costs 10 cents a package. What do I pay in duty on that? On cigarettes there is a duty ranging approximately from 90 cents to $1.10; but on the cigar the duty is less than 5 cents. Now, Sir, it has been argued by certain hon. members who spoke on the Government side that taxation was being brought in which would be levied on the rich man, who was able to pay, and removed from the poor man. Who are the men who can smoke cigars selling for 20 cents or higher? They are the men who are to be found in the Château Laurier, the Ritz Carleton, the Fort Garry or other hotels of like character. When these men buy a cigar for 20 cents they only pay a duty of one cent, whereas when I buy twenty cents worth of cigarettes I pay in duty 22 cents. If the Finance Minister really wants to bring in a tariff for revenue only let him remove this discrimination. I am not complaining about the duty on cigarettes, I am quite willing to pay duty of one cent on every cigarette I smoke; but I do say that the man who smokes a 20-cent cigar should also pay an equivalent rate of duty. If the Minister of Finance will remove this discrimination and put smokers on an equal footing in this regard I have not the least doubt but that he will increase his revenue from this source to $12,000,000 and that allows for the 10 per cent decrease in revenue which he anticipates as a result of the increased duty on cigarettes.

Now, I want to make a comparison with the duties levied on cigarettes and cigars in the United States. Over there, if I buy one dollar's worth of cigarettes I pay an excise duty of 7½ per cent; if I buy one dollar's worth of cigars I pay a duty of 3½ per cent. In Canada, on the other hand when I purchase a dollar's worth of cigarettes I am subjected to a duty of from 90 to 110 per cent; but when I buy a dollar's worth of cigars the duty only amounts to five cents. Now, I claim, Sir, that the men who smoke these cigars are just as well able to contribute towards the Dominion tax for revenue purposes as the ordinary individual—or the rich man for that matter—who smokes a cigarette. I commend the removal of this discrimination to the Minister of Finance; and if he only acts upon this suggestion he will increase his revenue by at least $12,000,000.

Now as to the matter of cars. Certain hon. members opposite have argued that a car was not a luxury. Well, a Ford car may not be a luxury; but it does seem to me that in the case of cars of a value which runs all the way up from $2,000 to $6,000 an excise tax is justifiable, but the tax should be graduated according to value. In the case of the cars of higher value, which are undoubtedly a luxury, a larger tax should be required in the interests of the revenue. In this way a tariff for revenue would operate beneficially.

I have carefully studied the income tax imposed in this country and compared it with the tax collected in other countries. I must admit that I am favourably disposed towards it because it exceeds the tax in vogue in a great many other countries. At the same time I want to say this: The man who enjoys an income of $10,000 up to $60,000 is almost missed. After the income gets to $60,000 the tax increases by leaps and bounds, until it is tremendous when it applies to incomes of a million. Very few people, however, receive that amount of income; and therefore the heavy tax applies to comparatively few. On the other hand there are thousands of our citizens with incomes between $10,000 and $60,000, and that is where the Finance Minister should apply his income tax and make hay while the sun shines. He can begin at an even earlier stage if he likes. I am quite willing to pay my share of the country's burdens; as long as I help to get Canada out of debt that is all I care about at the present time.

Let me say a word or two about the luxury tax. That tax was repealed some time ago, and why? Because from the very first it was made obnoxious; it was obnoxious to the women folk and it was obnoxious to the men folk. When you went into a store and bought certain commodities which were considered luxuries, the shopman told you the price and to it he added the luxury tax. That was a thing that stared people in the face all the time and caused a great deal of bother. Politics intervened, I understand, and the thing was removed. Now, Sir, the people who buy luxuries ought to be taxed. If they are able to buy a $300 fur coat, or similar costly garments, I say they have a right to be taxed. There is no reason why the luxury tax should not be collected in the same way as the sales tax. In the case of the latter we do not know what we are paying. We go into a shop to buy a certain commodity and they tell us the price. We have a sort of unconscious feeling at the back of our heads that we are paying a tax, but we do not know how much. It should be the same with the luxury tax; it can be reimposed, I believe, with a great deal of profit.

In conclusion, let me say this: I understand that last year the revenue on imports from Great Britain realized $18,741,531, the value of those imports being $117,134,570. From the United States we imported goods to the value of $516,105,107 upon which duty to the amount of $72,254,714 was paid. Now there, I think, was a splendid opportunity for the minister to have put into effect his ideas with respect to freer trade. When I look at the average ad valorem duty going with the preferential tariff, I find it is 16.2 per cent from Great Britain and other places. When it comes in the general tariff from United States it is 14 per cent. I think it would have been a master stroke of business if the minister had so reduced all these tariffs that it would have brought it down to an average all round of 10 per cent on the general and preferential tariff. As far as our reckoning goes, it would have decreased our revenue to a certain extent, but that could have been easily overcome by the increased revenue on cigars, luxury taxes, a more specific graduated tax on cars, and the income tax. There is no reason why we could not reduce these, because, I think, I have amply shown that, as far as our people are concerned, the reduction in the taxation would have increased the consumption and given them the opportunity to buy, whereas, on the other hand, the people who delight in luxuries, and have the money to smoke expensive cigars and enjoy other things would have still retained that privilege, and they would have more than made up for the reduction of revenue by the decrease of tariff. I hope that before the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) removes the mantle from his shoulder, he will see the great ideal of his life consummated, reciprocity with United States, a 50 per cent reduction with Great Britain, and freer trade all round, with its accumulated prosperity and peace to this Dominion.

Hon. R. J. MANION (Fort William and Rainy River): Mr. Speaker, I can very sincerely join in the congratulations to my hon. friend, the Minister of Finance, (Mr. Fielding) on the fact that he has had the good health and strength to deliver, I think, his sixteenth budget in this House. I am sure that, irrespective of party affiliation, everybody will welcome the fact that he has yet health and strength and wish him a continuation of it. At the same time, I regret that I cannot congratulate him quite so sincerely upon his budget as upon his health.

I should like to deal with the statements which he made regarding the loan made by the present Government. He spoke of it as as a one-hundred-million-dollar loan made recently in New York and compared it with some of the loans made by the former government. I have nothing to say against the fact that recently, in New York city, the Minister of Finance succeeded in selling bonds to the value of one hundred million at 5 per cent, and that the bond issue was taken up in a few hours. That is all to the good, but I notice in the press that the same day on which my hon. friend succeeded in selling that loan, New Zealand, a country of a population of about one-seventh or one-eighth of the population of Canada, and with a debt three or four times as much per capita, floated a $25,000,000, 5 per cent loan, in London, and it was taken up in a few hours. I have no criticism to offer, except that I believe both loans were floated by reason of the fact that the money market has eased down throughout the world.

I do not wish to take up time discussing the Liberal or Progressive platforms and pointing out the discrepancies between them and the present budget. It is sufficient to say, as everybody in the House knows, that in no shape, manner, or form does the present budget carry out either the Liberal or the Progressive platform.

There is one question with which I wish to deal for a moment, and I deal with it simply because my hon. friend the Finance Minister brought it up himself; that is the question of the resolution which he moved last year in amendment to the budget of the late government. In that resolution, which I am rather surprised that he again put upon Hansard, there are at least four matters which they demanded last year in Opposition, and which they did not put into force this year when they are in power and are able to do so. The first part of the resolution is this—

> That the House is unable to concur in the declarations by the Government that the tariff should be based on the principle of protection.

Well, if the taking off of 2½ per cent from farm implements and 5 per cent from one or two other things, changes a tariff or a budget such as ours from the principle of protection to the principle of free trade, I have yet to learn it. I do not think any of my hon. friends to my left, or any hon. member in this House, would think that that part of the resolution was lived up to. The budget this year is a protectionist budget without any question of doubt, and the Minister of Finance would no doubt agree with that statement. The second statement in the resolution to which I take exception is this:

> The tariff is a tax and the aim of legislation should be to make taxation as light as circumstances will permit.

I have no quarrel with the statement, but as the hon. member who has just resumed his seat has pointed out, instead of lessening taxation, the budget has increased it to a considerable extent. It has taken off one million dollars from the tariff, but has added thirty-five million of sales tax, so that nothing is lived up to in regard to that part of the resolution. The third statement is that—

> Such changes should be made in the customs duties as may be expected to reduce the cost of living.

If there is anything in this budget which reduces the cost of living I should be happy to have some one point it out to me. The budget increases the cost of living by at least twenty-nine million to thirty-four million dollars, because, as the hon. member from Swift Current (Mr. Lewis) has pointed out, the sales tax last year took in something like $60,000,000, and this year, by an increase of 50 per cent, it will take in something like $90,000,000 or $95,000,000. Those taxes come from the masses of the people. Therefore the budget has not decreased the cost of living, but has rather increased it. I might say that the other day I went to a theatre and saw a picture show. In it a pickpocket took from the pocket of a man to whom he owed money the amount which he owed that man, and then paid the man back with his own money. The people thought it was a good joke. But the people of Canada will not consider it a good joke when the Finance Minister takes from the country $35,000,000 and pays a debt of $1,000,000 which has been taken off the tariff.

Then the fourth statement with which I wish to deal in the resolution reads:

> That the House regrets that the financial proposals of the Government are not made with due regard to the economy that is so urgently needed, and expresses the opinion that before resorting to taxation the Government should make a substantial reduction in the proposed expenditure.

The total estimates last year, including supplementaries, amounted to $605,000,000, but out of that amount in the past fiscal year, we spent $495,000,000. The main estimates before the House at the present time amount to $466,000,000 which is nearly equal to the total expenditures last year, and the supplementaries are yet to come. I do not see any economy in that, and I am rather surprised that the hon. Minister of Finance should again put that resolution upon Hansard.

I admit that the Minister of Finance had a very difficult task to perform. He had first to make a tariff which would more or less accord with his own views; secondly, he had to make a tariff which would more or less accord with the varying views on his side of the House, and, finally, he had to make a tariff which would, at least, be partially acceptable as a promise to my hon. friends to the left. He had the hon. member from Brome (Mr. McMaster), for example, who says he is a free trader, to satisfy; and the hon. member from Brantford (Mr. Raymond) who got in on a high-tariff platform, who complained that the lowering of the duties on agricultural implements was going to hurt the city of Brantford. Then he had his own view, which, I believe, is a moderate tariff view, the same as my own view and that of my right hon. leader (Mr. Meighen). He had various others in his own party to satisfy, to say nothing of my hon. friends to the left, who, as my hon. friend from Swift Current pointed out, are free traders, but are quite satisfied with a protectionist budget when it comes to a vote. There is nothing in this budget to satisfy the farmers of the West, though it seems to be satisfying their representatives in this House.

I was in the lobby the other day, and one hon. member of the Farmers party, who has a very good fund of American humour, said "what we make on the peanuts we lose on the banans." I rather agreed with his statement, and I rather admired his ability to see quickly just what had been done to the farmers. There is certainly, in this budget, no relief for the farmers of the West. While the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) has, on former occasions in this House, shown a very nice vein of humour, I think at the present time he is laughing in both sleeves at the way in which he has put it over the farmers of the West in this budget, because there is no doubt that this budget has not relieved the farmers of the West; and, in fact, while farmers throughout this country are relieved to the extent, as my hon. friend says, of $500,000—(let us say $1,000,000)—by the removal of tariff duties to a certain extent on farm implements; but $35,000,000 is added—

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): If the statement has been made in this House that $500,000 is the amount of relief received under the customs tariff, why does my hon. friend raise it to $1,000,000?

Mr. MANION: I like the Government opposite, and I wish to give them the benefit of the doubt. Let us take it at $1,000,000, so that I cannot be criticised for underestimating the amount. As my right hon. friend (Mr. Meighen) beside me suggests, that takes in everything. But, supposing that relief amounting to $1,000,000 has been given to the farmers of this country, an amount of $35,000,000 has been added in taxation. Supposing the population of the prairie provinces amounts, as it does, to about 2,000,000, that is about one-quarter of the people of this country. Thus the Minister of Finance has added to the expenses of the people of the prairie provinces something like eight, or nine or ten million dollars for the million dollars which he has taken off the shoulders of the people of the country in general. Therefor, if there is anything in this budget that the farmers have any reason to cheer about, I for one, fail to see it.

In this budget there is no sign except one of free trade. There is, by virtue of the exchange situation, free trade with Germany. I am not a flag waver; I am not a German hater; and I am not one of those who believe in stirring up hatreds amongst nations; but at the same time, if I have any favours to give, I prefer to give them to my friends. On an occasion like this, I would prefer to favour the people who fought with us, the British, Americans, French, Italians, or some other nations which fought with us.

Just to show conditions that exist in Germany at the present time, let me read three brief extracts from literature which I have read recently, and such instances can be multiplied indefinitely. Mr. J. M. Keynes, a short time ago, wrote a book called "A Revision of the Treaty", and in that book he pointed out that up to the end of 1920, Germany was supposed to send coal to the Allies at the rate of about two million tons per month, and upon this the Allies were to pay a small amount towards the cost of production, this amount to be in proportion to the cost of coal production in England and France. But, due to exchange, this small amount not only paid Germany for the production of the coal, but gave her a good profit upon it. That illustrates the condition of exchange at the present time in Germany.

Mr. FORKE: Is Mr. J. M. Keynes not, at the present time, the foremost advocate of trading with the German people?

Mr. MANION: That has nothing whatever to do with my argument. I am not discussing him; I am giving this quotation from his remarks as a quotation on the exchange situation between Germany and other countries. I do not care what he advocates. He might be the Angel Gabriel or the reverse; that would not matter at all as regards my argument. In an article in the English Review for October, 1921, Mr. J. Austin Harrison, an Englishman who is not advocating trade with Germany, says:

> Germany is doing a brisk trade, is industrially prosperous, has few unemployed and has a growing export which, to the consternation of the Allies, threatens to grow more real and valuable as the depreciation in the value of Germany's currency increases. This will still further close British markets, increase unemployment, because Britain is forced to buy food at a great loss to herself and cannot compete in Europe with countries whose currency is depreciated.

The final quotation that I will give is from the Literary Digest for November 26, 1921, just six months ago. It says:

> Returning travellers report Germany humming with industry, her workers well paid and well clothed and fed, with taxes the lowest in Europe and a promising export trade stimulated by her cheap money which permits her to under-bid England, France and America on foreign orders. Thus the cheap mark helps Germany and hits everyone else.

That shows the condition of trade in Germany. It shows that Germany requires no favours; and yet, by virtue of the fact that the Minister of Finance has removed restrictions which have existed and which he says are not perfect—I admit probably they are not—he has, on account of the low value of the mark, virtually given free trade to Germany. The restrictions that existed on the foreign exchange did not apply to the French franc or to the British pound, because they had never decreased to a value of 50 per cent. I know the Minister of Finance had a difficult task to perform in making his budget; but at any rate, to my mind, he should not have removed those restrictions without in some manner attempting to put the Canadian producer on a par with the German producer. The Americans live in a country which is one of the richest and one of the most highly developed industrial countries in the world; but they have found it necessary—or at all events they have performed the act—to put restrictions upon German trade. I have a synopsis of some acts which were brought in recently, one in March, 1922, only two months ago, with that purpose in view. This is a synopsis of what they have done in that regard:

4 p.m.

If the President, upon investigation of the differences in conditions of competition in trade in the markets of the United States of articles wholly or in part the growth or product of the United States, and of like or similar articles wholly or in part the growth or product of competing foreign countries, shall find it thereby shown that an industry in the United States is being or is likely to be materially injured by reason of the importation into the United States of foreign merchandise, that in such cases and upon the proclamation by the President becoming effective, the advalorum duty, or duty based in whole or in part upon the value of the imported article in the country of exportation, shall thereafter be based upon the American selling price.

Further down in the same act, a regulation is given which permits the President to exclude any merchandise from the United States where extreme unfair competition exists, or he may assess such additional duties as he thinks fit.

Mr. FIELDING: Will my hon. friend add that that is not the law of the United States to-day, and that it may never become the law of the United States?

Mr. MANION: My hon. friend may be correct, and I should not like to cross swords with him on that point; but I am informed that that is the law in the United States at the present time.

[Mr. Manion.]

Mr. FIELDING: My hon. friend, I am sure, is mistaken. I think it is part of the legislation which has been proposed, but which has not yet been adopted. That is my recollection.

Mr. MANION: I will accept the statement of the hon. gentleman. I do not know whether that is correct or not; but I have no doubt that he is as sincere in his statement as I am in mine. But supposing that this is proposed legislation, it bears out my argument just the same; it shows that the American people understand the necessity of bringing down legislation such as this.

Mr. FIELDING: That does not deal with the question of depreciated currency, but with the question of American valuation, which is a different question.

Mr. MANION: That is true, but any unfair competition on the part of foreign countries can be dealt with under that law. Germany is not mentioned at all; but I understand that Germany is aimed at and this legislation would apply to Germany just as to any other country. Before I go further, I had better say that I do not and would not for one moment think of implying that my hon. friend was any more pro-German than I am. Such a thought never entered my head, and I do not wish any misunderstanding in that regard. My hon. friend is as good a patriotic Canadian as I am, and, perhaps, better. I am simply saying that I think he made a mistake in permitting such restrictions to be removed. As I said before, if we have favours to give, we should not give them to the men who fought us recently in the war, to the men who invaded France and who took advantage of France as the Germans did; we should give them to our own friends. What is the use of barring out by our immigration law as it does, mechanics and artisans of other countries, if we permit their goods to enter Canada without any restrictions and to compete with goods of Canadian artisans?

I know some of my friends to my left will say that these are cheap goods, and that to remove restrictions is in accordance with their ideas. "We want cheap goods" will be the cry of a great many people. Well, Mr. Speaker, I do not agree that cheapness alone should be the absolute desire of any nation. I consider that it is much more important to have our people employed in earning good wages than it is to merely ensure them cheap goods. For example, supposing to-day you could buy a suit of clothes or a pair of boots for a shilling, those cheap clothes and boots would be of no use to the army of returned men who are marching to Ottawa, and who were mentioned in the question which my hon. friend from North Toronto (Mr. Church) put to the Government this afternoon. Cheapness is not what those men want; they want employment. And if men are employed in making dear goods, it is better for them than that they should be idle although goods are cheap. That is my attitude upon the question. The real test of a country's social and economic standing is the average wages earned by its working people, not the cheapness of its goods. One can go to China, or India, or southern Italy, and get cheap goods, but I do not think we want reproduced in this country the conditions that obtain in those countries.

It is true that this tariff may be made to suit the names that have been given to it at various times. I notice that the last speaker (Mr. Lewis) used one of the names which were applied to the tariff in the last election. For example, my hon. friend the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) used various expressions throughout the country, his favorite expression being "a tariff for revenue"—repeated to-day by my hon. friend from Swift Current. But what is a tariff for revenue, anyhow? My hon. friend from Marquette (Mr. Crerar) has on a number of occasions this session spoken of a tariff for revenue. I asked him once or twice to explain what he meant, but so far he has not given an explanation which I think is correct. A tariff for revenue is a tariff such as England has, or had, under free trade. Under a tariff for revenue you may have, first a tariff on luxuries—you may have that under any system. Secondly, you have a tariff upon non-competing articles, that is, upon articles which are not manufactured or produced in the country, and therefore not competing with those imported. Thirdly, you may have a tariff upon goods which are produced in the country, but you must then have a corresponding or equivalent excise tax to take away the protectionist feature. That is a tariff for revenue; in other words, a tariff under free trade system, a non-protective tariff. But that is not the way my hon. friend the Prime Minister used the term throughout the country during the election. He spoke of a tariff for revenue—to attract votes I presume—implying thereby that he was in favour of bringing in something different in the way of a tariff. As one of my friends beside me remarks, although the Prime Minister spoke in that way, he was not in favour of anything of the sort.

Mr. CARROLL: Will my hon. friend permit me a question? Does that quite exhaust my hon. friend's knowledge of a tariff for revenue purposes?

Mr. MANION: It may exhaust my hon. friend's knowledge, but I do not think it exhausts mine. I do not quite know what my hon. friend is aiming at. Perhaps he will enlighten the House with some of his brilliant knowledge when he takes part in this debate.

The Prime Minister also used to speak of "a tariff for producers and consumers"; that was another of his favorite phrases during the campaign. I think he is the only member of the Government who used that phrase. I know the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) never used that or similar phrases, even though he does laugh in his sleeve at the present time at the idea of a tariff for producers and consumers. Every one knows that producers and consumers are the same people. We are all producers and consumers in this country, with the exception of those unfortunates confined in our asylums and gaols. Perhaps they, and children, do not come within the description, but outside of them every man and woman in this country is a producer and a consumer. Therefore, I say that this budget may have been made with the thought of trying to suit it to some of those titles, but it is certainly not a free trade budget, and it is certainly not made with any thought of its appealing to the farmers—or rather the thought is there, but the budget contains nothing that will commend it to them.

In my opinion there is no possibility of our ever becoming a free trade country. I do not believe it is possible to have free trade here. The free trade cry, it seems to me, is entirely sectional, proceeding from certain interests in the Prairie provinces who are thinking only from their own standpoint—and quite rightly perhaps—believing that it will lower their cost of living, but they are not worrying if free trade injures our industrial sections. The demand for a compulsory wheat board is another sectional cry, for such a board would put the grain trade out of business. I am not saying whether a compulsory wheat board is good or bad; that matter will come up for discussion later. The demand for a continuation of the Crowsnest Pass agreement is another sectional cry along the same lines, that is, to benefit one section of the people possibly at the expense of the rest. The objection by the province of Quebec to the building of the St. Lawrence canal is also sectional. My hon. friend the Prime Minister mentioned yesterday that the Government are not going to take up this question with the American government at the present time. In fact, I take it that every piece of legislation will naturally appeal more to one section of the country than to another; but some of these measures—and free trade to my mind is one of them—appeal only to one section and would be ruinous to all other sections of this country. There is this to be pointed out, that it does not matter much what the Government does apparently in response to the demands of my hon. friends from the West, if we may judge with how little they are satisfied on the tariff question. In view of this satisfaction I presume there is no necessity for the Government to worry what their views are on the Wheat Board and the Crowsnest Pass agreement.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: My hon. friend has referred several times to the cheers with which the members in this corner have received the budget and their satisfaction with it. He has even ventured to prognosticate how we of the Progressive party intend to vote. I wonder just how much knowledge he has of our intentions, and where he got his knowledge?

Mr. MANION: The only knowledge I could have, Mr. Speaker, is derived from the speeches that have been made by hon. members of the Progressive party. I did not say anything about their cheering the budget; my hon. friend is putting those words in my mouth. What I implied was that from the speeches which had been made by hon. members of the Progressive party no one could draw the conclusion that any of them have any intention of voting against the Government on this budget. That is what I said.

An Hon. MEMBER: Hear, hear.

Mr. MANION: My hon. friend opposite says "hear, hear." I suppose that is a sort of prelude to his hopes that the Progressives are going to vote that way. To my mind a country cannot be governed sectionally; it must be governed in the interests of the greatest good to the greatest number. Let me point out to my hon. friends from the West what perhaps many of them already know, but at any rate it may be of interest to refresh their memory. The cotton growers of the southern states were, as my hon. friends know, among those who demanded a free trade policy in the United States in 1880. At that time they were growing 3,000,000,000 pounds of cotton and were very insistent in their demand. But to-day they are not so insistent, because, although they are producing twice as much cotton as in 1880, with that greater production must be coupled this important fact, that their home market is using more cotton to-day than was produced in 1880, and there is being exported nearly as much as was then produced. In other words, I am pointing out that the building up of a home market is the important policy in any country. All my hon. friends from the Prairie provinces know that in dealing with foreign countries for your grain and other productions you are dealing more or less with an unknown quantity as compared with the home market, such as it is; and the home market, while not being satisfactory, of course, to hon. gentlemen who grow wheat, because there is too much of that commodity for the home market to absorb, yet furnishes to tens of thousands of our farmers to-day a very satisfactory outlet for those products which they are able to sell in the industrial centres in their immediate neighbourhood. Therefore I consider the policy of the United States whereby the cotton growers of the south have to-day a greater market in their own country for their cotton than their whole production in 1880, is the policy which we should follow so as to create the same conditions. We should develop as far as we are able on broad national lines, and so provide a market for a greater proportion of the products of my hon. friends from the Prairie provinces. In the United States to-day 90 per cent of its wheat crop is sold in the home market.

Now, Mr. Speaker, another point in connection with the tariff proposals of my hon. friend the Minister of Finance is the fact that he has reduced the duties on a number of articles to the extent of 2½ per cent—reduced the customs revenue, we will say, to the extent of $1,000,000—and he has increased the taxation by 30 or 35 times that amount, roughly speaking, in the sales tax, to make up for it. That is always the result of cutting down the tariff; if you reduce your revenue in one way in a country such as this, you have to raise it in some other way. I submit to my hon. friends who represent the farmers of this country that if you take away the tariff the farmers will pay in other taxes a greater proportion of the revenue than they are paying under the present tariff system.

Mr. SPENCER: Is it not a fact that the hon. member voted for reciprocity in 1911?

Mr. MANION: Well, if it will please my hon. friend—yes, I voted for reciprocity in 1911. I do not see, however, what bearing that has on the present discussion. Reciprocity was not free trade.

Mr. SPENCER: May I ask my hon. friend if he would vote for it now?

Mr. MANION: I do not expect I will have a chance to vote for it; the United States has attended to that. But let me tell my hon. friend this: I voted for reciprocity in 1911, and I have no apologies to make for doing so. Sometimes people change their minds; the man who in ten years never changes his mind on any subject has not any mind to change, in my opinion. The United States is raising its tariff against this country, on practically all articles and commodities, and she is not going to give the Minister of Finance or any other minister of finance in this country an opportunity to negotiate along reciprocal lines for some time to come. However, I will come to that again in a moment.

Mr. McMASTER: Before the hon. gentleman passes from that phase of the subject, does he consider that the reduction of 2½ per cent is likely to reduce the revenue from the classes of goods coming in under the lower rate?

Mr. MANION: I only take the suggestion made by the Minister of Finance that it probably will. The minister said it would probably reduce them by a million dollars.

Mr. FIELDING: No; my hon. friend is mistaken in that. My own impression is there will be very little if any reduction. It is even possible there will be an increase.

Mr. MANION: I admit all things are possible, but it seems to me that this change will be likely to bring about a reduction.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Oh, no.

[Mr. Manion.]

Mr. MANION: I am sorry I misunderstood the minister; I thought he stated definitely that the result would be a loss of revenue. I remember his mentioning $1,000,000 in some way, and I thought he said that the taking off of the 2½ per cent would reduce the revenue to that extent. My right hon. friend (Mr. Meighen) suggests that if the revenue is to be obtained just the same, the minister might well have removed more of the duties and thus pleased to a much greater extent the hon. gentlemen to my left.

I was pointing out, Mr. Speaker, that you cannot take away revenue with one hand without raising new revenue with the other—that is, if we are to pay our debt; and unfortunately in this country to-day we have debts that are very large. The interest on the national debt is a very large item. The pensions bill, soldier settlement, soldiers' re-establishment, the general carrying on of the business of the country—these are all very large items, and we must raise sufficient revenue to cover them. If you take off the revenue which you are receiving by way of customs duties, then you must raise the necessary moneys in some other way. The minister has indicated that he finds it necessary to raise more revenue. I notice from the very mild complaints of my hon. friends to my left that they are not altogether pleased with the sales tax which, they think, is going to bear more or less heavily on them. The hon. member for Last Mountain (Mr. Johnston), who spoke yesterday, stated that our increased national debt was one of the reasons why taxes are high in this country and that this increase is our fault. Well, he might just as well have blamed us for beginning the war; to my mind, that would have been just as reasonable.

Even free trade England raises large amounts of money in the form of tariff revenue. I made it my business to look up the figures, and I found that in the fiscal year 1919-20—these were the latest I could obtain—free trade England raised by customs tariff $750,000,000, and, by excise, $675,000,000; these were the estimated figures. If you take that $750,000,000 and divide it by the population of England you get about $20 a head. If you take the amount raised by way of customs taxation in this country, I doubt if it would amount to as much as that. But free trade England raises her revenue on goods which the masses of the people use—sugar, tea, coffee, cocoa, tobacco. I submit that the taxation of these commodities hits the ordinary masses of the people much harder than the present system which we follow in this country. Under a protective system you can raise your taxes upon luxuries to a greater extent, and you can lower your taxes to a greater extent upon the necessaries of life. The taxes in England under free trade—of which she raised the vast amount I have mentioned—are largely direct taxes upon the necessities of life.

I have said that, to my mind, free trade is impossible to this country—not impossible to put into effect, but impossible to carry out successfully. I wish to give a few reasons, in brief, why I hold this view. In the first place, there is the matter of revenue, with which I have dealt. We require a large revenue. I know some of my hon. friends say that you cannot have both protection and revenue. But you can have it and you are having it in this country; you have had it in the United States for many years. In the second place, the industries in this country cannot compete with those in the United States or with those in England, and in the future they will not be able to compete with the industries of Japan, unless you have protection of the working man of this country from the competition resulting from the lower standards of living in Japan and other countries. Even John Stuart Mill, who was a free trader, admitted on a number of occasions that the imposition of protective duties might be the very best way of building up young industries in a country.

Then, there is the standard of living, which I have mentioned. If you have not tariff protection, how are your working men to compete with those countries where the standard of living is very much lower than it is in your own? If you have free trade those working men must compete with working men in other countries where the standard of living is much lower, and that competition they are unable to meet. There is another argument which I look upon as a very strong one; and it is this: Truth usually prevails. Nearly eighty years ago, in 1846, England adopted free trade. At that time Cobden made the statement, which is very frequently quoted, that all the other countries of the world would have free trade within ten years. Well, nearly eighty years have gone by, and not one of the other countries of the world has adopted a free trade policy. Even England itself is to-day coming back more or less to the protectionist policy. England, even in her palmiest days of free trade, imposed certain duties against imports. She had the cattle embargo, of which we have heard a good deal on the floor of this House—that was the most stringent kind of protection, in fact, it was prohibition of the importation of cattle. Then she had the ship subsidies, and in 1915 she applied a number of what they call key industry duties, amounting to 33 1-3 per cent on many lines of goods. These duties were designed to protect the English producer from the competition of the foreign producer. If you have free trade in Canada to-day or in any country it is a one-sided bargain which you are carrying out: you are giving free trade to your opponents and allowing them to impose a tariff against your goods.

Finally, there are two other arguments. One is that with regard to bargaining or negotiating power. The Minister of Finance in his speech said that so long as the United States held a high tariff against us, they could not expect any favours from us. In other words, he was using the bargaining or negotiating power which is possible only under a protective system. But under a free trade system you could not use that bargaining or negotiating power, because the other country concerned could laugh at you; their goods would come into your country free, without restriction, and they could do as they pleased with regard to yours. Why, what was the reciprocity agreement, concerning which my hon. friend (Mr. Spencer) asked me a question a few moments ago, based upon? My hon. friends to my left liked the reciprocity agreement; they would jump at it to-day if they had the chance. But that agreement was based upon a bargaining and negotiating power which would not exist under a free trade system. You cannot have any reciprocal agreements under free trade, because you have given away your weapons; you have placed yourself in such a position that the other fellow can do what he likes with regard to your trade.

My last argument—and I do not wish to go into the matter in detail—is this: under a protective system you build up the industrial life of your country and you get a broader national development. No class of young men in this country have profited more by that broader national life, the result of a protective system, than the sons of farmers. If they do not wish to stay on the farms or go into the mines or the lumber camps they can go into industrial life. They have gone into the cities and made good there.

At the same time, while we have a tariff system, we should endeavour to make our tariff as fair as possible to all classes. We should have a tariff that will build up so far as we can the industrial life of the country in all lines of production, but it should be, so far as possible, a tariff fair and square to all classes of the people. To-day I admit we have a tariff which perhaps is not fair in many of its aspects. It is more or less of a hodge-podge. I presume that the Finance Minister when he was making the changes in this budget did not look at the scientific side of the tariff, if there is such a side, but rather at the political side, and changed a few items that might look good to the farmers of the West. If we had a proper body to make a thorough investigation of the tariff, an advisory tariff board or commission who would make it their life study, we would get the facts. It should be a non-partisan board, able, efficient, and well paid, who would get the facts upon which a proper tariff could be based. Such a board, of course, would be advisory only, because you cannot remove from a government responsibility for making a tariff. You cannot take the tariff out of politics. It is the duty of the Minister of Finance and the Government, and lastly of members of Parliament to decide what the tariff policy of the country shall be; but at the same time such a board as I have suggested could get the necessary information, on foreign manufacturing costs, for instance, on methods, labour conditions, production, and so forth. You could get information from such a board upon the exchange situation and its bearing upon present conditions, for example; information as to transportation costs both exterior to the country and internal, as well as comparisons of prices at home and abroad. That board could give advice to the Minister of Finance himself, to the Government, and to members of Parliament, better than we can possibly get under present conditions. A board of that kind would give us information based upon facts. What does the ordinary member of Parliament know about the details of the tariff that is in existence in this country to-day? What do I know about them? I admit frankly I know nothing of the details as to whether a certain article should have fifteen, twenty, or thirty per cent protection, and the ordinary member of Parliament will frankly admit his ignorance on that point. I would even go so far as to assert that the Finance Minister himself, cannot have knowledge of these details. But if you had a proper advisory board to tell you that a certain industry needed 20 per cent protection, giving the reasons for it, you would be able to base your law-making upon actual facts, and not upon theories or imagination. I submit that if an industry requires 20 per cent protection, it should not get 40 per cent. That is what I call a moderate tariff, a tariff sufficient to put our industries on a basis where they can compete fairly with similar industries in other parts of the world. At the same time, there should be something in the shape of a dumping clause. Foreign manufacturers may in certain years over-produce, and in consequence be left with large stocks of goods on their hands, and rather than carry them, they dump them here, if we have no dumping clause, and thus put out of business our manufacturers producing those goods. Then the following year, or a year or two afterwards, when they have put our manufacturers out of business, they raise the price to suit themselves. That is why a dumping clause is necessary. In speaking of the tariff board, I wish to make it plain that I am speaking for myself. It is an opinion I have had for many years, but which I do not think I have ever stated before in this House. It is my personal opinion that we should have an advisory tariff board to make, as far as possible, a scientific tariff. A scientific tariff is really an impossibility, but you can make a tariff sensible in all its details, and I doubt if we have ever had such in this country.

There are two items to which I would draw the attention of the Minister of Finance before I close. I do not suppose he will pay any attention to my advice, but at any rate I am going to offer it with the best intentions in the world. The cheque taxes which this budget imposes, I think are unfair for larger cheques. I believe the tax should be graduated, not because I write many large cheques myself, but because there are in this country large corporations which pay their wages by cheque at the end of the month. The day after this budget was brought down I was in a bank in Ottawa and I was informed by the accountant that he has a number of cheques of $25,000 and $30,000 to pay every month when wages are being paid. I think that the stamp taxes should be graduated for the larger cheques, and I hope that when the resolutions are considered in committee the Minister of Finance will take that into consideration.

There is a tax which I think might be imposed to replace the loss. We are sometimes accused of not offering anything constructive. I am going to suggest the imposition of a tax which I think the Minister of Finance has forgotten to include in his budget, and which could make up for what might be lost on the cheque taxes, and that is a receipt tax. Anyone who has travelled in Europe knows that you cannot pay an hotel bill and get a receipt unless it is stamped. The man who receives the money is the man who should pay the tax, and that is the man who does pay it in the case of a receipt tax, but in the case of the cheque taxes, the man who pays the money pays the tax also. Most of us when we receive an amount of money that is owing to us would be quite willing, I think, to put a stamp on the receipt. I think it would be a very good tax and would bring in a fairly large amount of money. It is in vogue in practically every country in Europe, and was before the war.

In closing, I just wish to say I shall have no hesitation in supporting the amendment of the ex-Minister of Finance (Sir Henry Drayton). The amendment is not an amendment demanding free trade. It is not an amendment that hon. gentlemen opposite shall carry out their pledges, but it is an amendment condemning the practice which has been followed too much in this country in the past, and certainly followed by hon. gentlemen opposite during the last election, of making promises that they had no intention of ever carrying out That is the amendment, and so far as I am concerned, in the interest of honesty in public life, I have no hesitation in supporting it.

Mr. L. J. LOVETT (Digby-Annapolis): Mr. Speaker, I am going to trespass on the good nature of hon. members for a very brief time in the few remarks I propose to make. I am a new member of this House, and as such, have felt I had much to learn of the proper method of conducting parliamentary business. I must say I have been bitterly disappointed at the way in which up to the present much of the time of this House has been wasted, costing the taxpayers of this country thousands and thousands of dollars. Wasted by the Government? No, but by the many members who have taken hours to express opinions which, presented in concrete form, would have taken only minutes, and been far more forceful in effect.

[Mr. Manion.]

Are we, a collection of business men entrusted with the serious business of this country, to waste the time of this House in useless discussion merely for the sake of some little personal advantage or of venting some sectional grievance? Is it not our duty to devote our time and energy to assist in passing such legislation as is in the best interests of the country as a whole, in the shortest possible time consistent with its importance?

Yet, Mr. Speaker, while holding this opinion I would feel I was not performing my duty if I did not at some time during this session, place before this House some of the needs and aspirations of the people I have the honour to serve. I am well aware, Sir, that the House has had the opportunity of hearing members from the eastern part of my province who have outlined the views of the people regarding the Intercolonial railway and the restoration of its management to the Maritime provinces. Let me say right here I am heartily in accord with much that has been said by the hon. gentlemen in this respect, but they have largely, if not entirely, urged the claims of the eastern part of the province. So I am determined hon. members of this House shall not get the impression that the important counties of the province of Nova Scotia are all east of the county of Hants, and that we in western Nova Scotia are merely the tail end, as it were, without any special rights and privileges of our own. Let me say to hon. members that no finer part of this Dominion exists than that section of the beautiful and fertile Annapolis valley which lies in my own constituency, which constituency also embraces a part of Digby county famed for its fishing, lumbering and beautiful tourist resorts,—a combination I believe, Sir, unrivalled in importance, because of its diversity of interests, either by the agricultural districts of the west, or the mining and manufacturing sections of the eastern and central provinces.

Now, Mr. Speaker, in what I am going to say I do not want to be misconstrued or regarded as disloyal, but no one who considers the prosperity of Nova Scotia before Confederation, and her present standing, can dispute my statement, that this province has not benefited commercially from her union with the other provinces. For instance, to give you some intelligent idea of just how slowly Nova Scotia has made progress, the census figures show us that during the last 50 years her population has only increased by 136,000 in round numbers. Surely with Nova Scotia's great natural resources there must be something radically wrong, and I am asking this Government to devise a policy that will remove trade barriers, open wider and more profitable markets, lessen freight rates, and remove all those forces which are at present throttling and strangling our industrial life and by so doing restore to her the same prosperity that characterized her before Confederation. It is a fact, an unpleasant fact, that Nova Scotia has not expanded commercially nor has her population increased in the proportion that her great natural resources would warrant. There must be, and there is, some reason for this lack of progress. We men of the Maritime provinces believe that one of the chief forces which has a strangle hold on our commercial expansion is the exhorbitant freight rates that prevent shippers and producers placing their products on the markets of Canada, and elsewhere, at a reasonable profit. There can be no incentive to production if the producer cannot sell, and sell at a reasonable profit. The natural market for Nova Scotia products as far as lumbering, fishing and agriculture are concerned, is undoubtedly the United States, and to our sorrow we know that market was closed to us by the defeat of reciprocity in 1911. I do not believe, Sir, that any province of this Dominion suffered so severely from the defeat of reciprocity as did the province of Nova Scotia. Again, I do not believe that this province has had the advantages of a proper immigration policy; and I would say to the present Government that we are looking to it to give greater publicity to our natural advantages, and greater inducements to prospective settlers in this extreme eastern part of the Dominion. There is no reason why Nova Scotia, with her mines, forests, fisheries, and agricultural, fruit producing and grazing lands, should not attract and support five times, yes ten times her present population. Remove trade barriers, open wider and more profitable markets, lower freight rates, grant inducements to settlers, give publicity to her natural resources, and I do not hesitate to state that Nova Scotia would become one of the most prosperous provinces in the whole of this Dominion.

Mr. Speaker, I am not, however, one who is sectional in his views, nor do I claim concessions for my province that would be detrimental to any of the provinces of this Dominion. For, Sir, I believe if we are to have a prosperous Canada it can only come about by a policy of fair play and justice to each and every province, and not by special advantages to any one of them. I am broad enough in my views when making a plea for my own province to likewise make a plea for Canada as a whole, for it is only by the prosperity of every province that we can ever hope to place this great Dominion of ours in the forefront of the great nations of the world. I believe we have in this country of ours—rich beyond measure in her vast natural resources, with a people frugal and industrious—the opportunity, if sanely and wisely governed, to make her one of the greatest countries in the world. Therefore we must in this parliament sink our sectionalism and unite on the broad principle of using every effort to promote the welfare of our country, so near and dear to the heart of every true and loyal Canadian.

We have listened to our Progressive friends, one after another, place before this House the deplorable conditions prevalent in western Canada, and asking that relief of some kind be given to tide the people over their period of depression. We should, and do, deplore the condition that exists, and should be glad to join with them in measures that would alleviate present conditions and place the farmers of the West on a prosperous basis, providing they do not ask for those things which would be detrimental to the other provinces of the Dominion. One can quite understand that in a country such as Canada, with its many complex problems and the many different interests that are demanding recognition, it is rather difficult for any government to satisfy the people as a whole. So I say, let us be reasonable in our demands; let us foster a spirit of give and take; let us put Canada as a whole above sectional interests. When we reach this broad viewpoint—and the sooner it is reached the better—we will justify our existence here as a parliament, elected by the people of Canada—a parliament trying to do things from a national and not a selfish standpoint. The solid delegation sent from Nova Scotia to support the present Government is evidence that the people of this province have faith that the Liberal party policy is best fitted to stimulate our commercial life, and right the wrongs she has been suffering through the policy of the late administration. Like Quebec and Prince Edward Island, Nova Scotia has given a strong rebuke to the arrogant and extravagant administration that has cursed Canada for the last ten years. The people of eastern Canada thoroughly understand who is responsible for the crushing load of debt under which our Dominion is staggering to-day, and has been one of the strongest factors in establishing a government whose object we believe is to restore some sort of order out of the present financial chaos, mitigate the crushing load of taxation, and again place Canada on a sound economical basis. Nova Scotia has done more than this. We are unique in the gift we have contributed to this Parliament, for is not the present Minister of Finance, the Hon. W. S. Fielding, a Nova Scotian? —the man to whom all Canada is looking to extricate us by his ability and integrity from our present financial difficulties; and that we have not looked in vain is evidenced by the remarkable budget which was presented to this House a few days ago—a budget the provisions of which, I believe, will be recognized by the people of Canada as the nearest approach possible under our present financial situation to lessen burdensome taxation. Now, here is our opportunity to show to the people of Canada that, as their representatives, we will give our support to the efforts the Minister of Finance has made, to raise the necessary funds to meet our gigantic obligations by a tariff that will bear as lightly as possible on the bread winners of this country commensurate with raising the necessary revenue. Taxes there must be, we all acknowledge it, with the incubus of debt placed upon us by our extravagant predecessors.

We have been accused by the hon. members of the official Opposition of broken promises in the proposed budget taxation. I maintain we have not broken faith with the Canadian electors. There has been an honest effort on the part of this Government to lessen expenditure shown in the reduced estimates of the different departments. If the tariff reductions are not as far reaching as some had hoped, our hon. Minister of Finance has given a lucid explanation of the reason for this, and it ill becomes those whose mismanagement and extravagances heaped up financial obligations and left this Government to pay the piper, to criticise, accuse and object to every honest effort made to mitigate our present financial difficulties. I would ask the hon. members of the official Opposition if they do not think the attitude they have assumed of great anxiety for economy, and anything that would look like not carrying out election platform pledges, must make them seem the wolf in sheep's clothing to the Canadian people whom they, for so many years, misgoverned and who plainly showed them at the polls what they thought of their brand of government. I would say to these hon. members that the people of Canada take their remonstrances and fervid protestations for economy as a huge joke, and have no faith in their sincerity. It is said comparisons are odious, but Mr. Speaker, there is a handsome little animal well known in all parts of Canada good to look at and innocent in appearance, and do you think those who have once suffered from its hidden and obnoxious all prevailing odour would readily turn to it again because of its innocent look and actions? No. They would know they were liable to get the same dose repeated. I tell you, Mr. Speaker, the people of Canada have not had time to forget what they suffered under Tory rule, and could the hon. members directly opposite by hook or crook force the amendment moved by the ex-Minister of Finance (Sir Henry Drayton) through this House and face the country again at an early election, there would not be enough fragments left to call itself a party. Let them beware and try to regain some measure of confidence from the people of this country by giving support to those who are honestly trying to govern Canada well, and who have back of them a record for honest administration.

Mr. Speaker, in conclusion, I wish to reiterate my belief that if this Government is given a fair and reasonable time it will again restore to Canada the same commercial prosperity and national harmony that characterized her during the golden era between 1896 and 1911.

Mr. J. D. DRUMMOND (West Middlesex): I do not know that I would have anything to say in this debate, if it were not to endeavour to bring before the House one thing in connection with the budget which more especially affects some of the people in my constituency. Before proceeding with that question permit me to say a few words about one or two other matters that have been brought to the attention of the House. Some hon. members to my right seem to be very much concerned about how the Progressives are going to vote. If it is any satisfaction for them to know, I am quite willing to tell them that I am not any too anxious to vote for either the budget or the amendment, but, if they will content themselves, their curiosity will be gratified when the time comes, and they will find out how the Progressives will vote.

I wish to refer for a moment or two to some statements made yesterday by the hon. member from King's (P.E.I.) (Mr. Hughes) in regard to our national debt. The Finance Minister in his budget speech does not give us very much encouragement as to what is going to happen in the near future in connection with paying any part of our national debt. He says we must soon begin to consider the question of reduction of our public debt, rather than the increase of it. According to the last report that I have been able to obtain from the Dominion Bureau of Statistics, the national wealth of the Dominion of Canada is estimated at $19,002,778,000. The national debt of the country is about two billion and a half. That is the federal debt; if we take into consideration the provincial, the municipal and the private debts in the Dominion of Canada in addition, I think I am safe in saying that the total debt of the Dominioin of Canada will reach four and a half or five billion dollars, or, in other words, the total debt of the Dominion of Canada will reach about one quarter of our national wealth. I ask hon. members of this House if they consider that is a good position financially for the Dominion of Canada to be in, or, without even looking to the near future, if the time has not already arrived when we should provide some means to retire, at least a portion of our national debt. There re those of us who have been identified with municipal work for many years, and we have found it impossible for a municipality to increase its debenture debt over and above a certain amount, unless by consent of some higher authority than its own. If a municipality increases its debenture debt past a certain amount, restrictions are put upon it by the province or some other authority, which restrictions will immediately bring it to time. If it is right that a municipality should have to make provision for retiring its debenture debt, either by a sinking fund or by making provision in those debentures that, at the end of a certain number of years, the debentures should be retired with an added amount of interest and principal, is it not equally true that in the Dominion some means should be taken, before the time comes when we are upon the verge of financial disaster, to provide for the payment of at least a part of our national debt?

I wish to approve the words that were spoken by the hon. member for King's, P.E.I., (Mr. Hughes) and to go considerably further. I wish to ask hon. members if they consider that we are carrying out the provisions of the heritage that has been given to us by our pioneer fathers, when we are drifting continually year after year into eighty or ninety million dollars more of debt. I am well aware that, according to the manner in which the finances of the Dominion of Canada are—I was going to say, juggled, if, Sir, you will permit the word without calling me to order—an apparent surplus is shown in some way of $73,000,000, in one year, and in other years of a somewhat larger amount. I feel that I cannot for one moment take that into consideration when the ultimate end of the year's work is an addition to our nation's debt of eighty or ninety million dollars. That is the only standpoint from which it is proper to judge, if it is right to judge at all.

The main reason which prompted me to rise to my feet is that I might protest against the excise duty that has been placed upon the beet sugar factories. It has been inferred by the Minister of Finance that that excise tax of 49 cents per 100 pounds will be met by the sugar factories. I do not at the present time recollect a single instance in which a tax has been placed against any industrial incorporation where that industrial corporation has not by some means transferred that tax to the producer or the consumer. We are told that this tax of one per cent that is imposed upon bank circulation will be met entirely by the banks. I mistake very much the influence or the intelligence of those who comprise the bankers' association, if they do not find some means of transferring this tax to the people with whom they are doing business. If it be possible for the Minister of Finance or for this Government to prevent that from being done, I should certainly be very glad. But as regards this tax of 49 cents per 100 pounds that has been placed upon the sugar refineries, there is no question that that tax will revert to the beet grower. I am not a sugar beet grower myself, so that I have no individual interest to speak about; but in the southern part of the riding which I represent, there is a considerable number of sugar beet growers. I should like to ask why an excise tax is imposed in such a manner that it places a burden upon sugar beet growers, and not upon any other agricultural production. Is this only a start towards imposing an ex-

5 p.m. cise tax upon the whole of agricultural production; or are the sugar beet growers especially marked out for this particular tax? I think if the Minister of Finance would consider that the application of this excise tax is a direct blow at the sugar beet growers, he would reconsider this tax; or if it is going to be continued, then I think we have every reason to ask that every other line of agricultural industry and every other line of industry in general shall also be subjected to an excise tax. I believe this country would be better off to-day with an excise tax than with a protective tariff. I go further than that; I believe that if upon every commodity that could be taxed, a reasonable excise tax were placed, it would be a very few years before the whole of our national debt would be paid. Allow me to say, in conclusion, that I do not consider that any great bouquets are handed out to the farmers by the 2½ per cent reduction in the duty on agricultural implements. Mention has been made that this 2½ per cent reduction is going to reduce our revenue. I cannot see that. A reduction in any tariff that affects the protected industries in this country does not reduce the revenue, for the simple reason that that revenue does not go into the coffers of the Dominion. I am not making any special plea for the beet growers; I am not making any special plea for the farmers; I stand before you to-day and I say on my behalf and, I hope, on behalf of the whole of the farmers amongst whom I am sitting, that we are not asking for any special privileges, but that we are asking for the right to stand upon the one broad platform of equality with every industry in the Dominion of Canada.

Mr. H. A. FORTIER (Labelle) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, my first words on this all important question of the budget will be that of congratulations to the distinguished statesman, who for the sixteenth time has delivered, in this House, the Liberal Government's budget. The whole country applauds the Prime Minister's achievement in having gathered within his cabinet, such eminent colleagues from all the provinces of the Dominion. No epoch can be compared to this present one, if we may except that memorable time of 1896, when Laurier surrounded himself with so many illustrious statesmen. At that time, the province of Nova Scotia was possessed of one of these eminent men, in the person of its Prime Minister. After fifteen years of judicious and faithful services to his country as Minister of Finance, this distinguished statesman, highly respected by all members in this House, once more returns, notwithstanding his advanced age, to take up his share of work and his post of honour. At a time when the country is greatly in need of its very best brains, he comes forth to place his intellectual powers, his experience and his patriotism at the disposal of his beloved Canada. In reviewing our present political history, I cannot find a more noble example than that which is given to the present and rising generation, by this veteran in political life, by this unrivalled parliamentarian, by this distinguished statesman, the present Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding).

Mr. Speaker, I approve the Government's policy. In this budget speech, I see the fulfilment, as near as circumstances will permit, of the liberal party's programme; this policy is for the welfare of the country and its beneficient effects are already being felt. I shall just add a word touching the amendment moved by the official opposition. The country is but little interested in the object aimed at by the Conservative party. This attempt to embarrass the Government by taunts for not accomplishing that in which one has no faith or takes objection to, is but to seek party advantage against the country's own interests. In my opinion, it is poor strategy and the Progressive party soon discovered the weak point. Is the Conservative opposition sincere when they reproach the Government for not having sufficiently cut down the tariff?

If so, what has become of their platform, their vaunted national policy, so called? What has become of their recent political declaration which the country has just heard and which was spurned by the people at the last general elections?

We must acknowledge facts and meet the necessity of the moment. The revenue demands the maintenance of adequate taxation; the lowering of the tariff must be accomplished by degrees and the first step taken as shown by the budget is in the right direction. The increase in taxes is justified by the duty we are under of clearing our national debt. These taxes have become necessary to meet our obligations. War has gobbled everything. Our fate, for generations to come, is to pay war pensions and to shelter under our guardianship the returned soldiers.

We, of the Liberal party and especially those who were opposed to certain measures which have dragged the country into expenditures far too great for a young nation, did not wish to overstep the just limits which our obligations called for; however, the majority demanded it, the debt has been incurred, it would be dishonourable to repudiate it; and if we are not permitted to disavow the obligations that Canada has contracted, it is absolutely necessary that the taxes be increased.

There is, Mr. Speaker, one tax in particular that I wish to refer briefly to. It is the income tax. If there is an assessment which may be looked upon as loathsome, it is certainly this one. It is a heavy burden carried by the ratepayer, and what is most depressing is that we cannot entertain any hope of relief in the near future. We have perhaps, within these last years, lost the opportunity of throwing the whole burden on the profiteers who amassed wealth during the war. However, we should endeavour to relieve the workman and the small trader and to make up for such losses by imposing a higher tax on luxuries. It seems to me that the people we should spare, should be the heads of families. I therefore beg of the Government to reduce the tax which the heads of families have to pay. In my opinion, a father having five children should not be called upon to pay income tax until his revenue reaches $5,000, and if he happens to be the father of eight children he should not pay income tax until his revenue reaches $10,000.

Our vast country, abounding in natural resources of all kinds, has not the necessary population for the so much desired development of our commercial, farming and mining industries. What we are in need of, is a greater increase in population. Not being able to obtain the desired increase from our countrymen, we are forced to seek it in immigration. What can we expect from immigration? The European countries have been desolated by war. France, whose population has been decimated by this awful war is encouraging repopulation by granting a bonus to parents of numerous children. Parents under 30 years of age, having five children, receive from the state a grant of 10,000 francs, and those who have eight children receive 25,000 francs. It is true, we are not in a position to make such gifts owing to our present financial state of affairs. Nevertheless one of the statesmen of my province, who played an important part in the progress of old Quebec, and whose memory the people still cherish—Mercier—had legislation passed, granting 100 acres of land to the father of twelve living children. It is by giving a better interpretation to the benevolent laws of that province and of this country which is dear to us, that we should, it seems to me, consider the possibility of reducing as much as we can the income tax, taking also into consideration the obligations which devolve on the heads of families. The present expenditures are not all an outcome of the war, for the budget has also to reckon with the yearly deficit of the railways acquired by the state. It is a sad legacy inherited by the Government which the people chose in December last. Let us hope that these statesmen will not fail in their duty and that under their able administration, the present sad plight of our railways will be followed by a new era of prosperity. To my judgment, one may discuss the question of nationalization of railways indefinitely and never come to a lasting solution. I shall therefore not undertake to discuss this subject. France itself has administered five industries with more or less success. To-day its economists are still discussing without any satisfactory solution, the expediency of the management of railways by the state. For my part, without leaning one way or the other in the controversy in which those pro and con are thus engaged, I cannot help thinking that the greatest objection to state ownership is that, while a private company has always the profits in view, the state very unfortunately has at its disposal a tax to cover the deficits; however, I rather think that in a new country like ours, colonization is of primary national importance and for the success of which, we must uphold our railway policy. A private company has no interest in investing its capital in uninhabited regions or of investing such capital without being certain of an immediate return. We must not depend on private companies to further our policy of settling this country. History teaches us that privately owned companies have never answered to the needs of colonization. It was the provincial governments that built the railways across the desert prairies or through the virgin forests when the Dominion government failed to do so or did not furnish all the means of accomplishing such a task by its grants in money or land. When the railway had paved the way into those regions and had become a paying proposition, it was eagerly sought by some large private concern that very readily annexed it to its system as a source of profit. I am pleased to see that, owing perhaps to unforeseen circumstances, most of our railways are now managed by the state. Perhaps the time has come for us to press our just demands, so as to forward the settlement of our newly opened districts, as I intend to do for the county of Labelle which I have the honour to represent in this House. Private companies have already built lines up to the borders of the county, but on account of financial difficulties—which are the cause of failure in operating a railway in these new settlements—the work of construction was discontinued. I am pleased to see that the Canadian National Railway is now the property of the state. This railway extends from the metropolis of Canada into the Laurentians, reaches the borders of the county of Labelle, at a place called Huberdean, and I still hope, for the sake of the people of the county, that this railway will penetrate to its very centre. Natural resources abound in that part of Canada. The settlers, not without great sacrifices, have cleared the land and have established parishes which are at a great distance from the railway. They appeal to the present Government to further extend this railway into the county, not only to the benefit of the railway system itself but also in the hope of settling these parts. I insist again on the necessity of extending these lines to the centre of the county of Labelle.

My last word will be one of well deserved praise to the Government. The present Government is carrying out a good and sound economical policy. The decrease in the expenditure of the state is laudable and necessary during this present period. From the outset of this session we have witnessed a considerable reduction in all the departments of the Government. This may have perhaps shocked some of the heralds of imperialism and militarism, but it has brought joy to the great majority in this country and I may add that it has specially pleased the people in the county of Labelle. However, where this decrease is most in evidence, to the satisfaction of everybody, it is in the militia expenditures. I hail with pleasure this new policy which will second the efforts of the country in reducing to its right proportion its standing army.

Let us return to peace pursuits. Let us economize and pay our debts. Such must be the motto of the Liberal party which the people have called upon to administer the affairs of the country, such must be the all designated goal towards which all our statesmen should tend, so as to save us from ruin and lead us on to great and nobler destinies.

Mr. L. J. LADNER (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, some sixteen years ago I happened to be a student of the University of Toronto, and I remember picking up the evening paper of the 30th November, 1906, and reading the budget speech of the present Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding). All will remember in those days the dominant figures of the Liberal party were their distinguished leader, Sir Wilfrid Laurier, and the then and present Minister of Finance. It is interesting to observe in this newspaper, which I hold in my hand, that in that budget speech certain changes not of a substantial nature, but, on the contrary, of comparatively minor importance, were made. In place of the general 33⅓ discount on British goods, there was substituted a special discount on each article, with some increases. Duties were slightly reduced, chiefly on agricultural implements, such as reapers, mowers and binders, and also on confectionery, gasoline, oranges, and lemons; duties were increased on hats, canned meats, beans, peas, and other vegetables—and it is wonderful to behold in those days the duties were also increased on horses and cattle.

Before proceeding further, I desire to tender my sincere wishes for the long-continued health and happiness of the Minister of Finance. We younger members look with respect and admiration on his distinguished career. Sixteen years ago his ideas were advantageous to me as a young man studying our fiscal policy, and they are equally advantageous to me to-day when he has become in fact the anchor of his party. Of course, now and again we see the ship of state blown hither and thither by the gentle winds from the West which, zephyr-like, blow upon the nervous brows of many hon. members of the Government. We may find some day that those zephyrs will develop hurricane force, which will again divide this country on those great economic principles of free trade and protection. If I were a prophet, I would suggest that the political thought of Canada to-day is moving in that direction and that the present partnership of the Liberal and Progressive parties is not destined to be permanent, that sooner or later the economic questions which differentiate them will rise up and overthrow all those unimportant considerations which now hold them together. In this newspaper of 1906 it is interesting to note the headlines in respect to the estimates. For instance, we find the following:

> Estimates are $105,000,000. Reach stupendous figure.

It is an interesting observation in psychology to see what really is in men's minds in considering the relative importance of the great questions confronting the country. Our friends on the prairies are making a great fuss for the reduction of duties on agricultural implements, but when you come to examine the effect of that reduction upon business and upon the operations of our commercial enterprises, you find that it really comes to practically nothing. In 1906 it was considered that $105,000,000 was a stupendous figure for the estimates; what would the same people think of to-day's estimate, which is really stupendous, reaching a figure of $425,000,000 or more? It shows that the people are capable of doing more than they sometimes believe they can do.

Mr. McKENZIE: Does the hon. member mean 1896 or 1906?

Mr. LADNER: I mean 1906. It is the Mail and Empire, I must confess, but the date of publication would hardly be wrong, though many other things in it might be.

Mr. McKENZIE: If it is the hon. minister's (Mr. Fielding's) first budget speech, it would be in 1896.

Mr. LADNER: No, it is not the minister's first budget speech; it is the speech of 1906. As I hold the paper up the hon. member may see the headlines of the article from where he sits. But the point I am anxious to make in that connection is that the proposals brought forward in these various budget speeches are very different from the promises made in the preceding elections. In 1893 it was free trade just as they had it in England. In 1896 more mature judgment prevailed—I do not doubt but that the soundness of the judgment of the present Minister of Finance was the cause—and the national policy of Sir John A. Macdonald and the Conservative party was adhered to, as was obviously necessary in the best interests of the country. Then we come again to 1906, and notwithstanding all the preachings with respect to free trade, the straight and narrow path in the best interests of the country was followed; the national policy was continued, with some slight deviations, to which I referred a moment ago. Then, coming to 1919, we find another splurge for free trade—a promise of reduction on nineteen specific articles and a substantial reduction on all others. But in 1922, with the present Minister of Finance at the helm, the good old Conservative policy is adhered to, because the minister knows, and responsible men charged with the administration of the affairs of the country know, that they cannot safely depart from that policy. I venture a prediction that my hon. friends of the Progressive party would not, if they were called upon to form a government, deviate from the policy which the Minister of Finance announced to the House a few days ago. The change from opportunity to criticise freely to responsibility for government brings about also a change of attitude at the last moment with respect to these matters. Now, these doctrines have been enunciated not only in political platforms, but in campaign speeches and literature up to the very moment of the election. I have before me the speech of the hon. Prime Minister delivered in Vancouver, in which he lays down the same Liberal platform, viz, substantial downward revision of the tariff which had been long overdue.

I propose to give to the House a few words uttered by the Minister of Finance at the great Liberal convention in August, 1919. These are golden words, and I hope the Minister of Finance is listening with one ear as I repeat them. I quote from the Globe of August 8, 1919:

> Sincerity is a great thing in politics. It should be. Politics is not a mere game and should not be a game; and it is a poor, miserable game when they do things merely to win power.

Now, I say that these are golden words, and they should be inscribed over every entrance to this chamber. I am not suggesting for a moment that the minister himself has deviated from the principle enunciated in these words, but I fear there are forces about him which have swayed the ship of state from the course which might otherwise have been followed. I say, Sir, that these words should be treasured in our memory and written in our hearts. But it is not only the Minister of Finance who discusses this doctrine of sincerity and who utters these philosophic words. There were other persons at this convention, some of whom are now members of the Government, while some have been passed on to the Senate. Senator Pardee said to the convention:

> If we are to succeed; if Canada is to succeed, it will not be enough to enunciate policies. They must be brought into operation. They must be rightly administered with earnestness, sincerity, efficiency and honesty.

The same theme, Mr. Speaker, was the subject of the remarks of the present Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell). This is what he says:

> Whatever the decisions arrived at here in regard to platform, we should go forth to our respective homes prepared to stand by them to the last ditch.

I might observe, Mr. Speaker, that the Minister of Agriculture lately got into a ditch himself on the oleomargarine question—and it was a chilly day among Cabinet ministers on that occasion. We have also an editorial from the Toronto Globe. Before passing to that, let me say that these ideals were put forward with a view to convincing the people that the policies formulated would be carried out. They were preached from pulpit and platform; they were embodied in philosophic utterances; they were stated with apparent sincerity and earnestness. It is, therefore, the course of consistency on the part of hon. members on this side to move the amendment which they have proposed in connection with the budget. The Globe newspaper on the 8th of August, 1919, carried the following editorial under the heading "The Promise of Liberalism".

> Liberalism has made a covenant with the people of Canada. The delegates to the national convention have pledged the Liberal party to certain specific reforms should the electorate entrust the government of the Dominion to the Parliamentary representatives of the party under its new leader, the Hon. Mackenzie King, who will doubtless be provided at once with a seat so that he may again take a place in the House after an absence of almost eight years from the political arena.

The article continues:

> The pledges concerning tariff reform and the efforts to be made to reduce the cost of living are much more specific than political conventions usually make. The country will expect that the promises now made shall be implemented if after the next general election a Liberal ministry is formed. There was no truer word spoken at the convention than the statement of Premier Norris of Manitoba that the time has arrived in the history of Canada when the people will make the politicians keep their promises.

Here in this chamber are the people's representatives from the Prairie provinces possessed of those high ideals; and to-day we on this side of the House have moved an amendment. Here is the opportunity of my hon. friends to my left to make these politicians keep their promises. I have stressed that feature considerably because it is pertinent and relevant to the amendment which we are moving, and because I believe that as a young member of this Parliament, I should proclaim my own opposition to a species of election campaign extending from one end of the country to the other in which promises were given that are not fulfilled, and in regard to which no explanations are forthcoming. Instead of the Government making a frank admission that they could not do these things, but had to take some other course, we find evasions and the digging up of long-forgotten speeches, and we are told that after all there were "charts" which will lead the Government forces from the promises they have made. I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that these same charts are minus a compass, because they do not enable a straight course to be steered.

There is not a great deal of change in the tariff under the present budget. There is a reduction of from 2½ to 5 per cent, but little tendency shown to carry out the policies enunciated at the Liberal convention of 1919. There is no substantial reduction at all, and I am glad that no important changes have been made. For the benefit of my friends to my left and some of our eastern friends sitting opposite, I should like to give the situation in the city of Vancouver. There is a city which has developed very rapidly in the past few years, and its outlook is one of industrial and maritime expansion. We have in the city of Greater Vancouver, 687 factories, employing nearly 19,000 employees, and there are some 60,000 souls dependent on these industries. If the protective tariff were taken away, it would be a death blow to the development of that city and to British Columbia, because their outlook must be one of industrial and commercial development. Nearby we have the great nation of Japan. With its cheap labour and low standards of living, Japan can send its goods to Canada manufactured at one-fifth the labour cost prevailing in this country, and how is it possible for the industries and the workmen of this country to compete with those goods, or with the goods that are made by cheap German labour? It cannot be done. I say again that once our friends on my left became charged with the responsibilities of office, they themselves would not advocate many of the ideas which they advocate to-day. The hon. member for Swift Current (Mr. Lewis) said that our national policy was based on a fallacy and experience had proven this to be so. I would like to put to him and to others what the real objects of protection are. In my opinion, they are to diminish as far as possible the importation from foreign countries of goods which can be produced at approximately the same cost at home; to facilitate the importation of raw material which cannot be produced at home; to encourage the manufacture of Canadian materials into the finished product, and their exportation; to make Canada self-contained by encouraging and developing within her borders all the legitimate activities that will give occupation to her people; and lastly, to secure revenue.

What have been the results of this policy? When you compare what this country was in 1878, or even at Confederation, with conditions now, you will see the great development that has taken place in this country under the protective policy, under a policy of reasonable protection such as sixty-three of the civilized countries of the world have retained since the war—and many of them have increased their tariff. In the light of their experience we can hardly pursue a different policy. In the year 1867 we had a population of 3,000,000 people; to-day we have a population of 9,000,000. Then we had a railway mileage of 2,280; to-day we have a mileage of about 39,000. In 1867 we had 123 branch banks; to-day we have 4,500. We have now 800,000 farms comprising over 53,000,000 acres of land, according to recent statistics. We had in 1867 3,800,000 head of live stock; in 1921 we had 15,500,000 head. There was invested in manufacturing business in this country in 1867, $78,000,000; to-day there is invested over $3,000,000,000. The public revenue at Confederation was $90,000,000; to-day it is in the neighbourhood of $425,000,000 or $450,000,000. Our exports at the time of Confederation were $52,000,000 worth of goods; our exports to-day amount to about $1,250,000,000. These are the results of the policy of reasonable protection which as been followed in this country. It is all right to stand up in this Chamber and say: Oh, it is a bad policy; you should not follow a policy of that kind; if we had free trade, we would get cheaper agricultural machinery, and this, that, and the other thing cheaper; but I submit, Mr. Speaker, that the test of a policy is its results, and the results of protection in this country cannot be denied. They may be argued, but they cannot be denied. The other course has not been followed in this country, but we have the experience of a number of other nations to determine whether or not it would have been a wise policy for this country to follow.

In concluding my remarks I would like to point out what I consider to be the two chief weaknesses of this budget. The first is that provision which enables German goods to come to Canada in large quantities with practically no restriction. In my opinion that is an unsound policy. It is unsound because of the cheapness of labour over there, and because of their lower standards of living forced upon them by their own iniquities in their outrage on civilization. To-day they are in the position of having committed these iniquities against civilization, and now we are putting them in a position to ship their goods here. I submit that that principle is unsound. I say that you cannot by logic eliminate sentiment in this country. I maintain that men who will look with real perspective across the Atlantic will not raise their eyes from the thousands of crosses in Flanders fields across over to the Rhine where the Hun holds out his bloody hand. I believe the people of this country do not want us to grasp his hand just because we could make a good deal with him. The people of this country do not want to save the last cent by the complete abnegation of all sentiment and sympathy and regard for the 56,000 men who lie over there, and who gave their lives for other things than trade. It is repugnant to the finer sense of the people of this country, and the Government will find that out before they have followed this policy very long. What will the men in the military hospitals, who are incapacitated for life, think of it? Picture them picking up their newspapers and reading that the Government of Canada have, a little over three years after the war, broken down the barriers against German goods, and that their baskets and toys and their things of that kind that they are making will have to compete with German toys and other goods sent over here. You may say it is all sentiment. Of course it is sentiment. But it was sentiment that brought about a successful issue of the war, and it is sentiment that will keep Canada united and will preserve our Empire. The Government should think carefully before it enters upon this course and should not allow itself to be swayed by the words of the Minister of Finance when he says it is humbugging the world to pretend that we are protecting ourselves against Germany. Those are high sounding words but they do not constitute an argument sufficient to override the policy which was adopted in the past of keeping German goods out; and if you ask the people of this country whether they would admit those goods or keep them out ninety-nine out of every hundred will express themselves in favour of a policy of exclusion.

Another objection I have to the budget is in connection with the sales tax. We have here the introduction of a principle of direct taxation which appeals strongly to our Progressive friends. The indirect taxation which was found in the former protective tariff has been eliminated, but the substitution of direct for indirect taxation will not only prove unpopular with the mass of working people of this country but will be a positive injury to them. It would have been far better to have secured revenue by the old-time method, than to raise it by a form of taxation which imposes a burden upon many of the people who are less able than others to pay it.

Before concluding, I would like to say that in my opinion the fruit industry of British Columbia and Ontario is going to be seriously affected by eliminating the anti-dumping regulation enforced in the past. The hon. member for Yale (Mr. MacKelvie) went into this question in considerable detail and there is no necessity for me to speak upon it at any length. I would, however, like to say this: The condition of the markets in the United States, the big production there, the early crops they raise—and from which they derive their profits—enable them to dump subsequent crops in competition with our growers. This undoubtedly works against the best interests of the Canadian fruit industry; and practical common sense would convince one of the necessity of having an anti-dumping regulation for the protection of our own fruit growers. The tariff legislation of the United States protects the fruit growers there to the fullest extent, but there is no hindrance to their dumping in Canada, and our fruit industry accordingly suffers. To allow the United States growers to pursue such a policy is both unsound and unwise.

To-day I received a letter from a little storekeeper in the suburbs of Vancouver. The writer is a returned man, and he deals in his letter with the sales tax. I shall quote briefly from the communication because the writer expresses the idea in a far better way than I could myself. He says:

> I did not complain at the luxury tax during war time, but I do now strongly protest at a 5 per cent tax on what is the children's delight, the poor man's meal—a five cent box of chocolate. Why tax candy and leave jewellery free?

I do not know whether jewellery is left free, but if such is the case I think this man's objection is well founded. There is no reason why confectionery, which is used to a greater extent by the majority of people than articles of luxury, should be taxed while jewellery is left untouched.

I conclude my remarks by reminding our friends on the Government side that we must judge the future by the events of the past. The history of Canada is before us. It rises like an immense column on which we may see inscribed the soundest maxims of political experience. We must take wisdom from the examples of others; we must derive encouragement from their success and learn caution from their misfortunes. We must look back upon the history of the nations that have gone before, we can look back upon the history of our own country, and from the lessons we learn we may be guided for the future in such a way as to avoid pitfalls and make the people of this country a happy, prosperous and contented nation.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

After Recess

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. D. F. KELLNER (East Edmonton): In continuing this debate, I would like to congratulate the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) on the very able way in which he presented the budget. There was a tone in his voice which suggested finality and almost the last word that might be said on this matter. Before proceeding further, I desire to deal with the amended amendment suggested by the official Opposition, and to draw the attention of the House to what I concede to be a kind of rubbing-in process. Some hon. members are continually calling the attention of the House to the fact that the Progressives sometimes support the Government, and they seem to think on that account that we should be subjected to a great deal of criticism. I will remind hon. members that on some occasions during this session they themselves have voted with the Government, and I think that if we are deserving of criticism they also are probably deserving of it. In the part of the country from which I come, the province of Alberta, we feel pretty much the same in regard to both parties. When the Conservatives were in power the Liberals used to tell us we could not put any confidence in anything the Conservatives promised, and we used to say "you are right." Now that the Liberals are in power, the Conservatives tell us that we cannot put any confidence in anything the Liberals promise, and again we say "you are right"—they are both right. I might add that we are not very much interested in which party gets the best of the debate, or, to put it in another way, we are not much interested in which makes the best batting average in the contest.

In regard to the budget, I can see little real change from what was in the last budget. We have about the same kind of taxes, and they expect to raise about the same amount of revenue, in just about the same way. There is an apparent reduction in the tariff, which, I think, will be amply made up by the increase in sales tax, so that I cannot see where the consumer can hope to obtain any relief under this budget as compared with the old one. There is going to be an attempt, at least, to try out some new methods of taxation; for instance, we have the tax on cheques suggested. Just how much revenue will be obtained from that is hard to determine at this time. Some institutions will probably change their system of banking to a certain extent, and the revenue will probably be affected in that way. Then there is a suggested tax on soft drinks and, judging by the number of telegrams that I am receiving from my constituents, I am quite well convinced that the people are objecting to having to pay a tax when they want to wet their whistle, in that country at any rate. A tax is also suggested on bank circulation. Candidly, I think it is a tax which is, at least, levied on a just, or more just, principle than our ordinary taxes. I desire to call attention to a change that took place in the minister's tone when he was telling us about the inauguration of this tax. If hon. members will refer to his speech, they will find he said "we will do thus and thus," until he came to that particular tax; then he said "last but not least, we are going to ask the banks to bear some share of these burdens," and I could not help but think that in his voice and manner there was a little change, the air of finality was less apparent, the pleading and the decisiveness seemed almost to give way to doubt, and I think, Sir, that there was a suggestion that this Parliament or this Government is subservient to the will of the banks.

We, in the past, have had a few taxes levied on what might be called the system of paying according to ability, and I am very glad to hear so many hon. members recommend this system of taxation. I hope they will live up to their recommendations and have the courage of their convictions when it comes to inaugurating these taxes. We have tried some of these taxes, and in fact one of them, our income tax, is in force at the present time. Another tax which we have had, and which is now discontinued, is the business profits tax, and I am a little surprised that this Government did not restore that tax. It was a good revenue producer. I think in 1920 we got some $40,000,000 from it. It was a tax that was tried, and no doubt the machinery could very easily have been re-established to again place it in operation. Then the luxury tax might have been included in that class, but, for some reason or other, this Government, whom I am frank to say, I believe the people had a good deal of confidence in, have ignored these systems of taxation. They have established two principles; one is that it is the intention to collect as much money as they can by taxes on the necessities of the producers, and the other principle is that special privileges will still be continued by way of the tariff.

In order to understand how this budget will be received by the country at large, it is necessary, Sir, to have an idea of the state of mind the country is in, and this House has had a very clear outline of conditions in western Canada; so that I will not dwell on these conditions longer to-night than to make one brief remark. If you were to take a financial survey of the farming industry of western Canada and strike off a balance sheet; if on the credit side you were to place the sale of every bushel of grain that was grown out there last year and on the debit side you should put down the cost of growing, harvesting, threshing and delivering the grain to the elevator, having no regard to the time the farmer spent in the work and forgetting entirely any money which he might have invested and on which he might expect some dividends, and if you were simply to deduct your cost price from your selling price, I do not believe you would have enough money left to buy one Massey-Harris binder.

If the people throughout the country are in a more or less feverish state of mind and if, during the last year, we have had labour troubles and numbers of unemployed men, many of whom no doubt have known what it was to suffer the pangs of want, we have also a large mercantile class who are feeling the pinch of poverty just the same as the farming and labouring classes, by reason of the fact that their business is depressed, and I think they were justified in expecting some relief when we had this new Government elected. I am a little afraid that that relief is not forthcoming in this 2½ per cent reduction in the tariff and the 50 per cent increase in the sales tax. The budget can, to my mind, give them little encouragement.

I should like briefly to allude to the final appeal of the Minister of Finance, who in his concluding words called upon labour and capital to get together. I could not help thinking that probably there was, on the part of the Government, a desire which they found it impossible for them to implement and that probably the unseen hand which controls governments and the destinies of nations was at work when the budget was being drafted. Our need to-day is a government that is big enough, strong enough, and fearless enough to try to lessen the gulf that exists between our social classes. We have on the one hand a display of social exclusiveness and on the other a display of want and suffering. Our people are fast being divided into two classes, one paying interest and the other collecting it. Having in mind these things, the condition that our people are in and what they might naturally expect, I cannot recommend this budget, as brought down by the Government, as being worthy of their best attempts.

The other evening the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Stewart), when speaking in the House, laid stress on the fact that in 1892 this country was in a similar or worse condition in comparison with that of to-day. I believe he sought to argue that because we had got out of that depression all right, there was no reason to think we should not get out of this one. The hon. gentleman is on very dangerous ground. Surely it is not well to argue that because we have got into deep water and come out all safe, we are safe in bobbing up and down in deep water perpetually and at will. Conditions at that time were altogether different from what they are to-day At that time we had little or no national debt. Now we have a federal debt of about $2,500,000,000, and added to that we have our various provincial and municipal debts. Therefore, every citizen in Canada can feel that on him devolves the necessity of paying interest on three separate debts, outside of what he may owe himself, and unfortunately many of us owe money. I maintain that the interest on these debts and the cost of civil government—and by the way that is another cost which is rapidly mounting up; I think probably at the present time our bootlegging industry is costing the country as much as our entire civil government did twenty years ago—must all be charged up against our production and against what we can develop from our natural resources. I believe the time is very near at hand when we shall find that it will take our entire production to pay the interest on our debts, and when that time comes we shall be facing absolute bankruptcy as a nation.

This Government, if it hopes to avoid such a catastrophe, will have to evolve something that is more fitting to relieve our depression than the present budget. I might say further that I am thoroughly convinced that before we can hope to re-establish our national standing and to get our country back to a prosperous condition, we shall have to change our credit system. I am thoroughly convinced that it is absolutely unworkable for any length of time, and unless we change our credit system, I cannot see where we have any possibility of lessening this huge debt.

Mr. HAROLD PUTNAM (Colchester): Mr. Speaker, this afternoon the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Ladner) gave me and, I believe, the House, to understand that the country in its last verdict had voted that the tenets of the Liberal platform, upon which he harped so much and so carefully, should have been carried out literally, fully, promptly, perhaps instantly and even with this budget. If he be correct in that conclusion, he was evidently obeying the behest of the leader of the Opposition (Mr. Meighen), who pronounced that the tariff should be the prime issue in the late election. I have heard the right hon. member dispute that he ever said it should be the sole issue but there is no doubt at all that he said over and over again that it should be the chief issue, or he used words to such effect. If the hon. member for Vancouver South is right in reading the recent verdict, then we must conclude that it spells very bad in its omen for the disciples of high protection, whose disciples the group of hon. members to the Speaker's left continue very frankly to be. If he be right, the only regret I have, as a believer in the two-party system of Government, is that it spells almost the complete extermination of the historic Conservative party in this Canada of ours.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I think the question as to who or what won the last election is almost as futile as the classic poser, "Who won the war". There did come a time when all the respectable nations of the earth became possessed of the will to win, and thencefrom the doom of Germany was fully assured; and long before the formal counting of the ballots in the last campaign there did come a time when the opponents of the late administration had the will to win, and thencefrom its doom was assured. Perhaps now it is rather a useless effort to analyze the different causes that compassed its defeat. There is this, however, to be said, that when, elected as a union government, our friends began to take upon themselves functions for which they were not elected, the people rose in their might and in their unity said: Democracy must be restored and the head of the serpent of autocracy must be crushed beneath our heel. That is what happened.

The hon. gentleman from Vancouver South (Mr. Ladner) is entirely welcome to say that it was a pronouncement sealing the doom of high protection. He reminds me of the story of an old gentleman, a clergyman apparently from his dress, who was riding in a London bus when a rather bumptious young man thus accosted him, "Sir, do you know that I can prove to you there is no such place as Heaven?" The old clergyman took no notice and continued reading his newspaper. Again he was interrupted by the young man who exclaimed: "Sir, you appear to be a clergyman and therefore a Christian. I challenge you that I can prove there is no such place as the Kingdon of Heaven." Still the old gentleman read on, and the impudent challenge was repeated in almost the same words. Finally he laid down his newspaper with a slight expression of disgust and said, "Well, well, young man; if you must go to Hell why make such a fuss about it?" And if the hon. gentleman from Vancouver South is convinced that the result of the verdict of the last election was the doom of the doctrine of high protection, my only sorrow is that he is making such a fuss about it.

I was in some doubt, Mr. Speaker, whether it would be worth my while to try to add anything to this discussion, but as a Nova Scotian I would not think of letting the opportunity go by without associating myself with all the kindly things that have been said of the author of this budget, the Finance Minister (Mr. Fielding). Those congratulations have come from every member who has spoken, irrespective of his political affiliations. Perhaps it is an example of the lingering death of party spirit that the budget itself has not been received with the same unanimous acclaim and enthusiasm, but we on this side of the House are in hopes that with the presentation of a few more consecutive budgets by our distinguished Minister of Finance we may have that happy consummation.

Down in Nova Scotia the people perceived, long before the declaration of the polls, that the late administration was doomed to defeat, and I may tell the House that we formed a little plan to celebrate this occasion. We knew that the hopes of the people were centred on the man who in years gone by had turned the chronic Foster deficits into the chronic Fielding surpluses, and recognizing him as the one and only outstanding choice for the position of Minister of Finance in the new Liberal administration, the people of Nova Scotia decided to celebrate his sixteenth budget by sending here one Liberal representative, including his distinguished self, for every budget that he had presented to this House and to the country. We carried out that scheme, and our only regret is that we could not do more, because our efforts entailed no self-sacrifice; on the morning of the 7th December the men who had tried to stand in the road of that tremendously popular movement woke up to find that they had lost their deposits. And, Sir, we congratulate the country that for the sixteenth time the man whose budgets were such a pronounced success for fifteen consecutive times is to-day the man who has been chosen to bring down this budget to Parliament and the country at a time of the most critical financial stress that we have ever experienced.

There is no doubt in the world that some hon. members are disappointed that the tariff reductions are not greater. One thing we on the Liberal side promised the country, and I think our Progressive friends also made the same promise, that whatever our ultimate views as to the tariff, whether it should be high or low, in this time of recovery from the staggering blow of the war, from the amazing deficits that the railway policy of the late government had imposed upon our young country, this was not the time to attempt any drastic tariff changes that would dislocate the business of the country. Therefore when some of us are disappointed that the tariff reductions are not greater, I would ask them to remember that promise.

Our hon. friends opposite would have us believe that the country was looking for the full and literal translation of the Liberal tariff platform of 1919. Well, I was struck with the remark which fell from the right hon. leader of the Opposition the other day, when he pointed out that freight rates which might be relevant and useful two or three weeks ago might be entirely useless and irrelevant two or three weeks after. I would remind every reasonable man in this House that the Liberal platform of 1919 was laid down a few years before the general election, and those were years of crowding events, those were years when the financial situation of the country was becoming worse at a faster ratio even than we had feared. Consequently there is every reason to believe that the people took a sensible view of the issues that were addressed to them in that long campaign which preceded December 6th last, when it is to be remembered the Liberal platform was two or three years old, which is a long time as events move these days. But to say, as did the hon. member for Vancouver South, that the people were deceived by the Liberal platform, when the right hon. leader of the Opposition himself avowed that he was going to have a long campaign for the express purpose of permitting a propaganda of education of the electorate, is a trifling with the plain facts of the case and with the intelligence of the people. In that long campaign it so happened that the three parties presented the issues to the people fully and fairly, and the verdict shows that the people did not expect any sudden change in the tariff at this critical juncture. Therefore I believe the tariff as a whole is eminently satisfactory to the country, even though perforce private interests here and there feel the pinch of taxation that perhaps they think cannot be justified as entirely equitable.

