Bill No. 120 (from the Senate), for the relief of James Malone.—Mr. Boys.

Bill No. 121 (from the Senate), for the relief of Marjorie Elizabeth Wickson.—Mr. Maclean (York).

Bill No. 103 (from the Senate), for the relief of Charles William Murtagh.—Mr. Boys.

Bill No. 76 (from the Senate), for the relief of Marie Louise Dagenais was considered in committee and reported.

Mr. GORDON moved that the bill be now read a third time.

Motion agreed to on division, and bill read the third time and passed.

Bill No. 83 (from the Senate), for the relief of Telesphore Joseph Morin was considered in committee and reported.

Mr. GORDON moved that the bill be now read a third time.

Motion agreed to on division, and bill read the third time and passed.

On motion of Mr. Fielding, the House adjourned at 11.12 p.m.

Monday, June 5, 1922

The House met at three o'clock.

ADMIRALTY ACT AMENDMENT

Hon. D. D. McKENZIE (Solicitor General) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 123, to amend the Admiralty Act.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Explain.

Mr. McKENZIE: Under the present Admiralty Act the Governor in Council has the power to appoint a judge and a district registrar. There is no authority to appoint a deputy registrar or a deputy judge. Both these officials are now appointed by the judge. It is thought better that the same power that appoints the registrar should appoint the deputy registrar. That is the purport of the bill.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

ESCHEATS ACT AMENDMENT

Hon. D. D. McKENZIE (Solicitor General) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 124, to amend the Escheats Act. He said: This bill comes to me from the office of the Department of Justice, and its sole provision deals simply with the time in which proceedings under the Escheats Act shall be drawn. The original act is dated 1910, and this is the first amendment to it. The bill simply fixes the time within which an action must be brought. As a rule actions are brought within the usual limit of six years. This is a provision that any action under the Escheats Act shall be brought within two years from the arising of the cause of action.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

SUPREME COURT ACT AMENDMENT

Hon. Sir LOMER GOUIN (Minister of Justice) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 125, to amend the Supreme Court Act.

He said: Under this bill we propose to provide for an appeal to the Supreme Court of Canada from the decisions of the Supreme Court of Ontario in cases of reference made under a certain act passed by the province of Ontario in regard to provincial matters. At present there is no appeal, and we are asked to provide for an appeal.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

QUESTIONS

YUKON—EXPENSES; POPULATION

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou):

1. What amount was paid out of the Treasury in 1921-1922 for all purposes, in the district of Yukon?
2. What is the population of the Yukon?

Hon. Mr. COPP:

Department of Agriculture: 1. $3,619.22. 2. No information.

Auditor General's Office: 1. Referendum Election, $4,573.30; General Election, $6,337.75. 2. No information.

TORONTO SUBURBAN RAILWAY

Mr. HOCKEN:

1. What were the total gross earnings of The Toronto Suburban Railway Company for the year ending December 31st, 1921?
2. What were the company's grand total operating expenses for the same period?
3. What were the net earnings from operation for the same period?
4. What was the miscellaneous income for the same period?
5. What was the total income from operation for the same period?
6. What amount of taxes were paid during the same period, specifying the same?
7. What was the interest on funded debt during the same period?
8. What was the interest on floating debt during the same period?
9. What were the total deductions for the same period?
10. What was the net loss or profit for the same period?
11. Is the net loss of $83,403.06 in the operation of the same railway for the year ending 30th June, 1918, correct, as is to be found on page 137 of the Report of the Bureau of Railway Statistics for the year ending 30th June, 1918?
12. Is the net loss of $107,834.09 in the operation of the same railway for the year ending 30th June, 1919, correct, as is to be found on page 225 of the Report of the Bureau of Railway Statistics for the year ending 30th June, 1919?
13. Is the net loss of $96,684.22 in the operation of the same railway for the year ending 31st December, 1920, correct, as found on page 265 of the report of the Bureau of Railway Statistics for the year ending 31st December, 1920?

Hon. Mr. KENNEDY:

1. $423,143.09.
2. $425,127.06.
3. Deficit, $1,983.97.
4. $11,698.84.
5. $9,714.87.
6. Taxes on real and personal property, $5,064.65.
7. $118,260.
8. Nil.
9. $547.89.
10. Net loss, $114,157.67.
11. 12 and 13. Yes.

NASSAU, ONTARIO, DAM

Mr. THURSTON:

1. Did the Dominion government award a contract in the months of November or December of the year 1921 for the supplying of sixty chair castings and the necessary bolts and nuts for the dam at Nassau, Ontario?
2. If so, what firm was said contract awarded to and at what price?

Hon. Mr. KENNEDY:

1. Yes.
2. The G. Walter Green Company, of Peterborough; price, $55, F.O.B., Nassau.

RAILWAY COMMISSION—CHIEF TRAFFIC OFFICER

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT:

Is it not true that Mr. Campbell has been appointed by Order in Council to replace Chief Traffic Officer Hardwell on the Railway Commission?

Hon. Mr. KENNEDY: No; but Mr. W. E. Campbell was appointed Chief Traffic Officer of the Board of Railway Commissioners in succession to the late Mr. James Hardwell by the Civil Service Commission, under date of June 1st, 1922.

FRUIT COMMISSIONER

Mr. MAYBEE:

1. Does the Government intend filling the position of Fruit Commissioner, lately vacated by Mr. Charles Baxter, by promoting someone from within the service of the department?
2. Will the new commissioner have charge of the whole of the Fruit Branch or only half as heretofore?
3. Will the salary of the new commissioner be three thousand five hundred dollars, the amount formerly paid, or is it to be increased and by what amount?

Hon. Mr. MOTHERWELL:

1. The position of Fruit Commissioner does not become vacant until August 21, 1922, the date of the expiry of Mr. Baxter's leave of absence. The matter of a successor is under consideration and the recommendation in the Civil Service Act in regard to the filling of vacancies by promotion will be followed, if considered in the best interest of the Department and approved by the Civil Service Commission.

2. The Fruit Commissioner has always had charge of the whole Fruit Branch since its formation, as the Department understands it.

3. The new appointment will necessarily be made in accordance with the Civil Service classification and no change in the salary range as provided in that classification is contemplated at the present time.

ROYAL NAVAL COLLEGE

Hon. Mr. STEVENS:

1. Has the Government ordered the closing of the Royal Naval College of Canada at Esquimalt, British Columbia?

2. If so, what are the conditions and terms of the said order?

3. Have the services of the staff attached to the said college been dispensed with?

4. When was the college originally established?

5. In the estimate of the Government has the objects for which the College was established been attained, and have the instructions given and work performed at the College been of a satisfactory character?

Hon. Mr. GRAHAM:

1. Yes, at the end of the present term.

2 and 3. Cadets will be returned home; second and third year cadets may enter the first and second year respectively of the course of applied science in the Universities of McGill, Toronto and Queen's; civilian and naval personnel, not required elsewhere in the service, to be demobilized when work of closing completed.

4. 1910.

5. Yes, for the present.

CHARLES DAUPHINEE

Hon. Mr. BAXTER moved:

For a copy of all letters, telegrams, reports, correspondence and other documents embodying the representations made to the Minister of Public Works with reference to the dismissal of Charles Dauphinee as janitor of public building at Lunenburg, Nova Scotia, and which representations were referred to the Honourable Minister as considered by him as being satisfactory to warrant the dismissal of Dauphinee without investigation.

Hon. MACKENZIE KING: I do not know of any objection to having this order passed. The Minister of Public Works, Mr. King (Kootenay) is not present to-day. Perhaps my hon. friend will allow it to stand.

Mr. BAXTER: Very well.

Motion stands.

[Mr. Motherwell.]

UNOPPOSED MOTION FOR PAPERS

Hon. Mr. STEVENS:

For a copy of all correspondence, letters, telegrams, and other documents exchanged between the Dominion Government or any minister or any officers thereof, and the Government of British Columbia, or the Premier of the said province or any minister or officer thereof, regarding the assumption by the Dominion Government of an issue of Canadian Northern bonds (estimated $40,000,000) guaranteed by the province of British Columbia and the releasing of the British Columbia Government of all liability in regard to the same.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

SATURDAY SITTINGS

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved:

That on Saturday, the 10th June next, and all subsequent Saturdays until the end of the present session, the House shall meet at 3 o'clock in the afternoon and the order of business on Saturday shall be the same as on Friday.

Motion agreed to.

PRIVILEGE—MR. HOEY

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. R. A. HOEY (Springfield): Mr. Speaker, I crave the privilege of making a very brief statement concerning two newspaper reports, one appearing in the Ottawa Journal on June 2, and the other in the Toronto Evening Telegram of June 1. Both these articles refer to a split or division in the Progressive ranks and associate my name intimately with that division. It is scarcely necessary for me to say that these reports have absolutely no foundation in fact; that they are wholly the product of some fertile and uncontrollable imagination. I should like to add that, in my humble judgment, they are wholly unworthy of Canadian journalism.

UNEMPLOYED RETURNED MEN

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Centre Winnipeg): Mr. Speaker, what action does the Government propose to take with regard to the unemployed returned men who have arrived in the city of Ottawa?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): The deputation to which my hon. friend has just referred, waited upon members of the Government this morning and made their representations in writing. Those representations are being considered by the Government; they are also being referred to the special committee of the House which is, at the present time, dealing with matters affecting the position and well-being of returned men. When the report of that committee is presented to the House, there will be opportunity, if desired, to discuss those representations further.

THE BUDGET

CONTINUATION OF THE DEBATE ON THE ANNUAL FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The House resumed from Friday, June 2, the debate on the motion of Hon. W. S. Fielding (Minister of Finance) that Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair for the House to go into Committee of Ways and Means, and the proposed amendment thereto of Hon. Sir Henry Drayton.

Hon. T. A. CRERAR (Marquette): Mr. Speaker, before I come to a discussion of the matter that is at present engaging and has engaged the attention of the House now for a period of some eight or ten days, I wish to make a reference to one or two matters that I should not like to have pass unnoticed. The first is to the fact that the Prime Minister, the leader of the Government (Mr. Mackenzie King), has been created a right hon. gentleman and can now share with my right hon. friend who leads the official Opposition (Mr. Meighen) any distinction and honour that attach to this title. I am not sure whether the addition of this handle to the hon. gentleman's name adds anything to his wisdom or not. In the very difficult and trying times through which Canada is passing, I could hope that that were the case. I, however, sincerely congratulate him on this distinction and honour he has received.

I wish also, like those who preceded me, to make a reference to the fact that this is the sixteenth budget delivered by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding). The Minister of Finance occupies an unique position in this House in the fact that of the members associated with him who have had at any time in their career the responsibility of a cabinet position, the Minister of Finance is by many years the senior in this assembly. While I cannot always agree with the Minister of Finance, while I expect to have some disagreement with the proposals which he has submitted to the House, I feel that, throughout the whole length and breadth of this country, there is no man whose name stands higher in public esteem or who is regarded by Canadians as possessing in higher degree those qualities that tend to the best in our public men than the Minister of Finance.

I have every sympathy with him in the responsible and difficult duty which he has had to discharge to the House and to the country in submitting his budget proposals for the present year. The circumstances under which this is done are grave, and I for one wish to approach a consideration of this question from the one angle of making, if possible, some useful contribution to the solution of Canada's difficult and perplexing problems at the present time. The general financial position of the country is not good; in fact, that is putting the situation very mildly. When we examine into the position of an individual as regards his ability to meet his obligation or to make progress, we usually associate that with the financial position in which he may be, and in national affairs which, after all, are simply individual affairs on a much larger scale, the same idea must govern. In considering the financial position of Canada today, we are faced with this fact—I was going to say this startling fact—that the debt of this country is almost two and a half billions of dollars; that notwithstanding that we are approaching four years from the conclusion of the war, Canada added to her debt last year over $86,000,000 and the year prior over $91,000,000. Those facts cannot be disputed. They stand out clearly before every hon. member; they stand out clearly before the country. I do not think there is anyone in this House, or, for that matter, out of it, who has regard to Canada's good name, who would wish that Canada should escape her honourable obligations. In private life we like to see the standard of personal responsibility and obligation that imposes upon the individual the duty of paying his honest debts. That must and should hold in respect of our whole federal financial administration. And if it does hold, then the burden of this debt, with the tremendous taxation that it involves, is a matter of very vital concern to every person in this country. In discussing his proposals the Minister of Finance pointed out that it is rather a difficult matter clearly to establish the balance of debt in each particular year, from the fact that the practice has varied as to the particular accounts to which certain expenditures should be charged. He made reference particularly to our railway expenditures, and I wish to say a word or two in that connection.

It is quite clear that a great deal, if not practically all, of the total deficit of our railways, is properly chargeable to expenditure and not to capital. I quite realize that expenditures made for the improvement of roadbed, for the purchase of new rolling stock, and for the building of new lines, are properly chargeable to capital account. But I think that the Minister of Finance and the Government will be very well advised indeed to draw a very clear line down through these items, and to charge to expenditure every cent that should be so charged, so that we may know precisely where we are standing in respect of the whole railway enterprise. That is of first rate importance, and when that is done we must then endeavour to make provision for such expenditures. I think the Minister of Finance, in the proposals he has submitted to the House, is endeavouring to do that in the new taxation that he is imposing. There are some who harbour the hope that these railways eventually will return to the country every dollar that is now being taken out of the taxpayers' pockets to make good the deficits and the accounts on fixed charges. I cannot take that optimistic view because, Mr. Speaker, as I have said in this House before, the occasion of this expenditure in connection with our railways is due to the wild-catting in railways that has gone on in this country for fifteen or twenty years past, at any rate for the fifteen years prior to 1914. Railways have been built where there was no need of them, and vast capital expenditures have been embarked upon and engagements made that were unnecessary. But when the individual in his business makes a mistake of that kind he has usually to foot the bill, and that is the position we are in in respect of these railways. For several years, therefore, I am afraid it will be difficult for us to escape some drain on the public treasury to make good the capital charges that arise out of this undertaking. The Minister of Finance has estimated this year that, on the basis of last year's taxation, he will have a revenue of $332,000,000. Last year on the same basis we collected $381,000,000. He has pointed out, and quite rightly, that the estimates brought down and submitted to the House provide for an expenditure of $466,000,000. This does not include the supplementary estimates which have yet to be brought down, and which, I assume, will amount to several million dollars more. At all events, putting the best possible construction on the situation, there is, between the minister's estimate of the revenue he will get on last year's basis of taxation and the proposed expenditure for the year, as revealed in the estimates brought down, a gap of about $140,000,000. Now, that is a very considerable amount. The sum of $140,000,000 more than covered the total annual expenditure of Canada before 1914. Consequently, when we are contemplating a budget, which on the basis of last year's taxation will fail by $140,000,000 to produce the revenue needed for the estimated expenditure this House has considered and passed, or will pass, we are faced with a most serious condition of affairs. And I cannot stress that point too strongly either in this House or out of it. The fact that we are $140,000,000 short on the same basis of taxation that we had last year is one of the most striking, thought-provoking suggestions in the whole of the budget proposals that have been submitted to the House. Our financial accounting, at any rate for the current year, does not give to the House the information as to the exact allocation of expenditures for capital and for ordinary purposes; and I presume that a great deal of it will be for ordinary expenditures. How does the Minister of Finance propose to adjust the discrepancy? He is proposing to adjust it by new taxation. He stated quite modestly—and I think perhaps it was the fact—that he was fearful that the new taxes would not quite bridge the gap that exists between his estimated revenue based on last year's taxation, and the expenditures for the current year. If the minister is correct in that view, then it imposes upon the Government, upon every member of the Government, the strongest possible obligation to curtail the expenditures of their departments wherever they can be curtailed, until we reach the point, at all events, where our outgoing expenditures are covered by our incoming revenue. That is absolutely and imperatively necessary. I have stated before that one of the most important things from this country's point of view is to get the budget within balance; that is to say, the ordinary expenditures of the Government, and the expenditures involved in the administration of the railways, apart from those strictly chargeable to capital account, should be covered annually by the revenues the country produces. That should be the cardinal guiding principle that should govern the financial administration of this country, at least for the next year or two. If we cannot make provisions for debt retirement or debt redemption in the next few years, perhaps the time will come, a few years later, when the sun of prosperity will again be shining on the country and we shall be in a position to do that. But for the immediate present the urgent duty of the Government is to bring about this condition of affairs. I think we have pretty well reached the limits of taxation in this country. I must admit the skill and ingenuity of the Minister of Finance in devising some new methods of extracting money from the pockets of the taxpayers, but we have about reached the limit. How, then, is the desired result to be brought about? I have preached economy in the House and outside of the House, and I am going once more to raise my voice in advocacy of that great need in our national housekeeping to-day, not only in respect of our federal affairs, but, as well, in respect of the whole matter of public expenditures throughout this country. My hon. friend suggested—indeed, he did more than suggest, he stated very plainly—that a good many people in Canada failed to realize the changed conditions of this country, and I presume delegations are still coming from all parts of the Dominion pressing upon the Government the need for public expenditures in their particular localities. I think that is an evidence that there is a great deal of truth in the observation made by my hon. friend, that the Canadian people as yet have not a full and clear realization of our financial position. The tendency in Canada during the last twenty years has been towards extravagance in public expenditure all down the line. That applies not only to our federal government but to most of our provincial governments and to a great many of our municipal corporations. What is needed to-day more than anything else is a realization by our people of the need of practising economy in respect to our public expenditures, and the Government can give an effective lead in that direction by ruthlessly insisting on economy in every branch of expenditure under its charge and control.

We are considering the possibility of raising this year vast additional amounts by new taxation. I do not know how much the proposed taxes will bring into the treasury, but at any rate the Minister of Finance has gone quite far afield in imposing new taxes, and even in the face of that he tells us he is afraid his budget will not balance at the end of the year. In Great Britain taxation is being reduced, in the United States taxation is being reduced—practically all the countries of the world whose condition is anywhere comparable to ours are reducing their taxation; and we must get to the point as rapidly as possible where taxation can be reduced. This heavy burden is pressing upon the people and discouraging business enterprise, and it is making living conditions more difficult. Therefore it is well once in a while to impress upon the Government the need of practising rigid economy.

Now, I do not want to urge economy without suggesting how such economy might be brought about. I am among those who believe that our governmental expenditures—and I include in that term municipal, provincial and federal—is altogether too much. In the years before the war, when our revenues were buoyant and our treasury overflowing, when every person, or nearly every person, was prosperous, the tendency naturally was to embark upon new forms of governmental expenditure. I may be wrong, perhaps my experience and knowledge are not wide enough to enable me to give a competent opinion, but I am of the view that right here in the federal administration of affairs great economies can be effected by the reorganization of departments and the cutting out of needless duplication of services. There are some departments—we have seen it in the estimates—duplicating the services of other departments. Some departments have their offices scattered all over this city. In this respect I would suggest that as soon as the country can afford it we should put up a few good administration buildings here to house the public departments, and so obviate having the staffs scattered over two or three square miles of territory and utilizing office space in scores of private buildings. Nothing is more conducive to extravagance in administration than such a condition of affairs.

I think, too, that there is a considerable overlapping between Dominion expenditures, and provincial expenditures, and I would suggest to the Government that this is a field which might well be inquired into. What is needed in respect to the whole matter is a large comprehensive policy. The problem needs to be attacked with vigour. We are not doing enough when we pare down the estimates of some minister a few thousand dollars here and a few thousand dollars there; that is not going to get us very far along the road of effective economy.

The Government has only been in office a few months, and I think there has been a very general disposition to recognize that fact and to pass the estimates submitted, in the hope that the most rigid economy possible will be practiced. But I am pointing out now to my right hon. friend the Prime Minister and to other members of the Government that next session, if they are still in the seats of the mighty as far as power is concerned, they will not have that excuse, and I for one hope that when the next legislative programme is submitted to this House, I care not by what government, substantial reductions in the cost of running the government machine may be shown and brought into effect.

I want to say a word or two now about the character of the new taxation that has been introduced by the Minister of Finance. Any criticism I am offering is offered fully conscious of the great difficulties he must have in finding the money necessary to meet the demands made upon him. A few of these taxes I wish to make special reference to, and the first is the sales tax. My hon. friend has increased the sales tax by 50 per cent. I opposed the sales tax in the budget of a year ago when it was introduced by his predecessor. I think it is just as unsound to-day as it was then. Indeed, if I read correctly the speeches of my hon. friends opposite, some of whom occupy the Cabinet benches, I think I could find argument in those speeches made last session when this tax was under discussion which would support my assertion. A sales tax is unsound for the reason that it does not bear fairly upon those who have to pay it. It is true there are a certain number of exemptions from the operation of the tax, but nevertheless I submit that the person who has the smallest income and is the least able to pay this tax has to pay a share altogether out of proportion to his ability under this method of collecting revenue. Let me cite the case of a working man—he may be a farmer, or a workman in a factory, or a clerk in an office. We will suppose he has a family of half a dozen children, and is earning anywhere between $1,000 and $1,800 a year. The sales tax hits him on a large number of articles that he must purchase for the maintenance of his family, and it hits him most unfairly. By way of contrast we have a bachelor—I was going to say a wealthy bachelor, like my right hon. friend the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King); I do not know that he is a wealthy bachelor, but at any rate he is a bachelor. Well, he escapes the incidence of this tax almost altogether. In that respect the tax is unfair. Taxes should be levied according to the ability of the taxpayer to pay, and this method of taxation violates that sound canon of taxation. I have no doubt that this tax will provide a considerable amount of revenue, but I am equally certain that it will also be a discouragement to business. Taxes of this kind always tend to discourage trade and industry, because the heavier the tax on the articles consumed, the smaller the quantity of those articles that will be consumed, and restricted consumption means unemployment in your factories. Consequently, the tax, judged by any standard you wish to apply to it, is not a sound tax.

My hon. friend has also imposed a very considerable increase indeed in the tax on cheques. I admit there might reasonably be some increase in that tax. Under the old regulations it rested at two cents per cheque issued; under the new regulations of the Finance Minister a tax of two cents is to be affixed for every $50 or part of $50 in amount of the cheque. The result is that, in particular lines of business at any rate, the burden imposed will be a very heavy one indeed. I am not contending for a moment that no additional tax on cheques should be imposed, but I think that when this matter comes to be considered in committee—if, indeed, my hon. friend the Finance Minister has not given it consideration before that time—some change in this respect should be made. In the great majority of businesses the additional tax will probably have very little effect, but I know, for instance, of some firms doing business whose contribution under this tax will be between $50,000 and $60,000 a year. I do not know to what extent the condition may prevail throughout the whole country, but there are certain businesses that peculiarly have to do their business by cheque. Upon such firms this additional stamp tax is a very heavy burden indeed. This proposed regulation is one which might well receive further consideration when the details of the budget resolutions are taken up in committee.

Some criticism, I think, can fairly be levelled against the proposal to tax the premiums on outside insurance companies operating in Canada. Many Canadian firms are unable to get from companies registered in Canada the kind of insurance they desire, and have to go outside of Canada to obtain it. Why should they be penalized by an additional tax on the premiums that the insurance company collects? Without doubt the tax will have to be paid by the person in this country who is taking out the insurance.

There is no doubt whatever that in all these burdens the Canadian people are carrying a very heavy load, and I offer to my hon. friend the Minister of Finance the suggestion which I have made before in the House and which I think has certain merit: that the time has come—if it has not already passed—when some attempt should be made to co-ordinate the financial policy of this country. I notice that this is advocated by the Citizens' Research Institute of Canada, which is making a particular study of the question of taxation. The object is, if possible, to find out whether overlapping cannot be done away with and whether expense cannot be reduced; to find out, if it can be done, where fair fields of taxation lie. Under the British North America Act the provinces of Canada have all the powers of taxation except that relating to customs, which is vested in the federal government; and the result is that the citizens of some provinces pay three income taxes, one to the Dominion, one to the province, and one to the municipality. There are various ways in which overlapping takes place. I believe that by a round table conference you could accomplish not only the straightening out of these inequalities in taxation, but the securing of well defined fields of taxation for each governing body, in other words, we should seek a policy the result of which would be to levy taxation fairly over all the people of Canada. One other advantage that would come from such a conference would be this: it would bring home to the provinces and to the municipalities, it would bring home to the people of Canada, the precise financial position of the country at the present time. In that way I am convinced that such a conference would be a very real service to the Dominion. I think the federal government should take the initiative in this matter. They are more conversant with the situation than are the governments in the provinces or in the municipalities; and I believe that if an effective lead were given by the Government of Canada to-day on this whole question of economy, there would be a splendid response from the whole of the Canadian people.

I wish now to discuss some other aspects of the budget. With some of its proposals I am cordially in agreement. It has some good features;—it has some features that are not so good, to which I shall refer in a moment or two, but it has, I say, some good features—and the first I would like to mention in that respect is the statement of the Finance Minister, which statement, I take it, represents the view of the Government, that it is the settled policy of the Government to secure reciprocity with the United States—to bring about a revival of the reciprocity arrangement of 1911, an arrangement which, had it been carried out, would have been of the greatest possible advantage to this country. The Minister of Finance gave good evidence I think, of his desire to bring this about in his recent trip to Washington and his taking the matter up as he did with the United States authorities. That, I say, is to the credit of the Government.

Another welcome and necessary change is the abrogation of the provisions in the Customs Act which gave the customs officer the power to assess the value of goods imported. That provision should never have been in the Customs Act; it often operated unfairly against the firm or individual importing goods into Canada. Another provision that has been done away with—and these are provisions that those of the Progressives who were in the House last session opposed most vigorously—is the regulation requiring that the country of origin be marked on goods brought into Canada. The whole purpose of that regulation was to make it difficult to import goods into this country, and to the extent that it did so it provided protection for the Canadian manufacturer on those goods. I believe, Sir, that was the whole purpose in view at the time this regulation was brought into effect.

Another important improvement—perhaps the most important—is the wiping out of that antediluvian provision in the customs regulations, that foreign currencies should be taken at half their pre-war value for the purposes of customs assessment when goods from such foreign countries were brought into Canada. That provision was, of course, the most outrageous form of protection that was ever placed upon the statue book of this country. It operated wholly and solely to keep goods from these countries out of the Dominion; and to the extent that you fence off certain goods, to the extent that you prevent their importation into Canada, you bring benefit and profit to the Canadian manufacturer. In some respects that provision was in line with true protectionist doctrine. I have never been able to understand the philosophy of protection in this respect. If it is a good thing to make it difficult for goods to come into the country so that your home manufacturer may benefit, would it not be a better thing to keep foreign goods out altogether and leave the home market to your Canadian manufacturer? That would be the logical course to follow. I know my hon. friends to my right do not agree with that view.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Or opposite.

Mr. CRERAR: I am very sure they do not, either.

Mr. DUFF: Some of us do.

Mr. CRERAR: If the protectionist theory is sound, why not keep foreign goods out of the country altogether? Well, this practice that was introduced by the budget of last year was in accordance with true protectionist doctrine, inasmuch as it operated to keep such goods entirely out of Canada. But the only result was to increase the cost to the Canadian consumer of similar goods made in Canada. Consequently, I say that the Government have done a wise thing in wiping that provision off the statute books.

Something has been said in the debate about trade with Germany. My hon. friend the ex-Minister of Finance (Sir Henry Drayton) described this budget as a "two and a half per cent British preference and free trade with Germany." That was rather an extreme statement, but I have observed that some other hon. gentlemen who have spoken in this debate have condemned the idea of trading with Germany, and they would like to see our customs barriers and tariff regulations framed in such a way as to make trade with Germany impossible. I cannot agree with the view expressed by my hon. friend from St. St. John (Mr. Baxter) the other day who stated, and it seemed to me an extreme view, that he would have no part or parcel with anything German. Is that the position that is being taken by the other countries of the world to-day? What is the position of the United States with respect to trade with Germany? What is the position of Great Britain? Both of these great countries are doing everything they possibly can to restore their trade with Germany—doing it to-day, doing it at this very moment. A group of financial men from both countries is conferring with a view to extending credits to Germany so that her manufacturing and purchasing power may be increased, and the whole trade of the world stimulated thereby. Is not that a sound principle and policy to follow? Why, in the face of that, should Canada take the position that we will have no trade with Germany, that we will create conditions which will make trade with that country impossible? I say again that in that respect the Minister of Finance has acted very wisely in the change he has made.

When I come to consider the other proposals contained in the budget, I regret that I cannot offer the same commendation to the Minister of Finance. This budget, outside of the changes I have referred to in abolishing these regulations, is a protectionist budget. It is based on the principle of protection. It is true the minister has made certain reductions in the duties—2½ per cent on a large number of articles coming from Great Britain; in other words, the British preference is increased to that extent. As far as the United States and the general tariff is concerned, the reductions made are very few and very far between. I think I am quite within the facts when I state that this budget is based upon the principle of protection. Nor is there any statement of government policy in the matter from the Minister of Finance. If he had stated: We are aiming at the elimination of protection in the fiscal policy of Canada—then the changes he has made, while they would not be sufficient, or anything like sufficient in my judgment, to meet the needs of the case, would nevertheless have given to this country an idea of which way the Government was travelling. Take the item of agricultural implements, for instance. My hon. friends on the government side have a very definite policy on the question of agricultural implements. They had a very definite policy in respect to the question of agricultural implements.

Mr. CHAPLIN: Before the election.

Mr. CRERAR: That policy was based on free agricultural implements. It was a sound policy, for reasons which I hope presently to give to the House. But in the changes which have been made in the tariff proposals submitted by the Government to the House, do we find anything of free agricultural implements? There is not one single, solitary lone implement added to the free list in Canada.

Mr. HOCKEN: Did you expect that?

Mr. CRERAR: I do not know what my hon. friend expected. I am not asking him, and I do not intend to disclose to him what I expected. But that is the position and I think the Minister of Finance has not been quite consistent even in the changes he has made in the duties on agricultural implements. What are those duties? We find ploughs, for instance, reduced 2½ per cent; the duty now stands at 15 per cent under the general tariff. As my hon. friend pointed out, it is very true that practically all the agricultural implements that are imported into Canada come from the United States, and consequently the reductions in the British preference are of no value as far as agricultural implements are concerned. But there have been a few reductions. Ploughs to-day stand at 15 per cent under the general tariff, and mowers at 10 per cent under the general tariff. Can any minister in the Government or any hon. member of this House tell me why there should be a difference of five per cent between the duty on mowers and the duty on ploughs? The very same materials enter into the making of a plough as enter into the making of a mower, and yet there is a difference of five per cent in the duty. My hon. friend the ex-Minister of Finance smiles at that, but I can assure him that he was guilty of the same thing a year ago when he brought down his budget proposals. Portable engines carry a duty of 17½ per cent. Why should they vary from ploughs I do not know. Then tractors under $1,400 are free of duty. There is a little ray of comfort in the fact that the Government are fixing this by statute, and no longer leaving it subject to possible fluctuations by Order in Council. The duty was taken off tractors by the Union government in the early part of 1918. For what purpose? For the laudable purpose of increasing production in this country. Even under the stress of war conditions, under the stress of an urgent need, that government, which comprised many most ardent protectionists, recognized that it was necessary to take the duty off tractors in order to encourage and increase production of foodstuffs in this country. If that was a sound policy then, is it not a sound policy to-day? It is, and the Government is to be commended for making this change permanent so far as this particular tariff is concerned. But why distinguish between the tractor that costs $1,400, and the tractor that costs $1,500? The farmer who wants to buy a tractor at $1,400 from the United States gets it in free of duty, but if some one wants a tractor a little bit larger than that, and it costs him $1,500 in the United States, when that machine comes to the customs border it is assessed $162.50 duty.

Again, the self-binder that cuts the grain in the fields has a tariff tax of 10 per cent, but threshing machines that thresh the grain after it has been harvested, carry a duty of 15 per cent. Why should that difference exist? Why should the threshing machine not be brought down to 10 per cent duty? I would also point out that the tools that are necessary to keep both of these machines in repair have to pay a duty of 30 per cent.

There is nothing consistent in these tariff proposals so far as agricultural machinery is concerned, and I can scarcely believe that my hon. friend the Minister of Finance has given this matter the fullest attention that he should have given it. Or is it possible that he was unable to go as far as he would like to go in making changes in the duties on agricultural implements? One of the amazing things in the situation to-day is the fact that among hon. gentlemen opposite, and even in the very Government itself, there are men who professedly hold almost diverse views on the question of the tariff and protection. Is that a sound thing? It is not, and I say that the Government failed, in my opinion, in implementing their pledges through their failure to reduce the duty on agricultural implements. If the Minister of Finance had come to the House and said: We would like to have cut off the duties on agricultural implements, but the needs of revenue are such that we feel we cannot bring the duties down below 10 per cent, I believe he would have had support in this House for that proposal. But I see very little effort in that direction. When you come to the necessaries of life, where do you find the reductions on those articles? We have reductions of 2½ per cent made in a few cases, but, under the general tariff to-day, on the main necessaries of life—clothing, boots and shoes, the household equipment and utensils needed in the home—the general tariff duty ranges from 25 to 35 per cent. Am I therefore unfair—and I do not wish to be unfair—in stating that this budget is, in its essentials, a protectionist budget? There is no change of moment in the tariff, for the reductions of 2½ per cent made in the customs duties are almost all swallowed up in the increase in the sales tax. It is well known that the sales tax on goods imported is higher than it was on the domestic manufacture, and, consequently, the ratio of increase, I submit, has practically taken away all the reduction that has been made by the 2½ per cent. That is not the platform of the Liberal party. If the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) had come before this House and said "It is true we had a tariff platform in 1919. I do not feel, and the Government does not feel, that it can cross every 't' and dot every 'i' of that platform to-day," and had been able to give some reasons why they could not go the full length, I think they would have received consideration from this House. As far as I am concerned, I would have been prepared to give consideration to that statement. But such is not the case; and, indeed, if we consider the resolution that was moved in amendment to the budget a year ago which my hon. friend, the Minister of Finance, made reference to in his speech, I scarcely think that these budget proposals that have been brought down square with that resolution. What were the cardinal principles, or the cardinal features, of that resolution a year ago? I think the second and third paragraphs of that resolution contain the meat of the whole thing, and they read:

> That the aim of the fiscal policy of Canada should be the encouragement of industries based on the natural resources of the country, the development of which may reasonably be expected to create healthy enterprises, giving promise of enduring success.
> That such changes should be made in the Customs duties as may be expected to reduce the cost of living, and to reduce also the cost of implements of production required for the efficient development of the natural resources of the Dominion.

I say again, if the Government had come to the House and said "We have not had time to make these changes," it would have taken a considerable degree of faith to swallow that, but they would have been in some reasonable position. But as I understand to-day from the budget proposals made by the Minister of Finance, these, excepting some minor changes which may be made, represent the policy of the Government so far as tariff reduction is concerned; and if that is the case, I submit to this House and to the country that the tariff changes made in the budget proposals submitted to the House do not implement the resolution that was moved in amendment to the budget a year ago, and, consequently, are not such as the country requires, and should have, at the present time.

[Mr. Crerar.]

I want to deal now for a moment with the attitude displayed in the budget with regard to the reduction of duties on goods from United States. I am not at all sure that my hon. friend the Minister of Finance—and I give him credit for every sincerity in his desire to improve trade relations with the United States—is taking the wisest course in making a discrimination against the United States in favour of Great Britain at the present time. I know that is a debatable question. It may be that the minister has information, or has reasons for his views, that I have not got, and I would certainly defer greatly to his judgment in that matter. But, nevertheless, it is quite apparent that even in the United States to-day, in some of its leading newspapers, the discrimination against the United States is being treated as a retaliatory measure against that country. We turned down reciprocity in 1911. The American government had approached the Canadian government of that day and said "We are willing to make an arrangement with you on this basis." The Canadian people had turned down that arrangement. I think that now we would have advanced our interests further in the matter of trade with United States if we had frankly said "We will show no discrimination against you in any changes we make." My own view is we would have gone further. I am as firmly convinced as ever that trade with United States is necessary. Indeed, if we study the trade figures submitted to the House by the Minister of Finance in the proposals he laid before us, we find the two countries with which our trade is done mainly are Great Britain and the United States. Last year we exported to the United States $293,000,000 worth of goods and we imported from the United States $516,000,000 worth. That has been the ratio or something near it for a great many years—and I might, in passing, draw the attention of my hon. friends to the right to the doleful prediction they used to make in the House a few years ago that the adverse balance of trade with United States was the cause of the depreciation of the Canadian dollar in New York.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Hear, hear.

Mr. CRERAR: My hon. friend the ex-Minister of Finance (Sir Henry Drayton) says "hear, hear," and his leader (Mr. Meighen) echoes the sentiment. Perhaps my hon. friends, when they speak in this debate, will explain how the discount on our Canadian dollar has disappeared, while the balance of trade continues the same.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Borrowing money.

Mr. CRERAR: I think the Minister of Finance has not been happy perhaps in taking that attitude towards the United States. Now what is the feeling in the United States? I am convinced the feeling is friendly to Canada, and I am convinced our protectionist friends in this country, while holding up the example of the United States to-day, will surely be deprived of that example. All the signs of the times in the United States point to the fact that they are abandoning the system of protection in fiscal policy. My right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition laughs, but we have the fact that the leading business houses of United States, the manufacturers, the leading bankers and the Chambers of Commerce of that country, are all protesting against the tariff legislation that is now before Washington. And where is this wonderful protectionist doctrine that was going to do so much for the United States? Where is the legislation introduced in the American Congress over a year ago, and scarcely any further on to-day than a year ago when it was introduced?

Mr. MEIGHEN: It is in effect.

Mr. CRERAR: My right hon. friend is altogether mistaken. The Fordney measure, which affects the importation of agricultural products from Canada and other countries, is in effect, but the general tariff is not in effect. The tariff which is in effect is still the Underwood tariff passed in 1913, which contains a large list of free articles entering the United States. My hon. friends are extremely anxious to bring to Canada capital needed for Canada's development. They argue that it is necessary to secure money needed for the development of our resources. I think it was my hon. friend from Centre Toronto (Mr. Bristol) who urged the argument that because of the principle of protection in Canada during the last thirty years, 350 manufacturing concerns in United States had opened branches in Canada and spent one hundred million dollars in this country. I am not sure that is greatly adding to the wealth of Canada. To-day, United States manufacturers are turning their eyes to Quebec. Why are they doing so? In the words of a manufacturer of some note in the United States, it is because of steadier labour conditions in Quebec that they are turning their eyes to that province as a manufacturing centre. But what profit is it nationally to Canada to have one, two, three or five million dollars coming in from the United States for the establishment of a factory in Sherbrooke, Three Rivers or any other town in Quebec for the manufacture of goods, and then to have all the profits made on those goods go back to the shareholders in the United States? Is that a sound policy of development?

Mr. McMASTER: Absentee landlordism.

Mr. CRERAR: Absentee landlordism! That is all it is. In order that this may be done, as I will presently show, we impose severe handicaps upon the natural industries of this country. I cannot for the life of me see the wisdom of any such proposal. The plain fact of the matter is this, that, in the United States to-day, some of the leading manufacturers are opposed to the principle of protection as regards the United States. They recognize, as has been already said by several hon. members in this debate, that if a country is going to sell goods, it must buy goods, and if it is going to buy goods, there is no sense in having those goods climb over a high protective tariff. The business of trade is not a one-sided business, although our protectionists assume it to be so. Our protectionist friends eternally lose sight of the fact that trade is not a one-sided affair. If you sell goods produced in a country outside of that country, you must buy in return, because that is the only way in which you will get paid for your goods. The United States are recognizing that principle to-day. They recognize that Europe owes them over $10,000,000,000, and that the only way in which they can get repaid is in goods. Consequently, instead of pinning their faith to the old fetish of protection, they are coming out into the sunlight of freedom of trade, and they are saying: "This thing is no good for us at the present time; it does not fill our needs." I venture to predict that within a few years the United States will have its face set definitely against the principle of a protective tariff, just as definitely as Great Britain to-day has its face set against that principle. But American industries which are looking for free trade for their factories in the United States, are not unwilling to have protection for their factories in Canada, and why? Because they wish to exploit the area of Canada as regards the things that they produce. It is a significant fact that when the ex-Minister of Finance (Sir Henry Drayton) was engaged in that lengthy peregrination over Canada a few years ago seeking evidence as to what changes should be made in the tariff, manufacturer after manufacturer in Canada representing American interests, took the view that they could not possibly live unless duties were kept up on the goods they manufactured, and they were branch houses of American concerns. I am very doubtful as to the wisdom of that kind of development.

We of the Progressive party stand unalterably opposed to the principle of protection in our fiscal policy, and I wish to make that as clear as I can make it. We are opposed to it for the following reasons, amongst others: First, that a nation grows rich by trading. No nation in the world ever acquired wealth, no nation ever acquired world prominence that did not trade with the world; and because we grow rich by trading, not within ourselves, but with the world, we are opposed to protection, for protection presents a barrier against trading with the world. A second reason is that protection retards the development of the natural industries of this country. What are the natural industries of Canada? They are those industries which are based upon the natural resources of Canada. The Almighty, when He gave us this country, gave it to us filled with a wonderful richness, a fertile soil, wonderful forests, rich mines and splendid fisheries. These are the great natural sources of wealth to this country. And how has protection operated to assist in their development? My hon. friends to my right argue—and I will say that I have not frequently heard that argument come from the other side of the House—that protection is necessary because it furnishes a home market to our Canadian producers of natural products. There never was a greater fallacy in the world than that as applied to this country. I will admit, for the sake of argument, that it furnishes a home market to vegetable growers around our large cities; but of what value is the Canadian market to the Canadian farmer who is producing in Canada enough wheat to feed 50,000,000 people when we have a population of only 8,500,000? What use is it to the Canadian farmer and the Canadian dairymen who are producing far away and beyond what can possibly be consumed in Canada? It is of no use whatever. Protection has operated to discourage those industries by making it costly and difficult to secure the very things that are necessary to carry them on. In order to build up a few factories and crowd a few cities, for forty years we have imposed this enormous burden on the masses of the real wealth producers of this nation. Protection has had no other effect.

The absurdity of the thing is discovered when you examine into some of its oddities, some of its peculiarities. Let us take rubber, for example. Rubber shoes, rubber belting, rubber goods of all kinds, are taxed under the general tariff either 30 or 35 per cent—I cannot at the moment recall which. Not an ounce of raw rubber is produced in Canada; we have to bring the raw material for these factories hundreds, yes, thousands of miles, to this Dominion. And then, in order to create an industry that will give employment to a few hundred or a few thousand people at the very outside, we say: "we will put a protective duty of 30 per cent on all rubber manufactured goods coming into this country, and we will build up in this Dominion a home industry that the Dominion may be proud of. That is the theory and doctrine of my hon. friends to my right. I wonder how many of my hon. friends to the right of you, Mr. Speaker, down in their hearts believe in the economic wisdom of that policy.

Mr. CAHILL: Not many.

Mr. CRERAR: I should say not; I would hope not. What is the effect of protection in that particular case? We tax the Canadian consumer of rubber goods to the extent of 30 or 35 per cent—indeed, with the present sales tax, the tax is more like 40 per cent. In other words, every person who wants to buy a garden hose, or a piece of rubber belting, or a pair of rubbers, or any class of rubber goods, has the cost of it increased by that amount. And for what purpose? To bolster up and support and maintain in this country an industry that gives employment to a few thousand people at the very outside. I put it to the commonsense of this House: Is that a sane policy? I know the Minister of Finance in his heart does not believe it is a sound policy. I give him credit for having too much vision and business commonsense to believe in it.

I have talked so much about cotton that I am getting a little tired of the subject in some ways, but I want to refer to it to-day for a specific reason. For many years we have had, on cotton goods coming into this country, a protective tariff of over 30 per cent under the general tariff. Cotton is not produced in Canada. This is another manufacture where the raw material is brought into this country free of duty. It is true it gives employment to a few thousand people in Sherbrooke, Valleyfield, Cornwall, and other places where they manufacture these cotton goods; but in order to sustain these few thousand you put a penalty of 30 per cent on every cotton consumer in Canada. And not only that, you do even worse; because the finished cotton goods is the raw material for some one else in this Dominion. Now, it is an interesting fact that in the late election one of the most enthusiastic supporters which the Progressive cause had in the city of Winnipeg—and we had many there—was a manufacturer of workingmen's overalls, smocks, and shirts. He was frankly a supporter of the Progressives, and was opposed to the tariff for this reason. He said: "It prevents me from buying my raw material where I can get it to the best advantage. My raw material is the cotton goods made in these factories, and when I come to buy it I have to pay the price the manufacturers lay down; and they even go so far as to specify the quantities I shall have". My hon. friend from Brome (Mr. McMaster) gave us some interesting information in his address the other day as to the operation of trusts and combines in matters of this kind. The manufacturer of overalls did not have any advantage from the tariff, because he paid his duty to the Canadian cotton manufacturer; and although there may have been a protection to him against the goods he manufactured, coming into Canada, he enjoyed no real protection in his industry for the reason I have pointed out. And that is the inconsistency of the thing all through the piece; for under the protective tariff, what is the finished article of one factory is the raw material of another, and you cannot possibly define any system of customs tariff that will work equitably. It simply cannot be done.

There is another reason why we are opposed to protection, and it is that protection is sectional and selfish in its operation. What is needed in Canada is a policy that will unite the Dominion. But protection has built up a few large cities; it has done very little else; and it is all the veriest nonsense to say that this system is necessary to provide employment for Canadian workingmen. Where are the skilled workmen in Canada going? They have been going in shoals to the United States in the last ten years. We know that the immigration figures in connection with the United States during the last ten years show a balance against Canada for actual purposes of residence, although there has been a big flow of population both ways. People have come from the agricultural portions of the United States to settle on our cheap lands in western Canada. What, then, has constituted the drift of population from Canada to the United States in the other direction? It has come from the labouring people of the Dominion; and that is why I urged the Minister of Immigration (Mr. Stewart) the other night to see to it that records are kept of the people going out of Canada, what parts of the country they come from, and what their occupations are. And why has there been such an exodus of population from the East? The reason is simple. The cost of living is less in the United States than in Canada, while wages, on the whole, are just as high. The Canadian workman will work in a country where the same amount of wages will buy more of the necessaries of life he requires, and that is why many of our workingmen go there. I say, therefore, that this system of protection, created to build up the Dominion, is absolutely unsuited for the purpose. And what has been the effect on the maritime provinces of forty years of protection? During the last election I spent a week or ten days in that part of Canada advocating the Progressive cause. I will confess that the results were not very fruitful.

Mr. DUFF: Hear, hear.

Mr. CRERAR: Nevertheless it gave me an opportunity to get an insight into and to study the conditions in the maritime provinces such as I never had before.

Mr. DUFF: We are all Progressives down there.

Mr. CRERAR: And I make this assertion, Mr. Speaker, that there is not a single part of Canada that has suffered so much under protection as the maritime provinces.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. CRERAR: I am very glad to see that I have some support on the other side of the House. What was the condition of the maritime provinces prior to Confederation? When you had freedom of exchange your ships were going into practically every port of the world. But for 40 years we have had a system of tariffs in this country that has made it difficult, if not impossible, for the maritime provinces to trade with the world, and the result is the stagnation of the natural industries of those provinces. But our protectionist friends say that the remedy is to get manufacturing industries in the maritime provinces. Well, of what use will they be? Can you create manufacturing industries in the maritime provinces that will compete with the industries of Montreal, Hamilton, Toronto, and other larger cities? It cannot be done. The whole tendency to-day in the manufacturing business is towards centralization, and the big centralized protected manufacturer controls the field and can crush out competition. I say to my hon. friends from Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island that they will never have manufacturing industries in the maritime provinces under this policy of protection; never in the world. What about Ontario? Well, Ontario has been lauded and has been cited as an example of the efficacy of the principle of protection. But what a change has taken place in Ontario. Study the figures of population as disclosed by the census returns and you will discover this undeniable fact, that some of the finest agricultural counties of old Ontario have gone down steadily in population in the last 30 years. My hon. friend from West Toronto (Mr. Hocken) says that the people will not get married. They will not get married, I apprehend, because they cannot afford to do so under this system of protection; and I would invoke the assistance of my hon. friend in getting this thing righted. That is the condition of affairs. Is it a healthy condition? I put it to the common sense of hon. members, is that a healthy condition of national growth and development? I submit that it is not, and I say to my hon. friends to my right, and to hon. gentlemen opposite who believe in the principle of protection: Try to justify this system on the ground of what it has done in Canada during the last 40 years either in the way of increasing population or in extending the national wealth, and you find that you cannot justify it. And what about the prairie provinces? We have heard a good deal of criticism, or at least we have seen considerable criticism in the eastern press, of the prairie provinces. I want to say in this House, with a full sense of my responsibility, that the prairie provinces will never become protectionist. You may send, as has been done in the past a first class hidebound Tory protectionist from the province of Ontario to western Canada, and while the heresy may last with him for a few years it will not affect those who come after him in his family. And I will tell you why. Western Canada cannot have manufacturing industries. In the first place, we have not the coal and iron upon which manufacturing industries largely are based, and in the second place the climatic conditions are such that the manufactures based on these articles cannot be developed in western Canada. On the other hand, what have we received from protection? It has not helped us. Western Canada progresses in spite of protection. Our chief exports have been wheat, live stock and agricultural products, and the home market has not been of the slightest value to us in respect of these things. Then again take British Columbia. This province is supposed to have some belief in protection. I was much interested a short time ago in seeing a proposal advocated, I think by the Board of Trade of Vancouver, for the purpose of making Vancouver a free port. I think my hon. friend from Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens) favoured that proposal.

Mr. STEVENS: Does my hon. friend desire to be accurate?

Mr. CRERAR: Yes.

Mr. STEVENS: Then let me correct him. What the Board of Trade of Vancouver asked for was a free port zone in the harbour of Vancouver; which is slightly different from what my hon. friend said. It was for re-packing and re-exporting goods.

Mr. CRERAR: I am glad to have my hon. friend's explanation, although I remember reading the bill that they propose to submit to the House and his explanation is not my understanding of it, but I may be wrong. What was the purpose of that? It was simply to get away, if possible, from the evil effects on the trade of that city. That was the whole purpose behind the proposal.

Now, what this country needs is a policy that will unite it from one end to the other. And I repeat, Sir, that the system of protection is selfish and sectional in its operation and unsuited to our national needs. The real wealth of Canada is produced from its natural resources. Let me give you figures of our exports in that respect. Agriculture has prospered in spite of protection; the West has prospered in spite of protection. But why? What has been the history of protection in this country? It was introduced in 1879 and for ten years, when we had a period of great depression and our people were leaving by the tens of thousands and going to the western states. In the early days the party that had been responsible for introducing protection was shifting its ground, speeches were being made about the need of "lopping off the mouldering branches," and in 1897 a very substantial reduction was made on the tariff upon imports from Great Britain under the change of government that had taken place. But the prosperity that Canada enjoyed from 1900 to 1912 was not due to the tariff at all, but was due to the fact that the great West with its vast areas of free lands was opening up, people were coming into this country by hundreds of thousands each year, and capital was pouring in by the tens of millions of dollars annually; railways were being built, public works were being carried on. Those were the conditions that gave prosperity to Canada at that time. That prosperity was not due to the tariff; indeed, the manufacturing establishments of Eastern Canada were practically "on their uppers" until the western development started.

But even in spite of the tariff, our natural industries have prospered. Let us look at the export figures for last year. Our total exports then amounted to $740,000,000—a very considerable total, although a substantial reduction from the figures for the previous year. Now, the wealth of a country is measured by its trade figures. That is why finance ministers, not only in this country but in every other country, dwell on these figures as a measure of prosperity. As I say, we exported goods to the value of $740,000,000 last year. But where did those exports come from? Last year was a year of trade depression, a very trying year throughout the world. Of this total, vegetable products accounted for $318,000,000, and animal products, $135,000,000; in other words, $453,000,000 of the $740,000,000 of exports last year had their origin in the farms of Canada.

Mr. MANION: In that connection, has my hon. friend figures for the total production of the farms of Canada last year to compare with the amount exported?

Mr. CRERAR: I have not those figures, Mr. Speaker, and they have nothing whatever to do with the question.

Mr. MANION: In my opinion they have.

Mr. CRERAR: We produced enough on our farms to maintain our own population and have a surplus for export. I am pointing out the surplus we exported last year.

An hon. MEMBER: What about cotton?

Mr. CRERAR: Our cotton manufacturers contribute very little in the way of exports, but we import a very small amount of cotton goods, so the main business of our cotton manufacturers and other manufacturers of similar lines of goods in Canada is to produce for the needs of the Canadian people under tariff protection ranging from 30 to 35 per cent.

Mr. STEVENS: Does my hon. friend include in those figures products of the farm that had been manufactured?

Mr. CRERAR: Certainly, those figures include manufactured products of the farm such as flour and meats.

Mr. STEVENS: Cereals?

Mr. CRERAR: Cereals and everything of that kind. The next item of our exportable wealth is from our forests, and represents $180,000,000. The wealth of our forests gains nothing by protection, because 85 per cent of the pulp and paper manufactured in this country is exported, and the main purpose is to find export markets for our surplus manufactured products. Our mineral products represent $50,000,000. So we have a total in farm, forest and mineral products of $683,000,000 in value, out of a total of $740,000,000 of exports. And yet, for forty years we have been following a fiscal policy aimed to create wealth in this country by building up manufacturing industries, although even last year they were not able to produce more than a few million dollars of exports in the most serious year that this country has passed through in a long time. To my mind the situation is absurd. The fiscal policy of this country should be based on considerations that will give the best possible opportunity for the development of these natural industries, such as agriculture, lumbering, and mining. The production of grain is just as much an industry as the making of goods by machinery. Let us then shape our fiscal policy to give encouragement to these great natural industries. If by encouraging the production of cereals we can double our production, and so increase by another $200,000,000 or $300,000,000 the value of our exports, our business is going to benefit, our railways will have more traffic to carry, and our factories will give more employment. That is a sound basis upon which to build our industries. But we have, so to speak, inverted the pyramid and endeavoured consistently for forty years to follow protection for the avowed purpose of building up manufacturing industries in the Dominion, creating them as the basis of our wealth, and neglecting our great natural sources of wealth.

The futility of protection is being recognized throughout the world to-day. After the war was over the various European countries sought to enrich themselves and advance their own interests by raising tariff walls against their neighbours so as to exclude their neighbours' goods. What has been the result? It has accentuated the suspicions, hatreds, and distrusts that have cursed Europe for hundreds of years, and after the terrific turmoil of the war was over the spirit of peace, that should be brooding over Europe has given place to a spirit of hate, distrust and strife. Those who were responsible for bringing about the Genoa Conference recognized that truth, and in the resolutions adopted at Cannes for the conduct of that conference specific reference was made to this particular subject. It is so important, Sir, that I shall read it to the House. It stated:

> The obstacles to revival—

That is, to the revival and reconstruction of Europe.

> The obstacles to revival, however, are economic as well as financial.
> The conference will therefore consider how the existing impediments to the free interchange of products of different countries can be removed, in particular by the abolition as rapidly and completely as possible of such new impediments as have resulted from post-war conditions.

That was set out as one of the specific things that was wrong with Europe to-day. I have already alluded to the United States; —what was the position in Great Britain? Some of my hon. friends in this House have cited the safeguarding of industries bill in Great Britain as evidences of the fact that Great Britain was moving toward protection. Well, I advise them, Sir, to get all the pleasure and comfort they can out of that in the immediate future, because if I can read aright the signs of the times, there is nothing more certain, than that when the British people have an opportunity to pronounce upon the matter, the safeguarding of industries bill will go to the scrapheap and stay there forever. Lloyd George himself has stated that it is only a temporary measure; he was apologetic for it the other day. There is no organization of bankers, manufacturers, transportation people or labour people which is not opposed to it to-day, and it will soon be a forgotten thing. Yet my hon. friends seek to support the maintenance of this doctrine in Canada on the ground that Great Britain had the safeguarding of industries bill in operation for a few years.

The cure for the world is to have more trade, not less trade. Trade begets friendly feelings between countries. Individuals who are trading with each other, who are exchanging goods with each other with resulting mutual benefit and gain, are invariably good friends; the same holds true in our national life.

I have said that the budget is protectionist. It is protectionist, in the sense that it practically makes no changes in the customs tariff. I want to point out to the House that in 1919 I left the Government of the day because it brought down a budget that was very little different from the one that is submitted now. Under these circumstances, Sir, I cannot support the budget proposals of my hon. friend the Minister of Finance.

I want to say a word now about the amendment that has been moved by my hon. friend the ex-Minister of Finance (Sir Henry Drayton). The first thing that strikes me in that respect is that the terms of the amendment vary entirely from the arguments that have been made by my hon. friends to my right who have spoken in this debate. The terms of the amendment are very simple; they state that the budget proposals brought down constitute on the part of the Government an utter failure to implement its pledges by legislation. Well, while I have been pretty severe in my criticism of the Government, I do not think those words are justified by the actual facts of the case. My hon. friend the Minister of Finance has wiped out that iniquitous discrimination against countries with depreciated currencies, and he is entitled to some credit for that. But my main objection to the motion of the ex-Minister of Finance is not founded on that; it is founded on the fact that it offers nothing constructive at the present period of this country's development. We have a serious condition of affairs in this country. We have a burden of debt of almost $2,500,000,000. According to the proposals brought down by my hon. friend the Minister of Finance, on the basis of taxation of last year as I have already stated he will be $140,000,000 short of meeting the needs of the present year as asked for by the Government in their estimates. Under these conditions, what is necessary? I submit that what is necessary is a broad, courageous policy. What is necessary is that we get away from this principle of protection in our fiscal policy and set our eyes definitely and steadily in the other direction. Only in that way can we add to the wealth of our country; only in that way can we make the people of Canada prosperous; only in that way can we bring about such a change in the conditions as will enable the people to bear the burdens of taxation that are imposed upon them. That is the broad, constructive policy that will lead to the advancement of this country in the development of all its great potential wealth. For that reason I beg to move, seconded by the hon. member for Springfield (Mr. Hoey):

> That all the words after the word "support" at the end of the third last paragraph of the amendment to the motion before the House, be struck out, and the following be substituted therefor:
> "That the Liberal party having been returned to power, the budget proposals of the Finance Minister now brought down, based, as they are, mainly on the principle of protection in respect to the tariff, are wholly inadequate to implement such pledges by legislation.
> "That while recognizing that changes in fiscal policy should be made in such a way as to give industries affected a reasonable opportunity for readjustment, this House is of the opinion that the principle of protection as a basis for fiscal policy in Canada is unsound and not in the best interests of the Dominion."

Mr. FIELDING: I submit, Mr. Speaker, that the motion is not in order.

Mr. SPEAKER: I would like to have the opinion of the most experienced members of the House on that question. I have an opinion, but I do not wish to express it at the moment; I will reserve it until later.

Mr. FIELDING: The ground of my objection is that it is a well understood principle that you cannot have two amendments on a motion to go into Committee of Ways and Means or Committee of Supply.

Mr. MARCIL (Bonaventure): I may add that during my term as Speaker, and for many years before and since, the custom to which the minister refers has always been followed.

Mr. CRERAR: I submit, Mr. Speaker, that in all the circumstances, the amendment to the amendment which I have moved—should be recognized by you and admitted. I have not had a great deal of experience in the study of authorities who have dealt with these questions, but it is a well recognized practice in the British House of Commons—the Mother of Parliaments, from which we derive practically all that we have in the way of parliamentary institutions and parliamentary practice—to permit the introduction of secondary amendments or amendments to the amendment. Now, I may say with reference to the British practice that the method of procedure, as I understand it, is different from ours. In effect, the permission of the British House must first be secured for an amendment; that being done in each case, as many amendmens may be offered as hon. members wish to introduce. Our own rules provide that:

> In all cases not provided for hereinafter or by sessional or other orders, the rules, usages and forms of proceeding of the House of Commons of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland in force on the first day of July, 1867, shall be followed.

We have no rule of this House which is contrary to the practice to which I have referred as the well established practice in the British House of Commons. Our practice in Canada rests upon a precedent. I quite admit that in recent years, and, indeed, for quite a number of years in this House it has been the rule not to admit second amendments, or even an amendment to the amendment. That practice rests, so far as I have been able to discover, upon a decision given by Mr. Speaker Smith in the old Parliament of Canada in 1858, but as Bourinot has pointed out in his very valuable work: "This peculiar limitation to moving amendments arose originally from a misunderstanding of a Canadian Speaker as to the English practice."

Bourinot had in mind the decision given by Mr. Speaker Smith upon this occasion. It was a decision that a second amendment was not admissible. I do not need to recite to the House the particulars of that discussion, but a curious thing, I find, happened two years later when Mr. Speaker Smith, the same Speaker who had given the decision in 1858, practically reversed that decision. I quote from Speakers' Decisions, a work compiled by Mr. A. Laperriere, who was at one time First Clerk of the Library of Parliament, and who quotes the decision of Mr. Speaker Smith upon that occasion:

> The Hon. A. T. Galt having moved the House into Committee of Supply, an amendment was proposed by the Hon. Geo. Brown, and after debate, an amendment to the amendment was proposed by the Hon. L. T. Drummond. C. Dunkin, Esq., raised the point of order and asked whether an amendment could be moved to the amendment to the motion for the House in Committee of Supply. The Speaker answered thus:
> "The point is very clear. There could be only one amendment to the motion for going into Committee of Supply. The motion of the Hon. L. T. Drummond was simply to amend the amendment, and consequently as it was not a substantive motion, he must rule it to be in order."

And he so ruled, and the House voted on the amendment to the amendment.

I submit that the present case is identical. It is true that subsequent speakers, either through lack of knowledge of the practice or of the decision on this particular occasion, have held that the first decision of Mr. Speaker Smith in 1858 should govern Canadian parliamentary practice, and I recognize that there have been several decisions by Speakers subsequent to that date confirming that view, but I submit, Mr. Speaker, that the full facts of the case were not taken into account and that you, Sir, in your ruling should follow the precedent established by Mr. Speaker Smith in 1860, in the circumstances which I have just related to the House.

There is another reason, aside from the practice and the rules, and that is that at the present time we have in this House a well recognized third party. I submit, Sir, that in fairness and equity this party of which I have the honour to be the leader, should have the opportunity of expressing its view upon a question of this kind in the manner in which we have done in the amendment I have moved. I think that is only a matter of equity and right. I quite recognize that you, Sir, in the duties of your office must be guided by the rules and by the practice that has gone before, but I submit, Sir, that the practice of refusing an amendment to the amendment is not substantially or soundly founded in this country. I therefore hope, Mr. Speaker, and ask you to so rule, that the amendment to the amendment which I have proposed is in order.