It is common ground that we have a very hard country to govern. We look to Canada's north, and we have the plains of the eternal winter. Our Lady of the Snows will cast her smiles in vain in that direction if she expects to find her true destiny or her true affinity there. We look to the West, and almost in the extreme portion of it we find the barrier of the Rocky mountains—beauteous as God ever made; so beauteous that the tourist goes in there and gladly pays liberally for his enjoyment of them, incidentally affording us a small fraction of our revenue, something for which we are truly thankful. But those mountain ranges, unfortunately, are a barrier to traffic, and when we go to the Pacific coast and find the glittering waters of the Pacific ocean leaning against those mountain ranges we realize that the Pacific ocean herself is a jealous mistress, because she says to the inland Canadian: You may not bring your steaming trains westward to load freight on the ships that float upon my bosom. You may not send your steaming engines eastward, hauling trains with freight from those ships—this you cannot do until you have passed my outer guards, which are comprised in the sharp grades in those very mountains. Mr. Speaker, those grades are austere; they are hostile to traffic, as every man knows who tries to bring about complete interprovincial trade between East and the extreme West.

Mr. STEVENS: Will my hon. friend permit me a question? Is he aware that the grades on the Canadian National from Edmonton to the Coast are better than from Edmonton to Winnipeg?

Mr. PUTNAM: I suppose there is a large body of traffic which is dependent upon the Canadian Pacific Railway.

Mr. STEVENS: I asked the hon. member if he was aware that the grades on the Canadian National from Edmonton to the Coast were less than the grades from Edmonton to Winnipeg?

Mr. PUTNAM: I will answer my hon. friend's question fairly, for I think he meant it fairly. I did know that, but for the moment I had forgotten it. I suggest to my hon. friend, however, that that is only a partial disposition of my objection in view of the grades of the Canadian Pacific to which only I alluded. Mr. Speaker, we look away to the east and we have the Atlantic ocean. But it so happens that the Atlantic coast of Canada is a very irregular coast, and it is immediately rivalled by a more regular Atlantic seaboard stretching at once to the south and coming soon to bays and harbours and great cities whose names are on the lips of all the world and which are so situated, climatically and otherwise, that the major part of the traffic of the ocean is directed through them. When the St. Lawrence is an ice-field, St. John and Halifax, instead of getting the share of the traffic which one might expect, have it abstracted from them and passed through the American ports. But, Mr. Speaker, when we look to the south we may well exclaim: What a South it is! There is a nation easily conceded to be one of the very greatest nations of the earth. With them we have enjoyed for one hundred years the blessings of happy peace. It is a country stretching from the Atlantic to the Pacific, a country whose people are largely of our own blood, of our language, of our own traditions, of our own national ideals. If an impartial observer came to look the situation over, would he not say: You have your difficulties on your north and your west and your east; why as people of common sense are you not trading in a free and unhampered way with your great kinsmen to the south?

I do not wish to detain the House by going into history which is just as well known to every hon. member as it is to myself. But we know that there was reciprocity in the old days, and that it was entirely profitable. We know that it was revoked as a result of the international jealousies, misgivings and distrust which unfortunately followed the Civil War. We know that efforts were made to revive that reciprocity agreement, and that there came a time in 1911 when we heard news so good that we could scarcely believe it. That news was in line with the historic tradition of the Liberal party. The present Minister of Finance was able to say: The bigger nation has come to the smaller nation and has offered us this large measure of reciprocity just for the taking. We know the negotiations that went on and we know the tragedy of the defeat of that measure. Now, the other night the hon. member for New Westminister (Mr. McQuarrie) told us that we must not suppose for a moment that any hon. member from British Columbia was favourable to the Reciprocity pact, and he challenged any member from that province to stand up and say so, if he were. Well, that was not a very bold challenge, it was a very harmless one. It was a very easy challenge. I am glad to see the hon. member now in his seat; we have met as neighbours, one from the far West and the other from the far East, and I have found him a splendid neighbour. But if he became aware that every province except British Columbia was in favour of reciprocity, I wonder what his attitude would then be. That, Mr. Speaker, was just the logical and final step he did not take in his altercation the other day with the hon. member for Last Mountain (Mr. Johnston). He said: Oh, you people on the prairies need not think that you are the only pebbles on the beach—as the phrase goes; British Columbia is all opposed to you on this question. I take it that the hon. member is convinced that we in this country are trying to make a success of Confederation, that we are trying to accomplish the greatest good for the greatest number. If he were convinced that all the rest of Canada wanted reciprocity and that only British Columbia was opposed to it, it would be interesting to know whether the members from British Columbia would consider it their duty to bow to the wish of the majority and say: Yes, even at that local cost we shall have the greatest good for the greatest number. But that is the step the hon. member did not take. I do not think the most ardent advocate of reciprocity ever contended that it would be universally for the good of the whole people. I believe there were interests—the hon. member from Toronto (Mr. Hocken) laughs. I do not know what he is laughing at, unless it is his own misconception of the whole question. But, Mr. Speaker, Toronto would be the last place to which I would go to look for any carrying out of that motto—the greatest good for the greatest number in this Canada of ours.

Mr. HOCKEN: Oh, you had better keep away from Toronto.

Mr. PUTNAM: Well, that is pretty nearly an indication of the true spirit prevailing there, especially if a man hails from Nova Scotia.

Mr. HOCKEN: We do not want your class up there at all.

Mr. MARTELL: He is too broad-minded.

Mr. PUTNAM: I am willing to leave to the judgment of the House what your own class is, in view of that remark. I have frequently been there, and have seen no superior class. Now, I was pointing out—and I do not know whether the hon. gentleman wakes up to the fact for the first time—that it was never contended that reciprocity would literally be popular in the minds of and beneficial to all Canadians. What measure under Heaven could be propounded that would have that happy result? Here is the stand the Liberal party took with respect to reciprocity. They said: Inasmuch as we believe that it will be good for the far greater majority of the people of this country, it is our duty to sink whatever differences of opinion there may be in our own party, and to bring down such a measure, not as the consummation of the perfect good of all, but as getting as near as we can to the greatest good for the greatest number.

Mr. HOCKEN: Is the hon member in favour of reciprocity himself? I cannot gather from his remarks.

Mr. PUTNAM: Are there snakes in Ireland? Am I in favour of something we cannot now get?

Mr. HOCKEN: Is the hon. member in favour of reciprocity?

Mr. PUTNAM: Does the hon. gentleman mean, if reciprocity were again offered to us as in 1911 would I favour it?

Mr. HOCKEN: I could not gather from the hon. gentleman's remarks whether he was in favour of reciprocity or opposed to it. He is wandering around in such a desultory manner that I cannot gather his attitude, and I am asking him the straight question. Does he approve of the reciprocity treaty between the United States and Canada?

Mr. PUTNAM: It is really complimentary to have the hon. member come back and seek information from a humble Nova Scotian after his recent remark. If the hon. member means, if reciprocity were obtainable on the same terms as it was offered in 1911, should we accept it? I would say a thousand times yes. We know the campaign that defeated reciprocity at that time. We were told, and told especially by Toronto, from which city the hon. member hails, that to trade with our good neighbours to the south would be prejudicing our loyalty to the flag of old England, and they told us to have no truck or trade with the Yankees. It was a flag-waving campaign, entirely apart from the merits of the question. If the hon. gentlemen on the other side would just take the converse case, I would have no complaint. Does not the hon. member remember that when in 1897 the present Minister of Finance brought down his budget proposing very drastic reductions in the duties on goods coming from England, every member on his side of the House voted against it? If we were disloyal to want a lower tariff with the United States, surely the converse holds true, and it would be loyal to give a lower tariff to Old England. Yet none of the gentlemen now sitting in that corner of the House, nor any of their predecessors, ever gave us any credit for loyalty on that score, when the case was exactly the converse of what happened in 1911 on the reciprocity issue.

Some of these reductions in the tariff may be disappointing in that they are not more drastic, but we on this side of the House promised over and over again that we would not disturb the existing business of this country, and in view of the terrible debt left by the war, and the enormous deficits produced by the railway policy of the late government, we would have been to blame in every sense of the word had we brought about any drastic dislocation of the business of the country at this particular time.

I have not followed all the things that have been said in favour of this budget, but I have tried to follow everything that has been said against it, on its merits. As one hon. gentleman put it, the Minister of Finance has access to avenues of information that are not open to the ordinary member, and for myself I am willing again to trust the old financial pilot who brought us through those former fifteen budgets so successfully. Reasoning from analogy, I would expect the best possible results from this his sixteenth budget. I have heard very little in this debate in criticism of the budget on its merits. The ex-Minister of Finance (Sir Henry Drayton), who I am sorry is not in his seat to-night, in what seemed to me a rather cheap sneer at the expense of Germany, beaten and stricken as she is, said that to him this budget appeared as free trade with Germany and a 2½ per cent reduction in favour of the United Kingdom. That statement was made for only one purpose, and a very demagogic purpose, a purpose, I submit, unworthy of any man who so recently occupied a seat as minister of the Crown in this country. The leading statesmen of England are saying that one of the greatest hopes for the restoration of international trade is that Germany shall be brought as quickly as possible into the trade orbit in which she moved before the war. When we come to South Africa, our sister state in that self-governing galaxy of nations that stands around the British throne like strong sons around a mother, South Africa, which came into this family of nations long after we did, and is therefore a member to whom we might rather be giving lessons in all that is judicial and proper, has actually sent a man to Germany to promote trade between the two countries. It remained for the ex-Minister of Finance to throw an unworthy sneer at trade with Germany, and he exaggerated unworthily the step which the Minister of Finance is proposing, which is simply that in importing goods from Germany we should be able to base the duty on approximately the real value of the goods.

Mr. LADNER: Does the hon. member suggest that it is in the interests of this country and of fair competition to permit the entry of free goods from Germany, where the men work for $3 a month, the same as they do in Japan? That is the figure which comes from authoritative sources, and it is a well known fact. The Minister of Finance himself showed how the mark had depreciated something like thirty-six times.

Mr. PUTNAM: I am not averse to answering specific questions relating to specific facts, but I am averse to answering academic questions. Does the hon. member suggest that under this budget German goods will come in free? That seems to be his implication.

Mr. FIELDING: They said it was free trade with Germany.

Mr. LADNER: My question is this: In view of the fact that German workmen manufacture these goods for $3 a month, and have a lower standard of living than we have in this country, does the hon. member consider it fair that the industries of this country should be brought into free competition with German goods, as they will be under the present budget proposals?

Mr. PUTNAM: I do not accept the hon. gentleman's premises. We have a tariff against Germany, and no German goods will come in free. I am not going to waste time in answering academic questions.

I listened to the thoughtful address of the Progressive member for Last Mountain (Mr. Johnston), who made some criticism of the sales tax. I confess that several of his observations have impressed me. There is an important industry in my own town and those identified with it have written to me along the line that they consider that the sales tax on certain of their finished products is unfair. I have laid their representations before the Minister of Finance, and he has promised the matter careful reconsideration. If there are possible inequalities in this tax it will be the duty of hon. members here to point them out—I had almost said to follow my example, but I will not say anything so egotistical. I presume there are features of the budget which affect their own industries, and of course it is our duty to lay all such matters before the Minister of Finance. Even this budget, with all its details and its figures, is not necessarily a finality, and in respect of the worthy institution in my own town—the condensed milk factory, a branch of the Borden Company—I only hope that the sales tax may be to some extent ameliorated. But after supplying what data we can we shall have to leave that once again to the serious consideration of the Minister of Finance and his associates.

Now I think it was the duty of the leader of the Opposition to have discovered, if he could, what, on its merits, was wrong with this tariff. Perhaps I should not anticipate him, I have no doubt he will speak yet; but I will say this: There is nothing in the amendment itself which mentions anything whatsoever as wrong with the merits of this budget. The leader of the Opposition and those surrounding him are supposed to be the critics in this chamber. In addition to his regular indemnity the leader of the Opposition gets a substantial, and some would think a handsome, allowance for the purpose of being a sort of attorney to watch all the legislation that is brought down by the government. We all know the weakness to which the attorney for the defence is prone whose only resource, during the progress of the trial, is to abuse the attorney for the plaintiff; and it does seem to me very much as though the attorney for the defence, in the person of the leader of the Opposition, by setting up in the amendment this empty cry about lowering the standards of public life—by hurling that general accusation at those who have propounded this tariff—has resorted to the old device of merely abusing the attorney for the plaintiff.

Now is there anything so terrible about the violation of this platform for 1919 even to the extent which hon. gentlemen opposite have suggested? As I have pointed out, that platform was laid down in other times and under conditions not nearly so bad as they are revealed today. Why, Mr. Speaker, it is not unknown that the full intent and purpose of a promise may sometimes be very honourably modified, or the execution of the promise may sometimes be very honourably deferred, or sometimes the promise may very honourably be dropped out of sight and out of recollection altogether. Do you remember the last general election in England—and I suppose we are British enough to admit that the leaders of the political thought over there are men of honour—do you remember that that great leader of thought, Lloyd George, and his great associate in the Union government, Mr. Bonar Law, and all who surrounded them in that campaign, promised categorically and in specific terms that it was part of their platform that the Kaiser would be pulled out of Germany altogether and given a trial before the courts of England? As a matter of illustration, and just to show how specific that promise was, let me read the actual words of Lloyd George at that time:

> We have decided that the man who undoubtedly had the prime responsibility for the war, in the judgment, at any rate, of the allied countries, should be tried for the offence he committed in breaking Treaties which he was bound in honour to respect, to which he was a party, and by that means bringing such horrors upon the world. The allied countries have decided quite unanimously that the tribunal shall be an Inter-Allied one, and that it shall sit in London for the trial of the person supremely responsible for this war.

I suppose that if the little group to your left, Mr. Speaker, were over in England to-night, and elected to the great legislative body there, they would have some amendment denouncing the honour of the public men of England for not having tried the Kaiser before this. But, Mr. Speaker, is there any complaint on the part of the best public spirit and the best public opinion in England because that promise was dropped? I have never heard of any; it simply faded away in the light of second thought and of subsequent events. It is a promise which can never be kept. The Kaiser is growing old; it becomes more and more inhumane to think of carrying out that promise now. But the citadel of protection is still arrogant, is still impudent; and when we get out of the financial stress of this war, as we hope to some day; when we get through these dark hours of the railway deficits, as we are still hoping to do; there will come a time when all the promises of the 1919 Liberal platform can be revived; and if the hon. gentleman to whom I allude is right that the verdict of a few months ago was a verdict against high protection, a verdict in favour of the 1919 Liberal platform, it will not be a very courageous course one will have to take to try to implement all those promises.

Now referring once more to promises: Hon. gentlemen opposite have called themselves, within recent times, by several different names; and I heard the genial member for Fort William (Mr. Manion) the other night stand up and say that he declined to be called a Tory any longer. Now I have not had much experience in the art, the delight and the exhiliaration of playing cards, but I do believe that among the devotees of the games of the card table—especially among some of the more standard games—it is a rule that a good loser should stop while he is still losing. The man who quits while he is still losing is supposed to be a good sport, and on that principal I congratulate the hon. member for Fort William upon having the proclivities of a real good sport. But whatever the name—and perhaps it is none of my business—by which that group should be called, there is this about it that in years gone by they did seriously set themselves up as having the major part of the political wisdom of this country, and they persisted in that claim until the great Laurier came on the horizon in 1896 and gave Canada her fifteen golden years. Then that same group—whatever their name then or now—persisted very seriously in the claim that they had a monopoly of the loyalty and of the imperialistic spirit in this country; I am sorry to say they persisted in that claim right down until the time of the war when the Liberal blood was mixed in equal volume with the Tory blood which flowed into those horrible trenches in Flanders fields. Since then they have been driven from that absurd position, and I wish to prophesy that they will never take up that position again. Well, they are now looking for a new position. They are fresh from defeat under a government which was the most conspicuous failure that Canada ever knew and, Mr. Speaker, they say "Oh, we found our new province; we are going to be the guardians and the wardens of the honour of the public life in this country"; and that view is embodied in their amendment.

Now, I think, that even in present times, and without waiting for any sequel or any of the verdicts of history, we can say that they are in a very poor and very inconsistent position, to say the least of it, when they pose as the defenders of the citadel of public honour. These are the guardians of the honour of the nation! These are the men who tell us by their amendment that they are the guardians of the public life of Canada. Does that not sound fine from the authors of the Wartime Elections Act? Does that not sound fine from the party under whose recent premier a commission on the tariff was set afloat at enormous expense to this country, with the specific promise, made from almost every platform from which he addressed an audience—and I refer now to the leader of the Opposition (Mr. Meighen) in the late campaign—that the people could depend upon a scientific study of this tariff, that, taking all the particular items one by one, the people, as the result of the scientific study, would be told just the digit, just the figure, to which the protection would be raised for the common good, in regard to each article, and that, having regard to the common good, they would be told just the figure and the digit to which that tariff would be lowered on every and any article? That is the categorical, the specific and the ambitious promise of the leader of the Opposition with respect to that question. When it was known the campaign would be a long one, we were told, with all the show of frankness, that it was to permit that drastic and searching campaign of education to impress itself upon the people, and to produce its proper fruits, before a vote could be taken under any spirit of hysteria, or under any spirit of ill-considered judgment in a matter of such importance. We all remember that. Did we ever hear from that scientific commission? It was promised. It was dearly paid for. Was that promise ever carried out? These are the men who tell us to-night that, by their amendment, they are the special guardians of the public life of Canada.

I could tell you certain promises I had to put up with down in my own county from no less a person than the ex-Minister of Public Works, the then colleague of the present leader of the Opposition. He told us in his literature, which I have under my hand, and from nearly every platform from which he spoke, particularly in or near Truro, that when the Meighen administration was returned we would get back the Intercolonial with headquarters at Moncton. When I came to this House, and before I had scarcely got settled in my seat, I was amazed to find that the leader of the Opposition not only repudiated that promise—and there is your collective cabinet responsibility—but sought to throw the dart of his sarcasm at the futility and absurdity of any such promise. He sought to pillory the hon. member from Pictou (Mr. Macdonald), the hon. member from Cumberland (Mr. Logan) and my humble self in terms of derision, for ever having held it out to the people. It was a specific promise given by his own ex-Minister of Public Works in the cabinet of the present leader of the Opposition, and these are the men who are setting themselves up on a pedestal to-night, as the guardians of the honour of the public life of this country. Moreover, another promise from the then hon. Minister of Public Works was circulated in printed form by the thousands, if not by the tens of thousands, in my county, and the little document was headed with the word "danger" in big black letters. But the people fully appreciated the value of the document, and appraised it with reference to the source from which it came. They knew there was great danger in allowing these gentlemen to trifle any longer with the affairs of the country, and they voted against them. But look at this nugget, in this particular piece of campaign literature issued, and taken advantage of, by the hon. ex-Minister of Public Works. One paragraph reads as follows:

> Should Meighen fail to obtain a clear working majority Crerar and King will combine to destroy the fiscal policy that has made Canada industrially great, business stagnation would be sure to follow, and the country would be set back twenty years.

Whatever may be the ultimate aim of the leader of the Progressives as to the doctrine of a low tariff for Canada and whatever the aim of my honored leader the Prime Minister as to the ultimate efficacy and benefit of a far lower tariff, those two gentlemen told the country over and over again that, for the immediate present, it could not expect any drastic reduction in the tariff as it now stands; yet the ex-Minister of Public Works, setting at defiance the pledges and words of those two honoured leaders, declares that if Mr. Meighen should find himself without a clear majority over both other groups in the House, the tariff would be submarined without warning and all fiscal policy destroyed. It happened that, instead of the right honourable the leader of the Opposition having a majority over both groups, he failed to get a majority over any single group in the House. Have hon. members seen anything to justify that sort of promise of the ex-Minister of Public Works? For my own part, I have not.

In addition to reading the lesson of political morality to us, speaker after speaker on the side of the official Opposition has been giving to our good friends the Progressives many a little side lesson, many a little moral quip, much gratuitous advice, upon the duty which rests upon them of making the Grits keep their promise. I am not going to tender any advice. My opinion of the Progressives is that they are abundantly able to be the guardians of their own intelligence and their own consciences in this House.

I intend, Mr. Speaker, to vote against this amendment, because it does not deal with the merits of the case. The hon. member for Last Mountain (Mr. Johnston) very properly stated in very mild language, that it was a political manoeuvre. I can well understand the Progressives, young in their career in this House—and I represent hundreds of them in my own county—who came out out from the Conservative party, who elected two men to the local legislature there, who unsuccessfully ran a man against the Minister of Public Works fourteen months before the general election, who said to me "We think your views and policy as a Liberal so nearly approximate the Progressive viewpoint in Colchester that we are going to throw our lot in with you", I have the honour to represent hundreds of them as well as the straight Liberals of the county of Colchester. I can well understand the Progressives in this House refusing to be a party to the political manoeuvre of the Tories embodied in this academic amendment. I say that the hon. member from Last Mountain was right, and he could have gone further when he said this amendment was a political manoeuvre designed to catch the Progressives off their guard, but was not successful. The Progressives are young in their career here. They are entirely honourable, and I do not know how they are going to vote, it is none of my business, but I appreciate the stand they have taken whereby they are not going to be caught with the empty chaff of any such amendment as has been proposed to the House. I cannot help characterizing it as a piece of political pedantry, not without a large admixture of hypocrisy.

Mr. J. L. STANSELL (East Elgin): Mr. Speaker, the previous speaker (Mr. Putnam), in common with a few others on that side of the House, evidently thinks one of the most effective means of criticism of hon. members who form the official Opposition is to hurl the word "Tory" across the floor of the House. It surely has been apparent to many hon. members that, although this has happened on many occasions, not once, so far as I have been able to observe, has any hon. member on this side of the House stood up and yelled "Grit".

Mr. MARTELL: We are not ashamed of that.

Mr. STANSELL: Certainly not, and neither are we of the word "Tory". I can remember some years ago when I was a boy at school we always recognized that, in a time of dispute, the boy who got on top of the fence and proceeded to call names, did so because he lacked the necessary material to get down and put up a real argument. As long as hon. members opposite think criticism consists in throwing this word across the floor of the House, we in this corner may feel comparatively safe. But if the time should come, in the dim and distant future, when it is necessary for us to get up and apply epithets across the floor for lack of criticism, then they may well consider that they have reached a height of statesmanship that puts them above criticism. I am not a prophet, nor yet the son of a prophet, but I have grave doubts whether the ship of state will, with its well known chart, ride sufficiently long until they attain that high position.

The previous speaker also in his closing remarks addressed himself to the Progressive party, and he called attention to the fact that he owed his election to hundreds, I think he said, of Progressives who supported him, for the very simple reason that the Liberal platform and the Progressive platform were so nearly identical. I believe that is a fairly correct statement. So far as I was able to observe in the last campaign, the statement was made repeatedly that there was practically no difference between the two platforms, and that the Liberal party, if entrusted with the Government of the country, would prove equally the friend of the farmer and the labouring man as the Progressive party. I am sorry to say, however, that speeches so far contributed by members of the Progressive party show that in the present budget, they are not able to see the close resemblance.

Many complimentary things have been said in connection with the presentation of this budget by the present Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding). I am sure they are well deserved; and it certainly is a distinction to be able to present in this House one's sixteenth budget. Possibly, however, this budget has presented greater difficulties than any of the preceding fifteen, so that, in attempting criticism of it, I, and I believe other hon. members as well, realize the difficulties confronting the Minister of Finance in the production of this budget and in our criticism we shall endeavour to be fair and courteous. I once heard a remarkable compliment paid the Minister of Finance by an old admirer of his, a gentleman who has been a life-long supporter of his party and who is an intense admirer of the minister personally. In discussing old times, this gentleman, who is well past the allotted span of life, said: "I consider that the present Minister of Finance is one of the most capable men in Canada."

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. STANSELL: Hon. members opposite say "hear, hear", but let me tell the House the rest of it, please. He said: "Actually in 1896 his party was elected on a free-trade platform, and he was able after that to maintain and even increase the duties in some respects and get away with it." For that reason he considered him a great man of great ability. The same speaker said to me: "On platform after platform at that time I preached the free-trade doctrine and, though I never believed a word of it myself, it was a great thing as a vote catcher." Now in my opinion, the minister to-day has a more difficult task than he had in 1896 to clear himself entirely in this regard.

I must, in passing, refer to a speech made this afternoon, and as it is in common with a number of similar expressions made in this House, I think it is worthy of reference. The hon. member for Digby and Annapolis (Mr. Lovett) referred to a great waste of time from which this House had suffered. He deplored the fact that practical business methods were not adopted in the performance of our duties here as representatives of the people. What kind of a practical demonstration did he give us? He proceeded to give us a practical demonstration of sound business principles by delivering a treatise on the Annapolis valley and skunks. I do not know just how these two are related, but as I am not as high an authority as the hon. member on these two important national subjects, I shall have to waste the time of the House in my own way by endeavouring to direct a few remarks to the budget.

It was said by a former speaker that we in this corner have offered a considerable amount of gratuitous advice to hon. members to our left. I presume I shall have to live up to his description of our course, and therefore I should like to direct just a few words in that direction. As a new member of this House, I have been intensely interested in the problems that have been brought forward by hon. members from the Western provinces. I believe they will give me credit for sincerity when I say that I sympathise to a great extent with some of the difficulties that they have, and to a great extent also I am willing to contribute my share to the solution of those difficulties. The extent, however, to which we contribute to that worthy cause might be influenced a little by the attitude of a few members who, no matter what the occasion or what subject is under discussion, feel it is necessary to direct a few shafts at what they call their "friends on the right." This, I believe, was expressed by one hon. member in the following words: "Should we at any time get into trouble, or want any help, we will never go to our friends on the right."

I noticed also a few remarks by the hon. member for Last Mountain (Mr. Johnston). Apparently, he was not entirely pleased with the budget in its present form; but he did not think that it was sufficiently clear to his "friends on his right" where his former allegiance had been, and he found it necessary to show by the tenor of his remarks that there was a slight hankering after the flesh pots of Egypt. I think he stated by way of comparison, that the Liberal platform was like a beautiful menu card. He might have said that he had tasted the fare and were it not for the price, he would still be willing to shove his feet under that table. He said that it was a beautiful menu card, and that when you had tasted, you felt like going back to the same place. He did not say, however, that though the menu card was beautiful, very little was put on the table through the budget to correspond with it. I am quite in accord with the hon. member when he criticises increased sales tax and also when he lauds the income tax.

With regard to the income tax, if there are reasons for congratulation as to its advantages, I would point out that it was originated and put in practice by his much-criticised "friends on the right". Apparently he might have exclaimed: Oh, Liberals, with all thy faults I love thee still.

We in this corner of the House have been told that our criticism is not constructive, and that we should offer an amendment of real constructive value. Well, we are not in authority, but I venture to say on behalf of my esteemed leader and of my associates that if the Government will say they are in need of, and will accept our advice we will tender it with the very best intentions. While possibly we may not feel free to offer advice on every occasion, I would remind my hon. friends opposite that we in this corner have, even this afternoon and on other occasions offered constructive criticism of the Government's proposals. Especially was that true in connection with the militia and naval estimates. But what was the result? One of the most influential members of the House, my hon. friend from St. James (Mr. Rinfret) in referring to our criticism and the plans we suggested in relation to those estimates said, "May I be permitted to add that the criticism and suggestions of the official Opposition only strengthens my purpose in asking for a reduction in the vote." Surely, Sir, in the face of such discouragement we have the interests of this country too much at heart to prejudice them by offering suggestions to such unsympathetic ears.

In the last election if there was one thing more than another the Liberal party claimed was nearest to their heart it was the welfare of the great masses, the common people. In looking up the debate on the budget last year I find that in a speech occupying about two hours and a half the present Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) stated in effect that while the Conservative party might be thinking of the big interests and the specially privileged classes who were benefited by a protective tariff, he and his party were thinking of the welfare of the common people. I have not his speech at hand, but it may be found in Hansard of last year, commencing at page 3607.

Well, let us see how this budget bears out his professions. The effect of a protective tariff upon the public was never better described than in the words of one who at least was noted for his sympathy with the common people and his ability as a statesman; I refer to Abraham Lincoln. He said: When we purchase goods in a foreign country we get the goods and the foreigner gets the money; when we purchase goods made at home we get both the goods and the money. No one has yet put the matter in a more practical form; no one yet has ever offered any conclusive argument against the truth of his view. But, Sir, it is claimed that under a protective tariff abuses will grow up. This may be so, but we also know that abuses creep into many of the good things of this life. I am perfectly frank in saying that I believe in a protective policy, and I also believe that that policy is best adapted to the needs of this country to-day, although sufficient care should be exercised in tariff revision from time to time to see that it is closely adjusted to the needs of the day, for in five or ten years' time conditions may alter and therefore necessitate a revision.

Some hon. members in the course of this debate have complained that where our revenue is raised by a tariff the full benefit does not accrue to the treasury, a considerable portion of the duties going into the pockets of the manufacturers or protectionists as they are termed. I am quite willing to grant that, but I think hon. members will also agree with me that it is in the best interest of this country to as far as possible purchase commodities that are produced at home. I am sure those who are familiar with farming will not dispute me when I say—and this applies especially to mixed farming with which I am familiar—that the successful farmer does not purchase what he is able to produce on his own farm; but as far as may be practical produces his own requirements. The contrary policy leads to one result—bankruptcy. Of course, we cannot produce everything we require, but the country as a whole might be compared to a great big farm, and surely what is good for the unit is good for the whole. We should have a policy that encourages as far as possible the production of goods at home, and in so far as that is practical and compatible with good judgment we should support such a policy.

In this connection it is obvious that we should encourage the maximum production of goods at home to meet the wants of our people, and this can only be accomplished in a practical way by a customs tariff. I am not a particular friend of any manufacturing industry, but surely it is a good policy to do something in a national way to encourage the investment of capital for the development of our own country, because then we have the opportunity to tax that capital to meet our national expenses; but it is absolutely impossible to obtain revenue in this way from foreign corporations who export their goods to this country. In this way the operation of the tariff accomplishes both purposes: it encourages the investment of capital in domestic enterprises, and it also increases our national revenue.

But the budget is wrong in this respect that while it reduces the tariff, thereby of course making a bid for the support of the working men and the farmers, at the same time it increases the sales tax by 50 per cent, which tax applies to practically everything the people require. The great masses of the consumers are the working men and the farmers—the common people, and they are compelled to contribute more than their share to the revenue of the country, although they are less able to do that than those classes who by reason of their smaller consumption of the necessaries of life are able to escape with a lighter share of the burden. Therefore this Government which professed to have so much at heart the interests of the masses have failed to live up to their professions, for undoubtedly working people with large families and small incomes are compelled by this increased sales tax to pay more for the necessaries of life, and in that respect in my judgment the budget is a serious mistake. Those who studied carefully the Liberal platform—the farmer, the labouring man, or any other class of the electorate who hoped for relief from taxation from that source—will derive little comfort from a budget of this character. In replying to a question this afternoon the Minister of Finance said he expected that notwithstanding the reduction of the tariff he would get an increased revenue. Now, we know that if there is an increased revenue it can only come by increased purchases in a foreign country. If we are to deal with the problems which face the farmer and the workingman by building up the big interests in foreign countries, increasing our purchases there and thus adding to the unemployment in our own country; if we are to do that and then offset the reductions in the tariff by the operation of a sales tax to secure the money from the pockets of our own people, I say it is a serious mistake and one not in keeping with the promises and platform of the Liberal party before they attained power.

Mr. BIRD: How does the hon. member suggest that the farmer, especially the western farmer, could sell his products abroad without buying abroad?

Mr. STANSELL: How do you sell your wheat, may I ask? I have understood from the discussion arising out of the application for a wheat board that the market for wheat was largely in Great Britain. We have never had any trouble in getting a market for our wheat there. It is true we are shut out of the American market, but that is due to the action of our neighbours to the south and not to tariff barriers on our part. Now, I did anticipate the asking of this question: How do we get the revenue from the protected interests, if we must call them such?

Mr. BIRD: Would the hon. gentleman permit me another question? He says that our market for wheat is in Great Britain. Now, if he could prevent Britain from exporting manufactured articles, would our market in Britain for our wheat continue?

Mr. STANSELL: I would answer that question if I had ever suggested anything of the kind, but I have not, and so far as I know, the suggestion has not been made by anybody in this part of the House.

Mr. BIRD: Did the hon. member not suggest a few moments ago that it would be to the advantage of this country to buy our goods in Canada and not abroad?

Mr. STANSELL: So far as practicable, yes. Does the hon. member not believe that that is a good policy? I was saying that the question I thought that might be asked was this: How will we obtain the necessary money, if we do not obtain it through the increased sales tax? By the very plan I spoke of a while ago,—a plan that was first put into operation by this party when in power, and one that I believe to be the best system yet devised; a system that I hope will be continued by whatever party is in power—that of income taxation. By that method alone can we compel the man who gets more than his share of this world's goods to contribute a proper share to the revenues of the country. My policy, Mr. Speaker, would be one that would encourage the investment of capital in this country and the taxation of wealth where it is found rather than one that would encourage the building up of industries in a foreign country where we have no power to impose taxation. Under the latter condition we must obtain our revenue largely from the pockets of the poor man, of the labouring man and the farmer. In this respect the present budget fails. I offer that criticism, and I believe it can safely be called constructive criticism.

The question may be asked, why has the sales tax been increased? I think I can safely say that in a time like this, when revenue is so necessary, there is sure to be some objection to almost any form of taxation. But there is one large section of our people who have no means of audibly speaking for themselves, no method by which they can present their case in this House. I refer to the great mass of the consumers. This sales tax, no matter on what it is applied, is handed on from one to another until it reaches that class of the people, and for the reason that they are less able to offer objection, it is the special form of taxation which is easy to enforce, and easy to collect. But it is pernicious in its form and effect and utterly fails to provide a solution of the pressing problem presented by our numbers of unemployed and because it does not fulfil the pre-election pledges of its party I propose to vote for the amendment.

Mr. JOHN MILLAR (Qu'Appelle): Mr. Speaker, before addressing myself to the budget, I would like to offer a word of congratulation to the Finance Minister (Mr. Fielding). I feel a pride in realizing that we have a finance minister who is able at the age of seventy-three to perform such a difficult task with such signal success.

In discussing the budget, I think it is recognized by every one in this House and out of it, that vast sums of money are necessary in the administration of the country's affairs. We ran into heavy debt during the war. I have one criticism to offer of my hon. friends to my right, and it is that during the war years more of the cost of the war should have been raised. I have seen the statement—and I believe it is correct—that only six per cent of the cost of the war was raised by Canada during the war years, while Great Britain and the United States raised upwards of thirty per cent—in fact, I am not sure it was not over forty per cent. Those were years when money was fairly plentiful in Canada. Those were years in which the farmer was receiving good prices for his products, in which contracts were being let for war supplies. As I say, money was plentiful, and I believe money could have been raised more easily then than it can now. I see no reason why thirty or forty per cent of the cost of the war could not have been raised by Canada during those years. I do not think many of our people were benefited by the easy money they received. We fell into expensive personal habits; these habits still cling to our people, and that is one obstacle that stands in the way of our getting back to normal conditions. Once we acquire these expensive habits, both business and personal, we come to believe we cannot get along without them. If the late government had levied quite a stiff tax at that time and had taken in a considerable quantity of the ready money then available, they would have stabilized income and conferred benefit all round, and we would not now have the enormous national debt under which we are labouring.

I think we all realize that the time should soon come when our receipts should equal our outgo, when we should be paying our own way and bringing a stop to the increase of our national debt. I have, therefore, no objection to make to the vast amount which is proposed to be raised by the Finance Minister. A budget should be so framed as to encourage basic industries. It may be otherwise in industrial Great Britain, but in Canada I am sure that the money that is lavished on the cities will not have the effect of making the agricultural interests or classes prosperous. But the reverse is true. If you make the agricultural interest, the mining and lumbering and fishing interests prosperous, you bring prosperity to the urban centres as well; it cannot be otherwise. During the years that have passed I think all will realize that the agricultural industry has been bled white. That is the condition now, whether we realize it or not. How has that been accomplished? Let me go back for a moment. I can remember the time many years ago when some industries believed that cut-throat competition was not in their interest, and wanting to get rid of it, they got together and held meetings and made agreements, which sometimes held and sometimes not, but there was the first attempt to form a monopoly. As the years went by, they succeeded better, and now the time has come when from the barber to the banker we have monopolies, small and large, in every industry. If you go to the barber he has his price list, and he must not charge less, though he may charge more. It is the same in other industries, even in the noble profession of medicine, and if I were picking out one profession as a noble one I would pick out the doctors, yet even they have their price list, below which they must not go, although they may charge more.

Mr. ANDERSON: Is that done in the West?

Mr. MILLAR: It is certainly done in the West.

Mr. ANDERSON: It is not done in Ontario. I belong to that profession.

Mr. MILLAR: As it is now, when we purchase goods we purchase from small monopolies. The agricultural interest has progressed in the same direction for the reason that a large part of our product must be sold on the world's market. We must compete against Russia, the Argentine, India and other wheat-growing countries of the world, and no act of this Parliament can raise the price of wheat more than perhaps a fraction of a cent. That being the case, when overhead charges are piled up on the agriculturists they must either go out of growing grain for export—in fact, they are forced to go out of grain growing so far as export is concerned. I believe that during the past ten or fifteen years if Russia had been as proficient as we are in our methods of agriculture, and had had the same efficient transportation system as we have in this country, Canada could not have exported one bushel of wheat; we could not have competed with her. It is only because of their crude methods that we are able to export wheat. However, that is another matter.

I have spoken of small monopolies, and while it seems to me that Parliament should have done something to check the small monopolies, it has really done something to encourage them. But our greatest monopoly is caused by the customs tariff. Before coming to that, let me say that I make no objection whatever to the various industries of the country forming their unions. I believe it is well that Labour should have its unions. They have done much to advance the welfare of the labouring classes and to win for them greater consideration, but when they arbitrarily fix the remuneration they shall receive from the rest of society for the contribution they are making to society, I believe it is wrong. I believe it is wrong for other industries to have that privilege. I have been struck by this during the discussions on the Wheat Board. Some strong advocates of protection have been greatly alarmed lest the establishment of the Wheat Board should lead to co-operation between the various nations so that they would be able arbitrarily to fix the price of wheat. That is, they are very much alarmed lest the policy they themselves advocate should be carried to its logical conclusion. We know what would happen if that should ever come to pass. Those who were able to control foodstuffs would starve the rest of the world, and in a small way that is what is being done by small monopolies at the present time.

I had hoped that this new Government when formed would be able to match its ingenuity against the ingenuity of man. During past years various corporations and individuals have found a way of circumventing legislation and of extracting large profits from the consumer. They have found a way of getting around the law, and our Parliament has not kept pace. I had hoped that when the new budget came down we should have had some evidence that the present Government had the initiative and the ability to cope with those who have been thus evading the law and extracting profits from the consumer to which they have no right, and I am sure that undue profits are being taken. A financial expert speaking to the Manufacturers' Association in Toronto a short time ago said, in effect: Quit breaking the Ten Commandments, and then you will have prosperity. I believe that when the various interests in Canada give a little more consideration to other interests, show a little more sympathy, and are willing to help not merely their own constituencies first but all parts of Canada that need help, we shall be taking a step towards prosperity. We have been following too much in the past the rule of give and take—give as little as possible, and take all you can get.

I had hoped that the reduction in the customs tariff—it is not the whole remedy for the depression that is burdening Canada at the present time, but still it is one of the remedies—would have been much greater than it is. A reduction of 2½ per cent is not sufficient to place agriculture on its feet. On an article where the duty is 30 or 35 per cent, a small cut of 2½ per cent means very little. It is some relief certainly; it is a step in the right direction, and if it had been twice as large and was to be followed up next session by another similar cut, I would have had no complaint to make, because I think it was understood all through the country—I know it was in the constituency I represent—that it would not be wise to make drastic changes all at once, and that industry should be allowed to adjust itself to the changed condition.

Just one word more about the conditions in agriculture. I look upon the law of the survival of the fittest as quite sound. Under normal conditions, if an occasional man engaged in farming or any other business is a misfit, not the most capable, and is compelled to make an assignment and drop out and find some other occupation, it keeps that industry in a fairly healthy condition. I have no complaint with that, but it is quite a different matter when a whole class is being crushed, and I assure you that that is the condition at the present time with agriculture in most, I will not say all, parts of Canada. In some parts of Canada where mixed farming and fruit growing are carried on the markets are fairly satisfactory. Some parts of Canada may be said to be fairly prosperous but throughout the greater part of the Dominion agriculture is languishing. In the case of small monopolies the remedy, I believe, is largely in the hands of the people themselves; and so long, and so far, as the people can themselves, by co-operation, remedy the grievances under which they are suffering, they have no right to come to any government and ask for assistance, and as far as possible governments should not interfere. But there are times when it is necessary for governments to do so. In the case of such national monopolies as the Imperial Oil Company, for instance, what can the people of Canada do if they are not given some support and assistance by their legislators either in the Dominion or provincial House? Many people have asked during the last few years why it is that gasoline, to give a concrete example, should be retailing in Canada for 50 cents a gallon, when the retail charge on the other side of the line is only 25 cents a gallon. True the American gallon is not quite as large as the Canadian gallon, but the difference is very trifling. We have a country very rich in oil, immensely rich, to be accurate; and yet during the month of March last, and I suppose the same condition exists to-day, we were paying at the retail stations twice the price for gasoline that they were paying on the American side of the boundary. In the case of such monopolies as these, the aim of a budget should be, as far as possible, to so direct industry as to prevent such abuses.

I am now going to read extracts from the utterances of three of our public men on the tariff. Two of these statesmen have passed from this life; the other, I am very pleased to say, is still with us. The late Sir Richard Cartwright said in speaking of the tariff:

> The moment you introduce the protective system you create a class whose interests are essentially different from those of the people at large and who become ready contributors to corruption funds sharing with their masters the plunder which they have been able to take from the people.

In 1893 the late Sir Wilfrid Laurier said:

> One of the evils of the National Policy has been here as everywhere else, to lower the morale of public life.

And again he said:

> If you want to purify the political atmosphere not a cent must be levied except what is necessary to carry on the legitimate expenses of the government economically administered.

Now I think perhaps hon. members to the right will listen to the next extract quite attentively. Speaking before parliament on January 18, 1922, the right hon. gentleman who now leads the Opposition (Mr. Meighen) said:

> It is that restraining, guiding principle, I claim, that this Government has entirely overlooked, and as a consequence they have allowed, in the respect which I am discussing this afternoon, protection to run rampant, and they have, for reasons that are only too obvious, become the slaves of those who helped them into power and who now maintain themselves behind ramparts of gold.

Mr. KING (Huron): Do I understand the hon. member to say that the right hon. leader of the Opposition (Mr. Meighen) made that statement in January, 1922?

Mr. MILLAR: That is my understanding.

Some Hon. MEMBERS: The date is wrong.

Mr. MILLAR: I am told I have given the wrong date. I suppose no one will raise any particular objection to that, but I would like to have the correct date inserted in Hansard. I would therefore like to ask my hon. friends to the right to state the correct date.

Mr. McKENZIE: I think my hon. friend will find that speech was delivered in 1912.

Mr. MILLAR: 1912? I accept the hon. member's statement.

Mr. McKENZIE: Somewhere about that date.

Mr. STEVENS: In the absence of the right hon. gentleman whose remarks are being quoted with such uncertainty, I think it should be stated, before the record goes on Hansard from what my hon. friend is reading—what speech he is referring to, where it was delivered and the subject to which it had reference; whether to protection of the tariff or protection in some other form?

Mr. MILLAR: Unfortunately, I cannot state all the circumstances under which the speech, from which this extract was taken, was delivered.

Another objection to the customs tariff—the National Policy as we have known it—is that it leads to mergers. Here is an instance; it is an example, I suppose, that has been cited many times but there are some things that will bear repetition, "lest we forget". The Canada Cement Company, organized in 1909, swallowed up eleven concerns having a total capitalization of $17,750,000. It was itself organized with a capitalization of $38,000,000. In July, 1909, the city of Winnipeg purchased 25 thousand barrels of cement at $1.77. Five months later, after the merger had taken place, the best offer they could get from three tenders from different agents of the Canada Cement Company was $2.24, an increase of 47 cents per barrel. In 1917 the total domestic production of cement in Canada was $7,007,000 and the importation was $26,000. This means that, at the retail rate of $2.50 per cwt. as a unit there were 3,000,000 units locally produced and about 10,000 units imported, so that the sum of $300,000 was paid as a bonus to the Canada Cement Company. Not only this but only a thousand dollars went into the public treasury as duty on $26,000 worth of cement. An examination of the facts in regard to other articles would lead to a similar conclusion.

Now let me say a word in regard to the tariff of 1906-1907. Within a week after they were afforded protection, the three companies who manufactured print cloth in Canada advanced their prices, and while the Customs Act was still awaiting the Royal Assent a statement appeared in the Globe of Toronto which showed the conditions prevailing at the time when the increase was made. The article in question stated:

> With regard to the ability of the mills to keep up to the demand, wholesalers declare that in the case of Canadian prints and domestic cottons, the situation is growing worse instead of improving, and that with prices steadily advancing it is becoming harder than ever to get deliveries.

In 1905 when the duties on white lead were increased from 5 to 30 and 35 per cent, the manufacturers were so eager to take toll from the Canadian people that telegrams were sent to their commercial travellers to add these percentages immediately to their price lists.

Now I would like to say a word in regard to the sales tax. I was very sorry indeed to see the sales tax increased because it certainly hits the poor man. Taxes that are imposed should be in proportion to people's ability to pay. In the eleven months up to end of April, 1921, during which it was in operation, the sales tax brought in $40,898,-383. As a producer of revenue it failed most when money was most needed. In October 1920, when business was good and retail prices were still high, the collections were $5,020,476, but in April they fell to $2,873,219, and were still falling when the tax was increased. In the six months that the luxury taxes were in operation they brought in $2,000,000 more than the sales tax realized in the whole eleven months. I do not know just why the luxury tax was taken off. There may have been good reasons, but I think it would have been much better policy to tax luxuries than to tax those things that are necessary for the poor people, which all poor people must have, if they are going to live. The sales tax is not equitable, for no other reason than that the poor man, who must spend practically all he earns, pays the tax out of what should go for necessaries, whereas the rich man pays it out of surplus. The rich man who spends several months out of Canada escapes this tax, whereas the poor man, who cannot have any holiday, must pay it all the time.

In regard to the free food plank, the official statement of the Customs Department for 1917 shows 205 separate classifications of dutiable goods, and that 20 classes paid four-fifths of the customs, or $89,000.

000 out of $109,000,000. These twenty classes contain four food items, the revenue from which was $16,000,000. If food were placed on the free list, the $16,000,000 could easily be produced by lowering the tariff on other articles, because lowering the tariff will greatly increase the buying power of the public. Our domestic consumption in 1917 in boots and shoes was $49,000,000, while the importation was $2,709,000, or about one-eighteenth of the consumption, and the revenue produced was less than $1,000,000. Enormous toll was paid to the manufacturers for having those institutions located in Canada. If the total amount of the customs duty on the homemade article went into the manufacturers' pockets, the sum would be $17,000,000. Take one million dollars off that, and the amount would still be about equal to the amount I referred to above, that would be lost on the free food articles.

During the campaign that is past, as in every campaign in which a discussion of the national policy takes place, we heard considerable about the high wages that would be obtained by the working classes. I will give some figures in regard to those wages. The situation in respect to agricultural implements shows that, in one year alone, the protection of this industry cost the people of Canada $7,000,000. The average earnings of the men employed in the agricultural implement industry, including executive heads, according to a survey of ninety establishments in 1917, was only $838. The figures were lower in those days than now, but hon. members can readily see that the men were not receiving high pay when they consider the fact that the heads of the departments are included in the list. If the home market provided for our product is gauged by the ability to buy, those statistics add little to our confidence in it. The 1920 income tax returns show where the profits of industry have been going. The following is the average income tax paid into the treasury in that year by the following classes of persons:

Agrarians	$ 36 74
Professionals	136 45

Mr. RYCKMAN: On what basis is this?

Mr. MILLAR: It is the average of those agrarians who paid income tax.

Mr. ARTHURS: How many paid?

Mr. MILLAR: I have not those figures here, but it really makes little difference, because of all those who paid income tax, that is the average amount that each man paid. This is not the average number that pay.

Mr. STEVENS: Can the hon. member give the figures upon which he bases that statement? Tell us how many paid, and how he arrives at the figures?

Mr. MILLAR: They were arrived at from figures in a statement given out by the income tax office, showing the number of agrarians, the number of professionals, and the number of salaried employees who had paid the income tax, and the total amount they had paid.

Mr. STEVENS: Could the hon. member give us the number, so that we could compare it?

Mr. MILLAR: I could not at this moment. I believe hon. members will find these figures are correct.

The next classification is:

Salaried employees	$ 101 25
Merchants	34 08
Manufacturers	2,517 70
Others	627 00

Manufacturers, I suppose, would include companies and would not necessarily be individuals. Another comment I have to make on the national policy is that it confuses two functions of government that should be entirely separate and distinct. Without making any personal application either to the present Finance Minister or any past Finance Minister, I wish to say that when we find a man in Canada who is so highly trained along the lines of finance and most capable to handle the financial affairs of our country, we will seldom find that that same man is most highly trained along the line necessary to develop and foster industry, and yet we have combined the two. The same individual is expected to perform the two functions. Then, again, at present it is impossible for the people of Canada to know how much it costs them to foster those industries. Is that sound business? Would you find any business man following such a policy in his own business? He wants to know what part of his business is paying, and what part is not paying? In this case we cannot tell. We can only make a guess. The question arises, if this protection is swept away, what are the manufacturers to do? I believe there are a few that should be swept away, but not very many. We want the manufacturers, as far as we can have them, but the people of Canada should know what it is costing them to have those manufacturers. If it cost the country $10,000,000 to have a certain article manufactured in Canada and it is worth only $3,000,000 to Canada—if Canada is reaping only $3,000,000 because it is here—it is about time that such a manufacture should cease.

The hon. member who preceded me (Mr. Stansell) said that he thought it was a good thing for a farmer to grow all he could and not to have to buy. When a farmer can buy from his neighbour for $5 an article that it costs him $10 to produce, it is a far wiser thing for him to buy. His neighbour, on the other hand, may want to buy from him an article that the first farmer referred to can produce much more cheaply than the other. I think we will agree that what has made the United States prosperous has been the free interchange of commodities or free trade amongst the different states.

Mr. STANSELL: I am well aware that, owing to the nature of some soils, one farmer can produce what another cannot. I said that, so far as was practicable, it was good policy for a farmer to produce as much as he could on his own farm.

Mr. MILLAR: Following that argument, let me state that other nations, because of their different climates and conditions, can produce some articles very much more cheaply than we can. A few days ago I noticed in the paper where a cutlery firm in the city of Kingston stated that Germany could place in Canada for 69 cents a dozen knives that it cost this firm $4 to produce. I would like very much to know just what it is costing Canada to keep that industry going. I am inclined to think where there is such a difference as that, if the people of Canada knew what it was costing them to keep that industry going, they would cease paying, and that industry would have to go out of business. I agree with my hon. friend to my right that, so far as possible, we should give some consideration to the different conditions, and to cheaper labour in the Old Country market. But I would far rather see Canada resort to the principle, objectionable as it may be, of paying bonuses, so that the people of Canada might know exactly what they were paying, than have the present system of protection.

The last speaker claimed credit, and I think rightly so, for the late government for the introduction of the income tax. Let me add that I believe that income tax was introduced by the late government under considerable pressure from the organized farmers. I believe it is correct that the then Minister of Finance, Sir Thomas White, rather objected when the suggestion was first made; but at a later date he acceded to the request. I may be wrong in this, but I believe not.

Mr. STANSELL: By whom was the request presented?

Mr. MILLAR: I believe, if my memory serves me aright, the request came from the Council of Agriculture. One suggestion I would like to make to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) is this. I do not know what control this Government has over the loan companies, nor to what extent they fall within the jurisdiction of this Parliament; but there is a place where there is a large amount of money that should pay a considerable tax to the provincial government or the Dominion Government. It would be hard to estimate the amount of money loaned on farm lands even in the three Prairie provinces of which I know much more than I do of the other provinces, but I would estimate it, at least, at half a billion dollars loaned at 8 or 9 per cent. I do not know to what extent the income tax touches those people that are advancing money on loans. Those who are lending the money may be small monied men in some cases, and in such cases the income tax would not be very severe on them; but it might be possible to reap some profit from that source. During the last few years they have had a regular harvest in the West. The crops failed; loans were maturing which could not be met, and I know of some cases where they were renewed at 9 per cent.

I am not going to detain the House longer than to make this suggestion. The present Government has been criticised somewhat for listening too much to suggestions; but that is one thing that has made me somewhat hopeful of the future. When a government is ready to listen to suggestions that are good, no matter where they come from, then we are getting nearer to democratic government than we have been in the past, and I hope that in the future we shall be able to get closer together. The Golden Rule is very good in business, just as it is in religion. If we practice more of that; if we have greater sympathies, one part of Canada for the other, and if we put forth a united effort to solve the difficult problems that confront this country, I am sure that we shall make some headway. The task is very great, but it is not hopeless.

Mr. W. F. GARLAND (Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to take up the time of the House to any great extent; but I must first offer my congratulations to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) upon being able to bring down his sixteenth budget. I have nothing further upon which I can congratulate him than on being in that position.

Before dealing with the budget, I wish to make a few remarks in regard to what has been said by the hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Millar). I know he does not want in any way whatever to create any false impression in this House. He first said that six per cent of the war expenditure was paid out of the revenue of this country. The late government, in the last year of its existence, paid $553,000,000 of the war expenditure, or a little over 20 per cent, or roughly, about 22 per cent. There is quite a difference between that and six per cent. The hon. member also referred to the Canada Cement Company. This was a merger which was effected under the regime of the Liberal government in 1909, and the duty was reduced by the Conservative government in 1912. He also said that the income tax was adopted at the suggestion, or on the advice, of the United Farmers or the Council of Agriculture, which did not happen to be in existence at that time, but for argument's sake, we will say that it was. The party, however, to which he refers, if they were able to gain anything at that time from the Conservative government, have not so far been able to gain very much from the present administration.

The hon. member for Swift Current (Mr. Lewis) this afternoon dwelt at some length on the 2½ per cent reduction in the tariff on agricultural implements. He compared the cost of an agricultural implement costing $100, plus duty under the old budget of 12½ per cent and sales tax of $4.50, making a total cost of $117, with the cost of that same implement under the present budget, which reduces the duty to 10 per cent and increases the sales tax to $6.60, making a total cost of $116.60, or a saving of 40 cents. But we might reduce that saving by the four cents which the purchaser will have to pay on his cheque, leaving him a net advantage of 36 cents.

The increase in the British preference is to my mind a step in the right direction as it will encourage trade with the Old Country. In this connection I noticed that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) was not very successful in his trip to Washington to secure closer trade relations with the United States. Since that occasion the Fordney bill has been before Congress, and as hon. members are aware it practically prohibits the sale of our products to the United States. For instance, American wheat can come in here free of duty, while we have to pay 35 cents a bushel on our wheat entering the United States. On American eggs we impose a duty of three cents a dozen, as against a duty of eight cents a dozen on our eggs entering the States. Various other commodities might be instanced on which there is a similar disparity in the respective duties. If any sane person would continue to do business with any one who treated him in that way I should be inclined to question his sanity.

We have been advised through the press of the various measures of economy which this Government from time to time was supposed to be introducing. But I believe that the economy effected will not in the long run save the country any money, on the contrary it will prove to be false economy. For instance, according to the estimates we find there is an increase of $51,256.18 for civil government. At the same time we know that there have been about five hundred dismissals from various branches of the civil service. That is an instance of the kind of economy the Government is practising.

And along with these dismissals comes a reduction in the bonus to civil servants. To my mind the bonus should have been left as it was or if altered at all it should have been in an upward direction. Civil servants without dependents are practically stripped of the bonus. It seems to me appropriate to remind the Government that a little while ago the sessional indemnity was increased from $2,500 to $4,000, and I suppose that it will be the policy of the Government to see that all private members and Cabinet ministers without dependents shall revert to the old indemnity. I think that is only fair if the Government are to be consistent in the policy they have adopted towards the civil service.

I am sorry that neither of the members for the city of Ottawa is in his seat tonight. I do not want to take an unfair advantage of them, but I fully expected that they would have expressed their views on the bonus long before this. The Citizen of November 8th, 1921, reports the senior member for Ottawa (Mr. McGiverin) as follows.

With respect to the Civil Service, whose battles he had always fought, Mr. McGiverin stated he stood for salary revision; for the bonus being replaced by a permanent increase; for the establishment of superannuation and for the establishment of Whitley, or more properly, King councils, because it was Mr. King who had introduced the system in America.

He referred in a complimentary way to his colleague, Mr. Chevrier, and concluded amid cheers, by saying that the Liberals were coming in, that they have an honest policy and an honest leader and would bring contentment and prosperity to the country.

The junior member (Mr. Chevrier) is quoted in the Citizen of November 29th as follows:

Mr. Chevrier, who did not speak long on account of the lateness of the hour, retorted to Mr. Fripp's claim that there had been no scandals during the regime of the government, by unearthing a number of land deals which took place before the war, he said.

He confirmed Mr. McGiverin in his Civil Service attitude and said that he himself had been in the service before he entered the legal profession.

He promised a superannuation system which would be instituted in collaboration with the service itself and revised salary schedules rather than the present cost of living bonus.

He promised power to the employees to name their own representatives on Civil Service Councils to be established for dealing with matters pertaining to the service.

He complained they were not privileged to have newspapers spread out at great length reports of their meetings. He claimed that contrary to Mr. Fripp, who had said he was not looking for votes from the Civil Service, or Mr. Meighen, who said he was not looking for Civil Service cheers, that they did want Civil Service votes as a mark of confidence in the party for which they stood.

He said their hearts were in the right place anyway when people charged them with suffering from enlargement of the heart as regards the Civil Service.

It seems to me that the hon. gentlemen must have taken some other disease besides enlargement of the heart since they were elected to office.

With regard to the Liberal policy, I find that the Journal of December 3, 1921, has the following report in regard to the Ottawa Reform Association:

Here is the Liberal Civil Service policy to which Mr. King and his candidates are publicly pledged:

"As to the Civil Service, Mr. McGiverin stated that on three main questions now before the service his stand and that of his party were:

1. Salary Revision: Present bonus system to be replaced by a permanent salary increase based on a just estimate of the cost of living since 1909.

2. Superannuation: A superannuation system to be prepared in collaboration with representatives of the Civil Service.

3. Civil Service Councils: The establishment of Councils to deal with matters pertaining to the service and the observance of the merit system in appointments and promotions, with power to the employees of naming their own representatives in such Councils.

Mr. McGiverin pointed out that in the past when member for Ottawa, he had done much for the service. He obtained the $150 flat increase and also shorter hours in summer.

Any promise made by other candidates have little significance because they cannot supplement them with the support of their leaders, even which they cannot get in the very unlikely event of these leaders being anywhere but in the cold shades of opposition, Civil servants will do well to vote the straight Liberal ticket, and thus ensure for themselves full and effective representation under the Liberal Government, which it is now generally conceded will be formed after Dec. 6.

This is a sample of the promises that were made by the Liberal party to make sure of the election of their candidates, especially in this city, and before this debate is closed I should like the Government to declare how they intend to carry out this pledge. I trust they do not intend to redeem it in the same way as they have redeemed their other pledges. The only way in which they have fulfilled those pledges so far has been by advocating them when in opposition and failing to implement them when in office.

With regard to the budget itself, I do not see anything in it that can in any way be considered an improvement upon the legislation put into effect by the late government. The sales tax has been increased fifty per cent, and it is bound in every way to make the cost of living higher. Therefore, taking this stand, I have much pleasure in voting for the amendment.

Mr. J. W. KING (North Huron): Mr. Speaker, in rising to add my quota to this debate on the budget, I would like in the first place to pass some more bouquets to the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding). I have been pleased in the past to read a great many of his budget addresses, and, Sir, I am certain of one thing: that he is possessed of the art of making figures pleasant. The hon. minister has delivered more budget speeches than any other man in the British dominions—two more, even, than the Right Hon. William Ewart Gladstone.

Before I start to talk about the budget I would like to say to the hon. gentlemen on my right, as well as those on the other side, that I object to their referring to hon. members in this part of the House as westerners. We are not westerners; there were more Progressive members elected in the old banner province of Ontario than in any other province. If the province of New Brunswick had elected twenty-three more, they would have elected as many as Ontario did.

Now, in referring to the budget, I shall not discuss it item by item. I am a new parliamentarian, but I understand that the items will be taken up later. In a broad sense, Sir, I want to say that in my view the fiscal policy of Canada up to the present time has been a wrong policy. Canada's present population is 8,746,872 souls. Canada's land area, exclusive of the Northwest Territories, and the Yukon, and exclusive also of swamp lands which at the present time are nonproductive, but which may at some future time become productive, comprises 1,401,100,000 acres. Of these, 31 per cent, or 440,000,000 acres are fit for cultivation; only 101,000,000 acres are occupied and only 60,000,000 acres, or less than 16 per cent, are under cultivation. Now, Canada is over 200 years of age, and why is this the case? It is because, Sir, her fiscal policy has been such that her people have been congregating in the cities. The result of the fiscal policy which has been carried out in Canada, since Confederation at all events, has been a tendency on the part of the people to drift into the cities. We hope that the present Government, if they are in power, will continue in the direction they have faced. They have made a very short step in the right direction, and we hope they will continue in it, so that ultimately they may adopt a different fiscal policy.

I may say to my friends on my right that I have no objection to fostering infant industries to a certain extent, though I do object to supporting them too long. I heard Sir John A. Macdonald in the early eighties—and I heard him personally in my own county; I am not giving any hearsay evidence—declare before an audience made up largely of farmers: "You farmers have hewn out homes for yourselves in the bush in the county of Huron; you are in comparatively easy circumstances, and I wish to lay a burden on your backs for the purpose of helping infant industries, for the purpose of starting high smokestacks all over the Dominion of Canada." But he said also that he would not allow that burden to remain upon the people longer than a period of fifteen or twenty years. Now, Sir John A. Macdonald died in 1891, and I believe if he had lived the party to my right would be heading in a different direction fiscally. I do not believe that he intended for one moment to continue that tariff policy indefinitely. Moreover, he said on that same occasion that at such time as the home manufacturer got such a grip on his infant industry that he began to export, at that moment the tariff would be cut.

Now, without going into minutiæ, I want to say that if there is any chance of our having reciprocity with the United States we should try to get it. There is no doubt that all wealth in this country has to emanate from four sources—from agriculture, from the mine, from the forest and from the sea. If you make the agriculturists in this country prosperous, you will make everybody prosperous. The Massey-Harris Company a year ago, when they found that the purchasing power of the farmer was at an end, stopped production, and that is the idea that is carried out by all the manufacturers. I will mention no names, but I heard one hon. member to my right say that, having some land, he thought he would engage in the dairying industry; accordingly he bought 30 or 40 cows, but when he found they did not pay, he stopped production. Now, we farmers are made of sterner stuff; we do not stop production. I am reminded of a story I once read of Napoleon Bonaparte at the battle of Waterloo, when his soldiers captured a small British drummer boy. The boy was brought before the great general, who said to him: "Play the march". The boy played the march, whereupon the general said: "Very good; now play the charge." So the boy played the charge, and the general said: "You have done very well, my boy; now play the retreat." The boy replied: "Monsieur, I never learned to play the retreat; the British soldiers never retreat." Now, the Canadian farmer never retreats; he is made of sterner stuff. Even if he does not make ends meet; even if he has no profits at the end of the year, he still continues.

With regard to the possibilities of arranging a reciprocity treaty with the United States, I would say in the first place that nearly all the newspapers of the United States are thoroughly opposed to the present tariff proposals which are being discussed by the United States Senate. More than that, the Republican papers which represent the high protectionists of the United States are saying to the people: We cannot go to the country at the next presidential election on these grounds. If we do, President Harding is defeated. I do not think for one moment that it will be longer than four or five years before there will be a completely different fiscal policy in the United States. I wish to read a few extracts from American journals in that regard. The New York Journal of Commerce calls the Senate high tariff, "a bill to raise living costs and hamper trade."

The New York Tribune warns the Republican party that this is no time to go tariff mad, and that if President Harding stands for re-election it will be unfair to hamper him with this tariff as President Taft was hampered in 1912 by the Payne-Aldrich Act.

The St. Louis Globe-Democrat says that the new tariff applies protection without regard to new conditions of world trade and the change of the United States from a debtor to a creditor nation.

The Boston Transcript declares that the manufacturers are nearly paralyzed by war expenses and lack of markets, and are to some extent prepared to regard strikes as a blessing.

The New York Herald sees the United States shut out of foreign markets except in raw materials, notably cotton and copper.

The New York Post regards the tariff as making a present to Europe of eleven billion dollars owed to the United States. Europe cannot pay in gold and her goods will be excluded.

The United States has to import in order to get her debts paid, for she is no longer a debtor nation, but a creditor nation. The New York World and the New York Times are virtually in opposition to the measure. Even the farm papers are not all favourable. I quote:

The Southland Farmer of Houston, Texas, regards the Bill as a betrayal of agriculture, bring the West and South under still greater bondage to the industrial sections of the East and North.

The New York American Agriculturalist favours the duties on certain farm products but wants fertilizing salts and other things needed on the farm to come in duty free so as to cheapen production.

Even the farmer bloc are not all in agreement on this measure, and they will find out that their prices are set at Liverpool, where they have to compete with our wheat.

Commenting on the changes made by the Fielding tariff the New York Commercial says:

But what is to be our attitude toward "protection" of those commodities which we normally import from Canada? Nothing has been gained by excluding Canadian wheat, for instance, from our markets only to force it to Liverpool, there to compete with ours just as effectively as it would in Chicago. The same or closely similar situations exist with regard to a good many other Canadian products. Can we gain our own consent to take a leaf from Canada's note book and adopt a more reasonable policy in such matters?

I could go on reading extracts to show the trend of opinion in the United States at the present time, but I shall not further weary the House. Any one who watches the trend of events to-day in the United States knows that it is towards freer trade relations with the whole world, and with Canada in particular. We and the United States are the same kith and kin. We are of the same blood. We speak practically the same language, and therefore on all these grounds there should be friendly relations between the two countries. I believe the present is a very opportune time to establish better relations, and I think we can depend upon the present Minister of Finance more than any other man in Canada to get along with the United States.

One gentleman on my right came along a moment ago and asked how long I was going to speak. I said, "Ten or fifteen minutes," so he tapped me on the back and said, "That is right." Mr. Speaker, I shall not make a motion, but I believe during this debate the speakers should confine themselves to speeches of fifteen or at the most twenty minutes. I do not believe that anything that is said in this debate will change one vote, for every man has already made up his mind. I shall not take up the time of the House further.

On the motion of Mr. Neill the debate was adjourned.

On motion of Mr. Mackenzie King, the House adjourned at 10.47 p.m.

Wednesday, May 31, 1922.

The House met at three o'clock.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

IMPORTATION OF LIQUOR FOR EXPORT

Mr. MILLAR:

Has the legislature of the province of Saskatchewan, or any person representing said legislature, made representation, verbally or in writing to this Government or in writing to the Government immediately preceding this Government that could properly be construed as an effort to prevent the importation of alcoholic liquor into the province of Saskatchewan for purpose of export to other Canadian provinces?

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes.

LABOUR UNIONS

Mr. PARENT:

1. Are there any shops, depending directly or indirectly on public moneys, in which skilled labour and ordinary labour are employed?

2. Are not the Public Works Department, the Marine Department, the Secretary of State Department, the Railways Department, and the Militia Department employing non-union persons, in shops under control of said departments?

3. If not, what special department or departments provide moneys for shops in which labour unions are recognized?

4. If any shop depending on public moneys is under one union, under what department is the money coming from after having been voted by Parliament?

5. How many labour unions exist in this country?

6. What are the names of such unions?

Hon. Mr. MURDOCK:

1. Yes.

2. Yes.

3. Answered by reply to No. 2.

4. The Government does not distinguish between organized and unorganized labour or as between different branches of organized labour.

5. The number of local trades union branches reported as for the calendar year 1921 was 2,668.

6. Details appear in the 11th annual report on Labour Organization in Canada, pages 165 to 236.

HOUSE OF COMMONS—LAW BRANCH

Mr. BLACK (Yukon):

1. Are the amounts aggregating $24,260, appearing under the heading Law Branch on page 18 of the estimates, to be paid out in connection with the preparation of legislation to be enacted during 1922-23?

2. What are the duties of Parliamentary Counsel, salary $6,000?

3. What are the duties of the two Assistant Chief Parliamentary Counsel, salary $4,020 each?

4. What are the duties of the Assistant to the Parliamentary Counsel, salary $3,300?

5. What are the duties of the principal clerk, salary $2,160?

6. What are the duties respectively of the senior law clerk stenographer and law clerk stenographer, whose salaries aggregate $2,760?

7. In addition to above Parliamentary Counsel are there not solicitors employed in each or in most of the departments?

8. Is not the legal advice of the Department of Justice available to Parliament?

9. How many of the Bills that have come before the House at this session have been wholly prepared by Parliamentary Counsel, the two Assistant Parliamentary Counsel or the Assistant to Parliamentary Counsel?

10. Are the great majority of the bills that come before Parliament prepared by outside counsel, not in the permanent employ of the Government?

11. Is the assistant to Parliamentary Counsel assistant as well to the two assistant chief parliamentary counsel?

Hon. Mr. COPP:

1. Yes, in part.

2. To advise the Speaker, officers or members of the House whenever requested, to supervise the printing of statutes, and such other duties as are mentioned in rule 64 of the House.

3. To assist the Parliamentary Counsel.

4. Answered by No. 3.

5. To assist in the general work of the office.

6. To take and transcribe dictation from the chief and his assistants.

7. Yes, eleven departments have solicitors.

8. Yes.

9. Eight public bills; no private bills.

10. The great majority of the private bills that come before Parliament are prepared by outside counsel, not in the employ of the Government. Of the public bills, a majority are outlined or drafted before coming to the Parliamentary Counsel, some very completely, but others requiring more or less extensive alterations.

11. He acts under the instructions of the Parliamentary Counsel.

WHEAT BOARD

Mr. DAVIES:

1. What is the total amount of funds transferred by the Canadian Wheat Board to the federal government (a) from surplus account; (b) from participation certificates; and (c) from any other source?

2. What is the total value of outstanding participation certificates, if any, issued by the Canadian Wheat Board?

3. Is the value of such outstanding participation certificates still collectable by the owners thereof?

4. If so, when does the Government propose to discontinue making payments on the same?

5. If the Government has already discontinued redeeming outstanding participation certificates, what action has been taken or will be taken by the Government in regard to the final disposition of the funds set aside to meet payments on participation certificates?

6. Have any recommendations as to the disposal of such funds been made by the Canadian Wheat Board?

7. If so, what were the recommendations?

Hon. Mr. ROBB:

1. (a) From surplus account, $560,000; (b) from participation certificates, $175,000; (c) from any other sources, nil; total, $735,000.

2. The total value of outstanding participation certificates issued by the Canadian Wheat Board as on May 23, 1922, is $209,526.84.

3. Applications for payments on outstanding participation certificates are still being presented, and payments on such certificates are still being made by the Canadian Wheat Board.

4. The question has not yet been considered.

5. Answered by No. 3.

6. Yes.

7. The Canadian Wheat Board recommended that the first amount, viz. $560,000, transferred from surplus account to the federal government, should be distributed to the provincial governments pro rata, on the basis of the quantity of wheat delivered by producers in each of the said provinces to the board, such moneys to be used for the immediate relief of distressed farmers in the various provinces, and that any money remaining on account of unpaid certificates should be used for research work, particularly for the prevention of black rust in wheat.

NEW BRUNSWICK WHARVES

Hon. Mr. BAXTER:

When did the Department of Public Works recommend that seventy-eight wharves in the province of New Brunswick be taken over from the provincial government?

2. Was an Order in Council passed, based upon such recommendations?

3. If so, what was the date of such Order in Council and what were its terms?

4. Did the government of the province of New Brunswick secure the legislation necessary to enable it to make a transfer of such wharves at the sites thereof to the Dominion Government? If so, when?

5. Did Engineers Stead and Goodspeed, under date of 14th of April, 1920, and the 10th of April, 1920, respectively, report that the amount required for the repair of said wharves was $86,823 less the amount of $5,385 in respect of five wharves not included in the recommendation to Council?

6. Has the Department of Public Works any further information as to the amount required since the date of these reports for the repair of said wharves, and what is now the estimated cost of such repairs?

7. Is it the intention of the Government to complete the acceptance of a transfer of said wharves from the province of New Brunswick?

8. If so, at what time?

9. Is the Dominion Government now bearing the cost of repairs of said wharves? If so, for what period has it been so doing?

10. If transfer has not yet been accepted, does the Government suggest that anything, and if so, what, remains to be done by the provincial government to warrant transfer being accepted?

11. Is it the intention of the Dominion Government at the present session to make any provision for the repair of said wharves, or any of them?

12. If so, what provision and for which wharves?

Hon. Mr. KING (Kootenay):

1, 2 and 3. No Order in Council passed.

4. Yes by Act 8, Geo. V, Chapter 10, supplemented by Act 9, Geo. V., Chapter 44, Statutes of New Brunswick.

5. Yes.

6. No.

7 and 8. Under consideration.

9. No.

10. Nothing further is required on the part of the provincial government.

11 and 12. Under consideration.

MERCHANTS BANK CASE

Mr. CHURCH:

1. Is it the intention of the Government to appeal the dicision of His Honour Judge Cusson in the Merchants Bank case against D. C. Macarow, former general manager, of wilfully giving false returns to the Minister of Finance?

2. Is it the intention of the Government to prefer a bill of indictment at the assizes against the said Macarow?

3. Is it the intention of the Government to hold a parliamentary inquiry into the whole Merchants Bank fiasco—if not, why not?

4. And is it the intention of the Government to so amend the Criminal Code as to compel presidents, auditors and directors and general managers of chartered banks to direct and fulfil their functions as bank officials, and to provide penalties for breaches?

Hon. Sir LOMER GOUIN:

1 and 2. There is no right of appeal, but the Government has asked the Attorney General at Quebec to submit the case against D. C. Macarow to the grand jury at the next assizes upon the charges and proof with a view to the finding of a bill of indictment.

3. While these proceedings are pending the Government do not propose any further action.

4. These are matters for consideration when the question of a renewal of the Bank Act comes before Parliament.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

Mr. LANCTOT:

1. What buildings were occupied, as offices, at Ottawa, by the Department of Militia and Defence, for the year ending March 31st, 1911, and for the year ending March 31st, 1922, (a) for the General Headquarters, and (b) for each service of this Department?

2. What buildings were occupied, as offices, in each military district, (a) for the district staff: (b) for the army pay corps; (c) for the veterinary corps; (d) for the medical corps; (e) for the engineers corps; (f) for the ordnance corps; and (g) for the army service corps?

3. What was the strength of the permanent force in each military district for the year ending March 31st, 1911, and for the year ending March 31st 1922?

4. During the above years, what was the number of officers of the army pay corps, the respective rank and salary of each, and the number of clerks employed in this service, in each district?

5. Does the department in future intend to keep more than one officer of the army pay corps in each district, and to continue the auditor branch which was organized in each military district during the war?

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou):

1. From what companies in the Maritime provinces did the Canadian National Railway Company purchase coal in the year 1921-22?
2. What was the amount contracted for with each company?
3. What was the price agreed upon in each contract?
4. How many tons were obtained from each of the companies with whom contracts were made?

Mr. NEILL:

1. What was the cost for the operation and maintenance of the fisheries of British Columbia annually, for the years 1917-1918, 1919-1920 and 1921, in the nature of office staff, buildings, upkeep and rentals, patrol, boats and upkeep, field work, hatcheries, and any other such items that may be charged against this department?
2. What amount of revenue has been collected from the fisheries of British Columbia by the Dominion Fisheries Department, annually for the years 1917-1918, 1919-1920 and 1921, in the form of license fees, royalties on canned salmon, prosecutions and fines, sale of confiscated boats and gear, and any such revenue as may be collected by the department?

CLAIMS OF ROBERT DEBEAUX

Mr. A. W. NEILL (Comox-Alberni) moved:

For a copy of all letters, telegrams, memoranda, reports to Council, Orders in Council and other documents passing between the Government and any other parties relating to the internment, deportation, return, and claims for compensation of Robert DeBeaux.

Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): In regard to this motion, I should say that what is called for includes one or two confidential reports that have been made to the Government by its special officers. There is no objection to my hon. friend being shown those reports in the office of the Minister of Justice, but it is hardly in the public interest that they should be brought down in the return. Any other papers may be brought down.

Motion agreed to.

FISHERIES ACT, 1914, AMENDMENT

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Marine and Fisheries) moved that the House do to-morrow go into Committee of the Whole to consider certain proposed resolutions in favour of amending the Fisheries Act, 1914, as regards salmon curing establishments and herring dry-salting establishments.

Motion agreed to.

WHEAT BOARD

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. H. H. STEVENS (Vancouver Centre): Before the Orders of the Day are called, I would like to address two questions to the leader of the Government, based upon the reference by this House to the Select Standing Committee on Agriculture and Colonization of a very important proposal, namely, the establishment of a Wheat Board. On March 27 it was indicated that there was need of haste. On May 26 a report was made to the House which involves the passing of legislation by this House and the subsequent passing of legislation by provincial legislatures for the handling of the wheat crop of 1922. I cite these facts to emphasize the need of haste and to direct the attention of the Government to the fact that no motion has been made for concurrence in this report, though it has been before the House for several days. I would like to ask if the delay in moving concurrence has anything to do with the action taken by the committee at its meeting on Friday last, an action which, in my estimation was somewhat irregular—to put it mildly, was extraordinary.

Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Perhaps I may take my hon. friend's last question first. There has been no ulterior intention to delay in any way the discussion of the report to which he has referred; the desire has been simply, to get through as quickly as possible with the debate on the budget. It has been felt that we would proceed more quickly in the long run if we concluded with the debate on the budget before taking up other matters. As soon as the debate is closed, the Government will be glad to have this report considered.

Mr. STEVENS: May I ask one further question arising out of the Prime Minister's answer? Is it not rather out of the ordinary to postpone action on an important report of this kind when it daily precedes the order to which my hon. friend has referred?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I mentioned, some days ago, I think, before the debate on the budget commenced, that once that debate commenced the Government would like to have it carried through. The report referred to had not been made to the House at the time; it was not ready then. I think we are following the ordinary custom in proceeding as we are in the matter.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I would point out to my hon. friend that the budget debate comes after routine proceedings. The Prime Minister's statement would apply only to business that comes after routine; the matter of this report would come before routine. I am sure a fair consideration of the two subjects would indicate at once that if the one is to be dealt with effectively at all, it is in a greater hurry by far than is any disposition of the budget.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My right hon. friend knows, perhaps, as well as any one, that there is possibility of a debate arising on the report which might occupy a considerable time. I think I can assure him that any legislation that may be introduced will not be prejudiced in any way in consequence of the delay in considering the report.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It cannot help but be.

THE BUDGET

CONTINUATION OF THE DEBATE ON THE ANNUAL FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The House resumed from Tuesday, May 30, the debate on the motion of Hon. W. S. Fielding (Minister of Finance) that Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair for the House to go into Committee of Ways and Means, and the proposed amendment thereto of Hon. Sir Henry Drayton.

Mr. A. W. NEILL (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, it is not my intention to waste the time of the House listening to me expounding my views on the tariff. In the opinion of one or two hon. members of this House—I hope it is only one or two—my views on that subject are both crude and unorthodox. Probably they are, Sir, but at least they are my own, founded on conditions as I have myself observed them, and not inherited from my parents or from the traditions of some half-worn-out party. They at least possess one saving grace, and that is they afford wide tolerance of the views of any other hon. gentlemen who hold different views from my own. They afford any other hon. member ample opportunity to differ from me on this subject without my feeling called upon to reflect upon his mental capacity or moral standing, which I see by the debates of this House some hon. members are rather in the habit of doing.

At the beginning of this session I laid it down as an axiom that the discussion of free trade and protection offers ample scope for interminable argument on both sides of the question, and the longer I sit in this House the more convinced I am that that axiom is absolutely correct. Everything can be said on one side and everything can be said on the other side. I do think, however, that we are rather in danger of making a fetish out of this question of the tariff. After all, it is not a question of principle: it is a question of fact and policy. I think some of us at least are rather apt to elevate what is only a matter of opinion into a matter of moral standards, and make it a matter of moral principle from which it is improper for any one to deviate. I repeat that it is not a question or right or wrong. It is a question of opinion. An hon. gentleman who spoke the other day referred somewhat slightingly to a statement I made earlier in the session, that because I lived in British Columbia I advocated protection, but that I had no doubt if I lived on the prairies I would be advocating free trade. It seemed to him that that was somewhat derogatory. After all, Mr. Speaker, I only said that I would do what every other hon. member does without saying so; that is an absolute fact. I certainly said that the tariff was a matter simply of geography, and that because I was in British Columbia I believed in a tariff policy for British Columbia. In British Columbia we do not, most of us at any rate, steal from, or rob our neighbours, not to any appreciable extent but we do not do that simply because we live in British Columbia. If we moved to Manitoba we would neither rob nor steal there, because that is a question of moral standards by which honourable men are bound. It has nothing to do with the tariff, and because I advocate protection in British Columbia I fail entirely to see why I should not advocate free trade in Manitoba. Here is a fair example of the difference between the two.

In the part of the province of British Columbia from which I come, it has been found appropriate and most successful to plant potatoes at a certain period of the year, we will say the first of May, and we invariably follow that practice because we have found it appropriate to the conditions. If we moved down to Manitoba where experience had shown that it was wise to plant potatoes six weeks earlier perhaps, would I receive any applause from hon. members because I then took the position: No, I have planted potatoes always on the 1st day of May; I will not lower the flag that I have lived under for twenty years, of planting my potatoes on that date; I will go on doing so. I think I would get little applause, and still fewer potatoes. I will go further and say that not only do I believe it is right for me to advocate protection for British Columbia; but I believe it is also right for hon. gentlemen to my left to advocate free trade for the prairies, because presumably experience has shown that that is the policy best adapted to that district. The only dispute which will arise between us is when hon. gentlemen to my left try to convince me that free trade is the policy for British Columbia. Then we shall get into a dispute. Once we accept the fact that certain sections of this country from their geographical position and economic conditions want, some free trade, and some a tariff, all we have left to do then is to formulate a tariff policy, not that will attempt to give every section what it wants, but as far as possible will be a compromise between the different sections. The tariff is always a compromise. Then our only question to consider to-day is, have we—British Columbia in my case, the prairies in the case of hon. gentlemen to my left—got such a measure of justice out of this tariff compromise as we are entitled to? Any further remarks I make on the tariff to-day will be along that line.

The budget is a compromise. I think the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) will take no exception to that. It is a compromise, as I said in my election campaign months ago that it would be, and I believe that the only question for us to discuss to-day is whether that compromise is fair to the different sections we represent. The budget has been so fully discussed the past few days in this House, and there are leaders much more competent to discuss it than I am, that I shall not touch further on it. I only wish this afternoon to consider the question for a few minutes from one angle, and that is the angle of British Columbia. I would not have spoken on this subject at all except that I did not want to give a silent vote. I do not believe in ambiguity of thought, word, or deed, and therefore, Mr. Speaker, I will frankly and plainly say now that I intend to vote against the amendment moved by the ex-Minister of Finance (Sir Henry Drayton), and on the main question of the budget resolutions I intend to support once again the Government. I will say with equal frankness that I have very grave doubt and hesitation in my mind whether in doing so I am acting in the best interests of the constituency I represent or of the province that I come from. I somewhat suspect that my constituents may share that doubt and hesitation, and it is for that reason I wish to go on record explaining briefly the position I take here to-day.