Mr. FIELDING: I submit, Sir, that the hon. gentleman has stated that something that occurred sixty-two years ago justifies his present motion. I do not admit that he is correct. I think possibly he may not be; but against his events of sixty-two years ago may I not plead the practice of the Parliament of Canada so long as any member of this House has any knowledge of it?

Mr. SPEAKER: Although I have studied the question, having been made aware that an amendment to the amendment might be moved, yet I find the point raised so important that I shall reserve my decision until to-morrow to give me an opportunity of reviewing the opinion I have formed, and see if I can render justice to the third party in this House. As I stated a moment ago, I have an opinion based upon the practice in the past, but I shall go deeper into the subject during the day, and to-morrow I shall be in a position to give a ruling. In the meantime my decision on the point is reserved.

Mr. E. J. McMURRAY (North Winnipeg): Mr. Speaker, in discussing the budget this afternoon, I do not propose to enter into any philosophical arguments in support of protection or free trade. There are the regular stock arguments in favour of either proposition. The case for protection has been well and ably set forth by the hon. member for Centre Toronto (Mr. Bristol), and that in favour of free trade by the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Crerar) and the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Good). Indeed, the latter has put forth various arguments in favour of other forms of taxation. Neither am I going to enter into a minute discussion of the budget itself. I am not well enough informed, and it is a matter of a highly scientific nature. The Canadian tariff is described as one of the most difficult of all subjects. I wish to discuss the matter more from a general point of view. It is easy enough to put forward theories, but their practical application in a country like Canada is a far more difficult and serious thing. Circumstances are compelling forces that limit and curtail the carrying into effect of many theories. This is true in all walks and callings of life. We see it every day. We must fashion the suit from the amount of cloth and the material at hand.

Financial conditions in Canada to-day, as in practically every other country of the world, are exceptionally serious. We have a national debt of two and a half billion dollars, and a potential debt in connection with pensions that will amount, before we are through, to practically one billion dollars. In addition we are rapidly accumulating railroad deficits. The difference between the first two kinds of liabilities and the third is that the first two constitute a liability for many generations, while the third in all probability can be stopped. Last year we were short some $86,000,000, and the year before some $90,000,000. This year we are going to be short some $140,000,000. With that facing the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) his policy, as a matter of consequence, had to be more or less limited. He might well have exclaimed with Macbeth that he was "cabined, cribbed, confined" by the actual financial conditions prevailing in this country. He had to face a falling revenue and a rising indebtedness. In addition to that, we will have to meet the Fordney Bill of United States. The minister finds his vessel is driven by contrary winds on a rough sea, but that splendid pilot of the people of Canada has pointed his course true to the Liberal chart and compass as he has ever steered it in the past.

In the discussion of this question we must understand that the indebtedness to which this country is committed is largely that created by war. It was not created in the special interest of any particular industry or section of people in Canada, but in the interest of all, and all have a patriotic duty to bear that burden. The taxation harness has been placed by a master hand. The budget has been drafted so as not to injure any particular industry in this country and yet in such a way that the burden is borne by all. It is a burden in which all bear a part, and no one is injured. I am satisfied that the people of this country as a whole will accept favourably, recognizing all the conditions, the budget as it has been drafted.

I am not so much concerned with the budget to-day, but what of the future budgets? I have listened in this House for some constructive proposition in that regard. But I have not heard anything constructive in the amendment moved from the other side (the official opposition) which I submit is empty, querulous and petulant, harking back to the past election, which appears to be an ever-present and bitter memory. I have heard nothing constructive from the hon. leader of the Progressives (Mr. Crerar). During the course of his speech he told us he had some constructive suggestions to make. He did refer to construction work in the past, but I listened in vain for something constructive in his amendment. He was purely critical and had nothing, with one exception, to offer. He did not offer any suggestion as to how the vast sums of money that had to be raised annually in this country were to be raised under his amendment. We are annually going back financially. In 1921 we had added a debt of $50 on every family in Canada. In 1922 we propose to add $75 a family. This cannot continue. It must end somewhere. What of next year? Are we going to make any provision for the creation of a reservoir of wealth from which we can draw to meet our needs? We must do something definite. In this country there appears to be a growing tendency to take a grumbling attitude. Everybody is against something; apparently nobody is in favour of anything. That is the attitude apparently of every applicant who besieges the Minister of Finance to lift the burden off his back and "let George pay it." We have farmers from the West wishing to lift the burden from their shoulders to put it upon the back of the rest of the community. There must be created large reservoirs of wealth to pay the debt and lower the insufferable burden of taxation. Wealth is not created by budgets nor by resolutions of Parliament. There is only one way in which wealth is produced, and that is by labour applied to natural resources. Providence will not do it. We cannot sit here and wait for rain and favourable climatic conditions to produce wealth. We cannot be like the fable of the frog that sat on the rock with his mouth open waiting for the flies to fly in. He waited there long and grew emaciated and finally died. We have got to do something constructive, if we are going to take care of the heavy taxation of this country. We must not, like Victor Hugo's toiler of the sea, sit on the rock and allow the waves of financial distress to sweep over and destroy us. Providence always sides with the energetic and the capable. Canada is a country of tremendous resources. It seems like tautology to harp and dwell upon this. There is not a man in this House who does not believe that this will be a great country; that it will be a populous country; that it will have diversified industries, large cities; and that, in hundreds of years to come it will be one of the great nations of the earth. Of course, we all believe that, and I submit the great chieftain of the Liberal party, Sir Wilfrid Laurier, was right when he made the prediction that the last century was that of United States and the present century will be that of Canada. The Americans believe that, and the Americans believe in the resources of this country. The hon. Minister of Finance was able to go to the city of New York in the United States and arrange a large loan at a reasonable rate of interest. The other day a friend of mine from Chicago, who had a small sum of money to invest, told me he went to a broker's office, asked for a suitable investment and the broker suggested bonds in a Canadian municipality. His friend asked him if he considered that a good investment and he said, "Certainly". He said that Canada was in the same position to-day that United States was 50 years ago. When the Liberal party went into power in 1896 things were in a bad shape in this country. There was unemployment, the West was unpopulated. There were no cities or towns there worth while. Times were bad and the people were leaving our country as fast as they could. There was blue ruin abroad in the land. The policy of the Liberal Government was that of a keen, active, energetic immigration policy based upon a sound business system. When Sir Clifford Sifton—then Mr. Sifton—became Minister of the Interior, he inaugurated an active immigration policy, and a complete revival followed. The West, which was practically a large barren prairie at that time, opened up to thousands and thousands of settlers drawn from all parts of the world. Cities sprang up; industries became active throughout Canada; unemployment disappeared; railroads were built. And that prosperity continued unremitting until 1914, when the war broke out. Since then, that policy has been dropped. Under that policy the manufactures of Canada increased six hundred per cent in twelve years; under that policy the population of Canada increased 40 per cent in twelve years; under that policy the total trade of Canada increased 400 per cent in twelve years. If that policy had been continued, and had not the war intervened we would probably have had in this country to-day, instead of 8,000,000 people, some 15,000,000 people. That policy was halted by the war, and it has not been revived. That policy should, in my humble opinion, be revived instantly. It was the policy that was making us great, prosperous and wealthy.

[Mr. McMurray.]

Sifton was the Canadian Columbus who discovered Canada to the people of the world.

We now have the railroads built; we have the elevators built; we have the mercantile marine; we have the large manufacturing plants created. The stage is all set. All we want is the strong hands and courageous hearts to produce the wealth and prosperity that we had before, to create that reservoir of wealth of which I have spoken, to secure in this country a body of wealth that can be taxed to take care of the great indebtedness that we must meet some time or another, and to do away with our annual deficits. There must be more shoulders to carry the burdens, and in that way alone can they be got. There are to-day in western Canada lands in unlimited quantities. The roads are built; the railroads are built; the schoolhouses are there; the municipal organization is ready. These lands lie within from twelve to fifteen miles of the railroad. There are some 12,000,000 acres of them along the line of the National Transcontinental from Winnipeg to Edmonton; there are 25,000,000 acres of good arable land in northern Ontario and northern Quebec adjacent to the railroads. In my opinion, there never existed a more favourable opportunity of getting desirable immigrants than exists to-day. Throughout Europe, by reason of the great war, there is great disintegration. Thousands of people there of capacity and ability, who have been disheartened and broken by conditions in that land, would hail the opportunity of coming to this new land with their sons and daughters and starting anew. That this is not a mere idle phantasy, we have the case of Australia to prove. Australia has actually embarked upon a policy of spending $250,000,000 in an agressive immigration policy to bring the people, particularly the British people, to their country, to help develop its resources and to pay the large burden of debt which the Australians, like ourselves, have to labour under. Not only is this true of the Australian Commonwealth itself, but it is true of each and every independent member of that commonwealth, such as New South Wales or Queensland; they are all actively engaged in that immigration policy. We can go out into the world to-day: we can go to Great Britain and we can get the best of her people; we can get the Scandinavians, we can get the people of Europe. From my experience of western Canada, an experience of considerable length, I am not one of those who are opposed to the introduction into this country of the peoples of Central Europe. If I might be pardoned a personal allusion, I have lived in western Canada for some twenty-six or twenty-seven years. I came to that country when it was more or less practically unsettled. There were no cities there except the city of Winnipeg. I have seen the effect of immigration. I saw the hardy people of Central Europe come there with their ox-teams and go out on the prairies. As I have stood on the ridge looking over miles of country in the summer time, I have seen that brown prairie turned into black ploughed land. I have come a year or two afterwards and seen that land in waving fields of grain. I have seen those people go to that land, dig their homes out of the ground, build their sod homes and sod stables, and I have seen them grow rich. To-day their children are going to our schools and colleges; they are competing with the best that we have in the West. In the province of Manitoba, in the high schools, I understand that 18 per cent of all the students are descendants of these people from Central Europe. If there is one weakness that the English-speaking Canadian possesses above all others, it is his sense of superiority to those of other races; he is inclined to look down upon the people of other extractions. But as regards thrift, industry and capacity for hard and continued labour, I do not think he is the equal of the people of Central Europe. The coming of those people was the result of the policy I have described. I have given only one instance out on the prairies; but those people did not get the best land of western Canada. They were turned to the wooded districts and to the swamp lands. Out from the city of Winnipeg, some thirty miles, is a settlement of Bohemians who went into a district that was considered practically worthless. To-day it is one of the most valuable districts in western Canada as regards the price of land. Those Bohemians made wonderfully fine settlers. They are cleanly, industrious, with a turn for music and painting, and if one goes down to a place called Ladywood, one will see every sign of thrift. Their condition reminds one of the story of Washington Irving's " Sleepy Hollow," where the schoolmaster went to court the old Dutchman's daughter. He admired the turkeys and geese and all the live stock around the place, the apple orchard, all overflowing with evidences of thrift and prosperity. That is the story of those people. Throughout western Canada, I have never known at any time the foreign people to ask for help or assistance. They do not need it; they are capable, by their thrift and industry, of taking care of themselves. If this active immigration policy is entered into, it will in a very short time solve our railroad deficits. I have this upon the statement of one of the ablest authorities on railway rates in Canada, a statement given a short time ago, not many miles from this House. He pointed out that the doubling of the production of grain in western Canada would settle the railway question instantly. I was pleased to hear the hon. member for Last Mountain (Mr. Johnston) advocating an immigration policy. I was doubly pleased to hear the hon. member for South Renfrew (Mr. Low) the other night referring to the necessity of an active businesslike immigration policy, and particularly to hear him speak of the necessity of stirring our agencies in the United States into keen and active work. Some years ago, in the city of Winnipeg, the large real estate offices were busy bringing thousands and thousands of settlers from the United States to western Canada. Practically every real estate office in the United States was a Canadian immigration office. But that is not the story now. One hundred thousand families of farmers settled in western Canada would produce enough added wheat in the next six or seven years to take care of the annual deficit on the National Transcontinental Railway. I believe that this is the view of the business men, and the men of standing in Canada to-day. I have made a point of discussing it with various persons I have met in different parts of the country, and I have rarely met any man who did not think that the solution, and the only solution, of our present unhappy situation is to bring the strong hand and the stout heart of the capable and willing immigrant wherever he can be secured to develop these resources of ours that are idle. Sir Clifford Sifton a short time ago, speaking in Toronto, advocated a keen, decisive, active immigration policy. He dealt with the question of our people leaving Canada, and the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Crerar) bore out his opinion a few minutes ago in his speech when he said that the men who were leaving Canada were the skilled artisans and the residents of the cities. It has been our mistaken immigration policy in the past that we have not brought to this country purely agricultural people to develop our resources. We have brought thousands upon thousands of artisans and labouring men who during the time of prosperity helped to build up the cities, and who, now that that era of prosperity has passed, are out of employment. They are not to blame that they are idle. They are men who have been trained along certain special lines, and the artisan cannot go out and make a success of farming in western Canada or, for that matter, in any other part of this country. A leading journal in western Canada, the Winnipeg Free Press, dealing with the problem of immigration says:

> Every live business man in Canada knows very well that there can be no solution of the great problems with which Canada is faced until there is greater development, more business, and more population.

Referring to the inactivity of immigration work in this country it says:

> It has been asleep or dead for some years now; and there are no real indications yet of any revival of life.

As regards the exodus of people from this country, it goes on to say:

> The other explanation for this exodus must be found in the unfitness of many of the immigrants for making a living in this country. What profits it to bring a million immigrants into this country if they do not stay here? The whole problem centres around the need for the careful selection of immigrants so that when they reach this country they will be able to employ their talents and services to their own advantage and to the benefit of the country. All criticism directed towards any proposed scheme to be valid must take cognizance of this basic fact. As for the considerations of race of nationality, of language which are being injected into the discussion, the wise course is to bar them all. The test is fitness and it is the only test that is required at this time. Fitness includes ability to make a living in this country and willingness to become a Canadian in every sense of the word. The problem of how to induce a maximum of immigrants of this class from Great Britain and Ireland, from northern and central Europe, and from the United States, is now before the government; and the people are waiting and watching, not very hopefully, for some signs that the government is equal to providing a workable solution of it.

The press recently contained an interview with one man who in Canada is undoubtedly an authority on these questions. That man, Baron Shaughnessy, on his return from Great Britain some time in May, is reported as follows:

> But the greatest potential asset for Canada to be found in Europe lies in the millions of desirable immigrants who should be brought to this country. "We have not been doing anywhere near as much as we should have been doing during the past few years to make an impression in Europe." declared the veteran railwayman. "We have abandoned anything like a strenuous effort to secure population, our immigration office in London is practically abandoned and such people who are going abroad are bound for either Australia or New Zealand. Of course, many of these are not of a type we care for in this country. We really want only such people as are willing to settle on the land and develop our agriculture.
> "We can take from 125,000 to 150,000 families per year into this country. These would represent roughly 600,000 persons, but they must all be of the agricultural class.
>
> "For these, we would draw upon every "white" country of Europe. England alone, can give us very few. Were we to depend upon British immigration alone, for the next ten years, our increase in population would only be trifling. No doubt they would be glad to give us a considerable number of immigrants from the large cities, but we have no room for them here just now, and probably won't have for a considerable time to come.
> "Our cities are overcrowded as it is, in proportion to our rural districts.
>
> "From information I have received, I believe that the Slavonic countries can give us a great many desirable people, Austria, Hungary, Holland to some extent and probably Norway and Sweden can give us our supply.
> "How long can we continue this supply? Almost idefinitely if we insist on the right kind of immigration. We can accommodate them and we need them, need them badly to meet the demands of our public debt.

On the 25th of April a large convention of the provincial Liberal party of Manitoba was held in the city of Winnipeg. It was drawn from all quarters, from the city and from the farming districts, and the following resolution was unanimously adopted without a single dissenting voice:

> Whereas the undeveloped lands and other natural resources of the province of Manitoba are capable of being developed, thereby producing homes for many new settlers;
>
> And whereas the time is now opportune for an aggressive immigration policy to attract desirable settlers;
> Be it resolved that the Liberal party is of the opinion that the provincial government co-operate with the federal government with a view of bringing, to this province of opportunity, settlers to assist in the development of these resources, thereby increasing our population and wealth.

What must be the qualification of the immigrant? I submit, in the words of Lord Shaughnessy, that he must be one who can earn a living in this country. In addition to that he must be a man who can be assimilated into the national life. He must be an agriculturist, or be capable of becoming such. You cannot make a farmer out of a man reared in the city. Somehow or other there comes about in city people a process of de-naturalization, if I may use that term in this connection.

They largely loose the love and taste for nature which the farmer's son in the years of his youth apparently breathes into his very mind and which creates in him the instincts of the agriculturist. The city man has no such opportunity of acquiring an appreciation of and a liking for farm life; and besides, through his associations in the city, he is more gregarious than the farmer. Life on the western prairies of Canada is hard. There nature is stern and severe and the life is lonesome. She calls for the sturdy, men who, in the words of Robert W. Service, are grit to the core.

Who were the successful immigrants in the past, who were the men who came to Canada, went on the land and stayed there? The hardy men who settled this country were of the agricultural type. They were men of the Scottish Highlands, used to the outdoor life, rugged and strong and full of courage; they settled in the maritime privinces and in Ontario. Then we had the peasantry of Ireland, driven from their native land by famine; they too made good. Then there were the disbanded British soldiers, who in nearly all instances were of the peasantry of Scotland and Ireland; they also made good. Another very successful class of settlers were the United Empire Loyalists. They, like the Americans now coming to our western states, were men of the open, farmers in the American colonies who were loyal to the British connection, and when the war was over they came to this country. They were the very finest type of settlers, because they were men familiar with outside work and loyal to our institutions. Throughout Ontario and down in Nova Scotia we had the sturdy German people, and they invariably made good. Out in southern Alberta are the Mormon people. They came there in the month of June years and years ago in a snowstorm—sturdy outside people. They have stayed with us and helped develop the country. The hardy farmers' sons of Ontario, Quebec, and Nova Scotia have come to the West and made good. I remember when the Barr Colony, along about 1900, trekked out over the plains of western Canada; they made good. And the people of Russia, of German extraction, known as the Russ-Deutchers in their language, have turned the prairies into a garden. To-day around the city of Winnipeg we have these people settled on ten, fifteen or twenty acres of land, and they are prosperous and well to do.

Now, we hear all sorts of criticisms of our immigration policy, and I propose to deal with them for a moment. Various members of the Progressive group have stated that there is no use bringing in immigrants at the present time, because, if the actual farmers already here cannot succeed, how can we possibly hope for the newcomer, unfamiliar with local conditions, to make headway. I believe that my friends from the prairies have painted too dark a picture. I believe that what they have experienced in the last year is only a temporary condition. They felt the period of deflation almost before any other class. But that deflation is setting in all along the line —wages to-day in the West have fallen forty or fifty per cent—which will lessen the cost of producing grain—the commodities that the farmer has to buy are also coming down in price, and freight rates are undoubtedly coming down—if we do our duty here they should be reduced very substantially.

The West has produced great wealth in the past and has built up great cities there and in eastern Canada. The immigrants who came into western Canada under the Sifton regime started under far harder circumstances than those which obtain to-day. I remember when those immigrants were coming into western Canada wheat was selling at 50 cents a bushel. And if I might be pardoned a personal allusion, I have under those conditions raised as fine stockers in the West as you can raise to-day and drove them eighty miles and sold them at 2¼ cents per pound—Black Galloways at that.

An hon. MEMBER: Where was that?

Mr. McMURRAY: Touchwood Hills. The West was not built on dollar wheat I would remind my hon. friend. You will see as fine farm houses and buildings in the West as anywhere in eastern Canada. I believe we are to-day in the position of the teeter—we are about at the dead centre, prices are going down and prosperity will return. We will shortly pass through this valley of depression and emerge again on the tableland of prosperity where we were five years before the war came.

Throughout western Canada there are holders of a vast amount of victory bonds. I know farmers who own as much as $20,000 and $25,000 worth of those bonds—dug out of the soil.

Mr. FORKE: Do you know that I have sold my victory bonds during the last two or three years to keep my farm going?

Mr. BROWN: So have I.

Mr. McMURRAY: That does not disturb my argument at all. You may have been obliged to do that. I will grant you that last year was very hard on farmers. I farm myself and I know that. But I believe that it is only a temporary condition, and that with lower freight rates—a great desideratum in western Canada—lower wages and lower prices of commodities we will be back where we were before the war; in a word, we will be prosperous again.

It is argued that our immigrants must be from the British Isles, that they must be English speaking. I submit, Mr. Speaker, that that is not the test at all. What we want are men capable of earning a living as agriculturists and who will grow into the common life of the country. Many of our people in the province of Quebec cannot speak English at all; who will say that they are not just as good Canadians as those who can speak English? For many years throughout this country people were found—and they are found now, I believe, in some parts—of Scotch extraction who talked Gaelic. They were and are good settlers; and I maintain, therefore, that a knowledge of the English tongue is not a necessary standard. It is not essential that these immigrants should be of English-speaking extraction.

Then, there is an objection against the foreign-born man that he will not become Canadian. I think it is rather a hasty view that if the foreigner does not talk our language in ten or twelve years he will not become part of the national life. The building up of a nation, Sir, is a matter of slow growth; it is a matter not of years, but of decades. If these people are thrifty, industrious, courageous, they will in the years to come develop into a solid Canadian people. And it is a scientific fact that from the mixing of nationalities a more competent, more virile race is bound to issue; we see instances of that in the United States.

Then, there is another argument—and it will recur to my labour friends in the House—that the introduction into this country of a large body of immigrants would be injurious to labour; would be detrimental to those of our people who are now idle; would add unemployment to unemployment. I do not believe that for an instant; if I did, I would not be here advocating the policy that I do. In fact, I think the very opposite would be the effect. With agricultural immigration into this country taking place, a home market would be created for the products of our factories. If 100,000 families were settled to-day upon the plains of the Canadian West, the result would be the giving of employment to large numbers of men in the annual production of some $50,000,000 worth of goods. Toronto, Brantford, Hamilton—all the cities of eastern Canada in fact—were stung into life under the immigration policy inaugurated by Sir Clifford Sifton following 1896.

There are those who tell us that we should follow the policy of the United States which allows not more than three per cent of any given foreign population to come in during one year. But that was not the policy of the United States when they needed settlers as we need them. After the American Civil War the people of the world were welcome to go to the United States, make their home there and assist in the building up of the great population and the great wealth that that country now possesses. We are now more or less in the situation of the people of the United States at that time, and if we are to build up a population; if we are to create a body of wealth, we must do it by the application of labour to the soil; and we must have the people of the world here to help us do it. They are to be had; they will come, and come gladly. We are not bringing them here to pay our taxes; their taxes are heavy where they are. They will come here and enjoy prosperity, as thousands of their countrymen have done in the past. Nor are we bringing them to a country that is, or should be, despondent. The financial situation of Canada, while it is bad, is fairly good compared with that of most other countries. I take the opportunity of quoting briefly from an influential financial paper published in the United States. It says:

> Canada has her troubles. They are the lesser problems of resumed growth, not of reconstruction. She has no war currency to deflate. Her budget practically balances. In foreign trade her cash position is stronger than a year ago. Her production increases. No other country in the world can point to the combination of all these factors in January, 1922.
> If the course of exchange be the true augury of 1922 eventualities, the Canadian outlook is 100 per cent better than a year ago. The new year opened with Montreal dollars at a 5 per cent discount. The old year began business with Montreal dollars worth 85 cents apiece in New York.
> Actual gain in cash position of Canadian foreign trade is stronger by $150,000,000 than 12 months ago. Both exports and bank clearings have declined less than our own.

Immigration sets in. Building revives and building costs decline. Production increases. Where is the outlook better or as good?

Now then, what will be the result of an active immigration policy in this country? To-day we have idleness in our cities. We have an ever-increasing annual deficit. We have diminishing railroad returns; we have an idle merchant marine, and apparently we have a despondent agricultural population. With the production of more wealth in the country; with a larger population, there must in every way be created a larger body of wealth. Our railroad situation will be improved; freight rates will be reduced for the western farmer; the annual deficit will be more or less wiped out, and lower taxes will come for all. As I have said, the people of this country are looking forward to the adoption of such a policy as this. Mr. Sifton wasted no time on statistics and red tape and inefficient government employees. He went to get immigrants of the right type by the shortest, most direct methods—exactly the methods that would be adopted by an ordinary common-sense variety of business man, and the greatest prosperity Canada has ever known immediately followed that policy.

What we want at this time, I submit, is a courageous, active immigration policy. Without it, I do not know how we can get on. We require political courage—we owe it to ourselves; we owe it to the poor and to the unemployed; we owe it to the world. We are entitled to enjoy better things. With an active immigration policy; with settlers flowing into this country as they did from 1898 to 1912, I submit, that ultimately there shall come peace, prosperity and happiness; there will be the evolution, slowly but surely, of a great national type, drawn from the kindred nations of the earth, developed by hardy toil in the invigorating climate of Canada, so that in the centuries to come one of the great and distinct races of the earth will be known by the name Canadian.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

After Recess

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. DONALD SUTHERLAND (South Oxford): Mr. Speaker, the budget proposals of the Minister of Finance always constitute one of the most interesting features, if not the most interesting, of a session of Parliament, and in view of the fact that this is the first session of a new Parliament, summoned on the advent to office of a new government, the present budget is of much more than usual interest not only to the members of this House, but to the country as well. Some hon. members may become somewhat impatient at times owing to the length of time taken by a budget debate. That is frequently the feeling of new members of Parliament, but the practice has, however, the endorsation of old, experienced parliamentary leaders, who consider it very valuable and who believe that the time given to the budget is not lost, but, on the contrary, is very usefully employed.

Under present conditions the budget must of necessity interest every one in this country to a very marked degree. We are experiencing at the present time a condition of affairs in this country, and it is universal throughout the world, such as has not existed before during the lives of those now present, and it is a question whether during the whole history of the world such a condition has been experienced. During the years from 1914 down to the end of 1918 practically the whole wealth of the world has been destroyed—blown up, burnt out, absolutely destroyed—leaving nothing except heavy liabilities. That is the condition of affairs that is confronting this country, as well as the rest of the world, at the present time. It is, therefore, not a theory that we are confronted with, but an actual condition of affairs with which we must deal to the best advantage of our people and of our country. Theories do not count for much under such conditions.

I thought as I listened to some of the addresses which have been delivered during this debate that some hon. members had lost sight of the difficulties in which this country finds itself and of the tremendous efforts which must be put forward by our people. I thought as I listened to the criticisms with regard to the budget, the amendment, and the amendment to the amendment which has just been moved, that possibly some hon. members were losing sight of one very important feature of the situation. But, fortunately for us, or unfortunately, it may be, we have in the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) one of the oldest parliamentarians in the public life of this country. The Minister of Finance brought down in this House on the 23rd of May his sixteenth budget. That is something very unusual; something which I doubt will ever be repeated. I do not believe it will ever be repeated under similar conditions. The Minister of Finance comes back here a member of the new Government installed in office about six months ago, after ten years in opposition, with all his experience and all his ability, and he has presented this budget to Parliament, and it is now open for consideration and any suggestions which hon. members may have to offer.

It is remarkable how frequently we hear hon. members on the Government benches offering excuses for the budget which is now before this House, saying that it is not the budget which might have been expected owing to the fact that the Government have been in office for only a short period. The hon. leader of the Progressive party (Mr. Crerar) also in his address to the House this afternoon excused the Government for not including much that he thought might have been in the budget, and said that he was not so much concerned about this budget as the one that would be presented in about a year from now. Under certain conditions there might be some justification for such excuses, but as the Minister of Finance has returned to power in full possession of his faculties, to a greater degree, indeed, than many men years younger than he is—and frequent references have been made to his experience and the long service he has rendered—I say there is absolutely no excuse under those conditions, because he has been in touch with the public life of this country during the years when he was in opposition.

We know that during the last election the Government professed before the people of this country to have a policy which they were anxious to put into effect if they were placed in a position to administer the affairs of this country. Yet in spite of that we have presented to us to-day a budget which does not carry out to any degree the promises and pledges which hon. members who now occupy the Government benches made a few months ago when they were appealing to the people of this country. Is it a small matter to break faith with the electors of this country so quickly or at any time? Is it sufficient justification for that breach of faith to say: Oh, we have only been in office for a short time. I thought as I listened to the hon. member for Marquette this afternoon that he also was anxious to justify the Government and to find some excuse for not voting for the amendment censuring the Government for their breach of faith with the electors. What does that amendment say? After pointing out the manner in which the Government had failed to implement their promises and pledges it concludes with this paragraph:

> That the making of such solemn pledges, the utilization of them to secure support, and their flagrant violation after the attainment of office reveal a disregard of political honour and tend to lower the standard of public life.

If it is true that the Government have disregarded their pledges and promises, surely there is something to be said for censuring the Government for that breach of faith, but I have looked over the amendment to the amendment which has been moved by the hon. member for Marquette, and I find that the substance of it is this:

> The budget proposals of the Minister of Finance now brought down, depending, as they do, mainly on the principle of protection with respect to the tariff, are wholly inadequate to implement pledges of legislation that have been given. This House is of the opinion that the principle of protection, as a basis for a fiscal policy in Canada, is unsound and not in the best interests of the Dominion.

Hon. members will notice that the hon. member from Marquette has not a word of censure for the Government with regard to their breach of faith with the people of this country. It is apparently a custom that has never obtained in this country to move an amendment to the amendment, and, consequently, the hon. member from Marquette must have been aware of this, and had been evidently looking for some ground upon which to justify his motion. I am not altogether sure in my own mind as to whether he expects his right to move that amendment to be sustained by the Chair. The fact that ever since Confederation no such motion has been entertained in this House has established a custom, which would not, I think, be very lightly cast aside by the Speaker of this Parliament. However, I do not intend to deal with that, but I would like to call attention of hon. members to statements that have been made with regard to such breaches of faith or confidence on the part of those who have entrusted the reigns of government to a political party. Hon. George Brown in his day stated:

> If, Sir, a public man avows certain principles, agitates those principles, and seeks to overthrow the government of the day and establishes those principles, and if, when he attains power, he laughs at his principles, and casts his professions to the winds, he is aiming a blow at public morality.

This was the view of the Hon. George Brown in his day with regard to promises made by political parties. Is it possible that we, in this age, can afford to be less strict with regard to such matters than the public men of that day, or is it possible that the public conscience at the present time can be abused and violated in that respect more than in those days? We have also the statement of the Right Hon. the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) a year ago in this House. On 15th of February, 1921, in moving a motion in this House he stated:

> What is it, Mr. Speaker, that works havoc in human lives, that destroys the noblest of friendships, that blights all that is most sacred in our human relations? It is the loss of confidence that comes through disillusionment, through the broken pledges the shattered ideals, the lost visions, the vanished faiths, cruel, indeed, it is when that breach in confidence comes between man and man, between friend and friend, between race and race, between nation and nation; but when it comes between a people and its government, there is no saying what injury it may ultimately work.
> * * * Is there nothing binding in conscience and in honour between those who rule a people and those who have permitted them to be ruled.

These are the words of the Prime Minister only a year ago in this House, and yet we find to-day that the platform of the party of which he is the leader is absolutely being ignored in the budget which has been presented to this Parliament. We have also heard hon. members opposite expressing their views with regard to the policy of the Liberal party, not only to-day, not only in the past, but also what it is going to be in the future. We had a few days ago the hon. member for Brantford (Mr. Raymond) declaring in this House that the Liberal party in this country was not a free trade party, that they had never advocated free trade and that he did not expect they ever would. On the following day the hon. member for Brome (Mr. McMaster) rose in his place in this House, argued strongly in favour of the very thing that was condemned by the hon. member for Brantford, and strongly advocated free trade in this country. Then the hon. member for Hants (Mr. Martell), I think it was, interrupted the hon. member for Brantford, declaring that he was in favour of a free trade policy. We have also witnessed ministers bringing their estimates before Parliament submitting them to the consideration of this House, moving to have them adopted, and another hon. member of the Government moving to reduce them by $50,000 or $100,000 or $400,000, or whatever the amount may have been.

I question whether there has ever been in the history of this or any other country, a similar policy adopted. It is something entirely new. It is something the people have not been accustomed to, and, therefore, it is possibly time enough for us to criticize this budget when we know what this Government is going to do with it. In all probability, when it goes into committee they will change it entirely and we will have another budget emerge from the committee that will not resemble the present one at all. I would not be at all surprised to see that happen, and, in view of the statements made this afternoon by the hon. member for Marquette, I am inclined to think that possibly his views will prevail with regard to the policy of the Government. We have also had—I will not say the spectacle—but we have had the very amusing experience of witnessing the hon. Minister of Finance, metaphorically speaking, chastising some of his colleagues in the Government very severely in the presence of hon. members of the House. We have seen that done in the case of the Minister of Labour (Mr. Murdock) and a little later on our genial friend the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell) subjected to a similar castigation by the Minister of Finance.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: It did not hurt me.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: The hon. member says it did not hurt him, but it has been noticeable that he has been very quiet, and that his voice has scarcely been heard since in this Parliament. It must have had a considerable effect upon the Minister of Agriculture. I was inclined to agree with the Minister of Agriculture, and I could scarcely understand why the Minister of Finance should become so annoyed and exhibit the temper which he did on that occasion. It is quite evident that the Minister of Finance is determined to have his own way in the Government, and if he decides to go through with this budget as it is, undoubtedly it will go through, but if other counsels prevail, and they overcome the views of the Minister of Finance, we do not know what the result will be.

I have already referred to the views entertained by hon. members opposite; some of them are extreme free traders and others are strong protectionists; in fact, we knew very well during the recent campaign they had practically a policy to suit the requirements of every constituency. This was the policy pursued by the Government throughout the campaign, and, as far as their platform was concerned, I do not believe that they paid very much attention to it. I was of the opinion, all through the campaign, that there was a tacit understanding between the Liberal party and what is called the Progressive party that they were out to defeat the government. Judging from things that have happened since this session has opened, I have not seen any reason to change my views in that regard.

In 1920 a by-election was held in western Ontario, and the present Prime Minister (Mr. King) when he was interviewed on that occasion by a correspondent of the London Advertiser, made a statement with regard to the prospects during the next general election, and this statement was made in reference to a trip which he had just had through western Canada:

> The people were most anxious to hear the trade policy of the Liberal party outlined. Of course, a large part of the audience was formed by farmers, who are more or less aligned with the new party, but they gave us a most cordial welcome just the same. Their policy is essentially Liberal, and it was quite plain that they realized we must stand together if we are to get results. The National Liberal-Conservative party is devoting all its efforts in an attempt to bring about a division of the farmers and the Liberals, but their success along these lines has not been very apparent.

That may be quite true; but at the same time, it is evident that every discordant element in this country was lined up with the object of defeating the late government in the last general election. After the elections were over, a different atmosphere prevailed, and this was indicated by the following statement made by the hon. member for Brome (Mr. McMaster). He said: "After the fight is over, why do you say anything about what took place?"

A year ago the present Minister of Finance referred to a speech that was made in the West by the leader of the official Opposition (Mr. Meighen). The Minister of Finance quoted Mr. Meighen as having stated at Winnipeg:

> Mr. Fielding has time and again given his adherence to the protective principle. and never in language more unequivocal than employed in recent years.

The Minister of Finance stated:

> My right hon. friend is mistaken. I never gave any adherence to the principle of protection. , . If I had to choose between the two principles by all means I would start from the standpoint of free trade.

[Mr. Sutherland.]

That was the statement made by the Minister of Finance on that occasion. The year before in this House, he said, and he was evidently preparing the people of this country for what has taken place:

> I do not even think we can expect to get a safe and sound tariff policy by a too rigid adherence to every line and every letter of the tariff platform. I think myself that we will find that we are all prone in framing platforms to put things perhaps a little more strongly than is wise, and we all find when we come to the responsibilities of office that we have to modify our views.

The following day the hon. member for Brome in this House used these words in a most vigorous speech:

> Mr. Speaker: Protection as a policy for this country is not only dead, but after the next election it will, as Disraeli said, "be damned!"

Those were his views with regard to his policy at that time. The hon. member for Brome, so emphatic and so satisfied in his own mind, even ventured into the field of prophecy on that occasion. We have had further statements with regard to the policy of the Liberal party by those who, I think we might assume, ought to know what they are talking about. In 1907 there was a proposal before the House to reduce the duty on agricultural implements, and the then hon. member for Souris moved the following amendment:

> That the committee reconsider item 445 and that it be amended by striking out the figures 17½ per cent in the general tariff and inserting in lieu thereof the figures 10 per cent.

This is in relation to the duties on agricultural implements that my hon. friends to the left have been advocating so strenuously. What did the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) have to say on that occasion, although a year ago and, indeed, whenever it suits his purpose, he states that he is absolutely opposed to protection and that he favours the idea of free trade? The Minister of Finance spoke on that occasion, and you will find his words quoted at page 5621 of Hansard of that year:

> Mr. Fielding: . . . . by a careful calculation, we are advised that the drawbacks we allow are somewhat less than the disadvantage under which the manufacturer is placed by the reduction of the tariff. . . . . Even suppose for a moment that he got everything free and had a duty of 17½ per cent on the implement, would that be an extravagant duty as things go in this country? . . . . I believe this proposal of the hon. member for Souris, if adopted, would do an injustice to an established industry. . . . My belief that if this motion were passed, we would strike a severe blow at one of the great industries of the country. I believe the International Harvester Company would find it to its interest to close up its business in Hamilton, at least so much of it as is devoted to mowers and binders, and have them made at the American branch and bring them from the United States. The factory in Hamilton is an American concern. With a moderate duty we have induced American capital to come into Canada and to establish that great industry, and after we have brought it in and established it in Canada I believe that if we were to pass this resolution the company operating that industry would find it profitable to close the Hamilton factory and bring in goods which they make in the United States.

This was the view of the Minister of Finance on that occasion, when hon. members in this House were asking to have the tariff reduced on agricultural implements. The Hon. Mr. Paterson on that occasion stated:

I do not disguise the fact that we propose to give these people nearly the amount of reduction in duty that has been made. For it must be remembered that 17½ per cent is no more than a revenue tariff.

The hon. member for Brome the other day was dilating upon the traditions of the Liberal party. I wonder what he has to say with regard to that statement by Hon. Mr. Paterson:

17½ per cent is no more than a revenue tariff.

It is not approaching a protective tariff at all. Yet we listened this afternoon to the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Crerar) and the other day to the Minister of Finance, claiming that the people of this country made a terrible mistake in 1911 when they did not accept the proposition which was made to them by the government of that day and adopt the reciprocity pact of Messrs. Fielding and Paterson. We have heard that during the election campaign, from every platform where it suited their convenience to advocate such a policy. What are the facts with regard to that matter? If you had the tariff that is adopted under the reciprocity arrangement or agreement entered into by Mr. Paterson and the present Minister of Finance on that occasion, you would have to increase the duties on agricultural implements all along the line very materially, and you would place on the free list everything that the farmer raises without his receiving any corresponding advantage. Do you suppose, Sir, for one moment, that had that agreement been adopted by the people of this country, it would have had any influence upon the people of the United States when a change of government took place in that country when it suited their convenience to adopt a policy which they believed was in their interest? Have they in the past shown any regard or consideration for the interest of this country? Have they not always placed their own, first, last and always? You cannot blame them for doing so. They are looking after their own interest and they would have done so, in any event because this agreement was not a treaty or binding; it was termed simply a pact, which might be denounced at any time by either party to it. We should have been compelled to develop new channels of trade again just as we did in 1866, after the treaty of 1854 had been denounced by the United States government. There were people in this country in 1911 who had a distinct recollection of what took place on that occasion and they were not going to be led into another trap of that kind, when conditions indicated in no uncertain manner the fact that the agreement was more in the interests of the United States than of Canada.

Under the reciprocity pact the duty on waggons was 22½ per cent, and we reduced it to 20 per cent. The hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Crerar) claimed that he had a cause to resign from the government in 1919, because he differed from it on its tariff policy. The other tariffs under reciprocity were hay-loaders 20 per cent, reapers 15 per cent, binders 15 per cent, mowers 15 per cent, and windmills 20 per cent, reduced to 17½ per cent. What about cement? We have not heard much during this debate with regard to cement. But, oh! how it figured during the election campaign. There was a provision in the reciprocity pact for a tariff of 11 cents per hundred pounds on cement, but the government that succeeded the administration of that day reduced that tariff to eight cents per hundred pounds, at which figure it has remained ever since. These were things that were done for the benefit of the people of this country by the governments after 1911, but they were not provided for in the reciprocity agreement of 1911. The duty on binders, mowers, and these other things was reduced to 12½ per cent instead of 15 per cent as proposed in that pact. There were some other things that farmers are vitally interested in that were not provided for in the reciprocity agreement; but to hear some members of the Progressive party one would suppose that any one who does not come from the prairie provinces would be encroaching on the prerogatives of true farmers to mention these things. We have heard so much about farming from these gentlemen that apparently there is only one class of people who are qualified to call themselves farmers, and that is the grain growers of western Canada. However, I shall mention some of the other articles in which the farmers of Canada generally are very much interested. Butter was made free under the reciprocity pact. Now, during the past year upwards of two million pounds of butter were brought into this country from Great Britain under the British preference, to say nothing of millions of pounds imported from the United States. Does the farmer of Canada not obtain any advantage from a protective tariff in view of these importations? The United States put their tariff on butter up to eight cents per pound, and yet hon. gentlemen in this House who call themselves farmers say they do not need protection, advocate that it should be done away with, and declare that we should have everything free.

An hon. MEMBER: Hear, hear.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: An hon. gentleman says: "hear hear." Does he know that 9,000,000 dozens of American eggs came into this country last year with a tariff of three cents per dozen? We cannot under- present conditions produce enough eggs to supply the requirements of this country. Hon. gentlemen say it is more profitable to grow wheat than to bother with these trifling things, and so we import all these eggs from the United States. Take apples, for instance. There was a tariff of 60 cents per barrel on apples, and it has been increased to 90 cents per barrel; and in spite of that increase, during the past year, even though it was the smallest importation of this commodity that has come into the country, upwards of 110,000 barrels of apples were brought into Canada. If I had time to go over the list of articles and to show how many millions, and tens of millions of pounds of beef, pork, bacon and things of that kind have been imported into Canada from the United States, the wheat growers of the west would probably appreciate the fact that those who are carrying on actual farming in Canada do not ask that the tariff shall be removed, but, on the contrary, are strongly in favour of having it increased on many things that farmers are producing to-day in large quantities.

This is absolutely essential under present conditions. As I said at the outset, we are confronted to-day with a condition and not a theory. There is throughout the whole world a tendency on the part of most nations to erect tariff barriers for the protection of their own people from the cheap labour of foreign countries, and to establish their own industries in order to provide employment and a home market for their own people. But hon. members say: "Oh, but we are going to blaze the way for the whole world; Canada is going to set an example that eventually will be followed by all other countries." The hon. member for Marquette this afternoon, venturing into the field of prophecy, which is not always a very safe thing to do, stated that even in Great Britain the protective tariff which has been adopted will soon be discarded. I am inclined to think, however, in view of the statement made by the Prime Minister of Great Britain a few days ago, that that right hon. gentleman is not at all so sanguine in regard to that probability, for he has pointed out that the tendency to-day in all countries is to impose tariffs for the protection of native industry. While he deprecated the fact, nevertheless, it existed and had to be faced. These countries that are protected, in order to maintain an even price at home in proportion to the costs of production, ship out their surpluses. This may be an unfortunate condition of affairs, but it is the actual condition that prevails.

That leads me to a feature of the budget which I was somewhat surprised to hear the member for Marquette speak of in the way he did. I refer to the fixing of the rate of exchange on imports into this country, including German imports. The hon. member for Brome (Mr. McMaster), dealing with this matter the other day, referred to small nations of Europe that had adopted the protective tariff, and he was quoting the imports into those countries and giving the rate of duty collected on the total imports. He did not, however, give the rate of duty collected on the articles upon which a duty was levied. There were many millions of dollars' worth of free goods taken in there, and had he given that he would have shown that the protective tariffs in those countries were higher in regard to many things than is the tariff in Canada. I shall refer briefly to what has been done in the United States. The hon. member for Marquette said that the bill dealing with this question of the exchange on imports was put through the American Congress a year ago, and that there is no possibility of its going into effect. Let me inform the hon. member for Marquette that this bill had its second reading on April 11, 1922, and was referred to a committee of the House of Representatives, and is now under discussion in the Senate. Hon. W. E. Andrews, who was for eighteen years an auditor of the treasury department of the United States, and is now a member of the House of Representatives, on April 12 of this year, referring to the rate of foreign exchange pointed out, not with regard to any other country but specifically with regard to Germany, how absolutely impossible it would be for the United States to compete against the goods produced in that country under the depreciated currency of Germany. Yet the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) and the member for Marquette refer to these as most iniquitous measures, and display indignation when the hon. member for West York (Sir Henry Drayton) in moving the amendment refers to the budget proposals as a preference of 2½ per cent to Great Britain and free trade with Germany. Some expressions of indignation had been uttered with regard to that statement, but I think the hon. member for West York (Sir Henry Drayton) was well within the mark when he made it. I have here the report of an address delivered by Mr. Charles M. Schwab at a banquet tendered to him by the New York Chamber of Commerce, during the course of which he stated:

> Is it possible that after having won the war, we of the allied nations, with everything in our hands, will allow Germany to win the peace through the efforts of her labour?
> Germany can to-day put a ton of steel in England at a price $20 a ton cheaper than what it costs England to make it. Germany is to-day selling pneumatic tools in Detroit where formerly we made machinery and shipped it to Germany to sell there cheaper than she could make it.
> The difference is solely a matter of labour costs.
> Railroad costs must come down, and it is in the interests of national prosperity that our government, acting through the Railroad Labour Board and every other agency, shall reduce railroad wages and bring costs down to a living point.

Now, what does the United States provide for in this bill? Section 304 (a) reads as follows:

> Every article imported into the United States, which is capable of being marked, stamped, branded, or labeled, without injury, at the time of its manufacture or production, shall be marked, stamped, branded, or labeled, in legible English words, in a conspicuous place that shall not be covered or obscured by any subsequent attachments or arrangements,—

And so on. I will not read the whole section. But this indicates the steps which have been already taken by the United States government to protect the country against unfair competition. Section 315, it will be found, provides that the President may put into effect a tariff to absolutely prevent the unfair competition of imports. It has always been the custom of all governments to accept the currency of the countries from which goods are imported, but it will be seen that the United States government have taken the necessary steps to adequately protect its industries under the bill which is now being considered by the Senate of that country. So I say, Mr. Speaker, there is absolutely no justification for the Government to cancel the legislation which was passed a year ago to protect our industries. But the hon. member for Marquette states, "This is going to prevent trade, and so long as these cheap goods come in we do not care where they come from." Well, I think that anyone who has any regard for our industrial stability will not take such a view.

The hon. member also pointed out that in so far as our protective policy is concerned it is sectional and unfair and that there are many objections to it, and that the people of the West will never tolerate its continuance. He followed that up with the statement that manufacturing could not very well be established in western Canada because conditions there were not conducive to it. Well, some of us remember the predictions which were made by certain of our prominent public men years ago in regard to western Canada. When the Canadian Pacific Railway was first projected it was predicted that there would not be enough traffic to pay for the axle grease of the cars. I am inclined to think that in view of the immense oil, coal and other natural resources in the West the day will come when we shall have very extensive manufacturing industries established there as well as in other parts of the Dominion.

The hon. member for Marquette deprecated a protective tariff because of what he termed its sectional nature. Is it not a fact, although a matter for regret, that during the last few years our people have been inclined to look at matters from a sectional rather than from a national or international standpoint? Have we ever witnessed in our public life a condition similar to that which now prevails? Where did it have its origin, and what is its outcome going to be? Everything new has to be tested and tried before we can be sure of its containing any degree of permanency. We have been told that the old party system has ceased to be of service to the country, and that something else is to take its place. Well, I would caution anyone who runs away with such an idea to pay some attention to the manner in which this system came in to effect and to the fact that it has been adopted by every progressive country in the world. There were some wise people in the old days just as well as to-day, and this system which has been developed and perfected is now acknowledged by all countries except Russia as the most suitable system for self government. There can be no question as to that, and yet we find people to-day stating that they are going to upset all the old conditions and have a brand new system. Well, innovations have been tried out in different countries, but up to the present time I do not think there is any occasion to get very enthusiastic over what has happened.

When did this new party, styled the Progressive party, originate, and how? We in this corner of the House have been taunted frequently by hon. members to our left and by hon. members opposite with being a remnant of the old Tory party. I would remind hon. members that the old Tory party has to its credit achievements that are now of historic record, and that record its supporters need not be ashamed of. Indeed, in one of the most critical periods of our national existence the leaders of what is termed the "old Tory party", but really of the Liberal-Conservative party, paid very little attention to politics. They realized the danger which confronted the country, and in order that Canada might put forth her maximum war effort they scrapped the old party and by every means in their power encouraged those who were hanging back to come forward and do their duty for Canada, for the Empire and for civilization. Yes, there is a remnant left of the old Tory party, and that remnant will be heard from in the near future, when the people will appreciate what the party did during those critical times. That party will not in this House or elsewhere tolerate such a violation of pledges as we have witnessed on the part of our hon. friends who now occupy the Government benches.

The hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Crerar) was a member of the Union government which was organized in 1917. Was there any discussion when he was taken into the Cabinet as to what the fiscal policy was to be? It is true that he and several of his friends came here from western Canada and other parts of the Dominion and discussed with the Prime Minister of the day the conditions under which they would come into a union government, but there was never as far as we know any discussion as to tariff policy. They returned home. What happened in the meantime? The War-time Elections Act was placed on the statute book, because a war time election had to be held and we were determined to see that our men at the front should have an opportunity of exercising the franchise. Eventually, as is well known, the Liberal party were given the appointment of one-half of the election officials under that act, and the Hon. member for Marquette and his friends then entered the Union government. Now they claim they did a great thing for the old Tory party when, as they insist, it was in such dire straits.

Yes, the hon. member for Marquette became Minister of Agriculture in the Union government. This afternoon he stated that he resigned in June 1919 because of his differences with his colleagues on the question of tariff. Well, I want to remind him that greater tariff reductions, particularly in the duties on articles which the people of western Canada are concerned in, were made by the budget which failed to meet his approval than have been made since the national policy was adopted in 1878. Those reductions were made in order to satisfy the demands of the people of western Canada. Were the government of that day not entitled to some consideration? When the hon. member tendered his resignation the day before the budget was brought down his action came like a bolt from the blue to many people, but there were others who were not surprised. They knew that negotiations had been proceeding even at that date, with a view to organizing a new political party, and that the company of which the hon. member for Marquette was president was contributing funds for the building up of this new party.

I had occasion to be a little suspicious of what was going on in view of certain appointments that were being made in my own constituency, for even during the enforcement of the Military Service Act the hon. member for Marquette took steps to see that appointees of his department were placed on the exemption tribunals.

Mr. SPENCER: If I may ask the hon. gentleman a question? He says that the company with which the hon. member for Marquette was connected was contributing funds towards political organizations in western Canada. Has he any proof of that?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: I presume the hon. gentleman is a member of the Grain Growers' Grain Company?

Mr. SPENCER: I am a shareholder.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Well, you will find my statement confirmed in one of the annual financial statements of that company.

Mr. SPENCER: I beg to assure the hon. gentleman that he is wrong.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: That is my proof. I have also the published statement that had it not been for the encouragement received from the Grain Growers' Grain Company and the Minister of Agriculture at that time, a statement that has appeared in agricultural journals in Ontario from the pen of the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Good), who is now an active supporter of the new party—

Mr. FORKE: Will you repeat that statement?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: The member for Brant.

Mr. FORKE: Excuse me.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: I am not in the habit of making reckless statements. I have made these statements before in the presence of the hon. member for Marquette, and he has not denied them—nor can he deny them. It is somewhat significant that while the agitation was active in the country to exempt farmers' sons from military service, the then Minister of Agriculture was given the right to appoint on each military tribunal a representative of his department, and I assert that in every instance in Ontario those who were appointed were absolutely opposed to and worked against the government of which he was a member in the election of 1917.

Mr. GOULD: If the hon. gentleman will allow me a question? You make the statement that funds were subscribed by the United Grain Growers' Company for the purpose of organizing a political party in western Canada, and you add that your statement is proven by the annual statement issued by the company. I think I am safe in stating that either you have read that annual statement wrongly or put a wrong impression upon it. I say that, Mr. Speaker, because I happen to be a shareholder—

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Order. The hon. member may ask a question with the consent of the member who has the floor, but he can hardly make a statement.

Mr. GOULD: The question I would ask, Mr. Speaker, is: What annual statement does the hon. member refer to?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: I could not give the year, but the hon. member surely could not have overlooked it, for I put it on Hansard last session. I did not take the trouble to look it up again, because it has never been called in question. I also made the statement that those who were appointed by the Minister of Agriculture at that time as representatives of his department on exemption tribunals were men who were absolutely opposed to the Union government and to the enforcement of the Military Service Act. I ask the House if that was an honourable proceeding on the part of the then Minister of Agriculture, if he was carrying out the mandate that had been given to the Union government? That happened in the London district, the Toronto district, and the Kingston district. These matters have been referred to in this House before and have never been called in question. There is absolute authority for the statement I have made.

The hon. member for Marquette informed the House this afternoon why he resigned from the Union government. It was because he differed with his colleagues on their tariff policy. What does Mr. Rice Jones, the general manager and first vice-president of the United Grain Growers' Company say with regard to this matter and Mr. Crerar's acceptance of office? This is the sworn evidence given by Mr. Rice Jones before a parliamentary committee of this House:

> At the time he, Mr. Crerar, entered the government, he was drawing $10,000, and he continued to draw on that basis. He said he would not draw any salary unless they thought he should have a nominal salary for acting as president. The point is that when he came down the directors did not think he would be down here very long.

Well, if the directors did not think he would be down here very long, they must have expected that the Union government would be defeated at the general election which was then pending. Fortunately for Canada the government were returned with a majority of 46, and consequently might be expected to live its full term of office.

Mr. McMASTER: Will the hon. member permit a question? Is it not possible that the true construction to be placed on that statement is that the directors thought the Union government would redeem its promise and go out of office as soon as the war was over?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: I may inform the hon. member for Brome (Mr. McMaster) that if he was so sanguine that the end of the war was near, his view was not entertained by very many people in this country or anywhere else. The situation was becoming more desperate from day to day, and a few months afterwards the fears entertained by the former government were fully justified by events on the western front, when the fifth army division was practically annihilated. The people in those days were not very sure as to when the war would end, but rather about what might ultimately happen. Again he states:

> Mr. Crerar's position at the time was that he should not draw the $10,000, but the directors decided in view of the fact that he did not figure he would be here very long that the matter would stand over.

So he figured that he would not be here very much longer, and the company did not think he would be here very long. A little further on, he states:

> I think that the general view at that time was that it was very doubtful as to how long the Union government would last.

Then on page 824 I find this:

> I may state, if you will go back, that Mr. Crerar has not drawn the $15,000 because that salary was set to take effect whenever he returned to the company.

So a by-law or regulation was passed by the United Grain Growers' Limited increasing the salary from $10,000 to $15,000, but it was conditional upon his returning to the company.

Mr. MORRISON: Might I ask what the salary which the United Grain Growers paid to the hon. member for Marquette has to do with the business of the House?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: The hon. member for Marquette informed the House this afternoon that the reason why he got out of the government was that he differed with them on their tariff policy. I am trying to show to the hon. member and the House that pressure was brought to bear upon the hon. member for Marquette by his company, and that he had either to give up the salary as president of the company or cease to be a member of the government.

[Mr. Sutherland.]

Mr. MORRISON: There was never the least bit of pressure brought to bear on the hon. member for Marquette by the company.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Then all I can say is that the sworn evidence given by Mr. Rice Jones was not in accordance with the facts.

Mr. CRERAR: It is not very often that I interrupt an hon. member making a statement, but I cannot allow to pass unchallenged the remarkable doctrine or explanation, or whatever it is, that my hon. friend from South Oxford is trying to give the House. As to the statement he has just made, there is not a particle of foundation for it. My hon. friend has drawn very largely on his imagination to produce the state of mind in which he now finds himself.

Mr. McMASTER: Withdraw.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: It was in September of 1918 that Mr. Rice Jones informed a committee of this House that this regulation or condition was passed by the company of which the hon. member for Marquette is president.

Mr. CRERAR: I again protest. No such regulation was passed, and when I say that I think my hon. friend should take my word.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: I am very glad to hear the hon. member for Marquette make that statement. He states that no such regulation was ever passed. I state most emphatically that I am giving the sworn evidence of the general manager and first vice-president of his company before a committee of this House.

Mr. CRERAR: You are drawing an inference from the evidence that is not warranted.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: I am drawing no inference. I am giving the exact words of Mr. Rice Jones. I was a member of the committee, and I thought it was a most remarkable statement for him to make at the time. As to the hon. member's desire to serve the farmers of this country, almost one of the first things which he did was something to which I have referred on several occasions. On September 1st the Grain Growers' Grain Company and the Alberta Elevator Company amalgamated under the name of the United Grain Growers, Limited. I do not suppose he will deny that fact. The president of the new company, the hon. member for Marquette, was sworn in as a member of the government on the 12th of October, 1917. On October 25, 1917, one of the first things that he did was to grant the right to the manufacturers of a certain commodity known as oleomargarine in this country to adulterate butter. By the adulteration of butter, greater injury has been done to the interests of real agriculture in this country than most hon. members or most of the people in the country realize. Almost the next move made by the president of the Grain Growers, Limited, was to contract with the terminal elevators for the recleaned screenings at $35 per ton. The president of the company also made the statement that previous to the war the sum received for screenings was very low, hardly worth considering, about four or five dollars per ton. By this act of the hon. member for Marquette, a great injury was also done to agriculture through the spread of weed seeds.

Mr. MORRISON: Does the hon. member think this is the annual meeting of the United Grain Growers?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: If the hon. member was as anxious to advance the interests of his country as he is to defend his leader and his party, he would be rendering a better service. I am taking the statement of his leader that the reason why he got out of the government was that he differed with them on the tariff, and I have pointed out to the House that there was a greater reduction in the tariff that year than has ever taken place since the National Policy was first adopted.

The next thing the hon. member for Marquette did was to change the grain standards which permitted the millers of this country to adulterate mill feed, and that has been going on practically ever since.

The next thing he did was to be a consenting party to placing an export duty on dairy produce going from this country. I could give you a lot more things that happened while he was a member of the Government, but I am not going to trespass on the time of the House.

One of his colleagues, Hon. Mr. Rowell, in the House stated on June 12, 1919:

> But I say to the House and to the country that if I was prepared, as all my colleagues, were, to support the Finance Minister in coming down to this House during this war year without any revision of the tariff, I do not believe that I am absolved from supporting him when he has revised the tariff in a measure according to the lines that I desire. I feel there is a double obligation upon myself to stand by the Minister of Finance and my other colleagues who have made a partial revision in the tariff along lines which I believe to be just and right in the public interest.

We had a staunch free trader in the House at that time, Dr. Clark, and what did the hon. member for Red Deer have to say to the hon. member for Marquette who had seen fit to resign on account of the tariff? He said:

> I cannot agree with my hon. friend from Marquette. I think this is the only disagreement I shall have with him in describing the budget as a protectionist budget. I think a fairer thing would be to define it and I think history will so define it as a budget tending towards free trade.

That was the view held by the hon. member for Red Deer, and no one who sat in this House at that time will call his free trade proclivities in question. His view was that the budget tended towards free trade. The tariff was not an issue in the elections at that time. I must now leave that subject and pass on to the customs tariff.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: Did the hon. member for Red Deer support that budget at that time which he characterized as tending towards a free trade budget? If he did, I should be very much surprised.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: I have given you his words. I have not looked up the vote. I am quoting from Hansard the words which the hon. member from Red Deer used on that occasion. Protection has been condemned in no uncertain tones by the hon. member for Marquette and other members supporting the Government. After listening to the address which was delivered condemning certain members of this House for not offering something of a constructive nature, what did the hon. member from Marquette have to offer to take the place of the policy which we have in this country to-day? Did he offer a single constructive suggestion? Did he intimate to this House how he was going to raise the revenue? If he did, I did not hear it. This committee of the House to which I have referred had some information from others who have been and are supporters of the member from Marquette. We had as a witness before that committee, the present Premier of Ontario, Mr. E. C. Drury. This evidence was printed and in it he gave his views on taxation. The following questions were asked and answers given:

> Q. Taking your farm as a typical case, do you object to a 1 per cent separate land tax.

A. I would not, if I were relieved of the other ordinary tax.

Q. Have you any knowledge of that being generally acceptable.

A. It is part of the platform of the United Farmers in Ontario, which was adopted unanimously at the last convention. I think that is the acceptance of the term at the present time.

By the Chairman:

Q. All other taxes being eliminated except the direct tax on land?

A. That is the ultimate object.

This is the statement made by Mr. E. C. Drury with regard to the taxes on land. Then he was further examined as follows:

Q. That platform is to tax unoccupied land?

A. No, beg pardon, to tax the unimproved value of land.

Then a question was asked by another member of the committee:

Q. Out west "unimproved land" has a different interpretation?

A. Mr. Crerar was taking that up when I left the Chamber. I think his interpretation agrees with mine—not a tax on unimproved land, but a tax on unimproved land value.

This is the method which the hon. member put forward, but he did not have the courage to intimate to the House what his policy would be with regard to that matter. This is a plank in the platform of the Progressive party, and this is the system by which they would raise the revenue of the country, not a tax on unimproved land, as some people imagine, but on the unimproved value of all lands. I have here a paper issued by the single tax people, called the Square Deal and it contains the platform of the Progressive party. It is headed:

We Claim the Earth is the Property of the Whole People.

And their proposal in this paper is that they will exempt everything that has been created by labour and that the taxes must come on the land for everything, and everything that has been created by artificial methods shall be exempt from taxation. These are the steps which, I presume, would be taken if these people were entrusted with the reins of government in this country to bring about the reforms which they are advocating. Conditions are altogether too serious in this country to take chances on any such wild schemes as have been outlined so far to take the place of the custom which prevails in this country. A free trade policy may be an ideal one if adopted in all countries, but owing to the fact that our neighbours to the south are erecting tariff barriers so high as to be absolutely prohibitive, in view of the fact that other countries are doing the same, and that the old motherland is the country to which we must, under present conditions, look for a market to dispose of our surplus produce, it would be most suicidal to give up our markets to the surplus products of highly protected countries, which would be dumped in here at times and absolutely demoralize our own markets.

The hon. member from Qu'Appelle (Mr. Millar) made a statement in the House the other night that more money should have been raised while the war was on, that the government had developed extravagant habits, and that it was hard to get away from them. It may be that they have developed extravagant habits, but the people of this country will have to come to their senses and realize that these extravagant habits, for the time being, will have to be dispensed with, and that the obligations with which this country is confronted cannot be settled by saddling a tax on a certain class of people, and excluding all others in the community from the tax which is proposed under the scheme outlined by Mr. Drury in his evidence before a committee in this House.

Just a word or two with regard to matters contained in the budget. I notice that the doubling of the sales tax is going to be a very serious matter indeed to many of the struggling industries in this country at the present time. I am going to refer to a few of the items which are exempt from taxation, but will not mention them all by any means.

Meats and poultry, fresh; milk, including butter-milk; cream; butter; cheese; oleomargarine, margarine, butterine or other substitutes for butter; lard, lard compound and similar substances, made from animal or vegetable stearine or oils; materials for use solely in the manufacture of oleomargarine or any substitute for butter or lard.

Any of these substances and substitutes are to be permitted to come into the country without any tariff. There is to be no sales tax upon them, but, in face of that, we find a tax on one of the most important food products in some sections of the country and one that is now used very largely by people on the ocean liners, in the mines, and by those who have to go into the interior, far from the settled portions of the country and the people generally. There are twenty-seven milk condensories in the Dominion of Canada. Some of them are very large, employing hundreds of hands. I see that 310,858,503 pounds of milk were condensed or converted into milk powders in these factories during the past year and 105,898,450 pounds of this commodity was manufactured in the county a portion of which I have the honour to represent. A little over 34 per cent of the total condensed milk product of the Dominion of Canada was manufactured in the small county of Oxford and I hope that when the Minister of Finance comes to deal with this question in the budget, notwithstanding his strong advocacy of the exemption of the articles to which I have referred, he will still take steps to see that justice is done to this important industry which has developed in this country and in which many millions of dollars are involved. I might point out that for the county of Oxford alone last year—and it was practically, with the exception of one factory, all manufactured in the constitutency I represent—the value of the product was $4,574,878. There is an excise tax of 1½ per cent; it is proposed to increase the sales tax by 50 per cent, so that this will practically mean a sales and excise tax of 6 per cent on this commodity, whereas all these other substitutes for dairy products are to be exempted from any customs tariff and from the sales tax. I would ask if it is fair, when it is well known that this industry is at the present time suffering owing to the fact that there is a large accumulation of goods on hand in the warehouses of this country, to permit all goods such as are mentioned in the budget resolutions, to come into this country free of all tariff regulations and free from the sales tax, and to impose a tax of 6 per cent upon condensed milk and powdered milk in Canada. I hope, when this matter is before the House in committee, the minister will give it his very careful consideration, because many factories are at the present time finding it very difficult to dispose of their produce and to continue in business.

I am glad to see the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) in his seat, because there is something to which I should like to call his attention, in view of the fact that some of the heavy liabilities that confront this country at the present time are a heritage from the government which was in office prior to 1911. We have had a considerable discussion regarding the railway situation in Canada and the need for reducing rates in connection with railway transportation, and I think every one agrees that something must be done along that line. The railway situation is one that has not developed recently. The present Minister of Finance was Minister of Finance of the government of that day when the building of the Transcontinental was launched in Canada in 1902 and 1903. The Minister of Finance and the Prime Minister of that day claimed, in their statements in the House and in the country, that all it would actually cost the people of Canada would be between $13,000,000 and $14,000,000; at least, that amount of money set aside and placed at interest would pay for the whole Transcontinental line to the advantage of every one in this country. What did the Minister of Railways of that day have to say with regard to the proposition when it was brought into the House?

Hon. A. G. Blair: Let me tell the House, in the first place, however, what the right hon. gentleman did not say in explanation of his course.

He is referring to the then Prime Minister.

He did not deny that there had not been deliberation; he did not affirm that the government of the country had availed itself of all proper sources of information; and had waited until they had exhausted all the means in their power to ascertain what the conditions were in the various portions of the country which the road was to traverse; he did not tell us the need which had arisen for us to jump headlong into a scheme of this kind; he did not tell us that he had summoned to his assistance the wisest counsels which the country could afford; he did not tell us that he had sought the assistance of experts in order to know what the traffic conditions were which would make this railway desirable; he did not even pretend to tell us that he had done these things.

The Hon. Mr. Blair goes on:

What does the right hon. gentleman mean when he says "The flood of tide is upon us, that leads on to fortune; if we let it pass it may never recur again." What does the right hon. gentleman mean when he says: "If we let it pass the voyage of our national life, bright as it is to-day, will be bound in shallows." What does the right hon. gentleman mean when he says: "We cannot wait because time does not wait." I think, Mr. Speaker, and I say it with respect to my right hon. friend that it would have been as correct if not as poetic for him to have said: "We cannot wait, because Senator Cox cannot wait."

This was the statement made by the Minister of Railways of that day who evidently had not been consulted when this scheme had been entered into by the government of which he was a member, and it is the irony of fate that the Minister of Finance of that day should be called upon to face some of the obligations which this country has had to shoulder as a result of what the hon. member for Marquette

(Mr. Crerar) termed the "wild cat" schemes that had been launched with regard to railway construction in this country. The late government has been charged by some hon. gentlemen opposite with not managing the affairs of the railway as they should have done. The late government found that they had either to go on advancing million after million of dollars to those companies or to take them over because they had to meet those deficits annually. When the Minister of Finance claims before this House that these obligations are the result of war, I say that they are not by any means all the result of war conditions, but largely the result of mal-administration on the part of the government of which he was a member on that occasion. We are to-day in this country paying the penalty for the policy that was pursued, for the steps that were taken upon that occasion, without due consideration, to build railways many years in advance of the requirements of Canada. This statement was made, not only by the Minister of Finance, but by the then Prime Minister in a speech delivered in the City of Toronto on October 5, 1907. The then Prime Minister stated on that occasion:

> I will not bore you with figures; I will give you the figures compiled by the experts of the Finance Department, who calculate that what we would pay in interest for seven years represents a sum in cash which, if it were put in the bank today, would amount to a little more than $13,000,000, and a little less than $14,000,000. That is all we would have to pay for the construction of the road if our expectations and contracts prove to be as accurate as we think they are. I ask you, my fellow-citizens, if we can get that tremendous railway for $14,000,000 do you think that will be so very heavy a burden for the Canada taxpayers?

And so on. This was the statement made by the Right Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier in Toronto in October, 1907, with regard to the railways. On that occasion he also referred to another matter which the Minister of Finance of the present day has evidently forgotten about. I have the Toronto Globe report of the speech delivered by the Right Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier on that occasion:

> I am proud to say that under our regime the manufacturers always sleep soundly and never fear interference with the tariff. We have made very few changes in the duty. We chiefly introduce new principles rather than make changes in the duty. For instance, one of the changes was made in 1904 when we introduced the anti-dumping clause. Why did we adopt such a policy? Why did we introduce that anti-dumping clause? We introduced it for the reason I gave a moment ago, that it was essential to the success of manufacturing that the man who is engaged in business should know exactly the conditions under which he would operate and we put in this clause to prevent the demolition of the market.

This is the very policy that is required in this country to-day, and which was put into effect last session to prevent the importation of cheap goods from foreign countries by reason of the depreciated currency and the almost abolition of the German mark. It is somewhat significant that the German government kept the printing presses constantly going in order to turn out these marks as rapidly as possible; and they were produced to such an extent that people in this country and elsewhere were buying them at about eight cents, and then six cents, and later on at less, and now they are worth one-third of a cent. I believe it was the intention of Germany to depreciate the value of the mark for the purpose of bringing about the conditions that now prevail, and I contend that it would be fatal to the industries here to permit German goods to come into Canada on the terms proposed, because it would put out of business those who are manufacturing the same goods in this country, and would thus throw out of employment those labourers whom we should take care of in Canada.

Now, I say that instead of $13,000,000 or $14,000,000 being the cost of the Transcontinental Railway, the total up to the present time, in my opinion, is $354,000,000. The conditions with which we are faced to-day in regard to the railways is largely attributable to the mismanagement of previous years when money was borrowed in every part of the world and the railways were built far in advance of the times. We have roads to-day in many instances paralleling each other, and it would be wise to close one where we have two, and in some instances as many as three lines. These are some of the matters that must be considered by the Government; and I would also emphasize the great need there is for rigid economy in the administration of the public affairs of the country. It is significant that notwithstanding the dismissals that have taken place in the Civil Service there should have been a very substantial increase in the cost of civil government during the present session, although the supplementary estimates have not yet been brought down. These are questions that must be seriously considered by the Government before we can hope to have any real progress in the direction of substantial economy.

In view of what has been brought out in this debate, Mr. Speaker, I shall have no difficulty in supporting the amendment that has been moved by the hon. member for West York (Sir Henry Drayton), because it is quite obvious that the Government have not dealt fairly by the people. They professed during the election campaign that they would adopt a certain policy, and the people took them at their word. But the attitude of the Liberal party on this occasion is on all fours with what they did in 1896. In this connection I may quote from a speech of the Hon. J. I. Tarte delivered in 1903, with regard to the professions that had been made by the Liberal party before they obtained office. The remarks I am about to quote may be found in Hansard of April 20, 1903, at page 1634:

> I say it openly, I say it from the bottom of my heart, that I fully expected that the Liberal party, with which I have been connected during the last ten years, would carry out the policy it was understood in 1896 they would carry out. I am weighing my words. I know what arrangement, what understanding took place between some public men. I know what took place. I do not divulge any secrets. I know what we did in the election of 1896 in Montreal. I see within the radius of my eye public men who, at our request, came to the city of Montreal, went to the manufacturers, with the knowledge of the leaders of the party, and told them not only would the tariff not be disturbed, but it would be changed in the right direction when the proper time came. There was no secret about that. I shall not give names. There are men who hear me—I am sorry there are not more on those benches—who know that I am perfectly right. I am out of office because I could not stay in office under the present circumstances. I have had only but pleasant relations with most of my colleagues and have for the most of them the greatest respect. But I could not possibly stay in office when I knew that the policy we are following now is not the right policy—when I knew that understanding took place formerly.

Here was a member of the Liberal government of that day deploring their betrayal of public confidence; and I have a distinct recollection of a campaign carried on in our county at which the leader of the party and his chief lieutenants were present at that time. They preached the policy that is now advocated by hon. members to our left, practically that of free trade, or commercial union, or unresticted reciprocity, or a combination of all. Sir Richard Cartwright was for seventeen years a representative of the constituency I have now the honour to represent, and that was his slogan during the whole of that period. And here was the Hon. Mr. Tarte, a member of the government of that day, putting on record in Hansard that it was by trickery of that kind that they had obtained office, afterwards disregarding their pledges and promises. I say, therefore, that the motion of the hon. member for West York, censuring the Government for making pledges to the electors of the country which they never intended to put into effect, is a motion that should receive the unanimous support of the House. The policy of the party now in office is one that cannot find approval in the country, and I shall therefore vote for the amendment that so properly condemns it.

Mr. WILLIAM IRVINE. (East Calgary): The members who have taken part in this budget debate have offered, no doubt, their very best advice to the administration, in full view of the situation in which the nation is placed, and with that sincerity of purpose and that spirit of patriotism which should characterize the utterances of statesmen. It would be interesting if not educational to review comprehensively the wide range of subjects that have in some remote way been related to the main theme which, as I understand it, is the consideration of the most effective, as well as the most equitable, method of raising the estimated financial requirements for current expenditures. But I refrain from reviewing the debate in any hypercritical mood, and choose to offer my humble suggestions, as other hon. members have done, in the hope that those who occupy the highest office of the state, as well as the hon. members of this House, will give me a hearing and at least some reasonable consideration.

It is indeed a matter worthy of the highest congratulation that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) has had the singular honour to present to Parliament his sixteenth budget; and I am sure that the people of Canada highly appreciate the distinguished services which the minister has so generously given during his many years of public life.

Adding my congratulations to those of the many hon. gentlemen who have preceded me in debate, I wish to state that it is my hope that the hon. Minister of Finance will long retain that splendid vigour which he now enjoys and thus be able to give to Canada many more years of service. I congratulate him not only on having been privileged to move his sixteenth budget, but on the budget itself as a great achievement of political genius.

The budget has been launched upon a stormy sea and the gathering waves are dashing around it in all directions. This was to have been expected, and no doubt was anticipated by the Finance Minister, who has had long experience in matters of taxation and finance. As a matter of fact, taxation is becoming increasingly difficult of accomplishment in all countries of the world, and these difficulties are being encountered chiefly, I think, for two reasons. The first is that indirect taxation is now pretty well understood. We are past the time when the people could be compelled to pay without knowing how much they were paying or how they were paying; and following this knowledge there has come a disposition on the part of the people generally, to dodge taxation. So really it does not matter much what we tax by the present method; there will always be some class or other that will feel that it has been discriminated against, and in many instances there may be good ground for that feeling. The second reason is that there is a widespread realization of the utter hopelessness of trying to catch up with the national debt, which is increasing on the principle of geometrical progression, while every tax imposed in the vain attempt to catch up but serves to reduce the purchasing power of the people, to stop the wheels of production, and more securely to bind the nation in financial servitude. Any criticism that I have to make will not, therefore, be applied exclusively to the present budget, but will have special reference to the financial blue bird that we are blindly chasing and the methods that we are adopting to snare it. If we are to continue to figure our credits and debts by a method of bookkeeping which ignores the real wealth of the nation; if we are to continue to train our people in the false idea of the building up of bank accounts for financiers instead of abundant wealth for all the people, then truly the budget as presented by the hon. Minister of Finance, is as good and, even better than, any other budget. I will go further, and say it has been drawn up admirably to meet both the political and the financial outlook from the observatory of the old political school. If we are to continue our hopeless drifting on the seas of high finance until we come to grief on the lee shore of bankruptcy, which is not very far off, then the present budget will do as well as if it had been brought in by hon. members on the opposition side of the House. If we do not intend to get control and steer for a safer port, then indeed the pessimism of the Minister of Finance is well warranted. I propose, Mr. Speaker, to deal with what I may call the colossal lie upon which the budget is based. I am going to advance a credit proposal that in my opinion would help to raise our national revenue to meet current expenditures and at the same time to enable us to pay off our national debt; then I will give a detailed example of how that credit proposal may be worked out, and instances of social credit in operation. Then I shall deal, Mr. Speaker, with the amendment, and I shall have something to say on the amendment to the amendment.

The pessimism which the hon. Minister of Finance gives voice to in his budget speech is a symptom of a panic which is seizing the minds of national leaders throughout the modern world. The hon. Minister of Finance said:

> I must to-day present two thoughts which are of paramount importance. The first is as to the need, the deep and earnest need, of economy. That means that we must appeal both to members of Parliament and to the people to pass what I may call self-denying ordinances. They must not expect all the things which in the good old days they got so readily.

There is only one reason, it seems to me, for this panic; only one reason for passing self-denying ordinances, and that is that we apply the financial system upon which the budget is built and the method of taxation of which it consists. If that is the only course, we may well breathe deeply of the pessimistic atmosphere which we find so heavily around us. The minister told the House that the total estimated revenue for the present year was $332,629,000, while the estimated expenditure calls for $466,983,359, with supplementary estimates yet to be heard from. This means that there will be a deficit in this fiscal year of $134,354,359, without taking the supplementary estimates into consideration. This is not, in my opinion, a complete statement of the nation's real financial position; in other words, there are other facts of even greater importance which have not been given. No doubt the minister gave all the figures that are usually required in the national financial statement, but there are other important inquiries to be made before we can be convinced that Canada is a poverty-stricken country, that the people cannot meet their obligations, and that we must be called upon to practise self-denying ordinances. I had hoped that the Minister of Finance, and then I had hoped also that the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Robb), would have given the House some more statistical information in regard to Canada's credit, but neither of these hon. gentlemen did give that information. I am in hopes that the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) will give it to us; for if Canada is so poverty stricken that we must face a deficit of over $134,000,000, on this year's current expenditure, and if people must prepare to deny themselves, how did it happen that a few weeks ago a $100,000,000 pledge of the national credit was subscribed for in New York within a few hours? Is that one transaction alone not ample proof of the soundness of Canada's financial position? The belief that Canada must necessarily be impoverished as a result of the war is what I call the colossal lie that is back of unemployment, that has inspired a policy of wage cutting, and that is damning up the natural flow of trade and industry in our home market. When I call this belief a colossal lie, of course I make no reference to individuals; rather I refer to the settled opinion that has grown up through the concentrating of our attention upon bank balances rather than upon our real wealth. We are short of money, but we have abundance of wealth. This distinction I hope to make clear as I proceed. The vital facts concerning the real economic situation should be put on record. A budget statement is incomplete which does not embody our total national assets as well as our total national liabilities. When we find that financial houses abroad are anxious to lend hundreds of millions of dollars on the nation's promise to pay, the idea that our country is poverty stricken may be challenged with considerable confidence. When the Prime Minister speaks, then, I urge again that he tell the country as near as possible, through the statistical records available in the Dominion Bureau of Statistics, what the total national production amounts to annually in money value; what the total annual national consumption amounts to, in terms of dollars, and, if he will, to prove from that the necessity of self-denying ordinances, and to prove that Canada is poverty stricken; that we should be curtailing our expenditures on every hand, and that we should be passing out from this House the suggestion to the people of Canada that we are just about bankrupt.

I am going to give to you, Sir, an approximate estimate of our national production based on figures obtained from the Dominion Statistician—and I am sure that when I speak on the authority of our Dominion Statistician, the statement will not be looked upon as an exaggeration of the facts. It is safe to say that our total production, including the building of the roads, houses, the crops, the production of the fisheries, the forests, the mines, the manufactories and all other items of appreciation and improvement measured in terms of real credit, is not less than six thousand millions of dollars. I have here a report published in the Ottawa Morning Citizen of a statement which was made from the pulpit of Knox Church on Sunday evening by the Rev. R. B. Whyte on the very same point, and I am going to quote it; I think it is worth repeating. He says:

> One other parallel between Coxey's army and the one in our midst: Coxey's army raised the question, "Why should there be hunger in a land of plenty; why unemployment?" and these are the questions which press upon us now. We, in Canada, produce wealth from our farms, our factories, our forests, our fisheries and our mines, amounting to six thousand millions a year; we consume, as nearly as it can be estimated, about three thousand millions. That shows a fairly healthy condition of affairs. Surely that should stir reflection.

Now, I want to place upon Hansard the figures as I have received them from Mr. Coats, our Dominion Statistician. First of all, I want to deal with the estimated wealth of Canada. This is the estimate for 1921:

Wealth of Canada

Farm Values, 1921—
Land	$ 3,196,876,000
Buildings	1,035,712,000
Implements	391,660,000
Live stock	766,720,000
Poultry	38,007,000
Animals on fur farms	5,824,000
Mines and forests	1,200,000,000
Fisheries	50,405,000
Steam and electric railways	2,687,000,000
Canals	137,000,000
Shipping	200,000,000
Telegraphs and telephones	191,000,000
Urban real property	4,115,050,000
Manufacturing machinery	666,835,335
Stocks of raw materials and manufactured goods	789,513,000
Stored products of farm, fisheries and the mine	500,000,000
Household furnishings, clothing, carriages, motors, etc.	800,000,000
Specie	193,603,304
Imported merchandise in store	250,000,000
Total for Canada	$17,215,205,639

It is to be observed that under the heading of "lands", no estimate is attempted of the value of unimproved lands or natural resources.

Now, this statement does not completely represent our real credit, for our real credit implies the ability to produce and deliver goods, and with the prevalent industrial anarchy—for that is what it is—we have never had an opportunity to test properly our ability to produce, except during the time of war, when a great number of our men were at the front. It is quite reasonable to suppose, that in comparison with the production of 1921, when our factories were running on short time—many of them closed altogether—and when 10 p.m. unemployment was current throughout Canada, we can very materially increase our production and thereby our credit if industry were properly organized and running to capacity. So I insist that while this is a very handsome balance sheet indeed, it does not represent all our real credit, which implies our ability to produce goods and deliver them as and when and where required.

Now, I want to give you the figures of Canada's production for 1921:

Canadian Production
Agriculture, 1921—
Field crops	$931,865,000
Farm animals	98,424,000
Wool	2,975,000
Dairy products	260,337,000
Fruits and vegetables	40,000,000
Poultry and eggs	55,000,000
Fur farming	1,065,000
Maple products	4,174,000
Tobacco	2,393,000
Totals		$ 1,396,233,000
Fisheries 1921 (estimated)		35,441,000
Minerals, 1921 (preliminary)		172,327,580
Furs, seasons 1920-21		10,151,594
Forest products, 1919 (estimated)		330,713,598
General Manufactures, 1919 $3,520,731,589— This figure of $3,520,731,589 includes fish canned and preserved, log products, wood pulp and clay products production, which would reduce the amount to be added in with Canadian production to approximately $3,300,000,000 for general manufactures not included in above headings		3,300,000,000
Total Canadian production		$5,244,866,772

Let me quote here a very significant statement of the statistician. He goes on to say:

> The above is a statement according to the latest available figures under the headings usually included in "production". It does not include all activities which may be regarded as "productive" from a strictly economic point of view, such as transportation and trade activities. Railway gross earnings, for example, in 1920 amounted to $492,101,000, street railway gross earnings to $47,000,000; telephone and telegraph gross earnings to $45,000,000, etc.

So you will see that when I say we have at least an annual production in Canada of $6,000,000,000, I am well within the mark; that estimate of our annual production is a very conservative one. Just to indicate that it is, I would point out that in addition to our annual production of consumable goods, we produce annually a large amount of what might be called capital goods, existing in the form of public improvements, new or improved manufacturing plants, railways, canals, harbours, dry docks, ships, telegraphs, telephones, houses, roads and similar forms of capital goods. Now, if our total production in Canada be $6,000,000,000 and our annual consumption as estimated by the statistician is only $2,000,000,000, then we have a difference of $4,000,000,000 between our consumption and our production. The statistician, in reply to my question as to what would be an average wage for the Canadian bread-winner, stated:

> We have no annual statistics of average wages, but in 1911 every individual on salary and wages was asked by the census to state his or her total earnings during the preceding year. The result showed an average of $592.75 for each male, and $313.12 for each female.

That is a very low average, and I want to add that in that estimate there was no allowance made for those who received high salaries and those who received incomes from profits in corporations, and the like. I am going to make my estimate in this way. I am going to estimate our population as around nine millions, and that one in every five of a family is a bread-winner or earner of money, and I am going to grant to each bread-winner an average income of $1,000. You will agree with me that that is giving them a really higher wage than would be borne out by the facts. If we make that calculation, we shall find that we have something like two billion dollars worth of wages and salaries paid out to Canadian bread-winners in a year. That is the measure of our consuming power. I am going to assume that we consume all of that, that nothing is laid by, that we spend everything in consumable goods. If we consume it all, having only two billion dollars to purchase with, we should have four billion dollars worth of goods left on our hands, because we have an annual production of six billion dollars worth of goods. If those are the facts—and if they are not, I hope the speakers on the Government side of the House will challenge the figures and give the correct ones—it is a very strange thing to hear hon. members on the Government side of the House talk about the necessity for economizing and for increasing production, and to hear the leader of the Progressives plead for strict economy. What is the value of strict economy when you are not able, as shown by earning measurement, to consume much more than one-third of what has been produced? If a man has a salary of $6,000 a year, and he can only manage to consume $3,000 of it, we all reckon that man is in a fairly good financial position. Is not that our state? That is precisely the position which Canada finds itself in to-day, measured in terms of our national credit. There is something very wrong with the belief that Canada is poor. What need to pinch when your production much more than doubles consumption? This "great lie" of poverty should be dropped from the philosophy of the Government.

The credit question is without doubt at the very centre of our national problems of trade depression, railway deficits, high taxation and unemployment. Canada's credit is good, as must be evident from the comparison which I have just given, and we should make collective use of our real national credit for the purpose of developing our home market. By increasing the purchasing power of the people they would be able to buy a larger percentage of that extra four billion dollars worth of goods that they are unable to purchase at the present time. Germany in using her national credit has once more outwitted her trade rivals and left the financiers of the world in consternation. She has successfully prevented the industrial stagnation which of very necessity prevails in other countries of the world where the old system of financing is still in operation, guided by the knights of high finance. There is practically no unemployment in Germany.

The hon. member for Fort William (Mr. Manion) quoted in this debate from an article in the English Review of October, 1921, written by J. Austin Harrison. I shall repeat his quotation, because I think it is germane to my argument:

> Germany is doing a brisk trade, is industrially prosperous, has few unemployed and has a growing export which, to the consternation of the Allies, threatens to grow more real and valuable as the depreciation in the value of Germany's currency increases. He says that this will still further close British markets, increase unemployment, because Britain is forced to buy food at a great loss to herself and cannot compete in Europe with countries whose currency is depreciated.

Here is another quotation by the same speaker, given in this debate, from the Literary Digest of November 26, 1921: , > Returning travellers report Germany humming with industry, her workers well paid and well clothed and fed, with taxes the lowest in Europe and a promising export trade stimulated by her cheap money which permits her to under-bid England, France and America on foreign orders. Thus the cheap mark helps Germany and hits every one else.

One other quotation in this connection will give the quietus to the wild statements that I have heard hon. members make with regard to the position of the workingman in Germany. I have here an article from a well informed writer in a recent number of the London Economist, who says:

> . . . The belief that the German workman works for long hours is mistaken. He works for eight hours, in coal mines for seven hours; if a bill already submitted is passed he will work in all mines for seven hours, and last year in the Ruhr mines a general strike was threatened in favour of six hours. The assumption that German workmen work, and will work, for extremely low wages is based on confusion between nominal wages, gold wages, and real wages. German gold wages are very low. The German real wage, the only wage that comes into account in considering working class "content", and "apparent acquiescence," is not low. It is considerably higher than before the war. The cost of living index (Statistical Bureau's) is 880; the Wages Index (Frankfurter Zeitung's) is 1,132; in other words, real wages are 30 per cent higher than before the war. Further, German workmen show the same persistency as British or American workmen in pushing up or keeping up wages. Between January, 1920, and April, 1921, the cost of living in Germany rose 50 per cent, whereas nominal wages, always as the result of agitation, rose 120 per cent; so that the present movement is altogether for a higher real wage.

Mr. Arthur Kitson, writing in the New Age—and by the way Mr. Kitson is a British manufacturer who has been very successful in business, and a student of financial affairs for over forty years, and I submit that his opinion is worthy of at least consideration—says:

> The fact that the only countries where trade is really flourishing are those (like Germany) which have abandoned the gold system, whilst those where the revival of the system has been either attempted or achieved (such as Great Britain and America) are suffering the worst period of trade depression ever known, conveys no meaning to the sound-currency association.

How has Germany accomplished this wonderful economic feat? She has done it by printing paper money and by fixing prices. I do not know whether Germany's credit issues have been made scientifically. I do not know to what extent and upon what basis prices have been fixed in that country. No doubt the fear of Bolshevism was very largely at the bottom of this innovation, and therefore it is likely that Germany would fix prices to some extent at least upon the essentials of life, so as to forestall civil uprisings, but the main thing to be noted is the effect upon Germany's trade and industry which the issuing of paper money against her credit produces. The full significance of Germany's credit arrangement will be appreciated if we note its effect upon world financiers. It will be seen that if Germany continues to ignore the gold basis and to issue new money upon the basis of her national credit, there is likely to be a downfall of the present financial system of the world. If she continues at her present rate, she will be able to pay off the indemnity in the form of goods, and pay it off very speedily. If this were done under ordinary circumstances that is, if the people who are Germany's creditors were permitted to consume the goods received as payment we would not need to worry, because if Germany pays off the indemnity in the form of goods our workingmen could take a holiday while they consumed the goods which the German workmen sent over. But, somehow or other, it does not work out that way, but works out in this way: that our workmen must starve and go unemployed until we have finished consuming the goods Germany ships in here. We are unable to consume our own goods now. How then could we consume the goods sent by Germany, especially when our workers would be put out of employment thereby? So that it is necessary for the financiers, not only to prevent that trouble which might develop under those conditions, but, at the same time, to help themselves to make the profits which they, no doubt, have been figuring upon when they offer to lend Germany some money with which to pay us a part of our debt. The International Bankers, meeting in Paris some little time ago, have been trying to get Germany to borrow a billion dollars, in order that she might pay back to France, to Great Britain, and the United States some of the indemnity that she owes. Here is a despatch from Paris May 26, which will show clearly how unfavourably financiers look upon the credit system in vogue in Germany. This despatch reads:

> "The Committee of international bankers in session here this evening served notice on Germany that further consideration of a billion dollar loan to the German government is virtually out of the question until Germany accepts in full the conditions of the ultimatum of the Reparations Commission, which expires May 31st, and also gives adequate guarantees that the inflation of Germany's currency will be stopped immediately . . . . A solution of the situation was said to be bound up in the question whether Germany can end her wholesale printing of paper marks and make drastic improvement in her currency."

I might also say that the United States Federal Reserve Board announced recently, in reference to the special overtures made for the cancellation of the war debts, that no proposals of any sort should be entertained until far reaching guarantees of fiscal reforms have been secured.

It is an old truism that money talks. In that statement money is not only talking, but screaming, and you can hear its voice going round the world. The German financiers, it may be presumed, are just as anxious to float a loan in Europe for a billion dollars as the European financiers are, because, doubtless, the financiers in Germany are just as anxious to return to the old system of financing as the financiers of other countries, and, therefore, it is very probable that the stipulations of the International Bankers Association may be met, and Germany, in that case, will borrow money from us to pay us. If this goes through, it would prevent Germany from paying back speedily the indemnity, and thus prevent, perhaps, the development of the trouble in the countries concerned that have to receive indemnities from Germany, and, at the same time, it will place the hands of the financiers of the world upon the treasuries of the world a little more securely. But whatever may come of the proposals of the International Bankers, the effect upon the industrial life of Germany, arising out of her credit, is a lesson which the nations of the world cannot overlook. I do not advocate that we should do in Canada what Germany has done. I contend, however, that there is a way by which Canada can borrow from herself on the strength of her own credit, and a way to regulate the prices so as to prevent inflation, which if adopted, will be a benefit to Canada, a way in which we could increase the purchasing power of the nation, stimulate industry, do away with unemployment, and bring a prosperity that will only be limited by our utmost power to produce. I want to point out that, to adopt the credit system which I am going to propose somewhat in detail to this House, will not involve the adoption of any fundamentally new principle, in so far as credit itself is concerned, but it will involve a fundamental change in the controlling of credit. In substantiation of that statement I want to indicate to you how the banks in Canada issue credits or new money. The Banking Act will describe very minutely the process of starting a new bank. Five men can start a bank. They apply to the Treasury Board to do banking business. If their application is granted they will be required to sell not less than $500,000 worth of stock, $250,000 of which must be paid back temporarily to the Treasury Board. After this, the organization of the company will be completed, and we shall suppose that $250,000 of stock which remains after depositing that amount in the Treasury Board is expended in bank buildings, equipment and for legal services and so on. When the certificate to do business has been granted, the Treasury Board will be required to deposit in the circulation redemption fund $5,000 out of the money deposited with it, and hands back to the banking company, $245,000 in cash. This new bank I am describing, in reality, has only in cash $245,000, but it is privileged to issue new money to the extent of its paid-up capital. Now, its paid-up capital, in this instance, is $500,000, but $250,000 out of the $500,000 have been expended in bank buildings and other equipment; and so the bank issues new money on the strength of its assets to the full extent of its assets. Now why should not the Government of Canada. which delegates that privilege to the banks, utilize that privilege to itself of issuing new money on its own credit to the extent of its assets if necessary? That is the question I want to leave in your minds.

Mr. McMASTER: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. IRVINE: Yes.

Mr. McMASTER: Has the hon. member not forgotten to mention the double liability, which affects all banks? Has that not something to do with the security on which the bank is allowed to issue currency?

Mr. IRVINE: I do not think that the double liability has anything to do whatever with the principle of credit issue that I am discussing. I frankly confess that I have made no pretence to be a financier, and you have all seen that already, of course. I do make a pretence, however, to be able to see a principle and to say how it is working out in our national life. I maintain that this is a privilege which is granted to the banks, a statutory privilege which permits the monopoly of our social or national credit, and credit has become, in our complicated modern civilization, an absolute necessity of human life and prosperity. That is the contention I wish to make. Here is the problem in a nutshell. When a bank issues new money it really issues paper notes based on its assets. It lends this to a farmer for his note which is issued on his assets. But while the assets of the bank are of no more value than the assets of the farmer, the latter must pledge a great deal of his assets for the use of a very small portion of the notes representing the assets of the bank. But this is not all. Why should the farmer who has exchanged a superior note for the loan of an inferior one be compelled to pay a toll called interest on the transaction? This used to be a riddle. It is now as clear as day. The banker through a statutory privilege charges the farmer for the use of his own credit.

It is this private monopoly of social credit that accounts for the fact that we have to-day a huge national debt. That debt is spoken of in the budget; it will be spoken of, I fear, in many more successive budgets, and it is very doubtful if it will ever be paid if we go on financing as the budget proposes to do. The national debt of Canada as given by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) is now $2,427,269,798. This means that our annual interest is $138,223,000. The interest alone on this debt, says the Minister of Finance, calls for an enormous sum of money, greater, indeed, than the whole expenditure of Canada a few years ago. At that rate, I suggest that we shall have to do more than pass self-denying ordnances, for we shall almost have to have no expenditure at all before we can even pay the interest on our national debt. But this does not represent all our debts Every municipality has debts; every city, I venture to say, is burdened down more or less; every province has its debt, in addition to the national debt. Not only that, but many of us have our homes mortgaged, and it has been said by some—I do not know to what extent it is true—that some 75 or 80 per cent of the farmers have their farms mortgaged. Therefore, our national debt does not begin to represent the real indebtedness of Canada from the point of view of finance.

The first thing to do, in my humble opinion, is to stop making more debt, to stop making multi-millionaires by allowing them to lend our own credit to us in order that they may charge us very highly for the privilege. Let us use our own credit and issue our own money thereon. It would take all the gold in Canada, I believe, and, perhaps, something more than that to pay the interest on our national debt for one year. If you go outside the realm of Canada for a moment or two, in order to make a comparison, we shall see that what we owe is merely a drop in the ocean. The post-war debt of the nations of the world is placed at $354,181,523,786. Allowing an average rate of 4 per cent interest on this enormous sum, I figure that it would take $14,167,260,948 to pay the interest for one year. It will take $38,800,000, to pay the interest for one day, and some hon. members had better figure out what it will take to pay the interest for a minute and see if we can do it.

This, then, is the situation. The more we borrow on the present system, the more interest we shall have to pay, the more inflation will follow, the less will be the purchasing power of the people and the more difficult it will be for them to pay taxes and more impossible to pay the national debt. If we follow then this beaten path of financial monopoly which leads into the thickets of despair and national bankruptcy, the scenery does not look very well; but the scenery is brighter and more inspiring, indeed, if we can step out of the rut and march in another direction. Deflation follows the inflation of our currency, and that has happened to such an extent that our people are in the position to-day where, as I have proved to the House, they cannot buy back more than one-third of what they are producing. What then will the workmen think when they receive the message of the Minister of Finance asking them further to deny themselves? They have little more to deny themselves save existence; and if they deny themselves existence, that would not pay our annual expenditure, nor our war debt, nor our national debt. I contend, then, that we must find some way of placing our people in a position to purchase the necessaries of life. Put an end to the under-consumption by using our own credit, and industry will soon be humming. Make consumption possible and production will look after itself. It will not be necessary for the Government to send highly-paid lecturers to tell the farmers to raise wheat and potatoes, if they know there is an excellent market for those things. Let us make it possible for the people of Canada to consume, by giving them money with which to purchase on their own credit, and you will find that you do not have to trouble much about your foreign markets nor about your tariff; that your industries will be humming, and that you will be able thereby to pay whatever national debt there may be, to pay the deficits of this year and to continue to prevent deficits in successive years. I am arguing for a new system of national credit in connection with this budget, because that would not only reduce our financial burden in the way of giving our people something with which to pay taxes, but it would shut off the interest taps of the financiers, so that our national debt will not continue to grow. Those are the two reasons. It will shut off the interest taps of the financiers, stopping, at its source, the debt that is inundating us and, at the same time, by increasing the purchasing power of the people, they will be enabled to buy back what they are producing and thus give them an opportunity to pay the taxes which have been heaped upon them by the present budget. It is hopeless for us to try to catch up with our national debt, which is travelling, I may say, at a speed that is twice as fast as the utmost speed with which we can follow it.

Before giving an outline of a system which is known as the Douglas system, and which I do not contend is the only possible way, I want to state that there are in connection with this system certain fundamental principles which I claim to be undeniable, and these I want now to emphasize. The details of working them out, as given by the Douglas system exponents may or may not be practicable, but I will leave that to the Government to find out. I want to insist first of all that the definition which Major Douglas has given of credit is, so far as I know, unchallengeable and hinging upon that definition, there are two important principles which, I say, are also unchallengeable if the definition be correct. As I say, hon. members may possibly not be able, from the incomplete outline that I am going to give the House, to understand the system, or, understanding it, they may not agree with it. But I submit that they will not be able to puncture the definition of credit, nor the principles which follow as natural corrollaries. The definition of the Douglas system of credit is:

> The correct estimate of ability to produce and deliver goods as, and when and where desired.

If that definition is established, then credit is acknowledged to be a community-created thing. If credit is a community-created thing, then it is only reasonable that it should be community-controlled, especially when we consider how essential it is to national prosperity. I am not aware that this definition has ever been challenged. Will any hon. member of this House challenge it? If it is true, I repeat, that our credit is our ability to produce and deliver goods, that implies, not only plant, equipment, management, and labour power, but the consumer.

Goods cannot be delivered unless there are consumers, and therefore credit is really a social or collective asset. Granting that it is a social asset, and one which by its power and its proper use may bring prosperity, or by its misuse may bring depression or poverty, it is in the highest national interest to see that this powerful instrument of credit is taken from the hands of financial kings and placed in the control of the nation. In further support of the argument that credit is a social asset, I will quote briefly from the bulletin of the National City Bank of New York. The writer says:

> First of all, the condition essential to credit is the maintenance of an orderly state of society, which includes a stable government having the support and willing obedience of the people—

I think he might have changed that statement and said a government which willingly obeys the people. That would be better. However, he goes on:

> —recognition of property rights, general willingness on the part of the people to work and maintain an effective state of industry. These are the foundations of credit everywhere; and the more clearly it appears that they are understood, and the benefits thereof recognized by all classes, the better the credit of a people will be.

That is a statement from the mouthpiece of a bank. If there are those who have some doubts about the definition as given by Major Douglas, they surely cannot have much doubt after such a statement from a banker himself. That must certainly be reassuring. Now, those who to-day control credit control also the issuing or holding of money. In that respect I desire to quote the late Hon. H. R. Emmerson, at one time an eminent minister of the Crown in our own Parliament. In speaking on banks and banking on January 30, 1913, as reported in Hansard at pages 2424 and 2434, and while referring to interlocking directorates, the Hon. Mr. Emmerson said:

> There is lurking in every section and paragraph of this bill—

By the way, I think it was the present Banking Act.

> —an atmosphere of that menace.

Namely, interlocking directorates.

> While those influences in the United States are limited to, say, ten men as controlling the great financial interests of that country, we in Canada have the condition of practically twenty-three men controlling the great corporate interest, the financial institutions, the insurance companies and the trust and loan companies of the country. . .
> We grant great concessions to these banks in the matter of the issuance of their promises to pay. Their Bills and notes go broadcast throughout the country. . . . . How much does the government get from these institutions as compensation for the right and privilege to issue their I.O.U's? After all they are but the I.O.U's of these banks and it is a privilege which a very greatful and kindly disposed people through their Parliament have granted to these institutions.

You will see from that quotation, from one of our great statesmen now passed away that financiers control credit. The aim of banking is to produce money, while the aim of the industries which money stimulates should be to produce goods. As a result of the present credit system the purchasing power in the hands of the people is chronically insufficient to purchase the products of industry. This unfortunate condition has come about because the present methods of financing permit the charging of capital production to the consumer in the form of high prices. In this way the people of the community may, for example, pay for a factory many times over, and yet never own one cent's worth of that factory. Now, the shortage in purchasing power brought about by the credit system leads directly to a struggle for foreign markets, and if that struggle is successful it usually leads to war, while if it is unsuccessful it leads to that kind of poverty and unemployment with which we are so familiar in Canada. The remedy for these conditions is to be found in the increasing of purchasing power; but the mere creation of new money is not itself a sufficient solution. That would lead us to what is commonly called the "vicious spiral", which was in evidence during the war. Although I will not suggest this to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding), it might be a splendid thing for Canada to revive the inflation that prevailed during the war until we have paid our war debts. If we did that it would very materially reduce our actual war debt; for if I mistake not, we sold our Victory bonds at a time when our dollar was worth something like 33 cents. We had about $100,000,000 in gold reserve, and had in circulation over $300,000,000 in paper money. That meant that the purchasing power of the dollar was reduced one-third at the time the victory bonds were sold. If we re-established the gold standard and then paid the national debt, we would multiply the national debt by three. I say therefore that it would be a good thing if we would bring into force again that inflation that obtained during the war until we shall have paid off our national debt. But money alone will not be a solution. If we merely issue money there must be corresponding regulation of prices; otherwise we shall have a repetition of the vicious spiral, which means high wages after the loan, higher costs, higher prices, then more borrowing, more inflation, higher wages, higher costs, higher prices, infinitely repeated.

I want now to present very briefly a practical outline of the proposed system of Major Douglas so that hon. members may have an opportunity of studying the matter if they so desire. I am going to place on Hansard a few tables, which if hon. gentlemen care to follow them at their leisure, they will discover the steps in a practical way which Major Douglas proposes in putting into effect his credit system. If it is true that the mere issuing of money leads to inflation and to the vicious spiral, we must begin by seeking the establishment of a just price. A just price, according to his proposal, will bear the same relationship to the cost of the goods, as the total national consumption bears to the total national production. Now, there are four factors involved in finding the just price of a commodity. We first have to deal with the cost of production; next, the just price, or selling price to the consumer; next, the total national production; and, fourthly, the total national consumption. The selling price of the goods to be consumed in Canada, must be arrived at by finding the ratio between production and consumption; and this formula will give you the means of ascertaining that just price. If you want to find the cost of a ton of coal, you must multiply the cost price of that ton of coal by the value of the total consumption and divide it by the money value of the total production. The total national consumption will therefore be seen to include capital depreciation and exports, and the total national production will include capital appreciation on imports. My next table deals with credit issue and price regulation. This is issued through the national clearing house, which will function in a similar capacity to that of the clearing house of our banks to-day. The Douglas system does not presuppose the demolition of any institution now in existence. Let me follow the production of boots beginning with the tanners and ending with the consumers, applying the Douglas credit system in each transaction involved.

Credit Issues & Price Regulation

Example: Boots

Tanners' raw hides (Datum value)	$ 500	$3,000 invoice to clearing house.
Semi manufactures (chemicals, powers etc.)	2,500
Wages and salaries	2,500	$2,750 cost plus profit at factory.
Profit (10% on out of pocket cost)	250
	$5,750

Clearing house issues cheque in favour of tanners for $3,000 by means of which tanners deal with their accounts for supplies. Clearing house writes up its capital account by this sum. Tanners owe $3,000 to clearing house.

Boot manufacturers

Leather (from tanners)	$5,750	$8,250 invoice to clearing house.
Supplies (pegs, thread power etc.)	2,500
Wages and salaries	2,500	$2,750 cost plus profit at factory.
Profit (10% on cost of labour)	250
	$11,000

Clearing house issues cheque in favour of boot manufacturers for $8.250. Boot manufacturers pay for supplies, including $5,750 to the tanners, who in turn retain $2,750 and pay back $3,000 to the clearing house. The tanners disposed of, boot manufacturers owe $8,250 to the clearing house.

Retailers

Boots (from manufacturers)	$11,000
Profits (including expenses, etc.)	1,500
Cost	$12,500	1,250 prs.	$10

Clearing house issues cheque in favour of retailers for $12,500. Retailers pay $11,000 to manufacturers, who pay off their debt of $8,250 to clearing house, and retain remainder.

Just price to consumer—

Cost	Price	Consumption	Production
$10	$5	$3,000 million	$6,000 million

The retail credit invoice is duplicate of bill paid by purchaser of boots.

The retailers turn in $12,500 on retailers invoices to clearing house, and are credited with 50% of that sum against original cheque sent them. They recover remaining 50% from actual purchasers of boots and re-imburse clearing house. The manufacturers account balanced at clearing house, who write down their own credit by that amount. The credit capital of the community is thus written up 50% of $12,500.

In this connection I would point out to my hon. friends who are so fond of talking about the tariff that if they introduced this credit system the iniquitous tariff would automatically die, because goods produced in Canada would be sold at a price which no outsider could possibly compete with. Goods would be sold in that ratio between our power to produce and our power to consume, and at the present moment it would mean that our goods would be sold at half the present price. Would it not be a happy day for Canada and for this House if the tariff question were buried so deep down, Mr. Speaker, that a thousand excavators would never find a sign of it again?

I repeat that I am not basing my full faith on any details of the Douglas scheme; I am going to hint at other schemes which have been proposed by such prominent men as Mr. Henry Ford and Mr. T. A. Edison. Certain propositions that they are making to-day are worthy of the consideration of thinking people. But apart from their theories certain practical attempts have been made to inaugurate a credit system such as they advocate. These attempts have been made in regard to specific industries and also in regard to cities, and I want to give briefly an account of two of such efforts.

The first instance to which I shall refer occurred in the island of Guernsey in the days of Governor de L'Isle Brock. When I mention that name it will no doubt remind hon. members of the famous general, Sir Isaac Brock, who fell at Queenston Heights fighting for this great dominion. It may be interesting to know that he came from the Channel islands, and I believe he was related to the governor to whom I now refer. There was in the parish of St. Peter's in the island of Guernsey great need for a public market. A number of enterprising citizens organized themselves into a committee and proceeded to raise the necessary money in the usual way, which was to go to the governor and secure his assent to the issue of interest bearing bonds to be sold in Paris or London. When the committee presented their case to the governor he asked them the following pointed questions:

Have we the necessary number of mechanics to build the market house?

Have we the material, the rocks, bricks, lumber, lime and sand, tools and teams as well as the food supply necessary during the operation?

To these very pertinent questions the answer came from the committee that they had. Then the governor spoke to them as follows:

Here you tell me that we have within ourselves everything needed to build a market house, yet you desire me to bond you to the bankers in Paris or London for a material which is of no manner of use in the constructions of the house. Strange anomaly! Is it your intention to build a market house for bankers? If so, then you are correct in your endeavour to get paid by those bankers, but in such case, you should not place yourself under bondage to those bankers besides. If those bankers pay you for the house and hold you in bondage also, demanding an annual tribute, they will soon have both the house and the money they paid you. It will be no relief to say that we make the renters of the market stall pay that tribute to the bankers. The renters will be part of us, and will demand of their customers that tribute in higher prices for goods. So we, jointly, will have to pay tribute in perpetuity for an article which, as I said, is not of any use to us. Allow me, gentlemen, to propose a better plan, for building our market house, than by way of money and bondage. Having, as you avow, men and materials among us, all that is necessary to do in the case is to keep account of each man's contribution in work or materials, that, in the future, we may balance equitably the expenses of the building. This can best be done by means of a money which lays no claims to interest nor discounts. Instead of bonds, I will issue $22,000 market house scrips of different denominations (as money) and with these pay the men and purchase the materials, then make these scripts receivable, at par with the legal tender money of the realm, for the rent of the market house stalls.

The committee took the advice of the governor. The market was built. The rent of the stalls was used to recall the script, and in ten years all had been recalled, and the building stood as a monument to co-operative financing.

A special anniversary was held by the community to celebrate their co-operative success. The governor in a speech to the people, pronounced the following impressive tribute:

Well done, good and faithful servants. While living you have performed your work with equity, and now departing you leave no interest-extorting bonds, nor mortgaged home behind, but instead, you open the portals to a brighter financial era. May the toilers learn wisdom from this example.

Fellow citizens: For the first time in the history of this Island you have learned to make your own money, you have built your own market house without borrowing one cent, without losing one cent in discount, and without paying one cent in interest. Now, when every one who contributed work or materials has been fully paid, as attested by the return of the scripts, the house is yet your property. Henceforth, the rent of the same will be appropriated to the expenses of the government, and hence lessen your taxes.

Turning then to the market house and pointing to the flag floating at its cupola, he exclaimed in loud tones:

Behold a monument to your financial wisdom, and as good as if built with borrowed gold. May future generations profit by your example.

The second example which I wish to mention very briefly is that of the St. Louis municipal currency, which was issued shortly after the civil war and kept in circulation up to 1873, when it was forced into retirement at the command of the American Bankers' Association. The history of this venture is given at some length in a pamphlet on Canadian money problems from the pen of W. J. Paynter. I will briefly give to you the facts. The city authorities, being unable to borrow money for waterworks and other city utilities, issued $2,000,000 worth of new money, which was equal in value within the city itself to the lawful tender. This issue of money on the city's credit worked splendidly. The treasurer of the city of St. Louis at that time, writing on the value of this practical use of credit, said:

"To get anywhere near as much service from borrowed credit would have required continuous borrowing to the total of $200,000,000 or more. This of course would have cost the city more than $400,000,000, burdening the city with a crushing debt, instead of the beneficient operation of the cash, The city currency was the most valuable of assets. Had it not been for the adverse legislation of 1873, that St. Louis currency would have continued its beneficence for an indefinite time."

It is encouraging to note how successful were these efforts to use social credit in a collective way.

There are only two possible destinies in front of us in our present course, whether in Canada or in any other country. If the attempts to return to the gold basis and the usual methods of finance fail, as they likely will, the financial system of the world will collapse, and, having nothing to take its place, there will be unthinkable chaos and untold suffering. If, on the other hand, the international bankers are successful in their efforts to maintain control of credit, civilization will pass into an economic slavery unsurpassed in the history of man. In any event, the outlook is serious enough to warrant any government in taking definite action. I regret that my resolution asking for a parliamentary committee to investigate the banking system did not come to a vote, but I would urge that the Government proceed to appoint that committee as soon as possible, for it is surely essential that we have the very best information upon this question. The Alberta government has already taken steps, in view of the fact that the Banking Act will come up for consideration at the next session, to get all the information possible on the credit systems of the world and on the credit system of Canada in particular. So it would be to the benefit of this House and to Canada if the Government would adopt my humble suggestion that such a committee be appointed to obtain the information that we so much need.

Our present industrial system grows out of the ground of human necessity, like a large tree. The branches of the tree are "Capital, management, transportation, mining, farming," etc. Credit is the sap which rises through the trunk of finance and brings life to every branch.

11 p.m. At the moment the sap is not moving freely on its mission of life, and as a result the leaves are withering and branches are slowly dying. To conclude, then, this point on the financial system, I want to say that if Canada is to attain industrial stability; if her factories are to be kept going if farming is to achieve economic success; if unemployment is to be done away with; if the necessary revenue is to be raised to meet expenditure, and if our national debt is to be paid, we must find out how to use out national credit. "Produce, produce, produce," is the insistent cry of the monopolist and the exploiter; consume, consume, consume, is the only answer to that cry. This is not a time for more self-denial; the more of that we do, the less business there will be and the more stagnant will our industries become. How ridiculous it is for us to go on taxing further the sales made in this country. By increasing the sales tax you decrease the purchasing power of the people so much more; you restrict business; you bring stagnation to industry and general chaos to our industrial life. We are short of money, because the bankers have control of the money. After all, money is but the shadow of the reality, which is the actual wealth of Canada. The bankers control the money, and it is little indeed we have of it at this time.

But we have abundance of wealth, and I urge that we should issue our own money to ourselves as we now authorize the bankers to issue for themselves. If we do this our problem will be very largely solved.

Now, I want to take a few moments more, although the hour is late. I do not suppose that you wish me to move the adjournment of the debate and resume tomorrow afternoon at three o'clock, so I will crave your indulgence, Mr. Speaker, for a few moments more while I deal with the budget itself more specifically.

The taxation principle employed in or anticipated by the budget is, of course, the same old taxation system that we have been trying for so long to get away from. It is a taxing of the consumer, and the consumer, as I have said, is unable to buy sufficient for his life, let alone to pay more in taxation, which this budget demands that he must do. I am not going to spend much time in a discussion of the budget proposals, because everybody knows what they are. The principle embodied in the proposals is virtually the same as that which we had in the last budget—and very few people, I may add, expected anything different. As I pointed out in my speech in the debate on the address, the influence of the financiers of Montreal and of Toronto is back of the budget. Here is one instance where there is no animosity between Toronto and Montreal; on a budget of taxation they can meet on common ground. That is pretty well understood I believe, throughout Canada. I will not enter into a detailed criticism of the budget, because such has been done so often and at length by other hon. members on this side of the House.

I wish to refer briefly to the amendment. I fail to see how the Opposition could do otherwise than they have done. The right hon. leader of the Opposition (Mr. Meighen) stated very clearly in the House the other day, in asking a question, that the policy of the Opposition already is in effect in the budget which has been presented to the House. The Opposition, therefore, are perfectly satisfied with the budget. It is their system of taxation that is being put into effect. They could not be expected, therefore, to oppose the budget itself, but we might expect the Tory party of this country to oppose the broken pledge which undoubtedly is involved in the budget that has been presented. I say we might expect the right hon. leader of the Opposition to do that, because whatever other criticism we might make of the right hon. gentleman, no one will say for a moment but that he stood four-square on a high tariff policy in the last election. Surely all will grant him that credit, and having done that, it is only human that he should chuckle over the present budget. It is only human also that he should set a political trap into which the Progressives have fallen. That is also a very reasonable thing to expect from such an astute politician as the right hon. leader of the Opposition. So I have no criticism to make of the Opposition's attitude. If there be virtue in consistency, that virtue belongs to Toryism, and God bless them with it, but as you know, Mr. Speaker, I do not look upon consistency as being always virtue. Sometimes it might be really super-virtuous to be inconsistent, but if there is virtue in consistency, let the Tory party have it by all means.

Now I come to the consideration of the amendment to the amendment. Before I make any declarations whatsoever upon it, I want first of all to congratulate the hon. leader of the Progressives (Mr. Crerar) in the splendid stand which he has taken with regard to the constitutionality of the amendment to the amendment. I wish to associate myself entirely with the contention in that regard. I think all will see the point that is involved. Every one knows that the present practice of this Parliament is archaic, that it was devised at a time when we had a two-cylinder machine. Now we have a four-cylinder machine, and corresponding changes must be made and the sooner that idea permeates the better. So I am in line with the leader of the Progressive party in his plea that the hon. members representing the Progressive group in this House have the right to present their viewpoint. They do not agree, evidently, with the budget; they do not agree with the amendment which has been moved by the Opposition. Therefore, if no further amendments are permitted, all they could reasonably be expected to do would be to go out when the vote is taken, or else vote against both the amendment and the budget. So it is necessary that the rules be amended in order that these new political alignments shall have an opportunity to give expression to that crystallized political thought which comes from organizations which sent them here. In that I am at one with the Progressives. Though I am going to make some criticism of the amendment to the amendment itself, words fail me in expressing my admiration and appreciation of the sterling character and sincerity of the hon. leader of the Progressives. I would ask hon. gentlemen on this end of this side of the House, who will be more interested in my criticism perhaps than those who sit opposite, to grant my sincerity in this matter. If I criticise the Progressives it is not that I have lost faith in them. I still have the confidence I have had for many years that in the United Farmers movement we have the greatest and the most hopeful influence in the political life of Canada to-day. Their leader, I repeat, is a man of unimpeachable character, so anything I say should not be taken in a personal sense. With this statement, I feel free to say what I have to say on the amendment to the amendment.

While we have had the statement of the Liberals, and the chuckling acquiescence of the Tories in the budget which has been presented, and their little consistent resolution to censure the Government, what have we got from the Progressives? That is a question that I want the hon. members of the Progressive group to consider, as well as all other hon. gentlemen in this House. I want the people of Canada to consider it also, for I do not know of any other group that is more responsive to the people who sent them here than this particular group that I have the pleasure of sitting with. So I want the people of Canada to investigate their proposal, and if it is not a right one, to say so, and then I am sure that the hon. members of the Progressive group will respond the next time. If as I think they have diverged from the path of democracy that they have championed so vociferously, I hope it is only a momentary aberration, and that we shall find them suddenly swinging back to their true path in their right mind.

But what is to become of the fiscal policy of the organized farmers of Canada? I am asking this question because in the first place I have been a member of that organization longer than seventy-five per cent of hon. members here representing that organization. I have done more, I say without hesitation, to organize that movement than perhaps any other hon. gentleman on this side of the House. Moreover, I have given pledges to farmers in my own constituency, and have been sounded out upon this very question of their fiscal policy, and upon that ground I take the right even to criticise this great industrial group, or party, if you choose, and to voice my opinion upon their policy. The farmers' platform was drawn up by the farmers themselves—and that is the point I want to emphasize. It is not like the Liberal platform, drawn up by a few Liberals, by themselves. The farmers' platform was drawn up by hundreds of thousands of organized farmers in Canada, as representing their opinions of how the country should be financed, and how our national business in general should be conducted. Therefore, the Progressives are in a unique position in this regard. The Liberals may violate their platform, because they made it themselves, but the Progressives cannot violate their platform, because they did not make it. It was made by the people they are here to serve, and that is the only thing we have to justify us in being here. If we do not make that distinction now and make it so clearly that there can be no misunderstanding about it, then I say I would just as soon cross the floor providing they would have me, which I doubt. If we cannot succeed in doing that, what is the use of calling ourselves anything different from the other old parties? If the fiscal policy of the organized farmers put out by the Canadian Council of Agriculture, and endorsed by the annual conventions of the organized farmers in every province where there is an organization, was good enough to elect the representatives of the farmers to Parliament, it is good enough to be moved by the hon. leader of that group in this budget debate. And if it has not been moved, I ask again, what has become of it? I am very deeply disappointed.

But before I deal with the speech of the hon. leader of the Progressives and his resolution in detail, I would like to refer to the keynote of his song, if you wish, as appearing in his pastoral letter—I am calling it that—to the people of Canada at the last election. He said "Let us get away from the bogs and mires of intrigue and corruption into the upland where the air is pure and sweet." Now, that is a very pretty thing, and I fancy we all want to join in the chorus of that song. But where are these uplands? I want to get my foot on the uplands. I fail to find these uplands in the amendment which has been proposed by the leader of the Progressives. I want to summarize his proposals, or his speech rather. I think that I am not hypercritical when I say that it was more or less platitudinous in the cry for economy. My reply to him is what I have already given. Look at the facts. Why plead for a greater economy when we are producing twice as much as we are consuming, and when greater economy initiated by this Parliament and passed down through the various institutions of this country will paralyze the trade in Canada and increase our unemployment? I reply to the leader of the Progressives in the same way that I replied to the budget in that regard.

Then, I think he made an inadequate attack on the sales tax. That is a striking injustice to the consumer. That tax was made on the lowlands, where the air is not pure and sweet, and those who are on the uplands, where the air is pure and sweet, should have something more to say about that tax than the leader of the Progressives has said. Then he made an amazing condemnation of the stamp tax because it would fall very heavily on large corporations. I was surprised, Mr. Speaker, to hear that. As a matter of fact, in my opinion the stamp tax will fall much harder upon the poor man who may have to issue ten cheques to pay $50 out of the bank. In doing so, he spends 20 cents to draw out $50, but a large corporation can save every cent possible by writing large cheques, but, apart from that, I was rather disappointed that the hon. member for Marquette should have gone out of his way to criticise this tax because it struck the big corporations.

Then, of course, he attacked militantly the Conservative party. That party seems to be a sort of red rag to the Progressives. Why should we worry about the Tories—poor Tories? Do not worry about them, do not get afraid of them at all, and do not bother criticising them. I am not sure that they are absolutely worthy of it, in point of politicial strength and influence. Do not trouble about these attacks on the Tories. Let us cut to the line and put out our own positive constructive programme. Never mind the Tories—they are playing their own game. The attack of the leader of the Progressives on the Tories was more or less a Liberal defence. I submit the Liberals can defend themselves, but there was absolutely no constructive proposal put forth by the leader of the Progressives. Why was the Farmers' platform not moved as a constructive proposal. Possibly the reply would be that they could not put the Farmers' platform in the amendment to the amendment, else it would not have been an amendment to the amendment. Well, there may seem to be some reason in that, but the constitutionality of the amendment to the amendment already having been challenged, it might as well have been challenged for putting the principle in it as for putting nothing in it, might it not? By moving the new fiscal policy hon. gentlemen would have had the opportunity of stating clearly to the House and to Canada what were the principles upon which he and his party were elected. I am going to put on Hansard the fiscal policy of the Progressive party. Here it is:

Canadian Council of Agriculture's Tariff Proposals

Our tariff laws should be amended as follows:

(a) By an immediate and substantial all-round reduction of the customs tariff.

(b) By reducing the customs duty on goods imported from Great Britain to one-half the rates charged under the general tariff, and that further gradual, uniform reductions be made in the remaining tariff on British imports that will ensure complete free trade between Great Britain and Canada in five years.

(c) By endeavouring to secure unrestricted reciprocal trade in natural products with the United States along the lines of the reciprocity agreement of 1911.

(d) By placing all foodstuffs on the free list.

(e) That agricultural implements, farm and household machinery, vehicles, fertilizers, coal, lumber, cement, gasoline, illuminating fuel and lubricating oils be placed on the free list, and that all raw materials and machinery used in their manufacture also be placed on the free list.

(f) That all tariff concessions granted to other countries be immediately extended to Great Britain.

(g) That all corporations engaged in the manufacture of products protected by the customs tariff be obliged to publish annually comprehensive and accurate statements of their earnings.

(h) That every claim for tariff protection by any industry should be heard publicly before a special committee of parliament.

Have we heard that discussed in this House? Have those industries which receive protection in the present budget proved to Parliament that they ought to get these benefits? I think not.