After the election last December, when it was shown what the complexion of this House would be, I consulted with my friends throughout the riding as to what attitude it would be proper for me to take in this House and we arrived at the decision that being elected as an Independent, being a new member in a new Parliament, and with a new Government, it would be proper, provided the Government introduced reasonably suitable legislation, which was to be supposed, that I should support them for at least one session in order to give them an opportunity to set their house in order, formulate their plans, and bring down a programme which might or might not meet our views then. I may say that had the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Crerar) been the leader of the Government, or had a coalition been formed which included that hon. gentleman, we would have taken the same attitude, that is to say, we would have given them a reasonable opportunity for one session to show what their programme would be. In pursuance of that attitude I have supported the Government through this entire session, with one exception, and that was on the Asiatic question, when the question was too great and too important to British Columbia for me to deviate from what I believed to be the exact necessities of the case. I hold no mandate for the other members from British Columbia, and I have no right to traverse their motives, but the records of the House are before us and I can see from them that the other members from British Columbia, except the Conservative members, have practically supported the Government solidly during this session. It is not for me to traverse their motives, but presumably they were actuated by some such idea as animated myself and my friends. So we find the situation is this, that practically fifty per cent of the representation of British Columbia, six at least out of thirteen, have given strong support to the Government of the day during this session. no doubt with the idea that if their policy continued to meet with the approval of their constituents they might continue that support; and also, no doubt, with the ulterior idea on the part of the government that if their policy, as developed, was suitable to the districts we represent, then, in the event of an election, they would secure greater support from the members from British Columbia. That, Mr. Speaker, was the fond dream that we, in our political youth and innocence, brought down to this House. It has been said:

> There's nothing half so sweet in life
> As love's young dream.

Yes, Mr. Speaker, and I am sorry to say there is nothing so bitter and complete as the disillusion that sometimes follows "love's young dream." Let us canvass for a moment what the results are. The session is drawing to its close and from my point of view the only members from British Columbia that will be going home with a cheerful countenance and a glad heart will be those representing the Conservative cities of British Columbia. And, why indeed, should they not have a glad heart? They have excellent reasons for it, and those reasons are furnished by the government that sits opposite us to-day. In the first place they have succeeded in getting huge sums of money for their constituencies, very large votes. It may have escaped the notice of hon. members that the whole of the vote for public buildings for British Columbia, and it is a very considerable sum, is to be spent in the cities of British Columbia—Victoria and Vancouver. There is a vote for William's Head. That is a little outside of Victoria, but it practically means that city because the money will be spent there, and the men to be employed will be from that city; so that the whole of the vote for public buildings in British Columbia goes to the two cities of Victoria and Vancouver. I say to the representatives of those cities: Well done. I am not casting any reflection on them. In addition to that, Victoria gets a few million dollars—I do not know the exact amount, I think it will be millions—for the continuation of its dry dock. Vancouver is also to get its dry dock. Possibly it has not yet been decided on; but the members from there have only got to continue as they are doing, attack the Government a little more, move a few more votes of want of confidence, and I have no doubt they too will get their dry dock. I may say that I had the opportunity of seeing an election address brought out by one of the candidates for the city of Vancouver at the last election, and he made it quite plain that he had been instrumental more or less in obtaining in four years for the city of Vancouver expenditures amounting to something like $5,000,000. I have no doubt his statement was correct, at least I am not prepared to dispute it; and it surely is very much to his credit as a representative that he was able to get an expenditure of something like a million and a quarter every year for the comparatively small city of Vancouver. May I be allowed to offer the suggestion that people who have been getting public expenditure at the rate of a million and a quarter a year for a number of years past might perhaps have taken a holiday in expenditure this session and allowed some of the money to go where it was really, perhaps, more needed. It may be said that this is none of my business. As I say I am not attacking these gentlemen at all; the more credit to them for their ability in securing these sums; but what does interest me is the question: Who is furnishing this money, and where does it come from? It may be said: "It comes from the public exchequer; what matters that to you?" Yes, Mr. Speaker, it comes from the public exchequer but it is also diverted from where it should be spent, and that is the rural constituencies of British Columbia. It is well known that only a certain amount of money will be voted to any province in a given time; and when that money is spent by the million in certain cities in the province it is obvious that no money will be available for the rural constituencies of that province; and that is exactly what has happened, and is going to happen, in the case of British Columbia. Now in the past, that policy has gone on for many years; it has not been so obvious, for the simple reason that the rural constituencies in previous years have been so ill advised as to elect city representatives, representatives living in the cities of Victoria and Vancouver. For twelve years at least the member for the riding that I now represent lived and had his business interests in Vancouver; and he was not likely to stand up here and object to a few additional contracts going into that city where he had all his interests. The same thing applies to other cities in British Columbia and, no doubt, applies to other provinces. The country sections have now awakened, and they have decided to send men, as in the case of the gentlemen to my left, who really and truly represent not only their own interests but their own constituencies; and the result is there is going to be a howl go up from the country districts of British Columbia at all the money being voted and distributed in the city municipalities.

I might mention incidentally—and let me say that I want to keep away from all petty or parochial politics—that the population of the district that I represent has increased, according to the last census, 33 or 36 per cent, and there is no other riding in the province of British Columbia where the population has increased to that extent, and it is one of the largest there, except the riding of South Vancouver, which is largely urban. Some of the other constituencies that are dragging down these big votes, have increased only 7 per cent in the same period. It can be readily understood that a district as large as that, growing at the rate I have indicated, must have ever-increasing needs in the way of wharves and lights for navigation, and so on; much more so than a stagnant city whose population only increased 7 per cent in the same period. The resources of British Columbia are to a large extent undeveloped. They are not to be found in the cities but in the country districts; and if you do not develop the country districts your cities will not make very rapid progress.

Another reason why the Conservative members of British Columbia should go home with a glad heart is the fact that the Government, unwittingly I should suppose, has furnished them with the very best of campaign material for the next election. They have put it in the power of these hon. gentlemen to go home to their constituencies, and to other constituencies and say: "I told you so; the Government have done exactly what we said they would do if they got into power." I would not say they have done it all, because the statements made by some Conservative candidates went too far altogether; but they are in a position to say, "I told you that you would suffer from the tariff; that you would suffer in this way and that way." Every opportunity has been given to them to do so. I do not need to imagine that such a claim would be made because we heard the hon. member for Yale (Mr. MacKelvie) saying the other day that the doing away, as it practically is, of the dumping clause on fruit was very much to his interest politically; but he was man enough to go on and say that he did not wish to take advantage of that. He would be willing to forego that, that is the way he put it, if the Government would change back to the old policy in the interests of his constituency; but the fact that the dumping clause has practically been done away with is virtually an election by acclamation for him at the next election. Therefore I say that those hon. gentlemen are going home with a glad heart rather than those men who supported the Government.

[Mr. Neill.]

Now let me consider for a moment, very briefly, what the rural sections of British Columbia have obtained during this session.

Not only the rural districts, but all the districts, of British Columbia by almost unanimous vote asked the Government for the exclusion of orientals and we got—promises, it is true, promises—promises that cannot under any circumstances fructify into legislation for another twelve months, a sort of political promissory note, dated a year ahead and always subject to be renewed then. What we did want at that time, and what we want now, is action—immediate, prompt and decisive action. I may say that even since that debate on the exclusion of orientals took place in the House another aspect of it has come to my attention to which I would like to invite the consideration of the House. I have here British Columbia's Lumber Journal and, under date of April 20, we find the following in it:

> Valuable timber tracts on Vancouver Island are likely to pass into Japanese ownership in the near future, according to reports in circulation here. It is said that Hon. Samuel Hill, Seattle millionaire, who recently returned from Japan, is extensively interested in Alberni Canal timber limits and that he is negotiating for a sale of a big block of this timber to Japanese interests. Another deal is now being handled by a Victoria real estate firm, it being understood that the prospective buyers are lumber importers of Kobe. In the event of the sales being put through, the Japanese would probably establish their own logging camps and mills, cut the logs into big-dimension timber suitable for export and ship it across to Japan in Japanese freighters.

Further on a lumber merchant from this same Tokio, Japan, says:

> "British Columbia lumbermen should not think that the Japanese market is merely a flash in the pan—here to-day and gone to-morrow. If my estimate is worth anything, Japan will be in the market for British Columbia lumber, just as long as British Columbia has lumber to sell."

I ask hon. members to notice this next sentence:

> "The Japanese government has prohibited the cutting of lumber in most of our native forests, and consequently we must get our supplies elsewhere."

Observe the shrewdness and the foresightedness of the Japanese government. They have prohibited the exploiting of their own forests at the present time and forced them to come to our forests to get their lumber, and that is all right, because we want to sell our lumber. That shows their foresightedness, because they want to protect their own forests. I have here a memorandum of the loadings of lumber shipped from British Columbia, and I find the following took place in less than one month.

From Alberni the Canadian Prospector was loaded with lumber for the Orient; the Canadian Farmer was loaded with lumber for California, and the Canadian Winner was loaded with lumber for the Orient. From Chemainus the Canadian Freighter and the Canadian Prospector were loaded with lumber for the Orient.

Four government boats, besides other boats, left our shores with lumber inside of three weeks, and the Japs are going to do away with it all. The Japanese government has become aware of the business we were doing, and they are going to buy up our lumber, and have it cut by their own men, and ship it in their own bottoms. I think history tells us that Nero fiddled while Rome was burning. In a different sense and in a less worthy sense we are "fiddling" whilst Japan is buying our raw resources, and pouring in her nationals to exploit them, and we get nothing but the bare original cost of the raw material. That is why we are asking for urgent action. I was saying that we asked for exclusion of orientals, and only got promises from the Government. But, in justice to the Government, it may be asked "What did you get from the previous government?" I do not know whether we got as liberal promises as we have received from the hon. members opposite, but the comparison does not prevail. There are two arguments against that which show that is not a just comparison. One is that the fact that the late government had not acted along these lines proved a very considerable factor against their candidates in the last election, and was a no mean factor in their defeat in the country districts in British Columbia: the public said "We do not like this lack of action; we will send men to parliament pledged to take some action." Therefore it is not sufficient to say "Well the late government did not do any better either", because our constituents and the public expect something to be done in the near future.

There we have the oriental question, and we will take the working man now. I believe it is not popular here to refer to the working man, but we are going home by and by and we will come in contact with him. He asked for an eight hour day, and he was told by the provincial government that it was a matter for the Dominion and not for the provinces. He was told it had some connection with the Treaty of Versailles and he was entitled to have it. I think that it formed no inconsiderable plank in the Liberal platform, I am speaking subject to correction as to that, but we came here and reiterated the demand made by our constituents, and we were told that it was not a matter of Dominion legislation but a matter of provincial legislation. That may be; I do not gainsay that statement. There was a suggestion and an inquiry made in the House, would the Government not call the representatives of the various provinces together, and have a conference with a view to passing legislation by all the different provinces, so that the matter would be adjusted? And we were given no assurance that it would be done. Further than that, the Government itself has fallen down and refused to carry out this principle on its own public work. I consider we are more or less obligated to do this under our treaty obligation. So much for that aspect of the case.

The next item I draw attention to comes under the tariff, and this matter, as I said, is a compromise, a sort of political grab bag. Each province and each interest shuts its eyes and puts in its hand and sees what it will bring out, and some of the things they succeed in getting are quite out of keeping with the needs of the people who draw them. You often see the same thing at a ladies' aid sale.

The lumber industry wants one thing and that only—and my hon. friends from British Columbia will agree with me in this—they want a reduction of high freight rates. They do not care about the tariff, if they can only get a reduction on the freight rates. Those mills situated on the water where they can ship their products are not so badly off, but there is a number of them situated inland; the only way they can ship is by train to the prairies and they cannot sell the lumber at a profit, after paying the freight. They come down asking for a reduction in the freight, and what do they get? They get 2½ per cent reduction on their new machinery. I am not deprecating that at all, because 2½ per cent on a mill that would cost $100,000 to equip amounts to a very considerable sum; but the irony of the thing is that they do not want new machinery, because their present machinery is lying rusting by reason of the fact that they have not the freight rate necessary to take the timber out. When a man wants bread what is the use of offering him a stone? And until he can make the wheels of his present machinery turn it is little use to say that he can get a rebate if he buys machinery. It is a reduction in theory but not in effect.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): In the Crowsnest Pass agreement is there a provision relating to lumber?

Mr. NEILL: No, lumber is not mentioned in that agreement.

I come now to the coal mining question. The coal miners ask protection—and I am not ashamed to use the word—against the importation of fuel oil from the American side, and ask for an opportunity to work more than two days a week—that is all they are working now. You hear a great deal about the big wages they make but if they only work two days a week how much does it come to? At present they are only working two days a week, and they receive $40 a month. In my opinion that is not as much as $25 a month in Ontario, because the cost of living is so much higher out there. And these men are expected to live, have their homes, raise their families on $40 a month and pay high taxation. The inspectors appointed under the British Columbia Minimum Wage Act have decided that $65 a month is the minimum sum that a girl in business can live decently on, and it is provided by law that she cannot be paid less than $65 a month. But the coal miner is expected to keep his wife and family and feed and clothe them on $40 a month, and that is all they are receiving at the present time in these mines. What do they get out of the political grab bag? They get nothing. They did get something. They got a vision of their own Canadian Merchant Marine going over three or four thousand miles to Japan and buying Japan coal mined by Japanese, and bringing it over, and selling it at the doors of our own coal mines, where the men are working only two days a week. How the Japanese authorities must laugh to see us sitting here passing resolutions, as solemnly as a lot of children playing at church, about restrictions and so on, and our very own Government boats are bringing Japan coal over to the detriment of our own workers out there in British Columbia. More than that, I claim the Government has not kept faith on this subject. I put a question on the order paper some time ago and drew the attention of the Government to the fact that a Canadian Government boat had gone over to Japan and brought a load of coal. After bringing the matter to the attention of the Government, I asked if this policy would be discontinued, and in reply, there was a positive assurance that, so far as it was possible to do so—I think those were the words used—the practice would be discontinued. I sent that word home to those coal miners, and I assured them that at least this would not happen again. Only a few hours ago, however, I received this telegram from Cumberland, signed by the President of the Board of Trade:

> Another shipment Japanese coal brought by C.G.S.S. Inventor transferred to Britisher. Britisher was due here for coal but had order cancelled result no work in mines to-day do not consider this good business for Canadian industries.

Neither do I. I will go further than that and say that that is an insult to our Canadian workers, a disgrace to the Canadian government, and incidentally a reflection upon ourselves. Those men who are not working are not Hungarians nor Poles; they are British-born miners, and they are the men about whom some hon. gentlemen waxed so eloquent the other day in the discussion about oleomargarine when they said that we must maintain at any hazard the right of the poor man to buy a cheap, spurious imitation of butter. Is there not a more potent right than that, the right of the poor man to have employment? I have cited this quotation before, but I will quote again what one of the leaders of the British government said in a debate in the House of Commons in London:

> The classes who had the running of the country would be judged in proportion as they could find or organize employment for the great mass of the people.

The word "people" in this connection means the people of Canada, not the people of Japan. That is the situation to-day, that these men are working two days a week, and we ourselves, for it is we, are bringing coal over from Japan. I might also mention incidentally that quite a large number of orientals are working in these mines with the full sanction and authority of law. They are dangerous; they are ignorant of our language; in case of an explosion or accident, they would add trebly to the danger and difficulties of the white men who are employed there. They are keeping out white men there to-day, and they, I suppose, are getting their two days' work a week. If the white men took the law into their own hands and broke out into open rioting, they would be promptly and properly punished, because the law must be observed. But if anything of that kind happened, would not some portion of the blame rest upon this Government and this House which, if not directly, have indirectly sanctioned conditions that prevail there to-day? I do not think we would be altogether clear from some blame attaching to ourselves. That is the situation as regards the coal industry. That is what the coal miners got out of this budget.

As regards the fishing industry, the fishermen asked for the elimination of purse seines and traps, and they also asked incidentally that the fishing should be limited to white men. What did they draw out of the budget? They drew a most extraordinary thing. They drew a substantial rebate on gasoline, and that reduction looked fair on the face of it, because fishermen use power boats. But the joker in this reduction is that the majority of them have motor power boats that do not use gasoline, and this reduction will be of practically no benefit to them. I imagine that, at the most, about ten per cent of them use gasoline, and the rest of them are not benefited one particle by this reduction in the budget. In some districts they are not allowed to use power boats. It was intended for fishermen; it was said so in the speech of the minister; but it does not benefit them, for the reasons I have stated.

The dairy industry asked for, not a tariff protection, but simply a protection against what they claimed was an unfair competition. I will not go into that again, because I have already discussed it. But the dairy industry is in a very critical condition to-day, and some form of protection was requested. What did the dairy industry get out of the budget? The ingredients that go into oleomargarine are allowed in free, although they are taxed if used for anything else, and in the budget we also find that free importation is provided for cottolene, which is a mess made of cottonseed oil and which is a sort of step-sister to oleomargarine. That is what the dairymen got out of the budget.

The fruit industry apparently only asked to be left alone. The fruit men did not appear to want anything; they seemed to say: "Just leave us alone." They had a dumping clause that protected them. If that dumping clause has not been removed, it has been changed to a method which they consider makes it absolutely unworkable. When the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) was discussing the subject, it did appear to me that the original form of the dumping clause was the more practicable one; but I must give way to the opinions of the men who operate it and who operate under it. It was introduced some fifteen years ago. The policy that is now to be the law was introduced then; it was given a fair trial and it was found unworkable. Theory is not so powerful as the practical example and they came down to the Government and got the form recently in force enacted and they have found it workable. Those who operate under it are apparently thoroughly satisfied with it and I should think it would have been part of wisdom to leave well alone. At any rate, they claim their industry, if this clause goes into effect, will be practically ruined.

Comox-Alberni is not only a very large district, but it presents a most extraordinary diversification of interests, more so, perhaps, than any other constituency in Canada. As a matter of fact all the industries that I have mentioned are to be found and are working under a hardship in the district which I represent, and there are many other interests as well. It is for these reasons, which I will recapitulate briefly—the oriental question, the eight-hour day, the lumber industry, the coal-mining industry, the fishing industry, the dairy industry and the fruit industry—and for the reasons that I have advanced in connection with these industries, that I hesitate and wonder whether I am acting in the best interests of my constituents in supporting the Government on this occasion.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. NEILL: I may assure my hon. friends to my left that while I may have somewhat loose ideas and be a little wobbly on the tariff, I have an unalterable conviction that as long as I represent the constituency of Comox-Alberni, my first duty is to look after their interests and my second to look after the interests of the province from which I come. If other hon. members would do the same, we would soon be able to get together and decide on a compromise—for all legislation is compromise—that would give a reasonable regard to the interests of all the different provinces. While these things all affect that district, they are all large questions and I am not being petty or parochial in the matter. They affect, in their entirety, the whole of British Columbia; in some cases, they affect the whole of that province, in other cases, a very considerable portion of it. But they are all burning, vital questions to British Columbia as a whole. It cannot be said that these questions concerning British Columbia have not been laid before the House; all the various members from that province have spoken and at some length on these different questions. They have been backed up by representations made by boards of trade, chambers of commerce, city councils and the like, so that it cannot be said that these questions have not been presented to the Government or that the Government are in ignorance in regard to the matter. The conviction, however, has been forced on us, most unwillingly, that the country districts of British Columbia are suffering from a double injustice. In the first place, the country is being starved for the benefit of the city ridings. In the second place, British Columbia is largely a country of raw products, and the development of those raw products is largely in its initial stages. We, therefore, can justly demand in the development of those resources the same protection as was accorded Ontario and Quebec in days gone by. I do not mean only actual tariff protection; but they got assistance and protection and some of the eastern industries are getting that still. Surely, therefore, we can demand that we get the same measure of protection until we build up our industries and get upon our feet. We are, however, feeling that we are being discriminated against in favour of the more populous or more represented portions of Canada. I do not chuckle over this as my hon. friends to my right. The reason I do not chuckle is that I have to go home and explain to my constituents why I support a government which does all these things. I have striven to avoid the consummation, but I cannot disguise the facts. They are as plain to the man on the street as to any one. If this policy is persisted in I cannot see how the Government, logically or fairly, can expect a very continued support from the country members of British Columbia, or, in the case of an election, any very great accession of support from the other districts. I may be wrong, perhaps my vision is limited; but I cannot see how it can work out otherwise. During the summer it is my intention to tour my riding. I always do that during the recess, because it is the only way to keep in touch with the people and to secure a proper measure of democratic representation. Any one who desires to know what public opinion really is must keep next to the people, and I shall tour the districts and hold meetings, at which the public will be invited not only to listen but to talk as well. I want to hear their views and to get their sentiments; and in accordance with the views I gather there, and the judgment which the people express generally, shall my course at the next session be shaped.

[Mr. Neill.]

Mr. FRANCIS N. McCREA (Sherbrooke): We have been waiting for several weeks for the budget to ascertain just what our venerable Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) proposed to do in the way of taxation, and now that it has been presented it is evident that every hon. member is not satisfied. I have received letters and telegrams urging me to use my influence to persuade the minister and his colleagues to modify the budget in such respects as those who have communicated with me are affected. Personally I was inclined to be somewhat unhappy over the budget, but when I stop to realize that this country requires about half a billion dollars to meet ordinary expenses, I have not very much to say except to make up my mind, as I think every one else should, to bear my full share of taxation. Every one must be prepared to do this, and to pay a little more than he would possibly like to pay. And I have such unbounded faith in the good judgment and the wisdom of the Minister of Finance that I am willing to leave that part to him. Consequently, I do not purpose taking up very much time discussing the pros and cons of the tariff question or of the budget. I think there is another subject of much more importance to the people than is any slight modification in the tariff here or there. That subject is our National Railway system; indeed, not only our National Railways but the other railways in the country as well. I look upon the railway situation as very serious, and the great question that is engaging the attention of the people throughout the country to-day is, what we are going to do to improve it? As a manufacturer who does a considerable amount of shipping, I find, and I think the public generally find, that the present freight rates are too high; in fact, they are so excessive that I think they are paralyzing business. Business at the present time is stagnant; it is held up to a great extent by reason of these high freight rates, for shippers cannot move their goods freely. And besides the freight rates being so high, the people are faced with a deficit on the government railways, of some $72,000,000, as shown by the Minister of Railways; while I believe that if the minister got a proper audit and a thorough accounting we should find that the deficit is not only $72,000,000 but well over $100,000,000. If I understand the situation correctly, there has been no proper accounting made for depreciation of rolling stock, road bed, etc.; nor has there been any allowance for capital investment. I believe therefore that with a fair and proper accounting you would find the deficit in the vicinity of the higher figure I have suggested. Now, there are gentlemen in this House, some of them on this side—I do not know how they come to be here, holding such views—who advocate government ownership of railways. The hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Crerar) the other day predicted that the time would come when we should be proud of our National Railways. Well, it is not entirely impossible that that prediction may be fulfilled some time or other. But from time immemorial there have been prophets in this world who have foretold the immediate advent of the millennium, which is not yet here; and in my opinion the day when we shall be proud of our National Railways will be cotemporaneous with the millennium. Those of us who were in the Railway Committee room a few days ago and listened to the evidence of Mr. Beatty learned that the Canadian Pacific Railway, a private railway which is well managed, operating over practically the same territory as our National Railways, pays its stockholders something over $30,000,000 a year in the way of returns on their investments. On the other hand our nationally owned railways, operated by the Government, are creating a deficit which the people, the owners of the system, are asked to dig down into their pockets to pay. And that deficit, as I have pointed out, is around $100,000,000. The man who stands up in this House or anywhere else and seriously declares that the nationally owned railways are a good investment has more courage than judgment, in my opinion.

What are we to do in the circumstances? We have heard Mr. Beatty, the president of the Canadian Pacific Railway; we have heard Mr. Hanna, who is the chairman of Board of Directors of the National Railways; and I presume that if you asked these gentlemen who were the managers, respectively, of these corporations, they would tell you that they were. In my judgment neither of them manages the financial end of the road with which he is connected. I think that if you go to Indianapolis and consult Mr. Carey, the president of the international labour union, you will find that he has more to say about the financial operations of these roads than either of these gentlemen, and dictates the policy of them from the financial standpoint. To explain what I mean: A short time ago I was talking to Mr. J. H. Walsh, manager of the Quebec Central Railway, over which our company does a very large amount of shipping. I complained of the rates, and he said that it was true that their rates were rather exorbitant, being more than double what they were five or six years ago. "But," he said, "here is the condition of affairs. At practically every station along the line the agent's residence is in the same building in which he does his work. Ever since I have been in charge of the road, some twenty-five years now, the practice has been for one agent to look after the station, whether he worked ten or twelve hours. He was on duty in the morning, when the first train was despatched, and he was on duty in the evening to see after the last train, having put in a day of ten or twelve or perhaps thirteen hours. And he was satisfied." But under the McAdoo arrangement this method was all changed; the agents and everybody else worked on the basis of the eight-hour day. Mr. Walsh said that the agents were told: "We are willing that you should work eight hours; we do not ask you to work more. But we do ask you to spread that eight hours over the day; that is, to be on duty when the first train requires your attention in the morning. If there is no other train for two or three hours, you may do as you like during that time, but be on duty when the next train comes along and take care of it." But the reply of the men was: "We belong to the union, and they will not let us do that." The result is that these men work their eight-hour day and if a customer comes half an hour or even ten minutes late for his freight or on any other business, there is nobody to attend to him. If the work is to be done, arrangements have to be made with the agent to pay him time and a half after he has put in his eight hours. This applies to the whole system, all the way down. Mr. Walsh says that the men are being paid twice as much as they were being paid five years ago, and that it now requires two men where one man formerly did the work with ease. How can you expect, he says, a reduction of freight rates under these conditions?

Mr. HUMPHREY: I would like to ask the hon. member if he has compared the rates paid those men with the rates paid to any other classes of labour in Canada?

Mr. McCREA: I would be glad to answer the question if I could hear it, but I am hard of hearing and I have not been able to grasp my hon. friend's question. In any case I would ask my hon. friend and all other hon. members to wait until I have finished, and then I shall be glad to answer any questions they may wish to put.

Mr. HUMPHREY: Shall I repeat the question, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. McCREA: What is the question? If the hon. member can speak loud enough to make me hear, I will try to answer his question.

Mr. HUMPHREY: I asked the hon. member if he had compared the rates of wages paid to the men he speaks of with the wages paid any other men in Canada performing that work or any other work of the kind?

Mr. McCREA: I suppose they are not paid any more than other men in similar employment. But this condition applies to all railways and it is responsible for the high rates which prevail. I assume, from where the hon. member (Mr. Humphrey) sits in the House that he is one of the Progressives and, consequently, a farmer. I would ask him if he would carry out his business on that system?

Mr. LAPOINTE: He is a railway employee.

Mr. McCREA: If he is not a farmer, let him ask the farmers around him if they could carry on their business on any system of eight hours a day or less.

Mr. HUMPHREY: I may tell my hon. friend that I am not a farmer, if that is any satisfaction to him.

Mr. McCREA: I say that this system applies not only to the agents but to all the railway employees. Mr. Walsh told me at the same time, by way of illustration, what now happens in the case of a locomotive which comes in for repairs. The engineer in charge runs it into the shop and reports to the master mechanic that some repairs are necessary. The master mechanic sends a machinist to make the repairs, with all the necessary tools. But when the machinist examines the engine he finds, perhaps, that a steam pipe is leaking—possibly needs to be tightened up. Now he has all the tools, all the equipment to do that work, just as it had been done for years before this McAdoo system of running railways in Canada came into force. But he dare not touch the job; he has to send back to the shops for a steamfitter to come in and fix that pipe, though it is a job which he himself could do in five minutes. The same thing applies to half a dozen different parts of the engine. Work that one man used to do now takes three or four men before the job is completed. Now, I am not interested in the railways; I have not a dollar in railway stock. But I ship as much freight as any man in this House. I ask hon. members who criticise the railways and find fault with them: how are the railways to cope with this condition? The railways should be in a position to say to these men: "You must do thus and so, as you did before; conditions have changed; you also must change and come back to normal conditions." When a strike is called, who calls it? Mr. Carey of Indianapolis, or some other leader of an organization. In the election of 1911 we heard a great deal from our friends on the other side of the House to the effect that there should be no truck or trade with the Yankees. Well, so far as the Yankees running our railway system is concerned; so far as their dictating when and how and how many hours our men shall work and what pay they shall receive, I say it is time that we had no truck and no trade in that direction. We ought to say: "Hands off; we will run our own business."

I am not in favour of low wages; I think I have stated that in this House before. I am a farmer's son. I was born and brought up on a farm—not a very rich one, either—and at a time when money did not come easily. Moreover, when I left my father's farm I went out as a labouring man, and without friends, without money, without anything to recommend me to the world. If I have had some degree of success it has been by putting into practice what I am now preaching to others; it has been the result of thrift and industry, of taking care of my money and not spending more than I earned. I think, therefore, I have the right to give some advice on these particular questions. I say I am not in favour of very much lower wages, but I am in favour of every man, no matter what position he holds, doing an honest and fair day's work for the money he receives. This classifying of labour—and there are some men in this House who know the results of it—this classifying of labour which calls upon a man to do a particular work and forbids him to do anything else, has cost this country a lot of money. I have no quarrel with labour; what I am saying now is, I believe, in the best interests of labour. I say to the young man in this country who is starting out as I did, without friends, relations, education or anything else to recommend him, the best thing he can do is to show his employer that he is interested in his work and trying to earn money for him. That is the way he will get promotion. If his employer does not notice his faithfulness and other good qualities, somebody else will. That is the best road to success that I know of.

Mr. Beatty, in his evidence before the Railway Committee the other day, said that he proposed to reduce the rates, but he was very cautious to add, on conditions, and what were the conditions? On condition that labour costs were reduced. If Mr. Beatty and Mr. Hanna were the managers of these two great railway systems as they ought to be, they would be able to say: "We are going to reduce the rates." But they are only in a position to say: "We will reduce the rates if Mr. Carey allows us, and if he does not, we cannot help ourselves." I do not know whether everybody in this House realizes it or not, but in my judgment our railway rates have reached such an exorbitant point that business is practically paralyzed, and on top of that we have $100,000,000 of deficits on the government-owned railways. I ask the Government and this House what are we going to do to remedy the situation? During the war, prices of everything went up, materials, wheat, lumber and everything else. Railway rates also went up; that was all right, and so did wages. Now we have reached the period where the prices of all commodities have diminished, in some cases more than 50 per cent, but labour costs have not come down in proportion. What we ask, and what we have the right to ask, of labour is that their costs should come down in proportion to the value of the goods they produce, but they do not appear to be willing to allow that. I say that if this Government have the power to legislate on the question, they should do so, and if they have not the power, we should hold a conference as they did in England, to see what they will allow us to do, because the situation is so grave. To my mind these are the only two courses, and one of them we cannot adopt too soon. If we have the power to say to these people: "You shall not go on strike," or "You shall not hold up the business of this country"—whichever way you choose to put it—if we have that power, all right. If we have not, let us invite them to a conference, take off our hats, and say: "Gentlemen, what will you allow us to do? The conditions are so grave that we cannot go on this way much longer, and some remedy must be found." I am not complaining about wages so much as the lack of efficiency. Labour is clamouring for shorter hours and more pay. I do not object so much to the more pay as I do to the shorter hours. There is a strike of the coal miners on in the United States at the present time, and one of their demands is for a six-hour day—the six hours to be counted from the time they leave the surface until they get back up again—and a five-day week. How can we expect cheap transportation when the steam for hauling our freight has to be generated from coal mined under those conditions? What right has a man who has to work for a living, whether he be a coal miner or any body else, to ask that the industry he is engaged in shall receive such a price for its products that it can afford to employ him for a six-hour day and a five-day week, or thirty hours a week altogether, when the farmer and the man who feeds that labouring man has to work seven days a week and anywhere from ten to fifteen hours a day?

Here is the situation. The people of this country are made up of groups. They do not all work in the same shop. One group is making boots and shoes, another group clothing, another group hats and caps, and so on. But there is another group, which comprises at least fifty per cent of the total population of Canada, and it is those who till the soil, and that group cannot carry on their business on an eight-hour day or a forty-four hour week. I am speaking now of the dairy farmer, not the wheat miner as some people call him; he can probably get along on shorter hours; but the dairy farmer who produces the butter, the cheese, the eggs, the beef, the pork, the mutton, the vegetables, and all the rest that goes to feed the nation, has to work six days a week and do his chores on Sunday, and he is very lucky if he gets the chance to go to church. The dairy farmer is not the only one who has to work long hours. It is the same in the lumbering industry. You cannot river-drive or carry on lumbering operations on a six-hour day. And there are many other industries in that category. I ask, what right has the man who works in a shoe factory and makes the shoes the farmer has to buy to say that the farmer must pay sufficient money for those shoes to enable that factory to pay its labour on the basis of an eight-hour day or a forty-four hour week, when the farmer himself is working six days a week and anywhere from ten to fifteen hours a day? Someone may say that the farmer is idling part of his time, that he does not work on rainy days, for instance. I was brought up on the farm, and I know there are all kinds of farmers, as well as all kinds of labourers. There are labourers who will not work until starvation forces them, and farmers who work when they must, but these are not the ones who contribute to the feeding of the nation. I am speaking of the men who feed the nation, the men who work six days a week, and have to do their chores on Sunday, or get somebody else to do them, and who are lucky if they can go to church. What right has the man who produces the coal, or the boots, or the clothing, to say to the farmer: "You must work ten or twelve hours a day, or longer, in order to produce what I require at low prices, while I on my side will work only forty-four hours a week, and loaf most of that time if I can"? I have lived a long time, but I have yet to learn where honest, faithful toil has ever killed anybody. I believe in honest, faithful toil, and in prudence and economy, and if you want to succeed that is my rule of success.

Some people may say: If you work every man ten hours a day, and every man works to his capacity, there will not be work enough to go round, and a lot of people will in consequence be idle. That may be true of China or any densely populated country, but in this young Canada of ours, with a population of less than ten million and a capacity to accommodate one hundred and fifty millions of people, with millions of acres of untilled, first-class choice land as good as any in the world, with her inexhaustible mineral and forest wealth,—does any man tell me that there is not enough work in this country for everybody who is willing to work? We are told to-day that there are numbers of men in the large cities out of employment—

Mr. McDONALD (Timiskaming): Does my hon. friend suggest that there are 250,000 people idle to-day because they do not desire to work?

Mr. McCREA: I am told that; I have not got the actual proof. Let me tell you—

Mr. McDONALD (Timiskaming): Will the hon. gentleman deny the statistics compiled by his own government?

Mr. McCREA: I am not denying anything. I said I had been told there are 250,000 idle men. But will my hon. friend tell me what those men are looking for? Are they looking for work, or is it "positions" they want?

Mr. McDONALD (Timiskaming): Don't make any unfair accusations.

Mr. McCREA: I know for a fact that in some cities idle men are walking the streets, and when work is offered to them they say "I want so and so." They want to select the work they shall do, and lay down the conditions of employment. I am told that is the class of men walking our streets to-day unemployed.

Mr. McDONALD (Timiskaming): I would like to—

Mr. McCREA: Will the hon. member or any one else tell me that in this country of ours—

Mr. McDONALD (Timiskaming): I would like to ask the hon. member another question. Am I within my rights in doing so, or not?

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: I would advise the hon. member that the hon. member having the floor need not answer questions unless he is willing to do so.

Mr. McDONALD (Timiskaming): Will the hon. member answer my question?

Mr. McCREA: I contend that in this country with its millions of acres of untilled land, with its abundance of timber, of minerals, and all kinds of wealth there is no need for any person to be idle—

Mr. McDONALD (Timiskaming): Why are they idle?

Mr. McCREA: —and I wish to say further: that the great majority of the men that are walking the streets and claiming they are in search of work are looking for positions, not work; positions where they can get a living with practically nothing to do. There are always lots of men engaged in that kind of quest. At the same time, it is true that we are passing through extremely hard times, and I say that if there are men or women that are destitute and are willing to work but cannot get employment, and have no money upon which to subsist, the country should take care of them. Nevertheless such people should be told "This country has resources and employment can be found for every man and every woman who is able and willing to work. We are going to help you now but see to it that you do not fall into need again. Take care of yourself; find some employment because there is plenty for you to do." If there are so many idle people why have we an immigration policy seeking to bring outsiders to this country? Either we have room and employment for immigrants, or conditions are such that we do not want any more outsiders.

I have a remedy for the existing situation and I am going to explain it to the House, but I would not advise this or any other government to adopt the suggestion right off. Let them ponder it well and if they think as I do they will come to the conclusion that the remedy is one worth trying. But the people will need to be educated to an understanding of what the proposition means, and of the beneficial results which will follow. My proposition is this: In the first place I would say to the labouring class, or any other class, that if they wish to form a union they have a perfect right to do that, because in union there is strength. But if they form a union they should do it under the laws of the country in the same manner that any other incorporated company is formed—if any company wishes to commence operations in Canada the first thing it must do is get a charter. That charter defines what the company may or may not do, and sets forth that those concerned are amenable to the law and must live up to any agreement into which it enters. I maintain that the first thing the government ought to do is to pass a law that a union of labour men, or organization of any other kind, must be responsible and amenable to the laws of the land. The next step should be to select from among the best men available persons learned in the law and persons experienced in industrial, labour, and other matters, to form a board to deal with labour situations. Then the government should make it an unlawful offence either for employees to walk out or for employers to declare a lock-out. That does not mean that capital and labour would not be always able to agree when differences arose, but what would happen would be this: In the event of a failure on the part of the representatives of labour to agree with the representatives of the particular company concerned, both sides should go before this commission and be heard as in the case of proceedings in a court of justice. After hearing the facts the commission would give its finding, which would be binding on both parties to the dispute. In the meantime there would have been no strike, and no holding up of business. At present, men go on strike because they have no other remedy—that is the only course open to them. Why not try an arbitration first, why not try to reach a settlement before deciding to stike? It is not merely the men and their employers that are interested; the public generally are concerned. For example, take the strike which occurred in New York last fall when probably three or four thousand milk drivers, and a number of milk dealers went out. What was the outcome? There was almost an epidemic among thousands of children in New York, where they were depending on getting milk and could not get it. Why should such a thing exist? Is that a humane way to settle trouble? I claim it is not.

The nations engaged in the great war which ended a few years ago lost millions of men, and after the war they met in order to settle terms of peace, which are not settled yet. Why should they not have had this agreement before? We should have a period of education, and people should be taught the proper way to settle such matters. I think seventy-five to ninety per cent of the men who go on strike cannot afford to do it, and fifty per cent do not want to strike. The men who make a business of engineering these strikes go round, hold meetings, and make the men believe that their employers are the greatest enemies they have, and are trying to crush and ruin them, when the facts are exactly the opposite. Any employer of labour who understands his business—and I think most of them do—realize that the goodwill of their employees is the best asset they can have, and they have no desire to crush those employees. The commission which I propose would deal with that aspect of it, and would do justice to all parties. The reason I suggest a period of education in these matters is because the men have only heard one side of the story. They have listened to the agitators, who tell them their employers are trying to crush them out of existence. Under the arrangement I propose, men will have their differences settled by the commission, and will receive their just and honest dues. The commissioners will be men of experience and the matter will be settled in the interests of the men and everybody concerned. Under these conditions, the employer could afford to pay his men better money. At present, if a contract of some magnitude is to be let in this city or elsewhere, the man who proposes to tender for that contract does not know where he is at. Suppose he tenders, is awarded the contract, and gets everything ready, and the labourers ask wages that he cannot conceive to be reasonable. Then they go on strike, and months elapse, and perhaps the period during which the work should be done will have passed. The consequence may be that the contractor is called upon to do the work in the fall or winter, when it would cost double the money it would cost at another period. The contractor does not make any money, and the labourers do not make any money because they are on strike. Under the system of arbitration, if the labourers did not agree with the contractor who tendered for a certain work, he would know there would be no strike on his hands. But he might have to pay the men more money, but that would be a mere bagatelle compared with the cost of doing the work at the wrong time of the year, when it cannot be done to advantage.

Mr. IRVINE: Does the hon. member think that this tirade of hackneyed nonsense is helping to settle the problem?

Some hon MEMBERS: Order, order.

Mr. McCREA: The labour element of the country has only heard the agitator's end of the story, and he would be out of a job if my plan were put into effect, but that would be a benefit to all concerned. I come from the city of Sherbrooke, and two-thirds of my electors, at least, belong to the labouring class. I have expressed my views to them before, and I am not afraid to do it again. In my opinion it is the solution of this trouble, and I believe when this Government goes before the country again they would be well advised if they adopted my suggestion or something along similar lines. I believe it is reasonable, fair and just to all parties. Can any hon. member show me a case where, being dissatisfied with their conditions, men have gone out on strike for one week or six months, and have derived any benefit? In cases of strikes, finally, after having exhausted what little means they have, the men come down to a method of adjustment. Why not have the adjustment before the strike, instead of after? I believe it is proper for the men to form unions to put their case before the public; but if they are going to unionize the men should do it under the law of the country and should not be allowed to do it in any other way. Under present conditions when a strike takes place a commission is appointed to investigate. Nine times out of ten the members of that commission have had no experience in regard to labour or capital. The commissioner may be a judge, perhaps learned in the law, but he knows nothing about labour. I propose to have men of experience in this particular work, who know what is necessary and what is fair and just to both parties. The troubles between the men and the employers could be adjusted, with no tie-up of business conditions. In cases of strikes it is not merely the labourers and employers who are affected, but, in cases of railway strikes, the whole community suffers. I contend that the very best asset any man can have in the industrial world is the goodwill of his employees. If he has not that, I pity him. I have been a labourer; I have been an employer of labour for many years, and the best asset I want to have, or believe I can have, is to have the goodwill and good wishes of the men who work for me. I have, however, never yet allowed, and I do not intend to allow any man to dictate to me and say: "This is my particular job; I will do this and I will do nothing else; I am hired to do this work, and if I can do it in an hour a day, I will not do anything else." If a man agrees to work for me eight hours a day and I agree to pay him for that, I expect him to work for me eight hours a day; and if there is something which he can do in the interest of me or the company which I represent, I expect him to do it. Surely that is a reasonable request. So long as the railways in this country are run on the McAdoo system of every man having a particular work which is classified, and is not being permitted to do anything else, we need not look for cheaper rates or better conditions. The sooner we get away from the idea that every man should have a fixed job and nothing else, the better it will be for everybody.

I think I have taken up enough of the time of the House; but I wish to touch upon one other matter. In the Agricultural Committee a few days ago I made some remarks which evidently pleased some people and displeased others. The only comment I care to make upon the matter is that, as my remarks were made in the committee they are not published in Hansard, and the only report is the report made by the newspapers. In that particular case, the report of part of what I said was correct, but part of my remarks was omitted. I commenced my remarks with regard to the Civil Service by saying that, in the Civil Service, there were a number of good men and good women who were earning the money they were getting and who were capable of earning more provided they worked more hours, as I think they should. I also said that quite a number of them were not earning their money. In addition to that I think I said—I do not want my remarks to be interpreted as meaning that these people were no good—that when you employ more men than you have work for, people who have not anything to do become parasites. I said that in the Civil Service there were a certain number of employees who were simply parasites because they were not earning their money, and the reason that they were not earning their money was because they had not sufficient work to do, as the service was overmanned. That was my statement, and I do not propose to retract it, whether it pleases or displeases. I also said that my advice to the Government would be as soon as possible to get busy and dispense with the services of those whom they did not require. I also said that many of these people were overpaid and that they were not earning their money. I have had some comment from different parties; I heard very loud talk of their poverty, how they were underpaid and badly treated, how they were living in almost starvation conditions. All I have to say in that respect is this: If anybody doubts that they are pretty prosperous people, let him walk down the streets about this time —it is now about a quarter to five, and they are not supposed to be out until five o'clock; but you will find many of them a little ahead of time—and you will think they are coming out of church. Just notice how they are dressed. If you saw the two crowds, one coming out of the government offices and the other coming from church, you would not know which was which.

I should like to cite some figures. I have always been in favour of giving good wages to people who earn their money, and I have no objection to paying good wages to the Civil Service or any other service, because my judgment is that that is the only way to deal with workers who earn their money. But when civil servants complain about their meagre salaries or wages, we must consider that their hours of labour are six and a half hours a day. Those are supposed to be the hours of labour, but they do not always work that number of hours. Take for instance, a man or a woman receiving $1,000 a year for 300 days a year and six and a half hours a day, you will find that he or she gets 51½ cents an hour for every hour's service that he or she is supposed to put in. Any person who wants to hire labour can hire as much as he wants and can get it to work hard for much less than that. The man who receives $1,200 a year is being paid at the rate of 61 cents an hour; the man who receives $1,400 a year is being paid at the rate of 73 cents an hour. The man who receives $2,000 a year is getting $1.03 for every hour he works, and the man who gets $2,400 a year receives $1.23 for every hour he works. My contention is: If they are not satisfied with the money they are receiving, in the first place, why did they take the job? In the second place, why do they not get something else to do somewhere else? Conditions are such to-day that everybody is asked to retrench and cut down expenses, and it is no more hardship on the Civil Service than on anybody else to cut down expenses and live within their means, especially at the present time when, as an hon. member said, many men are walking the streets and cannot get anything to do at all. Two or three years ago, conditions may have been somewhat different; but to-day we have reached a point that when you walk into a saloon and call for a drink of lemonade, you are taxed a few cents additional to pay for the cost of running the country and the deficit on the government-owned railways. Every cheque you sign has to have an extra stamp or two put on it for the same reason. Surely, then, it is time for the people to consider which way we are travelling and to economize. Whether the Civil Service are pleased or displeased, we should say to them: "If you are not satisfied with conditions, the best thing for you to do is to economize, and if you are still not satisfied, you can go and find work somewhere else."

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN (South York): Mr. Speaker, I intend to take up only a very short time of the House; but for a moment I wish to refer somewhat to the arguments advanced by the hon. member who preceded me (Mr. McCrea). In the speech just delivered by him he came out against public ownership of railways, against organized labour and against almost the right of labour or any other class of the community to organize to protect itself.

Mr. McCREA: May I correct the hon. member?

Mr. MACLEAN (York): Keep your seat. Hold on. I never heard such a denunciation of a political party and of political leaders as came from the mouth of my hon. friend, sitting, as he does, behind hon. gentlemen now responsible for the administration of government. He denounced the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King); he denounced the Minister of Railways (Mr. Kennedy), who has enunciated in this House the railway policy of the Government, and most of all, he denounced the Minister of Labour (Mr. Murdock). Indeed, the Minister of Labour blushed all the time the hon. member spoke. The labour interests of this country will look for the support of the Minister of Labour. He has been taking notes, and I know in a short time he will come forward to state the case of organized labour.

Mr. MURDOCK: The hon. member is mistaken. I am writing a letter to a friend.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): Surely the minister is not going to allow this attack on organized labour to pass without putting in a word for the labouring people, especially as he chased after the office he got and was elected to it and is in the Government as Minister of Labour. I leave the matter in that way to him and his supporters. I have always been in favour of public ownership, and after my present experience I am more in favour of it than ever.

Mr. McCREA: May I be permitted to make a statement? The hon. gentleman has repeated two or three times that I am opposed to organized labour. I said that I am not opposed; that I thought it was necessary that labour should be organized. I am not opposed to organized labour, but I am opposed to its running the country.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): It is all very well for the hon. member now to say that he is in favour of organized labour. But was there ever such a denunciation of the right of labour to organize in this country as has come from him to-day? My hon. friend is a pulp manufacturer, and in connection with the industry in which he is interested he recognizes the principle of collective bargaining. In his business that principle is observed every day. The trouble in Canada to-day, however, is not so much that we have organized labour, or that we are perplexed over public ownership, as it is in the fact that there has been a lot of profiteering as a result of the war. Perhaps the charge will apply to organized labour to some extent, but it no doubt applies to the industries of the country and the capitalists behind them; and if that is the case my hon. friend is narrow in his denunciation of organized labour. He must take a broad view of things and recognize the right of labour to organize, as that right is recognized the world over. No doubt mistakes have been made and unfair things done under the aegis of organized labour; but I say there was never such profiteering, as a result of the war, as was practised in connection with organized industries of the character and organization which my hon. friend represents. Just think of what the pulp manufacturers did to the banks of the country, and, through them, to the people. They wrecked more homes in Montreal through speculation in paper stocks, and so forth, than anything else in the country did; and the thing is still going on. I know one bank in the country that lost $6,000,000 to one of these pulp organizations. And I know what I lost myself, because the paper makers with whom I had been doing business for thirty or forty years actually told me, after I had paid them millions of dollars: "We don't want your business any longer; take it away and close your accounts." And when the accounts were closed they had to give me back a cheque. Why should an ordinary publisher in this country be told, by men with whom he had been doing business for nearly forty years, that his business was no longer wanted and that he could take it away? I know how that treatment originated. But it has been the experience of nearly everyone in the country that there has been profiteering on an enormous scale on the part of men carrying on industries, just as there may have been something of the kind in connection with labour. The hon. gentleman not only denounced the late government and its policy, but he eulogized the farmers, saying what a fine lot they were and how hard they worked. Well, they number 65 strong in this House, and they are here as an organized body. They have a right to organize and come here as collective bargainers, and surely they will not deny the same right to labour.

Mr. MORRISON: They do not go on strike, though.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): Not in the ordinary sense, perhaps, but they are on strike in this House; and the farmers in the United States Congress are among the greatest strikers in the world. Are not my hon. friends to my left on strike now in connection with several public questions?

Mr. MORRISON: Oh, no.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): My hon. friend will be able to speak for himself later. I say that the greatest strike in the world to-day is being put up by the farmers' bloc in the United States Congress, and an approach is being made to the same thing in this country. My hon. friends have my sympathy, I admit, because the farmer in Canada, no doubt, has some grievances. And the hon. member opposite (Mr. McCrea) evidently does not want to allow them any relief in connection with the railways. His argument was not quite logical to me, and he did not state the full facts. However, I shall come to that in due course. Now, at a time when we are trying to pull the railways out of the difficulties in which they are struggling to-day, my hon. friend wants the Government to assume the responsibility of calling a halt and adopting the strange policy of going to the schoolhouses with a certain propaganda of instruction to the farmers as to how they should, or rather should not, organize, continuing that course of education for a time, and then appointing some board of arbitration to pass certain regulations with the object of denying the right of collective bargaining. If his remarks mean anything they simply mean that we should pass laws to put men into gaol—I believe those are among the words he used—if they refuse to accept certain decisions that may be given on labour matters. In the twentieth century he is preaching a doctrine centuries old, a doctrine the practice of which has caused untold mischief in the history of the world. Among those people who are gradually being freed from the conditions that have held them down for centuries is the ordinary agricultural labourer in England. We hear a great deal about the beauty of England and how splendid a place it is in so many respects. But the other side of the story is not so engaging, especially when we remember that there are so many agricultural labourers lying in the village churchyards in that country without any headstones to tell who they are. England was made great by economic injustice to the labouring population, not only to those who work in factories but those who labour on the farms as well; and the only hope which the labouring classes of Britain and of Europe, who have suffered this injustice for over two hundred years, have of improving their situation is by some form of collective bargaining, or unionism.

My hon. friend denounced the railways of the country, but he suppresses the main facts. He says that there is an awful situation in connection with the railways to-day. So there is. But who brought it about? The politicians, among whom are he and I. It is the orgy of railway expenditures which have been voted during the past twenty years that has brought about this condition and helped to demoralize transportation, until the governments of this country, but particularly the last government, decided that there should be no more subsidizing of railways. And, inasmuch as the railways were bankrupt, it was deemed wise to take them over and consolidate them. Now we have the roads and we are faced with a deficit, and the way to decrease that deficit is first of all to coordinate all the railways that we have now on our hands. When will the policy be brought forward which the Minister of Railways (Mr. Kennedy) promised us in the statement he submitted to Parliament some time ago? He told us that we were to have a high-class board to administer the roads and that economies would be effected by the consolidation of the three or four systems that we have. When we can do that we can hope to be able to make a decent showing. But it is because certain railways are opposed to public ownership, fearing the competition from that source, that the effort is being made now to thwart the consolidation of the National Railways and the putting of a proper business administration at their head. Now, that criticism does not apply to the Government; it would be an unfair criticism of the Government, and I do not think that any one would resent it more than the Prime Minister, the Minister of Railways and the Minister of Labour. The railway men have possibly made mistakes; and the McAdoo award may have been wrong. There have been many mistakes made in this world in connection with other organizations, and undoubtedly mistakes may have been made by the railways. But what has been done has been done, and we must deal with the situation as it exists and take steps to remedy it. But you cannot remedy it by such means as my hon. friend proposes. He makes a proposition for the suppression of strikes; but he can suppress strikes only by keeping an organized police force of 100,000 men at a great expense to the country. I think the hon. gentleman was rather juvenile in his discussion of the question, as well as in his reasoning. We must face the condition of affairs which exists. A number of our working people have but one trade; the character of our industrial organization may have brought that about. Of course, the ideal condition is that under which a man has his little farm, his little home, an acre of land and a cow. But the world of to-day is not organized in that way, nor are we to be relieved from the awful effects of the late war by any such condition. We must have organization, of capital, of labour, of industry. Why, even the political parties in this country are based on organization; the only thing is—and I want to tell it to my friends opposite—the two old parties think that nobody else has the right to organize and get into the same business. The arguments my hon. friend has made may be interesting talk for the day; it may suit his constituents; he may be able to say these things to the working people in his own home town. But he is not living in this century; he is not facing squarely the problems which are confronting the people of Canada. For my part, I propose to address myself to the actual questions which face us and to which it is my right in a debate like this to direct the attention of the House.

One of the outstanding results of the war and of the Imperial conferences that have been held has relation to the status of Canada. At one time we were simply a Crown colony, but our status has expanded; greater responsibilities have come to us, and I see nothing ahead of us but a reconsideration of the whole question as to where we are and in what direction we are going constitutionally. As hon. gentlemen know, the British Empire is bound together by the principle of loyalty to the Crown. The supremacy of the Crown rests upon an act of Parliament, and that act of Parliament, which regulates the royal succession of the House of Brunswick, may be repealed any day by a democratic revolution in the form of a general election in England. If our position in the Empire is subject to that state of affairs, we must begin to think of what is going to happen. In view of the recognition of the dominions as co-equal with the Mother Country, it seems to me that we are coming to a condition where there will have to be some kind of federation of all these dominions on the basis of a written instrument. Strange to say, the whole policy of the British communities is not the result of a written instrument, as in the case of the United States; it is based on acts of the British Parliament which can be repealed at any time. I say that there will have to be a federation of English-speaking communities, especially those which enjoy British institutions; and under the written instrument on which it is based the various states will have the right to make their own constitutions. I stand here to-day in favour of Canada having the absolute authority to make her own constitution, just as the Commonwealth of Australia has done. That will come in a very short time, and we must prepare ourselves for it. In fact it is being forced upon us as the result of the war and of the Imperial conferences to which I have referred. Particularly in view of the uncertainty as to what war is to be in the future, this greater federation will have to deal with the question of what powers shall be granted to these free states which compose it. We shall get as a result of that not only the right to make our own constitution, but the right to establish our own courts and to have a court of last resort under Canadian law. Not for one moment do I say that Canada will ever achieve what we have always said she should achieve if the present condition in that respect continues. I believe there will have to be a supreme court of some kind as between the members of the league, or federation, whatever you like to call it; but so far as Canada is concerned, I agree with what has been said in this House and out of it, that these matters should be placed under Canadian law and be determined in Canadian courts by Canadian judges, who shall hear the arguments of Canadian lawyers, and the decisions ought to be filed in this country, no matter what they concern. While it is otherwise, we are more or less in a state of tutelage.

The most interesting question which now confronts us in this respect is with regard to war. War has not ceased. The great chemists, the greatest men of science, are busy to-day devising the most devilish systems for the destruction of humanity, and we are fools if we do not pay some attention to the question of what we ought to do in the matter of defence. I see no way out of it but an early convention of the different parts of the British Empire which will comprise this league of states to which I have referred, and this convention will have to decide what we are to do in the matter of war. We must settle the question whether this damnable system of scientific destruction of humanity is to be allowed to have a free hand from now on. That is the danger to every community. The time, unfortunately, has come when a peaceful country cannot for a moment maintain its place when such a war comes on unless it is ready for it. And some war of that kind is right ahead of us. Germany may be preparing for war; she has some of the ablest scientific men in the world. Some things were disclosed during the late war which indicated in an astounding way the extent to which human destruction could be carried on. Ships were destroyed from aeroplanes by radio control of bombs, and I want to tell the House that inventions of that kind have been and are now being worked out, and humanity is up against them for the future. It is time we had a convention of this kind and that we decided what we shall do in the way of our defence. True, we can hope for what arbitration may bring about. We have a League of Nations with its seat at The Hague, to which international questions are referred, and an effort is being made to get all the nations to agree to do away with war, but they have not done it so far. It is true they are scrapping certain ships and cutting down expenditure on armament, but some kind of war is ahead of us. Some kind of great constitutional shake-up is also ahead of us, as one of the nations under the British Crown. These questions must be considered; much as we dislike to talk about them, they are ahead of us, and we cannot evade them. We have to come to a decision as to what our position shall be in the British Empire, and also on the consequent question, what are to be our rights and duties in connection with our constitution:—Are we to be absolutely free within our own country? Such questions must come up and must all be decided. It is the result of our constitutional growth and development. We may have to come to a decision pretty soon on the question of defence. We are certainly up against it financially, as this budget shows. Enormous sums of money have to be raised, and heavy taxation is being imposed. With this taxation ahead of us, it is time that we began to consider and discuss these questions in a broad way.

Another question that is coming up is that of race aggression. We have to protect our own races in this country. We are threatened by all kinds of racial aggression to-day, and the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill) dealt with that subject for a moment. There is an attempt on the part of the orientals, and on the part of people in eastern and south eastern Europe, to get a foothold in this country. We must consider whether the races in this country can keep their position and endure in view of this inrush of orientals and Europeans I have before me a telegram in connection with that immigration from Europe, which I shall read a little later on. It is another question on which we must come to some kind of a decision.

Now I come to the question of transportation, and other associated questions raised by my hon. friend, and I want to bring them up in a rather broad way. We have had these questions discussed in this House and all over this country. I am going to lay down here to-day, and I ask the attention of hon. gentlemen to it, a Bill of Rights for the public services of this country. I have been studying this matter very carefully for the last two weeks and I have put the issue in shape for presentation to-day to the House and the country. Now what is this Bill of Rights that is hastening on in this country so fast that we cannot quite appreciate it? Let me read it to the House, and I invite the attention of hon. gentlemen who care to say something about it. I intend to make this Bill of Rights a part of my speech, and it will be printed in Hansard to-morrow:

Bill of Rights of Canadian Public Services.

The Government of Canada by itself or in association with others, or by delegation to others, to acquire, undertake and operate the following public services:

1. Transportation: A National System of Transportation, in and out of Canada, by railway, highway, waterway, airway or other way or means, singly or jointly, including warehouses, elevators, terminal facilities, and also including the purchase, production, distribution and sale of electrical or other energy or source thereof.

2. Communications: A National System of Communications in and out of Canada by post, express, wire, wave or other means, singly or jointly.

3. Banking: A National System of Banking in and out of Canada associated with the Post Office or banks or bankers or otherwise, including rediscounting for banks and provinces, the making of advances on warehouse receipt or other security.

4. Marketing: A National System of Marketing of farm and other staple products, with or without co-operation of organized producers or holders thereof, including the making of advances on such products in store or other security until marketed.

5. Waterways for sea vessels: The Government of Canada by itself or in conjunction with the United States or others to establish waterways for sea-going vessels to inland lake and river ports; and wherever possible to develop water or other power for the movement of traffic as may be agreed upon.

Finance: Such services to be financed out of the National Treasury, or by arrangements with banks or others or by bond issue of the national government or of others, bearing bank or bond interest, further secured when so provided on the undertaking or product.

Management: The administration of any such national service or any other public service in whole or in part, may be associated with that of any other public service in whole or in part; And these or other public services, wherever possible, to be made community centres so as to secure day and night service and every day service and efficient service to the greatest number of beneficiaries thereof or participants therein.

That, I take it, is a Bill of Rights in regard to these public services, and every one of the principles involved therein has been adopted more or less by this House, but they have never been brought together in this way. I have put them together in this form, and I take the responsibility of saying that on this Bill of Rights the next general election in Canada will be fought. It deals with transportation, with communications, with banking, with marketing, with waterways for sea vessels, and the financing and management of these services. As I said, all these matters have come up in this House, but they have all been disassociated from one another. The time has come when there can be no more trifling in this House with these services; we must deal with them adequately, or throw them out. We must either have, or not have, a national system of transportation. If we are to have a national system of transportation, it must be broad enough to take in every means of transport mentioned in this Bill of Rights. It must included the railway, the highway, the radial, the boat on the lake and on the sea. We have been told in the past in this House that there could be no regulation of freight rates in this country because some freight passes by boats, and boats were not under the jurisdiction of the Railway Commission. I am not aware if the hon. members of this House know what hard work some of us had to get even vessels carrying the traffic of this country brought under the Railway Act. We did succeed in that, and now we are proposing developments in other directions. For example, there are what the French call "communications", embracing the post office, express, telegraph and telephone services. We are conducting all these to-day, but the work should be done on well defined grounds and under well defined responsibility. My hon. friend from St. John (Mr. MacLaren) had a question on the Order Paper to-day dealing with the matter of cables. We have got immense investments in cables that we hardly know of; we also have immense investments in telegraphs, and similar investments in the wireless system. All these services we must co-ordinate and consolidate, and not turn them over to a private company as has been done in the States. The greatest monopoly in the world to-day is not the Standard Oil Company; it is the telegraph and telephone combination which has its headquarters in Boston and is taking over all the British cables. How many of us know that, except a few members who are interested in that subject? The same combination have taken over all the land lines in the States, and most of the other associated interests. That combination is the American Telegraph and Telephone Company; it is not the Westinghouse Company. The commitments in Canada, to which I have alluded, are so great, the services are so great, that, in these progressive times, now that they have got into the hands of the state and are being handled by the state, they must be co-ordinated. Furthermore we must have community centres in which these services will play an important part, as I pointed out in the declaration which I read. Why should not the post office, and the government telegraph, express and money order business, be located in a little central office in a community centre? That is what the West wants to-day more than anything else. Now that we are having public ownership of railways I hope we shall also have in the West, in every hamlet and every township, some kind of a community centre controlled by the government and that government handling the post office, the telegraph service and the express service, all adjacent to the telephone system, having an all-night and an all-day service such as the people want. But we cannot carry on business efficiently in the future unless we co-ordinate all these services; and, as I said before, there is not one of these things we have not already done in this country only it was in a disconnected way.

The right hon. gentleman (Mr. Meighen) who led the late government, and his associates, engaged in a banking business in this country and they helped to save Canada. It is considered to be a disgrace that the country shall be in the banking business; but during the war we carried on a system of re-discounting for the banks the facts as to which have never been disclosed to the people. There is no reason why the credit of the nation should not be used to a reasonable degree in connection with the marketing of our farm products, and other similar lines, but we ought to declare where we stand on these questions.

Now I come to one more thought on the subject of the employment of our waterways for seagoing vessels. The President of the United States—as far as we could gather from the public press, and from what the Prime Minister of Canada said here the other day—has made certain proposals to this Government in connection with the St. Lawrence waterways. Well, the Progressive element in the United States, the farmer's bloc, are in favour of the scheme. They are insisting on it, and it is their force which has compelled action by the United States government. The farmers to-day are the most dominating party in the United States; they have more influence in the American Senate than any other party, and they are compelling action by the so-called old fashioned Senate; they are the most progressive parliamentary party to be found over there. They have discussed all these questions which affect the farmers, including the transportation question, and while the stage of public ownership of transportation has not yet been reached they have come to approve of public ownership of the waterways and the development of electrical energy along those waterways for the traffic of the country. That is coming in the United States, and why should we not be willing to co-operate with that country in developing the St. Lawrence waterways? The Canadian government may have some reason why the question should not come up just now, but I hope they are not influenced in their action by the eastern seaports and the eastern cities of Canada. Because those seaports and those interests are assuming a dictatorial policy as to conduct and action, and as to what the people of the West should do in regard to their transportation problems. They have denied to us the right of free access to their ports and to their services for ocean going vessels carrying western products, and there is actually an organization in Canada now, and especially the city of Montreal and particularly in connection with the Canadian Pacific Railway, seeking to declare that we shall not have this development in connection with the Northwest and that we shall not have the benefit of sea transportation. What is the secret of the success of the cities and towns of Europe to-day? Is it due to the railroads? Over there seaports are open all the year round, and ships can navigate rivers and go from one inland place to another. Europe to-day is absolutely served and protected by a system of navigation, by freedom and interchange in the use of the sea, in the use of the railways, and in the use of the highways. In that way they are working out a great improvement in commerce. In this country to-day an organization is being perfected, and it has its headquarters in connection with the railroads of this country, having for its object to see to it that there shall not be waterway competition with the railways. The whole hope of the Canadian West is in getting water transportation, and reduced freight rates from that source alone. There has been more reduction effected in the cost of transportation by water competition than by anything else; but the railway interests to which I have referred do not like to see that competition and there is an organization entrenched in Montreal, perhaps in the Maritime provinces, perhaps somewhere in the city of Quebec, that would deny every port on lake Ontario, every port on lake Erie, every port on lake Huron, and every port on lake Superior its right to sea waterways and to the improvement of traffic charges. It is the most domineering system we have ever had in Canada. It is even said they are holding up the Prime Minister in regard to any policy he may have contemplated in connection with this matter. Well, when the issue as to this Bill of Rights is fought out I imagine the people will compel decisive action of some sort. I imagine that when the next election is fought it will be on these questions of transportation, communications, marketing, and banking. As I have already said, we have nibbled at every one of these issues. I do not know whether hon. gentlemen opposite, when they were previously in office, were committed to any of them or not. To-day we have national railways and national telegraphs, and we have to go the whole hog or none. We have some national banking. The greatest system of banking in the world to-day is the national banking system of United States, behind which they have the credit of the United States government, and to-day the United States is the master of finance for the world. She is coming to the relief of all countries. She has, time after time, come to the relief of the cotton growers and wheat growers of the United States. Mr. McAdoo has been very much denounced by the previous speaker. Well do I remember the time when the cotton and wheat men could not get money from the bankers, or had to pay 8, 9 or 10 per cent for it, and Mr. McAdoo, secretary of the treasury, said "Farmers you will get all the money you want for the movement of your crop in the shape of credit and government notes of the United States"—and the farmers were able to move their crops.

Mr. MORRISON: Do you not think that if the United States did a little more fighting she would not do so much financing?

Mr. MACLEAN (York): I am not their keeper. Does the hon. member not like the fact that United States have come to be the financial headquarters of the world, and every country is coming to them? They have a fine lot of resources, a magnificent system of national banking, and a reserve banking system by which the credit of the United States and the notes of the United States are placed behind the banks, and behind the farmers for the movement of their crops. They have at last got a uniform system of interest and low rates of interest. I have discussed the question of how the public services were to be financed, and have laid down the doctrine that they should be financed by the bonds of the nation at bank interest or bond interest, as against the exorbitant interest on watered stocks which are behind a lot of complaints against transportation in the United States. The watered stock business, which has played the mischief with the pulp and other industries, is not a good system on which to finance public services. Look at the result in the financing of the Grand Trunk, the Canadian Northern and some other railways. It was bad financing, and the lack of financing on the part of those behind the questions of transportation and banking, that caused the trouble. These may be regarded as absurd ideas because they are not in harmony with the general belief, but, as a matter of fact, every one of them is practised by this country. I believe the Government to-day, and the previous government, have re-discounted for the banks, and the governments have financed the railways by giving them enormous credits. We should have taken over these roads, instead of giving them large sums of money, and then letting them go into bankruptcy. Of course, my hon. friend has the right to speak against public ownership, and especially in regard to the railways we have now on our hands; but we have them and we must pull them out by co-operation, and finance them on the credit of the nation. I ask the Government what they intend to do, and when they intend to do it, in regard to the consolidation and co-ordination of the railways we have on hand. Enormous economies can be effected almost immediately by the co-ordination of the railways. I will promise to resign my seat in the House, if I cannot show the Government or the Minister of Railways (Mr. Kennedy) where enormous improvements can be made, where expensive grades can be eliminated and where a better transcontinental service can be effected. I have made a careful study of it, and I can show the Government an enormous saving on the route from Toronto to Ottawa. Starting from North Toronto I would take a route which, with some construction—including a bridge which would cost some money—would give a grade of less than one-half of one per cent and would avoid the present expensive grade of the Grand Trunk and the more difficult grade of the Canadian Pacific known as the Wexford grade. Then, by following existing lines, especially the Grand Trunk Montreal line which has the best grade of any road in America, I would reach Prescott, and so north to Ottawa. And I would double track the whole line. By economies of that kind, applied all over Ontario, applied to the Canadian Northern, to the Grand runk, to the Intercolonial, to the Grand Trunk Pacific and to the other roads in the West, you would get reduced costs, no duplication, and the elimination of unnecessary trains. Is there any need for six or eight trains every night between Toronto and Ottawa, and between Toronto and Montreal? Is there any need for the transcontinental trains running across the continent on both roads, when probably half the number would do the work more efficiently? Certainly, in these times of financial distress, such a scheme would give a real relief to transportation and to the public finances. The country is anxiously waiting, not for a declaration of policy, because the minister has announced that policy, but to see in what way those economies will be put into effect, and how soon we will have a managing board to administer these roads. The appointment of that board should be made almost immediately. Somebody does not want to see these economies put into effect. I do not want to appear as a critic of the Canadian Pacific Railway; I have the greatest respect for that road; but we subsidized that line enormously with money, lands and all kinds of legislation, and why should they stand with a club before the Parliament of Canada to-day and say, "You shall not go into public ownership of railways, waterways, or any other public service, but let George do it, or rather let Prince Eddie do it." The people of the country should do it themselves. We are spending all the money, yet, when there is a chance for relief coming, we are told by the Canadian Pacific Railway that we must not do these things. Are we to give the Canadian Pacific all the roads we have and let them run them? What will the future of this country be, if the railway which we ourselves have created is to be the dictator and to tell us that we must hand these roads over to them to administer? They tell us we must not have waterways, because they are competitors of their railways and we must not have national marketing and must not extend a seaport into the inland parts of Canada. That will not do. That would mean that we would make the railways the masters of Canada and of Parliament, and the station agent of the Canadian Pacific, if they get their way, will be the political boss in every locality. The Canadian Pacific must accept the situation in which we find ourselves. We are not going to ask their permission; they must allow us to run these roads and administer them and make the economies that will be effected. If we do that, transportation will improve in this country; we shall make some saving, and our expenses will be reduced. But we must start in earnest; and if I might pass any criticism upon my right hon. friend (Mr. Meighen) and say why he is leader of the Opposition to-day, I might say that he made one mistake in the last election. He should have actually consolidated the roads before he went to the country, and he should have fought the election on that consolidation. He started all right and perhaps it would have been much better for him if he had appealed to the country on the consolidation and the responsibility that went with the legislation which he put through in the House. I want to give him credit for being a man who has done a great service to public ownership in this country, although in the last election he did not get much thanks for what he did. He has been denounced for his policy in the past, but all parties have come to his policy and along the lines laid down at that time. Indeed, the same policy has been laid down in this House by the present Minister of Railways (Mr. Kennedy).

I have just received a communication in connection with the very question now before the House, that of the new taxes. I have received a great protest against the men who sell ginger pop to the people of this country. The people have been getting ginger pop at 5 cents a glass; the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) has increased the tax on ginger pop in this country perhaps one cent or less than one cent per glass; but the ginger pop manufacturers say to the people of this country: "You must pay ten cents for the ginger pop." Why do they not do what is done in England and other countries where a similar tax is in effect? If the minister imposes a tax of one cent on the ginger pop, why should the man who retails it not simply add one cent to the price; but these people say: "This is a reason for putting a five cent increase on the price." That is not quite fair, and I hope the minister will make the proper answer to them.

I have in my hand a letter from the treasurer of the city of Toronto saying that he has already petitioned the Minister of Finance in regard to the excessive charges that the city council of Toronto will have to pay by way of the stamp tax on cheques. I am told that the city of Toronto will have to pay about $50,000 a year by way of this stamp tax. Perhaps, that city is able to pay that sum, and that may be a reasonable way of collecting money; but there ought to be an understanding, and I am sure the minister will listen to the representatives of that city when they come before him in regard to the matter.

A couple of days ago I received this telegram in regard to the question of immigration which was brought up by an hon. member from British Columbia:

> Mr. W. F. Maclean, M.P. In view of intended immigration legislation before parliament, we, the undersigned, urge you strongly to vote for broad liberal immigration policy. Canada's vast natural resources destine her to become a great industrial as well as agricultural nation. To this end visioned immigration legislation should provide for industrial as well as agricultural worker. An increased population will lighten our heavy burden of debt and taxation of future immigration. Legislation should be based on these broad democratic and humanitarian considerations which have ever been the foundation of our Government.

Rabbi Barentt, R. Brickner, Magistrate Jacob Cohen, Leo Frankell. Eli Pullin, Edmund Scheurer, Rabbi Julius Siegall, Alderman Joseph Singer.

There is a good deal in that argument, and some very good immigrants have come to this country from portions of Europe. We must, however, have, in connection with immigration, a policy that first of all will protect the races which are already in this country, and we cannot be quite swamped by the people of Russia or the orientals from the East. We want our country settled, and we want farmers from every country in the world to come here if they wish to do so. We desire a broad immigration policy; but the people whom we want most of all are farmers who will toil on the land. Very good farmers have come to this country from Russia and from southeastern Europe. It is important that the Government should adopt and shortly put into force some national policy of immigration; but we must consider the people who are here to-day, who have to carry on in this country and who do not wish to see it come quite into the hands of other races. In portions of the United States to-day, the American population is outnumbered by the foreign population, and, perhaps, a similar condition is coming to us in connection with orientals. Nobody likes to hear of the invasion of our country by the Japanese as a nation, their lumbermen taking up our Crown lands, oriental labour being brought in by gangs and paid by the Japanese government, and not a particle of that work going to Canadian workers. It rather makes one blush to think that a nation, with which we have been very friendly in the war and which we have helped a great deal, is actually going to take possession of our forests, to bring its nationals into our country to do the lumbering and to export that lumber, and to do this as a national proposition of Japan. That will hardly go down with Canadians, but it is a question which Parliament must deal with in very short order.

While I have, perhaps, trespassed upon the time of the House in bringing up these questions, I have tried to deal with them not from any party standpoint. They are vital questions which confront us, and what I have laid down to-day is a bill of rights in connection with the public services of Canada. That is going to be the issue in the next election; and to get ready for that election, hon. gentlemen in charge of the government to-day must prepare for redistribution in this country and give full representation. If they do not do that this session, they will have to do it next session.

Mr. CARROLL: Hear, hear.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): I do not know why my hon. friend is applauding the idea.

Mr. BUREAU: Perhaps it is enthusiasm.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): Enthusiasm, perhaps, that the Government should immediately have redistribution passed through the House. I do not know how I am going to come out of the scrimmage; but I am going to tell the people that, no matter what I have been in the past, I am in favour of that bill of rights before anything else in the public services of this country. Progressive ideas are now affecting the people and they are talking and reading about what questions will be discussed in the coming election. These things are treated in that bill of rights, and I want my hon. friends from the West to read it over and when they take the floor to be good enough to tell this House and the country whether there is anything in that bill of rights in regard to all these public questions. If there is I am satisfied to have those questions go to the people.

The old political traditions that have obtained in this country have now come to an end. At present we are in a bog, largely because of the war and as a result of our own political action and legislation in the past. But if we are to get on to solid ground again, we must pull ourselves together, cease to be partisans to the extent that we have been in the past, and instead, be first of all Canadians, with a faith in the future of our country. Let us make our constitution and our courts supreme; let us so act that we shall play a worthy part in the League of Nations of which, with Australia, South Africa, and the rest of the Empire, we form an important part. Parliamentary government to-day is the best institution in the world. We have inherited that form of government from the Mother Country, which has done more for the world than any other nation; and parliamentary government is based upon the principle that the voice of the people shall be expressed and crystallized in progressive legislation.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

After Recess

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. R. A. HOEY (Springfield): Mr. Speaker, I am not fully persuaded in my own mind that I have a contribution worthy of this moment or of the subject in the discussion of which we are engaged. I feel it incumbent upon me, however, to define my attitude very briefly and very succinctly on these proposals that have been submitted to us by the hon. Finance Minister (Mr. Fielding) in his annual budget.

The great task confronting the people of Canada in this crisis—a task, of course, that confronts a finance minister in a very direct and distinct sense—is the task of meeting our financial obligations, and meeting them by methods that will bring the utmost measure of relief to what we ordinarily designate as agriculture on the one hand and the great masses of Canadian workmen on the other. When I say "the utmost measure of relief", I have in my mind such relief as is compatible with national stability and national progress. The position—shall I say, the precarious position?—in which agriculture finds itself at the moment has been dwelt upon at great length by my colleagues and associates, and I feel positive that the gravity of the situation so far as that industry is concerned is apparent to all. I cannot, however, Mr. Speaker, convince myself that the position in which the agriculturist finds himself at the moment is in any sense more precarious, is in any sense less hopeful, than is the position of the Canadian workmen, 200,000 of whom were out of employment during the early months of this year. There is this, however, to be said in the case of the Canadian workman: his condition may be temporary, certainly temporary so far as absolute unemployment is concerned. In the case of agriculture—and I speak particularly of western agriculture—It seems to me that the conditions embody within themselves all the elements that make for permanency; and I hope to prove that a little later in my remarks.

The opportunity has been extended to me for a period of years of coming into association with thousands of agriculturists in the western country and with thousands of Canadian workmen. It has been my privilege to discuss economic questions with them from time to time. During the fall of last year I entered the homes of many industrial workers who were not earning enough at that time to clothe their children—certainly not enough to clothe them in a way that would enable them to attend school regularly. I know that there are hon. members of this House who will point out to me, and very consistently, the condition in which workmen find themselves in other countries. Naturally I have given some thought to that question, and the comparison would be fair, Mr. Speaker, if we compared this country with other countries somewhat similar in area and population. I have pointed out to those with whom I have discussed these questions that so far as I could discover, so far as I could determine, the only means whereby we could bring immediate relief to these classes—and when I say "immediate relief", I have no thought that my suggestion should prove a panacea for every evil from which they suffer; I have in mind temporary relief in the case of the workmen;—I said to them that the only means by which temporary relief could be effected would be by increasing the purchasing power of the Canadian dollar. I made that suggestion, Mr. Speaker, believing that when you increase the purchasing power of the Canadian dollar you must of necessity increase the purchasing power of the individual who possesses it. And I thought that by increasing his purchasing power, the extra turnover of goods consumed would more than compensate the producer—that is, the manufacturer—for any loss the readjustment might entail. I pointed out to them also a truth that is self-apparent but which is very frequently overlooked, namely, the inseparable connection between unemployment in this country and the condition in which agriculture finds itself.

During the fall of last year, when unemployment was rampant in the city of Winnipeg, I noticed that upon every train that came into that city there were hundreds of farm labourers, coming in from the farms, helping to swell the tide of unemployment, adding to our city congestion, creating unrest and all the evils associated therewith, the situation was serious, and in discussing its seriousness with the farmers I pointed out the congested condition of the cities. I reminded them of the rents we were paying, and showed how they could help to relieve the situation by keeping the men employed throughout the winter months. I learned that a great many of the agriculturists who up till last winter ordinarily employed anywhere up to five men, were allowing their men to go because the financial resources at their disposal did not justify their retaining them. Many of them admitted that a large percentage of the labourers were prepared to work throughout the winter months almost for their board, but they said that their very presence in the home added burdens to the already overburdened farm wife. Together we reached this conclusion, that until the time came when the farmer would feel justified in erecting permanent homes for his hired help, and in that way be able to keep them throughout the year producing enough in the summer to keep them through the winter, we could do nothing to relieve the congestion in the cities during the winter months. But how many farmers to-day are in a financial position to build such homes? I venture to say, not three per cent in the province from which I come. Yet we see the absolute necessity of keeping on these labourers, who year after year reach the cities, so that they can bring up their families in the country in the open air and acquire a taste for outdoor life. If we have in Alberta and Saskatchewan the 55,000 farm homes that are to be found in the province of Manitoba to-day, Western Canada alone will be able to absorb 75 per cent of the men who are now ordinarily unemployed during the winter months in this country.

I sometimes wonder if we are fully seized of the great change that has taken place in western Canada during the last two decades. I am one of those who believe that western Canada would have reached this crisis had we never been engaged in the European conflict. Ten years ago from the public platform I made the statement that we were destined to reach this condition, and nothing has occurred since that day that would incline me to change my view. There were a great many factors contributing to this result, a thousand and one things to which I need not refer at the moment. Less than half a century ago we had a period of nomadic husbandry in western Canada. The pioneers went in there, perhaps the most heroic band of men that ever undertook similar work in any country, and found the land free, taxes negligible, if not unknown, and they started in to make homes for themselves. In those days the West had not been tapped of its resources. It was in those days, it seems to me, that a great many of our present policies were evolved. It was in those days that we evolved and determined our present system of taxation. The question in those days was, how much can the West bear? It was a new country where men obtained free land, where labour was cheap because thousands of labourers were reaching this country at that time from Europe, inexperienced men who were prepared to work two or three years for nothing, in order to get experience to enable them to take up farming themselves at a later date, and in those days the question that was asked was, how much can the agriculturalist stand, in the midst of this unlimited wealth, in the midst of these extended natural resources, the finest in the world? It was in those days that we undertook our expensive projects such as the railroads, and political and educational institutions far in excess of the people's needs, far in excess, indeed, of the needs of our present population. So burden after burden was added until I am sometimes afraid, although I trust I am mistaken, that we have added the last straw so far as western Canada is concerned. I have no desire to be unduly pessimistic, but I wonder if we are not living in a fool's paradise when we speak of western Canada and its ability to come back, unless we have a complete reversal of policy in this country.

I said at the outset of my remarks that the conditions in western Canada had been dwelt upon at great length. The trouble with the analysis, as I see it, is that we deal far too much in generalities. I think the time has come when someone should speak, to some extent, scientifically and authoritatively, without bias and without prejudice, and in attempting to do that, while I dislike, to put it mildly, to put these quotations on the official record, there is no doubt in my mind but that they are going to have a profound effect upon land settlement schemes in western Canada in the near future. The statements are authoritative and unassailable. They were prepared by the staff of the Manitoba Agricultural College after an extensive and intensive survey undertaken last year. This memorandum has already been submitted to the Minister of Agriculture in that province, and I have no doubt that a copy has been forwarded to the Minister of Agriculture in this Government. What are the actual facts?

> In three decades the average yield of wheat in Manitoba has dropped from nineteen bushels to fifteen bushels per acre.
> The criticism frequently advanced that we produce only fifteen bushels per acre, while Germany produces thirty-three bushels per acre, and some other small European countries which import our coarse grains and feed livestock and return the manure from our feeds to their lands get almost as much, is entitled to some defence. The facts are as stated and we must not belittle them, particularly when we remember that with the practice we are following we get only three fifteen bushel crops in four years, or, an actual average of three quarters of fifteen, which is but little over eleven bushels per acre.

The report goes on to say:

The effect of a generation of cropping to wheat has been to reduce the nitrogen of the surface seven inches of soil by 20 to 30 per cent, the phosphorous content up to an equal amount, and the organic matter by from 20 to 50 tons per acre. In other words, in a generation more than one-quarter of the potential wealth of the surface soil has entirely disappeared.

A great deal has been said in this House with regard to the cost of producing wheat. Again we have been dealing largely in generalizations, which, to my mind, are confusing if not misleading. I want to read this item with regard to the cost of producing wheat:

In the survey no attempt was made to arrive at the cost of producing wheat, for the very good reason that this varies with every farmer, every district and every season, and anything less than a thorough study of the cost in different parts of the province and on many different farms extending over a number of years, would be worse than useless, since the figures would be subject to misleading application. No work of this nature has ever been done in Canada, outside of a few counties in Ontario, but some work on cost of production has been done by the Farm Management Department of the North Dakota Experiment Station with the following results:

In the year 1919 the average cost of producing wheat in that State was $2.75 per bushel; the range being from $1.21 to $14.38 per bushel on the different farms studied. In 1920 the average cost per bushel was $2.44; the lowest cost being $1.05, and the highest $3.01 per bushel. In 1921 the average cost was $1.75 per bushel; the minimum 78 cents, and the maximum $5.24.