Canadian Council of Agriculture's Fiscal Plank

In order to provide the necessary additional revenue for carrying on the government of the country and for the bearing of the cost of the war, direct taxation be imposed in the following manner:

(a) By a direct tax on unimproved land values, including all natural resources.

(b) By a graduated personal income tax.

(c) By a graduated inheritance tax on large estates.

(d) By a graduated income tax on the profits of corporations.

(e) That in levying and collecting the business profits tax, the Dominion government should insist that it be absolutely upon the basis of the actual cash invested in the business, and that no considerations be allowed for what is popularly known as watered stock.

(f) That no more natural resources be alienated from the crown, but brought into use only under short-term leases, in which the interests of the public shall be properly safe-guarded, such leases to be granted only by public auction.

Now, Mr. Speaker, there is the programme of my Progressive associates. Though I am not a Progressive, I have been closely associating with them, being a representative of an economic group, similar in aim and with a corresponding educational programme, I am taking the liberty to make this criticism. Progressives will agree with me that their programme is one that they need not be ashamed of, and it should have been moved, I repeat, by the leader of the Progressive party or by some other member of his party, so that their opinion and the opinion of the farmers who have spent thousands of their own money to build up an organization to send representatives here might be heard.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I simply want to intimate that, in the Farmers' programme, there are two principles that ought to be emphasized more emphatically, one being the tax on unimproved land values; the other an inheritance tax. I am glad the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Good) gave us a most excellent presentation of single tax, and therefore, I merely wish to endorse the argument and the presentation of the philosophy as presented by the hon. member for Brant. I believe we should place a tax upon land, not only because the farmers of Canada have declared for that, but because it would be a tax which would not fall upon labour and would not even fall upon capital, but a tax that would fall upon the land exploiter and would result in forcing land into use. We were hearing something today from the hon. member for North Winnipeg (Mr. McMurray) about the necessity of bringing in more immigrants. Why, he says, that is how to pay our national debt. I submit it is not a very good advertisement for Canada that it should be said upon the floor of this House that our national debt is so great that we cannot pay it, so we shall have to get some people from Europe to come to Canada and help to pay our debts. But that is on the side. If we want to get immigrants into this country, it would be very good for us if we could get more free land; and if under the land tax, as some critics say, we would not get the money, we shall get the land back. We would thus have an opportunity of settling the immigrants whom the Government proposes to bring from other countries. At the estimate of $8,000,000,000 of land values in Canada, I would put a tax of 2 per cent on the land and thus bring in $160,000,000, more than the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) will collect off his candy tax in many years.

The next thing that I want to emphasize,—and then I am through—is the tax upon inherited wealth. Those are two principles in the Farmers' platform that require to be emphasized. We ought to have emphasized others, I admit, such as the more steeply graduated income tax. The privilege of the inheritance of wealth is based upon the same old fallacy upon which rested the divine right of kings. The divine right, if you will, of the inheritance of wealth, is no more necessarily fixed than the divine right of kings, and I believe the best way to abolish the inheritance of wealth is by taxation. I am in favour of an inheritance tax, in the first place, because we need more revenue, and in the second place, because I want to abolish the inheritance itself. The inheritance takes away the right of the producer to have what he produces. Inheritance of wealth means inheritance of poverty, and the divine right of kings and the divine right of inheritance are based, as I say, on the same fallacy. If we could tax the inheritance, it would ultimately pass out of existence, and we would thereby arrest a tendency to the concentration of wealth as well as put a great amount of money into our treasury. Instead of taxing the candies of little children, instead of taxing the food supply that is none too great to the present consumer, because he cannot purchase it, instead of taxing the food of living children, let us put a tax on dead millionaires, and I believe posterity will thank us, and we shall incidentally get some revenue.

Mr. HARRY LEADER (Portage la Prairie): Mr. Speaker, as I am a new member of this House, with very little experience in the art of public speaking, it may be rather an imposition to ask hon. members to stay here and listen to the few remarks that I shall have to offer. It seems, however, incumbent upon a member of Parliament—and the people at home expect it—to take part in the debates in this House and make at least one speech during the session. I hope to convey to the House the sentiments that I hold and to interpret the viewpont of my constituents who have honoured me with their confidence.

I am sorry that circumstances, over which I had no control, made it impossible for me to be present when the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) delivered his budget speech. The subject matter of that speech is a distinct disappointment to me, and I am sure it is a disappointment to the great majority of my constituents. While it is true that on many articles a reduction in the customs tariff has been effected that would give material benefit to the general public of Canada, it is also true that the increase in the sales tax has taken away the benefits that would accrue by the reduction in the customs duties. The effect will be that the Government have only shifted the load from one shoulder to the other, and the weary taxpayer of this country goes on with his burden. It seems to me that the practice of governments of Canada, both provincial and federal, is to apply their energies not to the reduction of debt mostly contracted during the war, but rather to find new sources of revenue to take care of ever increasing expenditure. If I am not a politician, I am at least a practical business farmer, and I know that inevitable ruin would be the result of my operations if I did not live within my means and curtail my unprofitable expenditures.

I wish to state my approval of the action of the Minister of Finance in approaching the government of the United States with a view to securing better trade relations with this great natural customer of ours. The door is shut for the time being, it is true; but can we not hope that, in the near future, better trade relations will be established between the two countries? Mr. Speaker, I wish to confess to a political sin—and this is another indication that I am not a politician. I think it was the hon. member for Fort William and Rainy River (Mr. Manion) who, upon being asked how he voted on reciprocity, said that he voted for reciprocity, and that he had no apology to make. I want to confess that I voted against reciprocity, and I wish to apologise to the people of Canada for doing so. At the same time, I wish to state emphatically that I thought I was polling an intelligent vote according to the dictates of my conscience. In those days I considered that I was a real politician, and the welfare of the Conservative party and the election of a Conservative member for Portage la Prairie meant more to me then than favourable trade relations. I will confess from my seat in this House that I made a blunder.

The rejection of reciprocity has been little short of a disaster to the country, especially to the agriculturists of Canada and I know this is the viewpoint of the great majority of my constituents. Let me take the livestock industry in which I am interested. The farmers of Canada raise hundreds of thousands of cattle that cannot be taken care of by the home market, excellent as that market is. We are told that the home market is the best market there is, and I believe it is. The stock raisers in the East have a home market which they can take care of. We have practically no home market in the West; 85 per cent of our home market is in the East, but the distance is so great that transportation charges eat up the profits, and we must look for wider outlets. Owing to the embargo maintained in the Old Country against feeder and store cattle, we must look to the United States for an outlet; and notwithstanding the duty of 30 per cent imposed by the Fordney tariff, we are selling thousands of Canadian cattle in the United States market, under this very grievous handicap. If we had reciprocity, that would be a great stimulus to the livestock industry of this country. To-day the hon. member for North Winnipeg (Mr. McMurray) stated that he had raised cattle, driven them eighty miles and sold them for 2½ cents per pound. The hon. gentleman, I notice, is not engaged in that occupation now; he has taken up the occupation of a lawyer. I do not blame him, because we shall all have to do so if present conditions continue.

Some hon. members say that there is very little difference between the two old political parties, and I know that that belief is prevalent throughout the country. The hon. member for South Oxford (Mr. Sutherland) referring to the Progressive party wondered where it got its origin. Well, let me tell him that the Progressive party originated from the conviction that there was no appreciable difference between the two old parties; the embodiment of that conviction is the membership of 65 in the Progressive group in this House. We had no faith in the Liberals, because their attitude in office has always been different from their professons out of office. I may be wrong, but I am informed that a great leader of the Liberal party once made the statement that if the Liberals were given power they would cut the head off protection and trample on its body. The Liberal platform declared for free trade on agricultural implements and foodstuffs, and for an increase in the British preference. The Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) is not in his place, but I heard him make an eloquent speech in Winnipeg during the campaign, in which he declared that the Progressive platform was so much like the Liberal platform that there was no need for a third party, and he could not see why we did not join the Liberals. I am not sure of the statement, but I think I am right in saying that during the Laurier regime the average duty on agricultural implements was 17½ per cent. Now, we can have a certain amount of respect for the Conservative party. They are more sincere, in that they have been consistent advocates of protection; and notwithstanding their advocacy of protection they succeeded in reducing the tariff that obtained in the Laurier regime to 14 per cent on agricultural implements.

The amendment proposed by the ex-Minister of Finance (Sir Henry Drayton) censures the Government for a breach of pre-election promises. Well, the Conservative party are in the same category in this respect, for they have broken election promises too. I remember that in Portage la Prairie, when Sir Robert Borden was touring the country previous to the 1911 elections, I had the privilege and the honour of sitting on the same platform with him, because I was a real Conservative in those days. He said that there should be wider markets and an outlet to the ocean, and that the Hudson Bay Railway should be built. We have not got that railway yet, so that that promise has not been fulfilled. Are the Opposition offering anything in alternative now? What have they to offer the people of Canada in the way of decreasing taxation? I recall that while the Estimates were going through and a reduction was moved in the naval and military estimates, the attitude of hon. gentlemen in that group was that no reductions should be made; and we know from experience that if they were in power there would be no economies, in these items at least. I think I may safely say that the Progressive party would follow their lead if they suggested any genuine measure of relief from taxation; but they do nothing of the kind.

It is only within recent years that a new light has arisen in the political firmament. I refer to the right hon. the leader of the Opposition (Mr. Meighen). Now, I desire to state to this House that as a citizen of Portage la Prairie and an elector of that constituency, I used to take great pride in our former member; we in that constituency have great admiration for him. We had the greatest hopes when he came to Ottawa that he would do something; we expected something great from him, and we never got it. I do not know why the change occurred. In 1911, in an eloquent speech he declared that protection fostered became a burden. He declared that Laurier and his followers were bowing the knee to the big interests and were being maintained behind ramparts of gold—slaves to those who placed them in power. He declared for greater reductions in the customs duties on farm implements, and proved by indisputable argument that the manufacturers of farm implements do not need any further protection. These remarks are to be found in Hansard of the session of 1910-11, at page 1912. Had the hon. member adhered to the sentiments he expressed on that occasion, I should not be here in his stead representing Portage la Prairie; I should be at home in a more congenial occupation. I also heard the leader of the Opposition declare in a speech there that it is impossible to carry on the business of the country without a protective tariff. He claims that Sir Wilfrid Laurier, who had been in his time somewhat of a free trader, and the present Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) had been a low tariff man, but had both come to the conclusion that the business of the country must be carried on under the national policy. I do not know what it is in Ottawa that drives men to that conclusion; it must be something in the atmosphere which perhaps I have not discovered.

I should like to make a comparison between the governments of this country and of the United States. We speak of retrenchment, and believe that the solution of our difficulties will be found in economy. In consulting the World Almanac and Encyclopedia I find that in the United States the cabinet comprises ten ministers who receive an annual salary of $12,000 each, or a total of $120,000. At the head of our cabinet is the Prime Minister who gets a salary of $15,000, and he has fifteen ministers drawing a salary of $10,000 each. I believe there are two fewer now than in the previous government, and for that we must give them credit. These salaries come to a total of $165,000, and in addition to that the ministers draw the sessional indemnity of $4,000 each, bringing the total to about $230,000. In other words, it costs the Canadian government, in a country with only one-twelfth of the population of the United States, approximately twice as much as it costs the United States to maintain their cabinet. Some people say that we are governed to death. I notice in this book, too, that our total expenditures for this year will be less than half a billion dollars, whereas the United States will take care of seven times that amount with six cabinet ministers fewer, and only half as much paid them in salaries. I would suggest that we also economize in the matter of salaries to judges. In our estimates approximately $2,000,000 is paid in salaries and travelling expenses to judges. I would suggest that 12½ per cent be deducted, which would save us $250,000.

I would suggest also that a reduction of 12½ per cent should be made in the sessional indemnities paid to members of the Senate. As I wish to be fair and consistent, Mr. Speaker, I would further suggest that a similar reduction be made in the sessional indemnities of members of this House. Thereby we would save the country about a quarter of a million dollars, and the burden of the taxpayer would be lightened to that extent. That places a weapon in our hands for introducing other economies, and more effectively demanding a reduction of wages. I received a circular letter, and I presume a similar letter was addressed to every member, from the Civil Service Association, suggesting that if the Civil Service bonus was to be reduced the extra sessional indemnity voted last session should also be reduced. The hon, member for Sherbrooke (Mr. McCrea) found fault with the civil servants for being so well dressed, and suggested that they wear less expensive clothing. He even went so far as to propose that they could get along with a little less salary. To-day I noticed a letter in the local press pointing out that this criticism came from a member of Parliament who was drawing $4,000 for a four months' session. So you will see what a moral effect it would have on the public generally if we reduced our own sessional indemnities. I would also reduce the salaries of our judges and cabinet ministers. What I am preaching to-night would perhaps come better on the eve of an election, when candidates talk in this strain; but perhaps we are four years from an election, and in any case I advance these suggestions independent of their effect upon the electorate. The legislature of Nova Scotia reduced the sessional indemnity of its members from $1,500 to $1,000; in New South Wales the sessional indemnity was also reduced; and in South Africa General Smuts declared that he was quite ready to have his salary reduced for the benefit of his country. We find that the leader of the Conservative party in Manitoba is telling the people, on the eve of an election, that if his party is returned to power the sessional indemnity will be reduced. I believe the farmers' party in Manitoba have made a similar declaration. I know that a reduction of our sessional indemnities would be a hardship on some members, especially those from the far West and the far East, and by way of compensation to them I would suggest that following the reduction the session should be shortened.

There is no doubt that much time is lost by too long and perhaps unnecessary speeches. I am not criticizing hon. members. I envy the man who can get up here and deliver an excellent speech, but I do believe that much valuable time is lost by needless repetition. I suspect that we would see a distinct condensation on the part of some hon. members if they were compelled to stay in the House and bear the infliction of every speech delivered during the session.

An hon. MEMBER: An awful penalty!

Mr. LEADER: I feel certain that this would have a tendency to appreciably curtail many speeches of those who are fortunate enough to be absent during the greater part of the sittings.

There is a verse which I commend to the attention of hon. members; it runs something like this:

If you would be pungent, be brief.
For it is with words as with sunbeams,
The more they are condensed, the deeper they burn.

Mr. S. W. JACOBS (George Etienne Cartier): Mr. Speaker, my object in rising to-night is not to indulge in any lengthy discussion upon the budget. Practical men, I submit, can say what they have to say upon the budget when the resolutions are before the committee. The budget is an annual talk-fest for doctrinaires who wish to discuss the relative advantages of protection and free trade. The free trader looks upon the protectionist as a thief; the protectionist looks upon the free trader as a visionary.

It is rather late in the evening, Mr. Speaker, for me to express any views upon these questions—if I had any. My object in rising is to discuss a matter which I wished to bring before the House earlier in the session. I had on the Order Paper a resolution with regard to immigration, but unfortunately private members' day was taken away before this resolution could be debated. I may say that it would have been reached earlier, had I not consented, out of good nature, to give way to oleomargarine, and then I found that after oleomargarine had—I was going to say paved the way—

An hon. MEMBER: Greased the way.

Mr. JACOBS: —my right to speak was lost. So that the only opportunity I have is here during the budget debate now drawing to a close. Therefore I shall express those views now, and I can assure you, Mr. Speaker, that my words will be very brief indeed. First, I want to point out that I propose to criticize my own party in connection with its immigration policy, and I am rather glad that it should be done at the dead of night when as few people as possible are present, and when I hope the members of the press have gone to seek well-merited repose.

During the campaign which ended in our return to power last December, I had occasion to criticize as vigorously as I could the immigration regulations enforced by the government which gave up the reins on December 6th, and I feel that a large part of my success was due to the fact that I was able to show the electorate something of the iniquities of those regulations. I sometimes think that I actually grew eloquent as I depicted the wickedness of the government in keeping out of this country a proper class of immigrants. At any rate when the votes were counted I found that my four opponents had lost their deposits and that the Liberal candidate had been returned at the head of the polls, pledged to do something for intending immigrants.

Well, I waited through December, January, February and March, but nothing was done by the new Government. On March 31st I had my resolution placed upon the Order Paper, but, before it could be reached, the Government changed its immigration policy. But in what way was it changed, Mr. Speaker? The regulations and the orders in council were, I thought, in all conscience restrictive enough, but by the new orders in council I find they are much more restrictive. It was another case of: "Where my father whipped you with whips I will whip you with scorpions." I want to cite to the House some of the regulations which are now in force. I wonder whether the House and the country are aware of the fact that we have a new regulation declaring that immigration into this country on and after the 9th of May is prohibited? I will read this regulation:

> From and after the date hereof and until otherwise ordered, the landing in Canada of any immigrant is hereby prohibited.

Now, the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, other transportation companies, and many public bodies in this country during the last year, particularly during the last six months, and especially since this Government has come into power, have declared that what this country needs is a sane, progressive and vigorous immigration policy. They contend that we have had enough of the system which was in force during the war. Let us, they say, get away from that; let us see that we pump into this country a proper class of immigrants. Let us see that men are brought into this country from Europe who are willing to come here; men who are willing to give up everything that they had in Europe and to start life anew in Canada. Let us see that we have immigrants not only who will go on the land, but who will go to the cities and become part of our artisan classes there. We want people from every walk of life. Well, the answer of the Government to that is: Immigration into Canada from and after the ninth of May is prohibited, with, of course, certain exceptions. Let me give you those exceptions:

> On 1. A bona fide agriculturist entering Canada to farm and has sufficient means to begin farming in Canada.
> On 2. A bona fide farm labourer entering Canada to follow that occupation and has reasonable assurance of employment.
> On 3. A female domestic servant entering Canada to follow that occupation and has reasonable assurance of employment.

These are the only people who are permitted to come into this country—bona fide agriculturists who have sufficient means to farm in Canada, farm labourers, and female domestic servants. Why, only a few nights ago the hon. member for South-east Grey (Miss Macphail) told us that farming was a luxury in this country. What does the regulation mean when it says that agriculturists shall have sufficient means to begin farming in Canada? What does it mean in the West for an agriculturist to start to carry on agriculture as it should be carried on in that part of the country? Who is to decide what are sufficient means for a farmer coming into Canada? There are further provisions with regard to whom the immigration officer may admit. He may admit:

(a) The wife and family of any person legally admitted to and resident in Canada who is in a position to receive and care for his dependents.

Just think of how kind-hearted the Minister of Immigration and Colonization is. He is going to permit the wife and family of any person who is already legally admitted to come in. I must say that is very kind indeed of him, and we must give him credit for it. The regulation continues.

(b) The national of any country in regard to which there is in operation a special treaty or agreement or convention regulating immigration.

That, I fancy, refers to Japanese.

(c) Any British subject entering Canada directly or indirectly from Great Britain or Ireland, the United States of America, or any self-governing British dominion or Newfoundland, who shall satisfy the immigration officer in charge at the port of entry that he has sufficient means to maintain himself until employment is secured.

Let me say a word or two in regard to that provision. Why should discrimination be made in favour of British subjects from Great Britain and Ireland or any self-governing dominion who can satisfy the authorities that he has sufficient means to maintain himself? Why not extend that provision to any person who wishes to come into this country? What is there in a British subject which makes 12 m. him better in this country than any one else? Any person who comes here and who desires to become a Canadian citizen, even if he has not British blood in his veins is, I submit, a proper person to come into this country. Why should a discrimination be made in that respect? Then we come to paragraph (d):

(d) Any American citizen entering Canada from the United States, provided it is shown to the satisfaction of the Minister of Immigration and Colonization that his labour or service is required in Canada.

What is the effect of this provision, and of the others to which I have referred? They bar out every person who is not an English speaking person. Now, you know and I know and every person knows the class of British citizen which sometimes is permitted to come to this country and which certainly is permitted to emigrate from the Old Land. We know that to-day in England one-twelfth of the population is submerged; that is, they belong to a class that are absolutely worthless to any country, particularly to the country from which they come. I am not now saying anything in disparagement of the British people; I am simply talking about this class. In the past we have made regulations to prevent this submerged class, this worthless class, this class of ne'er-do-wells, from coming into the country, but by these regulations these people are permitted to enter Canada while people coming from other parts of Europe have to come in as farmers, as farm assistants or as domestic servants. I ask you, Mr. Speaker, and I ask hon. members of this House, is that the way in which we are going to build up the country? How are we going to pay our immense national debt with a population of eight and three-quarter millions when we should have fifteen millions? How is that going to be done? Is it going to be done by encouraging the coming to Canada of only the farmer, the farm labourer, and the domestic servant? How are you going to get farmers to come to this country? You are going to get them by pointing out to them the advantages of Canada over other countries. Well, having listened for the last three months to the doleful plaints and wails of my hon. friends from the West I cannot see that any person coming from Europe, unless he engages in farming in a small way—intensive farming, as they call it there—can make a success in this country. The only way in which this class of people can be successful is by their settling near large cities so that they can engage in truck gardening or farming in a small way. But how can you get them to go to the great West, where the climatic conditions are of such a rigorous character and where large sums are required to carry on farming as it should be carried on? A man has to have his section of land, his tractors, his gasoline machines, and things of that kind. It is practically impossible to get these men to go on the farms in the West; as I have said, the only thing to do is to induce them to go into the more settled districts where they can make a living in a small way by market gardening. So I say that this policy of attempting to secure farmers for this country, particularly from Europe, is bound to fail; it cannot be successful. My idea is that we ought to permit people to come to Canada irrespective of what they are going to do when they arrive; they will find some kind of work to do. If a man is an artisan, let him come here and take his chance; if he finds there is no occupation for him as an artisan, he will very soon find his way into some occupation in which he can be employed. It is all very well to say that we want farmers, but what have we to offer to farmers? If a bona fide farmer comes to this country, goes on a farm and finds that he cannot make a success of agricultural work, he will drift into the city and try to earn a living there.

Do you not think it would be folly on the part of a farmer to remain on a farm and endeavour to make a living when he knows it is much easier to make a living in the city? We must allow these people to work out their own salvation. Do not attempt this paternal system of government and say: You shall go on a farm, and you shall not be allowed in the country if you do not farm. It is a mistake on the part of the Government to do that, and I am surprised that a minister of the astuteness and intelligence of the Minister of Immigration (Mr. Stewart, Argenteuil), should lend himself to any such scheme as that which has been propounded in these orders in council.

I would like to say a word or two with regard to the immigration we have had to this country in the last ten years. From 1911 to 1921 we received in this country 1,800,000 immigrants, a fairly respectable number. How many of these do you think are now in Canada? Only 600,000 of these 1,800,000. What has become of the others? I am quite in accord with what the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Crerar) said to-day, that we ought to have a commission or devise some sort of a scheme to ascertain what has become of these 1,200,000 people who have left. At present their disappearance is as mysterious as the disappearance of the ten tribes of the race to which I belong. We do not know what has become of them.

Mr. McMASTER: Does the hon. member belong to one of the lost ten tribes?

Mr. JACOBS: I feel sometimes when I am in the company of my good friend from Brome, that I am lost.

Mr. McMASTER: Lost in admiration, he means.

Mr. JACOBS: It may be said, Sir, that during the last decade, from 1911 to 1921, conditions were such that a very large number of people were obliged to leave the country. A good many of them returned to their own land; others, owing to the peculiarity of our rules and regulations during the war, disappeared to other countries, but what I wish to point out is that in the decade prior to that the same condition of affairs obtained. From 1901 to 1911, 800,000 people left Canada, so we have this astounding state of facts, that from 1901 to 1921 Canada lost two millions of people. Now how are we going to make up this loss? Are we going to make it up by merely allowing female domestic servants and farm hands to come in? I say that is absurd. We must pump in people in order to make some kind of an impression upon the numbers in this country. It is very much like the story of Alice in Wonderland. You remember where the little girl was running as fast as she could and was asked by her companion, "Where are you running to?" "I'm running somewhere," she replied. "You will never get there," said the other girl, "at that rate, you must run twice as fast if you want to get somewhere." So it is with us. In order to have six million of immigrants, we must bring in eighteen millions. It is a curious state of affairs, but it is a fact that we have lost two millions of people from this country within the last twenty years, and we do not know what has become of them, and while the land is crying out for people, while the land is without people and people are without land, the Government insists upon putting into force regulations which will effectively bar people from coming into this country.

I am not at this late hour going to discuss the advantage of immigration to a country —how it stimulates trade, builds up the country, how it would help pay a large part of the deficits on our railways, how things generally improve with the advent of a large number of people. It is too late to discuss that to-night, but at some other time I shall do so if opportunity offers. In the United States they have 110,000,000 people. How many immigrants do you think they got from Europe from 1800 to 1870? In that period, thirty millions of people living in the United States came to that land from Europe. At present they have reached the point of saturation. They have a law now which declares that only three per cent of each nationality resident there shall be permitted to come into that country, and we are trying to do the very same thing for Canada. We are taking the same medicine for our ills which the United States is taking for theirs, forgetful of the fact that they have 110,000,000 people, while in this country, which has a larger area than the United States, we have only eight and three-quarter millions. I am sorry to remark that I feel that the acts and conduct of the American authorities with regard to immigration are being reflected in our own Immigration Department here in Ottawa. I heard it stated by a high official in the Immigration Department that it is only a question of time when they will put into force this American scheme of a certain percentage for a certain nationality, or a certain race.

I do not know if my friend the Minister of Immigration has before him a resolution passed by the Montreal Board of Trade in which it strongly discountenances schemes to keep people out of the country. I know a resolution of that kind was handed to me. I shall not read it because the hour is too advanced, but I will give the minister an opportunity of perusing it at his leisure. Colonel Dennis of the Canadian Pacific Railway, than whom there is no greater authority in Canada on the question of immigration, says that the only solution of our railway difficulties and other national problems is to pump immigration into this country. He says: Last year we had a certain percentage on our ships, and this year we have twenty-five per cent less than we had last year. Their ships are crossing the Atlantic empty because the Canadian Pacific and other companies are not permitted to bring immigrants to this country.

There are certain curious notions with regard to immigration held by certain curious people. I notice that last week the Imperial Order of the Daughters of the Empire—I think that is what they are called—passed some kind of resolution at a meeting in Vancouver declaring that this country must remain British. We must have British blood introduced into this country they said in order that the British race may be preserved, and resolutions were passed, I believe, condemning bringing into this country anything except the simon-pure article. The Bishop of London, Ontario—I have not his words under my hand, but I made a mental note of them at the time—speaking on the question of immigration some time ago declared we ought to bar Americans from this country because they brought in ideas which were sometimes inimical to the British idea, and this country must be kept for the British-born. Le Devoir of Montreal, the well known Nationalist paper, is loudly protesting against bringing in immigrants generally from Europe because it is afraid that ethnically they cannot assimilate with the people of this country. I would like to know what Le Devoir would say if we suggested that the French Canadian race should forthwith assimilate with the British-Canadian race or any other race. I think we would have loud blasts at once protesting against it.

Mr. LAFLAMME: They will, if you give them a chance.

Mr. JACOBS: In what sense?

Mr. LAFLAMME: In the sense you mean.

Mr. JACOBS: I do not think that any French Canadian would want to have his race assimilated with any other race in this country, in order to produce something that was not entirely French Canadian. I do not blame them; I would not have it myself. The question just shows how curious notions will sometimes get together curious people. Can you imagine anything so different as the Imperial Order of the Daughters of the Empire, the Bishop of London, Le Devoir, and a few others of that type.

The hon. member from East York (Mr. Harris) in a burst of youthful enthusiasm, because he has only been here for a short time, undertook to read to this House some statistics which he obtained, I do not know where, in which it was declared that the foreign born were responsible for fifty per cent of the crime in Toronto.

Mr. LAFLAMME: There is no crime in Toronto.

Mr. JACOBS: My hon. friend from Drummond-Arthabaska (Mr. Laflamme) is an expert on crime, and if he says there is no crime in Toronto, it is probably because he does not practice in Toronto.

Mr. McMASTER: They get off in Toronto.

Mr. JACOBS: The hon. member undertook to read to the House a statement to the effect that fifty per cent of the crime in Toronto was due to the foreign born. I doubted the statement at the time, and I took the trouble to obtain from the official statistician some figures with regard to crime in Canada—and I suppose Toronto may be included in Canada—which puts an entirely different phase on the question. I find that, from the year 1914 to 1920 there were 13,050 convictions for crime in the whole of Canada. Of this number how many offenders do hon. members think were to be found among the foreign born? There were 2,768 divided into:

German	149
Scandinavian	157
Italian	534
Austro-Hungarian	776
Russian	503
Other foreigners	405

I fancy that, when it could not be ascertained to what nationality a man belonged, they made him a foreigner, and got 405 in that list. I am sorry the hon. member from East York is not in his seat to-night, so that he could carry away these figures and ponder them over well in his mind, and I trust when the matter is brought before him, he will in future be careful about making rash and reckless statements, without knowing beforehand hat he is able to prove them by figures.

Might I say a word about the hon. member for Southeast Grey (Miss Macphail)? I suppose that, as a member of Parliament, she must expect to be criticised if she has laid herself open to criticism. I am sorry she is not in her seat to-night. I find that this lady seems to be one of the most uncompromising opponents of immigration of what she calls the inferior races from middle Europe. What is it in middle Europe which makes a person belong to an inferior race? The fact that they cannot speak English, surely, ought not to make them an inferior race. I could give you many instances of people who are quite superior who were never able to speak English. Her objection to them seems to be that they wore sheepskin coats. Well probably the lady's esthetic desire to see people arrayed in nice finery may cause her to object to sheepskin coats, but the fact that a person wears a sheepskin coat, in my opinion, is not something which ought to debar him from coming into this country. The hon. member ought to remember the words of the Scottish national poet who says:

> What though on hamely fare we dine,
> Wear hodden grey an' a' that;
> Gie fools their silks, and knaves their wine,
> A Man's a Man for a' that.

I am inclined to think that longer association with public men in this country and an opportunity of studying things at closer range than before will cause her to change her views with regard to the class of immigrants we want in this country.

I say, Mr. Speaker, we must get immigrants from wherever they want to come. We must invite them to come into this country, and when they come here, let them do what they feel they are capable of doing. We have in the city of Montreal to-day sixty or seventy thousand people who came to this country a few years ago, who were practically thrown on their own resources. They did not walk around the streets looking for work. Work was found for them by those of their people who came earlier. They engaged in the textile trade and if to-day the clothing industry is the third largest industry in the country, it is largely due to these foreigners who made that industry what it is, not only in Montreal but in Toronto and the other large cities. In the metal trade they have made a success. They have gone into the tobacco industry and of every line of industry which they have entered they have made a success.

Do you not think people of that kind are an asset to the community? These people could never have gone on farms because they were not accustomed to life on the farm. They made a success in the city because they were accustomed to live in the city. I have no objection to people taking up farming, because I believe it is one of the basic industries of the country, but to tell a person that, unless he is willing to go on a farm, he cannot be permitted to come into this country is a shortsighted policy on the part of the government, and something which I am surprised to learn this Government is endeavouring to put into effect. I hope that these orders in council will be very shortly relegated to the waste paper basket. I wish to say a word with regard to this Order in Council which you, Sir, can see is a most important regulation, affecting as it does our national life. A matter of that kind surely has as much interest to the people of this country as oleomargarine; in fact, I would go so far as to say it has as much interest to the members of this House as the Minister of Agriculture's bills on the grading of onions or on fertilizers, but these matters are brought before the House, while the Order in Council is passed in the Cabinet Council and nothing is heard about it at all except when it is published in the newspapers 10 or 12 days afterwards. It should have been placed on the Table of the House and a day should have been set apart to discuss this most important question. We criticized the Conservative party that lived by Order in Council, and made our battle cry the question of Orders in Council, and "down with the government that insists upon governing by Order in Council", but when we came into power, we lapsed into the ways of the Philistines.

Mr. CHAPLIN: We have always had Orders in Council.

Mr. JACOBS: We have had Orders in Council, but I venture to say that Orders in Council of that kind and importance should have been tabled and should have been discussed. Had there been a discussion, I would not have been taking up the time of this House to-night in order to bring the matter to the attention of the country. But I can assure you, Mr. Speaker, that this matter is of such vital importance to thousands and tens of thousands of people in this country to-day, that I felt it was absolutely necessary for me to bring it to the attention of the House. I have been flooded with telegrams, letters and petitions from all parts of the country relating to this Order in Council. The minister is a very kind-hearted man; a most kind-hearted man; he cannot bear to think of these people being brought to our shores and then being deported, so he declares that they shall not come here at all. It is like the story of the man to whom a poor devil appealed for alms. He pressed the button for his butler, and said: "Kick this man out; he is breaking my heart."

Now that the matter has been brought to the attention of the minister and that he sees that some of his followers, not only myself, but a number of others, feel so strongly upon this question, I hope he will see his way clear to giving us some relief. We at least should have been consulted on a matter of this kind. When I heard that the question was about to be discussed by a sub-committee of the Cabinet, I made certain representations that I should like to be heard; but no doubt, in the stress of the business of the session, the matter was overlooked, and the first I knew about it was that an Order in Council had been duly passed. But the hand that creates the Order in Council can also destroy it. I believe that after the minister has had before him the necessary delegations protesting most vigorously against this Order in Council, not only delegations from people who are particularly affected inasmuch as their relatives are unable to come into this country, but bodies of such an important character as the principal boards of trade, the principal transportation companies, and others, he will see his way clear to making some provision which will give us relief from this obnoxious Order in Council. Finally, as my last word to him and to the Government, I would say that, when important matters of this kind are to be disposed of and when the House is in session, they ought to see to it that members of the House of Commons who, after all, are the masters, should have an opportunity of discussing such a matter and not having it rushed through as they have done by an Order in Council.

On motion of Mr. Stewart (Leeds) the debate was adjourned.

On motion of Mr. Graham, the House adjourned at 12.25 a.m. Tuesday.

Tuesday, June 6, 1922.

The House met at three o'clock.

IMMIGRATION ACT AMENDMENT

Mr. JOSEPH ARCHAMBAULT (Chambly & Vercheres): Mr. Speaker, with the consent of the House, I beg to move:

That the Special Committee to which were referred for consideration Bill No. 16, to amend the Immigration Act, and Bill No. 17, to amend the Criminal Code, be given leave to make a special report in reference to the first mentioned Bill, No. 16.

Motion agreed to.

THE BUDGET

CONTINUATION OF THE DEBATE ON THE ANNUAL FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The House resumed from Monday, June 5, the debate on the motion of Hon. W. S. Fielding (Minister of Finance) that Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair for the House to go into Committee of Ways and Means, and the proposed amendment thereto of Hon. Sir Henry Drayton.

Mr. SPEAKER: Before the right hon. gentleman (Mr. Meighen) addresses the House, he will kindly allow me to give my ruling on the proposed amendment of yesterday.

The Order of the Day being read for the Committee of Ways and Means and Mr. Fielding having moved, seconded by Mr. Mackenzie King, and the question being proposed: "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair." an amendment was moved by Sir Henry Drayton, seconded by Mr. Meighen:

That all the words after the word "that" be struck out and the following be substituted therefor:

"The Liberal party assembled in convention in August, 1919, adopted a resolution which, after reciting its professed purposes, contained the following specific and unqualified pledges:

" 'That to these ends, wheat, wheat flour and all products of wheat; the principle articles of food; farm implements and machinery; farm tractors; mining, flour and saw mill machinery and repair parts thereof; rough and partly dressed lumber; gasoline, illuminating, lubricating and fuel oils; nets twines, and fishermen's equipments; cements; fertilizers, should be free from custom duties, as well as the raw material entering into same.

" 'That the British proference be increased to 50 per cent of the general tariff.

" 'And the Liberal party hereby pledges itself to implement by legislation the provisions of this resolution when returned to power.'

"That such pledges were restated as the policy of the Liberal party in an official handbook issued just before the general election, namely, in October, 1921, under the authority of its leader, Hon. W. L. Mackenzie King.

"That candidates contesting on behalf of the Liberal party in the said election, used widely the promises therein set out as a means of securing support.

"That the Liberal party having been returned to power the budget proposals of the Finance Minister now brought down, constitute, on the part of the Government, an utter failure to implement such pledges by legislation.

"That the making of such solemn pledges, the utilization of them to secure support, and their flagrant violation after the attainment of office reveal a disregard of political honour and tend to lower the standard of public life."

Mr. Crerar moved, seconded by Mr. Hoey:

That the said proposed amendment be amended by striking out all the words after the word "support" at the end of the third last paragraph and substituting the following therefor:

"That the Liberal party having been returned to power, the budget proposals of the Finance Minister now brought down, based as they are mainly on the principle of protection in respect of the tariff, are wholly inadequate to implement such pledges by legislation.

"That while recognizing that changes in fiscal policy should be made in such a way as to give industries affected a reasonable opportunity of readjustment, this House is of the opinion that the principle of protection as a basis for fiscal policy in Canada is unsound and not in the best interests of the Dominion."

A point of order was raised by Mr. Fielding on the ground that there cannot be two amendments on a motion to go into Committee of Ways and Means.

The hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Crerar) has submitted that we should conform to British practice in this case and he has contended that we could do so under our Rule I., which reads as follows:

In all cases not provided for hereinafter or by Sessional or other Orders, the rules, usages and forms of proceeding of the House of Commons of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland in force on the first day of July, 1867, shall be followed.

The very first words of this rule: "In all cases not provided for," must be taken into consideration.

The House has provided for the case at issue by adopting precedents against moving more than one amendment on the motion that the Speaker leave the Chair for the House to go into Committee of Supply or Ways and Means.

Mr. Speaker Smith, cited by the hon. gentleman, has given two divergent decisions on this point. On June 22, 1858, he ruled that "An amendment to an amendment to a motion for the House in Committee of Supply is out of order." That was his first ruling.

And on April 27, 1860, he ruled that "But one amendment to a motion for going into Committee of Supply can be made, although the amendment itself may be amended."

This is the only decision allowing a second amendment which has ever been given in the Canadian Parliament, and it is anterior to Confederation and apparently self-contradictory.

On June 14, 1864, Mr. Speaker Wallbridge ruled that "But one amendment can be moved to a motion for the House going in Committee of Supply." (Vide Journal, pp. 388-389).

Since Confederation our practice has been consistently against such an amendment.

On May 1, 1867, Mr. Speaker Cockburn, upon ruling out of order a very complex amendment to a motion for the Committee of Supply, said:

The House could in general, according to precedent, order a complicated motion to be divided. But that could only be done by amending the motion, which cannot be done now, for but one amendment can be moved in going into Committee of Supply. (Vide Journal, pp. 268-270).

On May 2, 1873, whilst the House was debating an amendment to the motion that Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair, Mr. Tupper (later Sir Charles) moved to leave certain words out of the said amendment and insert certain other words instead thereof.

Mr. Holton (then the recognized authority on such questions in the Canadian Parliament) objected to this proceeding, and Mr. Speaker Cockburn again decided that "No amendment can be made to the amendment to the motion for the House to go into Committee of Supply." (Vide Journal, p. 262).

On February 29, 1876, Mr. Speaker Anglin over-ruled Mr. Workman's motion in favour of Protection, being an amendment of an amendment of Mr. Irving to the motion that Mr. Speaker leave the Chair for the House to go into Committee of Supply. (Vide Journal, p. 89).

Since the last mentioned date, the point has been considered as definitely settled and no second amendment to such a motion has ever been allowed in this House.

On April 9, 1878, Sir John A. Macdonald, then Leader of the Opposition, stated from his seat, that he intended moving an amendment on going into Supply with regard to "the Quebec crisis."

Mr. Mackenzie, then Prime Minister although admitting Sir John A. Macdonald's right to make such an amendment, took the ground that if it were made on the motion to go into Supply it would prevent sub-amendments. He said that Sir John A. Macdonald's amendment should not be confined to an occasion when there can be no sub-amendment because it simply meant asking the House to conform to the mover's own view of a particular transaction or else vote it down.

> "Whilst the House might concur with a certain portion of the motion but not with the rest" said Mr. Mackenzie, "we are obliged, on a motion in amendment on going into Supply, to accept whatever the Hon. Member chooses to offer us, or to reject it."

In Hansard it reads "or to neglect it". The reporter evidently meant the word "reject".

> "The Hon. member will place his motion in such a way that it will be impossible for the House to give any opinion at all on it except to accept it or to vote it down."

Sir John A. Macdonald here interjected "Exactly." Mr. Holton, speaking on the question, then said:

> The Right Hon. Gentleman intended to adopt a form of words or submit it to the House in a connection in which it was not susceptible of amendment and whatever shades of opinion there might be and whatever choice there might be as to the form of expression, the Hon. Gentleman practically said to the House: "take this or nothing."

Mr. Blake also concurred in this opinion.

I think the above precedents are binding on me, especially when supported by the opinions of such experienced parliamentarians as Macdonald, Mackenzie, Blake and Holton.

The honourable member for Marquette has quoted Bourinot to show that these precedents are based on a misunderstanding of a Canadian speaker as to the English practice. Bourinot made that statement in a foot note of his third edition, but he did not include this note in his fourth edition. It is, as a matter of fact, an obiter dictum which has no bearing on the principle accepted by the Canadian House of Commons. Bourinot recognized this fact in his fourth edition in which he lays down the practice unequivocally as follows:

> Only one amendment can be moved to the question that Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair. If that amendment is negatived . . . . no other motion can be proposed.

And he adds as a note on the same page:

> This limitation is peculiar to the Canadian Commons (p. 420).

The same question arose in 1917, and was decided upon the same principle. In this case an amendment moved by Mr. Turriff on the proposed motion of Sir Thomas White for the Committee of Ways and Means (the budget) was negatived on a division. Thereupon, Mr. Robb (Huntingdon) moved a second amendment, and it being late at night the debate was adjourned.

But next day, 11th May, 1917, the Deputy Speaker stated to the House that the second amendment was irregular and should have been declared to be out of order. He ruled that the main motion was the only question before the House and might be debated, but no further amendments could be moved. (Hansard, 1917, Vol. II, pp. 1317, 1319: Journals, 1917, pp. 188, 193).

In 1917, on a similar occasion, a second amendment was intended to be moved, but on being informed by one of my predecessors, the hon. Mr. Speaker Rhodes, that he would be ruled out of order, Dr. Clark, then member for Red Deer, desisted from his intention, thus accepting our well established practice.

I am not unmindful of the views expressed by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) and also by my predecessor the hon. member for Bonaventure (Mr. Marcil) whose long experience in this House gives weight to their opinions on questions of Parliamentary procedure.

In Great Britain, more than one amendment may be moved on the motion that the Speaker leave the Chair for the House to go into Committee of Supply or Ways and Means, but it is done on conditions quite different from the practice in this House. In England, whenever an amendment is moved striking out all the words after "that" from the main motion, the Speaker puts the question "That all the words proposed to be left out stand part of the question". If this is voted in the negative, amendments and sub-amendments are allowed; but if it is voted in the affirmative, they are not.

The practical meaning of this peculiarly British procedure is that the House grants leave to move the amendment. In another sense, it is nothing more nor less than the previous question. I cannot see my way to following the British practice.

As to the suggestion to give the hon. member for Marquette and his supporters the opportunity of expressing their views upon the budget proposals, I must say that the Speaker, in his interpretation of the rules, is not at liberty to recognize the existence of parties or groups in the House. Although he has to observe certain amenities in giving precedence to leaders in debate, he presides over an assembly of the people's representatives where every member has an equal right of using the rules and usages to express his views on public matters.

In England, although the Home Rule party under Mr. Parnell and his successors consisted of a large group, it never was given an official status in parliamentary procedure. Even to-day, there are at Westminster several groups or parties, but they are all subject to the same rules of procedure. All the members are on an equal footing. I think our rules and practice based on precedents, traditions, and usages give every hon. member ample opportunity to put himself on record upon any question. I therefore rule that no amendment can be moved to the amendment proposed to the motion that I do now leave the chair for the House to resolve itself into Committee of Ways and Means. The sub-amendment moved by the hon. member for Marquette accordingly is out of order.

I may add that the same rule applies whether the motion is for the House to go into Committee of Supply or Ways and Means.

Hon. T. A. CRERAR (Marquette): Mr. Speaker, I recognize at once the weight of the authorities which you have quoted in support of your ruling, notwithstanding that our practice has developed from a misunderstanding by Mr. Speaker Smith in 1858, and under ordinary conditions I would be the last member to question your decision. I submit, however, that the conditions which obtain to-day in this House justify a departure from our customary practice. We are the second largest party here, and I think we should have the opportunity of formally expressing our views in the manner I suggested yesterday. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, with the greatest possible respect for your person and for the high office which you so ably fill, I wish to appeal against your ruling to the judgment of the House.

Hon. W. S. FIELDING (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, if I may be permitted to make a comment on what my hon. friend from Marquette (Mr. Crerar) says, I would remind him that, being the second largest group in the House it was his undoubted right to take the place of the official Opposition, if he had so desired. Of his own motion and for good reasons, satisfactory to himself and his friends, he elected not to take that position. There is an advantage under the British practice in occupying the position of the official Opposition. My hon. friend waived his right to that advantage, and I do not think he ought now to complain of the consequences of his action.

Mr. CRERAR: May I say, Mr. Speaker, to my hon. friend the Minister of Finance, for whom also I have a very great respect, that his argument is not sound. The same condition would apply whether or not this group which I represent and speak for to-day were the third instead of the second largest party in the House. I submit that it should have the opportunity of expressing its opinions in this formal way.

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Leader of the Opposition): Although I think I am out of order, Mr. Speaker, I rise merely to state my position on the point of order. In so far as the sub-amendment is concerned, I need not say that it has no embarrassment for me. At the same time your ruling, Sir, appeals to me as being undoubtedly in conformity with the rules and practice of this House; indeed, so clearly is this the case that there does not appear any room for dispute at all.

The leader of the Progressive party (Mr. Crerar) urges that new conditions have arisen. If so, those new conditions must be met, and the way to meet them is to take the regular course to amend the rules of the House; not to appeal against what is manifestly a sound judgment that you, Mr. Speaker, could not possibly avoid giving. Consequently, if it comes to a vote I shall support the Chair.

Besides, may I point out that in the British House the closure rules are very different and much more drastic than ours, applying to motions in amendment to supply? Therefore they can afford a latitude there that we could not very well allow here, for without the intervention of a closure rule we have unlimited opportunities of moving amendments to supply. Consequently the leader of the Progressive party is not debarred at all by your ruling from moving his amendment to Supply or Ways and Means, and he will have many opportunities to do so.

The House divided on the question: Shall the ruling of Mr. Speaker be sustained?

And the same was sustained on the following division:

Mr. SPEAKER: The Speaker's decision having been sustained, the debate will now proceed on the main motion and the amendment thereto of the hon. member for West York (Sir Henry Drayton).

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, it has become the custom in this debate to make reference to a circumstances rare in our history, that of the same minister presenting to Parliament a sixteenth budget. I have not the least hesitation, indeed I join gladly in the tributes paid to the personal worth of the Finance Minister (Mr. Fielding). His standing as a citizen and as a public man is well recognized throughout our country. He has earned that place by an unusually long public service—by nearly fifty years of unwearied and assiduous toil.

I differ from him in the articles of his financial policy; the differences I have found in the past exist to-day. I cannot congratulate him on his budget; I do not think that situated as he was he made the best of his circumstances. His budget speech was an eloquent contribution to debate, it was an interesting and mostly appropriate though superficial commentary on our trade and fiscal position; but it will be searched in vain for any full or useful analysis of our finances as a nation, for any examination of value into our trade history and our trade prospects. It is mostly in the nature of a newspaper commentary on the politics of the day.

There are features of our financial position that are not wholly encouraging. In the main, though, having regard to the accomplishments of this country in recent years, there is little of which to complain. It is true, as the Finance Minister stated, we have a debt of about $2,427,000,000. Our debt increased last year by, I think, $86,000,000, and the year before by $92,000,000. But not one other country has been cited that has succeeded after the ordeal of war in really reducing its obligations. If it is true that Great Britain has in a sense reduced, Great Britain's reduction is due merely to another method of 4 p.m. bookkeeping than that adopted here. Great Britain made her investments in war munitions and war materials; all were added to the debt, and what afterwards came to her credit by sale or otherwise appears as a reduction. In Canada, for the most part what would have appeared as a reduction never in the first place was incurred as a debt; consequently what appears there to be a reduction of debt has no such appearance here.

Last year the debt of Canada was increased by $86,000,000, but last year we paid out of our $381,000,000 of revenue all our ordinary expenditure, composed precisely as it has always been, and paid as well all the regular capital expenditure of this country, and paid as well some $9,000,000 under demobilization. We did this, and had a small surplus besides. The $86,000,000 is made up mainly of advances to the railway systems of this country and constitutes an obligation by them to the country—advances that took care of anterior obligations of those systems, mainly the Grand Trunk—and that found their way into capital investment in those systems, bringing them to that standard of efficiency where they are to-day. By virtue of such efficiency they render service to this country comparable with that rendered by any other system in the world. The results of those investments we are reaping in dividends of service every hour, and none are reaping them more rapidly or more clearly than those portions of our country in the far west into which those improvements and extensions have to a great extent gone. Those investments were essential; they comprised some $115,000,000 inclusive of equipment. Even some of those have been taken care of out of the year's expenditure, with the result that only $86,000,000 of an addition to the debt has been entailed. These facts are not wholly discouraging—by no means are they discouraging. We are past the stage where large investment for that purpose is necessary. We shall have some deficits to take care of, but as the years advance and as the abnormal expenditures that attach to the war and its aftermath cease, we shall be able to address ourselves to achieve reductions provided right policies are pursued.

The main feature of the budget presentation was that which had to do with fiscal policy. This debate falls into two divisions. There is, first, the question as to what is the sound fiscal policy for Canada; and, second, the question, in what character does the Government appear in presenting to the House such policy. These are distinct and separate subjects.

As to what is the true taxation and fiscal policy for this country, I do not think I need inform Parliament what my own opinions are. On at least two former occasions in budget debates I took occasion to make them as clear as I could in English words—in the session of 1921 and in the session of 1920. It became my duty as I saw it then to declare fidelity, continued fidelity, to a system of protection in this country, protection applied in moderate degree, within limits clearly defined in those addresses. I do not need on this occasion to go elaborately into that argument. I can rely pretty confidently, I think, throughout this Parliament on my hon. friends opposite me supplying the arguments that it was necessary for me to supply in previous years. I can well recall how cold a reception my words received at their hands in the debate of a year ago and of two years ago, and I can remember how vociferously and how vigorously they applauded the speeches and the theories of the then small party of fourteen that sat in the seats now to my left. I could not help but contrast how feeble was the applause that similar language drew forth this year from hon. gentlemen opposite.

Indeed, I felt rather sorry for some members of the Progressive party and particularly, may I say, for the hon. lady member for Southeast Grey (Miss Macphail), when I recall utterances, similar to those they made this year, sounded in those two previous contests, and thought how if they had only been so fortunate as to have made on those occasions, the speeches that they made in this debate, they would have received as a meed of praise from the Liberal party those thunders of applause with which we were so familiar then.

Yes, I can leave for the present the defence of the cause of protection to hon. gentlemen opposite. Their policy is quite clear. It is embodied in the tariff they have presented to this House. It is the policy described in an election address by the hon. member for St. Antoine (Mr. Mitchell) as the very "same that we have pursued for forty-three years in Canada." It is the policy described by the present Minister of Justice (Sir Lomer Gouin) in many of his speeches as the policy pursued by the Laurier government and by all governments since 1878. That is the policy that they have advanced, and that is the policy for them to defend. There has not, indeed, in my judgment—and I say it with all deference to hon. gentlemen to my left—been any serious attack upon its soundness in this debate. There have been the usual charges advanced, there have been the usual appeals against monopoly, the usual sectional appeals, the usual assumption that this system is designed to oppress the many and to enrich the few; but there has not been much delving to the heart of the question in an endeavour to show that any other policy would give this Dominion a better or any chance in the commercial race of this world.

The hon. member for Brome (Mr. McMaster) endeavoured to argue by comparison. So far as I know, he was the lone sparrow across the floor who dared to say a word for the free trade principles of yore. He endeavoured to argue by comparison, and he described the results of the tariff impositions of certain countries of Europe. I do not think he got to anything larger than the Netherlands. He confined himself to very small countries, countries that by virtue of their geographical position, by virtue of their compactness, by virtue of their comparative absence of basic natural resources, are wholly different from ours. But he did not give the whole facts regarding them. I mention only one, and the corresponding argument would apply to all. He gave us the revenue from customs of the Kingdom of Belgium, and its total importations, and he said: There is virtually a free trade country.

Mr. McMASTER: A very low tariff country.

Mr. MEIGHEN: A very low tariff country;—because its importations are so large and its customs revenue is so small—only one and a fraction per cent of the total importations. Well, a country might have a tariff that only brought in half of one per cent, and still be a protected country, still be a country that followed the principle of protection and abandoned the principles of free trade or revenue tariff. A country, on the other hand, might be one whose proportions of customs revenue to imports would run from twenty to thirty per cent, and still be a country without any protection to home industries at all. It all depends on the nature of the articles upon which the duty is imposed. Belgium, for example, not having natural resources in degree like Canada, resources of the mine, resources of the soil—

Mr. McMASTER: If the right hon. gentleman will permit me, does he suggest that Belgium has not great resources of the mine?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Nothing comparable with Canada. She has not the variety of natural resources that this country has. Therefore, she does not need to apply her tariff to ensure the development of her natural resources. She only needs to apply it to the protection of those industries of her own that compete with other countries. It is obviously to her advantage to admit to her shores free those raw resources she has not at home. She needs to apply only to a few—but she does not neglect those few—the principle of protection. Take, for example, the clothing that she cheaply produces, ladies' clothing, men's clothing, hats and so forth. On these she applies a duty of 20 per cent. On sugar, one of the greatest of her industries, in which for her population she is one of the foremost producers of the world, she imposes a duty of 20 francs per hundred kilo grams, or 220 pounds, which is a duty very close to 2 cents per pound, higher than the duty we have in Canada.

The range of goods upon which it is to the advantage of Belgium to apply protection is narrow compared with that of this country. The range of goods upon which it is to her advantage to let them in free, because they do not compete seriously with her industries at home, is large, and that accounts for the reduced percentage that the total amount collected bears to the total value of her imports.

In Great Britain, on the other hand—even before the Safeguarding of Industries law—her average of duties to the whole value of importations was about 8 per cent; so at a time when Great Britain undoubtedly was a free trade country, imposing duties only on goods that did not compete with home production, her average would be four or five or six times the average in Belgium. But Belgium was a protected country because Belgium laid her duties on goods that did compete with home production. There comes the difference between the principle of protection and the principle of no protection.

For this Dominion of ours to abandon that system, applied in careful measure as we have it to-day, would be to invite, in competition with other industrial nations, undoubted disaster. Hon. gentlemen say, "Oh, there is this industry, there is that, where we have conditions in Canada enabling them to compete with the conditions of our chief competitors across the line." Well, it is sometimes easier to make such proposition before one gets all the facts than it is afterward; but assuming it to be true where are we then? You find a competitor over there that has a market closed, or partially closed, by a protective tariff; you find him with an advantage of 110 millions of a market. You find the competitor here with what? You find him with eight and a half or nine millions of a market; and you find him building to a scale to meet the restricted market of his country. Assume even that the other country opens its market; no industry in this country could be sure that such market would remain open for longer than four years. Therefore the manufacturer cannot lay down his plant on a scale to meet the large scale production of his competitor. Therein lies the basis of the protective theory. It is bound up in the very system of nations that we have in this world. When the existing system of nations is abolished, and when markets external to our country are under a common control, then there will be some reason in the theory of free traders.

So, I adhere still to the principle of a moderate protective tariff for our country.

[Mr. Meighen.]

Further: I believe generally in a system of reciprocal trade with countries of the world in which we can expect to find a market—a real market—not a mere intermediate market for our surplus. That applies to almost every country in the world. But Canada is peculiarly situated. Canada is in a position as to which no just comparison with any other country in the world appears. We lie on the North American continent, alongside a nation with a population of 110 millions, undoubtedly the most highly developed industrially of any country in the world. We are virtually their only neighbours in an industrial sense. The weight of their commercial influence is almost overwhelming. They are a nation that produces everything that we produce and, except for one or two things, produces a surplus, and a large surplus, of everything that we produce. Consequently though we may find a market—we do now find a market—there for much that we bring to maturity in this country, such market is of this character: It is intermediate, it only adds to the surplus that that country has of the same products for sale to the outside world. Therefore, the United States becomes a mere intermediary between us and the outside world. My hon. friend opposite shakes his head, but such undoubtedly is the fact. Here in our country, if we permit no considerations of nationhood to exist, or to have weight at all we would have certain portions of Canada trading almost exclusively by the geographically natural route through the United States. There is such trading now, I do not dispute it and there will always be, but I do not think it wise, far-sighted policy that the all but universal practice should be for distinct sections of Canada to trade by themselves with those states immediately to the south; such states in turn pressing on their surplus farther towards the seacoast; and those in turn pressing their surplus, so augmented, of the same goods on to the ultimate consumers of Europe and Asia. Would such a condition be for the good of this country? Would it be possible by following that path to build up a nation here? This is the problem that faced the Fathers of Confederation. This is the problem that has faced the statesmen of this country every year since Confederation. This is one of the tendencies that our country must have the virility and the tenacity to overcome if we are to remain a united nation on this North American continent.

Mr. McMASTER: Is it not true that in spite of all tariff barriers our trade with the United States has been growing almost from year to year, without affecting our national spirit?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not doubt it, not at all; but at the same time we have set ourselves to maintain our east and west routes of trade. We do not divorce one portion of the country from the other as would result if we were to wholly abandon our task, which is the real task of Confederation and let all trade take its geographically natural route. Oh, these things appear so easy to the minds of those who approach responsibility lightly; but when men get into positions of responsibility they do not appear to be matters of quite such light consideration. Many a political leader in this country, including the leaders of my hon. friend from Brome (Mr. McMaster)—one I know whose memory he much reveres—has come through the process of thought and of experience to exactly the view that I have expressed. Therefore, I feel now, no matter what the political consequences may be, that the right course for this country is not to enter into any extensive reciprocal arrangement with the United States.

Enter into such arrangement, and what results? First of all, the power to terminate though it may nominally be mutual, rests in fact with that country. In proportion to the life of the time such arrangement operates, in proportion as well to its magnitude, the whole commerce of our country adjusts itself to the new conditions. The natural routes are found and as they are found then we become practically at the mercy of legislation of the United States for the continuance of legislation upon which the currents of our commerce must more and more depend. We would have cultivated, and are at the mercy of our neighbour to the south. Our trade follows north and south routes, and as a consequence the mere threat of the abrogation of a treaty puts us in a position, most undesirable to say the least of it, with respect to the United States of America. We do not stand in the same relation with any other country of the world; there is not the same condition of affairs at all. I hope the day will never come when the fact of that relationship, unique as it is, will be lost sight of in the determination of the policy of this country.

It has been the habit of certain people to bewail the rejection by Canada of the Reciprocity Treaty of 1911. Canada rejected that Reciprocity Treaty just because of the truth that I have sought to expound to this House. It is just as much a truth, just as vital a truth, to-day as it ever was, and the spirit of this country is as true and strong to-day as it was in 1911. I venture to say that if such a treaty comes, in the form it did, or in anything like so extensive a form, before the people of this country again, and they have time and opportunity to see to the centre of it, to know its meaning and to know its purpose, the verdict will be just the same as in 1911, and just as firmly pronounced. Hon. gentlemen argue as though, had that treaty been made, it would have been permanent like the laws of the Medes and Persians. I, as a Canadian, loving Canada, loving our association in this Empire; I, as a Canadian and a British subject, would not welcome the treaty in the least even though I believed it was going to be permanent. But I know it never can be permanent; I know the permanency of it rests chiefly with the stronger power, the stronger commercial weight—that is to say with the United States of America. Oh, we have had reciprocity treaties, and this country took years to recover from the effect of their cancellation, and went through a period of suffering that it would never have had to endure if it had not travelled that way at all. As regards the pact of 1911, we would have met to-day, only under more unfortunate circumstances which would have still more emphasized the unfavourable conditions of this hour, had that reciprocity treaty passed. What is the explanation of the Fordney Tariff? What has brought about that feeling in the United States which has driven the government now in office to adopt the measures it has put through, and to propose those now under debate? Is it not chiefly the effect of the importations from this country, the effect there of the large surplus of our agricultural products. Is not the feeling strong, particularly among the farming community, that their farmers have a right to greater advantage in the American market which they themselves have contributed to build? Would that cause have been removed if reciprocity had passed? Would that cause not have been intensified? Would its results not have been accelerated? Are you going to postpone the effect of a cause by emphasizing that cause? They would have had still more of our products if reciprocity had operated at all; we would have seen the adverse feeling grow there just that much sooner.

Have we not had instances enough to awaken this truth in the mind of even the most perverse? We accepted the American offer of free trade in wheat and the products of wheat and potatoes. This was not very extensive: I never had very much hopes from it, I expected just about what resulted. At the time we accepted this offer, there was a stringency of shipping conditions that made the export of our grain by the regular routes very difficult, and there was the main cause of the acceptance of the offer. We were, no doubt, affected as well by a desire to meet what had become, in the minds of people in the West, the outstanding grievance. We sought the more to meet them because at that time we were engaged in a terrible conflict. What resulted? Was there an addition to the prices of those grains? An examination of the figures shows that the very day after the acceptance went into effect, the higher local prices for hard wheats in Minneapolis dropped right to the level at which they had been before in Canada. There was no increase in the Canadian price at all. But what I am seeking to show now is this. The operation of that arrangement, by which for admission here the United States gave us admission there of our wheat and our wheat products, deferred as it was by necessary war restrictions and embargoes due to government control of the crops, was in effect only about six months, and then what was its fate? The United States government, exercising its undoubted right, imposed a duty of 35 cents a bushel against our wheat, cancelled the whole arrangement; put a 25 per cent duty on flour, and virtually barred both commodities.

We are now at the heart of this question. Is there any reason why the same results would not have followed the reciprocity pact of 1911, if it had been accepted? The United States government did precisely the same with our acceptance of their potato offer. There followed this consequence in each case, that the routes of traffic had to be reversed and there were certain markets that had been cultivated of which we lost the advantage by virtue of the turning of our trade in a contrary direction for a very brief period of time. Nothing fatal is to be apprehended from entering into a very restricted form of reciprocity of that kind, but if we enter it on a big scale, on an extensive scale, this country, as years go on, reaches a position of virtual subjection and subserviency to the legislation of the United States.