The above figures for the State of North Dakota, which is not essentially dissimilar in soil or climatic conditions to the Province of Manitoba, should furnish food for thought to all Western Canadian people, particularly when it is recalled that the prices of No. 1 Northern wheat at Winnipeg were as follows—

And this is for the calendar year—

No. 1 Northern, 1919, $2.63
1920, $1.76 to $2.74
1921, $1.11 to $1.49

The figures for the years 1920-21 are the highest and lowest monthly prices for the crop year. A much greater proportion of the farmers' wheat was sold at or near the lower prices quoted than was sold at the higher figures. These too are Winnipeg prices. The farm prices were less than these figures by the amount of the freight charges.

Seventeen cents per hundred pounds, I may say, from Winnipeg to Port Arthur. The farmers' prices were less than these figures by the amount of the freight charges, commission, and other charges for handling. Let me summarize because I think this is of the utmost importance. It is the first scientific attempt that I have been able to discover to determine the cost of producing wheat in western Canada.

Mr. McMASTER: How did they arrive at the cost? That is important. Did they charge interest on the capital, and the cost of management?

Mr. HOEY: I regret, Mr. Speaker, that I have not those details. I have no doubt they could be obtained from the source to which I have referred, but in the memorandum in my possession the details to which the hon. member refers are not given. This is the summary:

In 1919, cost, $2.75 a bushel. Price received—

And again we must deduct the freight rates and the cost of handling—

Price received, $2.63.
1920, cost, $2.44. Price received, $1.75.
1921, cost, $1.75. Price received, $1.11 to $1.49.

I think it will be of interest to compare the profits made by other business interests during this same period. In the budget debate of last year I noticed a statement that the net surplus profits of the Canadian Pacific Railway in the year 1920 were $33,000,000, of which sum $21,000,000 was amassed in handling wheat and other products in western Canada in the last four months of that year. It is also interesting to note that the Northwest Territories—this country which I claim has been bearing until now an unnecessary burden—gave that company 18,000,000 acres of land that was free from taxation for a period of twenty years, a period still further extended.

In the Canada Gazette of a few days ago I noticed certain items that indicate the dividends that banks are paying at this time. I want to put these on the official record so that the people of this country may have an idea just who was making the money while we were passing through this period of deflation:

Bank of Montreal

Notice is hereby given that a dividend of 3 per cent upon the paid up capital stock of this institution has been charged for the current quarter payable on and after Thursday the first day of June next to the shareholders on record April 13, 1922.

By order of the board,

FREDERICK WILLIAMS-TAYLOR,
General Manager.

Royal Bank of Canada

Notice is hereby given that a dividend of 3 per cent, being at the rate of 12 per cent per annum upon the paid up capital stock of the bank, has been declared for the current quarter, and will be payable at the bank and its branches on and after Thursday the first day of June next to the shareholders on record at the close of business on the 15th May.

By order of the board,

C. E. NEAL,
General Manager.

Quebec, April, 13, 1922.

Canadian Bank of Commerce

Notice is hereby given that a dividend of 3 per cent upon the capital stock of this bank, being at the rate of 12 per cent per annum, has been declared for the quarter ending 31st May next, and that the same will be payable at the bank and its branches on and after Thursday the first day of June, 1922. The transfer books of the bank will be closed from the 17th of May to 31st of May next, both days inclusive.

By order of the Board.

JOHN AIRD,
General Manager.

I want to go on and refer to the statement I made earlier in my remarks, that the condition in which agriculture to-day finds itself embodies all the elements that make for permanency. You may reasonably ask what I mean by a statement of that kind? Well, let me refer for a moment or two to the ravages from which agriculture is suffering at this time, ravages that were absolutely unknown—at any rate almost unknown—two decades ago. Let me quote again from the memorandum:

Stem rust has caused an average annual loss of over 5,000,000 bushels of wheat each year, since 1916.

That is in the province of Manitoba.

The lowered production as a result of insect depredations varies widely from year to year, but is conservatively estimated at seven million dollars per year. In 1921 the Western Wheat-stem Saw Fly alone reduced the yield of wheat in Manitoba by 3,555,000 bushels.

In increased production costs and in lowered yields the Manitoba weed crop costs her farmers twenty million dollars per year,—

That is, the wheat crop, on account of the method of farming to which the agriculturalist has been pressed by economic conditions, suffered a loss of $20,000,000 a year in Manitoba.

—or nearly seventy times the annual outlay for the Agricultural College.

Every forty million bushels of wheat shipped out of Manitoba takes from her soil plant food constituents that would cost more than twelve million dollars to replace."

That is what I mean when I say that the condition in which the western agriculturalist finds himself embodies, to my mind, all the elements for permanency. I wish to read what these unbiased investigators have to say with regard to rural discontent, because if I referred to rural discontent my right hon. friend to my right would say in reply, "Well, a great deal of the discontent is due to soap-box orators, such as you are," and my words would have no effect whatever. Therefore, I desire to quote what the unbiased investigators say with regard to discontent in western Canada. Their report reads:

Our representatives did the work in the country during June and July last, and while the price of wheat had not at that time reached the low level of later months, it soon became apparent that, even at that time, there was a strong feeling of discontent on the part of many farmers. Generally, they did not complain unduly of their immediate production problems, of soil or climate conditions, or, except in a few districts, of low yields, but the chief tenor of their complaint was the uneven deflation,—the rapid drop in prices of farm products, and the very much delayed drop in price of most things they had to buy. Among other causes of discontent mentioned again and again were high taxes; high freight rates; the United States tariff on cattle; the high price of machinery; the difficulty of getting help on the farm and in the home, and in some instances the high overhead charges on land and equipment purchased at war prices.

They knew also that increased taxes and transportation charges, and adverse tariff schedules over which they, as individuals had no control, were also contributing causes of discontent; and they could see no reason why agriculture should be expected to carry, without protest, such heavy losses, while transportation, merchandising and industrial interests delayed post-war deflation.

I desire to repeat what I said, that in view of these conditions I often wonder if we are too optimistic when we speak of the west and the ability of the west to come back. I know some hon. members will say, "Well, what about these millions of untenanted lands of which we hear so much?" Well, naturally I have thought of that, and I have discussed the matter at great length with men who ought to know, and they have informed me that these lands that are not to-day populated are almost wholly devoid of plant food elements. They assure me that, if that were not so the lands would have been taken up and cultivated by the farmers who find themselves in an impoverished condition now. A great many of these acres are alkali land. Then, again, they tell me that, where the land is not devoid of plant food content, it is heavily bushed and consequently expensive to clear. Unless, Mr. Speaker, we have a reversal of policy, I cannot see any immediate hope for western Canada. Hon members will ask, what is the solution? We speak a great deal of the tariff. I am in favour of tariff reduction. If I were not in favour of reduction of tariff I would not be permitted to sit in this group, but I think the most drastic tariff reductions are wholly inadequate to meet the situation. We need drastic tariff reductions, or we must close up the west. We also need cheaper transportation facilities—that is lower freight rate. We need wider markets. They talk of the removal of the cattle embargo as if it were going to usher us into Heaven by the most direct route. I studied the cost of transportation from Moosejaw to Liverpool a year or so ago, when the cattle embargo was the subject of vital interest, and I learned that it took so much to pay the transportation of a steer from Moosejaw to Liverpool that there was nothing left for the farmer who produced the steer, except the tail, and even the tail, in my humble judgment, would have been all twisted. We need drastic tariff reductions, lower freight rates and wider markets. All of these, and the accumulative effect of all of these, are needed to restore agriculture in western Canada. I say—and I am not speaking bitterly or in any partisan spirit—that the economic conditions in this country have forced the farmer, not only to do without a great many conveniences, but to exploit his farm for the time being, to exploit the resources of western Canada, and thus forced him to rob future generations of their rightful heritage, and I defy contradiction on that point.

I desire to refer to the statement of the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) with regard to the tendency in this country of the people to lean on governments, to come to the government for support, and to seek out governments in order to obtain assistance. I do not think there is any thoughtful Canadian who has failed to notice that tendency in our public life. Next to the tendency of the average man towards cynicism with regard to politicians in this country and political institutions—and we seem to get away from that when we enter practical politics, because even a cynical man has some consideration for our feelings—that tendency to lean on governments, rather than to stand on their own legs, is to me one of the most demoralizing tendencies in the public life of this country. I remember in the country from which I came there were potato crop failures occasionally, and, of course, we subsisted almost wholly on potatoes. When there was a potato failure, we found ourselves reduced to almost abject penury. But I remember years when there were failures and some good philanthropist would get together with a government agent with the object of obtaining relief for us. I remember distinctly one year when we were reduced to abject poverty, when men sought relief for the district in which I lived, and when relief was offered in that thickly populated district only two families in the whole district accepted the aid and subsistence that was offered. Why? Because it was humiliating to them to accept government assistance. They had a sense of independence; they did not want government restrictions; their ancestry had fought and fallen for the overthrow of governmental interference. That was the kind of Scotch-Irish stock that built up great civilizations.

But compare that tendency to conditions in Canada to-day. If any man in this country wants to build up an industry, he comes to the government and says: "Will you not prohibit this commodity? It is likely to injure my industry." Another man may not want prohibition, but he may want regulation. I do not believe in governmental enterprises except in so far as they are absolutely necessary. I believe the people should be thrown back on their own individual and collective resourcefulness. I believe the problems of the future will be solved, not by compulsory co-operation, but by voluntary and mutual co-operation. But the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) would have been better advised if he had dwelt at some length upon the cause of which that tendency is the mere outward and visible expression. You ask: Is there a cause? Most assuredly, there is a cause; there is no effect without a cause. What is the basic cause? For many decades in this country we have been making subsidies, subsidies to certain interests at the expense of other interests. How can you make a subsidy to any interest without penalizing other interests in the country? We have been affording protection to certain interests at the expense of other industris. I have spoken of the lands that are free from taxation in Western Canada. The government of Saskatchewan, a number of years ago, estimated that if the Canadian Pacific Railway were paying taxes in the ordinary way, $300,000 would come into the provincial exchequer every year. Oh, yes, the cause is there all right. Is it not the most natural thing in the world that we should reach a stage in our development when all classes would want to enter the vicious circle? If we are going to protect any industry at the expense of other industries, then let us all get on to the toboggan. The decline is going to be a little more precipitous, but it is going to be exhilarating while it lasts. The same thing exactly is happening in the United States. The farmers there are following in the footsteps of their old friend the protectionist. I am not a very old man, and I may yet live to see the day when my fellow-farmers will be open and avowed protectionists.

An hon. MEMBER: Hear, hear.

Mr. HOEY: I do not mean in the sense the hon. member means. The agriculturists of the United States are following in the footsteps of their old friend the protectionist. Industrial enterprises in that country have, for years, been protected. The United States is gradually becoming a consuming nation, and now the agriculturists see their chance. Honest confession is good for the soul, and I think it is wholesome to make this confession, that agriculturists have no monopoly on altruism. If we afford protection to one industry, why not extend it to all?

Mr. McMASTER: You cannot.

Mr. HOEY: I think I can prove to my hon. friend that you can. We have in southern Manitoba to-day agriculturists who find that, under the most favourable conditions, their lands produce only ten bushels of wheat to the acre. We have in northern Manitoba, in the constituency from which the hon. member for Nelson (Mr. Bird) comes, land that produces 35 bushels of wheat to the acre, and which has been producing that regularly for years. Would it not be most reasonable and plausible if the farmers of southern Manitoba came down to the Minister of Finance and said, looking longingly and enviously towards their northern brother: "Give us fifty cents on every bushel of wheat we produce, or we will go out of business." I think they would be perfectly logical; but I think the Minister of Finance would be very well advised in pointing out to them what I have pointed out to them for years, that whereas their land is producing only ten bushels of wheat per acre, it is selling for $18 to $40 an acre, and that their taxes are determined upon that basis; that in the Swan River valley, land is selling as high as $100 per acre cash, and that their taxes are determined by that value; in other words, that economic phenomena have a flexibility and a levelling process that seem to have escaped completely the notice of our protectionist friends.

Mr. Herbert Spencer in that illuminating essay of his, entitled "Man Versus the State," reminds us of a time in the old country when the farm labourer received one-half of his wages from the farmer and one-half of his wages from the state. Could we not revert to that? Why should the Minister of Finance, in the interest of the unemployed, of whom our protectionist friends speak so eloquently, not revert to the days of which Spencer speaks and have the state pay one-half the wages of every farm labourer? The demoralizing tendency to lean on governments to-day is largely due to the mistaken principle that we have been following for many years in this country, a vicious principle that must lead to its own destruction. I sometimes say: "Let us all get into the circle." Let the snake put its own tail into its mouth and continue to feed. There is all kinds of nourishment before it reaches its head.

I want to refer, in my humble way, to the Fordney tariff as a factor in determining our fiscal policy. Prior to the last election —perhaps I was more conscientious than the average practical politician—that tariff gave me considerable anxiety; and in order to get at the actual facts, at considerable inconvenience I got into touch with three or four of the most outstanding business men in the United States to whom I could obtain access. I discussed the matter with them at some length on my own account; I did so because our platform, the platform that I was advocating, called for radical tariff reductions, and I could not conscientiously stand upon that platform and advocate its principles in view of what was taking place in the United States, until I had further light on the question. What was their explanation? In the fairest way possible they entered into a discussion of trade relations and pointed out to me that they were solidy opposed to the Fordney tariff, not because they had any thought of Canada;—Oh no; not in the least—they were opposed to it because they said it would increase the price of the workers' food. Hard wheat in the United States was becoming expensive, and just in proportion as the food of the worker went up, to that extent his purchasing power of manufactured articles would be limited. And, again, just in proportion as the price of food and the cost of living went up—and they were hoping that it would go down—wages would go up; and they proved conclusively and to my satisfaction that if the American manufacturer ever had an advantage over the Canadian manufacturer by reason of the Fordney tariff that advantage was destined to disappear. They said: "It will not only hamper us in our relations with Canada, but it will give Canada a decided advantage over us in the foreign markets."

Now, in view of that statement, a statement that is reasonable at least, I think that if ever there was a time when we could have made more drastic reductions in the general tariff that time is the present moment. Furthermore, it seems to me that by taking that attitude we would have put an instrument in the hands of the low tariff forces in the United States that would have enabled them, perhaps, to modify the Fordney and McComber tariffs, or any other high tariffs that are likely to displace them. But let us look at the question from another angle. Let us suppose that we have not reached that stage in our development where we can consider matters of trade from that unselfish standpoint. Let us suppose for a moment that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) was actuated by a desire, I will not say to retaliate, because I do not like that word, but just to punish the United States a little for their Fordney tariff. What method could he have followed better than by making a more drastic increase in the British preference? I feel that such would be retaliation with which the right hon. gentleman to my right (Mr. Meighen) would almost agree. I have said a great many perhaps harsh things with regard to the Conservative party and its tariff policy, but I want to be absolutely fair, and I do not think I would be fair unless I made this statement, that throughout their whole tenure of office it is debatable if they ever had as opportune and propitious a moment to make tariff reductions as has this Government at the present time. Certainly there was never a moment in the history of the Conservative party when the time was more opportune and propitious to make such reductions than it is to-day. Let us look at the question for a moment from the point of view of international friction. In view of the Fordney and McComber tariffs, would we not have been justified in making a radical increase in the British preference without creating any dissatisfaction in that great country to the south of us that fought side by side with us in the great crisis? Looking at it from every angle I cannot see any justification whatever for the meagre fare that has been submitted to us. The Minister of Finance has adopted neither one attitude nor the other, and the position he has taken is, to say the least, not intelligible to me in view of present conditions. Our present system of taxation, which bears so heavily upon our working people, which takes eight times as much from the hon. member for Swift Current (Mr. Lewis) as it takes from me, regardless of our ability to pay, if that is the best system of taxation that we can evolve, I cannot see much hope for modern civilization. I want to read an extract from an address delivered by Mr. Lloyd George in the British House of Commons after his return from Genoa. He said:

> One of the unfortunate results of the war, which had demonstrated the power of international goodwill, was that it should have developed into narrow, selfish, blind nationalism that was found in every direction—in customs restrictions and in trade and transportation, he declared. Transportation organized to develop international trade was used to prevent international trade. Not merely the amount of tariff was objectionable, he added, but its fluctuations and uncertainties. The human intellect was exhausted in order to make trade as difficult as possible. "This is the condition which we found at Genoa." he asserted.

I wondered, when I read that statement, if the contributions made to the discussions at the Genoa Conference by Sir Charles Gordon, representing the Dominion of Canada, would have any tendency to dispel Mr. Lloyd George's fears and render him more hopeful for the future. Now, someone may say, I suppose, that my address is lacking in the constructive element. A criticism such as that would, I think, have some justification. The critics will no doubt say: "You don't tell us where we are to raise the revenue if we make these drastic reductions". Well, I had in mind that we would raise the revenue from exactly the same sources from which the Liberals contemplated raising it when they framed their 1919 platform. From what source can we extract wealth? From the moon, that burnt out orb, or from the surface of the soil? There is only one way, so far as I can see, that we can meet our financial obligations, and that is by developing our basic industries. We can meet our obligations only by developing our basic industries to the extent that we dream of at this moment, and shipping the surpluses. With the wealth received we could pay off our debts. I am not without sympathy, Mr. Speaker, and I sometimes think that the situation in this country is so serious that it may demand considerable faith on the part of the Minister of Finance. I mean that the Finance Minister might have to have faith enough to bring in a budget that would call for revenues perhaps considerably lower than our expenditure in order to re-establish the basic industry. I do not know; perhaps I have not given the matter enough thought, but I sometimes feel that way when I view the seriousness of the condition of what we ordinarily term the basic industry.

Let me turn for a moment to the amendment—and I do so without any bitterness whatever, in no partizan spirit, with no lust after castigation. I have found the amendment exceedingly difficult to understand, despite the fact that I have inherited all the prejudices that Tory ancestors can bequeath. In order to understand it more fully, I attempted to put myself in the place of hon. members to my right. I found the task exceedingly difficult, but I succeeded to some extent. I tried to look at it from my right hon. friend's point of view, in all fairness, and this is how it appears: the Government went in on a certain platform. That platform was wrong. They made promises that they would embody in legislation the proposals and planks contained in their platform. That is to say, they made a wrong promise. They got into power, but under a sense of responsibility they recanted.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Oh, oh.

Mr. HOEY: I am trying to look at it from the point of view of hon. members to my right.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What is your own point of view. That is what should decide your action?

Mr. HOEY: Perhaps—

Mr. MEIGHEN: Will the hon. gentleman tell me then what his point of view is?

Mr. HOEY: I am just coming to that, if the right hon. gentleman will be patient. Having got into office and labouring under a sense of responsibility, they did not follow their own promises by wrong-doing. Would they have gone up in the estimation of hon. gentlemen to my right if they had followed a wrong promise by wrong action? I am looking at it from the ethical standpoint.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

[Mr. Hoey.]

Mr. HOEY: My associates smile at the idea of mixing up ethics with politics. Well, say my hon. friends to my right, because the Government did not follow a wrong promise by wrong action, we are going to oppose them.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Will my hon. friend permit a question?

Mr. HOEY: Most assuredly.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Does he believe in the practice of making political promises and then violating them in office?

Mr. HOEY: I certainly do not.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Then why does the hon. gentleman refuse to censure that practice?

Mr. HOEY: Well, I am not dealing with the censure; I am dealing with the angle from which the censure comes.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is exactly what my hon. friend is doing; but he does not explain his own position on the amendment until he explains why he refuses to censure a practice in which he says he does not believe.

Mr. HOEY: Oh, I have been speaking only a few moments on the amendment; it is early in the night yet, Mr. Speaker. Placing myself in the position of hon. members to my right, I could not conscientiously censure any government for not following a wrong promise by wrong action—that is to say, I could find no ethical justification for my action. I think the amendment is wholly unworthy of a great party.

Mr. MEIGHEN: May I suggest to the hon. gentleman that that is not what the amendment says? The amendment does not condemn a failure to do wrong, it condemns the making of a promise and the breaking thereof; and that practice the hon. gentleman says he himself condemns.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Hon. gentlemen opposite are even more afraid than is my hon. friend.

Mr. LAPOINTE: This also is unworthy.

Mr. HOEY: I have not the slightest doubt that the right hon. leader of the Opposition, by the exercise of the most subtle ingenuity, will place this dish in the most palatable form before his followers. I simply say that if I were in the position of hon. gentlemen to my right I could find no justification for my action; that is the position I take. But I want to go on and say that in my opinion the amendment is wholly unworthy of a great party and a great leader.

Mr. DUFF: It is not a great party.

Mr. HOEY: A great party and a great leader, with natural and acquired ability, enough and to spare for every emergency. Surely we might have had something constructive. What about the platform submitted to the people of this country by the right hon. gentleman? Since when was it scrapped?

Mr. MEIGHEN: It is not scrapped at all.

Mr. HOEY: Why is it not submitted?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Because it is mostly in effect.

Mr. HOEY: It may be in effect, but it certainly is not effective in meeting Canadian conditions. Since when has their platform been scrapped? There is no word of it at all. Here we have a great party and a great leader, not sounding a constructive note in the most serious crisis through which the Canadian people ever passed. Is that co-operation? Is that the co-operation of which we spoke so eloquently in the dark days of the conflict? Is that making the highest contribution of which my right hon. friend is capable to the cause of progress in this country? In my opinion, it is not.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Will the hon. gentleman permit me? What more could I ask for in this the main issue if our principles are still in effect?

Mr. FIELDING: Why complain if they are in effect?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not complain of their being in effect at all.

Som hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I say I do not complain of their being in effect, nor does the amendment complain of it. We complain of the conduct of hon. gentlemen opposite in promising something else and doing this, and thus deceiving the people of Canada.

Mr. HOEY: The right hon. gentleman speaks of broken promises.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Hear, hear.

Mr. HOEY: Have not broken promises been associated with the political life of this country for a great many years?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Hear, hear.

Mr. HOEY: Opposed to free wheat in 1911 and afterwards bringing about its adoption. Yes, you say,—the exigencies of the war period and hon. members opposite will add, the exigencies of the post-war period. What about a government that went in on the distinct understanding—and I was associated intimately with the campaign—on the distinct understanding that it was a war government?

Mr. LAPOINTE: Hear, hear.

Mr. HOEY: That nothing of a controversial nature was to be discussed on the platforms? That is what we were informed; but did the government resign immediately upon the close of the war?

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. HOEY: A broken promise.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. MEIGHEN: If the hon. gentleman will—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The hon. gentleman will see how many protectors he has across the floor. I will ask him here and now to produce that promise from the government or any member of it or, from the Prime Minister.

Mr. HOEY: The task would be an impossible one.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Hear, hear.

Mr. MARTELL: The candidates promised it. They did in my county anyhow.

Mr. HOEY: The right hon. gentleman made a speech in the city of Winnipeg, with two other hon. gentlemen, and the distinct impression I got from his remarks on that occasion was that it was going to be a war government.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The speech is published. I would like the hon. member to read it.

Mr. HOEY: I listened to it, and I know what the impression I got was. I want to be fair. I do not want to exaggerate at all. It may not have been made, but I say that the people throughout the district in which I was, took it as a distinct promise that nothing of a controversial nature, such as the tariff, was to be discussed, but that immediately the war was over we were going to take up domestic problems.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is what was done.

Mr. HOEY: But the government did not resign and appeal to the country immediately after the war. Then we had a tariff commission travelling all over this country at considerable expense.

Mr. STANSELL: Before passing to another subject, I think the speaker has made it very clear that he did not—

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: If the hon. gentleman has a question to put, I must ask him to put it at once, without argument.

Mr. STANSELL: I wanted to make my question clear. Will the hon. member tell us whether he justifies the making of a wrong promise? He has made clear the other. Will he make this clear also?

Mr. HOEY: I have answered that half a dozen times during the last ten minutes. We had a tariff commission touring this country, and the distinct understanding was that there was going to be a tariff revision, but that tariff revision was never attempted.

Mr. DUFF: It was also promised in the Speech from the Throne.

Mr. HOEY: Then we had the understanding—I will not say there was a promise made—that we were going to have redistribution giving the West the representation to which she was justly entitled. We did not have redistribution. I will not call that a broken promise, as it would not be fair, but it was dangerously near it.

I have made the statement, and I made it with no joy in my heart at all, that the party system of government in this country was largely discredited in the consciousness of the Canadian people. I do not want to adopt a holier-than-thou attitude and say that we have discovered something better, but I do say that the Canadian people will never go back to the old by-party system, with its mysterious campaign funds that have exercised such an influence on the policies of this nation. We will never go back to that. We must, if we are true to the living and to the dead, go forward toward something better, something more worthy of us.

Hon. gentlemen to my right are exceedingly anxious to know how we are going to vote. I am going to satisfy their curiosity; I feel the time has come. There is no difficulty in my mind as to how I shall vote. I would not be true to the people who sent me here if I did not vote one way—and one way only. No matter what may be the motives that are actuating me in casting that vote—that is a horse of another colour—I am going to vote—and this is the most interesting part of my speech, and I want to state that the whole Progressive group are voting solidly this way—I am going to vote according to the dictates of my conscience, and as a true Canadian with the interests of his country at heart, repudiating broken promises, on the one hand, and political trickery and expediency on the other, voting as a Canadian looking forward to a day when we shall have in this country men whose word shall be as their bond, and who will enable us to build up in this country a civilization that will be a pattern of all that makes for national progress, international comity and good will.

Hon. J. B. M. BAXTER (St. John city and counties of St. John and Albert): Mr. Speaker, I should be less than courteous, and very much less than sincere, if I did not take this opportunity to congratulate the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding), who has delivered his budget on this occasion, on the fact that in the sunset of life he is enjoying the opportunity of again filling a position which he has filled in past years, and which I think the people of Canada will say, without attaching any political importance to the remark, that he has always filled worthily in a personal sense. It would be too much to expect that all the members of this House, let alone the people of Canada, could possibly be in accord with the proposals which the hon. gentleman has to-day laid before the public for acceptance, but it is not too much for us to say that party differences or the differences which are engendered by opposite points of view, commercial points of view, I might call them, should not prevent us from paying a deserved tribute to a worthy Canadian whose life has been full of hard and earnest work. I would like to say, just as a personal appreciation, that it is only during a short time this session that I have had the pleasure of coming in some contact with the hon. Minister of Finance, and I have been delighted to find his extreme readiness of expression, and also to note in every act of his an absolute resoluteness which is too often lacking in the public life of this country. I am glad to be able to say things of this character. If I had criticism to offer, it probably would not be made, because I feel that a long term of public service so distinguished as the hon. gentleman has had ought to entitle him to a very great deal of consideration. I have from a personal standpoint no criticism, but rather an appreciation to offer.

In discussing the budget proposals I shall try in the short time I intend to occupy the House to approach the subject entirely from what I conceive to be the business point of view. Now my hon friend made use of some figures. I have not the slightest doubt but that they are absolutely correct, and I wish to supplement them with some other figures, because I have already said that the hon. gentleman has shown a resoluteness and courage in dealing with the matters he has laid before the House on this occasion and also, I may say, on other occasions when he has addressed the House. I feel I may digress to this extent: I believe the hon. gentleman is putting forward proposals which by no means go to the length he would like to have them go; they by no means meet his ideal of economic conditions; in fact I may also venture the suggestion that the proposals which he does make on this occasion approach much nearer to the economic ideas of the group of which I am a member than they do those of a large number of the group of which he is one of the exponents. However, he has given us this statement and he has given it, I believe, with absolute sincerity. He occupies the positon which enables him to make this statement because of the success of his party at the polls,—a success which must have been very gratifying to him and to his party but which was obtained by the violation, in every respect, of that candour and sincerity which distinguishes the hon. gentleman himself. I would pass, for a moment, to a quotation from a speech delivered by the hon. gentleman during the campaign. He said on that occasion:

> It would be possible to make the tariff much less burdensome on the people, particularly the poorer classes, without injurying industry, and the Liberals when in power would do this.

I believe the hon. gentleman was sincere when he uttered those words. I take, however, the utterances of his leader (Mr Mackenzie King) and I am going to quote from a report in the Toronto Globe of a speech made by him in the constituency of York, Ontario. Now, I take it that in public life we had better get down to plain, blunt facts. It is possible, as the late respected Mr. P. T. Barnum said, to fool some of the people all of the time, to fool the whole of the people part of the time, but impossible to fool all the people all the time. I notice that the leader of the Government assumed in this speech that the population of Canada was nine millions, and I will use that as a basis for testing his calculations and the sincerity of the views put forward, not only by himself on the platform but by his party in their literature, to obtain the adherence of the electorate to that party: assuming nine millions as the population, he said the tax for federal purposes alone would be $62 per head, and for a family of five, $310, a statement that no doubt was read, was noted, and was commented upon by the hon. gentleman (Mr. Hoey) who spoke a few moments ago; and no doubt his nerves are still tingling with the idea of this immense burden of taxation. In fact I would not doubt but that his entirely pessimistic attitude with regard to the Canadian West has been more largely inspired by speeches of the character made by the leader of the Government than by the actual facts as they present themselves in western Canada. The leader of the Government further said: that this sum of $310 per year meant the difference between a home and no home, or between giving to loved ones the food or education they needed or not—a most pathetic appeal. And when we look at the figures which have been supplied to us by the Finance Minister, and others which are easily obtained from the records of the country, we find that in the year 1920-21, the year upon which the leader of the Government must have based his calculations, the receipts of the Dominion were something over $434,386,000. That would mean not the large amount of $62 per head but $48.26, and when multiplied by the typical five-member family would come to $241.30. The receipts must surely be the measure of the taxation actually imposed upon this country. If the leader of the Government had used the correct figures I am not going to say it would have made very much difference; but I do say that his appeal was based upon a statement as to the taxation imposed by the late government which was, to say the least of it, absolutely misleading. If, however, he took the expenditures for the year he would be no more happy because the late government had not spent up to the amount of the revenue and the burden would be $210.-30. We come then to 1921-22 when we find that on the basis of the receipts, which is the burden supposedly borne by the five-member family, the tax was $211.80, and on the basis of actual expenditure it was only $193.40.

Now the reason I am commenting on these figures at all is to point out that on the basis of the estimated expenditure put forward by the Minister of Finance this year as the amount—cut to the bone, pared as closely as possible,—the smallest amount he can get along with,—the tax is to be at least $244.85 on the supposed five-member family, or larger than it was under the preceding government. Where then is the relief that was promised on every platform in this country—the relief that was promised to the women of the home in a pamphlet that I have upon my desk and that was largely circulated throughout Nova Scotia; that was promised to every wage earner and to every labourer within the sound of the voice of the leader of the Government? One would have expected under those circumstances to have found some real reduction, some real abandonment of expenditure, but instead of that we have an actual increase. Not only have we a failure to implement the pledges—not set out in the platform of the party adopted in convention, but the pledges spoken from the platform and published in the party literature—but there is, as in all other matters, an absolute disregard of them.

I noticed with much attention the attitude taken a few minutes ago by the hon. gentleman who spoke for the Progressive party. He assumed that the party sitting to your immediate left, Mr. Speaker, would be intensely interested in knowing how he was going to vote. I can assure him that that party is only concerned with how it is going to vote itself. We have our principles and we stand true to them. We know how we are going to vote, and we have known for a very long time, in fact, practically, ever since the session commenced, just how the hon. member who has just spoken is going to vote. It was not necessary to volunteer any information on that point. He is going to vote as he voted on the first division this session in this House. He is going to vote in favour of a policy by which a party can go to the country upon a series of misstatements, and if returned to power, he will vote to condone such conduct and will support that party. He talks about what is ethical, and his action drives all that is ethical out of public life. He has quoted the words of the Finance Minister about leaning on governments. I am not particularly concerned with his application of it, but there is leaning and leaning; and leaning sometimes is a support. We often see a post placed in the road which affords protection to a structure, which would topple over without its support. It is the Government that leans, and it leans for support upon the hon. member who has just spoken.

Mr. HOEY: Will the hon. member tell me, has the Government since its inception ever leaned on the party to which he belongs?

Mr. BAXTER: The hon. member probably thinks the question is pertinent, and I will tell him that, so far as I know—and he has the same opportunity of observing that I have—the Government has never leaned upon the party which sits to the Speaker's left, but I will say that in certain matters the Government members had the good fortune to be possessed of sufficient commonsense to vote the same way as the party which I belong to has voted. That is a Heaven-born gift, that, so far, has been denied to my hon. friend and the party with which he is associated.

Mr. HOEY: It is the same commonsense that has influenced me to do it on other occasions.

Mr. BAXTER: I am quite willing to take my hon. friend's self-sufficient estimate of himself. There can be nothing much more perfect, probably, in ethics, politics, morality or religion, and we will let it go at that. If the hon. member wants any better character, I will try to improvise one to his satisfaction, but I have no desire for any personal quarrel with him. The leader of the Government went to the country making representations of the character which I have mentioned. Those were public utterances. I have another utterance, where he said that Cape Breton Liberals had fought for the development of the coal and steel industry. I was never aware of any pitched battle on the part of the Liberals for the development of those industries, but, at the same time, that is the statement he made. He also declared that they would continue this fight until they brought back the prosperity which Canada enjoyed for fifteen years under the Liberal regime, and I notice, as a striking commentary, that my hon. friend from Cumberland (Mr. Logan) told his audiences during the election campaign that a much higher duty should be paid on American coal coming into Canada. Apparently, it was not possible, however, to influence the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) to the extent of altering the tariff in the direction of an increase. On that point my hon. friends to the left seem to have had their innings, because the Liberal platform was interpreted throughout the West as meaning abolition of coal duties, while in Cape Breton, and generally throughout Nova Scotia, it was interpreted as in favour of enhancing those duties, for the protection of that very important industry.

I will refer to a pamphlet issued during the campaign, to which I referred in the debate on the address, in which, I think, a pair of boots was taken as an illustration. The people were assured—the women at all events of Nova Scotia were assured—that it was very wicked of my right hon. friend and leader (Mr. Meighen) to take 50 cents on a pair of boots, of which, I believe, some 20 cents went to the manufacturer, while, if my hon. friend the present leader of the Government were returned to power there would be a difference of some 30 cents in the duty. I said at the time that the thing looked very much like the traditional 30 cents, but I find, after we have had all the tariff proposals, that it does not even reach the munificent sum of 30 cents in the reduction of the cost of living. I think about nine cents, after you have calculated the duty on an average pair of boots, and after you have taken the increased sales tax, about eight or nine cents, is the amount of the deduction, and you only get that if you import the boots or shoes from England. I am not sorry because I am not advocating the reduction of the duty. I believe in building up the industries of Canada and keeping the workmen within our own country by the produce to be raised, even in this part of the country, which, I am assured, is going very rapidly to the dogs—a statement which I do not accept at all. I want to see our own workmen and our own agriculturalists kept employed. I want to see a united Canada built up. I am glad the Finance Minister has not proceeded further in the work of destruction that was promised by his party when out of power.

I think it is entirely a matter of congratulation to the country that the tariff has not been very seriously disturbed, but it is a different matter when the hon. gentlemen who now control the Government and who know the effect of the tariff upon the business of the country, make representations, not only in their platform, solemnly adopted in convention, but also on all the platforms of the country. They made those declarations and stated what they were going to do. They came into power. They knew just as well before as after they came into power how much money it would take to run this country for a year, and they knew that it could not be done accompanied by any serious tariff reduction. The Finance Minister, with a frankness that is characteristic, told the House and the country what his leader never dared to tell the country, that it is impossible to carry out the pledges that were given in the platform of 1919, and the pledges that were given during the last campaign. That is a manifest fact, and my hon. friend who discussed the matter to-night said over and over again that he was dissatisfied with and humiliated by these budget proposals. He realizes that, according to the Finance Minister, it is an absolute fact that the cost of administering government and carrying on the public services of the country cannot be brought lower, that a burden of taxation must be imposed, and that the only question that remains is as to the distribution of that taxation.

We were promised that a load would be taken off the poor people. We have the pitiful appeal of the leader of the Government, as if people were going without medicine, without food, without education and clothing, because of this tremendous burden of $310 per family, which, after all, is only an average and is not true with regard to any specified family in the Dominion. Yet, that was the nature of the appeal, and now the hon. member who made that appeal had to face the fact that they cannot carry out the promises that they gave, or the suggestions that they made. They cannot, and they dare not, carry into effect the things that they told the people they wanted to do if they came back into power.

How does the case stand with some others? We have already had a vote in this House, and the Liberal party has declared that promises do not bind them; that political platforms are only scraps of paper. The Liberals have informed us that their leader, by a certain magic formula, after the platform was adopted, rendered it as tenuous as some vapour floating over a chimney top. He waved his hands and he uttered the magic words that he accepted all the work that the convention had done, and that he would regard that simply as a chart to be followed, according as he might be advised by those whom he would gather around him into the counsels of the party. Day after day was spent, mile after mile was travelled, health after health was drunk and cheer after cheer was rung around the room for this great magna charta of the Liberal party that was to give us the political and financial salvation of Canada; and yet, when their leader was adopting it, they did not know that he was damning and destroying and tearing it into the veriest shreds and patches and remnants of a policy, a thing not to be followed, not to be carried out.

But there are some other people in this House. Do they stand any better? The Liberal party, like the Conservative party, was repudiated during the campaign by certain other gentlemen. They wanted to stand on the "Mount of Promise" with their faces irradiated with the new political glory. They were going to come down that mount carrying the tables of the new law which would bring a new political salvation into this wretched political sin-struck world. Ah, they broke the tables of the law in carrying them down, just as the other Moses did. According to the other platform, we were to have not a postponed, not a delayed, not a fanciful, but an immediate and substantial all-round reduction of the custom tariff. Did the gentlemen who framed that know what they were talking about? Was this some more vaporous matter to catch votes; or was it the honest belief of the men who penned it and the men who spoke it? What are we trading on in public life anyway? Facts or fallacies, truth or fiction? The decision has to be made here as well as in the country. We can have the immediate reduction as soon as Parliament meets; the hour is now; the opportunity is here; but vigorous and united as they are, and knowing as they say just how they are going to vote, will my hon. friends to my left show me a substantial reduction of any duty, let alone a substantial all-round reduction of the customs tariff? Where is it? They cannot find it themselves, and their friends opposite, their friends in conjunction, cannot and do not pretend to show it to them. Both sides have repudiated the idea of getting any practical, beneficial reduction in the customs tariff; but my hon. friends are going to vote to support a government that gives them this back-handed slap, that destroys their hopes, that repudiates their platform as well as the Government's own.

My friends to my left also solemnly announced to the people of Canada that they were going in for a reduction by 50 per cent of the preferential tariff for Great Britain. That reduction was to be immediate; that was to be now, not five years from now, and then they were to have further gradual uniform reductions to ensure complete free trade between Great Britain and Canada in five years. I think it is up to my hon. friends to the left to discuss a little less, perhaps, my right hon. friend (Mr. Meighen), who has led this party with clearness of vision, with soundness of intellect and with a straight regard every time for the truth and the fact, and to tell us why they stand here mouthing about other things and disregarding their own platform, not daring to stand on the floor of this House and support a single plank or a single atom of the thing they said would bring salvation to Canada. Let those who live in glass houses cease throwing stones; or if they must throw them, let them throw them against a badly shattered glass house just over the way.

That was not their whole platform. Another plank was reciprocity with the United States in natural products. I do not blame them in regard to that; they might have thought they could get that. That might have been an honest mistake; they know now they cannot get it. Another demand was that all foodstuffs should be placed on the free list. Search your free list to-day; search the free list in the tariff proposals of the Minister of Finance, and tell me where you will find foodstuffs on the free list. It will take some searching to find any. Did the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Crerar), who leads this party to my left, not know that these things were impossible? Is he such a child that it is only in this session that he has discovered the financial standing of the people of Canada? Is it only now that he learns for the first time that these things cannot be done? Is it possible that he sat in Parliament, in the Government of this country, as year after year went by and he was accumulating knowledge, and yet he had not attained so much knowledge as to know these things were a mere lie, a sham and a deception to the people? Agricultural implements, farm and household machinery, vehicles, fertilizers, coal, lumber, cement, gasoline, illuminating fuel and lubricating oils—all to be free. Show me one of them now; but vote, gentlemen to my left, vote in your morganatic alliance, vote as you told us a while ago that you would. Vote to support, as I said you were supporting, a union always a little shady, a union which gives you none of the benefits, honours or dignities, but which confers upon you any of the degradations that there may be, that puts you to the menial task and takes you not into the household, that seeks you not in the home, but that puts you into a kind of inferior position. But vote for that kind of slavery if you like it.

Raw material and machinery used in the manufacture of these articles were also to be free, and we have the sanction of the great Council of Agriculture upon this. But when we have the budget, my hon. friends across the way, just as much as my hon. friends to my left, cannot refute the fact that was so clearly, plainly, honestly and courageously enunciated by the Minister of Finance, that it takes one hundred cents to pay one dollar of debt; that you have to do that, and that this country cannot go begging. I admire the stand the minister took; I admire his courage. He is about the only man in the two parties who had the courage of his convictions and who has taken hold of matters with a businesslike grasp. He says that you cannot carry out the platform of either the Canadian Council of Agriculture or the Liberal party. But where were the parties before we assembled in this House, before the people did the choosing? Ah, this old party was being blackguarded from one end of Canada to the other as a party of oppressors. From the Atlantic to the Pacific my leader (Mr. Meighen) was termed an autocrat. If there be autocracy in being just; if there be autocracy in telling the truth; if there be autocracy in being honest and four-square; if there be autocracy in not trying to camouflage the situation of the country; if there be autocracy in not begging people for their votes, giving them one kind of coin of political promises in one place and another kind in another—if that be autocracy, then I am more glad than ever that I stepped into the fight and endeavoured to help a man of the character of the leader of this party.

You can review the campaign if you will. Other parties may have things to think about themselves, or about their leaders, or about their press, but there is one thing that cannot be said honestly. It cannot be said that the Conservative party told the country anything else than the thing that it could and would do, the thing that it intended to carry out if it had been returned to power. We did not talk about making everything free and slicing off the customs revenue of the country; we did not talk about lifting burdens off the poor man; we did not attempt to fool the people for the sake of getting their trust. We were content to come back to power, but only on such conditions that we could face the electorate afterwards and say that we had done nothing other than what we promised, from the platform and from our press, could be done and would be done. We stand therefore in a position of intense satisfaction to-night, when we see our hon. friends to the left prepared to swallow again the dose they took at the opening of the session and stand up here and approve, by their votes and their conduct, the breaking of pledges, virtually declaring that it is not necessary to have any faith or honour in public life at all, and that all you have to do is to get on a platform and tell the people any old thing that will fool them for a while until the votes are counted, afterwards turning your back on your solemn pledges. My hon. friend who spoke a few moments ago (Mr. Hoey) rather sneered, I thought, at the amendment which has been moved. Let us look for a moment at that amendment. Is there any man in the House who will deny the following statement:

10 p.m.

> That to these ends, wheat, wheat flour and all products of wheat; the principal articles of food; farm implements and machinery; farm tractors, mining, flour and sawmill machinery and repair parts thereof; rough and partly dressed lumber; gasoline, illuminating, lubricating and fuel oils; nets, net twines, and fishermen's equipments; cements, and fertilizers, should be free from customs duties, as well as the raw material entering into same.

Will any hon. member deny that that resolution was adopted? Scarcely. Further, the Liberal party resolved:

> That the British preference be increased to 50 per cent of the general tariff.

What hon. member will deny by his vote that the Liberal party adopted that? None, I think.

> And the Liberal party hereby pledges itself to implement by legislation the provisions of this resolution when returned to power.

Ah, Mr. Speaker, the prospect of a return to power was the glory of it all,—the hope of power and the realization of power. To proceed:

> That such pledges were restated as the policy of the Liberal party in an official handbook issued just before the general election, namely, in October 1921, under the authority of its leader, Honourable W. L. Mackenzie King.

Will any hon. member in this House deny that statement? I think not.

That candidates contesting on behalf of the Liberal Party in the said election, used widely the promises therein set out as a means of securing support.

No one, I think, will deny that either.

That the Liberal party having been returned to power, the Budget proposals of the Finance Minister now brought down, constitute, on the part of the Government, an utter failure to implement such pledges by legislation.

Is there a man within the sound of my voice who can say that that is not correct? The Government may offer some excuse for not implementing their pledges by legislation, but they cannot contend for a moment that they have implemented them. They have not implemented one of them. The rest of it follows:

That the making of such solemn pledges, the utilization of them to secure support, and their flagrant violation after the attainment of office reveal a disregard of political honour and tend to lower the standard of public life.

I fancy this is a case where the horse comes up to the hurdle and balks at the jump; for hon. gentlemen know in their consciences that they ought to vote for the amendment. There is not a syllable of it that they can deny. But there is another platform, that of the Canadian Council of Agriculture, that is being equally violated by their supine acceptance of the proposals of the Government, whatever they may be. My hon. friends ought to be congratulated upon the plenitude of their success in this session. One sees the mere wraith of the Wheat Board trailing past the doors and disappearing into the night. There will be no compulsory Wheat Board; not even the bravest of them imagines that now. There will be only the ghost of the Wheat Board to give a warning to certain representatives in the prairies when they next appeal very unwillingly to their assistance. As regards the Crowsnest pass, I do not think my hon. friends are getting very much consolation now that there is some common sense injected into the discussion of that question. Redistribution was another immediate demand on the part of hon. gentlemen, but I think possibly they realize the futilty of repeating that demand this session. By the way, there was an observation made by the hon. member for Springfield (Mr. Hoey) with regard to my right hon. friend and leader (Mr. Meighen) as to redistribution. It is a fact that only about the opening of the session, were the census figures sufficiently completed to enable the House, if it so desired, to consider the question of redistribution, and I should like to know how my right hon. friend could possibly have introduced a redistribution bill and got it through before he had those figures or before the census was even taken. When I hear criticism of that kind I am reminded of the character of men I have canvassed from time to time in the past when I used to go about soliciting a personal vote. I used to encounter a type of man, who, when I asked for his vote, would hit off on something else. There was always something that did not quite suit him. He was dodging the question, and I knew from the start that he did not intend to vote for me anyhow. The hon. member for Springfield will not mind if I class him mentally with those men whom I used to size up as natural born opponents whom I could not win over anyhow. No matter what excuses they made they were bound to vote for the other side. That is the way a great many members of this group regard the hon. member and other vociferous exponents of the Progressive party. After all, they are Liberals. I would not call them good Liberals, because they did not run under the banner of their party; but they thought they had a better chance of getting into the House under the cloak of another party, and another platform a little more deceptive than the Liberal party's, if it is possible to make one so. And now to-day the cloak begins to fall off and we see them in the colours naturally theirs.

I shall not attempt to discuss the budget at any great length. However, there are a few observations that I think it well I should make. Must it not be noticeable to hon. members that right through these budget proposals there is a significant absence of taxation upon luxuries? It strikes at the essentials or fundamentals. Now, let the farmer of this country, to whom the automobile in many cases is simply a replacement of the horse; let such a farmer —I do not mean one of the camouflaged brand who is in politics a Liberal first and a farmer only for principle's sake; I mean the real farmer—let him look at the automobile question. My own view of it is that it would have been wiser in the tariff proposals to treat in a different manner the automobile, say, of the style of the Ford. I am not going to advocate the use of brother Henry's products in opposition to any other, but I refer to the cheap form of automobile which gives very good service and which to-day has become almost essential to rural life. Why not have helped the man on the farm by refusing to impose excise taxes upon such cars? Why not have taken the broadside that Mr. Attorney General Raney delivered in the last election against undue profits of the Ford Motor Company as at least an excuse for giving to those who need the convenience of an automobile in their business a substantial reduction in the cost of that article? Let the rest of us, those who ride in cars for pleasure, pay the 10 per cent or 5 per cent or whatever it may be, and give to those who really need the automobile some real relief. That is what my hon. friends should have done. I have not heard any of the hon. gentlemen to my left demand that. It is very evident that they are not bothering at all about the farmer; the matter of an automobile to the farmer does not matter.

Mr. RYCKMAN: They like the tax.

Mr. BAXTER: Oh, charmed with it; they must be very fond of it. A reduction has been made of a few paltry cents upon ploughs and upon a great many other articles that apparently we obtain only from Great Britain. Just imagine bringing a farm cart from Great Britain—and you get a reduction of 2½ per cent on that article; but you cannot get any reduction if you bring it from across the border. Now, who in thunder among the farmers expects to get any benefit out of that part of the policy? Of course, my hon. friends to my left mildly applaud it and say it is the best thing that could be done under the circumstances—a "step in the right direction." Well, when they have stepped out on the prairies it will be a case of "Tell it not in Gath; publish it not in the streets of Askelon." That is the way this news will be received if my hon. friends go fresh from Parliament with that kind of thing going on.

Then, let us look at these proposals for a moment from the standpoint of the labourer. I notice that the labourer gets the benefit of the 2½ per cent reduction on his heavy knitted wool undershirt, while the man who is fortunate enough to be able to wear collars and cuffs to his work, gets, I think, a reduction of 10 per cent, or 5—it is twice as much, anyway.

Mr. RYCKMAN: Put it on the safe side.

Mr. BAXTER: At all events, we will say it is at least a very gentlemanly tariff; it has proper regard for those who dress in good taste, and the man with collars and cuffs is going to come off better than the poor chap who has to go to work in his knitted shirt. Well, if my hon. friends to my left want to approve of it, all right. They have the votes; they have the opportunity,—and they also have a splendid opportunity to swallow their vote. I hope they enjoy it; I hope they like to gulf down budget, tariff, principles, everything, for fear that if they voted some other way this Parliament might suddenly go to pieces and they would have to give an accounting of their stewardship to the people of the prairies.

Now, I am not a very belligerent character; at the same time I do not want to be classed as an entire pacifist. I know that what I am going to say will not have very much of Christian savour about it, but I am going to express my real feeling. Perhaps what I say will be much more pagan in its character than hon. members may think it should be. But I should not jest on the subject, because I am in real earnest. Except that it might have cost many thousands of additional lives, I have felt and I always shall feel that the justice of God was not done upon Germany when her cities, her villages and her people remained intact, safe and sheltered, while the land and people of France underwent terrible devastation and suffering. It may not be Christian, but I think it is intensely human to feel that not until we are sure that the brute that is the soul of Germany —for she has no soul—is destroyed, we should not strengthen the power of what was the German Empire. You may trade with her, if you will. If you want to sacrifice everything to commerce; if there is to be no sentiment; if there is to be no feeling in the matter, then we can go on and barter with Germany and let her people do for us the work that the British artisan might do or the Canadian workingman might do near our own homes. If that is your sentiment; if you are willing for the sake of a few cents or a few dollars to let Germany engross your trade, God knows this tariff gives her the opportunity, and she is too only too willing to profit by it. Now, I do not want any one within the sound of my voice or any one who may read what I say to-night to infer for a moment that I desire in the least sense to brand the Government as intending to do anything against our nationality or our British connection, or, above all, in favour of Germany. I would not accuse the Minister of Finance or his colleagues of any deliberate intention in that regard, and I would be very sorry if a thing so cheap and so capable of being used on the hustings as an election cry should be resorted to. I may say that statements of that character have been made about us, and I would not wish a reprisal of them. It is not fair; it does no good to our national life. I would like to see the matter considered on the other basis. Let us, at least, until we are moderately sure that the world is safe, raise a barrier against those countries that tried to kill democracy and slaughter liberty. Let us insist that nothing German, nothing Austrian, shall come in here to be used by our people, not even for the sake of some paltry commercial advantage. If there were a famine in Germany to-night, I would say, let her suffer as a just punishment for the deeds of the past. I would not vote a dollar of Canadian money to send a single ship of relief, to send a single bushel of wheat, even though her population disappeared from the earth.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. BAXTER: That may be too bitter for you, but it is my feeling, and a feeling to which I will give just as much expression as others will give of their sympathy with and slobbering over those who tried to destroy them. There is such a thing as mercy, such a thing as reconciliation, but there is also such a thing as justice; and sometimes the only thing that is wise in the interests of the world is to let the axe fall.

Mr. WILLIAM ELLIOTT (South Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, at the outset I wish to express to this House my appreciation of the great task which the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) has undertaken. I do not believe there is a man in Canada in whom the people have greater faith than they have in the present Minister of Finance. In 1896 he gave to this Dominion a budget that brought a period of prosperity that has never been equalled in our history. While the budget perhaps does not go as far as we looked for in the matter of tariff reductions, I am satisfied it is a step in the right direction, and I believe that in the course of time we will eventually get where we want to be. I take this stand: We are in a period of great stress, and the financial condition of this country is such that we cannot put into effect all at once the principles we would like and which we have advocated. Changes must be made gradually, one step at a time, until we get to the point where it is unwise to go further.

The problem of meeting the expenditure of the Dominion of Canada is a very serious one. The late government, while meeting the expenditure in a way, always failed to raise enough money, with the result that the national debt has been increasing from year to year. In my opinion, the sooner we stop increasing our national debt the better. We simply have to take hold of this question of finance. We should raise as we go along a revenue sufficient to meet our expenses, and I believe the Minister of Finance is making an honest endeavour to solve this problem, which is one of the greatest facing the country to-day, We hear a lot about reducing the expenditure, and that is certainly a wise thing to do. It is easier to reduce our expenditure than to raise money by way of taxation. I think we could reduce the expenditure in some departments of government. I am under the impression that we have a great many more civil servants in the employ of this Government than we need, and if the Government would spend more time in studying the departments with a view to reducing the staffs to the very lowest point consistent with efficiency, I believe they would ultimately come to the point where they would be able to raise a revenue sufficient to cover the expenditure.

At the present time the country is faced with tariffs imposed by other countries. We find that the United States are making an honest endeavour on their part to raise their tariff, and the same is true of practically every country with which we deal. I venture to say that it would be very unwise, much as I am in favour of a low tariff, for the Government at one step to wipe out our tariff against other countries. We must proceed by degrees, and for taking a step in that direction I think the Minister of Finance ought to be commended. While we do not agree with him in all respects I think in the main he is proceeding in the right direction, and we have every reason to follow him with confidence.

The object of every government in this country should be to develop Canada. We have a country with great natural resources. We have stores of wealth that have never been tapped. So far as agriculture is concerned, we have a country which is immensely rich, possibly the richest in the world. We have in the northwest territories perhaps the greatest wheat belt in the world, and if we can get settlers of the right class out on that land—only a small proportion of it is under cultivation at the present time—it will help us to pay off our national debt in a way we otherwise could not do.

But the greatest problem before the country to-day to my mind, is markets. Our friends to my right lay great stress upon the home market. There is no one who appreciates the home market more than I do. I represent a constituency in the province of Ontario which has more people to the square mile, I think, than any other rural constituency. I represent the south riding of the country of Waterloo, and we have in that constituency one large city and two or three large towns all within five or six miles of each other. It is a densely populated district. I know and appreciate the value of the home market to the farmer, but unless the home market can consume all the products of our farms, it is practically of no value to us as a means of setting our prices. The prices we get for our farm products are largely fixed by the Chicago and Liverpool markets. They are fixed by our export trade. I believe that one of the greatest things that could be done for agriculture to-day is for the Government to develop markets for agricultural products. Once you get those markets established, you will find no difficulty in settling our idle acres in the northwest. While this is true of agriculture, it is also perfectly true of other industries. I am not one of those who hold the opinion that large towns and cities are a detriment to any country. I know that some of my friends on this side will not agree with me, but I believe the larger our towns and cities grow and the more people we can get into this country, the better it is for we farmers providing—and I make this proviso—that those cities do not grow at the expense of any other industry. I am just as much opposed to building up agriculture at the expense of industry as I am to building up industry at the expense of agriculture.

Mr. STEVENS: Does the hon. member believe that industry in this country in the past has been built up at the expense of agriculture?

Mr. ELLIOTT (Waterloo): I do. I believe that the towns and cities have been built up at the expense of agriculture.

Mr. STEVENS: Does the hon. member agree with the proposal to remedy that condition by the removal of the tariff?

Mr. ELLIOTT (Waterloo): I believe that the lowering of the tariff to a certain point at the present time would be in the interests of agriculture, and also in the interests of industry.

Mr. STEVENS: Lowering it to what point?

Mr. ELLIOTT (Waterloo): To the point where we have tariff for revenue only.

Mr. FIELDING: The hon. member for Vancouver does not seem to see the point.

Mr. ELLIOTT (Waterloo): We have a small population, comparatively, in this Dominion, about eight and three-quarter millions. We speak about the value of the home market, but my contention is that if industry does nothing more than supply the wants of these eight and three-quarter millions of people, it is not going to develop to any great extent. You have to get markets outside. You have to establish markets for the products of your factories in other countries. Some of our friends argue that the way to do that is by keeping up a tariff wall around this country and keeping other products out. I venture to say that that is the surest way to kill the industries of this country. If you want to build up the industries of this country, you must make the tariff just high enough to give us the revenue we require, and not put a great burden on the consumers of this country. Now the same is absolutely true with regard to agriculture; we produce a great many more goods than we can consume. Our friends who advocate a high tariff will say: "Oh, we will supply you with a home market which will consume your products." Well, I do not know that the Canadian people could possibly consume all the wheat that is produced in this country—at least I do not think it would be very good for them if they did. Neither could they consume all the cattle that we produce. We have to get export markets; we have to ship our products out into the markets of the world if agriculture is ever to develop.

I do not intend to deal any further with this question of agriculture, but I want to discuss for a few minutes the high cost of living as it affects labour in our towns and cities. To my mind one of the most serious questions which we in this Dominion have to deal with to-day is the labour problem. We have—very largely, I believe, as a result of the tariff imposed and the management of the war by the late government—a period of great unemployment. We find that we have more unemployed men in Canada to-day than we ever had before. During the last winter a great many of these men were, for a time, fed at the public expense. Hundreds and thousands of others, both men and women, were able, by the use of a little money they had saved up, to worry through the winter. Now what is the condition as we find it here to-day? We find that labour is not being employed as it should be, and that the coming winter will probably see greater hardship brought on the labour people than they have ever experienced before, simply because those people are not going to be in the position to stand a second hard year. I think the Government would be well advised to undertake some public work as a relief measure. Ultimately I believe they will have to feed these people; we cannot see them starve. These men do not want charity, they want work; and I believe that ultimately either the provincial or the federal government, or perhaps both, will have to feed this great army of the unemployed during the coming winter.

We find that the cost of living is very little lower than it was before. We find that the cost of coal and the necessaries of life, is very little lower than it was before, with the result that it is almost impossible, owing to the small amount of work which these men have had, for them to exist. Now labour has been blamed for a good many things for which, to my mind, it is not guilty. We have men who, in looking around for a reason for the high cost of living, will tell you to-day that labour is responsible for it. They will tell you that it is because of the high wages they must pay that the cost of living has gone up to its present point. I believe, however, that if we were to analyse the conditions in a great many of our important industries we would find that labour is not getting an undue reward. At the same time, I wish to say that I believe that in some of our industries, in some of our great corporations in the Dominion, labour, perhaps, is too highly paid, and in this connection I refer to the railway corporations. But coming right down to our factories, I spent a good deal of time in two of our industries investigating the conditions of labour. Take the boot and shoe industry, and there are quite a large number of factories in the south riding of Waterloo. We find that labour is blamed very largely because of the high cost of boots and shoes. Never in the history of Canada, as far as I can remember, has the cost of the raw material which enters into the manufacture of boots and shoes been so low. Why, beef hides were actually selling as low as 2½ and 3 cents a pound; they are a little higher now, perhaps in the neighbourhood of 4 or 5 cents a pound, but these prices are very much lower than those paid during the war. Consequently, it cannot be the cost of the raw material that is keeping up the price of boots and shoes. I have a statement made by the secretary of the Boot and Shoe Workers' Union of Ontario, Mr. O'Dell, of Hamilton, in which he says that the cost of the labour entering into a pair of shoes which retails at $12 is only $1.70. Now, Sir, I maintain that that is not an undue amount to pay for labour; I believe it is only a fair wage. When we consider further that, according to one manufacturer, 14,000 Canadians engaged in the shoe trade receive an aggregate yearly wage of $10,000,000, this works out at only $715 each. But footwear never cost so much as it does now. Where does the profit go? I maintain that a wage of $715 on the average for the shoe workers in the Dominion is not an excessive wage; and I do not think that any fair-minded man can justly charge labour with being responsible for the high cost of shoes.

Permit me to continue a little further along this line. I have obtained from a very reliable source the cost of the labour entering into the production of a yard of cloth. I might say further that in the south riding of Waterloo we have a number of the finest woollen mills in the Dominion. The figures which I am going to submit to you with regard to labour are not figures covering one year only, or two years—they are figures covering a period of eight years, so that I think they are fairly correct, and they cover the period in which the cost of woollens was said to be at its very highest. Now, I find this to be the case with respect to the labour entering into the manufacture of a yard of cloth which sells at $2 per yard to the retailer: The labour, represented by the handling, sorting, blending, picking, scouring, carding, gilling, combing, re-gilling, drawing, spinning, twisting, reeling, and so forth, only receives 30 cents, whereas the yard of cloth which that labour produces retails at $2. In other words, for a yard of cloth sold by that firm at $2 per yard the labour cost is only 30 cents. I do not think any of you will say that is an undue charge; and I believe that in this case labour is only receiving a very small part of what it is really worth. You may ask:

How is it, in view of the fact that labour is getting such a small reward for this work that the cost of clothing is perhaps higher than it has been for years? Now, it takes about 3½ yards of cloth to make a suit of clothes, and a little over a dollar, to be accurate $1.12 is paid for the labour which goes into that cloth. No wonder you ask me: "How is it that when we go to buy a suit of clothes manufactured from that cloth, we have to pay somewhere in the neighbourhood of $45 or $50, when the original cost of that cloth to the retailer was only in the neighbourhood of $7?" I venture to say that we never had a greater need for a good active board of commerce in this country to investigate the great cost of these articles than we have at the present time. That is true not only with regard to the articles which I have cited, but of practically every article which goes into human consumption to-day. There is too great a spread between what we get, what the producer gets and what the consumer pays. Until we get down to the bottom of that, we will not solve the question of the high cost of living. I want to be fair and I say that if the tariff on these articles were wiped out completely it would make very little difference in the cost. I have not had time to go into that statement, but I am satisfied it is perfectly true. The cost is somewhere else, and it is the duty of the Government to find out where the excessive cost of the necessities of life comes in.

I will deal now with the question of the tariff. A good number of elections have been won and lost on the tariff. We find that practically every government, both Liberal and Conservative, has used the tariff as a means of winning elections. In the last campaign our friends to the right said the tariff was the only issue. Well, it did not work out very well, as far as they were concerned. They lost the election, and our friends on the other side of the House won. Now, stripped of all its mystery, very few people thoroughly understand the tariff. We have a plank in the platform of the United Farmers, which is also incorporated in the platform of the Independent Labour party of Canada, which reads:

> That the tariff should not be a political football to be kicked about for election purposes, but should be placed in the hands of a qualified and representative commission, whose duty it should be to administer the tariff in a scientific manner, Labor then having an opportunity to protect its interests.

This was taken from the Labour platform, and further on—

> That every claim for tariff protection by any industry should be heard publicly before this proposed commission.

Another plank in the platform reads:

> That all corporations engaged in the manufacture of products, protected by the customs tariff, be obliged to publish annually comprehensive and accurate statements of their earnings.

I believe in that plank, and I think there are very few members in the House of Commons who know enough of the tariff to say definitely whether any industry needs protection or whether it does not. I have great respect for the high calibre of the members of this House, but, nevertheless, in order to state definitely that any industry is in need of protection, we must spend a good deal of time investigating the question, and I believe in the appointment of a commission to investigate it. That commission should be composed of men who were above reproach, and beyond the possibility of any outside influence being brought to bear on them. It would also be a representative commission, composed of a representative of agriculture, and a representative of labour. I would not say that we should have a representative of every industry, because that would be going a little too far. With a commission such as this, inquirying into the conditions as we have them to-day in the country, I believe we would get the very best information possible regarding our industries. I do not say that this commission should be independent of Parliament. It should be appointed under Parliament, and only for the purpose of making recommendations to Parliament. Those recommendations would be acted upon, and Parliament would have to assme the responsibility of those recommendations, if they were put into effect. The second clause in this platform, which I consider of great importance, reads:

> That every claim for tariff protection by any industry should be heard publicly before this proposed commission.

I believe that if this commission were in operation we would get a very great amount of information which would be valuable to the people of Canada. We would find out a lot of things which would be a great surprise to us. We have been told in the past that a great many of our manufacturers have been making immense sums of money. We have been told that the Dominion Textile people made a profit of 310 per cent in one year. I do not know whether that is true or not. It has been stated on public platforms and never denied, as far as I have heard. It would be the duty of this commission to inquire and find out whether that firm had been making such undue profits in one year or not.

With regard to the woollen industry I have been told—in fact the evidence which I have at the present time bears out the statement—that for a period of ten years the average profits of the woollen industry of Canada have been in the neighbourhood of 5 or 6 per cent. I do not know whether that is true or not, but it would be the duty of the commision to find out, and once they had that knowledge, and once they had all the cards on the table with regard to any particular industry, the commission would be in a position to say whether that industry required any assistance or not in the way of a tariff. However, with regard to any of our industries which are native to Canada, if upon an examination of their statements before the commission it is proven to the commission that they require protection, I would be in favour of giving them protection. We find that other countries are adopting this system. We found out just the other day that the United States made a move in this direction. While I do not believe in following the lead of United States in every particular, yet it is an indication that the people of other countries are thinking along these lines, and I think if the Government would adopt such a system as a tariff commission, which is one of the planks in our platform, they would receive a good bit of support from this side of the House. The tariff is more or less of a mystery to me, I am free to confess. I suppose I have a fair amount of knowledge upon it, yet I believe the Government is justified in dealing carefully with it. I do not think they would be justified in making any undue reduction, owing to the present unsettled state of this country. I think the action of the Government, while it is not all we desire, is, at least, commendable and goes in the right direction.

Mr. CHAPLIN: Would the hon. member consider the cotton industry as a native industry?

Mr. ELLIOT: I would not think the cotton industry was a native industry.

Mr. J. F. WHITE (London): I think a repetition of congratulations to the hon. Finance Minister (Mr. Fielding) is hardly necessary and somewhat tiresome. I can only say that I admire the Finance Minister for the pluck he has shown in facing a very difficult proposition, and that I wish him many years of the vigour, both of body and mind, which he now enjoys. I could not help thinking, as I heard his budget speech, that another milestone had been passed in the matter of election pledges, promises and arguments. I remember that in the days gone by we have heard of commercial union; we have heard of free trade as they have it in England; we have heard of tariff for revenue only, of reciprocity; and now we have the first outcome of the Liberal tariff platform of 1919 with its solemn pledges and its chart and compass attachment. As to what the final outcome will be, I suppose it is a case of, no man knoweth. If we consider the proposed tariff changes by themselves, there is some slight reduction; but if we consider them in connection with the 50 per cent addition to the sales tax, the reduction is so slight as to be almost invisible. Some have said that it is a step in the right direction, but I think such hon. gentlemen are quite satisfied with a very short step. It is rather significant that the budget does not contain any new sources of revenue. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) has not been able to tap any fresh source; he has simply added to those which we have had before, and it seems to me that this is quite a compliment to the previous Minister of Finance (Sir Henry Drayton) and the late government. In the case of these slight tariff reductions, I would point out that Canada is the only nation that I know of which is reducing tariffs. In the last two or three years, the customs tariffs of most countries have been increased, and it might be said that all the world, excepting Canada, is opposed to a reduction of tariffs.

Since coming to this House, I have been very much interested in the speeches of the party to my left, and the Ontario members, who number about one-third of that party, have been strangely silent upon many subjects. The hon. member for Springfield (Mr. Hoey) to-night gave quite a blue picture of the golden West, about the bluest that I have ever heard. We have just listened to the hon. member for South Waterloo (Mr. Elliott), who, I believe, advocated before the election the tariff commission that he has spoken of to-night. He also says that he is in favour of a tariff for revenue. I was just wondering, if a few more of the Ontario members of that party would express their views, whether we would not have just about as cosmopolitan a membership in that party as there is in the Liberal party. It was somewhat to my surprise that he cleared the manufacturers of cloth of any duplicity or any arrangement whereby prices were hoisted to too high a level.

We had before the special Railway Committee a day or two ago the Hon. George Langley who, in giving evidence before that committee, said that the western country from which he came, had lost confidence in a certain commission. We have had the Railway Commission looking after railway matters for some years; and if a certain section of the country loses entire confidence in the Railway Commission, why cannot other sections of the country lose confidence in a tariff commission? The tariff is too intimately connected with our raising of revenue to be entrusted to a commission.

We have heard a great deal about the troubles of hon. gentlemen to the left, and it seems to me that some of those are troubles which no legislation can remedy. They had bad weather conditions during the last two years, and I would point out that no Act of Parliament can command the velocity or the direction of the wind, or the downfall of rain or the time at which it shall come. It seems to me that while climatic conditions may not be ideal, the greatest trouble they have and the greatest drawback to their success is the exorbitant freight rates which they are compelled to pay. We are told that the special Railway Committee will have something of interest and of value to bring before this House when they are ready to report. Probably another reason for some of their troubles is, that dry areas in the southern part of Alberta and Saskatchewan were opened up for farming, when they might better have been left as grazing country and would probably have produced more than they have under cultivation. Although members of that party are opposed to protection in all its forms, or at least some of them are, we have heard from one to-night who is not. Some hon. members have explained that they are not asking for any special protection or special privilege; but they are willing to vote large sums for the promotion of the interest of agriculture, and I do not object to that. They are quite willing to ask for a wheat board, and in the present progress that the wheat board is making, I have my doubts whether it will be of any use to them. But if that is the regulation they want, I am quite free to say that I am willing to support that measure.

I have looked up the record of importations of farm produce, and I find that, in the year ended March 31, 1921, under nineteen items there was imported into this country the produce of farms to the value of $71,500,000. It seems to me that there is food for thought in those items. For instance, we imported 3,741,000 pounds of butter, of which 2,207,000 pounds was received from the United States. We exported 9,739,000 pounds, nearly 6,000,000 of which went to the United States. I am giving the figures in round numbers. The United States duty is now 6 cents a pound. Under the regulations now before the Senate, I believe it is proposed to raise it to 8 cents. The Canadian duty is 4 cents per pound.

Of eggs in the shell, we imported 5,342,000 dozen, of which 5,201,000 dozen came from the United States. That does not take into consideration eggs in the frozen state. We exported 6,579,000 dozen, of which only 191,000 dozen went to the United States. Eggs were admitted to the United States free. The proposed tariff is 8 cents per dozen. The Canadian duty is 3 cents per dozen.

We have heard a great deal about efforts being made to secure wider markets; and while I would not minimize those efforts, I would say that it behooves us to examine these conditions, to find out the reason why these things exist and to take steps to secure our own markets to ourselves. The home market is the most valuable market we have; it is the most stable, and it is the one that will stick by us in the end.

As to the free trade view of some members of the party to our left I might remind the House that we have experimented somewhat with that policy. During the stress of war, when the necessity for the production of foodstuffs was so great, the government of that day, in order to encourage such production, placed farm tractors on the free list. They did so with the best intentions, by a temporary provision under an Order in Council. Now, in 1919 and 1920 there were imported from the United States tractors to the value of some $20,000,000. The people of Canada paid the duty on those tractors in the form of exchange. They paid to the United States an exchange that averaged 14 per cent during all that time, and that money went to keep the American factories busy, and to keep open the channels of their trade. When the transaction was completed we had the tractors and the Americans had the cash. Those tractors might have been made in Canada, and we would have had the tractors and the cash as well.

Mr. BIRD: Is it not a fact that a large proportion of the money Canada has invested in the banks to-day is loaned to industries operating in the United States at the present time?

Mr. WHITE: I am not an authority on banks and bank investments; I have not made a study of that question. Now, no Canadian workmen had any part in the making of these imported tractors, and I find that the Government proposes to make these machines free by act of Parliament. I have been wondering how the member for South Waterloo (Mr. Elliott) will vote when this matter comes up in committee. He has put himself on record as being in favour of a tariff for revenue. He will agree, I think, that Canada needs a revenue, and if he supports the free entry of these tractors, he will have made a mistake in declaring himself in favour of a tariff for revenue. In making this change the Government says in effect that there are several thousand Canadian workmen who shall be thrown out of employment; they will have to find work elsewhere. So that quite a number of Canadians will follow in the footsteps of those who have already gone to the United States to work in the factories there. And I would remind hon. members that the United States' industrial system was not built up under free trade. In this and similar actions may be found an answer to the query which has been voiced several times in this House as to where some of our natural born Canadians have gone. We made a similar experiment some years ago with regard to binder twine and barbed wire and the results were largely the same. There is a disposition on the part of some people to believe that the tariff, which adds to the cost of the articles to the Canadian consumer, goes directly into the pockets of the manufacturer. Now, if there were such great profits derived from the manufacture of agricultural implements, would any one in his senses imagine that $11,700,000 worth of these implements would have been allowed to come into Canada from the United States last year?

Reference has been made in the Budget speech to the fact that Great Britain has reduced her debt recently some £500,000,000, and it is rather significant that Great Britain a few months ago came to the conclusion that the measure of free trade which she had had up to that time was not in her best interests. A tariff for the protection of so-called key industries was therefore imposed on some 6,000 articles.

11 p.m.

Mr. KELLNER: Is the hon. member aware that the dye industry in Great Britain is agitating for a repeal of that tariff?

Mr. WHITE: I have not heard of that, but I am aware that the agricultural industry in Great Britain is opposed to the removal of the cattle embargo.

Perhaps the most important announcement in the Budget is that which deals with the duties on articles coming from countries that have a depreciated currency. The minister referred to the tariff which has existed up to the present time as a tariff of 1,000 per cent. I wonder how he figures the present tariff. Take an article that cost 100 marks, with a duty of 30 per cent added. With undepreciated exchange that article would be worth, in round figures, $24. A thirty per cent tariff would mean a duty of $7.20. The previous method of figuring would bring it to $3.60. With the present method of calculating on the depreciated currency, that article, instead of bearing a duty of $3.60 as formerly, would bear a duty of 10 cents. I think, therefore, that the statement that we are going to have free trade with Germany is not wide of the mark. Now, under our immigration regulations we keep out the German and Austrian artisan and labourer. We say that they shall not come here and take the work from our Canadian citizens. Yet, when the products of their labour come to us in the shape of German goods we let them in practically free of duty. The minister gives as a reason for this change that the previous regulation was broken. Is it not a fact that almost all laws on the statute books are broken? But would he advance that as any justification for repealing all laws? The plain duty of the Government, it seems to me, was to amend the regulations which are not satisfactory, to make them stronger and more drastic, thereby giving the Canadian workman and manufacturer some protection from the workmen who produce these foreign goods in countries where the standard of living is low. The abolition of the depreciated currency regulations comes at a time when we have a great deal of unemployment, and when many of our factories are running on short time, in common with most other countries. We also have many soldiers who are out of work, some of them marching to Ottawa to put their case before the Government. No doubt the war has unsettled a good many of them, and possibly some were not employable before the war. The putting on of the khaki did not make them saints, but it cannot be denied that the great majority of them would make good if given proper conditions. Now, this very small duty on the German goods is practically no protection, so that almost the only protection we have left is sentiment. Sentiment will keep many of these manufactured goods out of the country, but they will come in in camouflaged form and the people will not know, when they are buying, where the goods were made.

The other day when the militia estimates were under consideration, the hon. member for Quebec South (Mr. Power), a returned soldier, I believe, attacked them quite successfully. I have been wondering whether he will speak up in protection of his former comrades when this matter of depreciated currency comes up—whether he will do his best to see that the soldiers and the unemployed get justice. Personally, I saw Canada's men march out in the pride of their youth and strength. I saw some of my best friends go with them and I heard afterwards that they had been done to death in the most hideous fashion. I saw some of them come back broken in everything but their spirit, and I saw others return who seemed to be in good health, but whose experiences will mean that they will not live out half their days. I am free to confess that I have not reached that state of grace where I can welcome a would-be autocratic German or the goods which he manufactures. I contend, Sir, that the Government has not done its duty by the Canadian people, who are anxious to maintain their present standards of living, nor has it, in particular, done its duty by the men who sacrificed so much that the liberty we believe in might not perish from the earth.

On motion of Mr. Kyte the debate was adjourned.

PRIVATE BILLS COMMITTEE

Mr. FIELDING: With the permission of the House, Mr. Speaker, I would move that we return to motions in order that I may make a motion with respect to a change in the personnel of a committee.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. FIELDING moved:

That the name of Mr. Vien be substituted for that of Mr. Ouimet on the select standing committee on Miscellaneous Private Bills.

Motion agreed to.

On motion of Mr. Mackenzie King the House adjourned at 11.06 p.m.

Thursday, June 1, 1922.

The House met at three o'clock.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk).

EXCISE—L'ASSOMPTION AND MONTCALM

Mr. SEGUIN:

What person or persons made recommendations to the minister as to the appointment and dismissals of all excise employees in the Counties of l'Assomption and Montcalm, from the 21st of September, 1911, to the present time?

Hon. Mr. LAPOINTE (For the Minister of Customs): There is no information on the files of the department respecting the person or persons who made recommendations to the minister for the appointment and dismissal of excise employees in the counties of l'Assomption and Montcalm from 21st September, 1911, to the present time, with the exception of officer J. A. Bonin, who was dismissed on account of inattention to duty on the recommendation of the District Inspector of Inland Revenue, Mr. J. A. Toupin.

MR. MEDARD FOREST

Mr. SEGUIN:

1. Was Mr. Medard Forest in the employ of the Excise Department at l'Epiphanie, Quebec, in September, 1911?
2. By whom was he replaced?
3. (a) What was the cause of his dismissal, (b) who recommended same and (c) who recommended the appointment of his successor?

Hon. Mr. LAPOINTE (For the Minister of Customs):

1. Yes.
2. J. B. T. Richard.
3. (a) Active political partizanship; (b) no information; (c) no information.

DRAWBACKS

Mr. FANSHER:

1. What amount of money collected in Customs duties was refunded under the Drawback Act, during the fiscal year ending March 31st 1922; (a) on goods imported and used in the manufacture of articles for export; (b) on goods imported and used in the manufacture of articles for home consumption?

2. What are the names of the twenty-five manufacturing firms which received the largest amounts, and what amount was received in each case?

Hon. Mr. LAPOINTE (For the Minister of Customs):

1. (a) $9,496,107.27; (b) $1,391,459.15; total, $10,887,566.42.

2. Atlantic Sugar Refinery, $1,572,846.81; Ford Automobile Co., $755,185.03; Harris Abattoir Co., $384,111.09; Canadian Kodak Co., $335,823.72; Davies, Wm. Co. Ltd., $335,757.30; Massey Harris Man'f'g. Co., $293,628.91; St. Lawrence Sugar Co., $273,632.70; Spanish River Pulp & Paper Co., $192,397.66; Algoma Steel Corporation $187,488.42; Fort Frances Pulp & Paper Co., $167,114.85; Steel Company of Canada, $159,050.36; International Harvester Co., $158,903.80; Quaker Oats Co., $155,745.34; Canadian Car & Foundary Co., $152,691.91; Canadian Consolidated Rubber Co., $152,-286.73; Canadian Packing Co., $133,510.62; Goodyear Rubber Co., $121,516.14; Dominion Corset Co., $120,152.82; Brompton Pulp & Paper Co., $117,341.88; Montreal Locomotive Co., $113,890.83; International Plow Co., $111,673.28; Laing Produce Co., $111,183.87; Singer Sewing Machine Co., $108,174.86; Page Hersey Co. Ltd., $107,-234.64; Maple Leaf Condensed Milk Co., $101,688.07.

ANTHRACITE COAL IMPORTATIONS

Mr. HANSON:

1. How many tons of anthracite coal were imported into (a) New Brunswick; (b) Nova Scotia; (c) Quebec, during the last fiscal year?

2. What was the average cost per ton of such coal (a) at point of shipment; and (b) delivered?

Hon. Mr. LAPOINTE (For the Minister of Customs):

1 and 2.

Anthracite—grate, egg, stove, nut and pea

Province	Tons	Value	Average Price
Nova Scotia ..	55,943	$ 562,532	$10 05
New Brunswick	77,846	747,920	9 61
Quebec..	1,154,825	9,281,267	8 04

Anthracite, n.o.p., buckwheat, rice and barley

Province	Tons	Value	Average Price
Nova Scotia ..	42	$ 63	$1 50
New Brunswick	.....	.....	.....
Quebec..	142,075	307,895	2 17

The price shown is the price at point of shipment including United States exchange. The cost, delivered, is not available from Customs statistical records.

CANADA—WEST INDIES SERVICE

Mr. DESLAURIERS:

1. What are the names of the persons who submitted tenders in connection with the contract given out by the Dominion Government on November 17, 1921, establishing a passenger, postal and freight service between Canada, the West Indies and British Guiana?

2. For what period has the above contract been given?

3. What are the conditions governing same?

4. Why was the Canadian Merchant Marine not given the said contract?

5. Is the Government in a position to cancel said contract?

Hon. Mr. ROBB:

1. No contract for the Canada-West Indies service was given out by the Dominion Government on November 17, 1921. Tenders for this service were called for on September 20, 1921, and were received up to noon of Januray 31, 1922. The only tender put in was from the Royal Mail Steam Packet Company, of London, England.

2. The previously existing contract was renewed for two years more from April 1st, 1922.

3. The contract provides for a fortnightly mail, passenger, and freight service from Halifax to Bermuda, the British West Indies, and Demerara, returning via the same ports to St. John, N.B. The annual subsidy is the same as before, £70,000. ($340,666.66.)

4. The Canadian Government Merchant Marine were asked if they wished to put in a tender, and they stated that it was not their intention to do so, as they have no steamers which would comply with the requirements as to passenger accommodation, or cold storage, should the latter be necessary.

5. The contract has been sent to London for the Company's signature, and while it has not yet been signed by the Minister, the Government has accepted the Royal Mail Steam Packet Company's offer, by Order in Council of February 10, 1922. Under the provisions of the contract the Minister may cancel it on thirty days' notice, if there has been any breach on the part of the contractors of any of the agreements, stipulations, or provisions contained therein.

AIR BOARD ACT AMENDMENT

Hon. GEORGE P. GRAHAM (Minister of Militia and Defence) moved that the House do to-morrow go into Committee of the Whole to consider the following proposed resolution:

Resolved, That it is expedient to amend The Air Board Act, chapter 11 of the statutes of 1919 (1st Session), to provide that the Governor in Council may make regulations prescribing the compensation to be paid, the persons to whom, and the manner in which, such compensation shall be payable, for the death or injury resulting directly from a flight undertaken in the course of duty in the public service of Canada of any person employed in the public service of Canada, or employed under the direction of any department of the public service of Canada: Provided, however, that such regulations shall not extend to the payment of compensation for any death, or injury in respect of which provision for the payment of compensation, or a gratuity or pension is made by any other Act.

He said: His Excellency has been apprized of the subject matter of this resolution and has given his assent thereto.

Motion agreed to.

ST. LAWRENCE WATERWAYS

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (North Toronto): May I be permitted to ask the Prime Minister one or two questions in regard to the St. Lawrence Waterways project? A great many applications are coming in for copies of the report of the International Joint Commission relating to the inquiry which has cost Canada a million and a half. That report has been printed in the United States and I have received telegrams from a number of public bodies in my district asking for copies of it. I think it is in the public interest that this report should be circulated, as the facts speak for themselves. I think the report should also be printed in Canada, and sufficient copies distributed to inform the public who are so interested in this scheme affecting the Great Lakes. I would also like to ask if it is the intention of the Government to have printed the correspondence which has been laid on the table at the request of the hon. member for West York (Sir Henry Drayton). I refer to the correspondence between the government of the United States and the Canadian government on this question; and further, whether opportunity will be afforded the House, before Parliament prorogues, of discussing the policy involved in the report referred to and the action taken by the government.

Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): In regard to the report itself, copies were laid on the table at an early stage of the session, as my hon. friend knows. It was then intimated that the government had a supply of printed copies, copies printed in the United States and supplied in large numbers to our government. I think it is probable that all the requests thus far made for copies have been met from this supply. If the government should find that it is not possible to meet all the requests for copies of the reports from its available supply I think the report should be printed in Canada as well; but it is an expensive report to reprint and if without embarrassment that amount of expense can be saved I believe the government would be justified in saving it. However, let me make it clear that if requests are made to the government for copies of the report in printed form beyond the supply available the government will consider the advisability of printing further copies.

As to the second question, concerning the printing of the papers that were laid on the table a day or two ago, it will be a pleasure to have them printed.

As to fixing a time to discuss this matter further, I think the House has already debated it for three or four days of the present session. I would not like to promise my hon. friend an opportunity to speak again on that subject, but we will take the matter into consideration.

Mr. CHURCH: Do I understand rightly, in view of the reply given to the government of the United States, that no further action on the findings of this report is contemplated by the Canadian government?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think my hon. friend is as well able to read the reply already given as I am to interpret it. That reply stated that the government did not think it advisable to take up the matter at this time; it did not go beyond that.

CROWSNEST PASS AGREEMENT

On the Orders of the Oay:

Mr. JOHN EVANS (Saskatoon): I would like to call the attention of the Government to the reply received by the Calgary Board of Trade on May 18 from the Minister of Agriculture in regard to the Crowsnest Pass agreement. The minister said:

> Your wire of May 18 duly to hand and note the position taken by your board in connection with the Crowsnest pass agreement. Let me assure you that the intention of the government is to try and get something better to meet present conditions than the Crowsnest pass agreement would do.

If such was the intention of the government at that time, why was the special committee appointed to consider railway transportation costs?

Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): As I understand the passage which my hon. friend has quoted it is equivalent to saying the government was moving in a particular direction with a hope of securing something better than obtains under existing conditions. If that is true—and I think it is perfectly true—the action of the government is to be interpreted in that way.

Mr. CRERAR: Just in respect to that, I would ask if it is the intention of the government to do something better than exists under the Crowsnest pass agreement?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I presume that the committee that is enquiring into the matter at the present time will report to the House what it thinks best to do. If the committee suggests something better than the Crowsnest pass agreement, certainly the House will have an opportunity to consider the better course.

THE BUDGET

CONTINUATION OF THE DEBATE ON THE ANNUAL FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The House resumed from Wednesday, May 31, the debate on the motion of Hon. W. S. Fielding (Minister of Finance) that Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair for the House to go into Committee of Ways and Means, and the proposed amendment thereto of Hon. Sir Henry Drayton.

Mr. G. W. KYTE (Cape Breton South and Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I desire at the outset to join in the felicitations that have been extended to the Finance Minister upon the presentation of his sixteenth budget to the House of Commons. In a few days he will mark another mile stone in his long and useful political career. On June 13 he will see the fortieth anniversary of his entry into public life. Upon that date in the year 1882 he was first elected to the House of Assembly in the province of Nova Scotia to represent the metropolitan city of Halifax. After two years he was called to the premiership, the duties of which office, in addition to the office of provincial treasurer, he discharged continuously from that date up to 1896, when he was called to the government of this Dominion as the Finance Minister of that day. His record since that time is well known to every man in public life in Canada, and appreciation of it was abundantly testified to in this debate by hon. members representing all shades of political thought in this country. We down in Nova Scotia have a very great and natural admiration for the Minister of Finance. We regard him as one of the very best of our public men, a man who has rendered services most unselfishly to this country for a long period, and who will forever stand in the very front rank of the large number of public men which the province of Nova Scotia has contributed to this Dominion.

With respect to the particular subject that is now being discussed by the House I have, perhaps, not very much to say, and I want to state frankly at the beginning that I fear I shall not bring very much enlightenment to that question in which we are all so much interested. I think, however, it is proper that every shade of public thought should find voice in this debate. It is the foundation upon which the financial structure of this Government will rest from time to time, at all events during the period the present Government is in office; and as the Liberal party is a liberal party it no doubt contains within its ranks many men of different shades of thought but all prepared and willing to adjust and adapt themselves to the will of the majority. That, Mr. Speaker, I conceive to be real liberalism and from that point of view I desire to occupy the time of the House for a few moments this afternoon. The Finance Minister is extremely happy in the position in which he finds himself to-day. Although during the recent election campaign we were told that it was the avowed purpose and object of the Liberal party if they came into office to destroy the tariff, to bring down our manufacturing industries to a position of bankruptcy, and to further increase the unhappiness and uneasiness existing throughout the industrial world, the Finance Minister has had the satisfaction of having men sitting in the Opposition testify, since this debate opened, to the wisdom of the budget as he has brought it down. Yesterday evening the hon. member from St. John and Albert (Mr. Baxter) spoke in the debate, and I will quote his words:

I believe the hon. gentleman is putting forward proposals which by no means go to the length he would like to have them go; they by no means meet his ideal of economic conditions; in fact I may also venture the suggestion that the proposals which he does make on this occasion approach much nearer to the economic ideas of the group of which I am a member than they do those of a large number of the group of which he is one of the exponents.

Again he said:

I think it is entirely a matter of congratulation to the country that the tariff has not been seriously disturbed.

What are we to think of the predictions that were made during the election campaign? We, on this side of the House, the great Liberal party of Canada, who support the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) and the party in office of which he was such an outstanding member for eleven years, knew he would be no party to the destruction of any policy that would bring about the conditions which were anticipated by our friends. Then we have the statement of the hon. member for South Vancouver (Mr. Ladner), who said:

There is no substantial reduction at all, and I am glad no important changes have been made.

Therefore, the tariff is no longer an issue, so far as the Conservative Opposition is concerned. A few months ago the right hon. member who leads the Opposififteen years, knew he would be no party who are associated with him, endeavoured to make the tariff an issue in this country, but when it became known that the hon. Minister of Finance was a candidate of the Liberal party in that election, and when they appreciated the very probable fact that he would again be Finance Minister of this country in the new Liberal government, they were content to accept that as a guarantee that the tariff need not be an issue in this country, because he would see to it that no disaster would come to this Dominion by reason of any improper or drastic changes. Considerable fault has been found, and I am one of those who agree that it is rather disappointing, that the Finance Minister has not been able to go further in the matter of reducing the burden of taxation. So long as I have had any views upon political matters, I have not subscribed to the platform of that political party that thinks we should have a system of free trade in this country. I have been unable to find any country in the world that has a fiscal policy approaching to free trade. My idea of a policy for this country is one designed to bring a revenue to the government sufficient to carry on the affairs of the country, but that no further tariff ought to be imposed on the people than that which is necessary to encourage our industries. The budget has been criticsed in respect of the increase in the sales tax, but it has not been pointed out, up to the present time, so far as I am aware, that the sales tax does not apply to a large portion of the articles which enter into the daily consumption of the working man. One hon. member after another regretted that the Finance Minister has increased the burden of taxation in respect of the cost of living to those that are less able to bear it, and particular reference was made to the sales tax. I desire to make it perfectly clear that, as regards the sales tax, there is a list of items, numbering almost one hundred, that do not pay the sales tax, so that the burden of taxation on the common people, and those least able to bear it, is not affected by the increase of the sales tax by 50 per cent, as provided for in the budget. The people of this country, Mr. Speaker, are to be congratulated on the fact that, for the immediate future at least the interpretation of our customs law will be in the hands of a Finance Minister who will always give the benefit of the doubt to the consumer and to those least able to bear the burden of taxation, and who will not use his influence to give further protection to the protected interests by giving fanciful interpretations to the customs law. Let me make perfectly plain what I mean. Up to 1911, among the articles upon the free list were certain articles that are used by the fishermen in the maritime provinces. Section 682 of the customs law is as follows:—

That ropes twine, barked marline, net norsels of cotton, hemp, or flax, when used exclusively for the fisheries, shall be admitted free of duty.

These articles were admitted free of duty from 1897 until 1911, and the fishermen of the Maritime provinces had the benefit of being free to import the articles used for their purposes. But not more than two or three weeks has elapsed after the change of government in 1911 before the then Minister of Customs, gave an interpretation to that section of the law which immediately, and without any change in the tariff, removed barked marline from the free list and subjected it to a duty of 25 per cent. The lobster fishermen of the Maritime provinces, who had enjoyed the advantage of importing all their twine necessary for the prosecution of the lobster fishing, found themselves, without a moment's notice, obliged to pay a duty of 25 per cent upon that twine. What was the explanation? The explanation was, as given by the Minister of Customs of 1911, that the customs officers who were performing their duties during the time the Liberals were in office were too generous in the interpretation of the customs law, and that, while unbarked marline, most frequently used by lobster fishermen, was admitted free of duty under the Liberal government, it should not be imported free of duty, but was subject to a customs duty of 25 per cent. But that is not the only instance. I referred to a case that applies to the Maritime provinces, but there is another case equally well known, and that is in respect to the duty upon rough lumber, which previous to 1911 came into western Canada free of duty. Article 504 of the customs tariff provides as follows:

Planks, boards and lumber or wood, sawn, split or cut, and dressed on one side only but not further manufactured, free.

Then article 505:

Sawn boards, planks, deals planed or dressed on one side or both sides when the edges thereof are jointed or tongued and grooved 25 per cent.

Well, Mr. Speaker, from 1907 to 1911 all rough lumber was imported into western Canada free of duty; and immediately after the change of government a ruling was obtained by the lumber combine of western Canada which immediately, and without any change of the customs law at all, imposed a duty of $2 per thousand upon rough lumber. The change was brought about in this way: The regulations provided that, whereas lumber planed only on one side came in free of duty, lumber planed on two sides or edged was liable to duty. They interpreted that to mean that rough lumber, the edges of which were sawed with a fine saw, became finished lumber and automatically lost its place in the free list, becoming subject to a duty of $2 per thousand feet. That was objected to by the settlers of western Canada, and they went so far as to test the legality of that new ruling by the customs authorities. The matter got into the courts, and I am not quite sure what the decision of the courts was; but suffice it to say that while the Liberal party was in office and while our customs laws were being interpreted by a Liberal Minister of Finance and a Liberal Minister of Customs, no such question arose, but in every instance of doubt the consumer got the benefit of it and the manufacturers' combine was obliged to submit to that ruling for the benefit of the people generally.

I repeat that, apart altogether from any reduction in the tariff which the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) has brought down to this House, it is a subject for congratulation that, whatever freedom we have at the present time, whatever privilege we enjoy in respect to freedom from customs duties, will be preserved to us while ever a Liberal government is in power and will not be lost upon a technical ruling by officials in sympathy, not with the consuming public, but with the manufacturers of this country. I stated a moment ago that personally I stood for a policy of tariff for revenue.

Mr. LEWIS: Will the hon. gentleman say that the present tariff is a tariff for revenue only?

Mr. KYTE: Most certainly not. A tariff for revenue is the ideal condition, in my mind, as a free trade tariff appears to be the ideal condition in the minds of some of my hon. friends sitting in the Progressive quarter. But if my hon. friends sitting in the Progressive group were called upon at the present time to formulate a policy having regard to the necessities of this country for revenue and to meet our increasing obligations, I doubt very much if they would give full effect to the doctrine of free trade; I believe they would rather wait until a more favourable time for its full fruition.

Mr. EVANS: In regard to what the hon. member said a moment ago, I should like to ask if, under the present arrangement, implements of agriculture and other things can be imported on the invoice price of the manufacturer?

Mr. KYTE: I must confess that I am not an expert with respect to the importation of goods. I did not expect that I would be asked that question; but the tariff speaks for itself, and I assume that agricultural implements will be imported subject to the duties specified in the tariff.

Mr. EVANS: Would that be on the invoice price, or will a dumping duty be added as well? The hon. member said that the consumer was to get the advantage. What is it?

Mr. KYTE: This is a matter of interpreting the customs laws; and in view of the wide difference of opinion as to interpretation between the two cases I refer to, between a Conservative Minister of Customs and a Liberal Minister of Customs, I decline to give any interpretation at this moment.

Mr. EVANS: Might I ask another question?

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. gentleman must be allowed to proceed with his speech without interruption.

Mr. KYTE: I have no objection to the hon. gentleman putting the question.

Mr. EVANS: I understood that it was altogether a matter of interpretation, and as the hon. member said that we were to get the benefit of the change now, will the invoice price be accepted as the valuation for customs purposes, or not?

Mr. KYTE: My hon. friend must know that I have no authority to speak for the Minister of Customs or for the Commissioner of Customs; but I repeat the statement that, wherever there is a question of doubt as regards the interpretation of the customs laws, I believe, having regard to the past, under a Liberal government, the consuming public will get the benefit of the doubt.

I was proceeding to discuss the subject of a revenue tariff. During the last campaign the leader of the Opposition (Mr. Meighen) visited Nova Scotia. He spoke in the large, important mining centre of Glace Bay, and I will quote a paragraph of his speech as reported by the Halifax Herald:

> In answer to his challenge, the premier stated Mr. King had said he stood for a revenue tariff. What was a revenue tariff? Did anyone know what was meant by a revenue tariff? No one on earth could know because there could no more be a revenue tariff than there could be such a thing as an expenditure tariff; one might as well talk about an atmosphere tariff or an algebraic tariff or a dynamic tariff. The term "revenue tariff" had been invented by Mr. King to evade responsibility for his real platform and was just another example of rot and humbug.

The leader of the Opposition has had occasion to express his astonishment at certain things that have taken place in political affairs during the last few months. But I should like to say to him, that the word "astonishment" but faintly mirrored the emotions of the people of Nova Scotia when they read that statement by the right hon. gentleman. "No such thing as a tariff for revenue" said the right hon. gentleman, "nobody ever heard of such a thing; it was rot and humbug and invented by Mr. King for the purpose of evading responsibility for the tariff." Every person knows that there is not a text book upon economics that does not deal with the subject of a revenue tariff. There are revenue tariffs, protective tariffs, and there is the policy of free trade. England herself is an example of what a revenue tariff is, and I should like to remind my hon. friend (Mr. Lewis), who interrupted me a moment ago, that England has not a free trade policy. The term "free trade" expresses what it means, and there is no need to give any further explanation; but England has not a free trade policy. Prior to the war, England raised more than £100,000,000 in revenue through a tariff, and much more since then. England's tariff provides for the collection of revenue upon goods not manufactured in England, so that the total revenue goes into the treasury of that country. England now goes a little further than that; more particularly in the last few years the British government has added to the list of articles subject to duty a number of articles that are manufactured in England; but in order to prevent the manufacturer from taking advantage of the increased duty and adding it to his profits, the British law compels him to pay, by way of an excise tax, the amount of the protective duty. That is my ideal of what a tariff ought to be. In my judgment, it is absolutely wrong that there should be developed in this country any industry in which, by class legislation or by special privilege, any man is permitted to put into the treasury of the corporation to which he belongs a larger profit than the custom of the trade or the competition of the world entitles him to.

We did not have a protective tariff on this continent until after the American war. Our American friends are now the greatest exponents of a protective tariff; but when did this policy begin? The protective policy was not suggested until after the American war, and why? We all know the tremendous struggle in which that great republic was engaged from 1861 to 1865. As you know, quite unexpectedly the United States government was called upon to furnish large sums of money for the purpose of carrying on the war and quelling the rebellion that had arisen in the south. It was necessary to secure ammunition supplies. They had to buy guns, shells and fuses, harness and all the other necessary equipment for the conduct of the war; and the manufacturers, who before had been content with a reasonable profit, suddenly found that there was a splendid opportunity accorded them to make great wealth. The profits that were made in the United States during that war were far greater than the profits that were made in peace time. And the United States is not the only country in the world that has had that experience. After the war was over these manufacturers came together to count up their profits, and they decided that war was a good thing for manufacturers because it increased their profits. And then they got to devising a scheme by which they could, in times of peace, extract from the pockets of the people the same profits, or profits similar to those which they had made during the war. The result of that conference on the part of the manufacturers in the United States was to evolve the protective system of government. They said: "We ought to maintain the home market for the home producer. During the war many men invested capital in the manufacture of munitions and they are prepared to continue investing in the manufacture of goods for the carrying on of the peaceful avocations of the country and in order to do that successfully it is necessary that we should have a monopoly of the home markets." They saw at once that if they could succeed in inducing the government at Washington to give them a protection upon their goods they would be able to preserve the home market and incidentally reap profits almost comparable to those which they had enjoyed during the war. That, Mr. Speaker, is the origin of protection in the United States. Up to that time the United States tariff had been practically a tariff for revenue.

Well, time has passed, and we have gone through a tremendous war ourselves. Canada participated in the late war with great glory, and the names of her men are enrolled in history's pages with those of the heroes of other nations who fought side by side with them on the European fields of battle. Now, we have had war profiteers in Canada. Perhaps I should not say profiteers; at all events we have had munition makers in Canada who secured large profits during the war. The fact will not be disputed by any hon. gentleman. But just as happened in the United States, since the close of the war there has been carried on in this country a tremendous propaganda by the manufacturing interests for more protection. For the last two years, beginning, in fact, almost before the ink in the signatures of the Peace Treaty of Versailles was dry, pamphlets have been issued from the city of Toronto and other manufacturing cities, signed by an alleged "reconstruction committee," pointing out what the people of this country ought to do in the matter of reconstruction with a view to promoting the prosperity of Canada. And the only suggestion with regard to "reconstruction" that was contained in those documents was the suggestion that there should be a higher tariff. What else could you expect from the gentlemen whose names were appended to these pamphlets—gentlemen well known in financial circles and prominently connected with the Canadian Manufacturers' Association. Following the example of the manufacturers in the United States after the civil war there, the manufacturers of Canada made a drive upon the government and upon the public men of this country in order to have the tariff increased. And this in the name of reconstruction! I say that, quite apart altogether from the merits or demerits of the budget brought down by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) a few days ago, Canada is to be congratulated upon the fact that, while this Government is in office, that particular element who tried to "reconstruct" Canada on the high protective basis will be out of a job. They will remain unemployed in that direction until our friends opposite may happen to come back to power.

These, Sir, are things that occur to the ordinary man who takes only a cursory view of the matters that appertain to government and social questions in Canada. In my opinion the Minister of Finance has gone as far as he could possibly have gone in the direction of reducing taxation. No man in this House would have been more rejoiced than I if he had been able further to reduce the burden of taxation as it applies to the great consuming population of the country. But on this question I am at one with the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Crerar), who leads the Progressive group in this House. Speaking a few days ago, the hon. gentleman said:

> My hon. friend the Minister of Finance is coming down to-morrow to deliver to this House his annual budget. I may be mistaken—I hope I am—but I venture the prediction that the Minister of Finance, if he discharges his duty to Canada, will not take the way of reducing the taxation, but must find additional taxation; there is no way out of it if this country is to meet its obligations.

I subscribe to that view, and it was the recollection of it that reconciled me to the modest reductions in the tariff which are set forth in the budget introduced by the Minister of Finance. We cannot get away from our obligations. It is all very well for us to talk about free trade and about tariff for revenue. But we are facing a condition in our financial history which is more serious than we have ever had to cope with. But, Mr. Speaker, the present Government is not in office only for a day or a year. The signs point overwhelmingly to the fact that, so far as our friends immediately opposite are concerned, the Liberal Government will be in office just so long as they want to be, at all events, so long as they fairly meet the reasonable expectations of the people.

Well, the Liberal party came into office in 1896, and we had the same propaganda during that campaign as we had in the campaign of 1921. It was stated that the Liberal party if they came into power would surely wreck and ruin every enterprise in the country. It was declared that capital would be unsafe and that bankruptcy would ensue where theretofore industry had been the order of the hour. The Liberal party, however, came into office and remained in office for fifteen years; and they went out, not on the cry that they not given good government to Canada, not on the cry that they had injured in the slightest degree any interests in Canada, but on the cry that they had governed the country so well for fifteen years that it was folly to try to improve upon their administration.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the question of reciprocity has arisen from time to time in this debate, and I desire to say to any hon. member who has any interest at all in any views that I may have upon the question, that I am wholly in favour of reciprocity with the United States. I was entirely in favour of it in 1911, and I would be equally in favour of it at the present time if we could only secure it on the same terms. The question of reciprocity did not arise in Canada only in 1911. Why, we had it discussed in every general election for forty years before that, and the gentlemen who were most in favour of reciprocity in those days were the predecessors of the hon. gentlemen sitting opposite to me to-day in this chamber. But the United States were not interested in reciprocity in those days. Why? Because we had falling revenues, we had deficits from year to year, and our pouluation was fleeing to the United States as though this country was stricken with everything other than that which invites people to dwell in a new land. Notwithstanding that large sums of money were spent from year to year to encourage immigration, our population was at a standstill. The fact is that the great republic to the south of us was not interested in cultivating trade relations with a country whose fiscal policy resulted in constantly recurring deficits and whose population was decreasing.

But, Mr. Speaker, after 1896 a great change took place. Instead of our people migrating to the United States the improved conditions encouraged them to remain and also attracted newcomers. In case I may be challenged upon this point, let me give figures: From 1891 to 1901 the increase in population was 11.13 per cent —and, bear in mind, Sir, that the last half of that decade the people enjoyed the advantages of a Liberal government. From 1901 to 1911, the first full ten-year period, during which the Liberal party was in office, our population increased 34.17 per cent. In the last decade, 1911 to 1921, the increase diminished and amounted to only 21.94 per cent. In other words, the population during the first ten years that the Liberals were in office increased 34.17 per cent, while in the decade preceding, under a Conservative government, the increase was only 11.13 per cent, and in the decade following, also under a Conservative government, the increase was only 21.94 per cent. During the period from 1911 to 1921 the Immigration Department brought in 1,728,876 people, and the excess of births over deaths was 1,103,630, or altogether an increase of 2,832,506. But, Sir, when the census figures were published a few weeks ago we were disappointed to discover that instead of that rate of increase having continued it had greatly fallen off.

Mr. CHAPLIN: Will the hon. member give the figures for the decade ending 1891?

Mr. KYTE: The only figures I have are in relation to the total population, which amounted to 4,833,239—after a period of more than thirteen years during which our friends opposite were in power. I was proceeding to say that our American friends were never very much interested in establishing reciprocal trade relations with us until after the change in government in 1896. From then on to 1911 the statesmen of the United States discovered that conditions here had changed very considerably, that our revenues were increasing; that large sums of money were being spent for the purpose of developing our resources; and above all, that a large and steady stream of immigrants was flowing into Canada. They noticed these changed conditions and they said to themselves: While we did not regard Canada as of very much consequence commercially during the regime of the old Conservative party, but now we think it would be worth while to talk business with her. So the government of that country made a proposal for reciprocity with us; and that is how it was brought about. I remarked a few minutes ago what we might hope for in the way of further tariff reductions if the present Liberal government remains in office long enough, as no doubt it will.

But, Sir, in addition to that, who knows what effect it might have upon the desire of our American neighbours for reciprocal relations if the present Minister of Finance and his colleagues bring about a recurrence of the condition of affairs that obtained from 1896 to 1911? There is not much doubt that there will be another offer from the United States for reciprocity.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I desire to put myself upon record as to where I stand upon this question. I repeat that, while I approve of the wisdom displayed by the Minister of Finance, I, in common with other hon. members sitting on this side as well as hon. members in the Progressive group, regret the circumstances were such as not to justify his making further reductions in the tariff. But I have confidence that in the next few years there will be such large increases in our revenues through increased prosperity and a large volume of immigration, that the Finance Minister of the day may be able to lop off here and there any objectionable features of the tariff so that in the near future it will approximate much more closely to a tariff for revenue only.

Mr. R. K. ANDERSON (Halton): Mr. Speaker, the budget debate so far has been interesting from several points of view: because it is the first budget of this fourteenth parliament; because we have heard the views of three distinct political parties; and also because we have a large number of new members who for the first time are looking upon national questions from the point of view of the legislator. It is also interesting because the budget has been presented by a minister who has had a distinguished political career. Although I do not agree with the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) in politics, I have no hesitation in expressing my great personal regard for him as a statesman of no mean calibre. I desire to compliment him, not for the subject matter of his budget, nor for the reductions in duties announced, but for the manner in which he presented it to the House and for his ability in disguising its real character.

This budget pretends to reduce the duties on imported articles and at the same time lower the cost of living. But to my mind it would appear that the cost of living to the average consumer will be increased. The hon. gentleman has not blazed any new trail in the way of taxation, but has contented himself with following the well-beaten path laid out for him by his predecessors in office, the Right Hon. Sir Thomas White and the hon. member for West York (Sir Henry Drayton). They are the true pioneers in introducing new methods of taxation to enable the Dominion to meet her increased expenditure resulting from the war. These were the men who bore the burden of finding increased revenue during the years of war conditions, and, although I have no desire to minimize the difficulties of their successor—for I know those difficulties are great, our national obligations being burdensome and likely to remain so for a number of years—yet I think his responsibilities are light compared with those of his predecessors.

I have listened with a good deal of interest to the previous speaker (Mr. Kyte). Some of his remarks were interesting from more than one point of view. He made statements which to my mind are directly contradictory. Of course, he made mention of the different shades of thought on the Liberal side of the House. The difference has been quite apparent during this session of Parliament when we have seen hon. gentlemen opposite disagreeing with one another on the questions which have been presented to the House for discussion. He also stated that the tariff was no longer an issue. That was also said during the political campaign which ended on the 6th of December last, that the tariff was not an issue so far as the Liberal viewpoint was concerned. He followed that up by saying he was no free trader, and then he said he was in favour of a tariff for revenue purposes only. To my mind, there is no difference between those two statements. A tariff for revenue purposes only, if carried to its logical conclusion, is essentially a free trade policy. I do not think any man in this House, no matter how clever he may be, could stand up here and convince any intelligent member that there is any essential difference between those two statements regarding the tariff. The hon. gentleman gave an example of how he would change the tariff duties and get the revenue which would be lost if the protective duties were repealed. He would place on articles which we produce in Canada an excise tax, instead of the tariff duty we now have, and he would put a tariff duty, I presume, on articles that we cannot produce in Canada. That is a free trade policy, because if you place a duty of 20 per cent on the articles manufactured in Canada, and put a sales tax of 20 per cent on articles imported into Canada which are also made in this country, you only increase the price of the article 20 per cent to the consumer, and give no protection at all to the Canadian manufacturer. The consequence is that the foreign manufacturer competes in our home market on an equality with the Canadian manufacturer, and that is essentially a free trade policy. It can have no other effect on the industries of this country than to bring them into ruinous competition with the manufacturing concerns in other countries. Nor would it in any way reduce the cost of living, which would remain just as high as it was before. In effect, it would be still higher, I imagine, because there are times when the customs duty collected on an imported article might possibly be paid, part by the consumer and part by the producer, but so far as a sales tax and an excise tax is concerned there is no doubt they will be paid by the consumer. There is no one else to pay it.

I was also interested in what the hon. member said with regard to the American system of taxation. He said they had no protective system of taxation in the United States previous to the Civil War. If I remember aright, Henry Clay, one of the most eminent American statesmen, was a great protectionist and advocated protection. He was dead before the Civil War. The United States, as appears from the World's Almanac, has had a protective policy for one hundred and thirty-one years, and I am quite satisfied that the Civil War did not take place that long ago. So the hon. gentleman was entirely wrong in his statement.

He also made mention of the small increase in population in this country in the last decade, as shown by the census of 1921. There were reasons for the small increase in population during the last ten years. The hon. gentleman has evidently forgotten that we had a war, which interfered very much with immigration to this country, and will probably interfere with it for a few years to come.

So far as the tariff reductions proposed by this budget are concerned, they are so small that they will not affect to any great extent the cost of living. We might designate this as a two and a half per cent budget, and so far it does not appear to be having any intoxicating effect upon hon. gentlemen to my left. They have not shown themselves very much in favour of it, and so far they have been keeping very much to themselves in regard to these proposals. I do not exactly know how it appeals to them, but taking it altogether a 2½ per cent reduction on the articles affected amounts to 2½ per cent on $40,000,000, or to about $1,000,000 a year. That is, the reduction in the tariff duties proposed by this budget amounts to about $1,000,000 a year. In 1919 the late government reduced the tariff duties of this country to the extent of about $17,000,000 a year, and at that time the reductions were not considered sufficient by the predecessors of the Progressive party in this House, and they crossed the floor in opposition to those proposals. I am very much interested in seeing how the members of the Progressive party to-day will view this small reduction of $1,000,000. This 2½ per cent reduction is offset by the fifty per cent sales tax increase, which practically kills the reduction altogether. Both the sales tax and the duties which are reduced by 2½ per cent are a tax to a certain extent. The effect of the changes that have been made is that the farmer receives no particular benefit in purchasing the implements of agriculture which he requires. The increase in sales tax will increase the taxes of this country something like $30,000,000. I think I am correct in saying that $60,000,000 was collected from the sales tax last year, and as it is now being increased 50 per cent, that will mean an additional $30,000,000. So we get a reduction of $1,000,000, and an increase of $30,000,000, which means a net increase of something like $29,000,000. That $29,000,000 increase in taxation will certainly not decrease the cost of living. I have made a short computation of what the farmer who buys a hundred-dollar implement will save under this 2½ per cent reduction. The 12½ per cent duty is reduced to 10 per cent, but, put against this the increase in sales tax, and in the stamp tax, and on an implement on which the duty is reduced he will save, on a hundred-dollar transaction, about 36 cents, which amounts to 1-227th of one per cent reduction on that particular implement. If the Minister of Finance keeps up his present pace of reduction, he will reduce the cost of that particular implement to the farmer 1 per cent in 277 years, and if he continues long enough he will reduce it by the full 12½ per cent duty in 3,000 years. That is not so bad a prospect for hon. gentlemen to my left, one of whom said yesterday that the millennium was near at hand, and some of them might live to see it.

This is the first time in the history of Canada that a political party has been returned to power without a definite fiscal policy. The Liberal party in the last campaign did not have a fiscal policy which the people of this country understood. Such a fiscal policy as they had was interpreted in different ways by their own following. It was variously described in different parts of the country; it was all a camouflage. Liberal candidates in various parts of the Dominion asked for the suffrages of the people on policies of their own. One appealed to the electorate on a tariff for revenue purposes only. Another advocated freer trade. Another advocated a tariff for the producer and the consumer; while others asked for popular support as independent Liberals. Now an independent Liberal in taking that attitude really repudiated his leader and his leader's policy. The hon. member for Kent who now reposes in the Senate, and the hon. member for North Waterloo (Mr. Euler), and the candidate for the county of Halton, all asked for the support of the people as independent Liberals. As independent Liberals it is almost impossible to say in what position they were appealing to the people as far as the tariff is concerned. The leader of the government had a policy, and that policy was a tariff for the producer and the consumer. The Liberal policy of 1919, and of 1896 as well, was a tariff for revenue purposes only. While some of the jugglers in the Liberal party advocated freer trade and others, as I said before, professed to be independents so that they could assume any position they desired having regard to the conditions in the particular county in which they were running. Taking all these various names, and putting them together, is was impossible to understand, and the people of the country did not understand, what the real fiscal policy of the Liberal party was. However, the Liberals were returned to power on the 6th of December, 1921; they received a mandate from the people to come down here, and, I presume, put into effect what they thought wise with regard to the tariff of Canada. In 1906 the Liberal party of that time were elected to office on the issue of the construction of the Transcontinental railway. That was made an issue in the campaign at that time; the people voted for it; and when the Liberals came into power they built that road. That policy has resulted disastrously; it has been followed by unparalleled railway deficits which the people themselves have to pay. I cannot say that I blame the Liberal party for that; I think the responsibility rests directly upon the people who elected them to office. In the last campaign the people returned the Liberal party to power without knowing what their fiscal policy was, therefore the people are responsible for what may happen when the Liberals bring down their fiscal policy from year to year. This is the second time in the history of this country, Mr. Speaker, that the Liberal party have been returned to power and immediately proceeded to carry out the protective principle of the Conservative party, although they repudiated protection at the polls. The Liberals did that in 1896, and although they were elected then on a tariff for revenue purposes only, they kept the protective principle in existence for fifteen years.

I have no thought at all that the Liberals will keep that principle in existence for another fifteen years, because I see in the present budget, indications that they intend to carry out a tariff for revenue purposes only, more truly than they did before—a policy which, to all intents and purposes, is a free trade policy. There are influences in the Government itself, there are influences in the Government's following, and there certainly are influences in the Progressive group on this side of the House, that will insist upon the Government implementing its tariff policy by some legislation during the term of this Parliament. The country may as well understand this, and understand it now. It has been heralded, as I say, in the budget speech, and was announced during the campaign although in a very obscure manner. During the budget speech the Minister of Finance said, as reported at page 2,184 of unrevised Hansard:

> The line upon which we ought to be expected to deal, and upon which we intend to deal, is expressed in a resolution that I had the pleasure of moving in this House a year ago.

This is the resolution referred to:

> That while recognizing that existing financial requirements of the Dominion demand the maintenance of a Customs Tariff, the House is unable to concur in the declaration by the Government that the tariff should be based on the principle of protection;

That is a clear declaration against the protective principle. It means that the Liberal party are opposed to that principle in the tariff. Now, if they are opposed to the protective principle, then it is quite consistent to believe that they will proceed at the present time to carry that principle out. The Finance Minister followed that up by a further remark in which he said:

> The policy so laid down is the policy we are prepared to carry out to-day.

That statement was received with applause not only by the members supporting the government, but by the Progressive members—a clear indication of what the country is to expect, and what the manufacturing industries are to expect, in a few years. The truth now appears in definite form, the truth is declared in unmistakable language in the present budget. Now, this will have a disturbing effect upon industry in the Dominion. Industry will be a little bit apprehensive that the protective principle is to be removed from our tariff. Those engaged in manufacturing will therefore cease to expand their plants, and a deterrent effect will be produced upon outside industries that otherwise might come and establish branch plants in the Dominion and thus help to manufacture articles here and contribute to the progress of the country.

Now, with regard to customs duties, the Finance Minister also made this statement —this is in the resolution already referred to:

> The tariff is a tax, and the aim of legislation should be to make taxation as light as circumstances will permit.

I do not think anybody will quarrel with that statement. I think it should be the aim of the government to make taxation as light as possible, as light as circumstances will permit; but I do not see that the government is succeeding very well in its present budget. Of course a protective tariff is a tax to some extent. It may be a tax entirely to the full extent of the duty; but there are times, I think, under proper circumstances the tariff duty might not be paid by the consumer. There are circumstances when the producer might have to pay part of that tax; but with regard to the sales tax that never can take place. The tariff duty also is a fair tax because it will compel a man with a large income to pay more duty. Having a large income he will purchase more dutiable articles and in that way he will pay more duty, and consequently a greater tax, than the man with a smaller income. The same applies also to the sales tax which possibly is a tax we will have to use a little more in the future. Now, duties can be applied for revenue purposes only, as they are levied in England; they may be applied on the protective principle only, just as they are in the United States; and they may be applied for both revenue and protective purposes, a combination of the two as used in Canada. England has had a revenue tariff for a good many years; but as the hon. member for South Cape Breton (Mr. Kyte) said this afternoon they were probably deviating a little from that principle. They have instituted a certain amount of protective taxes but, as the hon. gentleman said, they have also added an excise tax on the home-made article to obviate the protective principle, consequently they are a free trade country. In 1920 the English people collected $729,000,000 of duty, largely on articles produced at home. No industries were fostered, no protection was given, and the country did not receive any particular benefit from the duties collected, other than the revenue received. They collected in that year $16.20 customs duties per capita of her total population. The United States have a tariff for protection only. They have been making their tariff high enough to prohibit inportation from the outside world. The Fordney Bill, which is now before Congress, will practically prohibit outside manufacturing industries from putting their articles on the American market. Of course this is their own business, but only a country that is very much self-contained would be wise in adopting such a policy. I do not advocate such a policy for the Dominion of Canada. In 1921 the United States customs collections amounted to $308,564,000, or $2.88 per capita. That means $2.88 per capita collected from the citizens of the United States in customs duty, in comparison with $16.20 collected by Great Britain, Great Britain being a free trade country, and the United States an exclusion country. Canada adopted the middle course by taking a policy of adequate protection, using the duty for revenue and protection as well. In 1921 Canada collected in customs duty $105,500,000, a per capita tax of $16.40, as compared with $2.88 of the United States. That goes to show to what extent the United States is practising an exclusion policy. May we not expect that they will continue that for a number of years? It is not to be expected that the Secretary of the Treasury in Washington would favour any reciprocity treaty at the present time. It is scarcely to be hoped for, and I question very much whether such a policy, if it were submitted to the Canadian people, would not receive just as high an adverse vote as it did in 1911. The people of Canada, at the present time, are not in favour of reciprocity with the United States. In 1921 the exports of the Dominion of Canada amounted to $1,210,488,119 and her imports to $1,240,158,882, a balance against Canada of 130 million. The dutiable imports were $847,561,406 and the free imports $392,597,476. That shows that the free imports of the Dominion are about 48 per cent of her dutiable imports. That is not the very high rate of protective duty, when almost half the imports of this country are free of duty.

There is another feature of the matter which, I think, members of this House and the people of the country should very seriously consider. My opinion is that the present Government is starting on a downward trend in tariff duties, that they intend to do away with them, and gradually place in their stead a sales or excise tax to prevent any advantage to our Canadian manufacturers from the duty which is collected. The thin end of the wedge has been introduced, and it would appear to me that during the years of their term of office they will continue their present policy, until they have done away with the protective principle. During the late campaign, noting the remarks made throughout the country, I could not help thinking that the Liberals were sincere, and if they were sincere, I see nothing for it but that they will continue on the road on which they have started and do away with protective duties. What influence will this have on manufacturing industries proposing to come into this country? Looking over the amount of investments in Canada, I find British capital is invested in Canada to the extent of two and a half billions of dollars. That means that two and a half billions of British money is invested in Canada, and it is invested largely in stocks and bonds. Money invested in stocks and bonds helps to build up the country. The money is invested in our industry, although the British investor does not run those industries. He lives in England, gets the interest, which is sent over to him, and spends it over there. But the money invested here helps to develop this country and to run our industries, builds up the cities, and gives employment to the labouring men. This was the policy of the British investor in past years, but there is a decided change coming over the British investors. During the last few years they are coming into this country more and more, and investing their money, and taking part in the industrial development of the country. During the last two years British firms have come to Canada and established their plants here in various cities throughout the Dominion—Quebec, Montreal, Toronto, Hamilton and other centres of population. They are coming here to manufacture articles which will compete in our home market, with the Canadian made article, and, by their competition, they will reduce the cost, and at the same time give employment to our people and furnish a market for the farm produce of the country. The number of American firms in this country is quite large. In 1921 there was invested $1,800,000,000 of American money in Canada, and, unlike the British investor, they placed their money in the industrial concerns and went directly into the business in the country. They employed our labour, built their plants in our cities, and helped, like the British investor, to build up the country. In 1914 there were something like 350 American concerns doing business in Canada; in 1921 there were 700 American concerns, an increase of one hundred per cent, showing the benefit of protection. Without that protection none of these firms would be in Canada. They would have their plants in the United States, and would do the manufacturing there. The United States would have the money, we would buy the goods, and we would be building up the plants in their country. Instead, under protection they are building up our Canadian cities, furnishing a market for the produce of our farms, and helping to develop the natural resources of the Dominion.

Now taking them altogether, these people come here for the direct purpose, in the first place, of avoiding the tariff. Without that tariff they would not be here at all. They come here because of our stable form of government. We have a thrifty people, and varied natural resources from which they can draw the raw material. We have the market they want, and they can cater to that market better in Canada than from the home plant in the United States or in England. The consequence is that they are continuing to come. But if we interfere with the protective principle in our tariff, they will cease coming, because they will wait for the day when free trade will be in effect, and they can supply this market from their home plants. Hon. members to my left, and hon. members anywhere in this House, can readily understand that it is much better for this country to have the articles which we need manufactured in Canada. Canada is a large country, and it is well able to supply its own needs, and we should become, as far as possible, a self-sustaining country. There is no reason in the world why a people so verile, active and energetic as the people of Canada, with such a large tract of country, such great natural resources, able to furnish the raw materials for every kind of industry, should not develop the natural resources by its own people and make the country self-sustaining. During the war we found out that there were large numbers of articles which we did not manufacture at home and which we were buying abroad. We had to do without them until we were able to manufacture them for ourselves.

In the Dominion of Canada in 1920 34,000 manufacturing concerns were making in all 8,445 different articles of manufacture. In 1917, we produced 6,257 different articles, so that there was an increase of 25 per cent in those three years, directly resulting from increased activities due to the war as well as to the desire on the part of outside people to get into our markets. In 1917, 6,500 different firms were doing business in Canada, whereas in 1920 there were 8,500, an increase of 2,000, or 25 per cent. Each of these firms controlled about four different manufacturing establishments, showing the tendency on the part of various firms to branch out on account of the great extent of this country.

I wish to draw the attention of the House for a few moments to a comparison between these countries, Great Britain, the United States and Canada, as regards trade. In 1919—I am taking the year 1919, because it was the last year for which I could find any adequate returns—the total British trade amounted to $12,600,000,000, or a per capita trade of $380 for a population of about 46,000,000. Her imports for that year were $7,912,000,000, or $175 per capita, large, comparatively speaking; but when we examine her exports for the same year. In 1919, she exported $4,687,000,000 worth of goods, equal to about $93 per capita of her population, as compared with per capita imports of $175, or 59.25 per cent of imports. During the same year, the customs collections were approximately $720,000,000, or $16 per capita. In 1919-20, Great Britain imported $100 worth of goods for every $59.25 worth of goods that she exported; the balance of trade being so strongly against her in the world's market, she must pay the difference in gold, or her money will be below par. I do not know how any country can continue to do business on the basis on which England does it, always buying more than she sells. There is an explanation for that with regard to England; but I doubt very much if Canada can do the same thing and remain solvent. No private individual, no industrial concern could do business on the same basis, and remain solvent.

In the same year Canada had a total production of $4,993,000,000, or a per capita production of $587.50 for our people. This was made up of the two great branches of production, agriculture and industry, the amount as regards agriculture being $2,251,000,000, and as regards industry, $2,742,000,000, the two sources of production breaking almost even in the race. The greater part of this huge production was consumed in the country. According to trade returns, our total exports for 1919 amounted to $1,268,000,000, that is, the exports were almost exactly 25 per cent of the total production of the entire country. This leaves about 75 per cent of the production of this Dominion, in relation to agriculture and to our manufacturing industries, consumed in this country. This certainly is a good argument in favour of the home market and of our protecting that home market, not only for the agricultural producer, but for the industrial producer as well. Our exports amounted to $149 per capita, and our imports to $108 per capita. The total external trade was $257 per capita of the population. While we exported 25 per cent of our total production, we imported 18½ per cent of our total production, so that in reality the Canadian market could consume over 90 per cent of the total production of this Dominion if we catered to it in every way. This shows again that the home market is the best market which the people of this country can have.

In the United States, I took the year 1921, as that was the only year for which I could find complete returns. The United States in 1921 produced, on the farm, supplies of all kinds amounting to $8,420,000,000. This, I found from a statement by the Department of Commerce quoted in the World Almanac for the year 1922, at page 693. I was disposed to question that. I thought the agricultural production of the United States would probably be larger. I looked this up very carefully, and those are the exact figures stated. It was stated that they were taken from the Department of Commerce of the United States. The estimated population of the United States is 107,000,000 people. The industrial production of that country in the same year amounted to $24,624,000,000. That, added to the agricultural production, gives a grand total of $32,500,000,000 which is, roughly speaking, a production of $303.75 per capita, as compared with $587.50, the per capita production of Canada. Out of this total production of $32,500,000,000, $7,250,000,000 was exported, or approximately 22⅜ per cent of their total production. Thus, roughly speaking, 77⅝ per cent of the total production of farm and factory of the United States was consumed in that country. No other argument, I should say, was needed to show the people of this country and of the United States the necessity of protecting the home market. That is the market which is nearest to them, most accessible, and they know how best to cater to it. The same thing applies to the Dominion of Canada. The total imports of the United States for 1921 amounted to $3,090,000,000, or a little less than 50 per cent of their exports. But when you compare that with their total production, it amounts to 9½ per cent, so that 107,000,000 people purchase only 9½ per cent of their total needs from the outside world. You can easily see from this how very much self-contained they are. They can live almost within themselves and feel that they do not need to take any particular part in the disputes of Europe. They stand alone, and it will be very interesting for the people of this country to watch our neighbouring republic and see how they can get along with a total exclusion policy. The total external trade of the United States amounted in 1920 to $111 per capita while their exports amounted to $73 per capita, and their imports to $28 per capita.

For the sake of comparison, we will look at the trade of these three English-speaking countries that are doing business on a different basis: England as a free trade country, using the tariff for revenue purposes only; the United States as a highly protected country, and Canada as a country of moderate protection. The comparison shows that England leads in the general volume of trade and does much more business with the outside world than either of the other two in proportion to population. But she buys $100 worth of goods, while she sells only $59 worth in the world's market, having a reverse balance of $41 against her. The United States reverses this order very heavily. She buys only $42.83 worth of goods, while she sells $100 worth, thus having a surplus balance in her favour of $57.17. Canada has a medium position, selling $100 worth of goods, while buying $72.50 worth, thus having a surplus balance of $27.50 in the world's market. These figures with regard to Canada and Great Britain are for 1919, but with regard to the United States, they are for 1921. Canada, then, has a per capita production of $587.50, the United States $303.75. The per capita trade in the world's market is as follows: The United States, $96.40; Canada $257; and England $302.20. That shows the varying bases on which these three different countries compete in the world's markets. England maintains her position largely because she is a world carrier and is able to make up her deficits by the moneys earned in carrying exports from and imports into the country.

I do not think it is too sweeping a statement to say that the difficulties facing the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) are largely due to the war. If you could eliminate our war debt and the deficits resulting from the operation of the Canadian National railways, the Minister of Finance would have a very easy task to perform in connection with our financial situation. The hon. gentleman, when speaking on the budget last year, said in this House:

> In all that is necessary, as arising from the war, we desire to share with hon. gentlemen opposite the honour and responsibility of the occasion.

In these generous words he exonerated the late government from any blame in connection with the great war debt we have to-day. I do not think he could have done otherwise, since the late government had a record that has not been excelled by any other government in this country. They had to hew out for themselves a new path and follow an unknown course; they were compelled to face difficulties that were never before contemplated; and they showed great ability in meeting those difficulties and making revenue and expenditure meet. It was a very strenuous time and the government succeeded in discharging their obligations in a way no other government had done before.

There is only one way we can meet our debt, and that is by proper economy, making annual revenue meet expenditure. We must not go further into debt. I do not think there is any class of people in this country who object to paying our war debt. The only person I heard suggesting a repudiation of the debt was the hon. member for Winnipeg Centre (Mr. Woodsworth), who sits to the extreme left. I believe he made some remark to that effect the other day. But that view is not shared in by very many people of this country. Canada is a very wealthy country and we ought to be able to meet our obligations. It would be very much better if the same attitude were taken by Germany, and they went to work to meet their reparation payments instead of trying to evade their responsibility in this regard. I have sympathy with France in the position she takes in demanding these payments. The French people will not forget the treatment that was meted out to them in 1870 by Germany, when France was compelled to pay to the last cent. That fact will rankle in the mind of every Frenchman, and I sympathize with the French people in their demand that Germany shall pay on this occasion.

In relation to our debt and annual expenditure the Government has three definite duties to perform. First, they must practice economy in the annual expenditures. I think that economies could well be practised particularly in connection with the Civil Service, and I am not advocating that the civil servants shall be paid less. I believe, with the member for Sherbrooke (Mr. McCrea), that the Civil Service is very much over-manned. We could do with fewer civil servants, and those that are employed could work longer hours each day. In that way we should have more efficiency. It would be better for the civil servants to pay them more and make it worth their while to stay in the service. They could then be required to work longer hours, thus making their effort to help the government economise. I think that certain savings could have been effected in the estimates brought down this year in other directions than those in which the Government has economised. I do not think it is wise to pare down the estimates to the lowest possible figure, because that can very easily be false economy. The best economy is to get the utmost that is possible for the money you spend. I was not in favour of the reduction of $700,000 in the militia estimates, and I was sorry to see that the Minister of Militia (Mr. Graham) was compelled to submit to the importunities of hon. members on his own side. I compliment him on his ability to about-face at the command of his subaltern from Quebec South. It was certainly a manœuvre that the hon. gentleman did not learn in any British army, to turn his back so adroitly in the face of the enemy. I regret also that the naval estimates were cut down a million dollars. They were small as they were, and it was a great mistake to reduce them, because we ought to have a small navy in Canada. In 1908 or 1909, when the naval debate was in progress in this House, under the leadership of Sir Wilfrid Laurier, the Toronto Star sent out telegrams to all the leaders of the municipalities in Ontario asking their opinion on the naval issue. Replies were received, the great majority of which were to the effect that the Dominion of Canada should have a small fleet as the nucleus of a navy that could in future be sent to the relief of England in time of emergency. That was the proper policy to follow, and it is regrettable that the government has now receded therefrom and practically scrapped the navy. The naval cadets in Canada are very much displeased and disappointed as a result of the reduction in the estimates, because they will have to change the plans they had made for the present year. .It was scarcely fair to them to bring the matter down at the last moment and now compel them to alter the arrangements which they have made.

There is another way in which the Government can help matters, and that is by assisting to give an equality of opportunity to all. In the matter of taxation no preference should be shown, and every man should share the responsibility of the national debt. Every individual citizen gets the benefit of the protection that is afforded by our laws, and he has a corresponding duty to the state which he should discharge. The Government can do much in seeing that every citizen has an equality of opportunity to obtain the means whereby he may provide himself with the necessaries of life and pay his fair share towards the revenues of the country. Another duty which devolves upon the Government and which the Minister of Finance takes cognizance of in the budget, is to extract from the pockets of the people, in the most equitable manner and to the fullest extent possible, the money that is required to meet our annual expenditures. This is a matter of some difficulty, and I believe that the minister has approached the question with considerable care.

The railway question has been referred to by various hon. members in the course of the debate, and I may say at once that I am in favour of the national ownership of railways. Those railways were taken over by the government, not because the government wished to, but because they were compelled to by the circumstances. I believe it is possible to conduct our National Railways as efficiently under public ownership as under private ownership, and I think it would be a national calamity if all our railroads were under one private company. Such a monopoly would not be in the interests of the country generally. I have a great respect and admiration for the management of the Canadian Pacific Railway, which is one of the most efficient transportation companies in the world, but I think it is absolutely essential that our National railway system should remain under public ownership. The Canadian Pacific Railway will be a stimulus to the management of our National system to get their fair share of traffic, and it is gratifying to know that last year they secured 54 per cent. After listening to hon. members of the Government and their supporters, it would not appear to me that the National Railways will receive a fair and just trial at their hands. When hon. members opposite are so outspoken in their opposition to public ownership in principle, it is not likely that they will make any very enthusiastic efforts to insure the successful operation of our National railway system.

With respect to immigration, I am of opinion that as far as possible we should seek immigrants from the British Isles, northern Europe, Holland and France. But I should like to see a very strict medical examination enforced either at the port of entry or the port of embarkation, for it is absolutely essential that newcomers should be medically and physically sound. From the discussion on the estimates of the Departments of Immigration and Health, I formed the conclusion that there is not a sufficiently strict inspection of immigrants from the United States. Undesirables may seek entry from the United States, and we should have a better system of medical examination. The United States authorities are ahead of us in this respect and frequently Canadians crossing the border are held up under slight pretexts, not so much in regard to their physical qualifications as their financial position.

The abolition of the dumping clause will prejudicially affect a large number of fruit and vegetable growers in Ontario extending along the shores of lake Ontario from Belleville to Niagara Falls, as well as those along the shores of lake Erie, who in the aggregate have a very large amount of capital invested in the enterprise. The American fruit—I am speaking particularly of the small fruits—is shipped in here two or three weeks ahead of our domestic fruit and secures the cream of the prices, and by the time our fruit is coming on the market the American growers will have a large surplus on their hands, which they are ready to dispose of at any price, thereby depressing the domestic market for our local growers. The same conditions apply to vegetables. In the county of Halton alone there are five or six thousand people interested in fruit and vegetable growing, and altogether we have about forty thousand people in the province who are interested in this industry. It is scarcely fair to leave them open to the bad results following from the dumping of American fruit and vegetables on our market at a time when the domestic production is being offered for sale. As stated by the hon. member for Yale (Mr. MacKelvie), the fruit and vegetable growers of British Columbia will also be adversely affected. In view of these facts, I think the Government would be wise to consider this matter further, and I trust it will result in their deciding not to repeal the dumping clause.

The excise tax of 49 cents per 100 pounds on beet sugar will affect a large number of our farmers who are engaged in growing sugar beets, and in this case also I think the Government would be well advised not to place our farmers at such a disadvantage. I presume the matter was very carefully considered, but I hope it will receive further consideration.

5 p.m.

With regard to the amendment, Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that honesty and sincerity should characterize the undertakings of political parties. This is essential if our public life is to be kept at a high standard. The Liberal party has not been too particular in this regard either during the last campaign or in preceding campaigns. Candidates of that party made promises prior to the election which they knew there was absolutely no possibility of their redeeming. For instance, they promised that if their party was returned to power they would reduce the cost of living by reducing the duties on imported articles. But what has the Government done? While slight tariff reductions have been made, the increase in the sales tax will result in the cost of living being more burdensome than before. In a word, the Liberal party have secured office under what amounts practically to false pretences. This is not a desirable condition in our public life, and for that reason I shall support the amendment.

Mr. WILLIAM G. RAYMOND (Brantford): Mr. Speaker, as representing a constituency which perhaps is more affected by the tariff than almost any other constituency, I thought it desirable that I should say a few words upon the tariff as it appears to the workers in the industries at Brantford.

There are, of course, many views upon the tariff. Any one who has listened to the debate, so far must have noticed that all kinds of opinions are held by hon. members. In fact, one hon. member, I think from Fort William (Mr. Manion), did me the honour to allude to me in what I thought was intended to be the language of compliment—it might have been called flattery—when he said that I was a Liberal Protectionist. Now, I have no objection to the term if translated in the way that I would translate it. I do not know exactly what the hon. gentleman meant, but I would remind him that a countryman of his own once said "There is many a true word spoken in jest." I think from the point of view from which we regard protection, that is to say, of a tariff for revenue with incidental protection, not by any means a tariff for revenue only—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. RAYMOND: What is the objection? A tariff for revenue with incidental protection—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. RAYMOND: I should think that was easily understood.

An hon. MEMBER: Very easily.

Mr. RAYMOND: I am glad that some hon. gentlemen are so easily amused, Mr. Speaker. While we may differ on the tariff, while there are points, I think, upon which we can all agree. Every man who was elected to this House, I fancy would claim to be, and I think his constituents must have thought he was, at least a good Canadian, one who loved Canada; and those who love Canada must certainly honour those who serve Canada well and unselfishly, and do her good service. In that sense I believe it is the general opinion of this House that there is no better example among men of Canada, and we have many who have done great service to our country through a term of many years, than we have in the hon. the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding). I believe that on that the members of this House can all unite and be unanimous in congratulating him, and I believe they will agree that this budget that he has presented to the House is one that was produced under the most difficult circumstances. I believe that the people of this country look upon the hon. Minister of Finance as a wise administrator, as a true patriot, as an honest man, and an honest man, the poet has told us, is the noblest work of God. The hon. Minister of Finance is a man who has "talked with crowds and kept his virtue" and "walked with kings, nor lost the common touch". He is one whose name will be handed down with satisfaction and pride. I believe that his last achievement is one of which the country generally will feel that it is probably the very best that could be done under difficult circumstances.

There is one disappointment that I have, however, in this debate and it is this, that the amendment in the form in which it was moved, instead of expressing some sound or unsound economic principle, does not express any at all. It simply derogates the whole debate and draws it down to the field of mere party politics. Anyone who read the amendment introduced by the hon. member for West York (Sir Henry Drayton) will see at once that that is the object of it, the aim and the end of it—to open up a discussion that will go back to the last election; and I notice that the speeches of many members who have followed it are purely what might be called political speeches, instead of being on the broader field of patriotism, upon our national difficulties, upon our national aims and aspirations. I cannot believe that a man with the great wisdom of the ex-Minister of Finance (Sir Henry Drayton) and one who was concerned so intimately as he was with this country's financial affairs, could by himself have framed such an amendment. I believe it was thrust upon him, I do not think it was voluntary on his part. I think in the amendment we can see another form; we can see it has been suggested, it has been dictated, it has probably been written for him and placed in his hand to move, and he has moved it because he is under the discipline of his masterful leader the right hon. member for Grenville(Mr Meighen).

While I regret that the debate, as I say, has been drawn down to the field of party politics by the moving of this amendment, I do not think it is necessary to follow the amendment, because in doing that we are only going back to the argument, backwards and forwards, that were used during the last election. We have other issues before us. We have to consider how the budget proposals will affect, first, our constituencies, and then in a broader sense, how they will affect the country. That is, we should look at this budget both as representing our ridings, and in a general sense as Canadians. I endeavour, for my part, to regard it in that way, and I endeavour to represent the constituency that elected me. The members of this House are not automatons, nor are we delegates, but representatives, and we have to the best of our ability to speak opinions, not always our personal ones, but those of ourselves and our constituents. The very derivation of the name of this assembly is by many etymologists thought to be from the words "Parler le ment"—to speak the mind—and if we openly and plainly speak our minds, I think we shall produce better results than if we sail under any false colours or resort to any camouflage.

This House was told by an hon. member that I had out-priested the high priest of protection. That may be true. The returning officer said it was. While it is a fantastic and paradoxical phrase. I presume possibly it is meant for a reproof. If so, we can recall instances of where even priests and prophets were reproved. Balaam was reproved; we all remember that, and I believe in this case the reprover outbrayed the rebuker of Balaam. When I am called a Liberal protectionist, if that is what I understand it to mean, namely to desire a reasonable, rational revenue tariff on industrial products, the manufacturers of this country, I must acknowledge to being a protectionist, whatever odium the word may bear in some men's minds. But I claim that that has always been the policy of the Liberal party—always. If you go back to Confederation when the tariff was made by a coalition government, the first tariff we had was a matter of some 15 per cent, and the first time that tariff was raised, it was raised by the Alexander Mackenzie government, who were accused of being protectionist by the Conservatives of that time. The Liberals did not reduce the tariff when they came into power; they raised it because of the necessities of the country. Then, when they came back in 1896 the same thing happened. They maintained a certain amount of protection, but the present Minister of Finance so skilfully readjusted the taxes on raw material that the commerce of this country grew by leaps and bounds, and our population increased, as was proved to the House this afternoon. So free trade has never been a part of the Liberal party, neither in theory nor in practice, and I do not think any one expected that it would be. It is well known in the older settled parts of Canada that the factories existing there are dependent on a certain amount of reasonable protection that is afforded by a revenue tariff for their existence, and while that is felt it is not likely that the Liberal party would ever announce that it was going to renounce that policy which has so long been the accepted policy of Canada. Hon. gentlemen opposite are always endeavouring to say that the aim of the Liberal party is free trade, or, as they put it sometimes, free trade as they have it in England. If they could ever prove that that was the object of the Liberal party, they know then that the policy of the Liberal party would not be popular with the people of Canada, and that is why they wish to foist upon them a policy which is not theirs, which does not belong to them, and which, when in power, they never put into practice.

Now I am not going into the details of the present tariff, there will be plenty of time for that when the House is in committee, if it is desirable; but on its general principles I will just say this. What affects my constituency is the removal of the two and a half per cent from agricultural implements—from ploughs, binders, cultivators and the various implements that are used upon the farm. Why should I feel so keenly when, perhaps, it appears to some gentleman but a small matter? The reason is this: our city is dependent upon the agricultural industry, upon the manufacturing of agricultural implements. When there are no agricultural implements making, our people are idle and the families are starving. At least, one-half of the employees in the city of Brantford are employed in factories that make these goods, and that half contains among it by far the larger number of the heads of families and householders in the community. When there is no manufacturing of agricultural implements, those people have no work, actually it creates a situation of starvation. The city has had to spend thousands and thousands of dollars during the last year or year and a half when this employment has been very precarious; now it has ceased in many of the factories altogether. In view of these facts when these implement manufacturers—

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): May I ask a question?

Mr. RAYMOND: Certainly.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Louder.

Mr. RAYMOND: It isn't private, is it?

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): The hon. gentleman made a statement that in several of the agricultural implement factories the work had ceased altogether.

Mr. RAYMOND: Yes, sir.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Would the hon. gentleman have any objection to telling us reasons why that work has ceased?

Mr. RAYMOND: The reason the work has ceased is because the goods are manufactured, all the warehouses are filled, and until those goods are disposed of the factories naturally will make no more.

Mr. BRETHEN: May I ask a question?

Mr. RAYMOND: Certainly.

Mr. BRETHEN: My hon. friend has just made the statement that the prosperity of his constituency depended upon the implement manufacturers. Does it not depend upon the ability of the farmer to buy those goods in the manufacturers' warehouses?

Mr. RAYMOND: That is just what I said. You and I agree, evidently, very well.

Mr. SALES: May I ask a question?

Mr. RAYMOND: Certainly.

Mr. SALES: Have all your factories been closed?

Mr. RAYMOND: I believe so. I believe every one of them has been with this exception: I do not think the Windmill has actually shut right down.

Mr. SALES: The twine factory has not closed down?

Mr. RAYMOND: Not the twine factory.

Mr. SALES: I believe the twine factory operates under free trade?

Mr. RAYMOND: Yes, it does.

Mr. SALES: Thank you.

Mr. RAYMOND: Naturally, the twine factory operates under free trade, but I doubt whether the hon. gentleman understands the situation, although it was explained in the House a few weeks ago. There were twenty-four binder twine factories working against one another and keeping down the price of binder twine for the farmers in Canada; they were all in competition. However, when the duty was taken off these were all put out of business but three, so there was no competition amongst our Canadian factories, —that ceased. The industry was then in the hands of the American combine, and when they got these factories out of the business they raised the price to the farmers and you have to pay more for your binder twine than you would have if the factories alluded to had stayed in the country. That is the actual fact, and every farmer knows it just as well as I know it. There are no other binder twine factories except, I think, this one in Brantford, and one in Welland. The farmers also know that the price of binder twine is fixed by the combine in the United States; and if ever it happens that they have a surplus of binder twine they could possibly put these factories, too, out of business. But the danger the farmers are in is this: if they have a shortage of binder twine in the United States and there is a shortage of binder twine also in Canada the farmers here will not be able to get it because there are not enough factories in this country to meet the demand.

Mr. SALES: What about Ireland?

Mr. RAYMOND: You might get some from Ireland. Now, although I am delighted to answer questions—

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): May I ask a question?

Mr. RAYMOND: Certainly.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): Does the factory in Brantford which makes binder twine confine its activities to that product?

Mr. RAYMOND: Well, it makes some kind of rough rope too. I think it is also engaged in the manufacture of something like clothesline but binder twine is the article principally manufactured. It is a very successful factory; it makes twine of the finest quality, but it does not help to make more than, I think, about two-fifths of the needed supply. Hon. gentlemen opposite will correct me if I am wrong, but I think all the factories in Canada make about two-fifths of what we need; and you can see in a moment that if they have a shortage in the United States, through a good crop, and if we are likely to have a shortage from the same cause, the combine over there will not send their binder twine to us—they will use it in their own country. Now had we had the establishments which existed before, we would have had our own binder twine factories; they would have kept the price down, because, Sir, they would have been working against one another. I mention this industry of binder twine at the present time because, I say, the industries that supply the basic industries of the country are the most important that we have, consequently, they should be nursed and kept in Canada to develop and supply what we are pleased to call the more basic industries.

Mr. WARNER: May I ask a question?

Mr. RAYMOND: Certainly.

Mr. WARNER: Do you know of any of the United States companies that came over to Canada and manufactured on this side in order to dodge the tariff?

Mr. RAYMOND: No, I do not. Do you? As I was about to say—I will make another attempt at it—the binder twine industry brings us close to the argument I will present in a little while on basic industries. Now, two and a half per cent off these ploughs, cultivators, and implements of that kind, may seem to be a very small amount, it does not seem to some to be an appreciable figure; but when you remember that, for instance, on a binder the duty on which was originally only twelve and a half per cent, that two and a half per cent off is 20 per cent of the protection it had, you will see that it forms a considerable amount. Remember too, that these implements made to supply the Canadian market are made at the closest possible cost, but they were exported from Canada to certain countries in competition with the world. That trade has now been cut off; we have now nothing but the Canadian trade to depend upon. The condition of the money market in some countries, and the unsettled conditions in others, such as Russia, have made exports almost impossible—I think absolutely impossible. Take another cause of difficulty. There was one factory in our city, twenty-five per cent of whose output, I believe, went to Australia. That country has seen fit to put a prohibitory duty on implements and the factory in question, which employed 1,500 hands in Brantford, is to-day absolutely closed. Moreover, that firm is considering the advisability, instead of reopening their Brantford plant, of removing to Australia and establishing a branch factory there. Now, these are things that are serious, I take it, not only to Brantford, not only to the constituency that I represent, but very serious to Canada. If you are going to drive manufacturers out of Canada, or going to have them reduced to the lowest possible minimum, it would depreciate the value of farm lands and the value of farm produce in all these vicinities, and it would bring us down to where we should be only working to the one end, and that one end would be the development of agriculture. I doubt if this is advisable. I do not know if hon. members of the Progressive party really consider it advisable. From their arguments in this House, you would think sometimes they did but sometimes you would think they took a little broader view. Hon. members may think I am talking for the interests of Brantford and Brantford alone, but our business takes us over the whole of Canada from the Atlantic to the Pacific. The farmers are the customers for our manufactures. They esteem us as their friend, and we are all working for the one end, namely the success and prosperity of Canada.

On the other hand, some of the agriculturists who live upon the prairies seem to think that whatever they want to use should come in absolutely free of duty, because agriculture is represented as a basic industry. I would ask those hon. members to consider the situation a little more carefully. What would have become of this country if the early farmers had taken that ground? What would become of any country devoted only to agriculture? We are told that there are four basic industries, agriculture, lumbering, mining and fishing, and that what applies to one applies to another. What country on the face of the earth to-day that is dependent upon one of these four basic industries has amounted to anything? We are told that they produce the wealth, and that the wealth must come from the ground. What country in the world that amounts to anything has prospered from those industries alone? I do not think it is possible. I have ransacked my brain, and I cannot find it. I do not believe there is a country on the face of the earth to-day that dependent on those industries or other industries of a like nature that has taken a forward place in the march of civilization. Why is it? It is because the whole statement is a fallacy. It is said that all the wealth comes from the ground. That was true, perhaps, in the days of Adam and Eve picking fruit in the Garden of Eden, and might have been true of other generations after. But, take the case of a ton of iron ore produced in a mine. When it is converted into steel, it becomes much more valuable, and when it is converted into other branches of technical industry it is much more valuable. When it is made into razor blades, watch springs or needles, it is further enhanced in value. What has made it valuable? Human skill and labour has increased the value of that article. It is a mistake to tell us that all the wealth comes from the ground. Of course, we are willing to acknowledge that some wealth comes from the ground. I have referred to iron and steel, but you can take anything you like and you will find the principle is the same, but when speaking to men of the intelligence of the hon. member opposite, it is not necessary to multiply examples.

In the countries in the world of wealth, progress and intellectual development, which have gone forward in the march of civilization, you will find that while such industries may exist, to a certain extent, they have been able to take the raw material from the ground, or from the mine, and to manufacture that raw material into something better, and by increasing its value have increased their wealth. There is a little country in Europe where there cannot be much agriculture: Switzerland has its share of agriculture, of course, but it is certain that if they had to live upon the agriculture and agricultural products, they would have to deport more than half of their population to-day. Then, why is it that Switzerland is such a wealthy country and that the people live there in such comfort? It is because they are applying human skill and labour to the raw material that is produced in other countries. The same thing is true of little Belgium, of Holland, and of our own Mother Country. It is not what Britain grows or produces out of her soil that makes her prosperous, but it is the skill and labour that she puts upon it. She turns these products into the cutlery that holds the market of the world; she gets raw cotton from Egypt and from the southern states, and, after applying skill and labour to it, sends it all over the world. Would you compare the condition of those people in Manchester and similar districts with the condition of the negroes of the southern states, who produce the raw material? It would be absurd. And yet the logical thing according to the arguments of those members, is that this country should become a producer of raw materials, that we should look upon our basic industries, agriculture, mining, lumbering and fishing as the only thing, that the industries and energies of this country should be exclusively devoted to them, and that nothing more should be produced than is produced from them. It would reduce us to the position of Gideonites, and we would soon be hewers of wood and drawers of water.

An hon. MEMBER: Oh, oh.

Mr. RAYMOND: I hope the hon. member for South Grey (Miss Macphail) does not have to hew very much wood. I thought I caught a gentle voice—

Mr. McMASTER: Is the hon. member not aware that Switzerland, Belgium, Holland and Great Britain are free trade countries, or very low tariff countries?

Mr. RAYMOND: Not one of them is a free trade country, and upon what they call the key industries of Great Britain there is a tariff of 33⅓ per cent, which is just about the same as our tariff. I do not think there is such a thing as a free trade country in the world. Perhaps the hon. member for Brome (Mr. McMaster) could tell us.

Mr. McMASTER: Are they not free trade countries, or countries in which a very low tariff is in force?

Mr. RAYMOND: None of them has a low tariff. Holland has a high tariff, and Belgium and Switzerland—well, of course, it depends on what you call a high tariff and what you call a low tariff.

Mr. WARNER: Can the hon. member tell us how the tariff will help the farmer to buy the implements that are piled up in his town of Brantford?

Mr. RAYMOND: How will it help the manufacturer who has those implements piled up there to sell them by taking 2½ per cent off the duty?

Mr. WARNER: Is the hon. member asking me the question?

Mr. RAYMOND: How will it help him to sell what he has made up now by taking 2½ per cent off the duty, when the United States' manufacturers have their establishments crowded from the cellar to the roof with these implements and are only waiting for a chance to send them to Canada where they can sell them for anything? The hon. member cannot get away from the fact. The hon. member is more clever at argument than I am, but it is the facts we want.

Mr. WARNER: I could not hear the hon. member, and I do not know whether he asked me the question or not. I do not think 2½ per cent would make much difference one way or the other.

Mr. RAYMOND: Two and a half per cent would be that much less, and without the reduction the United States manufacturer would have to pay that much more. We all want to make Canada a good and prosperous country. I believe every hon. member is a loyal Canadian and looks forward with aspirations to the ultimate destiny of this country. I hope there is not one exception to that. I do not believe there is. If so, we should have some eye to the future when we are making laws that are going to govern the finances and the economic policy of our country. If we make those laws so that this country is always going to be a producer of raw material, we are going to put this country back until it will be in that position in which it was claimed to be before, namely, that of being merely an adjunct of the United States, producing the raw material for that country. If that happens, the United States will turn that raw material into something more valuable; their skilled labour will get the benefit from that, while skilled labour in Canada will be idle, and if industries are busy on the other side of the line, men on this side will shortly leave for the United States to get work. We know that takes place.

I believe we want to have other industries than lumbering, fishing, mining and farming. I have the greatest respect for all those occupations, but as I have endeavoured to point out, they are not all the occupations of the world. Those nations that make wealth, that advance in civilization, that raise their people to a higher plane of living, are those which support more varied occupations than those four. In order to become a great nation, what would it be more rational for us to do? Would it be necessary for us to foster by protection those industries which are not necessary to the basic industries of the country? That would be folly. If you want to have industries in the country, you must have industries that are necessary to the general population. If the general population are mainly employed in those four branches of industry, you must, of all things, have the goods that they want manufactured in the country and manufactured close to them. As I endeavoured to explain on a former occasion in this House, I think it is more important that we should develop the manufacture of the tools that we want, than to have a high duty on something that is not absolutely essential to the country. We should not foster manufactures that are more or less of an exotic nature. The proposition is a plain one; if we want to build up this country, we must get wealth from other than those four important sources. The key industries, the essential industries to the country, are those that produce the tools, equipment, implements and manufactures that are used in our basic industries. If we develop those essential industries, the country goes on and develops centres of banking, financial interests, great transportation and carrying corporations and other facilities for the country, and in that way you have some chance of building up a nation. If you look at those nations that are happy, contented, prosperous, you will find that it is just in such diversified national business that they are engaged. In the year before the war, Great Britain, out of her transport alone, by means of her mercantile marine, received a sum approaching the sum total of our national debt. In the one year she made some £360,000,000 or $1,800,000,000 out of her mercantile marine alone. Why was that? It was because she traded with the world. If the British had all been farmers, would they have done so? It surely was not farm products that they were exporting all the time.

Mr. BROWN: Great Britain was trading with the world.

Mr. RAYMOND: She was trading with the world. She got the raw material from various countries in which it was produced, countries like Russia, Sweden, Norway and the like, and she manufactured that and exported it, because there was a market for it in the world. That was what made the trade of that country. Had the British people restricted themselves to farming—and the Old Country people take the lead to-day in agriculture; I believe, at all events, we import all our best breeds of horses, cattle and swine from that little island yet—had they restricted themselves to the production of agricultural products, to the production of coal, of ore and so forth, where would they have been? Instead of that, they have a trade that employs skilled labour, a trade by which that skilled labour is of value to the world at large. The policy which we want in Canada is one that will protect the skilled labourer, one that will protect labour, because it is labour that makes those products valuable. It is plain enough to me, and I think it ought to be plain enough to any man, that it is the labour that is put into an article that makes it valuable. Allusion was made to the first tariff that was put on in the United States in 1864 or 1865, during the Civil War. That tariff was established on the basis that there should be a slight minimum tariff on all articles coming into the country; that as labour was applied to each article, the tariff should increase by gradual steps, so that the more highly skilled the labour used on the article, the greater would be the protection upon it. That is how the United States were able to develop the manufactures that they have developed. That is why the United States afterwards became, to a great extent, an exporting country. I do not claim for one moment that we should put up, as they did, a Chinese wall that would keep everything out of the country. In many instances, they made importation almost impossible. I do not believe in that; but I maintain that we should have a reasonable revenue tariff that will be levied upon all goods coming into this country. I will not say for revenue only, because then some hon. gentlemen will say that they want an excise tax. But I say a reasonable revenue tariff that should be equal and fair, as far as possible, to all the different lines of manufacture, and that would give incidental protection to those who are engaged in industry. I do not think capital needs protection so much as it needs the safety of law, so that property should be absolutely safe. That is an essential to the success of any country, and it may be taken for granted. Capital is an elusive thing; it can generally take care of itself. The tariff is not, to my idea, for the protection so much of capital as of labour, of our mechanics and the men who do the work in the factories. As regards the sensitiveness of capital, we were all told early in life that "The fear of the Lord is the beginning of wisdom"; but I believe the financiers translate that differently, and they say: "The fear of loss is the beginning of wisdom." Therefore, capital, with that end in view, the fear of loss, is always able to look after itself. If it finds that the laws of this country are against it, that it is not beneficial to invest it in the industries of this country, but that it is beneficial to invest it in the industries of the United States, you may be sure that it will go to the United States. I am speaking, not for capital, but for the labourers, the working men, the skilled mechanics, who go to make up and build up a great country. If you look at the matter calmly, you will agree with me that the whole of Canada is not only the three prairie provinces any more than it is only the constituency which I represent. If we could get together and see these things properly with the right idea of building up a nation, if we could build up a nation according to our own ideals and aspirations, every member of this House would join cheerfully in the work. But the thing for us to do is to get together on this idea, and then we must carry on with an open mind. When I am told that I am a Liberal Protectionist or a Protectionist Liberal, if you translate "protection" as I translate it, I may take it as a compliment, or flattery, or anything you like, but it, perhaps, does not carry all the sting that the hon. gentleman who used the expression intended it to convey. I am one who would like to see this country developed upon those lines that I have mentioned. I should like to see progress made, and I do not think the theory of protection is altogether unknown to hon. members of the Progressive party. If, for instance, they suggested a tariff on oleomargarine I would have voted for it. But they were not satisfied with that. They wanted to make it absolutely prohibitive; it was their view to prohibit its manufacture or importation, and I could not go that far. I would have voted for reasonable protection, but that was going too far.

Mr. CRERAR: If the hon. member throws his mind back to the evening on which that vote was taken he will find that the Progressives, practically unanimously, opposed the resolution.

Mr. RAYMOND: I am very glad to hear it. I know that as I journeyed on the train west one man I heard arguing most strongly against it was a Progressive.

Mr. CRERAR: One, yes.

Mr. RAYMOND: Those who voted in favour of the resolution were certainly arguing for the strongest kind of protection.

Mr. MARTELL: I voted in this House to prohibit the importation, manufacture and sale of oleomargarine in Canada. I am not a protectionist.

Mr. RAYMOND: Are you not, sir?

Mr. MARTELL: So long as there is a tariff on anything that competes against the products of the dairymen, the dairymen have a right to be protected. If you are going to have free trade, then pull down the tariffs altogether and let everything be unprotected.

[Mr. Raymond.]

Mr. RAYMOND: Perhaps I may refer to another article that receives a certain amount of protection. I mention these little things merely to show that protection is something that may be found on either side of the garden wall. I fancy that the Wheat Board was not altogether a free trade measure, was it?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. LAPOINTE: He is right there.

Mr. RAYMOND: I listened to a most interesting argument that was delivered by one of the witnesses who testified before the Committee on Agriculture. He said that the Wheat Board would increase the purchasing power of the farmer of the West, and if the purchasing power of that farmer were increased it would benefit all the rest of the provinces. The farmer of the West would want more fruit, fish and lumber from British Columbia, more manufactured goods from Ontario, and from the maritime provinces he would want, for instance, more steel from Nova Scotia. I daresay hon. gentlemen all recall the argument; it was a very interesting one and I listened quite attentively to it. The witness said that every man who farmed a half-section had from 12,000 to 15,000 pounds of steel and iron in use, the average life of the implements being twelve years. So that every man on every 320 acres in the West would be a consumer of no less than 1,000 pounds of iron and steel per annum; and that was cited as one reason why the Wheat Board would benefit Nova Scotia. Now, if that is the case, I should like to ask hon. gentlemen, if these goods were purchased in the United States, having been manufactured in Milwaukee, Chicago and other centres, how would Nova Scotia be benefited at all?

We should aim at producing a rounded out nation; and if hon. gentlemen think that the three prairie provinces constitute the whole of Canada, their ideas are just as erroneous as mine would be if I suggested that my constituency represented the Dominion. The best policy for Canada is to look to the future and build up a nation that will develop an attractive place for people to come to—a country that will not be devoted exclusively to any industry, or any particular line of business, and, especially, one that will not be merely a producer of raw material for shipment to other countries. We should have a country in which skilled labour can produce the things that are needed by the people, thus adding to the wealth of the nation. In the little town of Paisley, in Scotland, there are 12,000 operatives employed in the manufacture of ordinary cotton yarn used by ladies in sewing. Think of the conditions that exist in those places from which the raw material is secured. Think of the conditions in the southern states and in Egypt, where the raw cotton is produced, and you will see that wherever there is wealth and advancement in civilization it is because of the existence of skilled labour and an economic system that protects that labour until it is fully developed and becomes an asset to the country, and becoming so produces such other things as a mercantile marine, and a great banking system by which capital is invested all over the world. We have been told that Great Britain has $2,500,000,000 invested in Canada. Well, that money did not originate in agriculture, or lumbering, or fisheries, or mining, but in the manufacturing industries. And if Canada is to prosper as she should, the Canadian people must, in their wisdom, adopt such a policy. If it is to be a protectionist to hold such a view, I am one, whether the term is meant as one of compliment or of opprobrium. If it is a protectionist to hold the view that we should have a revenue tariff giving incidental protection to manufacturers, I am certainly a protectionist; and as to being a Liberal protectionist, sitting on this side of the House, holding such a view, and supporting the Government that has removed from the manufacturers 2½ per cent of the protection they have enjoyed, there are strong reasons that are as deep as my very being why I could not be anything else.

Mr. NEILL: How did the hon. member vote on the oleomargarine resolution?

Mr. RAYMOND: As I said just now, if it had been for a duty on oleomargarine as against the article made in Chicago I would have voted for it. But I would not make it a crime for a man to make oleomargarine in Canada or to import it, and as I told one gentleman who spoke to me on the question, there are mechanics in our town who, during their long period of unemployment in the past year, had all they could do to keep their families without seeking charity, and they were obliged to buy oleomargarine, because they could not afford butter. If I went back to one of these men who told me that he could not afford butter at 50 cents and therefore had to buy oleomargarine at 25 cents, he would naturally say to me: "Why did you vote for a law that took that substitute from my children's bread so that they have now to eat dry bread? Why did you do it? What answer could I make to such a query? I know that the hon. member (Mr. Neill) is a reasonable and rational man, and I ask him, how could I answer such a question? I simply could not. I would have voted for a duty, but not for the total prohibition of an article, thousands of tons of which were used in Great Britain as food during the war.

Mr. NEILL: Does not that apply to binders also?

Mr. RAYMOND: Yes, I think so. I would not vote for the total exclusion of binders. I never favoured the total exclusion of binders, and I never said it should be a crime in this country to make them. But I do say that a reasonable protection on binders is only rational and proper and right in order that we may have them made at our door and not be under the control of an American combine that could charge what price they choose, if those machines were not made in this country. Now, key industries are absolutely necessary, and hon. gentlemen must realize that they should be kept up. Not only for their own sake as well as for the sake of the country, but from their own selfish standpoint, they should cherish those industries.

Mr. BLACK (South Huron): Will the hon. gentleman allow a question?

Mr. RAYMOND: Certainly—delighted.

Mr. BLACK (South Huron): You said a moment ago that with the duty taken off binder twine the manufacturers were all put out of business except three. How is it that the manufacturers of binders have all been put out of existence although the duty has been retained?

Mr. RAYMOND: They have not all been put out of business.

Mr. BLACK (South Huron): Just as many as in the other case.

Mr. RAYMOND: There is a very large concern in Hamilton called the International Harvester Company.

Mr. BLACK (South Huron): Only two binders are manufactured in Canada to-day against nine or ten twenty-five years ago.

Mr. RAYMOND: If you will allow me a moment since you raise the question. The International Harvester Company was started as a branch of McCormick's and Deering's, and the reason was that those two companies thought they would rather start a branch factory in Canada than pay duty on binders from their American factories. So they started this factory at Hamilton, whence they distribute binders all over Canada. That is now a Canadian industry, and if there had not been a duty on binders you would not have got that factory established at Hamilton.

Mr. BLACK (South Huron): Binders were manufactured in Canada before that.

Mr. RAYMOND: Certainly, but not by the International Harvester Company. Binders were manufactured in Brantford by the Massey-Harris Company and at Smith's Falls by the Frost & Wood Company. There are several other companies that make binders in Canada.

6 p.m.

Mr. BLACK (South Huron): Just two to-day manufacturing binders against ten manufacturers twenty-five years ago.

Mr. RAYMOND: We not only make binders in Canada but we export them. The question brings back to my mind my first association with the International Harvester Company. When the company was coming here from Chicago an effort was made to get them to locate their factory in Brantford, and I saw their representative as I happened to be a member of the city council at that time. They were going to start this branch in Canada, and this gentleman, who came from the McCormick company, said they were going to start a branch in Canada rather than pay the Canadian duty on their American product.

Now, Sir, does not that prove, or at all events, strengthen my argument that it is to your interest to have these factories at your command, to have them developed close to you, so that if those industries are the four basic industries, the industries from which they derive supplies, tools and employment should be close to them and dependent on them, and that we should endeavour to foster such industries rather than exotic industries which are not so immediately necessary to our people.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

[Mr. Raymond.]

After Recess

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. RAYMOND: Mr. Speaker, when the House rose at six o'clock I was endeavouring to make plain my attitude towards the tariff and my constituency in occupying the place I do on this side of the House, and being, as it is termed, a Liberal protectionist.

I endeavoured to show that the position I held was not at all incompatible with the principles of the Liberal party, and that if to believe that a revenue tariff adjusted in such a way as to provide an incidental protection to the manufacturing industries of our country was to be a protectionist, I must acknowledge that in that sense I am a protectionist, because I believe that is the best tariff. As I stated before six o'clock, the consistent attitude of the Liberal party has always been, when it was in office, to carry out that policy. I am aware that at election times gentlemen on the other side of the House have endeavoured to state that the only policy of the Liberal party was free trade, or, as they loved to put it, free trade as they have it in England, but I think I was successful in showing that that had never been the policy of the party, was not now, and is very much less likely to be the policy of the party in the future. I think that we have in the present tariff one that is in the general interests of this country, and if the manufacturers of agricultural implements in my constituency have to lose 2½ per cent of protection, if that is in the general interests of Canada, as it must have been thought to be by the Finance Minister, I believe they are men who will cheerfully acquiesce in that tariff, though realizing it would have been better for their own business, if the old policy had been maintained. Why there should be anything incompatible in one holding such views being on this side of the House, or in being a Liberal, it is impossible for me to understand. I can only say in defence of my being a Liberal and being on this side of the House, that as I read history, and as I always have read it from my youth up, I have always inclined to the Liberal side of politics and to the principles that that party have held and have carried out.