[Mr. Meighen.]

The Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) in his speech used language which I really cannot understand. He said that there was a time when we had reason to complain of the conduct of the United States, when its fiscal legislation was unfriendly to us; but that now we have no reason to complain of unfriendly legislation. I do not know, first of all, why this word "unfriendly" is applied to tariffs. I do not feel in the least unfriendly to the United States, because I believe in a fair protective tariff. The United States, when they put their tariff against us, thirty-five, forty and fifty, yes, one hundred years ago, acted within their rights. What cause had we to complain? Does any one know? I do not know wherein our right of complaint existed. The same right which they exercised then, they exercise now; they make their tariff to suit the changing circumstances of the United States of America; they make their tariffs, as they believe, in the interest of their own people. They have nothing to fear of a national character from any reciprocity with us; its continuance or its cessation means relatively little to them; our trade with them is merely an incident to the United States. We must remember they are eleven to fifteen times commercially the magnitude of us. It is a different thing when the figures are turned the other way. We are small compared with them, and if we follow the path of unrestricted reciprocity, we adopt a course that may, indeed is certain to, result in serious detriment to, if not in the humiliation of this country.

I have stated, without equivocation, as clearly as the very limited time I allot to myself will allow, where I stand on this question, I hope hon. gentlemen will admit that at least I have been true to the principles I followed in Opposition before, and in power when in the reins of power I had some share.

I come now to the amendment that is moved in this debate. The amendment recites, first of all the position occupied by hon. gentlemen opposite when they took office. It specifically recites definite, concrete, unmistakable engagements which hon. gentlemen opposite made with the electorate of this country. With those pledges I do not agree. I believe the fulfilment of those pledges would have been disastrous or, at least serious, to this country. I would not have supported their fulfilment; neither would I have given the pledges. But the fact is the present government needed them for the purpose of getting votes in Canada, the votes of those who believed that such was the right policy for Canada to pursue. Is there in this House any hon. gentlemen who doubts the truth of the assertion that those pledges were given in the most formal way, in the most solemn way, or, to use the language of the leader of the Government (Mr. Mackenzie King), in the most "democratic" way, in which pledges were ever given to a nation? They were given in the same democratic way that elected him leader of the party and that gave him, in his opinion, a title to leadership far transcending that of other men. Were those pledges ever reversed? Were they ever revoked? Were they ever modified to make clear to the people of this country that they were not still in existence? I know there was hedging; but I know there was a distinct and consistent determination, evident everywhere, never to let anybody be able to say that those pledges were not still in effect. What did hon. gentlemen opposite pledge themselves to do? They did not bind themselves merely to a principle and then abandon the principle under a screen of words—which is usually their course. They adopted a different course in this instance. They stated, as related to seventeen named articles and classes of articles: "If we are returned to power, we will make these free." Can any one comprehend the mental texture of a man who can look upon that distinct pledge to make seventeen classes of articles free as a mere "chart of direction?" Can any one understand the intellectual constitution that pledges seventeen classes of articles to be free and then talks about carrying that pledge out in the spirit as differing from the letter? I fall before the problem; I cannot comprehend cerebral contortions of that kind. Of those seventeen articles, ten were free when they passed the resolution, and all this they knew. I leave it to hon. gentlemen to the left now to divine why the party of the present government inserted such padding in the resolution? Seven were dutiable at that time and ten free, of these specific articles; and now that they are in power and have brought down the budget, seven of them are free and ten are dutiable. By virtue of the American legislation putting our wheat and wheat products on the free list, those articles are now dutiable which at the time they passed the resolution were free. Not one gesture has been made to make good the covenant. There has been no apostacy so brazen in the history of parliamentary government.

The next pledge is to increase the British preference to 50 per cent. Hon. gentlemen will recall the oft-quoted doxology, with which this platform ends: "The Liberal party pledges itself to implement by legislation the provisions of this resolution when returned to power." As regards this promised increase to 50 per cent in the British preference, they have taken off 2½ per cent on certain goods of which we get a portion from Great Britain; but if hon. gentlemen will examine the main articles in this list, they will find we did not have 33⅓ per cent British preference before. Woollens, for example, once had a one-third British preference, but in 1904 the present Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) came to the House and stated that with a 35 per cent duty on woollens and a one-third preference it only made a duty of 23½ per cent against British woollens; and, he added, "I find certain industries in this country cannot sustain the competition with such rate of duty". He therefore raised the duty to a minimum of 30 per cent. Now he comes to Parliament and reduces it by 2½ per cent, or not yet by one-third, which is supposed to be the relation between the preferential tariff and the ordinary tariff. Aside from the effect of the sales tax, aside from everything, what is to be thought of the microscopic reductions made here in relation to the pledge of the Liberal party, a pledge endorsed by the present Minister of Finance himself?

Mr. FIELDING: My hon. friend has no authority for that statement; I may tell him, he is mistaken. I have never voted for the tariff items of the Liberal platform and never concealed the fact that I did not approve of the platform in that respect.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I accept the minister's word without the slightest reservation, but I fancy that this is the first time, after hon. gentlemen opposite have been in power for five months, that any one in this country outside the walls of that convention knew that the present Minister of Finance dissented from the tariff plank of the Liberal platform.

Mr. FIELDING: My right hon. friend is the first person to make that statement, and I therefore now correct it.

Mr. MEIGHEN: One would think that the minister would not need to wait until I should make the statement to make his position clear in the matter. The Minister of Finance went to the convention a contestant for the leadership of the party.

Mr. FIELDING: My right hon. friend is hardly correct, but we shall deal with that later.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I was only following the words of the hon. member for Brome (Mr. McMaster) who was there. But if the Minister of Finance differed from the platform of the Liberal party and refused to be bound by it if returned to power, it was his duty distinctly to say so, to state wherein he disagreed with the platform, to make his position perfectly plain so that no one might be deceived. I know that the hon. member owns a journal;—I presume he owns it—and it was stated therein, shortly afterwards, that the convention had gone too far, and that it was the habit of conventions to make platforms to get in on rather than to stand on. But I do say to the Minister of Finance that he should have stated clearly and definitely, not through the medium of a journal, but with his own lips, precisely in what respect he differed from that platform and by what he proposed to be bound. Even though he did not vote for it, is he not, as a member of the party and the convention adopting such platform, bound by the pledges therein set forth until he severs himself from that party and that convention? And what is to be said of other hon. members opposite? How many members of the Government of the day will follow this example and stand up and declare that they were never parties to this tariff resolution at all? We are getting revelations now. Are there any more? Was the Prime Minister a party to that resolution? Did he support it? We will expect him to tell us when he speaks—but he will not. Was the hon. Minister of Marine (Mr. Lapointe) a party to it?

Mr. LAPOINTE: I will tell when I speak.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The hon. member takes care not to tell before. I venture to say that we shall have more dissentients now in this House than confessions from those who agree. I need scarcely ask the Minister of Justice (Sir Lomer Gouin) and the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell). I have not the least doubt the latter hon. gentleman was a party to the pledge. Will he tell us why he abandons it now? Those of us who have read some of his speeches of recent months on other matters will understand that his one time allegiance to this pledge may be the chief reason why he now refuses to put it into effect. I believe it was the hon. member for North Bruce (Mr. Malcolm) who, the other day, enunciated some theory in this House and expressed the pious aspiration that some time that theory would find its way into the platform of the Liberal party. Well, I am sure that if he loves his theory he will not wish for it a fate like that. There will indeed be a dark outlook for any policy that ever finds its way into the platform of the Liberal party.

Hon. gentlemen opposite were pledged to an increase in the British preference to 50 per cent if returned to power. At the rate they are going, I have computed that the building of this 50 per cent preference will be something like the building of a temple by the Romans which was completed by the Emperor Hadrian, in the year 135 A.D, seven hundred years after it was begun. Nor is there promise of anything more. The Government has brought down its revision, and the Minister of Finance distinctly intimated that he divides the changes of the tariff into two classes: The first is in the way of general reductions, and the second is in the way of detailed adjustments, some up, some down, to meet changing circumstances. He says, "We are dealing with the first now; the other requires time." So that, so far as the general reductions are concerned, he has led us to believe that he has gone as far as he is going to go in the fulfilment of the Liberal platform.

These resolutions were passed—they were embodied as well in the official literature of the party published two months before the last election, literature given into the hands of speakers throughout the Dominion, who were commissioned to preach this doctrine throughout the length and breadth of Canada. I know that many of their followers who supported them did not want such resolutions enforced at all. I am quite aware of that. But hon. gentlemen knew, when they adopted them, that there was a large section of their followers in this country, and perhaps some outside the ranks of the party, who did subscribe to these tenets and wanted these articles free. They, therefore, adopted this plank to get the votes of such people. They preached it to obtain their votes, and reaffirmed it in their literature. And they got their votes. Now they take those voters into camp, and every one of them is betrayed. And without those voters hon. gentlemen opposite would not be in the seats of power to-day. Are they there by any just right? Or are they there by false pretences? Are they there by usurpation?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No; by the will of the people.

Mr. MEIGHEN: By the will of a deceived people,—and by a minority at that. They adopt these pledges, they covenant with the Canadian people to put them into effect if they are returned to power. Their return to power makes the contract. They break the contract.

I refer now to what the leader of the party opposite said a year ago; I know an attempt will be made, indeed, it has already been made, to show that less concrete, less binding language was used later; I read the language of the Prime Minister in this House only last session. Hon. gentlemen will note as I read how he contrived to vary in part—at the same time to keep the general appearance the same—the language of the resolution adopted at the Liberal convention. I read a quotation from the Toronto Globe which the present Prime Minister himself read and approved at the last session of this House, as the latest revised policy of the Liberal party on the tariff, a policy by which he was prepared to abide and which he declared as the fulfilment of the Liberal platform adopted at the convention. This is the quotation.

> We believe that the time has come, indeed that it is already long past, when a downward revision of the tariff is necessary. In this revision we believe that there should be substantial reductions of the duties on the necessaries of life, in other words, on those articles which go to make up the food, the clothing, the shelter of the Canadian people; that certain specific articles required for the purposes of consumption and other articles essential to production should be placed upon the free list;—

They are not named, but I ask hon. gentlemen to remember those words in the light of another sentence which follows from the Prime Minister's lips.

> —and that in regard to the implements of production in the basic industries of agriculture, mining, lumbering and fishing, there should also be a substantial reduction of duties. It is not a question of free trade or protection.

All this is his own language:

> In revising the tariff to this end care will be taken of the position and needs of all the industries in our country, but such tariff as may be necessary in this connection will be, under Liberal policy, a tariff for consumers and producers, and not a tariff to further the interests of combines, monopolies, or of any special or privileged classes.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That is very good.

Mr. MEIGHEN: If that is very good, what becomes of the budget? The tariff he now advances, differing from the last, is one I suppose that does not favour "combines, monopolies or privileged classes." The old one did; this one does not. The old one was for monopolies and trusts; this is for producers and consumers. Such is the ineffable caricature of common sense which the right hon. gentleman asks the House to accept. But will he say this is very good? He proceeded:

> There should be substantial reductions of the duties on the necessaries of life, in other words on those articles which go to make up the food, the clothing, the shelter of the Canadian people.

"The food, the clothing, and the shelter of the Canadian people." Now, I pause to ask—because this is the last revised edition, affirmed by the Prime Minister—what has he done to "substantially reduce" the duties on "food," or to reduce them at all by even a fraction? His convention platform called for the making free of all the principal articles of food—in addition to the seventeen specific articles there mentioned. After the platform was made I asked the right hon. gentleman across the floor to be good enough to tell me some of the principal articles of food so I might know what they were. I asked him if fruit was one; I asked him if sugar was one; I asked him if flour was one; I asked him if bread was one; I asked him if meats were included—all the range of the common articles of consumption of the people of this country, but I could not get a yes or a no; I could not get even a nod as to what were the "principal articles of food." But, as quoted, he came along again last session and stated in the House that there would be a "substantial reduction" in "food" duties. He had by that time apparently abandoned the use of the word "free." Now, what are the principal articles of food the duties on which are reduced by this tariff? Are the duties on meats reduced? Not by a fraction of a fraction; they are not even touched. Is the duty on bread reduced? No. Is the duty on flour reduced? No. Is the duty on fruit reduced? No. The duty on not one article of food is reduced. But I want to be fair. Do hon. gentlemen know what has become of the "principal articles of food" now that the budget has come? The only articles that they touch are cocoa and liquid medicine. Those are what my right hon. friend apparently had in mind when he promised in his platform that the principal articles of food were going to be made free, and, subsequently, that they were going to be "substantially reduced."

Then we come to clothing; against the chief competitor of this country I do not think there is any reduction in the duty on clothing. As against Great Britain, which is much less a competitor to-day, yes, only a fractional competitor compared with the United States, there is a very small reduction of 2½ per cent, and that under the circumstances I already stated, all is accompanied by a virtually equal addition to the cost of the same goods by the imposition of the sales tax.

Let us come to "shelter." Now, may I ask again what has been done to implement this pledge made only a year ago, committing the then leader of the Opposition, now Prime Minister, and his party, to a substantial reduction of the duties on goods that go to make the "shelter" of the Canadian people? Can he name one article that is touched? I fail to find any. We had a promise of free cement. Where is free cement to-day? Have we had a "fulfilment in the spirit, but not in the letter." Can there be a fulfilment "in the spirit" of a promise of free cement? No reduction whatever! The duty has not been touched. Lumber goes into "shelter"—what has been done to lumber? Dressed lumber has always been protected. Lumber and cement are the chief articles of "shelter," but neither of them is touched at all. Nothing in the world has been attempted to make good the word of the Prime Minister to this House only a year ago.

Then he says:

> That certain specific articles required for the purposes of consumption and other articles essential to production should be placed upon the free list.

Such is the way he stated it to the House a year ago. The free list was definitely named in the platform. The free list here is described as "specific articles necessary for the purposes of consumption and certain other articles essential to production;" those are to be made free. Will any hon. gentleman tell me what has been made free? What were those articles to which the right hon. gentleman referred? The only thing made free that I can find is the "porcelain parts of pumps." These must be what the right hon. the Prime Minister had in mind. I venture to say that he does not know to-day—I do not, I admit—where porcelain comes in in a pump. Such is the performance presented now as the fulfilment of these pledges by the Prime Minister; and as I speak he is reflecting in triumph on how this gigantic hoax worked on the Canadian people, and smiles in self-satisfaction. The present Prime Minister was then asked by a member across the floor if he would adhere to the policy of the Liberal party as outlined in the convention of 1919 favouring a British preference of 50 per cent, whereupon he replied:

> The statement I have just read to the House is intelligible to every hon. member, and I think my hon. friend has quite enough intelligence to see whether there is anything that is inconsistent, in what I have just read, with the platform laid down by the Liberal party at the Liberal convention.

He thus led the House to believe that in the general terms he had chosen he had only repeated in other words the convention platform of 1919.

What is to be done about it? Some hon. members have suggested we on our part had better let the whole performance go. Because, they argue, if we rebuke conduct of this sort it will be equivalent to opposing the protective principle. That was argued by the hon. member for Springfield (Mr. Hoey); it was argued by several hon. members to my right—that is to say, that the practice of entering into covenants with the people to get their votes and callously violating those covenants after getting the votes must go unrebuked except at least at the hands of those who believe in the principles which those covenants embody.

Mr. HOEY: Will the right hon. gentleman allow me to make a correction? In reply to a question put by the right hon. gentleman, I said I certainly did not endorse the breaking of covenants. I made my position on that point perfectly clear, and I reiterate it now.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Certainly the hon. gentleman did; but he said he could not vote to rebuke the practice. That is what I am talking about.

Mr. HOEY: I said that, putting myself in the position of the gentlemen to my right, I could not ask a party that had made a wrong promise to follow it by wrong action, and find any ethical basis for my attitude.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Let us take the hon. gentleman's position; it is exactly as I stated it. He says no one can censure the practice of making promises and breaking them save those who believe in the promises.

5 p.m. He says: We the official opposition who do not believe in the promises must never censure the breaking of them. Is that not what he says? Does he claim logic for such a position?

Mr. HOEY: I see the logic of my own position.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Is this practice I repeat to go unrebuked except at the hands of those who want that policy enforced? Even those who want it enforced apparently will not censure. But the practice is just as distasteful to me as it is to the hon. member.

Mr. HOEY: Hear, hear.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The practice is as distasteful to those who have no part or parcel in the Liberal policy as it is to hon. members to my left. Its viciousness appeals just the same to those of one fiscal view as it does to those of another. The hon. gentleman however does not need to put himself in our position; let him reflect on his own.

Mr. HOEY: I am just as anxious to be clear on this point as my right hon. friend is. If he argues that a wrong promise should be followed by wrong action, he simply argues that two wrongs make a right.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The hon. gentleman does not seem to see that it is the practice of making a promise and violating it that we are striking at, and that is all we are striking at. He has searched the recesses of his mind in vain to get some excuse for refusing to vote a censure on the Government of the day, though that Government, he admits, has followed demoralizing practice—a practice that he says he reprehends.

Now, let me turn for a moment to the position of hon. gentlemen to my left. They are not on very strong ground to chide the Government. Indeed, the leader of the Progressive party (Mr. Crerar) has a large share of the responsibility for the course the Government has pursued in this budget. The leader of the Progressive party early in this session gave the Government notice that if they turned their backs on their fiscal pledges he would refuse to call them to account. He indeed held out an invitation to the Government to abandon the pledges they had solemnly made to the people of this country. The first sign of such conduct on the part of the Government was when they turned away from their pledge to make additional cash grants to returned soldiers —turned from it without a quiver, without a sign of hesitation, and declared they did not intend to fulfil it or any part of it. The leader of the Progressive party then asked all his followers to vote against a censure of the Government for the guilt of such conduct. Well, were they any more bound by the one pledge than by the other? Once you put the seal of your blessing upon that kind of conduct you take the whole consequences and those consequences the leader of the Progressive party and his following are taking now.

"Oh," he said, "I cannot vote for this amendment because it says that the budget proposals constitute an utter failure to implement the pledges of the party by legislation." Such language is too strong, he says.

Mr. CRERAR: I want to correct my right hon. friend. He is indulging in a good many excursions this afternoon, and I want as far as possible to keep him to the line of truth.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. CRERAR: Well, Mr. Speaker, if I am out of order it certainly was unintentional on my part. I will say, to keep him to the correct line. He can read my remarks of yesterday and he will find nowhere that I made the statement he has just attributed to me.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I have Hansard before me, and I will read exactly what my hon. friend said:

> The terms of the amendment are very simple; they state that the budget proposals brought down constitute on the part of the Government an utter failure to implement its pledges by legislation. Well, while I have been pretty severe in my criticism of the Government, I do not think those words are justified by the actual facts of the case.

Mr. CRERAR: Hear, hear.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is precisely what I said.

Mr. CRERAR: No, it was not.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Hansard will be my vindication. He could not support the amendment because it declared that the budget proposals constituted an utter failure to implement those pledges by legislation. Well, do they not constitute an utter failure? The hon. member said he could not go that far, but his own amendment goes that far; it declares that the budget proposals are wholly inadequate to implement the pledges by legislation. The leader of the Progressive party refuses to vote for our amendment because it says that the proposals are an utter failure to redeem pledges, but he is ready to vote for his own, which says they are wholly inadequate to redeem them. I would suggest a study of the two phrases to the linguistic experts who sit around him.

The reasons the hon. member gives for saying that these proposals are not an "utter failure" but in his opinion are "wholly inadequate," are these: The exchange provision, and the marking provision, and the dumping provision, of a year ago, are wiped away, and these changes are a partial fulfilment of the pledge. But the pledge was made over a year before these provisions were ever enacted therefore it could have had no relation to these provisions at all, for they did not exist at the time the pledge was given. May I ask what has led the leader of the Progressive party and the chief whip of the Progressive party and that stalwart Liberal (Mr. Hoey) who sits to his left—what has led them to induce their following not to vote rebuke against the Government for conduct which they themselves condemn? How will they explain that to their constituents?

I often wonder, when the proud day comes that hon. gentlemen to my left return to their homes to lay at the feet of their constituents the legislative trophies they have won, what they will say in respect of this amendment. These hon. members came down to Parliament, with hopes high and language loud and strong. They came for a wheat board—they came to a Liberal Government for a Crowsnest pass agreement—for a reduced cost of living—for their tariff platform. And they will go back and have to say: No wheat board, nothing of that; no Crowsnest pass agreement, nothing of that—if I read the countenances of hon. gentlemen opposite aright. Cost of living? Worse than nothing! there increased and heavily increased, on all the people of this country. The tariff? Nothing there. The Hudson bay railway, did I hear someone say? I do not know that the railway was so prominent, but if so, nothing there. All nothing. What they can say to their constituents is this: We have nothing to bring back for you, but we remembered our old party—the home of 5 out of 6 of us and we kept the Government in power. We refused to censure them for anything. They were guilty of conduct that one and all of us decided was wrong, guilty of dishonouring their plighted word to the people—but we let the performance go—we really could not join in with the Tories to condemn them. We have been the parties, to the extent of our power, to relieve the Government of the obligation of carrying out the programme in which we—ourselves professed to believe. That is the story they must carry back to their constituents.

For my part, were the Government to introduce the legislation to which it pledged itself a year ago I, not believing in that legislation, would vote against it. But, in addition to not believing in those concrete acts of policy, I do not believe in duplicity, I do not believe in betraying the people; I do not believe in deceiving the electors of Canada.

Mr. LAPOINTE: What a change.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It is a change from the hon. member. If we are to follow the practice in this Dominion of making concrete pledges to the country, of going to the people and saying, this is what we will do if returned to power, and then coming into office and callously repudiating those pledges, where is responsible government? Hon. members who vote against this amendment vote to declare that when electors hereafter decide on any proposal of public policy, they are not to know or have any idea at all what is to result from their vote. Such a consequence ends responsible government.

Now I come to the sub-amendment so called.

Mr. CRERAR: Before dealing with that, would my right hon. friend inform the House whether he will vote for the budget?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I shall not vote for the budget, and I shall give my reasons in a very few minutes. The hon. member for Marquette said, though—and this is really illuminating as to his attitude: You have reduced ploughs only 2½ per cent, binders 2½ per cent, but if you had even said that you could not afford to reduce any more because of the needs of revenue, then I would have accepted it.

Mr. CRERAR: I do not think my right hon. friend will find that remark in my statement yesterday. What I did say was that it would then have received consideration from the House.

Mr. MEIGHEN: To save time looking it up, let us assume it was put that way; I do not see much difference; the hon. member expressed an attitude of favour if those words had been spoken. Why, the Minister of Finance might just as well have spoken those words as not. He could have said in perfect truth that the needs of revenue were such that he could easily justify 12½ per cent, and, I venture to say, 20 per cent. The needs of revenue to-day are four times what they were when his Minister of Customs in his own hearing declared that 17½ per cent was not enough on these same goods. There was nothing in the world to hinder the Minister of Finance giving the hon. member for Marquette that assurance, and I do not hesitate to prophesy that the Minister of Finance will give it yet, and I shall find no fault with him if he does. If he had only done so first then the gentle breath of this subamendment might never have disturbed the Government.

Hon. gentlemen point to where we have voted with the Government of the day. Our principles do not vary because the Government of the day comes over and adopts them. If hon. gentlemen can show that we vary from the principles followed when in office well and good—let them try. But hon. gentlemen to my left take good care that on any matter of consequence, on any vital matter before the people of this country, they do not become parties to any resolution that seriously reflects on hon. gentlemen across the floor.

Mr. CRERAR: That was not true on the freight rates resolution.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The hon. gentleman did what he could to acquiesce in the Government's course of putting that question off from day to day, knowing that the putting of it off means additional freight rates daily to the people of this country, freight rates from which they should have been relieved before this.

Mr. CRERAR: Where does my hon. friend find any warrant for that statement?

Mr. MEIGHEN: He refused to support our motion which demanded that the Government announce its policy. Once the Government's policy on the Crowsnest agreement is announced, that is all the Railway Commission needs, and the Railway Commission is delaying now because of the failure to adopt that resolution which demanded an announcement of Government policy.

Now I state that while the budget follows the protective principle, while no one could honestly dispute that it does—follows it as the old budget followed it—it is not in my judgment, without faults, and some serious faults. There are phases of the proposals of the Minister of Finance that I think carry with them menace to our business, our production and our trade. Indeed, I venture to suggest that we will find in committee the Finance Minister coming pretty much to the views that I shall now express and making some very considerable changes in these same decisions that are so loudly approved by hon. gentlemen to my left. I hope so.

I believe the absence of all special restrictions due to the depreciation of German and Austrian exchange is a mistake on the part of the Minister of Finance, and a mistake that he ought to correct. Germany to-day is one of the highest protected countries in the world, as is the United States, and Germany to-day is making marvellous progress. German minds, inventive as ever, have devised a plan by which they are able to maintain the mark value in their own country at a standard several times higher than it reaches for purposes of exchange; that is to say, the working men and the people of Germany are able to get more in goods proportionately for their money than that money is worth in the exchange markets of the world, more by many times over. They do it first of all by multiplying mark production, a tremendous inflation of currency. They do it as well by the stabilization of certain of their essential articles of consumption. By these methods they have contrived to put the working men of Germany in circumstances far more advantageous than those in other countries. That truth is recognized the world over. This condition has to be met; it has to be met by special provisions here. There may be another way of dealing with it better than the method heretofore adopted, but I do suggest to the Minister of Finance that something should be done, because if it is not done, the penalty is going to fall on large masses of the workmen of this country and to the practical advantage of none.

The Government asks as well that instead of the marking provision by which Parliament set out definite requirements for the marking of imports with the country of origin, it be given power to place such imports as it likes within the category to be marked. I do not think this is a right provision. I am surprised that it comes from hon. members who once worked themselves into fury denouncing Order in Council government. This Government wants the right to exercise a tremendous power by Order in Council unrestrained. Do hon. gentlemen realize the lever thus to be given them? They can say to one industry in this country, "You are not our friends; no marking required of the goods that compete with you." To another industry they can say "You are our friends; we will demand the marking of goods that compete with you": In a word it places it in the power of the Government on tariff matters—where above all others subjects it should not be in the power of the government to impose restrictions at all—it places in its power the distribution of favors among the industries of this country; it places in its hands a power of discrimination that I do not think the Government should ask this House to bestow. I do not say that it is not done in other countries: It may be that some similar power exists in the United States, but their system of government differs from ours. I am free to admit that the regulation on this matter, in the way it passed Parliament last session, was so broad that modification is essential; but it should be possible by this time to make such modification or to restrict the power of the Government within narrower limits than those suggested by the Finance Minister in his budget speech.

As regards various other features of the budget I think there should be important changes. What I mean to say by my vote against the budget is this: That having in mind certain matters particularly the question of exchange and its effect on valuation, the question of marking as well, and also the question of the abolition of last years dumping clause —a proposal that to certain industries of this country is injurious and seriously so, I do not feel free to vote for the budget. There may also be reductions that should not be made. There may be other reductions that could be made, I am ready to wait for the explanation of the Finance Minister in those regards. If he can show that he has made some reduction to the consumer without injury to the people of this country, without injury to the working man—at least with no uncompensated injury to the working man—well and good; I want reduction if it can be made in that way. I am ready to wait for his explanation. I believe he will find that in relation to implements he has done something which very probably will injure the manufacturer and his employees, very probably will turn working men on the streets in various cities of this country; but will not reduce by one cent the cost of the implement to the consumer in Canada. All the saving that is effected on implements of a hundred dollars value is 36 cents; against this also the increase in the sales tax will result in another practice—that implement manufacturers who distribute by means of agencies and heretofore have absorbed the small sales tax themselves will find it impossible to absorb the larger tax, and the full extent of that sales tax will fall upon the consumer. I would not be surprised therefore, if the budget should result in a slight increase in cost—even the article whose duty is lowered. And the sales tax addition is general.

But, what is to be said of the hon. member for Brantford (Mr. Raymond) who contested his seat on the distinct and unique platform of opposition to the reduction of duty on implements? What is to be thought of him if he submits to this budget? Particularly having in mind the Finance Minister's assertion only a few days ago that he was hopeful there would be no reduction of revenue owing to the 2½ per cent reduction of duty? If there is no reduction of revenue it simply means more importations; it means that this reduction is made at the expense of the workmen of Brantford; it means more people on the street and more charity levies in the cities of Brantford, of Hamilton, of Toronto and of sixty other places in this country. If the Finance Minister's logic is right that is how it will result, and all without advantage to the consumer of this country.

I should not sit down without saying something as regards certain other hon. gentlemen who, in the face of the pledges of their party, made wonderful commitments to their constituents. The hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Macdonald) is absent, but I hold in my hands something of the special Pictou platform upon which he appealed for election. He denounced the late government for not taking care of the trade needs, in a fiscal way, of his province, particularly in relation to coal and in relation to steel. Having paid special attention to me for daring to say that I had been instrumental in reducing the higher duties, by five per cent on farm implements—having done that he makes this statement to the people of his constituency at Stellarton on October 28, last:

> And so, my friends, I am not like Col. Cantley—unwilling to give pledges. I tell you, if I go to Ottawa, I shall urge parliament to put a duty on coal that is a real duty, and not a fake duty.

And speaking of steel he said:

> I pledge myself along the lines and in the way I have indicated, and I am prepared to say to you that when the Liberal party comes into power after December 6th they will find a solution for these difficulties. We will create conditions under which we can once more bring sunshine and happiness and prosperity to the homes where there is nothing but despair.

How was he going to do it? Further he said:

> I am here to pledge that when I go to Ottawa I shall move a resolution in the interests of Nova Scotia that the duties on the steel products produced here would be increased in order to enable them to be effective.

So there will be reason on the part of hon. gentlemen opposite for opposing the Government, if they intend to be faithful to the special platforms that they contrived to manufacture for their own special benefit in their constituencies. Similar comment applies to many hon. gentlemen opposite. I do not think that in the history of Canada a government ever sat in office whose position was more impossible, more indefensible, more unenviable than the position of hon. gentlemen now. Some talk about the difficulties of the Government and sympathize with the Finance Minister. Why, their position is impossible because of their own conduct, because of the situation they have got themselves into by the pledges which they deliberately made and which they cannot fulfil; which they knew, or ought to have known they never could fulfil. The scourge they bear was made by themselves; their difficulties are of their own creation. The fields of revenue had been explored. There is no new field found in this budget—none at all. There is simply the traversing of the old ones. That does not present the difficulty that the Government is in at all. The difficulty the Government is in is this: It is impossible to act in consonance with its own official commitments, wholly impossible, and do justice or save disaster to Canada. It is impossible, as well, to act in consonance with the commitments of one score of its supporters without violating and destroying the commitments of another score sitting somewhere else in the House. That is the reason the Government is in difficulty. The people of Canada, if I read aright the tenor of the debates on this budget, have evidently succeeded in getting rid, and very probably for good, of trade theories that are fallacious, unsuited to our country, and that could carry us only to disaster. Such theories are probably gone —smothered by those who gave them birth. The next duty of the people of Canada, a duty which we on our part proceed to discharge by this amendment, is to visit punishment on those who pledged themselves to policies in which they had no belief and who after deceiving a large electorate by so doing and thus gaining the sweets of power violate those pledges cynically and with indifference.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, despite all the criticism to which we have been obliged to listen during the last hour and a half, and what has been said against the proposals contained in the budget of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding), if evidence were needed to show that the proposals that have been brought down to the House are, everything considered, the wisest and best, having regard to the conditions of the country at the present time and the circumstances under which this Parliament deals with the budget, that evidence will be found in the conflicting character of the two amendments which have been proposed, the one which has been rejected, the other which remains; and the speeches which have been made in support of those amendments. If we take a broad view of the budget proposals, what do they disclose? They show that the Government has made an effort to relieve the burdens of taxation where they bear upon the great body of the people, and that the Government has recognized the superior obligation of the well-to-do to bear a larger measure of the taxation which is necessary in order to raise the required revenues of the country. It is impossible, in any budget proposals, to attempt to satisfy the different shades of opinion in a country as large as this is. It would be folly to assume that even in the same political party, men, no matter to which degree their views inclined in one direction, would all necessarily see eye to eye as to what is best in the way of tariff revision, coming, as they necessarily must, from different parts of the country, representing different needs and different requirements. I submit as I have already intimated, that, in the proposals which the Minister of Finance has brought down, he has succeeded in relieving taxation, as it bears upon the great mass of the people, and shifting the burden of taxation to a more considerable extent upon the shoulders of those who are best able to bear it. He has done this in a manner which avoids the raising of any sectional consideration in this country. That, above all others, is the most important objective in dealing with financial, fiscal and, indeed, all other problems in Canada. If, in our budget debate or in any other debate, we are to put forward a distinctly sectional point of view, or any class point of view, in arguing from that point of view, instead of binding the nation together as one in a strong and united way, we will be helping to make separations and divisions, which it should be our supreme aim to avert. That, the Minister of Finance has succeeded in avoiding; he has brought in a budget, which helps to reconcile differences, not to exaggerate them. Indeed, as I have already said, the conflicting character of the two amendments would seem to show that the Minister of Finance has succeeded in avoiding extremes.

If you compare the speech of the leader of the Progressive group (Mr. Crerar) with the speech of the leader of the Opposition (Mr. Meighen), they indicate two extreme points of view. The hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Crerar) places his emphasis in one direction; the leader of the Opposition places his emphasis in another direction. The Minister of Finance seems to have succeeded in discovering the happy mean and in avoiding the extremes which these two hon. gentlemen are advocating at this particular time. It would be unreasonable to expect that the Government, in dealing with a question of this proportion at the first session of this Parliament, would go far in any direction; it is only reasonable to expect that the Government should be guided by caution, taking only those steps which are most in the interest of the country as a whole, and avoiding anything which would tend to have a disturbing influence on the country's affairs during this period of reconstruction.

May I touch first of all upon the amendment of the hon. member for Marquette which was ruled out of order only a few minutes ago by yourself, Mr. Speaker? As I understand the matter, the objection which the hon. member for Marquette has raised to the budget proposals is that they constitute, to use his own words, a protectionist budget. I fail altogether to discover where my hon. friend finds grounds for such a contention. There is not a single protectionist feature in what the Minister of Finance has proposed to this House. The budget proposals, if you divide them, fall into two groups. The first are in the nature of a repeal of certain pieces of legislation that were enacted by the recent administration. The hon. member for Marquette admitted that that legislation was all of the nature of disguised protection, and he himself congratulated the Minister of Finance on wiping out this disguised protection. What is the nature of the rest of the proposed legislation? All the rest of it is in the nature of a reduction of existing duties; there is not an increase anywhere. Under those circumstances, how can it be contended that fault should be found with the Government because its budget is a protectionist budget? Actions speak louder than words. The only way in which it is possible to judge a budget is by the direction taken in the proposals which it contains. Every proposal that has been made by the Minister of Finance is in the direction of freer trade, not at all in the direction of protection, and my hon. friend cannot point to a single instance to the contrary.

Let me pursue this in another way. Assume that the Minister of Finance had adopted an opposite course; that instead of repealing legislation which he said, and rightly said, was in the nature of disguised protection, he had supplemented that legislation by further legislation of the same kind, and that instead of reducing the duties on some fifty different commodities he had increased the duties by the same amount on the same number of articles; would the leader of the Opposition (Mr. Meighen) have been jutified in saying that this was a free-trade budget, because it was heading in the direction of additional protective regulations and increased duties? The logic of the facts is the answer to the amendment which my hon. friend from Marquette has moved. The budget proposals are a sincere effort to carry out the purport, purpose and spirit of the Liberal policy in tariff matters, as it has always been understood and officially stated. The question is not one between protection and free trade; that is not the issue at the present time in dealing with the fiscal proposals that are before the House. The question is one of revision of the tariff; how the existing tariff can best be revised in the interest of all classes in this country, having regard to the conditions of Canada at the present time, having regard to our relations with our neighbours to the south and to all other countries. In that regard, I think it will be found that the most careful, thoughtful and moderate judgment has been exercised, and exercised in a manner which will be entirely to the good of this country.

May I take up the amendment of the hon. member for West York (Sir Henry Drayton), to which the leader of the Opposition has spoken for the most part? I shall not try to follow my right hon. friend into any theoretical discussion of the merits of protection, or of free trade, nor into any discussion of reciprocal agreements and their advantages or the reverse. That is not the question before the House at the present time. The question is whether the budget proposals, as made, all circumstances being considered, are the wisest and best for this Parliament to adopt in its first session, the session which we are holding at the present time.

Let me point out that both the amendment, and the amendment to the amendment which has been rejected, have this in common—and it is something to be considered owing to the nature of the criticisms that have been made of the budget proposals—that neither of them has anything constructive about it. Neither the hon. member for Marquette nor the leader of the Opposition, in the amendments which they have placed or sought to place before the House, offers a single suggestion in the nature of an amendment affecting the existing proposals. That surely constitutes one of the strongest pieces of evidence that the Minister of Finance has succeeded in bringing down proposals which, on the whole, and considered altogether apart from party politics, are the wisest, the most prudent and the best, all circumstances being considered.

The burden of the amendment moved by the hon. member for West York (Sir Henry Drayton) and supported by the leader of the Opposition is in the nature of a condemnation of the Government on the alleged score of having disregarded political honour. Well, my hon. friends had a try at that a little earlier in the session, and if the House will compare the two amendments, it will see that not only were they drawn by the same hand, but that the one so far as it goes is a copy from the other. The amendment might as well have been moved on going into supply at any time as by way of an amendment to the motion concerning the budget. It offers nothing in particular that bears especially one way or the other on the budget. But let me suggest to the hon. member who has moved the amendment, and to his associates, that people living in glass houses should not throw stones. They will do well to remember the Scriptural injunction: "Judge not that ye be not judged, for with what judgment ye judge ye shall be judged, and with what measure ye mete it shall be meted to you again." My right hon. friend, in seeking for the mote in his brother's eye, has forgotten entirely the beam in his own.

Mr. LAPOINTE: "Beam" is the right word.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Some two years ago, on May 18, 1920, in point of exactness, the hon. member for West York, who at that time was Minister of Finance, professed to give to the House what were the tariff proposals of the party to which he belonged. What did those proposals set forth? They will be found in Hansard at page 2491 under the date I have mentioned. He said:

> Our policy calls for a thorough revision of the tariff with a view to the adoption of such reasonable measures as are necessary:—
> (a) to assist in providing adequate revenues,
>
> (b) to stabilize legitimate industries and to encourage the establishment of new industries essential to the proper economic development of the nation—to the end that a proper and ever increasing field of useful and remunerative employment be available for the nation's workers,
>
> (c) to develop to the fullest extent our natural resources,
>
> (d) to specially promote and increase trade with the Mother Country, the sister dominions and colonies and Crown dependencies,
>
> (e) to prevent the abuse of the tariff for the exploitation of the consumer.
> (f) to safeguard the interests of the Canadian people in the existing world struggle for commercial and industrial supremacy.

That was the statement of the tariff proposals as given to the House by the then Minister of Finance on May 18, 1920. Within a month and a half after these proposals had been set forth in this manner, the hon. gentleman, together with other hon. members opposite held a caucus in which they took into consideration the position of their party and the platform on which they would appeal to the country later on. In that caucus they discussed the tariff among other matters and drew up a platform which has become more or less notorious in discussion, the platform of the National Liberal Conservative party, so called. What do we find on a perusal of that platform? We discover that it is a copy almost to the letter, of what the then Minister of Finance had stated in his speech to the House as being the tariff proposals of his party. I have said it is an exact copy of the minister's speech, it is that with but one exception, a very important exception, which I shall read. I have in my hand the platform of the party which my right hon. friend (Mr. Meighen) leads, and it fails to include, as a part of the policy of that party, this very significant clause:

> To specially promote and increase trade with the Mother Country, the sister dominions, the colonies, and Crown dependencies.

That was dropped out of the context in the declaration of the platform.

Mr. STEVENS: The right hon. gentleman made exactly the same statement last year and I corrected him on that occasion. I beg to be permitted to do so again.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Please do.

Mr. STEVENS: He will find that clause, which he says is omitted from the platform, in a different part of the platform as set out in the pamphlet he holds in his hand.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend will have some difficulty in discovering the clause in the platform. The policy of the party is set forth in this platform, and the tariff is printed in heavy dark lettering, in sections "A, B, C, D, E, F."

Mr. STEVENS: The right hon. gentleman made the same statement last year, but he is wrong.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That part of the platform to which I have referred contains no reference to furthering trade with the Mother Country, and I will leave it to my hon. friend when he speaks to point out where, in any other part of the platform, this policy is referred to.

Mr. STEVENS: If I may be pardoned for interrupting the right hon. gentleman, I merely wish to state that he is inaccurate in saying that there has been dropped out of the platform the clause to which he has made reference.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Well, I state again emphatically that my hon. friend will not find anywhere in this tariff platform that clause I have quoted. I challenge him to find in the platform the following words:

> To specially promote and increase trade with the Mother Country, the sister dominions, and the colonies and Crown dependencies.

I say he will not find that statement in the document.

Mr. STEVENS: Will my right hon. friend send the pamphlet across the floor.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: By all means; but my hon. friend will not find in it that clause for the reason that the caucus to which I have referred, in arranging its programme, decided to omit the clause when appealing to the people. Now, if that is not a case of disregarding political honour I should like to know what is.

Mr. STEVENS: I read in this platform the following words:

> The principle of trade preference between the different members of the Britannic Commonwealth should be maintained and extended from time to time to such a degree as may be found practical and consistent with Canadian interests.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That is a very different statement from the one I have read.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Wherein does the difference consist? Explain the difference.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If there is no difference between the two statements, then why was the change made?

Mr. STEVENS: There is no difference.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: And this is the party that professes so much loyalty to the Mother Country, and stands so strictly for consistency!

Mr. STEVENS: You will admit that that plank is contained in the platform.

Mr. DUFF: It is not there.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Well, perhaps we might pass from that to something else, if there is any doubt as to whether the party opposite have always kept their pledges. I hold in my hand the Speech from the Throne delivered in this Parliament on February 14, 1921, and I quote the following, the most solemn pledge that could be given to a Parliament. His Excellency, at the opening of Parliament read:

> My advisers are convinced of the necessity for a revision of the customs tariff. In order to secure the most complete information a committee has conducted an extensive and thorough inquiry, and has secured the views of all parties and interests in every province. The hearings necessary for this purpose have now been completed, and the conclusions founded thereon will be submitted to you in due course.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Hear, hear.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My right hon. friend says "Hear, hear". Does he mean that the time has still to come for action in that matter?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The time would have come all right. We made no pledge whatever to submit those conclusions at that session.

Mr. FIELDING: Then why did you make reference to it in your sessional programme?

Mr. MEIGHEN: For reasons which the hon. gentleman knows and which he has confirmed himself.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My right hon. friend is very logical in these matters. Will he tell us then, why he takes exception to our not putting our whole programme into effect this session?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Because you pledged yourself to do so when returned to power.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Does my right hon. friend think that this Government is in power only for one year? If he does he is mightly mistaken.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Will the Prime Minister say that he intends to put all the platform into effect? Does he intend implementing the convention platform in its entirety?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If my right hon. friend lives long enough he will live to see what this Government will do in the matter of this platform; but one thing he will never live to see is this Government putting words into the lips of His Majesty's representative which it does not intend to translate into action.

Mr. MEIGHEN: But the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) says he is against that matter.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I notice my right hon. friend still jumps up each time he is hit.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That joke is too old.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Now my right hon. friend condemns the Government for not putting its platform into effect at this particular time. Why has he not moved his platform in an amendment to the budget proposals now before the House?

Mr. MEIGHEN: What would be the use of moving a protectionist platform to a protectionist budget?

Mr. FIELDING: My right hon. friend is going to vote against it.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Let me pass to the more serious aspect of this question, which relates to whether the Liberal party has or has not carried out its pledges of tariff revision. Take, first of all, the platform of the Liberal party as drafted at the convention in 1919. My right hon. friend is fond of alluding to that particular platform.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Hear, hear.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: He knows as well as I do that at the time of being selected leader of the Liberal party I spoke before the convention which drafted that platform and expressed my views in regard thereto. Broadly, I stated that I would regard that platform as a chart which indicated the direction that the Liberal representatives assembled expected the party to take if returned to power, but that I would be guided as to how far it was wise to go at any particular time by the collective wisdom and the judgment of the ablest men whom it might be possible to bring together to direct the affairs of this country. I made that statement, not at some remote gathering, but at the very convention which enacted the platform.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Does the right hon. gentleman suggest that he had the right or the power to amend or vary his party's platform?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think that it is most distinctly the duty of the leader of any party, if he wishes to take a particular position, to state that position immediately to those who belong to his party, and if they take exception to his stand, then is the time to discuss further whether or not matters shall be further amended. I contend that every Liberal who was present at that convention heard that statement and accepted it, and there is not a single Liberal throughout the country, so far as I am aware, who has taken exception to that interpretation. That is what I am concerned about—the view the Liberal party takes of its own platform, and of the interpretation put upon it; and when there is no exception taken within the ranks of the Liberal party itself, it matters very little to me what my political opponents think or have to say.

But I might go a step further. Apart from that interpretation, the Liberal party at the last session of Parliament stated its position on the tariff very emphatically. Let me draw the attention of hon. members to this circumstance, that that was done before the Liberal party made its appeal to the people. Between the time the Liberal Convention was held and the time of the general election, the Liberal party as represented in this House of Commons, were sitting opposite, where my right hon. friend and his supporters are sitting at the present time, and there the Liberal party stated their position on tariff revision as it was to be considered when the time of the elections came. I have in my hand the amendment moved. Here are the essential features of it, and I contend that every one of them has been carried out in the proposals of the Minister of Finance—not in full, perhaps, but that every proposal is in accordance with what is here laid down.

> That while recognizing that existing financial requirements of the Dominion demand the maintenance of a Customs tariff, the House is unable to concur in the declarations by the Government that the tariff should be based on the principle of protection; the tariff is a tax, and the aim of legislation should be to make taxation as light as circumstances will permit;
> That the aim of the fiscal policy of Canada should be the encouragement of industries based on the natural resources of the country, the development of which may reasonably be expected to create healthy enterprises giving promise of enduring success.
>
> That such changes should be made in the Customs duties as may be expected to reduce the cost of living, and to reduce also the cost of implements of production required for the efficient development of the natural resources of the Dominion;
> That, while keeping this aim clearly in mind, the House recognizes that in any readjustment of the tariff that may take place, regard must be had to existing conditions of trade, and changes made in such a manner as will cause the least possible disturbance of business.

There is the position of the Liberal party as stated in the House of Commons, and that was the position which members of the party took throughout the campaign in setting forth their stand on fiscal reform and tariff revision.

But I might go a step further. Let us come to the campaign itself. There, it seems to me, is where we are to be judged, as to whether or not we appealed to the people on one particular ground or another. It is not honest to say that the platform as laid down at the Liberal Convention was the basis of our appeal; indeed the charge made over and over again by the right hon. the leader of the Opposition throughout the campaign was that the Liberal party had thrown its platform to the four winds of Heaven. That was given as a reason why the party should not be returned to power. The right hon. leader of the Opposition is pretty good at hunting up speeches that have been made in the past, and he has plenty of assistants working for him who are busy gathering and assembling this kind of material. He has not called attention to one single speech or utterance of mine made throughout the last campaign which in the slightest particular conflicts with the budget proposals now before the House. I submit that that is the best evidence as to whether or not there was any deception of the electorate. There was no deception of the electorate, as a matter of fact. I did not hesitate to state where I stood and where the Liberal party stood on the tariff, and throughout the course of the campaign I stated it not in a single province but in every province, with the exception of one, where however I had publicly stated it in the preceding year.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Did it differ from the statement made by the right hon. gentleman in the House last session?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It did not differ in any particular in one province or another or in one city or another.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I did not ask that.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If it differed in any particular from what my right hon. friend has just read I am sure he would have drawn the attention of the House to it.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Did—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. MEIGHEN: All right. Did it?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think my right hon. friend is quite able to find that out for himself, and I am prepared to give him that opportunity. He will recall that when the campaign opened last September he led off in a speech which sounded what he believed was to be the dominant note throughout the campaign. He said in so many words: Let us make it a protectionist campaign. True, before the contest had run very far we did not hear very much about the protectionist proposals which he made at the start. But he was very definite in putting the question to me as to where I stood, and that question I never failed to bring to the attention of every audience I addressed. I propose to read it to the House and ask hon. members, in the light of it, when on this occasion we are talking of a disregard of political honour, of betrayals and deception and the like, how the country will view the amendment moved by the party opposite to the budget proposals now under discussion. An amendment, mark you, Mr. Speaker, which condemns the Government for not putting that platform into effect in its entirety. Speaking in London, Ontario, on the 1st September last my right hon. friend said:

> To-night I put on record the question—Does Mr. Mackenzie King stand pledged to put that platform in effect if returned to power? That question admits of two answers, and two only, one is "yes" and the other is "no". He cannot refuse an answer.
> Let the answer come. I state my position now. Put that convention platform in effect and you add enormously to unemployment. As it is we have enough, and far more than enough; but we have the least for our population of any country that went through the war. Put that platform in effect and you cripple the industries and darken the horizon of many a town in this country. Put that platform in effect and by wiping away the small barriers we have to the influx of foodstuffs of the United States you make more hazardous the market and more burdensome the lot of every farmer in this country. If Mr. King answers "Yes", I say he should not have power because his platform is unsound and un-Canadian, false to the interests of our people of every class and occupation. If he answers "No", which I shall not presume until he says so, then I say he is unfit for power because he deliberately contemplates bad faith. If he refuses to answer at all, then he is unfit for high office as lacking in frankness and candour.

Well, that was boxing the compass very successfully on the part of my right hon. friend. But I did not hesitate to answer. I read that statement and I stated very frankly to every audience that I addressed that I did not stand for the Liberal platform literatim et verbatim in the manner in which my hon. friend would like to have the public believe I did.

Mr. BOYS: Was the right hon. gentleman a party to the insertion of the platform of 1919 in the handbook of 1921, which bears his photograph?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Let me just deal with that for a moment. The platform of 1919 was certainly inserted in the handbook, and it would have been an extraordinary thing if it had not been. But the platform of 1919 was not put forward throughout this last campaign as a pledge or promise on the part of the Liberal party of its proposals if returned to power.

Mr. BOYS: My question, if the right hon. gentleman will answer me, is this: Was he a party to putting it in that handbook?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Just a moment. I think hon. gentlemen opposite have discovered for themselves just how far the Liberal party in the campaign through which we have just passed made the platform of 1919 a pledge and promise to the electorate.

Mr. BOYS: Why not answer the question directly?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I have alluded to the fact that earlier in this session an amendment was moved by an hon. gentlemen opposite the member for Parry Sound, on a motion to go into Supply, condemning the Government for not having carried out, as it said, certain resolutions forming part of that platform. The amendment which is now moved is in the same language, almost the same words in every particular, but the amendment which was moved by the hon. member for Parry Sound (Mr. Arthurs) had in it certain words which have been dropped from the present amendment—why? Because hon. gentlemen opposite know they could not sustain them. The resolution of the hon. member for Parry Sound read:

> That the policy embodied in such resolution so adopted was continuously thereafter held before the people of Canada, and in an official hand book issued in October, 1921, by the Liberal party under the authority of its leader, Hon. W. L. Mackenzie King, the said resolution was quoted and reaffirmed.

You will find that phraseology in both these amendments; but here are words which follow in the amendment proposed in regard to the soldier question which are not in the present amendment in regard to the tariff:

> And the promise and pledge embodied therein declared to be the policy of the Liberal party.

These words are not in the amendment respecting the tariff proposals which has been moved, in this debate and which is now before the House and their omission is very significant; it proves of itself that hon. gentlemen opposite know very well that throughout that campaign no effort was made to say that the Liberal platform as drafted in 1919 would constitute a promise and pledge to the electorate if the party were returned to power.

Now, I am sorry to have taken up so much time on this matter, but when charges of duplicity and betrayal and the like are made, it is, I think, only proper that they should be answered in a sufficient degree at least to enable the electors to decide for themselves whether such charges are true or false.

Let me ask, in conclusion,—because I do not wish to go over a lot of ground that has already been covered in this debate or may be covered before the motions are put—what was the position taken by the Liberal party as respects the tariff in the last election? On what appeal did we get from the electorate the support which we received; and by which we are bound at the present time? We stated first of all —and may I for the moment use language that I used in the different provinces? —that the Liberal party was not a free trade party, as my right hon. friend would have had the electorate believe when he was speaking in some of the urban centres; secondly, that the Liberal party was not a protectionist party, as my right hon. friend tried to urge when he was speaking in the rural centres. I pointed out that the question that was before the people was not a question as between protection and free trade, but was a question of the revision of the tariff; that the Liberal party had stood for tariff revision on the basis of a tariff for revenue; that that had been the historic and traditional policy of the Liberal party; that we believed that a tariff was necessary for the purposes of revenue, and that that was the basis which we would keep in mind in revisions of the tariff.

It was further stated that the revision should be downwards, in the interests of producers and consumers, and that in such downward revision we would seek to lower the duties on the instruments of production in the basic industries and on the necessaries of life, with a view to increased production and the lessening of the cost of living to the masses of the people. Finally it was stated that in the changes to be made there need be no fear of injury to any legitimate industry earning legitimate profits as a consequence of the revisions affected.

I contend, Mr. Speaker, that in the budget proposals as introduced those pledges have been fulfilled, not only in spirit but in the letter, and this, not at the last but at the first session of this new Parliament.

Let me point out further that all this has been done without any flare of trumpets, and what is of even greater importance at this time, without cost to the country of tariff commissions travelling to and fro across the land, conducting make-believe inquiries and compiling voluminous abortive reports.

Finally, may I make mention of one further representation. The country was led to believe that if the Liberal party was returned to power the work of tariff revision would be entrusted to that much revered, and greatly trusted public servant, the Hon. W. S. Fielding. Through the providence of God that all-important hope and pledge of the Liberal party has also been fulfilled. Many hon. gentlemen opposite have joined with others on this side of the House in expressing their pleasure and pride in having been privileged to witness the presentation of his sixteenth budget in Parliament by the present Minister of Finance. May I say that their kindly references in this regard are not less appreciated by the Minister of Finance himself than by those of us who, through longer or more intimate association with him, are even more favourably situated than hon. gentlemen opposite to judge of his great personal worth and inestimable public service. It is not alone the Minister of Finance who is to be congratulated upon the achievement we have witnessed, but the whole of Canada. And in recording their votes upon the resolution and the amendment thereto which is before the House, I would ask hon. members not to be unmindful of that fact. The measure of tariff revision you are asked to support is what, in the light of his mature and wide experience, has seemed wisest and best to the one man upon whose judgment more than that of any other living person the people of Canada are ready and willing and desirous of relying in tariff matters.

It is to the benefit of all classes and parts of our Dominion that, if possible, there should be stability in tariff matters and confidence in the judgment by which that stability is secured. All circumstances considered, stability and confidence alike will, I believe, be secured in greater measure by the adoption of the resolution the hon. the Minister of Finance has moved, than by any amendment that can be offered to it; and on this all-sufficient public ground as well as because of what it may afford of more than merited recognition of the wise and prudent counsel of the veteran statesman of this House of Commons, I hope its hon. members will accord to his motion an overwhelming if not a unanimous support.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

After Recess

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. NEIL H. McTAGGART (Maple Creek): Mr. Speaker, in rising to say a few words on the question before the House I deem it a privilege to associate myself with other members who have congratulated the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) on the clear and lucid way in which he delivered the budget speech. I am not ashamed to say that my earliest recollection of Canadian politics is closely identified with the name of the Minister of Finance, as well as with the name of his late chieftain, Sir Wilfrid Laurier. I well remember the pilgrimages made from this country by the Minister of Finance in order to try and secure wider markets for Canadian produce, as well as the removal of the restrictions to Canadian trade. Because of those efforts I looked forward to very substantial relief in the directions indicated in the present budget. I am sorry to say that in this anticipation I have been very much disappointed. Let me remark in this connection that I am reminded of a prediction made by the right hon. leader of the Opposition (Mr. Meighen) in the early days of the session, in which he stated that the Progressive party would be sorely disappointed when the budget proposals were brought down. It would seem that the reputation of the leader of the Opposition as a forecaster of coming events has not suffered very much by reason of that prediction.

I understand that it is the custom in this House to make references to the speeches of preceding speakers. As a new member I am sorry that it is possible I cannot pay the due meed of credit to the two splendid orations that were delivered this afternoon. I am not going to attempt to do so, but I have just this to say: I listened with deep interest to those speeches but was disappointed in that I could not discover in either of them any solution to the problem which confronts Canada to-day. If protection is a good thing for this country ought we not to expect that the speeches of the leaders of the two great political parties would contain some substantial proof of the benefits which Canada has derived from a protective policy? I can say in all sincerity, that although I listened with deep interest to both speeches I could not discover that they contained any proof of the benefits derived by Canada in the past or the benefits which she might expect to receive in the future from a protective tariff.

The debate on the budget has had a very wide range and the ground has been, I believe, almost completely covered. I would not attempt to project myself into this debate at all, were it not that I believe I can treat this question from a new angle. I am not going to attempt to repeat the arguments that have been already advanced, and particularly those brought forward by my honoured chief, the leader of the Progressive party. I will, however, say this—that the situation in Canada at the present time is not encouraging. We have a huge national debt, we have a rapidly increasing taxation, we have idle factories and thousands of unemployed, we have depopulated areas and a rapidly increasing number of abandoned farms. When I think of this situation, and I do not wish to indulge in any levity, I am reminded of the ground hog which was travelling rapidly in the direction of the nearest tree. Some one said "What is he running to the tree for? Surely he does not hope to climb it?" The friend of the observer replied, "He will be compelled to climb it, the dogs are after him." Now, Mr. Speaker, so far as Canada is concerned, the time is rapidly approaching when she will be compelled to make readjustments of her economic structure, to put her house in order so to speak, and to make it possible for all classes of her people to establish comfortable homes. Of course, when mention is made of the situation as it now exists in the Dominion, the war is always blamed; and I will admit that the war has imposed upon our people a heavy burden. But the responsibility does not rest so much upon the war as upon ourselves; I maintain that the war is not wholly responsible. It is my conviction that the people who are to-day engaged in the work of developing the natural resources of this country are carrying a heavier burden than they can bear, and that substantial advances in that direction will be impossible in the future until we have a readjustment and a revision downward of the customs tariff. It is also my conviction that on December 6 last, the people of Canada made a definite pronouncement in regard to the customs tariff. It is my opinion that the verdict cast by the people on that date was that the policy of protection as enforced in Canada for over forty years had failed all along the line, and I would say this further—that unless this burden is removed at an early day the future of this country will be seriously jeopardized. As regards the present budget I am in sympathy with the removal of certain restrictions to trade. With these, I am not going to deal; they have been fully dealt with by previous speakers. One objectionable feature, however, is the increase in the sales tax. I believe that this increase will render heavier the burden now resting on those who are engaged in developing our natural resources. I have wondered ever since it was introduced where the idea originated of having this sales tax increased, and I am going to read for the benefit of the House a recommendation made by the representatives of the Canadian Manufacturers' Association to the Government on February 23 last. These recommendations are contained in a little booklet entitled "Statements in regard to matters connected with Trade and Commerce presented to the Government of Canada by a deputation from the Canadian Manufacturers' Association." Now on page 11 of the booklet we find these recommendations:

That duplication of taxation be avoided as much as possible.

That the Income War Tax Act as regards corporations shall be repealed.

That the present Sales Tax shall be adjusted so as to provide additional revenue.

As regards the new budget which has been brought down, I am in sympathy with the statement which has been made that this is a protective budget. I am not surprised that Conservatives, who have been so much interested in "morganatic alliances", refrain from criticising the taxation proposals as outlined in this budget. The minister, in a statement which he made when he brought down his budget, intimated that Canada's expenditure for the current year would be very large, and that the revenue would scarcely meet these burdens. It was also intimated that there was expected to be a reduction in the amount derived from the customs tariff, and this is the particular feature of the budget to which I wish to refer. It seems at least a strange thing that a reduction in revenue should be contemplated from the customs tariff, notwithstanding that the tariff, generally speaking, has not been changed to any appreciable extent. It is my opinion that industrial and commercial institutions in Canada of an international character have found a means to circumvent the tariff. We learned in this debate from the previous speakers that large amounts of American capital are invested in Canadian industries, and the point I wish to make is that this outside capital which is invested in Canadian industries, has been used to exploit the Canadian consumer. I am going to endeavour to give the House a case in point, and I believe that what I am going to describe applies to many other articles of commerce in Canada to-day. I have in my hand a package of cut tobacco, and I believe this article of commerce is sold to-day in almost every community throughout the Dominion of Canada and the United States. I purchased this tobacco in the city of Ottawa a few days ago, and this is the trade mark on it:

The genuine Durham Smoking Tobacco; W. T. Blackwell and Company; Blackwell and Durham Tobacco Company, Successors, Durham, N.C. Manufactured by the Imperial Tobacco Company, Limited, Montreal, Que.

This package contains, according to the stamp on the package, one-fifteenth of a pound, and on the tag which is attached to this package, we read this slogan: "None genuine without the bull on each package." What I have to say about this package of tobacco is this. When I purchased this package of tobacco on Sparks street, I asked the salesman if this package of tobacco was made in Montreal, and he stated that he thought it was. I asked him if he could sell me the same tobacco imported from the United States, the American make, and he said that he could not. I asked him if he could procure the American Bull Durham tobacco, and he said that he did not know; that he thought it possible that he might. I want to give the House some figures in connection with this tobacco from the constituency in which I reside. I paid 20 cents in Ottawa for this package, and it retails in my constituency at 20 cents. What we might call the American Bull Durham tobacco is put up in packages of 1⅛ and 1⅝ ounce sizes. This tobacco contains 1 1/15 of an ounce of tobacco and sells wholesale in Saskatchewan at $2.38 a pound. This same tobacco sells wholesale in the state of Montana at 80 cents a pound. The retail price of this tobacco in Saskatchewan figures out at 18¾ cents an ounce; in Montana, the retail price figures out at 6⅝ cents an ounce.

When my friend in Saskatchewan called my attention to this particular feature of the customs tariff, I asked him: "Why do you not import this tobacco from the United States?" I understand the duty on this tobacco is 95 cents a pound. If he purchased it at 80 cents a pound in Montana and paid the duty of 95 cents, that would make $1.75, and that would still leave 63 cents, which would be more than enough to cover sales tax and other charges. I was, therefore, surprised that my friend did not import this tobacco. I want to give the answer of that friend in Saskatchewan in regard to the matter, and it is that it is impossible to import this tobacco into the Dominion of Canada because the Canadian authorities refuse to put a revenue stamp on the American pack because it does not conform to the particular value of our revenue stamp. There is a difference in the weight of the two packs of 7-120ths of an ounce; but the American tobacco cannot be imported to-day into Canada, for the reason that the size of the American pack does not conform to the particular value of the revenue stamp as it at present exists in Canada. I said to my friend: "Surely there is a way to circumvent even that. Why not write to the American Tobacco Company and have them make a pack conforming to the Canadian revenue stamp?" My friend had forestalled me in this, as he had already written to the company on several occasions. There are two replies, which I am going to read because they are more or less evasive. This is one dated October 18, 1921:

F. O. BARNSTAD,
Shaunavan, Sask.

Dear Sir,—We are just in receipt of a reply from the American Tobacco Company, in regard to putting up the 2 oz. package of Bull Durham which you requested that we try to order for you from them.

They state that they put up a 1⅛th oz. pack only, which is the one that we carry in stock at the present time.

We regret our inability to fill your order on the particular sizes that you request.

Yours very truly,
MINOT GROCERY COMPANY.

This is another letter:

Re your letter September 15. Replying to above letter on Bull Durham tobacco, we carry the 1⅛th ounce bag, put up 24 in a carton, and 12 cartons to the shipping case. This 1⅛th ounce bag costs $.96 per dozen and is retailed at ten cents here.

We do not carry cigarette papers in stock.

This is an argument in favour of the statement I made that American industrial and commercial companies of international character are finding a way to circumvent the tariff, and Canada does not secure the revenue. I hope the House will understand that I am not finding fault with the high price of tobacco in Canada, or in Saskatchewan. I would be perfectly willing to pay those high prices for that tobacco, provided I used it, if I knew that the excess price which I was paying over and above the legitimate price was going into the Canadian treasury. This is another letter, from the same gentleman by the way, dealing with some of the abuses of the customs tariff on goods coming in from the United States. He says:

I enclose herewith facts in regard to a shipment that I just received to show you how charges are piled on to a shipment so that it is almost impossible to import tobacco.

I enclose bill of lading to show that shipment consisted of 54 pounds, cancelled draft shows that I paid for same $47.63 plus $2.42 American exchange or $50.05. This is what I paid the shippers for the 54 pounds prepaid to Shaunavon.

I also enclose my expense bill from the Canadian Pacific Railway who cleared this shipment through the customs at Weyburn. Their bill calls for $64.64, or a total of $1.19 per pound, whereas our tobacco duty is supposed to be 95 cents per pound.

There is another letter which deals with the duty on cigarettes. It is as follows:

SHAUNAVON, SASK., March 21st, 1922.

NEIL MCTAGGART, Esq., M.P.,
Ottawa, Ont.

Dear Sir,—I attach a price list that I just received from the J. R. Reynolds tobacco as I desire to call your attention to the ridiculous rate of duty charged on cigarettes. You will note that I can buy Camel Cigarettes freight paid for $3.65 per thousand list price (They allow 10% discount from this list) but call the cost freight paid $3.65 per M.

Our rate of duty is $4.10 a pound on cigarettes plus 25% of invoice price, also at present there is a surcharge on account of exchange and a 4% sales tax on the duty paid value of a shipment and a charge by custom officers for attaching revenue stamps.

For figuring duty charges the customs department, figure in the weight of the package that the cigarette comes in, this is shown in the list as 3.5 lbs. per M.

If you will figure out the duty you will find that on a thousand cigarettes that cost me freight paid $3.65 I will have to pay over $16.00 duty, etc. I am told that the Canadian manufacturer of cigarettes pays a little less than $7 per M; as to that I cannot vouch but I believe it about correct.

Instead of a per pound charge why would it not be best to have duty figured on the invoice price of cigarettes, I would suggest 100% duty on the invoice price, this certainly should be sufficient protection for any industry and would stimulate the importation of these Camel cigarettes and other lines as well and our government would get 100% duty on each invoice, whereas now the practically prohibitive duty keeps us from importing.

This is a particular phase of the customs tariff, as it exists to-day, which is worthy of attention, and I hope the Minister of Finance will give this question serious thought. I believe there are abuses of the customs tariff, in the direction I have indicated, in many lines of industry. For instance, I should like to know why the Eastman people of Toronto sell cameras in Ottawa or Quebec at $25 when they can be procured at Niagara Falls, New York, for $14.50.

I want to say a word in regard to what has been stated in the debate touching the alleged danger of reducing the tariff. It has been said in this House on several occasions that Canadian industry cannot compete with industries in the United States. Well, in this connection I am going to quote again from this booklet issued by the Canadian Manufacturers Association. At page 12 there is an article entitled "Preferential Tariff, Australia and Canada," from which I shall read a paragraph, because I believe it proves conclusively that Canadian industries generally can compete with the world:

> The Customs appraisement laws of Australia now stimulate importations from the United States instead of from Canada. The Australian law applies ad valorem duties on values which are based upon the "home" market value of the goods in the country of export. The application of the Australian duty on values based upon the home market price in the country of export results, as a rule, in the Australian duties being greater on goods made in Canada than on the like goods made in the United States. Let us illustrate: Because of revenue duties on materials of a class or kind not obtainable in Canada, which must be imported by the Canadian automobile manufacturer, the "home" price on a Canadian-made car is higher than the United States "home" price on a similar car. But the Canadian manufacturer, under the Customs drawback regulations, can sell his car for export at prices which approximate to the United States price. Thus a United States automobile, on importation into Australia, pays duty on the basis of the "home" selling price in the United States; and the same automobile made in Canada and shipped into Australia (although the export price based on drawback would compare favourably with the United States export price) would be valued for duty in Australia at the higher "home" selling price in Canada,—resulting in the payment of greater sums in duty than would be payable on the like car made in the United States.

I think that this admission on the part of the Canadian Manufacturers Association is an admission that Canadian industry can and does compete in the markets of the world, and does so favourably.

Now, when I began I said I would endeavour to be as brief as possible, and so I shall now conclude. Before doing so, however, I should like to say a word in regard to the speech of the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Baxter). I was very much surprised at the outburst of the hon. gentleman. He seems to think that in heaping ridicule upon the Progressive party he is rendering the public some service. He expresses the view that the Progressive party would not be fair to the Government in supporting the amendment moved by the hon. member for West York (Sir Henry Drayton). Well, let me say that we do not want any morganatic alliance between the Progressive party and hon. members to my right in regard to that amendment.

Hon. W. R. MOTHERWELL (Minister of Agriculture): I am sure it must have been very gratifying to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) during the past week or ten days, after listening to the battle of words and wits over this budget, to find that no substantial dint has been made in the fiscal armour with which he has surrounded his tariff proposals. While a few pinpricks may have been made in these proposals during the debate, they can easily be ironed out when the resolutions are before the committee. I observe, too, that the criticisms levelled against the Government during the debate have been chiefly of one character, that is, the making of allegations, charging dereliction of duty on the part of the Liberal party and this Government with respect to the non-fulfilment of pre-election promises, and the carrying out of pledges and platforms. We are familiar with these things, Mr. Speaker. Ever since I can recall anything of Canadian politics, particularly since 1896, I know we have always been charged with dereliction of duty in the matter of carrying out pledges, promises and platforms. If there is anything in this surely the people would not have trusted us anew last December. However, I am going to try once more to dispel the idea that there is anything in these allegations with respect to either the tariff platform of 1893 or the platform of 1919. On a hot evening like this, some hon. gentlemen opposite may think that this is a big contract, but I do not at all feel that way; I am perfectly confident that I can undertake and successfully carry out the proposition I have in hand.

I shall hurry along because I want to deal briefly with other matters of an agricultural nature, but there is one point in regard to the question of platforms that I desire to take up now. I have in my hand the platform of the Liberal party of the year 1893. Now, I do not desire to go back into ancient history, but this matter has been dealt with in the debate and I shall refer to two features of the platform which will serve our purpose. I will read the pledge, with regard to the tariff. It is as follows:

That it should be so adjusted as to make free or to bear as lightly as possible upon the necessities of life, and should be so arranged as to permit freer trade with the whole world, more particularly with Great Britain and the United States.

With respect to free trade with Great Britain, Mr. Speaker, surely there is not a single member, no matter how violent an opponent he may be of this Government, but must concede that we have carried out this pledge to the letter and the spirit. A preference of 33⅓ per cent was granted on a large number of commodities from Great Britain. It is quite true that a part of that preference has been absorbed by the higher ocean rates, but that again will be picked up by the increased preference that the Minister of Finance now proposes. I do not think there is a single member but will concede that that pledge of the 1893 platform has been carried out in toto. The preference has not gone to 50 per cent yet. But give us a little while longer. We were in power fifteen years last time, and if you will give us another fifteen years, or a half or even a quarter of that term, see where we will be then.

As to the other plank of the platform, that in regard to reciprocity, I can recall as a boy about six years old when the original reciprocity treaty of 1854 was abrogated. From 1867 to 1911 all parties in this country had both hands up—had both feet up if it was necessary—for reciprocity. Then when it was brought down in 1911 an agitation, started by the Opposition in conjunction with certain manufacturers, the principal ones being in Toronto, was directed against reciprocity and carried to success by means that we are all familiar with. In a word, they defeated the reciprocity pact. Here is the pledge in regard to reciprocity:

That a fair and liberal reciprocity treaty would develop the great natural resources of Canada, would enormously increase trade and commerce between the two countries,— and so on. That is pledge No. 2 of the 1893 platform. Did the Liberal party carry it out or die in their tracks? Of course, we all know that the party died in their tracks trying to carry reciprocity. Surely further proof is not necessary of their sincerity.

Let us see what the reciprocity pact meant. I have the draft here. You do not find very many people carrying this around nowadays—only the Liberals. On the first page I see a large number of articles, in fact all the natural products of Canada, on the free list, carrying out that pledge of freer trade. I wonder if our farmer friends, when they taunt us with failure to fulfil our pledges, ever think that there are dozens of articles on the free list of the reciprocity pact. Did we try to carry out that arrangement? Why, did we not give up our political life in the attempt? And what more could be expected of any political party? Do you want to hold us responsible for our failure after we were defeated in 1911? I remember being at a political meeting on one occasion where two or three gentlemen actually took that ground. I draw attention to that to show the utter absurdity of the stand they took. What more could we do? What dereliction of duty has the Liberal party been guilty of in regard to that platform since the 1911 defeat? Well, then, if there has been no dereliction of duty, why cannot every one who supported us in respect to reciprocity at that time support us yet? Especially, why did they not support us at the last election? There must have been some reason. Well, if every hon. gentleman is prepared politically to die on behalf of the platform of his party, what greater sacrifice can you wish for in the carrying out of political pledges? No man can do more than that; that is the supreme sacrifice. Then if that be so, why are we charged with failure to fulfil those pledges at the present time? I was sorry to hear the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Good) actually suggest that we were pledged to free trade. That is not so. But even if we had been pledged to free trade there was a very large and substantial measure of free trade embodied in this reciprocity pact. Then we have the hon. gentlemen opposite finding fault. And I must say that in one respect I admire them, for you always know where they stand. I wish I could say as much for all groups in this House, but we cannot have everything always our own way. However, I compliment my hon. friends upon that feature.

I am going to point out how differently the 2½ per cent decrease in the tariff is regarded now compared with the reception which was accorded our proposal originally to make that reduction in connection with the reciprocity arrangement. At that time the Farmers and the Conservatives made a lot of this 2½ to 5 per cent concession. On the first ten pages of the agreement I find fifteen articles on which the duty is reduced by 5 per cent—they are nearly all agricultural implements—and twenty articles on which the duty is reduced 2½ per cent. We went to the country satisfied that that was a pretty good bargain. It will be remembered that included in the arrangement was free trade in natural products. To-day our Progressive friends make light of that 2½ per cent cut in the tariff, but they thought it was all right in 1911—most of them at any rate, except those who opposed reciprocity and are now shouting because they cannot get it.

How did our Conservative friends take it? They talked as though we were going to the bow-wows—they told us that we would go to bed as Canadians and wake up next morning whistling Yankee Doodle if we entered into this reciprocity agreement. At meetings you would see the American flag on the one side and the Union Jack on the other, with the question: Under which flag are you going to live? I myself was turned topsy-turvy at one time, and have been mad with myself ever since. In 1891, when we proposed unrestricted reciprocity—reciprocity as wide as a barn door, everything free between us and the United States, I wonder how the farmers of Ontario voted when this country was nearly 80 per cent rural and the proposal was defeated. Well, we will forget it.

But I nearly went wrong myself in 1891. I was very much disturbed about what I had heard regarding the evil effects of reciprocity with the United States. I remember I went to a meeting—and if Senator Turriff is anywhere within hearing he will recall the occasion—in a little school house at Kenilworth, which he was conducting. Of course, he was Mr. Turriff in those days. I was reading reasonably good papers, for instance, the Montreal Witness, but I had missed it for two or three weeks, and I very nearly lapsed during that interval. I was told that reciprocity meant annexation, and that was dinned into me so frequently that I was actually beginning to believe there was something in it. Of course, I was young in those days and believed a good many things that our Conservative friends used to tell us as facts. I found at the schoolhouse every blank space plastered with great big posters indicating annexation to the United States. Here you saw doleful scenes depicted, the men were signing mortgages, the hens were flying in the direction of the 49th parallel, and even the cats had their tails in the air. When the meeting was opened I was visibly impressed, and I remember in my innocence when Mr. Turriff finished speaking on behalf of the Liberal cause and Mr. afterwards Senator Perley—an old war horse from the maritime provinces who knew nearly as much regarding politics as my innocent Progressive friends over the way—I asked Mr. Turriff in open meeting—what a foolish thing!—It showed how little I knew of politics in those days; and I am told I know less now—I asked him if there was anything in this allegation that reciprocity meant annexation. I actually embarrassed him with my question. I have not done it since; I try not to commit the same offence twice. But that kind of campaign, Mr. Speaker, has been continued from that day to this; in fact, that is what defeated reciprocity in 1911. It may be said that the people should, in the ordinary course of events, get wise to these things, but you must remember that every ten years we have a new bunch of people ready to be deceived; and that is the hope of the Conservative party—the deceiving of the new elector. If it were not for that, they would not be in power in this country. I do not know when they are going to get in again, because the campaign of education that has been conducted by the Progressives during the last three or four years has educated the people in these matters as nothing else has ever done; and I will give them credit for it. I want to make some candid admissions; I do not find myself very far from their ideals, their hopes and their ambitions with respect to tariff matters, though I do differ with them very seriously on the question how to bring these ideals and reforms into effect by legislation. But that is about the only place where I do differ.

Now, let us see what else was involved in this reciprocity bargain. Why did the manufacturing interests so strongly oppose it? It was not, surely, because 2½ per cent or 5 per cent was taken off agricultural implements. It was not, surely, because the farmers were going to have a better market, were going to realize more on their goods and be able to buy more manufactured articles—and not only to buy them, but to pay for them, which also is an important thing. I have never been able to understand the reason for the opposition of the manufacturers to the proposal; I have not been able to see what species of absolute madness could have tempted them to oppose it—because I want to say that they will never get as good a bargain again, any more than the farmer will. Under this proposal the farmers would have got the benefit of a market consisting then of 100,- 000,000 people—it is more now. Some of my hon. friends say that even if the reciprocity agreement had been adopted, it would in time have been abrogated. But suppose it had been adopted and had remained in force for ten years from 1911 until 1921, surely ten years of a market at our doors of the wealthiest people on earth, wanting our goods and prepared to pay for them, would have been worth while. Ten years is at least one-fifth of a man's active lifetime; fifty years is a long period for any one to engage in active business or farming. Well, we would have had one-fifth of that business or agricultural career under the conditions laid down by reciprocity; would not that have been worth while? Moreover, we would now be in a better position to push on under the conditions of hard sledding which prevail. Why, when reciprocity was formerly in force, we had it for only twelve years, from 1854 to 1866, and we all know how Canada prospered, how the maritime provinces prospered, how we all prospered during those years. Would it not have been worth while to have another ten years like that? Taking it, therefore, at the discount suggested by my hon. friends, it would have been well worth while.

But there is one thing which I myself overlooked when this campaign was on. I have before me a long list of articles included in the reciprocity agreement as arranged for by my hon. friend the Minister of Finance and his colleague the late Mr. Paterson. Under this provision access was to be obtained to the large market of the United States, not only by the farmers, but by the manufacturers of Canada for their manufactured wares. But they did not know enough to take advantage of it. In this list thirteen articles are included, with various reductions, ranging from 25 to 50 per cent, and nearly all on agricultural implements. The farmers were not interested in this; it was an opportunity for the manufacturers to get the very thing they wanted, an opening for their products. The arrangement was, therefore, fair to all concerned. I say it was the most tragic mistake ever committed by any country when Canada turned down that offer. The Finance Minister made the prediction at that time that if the reciprocity agreement were turned down Canada would see the day she regretted it, and we have been regretting it, Mr. Speaker, ever since. As a matter of fact, the cause of reciprocity has gained tens of thousands of friends since that day. I will not deal longer with that phase of the question, Mr. Speaker; I think I have shown with respect to the platform of 1893, or the two outstanding features of it, that we have kept to the one—that is, preferential trade with Great Britain—and we went down with our flag nailed to the masthead in the attempt to carry out the other. If anybody is prepared to do more than that, he should not be in politics; he should be on the other side of Jordan.

So much for that. I want to say a word about protection, and I would like the attention of the leader of the Progressives so that he can see how near I come to him on that subject. The hon. member for Last Mountain (Mr. Johnston) made a statement something like this: that protection could not last indefinitely, especially on the prime necessities of life. With regard to the kind of protection that we have now, I am opposed to it. I do not say that we should not help new industries—I will deal with that in a minute. I do say that we should help new industries in some ways, but there are many ways of doing it besides the protective system under an import tax. The trouble with the customs tariff as a means of assisting infant industries is that these industries insist upon being infants for all time; at any rate, they have done so ever since this policy was inaugurated. They are now forty-four years old—whiskers on them as long as your arm, and still insisting that they are infants.

Now, that is the objection I have to it. If we are to apply the principle of protection, particularly to the implements of production, then it could well be argued that we should pass protection all around, if it is so good. Now, what would that mean? I do not advocate that course, which would involve a second mistake to correct the first; for you cannot correct one wrong by committing another. The way to correct the evils of protection is to remove them; remove the cause of your difficulty; do not substitute a fresh cause as a corrective, or counter-irritant, if you like. But what would it mean if we invoked the remedy that the farmers of the United States are invoking? They have ceased the fight against protection; they are tired of fighting it, and they have said in the agricultural bloc: Pass it all around.

What would that mean in Canada? There is no doubt about it—you can philosophize as much as you like about the percentage of our farm products that we consume in our own country, but so far as western grain is concerned we have to rely upon a foreign market for 90 per cent of our output. So that protection so far as it affects us in providing a home market is a minus quantity. That being the case, how are you going to protect these articles? How are you going to protect the farmer if we decide, like they did in the United States, to pass it around? Now, I am just giving this as a hypothetical case, but there is no way to protect your grain, which seeks an open market in competition with the world, except by putting a bounty on it of 10 or 15 cents. We have many precedents for that in Canada, in respect to steel and other articles. Imagine what it would be like—taking out of this pocket the protection on the article and putting in the other pocket a bounty on our grain. Yet that is the only way that you could protect the farmer in the growing of grain.

Who would be so mad as to propose such an awful nostrum as that? But I have met people who have actually proposed it. I was in Toronto after the defeat of reciprocity, and they had some slight contrition even there, and they asked me if something could not be done for the farmer along that line. There are other products, like butter. Yes, we could put butter up another six cents, equal to the Fordney bill rate. How would you like that? We could do the same thing with eggs, and all along the line. But would that reduce the cost of living? Is that the solution? Yes, Mr. Speaker, it is the logical solution unless we remove the element of protection, especially from implements of production, just as soon as it is possible to do it. I do not know when that will be, but we have taken a step in that direction, and a substantial one. If I were five steps from the edge of a precipice, and I took one step towards it, I would be substantially nearer the edge of the precipice than before. Some hon. gentlemen over here, the hon. member for Brantford (Mr. Raymond), for instance, think it is a substantial step. He thinks so because he does not like it. It is a substantial step. It is 20 per cent off the protection that was on there.

It is not fair of the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Crerar) to say that this is a protectionist budget. It has protectionist features, but every change the Minister of Finance has made was a direct and deliberate step away from protection. Is there not hope in that? Rome was not built in a day. We have had the tariff a long while, running away back to 1878, but I see evidences on the horizon to-day that the movement in the right direction is going to be accelerated in the very near future so far as the implements of production are concerned. How can we develop the natural resources of this country without cheaper implements? How are we going to pay the national debt unless we develop our natural resources? Surely that is evident, and requires no demonstration on my part.

Mr. CRERAR: Would the hon. member inform us whether he is arguing for or against the budget?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I thought I made it plain that I was arguing for it. I even tried to illustrate my position so that he who runs might read. I said that if I were five steps away from the edge of a precipice and took one step towards it, I was substantially nearer the edge. I thought that was plain enough even for my hon. friend.

At the Liberal convention in 1919 we crystallized our thoughts and our views and got as near as we possibly could to a platform, and there it is. Of course, you cannot get a body like that all of one mind. Some have reservations. As a matter of fact, there was another statement made, and I want to say this much: Every member of this House last session spoke another word with respect to his attitude on tariff. Now which holds good? If you or I, Mr. Speaker, or anybody else made a will last year, and we decided to make another one this year, which would hold? Is it not the last one?

Mr. CALDWELL: Is this the Government's last will and testament?

Mr. FIELDING: No, we will have an opportunity of making others.

Mr MOTHERWELL: If you take the opposite view and say that the first expression of opinion, no matter whether it was given forty or fifty years ago, should hold to-day, do you call that progressive? We have a precedent furnished by our Progressive friends themselves. I am speaking entirely from memory, and my hon. friends will correct me if I am wrong, but I understand that a year ago the Canadian Council of Agriculture revised their platform. You will remember it had a plank calling for 50 per cent British preference, and free trade with Britain in five years, but at a meeting of the Council of Agriculture last July the words "in five years" were eliminated. The platform was modified absolutely, and they had a right to do that. Which is their last will and testament in that respect?

Mr. CRERAR: I want to correct my hon. friend.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I would be very glad to be corrected, because I remember it quite distinctly.

Mr. CRERAR: I want to keep my hon. friend on the right track if I possibly can. He has wandered far from it. His statement in respect to that change is not correct.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Then set me right. I do not know whether my hon. friend was present at the meeting or not, but I had a clipping with respect to it, and I have given it as I remember it. Unfortunately, the clipping got lost in the mix-up of the election. Nearly everything but the counting of the votes had disappeared by that time.

I said a few moments ago that there would always be individual opinions. Do you mean to say that they do not exist over there? I will say for the Conservatives that they are absolutely at one in regard to what they think are the 9 p.m. benefits of protection. I do not know whether it is a detriment to a party to have a diversity of views within itself. I hold views with respect to helping young industries. I absolutely oppose the present system, because you cannot get rid of them when they grow up. Do you think that Sir John A. Macdonald, who introduced the system, would declare that what were infant industries in his time were still infants? The thing is ridiculous. It was my privilege to have the opportunity of assisting a young industry, the dairying industry in Saskatchewan. It was not by import duties that we assisted it but in various ways, by loans, by guarantees, and by a certain amount of office staff. At the end of ten years we had a flourishing dairying industry on our noble prairie, and we handed it over to the farmers and said: "We are going to wean it. Take the industry over and run it yourselves." But our friends of the Manufacturers' Association, who have been on the nursing bottle forty-four years, do not want to be weaned, and the longer you leave them there the less they will want to be weaned, but we must do it now if we ever expect to do it, or as soon as possible. I am going to show you how it can be done. In common with the Minister of Finance I may say that there were features about our platform that I did not approve of. Not being here, and not taking any part in the resolution that was adopted last session, I feel I am in honour bound by the convention. There was another expression by the leaders of the Liberal party in this House, which has a right to take precedence. But I am not going to take advantage of that. Here is what I said in my nomination address in Regina City on the last day of September:

> Large amounts of revenue are raised under the excise duty on home manufactures in England, and the adoption of a similar policy in Canada, varied to suit our circumstances, would not only permit of a substantial reduction of customs taxation on articles of common ware, consumption, and for the purpose of more production, but also supplement the much needed revenues of the Crown.

Two or three speakers, including the chief Liberal Whip, the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Kyte), dwelt on the prevalence of the excise duty in Great Britain. There are hundreds of millions of pounds raised by excise duties. If the import duty was reduced to 12½ per cent or 10 per cent, if you like—some of the duties are down to 10 per cent, binders, harvesters and mowers; no, I do not think mowers are, but some of the implements are down to 10 per cent—but supposing the import duties were reduced that far and an excise duty put on, that would take out the protection. What is the use of my hon. friends in the Progressive party talking about a revenue tariff unless it also implies an excise duty? Take a 10 per cent duty, or a 12½ per cent duty, or a 15 per cent duty—no, I will not say 15 per cent, that is getting on dangerous ground—but say 10 and 12½ per cent—there is incidental protection. There is protection if the duty is only 5 per cent—it is only a matter of degree—unless you invoke the principle of the excise duty. Is that sound doctrine? I say it is.

Well, let us talk right from the shoulder now on this matter. I believe there is a solution to be found but it is not in a list of free implements. Why not? Since 1919 our financial situation has changed immensely; we cannot get revenue by means of a free list. Is that hearsay? Is that going back on our platform? Will the leader of the Progressives not agree with me that a substantial duty on articles not made in Canada, and an excise duty on things that are made in Canada, are not incompatible with the principle of free trade. I do not think I said that very well, so I repeat the statement: I say that high duties on articles not made in Canada, as well as excise duties on things that are made here, are not incompatible with the principle of free trade—that is better. Is that not right? Well, I thought we had in the present budget a start-off in that direction with motor cars. I am not sure whether that is the case or not, but if it is the case that there is an excise duty on motor cars that would be the principle to which I have reference; and we have the same principle, of an excise duty, in the tariff in a dozen places. It is not new in this country or any other country that I know of—it is simply carrying out the thing to a logical conclusion, and you would have a revenue from the best available resources. So much for the revenue tariff.

My hon. friend (Mr. Crerar) would like to know if I am talking for or against the budget. Not only am I talking for the budget, but if my hon. friend followed up the attitude which he took previous to the election last fall he would be supporting the budget also. I am willing to make all kinds of allowance between the time my hon. friend was looking for votes and the present time. Like many another man, he was seeking to indulge in a little bit of a stunt that would read well. We all have to, I suppose, to use legitimate means to save our faces.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Just think of it, Mr. Speaker, making these admissions. Speaking about a first instalment of tariff reduction, if we do not get any more instalments think of what I shall have to face next year and the year after, as a result of putting on Hansard these statements. However, I am going to take chances. I am now going to quote statements made by my hon. friend from Marquette before the last election. These statements are taken from the Globe, a newspaper that was not unduly favourable to the Liberal party last fall. The first statement from the issue of October 31, is as follows:

> Mr. Crerar gave some applications of his economic views to the local industries of coal mining and steel. He repeated that the Progressives had no intention of sweeping the tariff away over night, but he hoped to see the day when the principles of protection would be abandoned in Canada's fiscal policy.

He hoped! He was not going to sweep it away over night! Has my hon. friend the Finance Minister swept it away over night or even over day? He has complied with the requirement laid down by my hon. friend (Mr. Crerar). What did that statement mean, if it did not mean that the tariff should be reduced gradually? Mr. Speaker, I believe that the people of Canada, outside of the prairie provinces, would support us in not touching the tariff this session at all—I believe that. The tariff was not touched in 1896, the first session of the Laurier government. It was substantially amended in 1897 when the British preference was brought down. Can my hon. friend recall any period, in the history of this or any other country, where the tariff was in issue, when a new government came in and modified the tariff in its first session more than this government has done? I cannot recall such an occasion; I would like to be set right if I am wrong in that statement. Now I want to continue; and I do not want to do so in any spirit of petty criticism. I merely want to show why my hon. friend (Mr. Crerar) should support this budget. I quote again from the Globe:

> Summerside, Prince Edward Island.
> Mr. Crerar agreed that the tariff could not be swept away over night.

My hon. friend is very much like the rest of us; we all make one speech of pretty much the same type all along the line. When we get it off it seems good to us, and we repeat it although not exactly in the same terms. We have repetition here showing that the reporter has reported my hon. friend correctly. Now here we have another extract. This is dated November 11:

> Mr. Crerar said that the tariff reduction on the necessaries would reduce the cost of living. Premier Drury—

I think that is the wrong quotation.

Some Hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MOTHERWELL (Reading):

> —spoke briefly at both meetings, urging that the best policy for Canada was the policy of the National Progessive party.

I have no marginal note with respect to this extract—probably it was not of so much importance. Well, they are all very much alike. Mr. Crerar wanted to know where the campaign funds came from. That was another topic of discussion but I will not recall it.

Mr. CRERAR: You had better not touch that.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: However, my hon. friend goes on, right through these extracts, to speak about moving gradually in the matter of tariff reduction. Well, is not the present budget a case of moving gradually? "Gradually eliminating the protective features"—is not this gradual? My hon. friends on the Progressive side ought to have no difficulty in supporting us on the basis of moving gradually and permitting "the industries to adjust themselves." That is another term of my hon. friend. "Permitting the industries to adjust themselves" —to temper the wind, as it were, to the shorn lamb. Well, the lamb is having lots of time to adjust itself; I am sure that my hon. friend, in view of his repeated pronouncements against our doing this over night should not find any difficulty in supporting us. I repeat that my hon. friend will not be able to put his hand on a single illustration in the history of this country where a new government has taken up the question of tariff reform and dealt with it any more vigourously, or thoroughly or to a greater extent, than we have done in this case. If that be so, where is the justification for heaping ridicule upon us and indulging in all kinds of criticism?

Mr. HOEY: The hon. gentleman speaks of a gradual process. Is it the intention of the Government to announce this gradual reduction?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Well I have no authority to speak for the Government. The Prime Minister spoke this afternoon and dealt with the unfairness of taking the ground that we should be judged as not having carried out our pledges after having been only five months in office. I repeat that statement. We shall let next year take care of itself. A certain hon. gentleman who at one time was in this Parliament used to say: "Just see us next year." I am not justified in saying that with respect to the matter which is under consideration.

Mr. LEWIS: May I ask my hon. friend a question?

Mr. MOTHERWELL No, I have no authority. Next year will take care of itself. I am going to read another extract, and it must be remembered that I made this statement in the city of Regina before a city audience, one of the best gatherings that I was ever at in my life. I made it where I would be least likely to get support and approbation, and yet they both came. This is what I stated:

> The more general adoption of the excise, a strictly revenue tax, as above suggested, will get at the past beneficiaries of protection, and relieve the poor man correspondingly, and has the further very obvious advantage that if any attempt is made to pass such a tax on to the consumer, the corresponding foreign cheaper article would immediately displace it on the market.

I can recall the time not very long ago in the city of Swift Current, when the leader of the Progressive party (Mr. Crerar) made a speech in which he spoke just as favourably of this way of dealing with protection as I am doing to-night. I have not heard him say anything of it recently; but I want to tell him and to take this ground that I do not believe there is any way of eliminating the protective element from the tariff except by the invocation of the excise tax, although I am willing to be enlightened on that point. We could, of course, abolish the protection altogether; we would have no revenue, and at a time like this, we need revenue. It seems to me, however, that every man should, at every opportunity, consider the matter of dealing with this question of finding a remedy for the evils of protection as soon as the time is opportune. I will go further. There are times when we should not take any drastic attitude, and I have pointed out a number of excuses that I might offer. We might take the ground that inasmuch as the Americans have increased their tariff, we should not do anything. I am not taking that ground; but I would take the ground that this is not a propitious time for making a drastic inroad into our protective system. Is it not right to take that ground? Everybody knows that the businesses of Canada, whether farming or our various industries, are not in a healthy condition at the present time. I might say that they are more or less sick; their morale is low. Is it right to wean an infant or a domestic animal when it is sick? If it is not, then this is not the time to make rapid inroads into the protection that our industries have been enjoying all these years. But what is this tantamount to saying? If I were Minister of Finance, the chances are that I would say this: "You manufacturers of the implements of production can surely get on your feet in a few years; things are going to look brighter in a little while, and you had better get your house in order and be prepared to see whether you cannot stand on your own feet." As for those of us who are family men, what a delight it is to our hearts when our child first walks or even toddles along! After forty-four years of waiting, would it not be a delight to all our hearts to see this thing toddling along on its own feet?

I am going to give some of the reasons why I think those industries can at least toddle if we give them a chance. When the war came on, the flower of Canada rushed to the colours, a civilian army; they went to the battlefront and measured themselves with the standing armies of Europe. Did they ask for protection in the front line or the rear line? Did they ask to be covered by the British or the French guns? Did they crawl down into the trenches and say: "We want to be protected; we cannot stand up, if necessary, above the parapet and take the chance." No. They stood out there with the standing armies of the world, and they came back home with the laurels of victory on their brows? Is that not the case? Do you mean to say that those men who returned, leaving their comrades on the field of battle, and those who remained at home, cannot compete in peaceful avocations? I think more of Canada than to believe that. Do you mean to tell me that, because there is an invisible line along the 49th parallel, men who have acquitted themselves well in military avocations cannot acquit themselves equally well in peaceful avocations? I should like to see the experiment tried out before I would believe that. It would not, of course, be wise to try it out all along the line; but we might do what we did with cream separators and binder twine. Try it out if you like on Toronto—we cannot lose much there anyhow.

I promised not to speak very long on the tariff. As a new man in this House and one in charge of probably one of the most important departments of government, a department which is connected with an industry on which the country is going to rely possibly more than on any other to help to pay this war debt, I want to say now that there is no royal road to paying this debt. We have to pay it in the same manly way that we contracted it; we must go at the task with our coats off. As the one for the time being in charge of this department, I wish to make a few remarks regarding what I think should be the objective of the Department of Agriculture in the immediate future. How are we going to assist in this great task of getting this country on to its feet? This must be done through the medium of our natural resources, with labour and capital applied to them. How are we going to go about the task? These are some of the things that I would like to see started just as soon as we have the finances to take care of them. I should like to build fairly rapidly upon the foundation so well laid by my predecessors, the hon. member for Victoria city (Mr. Tolmie) and the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Crerar), with respect to the matter of accredited herds.

For the last year or two we have been spending annually half a million dollars in connection with the extermination of tuberculosis amongst our cattle. We are doing this for two purposes. I think, in the hearts of many of us, it is primarily for taking care of the youth of Canada. It is known that tuberculosis is extending rapidly throughout practically all civilization, and the "White Plague" is to-day one of the great problems with which the nations of the world have to deal. One of the most prolific sources of contagion, especially amongst infants, is from cows' milk. There has been laid down by the government and by the hon. gentlemen to whom I have referred, the accredited herd system, and it is the only way of dealing with this matter. Only about seven years back not much stock was taken in this system; but during the last seven years an accredited herd was started in this quarter, another one in that quarter, and another one elsewhere, and all intervening was more or less tubercular. The result was that if you did not have an active follow-up policy, the infection spread back until it covered the whole territory again. The time has now come when we should have a broad policy as regards the elimination of tuberculosis in Canada. This would mean more money. We have had representations made to us to block out and to clean up certain whole territories, so that the infected area in between the present accredited herds would be removed and would not be a source of contagion to the adjoining accredited herds.

There is a suggestion that if you want to do that safely there is a splendid opportunity of doing it afforded in the two islands that lie at the extreme east and west of Canada. We have Prince Edward Island, with its water boundaries, where we could establish a herd and entirely eliminate the disease, with the minimum possibility of contagion from adjacent territory. Then there is Vancouver island in the West. I was talking recently with Premier Oliver and he informed me that the method they had adopted, of picking out herds, whether adjacent to cities, or from other places, was not showing any progressive results. He said that the work was not meeting with the success they had hoped for, simply because they lacked the necessary money, equipment and men for carrying out a proper continuous policy. I am convinced that the time has come when we should select blocks of land, establish herds, clean them up entirely, and then pass on as rapidly as possible to other areas. After it had been demonstrated by the Government that this was practical, we might have then some system whereby the municipalities or the provinces in which the territories were located could co-operate with the Federal Government in eliminating tuberculosis from the herds. I think the people are ready for a forward movement in the direction I have indicated.

There is another matter I may refer to, and I am taking no credit to myself in respect thereto, because while I did to a smaller extent assist it along, I was in no way primarily responsible for what was done. I refer to the matter of cold storage. Canada to-day, and especially Eastern Canada,—I trust hon. members will forgive me for saying this—is a long way behind the times in regard to cold storage facilities. I believe that some of the propaganda that was spread broadcast during the war is in a degree responsible for this. I think the Board of Commerce made some report in reference to packers and cold storage plants; and a gentleman whose name I will not mention, but who has been in the limelight, made some remarks about the evils of cold storage. I remember that we were just establishing a chain of cold storage plants in Saskatchewan at that time, and this propaganda nearly knocked the business out, because we could hardly sell the stock. The people were alarmed, and one would have thought that all the evils that were talked of were attributable to the cold storage plants. Now, the fact is that a properly conducted and adequately supervised cold storage plant is one of the greatest of modern institutions, and it is one of the best media by which you can develop the live stock industry, and other industries as well. The late Hon. Sydney Fisher, many years ago inaugurated a system of subsidizing cold storage plants. During the war the regulations were changed so as to apply only to municipalities, and no doubt there were good reasons for the change. Since that time very little has been done under the system. As a matter of fact, I do not believe the system is a proper one, although there is not much money spent under it because there are not many applications for assistance. I think the regulations under that act should be changed as speedily as possible. The assistance given formerly of 30 per cent is, I believe, too much; it is more than is required to encourage the establishment of cold storage plants, because the people know very well the benefits that are to be derived from these institutions. All that is necessary is a reasonable aid to encourage the erection of these plants in the various parts of the country, and at as early a date as possible we ought to reintroduce the system of assisting co-operative institutions to establish cold storage plants. There should be many of these plants in the eastern provinces. I was very much surprised to discover how few facilities there were in that part of Canada in this respect. In my opinion half the subsidy of 30 per cent that was given in the early days would meet the present requirements, and a comparatively small amount of money would go a long way towards promoting the establishment of these greatly needed institutions throughout Canada, not only for the handling of dairy products, but also for the storage of fruit. There is no industry in Canada that requires more legitimate assistance right now than the fruit industry. We are all aware that decomposition sets in very easily with fruit that is not pre-cooled. Apples, for example, are picked at midday and are put away in warm buildings, and before the chill of night gets into the barrel bacterial action sets in and decomposition rapidly ensues, so that before the fruit reaches its destination across the water it is in bad shape. Pre-cooling therefore is absolutely essential, and this can be provided by a system of cold storage warehouses for that purpose alone. I hope to be able to get on the right side of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) before many years, if not months,—at least, when the financial situation of the country warrants it—in order that I may be able to do for Canada what I was privileged to do for Saskatchewan, where there is a chain of eight cold storage plants, the finest in the Dominion. The sooner we get that done the sooner we shall be able to develop not only the dairy and live stock industry generally, but the fruit industry of the country as well.

Just a word now about the experimental farm system. I see that the hon. member for South Oxford (Mr. Sutherland) is in his seat, and I am sure that he will sympathize with some of the remarks, at all events, that I am going to make in this respect. I have come to the conclusion that the time has arrived when, instead of establishing very many more experimental farms, we should strive to improve those that we already have. Hon. gentlemen will recall that in the course of the discussion on the estimates I intimated that possibly one or two more farms might be established which my predecessors had had in mind. But we have 22 now, and instead of going on and extending the system further I would strongly advise that we go about putting those 22 into proper shape. There is no question that that is the right policy to adopt in this matter. I am not familiar with all the farms yet, but from what I see of those that I do know I can say that as a result of the conditions brought about by the war, and the necessary tendency towards retrenchment in consequence thereof, a number of these farms have been starved to the point where they are not more than 50 per cent efficient. We are not blaming any one for that condition, but it is the condition that exists nevertheless. It will be necessary to spend more money on these institutions in order to obtain any benefit from the money that has already been invested in them. Hon. members will no doubt have noted by the press that Dr. Charles Saunders, who has figured so conspicuously in research work in the cereal world, has left Canada for a trip, broken in health. Now, the facilities for carrying on the work which he has been doing are of the most primitive kind, and it speaks well for him that he has been able to achieve the results which he has achieved in spite of that handicap. But you cannot always find that class of men who will so devote their energies and their talents to their work notwithstanding the lack of even fair facilities. We had a flax plant at the Experimental Farm, but it was burnt about a year ago; and the botanical building, an important building in which is carried on the experimental and research work in connection with the diseases of plants, is now 30 years old. All the work related to the investigation of plant disease and the hybridization of plants, which has been conducted by Professor Gussow and Dr. Saunders, has to be done in a wee little building in which two or three members of this House, if they tried to turn around, would upset things. That building was erected thirty years ago, and while no doubt it did good work in the pioneer days, it has long since ceased to serve the purpose for which it is now required. The work that is being done in connection with the discovery of plant diseases and their remedies cannot be over-estimated. For instance, we have to discover the remedy for that scourge which is known as rust. Our crops in the West some years are cut in two by the ravages of this plague; and just as we discovered a remedy for smut in grain, and found a new kind of cereal called Marquis wheat that will ripen earlier, being worth millions to the country, so we have possibilities of finding remedies to cure the other diseases that exist in our plant life.

We have the possibility of discovering the best varieties of grasses and grains, for the foundation work is already done, and all we need to do to-day is to continue and extend that work. If we could only develop varieties of grain resistant to rust it would be worth all the money that has been spent during the last thirty years in the maintenance of these experimental farms. But we cannot accomplish this with inefficient equipment and low-salaried men. You cannot get men to work under these conditions, for every man in the research world that is worth his salt does not want to work indefinitely without showing results. I have almost come to the conclusion—this may sound like economic heresy—that there are circumstances under which it is desirable, if we are to pay off our debt, to equip ourselves properly for the task by going into further debt. Take any business that is suddenly confronted with disaster; for instance, supposing a man is burned out, does he sit down helpless and despondent, or does he take off his coat and with courage and vision and determination apply himself to restore his broken fortune? Of course, he goes ahead and gets results. The Chicago fire, the Halifax disaster, the burning of our old Parliament buildings—all these losses were quickly made good by courage, energy and resourcefulness. Well, the world was on fire for four years. We know Canada was solvent when the war broke out, and we know we have $2,000,000,000 of debt now. What are we to do, sink under the burden? Or are we going to vow that we will not increase that debt by another dollar? I think the Minister of Finance and the Government are taking the right course now in making just as few capital outlays as possible. That is right, because we want to do some national stocktaking to see where we stand. But I am of the opinion, with all deference to those who think differently, that once we get established again we must make wise investments that will develop our natural resources. That is the way to pay our national debt. Wise investment is often true economy, and the refusal to invest will leave this burden of debt on our shoulders indefinitely. I know we are absolutely sound as a nation, and I would be sorry if we spent even modestly before we have completed this national stocktaking. But once that is done we ought to go full steam ahead. My colleague, the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Stewart), will have to help out in this connection by means of a wise immigration policy that will encourage desirable immigrants to come here and help in the upbuilding of this country. I think the Immigration Act needs some amendment to remove certain of its restrictive features; and the regulations will also need further amendment.

If the Department of Agriculture is to function, it must have equipment, it must have men. Look where we are at the very outset when I speak of men. I want a good cerealist, a good entomologist, eleven butter graders and twenty hog graders, but I cannot go to suitable men and say: "Here, I want you to come into the department. I will give you so many dollars." And then if they refuse I cannot add, "I will give you so many dollars more." We have not got that system, unfortunately. It is said that being in public life in the smaller provincial sphere fits you for the larger federal arena. In the matter of equipping my staff, manning my ship with the best men, the freedom I have exercised in the past in the provincial field has spoiled me for the federal under present conditions. If these conditions are to continue with respect to facilities for selecting my staff, then, I believe, Mr. Speaker, that inside of two or three years the efficiency of my department will be diminished 50 per cent. The public practically forced the then government to establish the Civil Service Commission away back in 1908. In 1918, I think it was, the late government in response to a pledge demanded by the people to destroy what was known as patronage, resorted to a rather ingenious way to destroy it. One of the Liberals on the old commission they let out, and appointed two good Conservatives. That is one way to destroy patronage. It simply transferred patronage from the crowd to the few, by whom it is looked after properly. I think that a Civil Service Commission is only possible, unless it is to partially destroy the public service, when that commission is friendly to the government. I am of opinion that the members of the Civil Service Commission should go out of office with the government that appointed them. I believe we should have a civil service commission, but not one that has no interest in my department—not one that is more interested from a political standpoint in something else than trying to man my department with good men. It is not possible for men who have been in politics, as we all have been, to be put on the Civil Service Commission, to be transmogrified overnight, and then to search the earth for the best men in each department. I know what I am talking about. I have been on bended knees before that commission and have stayed bended and got up without getting what I wanted. Are the judgments of these hon. gentlemen with whom I am privileged to be associated to be subordinated to that of an extraneous body responsible to nobody? Is that the way we are to conduct the affairs of this country? I do not care how good the members of the commission are, they are tied up by the Civil Service Act. They are handcuffed; they are hobbled; they have to abide by the terms of the act under which they were appointed. I am not making any particular statements against them; I am simply taking the ground that the system is bad. If in the selection of men I have to subordinate my judgment to theirs, then my staff will be just what they make it, not what I make it. I accept the responsibility, but they have the power to do or not to do. How can we pay a war debt in that way? The people of Canada have asked us to assume the administration of the affairs of Canada, but we are denied the right to man our own ships. I never heard of such a proposition. I had heard of a civil service commission; we had one and it worked all right—there was only one man you had to deal with and he was all right; he did good work. Nobody suggests that we can go back to no civil service commission, but I do take the ground that the key men in the various departments—well, I will speak only for my own, the key men in the Department of Argiculture—should be chosen by the deputy minister and his minister. Let me be fair; in the working out of this thing the head of the department sometimes gets what he wants; in fact, I think in most cases we do get what we want. But that is not the only difficulty; it is the time it takes. Why, I ran across Mr. William Graham, Indian Commissioner, who wanted a farm foreman to replace a man on one of the Indian reserves who had died or resigned, I forget which; he was not there, anyway. Well, look at the rigmarole he had to go through; it takes nearly four months, with good luck, to run that gauntlet. But he wanted that farm foreman right away. Spring would not wait; the land was ready for seeding, and there was no farm foreman. Well, I did not go down to the Hunter Block this time —I had such poor luck the first time. So one of the staff was good enough to come to my office. I pointed out to him that spring would be gone and the harvest reaped before a farm foreman would be obtained under the present system, and he was good enough to tell me that he would make arrangements for a temporary appointment. Now, how would any farmer like the idea of starting out in the spring, with all the difficulties of seeding in a year like this, and then be told that some other body, especially if that some other body was a rival of his, would select his men for him, taking all summer to do it? Will the spring wait while that kind of humbug and nonsense is going on? That is far worse, Mr. Speaker, than getting the wrong man; it is the interminable time it takes to get any man. I admit that the commission are doing their best now; they are trying to get over the difficulty; in fact, I think they got a little bit wised up lately, and here is what they are doing. Instead of making a selection four or five months after the application for the filling of the position has been made, they are making temporary appointments. Well, just see the difficulty you are up against in that respect. Take the case of a butter grader, who has to be a man of the highest type, of first-class ability and absolutely honourable. A butter grader always has a good job; he is not knocking at your door every day in the week and twice on Sunday looking for employment; you have to offer him better money, and when you tell him that you want his services for only a month, why, he simply will not come. That is why I say that if this thing keeps on for three or four years you are going to degrade the service. I will come nearer home than that: I have been trying to get these butter graders for a number of months—ever since January, in fact; that is six months; and I have not got them yet. It is not all the fault of the commission, but if my deputy and myself had been in a position to go ahead and get the men, they would all have been on the job at the drop of the hat. The hon. member for Glengarry (Mr. Kennedy) had a motion on the Order Paper—it died on the roost—asking for information with regard to these butter graders, and had that resolution come up I was going to make a statement in the matter. But it has come to the point where we have to have temporary appointments; the same applies to the hog graders. Then, in the case of temporary appointments you have to go through the whole rigmarole again to get the men appointed permanently—"It's a long, long way to Tipperary"; it is a long, long way to get anything from the Civil Service Commission, and when you get it, it may not be the right thing. Am I exaggerating this?

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: The Lord forgive me if I am, because I have not intended to. The truth is bad enough, Mr. Speaker, without making it worse. I had hoped that the House would wake up and see the folly of perpetuating this system. Of course, every one who knows nothing about it will tell you to-morrow morning that I am asking for a return to the vicious patronage system; that I want to get back to the loaves and fishes; that I am preaching the doctrine that to the victor belongs the spoils. No; I am preaching this: You have given me the responsibility; for pity's sake, give me the power to serve my country. I would be almost afraid to say these things if it were not for the fact that if I have a reputation that is looked upon as commendable at all in any particular line in connection with my public life it is that I have always sacrificed everything to secure the selection of good men. It is more important to have a good staff than it is to have a good minister, you can administer a department better with a good staff and a second-rate minister than you can with a third-rate staff and a first-class minister.

Well, what are we going to do? The Conservatives, of course, will oppose any change. They know they have got us up against it; they know the best way to trim us is to keep us just where we are—with responsibility, but without authority. And I do not blame them; they are up against it themselves. They will never see daylight in the next fifty years, so the best thing they can do is keep us here. The hope, Mr. Speaker, lies in the direction of my hon. friends the Progressives. What are they going to do about it? Are they going to play the game, the way they were doing on the amendment to the budget? I do not blame them if they play the game, but I will blame them if they pretend not to play it, but play it just the same. The hope of betterment is with the Progressives until we get a majority, and I appeal to the Progressives, are you going to allow agriculture to struggle on under this handicap, handcuffed, shackled, hamstrung, and expect it to be one hundred per cent efficient?

If I were dealing with the matter myself I would call in the recess a conference of business men and the press, because you cannot get anything under way until you convert the press, and I would take counsel with them how best to deal with this question of appointments to the Civil Service. I would show them how the work is now handicapped, and I am satisfied that it would not take long to convince them that the remedy for patronage that has been in vogue now for some time, perhaps with the best of intentions, is a hundred times worse than the disease it was designed to cure, and I say that with a desire for bettering the conditions. This Parliament of Canada, we here in these beautiful buildings, are actually handicapped in our service twenty-five or forty or fifty per cent as a result of this load on our necks that we cannot get rid of until a majority of this House introduces something better. I hope the day is near at hand when we shall buckle on our armour and bring about the proper conditions, so that we can give the very best service at our disposal.

Mr. SAMUEL CHARTERS (Peel): Mr. Speaker, my contribution to the debate will not occupy very much space in Hansard. I shall not attempt to follow the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat (Mr. Motherwell) as he is altogether too elusive for me. When I learned that his election literature was headed "Vote for Motherwell and the Wheat Board," and saw that when he reached Ottawa he opposed the Wheat Board, I knew that he was somewhat versatile, but I never thought he was equal to the performance he has given in this House to-night.

Two weeks ago we were told by no less an authority than the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) that the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell) is a free trader in everything except butter. Tonight he is a protectionist in supporting the budget presented by my hon. friend. He tells this House that no government has done more to implement its pledges than this Government has done in the first session of this new Parliament. My hon. friend and those associated with him knew very well what should be done four years ago, three years ago, two years ago, one year ago. They believed then that implements should be on the free list, that all foodstuffs should be free of duty, that all articles of clothing should carry a greatly reduced duty, yet when they come to Parliament and are asked to put into force the pledges they made they say, "We have not had time to get ready." I would remind the hon. member and the House when he says that no government has done better in implementing pledges, that in 1878 the Conservative party laid before the people their policy, and in the very first session of Parliament, in 1879, they brought that policy down into the House and had it confirmed by Parliament, and that is the policy in force to-day with the variations that have taken place under the different governments that have ruled the country.

The hon. Minister of Agriculture tells us in one breath that the infant industries in this country are forty-four years old, with patriarchal whiskers and all the rest of it, and therefore they should be able to provide for themselves, and in his next breath tells us that they are infants still, and have not yet acquired sufficient strength to justify their being weaned. Could anything be more absurd or ridiculous? I suppose he wants to circulate in one part of the country the idea that he is a free trader denouncing the bloated manufacturers, and in another part that he is not so difficult to deal with after all.

Then he said that if a man made a will last year there would be no trouble about changing it this year. I thought that was a peculiar illustration to give, and there came to my mind the lines:

> A mericiful Providence fashioned us holler.
> In order that we might our principles swaller.

I think if any hon. member has done that, it is the Minister of Agriculture.

I am in favour of the amendment, because I believe the failure of the Government to put into force the policy on which they secured power deserves the condemnation of the House and the country. The budget we are debating, and the record of the administration during the few months it has been in office, furnish sufficient evidence, I believe, for the most interesting breach of promise action in the history of this country. If the thousand-times repeated solemn promises of members of the present

10 p.m.

Government and of their supporters, and of some of their allies in this House, if the solemn pledges of the Prime Minister and the leader of a political party are to be disregarded and the men and women of Canada are to be indifferent to such deception, to such political dishonesty, then I say let us remove from the archway at the entrance to this building the Scripture text and substitute for it the one word "Ichabod", for assuredly the glory will have departed. In saying that I am only saying in other words what has been said by a prominent member of this Administration, one who is in the habit of saying frankly what he believes, and saying it without any danger of being misunderstood. Addressing a meeting of women at Milton on November 25, 1920, the hon. Postmaster General (Mr. Murphy) made use of this language:

> Repeated breaches of public professions not only dishonor those who are guilty of them, but, what is far worse, they destroy those standards of public morality which the people have been accustomed to associate with men in public life. And what are the results? The first result is that when those whose duty it is to set an example in political integrity fail to do so, there is a progressive decline in public morality among the people themselves. The second result is that with the decline of public morality there is a corresponding decline in private morality that operates to the injury of the State no less than it does to the injury of the individual.

That was the statement made by the present Postmaster General. Does the present Government come under the implied condemnation in the statement of the hon. member? Let us look for a minute or two. We were told that the late government should be condemned because it was an autocratic government, governing by order in council, and forestalling action by Parliament. We expected that when the new Government came into power all that would be changed, but what are the facts? They were very well presented last night by the hon. member for George Etienne Cartier (Mr. Jacobs), who said:

> We criticised the Conservative party that lived by order in council, and made our battle cry the question of orders in council, and "down with the government that insists upon governing by order in council," but when we came into power, we lapsed into the ways of the Philistines.

Not only did they lapse into the ways of the Philistines, but they went ninety per cent or, at least, a very great deal further, because we have had the statement made in this House that in the three months of this year there were ninety more Orders in Council passed by this Government than were passed in the corresponding period last year. All of which goes to show that that is just another pledge broken by this Government.

We were condemned last year for abolishing the business tax and the luxury tax. Why are they not restored this year? The Minister of Finance says that we need revenue more and more. Why does he not secure some of it in the way he advocated last year? We were condemned for not recovering some portion of the wealth of what were called the profiteers in food and so on, and we were told by the Prime Minister that:

> Mr. Murdock has exposed the manner in which, as respects the necessaries of life, the food, the clothing, the articles required for the shelter of the people, associated businesses with their trade agreements, combines and monopolies, have been permitted, with the assistance of a protective tariff, and to the detriment of consumers, to reap their excessive profits through unrestrained freedom of action.

What has happened? The hon. gentleman who exposed all this trouble is now the Minister of Labour in this country. What has he done? I am afraid—to use one of the expressions he is familiar with—that he is "loafing on the job"; because so far there is no evidence of any action whatever. Let me give you one item, an item which was brought to the attention of the people last year—that is the quantity of food in cold storage. In 1921 there were three million dozens of eggs in cold storage, and complaint was made that these should be liberated in order that they might be made cheaper to the public. On May 1 of this year, just a year afterwards, there were upwards of four million dozens in cold storage; and my hon. friend is not doing anything to bring that condition before the public at the present time. That is an illustration of what is being done, or rather not being done.

Then too, we were told that taxation was oppressive, that it was too grievous to be borne. The Government has answered that by increasing the taxation, thirty or forty or probably fifty million dollars. Hon. members opposite condemned the action of the government in imposing the sales tax day after day, and they redeemed their pledges by increasing it 50 per cent. The public debt was to be provided for in a way that nobody had been informed of and the action of the late government was condemned. Furthermore we have just had, in the address of the Minister of Agriculture, some reference to patronage. His reference could only mean one thing, and that was that at the earliest possible moment the Civil Service Commission would be abolished and patronage would be returned to the boys who are supporting the Government. That statement was applauded more vigorously than any other statement the minister made in his speech. But the Government has not simply been confining its attention to the party workers. Let me remind you that no fewer than five defeated candidates have been appointed to judgships in this country, and several good appointments have gone to others who have been defeated and to others who are prominent party workers. In the United States, in order to become a judge a candidate must be elected, but in Canada to become a judge a candidate must have been defeated; that is the difference between our system and theirs.

The Minister of Agriculture talks of the absolute folly of perpetuating "this system"—that is the Civil Service system. Well, all over the Dominion—at least I will say all over the province of Ontario—in the literature of the Liberal party it was announced that the abolition of patronage was part of their platform; and so with my hon. friends of the other section of the Opposition at that time; they had on their cards, on their literature, the same slogan "Abolition of Patronage". Well we know what is the position of the Government—that is if the hon. gentleman does not change his mind over night as he has done so frequently in relation to that question. Now these are a few of the points as to which no man living can say that any action has been taken along the lines suggested. Has anything been done to improve the standard of public morality to which the Postmaster General referred in the speech alluded to? Furthermore, if anybody can say that anything has been done to lessen the burden of the people, to increase the employment of the workmen of the country, or to lessen the cost of living, then all I can say is "I have not seen such great faith, no not in Israel".

It would be very unwise, I think, for me to undertake to discuss anything in relation to the tariff at this time after it had been so exhaustively dealt with this afternoon, but I want to refer to one or two things. At every session of the Parliament that expired last September the question of protection and free trade, or higher protection and lower protection was presented, and in every case the position taken by the present Government and its followers was that we should have as near an approach to free trade as possible. Some of them were in favour of absolute free trade until we met together in the House this time. For instance in 1919 the member for Brome (Mr. McMaster) was the financial critic of the then Liberal opposition. He was a real free trader and he spoke very lengthily and very learnedly in favour of the adoption of that policy. He told us about getting up in the morning to perform his ablutions and commencing to dress, and his difficulty in doing so because of the tax on his boots and the tax on his clothing— the tax on everything that he wore. The member for North Ontario (Mr. Halbert), who is not here to-night, took up the song and made it a little stronger. He said that even the coffin in which he would be buried was taxed. Well, the hon. member for Brome is still wearing the clothes that are taxed and he will wear them a long time because this Government continues to levy a tax on them; and my hon. friend from North Ontario, who is looking for free trade in coffins, will have to wait a long time before he will get it from a government of this kind.

An hon. MEMBER: Not while he is living.

Mr. CHARTERS: Not while he is living, that is true. Then in 1920 the member for Brome came forward again. I will give him credit, he has been the one consistent man who has discussed the question in this House, and I have no doubt he will carry that consistency into his vote when it is recorded on this motion. In 1920 my hon. friend said:

> Protection as a policy for this country is not only dead, but, after the next election, it will, as Disraeli said, be damned.

Well, protection is not dead. I suppose my hon. friend can say of it as Mark Twain once said of his reported death, "That the report was very greatly exaggerated;" and up to this time there has not been sufficient obstruction placed in the way of a protective tariff to constitute even a respectable "tinker's dam".

A statement that has not been put upon the records of this House, and which I think should be placed there, is one made by the Minister of Finance himself who, during the Laurier regime, was the real authority, as he is the real authority to-day. I made this statement several times, as did other candidates, during the election: I said over and over again that I believed that my hon.

friend was absolutely sincere. I also stated my belief that the leader of the Progressive party was absolutely sincere, and that if the opportunity came they would put into effect the declarations they had made before the electorate. Now on May 10 last year the present Minister of Finance in the course of his speech on the budget, said this:

> You may depend upon it that a tariff built up on the protective principle, a tariff designed to protect industries merely because they are industries and without regard to the economic conditions of the country, cannot and should not succeed. If there are people in Canada who are contemplating the establishment of new lines of business in which they feel that tariff protection is necessary I do them a friendly service when I say; "Don't do it," because anybody who counts upon the continuance of a protective policy is bound to find that he is pursuing a delusion. If any outside capitalist purposes coming to Canada to start some industry which he believes can only be kept alive by protection again I advise him not to come.

Further on in the same speech he said:

> They think that Canadian industries need to be protected by glass houses. Protection like conscience makes cowards of us all. We lose faith in our country; let us get away from that.

That was the statement of the Minister of Finance last year. Then we had this statement in the manifesto of the leader of the Progressive party:

> Our goal is the ultimate elimination of protection in our fiscal system.

The budget now before you tells whether or not that policy has been adhered to. I have said that I have stated several times that I believed in the sincerity of these hon. gentlemen. People from the district from which I come believed it also; they believed that the policy they advocated would be put into effect. They did not approve of it, they voted against it; and in the rural municipalities in the country which I represent there was a majority against the policy, a majority against the Progressive candidate, a majority against the Liberal candidate, showing the feeling of the farmers of that district in relation to that policy.

Now the tariff changes are not very many, but whatever their number they are not calculated to benefit the public. As to implements we have the assurance that if there is a great deal of importation it lessens work in the Dominion; and experience of the past shows that such changes have not reduced prices. Then as to the fruit industry, it is one in which my district is very much concerned. My hon. friend from Yale (Mr. MacKelvie) has explained very fully the effect which the changes are likely to produce. According to the belief of the men who have studied the question most closely the changes will operate injuriously to the people of Canada.