I was very much surprised when I heard an hon. member who has charmed this House with his eloquence and informed it with his erudition, the hon. member for Centre Winnipeg (Mr. Woodsworth), say that as he read history he could see no difference between the two old parties. I hope that as he reads it with added years he will see a vast difference between the principles of the two old parties, for as I read history I find on every page the principles, wherever there is action, of the one side or the other always at work. Not to mention what is trite and obvious, and well known to hon. members of this House, who are, of course, all readers of history —it is not necessary for me to recapitulate the gradual growth and development and building up of our freedom, of our liberties, and of this very assembly of the people, as a product of the growth and development of Liberal principles. If you go back to the earliest days and take those measures which have been for the good of the people at large and in the direction of good government, in which power has been made to feel its responsibilities and obligations to those over whom it exercises control, I say that there you will see the growth and development of what I consider and call Liberal principles. If you take the other side—you need not go further than Magna Charta. Everyone knows who was the Tory on that occasion; they do not need to be told it was King John. If you come down further in our parliamentary development you will find it was the people of Liberal principles who rose and fought for the liberty of Parliament against the Stuarts, and in that long and bloody war achieved an independent place for the Commons of England such as they have never lost to this day. If you want to find the opposite principles, the principles of true Toryism, you find it when the thirteen colonies of the United States were forced away from Great Britain by the exercise of tyrannical power by George III and his Tory advisers. One can hardly read a page of history from earliest times down to the present day without seeing these principles clearly and plainly at work.

I will not weary the House but if you come to the emancipation of the slaves, if you come to the Catholic Reform Bill if you come to the Great Reform Bill when the franchise was given to the people, and so on right up to the present day, you will find that those who resisted those movements were those that believed in the practise and exercise of what I call the principles of Toryism. In fact you have it right down to modern times, right down to our own days. Those were the principles that so actuated the Government of this country that after ten years experience of it, from 1911 to 1921, the free independent spirit of the people of Canada rose against it and in one form or another the people said they had had enough of it. On the other hand, if you take those things of which we as Britons, as Englishmen, have most justly to be proud I maintain it is where Liberialism has won victories, where we have gained constitutional liberty, and where such a system was established,—in which Canada took the foremost place, resulting in the institution of representative government in this country,—that we now have the free governing nations that now form the British Empire held together—sometimes they say by the spirit of loyalty. But it is not loyalty alone, gentlemen, in the case of those men who were driven from England by Tories and helped to establish the thirteen colonies in the country to the south. They were loyal, just as loyal as anybody else; but they were driven out because there was not such a system in which they could exercise what they considered their just freedom and their just liberty.

It is because of these things that have been accomplished, because we have autonomous nations within the Empire—self-respecting, self-governing, but united in forming the great galaxy of nations that we call the Empire—that I see the great triumph of Liberal principles and hence, Mr. Speaker, I feel that I should have no occasion to defend myself against the charge of being a Liberal. If I have, then the crime charged is one of which I have always been guilty in the past, and I fear I cannot, at my time of life, so change as to be innocent of it in the future. For it seems to me that those things of which we are most justly proud, those things of which we have the most right to boast of in the achievements of our race—not merely what we have done in the way of commerce, of colonizing, of producing great money or wealth, although those are great things and have filled their purposes—those things that we have done in solving the problem of the proper government of the people, for the people and by the people, have been accomplished through the agency of Liberal principles.

I hope, Mr. Speaker, that the gentleman who referred to me as a Liberal protectionist will feel satisfied with my answer, and that the hon. members of the House will think that I have so far made clear my position that at all events it will be worth the consideration of those who did not at first agree with me.

Miss AGNES C. MACPHAIL (South-east Grey): Mr. Speaker, I want at the outset of my remarks to assume full responsibility for what I am about to say; I do not want any one else to have to bear that responsibility with me except my constituency. Now almost all who have spoken in this debate have made pleasing and kind remarks about the Minister of Finance. I am glad that I also can say that personally, I do admire very much, as I am sure every one in this House does, the Minister of Finance. It would be too much, however, to go further and say that I was disappointed in the budget. I was not disappointed in the budget because I did not look for anything from it. I could not be after having studied the Liberal budget of 1896; knowing as I do that under the Liberal regime we got the rebate; knowing also that the British preference was not increased but decreased under Liberalism in 1907; knowing, or suspecting at least, that had there been a desire now to bring down a more generous tariff it could not have been brought down because of the high protection which to-day permeates the Liberal party and the Liberal Government. Of course, this is nothing startling that I am telling you, the country knows this and knows it very well. And so it would be going too far to say that I was disappointed in the budget. It has been said many times that the budget was a step in the right direction. If that be true then I think it was one step forward and one step back; because anything that was gained was pretty nearly lost in other directions and so the total, or the sum gained, did not amount to anything of any material value.

We have heard some interesting things this afternoon from the hon. member for Brantford (Mr. Raymond). It seemed to me as I heard him present his argument that he was building the roof of his house first, and I wondered all the time how he could support that roof while he was getting the walls built and then the foundation. I think he was going on the assumption that if it were not for protection, or other artificial stimulation, there never would be any manufacturing to supply the need of the four basic industries; that those key industries he speaks of would never develop, unless under protection of an artificial character. That, I think, is a fallacy. I think, just so surely as there are four basic industries, just so surely will the secondary or key industries follow the development of those basic industries. Then one must wonder, too, what we are to do if we are to buy everything at home and not buy from any other nation in the world. We must sell—everybody admits that. Then, who is going to buy from us? Can we always sell but never buy? Such a thing, in neighbourhood terms, would mean always borrowing from your neighbour but never lending to him.

Now, possibly it would be a very good thing to test protection by seeing what has been the effect upon the greatest of the basic industries under the protection we have had for some time in Canada. I think it is true that rural depopulation has become so intensified a problem that it is a worry to every one, not only those who live upon the land but those who earn their living in these highly stimulated industries. Because, as we were told this afternoon, they want someone who is going to buy the product of the labourers in the factories; they cannot keep factories going if the warehouses are full. And just here let me ask: Why has trade been very dull lately? Of course there are world conditions which tend to make it so, but surely every one in this House knows—I am sure hon. members know and I hope they will admit—that the lack of buying power of the four basic industries has had a great deal to do with the full warehouses that made trouble for the key or the secondary industries. We find that of the population of Canada in 1901 the rural percentage was 62.04, and the urban 37.06. In 1911 the rural population had fallen to 55.05, and the urban had gained until it reached 45.05. In Ontario, between 1901 and 1911, the rural loss in population was 52,184, without taking into account the increase in birth and immigration, which would have brought it to a total loss of 373,567, or 29 per cent. In obtaining the census they are not always strictly accurate. Take such ridings as East and South York; the city of Toronto has over-run into the surrounding country, and the people there live on very small holdings, which they do not work, because they go back and forth to their work in the city. These people are, in a great many cases, called rural people, when, in truth, they are not. I gave these figures before, but not completely, and I desire to repeat them, because I was startled when I saw them. My own riding of Southeast Grey, since 1911, has lost 14.22 per cent of its people. My riding, with the ridings that border on it, Dufferin, North Grey, including Owen Sound, South Bruce, North Simcoe, and North Wellington, have together lost 18,170 people. The township of Egremont, which is one of the best townships in Grey, and has splendid land, lost 15 per cent of its population between 1901 and 1911. The question is, can this go on longer, or how much longer is it to go on? Has protection, under which we have been living, been good for the basic industries of Canada? Can the manufacturing industries continue to flourish, if the very roots that nourish them die? I do not think they can.

I always take it for granted that we are all loyal Canadians, and I never question any one's loyalty. I believe that each member in this House hopes for the day when Canada will be even a greater nation than she is to-day. But when I look at it from a national viewpoint, I am alarmed when I see the artificial stimulating of the secondary industries at the expense of the basic industries. Those basic industries, of which the greatest is agriculture, are slowly—not so slowly either—and surely, dying in Canada. The history of the world proves that in civilization finally urban life dominates the rural, and then rural life dies, and then, finally, we have national decay. History teaches us that lesson. It is true that the people of Denmark and the people of the Scandinavian peninsula have gone one step further than we have, and they are trying by their own exertion to save rural life, and it seems that they have been successful. The odd thing is that when we try to do that here we are called very hard names, and you would think that we were trying to disrupt all the national life in Canada, though in reality we are trying to save that national life by saving the foundation on which it is built. In 1918, in Ontario out of 5,957 rural schools we find this result:

Schools	No. of pupils
12	2
33	3
46	4
79	5
524	6 to 9, average
1,400	10 or less

Mr. DUFF: Is that in the whole of Canada or one province?

Miss MACPHAIL: In the province of Ontario.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: You do not see that in the province of Quebec.

Miss MACPHAIL: Then they say that they can protect the farm. Well, if you ruin it first, you can try to protect it afterwards, but you must first ruin it, and we have not done that yet. The United States is further on in the same road of protection than we are. Their farmers are demanding protection for themselves, and there must soon come a reaction, and in the very thickly populated portions of the United States half or more of the population are going to be clamouring for no protection on food and will wage a similar fight to that which took place at the time of Cobden and Bright long years ago in England. So it is going to go on in a circle that gets nations nowhere.

I do not for a moment assume that protection alone is the cause of the deplorable rural condition. I do not even think that. I think there are many causes for rural conditions such as we find to-day and I think possibly it is not asking too much to take just a few minutes to tell you what I truly believe they are. I believe one of the basic things that makes life unsatisfactory to-day is our school system—a school system which is based on the idea of classic education, a system which has got into a rut. You go from public school to high school and from high school to the university, and once you have gone all the road you very rarely come back to live by any of the basic industries. There is no rural system of education. It is true there is an urban education transplanted into the country.

Then, again, we have the lack of cheap credit, and of long time loans. It is very difficult for farmers to get credit, because the assets they have at their command are not accepted as security for loans. With regard to transportation, our railways having been built away ahead of the development of the country, the overhead cost that has resulted has led to heavy transportation charges. I hope it is not too much to say that I think our national ideal is not a true ideal, that we have in the last 25 years possibly allowed ourselves to think that money, dollars and cents, the successful gathering together of a large pile of capital, is success, when it is not really success. Everyone has tried to acquire capital by doing his fellowman, and if he could not do him well enough without legislation, he cleverly sought legislation to help him do the other fellow more successfully. Because of that we have had legislation which no one can deny has taxed all the people for the benefit of a few.

I want to give you what I consider three or four proofs that farming does not pay to-day. Of course, any one who farms does not need any proof, but, possibly, it is well for the people who do not farm to realize something about farm conditions at the present time. Not one per cent of the farmers pay an income tax. Only 45 in Ontario paid the tax last year. People do not run from a paying proposition, and they are running from the farms in Ontario at the rate I have quoted to the House. Not one farm between one ocean and the other will rent for enough to pay 6 per cent on the investment. Two or three generations ago the old pioneers came out to Canada and with great labour hewed down the forests and established homes. Gradually one generation after another improved the property, put buildings upon it, draining it, fencing it, and to-day their descendants find that they have not help of their own, and that their children will not stay with them because they cannot pay them as other industries can. When they cannot afford to hire help they give up the struggle and sell the property that their parents and grandparents have possibly hewed out of the bush. They find that they can sell the land and give away the buildings and improvements if they like, or they can sell the improvements and give away the land; but they cannot sell both because nobody will pay for both. Anybody who has tried to sell a farm knows that is true. When we went on to the farm that we are now on seventeen years ago this spring, the taxes were $16; this year they are $92, and yet what that farm produces to-day is no greater than it was then. One is, therefore, led to think that sometime, somewhere, an end must come to this thing. It cannot go on, because the basic industries cannot carry the overhead expenses that are thrust upon them; so people are trying to get out from under the load and are going into other industries that are artificially stimulated. No less eminent an authority than Sir Thomas White referred to this when he said:

> The future of Canada rests with the development of its great resources, of which the greatest and most fundamental is agriculture.

I hope his followers will remember that. It is true, and it is something which Canada, a young nation, should learn now before it is too late. When we look at the trade reports of Canada, we find what a prominent place farming and the other basic industries play in it, because, for the year ended March 31, 1921, the total export trade was $1,190,000,000, of which farming, lumbering, mining and fur-trading, with almost no manufacturing—with a little, I will grant you, the manufacturing of wheat into flour—provided 80 per cent. Of this total, manufacturing provided 20 per cent, and agriculture alone provided 47 per cent. That surely convinces one that we need to stimulate the basic industries if we are going to build up an export trade. I think—and I hope I am not wrong in thinking; I am willing to be convinced if I am wrong—that trade is what makes a nation great. That is what made Great Britain great, because she is the greatest trading nation on the face of the earth to-day. If trade is not a thing that nations should seek, why is it then that we do not find small nations with poor harbours and high mountains, nations that cannot trade much, the greatest nations in the world? One would almost think trade was fundamental because, in spite of all the artificial restrictions that parliaments and men can throw up around it, trade persists, and the United States, one of the greatest of high protectionist nations, rejoiced some years ago when her foreign trade approximated that of Germany. One would wonder why they should do so if trade is something to be deplored. For many years many people thought, when you had high protection, you produced a revenue; but you cannot make them believe that to-day; the people know better. The fact of the matter is that we who sit in this corner of the House are the proof that the people know better. When you make protection so high that goods do not come into a country, you produce no revenue. Then the manufacturer who stands behind that wall of high protection gets the benefit of that protection, and he waxes rich and strong, so that now we, who live in the country, cannot keep our hedges or gardens looking well on account of the motors that pass them on the way out from our large, well filled cities.

Supposing that we did give protection and that this protection made the quality of Canadian goods greater than the quality of any other goods; or supposing that all the protection went into the revenue; or supposing all the protection went into the workingmen's wages, there might be some plea made for protection. But since none of those three things is true, one wonders why we have tolerated it so long. I am sure no one in Canada wants to cut off protection at one fell swoop, because if a person has never learned to walk, it will be difficult at first, so it will possibly take some careful teaching. I remember that, a long time ago, when people first wanted protection, the idea was to help infant industries. Those infants have now become so strong and heavy that we can scarcely carry them; but yet they want protection.

Cotton and woollen goods are two things that we use a great deal. The farmer is favoured no more than the person who lives in the town or city if we have cheaper cottons and woollens. They are two articles that are highly protected; and we find, if we look back over the history of the cotton and woollen trade, that they have waxed exceedingly strong and fat, and that capital invested in them receives very good returns, better than 6 per cent on the investment. We find that all down the tariff list there has been a discrimination against ordinary things that are used by everyday people, in favour of the luxuries that are used by the few, and which could be easily done without. What I, in this corner of the House, believe in —whether the rest do or do not is for them to say—is that as rapidly as possible we should get away from the idea of indirect taxation and should get back, or come, to direct taxation. Possibly Barnum really found out the trouble when he said that the people loved to be fooled. That may be true; it seems sometimes that people would rather pay $5 indirectly than $1 directly. Possibly it is like getting a tooth pulled. You could get one pulled painfully and the whole set out painlessly; and only afterward do you realize the awful damage. I often think that is the way with taxation. People would be much better off if they paid their taxes directly; and when they are educated up to the true idea of taxation, where the money goes and where it comes from, I think any one would be willing to have direct taxation. That would tend towards the careful expenditure of public money, because when people know that they have paid the money out of their own pockets, they are going to watch it more carefully than if they did not know that. The national expenditure has reached a most alarming figure, and it must be cut down. I know this is hard, and I very much sympathize with the Minister of Finance, because, no matter whom you tax, nobody wants to pay the tax; every one wants the other fellow to pay it. That is true everywhere and at all times; but we have paid it so long, we think it would be very well for the other fellow to pay it for a while and see how he likes that. Therefore, we look with hope to a day, when the indirect method of collecting taxation will be abandoned and the direct method adopted. I do not believe we should be ashamed to say that; I believe we should take definite steps in that direction, and I am willing to say that a government that starts this is possibly going to take its life in its hands; but a government that is not willing at any time to take its life in its hands for what it deems best, is not perhaps the best kind of a government that a nation could have.

Mr. JAMES MALCOLM (North Bruce): Mr. Speaker, at the outset of my remarks, I should like to compliment the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) on his very excellent presentation of a most excellent budget under most trying circumstances. I only hope that the budget which the minister has presented will be followed with the same degree of prosperity that followed his famous budget speech of 1897. The minister has pointed out, and the fact has been dwelt on to a large extent and in an able way by hon. members who have preceded me, that the obligations of the country are great; and were we not an optimistic and resourceful people I think the chances of meeting those obligations would be very slim indeed. I think, however, that as a young country, with the natural resources which we have and with that buoyant optimism which is inherent in all Canadians, we shall be able eventually to solve the problems with which we are now faced. The Minister of Finance in considering the proposals of the budget has, I believe, acted very wisely in providing for the payment of the national charges for this year. To discharge the obligations for interest on the national debt, for the expenses of government for the re-establishment of and the pensions to soldiers, and for the interest charges and probable deficits for some time at least on the National Railways, he has imposed all the taxation which he considers the country can bear at the present time. Had he made provision to meet capital payments he would have been imposing a degree of taxation which would have been a hindrance to the development of the national industries on which so much of our prosperity depends, and would have been placing upon the people a load which at present they are not able to bear. I think, therefore, that we should compliment the hon. gentleman for at least devising a system of taxation that will meet the obligations of the country for the year; and we must also compliment him on his wisdom in not burdening the country with taxation to meet capital payments during the present period of industrial and agrarian depression.

Knowing the West as I do, and having been associated with many of the western and Agrarian members, I believe there has been exhibited here a very much broader spirit of co-operation in legislation than the majority of hon. members might think. All hon. members of the House have evidently come, after a few weeks of parliamentary experience, to recognize the fact that Canada is not so easily governed. There is an East and a far East, there is a West and a far West; and there is a new North developing. And the Minister of Finance in preparing his budget has, I think, given a good deal of thought to the interests of each section of the country and has acceded, in so far as it is possible for him to accede, to the ideals and the hopes of the Dominion as a whole.

In order to meet the taxation which is inevitable this year, the Minister of Finance has increased certain existing kinds of taxation. He has also proposed entirely new methods, and has returned to some of the luxury taxes that were in existence during the war. I will refer to the increase which he has made in the existing method of taxation, and justify it, so far as it can be justified, because no tax such as the sales tax can be justified by anything save necessity. Some hon. members have pointed out that the sales tax falls equally heavily on those who have many dependents. The hon. member sitting beside me representing the constituency of Cape Breton South and Richmond (Mr. Kyte) pointed out this afternoon the exemptions that exist in connection with the sales tax. I need not therefore dwell on that point. I would point out, however, that while the sales tax undoubtedly falls more heavily on the man with a certain income and five dependents than it does on another man with the same income and two dependents, the tax does not really change the ratio; the only difference is in the amount. The sales tax is levied on what we buy, and it must be clear to every hon. member that a man spends money according to the wealth he has. It could be said with equal truth that the man of means having a great many dependents would naturally pay a greater amount of sales tax than the man with fewer dependents. The tax is levied entirely on the amount spent, and inasmuch as the spending is heavier among the wealthier classes, in the long run the very large percentage of revenue from the tax comes from those that spend the most money. We had an investigating body in this country from Washington recently looking into the Canadian sales tax. I was told that, in a jocular way, one of these men remarked when he went home that the only criticism which the American government had of the Canadian government's tax was that they could not suggest any improvement upon it.

The Minister of Finance has introduced a new piece of legislation in the stamp tax and also in the share tax on the transfer of stocks. Both these taxes will undoubtedly be subject to criticism by the bond dealers and the brokers, and possibly by the bankers. But I want to compliment the minister to-night on his courage in introducing this legislation, the first of its kind that extracts money from this particular class in the community. The average business man will not complain because he has not in the past complained of taxes administered by the late government for war purposes. The stamp tax and the transfer tax may possibly be subject to some modification, but they will produce a decided revenue and will not fall heavily on the shoulders of the average citizen. The minister has seen fit to revive a tax, put into force by the late government, on motor cars. I do not think that hon. gentlemen will disagree with the statement that there is possibly no industry in Canada that is in as good a financial condition as the motor car industry. An automobile is possibly a necessity, but it is mostly a luxury; and as regards tractors, the late government exempted them from customs duties while the present Minister of Finance proposes to make that exemption permanent by act of Parliament. The minister regards motor cars as to some extent a necessity, and as such he has exempted them up to $1,200. The tractor is free from duty while the commercial machine is exempted from the tax.

In dealing with the general tariff the Minister of Finance has pointed out the relations that exist between ourselves and our natural geographic customers, the United States. He has explained how that country, which has always maintained a high tariff on manufactured goods, has now turned to a tariff on the products of the farms and intends shortly to supplement that legislation by still higher protection for the farmers, which is the request of the agrarian bloc in the American Senate. He mentions with a good deal of justifiable pride his reciprocal bargain with the United States in 1911 and points out that as that bargain was agreed to by the American government and rejected by the people of Canada, it is natural to expect that in any reopening of negotiations with a view to entering into another bargain for reciprocal trade the initiative must be taken by this country. He has stated that such an advance was made by himself, but that in the meantime the American government knowing the mind of the Minister of Finance, naturally cannot expect him to make tariff reductions on American goods entering Canada that might influence a bargain for a reciprocal agreement which he will eventually make if he gets the opportunity. That is the point which he made clear, 9 p.m. and I think his logic is perfectly sound and acceptable to the majority of hon. members. The exceptions made on implements of industry are in line with the views he expressed last session, and taking into account the conditions I have referred to, I think that is as far as any reasonable member could expect the minister to go.

Regarding the British preference, I feel that as an integral part of the Empire hon. gentlemen will agree with me that everything should be done as far as possible to encourage trade with Great Britain. The minister has made a decided step in that direction by granting a greater preference on goods of British manufacture, and I heartily commend him for his action in this regard. I would, however, point out to the British manufacturer (if he were here) that he himself would do a very great deal towards capturing Canadian trade if he would be willing to make the style of merchandise that appeals to his overseas customers instead of following his more or less timeworn custom of trying to make us buy what he has to offer.

The hon. member for Halton (Mr. Anderson) expressed the opinion, with which I do not agree, that American branch industries are being established here because of our protective tariff. I do not think that is the principal reason for their locating here. I think the main reason at the present time is because of the better trade relations existing between Canada and the other parts of the British Empire, and the American manufacturer, who is now more or less in trouble with his export trade, sees a possible way of doing better business with the British Empire from a Canadian branch than he could from his headquarters in the United States, as on his goods exported from the United States he is probably not going to receive the same preferential treatment from the British dominions that he will receive on goods exported from his Canadian branch.

I am very heartily in accord with the establishment of American branch industries in Canada. Some people contend that the profits from those industries usually go to the States; but, Mr. Speaker, the past history of American branch industries has been that after one generation, if not before, they have a habit of passing into the hands of Canadians, or the principals of those branches in many cases become Canadianized and real citizens of our country.

The Marking Act and the Depreciated Currency Act have been abolished, I think very much to the satisfaction of the Canadian importer and consumer. In the case of the former act the minister stated when introducing his budget:

> We propose, in any particular case of an exceptional character, when there are reasons why articles imported from abroad should be marked, that we should have the right by Order in Council to deal with the matter; but we propose that, as a general law, this provision shall be repealed.

With respect to the Depreciated Currency Act, I would point out to the hon. minister that he has apparently overlooked making a similar provision. It must be admitted that the German mark has fallen in Germany compared with its trading value for merchandise; but it is not to be admitted that it has fallen to anything like the same extent as in relation to British, American or Canadian gold. If he is to consider his tariff for revenue alone, he will find that the revenue to be derived from the importation of German goods will be entirely wiped out in many cases by the depreciation, so that if he leaves the protective side of the argument out altogether and considers only the revenue side, he will do well to make provision also that in exceptional cases of a like nature, or for obvious reasons, it will be necessary to have some sort of legislation. The British government, which has been cited so often as being very much of a free trade government, has an act known as the Safeguarding of Industries Act, providing that where goods are to be dumped into England to the detriment of British workmen, the government may take cognizance of the fact and govern itself accordingly.

The minister has not informed the House what he proposes to do in regard to the income tax. I refer to this item only on account of a remark made during the course of the debate by the hon. member for Centre Winnipeg (Mr. Woodsworth) whose speeches we have enjoyed on several occasions. The hon. member refers to a capital tax to pay the national debt. I would point out to the minister, in dealing with the income tax, that all countries such as Canada are more or less in competition for foreign capital, and that with the United States having a maximum income tax of 50 per cent and we having a 75 per cent maximum, we are not likely to share to any great extent in foreign capital which will be necessary to develop our natural resources, if we are going to maintain a 50 per cent higher maximum. The United States did not build itself up by a natural process of development, but by importing capital and workers from the Old Land to a great extent; and if the growth of this country is to be in any degree rapid, we will of necessity have to follow similar methods. Therefore I contend that as capital is very necessary to our development, we will do well under existing circumstances to hold the capital that we have here, and try to attract more, and I think the minister will have to consider that point very carefully when bringing down his income tax proposals.

There always seems to be in the remarks made by the hon. member for Centre Winnipeg a rather mistaken idea with regard to capital. His viewpoint has always appeared to me to be that capital is the property of a few individuals. In my opinion capital is largely the accumulated premiums held by the big insurance companies for their beneficiaries, and the accumulated savings held by our banks and trust companies. These funds they lend to governments, municipalities and individuals, and when you start in on a plan to tax capital you are taxing not only the wealthy man but also the small man—the small investor and the small policyholder, whose funds in the aggregate constitute these insurance companies, banks and trust companies, the greatest capitalistic institutions in the land, and that if you enforce any policy of confiscation, you must of necessity pretty well confiscate the capital of all together.

Another factor which to my mind must be very carefully considered by the Minister of Finance in dealing with income tax is not to discourage enterprise. We in Canada have as much enterprise as the people of any other country on the face of the globe, and enterprise is a very necessary third factor along with capital and labour in developing our country. It does not make any difference how enterprising we are to-day, if we have not the capital and labour along with enterprise we will not get very far. Nor does it, in the second place, make very much difference how much money we have if we have not the enterprise and the labour to use that money, and in the third place, we may have much unemployment and much loose labour, as we have in Canada to-day, if we have not the enterprise and capital to make use of that labour. It seems to me that hope of reward is at the very foundation of all endeavour, and if you take away or discourage that hope of reward, you cannot expect enterprise to be exhibited. I rather like the thought that Providence has placed an abundance of wealth in the earth, but that it takes enterprise and labour to get it out.

I would like for a moment to deal with the problem of immigration as it pertains to industry. I most heartily agree with what has been said by practically all hon. gentlemen who have preceded me, that we must put immigrants on the land if we are to develop this country in a way that will be reflected in our national credit. I consider the development of our western prairies as probably the most important factor in our national growth. It is important from the standpoint that it will be practically impossible for the Minister of Railways (Mr. Kennedy) to meet with any degree of success the deficit on our national system unless we have a more thickly populated western territory, and I agree very much with some of my Progressive friends that industry in the East cannot flourish until we have people in the West to consume the products of those industries. I do not altogether agree with the ex-Minister of Interior, the Hon. Sir Clifford Sifton, that the reason why we lose our immigrants is because they go to a warmer climate; that they are not able to stand the rigours of our winter. I am rather inclined to agree with the remarks made by the ex-Minister of Trade and Commerce, the Hon. Sir George Foster, that what Canada is guilty of is importing muscle and exporting brain. We have in Canada a very highly developed educational system. The average Canadian wants his children to be educated, and it is only natural that a large percentage, or some percentage at least, of the students of our Canadian schools will turn to occupations more or less suitable to their individual tastes, and if they cannot find that occupation in professional, business or industrial life in this country, they will naturally migrate to the country where that opportunity can be found. I do not think you will find very much Canadian labour in the United States, but I believe the House will agree with me that one cannot but be impressed by the great number of very prominent and very clever men and women in the United States who were born in Canadian homes, and who for lack of opportunity in their chosen calling in their own country had to seek employment elsewhere.

Therefore, I think that the making of farm life more profitable and attractive will not altogether solve the problem that the Canadian farmer has to face, of keeping the people on the land and to which the hon. member for Southeast Grey (Miss Macphail) has referred. In so far as legislation can be passed making the condition of the farmer more prosperous, I am very willing to support it, because I feel that on the prosperity of the farmer depends to a very great extent the prosperity of the whole Dominion. But there is a fact which I want to point out to my Agrarian friends. The country which has the most diversified occupations, which has a highly developed industrial and business life working in conjunction with the fine agrarian life, is the country, that is the most independent. It is self-contained, able to absorb within itself practically all its sons and daughters, and for that reason I feel that to the Canadian farmer the industrial life is a very important factor from the standpoint of his home, and I would point out that not many hon. gentlemen in this House, in my opinion, are more than one or two generations at least removed from farm life.

Much has been sald in the House as to the problems of the producer in the prairie provinces. The hon. member for Last Mountain (Mr. Johnston) has referred to the one great need, the need of a better market. He says that better markets are essential if farming is to be successful. Is not that also the very need of eastern industry—a better market? We have heard a great deal about the deplorable condition of the western farmer, and I know that it is practically all true, and that half has not been said. We can use the same language practically in describing the position of the mechanic and of industry in the East during the past winter. Their problems are indentical in the sense that a broader market is the one thing they both need. Therefore, we can attack their problem with a feeling that what we do for the one will be of benefit to the other.

There is a matter before a special committee of this House, and I do not care to discuss it for that reason, and that is the question of lower transportation costs. I agree with the hon. members for Toronto that the greatest blessing that will ever befall the western provinces in the matter of transportation is when they are able to load ocean steamers at the head of lake Superior, but so far as our agrarian friends are concerned I think that probably the solution of the problem as presented by the hon. member for Last Mountain (Mr. Johnston) would give them the greatest amount of relief. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) has given to them that degree of relief which he feels they are entitled to and he has not hesitated to ask them to share their burdens along with other parts of the Dominion in paying direct taxation on sales, on cheques, and so forth, and if broader markets are as important a factor as our agrarian friends think, they could not possibly have any one in charge of the fiscal policy of this country to whom a broad market is as much an ideal as the present Minister of Finance. So if that is their solution, I feel they are perfectly safe in leaving that matter in his hands.

In closing, I only want to repeat my remarks on rising, that Canada is an extremely difficult country to govern, and so far as her fiscal policy is concerned, no matter whether it be a Conservative, Liberal or Progressive government that is in power, it will have to formulate a policy which will be expedient unto the day. It will have to raise the revenue by direct and indirect taxation, and it behooves the individual members of this House, no matter what their particular calling or geographical location may be, to expect something, and to expect to concede something. I think there has been a very fine spirit shown by the majority of the members of this House in dealing with the fiscal policy, and I want to congratulate the minister not only on his budget but on having such a considerate House behind him as will give him a fair chance to finance this Dominion in these trying times.

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (North Toronto): Mr. Speaker, judging by the attendance in the Chamber it seems to me that the races at Connaught Park are proving a greater attraction than the budget debate and yet there is somewhat of a resemblance between the two; like the budget the races take all the money that one has, leaving scarcely sufficient to buy cigarettes and soft drinks.

The tariff should not be a political question at all in my opinion. I agree with my hon. friend from Fort William and Rainy River (Mr. Manion) that an authority should be set up that could act in an advisory capacity to the government in relation to this particular problem. The tariff should not be made a political football by one party or the other. It is not a political question; it is a business question, and a great economic question; it is a great national and patriotic question that concerns the welfare and the comfort of every man, woman and child in the community. As to my attitude on this question I have no apologies to make. I am a Tory, a Tory of the old school. I am proud of being a Tory because, after all is said and done, a Tory is a man of his word. A Tory is a protectionist, but all protectionists are not Tories. To-day political names do not mean what they meant twenty-five years ago. They called Sir Adam Beck and the late Sir James Whitney Tories in the province of Ontario, yet they were two of the greatest radicals the province ever produced; they are two men who did more for the province than any other men that I know of. I see some hon. members opposite me that probably would not like to be called Tories; but I brand a number of them as the biggest Tories that have ever been seen in this country. My hon. friends may not agree with me, but everybody is entitled to his opinion and I am giving mine; in expressing that opinion I speak for no one but myself.

I repeat that I am proud of the Tory party. They have always been consistent protectionists from the days of Sir John Macdonald down. Every Conservative government we have had since then has been protectionist; it has preached the same gospel down in the maritime provinces as in the West. In the late election the then leader of the government, the Right Hon. Arthur Meighen, preached the same gospel in Prince Edward Island that he did in Nova Scotia, that he did in Ontario and Quebec, and that he did in the western provinces. That gospel was the gospel of protection—moderate protection, adequate protection for the industries of this country. After all it was not any political party that made Canada a nation. The people themselves had something to do with making this Dominion a nation as well as the governments, but in my opinion it was the National Policy that made this country the nation it is to-day. You may criticise the National Policy as you like, you may criticise the principle of protection, but we never had any-anything else but protection in this country so far as I know. I have placed the tariffs of the respective governments in Canada in parallel columns and compared them; and I doubt whether anybody could call the tariff that has been in operation from 1896 down until to-day anything but a protective tariff. I think that any economic writer would certainly consider that the tariffs for which my hon. friend the Minister of Finance is responsible were protective.

I was very much surprised to hear the remarks of some of the Progressives here to-night, as well as the remarks of some of the Government supporters. If there are two counties in the province of Ontario that owe something to protection they are the two counties of Huron and Grey. Eighty-five per cent of the crops produced in the county of Grey have a home market in the near cities and towns—at the highest price that can be got in open competition in the world to-day. That home market is a steady market. It is to be found in the cities and towns that surround both the two very fine agricultural counties that I have named. I have been in some election campaigns in those counties and I do not think the farmers there believe in free trade. If it were not for protection, in view of the hostile tariff in the United States these farmers would be one hundred per cent worse off than they are to-day, and I believe that remark applies to eastern Canada generally.

The late Hon. J. Israel Tarte once said—that platforms were made to get in on but not to stand on. We have also heard to-day a lot about political nomenclature. Hon. members to my left call themselves Progressives. I do not know who gave them the right to use that title; probably they adopted the name themselves. The fact that they call themselves progressive does not make them Progressives. The fact that I call myself a millionaire does not make me a millionaire. I have been sitting here for some weeks and I have yet to learn of one progressive measure which hon. members to my left have brought forward, by resolution or otherwise, to remedy the economic problems of this country or to improve the condition of the people of Canada.

Why do these hon. gentlemen not seek to carry out here the platform upon which they went to the country—the United Farmers' platform? When the amendment at present before the House has been disposed of, let my hon. friends the Progressives move another amendment, or take other steps, to give effect to the planks laid down in their platform. Liberal members should also follow that course. But no, the Liberal party go back on their policy of free trade as laid down in the platform of 1919. I heard the present leader of the Government preach this doctrine in the province of Ontario; but it would appear that he enunciated a different doctrine in every county that he went to. And the hon. member from Brantford (Mr. Raymond) who spoke this afternoon, during the election, preached high protection, and added protection, for the industries of this country especially those in his own city.

The industries there were built up under protection; and what is true of Brantford, is equally true of Toronto, Hamilton, Montreal and all our other large cities—they have been built up by the National Policy. Take the city of Toronto which I represent. In 1878 soup kitchens had to be established there to meet the wants of the large number of men who were out of employment. Vacant houses and stores were many; and there were evidences of distress on every hand. But the policy of protection was adopted and it stimulated the growth of our city in many ways. The trade and commerce of Toronto greatly increased; the population doubled almost every ten years; the receipts from customs, post office, to say nothing of the bank clearings grew prodigiously, and Toronto is only one of the many cities of Canada that has made tremendous strides as the result of protection.

Now, geography has taught the people of Canada a lesson in more ways than one. It has taught them not to leave themselves at the mercy of a foreign country in regard to their fiscal affairs, especially when that country is one of the most wealthy, powerful, prosperous and ambitious in the world. I refer to the United States. Every country in the world including the United States is increasing its tariff. Not only the various countries in Europe and the United States but Australia, New Zealand, and the countries of South America are all increasing their protective tariffs. Is it to be argued that these countries are all wrong and that the Progressives of Canada are all right? I say no. I maintain that as a result of the Great War more protection will be required to meet the changing conditions that arise as the years go by.

I once heard Sir Richard Cartwright and Sir Oliver Mowat say that if the Liberals were returned to office in 1896 they would remove the last vestige of protection, but they did not do so. Examine the sixteen budgets of the present Finance Minister and what do we find? We find that each and every one is protection. What have we before the House to-night in this budget in the various resolutions? It is all protection. The hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) said he would reduce the tariff. He took approximately from the tariff $1,000,000, and then increased the sales tax from $60,000,000 to $90,000,000. It will run up to $95,000,000 before they are through and I venture to predict it will go over a hundred million by the end of the fiscal year.

There will be thirty or forty million dollars added to the sales tax which the consumers of Canada will have to pay. The poor man, the middle man and the rich man will have to pay these taxes. The budget presented to us does not reduce but increases the taxes to the consumer.

Speaking about the group system of government the hon. member for Southeast Grey (Miss Macphail) spoke the other night in Montreal to the Women's Club of Notre Dame de Grace, and the report of her speech in the Ottawa Evening Journal of May 21st reads:

> She declared that the farmers had been forced by combinations of other interests to get together to protect their own requirements, and she remarked that if any of the Progressives in Parliament wished to say they were not there in the special interests of the farmers, she wondered what they were there for at all. The farmers had been driven to concrete political effort, and she hoped the movement would continue.

Miss Macphail spoke strongly in favor of a general reduction in the tariff, especially as it would assist farmers in buying what they needed. She further criticized what she described as a combination of the transportation and banking interests with the Canadian Manufacturers' Association, with a view to securing all the protection and benefits they needed.

Well, why do not the Progressives go after these big interests, then? If there is such a combine and such restraint of trade, why do they not break these combines up instead of talk? The farmers are highly organized and it is about time also the consumers and the town and city man got organized to protect his interests and not be made the target for all kinds of taxation. The producer is highly organized; and it is about time for the consumer to do likewise.

You have here the big interests. Why do the Progressives not bring some measure before the House to protect the consumers and go after these big interests and the combines if they exist as they say? They are a group organized in the farmers' interests, but they are not doing anything. Who pays most of the taxes? The bulk of the new taxes have now been put on the city and town man, and the town people and consumers are soaked all the time. The small wage earners are especially hit by the tariff. The man with a small income has to pay a municipal income tax and an income tax to this Government. I contend the federal authorities and the municipal authorities should get together and co-ordinate that income tax, so that the small man and the middle man would not have to pay double income taxes as they are doing to-day. They will be driven to the wall, if the present condition continues.

This remark applies to other forms of taxation such as those on cigarettes and tobacco. Eight years ago you could buy a package of Players cigarettes, which the soldiers smoke largely, for 10 cents a dozen. When the war came on the price was raised to 15 cents. Then the price was 17½ cents, and now the price is 10 for 22 cents. So that they are going to make the smoking of cigarettes a luxury. It is not a luxury, but a modern necessity for the soldiers, the working classes and everybody else, and should not be taxed in this way. It is double the tax imposed in Great Britain. I think the tax in Canada is $10.50 a thousand. In the United States it is $3, and in England $5.20 per thousand. That is altogether too much. These other countries have larger war debts than Canada. It was said by the medical officers in the war that cigarettes were a necessity, and it was so held by the army surgeons. The placing of a tax on cigarettes and soft drinks is going to cause more unrest among the working classes. We should do something to put it down, and, in that way, we would perhaps prevent unrest. We should not tax articles which are more or less of a necessity, and not a luxury. If they are a luxury, they are the only luxury the poorer classes enjoy to-day, about the only thing left to them, and they are taxed heavily—too heavily for them already. You will kill the consumption of cigarettes.

In view of the Fordney bill I do not see what the farmer is going to do. He is shut out of the United States, but he has a home market, the best market I know of, which will take care of 80 to 85 per cent of his crop—in the East. If the Government can solve the railway problem, and bring the railway rates down, a great step will have been taken. Mr. E. W. Beatty, K.C., was here a few days ago and was very polite, addressed everybody from Mr. Speaker and the members to the pages as "Sir." He is pretty smooth and is well liked by every one. The Canadian Pacific Railway boasts of half a million active and inactive surplus. The Canadian Pacific Railway Company should be told to carry out the Crowsnest pass agreement, and if they did the farmer would be benefitted. The Canadian Pacific Railway are just stalling and bluffing and should not be allowed to break their agreements as scraps of paper. The hon. members opposite are responsible for the Crowsnest pass agreement, which has cost the people of this country from $400,000 to $500,000. This House should insist on finding out who is the boss in this country. Is it this Parliament, or is it the Canadian Pacific Railway with headquarters in Montreal? I think the Government should stand by the Crowsnest pass agreeement and notify Mr. Beatty that it must be carried out to the letter and at once. If this House passes legislation to solve transportation questions, lessen freight and passenger rates, and get a live and up-to-date railway commission properly regulating railways in this country, I think it will be accomplishing more to relieve the farmer out West than could be accomplished in any other way.

I am opposed to the principle of opening up trade with Germany. It is too soon after the war. As the hon. member from Fort William (Mr. Manion) said, the budget means free trade with Germany. In many cities and towns in this country the returned soldiers and their wives have started little toy and smallware stores and factories. They have opened up, without much capital or money, and have built up a trade in a small way in toys, small wares and fancy goods. Will Parliament take away from them the little protection they now have, simply for the benefit of Germany? I think trade should follow the flag and we should deal with our allies and only with those countries that were loyal to the Allies during the war, for a few years at least. It is too bad that we should take away from the small dealers, who are principally the returned soldiers, the small protection which they have in the sale of their toys.

In looking over the proposed resolutions, I am surprised to find that there is no mention of the trusts, combines and the war profiteers at all, but there is mention of the small man. I asked the question as to how many combines had been proceeded against in this country. We heard the Minister of Labour say what he was going to do to fight the combines and lower the cost of living if he was returned to power but he has done nothing. Many of these combines and companies are interlocked and do not pay much in taxes. We had an illustration of that in the case of a jobbing concern in Toronto, who made a return for a five thousand dollar income, and paid the business tax on $5,000, but they charged up about $280,000 in bonuses, and thus escaped a great deal of their federal taxes on a technicality. Then we have the war profiteeers and we have some corporations which, by means of technicalities in the law are able to evade the tax.

I should like the Finance Minister to look into the system of taxation by the government of the province of Ontario. A lot of revenue has been taken from this Government by acts which are ultra vires of the province. Take the Wartime Amusement Act which was passed. Under section 91 of the British North America Act militia and defence is a matter for the Parliament of Canada, but the Ontario legislature in my opinion illegally collect a wartime amusement tax—illegally tax both the municipalities and the individual. I contend their action is illegal and I hope the minister will look into some of these matters. The province of Ontario has a very extravagant and spendthrift government which receives a federal subsidy to maintain provincial institutions and spends the money otherwise, making up the deficiencies by innumerable and questionable forms of direct taxation more or less illegal. That government is imposing additional taxes on the working classes of Ontario.

There are many other sources of revenue of which I might speak, and I want to refer briefly to-night to this additional tax on cheques. Let me refer to a letter written to the Minister of Finance by the commissioner of finance of the city of Toronto, acting for Toronto and other municipalities. In this letter he goes on to refer to the great loss that this tax is going to impose upon the city and municipality, including the board of education and other similar boards. During the last two weeks, they have taken in $15,000,000 worth of taxes, and the bank opens at 7.30 a.m. to take in the money which continues to come in all day. They will, on this $15,000,000, have to pay twice under this tax; they will have to pay when they deposit the money in one bank, an amount of $6,000; and if they transfer this money to other branches, for the school board, the hydro board, and the library board, they will have to pay an additional tax on the aliquot part of the cheques to the sub-boards, thereby paying a double tax. This commissioner of finance is acting as well for municipalities out West, because he has telegrams from them asking him to act for them. He gives the cost of education in Toronto this year as $8,000,000, and it will be his duty to pay this amount over to the board of education. This will call for stamps to the extent of $3,200, and the sub-board will have to pay an additional tax of $3,200. He refers also to $6,000,000 worth of sterling and New York exchange which was purchased in 1921, and he says:

> You will appreciate the fact in making such large purchases, considerable transferring of bank balances was necessary. Had your proposed stamp tax been in force, we would in many cases have had to pay the charge three times. As I understand it, we would have to pay the charge at least twice, that is for stamps on the bill of exchange and stamps on the cheque issued to pay for the bill of exchange.

Another illustration is in connection with $10,000,000 worth of bonds sold for the betterments of the Toronto Railway Company. The brokers in bidding for those bonds, could take into consideration the fact that they would have to pay this additional tax on the cheques. This figures out at one-twenty-fifth of one per cent which will undoubtedly be deducted from the amount to be paid to the city; so that the city and municipality will have to pay the charges on this loan. On that, they would have to pay three-twenty-fifths of one per cent, or $12,000. Other municipalities are affected to a lesser extent; but this tax is going to cause a great deal of trouble in trade and commerce. Collections are going to be hard to get. Any mercantile agency will tell the minister that this tax is going to make collections more difficult, and collections are bad enough now, especially for the retail man. I do not think this tax is in the interest of trade and commerce. It is not supported by any business concern. The business man is soaked in many ways for taxes, by this Parliament, by the provincial legislature, and by the municipalities, and he cannot stand this much longer. I do not know who advised this cheque tax proposition; I do not know why we should copy every piece of legislation passed by the United States in order to raise taxation, because our circumstances are different. This additional stamp tax is being opposed by municipalities, by business men, by boards of trade, and by bond dealers and brokers, who advise that it is going to tie things up more or less and to make business much more difficult. Dear knows, there are enough stumbling blocks in the way of trade and commerce and business men now without our adding any more to them.

In my opinion, posterity ought to pay some of these war bills and taxes, and altogether too much effort is made to make the men of to-day pay them. This generation has suffered in flesh and blood for the amount of debt added by this war, and we should not adopt a policy of pay as you go, and make them pay now for the war also. Posterity should be called upon to pay some of the national war debt.

The farmers of this country are no more entitled to a wheat board than the people of the cities and towns are entitled to a coal board, or a rent board, or a food board, or an ice board, and so all the way along. It is contended that the wheat board is necessary, probably because agriculture is a basic industry. There may be some argument in that; but there is an argument on the other side, and I contend that all these commodities should be left as far as possible to supply and demand. I believe a wheat board will not do very much good, as the farmers may find out later on. If the producer is to have a board to protect him why should not the consumer also have a board? Better leave things alone.

During the election we heard a great deal from the Minister of Labour (Mr Murdock) about the high cost of living What does the Government propose to do for the working classes of this country along that line? On several occasions, I have asked the Minister of Labour in regard to that; but he has not been able to tell me anything yet, nowithstanding the fact that he has a large department and a large staff. During the election, he went through many Ontario constituencies denouncing the late government as being the representative of the special interests and as having done nothing to lower the high cost of living. What is he doing to prosecute the special interests and combines in this country? How many prosecutions has he started? I asked him the question the other day, and there has not been one prosecution. Let him be up and doing to bring down the cost of living.

In conclusion, I want to refer to three or four other matters, which I think should be mentioned in this debate, because this is the only opportunity we have of doing so under the rules of the House. If there ever was in this country an act that needed overhauling, it is the much heralded Bank Act. Some newspapers are beginning to wonder whether there is to be one law for the rich and another for the poor in this country. I have read, in some very reputable newspapers, in Canada, articles referring to some people who stole $8,000 out of a bank, and some other poor fellow who took $1.25 out of a postal envelope. The people who stole $8,000 got a life sentence because they robbed the bank with violence; the poor postman, on a small salary without a bonus, who took $1.25 out of an envelope, was sent down. This matter of the Merchants Bank should not be left to any superior or high court judge of the province of Quebec; or the Appellate division either; there should be an independent enquiry by the High Court of Parliament and no whitewash. We should find out whether we have a Bank Act, whether it is a mere scrap of paper or not, and whether the monthly returns made by the bank to the minister are scraps of paper or not. I believe the losses will run to twelve or thirteen million dollars before they get through. What protection has the investor, the stockholder? I know one man in my city who has started to sell out every dollar's worth of stock he has in some small banks. When I asked him the reason, he said that he was very doubtful if, in some of the smaller banks, the shareholders have the protection which they should have. This Parliament should be big enough to go into the whole question of the Merchants Bank. The banks have been allowed to increase their note circulation; they have been given many special privileges, and a thorough enquiry should be made into the whole matter. The House and the country expect us to do our duty in this matter. Where do the Progressives stand upon it?

The other night, I referred to judges serving on political commissions, and I have had no opportunity of bringing this matter up before. I hope something will be done to stop this practice, because the public are utterly disgusted with the way in which some judges of the High Court in Ontario were allowed to leave their judicial duties for months in order to serve on these political commissions. I hope the Government will see to it that this practice is abolished in the country, so that the public will have, for the judiciary, the respect which they have had in the past.

I am sorry that something is not being done by this Parliament in regard to prison reform. I see in this morning's paper, that there are 879 people in Kingston penitentiary; that the authorities have had to have double cells; that the place is crowded, and that they have no more accommodation. As I said in this House the other night, if there was one thing we learned in the war, it was from the Red Cross. The Red Cross restored to society about 79 per cent of those who were wounded in the war, and that was a great work. We should try to do something in this country to restore to good society that class of the people which I have mentioned. In the United States and other countries rapid headway has been made in this regard. Prison reform is absolutely necessary. It has been too long delayed in Canada and conditions in these places are deplorable. There is practically no inspection of them. The provincial reformatories are inspected by the grand jury, but there is no inspection of these prisons except by officials.

The minister (Sir Lomer Gouin) said the other day in answer to a question that the matter is being looked into, and I trust that proper steps will be taken to remedy the present state of affairs. There are about 120 children between the ages of 16 and 17 in these institutions, and these are not circumstances under which the rising generation should be brought up. I referred the other day to the fact that a child had broken into one of the Canadian Pacific Railway box cars and stolen some fruit and is now in one of these institutions. I fancy that if the Grand Jury had an opportunity of going through some of these federal institutions I have named we should have some real reform. The people in charge of them know when the inspectors are due and the result is that there is practically no real inspection at all. Where does the public come in, anyhow? Are they not entitled to know what is going on in these places? And are we going to stand still while the same condition of things that existed 25 years ago is perpetuated? A royal commission was appointed a year ago and made certain recommendations, and I think that it would be a work not only of good government to check this economic waste but also one of religion if the Government would take such action as would restore the confidence of the people in this branch of the public service and stop this economic waste in our population.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: The hon. member said a little while ago that the Farmers were not entitled to the Wheat Board. Why, then, did his party give them the Wheat Board in 1919 when the prices were going up?

Mr. CHURCH: Probably the former ministers can tell you that better than I can.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. CHURCH: I do not believe in such a board. It would take me too long to go into an explanation of that to-night, and I know that the hon. member would like to go to the races to-morrow. Now, I was very much surprised to hear the remarks of the hon. member for Sherbrooke (Mr. McCrea) in regard to the Civil Service. I have the greatest respect for the Civil Service. We have, I believe, on the whole a highly courteous and capable body of employees. From deputy ministers right down they are all highly efficient, and very many of the civil servants receive a small salary that is inadequate to meet the cost of living. I doubt whether some of the better paid civil servants can meet expenses. I say that we have a high type of civil servants in this country and they are entitled to respect. From what I have seen of the Civil Service since coming to Ottawa I have come to the conclusion that the civil servants attend to their duties thoroughly, and I know that they are polite and courteous. We have a very efficient public service and I hope that the Government will now come across with the bonus that is so badly needed. After all is said and done, I do not believe that the cost of living has declined very much for the small wage earner, for the two main items in the household budget, coal and rent, are still very high. Soft coal is produced at $1 a ton, and hard coal at about $5, at the Pennsylvania and Virginia mines, and by the time transportation is paid the latter costs over $15 a ton. Some people are of the opinion that it will be still higher this winter. The same thing applies to rent, which in Ottawa is a considerable item. I was reading recently that in Montreal, owing to the increase in rents, very many people were obliged to move on May 1st who did not know where to get houses within their means. I do not think the time has yet come when the Government should cut out the small bonus which the civil servants have been receiving. They earn it and are entitled to it, especially the men of the customs and post office services.

I was greatly surprised to learn of the attitude of the Government in regard to the St. Lawrence deep waterway. I hope that the reply they have made to the United States government is not definite and final. This is a big question, it should be discussed in a big way, and I hope that in the recess the Government will again take the matter up, because sooner or later the work will have to be done. There has been a lot of loose talk about the cost of this undertaking by people who do not know anything about the subject. The only basis upon which we can go in regard to the cost is the estimates of $250,000,000 made by the International Joint Commission, which made a thorough investigation into the question from the engineering, financial, business, water power, and traffic standpoints, and from all these various angles they found the project feasible and recommended it. An adverse opinion has been expressed by a senator and by an engineer of Three Rivers who never made a survey of the St. Lawrence. But the report of the International Joint Commission, which is backed up by the Hydro Electric Commission of Ontario, is that sooner or later the work will have to be gone on with. It is true that at the present moment our financial condition is rather straightened, but in two or three years the work ought to be undertaken; when prices will have reduced and in the interval additional surveys should be made. In answer to one Progressive member who spoke the other day I would say that the work would amply pay for itself and cost the country hardly a cent. For these various reasons, Mr. Speaker, I shall support the amendment that has been moved, and which I know commends itself to the wisdom and judgment of the country.

Mr. H. E. LAVIGUEUR (Quebec County): I endorse all that has been said by my hon. friends on this side of the House complimentary of the hon. the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) in regard to the admirable budget that he has submitted to the House. I am sure that the budget this year will meet with the approval of the great majority of the people. The minister had a hard task before him in preparing it, and he has certainly performed it well. When the Liberal party took over the reins of administration on December 6th last they realized the enormity of the burden they were assuming. The situation that faced them was no doubt largely due to the war; but at the same time it was due in a great measure to the bad administration of the late government. Since 1911 there has been great extravagance, and millions of dollars have been wasted in all parts of the country on all kinds of public works and war contracts. The debt of the country, which was $350,000,000 in 1911, is to-day $2,500,000,000, and the country is faced with an enormous deficit in connection with the National Railways. Although hundreds of millions of dollars have been expended since the Conservative party came into power in 1911, the province of Quebec, and especially the city of Quebec, to which I belong, has been refused the most urgent public works. The government was always very free with its promises, but when we called on the late Prime Minister the answer we invariably received was: There is no money available for public works. But there was always money to spare for public works in the other provinces.

The citizens of the city of Quebec and district have always borne their share of the burden of taxation, and they are quite willing to shoulder their part of our national obligations to-day, but they deserve better treatment than they have received since 1911. I referred a few minutes ago to our railway deficits having very seriously added to our financial burden. I have not objected to the decision of the present Government to give public ownership and operation of our National Railways a fair trial, but I wish to state here that I think that trial should be of short duration, because, speaking for myself and for a great many citizens of our province, I must say that we have no confidence in public ownership and operation. And I think that any business man after investigating the administration of our National Railways in the province of Quebec, and especially in the city of Quebec, would share our opinion.

Before 1911 plans were agreed upon for the construction of a large station on Champlain Market in Quebec city to accommodate the business of the Transcontinental Railway, the city having entered into an agreement with the late government to transfer property worth over $2,000,000 on the specific condition that the government would spend $2,000,000 on a new railway station, and also provide a grain elevator and other public works. But after the election of 1911 everything was cancelled, and instead of building a $2,000,000 station the government erected on the Champlain Market site a building at a cost of about $30,000 which is a disgrace to those responsible for its erection and a disappointment to the city. The city never consented to the cancellation. The government also made an arrangement with the Canadian Pacific Railway Company for the joint use of the latter company's station at a very heavy rental. So now we have our Canadian National Railway using that station with its competitor,—the Canadian Pacific Railway ticket office on one side, and the Canadian National ticket office on the other side of the building.

But what prospect has our Canadian National Railway of securing a fair share of passenger traffic in competition with the Canadian Pacific Railway, when its competitor's train takes only five hours on the run to Montreal against six or seven hours required by its own trains to reach the same point. It may be asked why there is that great disparity in time between the two routes. It is simply because of the change made by the government in the plans which were prepared by the late hon. Mr. Parent, who was the first chairman of the Transcontinental Railway Commission, who was for many years mayor of the city of Quebec and prime minister of his province—a man who knew exactly the requirements of the city and district of Quebec.

The contract that had been given for the construction of the Champlain Market station was cancelled and arrangements were made instead with the Canadian Pacific Railway. No citizen of Quebec can understand why the National railways should have chosen this way of coming into the city from the bridge. It is only four and a half miles from the bridge to the Champlain Market station, but instead of that the trains are going around eleven or twelve miles to get into the city. Furthermore, at the Canadian Pacific Railway station there is just a few thousand feet of yardage and the trains block the busiest street in the city of Quebec. No such difficulty would have arisen if the Champlain Market plans had been adhered to, for they would have given first-class accommodation and there would have been no congestion as there is now. The citizens of Quebec, the Board of Trade, and other public bodies in the city have called the attention of the Government and of the railway officials to this matter, but our demands were always met with the answer that there was no money on account of the war.

Plans were made for the construction of repair and construction shops for the railways to be erected in the city of Quebec. The most important shop in the East was to be built in Quebec city. It is only after three years of repeated endeavours that the citizens of Quebec have succeeded in getting these shops erected. In the meantime cars that should have been repaired in Quebec city have been hauled five or six or eight hundred miles, and sometimes as far as Winnipeg to be repaired. The St. Malo shops have been built at Quebec, but the main building which the government agreed to build for the construction of engines and cars has never been built. The shops that are there now have cost this country $2,000,000, and one would think after spending so much on them, these shops would be utilized. To-day there are employed in the St. Malo shops three or four hundred persons, where there should be three or four thousand, and that was the promise given. In the district of Quebec there are now five or six hundred disabled cars waiting to be repaired, and these cars were lying there idle when the merchants and shippers were urging the Railway Commission to provide them with cars for the shipment of their goods, and they could not get a car. We have the proper equipment for repairing these cars at Quebec, but the cars lie there idle and no repairs are made.

Another very important enterprise was started by the government before 1911, and that was the St. Charles river improvements in Quebec. The government had proceeded with these works a certain way and had expended, if the figures given by the ex-Minister of Public Works are correct, over $1,600,000. During the war that work was stopped, and although the citizens of Quebec have repeatedly urged that it be continued, and have pointed out that the work already done will be completely wasted if it is not carried to completion, the answer has always been that there was no money available. That is the situation to-day generally in the city and district of Quebec with regard to any requests that are made. We have a great many urgent demands for public works and necessary improvements, and the maintenance of different works throughout the district of Quebec, but we are told there is no money available at the present time for public works.

I wish to put on record here a demand I have made of the hon. Minister of Public Works. I hope that the Minister of Public Works will see fit to put a reasonable amount in the Supplementary Estimates to provide for the expropriation of a wharf property at Ste. Petronille. There is another demand which I have made of the hon. Minister of Public Works for repairs to a wharf at St. Gregoire de Montmorency which was destroyed by the high tides in 1918. I hope the minister will provide an amount for this work in the Supplementary Estimates. There are lots of other improvements and works that are very necessary, but of which the city and district of Quebec is now being deprived. For many years now the citizens of Quebec have not enjoyed the favours of the government of the day, and it seems harder at this time that these works should not be gone on with. We are paying our share of the taxes and it is always hard for a citizen to pay taxes. Those in affluent circumstances find no difficulty in paying the taxation that is levied; it is far different with people of the lower classes. It is gratifying to the citizens of Canada to realize that the present Government is taking adequate steps to meet the existing situation and to improve the conditions with which we are faced. One of the most effective means of doing that is by the exercise of economy. Already we have seen a great cutting down of expenditure in connection with the military and naval departments. The two ministers responsible for these reductions deserve well of the people for their courageous action. I hope that similar steps will be taken in other public departments so that ere long the public expenditure will be down to something like normal figures. From the budget speech of the Minister of Finance we have had the opportunity of learning the true situation of the country to-day. Every hon. member, and every citizen that desired enlightenment in this respect has had his wishes gratified. Measures of a practical nature will be adopted to meet the obligations of the country. Although from some of the budget proposals a diminution of revenue may result, on the other hand from other sources the receipts will be augmented. So that we have every reason to be satisfied that the affairs of the country are in such competent hands as they are to-day.

Mr. W. J. WARD (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, I listened with a great deal of interest, some surprise, and considerable disappointment to the 1922 budget; but before commencing my remarks I would like to associate myself with those who have preceded me in congratulating the Minister of Finance upon his health and upon the vigour with which he introduced that budget to this House, because, I am sure it must have taken a good deal of nerve to present such a financial statement. I used to read with some pride the free trade and progressive speeches of the Finance Minister, and I had hoped that on returning to his old job as budgeteer he would implement some of those good old convictions into this year's budget. Alas, my disappointment, as I listened to him unravel that reactionary and mysterious budget! I use the term "reactionary" because I believe that any government that would introduce a fiscal policy imposing a tax upon thrift and industry and allowing the real wealth of the country to go practically scot free can only be termed reactionary. This budget represents the fiscal policy that will be applied to the commerce of Canada for the coming year. Immediately we mention the tariff we associate ourselves with taxation, and as I believe that taxation is the paramount question in the country to-day. I will therefore deal first with that phase of the budget. The budget we are now discussing is, in my judgment, the champion of high protection and of the indirect method of taxation. Personally I am opposed to the principle of protection and the indirect method of raising revenue. I believe that by the adoption of a more direct method of taxation we would at least exercise greater scrutiny as to where the public money was being spent. I believe that if we had raised all our taxes by a more direct method we would have at least seen that the late government did not spend $73,000,000 on a merchant marine that is practically tied up to-day and that is virtually worthless to Canada. I think we would have at least seen that the late government did not let a four or five million dollar contract to build a dry dock on Vancouver island in order to elect a minister of the Crown, when three months previously the last dry dock constructed on the Pacific coast went into the hands of a receiver.

Mr. LADNER: Does my hon. friend suggest that a dry dock on the Pacific coast in the neighbourhood of Vancouver and Victoria is not required as an actual business necessity? Is he founding his remarks upon facts within his own knowledge?

Mr. LAPOINTE: Perhaps one, not two.

Mr. WARD: I am founding my remarks on this; that three months previous to the letting of that contract the dry dock at Prince Rupert went into the hands of a receiver.

Mr. LADNER: That is 700 miles away.

Mr. WARD: Does the hon. member not know that the Vancouver dock was also in the hands of a receiver? I repeat that if we paid our taxes in a more direct way we would at least exercise greater scrutiny as to where the public money is being spent.

Now, let us examine for a moment, if you will, the purpose or the principle of protection. Is it not for the purpose of permitting the Canadian manufacturer to charge a higher price than he otherwise would? I am quite sure that when protection was introduced into the fiscal policy of Canada in 1878 it was not the intention of the government of that day that it should continue longer than was necessary to establish the Canadian manufacturer, so that he would be able to get on his feet, so to speak. I am sure it was not the intention that it should be carried down to this date. With the immense natural resources of this country, and with the natural opportunities that exist for manufacturing, and after forty-five years of protection, if our Canadian manufacturers are not able to compete in the markets of the world, I say, for God's sake, let them get out of the way and make room for someone else who can.

The present Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) when leader of the Opposition, had a good deal to say, on his western trip, about the "invisible government" in Canada. He had a great deal to say about how that invisible government had fastened its fangs upon the late government, and with that I think his hearers all agreed. I do not think it takes a very far-sighted man to see the hand of that invisible government upon the budget that was introduced in this House a few days ago. The Canadian manufacturer is utterly Bourbon. He never forgets and never remembers anything, and his only conception of national prosperity is the gold he brings to his own chest. I think it was the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. McQuarrie) who asked what would happen to the Canadian manufacturer if we had free trade. In reply I would say that the Canadian manufacturer has always enjoyed a very large measure of free trade upon everything he had to buy, but he has constantly refused to extend that privilege to others, and I would like to remind the committee that the Canadian manufacturers have been able to very successfully compete in the markets of the world. Of that I am very proud, but I have noticed quite frequently that the Canadian manufacturer sells to the foreigners cheaper than he sells to the Canadian people. The Canadian manufacturer contends that he must be able to purchase his raw material in a free market, in order to carry on his business successfully.

I contend, Mr. Speaker, there is no such material as raw material. We go to mother earth, and take the ore from the mine, which is the finished product of the mine. It is the raw material of the smelter, and the pig iron is the finished product. The pig iron is the raw material of the steel refiner, and the steel is the finished product. The steel is the raw material of the manufacturer and the plough is his finished product. The plough is the raw material of the farmer, and wheat is his finished product. The wheat is the raw material of the miller and the flour is the finished product. The flour is the raw material of the baker and his bread is his finished product. The bread is the raw material of the working man who goes out to perform all these duties. The only raw materials we have are the earth, the water and the air we breathe, placed here by the Almighty for the use of mankind.

I contend that the moment we extend privileges to, or subsidize, one industry we must, of necessity, take that much from another industry. The business of Canada is what we might term one great universal, commercial intricacy, of which we are one large family. In looking over the Dominion, I do not see one single industry we do not need. I am proud of them all, I am proud to be a Canadian and proud of our Canadian institutions, but I think it is time that some of our Canadian industries got off the backs of the Canadian people, and stood on their own feet. If we ever expect this Canada of ours to be the prosperous country we would all like it to be, we must extend to others the privileges we would like to enjoy ourselves. We are all in a great family here on Canadian soil, and if we ever hope to make Canada that great country that we all look forward to, we must develop on Canadian soil a moral and a prosperous people, and we cannot develop that class of citizens in the presence of a privileged class, or with a fiscal policy that permits the massing of immense wealth on the one hand and dire need on the other.

I would like to point out the effect of the fiscal policy, or this indirect system of taxation. It is a sort of camouflage or a painless-extraction way of getting money. In looking over the budget I find that, according to the figures, we will extract by this painless extraction method in the year 1922 about $110 per family in Canada, while the average farmer will pay about $220. I shall deal with it in the broader sense, so that I will take $110 as the amount which the average family in Canada will have to pay under this budget. If that $110 were all they had to pay it would not seem so bad, but the impost continues to grow and the farther it goes the bigger it gets. That $110, when it reaches the ultimate consumer, or in the final analysis in many cases, amounts to fully $200. The tariff is of a snowball nature; the further you roll it the bigger it gets.

I became somewhat curious and I thought I would like to learn the origin of this indirect method of taxation. I discovered that its origin was about the time of the Napoleonic wars. The people had been taxed so insistently through the direct method that they rebelled and refused to pay any longer, but along came some evil genius with this new idea of taxation and it worked so well that it has been carried on to the present day. However, going back to the snowball nature of this tariff, we will go across the border into the United States, or anywhere and we will purchase $100 worth of woollen goods. Those woollen goods are subject to a tariff of 35 per cent. When the goods reach the border the importer must pay the duty. I put the profit of the importer at 10 per cent, which I think reasonable.

Mr. BRISTOL: I think you are giving an illustration of woollen goods and saying if you bought them in the United States for $100 you would pay 35 per cent duty. Are you aware, as a matter of fact, that all the woollen goods that come into this country come from England?

Mr. WARD: I will accept my hon. friend's statement that goods from England are bearing a tariff of 27½ per cent under the new tariff proposals.

Mr. BRISTOL: No, 17½ per cent.

Mr. WARD: I looked this up only to-day and, according to the new schedule, I think the duty is 27½ per cent. Possibly I did not read the figures aright. I am, however, merely using woollen goods as an illustration. I do not wish to infer that we buy all our woollen goods in the United States. I only wish to make a comparison, because I have a long list of goods, many of which come from the United States or other foreign countries and which bear, on an average, a duty of 30 per cent. The list is:

Glass, 25 per cent; leather goods, 30 per cent; furniture, 30 per cent; stoves, 25 per cent; electrical goods, 27½ per cent; coffins, 25 per cent; tombstones, 35 per cent; screen doors, 30 per cent.

You cannot avoid this tax; indeed, it follows one from the cradle to the grave.

Medical goods, 30 per cent; cottons, 32½ per cent; woollens, 35 per cent; soap, laundry, 1 cent per pound; castile soap 2 cents per pound; all other soaps, 32½ per cent.

So that the average tariff is about 30 per cent. The point I wish to make is this: If we buy $100 worth of goods outside of this country, when they reach the borders of Canada, the importer must pay, say 30 per cent, which amounts to $30. He passes the goods on to the wholesaler, and I put his profit at 20 per cent, which, I think, is very reasonable. The goods have now cost $139.60. He passes those goods on the retailer, who is possibly your merchant in Ottawa, and the tariff charges which were $30 have now become $51.48. I have taken the shortest possible route. There are, however, many cases where goods that the good housewife buys every day, pass through five or six middlemen's hands, and the tariff reaches, in some cases, 100 per cent before the goods arrive at the home. This is the evil of the present system of taxation, namely, that there is no end to it, and the ultimate consumers, who, in a large measure, are the agricultural people of this country, have their backs against the wall. When the tax reaches them, it can be passed on no further. This tax is the one that we are positively opposed to, and we must consider that the average family in Canada have, in addition to their $110 of federal indirect tax, other federal taxes and municipal and provincial taxes, the total amounting to the enormous sum of $507 per capita or $2,850 per family. I would like to ask the House and the people of Canada if they think that the families in our small towns and villages and in the rural districts of this country can bear a public burden of $2,850 in addition to their own financial burdens.

It has been my privilege in the last couple of years to visit many rural homes in western Canada, and as one hon. member remarked to-night, the story has not been half told of conditions in that part of the country. No one is more desirous than I am of seeing the whole of Canada go hand in hand and the whole country developing; but if agricultural conditions remain as they are, it is impossible for Canada to prosper. Agriculture to-day in western Canada is on the brink of a precipice; and I want to ask the business men of this country what they are going to do about it. Are they going to let it go over the precipice, or are they going to bring it back and place it on a sound, satisfactory and remunerative basis? The debt of this country will never be paid, and it will be humanly impossible to meet our obligations unless agriculture is placed on a sounder and more satisfactory basis. It is from the top six inches of the tillable soil of this country that the large measure of our debts must be paid.

I have visited not one but almost thousands of homes in western Canada; I have slept in many of those homes, and I have seen where a mother has raised a family of six, eight and even as many as ten children in a little log shack. The parents have been there in many cases for twenty years or longer, they have produced tens of thousands of dollars worth of wealth; but the system of taxation does not permit them to retain enough of that wealth to put in even the commonest kind of furniture into their homes. In many of these homes the mother is still scrubbing a rough board floor, home-made furniture, and there is not even a blind on the window. When such is the case, how can we expect the boys and girls to remain on these farms or in such homes, of which we have thousands in western Canada?

In my district, that of Dauphin, which, without any boasting, is, I think, the richest municipality in Manitoba, let me take the farmers or the class in that municipality who have been there for twenty years or longer. I will not take the others, because they may have bought their farms at enhanced values and all that sort of thing, and they may have met difficulties that may be almost insurmountable. I will take the men who have been in the district for a longer time and who have secured their farms at a low figure or have homesteaded them. If you go to any of those farmers to-morrow morning and ask them to liquidate, 75 per cent of them cannot liquidate with enough to pay their debts. How much longer can this state of affairs continue?

A couple of weeks ago I made a visit into south Huron, and in driving along one line, I noticed five beautiful farms in succession, with brick houses, and nice barns, well fenced, but no one living on those farms. We counted, through that district, many farms with no one living on them. What is the reason? Out in Ottawa South where I live, a new home has been born nearly every day since I moved out there last February. I noticed, in looking up the census records, that in 1870, 83 per cent of the population was engaged in the industry of agriculture in Canada. I see to-day that about 50 per cent is engaged in agriculture, and I think, if a close analysis were made, we would find that the percentage was nearer 45. I venture the prediction that, unless the fiscal policy of this country is changed so as to place the burden of taxation more equitably upon our people, the influx from the rural parts of this country to our cities will be very much greater in the next few years than it has been in the past. I do not attribute all these troubles to the fiscal policy of this country, although I think it has a great deal to do in creating these conditions. There are many other natural and unnatural problems surrounding agriculture that make farm life almost impossible in these times. I believe, if we took the $220 a year that the average farmer pays in tariff taxes and placed that upon the natural wealth of this country, it would go a long way in relieving the apprehension that now exists.

I should like to deal for a few minutes with the railway situation. We speak about the railway problem as being the great problem of this country. It is a great problem, but I think that problem could be solved very quickly if we set about it in a proper manner. Some twenty or twenty-one years ago I spent a summer in Saskatchewan in search of a homestead, and after spending some months travelling through part of Saskatchewan, I came back to Dauphin without a homestead. You might ask why. I travelled over what represented millions of acres of good arable land, but there was none of it to be homesteaded; it was all bought up by speculators. The government of that day had a flat rate of selling land at a dollar an acre, and they sold millions of acres at that price. I know one company who bought 3,000,000 acres, in what was then called the Northwest Territories at one dollar an acre. The average selling price of raw land in that province according to statistics, is about $21 an acre, so that those land speculators have taken out of the province of Saskatchewan, and other western provinces, an unearned increment of about $21 an acre. This is what happened. The legitimate settler when he came to settle was forced to go away back, 30, 40 and 60 miles from the railway in order to get cheaper land or a homestead. They developed settlement and then demanded railways, and the railway companies, or the government, as the case might be, eventually came to their relief. But in order to do so they had to build long stretches of railway over unproductive, speculative territory which in many cases is still lying idle waiting for a higher price. Now, if the Government really wants to usher in prosperity let them be willing to give land free to all those who are willing to give time and energy to the production of wealth and give the settler an outfit to work the land at 4 per cent interest.

It is humanly impossible for a man to buy a farm to-day, and pay 7 or 8 per cent interest on the farm and 7 or 8 per cent interest on the outfit to work it. I know this to be the case, because farmers in my own district, who have been there for 30 years, find themselves bankrupt after producing tens of thousands of dollars of wealth. I do not wish to be misunderstood when I refer to these matters. I do not wish to be pessimistic. But I think the East should compromise with the West. I told my constituents before coming here that any representative coming from western Canada to this Parliament would have to bear in mind that it was necessary that he should show a spirit of compromise. I told them that so long as the seat of government was situated in Ottawa—and I hope it always will be here—we should always have to come here in that spirit. And I say so still. But I do not think that eastern Canada recognizes the conditions that exist in western Canada to-day. The hon. member for Brantford (Mr. Raymond) this afternoon complained of the assistance that this Government was giving to agriculture. Well, in the year 1920, according to our trade returns, we consumed in Canada some $600,000,000 worth of goods, three-quarters of which were manufactured within the borders of this country, the other quarter having been imported. We paid an average tariff of about 30 per cent on these goods. Now, the tariff is there for a purpose, and our experience shows that the Canadian manufacturers simply raise the selling price of their articles to the amount of the tariff. If that be true and we imported only one quarter of the goods consumed that year, on which the Canadian government collected $156,000,000 revenue, then we paid into the pockets of the Canadian manufacturers $450,000,000. And yet an hon. member can get up in this House and criticise the Government for spending $6,000,000 on agriculture, which furnishes from 45 to 65 per cent of the exports of this country. After all we must admit that the only source of wealth is in our exports, whether they be agricultural or manufactured products.

Mr. BRISTOL: What is the hon. member's view as to gold, silver and iron mines? Are they sources of wealth?

Mr. WARD: Absolutely. Professor Ely, in his book on taxation in the states of the American Union, made a statement in regard to this question. He is one of the recognized authorities on this subject in the United States, and he says that taxes might be so levied by a skilful hand as to give free scope to every opportunity and promote industry to the highest degree. He referred to this as the taxation of natural resources. On the other hand, he says, taxes may be so levied by ignoramuses as to place a dead weight about the neck of the community. These are his words, not mine. Not long ago a piece of property, a waterfront, was sold at Fort William for $1,600,000. Now, to whom did that $1,600,000 really belong? Did it belong to some land speculator that happened to buy a piece of land up the river, and then sit tight until the people built railroads, and the grain producers caused elevators to be built, when he found the opportunity propitious for the sale of this land?

The national debt of the country is enormous, but it is a mere bagatelle compared to the vicious and inefficient system of taxation that has governed this country for the last thirty or forty years and which has permitted speculators to carry away, in the form of unearned increment, billions of dollars from this country. We are told by economists that there are over 200,000,000 acres of land held by the speculators between the Great Lakes and the Rocky mountains. Well, let us get some of the revenue that we ought to derive from these lands instead of taxing the children of the country. It is little short of a crime that in a country where we have six or seven months of winter we should tax the food and clothing of the poor people. While the great natural wealth of this country is passed up. Every time a babe is born the first thing the mother gets is a slap in the face to the extent of 30 per cent when she goes to buy woollen goods to wrap that infant in. And the tariff follows us all the way to the grave. Professor Drummond makes this observation that in our big cities to-day we find that the families are all becoming triangles, pa ma and Mabel; the only place where we come across the old fashioned family is in the little town, and village or the rural district.

Mr. HANSON: Is that due to the tariff?

Mr. WARD: I say that we are simply penalizing every mother who brings forth a child, and it is a crime that the government of a country like this should have to resort to these forms of taxation, when the land which is affording the speculators such opportunities to make money could be so easily taxed. Of all the countries that went into the war, Canada had the best opportunity to emerge without a debt. There was no other country that participated in the war that had the natural resources that we had. And what did Canada do? She paid on her war account, by direct taxation while the war was on, only 6 per cent, while Great Britain, with her resources all gone years ago, was able to pay 86 per cent, and the United States 82 per cent.

Mr. STEVENS: Where did the hon. member get the 6 per cent? Is he aware that Canada paid, out of revenue, war expenditures to the extent of $553,000,000? That is certainly more than 6 per cent of the total expenditure for war purposes.

Mr. WARD: I was referring to direct taxation. All that Canada raised by direct taxation was 6 per cent.

Mr. STEVENS: There is no record that the hon. member can quote to substantiate that statement. I have not the exact figures before me but they are certainly very much in excess of the figure my hon. friend has given. He is utterly unable to quote anything to substantiate his statement.

Mr. WARD: I have my figures from the Grain Growers' Guide.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. WARD: Hon. gentlemen may smile, but the Grain Growers' Guide is a reputable journal, and if it or any other journal made a false statement hon. members to my right would be the first to call them to order.

Mr. STEVENS: I do not undertake to call them to order, but I have pointed out on frequent occasions the absolute fallacy of their statements and have given the official figures to prove it. Unfortunately I have not those figures by me to-night.

Mr. WARD: I do not wish to pursue that point with the hon. member. However I should like to answer another statement that the hon. member for Brantford made this afternoon in dealing with the binder twine situation. I do not know whether he deliberately attempted to mislead the House, but he certainly left a wrong impression. He gave as the reason the binder twine industry was in its present unsatisfactory condition was because binder twine was on the free list. That is not the reason at all, and I am sure the hon. member must surely know the facts. Some years ago the International Harvester Company cornered practically all the land in Yucatan where sisal is grown, and they still retain control. Therefore it does not make any difference whether we have one or twenty binder twine factories in Canada the price of the product would go up.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I would again appeal to this House to give favourable consideration to the industry upon which all our other industries must depend. I look upon our industries as one great tree, with agriculture representing the roots, and it seems to me that any fiscal policy based on protection endeavours to develop the branches without taking care of the roots. If we develop our basic industries there is no question about the position of our manufactures. In my judgment we need more manufactures in Canada to-day. If we have freer trade we shall have an expansion of all our industries. I am not a free trader in the sense that some hon. members have branded the Progressive party. I do not believe we should move one whit faster than it is possible for the manufacturer to adjust himself to changing conditions, but I do say that in view of the intricacies of our business we will never develop that sound economic stability so essential to our national progress unless our manufacturers are willing to compromise with our agriculturalists.

On motion of Mr. Bristol the debate was adjourned.

On the motion of Mr. Mackenzie King the House adjourned at 10.55 p.m.

Friday, June 2, 1922.

The House met at three o'clock.

AGRICULTURE AND COLONIZATION

STANDARDIZATION OF PARTS OF AGRICULTURAL MACHINERY

Mr. W. F. KAY (Missisquoi) moved:

That the proceedings of the Select Standing Committee on Agriculture and Colonization had last session on the question of "Standardization of parts of Agricultural Machinery" be referred to the Select Standing Committee on Agriculture and Colonization.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. KAY with the consent of the House, moved, that the House return to the Order of Motions.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The hon. member should state the object he has in view in returning to the Order of Motions.

Mr. KAY: I desire to move a resolution, and I think that if I read it the object will be clearly apparent. I move, seconded by Mr. Sinclair:

That a message be sent to the Senate requesting that their honours will give leave to the Hon. Archibald B. McCoig, one of their members, to attend and give evidence before the Select Standing Committee on Agriculture and Colonization.

Motion agreed to.

COAL FROM JAPAN

CANADIAN GOVERNMENT MERCHANT MARINE ON THE PACIFIC

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, may I take advantage of this moment to correct a false impression that seems to exist in regard to the use of Japanese coal by the Canadian Government Merchant Marine on the Pacific. The impression seems to have got abroad, that the Government Merchant Marine intend to use Japanese coal, or are bringing Japanese coal to this country. The matter came up some time ago in connection with a question asked by an hon. member, and a reply was given at the time that the coal that came from Japan was merely in the nature of ballast; it was cheaper to the company at the time to purchase coal for that purpose than to purchase ballast in some other form. I understand that recently the matter has come up again, and some fear is expressed on the part of certain hon. members from the West that the Government Merchant Marine intend to adopt as a policy the bringing of coal from Japan to Canada. Hon. members know that the Merchant Marine is under the Board of Directors of the National Railways. The Government has not to do with the control of its affairs, or the operation of its steamers; but in answering the question that was asked some little time ago the following statement was made:

As far as they can possibly do so the steamers of the Government Merchant Marine will hereafter use only British Columbia coal on the Pacific ocean.

That statement was given to the Government by the Board of Directors of the National Railways and, as I understand it, indicates its policy then and its policy at the present time.

Mr. W. G. McQUARRIE (New Westminster): May I be permitted to ask the Prime Minister if he is aware that the ships of the Canadian Government Merchant Marine are purchasing their coal from mines at Cumberland which employ orientals underground?—and that these mines are the only mines in Canada where orientals are so employed?—and if the Government will take action to see that this condition is remedied?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The complaint I had was that the board was purchasing coal from Japan instead of British Columbia, but I will take occasion to inquire into what my hon. friend has just represented.

THE BUDGET

CONTINUATION OF THE DEBATE ON THE ANNUAL FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The House resumed from Thursday, June, 1, the debate on the motion of Hon. W. S. Fielding (Minister of Finance) that Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair for the House to go into Committee of Ways and Means, and the proposed amendment thereto of Hon. Sir Henry Drayton.

Hon. EDMUND BRISTOL (Centre Toronto): Mr. Speaker, I join with other members of the House in congratulating the Minister of Finance upon the manner in which he delivered this—his sixteenth budget speech. I do not believe that there is any man in Canada better equipped, by long experience and by ability, to present that speech; and I do not suppose that the Finance Minister, well informed as he is, was ever confronted by a more difficult situation, because he has to satisfy everybody on his own side of the House, from the free trader in the person of my hon. friend from Brome (Mr. McMaster) to the ultra-protectionist, my hon. friend from Brantford (Mr. Raymond). Anybody who can do that is certainly something of a magician as well as an able finance minister. Now my hon. friend had a great many difficulties to encounter, and I have no doubt that if those difficulties were not so numerous he would have presented a budget more on the lines of his budget of 1907 rather than the class of budget which he brought down recently. But the criticism that I would offer in respect to the budget as a budget is, that substantially it does nothing for the stimulation or promotion of Canadian trade or Canadian agriculture. It is what you might call a "safety first" or "stand pat" budget. Whatever reductions or changes have been made are for the benefit of our business competitors the United States, Great Britain, and particularly Germany. Now, everybody in this House knows that, since the war, every civilized country has been doing everything it possibly could to protect, preserve and maintain the home market of that country for its own people and to protect and maintain its own home industries. I suppose the two most conspicuous examples with which we are familiar are Great Britain and the United States of America, and I would have thought that under those circumstances, a Finance Minister of the wide experience and great ability of the present occupant of that office would have taken into account the necessity in this country of not merely preserving matters in statu quo, but of doing what he reasonably could, so far as the tariff will do it, to promote, advance and protect the industries already existing in this country, to bring in other industries, and to give the people who have money to invest in industries a confidence that, so far as Canada is concerned, the policy which has been in force practically from 1879 to the present time is to be maintained unimpaired, and that the small modicum of protection given to our industries is not to be whittled away for the benefit of our American, English and German competitors.