I was surprised to find the readiness with which the budget was at first received, not only by my Liberal friends, but by those to my left on this side of the House. There was a little element of dissatisfaction; but the majority of those who took part expressed a good deal of gratitude. The Minister of Finance was congratulated and commended in certain quarters. We were told that the reduction of 2½ per cent was a step in the right direction; that a half loaf was better than no bread, and this 2½ per cent reduction was repeated so often and emphasized so strongly that almost expected that some of our clerical or ex-clerical brethern might be induced to quote the words of the familiar hymn:

> I do not ask to see
> The distant scene; one step enough for me.

But latterly they have changed their attitude, and hon. gentlemen have got away from that somewhat. One hon. gentleman told us in a very dramatic way how he and every member of the party with which he was associated were going to vote. He said that he was going to vote as his conscience dictated. That was all very well a few days ago; but latterly I am convinced, in view of the attempt to introduce a second amendment, that it will be caucus, not conscience, that will dictate the vote of hon. gentlemen in this matter.

As regards fruit in Ontario, there are no less than 280,000 acres in orchards, 13,000 acres in small fruits, 85,000 acres in vineyards, and 65,000 acres in vegetables. The value of the apples produced last year was more than $12,500,000, and of the other fruits almost an equal amount. In spite of the tariff which we have at the present time, we imported upwards of $31,000,000 worth of fruits and vegetables. My contention is that, instead of reducing the tariff in order that greater quantities may enter Canada in competition with the fruit grown on our own farms in our own districts, the Government should increase the duties on fruits and vegetables and products of that nature. If any country imposes a duty upon goods that we are sending to that country, we should meet it in the same way and thus protect our interests and our industries.

Before taking my seat I want to say just a word or two in reference to—I was going to say the wail; somebody used the expression "wail" this afternoon—that has been going on, not only in this House, but out of it, during this debate and in recent years, about the awful conditions under which we are living. I thought, if this went on much longer, the Hansard of 1922 would resemble the modern edition of the Lamentations of Jeremiah. I think it was the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Turgeon) who talked about reciprocity, about which we hear so much and which everybody knows we cannot secure even if we want to secure it. It must not be forgotten that the only time when the question of reciprocity was submitted to the people of Canada, they voted it down, and the majority in favour of the government was secured as much from the rural constituencies as it was from the cities. The hon. member for Gloucester said—and this was after reciprocity was defeated:

> At once we saw the industry and commerce of Canada decline in every direction from its prosperity to a state of dilapidation.

That is a very easy statement to make. It has been made so often that I have no doubt some people believe it. Of course, it is not true. The population of Canada increased more in the last ten years than in any other ten-year period. As regards rural depopulation, there has been a constant repetition of an unfair and untrue statement made by certain journals that were supporting the Opposition during the last few years. What are the facts in Ontario? The rural population in 1919 was greater than that of 1918; in 1920, it was greater than that of 1919, and again in 1921, it was greater than that of 1920. In the latter year the increase in rural population is 31,135, not a very bad increase, while the increase in population in the towns and villages in the same year was only 20,467.

We have heard statements about nobody going to schools, and this is a statement from the Minister of Education of the province of Ontario. The report of the Minister of Education just issued contains the information that the increase in the rural school population of 1921 over 1920 is 5,000. Surely that is sufficient. A gentleman whose name is very well known throughout Canada, Mr. T. Albert Moore, is writing a series of articles to the Globe —and I think they are appearing in other newspapers—on this very question. He has been deputed by his people to investigate the matter. Let me read one or two paragraphs from a letter which appeared under his signature two or three days ago:

> In a school section in Waterloo county, in 1884, there were 160 children in the families represented in the public school, and the average attendance was about 60 scholars. In 1922, with six more farm houses occupied, there were only 29 children with an average attendance of 23 at the school.

Mark that, with six more farm houses occupied than in the former year, there was this great reduction in the number of children. Is the tariff responsible for that? This is another paragraph. Listen to this:

> In 1884 in two homes there were 13 children; in one, 12; in three, 11; in one, 10; in two, 9; in one, 8; in two, 7; and in one, 5. To-day in these same houses, two have four children; one has three; three have one, and the rest are occupied by childless couples or bachelors.

I do not think it is unwise to put that on the records, for the reason, first of all, that the tariff cannot be blamed for that. In the next place I would like to say this—and I hope attention will be given to what I am going to say—that if the present generation in the rural districts and every other district would pay greater heed to the Book that tells them "to increase and multiply and replenish the earth," and less to the doctrine that is being preached by destructionists throughout Canada, there would be greater happiness and no talk about rural depopulation.

I should like to place upon Hansard the following statements in regard to the value of occupied farm lands in Canada in the years 1910 and 1920:

Value of occupied farm lands in Canada per acre	1910	1920
Canada	$33	$48
Ontario	48	70
Quebec	43	70
Manitoba	29	39
Saskatchewan	22	32
Alberta	24	32
British Columbia	74	175
Prince Edward Island	31	49
New Brunswick	19	35
Nova Scotia	25	43

Not a very bad showing for a farming country that has been going to the dogs for the last forty years. The output of wheat in 1910 was 132,000,000 bushels; in 1920, 263,000,000 bushels. The total farm production in 1910 was $663,349,190, and in 1920, $1,946,648,000. This year was very significant, notwithstanding the statements that have been made in this House and elsewhere that nobody could live on the farms any longer and everybody was in a state of despair, if nothing worse. The statement was that the acreage in crop this year is 25 per cent greater than it was last year. I do not know any explanation other than that the people are trying to do their best honestly and fairly.

Let me give one other illustration. In Canada, there are 415,000 automobiles, and that is quite a few. If you average them at $1,000 apiece, which is not too high, that means an investment of $415,000,000. Somebody says, of course, that they are not luxuries. I am not going to argue what they are. There is the investment, and if a man puts $1,000 into one specimen of equipment, he may not be able to put it in another; but if a man buys an automobile in order to help him do his duty on the farm and elsewhere, and he is unable to buy a binder, he must make the choice; but the country must not be condemned because he makes that choice. The following table will show the number of motor cars registered in each province and the number of persons to every one car in the province.

Provinces	Total Motor Vehicles registered	Persons per vehicle
Alberta	38,462	15
British Columbia	28,850	21
Manitoba	37,571	16
New Brunswick	11,216	34
Nova Scotia	12,635	45.5
Ontario	177,561	16
Prince Edward Island	1,419	62
Quebec	47,159	41
Saskatchewan	60,314	12
Canada	415,187	21

That, I take it, is an evidence not of decay but of growth, when people can invest to that extent in equipment, if you like to regard the motor cars in that light, or in pleasure vehicles, if you prefer so to consider them. Canada is the second largest purchaser of automobiles in the world in proportion to population, as will have been noted in the table I have quoted. We have one to every twenty-one of the population; in the United States there is one to every fourteen, in England one to every 268; in France one to every 402; in Germany one to every 684, and in Italy one to every thousand. Saskatchewan, as I have pointed out, has one to every twelve. I do not think that this is any indication that the country is going to the dogs.

I may quote an extract or two, which I think will be accepted very readily by hon. members to my right. A short time ago the Ontario government issued what is known as the "Handbook of Ontario, Canada," intended primarily for distribution in the United States and England, I presume, although no doubt it was sent to other places, the object of the publication being the encouragement of immigration to the province. The book is issued, with the endorsation and approval of the Hon. Mr. Drury, by the Minister of Agriculture for Ontario, and has been widely circulated. In regard to conditions in Ontario, this handbook quotes certain newspapers. At page 201, the following is taken from the Farmers' Sun:

> Experienced farmers with moderate capital can find here farm homes in which they can enjoy all the comforts of a matured civilisation. Men without capital, but willing to work, can secure employment at wages which give an assurance to the farm labourer of to-day of becoming a farm owner in the not distant future. Inexperienced farm help command $20 to $25 per month with board. Single men with farm experience are paid up to $50 per month with board. Married men are paid as high as $700 a year with free house and other perquisites.

The Farmers' Magazine, another paper circulated in the interests of the Opposition parties, has something to say on the subject too. Listen to this, in regard to a country which it was stated in the election was going to the dogs:

> The province of Ontario stands at the porchway of a glorious future. Ensconced in the strategic centre of our vast Dominion, with the best wealth of soils, the clearest fresh water lakes and streams, and an understratum of minerals, the importance of which is yet little guessed, we have here all the requisites for a population of many millions, a land of real homes under skies that mingle sunshine and shadow in the best of proportions. Agricultural life in the past has been filled with a wealth of association in every township, and while the population in the rural districts has been shifting in recent years, the reasons are by no means as derogatory to agriculture as a first glance would indicate.

It goes on to speak of the value of machinery, the adoption of electrical power and so forth, and then proceeds:

> Such a movement among the maple lanes of our land bespeaks a busy, prosperous countryside in this province, snuggling as it does so contentedly in the arms of the big, fresh water lakes. A land of peaches, and pulpwood, of red apples and cobbler potatoes, of sleek cattle and Wiltshire bacon, Ontario will double her billion annual agricultural production in the very near future.

Take another one:

> To the young man looking out on life, to the parents who would "set up" a boy or boys in farming, to the Old Countryman coming to this new country, we would say, behold what good old Ontario offers:
>
> A home—brick and stone houses with all that makes for a home, ready and sufficient income, pleasant environment, trees, water, varying scenery, neighbours, convenient schools and churches and market centres, travel opportunities, daily mails, culture, accessible entertainment.
> Food in abundance, varied to one's taste.

These statements—and they can be multiplied a hundredfold, have been sent out by the Minister of Agriculture of Ontario with the approval of the Premier of that province, who was elected to remedy all the evils that exist in that province. They have been sent across to England and over into the United States, and if they are true then they disprove many of the contentions that have been raised in this debate. On the other hand, if they are untrue, surely the Prime Minister of Ontario and his Minister of Agriculture would not vouch for something that is unworthy of them or of the province. Now, the attractive conditions which are set out in this book are the result of 40 years of a protective policy, which has been approved by the majority of the people every time there was a straight vote upon the question. And that policy would be approved to-day if there were a vote upon the one question of protection. Under the circumstances those who pretend to oppose the Government at the present time, if they live up to their professions, must vote for the want of confidence motion before the House. I have no fear for the future of Canada. This country has prospered and will continue to prosper notwithstanding the mistake it made in December last. And it will prosper all the more rapidly if its affairs are placed again in the hands of those who believe in the protective policy and have the courage and determination to stand up and say so, not only when an election is in progress but when they come to the House to administer the affairs of government.

Mr. ROCH LANCTOT (Laprairie-Napierville) (translation): Mr. Speaker, the budget speech of the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) is always listened to with much interest by this House, and it appeals more particularly to the people of this country, for if there are new taxes levied on the great majority of the people, there is also some disappointment expressed by those who expect reductions on many articles mentioned in the budget. The hon. member (Mr. Charters) who preceded me in this debate will, I trust, pardon me if I but answer a few of his remarks. Amongst other observations, he said that a defeated candidate had been appointed judge or senator. He is not teaching the old politicians of this House anything new, because this has always been the practice of both political parties, and those who are so chosen to sit on the bench or enter the Senate, never complain.

So far as the budget is concerned, I have very little to add. Nevertheless I would have been better pleased had not beer been taxed. Beer drinkers are to be found almost everywhere in the province of Quebec. It is the poor man's beverage at the present time, because spirits are so highly taxed that it is almost out of the reach of a workman or of a humbler farmer like myself to purchase a bottle of scotch, gin, brandy or rye, and as I am in favour of temperance and should like to see it spread more and more amongst our Canadian parishes in the old province of Quebec, I wish to plead its cause and I therefore beg of the hon. Minister of Finance to find some possible way of dispensing with this tax of 15 cents per gallon on beer and soft drinks. Furthermore, Mr. Speaker, I would in no way object to an increase on Scotch and other liquors so as to compensate for the loss sustained by the removal of the tax on beer, and those who come as our guests from Ontario or elsewhere, even from the United States, will pay for the increase, and we shall be able to drink beer at reasonable prices.

As I have previously stated, Mr. Speaker, I find very little fault with the budget delivered by my hon. friend the Minister of Finance. I have, in the past, approved the late minister of finance when he proposed to this Parliament new taxes. I even previously upheld, when we took part in the war, in 1914, that the government of the day should have taxed the people so as to pay at least one-quarter of these war expenditures; but I understand that the far-seeing statesmen of the day did not wish to let the people know how much money was necessary to keep up this conflict; they needed men and money for the war. It would have been far preferable to tax the people at that time, because they had the means to pay such taxes; but to-day times are harder. Nevertheless, we must stand the racket. I am glad to see that the people at least realize what war costs, for I myself, I have heard people tell me in my county, "Why, you are against the war and we are making money while it lasts." They even lent money out at 5½ per cent with tax exemption. This was to their gain; but now the Government is going to tax them, and these same people who are receiving dividends from the Dominion of Canada, will, on the other hand, have to pay back. This, however, a little against their wishes, so as to liquidate this mania for war. If there is a person in that House, who has a right to find fault with these new taxes, it is certainly your humble servant, because I was opposed from the outset of the second year to this senseless and immoderate policy followed by the two parties in this House.

Everybody must now acknowledge that in entering the war we went into it blindly, without knowing where it would lead us to; we foolishly squandered the people's money without helping very much the cause of the Allies, but rather to enrich the Canadian manufacturers and those engaged in making munitions of war. These same people invested the millions made during the war with the late Minister of Finance and were exempted from the tax on some hundreds of millions of dollars, and we, the poor people, who have a yearly income of three or four thousand dollars, we are forced to pay an income tax, while these gentlemen who have amassed wealth during the war, who have well sheltered their millions under the country's guarantee, who will be reimbursed cent for cent, receive, for two millions lent to the State, about $110,000 of yearly interest, and they are not taxed a cent on the above amount. That is what these people call patriotism.

Mr. ST. PERE (Translation): Commercial patriotism.

Mr. LANCTOT (Translation): As the hon. member for Hochelaga has just called it, commercial patriotism. For my part, Mr. Speaker, I do not relish this kind of patriotism.

In the course of this session, my right hon. friend, the late prime minister, alluded to the policy which I enunciated in my county in reference to the National Railways. As I have not had an opportunity to protest, I take advantage of the means offered to me this evening to reopen the discussion on this question with the leader of the Opposition. Not only have we foolishly participated in the war, but we have also foolishly purchased railways; that is to say, that those at the helm of the government of that day knew no limits; they threw away hundreds of millions, nay billions of dollars. Money was no object, anything went. It was even then admitted that the end was an unknown factor, that any extravagance was permissible, that we would always have money on hand. Well, is it not the contrary which happens? I discussed this railway question in my county and I wish to broach the subject once more this evening. First let us see how the railways started. I may say that it was a ruinous undertaking, and we are now wrestling with the consequences. In 1911, previous to the general election, the Laurier government was then in power; there existed in this country a company under the management of Mackenzie and Mann. They were the cause of many people doubting the honesty of numerous politicians in and out of this House. One of them was supposed to be a Tory, the other a Liberal. I came across them in this House, in the lobbies, in the railway committee room, and here and there. I was then a young man, having been in this House but a few years; my experience was limited and I was not aware of all that was going on. I was undergoing a business training. Nevertheless, I thought it proper to advise one of my leaders that the best thing the Liberal Government could do would be to close their accounts with that firm of Mackenzie and Mann, adding that if I had any say in regard to Canada's policy, it is what I would do without the least hesitation; that I would not give this guarantee of $35,000,000, so as to ensure the construction of the Canadian Northern between Port Arthur and Montreal, but that on the contrary, I would discontinue the building of this railway, expropriate its different western branches and hand over the traffic of such branches to Laurier's National Transcontinental. I was told that it could not be done. I did not then understand the ins and outs of politics; however, later, I became familiar with them. The opposition of that day, led by Mr. Borden, put up a weak protest but I suppose Mr. Borden had to reckon with Mr. Mackenzie, who guaranteed the party funds to beat Laurier; and that is what happened: of the $35,000,000 voted by the Laurier Government, a portion found its way into the Tory candidates' pockets all over the country, so as to defeat Laurier, and we certainly well deserved it. I regret nothing, because we acted wrongly on this occasion.

The leader of the Opposition several times, and all through the country, bitterly reproached the Liberal party for our extravagance in having built so many railways. Should I ever meet him on public hustings I would prove to him without the shadow of a doubt that the Conservatives are more to blame than we are, although I admit that we have to bear our share of this responsibility. If our project of constructing the Canadian Northern between Port Arthur and Montreal was considered impracticable, why did the Tory party, five weeks later, when they assumed power, put the project to execution? It was their duty to remedy the blunder. Not only were they satisfied to take up our scheme, which was a poor one, but they also came to an agreement with Mr. McBride, then Prime Minister of British Columbia, and if the country had not come to the rescue of British Columbia by purchasing the Canadian Northern, that province would have been bankrupt owing to this senseless policy of building a third line so as to cater to a population of 376,000 people. I see to-day, on the order paper, that an hon. member is asking the Government if they have the intention of paying to Mackenzie and Mann the amount thus guaranteed. We, belonging to the province of Quebec, have been more fortunate than the other provinces of the Dominion.

Mr. ST. PERE (Translation): More business-like.

Mr. LANCTOT (Translation): More business-like. Yes, we were fortunate enough to have as administrators more practical men whose thoughts went to ensuring the welfare of the province they represented, rather than to preparing and winning elections as Bob Rogers used to boast about when he was a member of this House.

Now, I stated in my own county of Laprairie-Napierville, and I fought the election on that point, that if I were returned to Parliament, as far as I was concerned, I would be willing to sell our National railways if I could find a company to purchase them. However, I put down conditions; I would not sell to a "Toronto ring." I would not even consider the offer of a "Montreal ring," but I would sell to a company called the Canadian Pacific Railway, which is a responsible company and well able to pay us. I would sell them the whole system of railways for one dollar. This is cheap; however, if Rockefeller, who is in a position to purchase our railways, and to pay for them cash down—for he is considered worth two billions and a half, and we have property to the extent of 1,652 million dollars, according to the statements made by Sir Joseph Flavelle, who manages part of our railways—if Rockefeller, I say, owned these railways and obtained the results we are at present getting, do you suppose for a moment that he would like to hold them long? He would simply say: let us get rid of them, I shall slightly increase the price of my oil and I shall get out of it. We have built our railways in this country 50 years ahead of time. Notwithstanding the ability of a company to pay for the whole system, it would never make a success of it. I shall prove my contention. We have at present a population of 8,700,000, people spread over an area as large as the whole of the United States of America. Now this latter country has not made a success of its railways, although it has a population of 110,000,000 inhabitants. With practically three transcontinentals which spans from ocean to ocean a territory as vast as ours, what can the solution be to the problem? Should the Government wish to carry on this policy which is not to my liking and which costs us enormous sums each year, there is but one thing to do and that is to discontinue operating one of these lines, that one which extends between Ottawa and Port Arthur. If, there are a number of settlers scattered here and there, for 25 or 30 miles along this railway, we can satisfy them by allowing them the use of a kind of so-called local train. That is due to them because it is the building of this railway that drew them to those parts. Let us come to an agreement with the Canadian Pacific Railway so that they will operate this railway line, and, if necessary, grant them a certain amount of money for a number of years. Let us do more, if we find the same state of affairs exists in other parts, let us repeat this arrangement. I am told that in British Columbia, from the prairies to Vancouver, there are but few houses scattered here and there along the line of the Canadian Northern, and that the upkeep of that line is a clear loss to the country of no less than $8,000,000 per year. Why then not put a stop to such loss? Why do I wish to sell our railways for $1.00 to the Canadian Pacific Railway? Because they have an efficient staff, because they have a board of directors who are past masters in railway affairs.

This company would do away with all duplications which at present exist on the lines, and, within five years it is the people of this country who would benefit the most, because if the Canadian Pacific Railway succeed in making the National Railways pay, when we fail to do so, the country will benefit by it, let it be in five or ten years.

What do we hear every day: With the present freight rates life is unbearable. If we cannot exist with the present rates, we the farmers, must cut them down. But how can you expect a government to do so when it acknowledges a deficit of $72,000,000 yearly, simply to keep the trains moving, without taking into account what is expended each year for the maintenance of these railways and charged to capital account and therefore bearing no interest. We must not only take into consideration the actual deficit that the Minister of Railways admits each session in his statement, but we must also consider what we spend yearly for maintenance. Our National Railways cost the country last year $165,000,000 which the late Minister of Finance advanced. If we are already losing money with a smaller capitalization, how can we expect profits by doubling this capitalization? We have sunk enough money. Let us put a stop to it.

Mr. Speaker, I contend that should we persist in operating our railways, it will lead this country to positive ruin. I am always astonished to hear partisans of nationalization tell us: "For Heaven's sake keep quiet, let those who are in favour of nationalization have their way, and we shall make a success of it; time means nothing, wait until we have doubled our population." Do you expect to draw many useful immigrants to this country with the policy which has been expounded in this House during the present session by grumbling that one cannot exist in Canada if the tariff is not lowered on all articles?

Have not the Progressives proclaimed high and low in this House that it is impossible, at present, to make a living in the West, and that we must not encourage people to immigrate there.

Mr. McMASTER (Translation): It is worse in other places.

Mr. LANCTOT (Translation): I cannot understand, Mr. Speaker, that intelligent men, such as I know many in this House, try to compare our vast system of railways with an electric tramway located in a small town of Ontario, Quebec, or any other place. I have the honour of sitting, in this House, not very far away from a highly intelligent gentleman, who gave as an illustration which to my mind is not at all comparable to a situation such as that of 22,000 miles of railways in a country like ours having a population of 8,700,000 inhabitants. He said, in this House, that the small town he comes from possesses and operates with profit an electric tramway. It is quite evident that in such a case the municipal council establishes the rates so as to meet the expenditures, not for profits but simply to make both ends meet each year. Well, I put it up to those who, in this House, are in favour of nationalizing our railways, to follow that example, and I, for one, shall put up my share. If you insist on nationalizing our railways and all public utilities, pay for it gracefully and do not bitterly complain and call upon the Government to lower the taxes. For my part, I contend that it is the only policy to follow for a party in power and for the country at large. Many of my hon. friends in this House protest against the taxes; they even contend that banks should not be taxed. These hon. gentlemen are no doubt forgetful of the fact that we have just emerged from a mighty war; they forget that our politicians, such as the hon. leader of the Opposition for instance, were in favour of sending even our last man and spending our last dollar for the war. He succeeded very well, and he was supported by a large majority of members in this House. That is evidenced by the results of the 1917 election when the Progressive party, who are now opposite to us and the Ontario party who sit on both sides of this House, were in favour of ruining the country to win the war. Has human blunder ever been more evident? Do not try to make believe to an intelligent people such as Canadians are, that 300,000 men were of any account in that war when there were 43,000,000 men already engaged in the European conflict. It is impossible for me to believe such a thing. I say that our boys did their duty during the war; but we must not forget that our politicians of the day—who ruined us—kept within our boundaries during that whole time, 172,520 men so as to give chase to our conscripts of Quebec. They held back about 50,000 men in England. They were calling for conscripts when the United States had just made its entry into the war, backed by all the gold and silver in the world. Yet they had not sufficient vessels to transport the American troops. Why did they want conscription in this country? To hammer on the province of Quebec and say that we had not done our duty. When I speak in this House, I assume all the responsibilities of what I say, and do not drag in others. I have already declared in this House, and I shall do so again, that had I been, at the time, twenty-two or twenty-three years old, never would I have gone to fight in France, but on the contrary, I would have remained in this country to fight for my race, because we do not enjoy our full rights, we have never had them. We were asked to go and battle in France for the freedom of nations, to have Belgium's neutrality respected. We have our own little claims which deserve consideration as much as Belgium's neutrality—such as, for instance, those of our compatriots in Ontario or in Manitoba.

I will make a statement here this evening. I am not of the same opinion as the leader of the Opposition who still wishes to prepare soldiers for future wars of the Empire. Well, as regards the Empire, I agree. However the Empire is still standing and we are crushed, we are completely ruined; the Empire is discharging its obligations since the termination of the war, while we, ever since that date, are increasing them. Let the Empire take care of itself and let Canada look after her own interest, such is my motto. No, we have had too many humbugs in this country. Even now, at this very time, there is a small group, in the corner over there, who expound their senseless policy and which is entirely out of proportion to our means. They make comparisons. They contend that we spend 17 cents per head for a navy in Canada, while England spends $10 per head for its navy; but there is a vast difference between John Bull and the colony of John Bull, which by name is called Canada. We all know that England has still money lent all over the world, some say ten billions, others eighteen or twenty billion of dollars; let us put it at fifteen billions. England is in need of a merchant marine to reach the products of the whole world, to carry back to her islands what is needed to feed her population and to gather the interest due to her. Moreover she needs a fleet to protect her trade throughout the world. There lies the reason why Germany declared war on her so as dispute her supremacy. Engand said: Never! She was the top dog; so much the better. We took part in the war and I extend my congratulations to those who volunteered to take part; let those who wish to fight for the Empire do so. But let it be understood, the Empire must pay, it will look after our soldiers as they did for the African war and I shall not hinder any one from taking part. I do not say that I shall myself shoulder the rifle, I am getting old and I do not intend to join.

Now, I support this Government because I am a Liberal. I am a Liberal of the old school, not one of those who have come in at the last hour, at the last moment, who were simply shoved in, but a descendant of Médéric Lanctôt and others like him. I have always been an anti-militarist and I had cause to be so, because if we have made preparations for the war they were never an asset to us. Is there an hon. member, in this House, who can say that our navy—if we ever had one, and we did, it was made up of the Rainbow and the Niobe, the Conservatives had a good laugh over it, nevertheless there was a time when they seemed very proud of it—I ask, is there a member who can say that our navy was of any use ever since we have been a British colony? Our militia did us a good turn in 1812; but what has it done since? When Uncle Sam wanted a portion of our territory, did he not take it? I am speaking about the state of Maine. In regard to Alaska, did our delegates, who went over to defend our case, return satisfied? They were hoodwinked by John Bull, and Uncle Sam returned satisfied.

An hon. MEMBER (Translation): What about the embargo?

Mr. LANCTOT (Translation): The embargo! I have nothing to say in regard to what England is doing; I would be the last to rise and claim that the embargo should be lifted. If England has not the courage to impose a tax on the importation of cattle from foreign countries, and if she wishes to obtain the same result by using other means, it is her undoubted right. But if, as it is said, England had promised during the war to our statesmen that she would lift this embargo once the war was over, I say that she follows in the footsteps of Germany, and she does not honour her promise. That is all I have to say. I do not know if it is true, but if it is, such is my answer.

We have a debt that is enormous for a small population like ours, and a country so little developed. The hon. Minister of Finance informs us that this debt amounts to two and a half billion dollars, but it is nearer three billions, according to the Official Gazette, and I consider that the gross debt of any country is its real liability. I am satisfied that none of those who owe us will ever pay us; governments are not always paid what is due them, especially the government whose seat is at Ottawa. Moreover, there is the railway indebtedness which is already enormous and which ere long will be as high as that of the country. People lose sight of the fact that this is a real indebtedness. If our railway brought us any revenue, it would be different, we would then have an asset, but there being no revenue, it is a real liability. I would like to know how much the minister pays annually for our guarantee bonds for Mackenzie and Mann, the Grand Trunk and all the companies we recently purchased. We must face all those obligations. According to me, the remedy is simple, I think we should try and sell our railways as soon as possible, either for one dollar, or for more if we can. I am not difficult to please as to the amount, provided we are rid of that white elephant.

I do not know whether the people of the West and of Ontario are actually in favour of public ownership of railways, but their representatives in this House are. I therefore believe that I shall not please these gentlemen in speaking as I do this evening, but I am always ready to express my thoughts openly. During the war, I received letters from a great many people in the province of Ontario, whom I did not know, and who wrote to me saying: Sir, we have not the honour of your acquaintance, but we are happy to congratulate you, because you are not afraid to speak out what others dare only whisper.

I do not wish to detain the House very long, as it is already late, but I have another subject to discuss, it concerns lawyers. Those gentlemen are not always pleased at what I say, but, as my hon. friend from Peel (Mr. Charters) referred a while ago to a lawyer who had either been appointed to the Senate or to the Bench, I also wish to speak of another lawyer. This gentleman was a lawyer formerly, but now he has given up law for something quite different, as I shall tell you, Mr. Speaker. As you know, I am an eonomical man. I preach economy and practice it as well. I proved it at the time when the parliamentary indemnity was increased. And if I opposed it, it was not for the purpose of acquiring political friends in my county, they had all been my supporters before that.

Mr. McMASTER: They are intelligent people.

Mr. LANCTOT: That is it, as my hon. friend from Brome has just stated. There are here, in Ottawa, a parliamentary counsel, two chief-assistants, two special assistants, clerks, stenographers, in fact, quite an organization which costs $24,260. Before 1913, its cost amounted to only $12,000, and now that we are ruined, it costs double. I do not see the reason of it, because I wonder what they can find to do when the session is over. Yet, everybody to-day is employed by the year. Well, I shall show in a moment what my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition (Mr. Meighen) did when he was Prime Minister, with the aid of my hon. friend, Mr. Charles Doherty, of Montreal. The former Minister of Justice, the hon. Mr. Doherty has made several trips to Europe. At the time of the dissolution of the National-Liberal-Conservative government, in October last, Mr. Doherty had not yet returned from the Geneva conference, and during his absence, the hon. Prime Minister had replaced him by a Mr. Bennett from Calgary. After the arrival of my hon. friend, his Montreal friends informed him that he was no longer Minister of Justice. You will admit with me, Mr. Speaker, that he cannot have slept very soundly after that. A few days later, the then Prime Minister left for the Eastern Townships to deliver speeches in support of protection. He had to pass through Montreal on returning to Ottawa. I am informed that the minister who had been dismissed from office met the Prime Minister and that the latter was compelled to appoint him as a lawyer in a certain case to be settled between Canada and Newfoundland concerning Labrador, at a fee of $10,000.

Mr. RINFRET: Per annum?

Mr. LANCTOT: I am told that it is not per annum, but .for the preliminaries of the case. I do not know much about a lawyer's work. However he must do something since his fees amount to $10,000. But Mr. Doherty accepted on certain conditions. He immediately received $5,000. He came back, they say, broke, from the other side. He had to have money by all means. Therefore $5,000 was given to him. I have had a conversation about this affair with a very good friend with whom I have had excellent relations both in and out of the House. He lives in Toronto, and was once Minister of Justice, I may add that he is both a gentleman and an honest man. I am told that this lawyer of Toronto deals with governments as he does with private clients; when he works, for instance when he prepares a brief for a case, he charges the government exactly what he would ask from a private client. You will admit, Mr. Speaker, that Mr. Doherty is not an ordinary lawyer, and I shall prove it to you. He has become a white elephant whose upkeep is most expensive. Sometime ago, I had a question inserted on the order paper concerning this gentleman. This question mentioned the date of May 11th, 1855; I could not go back any further than that date, as my friend was born on May 11th, 1855. Here is the answer which I was given. First of all, as judge he received $78,147.50; as a state pensioner, $70,893.33 —this is sometime ago, it is more to-day, he continues to receive $4,666.66 per year— but this is not all. He has travelled as a judge, but it amounts to very little, $282.90. While a member of the House of Commons he received as parliamentary indemnity, the sum of $40,555. Furthermore as Minister of Justice, he was paid $76,636.20. Now, during his term as Minister of the Crown, he received for travelling expenses, the sum of $3,196.25. Lastly, as counsel for the arbitration between Canada and Newfoundland concerning the boundaries of Labrador, he was paid in advance, the sum of $5,000. The department has no further knowledge of his receiving any thing more. He got nine thousand and a few hundred dollars for trips to Europe during the war, one of which was to represent Canada at the Peace Conference, at Versailles. My hon. friend from Wellington South (Mr. Guthrie) also took a few little trips—I hope he had a good time—for the amount is but a bagatelle, $9,000.

I have my doubts, Mr. Speaker, if according to the act amended in 1920, Mr. Doherty, as attorney of the Justice Department was entitled to draw his full salary. The amendment for which I was sponsor and had adopted in 1920, was to the effect that the pension of a retired judge must be deducted from his indemnity, when he becomes either member of this House or of the Senate or a Minister of the Crown. I should like to know from the present Minister of Justice whether the law has the same effect when applied to the Government's attorney. I do not ask for an immediate answer, however, I trust that one will be given me in the course of this session. While I am on the subject, you are aware that we, the farmers, are usually men who practice and preach economy. We should very much like to know if it is not too late to remedy this state of things. What do we see here, at Ottawa, in all the departments. There are it seems, law officers in eleven departments. It is not mentioned whether there are one, two or three in each case, but there are lawyers in eleven departments. In the Department of Justice there are quite a number. In the House of Commons, we find four, I believe. I ask the Minister of Justice, who is a lawyer and a business man of the very highest standing, if it is not possible to improve on this state of affairs and to establish an office of legal experts which would advise all the different departments. We could provide offices for these legal men in some building in Ottawa, and when a department would wish to proceed with a case, they would submit their case to these officers; because, as I understand it, there are lawyers who specialize in procedure, others in the preparation of statements, still others as barristers,—finally others who are very little use. This office should be under the direction of two lawyers who could be got in Montreal or Toronto, men chosen amongst the best legal luminaries of this country, should it be deemed necessary, they would be placed in charge of a certain staff. Instead of paying as it happened about $180,000 to Winnipeg lawyers when certain famous cases took place in that city, I contend that we could have saved by these means for the country an amount which I am not in a position to give, but which must be very considerable. Ever since I have been a member in this House, I have seen a great number of lawyers come from all parts to ask favours and cases and all t' is must have been very expensive to the country. Tomorrow, it will be said that Roch Lanctôt is an enemy of lawyers. No, I am not against the lawyers, but let us act in a business-like manner, because we are called upon to pay; it is the people of this country that have to foot the bill. When you think that we farmers have not had a crop for two years and had to buy the feed for our cattle, that we are called upon to pay larger taxes every year, when we realize that if we desire to-morrow to draw $500 from the bank, we shall have to put on our cheque ten two cent stamps—and I assure you that you cannot get much from a lawyer for that amount; they require much more than that—I say: For mercy's sake, let us adopt now a policy of economy.

Note the point which I am trying to make. It those who hold the higher posts would show the way to the people, what would it mean? You would not see such things as are happening now at the offices of the ministers and hon. members from the city of Ottawa. Every day hon. gentlemen are visited by people who are asking for an increase of salary. They are only following the example set by men of higher rank who are drawing pensions which they never earned. Do you consider, for instance, that Mr. Doherty has earned the pension which he is getting? No. If this policy is to be continued in the future, it must be subject to certain conditions. Do you know, for instance, who was responsible for the Bolsheviki régime in Russia? It was the Czar himself. I say that we must abandon such a policy, which, in my opinion, is a policy of extravagance and one which is detrimental to certain classes of the community. Instead of that, let us adopt a policy for the people as a whole.

Now, take our railways. Why shall they never be a success? Is there a government in the world that can do what a private company can accomplish? Right here, you can not do it with the civil servants. You must give them a bonus, against your will. Can you reduce the wages of the railway employees?

Let us see what took place during the last election. They say that patronage has been abolished and that the Government do not interfere with the management of our roads. Well, it as been shown very clearly that the Minister of Railways and the Minister of Labour intervened to procure work for the unemployed in some constituencies. But there were unemployed men everywhere and the same thing should have been done in every constituency. A government cannot act as firmly and as wisely as a private concern, and that is why I say: Pray, let us rid the people now from all these burdens and that everything be set up again as it was before the war, if possible. Thus you will see that a government such as the one we have now, composed as it is of honest ministers who have already administered the public affairs, will be able to pull the country out of the mire it is in now.

Mr. THOMAS SALES (Saltcoats): Mr. Speaker, I am a little differently situated to most of my friends; I have a personal matter with the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding). He has enlarged a tax which seems to be rather unpopular, and unfortunately I am the only man in the House who bears the same name as that tax. I find that even hon. members are coupling that tax with my name. So what is going to happen to me from the less intelligent of the community outside I do not know. Probably if I cannot persuade the minister to change the name of this tax, I shall have to seriously consider entering an action against the Government for defamation of character.

But to deal with the matter seriously, if I cannot persuade him to change the name of the tax, I certainly would like to appeal to him to change it so that it will bear more lightly upon the working man. We are rapidly getting the reputation of being the dearest country of the civilized world in which to live. My hon. friend from Maple Creek (Mr. McTaggart) was talking about tobacco this evening, and it brought to my mind a little trip I had to Niagara Falls on the 25th May. While there I found I could buy a package of Tarryton's English tobacco twice as big as the package I can buy on Sparks street at the same price, and I bought a box of matches for six cents very nearly as big as the box that I have to pay fifteen cents for here.

In appealing to the Minister of Finance to reduce the sales tax on the necessaries of life I want to relate a little incident that I witnessed last winter. A poor man was in a store and was trying to buy for his family felt boots, stockings, mitts, caps and other articles that they absolutely must have for the winter. He had with him only $50, and when he had expended this sum he had but half the number of purchases that he needed. The big, strong fellow cried because he could not clothe his children to withstand our very severe climate. I am sure that if the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance could only understand how this sales tax bears on the poor man they would certainly remove it, say from boots costing $5 a pair or less, and on mitts and other articles of clothing which are absolutely necessary for winter wear.

With regard to the rest of the sales tax, I have no objection. I fully agree with my hon. friends who say that the man who can afford to pay $5,000 for a motor car can afford to contribute $1,000 to help run this country. I fully agree with them that the luxury tax was the best tax we ever had. Certainly the man or woman who can afford to pay $300 for a fur coat can afford to help towards the expenses of governing the country.

I am sorry that the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Baxter) is not in his seat. He will ever live in my mind because of two favourite phrases of his. He speaks very glibly of thirty cents, and I wonder whether he knows what thirty cents feels like when he has not got it. I do not believe that this House has had enough members in it who know what thirty cents feels like when they have not got it. His other favourite phrase that I shall never forget is a " morganatic alliance." He appears to know more about morganatic alliances than any other member. I do not know exactly what he means by the term. For my part, I have been satisfied with one wife, regularly married at church. But I think we saw this afternoon a " morganatic alliance " of a slightly different kind, and I suspect that we shall see a few more of them before this session closes.

I noticed that my hon. friend from Swift Current (Mr. Lewis) referred to his domestic affairs. The last time I ventured to refer to mine the House laughed uproariously for some reason or other, which makes me somewhat afraid to return to the subject. But as my hon. friend has spoken of his family, and as I do not intend my French-speaking brothers to have all the honours on this occasion, I may say that I have the hon. member for Swift Current beaten by two. So that when it comes to thirty cents on a pair of shoes, which the hon. member for St. John so glibly speaks of, and I multiply it by eleven, it is not thirty cents any more, it is $3.30.

I should like to remind the hon. member for St. John that while he speaks of the traditional thirty cents, we have it on record by a greater authority than he that the difference between happiness and misery is only twelve cents. Charles Dickens in the person of Micawber says: Income, one pound, expenditure, one pound and six pence—misery; income one pound, expenditure, nineteen shillings and six pence—happiness. So you see it is only a matter of twelve cents difference between happiness and misery. But the hon. member for St. John says, "It sounds like thirty cents." I shall reserve anything further I have to say on the sales tax until we get into Committee of the Whole.

I have been a little amused at the difference of opinion among our friends on the other side of the House. The hon. member for Brantford (Mr. Raymond) is not quite as lonely over there as I thought probably he would be. And even our good friend the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell) this evening found something in common with him; they both used the same happy phrase of a tariff for revenue, providing incidental protection.

The fear has many times been expressed that if we do not pursue this policy of protection our industries will go to the wall. I had intended to deal at some length with matters affecting the twine business, but I shall not do so tonight. The association with which I am connected out in the West has bought a large quantity of twine from the Brantford factories, and I know they say they do not need protection; they stand on their own feet. It is a strange thing that the large number of persons mentioned by the hon. member for Brantford (Mr. Raymond) are unemployed in that city because of the closing of their factories, while factories which are working under free trade are operating full time and over time. I am really afraid that the protectionist doctrine leads to this—and I am going to quote only one thing which a manufacturer of binder twine says:

> The success of the Brantford company is found to depend on quality of production and hard work, on good management, courage and efficiency. The company commenced business with the single idea of making the best binder twine on the market. It carried out that idea, and at a cost as low as its competitors, because the company's management was willing to work 24 hours a day if necessary. Flung on its own resources, with no tariff protection to shelter behind, the company substituted for that protection a constant striving for efficiency in buying, in manufacturing, in selling.

A manufacturer said to me in this House this very week that if the protection were taken away from our manufacturing plants they would have to stand on their own feet, and that it would be the best thing that ever happened to them; as long as they have protection they are going to lean on it. We have proved that our manufacturers can stand on their own feet. In fact, the manufacturers of farm implements are invading the very field which they say they are afraid of. I find that since 1914 a considerable number of agricultural implements manufactured in Canada have been sold in the United States. In 1919, $3,131,584 worth of agricultural implements and parts were sold in the United States, and in 1920 that trade was increased to $5,123,889. On looking up the figures I find a number of interesting things. For instance, in 1920, 12,094 ploughs and cultivators, amounting to $1,666,461, were sold in the United States, and 1,026 threshing machines at about $800 each, amounting to $850,375, were sold in that market. I cannot help wondering whether our agricultural machinery made in Canada and exported to the United States is sold cheaper in that country than it is within our own borders, because I do not know of any kind of threshing machine that I can buy for anything like that amount. All this talk of protecting these forty-four year old bewhiskered infant industries of ours is rubbish. The Minister of Agriculture is becoming quite an authority on infant industries. As those gentlemen who were with us when we took that very pleasant trip to Quebec will remember, the Minister of Agriculture stated there that there was only one way to make farming pay, and that was to have a large family so that it would not be necessary to pay wages and so that you would be able to keep all your money at home. I said to him on the train on the way back: "Mr. Motherwell, you have started a new infant industry". The hon. member for Peel (Mr. Charters) read such glowing reports to-night from that Ontario book that I wondered that there was a man left in the towns and cities; judging from the character of those reports, they should all be attracted to the farms. The hon. member for North Winnipeg (Mr. McMurray)—and I have heard doctors, lawyers and merchants, everybody except the farmer, say the same thing—spoke of the glories of farm life. All those who speak from this point of view agree on two things: first, that what this country needs is more people on the land; and, second, that it is the other fellow who should go. I sometimes think that I should be better off if I gave up living on the land; if I left the farm and lived off the farmer and joined in the universal chorus of "Back to the land" as the finest, freest, and most independent life there is.

There is just one other point I want to deal with—and I shall not detain the House very long—because I think this question is one of the most important we have before us, and it is one which has not been referred to very often during the course of the debate. I refer to the question of the distribution and marketing of our products, which was alluded to briefly by the hon. member for Brandon (Mr. Forke). I want to say, Mr. Speaker, that it is not altogether the price we get for our product that counts; we may get 80 cents a bushel for our wheat, but it is what we can get for that 80 cents or for that bushel of wheat that is important. I am going to give you a few illustrations to indicate why the western farmer, at any rate, is finding it very difficult to make ends meet. I marketed my wheat in October, the price then was 80 cents a bushel. My good wife asked me to bring home some apples, and I went to the store to get a box of apples. Now, I got 80 cents for 60 pounds of wheat, and to my surprise I was asked $4 for 40 pounds of apples. When the storekeeper said: "How many do you want?" I said: "I do not want any at that price." "But", he said, "These are MacIntosh Reds." I said: "I don't give a darn if they are Cochin-China Yellows; I don't want any. I will not give 300 pounds of food in the shape of wheat to buy 40 pounds of food in the shape of apples; neither would any other man in his senses." Under our wheat board we had the control of flour—I have stated this in the Committee on Agriculture—and for the price of 3 bushels of wheat I could get a 98 pound sack of flour, but the moment the control was taken off and the millers were left free it cost me the price of 5 bushels of wheat to buy that same 98 pounds of flour.

I was dealing with some of these matters during the recent campaign, and in that connection I had another strange experience. Take soda biscuits, for instance. I do not know what else is in them beyond flour, which is made from the wheat I grow, water, and perhaps a little shortening, yet it costs me sixty pounds of wheat to buy two small packages of soda biscuits, containing a little over two pounds—sixty pounds of wheat to buy two pounds of soda biscuits. To buy twenty pounds of rolled oats, it costs me over one hundred and forty pounds of oats. I could not carry enough hides on my back to buy a pair of boots. We have heard of the man who took his sheep to market, and when he had paid freight and marketing charges got only thirty cents apiece for them, then he went into the hotel to get a mutton chop for his dinner, and that cost him the price of three sheep. I have friends in Regina and Winnipeg who tell me they cannot afford to buy my beef. They told me that last fall. I could not give it away, and I was afraid to ship it to Winnipeg for fear it would not pay the freight.

What is wrong with this country when such conditions prevail? If there is one thing to which this House should devote its attention, it is to finding out what it is that stands between the man who grows the stuff and the man who wants to eat it. Whether it is combines, watered stock, the paying of millions of interest on watered stock, or whether it is that big business is strangling this country, I do not know, but that is the situation, and I believe that this House should take early steps to ascertain and make the public aware who is the guilty party. We cannot keep men in this country, and we cannot expect wages to come down unless we can find a remedy for the present situation. I do not know exactly what the remedy should be. Everybody seems to be able to prove an alibi pretty well. It makes me think sometimes of a patient who is being sucked to death by leeches. I remember as a boy going into a horse pond in the Old Country and having the leeches get on my leg, each one drawing out a little blood. I think the consumer to-day is in pretty much the same position as a patient who is being sucked by leeches. He pushes off one little leech, and it says, "I am only getting a little bit, only thirty cents, perhaps. I have to get my living." He pushes off another, which also says, "I am only getting my little bit," but all these little bits, a little bit by the tariff, a little bit through watered stock, a little bit by this, that, and the other, soon bleed the victim white, and a remedy must be found.

I apologize for detaining the House so long, but if my words have any effect in bringing about appropriate action, I shall be very pleased.

Mr. JULES EDOUARD PREVOST (Terrebonne) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, the speech on the budget as given by the Minister of Finance has many remarkable aspects. Looking at it from all possible angles would be a great task beyond my sphere and which, moreover, would tax too highly your patience, however boundless it may be. But allow me to dally, for a few moments, over certain phases of this important speech.

First, have we not all been filled with admiration at the intellectual powers, the profound knowledge of his subject, the clear and lucid mind, the sound and unimpaired judgment of the Minister of Finance, the cleverest Canada has ever produced? His return to the post he occupied during fifteen years, from 1896 to 1911, recalls the unparalleled prosperity which so well marked the administration of Laurier's government. The member for Queens and Shelburne, after a lapse of eleven years, is again chosen to watch over our finances. May it please the Almighty that with his advent the order and prosperity of days gone by may return.

The Minister of Finance has a most important part to fill and, I might say, decisive part to play in times of crisis such as we are passing through. Ever since the end of the war, it is on this department that the heaviest burdens and the most serious tasks have fallen. Although the Railway Department has a difficult problem to solve, the complexity of which is undeniable, yet the Finance Department is the organism of the Government where is met all that pertains to the economic life of this country. If, according to a celebrated saying, good politics bring financial success, it is no less true that, at present, the financial factor predominates in many ways the political factor, or, at least the latter must give way to the former. Therefore, the Minister of Finance must have the power to impart a character of unity to the financial policy followed.

It is indispensable that he should have a free hand in the preparation and the making up of the budget, that he should display the aggressiveness of the watchdog, a quality which should ever be present in a minister of Finance. Ever on the alert, he makes it a point not to give in when favours usually granted as a matter of course are being sought on every side. His supervision must extend over the receipts, watch that they be not neglected, as it happened under the late government. His labours do not end here. There remain many other jobs to successfully carry out. We must prepare to reimburse little by little the debt incurred by our country.

Then, in the midst of all this, appears the great needs, both foreseen and unforeseen, of the treasury, put to a specially hard test by the commitments and expenditures inherent to the nationalization of railways and the merchant marine that make up the major part of our budget. To meet these difficulties the Minister of Finance must have a definite policy, resting on a comprehensive and clear view of things. Through the critical times we are experiencing we must in the administration of our finances adhere to a consistent policy, raise revenues by the means of taxes justly assessed, practise economy in our budget expenditures, and forward the expansion of our foreign trade.

The present Minister of Finance gives ample proof of his consistency and of the loyalty of the Liberals to their programme, through the changes he brings about in our tariff.

By lowering, as much as circumstances will permit, the duty on numerous articles, the minister returns to the Liberal policy of 1897, when the customs duties were cut down on 147 articles. The present policy conforms to the one which was followed up by the Laurier government in the changes which it made to the tariff not only in 1897, but also in 1904, 1907 and in 1910; it is likewise in harmony with the changes which were proposed in the House of Commons by the Liberals ever since 1911, namely, on January 28 and February 10, 1914; March 16, 1915; February 23, 1916; May 23, 1917, and at the national convention in 1919. It is true, events took place which have changed the financial state of our country, and as the tariff must not be the outcome of an unrelenting doctrine, but, on the contrary, must adapt itself to circumstances, and safeguard above all the general welfare of the country, the present Liberal Government is not adhering strictly to all the reforms asked by the Liberals within the last years. Nevertheless the spirit is unchanged; the tendency remains the same; the Liberal party is still led by the cardinal principle which has been the mainstay of its policy in the past.

Confronted with our public debt seven times larger than it was previous to the war, in the face of the interest which we have to meet yearly, with railway deficits staring us in the face, and called upon to meet the demands of the country's administration, the first duty which devolved upon the Minister of Finance was to meet our current expenditures, our maturing debts, and provide for the pressing needs of Canada. It was impossible for him to discharge such large obligations without levying taxes. This is what he cautiously did, although, I admit, a closer scrutiny might wisely modify a few of these taxes.

All the theories in regard to taxes are embodied in general rules, indicating the aims sought: that is, to raise the most funds in the easiest possible way, from the ratepayers, at the same time interfering the least with the productive power of the country. It would not be a matter of surprise for any one if the Government found themselves under the necessity of imposing new taxes.

The Conservative and Unionists governments, which followed one another within the last ten years, bequeathed to the present Government as a legacy the heaviest task which has ever burdened a parliament. Our predecessors squandered money and, whatever may say their panegyrists, this unconstraint, this squandering have enormously inflated the already large amounts which the war demanded so that accounts for our public debt reaching, not millions, but billions of dollars. Who will figure what, first the Borden, then the Meighen governments have cost the country? And then these governments after recklessly squandering and deepening the chasm of our deficits, have left to their successors the heavy task of paying the formidable bill of their extravagant expenditures.

The new Government is fully aware of its immense task. Those who are responsible for such a state will not miss the chance to make the best of it. They will denounce before a roused public these new taxes which the Government will have to impose so as to restore order in the finances left by them in a state of confusion.

Mr. Speaker, the people responsible for the taxes are not so much those who establish them, but those who made them necessary. The country was made aware of the administrative squanderings, pillaging of public funds, frauds, enormous benefits of the profiteers, the scandals of war contracts, for which the late government is responsible, and that is why they were judged and condemned.

On the other hand, while imposing new taxes the Minister of Finance, so as to relieve the high cost of living and relieve as much as possible the ratepayer, lowered the customs duties which, after all, are paid by the consumer. Taking an interest in the welfare of the masses as well as that of our national industries, the King government seeks to lower the high cost of living, by cutting down the duties on a great number of articles of daily use and on the necessary implements for the development of our national resources. Let us not lose sight of the fact that the tariff is the greatest source of our revenue. However, the tax and tariff should not and must not overstep a certain limit otherwise they become detrimental to the people who bear them; we must watch so as not to destroy the source of our economic life and paralyze our commercial and industrial development. Therefore, another duty imposes itself on the country, on the Government, and the Minister of Finance reminds us of it. It is not enough to have removed from power those who by their poor administration have so seriously imperilled the finances and credit of Canada. The people demand that those in whom they placed their trust not only redeem the extravagances of the past, but also show an honest desire to maintain the financial equilibriun.

by putting into practice a rigid policy of economy.

In fact, the increase in the yield through taxation cannot suffice. The budget cannot find its bearings; the treasury is empty, the deficit enormous.

Our national debt which amounted to $300,000,000 in 1914, to-day amounts to more than two billion dollars; the interest alone figures up to $140,000,000 per year, compared with $14,000,000 in 1914; we pay out in pensions and assistance to disabled soldiers more than $60,000,000 yearly; our railways leave us with an annual deficit of $70,000,000. Even now, I have not enumerated the whole of our heavy obligations. So as to follow a firm policy of adjustment of our finances, the strictest economy is necessary: it constitutes a whole political program and becomes absolutely indispensable to the proper balancing of our finances and to the economical uplift of our country.

The Government is therefore right in restricting as much as possible our expenditure. Would it not have seemed more than strange, for instance, that three years and a half after the war, when disarmament is preached everywhere and to attain that end conferences are held in all parts of the world, would it not, I say, have seemed more than strange to behold Canada voting large sums of money for its military budget, out of proportion to its needs, to its population and especially to its revenues? I might say that the same argument applies to the naval service or war navy expenditures. Would it not be a disgrace if the public service remained encumbered with this large and unnecessary staff which was brought in under the late administration? The Government must not hesitate in applying the hot iron on all the abuses. It is with that understanding that the Canadian people will accept and joyfully put up with the new burdens.

I mentioned, at the outset of my remarks, that Canada must expand its external trade.

To insure our economic revival and the restoring of our financial state, no way appears more effective than to increase our exportations. On the increase of our external trade depends indeed the wealth of Canada, the disappearance of the crisis which forces the heads of certain factories to close their doors or to lower their production which brings on a sad unemployment for the workmen.

Outside trade which, at all times, played an outstanding part in our country's affairs, is at present becoming of primary importance. On examining the latest statistics relative to our commerce, we become aware that our exportations have considerably decreased. In 1914, our exports amounted to $455,437,224. In 1918, they reached the fanciful figure of $1,586,-169,792.

This rapid increase is without doubt due to the war which gave Canada an opportunity to sell to the allied nations of Europe products of all kinds of which they were in need. There is to be found the main reason of the prosperity which favoured the country during the four years that lasted this war so disastrous for many other countries.

However, the conditions have changed. Canada's whole export in 1921, amounted to $1,210,428,119, which means about $400,-000,000 less than in 1918; and in the course of the fiscal year ending March 31st 1922, our exports amounted only to $753,-927,009.

It is in Canada's interest to find means of preventing this continuous decrease of its exports. With that end in view, it must adopt a firm policy and right methods so as to secure new markets and a steady external trade.

The Minister of Trade and Commerce said, in a speech which he delivered some time ago, at Montreal: We must direct all our efforts to bring back the prevailing conditions to their normal state". That is one of the essential conditions for the future and prosperity of our country. Canada will only develop providing we further extend our export trade. All must cooperate with that end in view, because a country cannot attain a genuine prosperity unless all put their shoulder to the wheel." That is a fact. It is apparent that the rapid increase in our trade during the war was abnormal; the cause was transient and ephemeral. It was a momentary gain but this magnified prosperity caused by extraordinary circumstances which changed almost suddenly, was rather detrimental to our industrial development. How many of our industries dazzled by the sudden foreward leap of our commerce, took too much for granted, plunged too soon and too far into extravagant expenditures and thereby over produced, and, now they see their success imperiled by the sudden ups and downs of our commerce. Canada which is and should remain an essentially farming country or, at least, should restrict its efforts to the development of its natural resources, evolves rapidily, too rapidly indeed towards industry. This course will only lead it to true prosperity if its evolution towards industrialism proceeds rationally and by degree.

It was truly remarked lately: First, the industrial evolution of Canada must be the result of the normal expansion of our markets and not promoted by a purely momentary and casual demand or protected by tariff measures or others, of too artificial a character.

An undeniable truth, is that the Canadian market is insufficient for the consumption of our farm products, the absorption of our mining products and a great part of our manufactured goods. Experience teaches us that an industry which limits its scope of action to its home market leaves itself open to dangerous crises and, to escape the too sudden fluctuations of the home market, it must throw outside strong feelers.

Our duty is therefore to open up new markets. Such was the aim of the Laurier government during the fifteen years it presided over the destinies of Canada. The increase of our sales went hand in hand with the development of our output, under the Liberal rule. In 1896, Canadian exports amounted to $110,000,000; in 1911, they reached the figure of $274,316,000. Our manufactured goods exported, which by themselves amounted, in 1896, to $7,000,000, reached the figure of $35,000,000, in 1911; our agricultural exports which, in 1896, amounted to $40,000,000, climbed to $82,601,000 in 1911.

Modeling our policy on that of the Laurier government to insure the progress of Canada towards prosperity, we must seek new openings for our export articles. In an essentially producing country like ours, we must have for our products numerous markets, easy of access.

The countries to which we sell the most are Great Britain and the United States, since 82 per cent of our external trade is carried on with item.

It is of the utmost importance for our commerce to find new openings and to expand our foreign markets. The total exports of Canada to the United States in the month of March last reached the amount of $1,283,942, against $9,488,589 for the same corresponding month of last year. The total exports for the period of ten months ending on March 31st, 1921 and 1922, respectively reached the amount of $157,141,786 for 1920-21 and of $35,954,735 for 1921-22.

This large increase is due to the effects of the American tariff (Fordney bill) adopted and put into force in May, 1921.

Under such circumstances, it is evident that Canada must seek in other countries markets which the Americans refuse us.

In fact, it is dangerous for Canada to export most of its products to one or two countries. It is impossible to speak on imports without touching the question of our transport system, that is to say, the merchant marine and the railways.

I have not the intention to even touch upon these different subjects, it might lead too far. Let it suffice for me to say that I am convinced that the King government cannot escape—neither does it seek to evade its responsibilities in the administration of the affairs of the country. So far as it concerns the means of transportation: merchant marine and railways, its heritage is of a complex nature, an unhappy situation which is not of its making.

He will do the best he can. However, by all means, he must secure for the producers of this country the necessary means of transport so as to insure the development of our natural resources, to help the expansion of our commerce both internal and external. If Canada wishes to grow, to extend its horizon, to spread its name and its products over the world, it needs a vast interior system of communication by water and by rail, also a merchant fleet; however, this great undertaking can and must be realized without the state spending hundreds of millions each year. Individual and private initiative, guided by its own interest and responsibility, plays a part here which the state must not encroach upon. Whenever it has attempted to do so, in whatever country it may have been, the experiment was disastrous.

Our waterways linked to our great lakes, our railways converging towards our maritime ports, our merchant marine, the whole of our transport system, which improves from day to day, is well adapted to the necessities of exportation. But this is not sufficient and if we do not organize in a scientific way the foreign sale of our products, it would be useless to urge upon the Canadian merchants the duty of economic expansion.

I mentioned just now that we should open up new markets, I may add that we should also establish, with the country receiving our goods, direct business intercourse, and with that aim in view make a serious study of the conditions prevailing in those countries where we wish our commerce to penetrate, establish a perfect system of informations for our merchants and manufacturers.

To export is a science. It is not as easy as the man on the street is apt to think to find a market abroad for the surplus of a country's output. There exists differences in languages, currency, custom, taste, transactions, etc., which one must be acquainted with. Moreover let us not forget that competition is very close. We have, it is true, at our disposal a whole commercial organization which is expected to render great services. But it is not yet working perfectly and the Minister of Trade and Commerce whose mind is wide open to progressive ideas and business enterprise, should without any delay work at completing the organization of our commerce abroad. Everywhere, in all the countries of the world, large and small, they are preparing for commercial sway. All have consular agencies entirely composed of men well prepared for the services they are called upon to render, numerous and competent commercial attachés. Almost all possess commercial museums, information bureaux organized by the state. In the United States, England, France, Italy, Germany, Belgium, Switzerland, Holland, Denmark and Japan, the governments are represented by consuls and trade agents spread over the world, having information bureaux, publishing booklets which give out data for the guidance of exporters, and to expand more and more the commerce abroad of these various countries. In the world-wide competition where Canada wishes and must battle, it must arm itself with the same weapons and use the same tactics to which have recourse the other countries desirous of succeeding and which do succeed in extending their commerce.

Where is, in Canada, our commercial museum, our official information bureau that place at the disposal of our merchants and manufacturers, samples of raw materials and of industries of all the countries in the world, collections showing the modifications which take place in goods in the manufacturing process; maps and photographs showing the localities of production, the transportation methods, packing and other useful details; notices explaining the chances of doing business in foreign countries, the customs, the means of transportation, the different weights and measures systems, currency, customs duties, banking systems and numerous other precise information, practical advice, well timed warnings, used as a guidance for private initiative and landmarks to the Government in its negotiations with foreign countries? I only know, in this country, the Ecole des Hautes études commerciales of Montreal which possesses a commercial museum now in course of organization. I may remark, by the way, that this institution, the foundation of which is due to the far-seeing mind of the Minister of Justice, when he was Prime Minister of Quebec, is becoming one of the best schools of its kind in America.

In this country, as in all others, the Minister of Trade and Commerce should possess a commercial museum and a bureau containing very complete commercial information gathered from the best official sources such as in the year books, reviews, statistical and geographical publications, and others. What valuable services such an organization could render to our traders?

These institutions which exist in almost all other countries are not to be found in Canada.

In the same way, our service of commercial agents is very limited. We possess about twenty trade commissioners recruited in a very wretched way. In reference to this, I notice that in the list of our commercial agents, there is but one French-Canadian, Lt.-Col. Hercule Barré, at Paris. If it was part of the late government's policy to eliminate the French-Canadians, in the choice of our commercial attaches, I know that such a practice will disappear. Now, I would like to know what valuable services can our trade commissioner, in Belgium, possibly, render us if he is not conversant with the French language? Do all our commercial agents, a list of whom is in front of me and who represent Canada in twenty different countries, fulfil their duties efficiently, do they correspond with our business firms, our producers, our traders; do they truly keep the Minister of Trade and Commerce well posted on the possibility of doing business in the parts where they have been sent? We have cause to doubt of the efficiency of the services of these trade agents when we know how they have been recruited in Canada. On the admission of Mr. William Foran, secretary of the Civil Service Commission, we are content with requiring from candidates a common school education instead of a diploma from a technical institution of a high order, as the thing is done in other countries. By so doing not only would we secure for the State competent commercial representatives in all parts of the world, but we would also be opening up a new and fine career to the young Canadians who graduate in commercial schools.