I am going, first of all, to take up the case of Germany, because that is the most flagrant case, and I am rather inclined to think, from the way the minister spoke, that his mind is open to conviction, and if I can help him in any way to come to a conviction which will protect Canadian labour against the cheap and efficient labour of Germany, I think something of advantage will be done. What is the position in Germany as regards the wages paid to labour? It is well known—and the Finance Minister (Mr. Fielding) stated—that the value of a German mark to-day is a third of a cent. The latest information I can get from Germany is that skilled labour is paid 60 cents a day, and ordinary unskilled labour is paid 30 cents a day. But we will take sources perhaps more authentic, or, at least, more to be relied upon. I take Industrial and Labour Information, Volume II, No. 6, of 12th May, 1922, published at Geneva, by the International Labour Office, and I find the following item:

It appears that the highest wages were paid in Hagen, dyers, 639 marks ($2.13) per week; belt makers, 650 marks ($2.17) per week; ribbon makers 654 marks ($2.18) per week, Essen and Hamburg, and the lowest in Bautzen (353 to 508 marks ($1,18 to $1.69) and Munich (409 to 524 marks ($1.37 to $1 75)).

The memorandum states that in most cases the weekly wages were lower than the minimum cost of living of a family of two adults and two children. In Berlin, for instance, the weekly minimum cost of living in December 1921, amounted to 557 marks ($1.86) per week, while in the same month the average wages in certain occupations were as follows: Printers (married), 553 marks per week ($1.84), railway mechanics, 418 marks ($1.40); railway labourers, 379 marks ($1.27); bricklayers, 552 marks ($1.84); building labourers, 522 marks ($1.74); navvies, 381 marks ($1.27). In Hamburg, the wage of bricklayers, 620 marks ($2.07), building labourers, 594 marks ($1.98), and navvies, 589 marks ($1.97) were in excess of the minimum cost of living, while those of joiners, 561 marks ($1.87).

I am not suggesting these figures for Government employees in Canada, but I find in the Frankfurter Zeitung, of 28th March, 1922, that they paid their Government officials the munificent salary of 11,000 marks per annum, or $36.67 for the lowest group, and for the highest group, No. 12, a salary of 40,000 marks, equal in Canadian funds to $133.34 per annum. It is not necessary for me to tell this House that the German mechanic is as well equipped for his work as any mechanic in the world, and they are not working six or eight hours a day; they are working all they can—ten hours a day, and an extra two hours for the Fatherland. The present tariff brought in by the hon. Minister of Finance takes for the valuation of German goods their fair market value in the country of production—Germany. You can figure what this value in Germany would be. Labour is 50 per cent of the cost of producing an article and then we have the raw material. I have shown you the labour cost, which is a prevailing cost. It practically means that the Germans can produce everything that is produced by factories in this country for about one tenth of our cost, and the freight rates from Germany to Canada are cheap. That is the real situation. Let me show you what Germany exported to Canada and the kind and character of the merchandise sold by that country to Canada in 1913. The total value of these imports was about $10,000,000. Some of the importations were as follows:

[Mr. Bristol.]

Breadstuffs (grains and products of)	$ 63,055
Peas n.o.p.	60,647
Buttons of all kinds n.o.p.	65,197
Cars, railway and parts of	84,854
Clocks, time recorders, etc.	119,555
Cocoa paste or liquor etc., Chocolate mfrs.	73,512
Combs	81,507
Cotton fabrics, dyed or coloured	63,770
Clothing n.o.p.	71,268
Lace, white and cream coloured	226,904
Socks and stockings	441,898
All other drugs, dyes and chemicals, n.o.p.	77,807
Tableware or china porcelain	300,586
Electric Apparatus n.o.p.	79,799

Just referring to electrical apparatus, Germany to-day is the first country in the world in manufacturing along electrical and radio lines, and it will practically mean that great companies in Canada, like the General Electric and the Westinghouse and the other large company at St. Catharines, an English company, will be put out of business by Germany, or very seriously injured, when the Germans got started under the proposed tariff. Other articles imported were:

Boxes, fancy, ornamental cases	$ 63,280
Braids, cords, fringes, etc.	141,124
Artificial feathers, flowers, etc.	127,684
Lace, n.o.p.	198,238
Toys and dolls of all kinds	534,010
Furs, skins, wholly or partly dressed n.o.p.	377,135
Caps, etc. of fur	63,988
Glass, carboys or demijohns	66,248
Glass balls and cut pressed crystal glass	64,766
Gloves and mits of all kinds	380,057
Rubber cement and all manufacture of rubber n.o.p.	59,744
Hops	56,674
Machinery, composed of iron or steel n.o.p.	240,616
Tubing, wrought iron and steel	65,069

—on which the tariff has lately been reduced and is particularly reduced in the present tariff.

Knives and forks of steel	$ 67,759
Cutlery n.o.p.	302,015
Tools, hand, all kinds, hoes, rakes, forks etc.	52,039
Manufactured articles of iron and steel n.o.p.	142,903
Jewellery n.o.p.	175,296
Lamps, lanterns and chandeliers	177,687
Other musical instruments, n.o.p.	135,207
Optical instruments	52,256
Zinc, white	109,283
Paper, manufacture of n.o.p.	130,050

It is well known that the Germans have been shipping paper into New York for some time back, in competition with the Canadian paper manufacturers.

Pocket books, port-folios, leather goods	$ 78,693
Ribbons of all kinds and materials	17,776
Seed, clover and timothy	37,185
Silk Fabrics for neckties	52,724

Silk socks and stockings	80,602
Sugar n.o.p.	300,914
Knitted goods, including knitted underwear n.o.p.	104,159
Woollen fabrics, n.o.p.	214,415
Clothing, women's, children's outside garments, cloaks, suits and costumes	148,048
Clothing, readymade, (wool) men's	246,454

I thought it proper to read this list of articles to the House to show that, as far as competition with Germany is concerned, our mechanics have not only no protection, but there is practically nothing that is manufactured in this country, or that can be manufactured under reasonable competitive conditions, that Germany cannot today put on the Canadian market under the present tariff and easily undersell its Canadian competitors. It would be interesting to see, in this regard, what Great Britain has done to protect her industries—England, that free trade country that was once the proud boast of my hon. friends on the left. The British people are pretty level headed, when the question becomes one of real competition. They have passed what they call the Safeguarding of Industries Act. It reads, in part, as follows:

1. If, on complaint being made to the board to that effect, it appears to the board that goods of any class or description (other than articles of food or drink) manufactured in a country outside the United Kingdom are being sold or offered for sale in the United Kingdom—

(b) At prices which by reason of depreciation in the value in relation to sterling of the currency of the country in which the goods are manufactured are below the prices at which similar goods can be profitably manufactured in the United Kingdom;

and that by reason thereof employment in any industry in the United Kingdom is being or is likely to be seriously affected, the board may refer the matter for inquiry to a committee constituted for the purpose of this part of this act.

2. If the committee report that as respects goods of any class or description manufactured in any country the conditions aforesaid are fulfilled the board may by order apply this part of this Act to goods of that class or description if manufactured in that country:

They go on to state that where this is found, the customs duty, in addition to the ordinary duty,—shall be a customs duty equal to one-third of the value of the goods —in England, not in Germany. If England has to do this, what about poor Canada? Let us go on and see what the United States have done. They have not completed their legislation in this regard.

Mr. MURPHY: Before the hon. gentleman deals with the United States, will he state to the House the effect, as to volume and amount, upon the trade of the United Kingdom and Germany, of the legislation to which he has just referred?

Mr. BRISTOL: I can give my hon. friend only the information I have. I am not going to vouch for this; but I am told by responsible people that British merchants are merchants first, and they are importing German goods, adding a little work and a made in England label and thus taking advantage of German cheap labour.

Mr. BIRD: Is the hon. gentleman aware that the cotton spinners of Lancashire and the dye industry of England are agitating for the repeal of the Safeguarding of Industries Act, and that on May 16 a motion which was introduced in the House of Lords for the repeal of that act, was lost by only two votes? Is he aware that the Liberal federation which met at Blackpool last month also adopted that as a plank in their platform?

Mr. BRISTOL: I only want to say to my hon. friend that he is not asking a question except by way of making a long statement. Of course, there are people who will object to this act just as, if the Minister of Finance imposed a duty on German goods of one-third of the value in Canada of similar goods there would be people who would object to it. I have no doubt that in free trade England many people are agitating against the act, but I do not happen to know about that. If the hon. gentleman has information of that kind, he will have an opportunity of presenting it to the House. I am only pointing out that such an act is in force in England, and that it has not yet been repealed. This shows that British industry, in a country which has been free trade from 1846 to the present time, is so much alive to the situation and the necessity of protection against German goods that the British authorities are protecting, not merely industries that are at present in existence, but industries that might be brought into existence and that might be injuriously affected. I will come back to this matter later on.

I want now to deal with the situation in the United States, because it is just as well to see what is done by our neighbours, although some of us may think they are foolish. No group of farmers in the civilized world, except the farmers of western Canada, is arguing in favour of free trade. The farmers of western Canada may be right in their views,—possibly but not probably;—honestly I have my doubts.

This is the bill as it is before the United States Congress at the present time. Let me cite section 315 of the new United States Tariff Act of 1922,—and in my humble judgment this is useful as showing the proper view of protection, which may be up or which may be down, but which is real only when it fairly protects industries essential to the development of the country giving them such protection as will put them on a fairly even footing with their competitors in other countries. It gives a smaller country an opportunity to develop its industries in competition with more powerful rivals. Section 315, to which I have referred, reads:

(a) That in order to regulate the foreign commerce of the United States and to put into force and effect the policy of the Congress by this Act intended, whenever the President, upon investigation of the differences in conditions of competition in trade in the markets of the United States of articles wholly or in part the growth or product of the United States and of like or similar articles wholly or in part the growth or product of competing foreign countries, shall find it thereby shown that the duties fixed in this Act do not equalize the said differences in conditions of competition in trade—

That is the aim of proper protection, namely, to give the people of the country a return for their money when they invest their capital, and to give the labourers a fair chance to get a fair day's pay for a fair day's work.

—he shall, by such investigation, ascertain said differences and determine and proclaim the changes in classifications or forms of duty or increases or decreases in any rate of duty provided in this Act shown by said ascertained differences in conditions of competition in trade necessary to equalize the same in the markets of the United States; that thirty days after the date of such proclamation or proclamations such changes in classification or in forms of duty shall take effect and such increased or decreased duties be levied, collected, and paid on such merchandise when imported directly or otherwise from the country of origin into the United States: Provided, That until further provided by law the total increase or decrease of such rates of duty shall not exceed 50 per centum of the rates specified in this Act, or in any amendatory Act.

The next clause is a very interesting one:

(b) That in order to regulate the foreign commerce of the United States and to put into force and effect the policy of the Congress by this act intended, whenever the President, upon investigation of the differences in conditions of competition in trade, in the markets of the United States, of articles wholly or in part the growth or product of the United States and of like or similar articles wholly or in part the growth or product of competing foreign countries, shall find it thereby shown, that an industry in the United States is being or likely to be materially injured by reason of the importation into the United States of foreign merchandise, and shall find it thereby shown that the value as determined under the provisions of paragraphs (1), (2), or (3) of subdivision (a) of section 402 of this act, is not a certain basis for the assessment of the particular duties, he shall make such findings public, together with a description of the class or kind of merchandise to which they apply in such detail as he may deem necessary for the guidance of appraising officers; that in such cases and upon the proclamation by the President becoming effective the ad valorem duty or duty based in whole or in part upon the value of the imported article in the country of exportation shall thereafter be based upon the American selling price,—

The duty is not based upon the value of the article in the country from which it comes, as such an article is being valued by our new tariff.

—as defined in subdivision (f) of section 402 of this act, of any similar competitive article manufactured or produced in the United States embraced within the class or kind of imported merchandise upon which the President has made public such a finding and proclamation.

I most respectfully submit that it would be wise for the Minister of Finance to reconsider this question in regard to German goods, and to provide that the ad valorem duty or duty based in whole or in part upon the value of the imported German article in the country of exportation shall thereafter be based upon the Canadian selling price of any similar competitive article manufactured or produced in Canada. There are various other provisions in the act showing that the United States is looking after its own interests from every angle. For instance, section 316 of the act reads:

That unfair methods of competition and unfair acts in the importation of merchandise into the United States, or in its sale by the owner, importer, consignee, or agent of either, the effect or tendency of which is to destroy or substantially injure an industry, efficiently and economically operated, in the United States, or to prevent the establishment of such an industry—

You will note how far it goes.

—or to restrain or monopolize trade and commerce in the United States, are hereby declared unlawful, and when found by the President to exist shall be dealt with, in addition to any other provisions of law, as hereinafter provided.

So much for the United States. Now, I would call the attention of the House to the fact, if it is necessary to labour the point further, that France, on the 28th of March, 1921, increased the maximum rates of duty, making the maximum rate exceed the minimum rate in varying proportions, not exceeding 300 per cent, whereas formerly the difference between these rates was 100 per cent. The preamble to the decree explained that the measure is one of the results of the investigation which has been made of the steps which need to be taken in order to safeguard French industries, the very existence of which is threatened by the competition of goods from countries with depreciated exchange.

Now, if that applies to England, France and the United States it certainly applies with equal, if not greater, force to Canada. The last country I shall mention is Australia. Paragraph 8, Customs Tariff (Industries Preservation Act) reads:

(1) If the minister is satisfied, after inquiry and report by the Tariff Board, that the exchange value of the currency of the country of origin or export of any goods has depreciated, and that by reason of such depreciation goods have been or are being sold to an importer in Australia at prices which will be detrimental to an Australian industry, the minister may publish a notice in the Gazette specifying the country as to the exchange value of the currency of which he is so satisfied, and the goods originated in or exported from that country to which in his opinion the provisions of this section should apply.

The Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) says that if you want to prohibit Germany from sending goods here you should say so. I am certainly not advocating that. He says::

If you want to say that German goods shall be prohibited say so; if you shrink from saying that in such a direct way, then put on a 1,000 per cent duty.

It is not necessary to do that. Just put a value on German goods for tariff purposes that you would put on similar goods produced in Canada. Take the Canadian selling price of similar goods as the basis on which to value the German goods and put a reasonable duty upon them so as to give the Canadian factories a fair chance to compete with German exports on even terms. Before leaving this point I would refer to a statement made by Mr. Tom Moore, president of the Trades and Labour Congress, after his return from a visit to Germany in 1921. He said:

Skilled mechanics in Germany must work one day to earn the currency which will purchase one pound of butter; they must work one week to earn a pair of shoes, or one month to earn a suit of clothes.

The Minister of Finance, in concluding his very able speech, referred at some length to the subject of capital and labour, declaring that the condition of labour in this country should not be placed again on a pre-war basis. I am entirely in accord with the remarks of the hon. gentleman in that direction. But if we are going to pass legislation practically preventing the immigration of certain races into this country because we believe that their entry into Canada would have a tendency to lower the standard of living of our own working people, then I hope that the Minister of Finance, who I am sure is sincere in the view he has expressed, that the Canadian labourer should receive a fair and reasonable degree of protection, will give further consideration to the question of the values that are to be put on German goods, and will take such steps as will fairly and adequately protect the workingmen and commerce of this Dominion.

We have been told for a long time now that we have a high protective tariff in Canada, and I have often wondered whether hon. members, particularly my hon. friends on the left, who are of this opinion, have really studied the subject at all, and have given any thought to the tariff conditions under which the United States has come to its present state of prosperity. I am not going to advocate to-day that Canada needs the same high tariff that the United States has had for some considerable time —their tariff has averaged from 1870 to to-day between 47 and 57 per cent on imported articles. I do say, however, that the fact that the United States has seen fit to impose such high tariffs on goods entering that country is a very considerable argument in support of the contention that if we are to have factories in Canada, whether they are ten or twenty years old, such factories, except perhaps lumber, pulp and paper, cannot reasonably be expected to compete with American factories ten times their size, which can easily and with slight added cost manufacture an extra eleventh or twelfth of surplus and ship it here. Our factories cannot stand up against such competitors unless they are afforded a fair protection that will equalize the conditions that exist between the cost of production on an enormous scale, as is the case in the United States, and the cost of production on an average scale, or one-tenth of the American production, as in the case of Canada.

My hon. friends to my left say that they believe in the development of the basic industries of the country. Now, I suppose that coal would fairly be regarded as a basic commodity, although one hon. gentleman says that there is no such thing as raw material except earth, air and water. However, I conceive that coal, so long as it is in the ground and untouched, is a raw material; and the same is no doubt true of iron. After the United States civil war in 1868, the manufacturers of that country were practically forced to go out of business as a result of the operations of the war. But the Americans saw that they had deposits of iron and coal in close juxtaposition and they made up their minds that they would become the dominating factors in the iron and steel world. At that time England and Germany, particularly England, were supreme in the iron and steel business. The Americans, however, in 1868, put on a general tariff of 37 per cent on imported articles. In 1870 they raised the tariff on articles to 47 per cent, cutting it down 10 per cent in 1872. In 1875 they put it back again at 47 per cent. The Democratic low tariff of 1894 was 37 per cent, and the Dingley tariff of 1897 was an increase to 57 per cent, that tariff practically continuing in force on imported articles until 1909, or almost up to the period of the Great war. After the civil war, in the year 1871, the United States put on a duty of $28 per ton on steel rails. The gross product of the United States in that year was 34,100 tons, and over half a million tons were imported. The average price at that time was $91.70 in the United States and $57.70 in England, the American price exceeding the English price by $34. By 1885 there were produced in the United States 967,000 tons of rails and only 2,200 tons were imported from England. The American price had come down to $28.50, the English price being $23.65, or an excess of the American price over the English price of $4.85. In 1883 the industry had so far progressed that the tariff was reduced from $28 to $17. By 1890 the tariff was further reduced to $13.44. In 1890 the United States produced 1,871,400 tons of steel rails, not one ton being imported, and the difference between the English and the American prices was $4.45 in favour of the United States. In 1897, the duty had been reduced to $6.72, and the quantity of rails produced was 1,630,000 tons, no rails being imported. The average price of the United States produce was $19.60 per ton, the English price being $21, or $1.40 more than that of the United States. To-day steel rails in the United States are on the free list. There is no country in the world to-day that has iron ore deposits in such vast quantities and of such high grade as has the United States in Pennsylvania and Minnesota. When the world war came the United States was supreme in the steel industry, and it has achieved that position under a tariff of the kind I have described which had absolutely excluded English and German rails, with the result that domestic rails were reduced to a lower price in the United States than in any other country in the world.

But let me tell my hon. friends something more; it relates to the German situation. A short time ago certain German companies bought 500,000 tons of Wabana ore in Newfoundland, which they are taking over to Germany and turning into steel rails, and those rails they are able to sell in Cuba in competition with the United States rails. That is what German competition means in rail to-day. Since the war the United States Steel Corporation, which, I suppose, is one of the best organized and most powerful corporations in the world, has not been able to successfully compete against German rails and steel in other parts of the world. That is an added reason for my argument that Canadian workingmen and manufacturers should be protected against German competition.

A similar illustration as to the value and benefit of a protective tariff in building up the iron and steel industry may be taken in the case of nails, on which the duty was originally $80; now they are on the free list. When the duty was first imposed the United States was buying millions of dollars' worth of nails in England and Germany; to-day their own manufacturers are able to meet the whole domestic demand.

In the great province of Nova Scotia we find fifteen per cent of the coal deposits of the world. At Wabana, in Newfoundland, is one of the largest ore deposits in the world. Cape Breton and Wabana are in just that position. But what is their relation so far as competitive conditions with the United States are concerned? The deepest United States coal mines to-day are not more than one thousand feet, the shafts are a mile apart, ventilation and haulage are easy, and in many places in Pennsylvania the mines are on the sides of hills or mountains, the coal is brought down an easy slope, and the working conditions enable mining to be carried on at a minimum cost. The result is that in the United States today the miners of bituminous coal produce just twice as much per man as the miners can produce in Nova Scotia, no matter how hard they may work. The cost of coal is largely the cost of mining it. So it is essential that we should build up the coal industry in Nova Scotia, for it would never do for this country to be at the mercy of the United States for soft coal as we are for anthracite coal. But we would be at their mercy if we allowed United States coal to be dumped here at a price that would put our Nova Scotia mines out of business; those mines must be granted reasonable protection. What that reasonable protection should be is a matter for investigation, but there is no doubt of the disparity in conditions, it costing just twice as much to bring a ton of coal to the surface in Nova Scotia as in Pennsylvania. It takes four tons of coal to make a ton of coke for use in the steel industry. If it is costing you twice as much to get your coal, you can figure what your steel is going to cost you. Mining coal in Cape Breton is a submarine proposition, and when you go down two and a quarter miles under the sea, haulage and ventliation are costly and difficult factors, and it takes twice as much time and money to get your coal out as it would if it comes up a straight shaft, and this additional expense cannot be avoided. Then again the Mesaba iron ore is dug out with a steam shovel; the Wabana ore has to be blasted out under the sea. The adverse conditions in Wabana ore are not so bad as in regard to our Cape Breton coal, but it is infinitely more costly mining ore at Wabana than at Mesaba, in Minnesota, and the latter ore is of higher grade.

It follows from the start that we cannot compete on even terms with the steel industry of the United States either in regard to coal or iron. Now, are we to follow the policy of my hon. friends to my left and say to Nova Scotia: You shall have no protection; we will tie up your coal mines for two or three hundred years until the American mines are down two thousand or three thousand feet, or they are exhausted—are we to adopt that course? Or are we to follow the policy which has been followed for the last forty years and give reasonable protection and assistance to our Nova Scotia coal and steel industries? It seems to me that if you are to develop your basic industries you must recognize the competitive conditions under which they have to be developed. When I say to you that, as against the protection of $28 to the United States steel rail industry, you can see that our industry is not over-protected, or even sufficiently protected to equalize conditions with American competitors. It also explains why so many steel rails are imported, and why we have our Algoma mills using American coal and iron instead of Canadian or British.

I suppose that if the Minister of Finance had not come from Nova Scotia he might have been a little more just to that province. But I do say as a Canadian who has investigated the matter that I do not think the great province of Nova Scotia has received fair play for her coal and iron industries. Coming into Confederation, she was practically shut out of the American market which she would have had in Boston and New York by water, and was forced to send her products by the long rail haul from Sydney to Montreal before a substantial market is found, except the demand from Nova Scotia railway companies. Moreover, American steel plants at Buffalo are next door to Ontario where a large demand exists for steel products. The fact of the matter is, as one distinguished member on the other side said, the tariff is a compromise. What we have to do is to be fair to each other and to every one. Give every one a square deal, no matter whether he be a farmer, a workingman, or a manufacturer; let us try to treat every one fairly and reasonably. Ontario and Quebec are undoubtedly in favour of a protective tariff; you could not get either of these great provinces to vote against such a system. But they would all be in favour of a revision of the tariff; there is not a manufacturer who does not want to see the tariff put on a fair basis. If any manufacturer is getting too much protection the duties in that case should be reduced. Tariff revision is long overdue.

But the tariff should be applied in relation to particular things; this slapping on of a big duty on everything is not the proper method to adopt. Some industries require more protection than others, and the problem is a matter for investigation by a committee so that such protection may be afforded as is proper to develop our natural resources and give our workingmen fair competitive conditions with their fellow-workers in every other country in the world. That is what I stand for.

I have every consideration for the farmer of the Canadian West. As far as I can find out he is up against a hard proposition. I know that the purchasing power he ought to have to-day he has not got. I know that if the old dumping clause is retained the British Columbia fruit farmer will be all right; if he gets the protection he wants the Ontario farmer will be all right; the Quebec farmer is always all right; and down in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick they are working hard but they are not getting just as good results as they should for the work they do. But the fact is that Ontario and Quebec get the best bargain at present, British Columbia coming about third. Now, just what can be done to help the condition of the western farmer I am not prepared to say, but undoubtedly it is a matter that should be most carefully investigated by the best brains of the country. But I wish to tell the western farmer, with all the force I can, that I think he is barking up the wrong tree when he says that his only method of securing relief is to change our tariff system. I do not believe that, and I will tell him why in a few words. I agree that he should have relief, but I say, get it some other way. A fair reduction of freight rates would probably give him more purchasing power, and undoubtedly he is entitled to some benefit, because he is not getting any substantial relief out of our protective system. He sells No. 1 Hard wheat, which is the standard for the world, and as he is the only one who raises it his wheat fixes the world price. But I want to say to him that this question of protection is not simply a matter between the farmer of Canada and the manufacturer of Canada, because you have five million farmers to the south of the line, all of whom we must assume to be nearly as wise as Mr. Henry Wise Wood, and they are all opposed to free trade; they want protection, even against the Canadian farmers. I do not blame them for that; their reason is a very simple one. Before the world war the United States was an exporting country, largely of foodstuffs; upon the conclusion of the war they did not want to export foodstuffs because they did not think the fellow on the other side could pay for them. With this market gone, both for manufactured goods and for foodstuffs, the people on the other side of the line looked askance at Canada when she shipped $175,000,000 worth of foodstuffs into the United States; so they decided to put up the tariff and keep that Canadian stuff out. Of course, that did not apply to our No. 1 Hard wheat, for the simple reason that the United States people must have that wheat for seeding purposes and for mixing with other grain to produce a flour of sufficiently good quality to make the bread that the United States people want. So that the matter of the duty does not have so substantial an effect in the case of the No. 1 Hard wheat; the Americans have to buy it, anyway. In the case of cattle, the duty has unquestionably hurt Canadian trade. But why allow so many commodities to come in from the United States—early strawberries, for instance, and various kinds of early fruits and vegetables? Why not put a high tax on them, and let the Canadian people wait a little while until they can get similar commodities produced in their own country? As a matter of fact, these things are more or less luxuries. In British Columbia they have protection on their fruit. But we in Ontario get all the early potatoes, beans and vegetables of various kinds shipped into Ontario from the United States. Why should we allow that, when the United States does not allow our stuff to go in free? That is what I do not understand. You are level-headed farmers, and I cannot see why the other fellow should be allowed to come into Canada and obtain the benefit of our market when he will not let you get into his.

Now, in this matter of protection, you are the only farmers in the world who are asking for what is involved in your proposed changes in the budget. Look at it from another point of view: what country in the world has been more prosperous since the war than Canada has been? True, you had a bad year last year in your business, but I do not know of anybody who did not have a bad year in business last year. We have good years and we have bad years. Before the war we used to have about only one good year in seven, and then we used to think we were well off. But the war, unfortunately, sent around a good deal of easy money; it got people into expensive habits; and it is a little hard, perhaps, to get away from those habits and settle down to the hard work and the saving which are the only producers of a country's real wealth.

Suppose for one moment that your ideal of free trade were carried out: Take the case of agricultural implements, upon which some reduction has been made by this budget. The agricultural implement industry in this country is a very important one; thousands of men in Canada—at least, in Ontario and Quebec—are employed in it. Last year the Massey-Harris Company, I happen to know, was working only up to one-sixth of its capacity. During this period our western farmers, for reasons of their own, bought about $11,000,000 worth of American agricultural implements. They paid duty on these implements, and felt that Canada was getting the benefit of that duty. But if you had paid out this $11,000,000 in Canada, the Massey-Harris Company and all the other implement manufacturing firms in Quebec and Ontario would have been enabled to work full time and you would not have had men to feed who were unemployed; there would have been no starving families and no unemployment in this part of the world. It is true you paid the customs duties, but what else did you do? You patriotic men sent your money away to pay the working men of the United States, to assist in the building up of American industries, to feed American mouths, when there were Canadian mouths in want of food. If only from the point of view of common, decent charity to your fellow-countrymen who fought beside you during the war, you should have bought these thing in Canada, even if it cost a little more to do so. It is only by the rounded-out prosperity of the country generally that you get increased population, that you get growth and development, that you get a market and create ability to buy the things which you produce.

But, you may say, that is a selfish way to look at it. I do not know exactly what effect the 2½ per cent reduction which has been made will bring about, but I doubt if it will make a difference of $10 a year to any one of you gentlemen who are farmers. But it will make a lot of difference if it shuts down the agricultural implement factories of this country. If you have this free trade that you want, you think that you are going to get things cheaper. Well, you would get them cheaper, if the world would just stand still and these things would simply come into Canada as before and nothing more would happen. But you know as well as I do—probably a good deal better—that if the agricultural inmplement factories of this country are shut down and can no longer compete with the American agricultural implement factories; if the Harvester Company goes back to Chicago, where it belongs; if the 350 American factories, which have spent over $100,000,000 in the last thirty years in the building of big factories in this country, shut down in Canada and return to the United States, —which would mean a saving in overhead —you know that they will be able to sell these implements to you at such prices as they may demand. We have no control over American factories, American trusts, American prices. You really do not believe, do you, that the Harvester Company, with no competition in Canada, would sell you your mowers and binders more cheaply? If you do, look at the history of Australia. Australia had a labour party; they wanted free trade and they got it, but they have now gone in for high protection—60 per cent on agricultural implements. You know that, and you know the result has been that the Massey-Harris Company and others have had to go into Australia, establish works there, and give employment to Australian workingmen. Well, if we had free trade the same would happen here—you would be eaten alive; almost before the legislation was passed, the American trusts—would control the Canadian market and would charge you fifty per cent more than any Canadian company had ever charged you. You do not think the United States trusts are benevolent institutions existing for the benefit of western Canada, do you? I assure you they are not. Why, we could not do anything. The trusts and combines in this country, about which your leader was talking a great deal during the campaign—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. The hon. member is too old and too experienced a parliamentarian to forget that he must address the Chair.

Mr. BRISTOL: The hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Crerar), during the recent campaign, was speaking on the question of trusts and combines; I think the question of the woollen industry was one that bothered him, as it did another hon. gentleman last night. He was telling us of the terrible duty of 35 per cent on woollens. I looked the matter up and I found that about $60,000,000 worth of woollen goods were imported into this country last year, but they were imported from England, not from the United States, and the British preference, which is, I think, about 50 per cent, perhaps less, made the duty only 17½ per cent—which was the tariff rates as in force at the time of the Mackenzie government.

But to come back to the argument I am trying to present, I wish to point out that if you have free trade you put yourself at the mercy of the factories of Germany, of England and of the United States, because you put your own Canadian factories out of business by unfair competition. It is obvious that there is practically nothing outside of pulpwood timber and that sort of thing, that we could manufacture in competition with the United States. If, then, you do that, it must be obvious to you that although you are getting the highest price for wheat, you are dealing a body blow to the industries of Ontario, Quebec, Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and, possibly, Manitoba. And what else have you done? You have put the farmers in these great provinces out of business, because if the factories are not running in Montreal, Toronto, Hamilton and the other large cities of this country, the farmer has no home market, —and on the question of home market, I would mention the county of York concerning which the leader of the Government knows something so far as the home market is concerned. But that is the position: if you have free trade you have ruined the eastern farmers and manufacturers. As I have said, you still get the highest price for your No. 1 hard wheat, which is the best wheat in the world. Then what becomes of the rest of us? We shall not be here and you will have the national debt on your hands. I do not suppose you would agree with the member for Centre Winnipeg (Mr. Woodsworth) in the suggestion that the debt ought to be repudiated. You certainly would not be able to adopt his alternative suggestion and have a capital levy under those conditions.

Mr. COOTE: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. BRISTOL: With pleasure.

Mr. COOTE: If the wheat growers should leave the prairie provinces, apparently all the rest of Canada would automatically disappear?

Mr. BRISTOL: Not at all. Why do you say that?

Mr. COOTE: Did you not say that the manufacturer would be ruined, as well as the Ontario farmer, if we brought our goods in free?

Mr. BRISTOL: You would still be raising your No. 1 hard wheat, the best there is, and selling it in the markets of the world at he highest price. I said the rest of us would be out of business and that Canada would be at he mercy of the trusts in the United States who instead of producing twelve times as much as they do to-day, would manufacture for Canada an additional thirteen times if the Canadians are forced to use their products and Canadian factories are out of business, and at their own prices. That is practically what it would amount to. View the matter in any way you like there is no escape from that conclusion.

Mr. COOTE: If there is no escape from that conclusion as my hon. friend says, if we are forced to leave the prairie provinces and quit producing where are you going to deliver the goods that you manufacture?

Mr. BRISTOL: Why, we are not shipping to you to that extent, are we?

Mr. COOTE: No, but you say that if we do not buy your goods you will not be able to keep your factories going.

Mr. BRISTOL: No, I am not saying that at all. I simply say that if your free trade doctrines were to go into effect you will ruin the eastern manufacturers, with the exception, of course, the manufacturers of pulp, paper and lumber, and you will ruin substantially the eastern farmer. On the face of it, you in the West will be just as prosperous, the only difference being that you will have to pay for your manufactured products any price that the United States trusts choose to ask for them, and you will have the national debt of this country on your hands—that is all. And you are getting perilously near that condition now in connection with the manufacture of agricultural implements in this country. Because, before the war the agricultural implement manufacturers in Canada, particularly the Massey-Harris company, had a tremendous and growing trade in Europe, especially in Germany and Russia. That market is gone to-day, with a loss of many millions of dollars. We do not know whether they can weather present conditions or not; if they do not, you will have to pay more for your agricultural implements.

The point I was trying to make, as far as I was able to do so, is that every civilized country in the world—except the community represented by the farmers of western Canada—are in favour of the protective principle, in favour of protecting their home industries. I have also tried to point out that the suggested change in the method of raising the revenue would not be in the interest of the western farmers any more than it would be in the interest of their fellow countrymen. I do not question the sincerity of the motives which actuate my hon. friends from the West. I believe they are influenced by sincere and patriotic motives; and it is only by all of us discussing our respective viewpoints that we can get results. I sincerely trust that in Canada we will all try to work together, eastern men with western men. I certainly recognize that agriculture is the basic industry of Canada, and that no country can be great and prosperous unless its agriculture is prosperous, and its workingmen are sufficiently paid, happy and contented. I want to see the best of feeling existing between the great provinces of Ontario and Quebec—and let me say here I was very glad that one of my hon. friends from Montreal went up to Toronto the other day and delivered a speech to our friends up there along this line. Let us continue our efforts to secure unity, because there should be no differences between us. There should be harmony not only between these two provinces, but between eastern and western Canada. Because we are all patriotically endeavouring, in our own way, to work for our common country and to obtain the best possible results.

There are many features in connection with the existing situation that require consideration, but one difficulty at present is this. Deflation is required in two items which affect almost everybody; one is rent and the cost of building, and the other is the cost of coal to heat our homes. Now, I have never been able to understand why the building trades and building unions of this country—composed of reasonable and intelligent men as they are—have not been willing to accept reasonable prices for building material and reasonable rates of wages; why they have not been willing to cut down in the matter of prices and wages as the farmer has had to cut down the price of his products. If that were to take place there would be a tremendous building boom in this country and it would be of enormous benefit to Canada, and our working people in large cities like Toronto and Hamilton would not have to live in boxes lined with paper as many of them do—literally packing boxes. They would have decent houses in which to live and to bring up their families. When I find, for example, the price of brick in a great city like Montreal is practically $23 a thousand when in my opinion it ought to be about $10, you can readily see what a great handicap there is to building operations. I have no complaint to make against our labour unions. I think our Canadian working men are as fine a lot of men as there are in the world; I do not know that any better are to be found anywhere. But if they would only get together and agree upon reasonable terms there would be millions of money spent upon building, and a greater number of houses would be available at cheap rents. Another necessity is a reasonable price for our coal. There must be deflation in both the directions I have indicated. A labouring man is no better off with $10 per day than with $5 if the latter figure will purchase as much as the former, except that he can say that he has more money in his pocket. The great object should be to get the men engaged in the building trades together and try to arrive at a reasonable rate for the construction of houses so that rents might be cut down and people housed at a moderate figure. Once you can cut into the wages of the men who run the great railways of this country, once you can properly and fairly do that, you can unquestionably effect a great reduction in railway rates; and you certainly have got to have a reduction of railway rates in some way. As between the east and the west, if the east, which benefits more from protection than the west, has to pay a little more in consequence it would perhaps only be fair.

With reference to the amendment, it seems to me purely a question of whether our western friends and the rest of the House want to go on record as saying that no matter what platform you may stand on during the election you can discard that platform when the election is over. If I have any comment to make on the subject it is just this—does the House think it wise for public men to put themselves into such a position that it can be said that no reliance can be placed on their promises? I do not believe that to be in the interest either of this parliament or of the country.

Mr. ANDREW R. McMASTER (Brome): Before entering upon the few observations that I have prepared for this afternoon, may I respond briefly to some of the assertions and arguments advanced so pleasantly by the hon. member who has just taken his seat. First of all, he complains that the Finance Minister should have raised the tariff; if only the tariff is raised everything will be happy in Canada. Now a tariff is a tax, and therefore the logical conclusion is that if we will only tax ourselves a little more heavily all will be well. My hon. friend states that we should be very much afraid of German competition because in Germany the men are working on scales of wages which he read out. Now, there are two possible conclusions from the figures which he gave us. One conclusion is that someone has been telling him fairy tales; the second conclusion is that the purchasing power of the mark in Germany must be very much higher than its international or exchange value, because according to the figures which he gave us the amounts paid to people in Germany would not keep body and soul together; and I think we will all agree that workmen always have to have enough to keep body and soul together or they are not able to work. He states that the German workmen are working ten hours a day if not twelve. That is not in accordance with the information which I have gathered. I have a paper published in New York called the Dry Goods Economist. It is in its 76th year of publication, and has been handed me by a gentleman in whom I have the utmost confidence. I will read an extract from the issue of the 20th May of this year. It says:

> Last week, during the convention of the Ninth National Foreign Trade Convention, a speaker who had just returned from Europe quoted Dr. Walter Rathenau, the prominent German publicist, as having declared that Germany is now exporting only 25 per cent of its pre-war volume. And that German production costs have been rising rapidly is the statement made to our Commerce Department by its Commercial Attaché at Berlin, with the upward tendency still apparent.

We may doubt the statement of Dr. Walter Rathenau because he is a German, but it would be impossible, I think, to doubt the correctness of the information gathered by the American representative in Berlin that production costs in that country are rapidly rising. The article goes on to say however:

> Indications, moreover, continue to multiply that Germany has not a great amount of goods to export. A writer in a Berlin trade paper, dated April 23, states that in the first half of the year 1921, as a result of strikes in Germany, 772,891 persons were out of work and that the German industries during that period sustained a loss of 11,608,129 working days.

After all, human nature is somewhat the same all over the world. Workmen are being asked in all countries of the world to accept harder working conditions and to accept lower pay, and they accept it reluctantly and only after a struggle. I think that what is contained in this article is very much more likely to be true than the information just given to the House by the hon. member for Centre Toronto (Mr. Bristol) although I do not infer for a moment that the hon. member would desire to mislead the House. Might I say with all kindness, that his address would appear to be labelled, if the Marking Act were in force "Made in Toronto". The United States high tariff has been the cause of the prosperity of the United States according to the view of the hon. member, but we know differently. We know the economic history of the United States only shows that a people with boundless natural resources and a virile hard-working and intelligent population can succeed in spite of a very unsound tariff or fiscal policy. The fact of the matter is that, although there has been an ebb of reaction in United States in trade matters, the best commercial, the best industrial and the best financial minds in the United States are more and more tending towards a free trade solution of the difficulties of the world. There was an effort made in the Fordney Bill to put upon the tariff schedules boots and shoes and leather, which are now free, but a great movement came to have them remain on the free list. And from whom? From the shoe manufacturers of United States. "Because" they said, if you put them on a protective tariff schedule, then, of course, those who produce leather, which is our raw material, will demand that leather be put on a tariff schedule and we produce a great deal of boots and shoes for foreign export. We have got to meet the competition of the world. In order to meet the competition of the world we have to have our raw material free, and therefore we believe we will find when the dust of the conflict clears off at Washington concerning the Fordney Bill we will find boots and shoes and leather still on the free list.

Now passing from the United States my hon. friend went back to Germany and said that the Germans had come and bought from Newfoundland some Wabana ore. I mention that in passing merely to illustrate the argument which I propose to make in reply to the argument which he made that the coal mines of Nova Scotia are absolutely unable to endure competition from the United States and that the steel interests of Nova Scotia are absolutely unable to meet the competition of the American steel interests. His argument is this: We have to go under the sea in wet mines for our coal, and in Newfoundland they have to go under the sea in wet mines for our iron ore. But if the iron ore was hard to get out why do the Germans buy it? Why did they not go to the United States where the ore according to his statement was raised with a steam shovel and therefore should be much cheaper? What is the matter with the steel interests or the coal interests of Nova Scotia? They are both combined. Is it the water in the mine or the water in the stock that is the trouble? I know something about the formation of the Dominion Iron and Steel Company. I was only a youth, but I heard the matter discussed in Montreal, and I know that the great promotor of that industry, H. M Whitney, told investors in Montreal before he invited them to put in any money, in the early days of the concern, that such was the advantage that Nova Scotia possessed with reference to this coal and to the close proximity of iron ore in Nova Scotia, that they could meet the competition of the world. I was wondering whether if that company had not suffered from the watering of stock, the re-watering of stock and the re-re-watering of stock that has taken place, and if it had remained in the hands of the capable honest and high-principled business man that some time ago had control of the company, whether it would be in the condition in which it is to-day. And what is the situation, and what is the conclusion which should be reached?

Mr. MARTELL: Do I understand the hon. member to state that it would have been better for the company if there had been no Whitney legislation?

Mr. McMASTER: No, I made no such assertion. What I did say was this: Mr. Whitney told the interests of Montreal, when the company was formed, that they could stand competition from the world, and I know that when the company was floated the common stock was sold for fifteen cents on the dollar.

Mr. BRISTOL: Does the hon. member dispute my statement that it costs twice as much to-day to raise a ton of coal to the surface in Cape Breton as it does in Pennsylvania? That was my statement. I did not go into the watering business or anything else.

Mr. McMASTER: I am not in a position to contradict the figures given by my hon. friend, that it costs twice as much in Nova Scotia to raise a ton of coal as it does in certain parts of United States; but if he tells me that my statement as to the watering of the stock of the Dominion Iron and Steel Company and the other companies, almost too numerous to remember, which preceded or have succeeded that company is untrue, I would ask him to look at the quotations on the stock exchange of the preferred stock, and the second preferred stock, and the common stock, of that company, and answer me whether, if dollar for dollar had ever gone into that concern, it is likely those stocks would have been quoted at the price at which they are quoted now.

Mr. BRISTOL: I can only tell my hon. friend that, with reference to the second preferred stock of the Steel company exchanged for the Dominion common stock, I am aware that the price of $70 a share was paid for 50,000 shares a short time before. I have myself paid $140,000 or more for 2,000 shares, and that money went into the treasury of the company. I do not know about previous transactions, but I know the English syndicate—and they have been very much misrepresented; I know my hon. friend wishes to be fair—men like Lord Furness and others who came in, paid $70 a share for the common stock which is to-day selling at $30.

Mr. McMASTER: I suppose the shares of the second preferred stock were $100 par. If they were bought at $70, there is 30 per cent of water, at any rate. I do not know whether I made any statement as to the exact amount of water, but I think the company has been very well sprinkled. What is the logical conclusion of what my learned and hon. friend has told us, if we take his statements as being absolutely correct? It is this, that there is no hope in Canada for getting steel rails at prices which would compare with world prices. Nevertheless, we have an annual deficit running from $50,000,000 to $100,000,000 on our National railways. Everything that makes railway construction, whether it be of bridges, or steel rails, or steel cars, or steel wheels, more expensive, is going to increase the deficit on our National railways, which deficit has to come out of our pockets.

My learned and hon. friend then turned to Australia, and he said that Australia had had free trade. I do not think, in the recollection of the present generation, Australia was a free trade country. Prior to the confederation of the Australian states, there were two states in Australia, one being a free trade state and the other a protectionist state. A very interesting argument for the benefit of free trade as opposed to protection for industries can be drawn from the fact that the manufacturers of the free trade state in Australia were more prosperous than those in the protectionist state alongside of it.

I do not think the West ever had such a high compliment paid to it as was paid by the hon. member for Centre Toronto. If the people who live in the prairie provinces cease buying goods from eastern Canada, then, he says, we may as well shut up shop. That is a pretty good reason, if true, why we should endeavour to have living conditions such as to encourage people to stay in the western provinces and to encourage more to go there. I think the agricultural implement business is one which could have a very happy and useful life even under the free breath of absolute free trade. As Mr. Findlay, the late manager of the Massey-Harris Company said, "Give the manufacturers of agricultural implements our raw materials free and we will meet the world." That is the evidence given by Mr. Findlay, the manager, himself. I have endeavoured, very inadequately, I am sure, to deal with what has been stated by the hon. member (Mr. Bristol) who has just taken his seat.

The task of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) is one of the heaviest that has ever been before a Minister of Finance of this country. When he was appointed, when the ministry was formed, the Minister of Finance said: "Cabinet ministers are subjects for sympathy rather than for congratulation." I congratulate the Minister of Finance, because he had such a real appreciation of the difficulty of his task; but I know all in this House, irrespective of whatever their view of public policy, whatever their party allegiance, wish the Minister of Finance every help and strength in meeting the situation which confronts him. May I tender him my warmest congratulations on courageously doing away with those underhand methods of giving protection to special interests in this country which were found in the Depreciation of Currency Act, the Marking Act, the Certification Act and some other acts, the names of which I have forgotten for the moment? I believe he is entitled to the highest commendation for his action in that regard. We have had some criticism of his attitude from members of the official Opposition. Some of this criticism has been couched in kindly and polite language, such as was used by the hon. member who has just spoken. Other criticism has been uttered in language which I do not hesitate to characterize as grossly unfair. The hon. member for West York (Sir Henry Drayton), who formerly occupied the high position of Minister of Finance of this country, stated that this was a budget giving a preference to Great Britain and free trade to Germany. I think the hon. gentleman rather fell below his usual level when he made that statement, and it was unworthy of one who held high office in this country. For anyone to try to introduce international bitterness and hate into the discussion of a business matter is, I believe, highly undesirable. Moreover, the statement is not true. The tariff remains on German goods at the general tariff rate, which is, in many cases, a high rate. The argument used by the ex-Minister of Finance was an interesting one. He seemed to think that the prosperity of a country was helped by two things—perhaps I should say that he seemed to think that the prosperity of a country, as regards the possibility and power of exporting goods and entering into competition with the world, was helped by two things; first by a depreciated currency, and second by a low standard of living. How can we expect, says he, the Canadian workmen to compete with the workman who is earning only a few dollars a week? I doubt if there is any advantage in a depreciated currency as regards payment of wages in a country because depreciated currency means merely an inflated currency, and as a rule, when you inflate currency, you inflate prices at the same time, in just about the same proportion. I do not, therefore, see how there can be any real advantage in that regard; but I am perfectly certain that, when a country with an inflated or a depreciated currency goes outside to purchase, any possibility of advantage disappears; and Germany, which after all is a country of northern Europe with a temperate climate, a country having to buy a vast deal of its raw materials outside of the country, when it goes outside, has to pay, not in its depreciated currency—for after all, wealth does not consist in pieces of paper turned out by a printing press, but in real money according to the standards of the country in which it makes its purchase. I have in my hand a table which has been prepared for me by our Dominion Bureau of Statistics—and we are fortunate, indeed, in having available to members of this House who care to study matters carefully and thoroughly, the assistance of the able and courteous official whom we have at the head of this department, with his no less able and courteous assistants. I have before me the monthly averages of imports for consumption into Germany and exports from Germany. This shows that, in 1913, the monthly average of imports for domestic consumption was almost 900,000,000 marks. Their exports of domestic products totalled almost 842,000,000 marks in 1913. In January of this year they imported over 12,500,000,000 marks' worth of goods and exported in the same month goods to the extent of ever 14,500,000,000 marks. A great deal of these purchases are purchases in foreign countries of raw materials worked up in Germany and then sent out of that country; and if there be any advantage in depreciated currency so far as paying the home labourer is concerned, it disappears entirely when you come to deal with purchases abroad. I may say that these figures are obtained from the monthly bulletin of statistics of the League of Nations for March, 1922.

Then there is another argument which is very unsound, and which I think is a very dangerous one from the point of view of labour, and that is that cheap labour is inexpensive labour. Cheap labour is very often the most expensive sort of labour. Let me give two examples. When the Panama canal was being built the white labourers were paid in gold and the black labourers in silver. They were paid so many dollars a day, one in gold and the other in silver, and it made a substantial difference between them. But the amount of labour which the white man did over and above that of the black man made the two labour costs practically the same. Again, some time before the war, a commission of investigation on labour costs visited the United States from Great Britain. They found that in many lines of work, wages in the United States were considerably higher than in Great Britain, but that the labour costs were not higher, in many cases being lower. Why? The highly paid, ambitious man getting a good wage and living in a good house is anxious to see his children well educated, and he therefore puts into his work a force and efficiency which the lower paid man does not. I trust, therefore, that we have disposed of this suggestion that we should change our legislation because of fears from German competition.

Then we have the remarks of the hon. member for St. John and Albert (Mr. Baxter), who thought that the Almighty had not dealt hardly enough with the German people, and who wished to see some German cities devastated. Well, I would remind the hon. gentleman that vengeance belongs to a Higher Power. Hatred forms the seedbed of future wars, and anyone who speaks or writes with the idea of perpetuating national hatred just waters that seedbed and brings forth the seeds to quicker and surer germination. The official Opposition often claim, or speak in such a fashion as to make one believe, that they regard themselves as the official depositories of loyalty to the Empire, as they call it, and of pride in British connection and admiration for British traditions. So far as admiration for British traditions is concerned, I do not give ground to them for one instant. But I say that any desire or attempt to foment and maintain international hatred and bitterness after the fighting is over is not the British way. Let me give two or three examples to illustrate this truth. Quebec was taken in 1759 at the close of the Seven Years' War. Now, I am sure that there had been many atrocities committed on both sides in that war, because both races on the North American Continent had the aid of their savage allies, the Indians. While the siege of Quebec was in progress the farms and farmhouses of the French-Canadian habitants in that neighbourhood were devastated. The French-Canadian looked forward with fear and trembling to what would happen after the capitulation. But what did happen? The day after the capitulation, Amherst said to his soldiers: "These French-Canadians are now your fellow-citizens; treat them as such." Three weeks afterwards, speaking in their own tongue to the French-Canadians, he said: You are now British subjects, entitled to the rights of such. I have told my soldiers to treat you as fellow citizens; see that you treat them in the same way. What ensued? A few weeks after, the Tommy Atkins of that day was helping the habitant bring in his crops; and it was not more than a month or two afterwards before the Macleans, the MacKays, the Macdonalds, the MacIntoshes and the Frasers were so much at home that to-day we find MacIntoshes, Macdonalds, Frasers all along the north bank of the St. Lawrence who cannot speak a word of English, but know only their mother tongue. Earl Haig, who I presume is a Presbyterian, because he was called upon to address the General Assembly of the Church of Scotland, stated about a year ago that what was needed in the world was the spirit of peace, in order to make the League of Nations effective. He said: You have your League of Nations, but you have to have the proper spirit behind it. Now, he will not be regarded as an undue pacifist, but that was his interpretation of the British way. And then, what has Lloyd George been doing in the last few months? Has he not been trying to appease the hatreds of war, and to moderate the demands of his friends against their erstwhile enemies, endeavouring to get a better international spirit? He has been attacked for it; of course, he has. And I tell the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) that when his legislation is attacked he is in very good company indeed; he is in the company of Lloyd George.

Some people do not want to trade with the Germans. They say, do not let us trade with them at all. Well, if we heed that demand, how shall we get our share of the indemnity? I have no objection to seeing Germany pay a just indemnity. She is the losing party and every lawyer is conversant with the principle that the losing party shall pay the costs. But I wonder whether the hon. member for St. John and Albert, even in a lawsuit where great bitterness had been aroused, ever refused to take his cheque in payment of his account because he was not altogether satisfied with the way in which his confrere on the other side had conducted the case.

Then, from the business point of view, there is still more important consideration. So long as Europe does not recover, Canada cannot recover. So long as Germany cannot recover, or has not recovered, Europe cannot and will not recover. Any idea that you can put 70,000,000 Germans in a corner of the world and ostracise them completely forever, or for any considerable term of years, is mere preposterous nonsense, and any attempt to do it will just result in this, that Germany and Russia, whether they like it or not, will be driven into each other's arms. Let us be reasonable and look at the matter in the spirit of wisdom. This matter has been dwelt upon to a certain extent by members of the official Opposition. Their desire not to trade with Germany has been very marked indeed. Well, what are other nations doing? I hold in my hand a table prepared by the same bureau I have referred to already, which shows that in the year 1921 Great Britain imported £20,549,-999 worth of goods from Germany, and exported to Germany no less than £17,831,-000 odd; that the total of British trade with Germany in currency, which may not represent very fairly the comparison, is not quite but almost 44 per cent of what it was before the war. If those who suffered from the war as did the people who live in the little islands of Great Britain and Ireland are prepared to trade with Germany, would it not be well for us not to talk in such a way that we might be interpreted as not desiring to have any commercial relations with Germany at this time? And what has the United States done? Its total trade with Germany for the last year was $452,605,175. So that we see that nations that fought with us against Germany do not hold to the exclusionist ideas of some members of the official Opposition. I need not stress that point any further.

I come now to the very excellent address given by the hon. member for Brantford (Mr. Raymond). There was part of his discourse with which I am in the most complete and hearty accord; there are other parts with which I am not in such complete accord. He laid great stress on the fact that wealth might be created by the taking of the primary productions of the world and working them up into finished goods. I do not think there is one of us in this House who has any other idea on that subject. Of course, it is true. But then he went on to point out, with an eloquence and suavity and bonhomie that we all enjoyed to the full, that those nations which had made their greatest advance along those lines were Great Britain, Switzerland, Holland and Belgium. I said to him in questioning form: But, Sir, are these not free trade nations, or nations with a low tariff? And he said to me: Nay. Now, my friend is a Liberal. I know he is a Liberal. His face shows he is a Liberal, the tones of his voice, his demeanour shows he is a Liberal. But, alas! he has lived too long in Brantford, where misconception and ignorance upon fiscal matters are such that even the elect do fall. Because, what is the fact? I have here another table, for when I came to contradict my hon. friend I wanted to have the figures in hand.

In 1912 Belgium had imports of £198,320,000, on which they collected—of course, a lot of the imports came in free, and some were dutiable—£2,978,000, the average rate of ad valorem duty over all the importations being 1½ per cent. Well, now, if that is not a free trade nation, it is pretty near it. In 1920—I will not bother you with the details—the average rate was 1.69 per cent.

Let us take Switzerland. In 1912 they imported £81,577,000 on which they collected £3,424,000 as duty, a rate of 4.19 per cent. It is quite possible, and no doubt true, that some duties were considerably higher than this percentage, but that was the amount of duty paid over the whole of the imports. In 1919 the rate of duty had gone down to 1.91 per cent; in 1920 it had run up again to 2.25 per cent.

But, after all, I think on the continent of Europe the champion free trade nation is Holland. The Netherlands' average rate of duty in 1912 on goods both free and dutiable amounted to .44 per cent—less than one-half of one per cent—in 1918, .38 per cent; in 1919, .23 per cent. They raised their duty then to meet the expenses incurred during the war, and in 1920 the rate of duty had run up to a little more than 1 per cent—1.03 per cent.

Mr. LADNER: I might tell my hon. friend that I was in Belgium last summer. Is he not aware that a large quantity of those imports represent raw materials brought in for glass and other manufactures? They do not put a duty on such imports. They manufacture those materials and then export the finished goods to the United States and other countries. That is why they have such an enormous merchant marine and such a world-wide business.

Mr. McMASTER: That is exactly the point which was so properly placed before the House by the hon. member for Brantford, supplemented and, to a certain degree, corrected by myself—that it is these free trade nations who are able to take raw materials from the other nations, work them up by their energy, labour and experience, and ship them out and make money for their people.

Mr. LADNER: Does the hon. gentleman suggest as a result that Belgium is a free trade country so far as imports of manufactured goods are concerned? Does he know? I know she is not.

Mr. McMASTER: I will repeat what I said. I think I was very frank in my statement. I said that the duty collected on some £200,000,000, was almost £3,000,000, or an average rate of 1.50 per cent. I said that a great deal came in free, and I did not suggest for a moment that the rates of duty on what was dutiable was not more than 1½ per cent.

Mr. LADNER: You differentiated?

Mr. McMASTER: I have not differentiated, because I have not had time to get the figures together; in fact, I do not think they are available in this country. I have not attempted to differentiate between what came in free and what came in dutiable, but I say that if you take the whole import trade of Belgium in 1912, only 1½ per cent was levied on it. Some imports came in free, others, of course, were levied upon at higher rates than 1½ per cent. But I have some figures which will enable my hon. friend to appreciate my argument.

Mr. CRERAR: May I interrupt my hon. friend at this point? Were these duties in the nature of protective duties on such articles as were not produced in Belgium?

Mr. McMASTER: I do not know, but I would imagine that either the duties were protective over a very, very small number of articles, or they were merely revenue duties. There is only one of those two conclusions. But answering my friend from Vancouver (Mr. Ladner): In 1907—I got these figures from the report of the Free Trade Congress meeting held in 1908—in 1907, of Belgium's imports, 87.36 were free and 12.64 were taxed. So that shows that a very great majority, 87 per cent or more, came in free, and a very small minority came in taxed. Even on the latter the tax must have been very small.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Will the hon. gentleman permit me a question? Can he name any of those goods that come in free which are articles that do not compete with Belgian goods or Belgian industries?

Mr. McMASTER: I do not know. I cannot tell.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is the whole point.

Mr. McMASTER: A protectionist convinced against his will is of his own opinion still. Now, I have the figures for 1907 for Holland. In 1907 Holland, I see, laid a tax of 5 per cent on manufactured goods. I assume that in this case I can answer my right hon. friend, (Mr. Meighen) who is modestly sitting in the rear; those goods, I imagine, must come into competition with other goods made in Holland. On raw material and necessaries of life it was 2 per cent and 3 per cent, and as the total taxation in 1912 was less than one-half of one per cent, I presume that foodstuffs must have come in free. Holland, I should think, is in exactly the same position as Denmark; they are splendid agricultural countries; their agriculture is developed to a very high point of perfection, and they will have no protection upon food.

I think I might now pass to what I would call the great example of free trade, and that is the country which, I believe, has the honour of having been the native place of the member for Brantford (Mr. Raymond)—Great Britain. Let me deal first with the Key Industries Act. If there ever was a case, Mr. Speaker, of much cry and little wool, it has been the joy of the protectionists over the Key Industries Act. The Key Industries Act affords a protection, it is true, 33⅓ per cent on the articles included in a certain schedule, but if that schedule came into contact with the schedules in a real protectionist country, it would be absolutely lost; it is so small you would not be able to find it. It could be printed on half a page of this book which I hold in my hand. It deals with the most restricted classes of goods: optical glass and optical elements; theodolites, beakers, flasks, burettes, measuring cylinders, thermometers, tubing, and other scientific glassware, and lamp-blown ware; galvanometers, pyrometers, electroscopes, barometers, wireless valves and similar rectifiers—I will not read the whole list. The point I want to make is that the amount of goods which come under the Safeguarding of Industries Act is infinitesimal compared with the amount which goes free into the Old Land. Then there is provision for the imposition of a duty should a committee decide that certain goods are being sold in too keen competition with British goods. But the interests of the consumer are well safeguarded under the Key Industries Act. First of all there is provided a committee which must sit and investigate the case, and appeal may be had by any interest affected to a court of appeal constituted by the Lord Chancellor of England. This board may make an order, but if Parliament is going to sit within one month, that order cannot go into effect. If our protectionist friends would be willing to put their whole claim for protection under this act I do not know whether even such a convinced free trader as myself would not at least take it into earnest and sympathetic consideration.

What is the history of the free trade movement in England? Was it that English industry was built up under protection? —industry which takes the raw material from the fellaheen, the negro and the other persons who work in the hot parts of the earth to produce cotton and jute and cocoa and rubber and all those things which are used in the industries of Great Britain. Was it under protection? No, it was not. In 1721, first of all, Walpole started to take off duties. Then from 1823 to 1826, Huskisson took off a great number of duties. Then there was the great free trade agitation from 1837 to 1846, when John Bright and Richard Cobden, those two great apostles not only of free trade but of international brotherhood and of reason between man and man and between nation and nation, went throughout the length and breadth of the land. We had the repeal of the corn laws, and in 1860 we had the final doing away with duties. And what happened? Their trade went forward by leaps and bounds; their shipping increased by the hundreds and the thousands and the tens of thousands of tons. I cannot take the time of the House to go into the matter in detail but let me say that by reason of that free trade policy Great Britain not only became, for long, long years, the premier manufacturing country of the world, but she became the carrier, she became the banker, she became the insurer, for a great part of the whole known world. Prior to 1850—prior, indeed, to 1860—the United States, the other great nation of the world, carried fifty per cent of her own imports and her own exports in her own bottoms. The Stars and Stripes floated in nearly every sea; in nearly every port you could see the clipper-built ships of the United States—aye, and the clipper-built ships of Nova Scotia, because, although the United States stood on a high eminence at that time in the matter of shipping, alongside them were the sailors from the little province of Nova Scotia. But what happened after 1860? As the gentleman from Centre Toronto (Mr. Bristol) has said, protection was put on in the United States.

And protection "protected" the merchant marine of the United States almost out of existence, so that in 1900 not ten per cent of American imports and exports were carried in their own bottoms. There were other contributing factors, of course, but that is one; and I think the House and those of us who believe in the doctrines of free trade are deeply indebted to the member for Brantford for having brought before us this splendid example of how free trade helps nations to develop their secondary industries.

Now, I wish to deal for a short time with the budget itself. Let me say that I make the suggestions which I
5 p.m. have to make in a spirit of sincere diffidence and modesty. I am making suggestions to a finance minister who was my leader—and who is my leader—in matters of finance for very many years. I suppose the first time I heard the Minister of Finance speak was when I was a student in Montreal, on the occasion of a by-election, when we elected Jimmy McShane over Dr. William Hingston. The minister spoke in the old Windsor Hall—and ah, what a night was that! There was the Minister of Finance; there was Sir Wilfrid Laurier; there was the late Mr. Emmerson, from New Brunswick; and last but not least there was the Guysborough giant, D. C. Fraser, of Antigonish. The principles which were set forth then were the principles which were to guide the Liberal party. I believed in those principles then; I believe in those principles now, and in the light of those principles I propose to examine the budget.

The sales tax provisions are not what the member for Southeast Grey (Miss Macphail) described them to be—a step backward. I think the hon. member described the taking off of the 2½ per cent as a step forward and the putting on of the sales tax as a step backward. Well, that is not quite fair, because a sales tax goes not only upon the goods brought into the country but also upon goods manufactured in the country, and a great deal more of the resulting proceeds go into the coffers of the state. Now, I am stupid about figures; I like if possible to get things down in concrete shape, because I feel, Mr. Speaker, that if I myself understand them other people should be able to understand them as well. So I put this in a concrete way; I think I have arrived at the right facts, and I trust that my conclusions will commend themselves to the House. If a bolt of cloth be manufactured in Canada and sold by the manufacturer to the jobber, the manufacturer will add to his invoice 2¼ per cent under the new regulations. This amount the jobber will pay to the manufacturer who will account for it to the Government. That is the first step. Now the jobber when he comes to re-sell to the retailer has to add to his price the 2¼ per cent he paid to the manufacturer, and then, of course, if he is doing business on proper lines he must add to that his ordinary profit. Now let us suppose that the jobber is satisfied with an ordinary profit of 10 per cent—sometimes he will get more, sometimes he will get less; but I suppose 10 per cent is not an unfair profit to estimate. Therefore the tax when the goods arrive at the retailers amounts to 2¼ per cent imposed by the manufacturer, plus 2¼ per cent. That makes 4½ per cent plus profit —say 10 per cent to the jobber on the 2¼ per cent he has had to advance to the manufacturer, which is between one-fifth and one-fourth of a cent. Hence the retailer finds his purchase increased not by 4½ but by 4¾ per cent. On this he bases his profit. Now what a retailer's profit is it is sometimes difficult to say. I have heard of one large house which puts a hundred per cent on. I think that is profiteering, and as I like to quote people who, I believe, are doing the right thing, we will call it 40 per cent. That will include 40 per cent of the 4¾ per cent; so when it finally arrives to the consumer who pays it he does not pay 4½ per cent but a higher amount—the consumer pays 6⅜ per cent, that is to say if ordinary business methods are followed. Of course sometimes a jobber will absorb it, sometimes the merchant will absorb it; but I think as a general rule that under ordinary canons of business that tax of 4½ per cent will be 6⅜ per cent before it reaches the consumer. Now, if the bolt of cloth is manufactured in Canada and sold directly to the retailer by the mill—and that often happens—then the tax is 4½ per cent, there is only one profit to add, so that the ultimate consumer will bear 6⅜ per cent instead of, as it is, 6⅜ per cent. But suppose the bolt of cloth is manufactured in Bradford. It is sold to a jobber in Ottawa, re-sold by him to a retailer in Almonte, and sold by him to a minister of the gospel who is a member of the House of Commons on the Progressive side.

An hon. MEMBER: Name him.

Mr. McMASTER: We are not allowed here to name people by name. Now how does that work out? The duty under the new schedule, the duty on this bolt of cloth, is 27½ per cent, and the sales tax is 4½ per cent, which makes the aggregate impost when the cloth comes into this country 32 per cent. When that cloth reaches the consumer the jobber will have to have his profit on the duty which is advanced to the Government, if he imported it, and it will also have to bear the profit of the retailer. So I calculate that if we give the jobber his 10 per cent, and give the retailer his 40 per cent, we will make the duty borne by the consumer of this bolt of cloth 49 per cent and of this impost the sales tax and the profits on the sales tax amount to 5⅔ per cent. Now if the bolt of cloth is sold directly by the manufacturer in Bradford to the retailer in Almonte, the sales tax is 6 per cent and the duty will be 33⅓ per cent; and if the cloth was manufactured in Lowell, Massachusetts, the duty would be 41 per cent, and the duty borne by the consumer would be 41 per cent plus 40 per cent or 57½ per cent. Now what are the deductions that I make? First of all it seems to me that the imposing of a heavier duty, on the sale of the goods manufactured at home from the manufacturer or producer to the retailer—a heavier rate of duty than is borne in the case where the manufacturer sells to the jobber and the jobber then sells to the retailer—really discourages the elimination of the middleman. I know that an apparent unfairness, perhaps a real unfairness, might take place if we did not so increase the rate of the sales tax in that case; but I do say that one of the undesirable features of this sales tax is that it encourages the maintenance of the middleman or discourages his elimination. Now that is one, and I do not think a very important, direct objection to the tax, but where I think—and I submit this with a good deal of confidence—the tax is undesirable is the imposition of the sales tax on goods which, on entering this country, already pay a high customs duty. Because what happens? This may very possibly, may very likely, happen: That it makes very little difference whether you call it an impost, or a sales tax, or a protective or revenue duty—if the impost amounts to a high percentage the goods may not come in at all, and the revenue by that fact suffers. That is a point that should be borne in mind; and I respectfully ask the Finance Minister to carefully consider as to whether it would not be better to make these sales taxes, in reality what they are in name, excise taxes—to have them to a certain extent as countervailing duties. In that way we will get more money for the state and we will, in my humble opinion, substantially relieve the consumer.

Now I have dealt with the advantages of the sales tax over the mere imposition of customs duty by the tariff. The cuts are smaller than I had hoped for—smaller indeed than I believe I had reason to expect. If the Finance Minister will pardon me I cannot very well say that it is the quick, decisive step that he customarily takes in the right direction; I would say it is a short shuffle generally in the right direction. I am doubtful, too, about the advisability of waiting to see how the Americans are going to deal with their tariff before dealing with our own, but I say this: I am not going to take issue with the Finance Minister in that regard because he may have information which he is unable, naturally, to convey to the House, information which he has learned on his recent trip to Washington and which leads him to think that it is good tactics not to declare our cuts immediately. But I would remind him respectfully of what Peel said in 1841, that "the way to overcome hostile tariffs was by free imports."

Why do I accept this budget, with less enthusiasm however than I would like to have accepted it? Why do I accept it? I accept it, reserving my right to criticise any items of importance when we are in committee on the resolutions. I do so because I am unprepared to believe that the Liberal party has been, or will be, recreant to its history on the trade question. I sometimes think that some of my friends opposite are not quite as fair as they should be to the Liberal party in regard to what they did in connection with the tariff. We came in in 1896, and we did make substantial reductions in the customs duty. Open confession is good for the soul. I never pretended to be pleased with the revision of the tariff of 1904. We had increased the British preference until it was a full 33⅓ per cent, but in 1904, in response to that pressure which is constantly brought upon the government by organized protected interests of this country, which is not offset by the consuming interests as they should offset it,—in response to that pressure there were certain increases in lines of textiles, woollen cloth, tweed and wearing apparel and on twine and cordage, and slight reductions were made on china and window glass. Then we had the revision of 1907. As to that revision I am not prepared to say whether that was a revision which on the whole reduced or increased the British preference. I have in my hand a statement of the textile items of the tariff, and I find there were decreases in 18 items, and there were increases in 18 items, and no change in 9 items, and no change in 14 items on the free list. There were 59 textile items in the customs tariff of 1907 and they were divided, as I say. Whether the increases were greater than the decreases I do not know, but I am sorry the decreases in the preference were made, and I am glad the increases in the preference were made. But whatever our backslidings in the past were, what we did in 1911 should be accounted to us for righteousness. I suppose I will get the name in this House of being a candid friend, disagreeing at times with everybody but not necessarily all at the same time, but I do not think the Liberal party has had quite as much credit from the western friends as it should have for what we did in 1911. In 1878 the Liberal party went down to defeat because it stood up for the rights of the consuming public against the organized protected manufacturers of this country. In 1911 they did the same thing, and they met the same fate. We were not altogether blameless in the matter, and I will tell the House why. Because, from 1904 to 1911 we had, doubtless because of perfectly natural and reasonable causes, a pressure of work on ministers which was abominable and abnormal—more than it should be, we had not been preaching our gospel as we should have preached it, and generation after generation of young men came to the age of 21 who had never heard the trade question discussed, who did not know that trade was a good thing in itself and were therefore able to be led astray and beguiled by the specious argument of "no truck or trade with the Yankees", or the statement that our loyalty would be affected if we dealt in potatoes, or apples, or wheat, or barley, or flax, with the United States. But we went down fighting for a great cause. And it is because we have done these things in the past that I propose to maintain my support of the budget in the present instance. We have also the declarations of the Liberal party in connection with the trade policy. We have the Ottawa platform of 1893, and I may say if one will read over this platform of 1893 he will find that everything in it is true, that after having experienced protection from 1878 to 1893 the Liberal party came to the conclusion expressed in their platform was right, and I say that in the mind of every informed, unprejudiced and disinterested man, everything that happened since that time bears out the truth and soundness of the position we took. I rely upon the statement made by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) in introducing his budget of 1897—which was the beginning of a fresh era for Canada. Now let us be fair to the Liberal party and let us be fair to the Minister of Finance. Canada after 1896 was a different place from what it was prior to that time. The Minister of Finance, who is the Minister of Finance to-day, after having read the Ottawa platform said:

> Mr. Speaker, the electors of Canada, in due course, gave their verdict upon that and upon other issues, and subject to such changes as changing circumstances may require, and as to which I shall have something to say as I proceed, we accept the Liberal platform of Ottawa as the declaration of principles which we are bound to follow in our tariff reform.

I pass on to a declaration made by one whose name is ever dear to and revered by not only Liberals but all well disposed Canadian citizens. I refer to Sir Wilfrid Laurier. During the last days of his life he was present at a meeting of the Eastern Ontario Liberal Association, held in this city, and on the 14th January, 1919, he spoke as follows, concerning the trade question:

> Sir, I told you at the commencement of my speech that it was the commercial freedom of England which enabled her to pass triumphantly through this war from an economic point of view. England, needless to say, has always been in the van of the greatest advances with respect to freedom of any kind, whether it be religious freedom, civil freedom, or political freedom; there are no people in the world to-day who have a greater degree of these liberties than have the English people or the Canadian people. In the matter of commercial freedom, England has not only been well to the front, but has been very much in advance of any other people.

Discussing the question of the granting of preference to Great Britain and the Conservative party's objections thereto, he stated:

> We do it (we grant the preference) because we are British subjects and because we believe in the principles of free trade. We believe also that it is for the good of the Canadian people that we should adopt that policy, and by that policy we stand to-day.

I adhere to this budget and support it because of this fact; that we had a great convention at Ottawa in 1919. We passed a trade plank in the platform which I consider is a sound plank for the people of this country and after we had passed that trade plank the present Minister of Finance allowed his friends to nominate him as the leader of the Liberal party. I do not think for one moment that the present Minister of Finance would ever, after that platform was passed, have allowed his friends to place him in nomination had he not been in substantial agreement with that platform—I do not mean to say that he was prepared to cross every "t" and to dot every "i" of the platform—but in substantial agreement with the decisions reached at that convention.

Let me speak just a moment in conclusion—and I have delayed the House too long—concerning where we can get the money. It is a hard thing to get money for the state; it presents many difficulties, and there are many dangers in connection with it. I am going to refer the Minister of Finance to what he said on the 14th of March, 1919, in this House, as reported on page 484 of Vol. 1, of Hansard, of 1919:

> But my hon. friends who are interested in tariff questions will bear me out in this, that when you increase the tariff on a class of goods that are made at home, not only do you get the increased duty which you collect at the customs house, but for every dollar that you collect at the customs house for increased duty, the consumer pays to the manufacturer two dollars which does not go into the public treasury.

It is towards those two dollars that I direct the attention of the Minister of Finance. I believe it will be found on investigation, in certain lines, the Canadian manufacturer occupies the field to such an extent that imports are negligible. I believe it will also be found that he has abused this privilege that the tariff has given him by watering his stock, by capitalizing the tariff against the taxpayers of this country. I should like to draw to the attention of the House two instances which came to my notice just the other day, and which were given me by a man in whom I have the utmost confidence, Mr. Isaac Pedlow, who was a valued member of this House during the last Parliament. He is a merchant in Renfrew. He was selling collars for 18 cents each, or three for fifty cents. His competitors were selling the same collars for 25 cents each, and he was refused by the manufacturer additional supplies of those collars. The manufacturer would not allow him to sell the collar at the price at which he wanted to sell it. That is an example of the tyranny of the trust.

[Mr. McMaster.]

Let me give the House another example, which will interest the ladies. It refers to silk stockings. The Niagara Maid Manufacturing Company manufacture a silk stocking which was sold to Mr. Pedlow at what averaged $1.37½ a pair. He put them on the market at a very fair profit to himself, at $1.75 a pair, or a profit of between 30 and 40 per cent. His competitors were selling these stockings at $2 a pair, and he was instructed by the selling agency of the mill that he could have no more of those stockings unless he was prepared to sell them for $2 a pair instead of $1.75. You say: "Should the attention of people be drawn to such trifling matters as these?" Yes, because these things show that, in many lines of primary necessaries of this country—I suppose silk stockings are not an absolute necessity of this country, although some people may think they are—it is not the ordinary trading rules which obtain; but by the control of the market, because manufacturers can do this under no other circumstances, the manufacturer is endeavouring to make of free merchants men who have to be, to a certain extent, his serfs, to do what he tells them. It is what Mr. Edward Porritt calls an example of the new feudalism, and the sooner we get away from that the better.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Is the hon. member not aware that the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) has solemnly undertaken to get rid of all those practices that he complains of by trusts?

Mr. McMASTER: I am glad to know that he has, and he will have every help which the member for Brome can give him to accomplish that end.

Now, we come to the amendment. I will not read it, because it reminds me of a story of John Henry Pope, who came from that part of the province of Quebec which I have the honour to represent. In talking about something that was said, he exclaimed: "There ain't nothing to it," and that is all, with due respect to the leader of the Opposition (Mr. Meighen) that I can say about the amendment. What is it? It is just another example of the policy of "scold." It gets you nowhere because, what do they say? Are they blaming the Minister of Finance because he has not taken duties down? Not at all. They want him to put them up. There is not very much in the amendment; there is not a great deal to it. I sometimes am glad, because I am a humane man, that the members of the official Opposition are not living in the sixteenth century and are not of the female sex, because at that time they had an institution known as the "ducking pool" for common scolds, and I am afraid many of them would run a close risk of landing in that watery place.

What of the future? What has been the record of the Liberal party in the past? Can we depend upon the record of the Liberal party in the past to give promise that the Liberal party will be the great party of progress and freedom in the future, because the party of progress and freedom, by whatever name that party may be called, is going to rule this country in the future. The Liberal party has traditions. It has given to this country William Lyon Mackenzie, Louis Joseph Papineau, Baldwin, Lafontaine, and Papin. It has given to the country George Brown and Aime Antoine Dorion. It has given to the country Alexander Mackenzie, Edward Blake and Sir Wilfrid Laurier. I believe we should endeavour to be true to those great men of the past, and to see that we carry on the affairs of the Liberal party and of the country along the lines which they laid down.

Mr. MARTELL: Does the hon. member include Joseph Howe?

Mr. McMASTER: I would include him; but alas for him, he joined a Union government. But he was in his time a great tribune of the people, and his voice and his name will never be forgotten while Canada remains. It would be, I say, a sad thing if the parties of progress were disunited. We have had an example in the old land of the effect of disunion amongst the parties of progress. We have had the independent Liberals, we have had the Labour party, largely animated by the same ideals, largely standing for the same principle, but kept apart by certain things, perhaps of secondary importance. I want to see in this country—I know I do; I know I speak for my electors, and I believe I speak for the rank and file of the Liberal party throughout this country—a Liberal party so truly Liberal that, under the broad folds of its banner, all people who love Canada, who love progress, who love liberty, who love equality, may find their proper place. That party must be free from all sinister influences. It must be strong in the confidence of the people. It must deserve the confidence of the people. It must be guided, not by the fitful flare of expediency, but by the polar star of those Liberal principles which in the past have animated men of good will to bring about, upon this old world of ours, better conditions for the plain and common man.

Mr. W. C. GOOD (Brant): I would not ask the indulgence of the House were it not for the fact that there are some very important considerations in connection with the present question under discussion which have not yet been placed before the House, and for this reason I am going to ask that indulgence in order that I may present those considerations.

First of all, however, I should like to say this: I did hope for very much more, in the direction of what would seem to me to be real progress, than is evident in the budget that has been proposed. And perhaps, if I were absolutely sincere, I might say that I did not expect very much more, knowing the record and the present composition of the so-called Liberal party. Regarding the amendment, I have nothing to say. But I have looked up the record of the Liberal party, both in the recent and remote past, in connection with the tariff question and the whole protective philosophy, and I shall present to the House a brief statement of the various opinions which have been proclaimed by the Liberal party for some little time in regard to this subject. In discussing the amendment, I think it is quite pertinent that we should know what the Liberal party has stood for, and what it purports to stand for at the present time.

Now, in regard to the last campaign, I would submit to the House—and I do so subject to correction by the hon. member for Brantford (Mr. Raymond)—that this hon. gentleman, at all events, did make it perfectly plain to his constituents that he did not subscribe to the 1919 platform of the Liberal party in respect to its tariff planks. How many other hon. members who proclaim themselves Liberals occupy the same position and so stated their attitude during the last campaign I do not know, but I know that in this particular case the hon. member for Brantford proclaimed openly and publicly that so far as the tariff plank in the Liberal party's platform was concerned, he repudiated it.

Next, I want to refer to some history, and I shall begin with a little item that appeared in the Toronto Globe of April 15, 1858. It reads:

A meeting called by agreement of gentlemen holding protectionist views on commercial matters in various parts of the country assembled yesterday in St. Lawrence Hall in this city. The aggregate attendance was about two hundred.

That this meeting was attended with success is indicated in an item which appeared in The Globe of March 25th, in the next year, 1859. Note the following:

With a degree of haste as rare as it is unseemly, the government yesterday forced the new tariff through all its stages in the legislative council. It was read the first, second and third time on one day; and now only awaits the Governor-General's sanction to become law. To accomplish their purpose ministers proposed to set aside an established rule of the council devised to prevent precipitous legislation; and they succeeded in carrying the point.

I wish now to call the attention of the House to a number of addresses that were given in the campaign of 1877, published under this title:

Picnic Speeches Delivered in the Province of Ontario During the Summer of 1877, by the Hon. Alexander Mackenzie, the Hon. Edward Blake, the Hon. R. J. Cartwright, the Hon. L. S. Huntington, and the Hon. David Mills.

There is some interesting reading in this record of the position which the Liberal party took in regard to the tariff question at that time. I want to quote just one extract from the remarks of the Hon. David Mills:

"The Conservative opposition"—said Hon. David Mills, March 15, 1877, in denouncing customs duties—"might disguise their proposal as they please, but it meant plunder and nothing else. It meant taking from the pockets of every consumer a sum to be given to some other person; and the system by which this was done was a system of plunder".

"If", continued Mills, "people knew that honourable gentlemen opposite intended to impose taxes to the amount of twenty-eight million dollars instead of fifteen millions, and that only fifteen millions would go into the public treasury, the balance passing into the pockets of certain capitalists, they would not support such a proposal. And yet, that is precisely the proposal of honourable gentlemen opposite, disguise it as they may."

The next record which I shall submit to the House is from a speech of the late Right Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier. Speaking at the Liberal Convention in Ottawa, June 20-21, 1893, he said:

It seems to me that it (the Paterson resolution) could hardly be improved upon. It is a thorough arraignment of the policy the government has followed. It sets forth all the evils which have flowed from the system of protection. It draws the line, clear and distinct, between the policy of liberty and freedom, and the policy of slavery; because, I leave it to the judgment of every free man, to the farmers, and above all I leave it to the working man in the cities, if protection is anything else but slavery.

I have many other quotations in connection with that Liberal Convention of 1893.

[Mr. Good.]

I shall not read them all at the present time because it would take too long. But a number of statements were made by Sir Wilfrid Laurier and others; and there were statements as well embodied in the election literature issued by the Liberal party in the campaign that took place in 1896. I have one here from the handbook that was used at that time:

Protection has been tried and found wanting. The Liberals offer a policy of free trade limited only by the necessities of revenue required for the honest, economic administration of the Government.

In the platform of the Liberal party as adopted on that occasion we find a most sweeping condemnation of the whole protective system. I have it before me, but I shall not take time to read it. I wish, however, to remind the House of what happened in 1896; and although I should like to feel a little more charitably disposed towards the government of that day than I do feel, at the same time I want to say frankly that it was a most bitter disappointment to the farmers—and shall I say?—to very many other people in this country that, in the first revision in 1897 that followed the election of the new government, further reductions were not made in the tariff. And I must say that, looking back on the history and the record of the government of that time, and seeing the beginning which is now made in, I admit, the right direction, we wonder whether or not the history of that time and that government is to be repeated on this occasion.

Now, reference has been made to the election of 1911. I want to read a little item from the Toronto Globe of November 8, 1911. Commenting upon the situation that then existed and that had existed for some time previously, this paper said:

The big interests of all kinds in Canada, like their ilk in the United States, while as individuals they call themselves Liberals or Conservatives, and may even hold party offices, are not any longer in any real sense party men. Great railway corporations, protected monopolies, and the banks that finance their exploitations and mergers are playing in Canada the same bipartisan game that was played so disastrously to public interest and national honour in the United States. Let there be no mistake. The horns and hoofs of the American system are already within the doorstep of Canada's house of government. The fight for freedom from its vulgar and oppressive domination has only begun in Canada.

Now, Mr. Speaker, we know what happened in 1911. I supported the late Hon. William Paterson with all my strength in that election, and I have always believed that the adoption of the Reciprocity Agreement would have been one of the best things that could have happened to this country. So I want to give every credit to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) and to his colleagues in the then government for their action at that time. But a year later we have a pronouncement by a gentleman who now sits in this House as senior member for Halifax (Mr. Maclean). On March 13th, 1912, he stated:

> We were divided in Canada on the National Policy for a good many years. Nevertheless, once the two parties came to see that the National Policy was essential to the country that division disappeared.

The hon. member was, I believe, an adherent of the Liberal party then in opposition, and here we have a frank admission that any difference which had existed between the two old parties prior to 1911 had then disappeared.

And I have another quotation here, Mr. Speaker. It is from a speech delivered in this House on June 9th, 1919, by a gentleman who announced himself as a protectionist Liberal. I refer to Hon. C. C. Ballantyne, who was Minister of Marine and Fisheries in the late government. Listen to this, Sir:

> I am a protectionist Liberal, a believer in moderate protection. Before I strayed from the fold, I did not find that my views were at variance with those of the majority of members composing the Liberal party of that day. Nor do I think that my views as a moderate protectionist Liberal would be much at variance to-day with those of the majority of hon. members sitting to the left of the Chair. We can only judge the Liberal party by the policy they pursued during the fifteen years they were in power. I for one saw no tangible signs of free trade during that period.

Mark that, Mr. Speaker:

> I for one saw no tangible signs of free trade during that period.

An admission by a man who represented himself as belonging to the Liberal party, that he saw no signs of free trade, apparently no signs of the carrying out of the professions made in the platform of 1893, during those fifteen years from 1896 to 1911! I am not saying he is right, but that is his statement made on the floor of this House only two years ago. He continued:

> The manufacturers of this country were perfectly satisfied with the fiscal policy of the Liberal government during those fifteen years . . . I think I may safely say that one can take as his very best guide in matters of this kind the policy of such great men as have filled the office of prime minister of this country during the last fifty years, and when the policy of moderate protection has been adhered to by both Conservative and Liberal governments, that must be the easiest and best way of raising the necessary revenue, and also the fairest and most equitable system, having regard to the diversified interests that exist.

Then I have here the tariff planks in the Liberal platform of 1919, partly quoted in the amendment. I am not going to read those planks; we all know what they are. They practically reassert the assertions in the platform of 1893, and they are, as everyone knows, in very marked accord with the tariff planks in the Farmers' national platform.

Now, with respect to this extraordinary transformation—one authority has called it the "great apostacy"—I find the following in the report of the tariff committee of the Canadian Manufacturers' Association for 1918-19 as printed in Industrial Canada for July 1919:

> As the tariff changes demanded at this session of Parliament—

That is 1919.

> —go much farther than the Reciprocity Agreement of 1911 towards free trade with the United States, the threatened danger to the future of Canada is proportionately increased. From these denationalizing agencies our protective custom laws, inaugurated forty years ago, preserve our country. It is fundamental that the maintenance of our separate British nationality depends upon the retention of our freedom to shape our protective custom laws to serve our own needs.

In conclusion perhaps I might read a rather cynical comment which appeared in "Saturday Night" upon the situation as represented in the extract that I have just read. As I say, the comment is rather cynical, but it contains a good deal of wisdom. It is as follows:

> The flag-waver is generally the man with the coin, or the man with the axe to grind. It was ever so. Kings and princes, through all the centuries, have waved their flags and their banners, and called upon their loyal supporters to fight the enemy. And the loyal supporters were just good enough and foolish enough to do it. Therefore, the kings and princes continued to rule over them and so they should. The financial kings and princes now wave the flag. The voter comes manfully forward and, with eyes blinded with patriotic tears, marks his little cross on the ballot for the "interests". Therefore the "interests" continue to rule over us, and so they should.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I am going to ask a very definite and, I think, a fair question. What is the significance of the extraordinary variety and contradictory nature of the views expressed and the conduct of the Liberal party for the last fifty years? To me there are three possible explanations: First, was the Liberal party insincere in its professions? If it was, that is an explanation. I do not answer the question; I ask it. Second, was it bribed, controlled or dominated against its convictions by tariff beneficiaries? Again, I do not answer that question; I ask it. Or third, has it honestly changed its mind and adopted protection as a sound national policy? I think that we who sit in this quarter of the chamber, at all events myself, have a right to ask those questions, and to have them answered. I am not going to answer them, because I cannot.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Why not make it twenty-four hours, and not fifty years?

Mr. GOOD: In that connection I am going to refer to some statements that were made here a few weeks ago, and one just the other day by some British Columbia members, to the effect that one's views on the tariff are geographically determined, and, further, that the whole tariff question is one of expediency and compromise and not one of principle. Even if it were true that one's views on these matters were determined by one's place of residence, the rightness or wrongness of the tariff system would not be thereby determined in the most infinitesmal respect. I would like to repudiate absolutely the suggestion that we in this chamber are morally justified in considering this question from the selfish standpoint of our own occupation or our own locality. It seems to me that if we cannot approach the question from the point of view of the general interests of Canada, then it is absolutely hopeless to try to arrive at any right conclusion. I propose, therefore, to examine the protective system without any reference to locality or occupation and to ask the question: Is it a sound national policy? Were the professions of the Liberal party in times gone by, as stated in their platforms, based on sound principles, or were they not? I hope in that review and criticism of the protective philosophy to establish this point: viz, that the whole protective system has no possible justification from the point of view of right and justice.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

After Recess

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. GOOD: Mr. Speaker, when the House rose at six o'clock, I had proposed an inquiry into the protective system, in order to find out if there were any reasonable basis for the persistent adherence of the Conservative party to that system, and for the evident disposition on the part of at least some of the Liberal party to lean that way and, after excusing the system, partly to adopt it. I stated that this inquiry ought to be undertaken, not from the point of view of any occupation or any section in Canada; that we ought to judge the matter regardless of whether we live in British Columbia, or Saskatchewan, or Nova Scotia, regardless of whether we are farmers, merchants, manufacturers, or whether we follow other occupations. In this inquiry, which I shall try to make as brief as possible, there are a few preliminary considerations which, I think, we shall all agree upon.

In the first place, I submit that it ought not to be very difficult for a reasonable and disinterested man to come to some fairly accurate conclusion, because the subject matter of the inquiry is that of every day experience. In the second place, I think we ought to bear in mind that we should not be influenced by what might be called the weight of general acceptance, because when we look back over history, we find at times that many delusions and errors have had widespread acceptance, so that the fact, if it be a fact, that many people and many countries believe in and have adopted the protective system is, in my judgment, no reason why it is a good system. In the third place, I think we ought to bear in mind that social and individual advantage do not always coincide. There is a rather famous passage in the Book of the Acts recounting the agitation that a certain silversmith of Ephesus was instrumental in bringing about when his business was threatened. Hon. members will remember, if they recall the passage, how he made a great to-do about the preaching of Paul and expressed the opinion that thereby the great Goddess Diana would be deposed from her magnificence. Now, all kinds of disasters, such as war, fire and famine might result in conditions that would be profitable to particular individuals. But in such cases we could not justify these various calamities simply because certain private persons had benefited thereby. We ought then to bear in mind, in considering this whole question, that individual and social advantage do not always coincide. They do sometimes, but not always.

Now, coming to our enquiry, I submit first that the protective theory denies the fundamental truth that trade is a form of co-operation, and that, as civilization progresses, independence is replaced by interdependence. I was very much amused a few years ago when I heard in the House of Commons, when it met in the Museum building, the hon. member for Brantford at that time, Mr. W. F. Cockshutt, speaking on the budget. He started out on the assumption that trade was not a form of co-operation but essentially of competition, and that the seller was always the person who profited while the buyer was always the victim. Of course, starting out with an assumption of that kind, which is fundamentally false, he was led to all kinds of false conclusions. I say, then, that the protective system assumes that trade is essentially not co-operation, although any student of economics and of civilization knows that it is a form of co-operation. In that connection I desire to read a very concise statement of this truth by a celebrated Belgian who some years ago wrote a book entitled "Pax Economica." This author, M. Henri Lambert, says:

> To deny the benefits of international exchange —and consequently of free exchange—is, in fact, to deny the advantages of division of labour and the increase in productiveness resulting therefrom. It is, therefore, to deny that which is evident. A country which determines to be self-supporting must resign itself to an inferior productivity and standard of wealth. If such a country continues to prosper, it will be by reason of natural advantages, because of high intelligence and labour energy of its inhabitants, because of interior free exchange, and despite its efforts to be self-sustaining.

Now, I submit that our various efforts at improving means of communication and transportation are sufficient witness to and proof of the advantages of trade and commerce, and that when tariff walls are erected between any two countries whatever, or between the sections of any country, a policy is being adopted which contradicts and violates the fundamental truth that trade is a form of co-operation. The protectionist philosophy, if it is true, must assert as a general law that protection is a universal need. In that connection, let me ask hon. members to recall the situation that existed in the United States about the year 1787, when the Union was formed. Prior to that time there were inter-state tariffs in the United States, but thereafter those tariffs were abolished and what you might call an external tariff, small at that time, was established. I am going to ask this question: Was it good for the various states prior to 1787 to have those inter-state tariffs? If so, then it was bad for them to do away with those tariffs; when they confederated they should have retained them. I submit further that if it is beneficial to have a tariff wall between Ontario and New York, it should also be beneficial, by the same reasoning, to have a tariff wall between Ontario and Quebec or between Quebec and New Brunswick. Indeed, why should we not have a tariff wall between, say, Ottawa and Montreal? Why should not the industries of Ottawa say to the citizens of Ottawa, "Give us protection against the industries of Montreal"? In fact, the nearer two communities are together the more similar are the conditions and the keener the competition; and it seems to me, without spending further time upon the matter, that this reasoning must lead us to the conclusion that if we applied the protective philosophy in that way and reduced the areas under consideration it would result in absurdity; we should then have a reductio ad absurdum. How would it be to have the various towns in the same county protected against each other's competition? I think that even the most convinced protectionists must admit that from that point of view the thing is altogether illogical.

But the protectionist says that the nation is the protective unit. Then I ask the question frankly and fairly, why so? Political boundaries are arbitrary and shifting. They take no account of natural, industrial or climatic conditions. Take, for instance, the case of Texas. There was a time when what is now the state of Texas belonged to Mexico. Before Texas was annexed by the United States of America protectionists on both sides of the dividing line would argue that it was a good thing both for the United States and for Mexico that there should be a tariff wall between them; and at that time the tariff wall would run on the north boundary of what is now the state of Texas. After the annexation of Texas the consistent protectionists would be forced to argue that the removal of the tariff wall that then took place was a misfortune to the people on both sides of the boundary. But they did not do so, but transferred the wall, suddenly and without any change in industrial conditions, from the north to the south boundary of Texas. Take also the provinces of Alsace and Lorraine in Europe, which have recently been transferred from Germany to France. In that case, too, the consistent protectionists would argue, in fact they must argue if they are logical, that the removal of the tariff wall from the western boundary of these two provinces to the eastern boundary was a misfortune. I think it must be evident to all hon. gentlemen that the protectionist reasoning breaks down when you consider that political boundaries are arbitrary and often shift overnight. Indeed, I believe that unhampered trade, if we would but once realize it, pays no more attention to political boundaries than do the birds of the air of the fishes of the sea.

I pass now to consider for a moment tariffs for revenue and tariffs for protection. Historically tariffs originated as means of securing revenue. I do not think there is any doubt about that; and a celebrated Frenchman, once speaking of this particular system, said that it was the best way of "plucking the goose with the least squawking."

It seems to me that the system which was thus described accords with a system of government which has very happily disappeared—a system of government in which the governors by hook or by crook obtained what money they could by any and all kinds of taxation from unwilling subjects. But now under our system of government we are not subjects of a ruler, we are citizens of a country, and if we have the proper point of view we contribute taxes willingly for the public services. And it seems to me that indirect taxes are bad in themselves largely because they are indirect, and that in this respect direct taxes are much better. Indirect taxes, like the tariff tax, the sales tax, and other like taxes, may be evaded, concealed and shifted, and often are, and the results are unfortunate.

Now, turning to tariffs for protection, I very frankly admit that it may seem to be in the public interest to protect certain infant industries for the time being. But I submit that if the collective wisdom of the people decides that any particular industry which has a fair prospect of becoming permanently self-sustaining needs assistance by the state, this assistance should be given directly in the form of a bounty, instead of indirectly by means of a tariff. In order to make my meaning clearer, I submit a case which I think will illustrate the difference between the bounty system and the tariff system from the purely protective point of view. Let it be supposed, for example, that we want to encourage the development of aerial navigation. Would it be a sensible policy to assist the people engaged in that development by granting them a bounty, or by putting a handicap upon all other means of transportation—to put a tax upon the use of our highways, our railways and canals, and in that indirect way assist the infant industry of aerial transportation? It seems to me that when we look at it this way we see that the bounty or direct subsidy, if it be necessary, is in every way to be commended as compared with the indirect system of protection by means of tariffs, because under the bounty system you pay only in proportion as the particular industry which it is desired to develop does develop, and you do not put a handicap upon all other competing industries. I must say in that connection that while the bounties which were given a good many years ago by the government of which the present Minister of Finance was also then Minister of Finance may have been excessive, I do think that the principle then adopted to assist certain industries was the right principle, providing, of course, that assistance was considered necessary or advisable.

However, there is another consideration which I think we ought to bear in mind in connection with the so-called encouragement of infant industries, and that is that as soon as the infants get big they want more encouragement than when they were small. In a word, in practice, the system does not work out according to the theory. I suppose all farmers have observed that in litters of pigs the little runt, instead of getting the best place and the biggest share, is shoved off to one side by the big husky fellows, and he is practically starved to death.

An hon. MEMBER: The bigger the calf the more milk he takes.

Mr. GOOD: As one hon. gentleman remarks, the bigger the calf the more milk he takes—and, I think, the more anxious he is to stay on the job and the more fuss he makes when weaning time comes.

Now, Mr. Speaker, when we look back over the history of our protective system, I think we shall find that these infants as soon as they grow pretty big shove the little fellows to the wall and continue to get the lion's share. So while it may be theoretically defensible to encourage infant industries, either by tariffs or bounties—and I think the bounty system is very much better; in fact, I think the tariff system is indefensible—in practice the more encouragment they get the more they want. That has been the history of the encouragement of infant industries in this country, and I think it should bid us beware.

But some of the adherents of the protective system claim that we must have "adequate protection" of all Canadian industries. I submit that in the nature of the case this is impossible. You cannot protect local industries—a local newspaper, a local blacksmith, or any other local industry—their field is necessarily restricted, and therefore it is absolutely absurd to talk about protecting those industries. In the second place, you cannot protect those major industries which have a surplus to export, such as our wheat-growing industry in the Canadian West, our cattle industry, or any other of a number of our major industries—these it is impossible to protect. It is absolutely impossible to give adequate protection to all Canadian industries. It does not and cannot work out that way, and we have to recognize the fact that when we once start the system the inevitable result is that the few industries,—the big husky infants, so to speak,—get the lion's share and the others necessarily are left with the husks.

The protective system is also advocated as necessary to secure what is called a "favourable balance of trade". Now, if that is a desirable end in view, why should we not carry goods from where they are dear to where they are cheap? In that way we would get a maximum export and a minimum import. Or, better still, let us sink all ships at sea, and then we will have the summum bonum of the protectionist philosophy so far as it applies to international trade. I think the protectionist fails to see that international trade is essentially barter, and that in the long run imports and exports have to balance one another. This is a recognized truth among economists, and we should not forget it. Of course, there are some modifications when one country pays tribute to another in the form of interest.

In regard to protection against what is called cheap foreign labour, the hon. member for Brome (Mr. McMaster) dealt with that this afternoon, and showed very conclusively I think that so-called cheap labour is not by any means always really cheap labour. The cost of production indeed is dependent not only on wages but on climate, on resources and on the efficiency of labour; and this we must bear in mind. We should also bear in mind in that connection the distinction between what we might call real wages and nominal wages.

I submit further, Mr. Speaker, that no matter what the advantages of one country may be over another, international trade is always beneficial, because in some respects one country will have certain relative advantages over its neighbours, and those industries in the one country which have a relative superiority will be able to export their product to the other country. Let me take an example: It might be argued that we can manufacture sugar in Canada more cheaply than they can manufacture it in the West Indies, but I submit that even though that be true our advantage over the West Indies in the production of wheat and cattle is so marked that it is a better and more sensible policy for us to use our labour in those industries and buy our sugar from the West Indies, for instance, rather than manufacture it at home.

Now, in regard to retaliatory tariffs, it seems to me that this is something which comes home very strongly to a great many people. It is said that the United States has done us a bad turn; that they have been disagreeable; that they have been unfair, and the sentiment at once is to retaliate. If they will not let us into their market, it is argued, then we should not let them into ours. But I submit that if we take that attitude we are likely to cut off our nose to spite our face. When we look into the matter a little more closely we find that that policy is essentially a mistaken one. Take the case of two men, one specializing in the growing of wheat and the other in the growing of potatoes. It is a great advantage for the man who wants the excellent wheat to go to his neighbour and get it, and it is likewise an advantage to the man who wants the excellent potatoes to be able to get them from his neighbour. Suppose the wheat grower went to the other man and, upon endeavouring to sell his wheat to him, was met with refusal, what would you think of him if he said: "Well, if you will not buy my wheat, I will not buy your potatoes"? He would simply be denying himself the advantage of getting the good potatoes which the other man was specially qualified to produce. It seems to me that if we eliminate sentiment in this matter and study it on a common sense basis, we must admit that the policy of retaliatory tariffs is indefensible. The only possible justification I can see for it is that by threatening the other man or the other country you might bring him or them to terms. I do not know how far that is possible; I am afraid, however, that the effect would be the opposite.

A good deal has been said about diversified industry. That is another claim which is made for protective tariffs; it is said that protection does secure diversified industries. I think that protectionists make an entirely unwarranted assumption in this regard. I do not think that tariffs are necessary to build up diversified industry in any country. In fact, I deny it absolutely; all history and all common sense point in the other direction. Where you have a country opened up as our Northwest has been opened up in recent years, you will find the primary industries being first developed, and then when the proper time comes you will find, inevitably, the development of the secondary industries taking place. It is impossible for any civilization to develop unless in that particular way. While it may be possible to encourage certain secondary industries by tariff protection and by bounties, it is not necessary to enact tariff walls or adopt a protective system in order to secure diversification of industries.

I would like to submit in that connection also to some of our protectionist
9 p.m. friends in this chamber that at the present time the Canadian manufacturer, who has been crying out for protection for so long, finds his Canadian market practically gone on account of the decadence of agriculture. We heard yesterday from the hon. member for Brantford (Mr. Raymond) how the warehouses of the manufacturers of implements in the city of Brantford are full and the workmen idle. Why are they full? Because the farmers are in such a position at the present time that they cannot buy. I would like to submit to our manufacturing friends that they should turn their eyes a little more definitely to our Canadian market and endeavour to ascertain how the Canadian farmer can be advantaged, how he can be put in a position to buy their implements. I submit also to our protectionist friends that they should consider the possibility of developing an export trade. I cannot understand why the Canadian manufacturers, who are such agitators and propagandists for protective tariffs, do not see that if they are going to develop an export trade as have England, Belgium, Switzerland and the other countries we heard of yesterday and this afternoon, they have to reduce their cost of production in this country. That is the only possible way in which they can compete in a foreign market in manufactured goods.

[Mr. Good.]

Personally, I wish our Canadian manufacturers all success and all prosperity; I would like to see Canadian manufacturing developed to a much greater extent than it is at the present time. But I contend that that can be done not by imposing protective duties, not by hampering both the primary and the secondary industries of the country, but by giving the manufacturer free raw material and lower labour costs—and we can give the Canadian manufacturer lower labour costs by making the cost of living lower for the Canadian working man. It seems to me, therefore, that a freer trade policy would be absolutely to the advantage of the Canadian manufacturers, as it has been for the British manufacturers. It would be to the advantage both of agriculture and of the primary and secondary industries.

It is said further that infant industries or small industries cannot establish themselves in the face of competition from the old established and stronger industries. That is the plea constantly made on behalf of certain Canadian industries—that they cannot compete against the larger industries in the United States. If that is true, Mr. Speaker, what of the manufacturing in our own West which is beginning to be established? Are these manufacturers able to establish themselves against the competition of the old established and stronger manufacturing industries in the Canadian East? We have no tariff between the Canadian West and the Canadian East. Would our protectionist friends advocate a tariff between western Canada and eastern Canada in order to protect the manufacturing industries in western Canada? I ask them, frankly and candidly, would they advocate that? It seems to me that if they are true to their own philosophy they must advocate a tariff in order to protect the infant manufacturing industries of western Canada against the older and longer established industries in the East.

I want to submit in this connection that if we study the industrial history of the United States we shall find that as the primary industries developed in the Mississippi valley and westward, the secondary industries followed them up and established themselves through that whole territory in open competition with the long established manufacturing industries on the Atlantic sea-board. I remember some years ago talking to a couple of men from the New England states who were interested in the boot and shoe industry. They told me that in St. Louis the boot and shoe industry had become firmly established in open competition with the very powerful boot and shoe industries in the New England states. Why? Because the market was out there, because the raw material was out there, and because the manufacturers saw the possibilities and the prospect of sure success in that territory. And so it will be everywhere: If we have concern for the development of our primary industries we do not need to worry about our secondary industries. They will follow when needed.

Now, Mr. Speaker, there is another consideration I would like to present to our protectionist friends and it is this: That protective tariffs cannot effectively protect unless they lead to monopoly; and why? Because under free competition all profits tend to a common level. If the profits in any particular business are inordinately large, and free competition is permitted, others will go into that particular line in order to reap those profits, and the only way in which that can be prevented is by a combination to fix prices. And I submit to all hon. gentlemen here, that if we look back over the history of Canadian manufacturing for the last thirty years, we shall see that under the cover of tariff protection, and in order to take full advantage of tariff protection, the various industries have merged and amalgamated so as to very effectively destroy competition, for the very simple reason that if competition remained they could not reap the advantages of the tariff. So they have combined, and we have had a tremendous growth in these giant mergers in Canada, as well as in the United States, during the last twenty-five years; we have indeed had monopoly conditions.

I believe, Mr. Speaker, that monopoly conditions are absolutely intolerable to a free people. If we are going to have monopoly it must be public monopoly; private monopoly is absolutely indefensible.

A moment ago I asked the question: Has protection assisted manufacturing? I think I answered that in respect to manufacturing in the United States. I now ask it with respect to Canadian manufacturing: Has protection assisted Canadian manufacturing on the average? I claim it has not, and that it cannot, both as regards the home market for manufactured goods,—that is the primary industries,—and as regards the export trade, in both cases our Canadian manufacturers stand to gain very greatly by a different policy—of freer trade.

I must hurry on. I have just one more point which I think it is worth while to emphasize in this examination of the protectionist system and it is this: There is, I think, no system that, from the standpoint of public morality, is more absolutely corrupting,—demoralizing and indefensible. I think that any system which opens the door for all and sundry to feed at the public trough, in a disgusting, corrupting scramble for special favours, is indefensible. I have had that admitted to me by protectionists—that there is a tremendous amount of wire pulling, lobbying and efforts to get special favours; and in that connection we find, I think in fact it has been pretty well admitted in Canada, that those concerned in it are people who expect, and have reasonable ground for expecting, that any investment in campaign funds will secure the retention for them of special privileges. It seems to me that there is no indictment against the protective system, more crushing, more damnable, than this particular indictment that I have mentioned —that it has corrupted the public life of this country, and that it must corrupt the public life of any country where that system exists.

There is just one other thought that I would like to add. If the protectionist is driven, as I think he can be, by resistless logic, from one position to another, I have found in my experience that he takes refuge in this final stronghold. He says: National existence, national integrity is to be preserved above all things. National prosperity is of secondary importance; and he goes on to say, that in order to guarantee national existence and national integrity, the nation must build up within itself practically all the industries that are necessary for the preservation of that nation in time of war and that, no matter at what sacrifice. we must build up a completely diversified industry in the country, so that in time of war we shall be able to have everything that is necessary within our own boundaries: It is the ideal of national, economic self-sufficiency.

That claim, I think, ought to be met. It is fairly stated, and I would like to meet the claim as fairly and honestly as I can. It seems to me that there are two fatal defects about that argument —an argument which admits that the protective system is impoverishing to a country, but which defends it on the ground that it enables a nation, in time of war, to maintain its integrity and existence. I submit, Mr. Speaker, that there are two fatal defects to that reasoning. In the first place it is not a practicable means of securing safety, particularly at the present time. We do not know what may be the methods of warfare in the future. We may strive as best we can, and exercise all the ingenuity of which we are capable; and yet when the next war comes we may find something that we had not thought of and provided for which would be the key to the whole question and would determine our fate for weal or woe. It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that from that point of view the argument that we can establish national economic self-sufficiency falls down.

In the second place, while it is not a practicable means of securing safety, I do not believe if it were practicable that it would be right, for this reason—that it is not feasible for the smaller countries in any degree whatever. It may be measurably feasible for such countries as the United States, a country with most varied resources of all kinds. A country like the United States can attain, in a measurable degree, national economic self sufficiency. But take countries like Belgium, or Holland or Denmark—particularly Holland—the natural resources are so extremely limited that it is absolutely absurd to talk of economic self sufficiency. To recommend a policy of that sort for a country like Holland or Belgium is absolutely absurd and every one knows it—in fact any attempt by the people of Holland to attain national self sufficiency would be doomed to utter failure. Therefore, it seems to me that as in the Great War we sacrificed blood and treasure in order to protect the existence and integrity of small nations, we are not justified now in defending a policy which, for the small nations—no matter how feasible it may be for the large nations—is absolutely impracticable. I submit, therefore, that in the case of the smaller nations confidence must be reposed in the League of Nations idea, and in international trade.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I am going to ask a question, just in conclusion, and it is this: If the case against protection is so overwhelming why is it not more apparent? Why do we, in spite of the logic of the situation, find such a strong feeling and sentiment in favour of protection? I think there are reasons for it. The first reason is that we find public opinion and public ideas warped and distorted by powerful selfish interests. In that connection I have a little extract from a book entitled "Democracy after the War" by a very eminent English economist, J. A Hobson. I will read what he says as to why the protective policy continues to receive so much public support, and I hope this will sink into the minds of some of our protectionists friends. He says:

> The explanation lies in the opposition between the interests of certain classes within each nation and the welfare of the nation as a whole, and in the ability of these classes to impose their class interests upon the statecraft of their country. Protection is a bad policy for a nation. It diminishes its total output of wealth, distributes it unfairly, imposes a secret, onerous and wasteful method of taxation, breeds political corruption, establishes monopolies and provokes illwill and quarrels with other nations. But it is a good policy for capitalists in certain well organised industries, who, by their political pressure can frame a tariff that enables them to raise their prices and increase their profits at the expense of the weaker industries, and the consuming Public. A part of the illicit profits which it yields can be applied to maintaining and enforcing the political pull and to spreading a propaganda representing protection as a sound national and imperial policy. The ill-will which tariffs beget in surrounding nations and the reprisals they evoke go to feed the delusion that trade is fundamentally a form of competition, not of co-operation, and that nations are hostile competitors. The diplomatic and sometimes the military conflicts which ensue from tariff wars confirm this delusion. So protection passes from the position of an unscrupulous scheme of class plunder into that of a patriotic public policy. Finally, given favouring circumstances, it can be rivetted upon the state as a political and military necessity. For states which stop the natural courses of trade with neighbours, cripple their development, "steal" their markets, and otherwise inflict economic injuries, live in fear lest the injured interests in these neighbour states may be strong enough to coerce their governments into forcible intervention. Given a group of powerful states, each controlled in its fiscal and its foreign policy by strong business interests, it is easy to perceive that a generally dangerous situation emerges. Each state, considering the possibility of invasion on the part of a foreign power or group of powers, must look not merely to its forcible but to its economic defences. So a national economy of industrial, agricultural and commercial self-sufficiency assumes the guise of a vital policy, and permanent protection is established as its chief instrument. Under these conditions protection becomes an essential feature of national defence, an economic militarism."

That, Mr. Speaker, is one explanation of why it is that the protective philosophy continues to get so much support. In that connection, I would like to refer to an editorial which appeared in the Montreal Witness some time ago, entitled "Where is the Consumer."? I shall not read it, but it says, as the hon. member from Brome (Mr. McMaster) remarked this afternoon, that the consumers are not organized to protect themselves. The producers in this line and that line are organized to protect themselves by exploiting the consumers throughout the whole country, and that is exactly in line with the statement which I have just read from Mr. Hobson. I have here a book which was sent to me some little time ago, published by the Canadian Manufacturers' Association, entitled "The Tariff, why Canada needs It." This is part of the propaganda which these illicit gains give rise to, in order to persuade the Canadian people to maintain this system. I will read one or two sentences out of this book, to show the kind of logic that that association foists upon the Canadian public. On the first page of this book I find the following paragraph:

> The objects of a protective system in Canada have been and should continue to be: (1) to diminish, as far as possible, the importation of goods from foreign countries which can be produced at home.

Mark the words "which can be produced at home." Now, we can produce oranges at home, we can produce bananas, and all kinds of tropical fruit. We can grow cotton at home. Would the Canadian Manufacturers' Association advocate that as a sensible national policy? It seems to me the statement is absolutely absurd, and that, in order to make a sensible reasonable statement, we have to insert the word "profitably" and make it read "profitably produced at home." If we insert the word "profitably" I subscribe to the statement, but that opens the whole question as to what industries we can profitably follow and encourage, and what we must leave for other countries to develop, because of their climate and conditions.

The second object, as here defined, reads:

> (2) To facilitate the importation of raw materials which cannot be produced at home.

Now, how, in the face of all that is reasonable and sensible, can the Canadian Manufacturers' Association come before the Canadian public and advocate a tariff to facilitate importation? We all know that, to facilitate importation, all we have to do is to put articles on the free list and admit them as freely as possible, I submit, therefore, that this object, as stated here, cannot be in any way served by the imposition of tariffs. The third object is:

> (3) To encourage the exportation of Canadian materials as finished products.

We are all desirous of encouraging exportation, but how can we possibly encourage exportation by putting on tariffs and customs duties on imports? In order to facilitate exportation, we have, as I said a few minutes ago, to make manufacturing and production in this country as cheap as possible. If we want our exportation to be large, we must help all the industries in Canada to produce as cheaply and freely as possible, and, in order to do that, we must admit goods freely.

The fourth object, as here defined, reads:

> (4) To make Canada self-contained, by developing and encouraging within her boundaries all legitimate activities that will give occupation to her people.

I am in accord with that. "All legitimate activities"—that is all right, but how is that accomplished by imposing tariffs? By imposing customs duties we encourage all kinds of illegitimate activities in Canada. We divert labour from activities that are native to the soil, and can be carried on profitably, to industries that are not indigenous, that have to be subsidized, and that can only be carried on at a loss. The fifth object as stated here is:

> (5) To secure revenue.

We all know that the tariff, as a means of securing revenue, has lamentably fallen down. It is true we secure a revenue from the tariff, but there are other ways of securing revenue. As far as protection is concerned, the higher we protect the less goods come in, and the less revenue we get on our imports. If these are the best reasons that the Canadian Manufacturers' Association can advance on behalf of the protective system, it seems to me they had better, as we say, "go back home and sit down."

I am going to ask another question in connection with the protective system in Canada. I have tried to show that it cannot be defended on any kind of national or international ground. The policy seems to me, from the standpoint of economics, to be indefensible. I ask a further question: How has it worked out in Canada? Well, as we all know, Canada is a young country, and a country of illimitable natural resources, and I do not know that there is any country on the face of the earth which to-day offers greater opportunities for labour than Canada. We have for years followed a persistent immigration policy, trying to attract into Canada all kinds of people from abroad. How has it worked out? During forty years we have had this protective system in Canada, and I have here an examination of the growth in population during the various decades from 1871 to the present. I am going to give the House a summary of these results; it will not take very long to do so. In the decade from 1871 to 1881, that was before the establishment of the National Policy in 1878, I find that the net loss, after taking into consideration natural increase and immigration, was nil. (I may say that I have these figures from the Bureau of Statistics, and I believe they are substantially accurate.) In the next decade, from 1881 to 1891, I find that the net loss, after taking into consideration natural increase and immigration, was 559,000. In the next decade, from 1891 to 1901, the net loss was 349,000. In the next decade from 1901 to 1911, the net loss —and these figures are more accurate as we go on, because we have more accurate records—was 703,000, and in the next decade, from 1911 to 1921, the net loss was considerably over 1,000,000. When we take into consideration with that the most deplorable depopulation in our rural districts and the condition of agriculture in Canada, and when we realize that, during the last four decades, under a protective system, there has been a steady draining of people away from this great new country of Canada with all its resources, I think we must realize that that constitutes a most terrific indictment against the protective policy, because, in this country we cannot hold the people that come here, if they are coming in and going out again, that surely indicates that there is something wrong with conditions. It is not Canada; Canada is all right; it is the laws we have enacted which have made it difficult in this country to develop our natural resources. A little over a year ago there was placed before the Tariff Commission by the educational secretary of the United Farmers of Ontario, a statement in which he summed up the effect of the protective system of Canada in this way:

1. It has not eliminated the possibility of unemployment.

2. Protection has failed to maintain a remunerative market for farm produce.

3. Protection has failed to maintain a favourable trade balance.

4. Most disquieting of all perhaps, the protective tariff has failed to prevent the spirit of unrest.

On the other hand these are some things that the protective system does:

It places the government under the necessity of maintaining a self-contradictory policy.

That is a tariff for revenue and a tariff for protection.

Protection affords a shelter behind which incompetent manufacturers and lazy manufacturers can make a living at the expense of the consumer.

Lastly, the protective tariff directly fosters class organisation and class selfishness.

Therefore, the protective philosophy and the protective system absolutely fall down, I contend, from the standpoint of economics and from the standpoint of actual accomplishment and results in Canada. Prior to the war we had this economic industrial sickness prevalent in Canada, a serious economic condition, due, I submit, to mistaken policies. I think that sickness was aggravated by the war, because while, during the war, as Sir Thomas White has maintained, the war was largely paid for by extra work and extra sacrifice on the part of the Canadian people, at the same time, we permitted, we even encouraged, war profiteering, and then I think, even worse than that, we permitted many of the profiteers to salt down their unholy gains in Dominion bonds, some of them untaxable. Worse than that, deflation has come, and we find that these Dominion bonds will have to be redeemed with double value, either in service or commodities, by the Canadian people.

It is true that during war time, various expedients were resorted to in order to increase the revenue, because at that time, as all hon. gentlemen will remember, the tariff tax fell lamentably short. Besides that, in some of these expedients, there was a dim perception that those who had enriched themselves by a protective tariff and war profiteering, should shoulder a larger share of the burdens. Some of the expedients that were resorted to in war time were as follows: The excess profits tax, the income tax, the stamp tax, the luxury tax, the sales tax and so on. But with all these expedients we find to-day that the country is steadily going into debt. Industry is paralyzed, the farmers are discouraged and production is stagnant.

Just in connection with one of the various expedients that were adopted during war time, I want to submit a little information, which, perhaps, will explain to the House why it is that, in some respects at least, we have not got better results. I refer to the excess profits tax. Some little time ago, I asked a question which stood upon the Order Paper in this House for a long time. Finally, it was evaded; it was not answered. I may say that this question was based on certain information that I had received privately, and I want now to submit to the House that information without mentioning any names. A certain company in a certain year had a capital stock, according to this statement, as follows: $250,000; reserves, $731,350.20, making a total capital employed of $981,-350.20. The gross profit of that company, according to the statement submitted, was, I am told, $1,571,626.17. Deducting from that the income tax—I will not read the figures; I have them here—the decrease in the inventory and the depletion, I find there is left a net profit of $1,423,764.31. According to the act, I am informed that the assessment levied on that company in that particular year should have been $1,111,-983.99, made up as follows: 7 per cent of the capital employed, exempt from taxation; 8 per cent, one-quarter taken by the government; 5 per cent, of capital employed, one-half taken by the government and of the balance of profits, which was considerably over $1,000,000, six-sevenths should have come into the federal treasury. The total assessment which, according to this statement, ought to have beeen levied on that particular company, was considerably over $1,000,000. What was the actual assessment by the department?—$214,312.36. In connection with this one company for one year, if these figures are correct, and if there is no good justification for the action which the department has taken, there is an apparent loss to the country of $897,671.63!

There is a situation which I think calls for some inquiry. I submit it to the House because I asked questions based on the information that came to me privately, and I got no answer. I think that if that sort of thing has been happening in Canada and we have not got millions of dollars of excess profits that we were entitled to receive during and since the war, we should know the reason why.

But in spite of all these expedients to which we have resorted, the country has been steadily going into debt. We have been discussing for days now the unfortunate railway situation that Canada finds herself in, the unfortunate condition of agriculture, and the paralysis of the manufacturing industries. There is no industry in this country that has not been deploring its condition; and yet, in the face of all these things, the first budget of a new Government proposes nothing but the same old nostrums. And I say that in all charity. There is not a glimmer even of anything new; there is no promise of relief; there is only the pathetic, tragically blind clinging to the past. Thus it hath been, thus it ever shall be.

I stated at the outset that I was keenly disappointed with the budget, and I am. I should not be so disappointed if there were any inkling in it of anything of a radical nature to which we might look with hope for the future; and it is because I do not see in it anything of a constructive, radical character that holds out some promise of relief in the future that I am going to present to the hon. members of this House something of a different nature which it seems to me does promise very considerable relief. And in order to approach the question in a logical and systematic way, I shall ask, first of all, this question: What is a just system of taxation? To answer that question we must ask another. What is taxation for? Are not taxes contributions by individuals for the purpose of carrying on collective or community undertakings? Are they not payments by the individual to the community in return for services rendered the individual by the community? I think they are; and I hope that that is a fair statement of what taxation is for. For instance, we have in our municipalities, schools, streets, and so forth, which are maintained by taxation; and we have in our Dominion, railways, canals, and other public utilities which are kept up in the same way. From this point of view, let us examine the various kinds of taxes which are levied in Canada. We can classify these taxes under three general heads.

In the first place, we have a tax on consumption, the tariff tax, the sales tax, etc. As has already been abundantly shown in this debate, this tax as levied on the necessaries of life bears hardest on those who are least able to pay, namely, the average man with the large family. I am well aware that the member for one of the Bruces, I think (Mr. Malcolm), said yesterday that the rich man paid in proportion to his riches through the sales tax. I submit, however, that that is not so. This particular tax, especially as it applies to the necessaries of life, falls upon the average man with a large family much more heavily than it does upon the rich man. Moreover, it is in no sense proportionate to the services rendered the individual by the community. Let me take an example to show that. Suppose a bachelor to be the owner of a valuable mining property, yielding him, say, a million dollars a year without any effort on his part. Now, I happen to know one man—he is not a bachelor, but I do not think he has any children—who was very much in that position some years ago. He received an enormous income, although I do not know that he got quite as much as I have suggested. I think, however, that this is a fair supposition. We will suppose that he gets a million dollars a year by reason of his ownership of this valuable property. Now, then, imagine one of his employees working for $3 a day and having to support a family of five. That employee may pay, indeed, will pay, more for the necessaries of life than the rich bachelor who is in receipt of a million dollars a year without any effort on his part. That is about the way the sales tax and the tariff tax work out.

Or take another example. In western Canada the Canadian Pacific Railway has been granted by the Canadian people quiet possession of thousands of square miles of valuable land which is increasing in value by reason of the labour of neighbouring settlers, while those settlers pay heavy customs and sales taxes on all their supplies. I think that is an outrageous, a scandalous state of affairs. So far as the ownership of that property is concerned, the Canadian Pacific Railway pays not one cent of taxation into the federal treasury, while the people who are settled in these districts pay heavy customs and sales taxes on all the commodities they require. I submit, Mr. Speaker, that the tax on consumption is unjust and unwise and should be abolished, perhaps not immediately, but as soon as may be. There is one exception, possibly, which I would make. If it is considered desirable to discourage the use of any commodity, then the customs tax or the sales tax would be justifiable. If we could only agree on what commodities are to be discouraged, then of course we might permit a heavy tax to remain on them. But the difficulty is that we cannot agree on this point; some commodities are felt to be useful to one man while they are a curse to another, and we cannot find any common basis for action in regard to most commodities which we call luxuries. There are some, perhaps, like alcoholic beverages, which we would generally agree should be taxed under this system. But even if we could agree that customs duties and sales taxes are proper and wise on such commodities, I am afraid we should not get a very large revenue from taxes of this kind.

The second species of tax I desire to refer to is exemplified in the graduated income and inheritance taxes. The basis of these taxes is the "ability to pay"; but the ability to pay is not always a measure of the privileges, rights, and services conferred upon or rendered to the individual by the community. Perhaps under existing conditions it is largely so, but there are notable exceptions. Take the case of two farmers living side by side on land of equal natural value and equal value so far as location is concerned. One farmer may be diligent, enterprising and thrifty and may do well. He may accumulate quite a competence, build up his farm, and in the course of some years develop a very valuable property. The other man may be lazy, thriftless, and live on the verge of bankruptcy practically all the time. This, I think, must indicate to us that it is not always wise to tax according to ability to pay. In this particular case it is grossly unfair. Both these men have equal opportunities so far as the community is concerned, though perhaps the poor, ignorant, lazy man might claim that society owed him better care when he was a youngster than to bring him into a condition of that sort. But leaving that aside, I do not think we should penalize thrift and industry, as we are bound to do in a tax based exclusively upon ability to pay. Industry ought to be encouraged; and if we permit idleness to eat the bread of industry, then by and by we are not going to have very much bread in this country.

It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that this is one of the most important questions which we have to consider in connection with taxation. We must, I believe, devise a system of taxation which does not discourage but which encourages industry. Now, if, as in some of these cases I have mentioned, the idler gets the biggest return, and the worker has to labour hard for a pittance, we are certainly not doing very much to encourage thrift and industry; and I submit that the whole system of taxation on consumption and to some extent that according to "ability to pay" has the effect of discouraging thrift and industry and encouraging idleness.

However, while making that statement, I do think that the apportionment of taxation according to ability to pay is largely justified nowadays, because by unjust systems of taxation and by other special privileges we have allowed the idler to confiscate the earnings of the worker. Having permitted the poor to be robbed—and in this connection I recall a rather well-known phrase of the late Sir Wilfrid Laurier, "Protective tariffs are legalized robbery" —having permitted the poor to be robbed, we make a belated and largely futile effort to recover part of the spoils, and, unfortunately, in so doing we incidentally penalize honest industry and thrift. I think it would be better to purify the stream at its source, to stop the iniquity at the beginning.

Mr. RYCKMAN: If the hon. member will allow me, he has made it abundantly plain that he is altogether opposed to a protective tariff. If in power would he by one stroke sweep away all tariffs, or would he get rid of them gradually?

Mr. GOOD: Mr. Speaker, I can answer my hon. friend's question definitely and honestly. I would not advocate the sweeping away of all protective duties immediately. I would set about discovering some better system of taxation and introduce that gradually to replace what I regard as a vicious system.

Now, the third system or species of taxation is exemplified, although but imperfectly, in the ordinary property tax. Property in common usage comprises many essentially different things: land, mines, water-powers, buildings, tools, clothing and everything else to which exclusive legal right is given the individual by the state. But of these various kinds of property there are two main classes: first, those kinds of property which are not the product of labour, such as unimproved farm land, mineral resources, water-powers, site values, etc.; and, secondly, those kinds of property which are the product of labour such as wheat, houses, clothing, tools, etc. The first class is designated in the platform of the Progressive party as "unimproved land values, including all natural resources;" and the broad and vital distinction between the two classes of property can be well summed up in the terms, "land values" and "labour values"; and the Farmers' platform, as is well known, advocates the taxation of land values.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I submit that there is no juster or more accurate measure of the rights, privileges and services conferred upon the individual by the state than the land values to which he has legal title under our existing laws, for the ground rent of such land values is the measure thereof. This ground rent is the annual value of the rights, privileges and services conferred upon the individual by the state, because it can be enjoyed without personal effort on the part of the individual. Therefore the Progressive party advocates the taxation of land values for federal purposes, as they are now partly taxed for municipal and provincial purposes. I submit that the taxation of land values is based upon equity and justice, and, moreover, will have the incalculable advantage of stimulating instead of restricting and curtailing production.

We have been debating for many days how we are going to increase production in order to pay our enormous national debt and solve our railway problem. There is nothing more necessary in Canada from a material point of view than increased production. If we can solve that problem then we can solve our national debt and railway problems. Now, taxes on consumption, tariff and sales taxes, inevitably tend to curtail and discourage production; but taxation of land values has the opposite effect because it tends to force all natural resources to be used. To the prospective farmer it makes land cheaper, and thus decreases his cost of production. The substitution of the taxation of land values for the tariff and sales taxes, at least so far as necessaries are concerned, will reduce to the farmer both the cost of land and also the cost of supplies, and thus stimulate production. It will increase the average ability to pay, for all taxes come out of the wealth produced by those who labour, and anything which assists production to that extent increases the fund from which taxes come.

I do not think there is anything that we can turn our attention to of greater importance at the present time than this means of increasing production. And while the initial effect of this species of taxation would be to give every possible encouragement to the user of agricultural and other natural resources, it would have the secondary effect of increasing the value of these resources, and therefore increasing the revenue which we derive by taxing them.

So far as our farmers are concerned, I made a calculation a few years ago as to the effect which the change resulting from substituting the taxation of land values in Ontario for the tariff tax would have on the farmers of that province, and I found that they would pay only one-tenth as much under the system of taxation of land values as they have been paying under the tariff system. That surely would be an immense inducement to farmers to speed up production. It would, I submit, assist very materially in the development of the most important of our primary industries.

In that connection I wish to point out again what has been pointed out so many times in the past, that the taxation of land values is not the taxation of land acreage or area. I think that those who go into the matter closely will find that in our agricultural districts unimproved land values are very, very small, and that this particular kind of taxation will be very easy on farmers. However, I do not think the farmer would be justified in supporting it on that ground—not at all, but on the ground that it is a system of taxation which is absolutely fair and just to all industries, and which is based upon the principle that taxation ought to be in proportion to the service rendered by the community to the individual.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I submit this question: Is the taxation of land values feasible, and what can we expect to get from it? Well, we have it to some extent municipally at the present time. We have in our municipalities all the machinery for assessing and collecting it so far as municipal values are concerned. We have it provincially in respect to the western surtaxes on vacant land, and we had it in Ontario in a measure during the war, when a limited amount of taxation was imposed by the province upon real estate for war purposes. We have it exemplified at the present time most completely by the Toronto Harbour Commission which has control of the "made land" along the Toronto waterfront. I understand that all that land is to be leased on short term leases and never sold. That policy which the Toronto Harbour Commissioners have adopted is almost a complete realization of the taxation of land values. Personally I am very glad indeed to see such an apparently successful and commendable example of this particular kind of taxation in the municipal field. We have also in the Australasian countries—New Zealand and Australia—I have some particulars here, but I will not submit them to the House—we have a record of the taxation of land values for their federal purposes. Now, in regard to the taxation of land values for federal purposes, I am going to suggest to the hon. Minister of Finance that so far as municipalities are concerned, the machinery for assessment and collection is all there; no new machinery needs to be created; there is little added expense in utilizing the machinery already in existence. So far as the larger corporations and values are concerned which are not within any particular municipality, we have already the income tax machinery which can be employed in that connection. I submit that we may very well begin to adopt a policy in that direction in the very near future—at once, even, and with pactically no expense for the creation of new machinery.

Now, what revenue can we expect this tax to give us? I made some calculations a few years ago regarding the unimproved land values in Canada, and while there was a good deal of guesswork about it, the conclusion I came to was that, roughly a one per cent tax on the unimproved land values of Canada would give us a revenue of $80,000,000. Now, that certainly is worth while, and if we begin in that little way, pretty soon, I think, we would find our financial burden very much lessened. I repeat the answer which I gave to the hon. member for East Toronto (Mr. Ryckman); I would not suggest any very drastic and sudden changes in our methods of taxation, but I would suggest the immediate beginning of something that is likely to become permanently valuable for this country. I see no difficulty about adopting this plan at once, assessing and collecting through our municipal machinery those values that lie within the municipalities, and assessing and collecting the tax on the other values through our income tax machinery. I submit that suggestion to the Minister of Finance, with every emphasis which I can possibly place upon it.

There are only two other suggestions, Mr. Speaker, which I wish very briefly to place before the Minister of Finance in regard to our whole financial situation. The first is this: that we might adjust federal taxation and public works to prevent inflation and deflation. It is generally admitted that these booms and depressions occur in cycles and that during a period of inflation there is what you might call intoxication of industry. Prices go up; everybody thinks that prices are going to get better, and we have a period of inflation. Then the crest of the wave is reached, and we have a sudden drop—a slump. People get discouraged; we have paralysis of industry. We have such a situation now existing in Canada, aggravated of course, as it is at present, by the European situation. But, Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that if the federal government were to levy heavier taxation during a period of inflation and withdraw money from circulation—not put it in the banks where it will go back again to stimulate industry; industry does not need stimulation at those times; it needs checking—if such money as is not needed for the requirements of the time can be withdrawn from circulation and set aside for use in a period of deflation, we would have a sort of automatic control over the rising and falling of prices. When the period of deflation begins to come and men are thrown out of employment, we would have our public works to fall back upon,—works which had been held in suspension, so to speak. In that way a great deal of the distress which now prevails could be avoided. It seems to me this is entirely in line with the policy that any sensible farmer would follow. In a period of active demand for his crops, he would concentrate his energies upon raising crops to supply the demand, and then in a period of depression, having set aside some money for duller times, he would use the money and use his labour for the carrying on of certain improvements which he had delayed. If we could adopt a policy like that in our federal taxation we could in many ways prevent these recurring periods of depression—not, perhaps, entirely prevent them, but assist in controlling the situation, assist in preventing the serious evils that have arisen in that connection and which exist at the present time.

Just in conclusion, I want to suggest to the House that the whole question of the control of credit, which forms the subject of a resolution that was presented here some time ago, is a matter which should be studied very seriously by the Government in connection with our financial situation, and particularly in connection with the Bank Act, which is to be revised next year.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I have perhaps taken more time than I had intended to occupy in presenting these views to the House, but I feel that I am justified, because these views have not, so far as I know, yet been presented to the House. They deal with part of the farmers' platform—the taxation of land values as a permanent policy of taxation. I submit that we should get away as soon as possible from the onerous and unfair methods of taxation which we have been following in the past and try to devise and adopt and apply a righteous system which will inevitably result in increasing the prosperity of this country.

Hon. THOS. A. LOW (South Renfrew): Mr. Speaker, at this late hour I do not propose to occupy the time of this House at great length. But before I proceed I should like to extend to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) my most hearty congratulations upon his being spared to present his sixteenth budget. I know of no man in the public life of this country who enjoys the confidence of the people to a greater degree than the hon. Minister of Finance.

It occurs to me, Mr. Speaker, that the budget is very much like the financial statement of a great corporation as presented by its president. From that point of view I venture to make a few remarks to-night. While I have enjoyed the oratory of my hon. friend from Brant (Mr. Good) he will pardon me if I do not attempt to follow his remarks. The only thing I can say is that I thank Providence for having placed and kept men with the tariff views that my hon. friend entertains in the minority.

It will be generally admitted, Mr. Speaker, that when the present Government assumed office it was confronted with very serious problems, such as falling revenues and increasing expenditures, general business depression, and increasing unemployment. That the Government has met the situation in a fearless manner and has accomplished much will be admitted by the average citizen of Canada who is not unduly biased. I am sure that the action of the ministers of the various departments in their endeavour to reduce the expenditures of this country will commend itself to the people, as will also the statement made by the Minister of Finance that he intends to keep the expenditures within the revenue. The introduction by the Minister of Finance of new taxes that will bear as lightly as possible on the plain people of Canada will, I am sure, meet with general approval.

We all know that the tariff question has been the football of all political parties for the last fifty years. There are those who would abolish the tariff altogether as a cure for all our national ills. I want to say, Mr. Speaker, that I do not agree with that view, and that I do not think the farmers, of the province of Ontario at least, entertain any such opinion. I come from a constituency which is at least 60 per cent rural, and I want to tell hon. gentlemen that I received in the rural sections of that constituency almost as many votes as did the farmer candidate. Not because I told them that I would help them to escape the payment of a few dollars on agricultural implements. No; but because I told them that from my place on the floor of this chamber, and at all times, I would endeavour to secure for the farmers of this country better markets for the products they had to sell.

Now, Sir, in the province of Ontario I believe that the farmers, just the same as the urban portion of the population, if left to themselves would appreciate the value of a tariff. Why? Because they know that the best market they have is the home market; and I cannot understand how men argue from an opposite standpoint. Take a glance at the statistics for the year 1921, and what do we find? That the value of the total products of Canadian farms amounted to $1,396,233,000. After listening to the various speakers on the Progressive side you would imagine that the farmers received no benefit from the home market; that the market for their products was largely the export market. But what do we find? That in the same year, 1921, the total of farm products exported from this country amounted to $388,237,000. What does that mean? It means that the people of this country consumed 73 per cent of the products of every description produced on the farms of Canada, and that only 27 per cent was exported. I ask any fair minded member of this House if he would do anything to jeopardize the market that consumes 73 per cent of what the farmers produce.

We hear a great deal about the agricultural implement industry, and one would think from the arguments advanced that if the duty were completely removed from agricultural implements the farmers of this country would be greatly benefited. But I find on referring to departmental records that the farmers in the Dominion of Canada purchased agricultural implements to the value of $51,637,441. Now admitting for the sake of argument that the manufacturers take advantage of the full benefit of the duty—which I do not admit—what would that mean to the individual Canadian farmer? According to last available figures there were 714,646 citizens engaged in farming. It would represent a per capita payment of $9.04. Yet some men tell us that the tariff is a great burden to the farmers, and that for the sake of saving $9.04 per capita they would wipe out one of the largest industries of our country, an industry that in the city of Toronto gives a living to at least one-twentieth of its entire population. Surely, if the farmers themselves had to vote on the question of killing an industry of that size they would hesitate about doing it. My opinion is that if the facts were plainly placed before them, they would stand by a policy that will build up the national industries of Canada, because they know that the better the home market is the more advantageous it is for our agriculturists.

I promised my constituents that if elected I would urge upon the Government of the day that negotiations be opened up with any country that would give us better markets for our agricultural products, and I am glad that I did not have to wait very long after coming to Ottawa to see that idea carried out. I found the Minister of Finance ready and willing to go to Washington to negotiate, if possible, a treaty that would be solely in the interests of the farmers of this Dominion. In 1911, although a manufacturer, I stood upon the floor of Parliament and urged the adoption of the Reciprocity Pact. Why? Because I believed then, as I believe now, that it would not hurt the manufacturer, but that it would be a great benefit to the Canadian farmer, and that is the reason why the farmers in my riding supported me so strongly in the last election. They knew if anything came up in this House that would be to their benefit I would not fail them.

We have many serious problems, and one perhaps more serious than any other is that of our great railway system, with its 22,000 miles, with its annual deficit and the effect that has upon the whole country. Trade cherishes the railway as its best customer, buying thousands of tons of coal annually, using the steel and iron of many mills, and the products of our vast forests, and giving employment to 185,000 men, providing a living for, at least, 900,000 of our population, and I am sure that anything that would affect our railways would affect the country. When the railways are depressed, the whole business of the country is depressed. Anything that will be for the benefit of our railways will be for the benefit of our country as a whole, as the deficits of the railways are paid by the people of this country.

Every proposed law that comes before this House should be scrutinized, because, after all, any blunders that are made are, in the last analysis, paid for by the people of the country. It is a strange coincidence that just 50 years ago the United States were passing through the same experience, and had the same problem to contend with that we have to-day. In the year 1872 President Grant, in his message to ongress, recommended that a select committee be appointed to investigate freight rates between the west and the east. The farmers of the western states at that time were groaning under the same burden that the farmers of the Canadian West are groaning under to-day, and, as a result of that investigation made by Congress, rates were reduced. I will read what history records 50 years ago.

> The lower rates conceded to shippers induced an increase in the general volume of traffic. The farmers prospered because rates were reduced and the shareholders and the railway companies, who had not prospered hitherto themselves, realized that it was business and not high rates that they required in order to make money on their investments.

In that same year the commission reported, and one paragraph from the report reads as follows:

> The cry of despair which comes from the overburdened west; the demand for cheaper food heard from the labouring classes of the east and from the plantations of the south, and the rapid falling off of our principal articles of export all indicate the imperative necessity for cheaper means of national transportation.

Now, Mr. Speaker, what the West needs to-day is cheaper freight rates. The importance of the railways to the West, I am sure, will be admitted by everybody, and it seems to me that they should have the lowest possible freight rates. What the seas are to England the railways are to our Canadian West. Without the railways the West would be in as bad a condition as England would be without the seas. The great problem in connection with our railways is, by what means shall cheap and ample facilities be provided for the interchange of commodities between the different sections of our widely extended country? Everybody knows that the interior growth of any country is due to the railways. The demand of the people of the West to-day is for adequate and cheap transportation. We heard the Minister of Railways (Mr. Kennedy), when he addressed the House sometime ago, outline his proposals and, I think, if we are to succeed with our railways, it can only be done by giving the minister a free hand and a fair opportunity to operate those railways upon business principles and business methods. Sectional interests must give way to the larger interests of all the people. Increased business with the railways will reduce the deficits as well as lower the rates of the railway. As members from Ontario, we are deeply interested in railways, because, after all, the lion's share of the deficit will fall upon the provinces of Ontario and Quebec. We have heard many speakers, but after all, unless some constructive policy is suggested and adopted we will not accomplish anything. I believe that, if we are to wipe out our railway deficit, it can be done in one way and in one way only, and that is by increased population—an increased number of settlers upon the land.

I will endeavour to present to the House what, in my opinion, is the solution of some of our national ills and financial burdens. It has been said by eminent railway authorities that every settler placed upon the land is worth $746 annually to the railways. If that be the case, the first thing the Government should do is to inaugurate a progressive immigration policy. No doubt there is a certain class of immigrants we do not wish to see coming into the country, but there are people we would welcome. We should first make an attempt to reclaim many of the Canadian citizens who have gone to United States. How are we going to accomplish anything in the way of immigration? We have 19 immigration agencies in the cities of the States and twelve agencies in the United Kingdom. I think the Minister of Immigration (Mr. Stewart) should waken up these agencies, rouse them, and treat them in the same way as a business man would treat one of his agencies. If a business man finds that a manager in his office in a foreign country is not doing any business, he wants to know the reason, and, if the business is not forthcoming, he will quickly make a change. I believe that if every one of these thirty-one agencies was alive to the requirements of the country, we would see an influx of immigration that we have never had before.

We would like to see as many settlers from the United States as possible. They are very much like ourselves, and I believe they would settle our lands and make first-class citizens of this country. I believe an immigration policy should be put in effect in England that would induce as many as possible to come to this country. There is, in England, a class of people who, I believe, are available and possibly could be induced to come to this country, a class of educated, trained agriculturist families. English periodicals tell us that many of these families which, before the war, had sufficient incomes to maintain themselves in considerable affluence, find the inroads of the war and the pressing burden of taxation so great that they are unable to maintain their former standard of living and their financial position, and the capital realized from the sale of their lands and the income which is still theirs would enable members of this group to exist in a comfortable condition in this country. A determined and special campaign directed towards this group would result in bringing to Canada large numbers of permanent settlers of a most desirable type. In England and Scotland there are many young farmers who, by personal service during the war, have saved up sufficient means to purchase small land holdings. Many of these men have been agriculturists, gardeners, country merchants while their wives and sisters have been brought up in the country and in country villages and are accustomed to rural life. They, to my mind, would make most desirable settlers.

In Scandinavian countries, there is also a class of people who will make most desirable citizens, and I would refer more particularly in this category to Norwegians, Swedes, Danes and Icelanders. More Swedish farmers came to Canada from the United States than came from Sweden. The population of Sweden is not very large, but history tells us that those who have emigrated to the United States have made excellent citizens. According to the records, 43 per cent of those who emigrated to the United States have remained and are to-day on the land. Of eleven groups investigated, the Swedes committed fewer crimes than almost any other nationality. The Norwegians, like the other Scandinavian races, are a hardy adventurous race, and they become naturalized citizens very quickly. They have sent to the United States more people than almost any other nation except the Irish, and there are nearly one-half as many Norwegians in the United States as there are in Norway. We might very properly turn our attention to this class of immigration. An investigation of Norwegians in the United States revealed the fact that 63 per cent of them were engaged in agriculture, and I am sure that what we require in the settler coming into this country is that he will settle upon the land. More than one-third of the Norwegian farmers in the United States are settled in Minnesota, one-fifth in Wisconsin, and the production of those two states in wheat and other farm products, as well as the general development, speak well for the type of settlers and citizens they make. I might go on at some length; but I believe if a businesslike immigration policy is introduced in this country, it will do more to relieve the deficits of our railways than any other method that we can adopt.

I am not going to detain the House longer; I merely wish to say, in conclusion, that we have a great country; but we can only keep it great provided all our people are united and contented. That, Mr. Speaker, above all else, should be the guiding star and the aim of every administration, so that every shade of thought is duly considered in the framing of policies and in the carrying out of those policies. Liberal administrations have adhered to those principles in the past; and if the present Liberal Government lives up to the traditions of the great Liberal party, we may look forward to the dawn of a new era of prosperity, contentment and happiness.

Mr. WILLIAM BLACK (South Huron): Mr. Speaker—

Mr. WILLIAM IRVINE (East Calgary): Mr. Speaker, I beg to move the adjournment of the debate.

Mr. BLACK: Mr Speaker—

Mr. IRVINE: Mr. Speaker, whom do you recognize?

The ACTING SPEAKER (Mr. Marcil): The hon. member for South Huron has the floor.

Mr. WILLIAM BLACK (South Huron): Mr. Speaker, as this is the first time I have spoken, I have a considerable feeling of diffidence in the presence of the many old parliamentarians whom I see around me and who have been in this House for so long a time. I must at the outset confess that I have been rather disappointed in the budget that has been brought down by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding). In the election of 1921, the Liberals, when they came out to oppose us, told us that the two parties were practically the same, but I differ greatly with that statement as I take my stand in the House. Last fall at Calgary the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) delivered an address in which he spoke about the downward revision of the tariff and also a complete elimination of those duties which we have had for many years; but there is surely something radically wrong when we compare those statements with what we find in the budget that has been brought down by the Minister of Finance. This reminds me of an address that the ex-President of the United States made about a year ago, when he stated that he had never seen a minister of finance deliver a budget speech without a joker at the end of it. Had farm implements been left as they were instead of a reduction of 2½ per cent being made in the duty and then there being added, as it were, as the ex-President of the United States said, two or three jokers, I would have been quite well satisfied, especially if my hon. friend had put an excise tax on all those articles that are manufactured in this country.

The minister speaks as though it were a difficult undertaking to raise the revenue. Our good friends to our right almost declare that unless there is high protection, you cannot manufacture goods in this country. If they want high protection, I would advocate the imposition of an excise tax, and then some of the money will go into the treasury of this country instead of all going into the pockets of the manufacturers.

Let us consider some of these manufactured goods. In the first place, I think we could easily reduce the duty on boots and shoes by one-half. And let me say right here that the boots and shoes that have been manufactured in Canada during the past six or eight years have been hardly fit for any man or woman to wear. I have known instances where children's boots, costing between $3 or $4 per pair, coming out of the factories here, have gone to pieces after three weeks of wear. The manufacturers of these particular articles should, I think, use more brains and better material in making them, because the class of goods they turn out at present is certainly not a credit to them. As one hon. gentleman near me suggests, they should put more leather and less paper in them, and there is a good deal of truth in that. In the year 1921, there were imported into this country over $2,000,000 worth of boots and shoes, while the exports totalled over $1,500,000. Of these exports some $354,000 worth went across the border. Now, if these manufacturers can compete with the American manufacturers, sending this quantity of boots into the United States, I think they should certainly be able to meet the competition of the boots exported from the United States into Canada. The exports of boots and shoes from Canada to Great Britain in the same period amounted to $904,000.

I think the Minister of Finance should have given more consideration to the question of building materials and agricultural implements. I have been informed on good authority, and the fact was mentioned in the House yesterday, that the manufacturers' warehouses are filled to the roofs with farm implements, and I understand that the same thing is true in regard to other manufactured goods that are used in building in this country. If these gentlemen would only lower their prices, as the farmers have done, this Dominion to-day would not be in the condition which is so generally deplored, and there would not be so many men walking the streets, because people would be able to buy and money would be in circulation. I know that the common talk in my part of the country is this: "We will not buy implements until these men decide to bring down their prices". That is the attitude of the people in western Ontario, and I for one do not blame them. If these men keep their manufactured products in the warehouses in the hope of being able to sell them at exorbitant prices, where are the farmers going to stand?

There is a further consideration in regard to the manufacturers in Canada. They are given a rebate on the duty they pay on raw material entering into the manufacture of goods which they ship out of the country. I contend that this is unreasonable, because I think that they can compete with the manufacturers across the line, or with those of any other country.

There is a good deal of talk about the want of population in Canada, but I do not see how we can hope to increase our population or retain the people we have already, unless we can improve conditions and make the country more attractive to intending immigrants. In the last decade, taking the natural increase with the immigration that came into the country, our population ought to have been 11,000,000, and it is quite obvious that conditions in Canada could not have been such as to appeal to the people who left. When the hon. member who spoke a few moments ago (Mr. Low) said that 73 per cent of the produce of this country was consumed in Canada, I was almost staggered. That may be true, and I am not going to doubt the hon. gentleman's word but I can hardly credit the fact.

I do not want to take up much time, but I desire briefly to refer to the railway situation. Let me tell the Minister of Railways (Mr. Kennedy) at once that as a good Canadian I believe that the National Railways can be operated and made to pay inside of three years, provided the right men are placed at the head of the system. I might as well express the opinion here as in the back concessions of my constituency, and I will tell the minister that the sooner he changes the management of the railways the better it will be for them. He must begin a vigorous use of the pruning knife, and most of all he must have at the head of the railways a man in whom the people can have the fullest confidence. No one has any faith in the man who is to-day at the head of the railways. That is the common view all over the western part of Ontario, and the sooner the minister gets a young man with a broad vision, who has his name to make, and places him in charge, the sooner will the National Railways be made to pay for themselves.

I might go on to speak of the merchant marine, but as the time is short I shall not do so. I should like, however, to say a word or two about the Civil Service. I think the service is over-manned, and I was about to suggest that it could be reduced by one-third. At all events, I do not think there is any doubt about the fact that it could be curtailed to advantage. But if I mistake not, there will be as many civil servants in Ottawa at the end of this year as at the beginning. In my opinion the civil servants could be reduced by thousands, and I would ask the Government seriously to get down to business in that direction and see that the service is cut down wherever there is over-manning. Any minister, if he goes through his own department, can, I believe, find instances of this.

[Mr. Wm. Black.]

There is one other matter I shall refer to before concluding; but in passing I might suggest that a good deal of time has been wasted during the past week in this debate. I think that the man who talks for over half an hour, apart from the leaders of the parties and their lieutenants, is taking up too much time. However, to proceed. Our hon. friend the Minister of Finance visited Washington some time ago, and we often hear it said that he might as well have stayed at home. Now, I do not agree with that, for I believe in dealing with our first cousins across the line, if I might so describe them. The United States is our best market and probably always will be. Just to spend a few moments on the question of our trade relations with that country, I might refer to the reciprocity treaty of 1854. Under that treaty Canada's exports to the United States increased from $10,750,000 in 1854, to almost $38,000,000 in 1866. Twenty years later, in 1886, our exports to the United States were only $34,000,000. Our exports nearly quadrupled in twelve years of reciprocity. In twenty years, when comparatively mild tariff restrictions existed, they declined by $3,500,000. Later on, when real restrictions began with the McKinley tariff, the effect was more injurious and was felt by the farmers of Canada with particular force. In 1888 Canada's export of animals and their products to the United States amounted to $7,500,000. In the fiscal year of 1893, when the McKinley tariff had made its full effect felt, they were down to less than $4,000,000. In the same period our exports of other products of agriculture shrank from $10,000,000 to $4,000,000. About that time occurred the darkest period in the whole agricultural history of Canada. Potatoes were sold on the Toronto market at 20 cents and 25 cents per bag, while good cattle in the country sold for from $12 to $15 per head. The only wonder was that farmers were able to exist at all. A great many of them left their farms, and a great deal of the best blood of rural Ontario emigrated to the United States during the dark days of the early nineties.

The first relief came in 1897, not with any easing up of the American tariff but merely as a result of the removal of quarantine regulations. About the year 1891 there had been a ninety-day quarantine against cattle moving either way across the border. Hon. Mr. Fisher, when he became federal Minister of Agriculture, secured the removal of that obstruction, and as a direct result, although the American tariff still remained, our exports of cattle across the border jumped from 1,646 head in 1896 to 90,000 head two years later. The effect was immediate, prices beginning at once to advance with the removal of the quarantine. And still we hear people saying that the market across the line will hold up our own market here. Well, our own market is good enough, but still we have a surplus to export, and the American market is the best market we have.

The real boom came, however, in 1913, when some agricultural products were placed on the United States free list, and duties in all lines were greatly reduced. As a result our exports of cattle alone to the United States during the seven years from 1914 to 1920, inclusive, averaged 260,000 head per year, as against 28,000 head in 1913. Our exports of all animals and the products of animals advanced from less than $13,000,000 in 1913 to $113,000,000 in 1920. Our exports of other agricultural products went up from $27,000,000 to $52,000,000 at the same time, our fisheries advanced from $5,750,000 to $18,500,000, and our forest products from less than $30,000,000 to $71,000,000. All told, there was an increase in our exports to the United States in all lines in eight years from less than $140,000,000 to $464,000,0000. If any stronger argument is required as to the value of the American market for Canadian producers, Mr. Speaker, I should like our good friends to the right of us to let us know about it.

The last American tariff went into force on the 28th May, 1921. In the first six months after that tariff was introduced our exports of wool to the United States amounted to only $13,560, as compared with nearly $1,000,000 for the same period in the previous year. Our export of potatoes was only $447,000 in the first six months after the new tariff came into force, as compared with $2,000,000 in the same period of 1920. Milk exports were less than $200,000 during 1921, while they were $1,295,000 in the previous year; our sheep exports were $421,000 as against $1,500,000; our cattle $2,369,000 compared with $17,000,000.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I am entirely in accord with the sentiments of the last speaker (Mr. Low) in regard to immigration. I believe our own Canadian boys are worth two or three of any class of immigrants that we can bring in. I think the Minister of Immigration would do well to try and get as many as possible of our Canadian men to come back from the States, instead of encouraging too many immigrants from the Old Land. We need immigration to solve our railway problem, but at the present time I am strongly against spending so much money to bring in immigrants until we are able to hold the people we have here.

Mr. LOVIE (rising):——

Mr. IRVINE: I move the adjournment of the debate, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. FIELDING: I hope my hon. friend will not press his motion. The debate is dragging out a little, and I think we all desire an early prorogation. Therefore we might sit a little later than the usual hour. If my hon. friend desires to speak now, he should have priority.

Mr. IRVINE: I will not press my motion to adjourn the debate now, Mr. Speaker, if I may have the opportunity to move its adjournment after the conclusion of the next speech. Will my hon. friend grant me that?

Mr. FIELDING: I understand the hon. member for Calgary does not press his motion, so it is open for any other member to speak.

Mr. W. J. LOVIE (Macdonald): Mr. Speaker, In rising to take part in this debate, I wish, along with those who have already spoken, to extend to the hon. Finance Minister (Mr. Fielding) congratulations upon his sixteenth budget speech in the Canadian Parliament. It is a unique record for a finance minister in any country, and one which it is very hard to duplicate. I give the hon. minister credit for all the reductions he has made upon foodstuffs and agricultural implements, but I would say that in my humble opinion, and looking at the proposition from the viewpoint of a western farmer, these reductions do not begin to go far enough to remove the handicaps under which agriculture, the basic industry of Canada, is suffering and has been suffering for the past forty years, ever since the inauguration of the national policy.

Of course we know that revenue has to be raised, and that it is the finance minister's first duty to provide money to run the affairs of the country, but a tariff that will impose handicaps upon the principal industry of the country is, in my judgment, not the best sort of encouragement to hand out to that industry, and expect it to be prosperous and develop and show life. The farmer is in the unique position of having to pay whatever tax is imposed upon him as there is no one to whom he can transfer it. A manufacturer passes on the tariff tax he has paid to the wholesaler, who in turn passes the same with a profit to the retailer, who also in turn adds the whole thing together, and the consumer—the farmer—pays it. It ends there as there is no one he can pass the tax on to.

Were a customs tariff framed with the avowed object of raising revenue—suppose nothing else were in the finance minister's mind—then all the money collected under that tariff would go into the Dominion treasury and be available to pay the expenses of the country. But such is not the case. Under a protective tariff as we have had it in Canada, the Canadian manufacturer pockets the amount of customs duties and as the farmer has to pay them he is to that extent less able to pay into the national finances. Customs taxes place money in the federal treasury only when they are paid to the customs house officers at the regular ports of entry. But, Mr. Speaker, I contend it is not fair that anyone should be entitled, whether he be manufacturer or agriculturist, to put money into his pocket that really should belong either to the consumer or to the Dominion treasury.

A protective tariff was first inaugurated in Canada forty years ago to boost the manufacturing interests, and boost them it certainly did, until they were top-heavy. It made them act not as though they were giving service to the country as a whole, but as if they were the whole country. In the natural and successful development of a country the logical idea would be first to find the principal industry of that country, what the country was best adapted to, and then develop that industry. It is conceded by all that agriculture is the basic industry of Canada, and that being the case, it needs encouragement. So far in the history of Canada it has not had encouragement; it has really been poverty stricken. Let anyone examine the wage schedules of any competing agency for workingmen, whether in the case of manufacturers, the railways, the professions—in fact, any concern that employs men, and invariably you will find these firms offering larger remuneration than the farmer can afford to pay; consequently, the best men leave the farms.

Were manufactures to be developed as a secondary industry with a view to supplying the needs of the consumers at a reasonable cost and to selling the balance of their output in the open markets of the world, things would be different. But what is the state of affairs to-day? We find that implements are sold to the Canadian farmer by the Canadian manufacturer at a profit on the cost of production and then the customs duty added to that, while at the same time the Canadian manufacturer goes to other countries and sells that same machine far cheaper than he sells it to his home consumer. In proof of this I will give you a concrete example.

As the conditions of agriculture in the three prairie provinces correspond in a large measure with the conditions in the states to the south just across the international boundary as far as soil and climate are concerned, we in western Canada claim that to put the farming industry of Canada on an equal footing with the industry just across the boundary, and so enable us to keep the native born Canadian at home—and also to keep the immigrant who comes to our shores to develop agriculture in Canada, and incidentally to make a home and a competence for himself—we need to get our agricultural implements as cheaply as possible.

It was generally conceded at the last general election, and is just as necessary now as then—more so, in fact, because at election time these were only suggestions; now they are far more than that—that five things were absolutely necessary, to lift agriculture out of the mud and mire in which it had found itself placed, and set it upon a higher plane. These were: Reduction in the tariff; reduction in freight rates; cheap agricultural implements; wider markets; a better system of marketing our wheat.

Reduction in the customs tariff I have already spoken about. The pre-war period was not a prosperous time for agriculture. Agriculture was not on a par with other industries, and consequently languished. There are in western Canada millions of acres of as fertile soil as ever the sun shone upon, waiting for men and women to work and develop it, but at present no one who is not already engaged in farming will undertake such a proposition. Conditions have been worse for the farmer at this period of depression than at any other period, because the purchasing power of the dollar has been very low. The price of wheat went down as much in one year after the last war as it did in six years after the American civil war, and went down further. Mr. John Bracken, president of the Manitoba Agricultural College, at the convention of agricultural societies held in Winnipeg in January of this year, stated that the American government had set aside one thousand million dollars to assist in financing farming operations in their country in 1922, and that their farmers had advantages which ours did not enjoy.

As rigid economy must be practised in handling the finances of the country, I would suggest to the Minister of Finance that he let the agricultural implements of the country carry as light a load of taxation as possible so as to give encouragement to the industry of agriculture, because if it is prosperous, all others will be prosperous in turn. Business men by the dozen said to me last fall, "The farmers are good spenders. If they have money, I will have money too, but if they have no money there is none for me and as they get theirs from the soil there is no one they can fall back upon." I am talking about a purely agricultural country; the money comes from the soil, and when the crop fails there is nothing else for the farmer to fall back upon.

Of course, there are other difficulties the farmers have to contend with as well as the injustices of a protective tariff; but the federal government have it absolutely within their power to remedy the injustices arising out of a protective tariff. A protective tariff is not a popular doctrine to preach in any of the three prairie provinces, where the people are situated a long way from markets and pay high transportation costs on all they ship out and all they bring in. They need every encouragement possible in the way of removing handicaps to their industry. I would suggest again that if it is absolutely necessary for revenue purposes to keep a tariff tax upon agricultural implements, a corresponding tax for revenue purposes be placed upon all implements of home manufacture.

Reduction in freight rates is very important, but there will be an opportunity to discuss that later when the bill with respect to the matter is before the House.

A better system of marketing our wheat is necessary in the national interest, but this also will be before the House, so need not be taken up now. I would just like to emphasize what has been already said, that no one who is not actively engaged in farming really believes, even if he pretends to believe, that the granting of a national marketing agency with compulsory powers to handle the wheat of the country, is protection as it is generally understood. If it is, I for one am quite willing for the finance department to collect from me every dollar the wheat board pays me for wheat, over and above what the world markets warrant, less storage and transportation charges. The idea of a wheat board is to cut out the big slump in prices that occurs as soon as the movement of the wheat starts in the fall, to hold the market steady, and to see that the producer gets for his wheat all that the world's markets warrant.

As the development of the natural resources is the first and most important industry in Canada, and as the greatest of all natural resources in western Canada is the top six inches of fertile soil, so one of the prime requisites of that part of the Dominion is to have some place to sell its products outside of our own country. It is the function of provincial legislatures to look after the domestic affairs of the different provinces, but finding export markets is something that comes purely within the scope of the Dominion Parliament. A large percentage of the farmers of the three prairie provinces feel very sore over the loss of the market to the south just across the boundary line. True, we have no say in that at present, but if we cast our eyes back to the general election of 1911, we do not need long distance field glasses to discern what particular political party worked hard and successfully to shut the Canadian farmer out from the market to the south, and to-day that same party openly avow upon the floor of the House that they are in favour of restricted markets. I claim, Mr. Speaker, that had there been reciprocity in natural products between the two great countries—Canada and the United States—from 1911 up to the spring of 1921, the advantages to both would have been so apparent that no endeavour would have been made to interfere with the free flow of natural products north and south.

Canada, in effect, said to the United States in 1911, just exactly what the campaign cry meant, "No truck or trade with the Yankees." And the Yankees have certainly taken us at our word now, but Mr. Speaker, I commend the action of the Finance Minister, at the beginning of this session in making an endeavour to secure better trade relations with our neighbours to the south. I wish him God speed on that undertaking and I would heartily commend to the notice of the Government and the House the recommendation of my worthy leader, the hon. member from Marquette (Mr. Crerar), that Canada should have representation at Washington.

From 1917 until the spring of 1921 livestock had free access to the American market, but when the Fordney tariff took effect, it seemed as if a cyclone had struck the Canadian livestock interests. The two greatest livestock marketing centres in Canada are the cities of Winnipeg and Toronto. What is the effect of the Fordney tariff upon these markets? The livestock shipper from my district in Manitoba told me personally last fall, that he saw nothing for it but to pay duty and ship his cattle to Chicago, as the Winnipeg market was so congested that one carload of cattle would knock it endways.

About the Toronto market I know nothing personally, but I can give the evidence of a gentleman living within twenty-five miles of Ottawa who has handled thousands of cattle in Ontario, and who has assured me since I came to Ottawa, that he was entirely out of the cattle shipping business since the market to the south was cut off because he could sell fifteen carloads of cattle in Buffalo just as easily as he could sell two head in Toronto. Since coming to Ottawa I have learned on the floor of the House that the maritime provinces depend very largely on the market in the United States directly south of them for the sale of their potato crop. Mr. W. A. Brown of the Poultry Division, Ottawa, speaking at the Agricultural Society's Convention in Winnipeg in the spring of this year, said:

> We need to look for wider markets than we have at present for poultry products. We want to see Canada shipping poultry products to the great cities of Boston, New York and Philadelphia, just the same as they ship to us, oranges, lemons and walnuts. Thirty-five carloads of poultry were shipped, live weight, from Prince Edward Island last year to Boston, 3,000 birds to a car, and 16,000 carloads of fowl were consumed by the Jews in New York alone last year.

Coming to Ontario, I find that the district in the southern part of the province lying along the shore of Lake Erie, has become properous growing garden and field truck for the United States market. The city of Detroit with a population of over 1,000,000 is within easy reach of that district; it sends motor trucks into the fields where the produce is grown and takes it into Detroit, paying duty on it. The northern part of the state of Michigan being rocky and bushy, no truck is raised there, and Detroit depends on the southern part of Ontario for a large part of the necessaries of life, and the Ontario farmers are only too pleased to supply them. Farther west, some of the farmers are raising Kubanka wheat. There are no mills in Canada to grind Kubanka wheat. No mills nearer than Minneapolis can do so. Being practically rust resistant, Kubanka does better than Marquis in a year when rust bothers the crop. But the restricted markets which we have at present are against the raising of this particular kind of wheat.

I did want to say a word or two about freight rates, but that subject will come up later in the House. However, I would just like to mention one instance as to how freight rates are killing the trade of this country. An Ontario farmer was in our district last fall during threshing time, and wanted to take a car load of potatoes from Manitoba to his home district, because there was a scarcity of potatoes there. He could get potatoes at 70 cents a bushel f.o.b. the car. He found, however, that the freight was $1 a bushel so it was prohibitive to ship them; the producer would get 70 cents for his potatoes but it would take $1 a bushel to ship them to their destination. In that case there was nothing doing, and that is one of the reasons why farming is getting so unprofitable. There are many other similar instances that could be cited.

I submit, Mr. Speaker, that western farmers are not kicking against existing conditions without reason. I would like to draw the attention of the House to one of the statements made by Mr. Sanford Evans while giving evidence before the Committee on Agriculture on the subject of the "Wheat Board." He said that those who cannot make money out of wheat raising at present prices have no business to be raising wheat, and that, in spite of the fact that wheat prices had fallen below cost of production. Mr. Sanford Evans also said at the same time that the price of all commodities the farmer had to purchase had started to come down before the price of farm produce came down. What are the facts? In the fall of 1920 wheat prices came down a half and stayed down. In March of 1921 the manufacturers and implement dealers of western Canada in convention assembled, decided that the price of farm implements was not high enough and raised the price 30 per cent. The blacksmiths of Manitoba at the same time met in annual convention and raised their prices 25 per cent, and this in spite of the fact that prices of farm produce were cut in two. These men certainly showed that they hated to take a loss.

It comes hard to give up money that people thought they had made, some honestly and some by outrageous profiteering, out of the world's dire extremity; but it must be disgorged just the same.

We are not to see that equilibrium, without which there can be no widespread resumption of business, until every mother's son of us shall have let go of all the temporary advantages gained under the stress of feverish war activities. They were all unfair, unreasonable and uneconomic at the time. They represented not honest reward nor effort, but a world's agony. They could have no permanent place in any man's industrial or business calculation.

Will people never learn the lesson that we are absolutely interdependent. It seems not. The starting point of the prosperity of every man, woman and child in Canada is a living wage for the farmer. The western farmer who has to take 18 or 20 cents a bushel for his oats is in no position to buy merchandise or machinery made and transported by labour receiving the price of 20 to 50 bushels of oats per day. That fact is so plain, that any wage arbitrator or price-fixing conference should understand it.

We have more respect for plain everyday highwaymen than we have for those who have not yet relinquished ill-gotten gains and accepted their losses. Of course, we hate to take a loss, even though it be a mere return of money which we thought had come to us as a blessing from heaven while Germany sat on our neck; but it came from the hell of war and we have no business trying to hang on to it any longer at the expense of barring the return of general business activity. The sooner the war booty is turned into the common pool, the sooner all will again find incomes equal to necessary expenditures.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I have not offered any remedy for the loss of revenue likely to come to the treasury through the lowering of the tariff on agricultural implements, which I have suggested. If the farmer were in a better position financially he would be in a better position to pay income taxes, something which he is not able to do at present to any great extent as he has not the income. There are a few suggestions in the Farmers' platform issued by the Canadian Council of Agriculture in 1918 which I would commend to the notice of the Minister of Finance.

The farmers in my neighbourhood paid income tax pretty considerably in 1920, but, on the 1921 crop, I am afraid there will be very little income tax paid.

There is a system of collecting revenue, which I am going to bring to the notice of the Finance Minister, and the members of this House, of which I do not approve, and I would like an expression of opinion from the Finance Minister as to whether or not he approves of it, or how much of it has been done. I may say that the Income Tax Department are penalizing religious institutions. I do not know that it would be well to bring out the facts, but I would like to place them before the minister sometime or other. I have an idea that religious organizations were exempt from taxation, but I have a proof in my pocket that they are not.

Mr. HALBERT: I move the adjournment of the debate.

Mr. IRVINE: I move the adjournment of the debate.

Mr. SPEAKER: It is moved by Mr. Halbert that the debate be adjourned.

Mr. IRVINE: I rise to a point of order—

Some hon. MEMBER: Order, order.

Motion agreed to.