Mr. J. A. Cooper, who was trade commissioner, at New York, during the war, lately said before the members of the Export Club, at Montreal, that at present it is difficult to gather details regarding the import and export trades. This is due to the shortage of commercial representatives. Great Britain has 115 commercial agents in the United States, Argentina 25, Belgium 60, and the other countries are better represented than Canada. I heartily approve the hopes expressed by Mr. Henry Laureys, director of the Ecole des Hautes études commerciales, at Montreal, during a lecture given on Canada's external trade, and I trust that the Government will bring on the necessary changes in the mode of recruiting these important officials who are our trade agents, so as to endow the external trade service of Canada, with an efficient staff who will in no way be handicapped as compared with that of other countries.

Fairs and exhibitions are also a powerful weapon to advertise the products that we wish to sell in foreign lands. In this connection, I must congratulate the Minister of Trade and Commerce for having asked a credit of $50,000 to give effect to the project put forth by Senator Beaubien in order to have circulated in France, and I also hope in Belgium, an exhibition train showing the raw material and the manufactured articles that we have for sale.

Mr. Speaker, we are passing through a critical political period, we have to face serious problems. We are confronted with the question whether in such a juncture the government in charge of the country's affairs, is in a position to make a success of it: this is what the House must decide; that is what the people expects from the government. We certainly have no reason to lose hope and distrust the future. Let us recall the example of the United States. In 1860, our neighbour's debt amounted to $64,000,000. After the war of Secession, in 1866, their debt increased to $2,733,000,000. In twenty years the United States wiped out half of their debt. In 1866, the United States only exported $300,000,000 worth of goods while Canada, in 1922, exported more than $700,000,000.

What the United States were able to accomplish, Canada is able and must accomplish; and it will do so.

Never, in any case, was it more necessary for a Parliament to avoid these foregone conclusions, these inconsiderate voters, these obstinate attitudes from which the prestige of the House would suffer and the Government would find itself weakened.

All ministers, for a long time to come, will have to take serious precautions, decisions which will not always be popular or may astonish an unprepared public. These necessities are the results of the intimate nature of things and events. It is in such cases that a government needs the support of Parliament. It is equally in such cases that the House must decide and choose, refuse or give its confidence and by all means support the government which it has resolved to sustain.

Now comes into play the making of alliances to which in the past we have not been used. New ideas, extraordinary circumstances demand that three parties should have numerous followers in this House. We are witnessing what has never been seen: The House divided into three important groups. The Government must necessarily count upon the support of all those who have confidence in it. Those who wish to contribute to the moral uplift and to the restoration of our finances must perforce become its allies. Such an alliance the Government far from rejecting, loyally welcomes it, as long as it does not obstruct its liberal policy nor its aim which is the country's salvation. In the critical period we are passing through, the question is no more one of conflict between political parties, it is a struggle between the Canadian nation and the Tories. I know that the Government is not ready to sacrifice the general welfare of Canada, the broad views of the national policy, in a word the national strength, to alliances, and it must not do it otherwise it would be a deceitful game.

If it is true that an alliance gives strength to the Government we must also admit that it is the confidence in its programme, as also the ability of its statesmen which draws to it allies.

We must return to our Canadian traditions, to the respect of the constitution, to the pride of our autonomy, and invigorating thought of responsible government, we must forever create, maintain and develop a Canadian national spirit which will be our safeguard against the allurements and snares of imperialism; we must strive to restore our shattered finances and this through economy and the expansion of our commerce; we must rebuild a healthy, laborious, robust, peaceful Canada and deferential to all the races and creeds, united and trusting in the future. If the Government remains faithful to this great programme and accomplishes this noble task, it will prove itself worthy of the alliance which, more than any other, will strengthen and make it invincible: the alliance with the whole Canadian nation for which it will have realized her most cherished hopes.

On motion of Mr. Lapointe the debate was adjourned.

On motion of Mr. Graham, the House adjourned at 12.20 a.m., Wednesday.

Wednesday, June 7, 1922

The House met at three o'clock.

THE LEAGUE OF NATIONS

PROTOCOLS OF AMENDMENT TO THE COVENANT

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I beg to lay on the Table a document entitled:

Protocols embodying proposed amendments to Articles 4, 6, 12, 13, 15, 16, and 26 of the Covenant of the League of Nations, as adopted by the Second Assembly of the League at Geneva on the 3rd, 4th and 5th October, 1921; together with letter, dated the 24th November, 1921, from the Secretary General of the League to the Prime Minister of Canada, transmitting certified copies of the Protocols.

I move that the said document be printed as a sessional paper and that 1,000 copies in the combined French and English texts be printed forthwith, and that Rule 74 be suspended in relation thereto.

Motion agreed to.

ST. LAWRENCE RIVER WATERWAY

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I move, seconded by Hon. Mr. Murphy:

That 500 copies in English and 500 copies in French of the correspondence between the Government of Canada and the United States government concerning the St. Lawrence River Improvement Scheme, laid on the Table of this House on May 30, 1922, be printed forthwith, and that rule 74 be suspended in relation thereto.

Motion agreed to.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk).

HOUSE OF COMMONS AND SENATE

Mr. BLACK (Yukon):

1. Is the total amount of expenditure in connection with the House of Commons as shown on page sixteen of the main estimates, without taking into account any amounts that may be supplementary estimates, $1,703,390, and the expenditure for the Senate as shown on the same page the sum of $561,205?
2. Why is the chief accountant of the Senate, as shown on page seventeen of the main estimates, paid $4,020 and the Chief Accountant of the House of Commons paid only $3.450 as shown on page nineteen of the estimates?
3. How are these officers classified to make this difference in salary?
4. Does the Chief Accountant of the Senate have to furnish bonds in connection with his office?
5. Does the Chief Accountant of the House of Commons have to furnish bonds in connection with his office?

Right Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE KING: With reference to this question, I understand that the Senate takes exception to this House inquiring into matters affecting its accounts and declines to give the answer to that part of the question. As respects the rest of the question the answer will be laid on the Table to-morrow.

BOARD OF COMMERCE

Mr. COOTE:

1. What was the cost of the Board of Commerce instituted in the year 1919?
2. Did the Board make a report to the Government?
3. If so, has this report been pubished? If not, why?
4. Is it the intention of the Government to have this report published?

Hon. Mr. ROBB:

1. $146,345.53.
2. Yes.
3. Yes. A first annual report covering the period from July, 1919, to March 31, 1920, has been published.
4. Answered by No. 3.

LEVIS LIGHTKEEPERS

Mr. BOURASSA:

1. What are the names of the lightkeepers of the County of Levis, Quebec, who were dismissed since September 21st, 1911, to date?
2. Who recommended the said dismissals?
3. What are the names and addresses of the persons who replaced the above mentioned lightkeepers?
4. Who recommended their appointment?

Hon. Mr. LAPOINTE:

1. There were no dismissals of lightkeepers in the County of Levis, since the date mentioned.

2. 3. and 4. Answered by No. 1.

SUPERINTENDENT OF LIGHTHOUSES

Mr. CASGRAIN:

1. Who is the Superintendent of Lighthouses at Quebec?
2. How long has he been in the present position?
3. What is his salary?
4. What was the amount of his salary on appointment?
5. Was his salary increased? If so, why?

Hon. Mr. LAPOINTE:

1. Bernard Joshua Kaine.
2. Since 26th June, 1909.
3. $2,760 per annum.
4. $1,500 per annum.
5. Yes. As a result of general reclassification of salaries of Superintendents of Lights in 1911 and 1919.

MILITARY CAMPS

Hon. Mr. STEVENS:

1. Having reference to the recent reductions, made in Committee of the Whole, of the estimate for military camps during this Session, in what manner will the remaining portion of the estimate be distributed?
2. How much will be allocated to each military district?
3. What is the present actual number enrolled in the Militia in each Military District?

Hon. Mr. GRAHAM:

1. From 30 per cent to 40 per cent of the establishment of each Military District will receive a limited training either in camp, or at local headquarters.

For the cavalry and infantry the period of training will be 9 days. For the artillery 6 days at local headquarters and for gun detachments only 6 additional days in camp.

For departmental units little beyond the minimum requirements of the small camps authorized can be undertaken this year.

Units of the permanent force will have about 1 month's camp training.

2. Approximately as follows:

Military District No. 1	$ 89,000
Military Distrcit No. 2	190,000
Military District No. 3	100,000
Military District No. 4	112.000
Military District No. 5	48,000
Military District No. 6	74,000
Military District No. 7	34,000
Military District No. 10	75,000
Military District No. 11	66,000
Military District No. 12	69,000
Military District No. 13	58,000
Permanent Force	60,000
Miscellaneous	25,000
Total	$1,000,000

Military District No.	Numbers enrolled (all ranks) Non-Permanent Militia, as 31st March, 1922
1	4,479
2	10,243
3	7,378
4	4,905
5	2,910
6	4,730
7	2,937
10	3,684
11	2,857
12	3,236
13	4,217
Total	51,576

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS AND TORONTO MEETING

Mr. SHAW:

1. Were the Canadian National Railways represented by an official, Mr. Wood, at a meeting held in Toronto, on or about Thursday, May 4th, at which E. Matthews, of the Matthews Steamship Company, of Toronto, representatives of the Tomlinson Company, Winnipeg, the Canada Steamship Company, Montreal, and Mr. Todd, of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, were present?
2. If so, for what purpose was the meeting convened, what matters were discussed and what conclusions were arrived at?

Hon. Mr. KENNEDY:

1. Neither D. O. Wood, General Foreign Freight Agent of the Grand Trunk-Canadian National lines, nor F. G. Wood, General Agent, Canadian Government Merchant Marine, attended any such meeting.
2. Answered by No. 1.

UNOPPOSED MOTION FOR PAPERS

Hon. Mr. BAXTER:

For a copy of all letters, telegrams, reports, correspondence and other documents embodying the representations made to the Minister of Public Works with reference to the dismissal of Charles Dauphinee as janitor of public building at Lunenburg, Nova Scotia, and which representations were referred to the Honourable Minister as considered by him as being satisfactory to warrant the dismissal of Dauphinee without investigation.

MOUNTED POLICE AT MACLEOD

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. G. G. COOTE (Macleod): A report is current that the Government contemplate removing the detachment of mounted police that is at present stationed at Macleod, and I have been asked by the citizens of that town to point out to the Government that at Macleod is located the oldest established mounted police station in Alberta. The town of Macleod and the mounted police are so closely associated that the citizens feel that if a detachment of the Royal Mounted Police is to be maintained anywhere in southern Alberta it should be at Macleod. I would ask permission to read one or two sentences from a letter I have received upon the subject:

If the police are to be maintained anywhere in the south then Macleod should have first claim as the town owes the fact of its existence to the police post here and nowhere I believe outside of Regina have they a more complete equipment in the way of buildings, grounds, horse pasture, etc. The history of Macleod and the police is so interwoven that it is hard to disassociate one from the other, and it would be with keen regret the citizens would see this association broken.

I do not wish to make the question lengthy, but I would ask the Government to consider carefully before removing the detachment from Macleod, and if possible to give some assurance to the citizens of that town that the matter will receive every consideration.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I shall be pleased to call the attention of the Minister of Justice (Sir Lomer Gouin) to the representations of my hon. friend. But the Government would like to be clear on this point: Do I understand that the hon. member, on behalf of the citizens of Macleod, asks that the mounted police be retained in Macleod irrespective of whether or not they are to be retained in other parts of the province of Alberta?

Mr. COOTE: The citizens of Macleod, in telegrams they have sent to me, ask that the detachment be retained. I have also a letter pointing out that if a detachment of the mounted police is to be removed from any part of the province, Macleod is the last station that should be abandoned, because it is the oldest established mounted police station in southern Alberta and the one best situated from a strategic point of view. I should be glad if the Government would state as early as possible whether it is intended to remove the detachment from Macleod.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS—AMALGAMATION

On the Orders of the Day:

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask the Government what is the cause of the delay in the amalgamation of the national railway system; and if the Government is aware of the immense loss to the country day by day through the delay?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I think my right hon. friend appreciates that while Parliament has been in session the Government has been very busily engaged. Great care should be given to the carrying out of this amalgamation, and such delay as has taken place will, I think, in the long run prove to the advantage of the country.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Then perhaps the greater the delay the greater the advantage?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Possibly, yes.

THE BUDGET

CONTINUATION OF THE DEBATE ON THE ANNUAL FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The House resumed from Tuesday, June 6, the debate on the motion of Hon. W. S. Fielding (Minister of Finance) that Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair for the House to go into Committee of Ways and Means, and the proposed amendment thereto of Hon. Sir Henry Drayton.

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Marine and Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, in view of some statements which have been made during the course of this debate, I feel it incumbent upon me to revise my decision not to speak, and to make plain my position to the House and to the country. The House will understand me when I say that I prefer to express my own opinion rather than to have it interpreted by the right hon. leader of the Opposition (Mr. Meighen).

I am glad that it affords me also the opportunity of offering to my hon. friend, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) my sincere congratulations and of expressing my admiration for his unequalled record. My hon. friend, at an advanced age, is giving his services to the country at a time when those services are most needed, when strong and trustworthy men are required, and no man possesses in a higher degree the confidence of his fellow-citizens than does my hon. friend. He is a living example of the truth of the saying: "Honesty is the best policy." I am sure that the people will trust him more than the disappointing and disappointed criticism of my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition (Mr. Meighen).

It was said of the great warriors of olden times that some of them shone more brilliantly in defeat than in victory. Whatever compliments may be offered my right hon. friend—and he deserves many—it cannot be said of him that he is a very good general of a beaten army. His effort yesterday, if he will pardon me for saying so, was a new exhibition of political rancour. At a time when the complexity of problems, both domestic and international, is growing hourly, at a time when all the energies of the nation should be grouped and directed towards a common goal, he, the leader of a once great party, is offering Parliament and the country an empty amendment. When co-operation and constructive help is required, he is camouflaging the issue by the immoderate use of epithets and insinuations. At a time when new and vigourous statesmanship is needed, he is serving us a feast of cold roast partisan nonsense.

What is the purport of the amendment which is supported by my right hon. friend, and which bears all the earmarks of his authorship? It proposes to reject the budget, not because of any inherent inefficiency or ineffectiveness or viciousness of policy, not because it contains something which my right hon. friend does not like, but because there is not in it something which he does not like. Of all the absurd proposals which during a parliamentary career of eighteen years I have heard made in this House—and heaven knows I have heard many—this one easily earns the palm. It is overwhelmingly entitled to the blue ribbon of that inglorious race.

Hon. gentlemen opposite, since the opening of this debate have painted in dark colours indeed the ruin and desolation which would follow throughout the country a larger reduction in the tariff. My hon. friend from Centre Toronto (Mr. Bristol) said a few days ago that such reduction would put everyone out of business and be the ruin of our industries and the bankruptcy of Canada. Yet this same gentleman and his colleagues propose to censure us because we have not brought about that ruin and that bankruptcy. My right hon. friend (Mr. Meighen) may contend that this is not the meaning of his amendment. Well, he may convince himself by his own sophistry; he will convince no one else. The main question before the House is whether the budget shall be accepted or shall be rejected. The amendment proposes to reject the budget because the Liberal policy in its entirety is not incorporated therein. And yet my hon. friends opposite are opposed to that policy.

[Mr. Lapointe.]

Now, Mr. Speaker, I do not admit that any pledges have been violated by those who are responsible for the framing of this budget. On the contrary, I claim that this is a Liberal budget, inclined towards the right direction, and framed to meet the world conditions which we are facing to-day. But before arguing that point, Sir, may I refer to the apparent and amusing unconsciousness of my right hon. friend of his entire disqualification to discuss violated pledges and political honour? My hon. friend from Springfield (Mr. Hoey) in the course of this debate, and my hon. friend from Brantford (Mr. Raymond) in the debate on the address, quoted instances of the respect for pledges shown by my hon. friends opposite. I shall not repeat those instances. But what do you think, Mr. Speaker, of the respect for pledges and political honour of gentlemen who, after having obtained a prolongation of Parliament and of their term of office under the explicit condition that no controversial matters would be brought forward during that extended period, used the occasion to tamper with and manipulate the electoral law of the country and to enact under closure a measure for the purpose of disfranchising British citizens and selecting their own electors for the ensuing election? What do you think—

Mr. MEIGHEN: Before the hon. gentleman proceeds further, will he please read that explicit condition and state where and when it was given?

Mr. LAPOINTE: My right hon. friend knows that I have not here the explicit promise, but he knew that it was made at that time, and that the prolongation of Parliament would not have been granted but for it.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It was never made, and the hon. gentleman knows it was never made, and cannot produce it.

Mr. LAPOINTE: The right hon. gentleman knows it was made.

An hon. MEMBER: Produce it.

Mr. LAPOINTE: My right hon. friend has the habit of making assertions very often instead of arguments. This is an assertion, and I can contradict with my own assertion. I know such a promise was explicitly made at the time. What do you think, Mr. Speaker, of the political honour—perhaps my right hon. friend will deny this too—of gentlemen who, having obtained a mandate on the pledge made on all platforms of the country that that mandate should be for a special purpose and would expire when the purpose was achieved, clung to power for three years after that special purpose had been achieved? What do you think of the political honour of gentlemen, who for the purpose of deceiving the people changed their name—or, if you like, the name of their party—as often as Henry VIII changed his wife and even borrowed or appropriated the name of their opponents—and that without applying to the newly-manufactured article the dispositions of their own Marking Act? Sir, I do not like the tu quoque argument; it is always weak and sometimes despicable.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Hear, hear.

Mr. LAPOINTE: My hon. friend says "hear, hear"; perhaps one of the reasons why I do not like it is because it was overused by my right hon. friend during his term of office. Two wrongs do not make a right But I simply desire to express the opinion that my hon. friends should use some discretion when it comes to discussing pledges and political honour, and that on such a topic my right hon. friend is not entitled to the floor.

I submit, Mr Speaker, anybody to the contrary notwithstanding, that this budget is a Liberal budget. It is based on the traditional policy of the party as it is, not as it has been represented to be, or misrepresented, by many gentlemen in the past. Nobody in this country—no party, rather—is in favour of absolute free trade. The right hon. leader of the Opposition, who seems to have lived for the last two years in a world of bogeys and nightmares, erected a bogeyman during the recent campaign whom he called free trade; this unwelcome figure he paraded throughout the land, but nobody took him seriously. In my opinion, the question of adopting absolute free trade in Canada is rather an academic one; it is a condition which cannot be realized during our lifetime—at least as long as the country will need import duties for revenue. Those duties, if raised in an intelligent and businesslike way, will properly safeguard our industrial activities. On the other hand, to proclaim protection as a basis of economic policy is a mistake, an economic heresy; because protection, if it means anything, means prohibition of imports, and you cannot get revenue without imports. In either case the strict application of the system would kill the goose that lays the golden eggs. It would be impossible to frame a tariff which would please everybody; nobody knows that better than the Minister of Finance. The interests of society organized as a state frequently clash with the interests of the individual. Economic questions have to be judged by different standards accordingly as you view them from the point of view of the interests of the individual citizen or from the point of view of the social interest of the community. But the private interest is almost universally subordinate to the general interest, and in the end it is the general interest which must be taken into consideration. The task of finding out what that general interest is is an arduous one—more arduous than that of the individual in ascertaining what is his own personal interest. The duty of public men is to abstain strictly from centering their vision on local or personal interests, and to keep always before their eyes the national interest of the society; it is for them to endeavour always to solve vital and fundamental questions with the view of building the nation as a whole. I do not believe that any fiscal system is the absolutely correct one, the one that will always succeed if applied in its entirety, at all times and in all countries. I do not believe that any fiscal system is as good or as bad as its friends or its enemies represent it to be. Political and fiscal questions are not governed by inflexible and rigid rules, as are the principles of geology, for instance, and of astronomy. Geography, and the needs of a certain section ot a certain territory, must also be considered. General Hancock forty years ago was ridiculed for stating during the presidential elections in the United States that the tariff was a local question. One hon. member of this House—I think it was the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill)—said something to the same effect the other day. Yet there seems to be some truth in that statement, if we may judge from the various speeches that we hear in this House and elsewhere. Indeed, geography and the particular interests of certain territories seem to have a great influence on the principles of individuals. It seems to me impossible that all the men living in one section of the country or belonging to one class of the community should be of the same opinion and that all the men living in another section of the country or belonging to another class of the community should be of another opinion, if genuine, strict principles only were applied.

Mr. CRERAR: Hear, hear.

Mr. LAPOINTE: My hon. friend from Marquette says, "hear, hear." The other day he told the House that the West would never be protectionist. Why did he speak only of the West? Why did he not mention the East as well? My hon. friend said, in emphasizing his argument, that the most hide-bound Tories, even those coming from Ontario, abandoned their protectionist principles when they settled in the West and became, or at least, their children were, far from being Tories. I am glad of that, but surely it is not due to climatic conditions.

Mr. McMASTER: They see clearer out there.

Mr. LAPOINTE: At the National Agricultural Conference held at Washington on January 27th last, the representatives of the United States farmers adopted a resolution approving the principle of protection and declaring in favour of a tariff adjustment board, and for the enforcement of an elastic tariff against foreign countries. At that same conference a resolution was adopted opposing all fixation of prices. Yet in our own country the farmers, especially in western Canada, are unalterably opposed to protection, yet seem to believe, to a degree, at least, in the fixation of the price of wheat through a wheat board.

Mr. CRERAR: I am sure that my hon. friend does not in any way wish to misrepresent the western farmer in that respect. The proposal in respect to the Wheat Board does not mean the fixation of prices in any sense or degree whatever. The farmers are not asking for that, and have at no time asked for it.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I am glad I am mistaken in my impression, but my hon. friend from Brome (Mr. McMaster) who is generally right on these matters, seemed to indicate, so far as I could gather from the newspapers, that such was the case.

Mr. McMASTER: The old Wheat Board proposed to fix the price of flour. That was one of the objections.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I am not mentioning that by way of criticism, but simply for the purpose of showing that circumstances and conditions, geographical and otherwise, have a large influence on the fiscal views of peoples and of individuals. If that is so, is it not the duty of public men to try to find out the causes of these divergent interests, either as between countries or as between sections or classes or occupations within a country? Is it not our duty to try to establish the causes of these divergencies, to scrutinize and weigh them, and to subordinate the merely accessory to those things that are absolutely essential? Is it not our duty to try to discover the concessions which it is possible for either side to make, or which it is desirable to obtain? I think that is the question which must be solved.

When citizens are animated by a sincere desire to serve the general interests above their own, or, at least, equally with their own, there is a minimum of progress that can be made. That is a step forward towards the goal of success, and should be accepted by all. What I have just indicated is true at all times, but especially is it true under the present conditions when it would be altogether unwise to try to apply old fiscal theories to a world which is wholly new. The war is over, but the war debt still rages, and the necessity of opening all sources of revenue is greater than ever. Furthermore, the consequences of the war, included among which is the demoralization of the gold basis as a medium of exchange, have turned upside down pretty nearly every economic theory upon which tariffs were formerly framed. Since the war sixteen countries have increased import tariffs for the purpose of revenue. Even export taxes have been imposed. Sixty-four per cent of the taxes in Mexico to-day are export taxes on oil. Roumania has put an embargo on the exporting of wheat until her food conditions become normal. England to-day is collecting over $700,000,000 from import duties.

My hon. friend from Brome the other day in the course of an eloquent speech, with most of the points of which I am in hearty agreement, pointed to the little countries of Switzerland, Belgium and Holland as having grown, and developed prosperous industries, under what is practically a free trade system. To that I readily assent.. But these countries at the present time, however devoted they may be to the principle of free trade, find it necessary to adopt measures quite at variance with their normal and traditional policies, in order to meet the abnormal conditions prevailing in Europe at the present time. I have here the Journal des Economistes, of November, 1921, and I find that on September 30, 1921, the Federal Council of Switzerland prohibited entirely the importation of 167 articles, and partially the importation of 23 others.

Mr. McMASTER: They would not raise much revenue on those they kept out.

Mr. LAPOINTE: If my hon. friend will allow me to proceed,—they have imposed duties on many articles, especially on farm products. Here is what the president of the Confederation of Switzerland, Mr. Schulthess, said to justify those duties—I translate from the French:

All the other States increased their rates of customs duties, and therefore Switzerland has had to follow suit. Why? By not imitating them she would decrease, with regard to them all, her costs of production, including those of food, and therefore she would open her gates.

In the same issue—

Mr. STEVENS: Does not that constitute protection for Switzerland's industries?

Mr. LAPOINTE: I do not say it does not. It is a temporary condition though, as I shall try to show to my hon. friend. In the same issue I read an excerpt from a speech by a prominent Belgian statesman. At a banquet of the French Chamber of Commerce in Brussels Monsieur Janson spoke as follows:

We fear to see the era when France still more wrongly inspired, accentuating her policy of protectionism, shall condemn us truly, because, in my opinion, it would be a condemnation, to resort, three years after peace, to a policy of retaliation. If we mean to maintain and increase the sympathy which we have for France, if we mean to keep as much as circumstances permit this military accord created between us, we must develop this sympathy, this agreement, in realizing between us this economic "entente" to which Mr. Houtard alluded. We must say to the Frenchman, because it is the undeniable that every time that between you and us the barrier of protective duties will be raised the necessary wall of defence which we have built on the eastern frontier shall be torn down. On the political ground, as well as the economic ground, it is necessary that France and Belgium should go together.

I have also the issue of May 12, 1922, of The Economic Review, in which it is stated that Holland, Belgium and Sweden were awaiting the results of the Genoa Conference before deciding to protect themselves more substantially against the goods of the other country. Here is what I read there:

The decision of the Government to postpone until after the Genoa Conference consideration of the policy to be pursued in the face of the unfair competition to which the country is exposed as a result of the fall of various exchanges is fully justified, in the opinion of the Rotterdammer, by the attitude adopted by other neutral countries, and it quotes with approval the complaint made by M. Branting that the governments of these countries, notwithstanding a close community of interests, have no concerted policy with regard to the stabilisation of the rates of exchange and the abolition of Customs barriers. In the event of the Genoa Conference proving abortive, Sweden and Belgium, according to the Socialist statesman, will be driven to building up Customs tariffs for their protection against the competition of countries with a depreciated currency, and the Rotterdammer fails to see how Holland will be able to abstain from measures to regulate imports.

Spain has created four different tariffs. Two are applied to the various countries and two other tariffs, with 60 per cent more, are applied to the countries which have depreciated currency. Of course, this will not be permanent; I hope it will not be, for I agree with my hon. friend from Brome (Mr. McMaster) that economic and tariff wars always lead to real wars. But, Sir, every fair-minded Canadian will admit that under such circumstances, where free trade countries have to modify their tariff policy, it was our duty to act cautiously and not to enter too deeply on the path which other countries feel compelled to recede from temporarily. I resent, therefore, the taunt that we have been untrue to the principles of the Liberal party. All the changes that have been made are in a downward direction, while other countries are moving the other way. Any more radical changes at this time would have been unwise, and perhaps dangerous; and we would have been unworthy of the trust conferred upon us had we taken our decision on preconceived notions and ignored the evidence and the facts existing at the time of making the decision. Is that a deviation from the principles enunciated in our programme? I submit that it is not. The various resolutions which have been read during this debate are declaratory of a principle, and by that principle I am willing to stand. The measure of the reform to be accomplished, the extent to which it is possible to accomplish it to-day, the time when it can be accomplished—all these depend on the exigencies of the hour, and no fair-minded man can seriously blame us for taking this view and acting in the way we did. Liberalism means evolution along reasonable and progressive lines. It holds the middle course between changes that would endanger our institutions and obstinate resistance to the spirit of the times. Sir, even the Manitoba Free Press, which is most friendly to my hon. friends of the Progressive party, said in an editorial, I think the day following the budget speech of the Minister of Finance, that nobody expected that the Government would make so many changes at this session. I believe that this will be the general opinion of the country, and that the budget will be universally accepted as the best that could be devised under the circumstances. As far as I am concerned I have no doubt that the country would vote for the adoption of the budget if it were submitted to it to-day.

The other day the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Good) referred to the supposed failure of the Liberal party to enforce the platform of 1893, and said that it had been called "the great apostasy." Well, my hon. friend was hardly fair. I believe that if there has been a breach of faith it has not been on the side of the Liberal party. The duties were reduced at various times; and when in 1911 the Minister of Finance brought forth his great measure of reform to establish reciprocity of trade in natural products between this country and the United States, who broke faith? My hon. friend (Mr. Fielding) went down to defeat with his party at that time as did also that great veteran of Brant county, the late Hon. William Paterson. I was glad to hear my hon. friend say that he voted for Mr. Paterson on that occasion, but, surely, all those who elected him to this House failed to vote for Mr. Paterson.

Mr. GOOD: Did the Liberal government, between 1896 and 1908, materially move in the direction of free trade?

Mr. LAPOINTE: Well, perhaps, if it had done it in 1908 many of the friends of my hon. friend would have defeated the party instead of defeating it in 1911. My hon. friend from Dufferin (Mr. Woods), who spoke in this debate, knows that almost all the farmers of his country voted against reciprocity in 1911. The same thing happened in most of the rural constituencies of Ontario and in many of the western constituencies. I heard my hon. friend from Portage la Prairie (Mr. Leader) make an open confession that he voted against reciprocity. Well, he will be forgiven much for having so confessed. On the other hand, he is taking away some of the merit which he would have by saying immediately afterwards that the Liberals had been unfaithful to their pledges. Who was unfaithful on that occasion? Do we deserve to be told that we have not kept our pledges? When we tried to enforce them, we were defeated through not receiving the support of many of the hon. members who are now criticizing us for not having done so. The policy of the Liberal party is not one of free trade, but of freer trade by way of a revenue tariff. That was the policy of the great leader under whom I am proud of having received my political education. By that policy I have always stood and by that policy I stand to-day. The right hon. leader of the Opposition (Mr. Meighen) has stated in some of his speeches that there are only two systems, protection and free trade, and that a tariff revenue meant protection.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I said two principles.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Two principles. Well I join issue with him in that statement. The very nature and essence of the protective duty is that it must prevent the exchange as between the foreign product and the domestic product. The very nature and essence of a revenue duty is that it exists only when an exchange takes place. The less the foreign product enters the country, the more the protective duty achieves its end; the more the foreign product enters a country the more the revenue duty achieves its end. When a duty has for its purpose the blocking of the entrance of other countries' goods at the expense of the national revenue, so that only the national goods can be bought and their price artificially made higher, it becomes a purely protective duty. There is the difference between the two programmes, and my hon. friend is mistaken when he says there is no difference between him and ourselves. In the language of a great French orator—

Nous ne méritons pas cet excès d'honneur ni cette indignité.

We do not deserve this excess of honour nor this indignity. I do not wish to speak at any greater length, except, perhaps, to express my regret that certain exaggerated statements have been made during the course of debate. Conditions are, indeed, serious in Canada, as they are in every other part of the world, although they are better here, perhaps, than in any other country. Our agriculture in common with all other industries, has felt the effect of this world-wide crisis, but I do not think it makes for public good or for the improvement of conditions to say that agriculture is dying in Canada. I cannot let such a statement go unchallenged. In the part of the country with which I am best acquainted agriculture is not dying. The farmers have had better days at times in the past, they may have better days in the future; but at no time has their courage, their energy, and their spirit of hope been higher. Nor is it an evidence of the soundness of that argument to say that there is scarcity of pupils in certain schools. Mr. Speaker, when there are few children in the homes there cannot be many in the schools, and whatever may be said against protection this objectional fiscal system is not responsible for that condition of things. There was another statement which was made with which I am not in sympathy. I will not name the hon. member who made the statement, because she is the one in the House with whom I would least like to quarrel. She said, speaking of the condition in the country:

> Everyone has tried to acquire capital by doing his fellowman, and if he could not do him well enough without legislation, he cleverly sought legislation to help him do the other fellow more successfully.

Well, this is an unfortunate statement. A great Canada cannot be built nationally or economically by the sowing of germs of suspicion, hatred, discord, and class war. It can only be done by the union and co-operation of all citizens and classes, and by the creation of a spirit of solidarity. I sincerely believe that such notes of despondency and discouragement must be avoided, if we wish our country to pass through the crisis which prevails at the present time. For Canadian manhood, and for Canadian womanhood, as well as for Christianity, hope is a cardinal principle. Canada must smile once more. If there is one thing I would, with their permission, urge upon my hon. friends in this House, it is, "keep smiling." I will be more emphatic, and I will ask my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition to start smiling. The electoral battle has been waged. The political atmosphere has been purified. Should we not all co-operate for the progress and prosperity of Canada? Let my right hon. friend forget his disappointment. Let him forget that his fellow citizens, the electors of Canada, have shown what he seems to consider a lack of appreciation about himself. After all the country is still alive. Moses passes, Aaron passes, but the Ark remains. My right hon. friend is no longer Prime Minister of Canada, but the country still exists, and it needs co-operation. The country requires of the right hon. gentleman that he do nothing which might hamper the efforts of those whose duty it is to lead her towards progress. I believe the Government has done a day's work. Of course, it is not exempt from human weaknesses; it is not blessed with all of the human virtues.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Hear, hear.

Mr. LAPOINTE: My hon. friend the ex-Minister of Finance says "hear, hear." Let me tell him, however, that the present administration shines in comparison with other governments in that respect. He will admit with me, I think, that the Government is entitled to fair play on the part of all, and especially on the part of those whose mistakes it is its unfortunate duty to repair. These are my last words, Mr. Speaker.

Hon. S. F. TOLMIE (Victoria City): I have listened with a great deal of interest to the hon. gentleman (Mr. Lapointe) who has just taken his seat. I have heard all of the criticisms which he has directed towards the right hon. member who leads the Opposition (Mr. Meighen), but I do not purpose replying to those criticisms because I believe, and I think the House will agree with me, that the leader of the official Opposition is quite capable of taking care of himself. I was rather surprised to hear the statement that the election of 1917 was simply to return a Parliament for the duration of the war. I do not know what had occurred previous to that time, because that was my first election experience. I do not know, however, that so far as my constituency was concerned—and I think I am safe in speaking for the whole of British Columbia—we did not believe that the Parliament that was being elected at that time was to function only during the war. We understood that it would run the usual course, and I think that was the general understanding throughout the whole country.

Before taking up a few matters in relation to the budget I desire to join with other hon. members who have preceded me in congratulating the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) on his achievement and on the years of excellent service which he has rendered this country. He has served in both provincial and federal governments and has a long record that is absolutely free from any besmirchment of any kind. At this late day it must therefore be a matter of deep gratification to him to feel that no one can point an accusing finger at him for anything that has not been proper during the whole of his public career. After all, that is the greatest possible reward a man could hope for after as many years in the public service as my hon. friend has put in. I wish to extend to him my best wishes for many years of good health and of usefulness in the future. I quite realize the difficulties with which he is faced in the present situation. His position is similar to that which has been experienced by ministers of finance from the commencement of the war up to the present time, a position fraught with difficulties that were never contemplated in the past history of Canada and that require the greatest degree of ability and intelligence if they are to be solved.

Now, among the items dealt with in the budget I notice my old friend the tariff on agricultural implements appearing again. The farmers have had conceded to them on this occasion a reduction of 2½ per cent in that tariff, aggregating, I understand, something less than $250,000 a year; while, on the other hand, the sales tax represents a total increase of some $30,000,000. I have been looking with some interest to the farmers in some sections of the country where they had been demanding the entire removal of the tariff on agricultural implements, and I have been wondering how they will receive this concession of 2½ per cent. It must, I am sure, be a great disappointment to those people who expected,when the results of the election were made known on December 6th last, that the present Government would usher in the new era. Some of these enthusiasts, no doubt, anticipated a wonderful change throughout the country; they believed that the tariff would be absolutely wiped out and that with the exit of that much abused government that had carried on the affairs of the country during the war and for the period immediately ensuing, all the ills of the country would be cured—they would have no more tariffs to bother with; would not be troubled with rust or hail; and that even the grasshopper in the western plains would lose his hop. Expecting all these things, they must have experienced a considerable jar when they were given this reduction of 2½ per cent in the tariff. I wonder whether, after a careful survey of the situation, they will decide to laugh or to get angry. In my opinion the benefit of the tariff on agricultural implements, as it has been discussed in relation to the success of farming in this country, has been exaggerated to a very great extent. It has been used by politicians and stressed by them until it has almost developed into a humbug. There are many other matters of greater importance relating to agriculture that would have brought much better results, such as better cultivation, the improvement of our live stock, the improvement of crops by the use of good seed, and so forth. The actual experiments on the government farms have shown an increase of from ten to 100 per cent in production by the use of first class seed, and I am sure that if half the energy and time that have been devoted to a fruitless discussion of the tariff on implements had been directed towards the improvement of farming in Canada, we should have had results amounting to millions as compared with a few hundred thousand dollars which the farmers will gain by the tariff concessions. However, we must not be too hard on this tariff on agricultural implements, because, in addition to having been an excellent instrument in the hands of opponents of the late government, it has no doubt helped to while away many a dreary winter's evening in the country districts.

With regard to the various budget proposals, I find that it is suggested that we shall have better trade relations with Australia. I would call the attention of the Minister of Finance to the fact that when this question is being discussed there are some items that should not be lost sight of. Among hese I might mention beef, mutton and lamb, which can be produced in Australia and New Zealand, by reason of the peculiar climatic conditions and the cheapness of land there, at a lower cost than in Canada. Besides that, there is a most excellent refrigerator service from those countries to Pacific coast points, so that their products can be landed in this country at a very low cost. And especially in the years when those countries are affected by drought, their animals are sold for almost a song, and they can be dumped into Canada on an enormous scale, thus seriously interfering with and handicapping the development of our live stock industry. When I spoke on the address I referred to the importance of mixed farming as being the only system that would insure the success of Canadian agriculture I was laughed at by some of my Progressive friends. Therefore it is very pleasing to me to note that at a representative meeting held in Saskatoon the other day, attended by delegates from all the provinces west of the Great Lakes, a resolution was passed to the effect that only mixed farming would give lasting success to agriculture in the western country. When I referred to the importance of developing our sheep industry, some of my friends, speaking on this subject later, said that there was no money in sheep, and that they had had a great deal of difficulty not only in selling the stock but also in getting rid of their wool, and some very clever speeches were made along these lines. I am delighted to be able to tell them that already at this early period the situation is improving very rapidly throughout the world. We find that the wool market is picking up and that large quantities of surplus wool held by the British government are being disposed of without difficulty; that wool is getting scarce in South America; that Bradford, England, the great wool centre of Europe, is buying again very freely; that wool is moving very actively in the United States, and that only the other day as high as 40 cents a pound was paid in Utah for wool in the grease. The business of sheep raising is very promising for the future, and for the benefit of those of my friends who may be interested in the business I am going to quote them a few figures. It has been demonstrated that a flock of fifty sheep, costing not more than $500, will, under ordinary farm conditions, yield a return of not less than 15 per cent net, and in addition to that the wool is usually figured as a net gain. Besides their ordinary value for commercial purposes, sheep have a great value in the destruction of weeds and the cleaning up of rubbish on the farm, and they afford a convenient supply of fresh meat to the farmer in the busy seasons of the year when there is not always time to go to town for supplies. Under these conditions I would draw the attention of the Government to the necessity of guarding carefully against the entry of cheap mutton and lamb from those countries the competition of which would be unfair to Canadian farmers. And in that regard I am sure the hon. Minister of Finance when concluding arrangements with Australia will give particular attention to these few points which I have brought to his notice.

I am very much concerned in the proposed removal from the Customs Act of what is known as the anti-dumping clause. I have watched with a great deal of interest the development of the fruit industry in British Columbia. We have there a large area known as the Okanagan valley, which only a few years ago was devoted to cattle raising, but in the meantime it has been irrigated and now supports a large number of people who have something like $40,000,000 invested in the fruit-growing industry, and their product last year sold for $8,000,000. On several occasions previous to June 4, 1921, our American friends were able to come into the Canadian market with large quantities of their No. 3 apples and sell them at such ruinous prices as made it impossible for the Canadian producer to compete with them. This was repeated from time to time until, on June 4, 1921, what is known as the anti-dumping clause was introduced into the Customs Act. This clause made it necessary for the shipper to take into consideration the cost of production with a fair profit added in arriving at the amount on which the duty was based. This clause has rendered a very valuable service to the fruit growers of British Columbia. It may be asked, why are the Americans able to compete with our fruit producers in that way? In the first place, during a boom in Washington, Idaho, Oregon and Montana, very large areas were planted in fruit; in fact they planted more land to fruit than they had market for the product, with the result that they were able, in those years when there was a large crop, to put a certain amount of their product on the Canadian side at a very low price. In addition to that they were able to dispose of their No. 1 fruit in their large cities at fancy prices, and consequently they were glad to sell their culls, or No. 3 apples, at a sacrifice. These apples have been placed on the Canadian market as low as 30 cents and 40 cents a box. It is estimated that a box of apples costs $1.35 to produce in Washington today. In quoting those apples to our Canadian buyers the Americans have even gone so far as to intimate that no reasonable offer would be refused, indicating that they were simply dumping their surplus on our side. They were, however, careful not to dump their apples on the American side of the line, simply because they did not wish to injure their own market. In the production of small fruits and vegetables we find that growers in the United States have a distinct advantage owing to their geographical position. In the southern States their early produce comes on the market in February and March and soon finds its way on to the Canadian market. Then, as the season works northward, we continue to receive their fruit and vegetables until such time as our own products are ready but by that time the sharp desire of the consumer for fresh fruit has been satisfied by the early American fruit, and the result is that the Canadian producer does not obtain the fancy prices which have been paid to his American competitors. This year we expect a very large fruit crop, particularly in the eastern section of the continent, and it is to be hoped that this anti-dumping clause will be retained for the purpose of giving the protection which I have referred to. These are matters of actual experience, not guess work. Our fruit men have sent delegations to Ottawa on many occasions to place these matters clearly before the government, and they have stated that this anti-dumping clause has proved to be an effective instrument in keeping out this unfair competition. The Minister of Finance in the course of his budget speech pointed out that there would be considerable difficulty in finding out the actual cost of production. I think no such difficulty need be feared, for the simple reason that if we send an expert down to the few fruit points from which we expect this competition he can look into the whole situation carefully, and will have no difficulty in arriving at the cost of production to such an extent as will enable the clause to be put into operation.

It is also proposed to place a tax of ten cents a gallon on temperance beverages. This tax is very strongly opposed by the manufacturers, who claim that it will so upset their present selling prices as to make it impossible to place their goods on the market at a popular figure. However, circular letters have been sent to all the members, and no doubt to the Minister of Finance, and I do not propose to take up the time of the House any further in this connection, save to ask the Minister of Finance to give the matter his very careful attention and endeavour to make an adjustment which will be satisfactory to all concerned. But there is another phase of this question of considerable importance—that is the application of the tax to beverages made from fruit juices on the same basis as those that do not contain any fruit juices. It may not be generally known that some of these beverages which are on the market and are described by large, bright labels as being made from fruit juice, contain only chemical flavours. Therefore I think if the Minister of Finance finds it impossible to remove this tax, he should at least give preference to the genuine article made from fruit juices, and refrain from taxing them. This fruit juice business is a very important one to the fruit growers of this country, because it makes a market for the smaller portions of the crop which cannot be disposed of to advantage in packages—the smaller apples and pears, for instance. It also enables us to dispose of many of the smaller fruits, such as loganberries, which are grown extensively on the Pacific coast—to the extent of thousands of acres in Washington and Oregon and hundreds of acres in British Columbia. This berry produces a juice which is used in the manufacture of summer drinks; it is of a very high colour; the beverage produced is a very wholesome one; and with the industry growing as it is, it should not be seriously interfered with.

With regard to the hog situation and the British market, I pointed out when speaking a few weeks ago in this House that as far as I could judge from what I saw on the other side, if we are to meet the needs of the British market we must supply the Britisher with an even grade of product; it must be uniform and of high quality, and furnished in sufficient quantities to attract the attention of the buyers over there. While the late government was still in office a plan for the grading of hogs was inaugurated. I do not know what progress has been made in the matter, but I urge upon the Government the necessity of pushing it as rapidly as possible so as to ensure the placing on the British market of an even grade of product. We must do this if we are to retain that market in competition with such countries as Denmark and Holland, where careful grading is carried out.

I wish to direct the attention of the Government also to the opportunity that is offered at the present time to rid Canada entirely of what is known as hog cholera. This disease has caused severe losses in this country, as well as in Great Britain and the United States. In 1912 we had about 4,249 hogs slaughtered on account of hog cholera, in respect of which compensation was paid to the extent of $23,446.51. I have the figures here for ten years, but I will not quote them all. In 1915 the disease had increased to such an extent that it was necessary to slaughter 34,779 animals, and to pay in compensation $196,981.28. In that year we introduced what is known as the garbage feeding regulation, with the result that in 1916 only 5,700 hogs were slaughtered on which compensation to the extent of $33,699.95 was paid. What made the difference? Under the garbage feeding regulations it is necessary for all feeders of swine to cook thoroughly all garbage obtained from hotels or boarding houses—that is, waste material, bacon rinds, ham bones, etc., which are fed to hogs and which may give them hog cholera if fed in a raw state. The boiling, however, sterilizes them and makes them a safe article of food. A great deal of bacon is imported from the United States, where hog cholera is so prevalent that it is found necessary to vaccinate the hogs—to inject a serum and virus into them to prevent them from dying of the disease. While many of their hogs are immunized to a certain extent as a result of this operation and do not develop the disease, in many cases they are carriers of the disease, and when the meat is fed to hogs in a raw state, the disease is communicated. In the year ending 1921-22, the regulations having been applied very carefully from year to year, the figures indicate that the mortality from this disease had been reduced to such an extent that only 429 hogs were slaughtered in Canada, compared with 34,779 in 1915. I suggest to the hon. Minister of Agriculture that here is an opportunity, by thorough organization, to wipe out the disease altogether. It will require a little money, but money will be saved in the long run. I speak from experience in this matter. When I entered politics in 1917 I resigned the position of Chief Inspector of the Health of Animals Branch for British Columbia. Hog cholera was very prevalent in that country; in many cases the animals were owned by foreigners who did not understand the English language and could not read our regulations. But even at that we were successful in cleaning out the disease, and for nearly two years previous to the time I resigned, British Columbia was entirely free from hog cholera. This shows what can be done by proper organization in the way of eliminating this disease.

What would be the advantages of bringing about this result? We would save a great deal of money through having no compensation claims to pay; we would save the present heavy cost of enforcing the act; we would save tremendous losses in swine; we would greatly encourage the development of the swine business by the extra confidence which would be given to the raisers of those animals; and in addition to that we would add substantially to the agricultural wealth of this country. And, referring again to the British market, if we could point to our goods as coming from herds entirely free from contagious disease, you can readily understand what a tremendous advantage our product would have over the vaccinated pork coming from the United States.

I have been rather alarmed to hear suggestions in this House that we should introduce the United States system of dealing with this disease. In this country we have adopted what is known as the eradication system. In any case where hog cholera is found to exist the animal is destroyed, the carcas burned and the whole premises disinfected. We use serums only in cases where the remainder of the herd is not infected at the time of the inspection; serum is injected and the animals thus immunized until such time as they can be slaughtered. It would be a great mistake —and I say this after many years of experience in this work—to adopt such measures as are adopted in the United States. The United States have adopted their present system simply because they cannot do otherwise, the disease having become so widespread in that country. This disease can be entirely wiped out in Canada, I am quite sure, by close inspection of our herds, by a campaign of education among the hog growers, and by an even closer application of our garbage feeding regulations. If this is done I am sure the results will be excellent indeed.

Another point that was brought up last evening by the hon. Minister of Agriculture was his proposal to extend his work in connection with the eradication of tuberculosis in this country. This is a very important work. Its extent is very great; millions of dollars will be required to carry it on, and it must be approached with the greatest possible care. I was also much interested in his suggestion that isolated areas like Vancouver Island and Prince Edward Island might first be cleaned up. If it is the intention to do that, I suggest that he include with Vancouver Island the islands of the Gulf of Georgia, which are isolated in the same way; he can clean that whole section up at one time. That can be done by simply applying the quarantine regulations of the Animal Contagious Diseases Act; the areas can be quarantined and it can be made illegal to take cattle on or off these islands without a certificate of a health of animals inspector. I advise the minister, however, to proceed very cautiously in this connection.

As an indication of how serious are the ravages of bovine tuberculosis in the human race, I will just quote a few figures.

According to tables which I have here, 75 per cent of gland cases in children are of bovine origin; 66 per cent of generalized tuberculosis in children is of bovine origin; 18 to 26 per cent of deaths from tuberculosis in children are caused by the bovine bacillus. About 10 per cent of all tuberculosis in children from five to sixteen years is bovine. The British Royal Commission figures are much higher, namely, 37.5 per cent under five years of age; 29.5 per cent from five to ten years of age; 14.6 per cent from ten to sixteen years. This indicates that there is a great danger from these sources of the infection of the human being from the consumption of bovine products affected by tuberculosis.

Glancing at the livestock situation, of the cattle inspected in our abattoirs in 1910—and these abattoirs I may say are very carefully inspected by highly qualified men—2.70 per cent were affected by tuberculosis. In the same year the number of hogs showed an infection of 9 per cent. In 1921, of the 737,195 head of cattle slaughtered under inspection, the percentage affected amounted to 5.26 per cent, and of the 1,727,296 head of hogs slaughtered in the year ending 31st March, 1922, the percentage had increased to no less than 22 per cent, indicating the rate at which tuberculosis is increasing in this country.

We have also found, in hogs, and this is a very interesting point, that in dairy districts where the by-products, such as skimmed milk and other by-products are fed unsterilized the percentage of infection among animals coming to the abattoirs is not less than 10 per cent greater than from those districts where no dairy products are fed. In those districts the percentage of affected cattle is no greater, indicating that the sources of infection in the swine is from the by-products of the cow. This will indicate the need for prompt, persistent, and careful action for eradication of this disease. But I am quite sure that the moment the Minister of Agriculture applies to the Minister of Finance for funds in this connection, he will be met by a statement regarding the heavy expenditures that are necessary under prevailing conditions, and I know that the Minister of Finance will be quite justified because under present conditions every dollar has to be carefully considered before it is allocated for expenditure. I am going to make a suggestion that should meet with the approval, I think, of the Government and of all the members because I think there never was a time in the history of this country when it is so necessary for us to secure money in every legitimate way for the purpose of furthering such work as I have pointed out in connection with tuberculosis. I am going to suggest that we follow the system adopted in France. In France, horse racing is placed under federal control. The government of France secures a small percentage from all the moneys that pass through the books in connection with these horse races which are carefully supervised by government representatives. This percentage is aplied to helping out of poor people and orphan asylums, and also to improving the quality of the livestock. Splendid results have been obtained in that way. If the horse racing in this country could be placed entirely under federal control, we should be able to obtain from that source very substantial sums, and I would suggest that half of the proceeds be given to the Dominion Anti-Tuberculosis Society, and the balance be used for the eradication of tuberculosis among animals. This should not be done, under the Criminal Code. A special act should be passed for this particular purpose. In this connection, I think, it is rather a slur on many respectable men who are interested in horse racing in this country to have racing dealt with under the Criminal Code.

Mr. McKENZIE: Does my hon. friend think that any regulation is required in connection with horse racing that could not be furnished by provincial enactment?

Mr. TOLMIE: My idea of putting racing under federal control would be to have the law uniform all over Canada. In my opinion, that is the only satisfactory way of controlling and stabilizing horse racing. The sport is a very popular one. It is patronized by thousands of people wherever races are held, but there is a great deal of room for improvement in conducting the races. I was never so much impressed in my life as I was by a visit to Ascot in England, when I saw the race for the Ascot gold cup. Everybody from the costermonger to the King of England was there—ambassadors from all the different countries represented in London, the very best people in the land, tens of thousands of them, and they all seemed to be happy and enjoying themselves. If we can run our race tracks in this country under proper regulations, and I am quite sure we can, the great majority of the responsible men connected with this sport would very heartily fall in line with any such regulation. In addition to that it would provide us with a very useful source of revenue which could be devoted to the eradication of tuberculosis in this country.

With regard to the export trade of cattle, which has been developing to a certain extent since the war and since ship space was available, we have had at first loud clamouring for more ships, but, as a matter of fact, our Canadian feeders have not kept up with the ship space offered, and it has been necessary during the last few months to secure cattle from the United States to fill the ships. In the fall, of course, we shall be able to fill up the space on the ships very much better than we are doing at the present time.

It is gratifying to note the great interest that is now being shown in Great Britain in regard to the embargo on Canadian cattle. Many men are interested in this question now who did not show any interest some time ago. My attention has been drawn to a statement in a newspaper from the Minister of Agriculture in Great Britain, Sir Arthur Boscawen, who says, speaking of the cattle embargo:

> As a matter of fact, I inherited this question, and it has not been a pleasant heritage. I can never get away from Canadian cattle, and I only hope that when I go to another world there will be no Canadian cattle there.

I surely thought the right hon. gentleman would be satisfied with maintaining an embargo on Canadian cattle in this world, without suggesting that there shall be an embargo on them in the next. I can assure him that if he will only do what he can to help remove the present embargo, Canadian cattlemen will be willing to take a chance on there being a cattle embargo in the next world.

My attention has been called by a number of telegrams to the taxes imposed on cigarettes, autos, and the stamp tax on cheques. These matters have all been brought very fully to the attention of the Minister of Finance, and I do not propose to take up time in discussing them further, except to read a telegram I have received from the Victoria Chamber of Commerce:

> Victoria Chamber of Commerce most strongly opposed to proposal to amend regulation covering stamps on cheques and drafts which would result in penalizing those with large aggregate at present carrying heaviest burden and tend to retard normal flow of business. Convinced that auto tax would vitally affect employment situation curtail sales and defeat end desired. J. H. Beatty President Victoria Chamber of Commerce.

There has been a good deal of complaint over the selection of these particular lines for special taxation.

With regard to the amendment which has been proposed, the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Lapointe) implied that we were clamouring for a lower tariff. I do not think that is the intention of the amendment at all. I look upon it simply as a strong protest against the idea that it is permissible for a party or a candidate to gain victory at the polls by promises which he or they never intend to carry out. If it is necessary for a man in business undertakings to keep his word; I feel that the responsibility of any candidate or any government to carry out a pledge that has been given is just as great as it is in the case of a private individual. And when the violation of a pledge is brought to the attention of the Government, to hear the reply, in effect, "Don't worry about that, it was only an election pledge," is certainly surprising. I am quite sure, therefore, that many members of the House will agree with me when I say that such a course certainly is not conducive to that high standard which the government of Canada should aim to attain.

Mr. C. WALLACE STEWART (Humboldt): Mr. Speaker, on rising to continue this debate I cannot refrain from expressing regret that the proposed amendment offered by the leader of this Progressive group is not before the House at this time. Not, Sir, that I would cast the least aspersion on the ruling handed down to us by the Chair or suggest in the least any doubt as to its fairness or wisdom. In fact, if I have followed the reasoning aright upon which that ruling was founded, I think that no criticism can be made with respect to it; but that rather we are suffering here as the result of the sins of our forefathers descending upon the third and fourth generation. However, I say that I regret that that amendment is not properly before the House, for this reason. That amendment states concisely, and emphasizes, the point of criticism of the budget that I would wish to make. And I think this other reason too might appeal to hon. members generally, and not alone to this group in which I sit—that if that amendment were properly before the House perhaps I would not feel it incumbent upon me to take up time in presenting arguments to the end so well expressed in the amendment, but that I might have been satisfied to have supported the amendment with my vote and thought I had done my duty But I do feel, Sir, that we in this group represent a distinct school of thought, that we are urging a policy that is not stated either in the remarks of the Finance Minister or in the amendment to his motion. I feel too that at this time, in view of the serious conditions that confront us in this country, all the suggestions for improvement that can be made should be taken into consideration. Therefore I make so bold as to occupy some of the time of the House in offering some further criticisms and suggestions.

First of all, I want to state, and if possible to make clear, why I am not satisfied with the amendment to the motion. I thought, Sir, when the ex-Minister of Finance (Sir Henry Drayton) first started to propose the amendment that it was going to be one that would appeal to me; I thought that he was making statements which sounded worth while—I refer to that part of the amendment which, perhaps, to a greater or lesser degree camouflages the real point, where he recited those pledges as expressed in the Liberal platform which, he declares, have not been carried into effect. I say, Sir, that I thought perhaps I was going to be able to agree with him because that point did appear to me to be worth while. But later, as my hon. friend concluded his amendment, I realized that he did not express my views as I would wish to express them; and if I had any doubts—for I must admit, Sir, I did not hear very clearly back here where I am seated and was not very sure just what the actual nature of the amendment was—if I had any doubts the hon. member for Fort William and Rainy River (Mr. Manion) cleared up those doubts when he made it plain in the concluding remarks of his speech in this debate as to just what the intent of the amendment was. My hon. friend said, "It is not an amendment requiring hon. gentlemen opposite to carry out their pledges, but an amendment condemning the practice of making promises it was not intended to fulfil", and so on. Now, in so far as it goes, that statement appeals to me. If pledges have been made and not been fulfilled, then I would like to join in condemning the practice. But that is not the point in respect to the budget proposals before us that I want to emphasize; and, as the amendment does not go further than I have stated, it does not completely,—does not by any means completely—express the criticism that I would like to make of the budget. I want to state, Sir, that I was not sent here as a guardian or keeper of the Liberal party though it happened to be in power; at least my conception of the reasons for sending me do not include that responsibility. I was sent here, I think, to state as clearly as possible, and to keep before this House, certain definite principles and certain proposals, and I shall endeavour to do so. I do not think that criticizing the party that is in power carries out, under any circumstances, the obligations which were placed upon me. I have also noted that members of the group sitting immediately to my right have not only pointed out that the amendment is capable of expressing their opinion and their criticism, but that some of them have gone to considerable trouble to point out that the amendment is also capable of expressing the criticism and viewpoint of the Progressives. I take exception to that ambiguous feature of the amendment, and I wish to say that when this group has the privilege and the opportunity of expressing its views it will attempt to do so without ambiguity. Personally I do not feel that I can join in an expression that is capable of two interpretations. I do not think that it was a fair criticism to level at us in this corner of the House to say that when the resolution which did express our sentiments was offered it was offered as a means of safety to the government. I would point out, Sir, that the result of the two amendments would be practically the same. That is, both constitute a censure of the government; and I cannot see that in taking the stand that I do—although I cannot admit that the amendment now before us satisfies me—I am in any way coming to the relief of the Government.

Now, I want to make a few comments on the budget proposals. In the first place I would like to join in the congratulations that have been offered to the Minister of Finance on the service that he has given for so long, and is still giving, to the country. I would like, in particular to congratulate him on a point that I think has not been stressed, and which I believe is important. That is, that the phraseology in which he has clothed his proposals is so clear and intelligible that it was not difficult for any hon. member to grasp the points which the minister wished to place before us. That is commendable but that is not the whole point that I have in mind. It is the fact that my hon. friend's phraseology is so understandable that the average citizen throughout Canada can realize the present situation fairly accurately, and that, I think, is something desirable. It should be possible for the people of the country to understand the condition of the Dominion at the present time. I believe that the average citizen is now getting a better grasp of the conditions than he had, perhaps, at any time in the past, and that he is realizing that we have a very heavy burden of debt to sustain. It is not possible, perhaps, for the average citizen to think in the terms of billions or millions of dollars; but the people as a whole are now realizing that a very heavy debt is placed upon us. They realize that the interest charges on that debt, and the other fixed charges, together with the legitimate charges of carrying on the administration, amount to a very large sum. They realize this requires a heavy taxation, and if I might diverge again, I would congratulate the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) on having presented tax proposals which are intended to bring in a large revenue. I believe that we all realize, both in this House and throughout the whole country, that a large revenue is necessary to carry on the government at this time. I do not wish to be misunderstood in that respect. I do not mean to say that, because a large revenue is necessary, we should encourage the Government in making the expenditures and charges over which they have direct control greater than are absolutely necessary at this time. I am wholly in sympathy with the statements regarding the necessity for economy, which have been made by my hon. colleagues in this corner of the House. I believe it is possible that reductions can be made in the expenses of the various departments of this government. As a new member of the House, I would not try for one moment to place my finger on the weak spots. I would not attempt to criticize; in fact I think most of us who have been in our seats during the passing of the various estimates have felt that it would be almost futile to touch those estimates with the knowledge we have of them. It is the business of the Government and of the heads of the departments to find out where there are encroachments on the revenue which can be stopped, and where items can be cut off, without seriously injuring the ability of the Government to carry on. My whole idea in commending the Minister of Finance for having introduced proposals that would bring in a large revenue is that a large portion of that revenue might be diverted from the ordinary expenses of government to reduce our national debt.

There are other features of the budget I would like to comment upon. The first is one which has been touched upon many times here, and that is the statement of the Finance Minister as to his attitude—and I presume the attitude of the Government for whom he speaks—with regard to reciprocity with United States. I commend that attitude, and personally I am prepared to stand behind him wholly and unreservedly in that matter. I also commend certain features of the budget where the minister makes proposals for more direct taxation. I believe, Sir, that the people of this country, if they are not now wholly in a position to accept direct taxation, are making long strides towards that position. They are demanding that the taxes shall be placed upon them directly, so that they can trace them to their source, and know exactly how much they are paying, and through what channel it is reaching the treasury of the Government. I refer to the taxes on bank notes circulation, cheques, money orders and the like. Those taxes are commendable in another sense, in that they do not bear unjustly upon the man of small means and with very little income. Those are proposals which meet with favour. I might also mention taxes which are included there, which might be termed luxury taxes, such as the taxes on automobiles, tobacco, confectionery, and taxes of that nature. If I have a criticism to offer on those taxes, it is that there should be greater attention given to the graduation of the taxes. The greater the value of the article, the more right it is to term it a luxury, and in my estimation the greater the tax it should bear.

I commend all measures in the budget tending towards freer trade. In this, my first attempt to address the House, I will not state that I am a free trader, either in theory or every day practice at this time, but I believe in much freer trade than we have at the present time. I am commending these measures because they point towards freer trade. I will mention some of them. We have the alteration in the Marking and Valuations Act, the change in the regulations regarding the arbitary value of foreign money, and the direct reduction of tariff where those occur in the proposals before us. These are all tendencies toward freer trade, and I commend them in that respect. Although supporting the thought expressed in the resolution to amend the amendment, as submitted by the hon. leader of this group, (Mr. Crerar) I do not in any sense wish it to be understood that I am advocating radical changes in the fiscal policy over night. I do not think that any person in this House wishes to do that, and if there were such, I would, least of all, wish to be connected with them. In my most optimistic moods I never supposed the Government which in power would do anything radical in that respect, and in my more pessimistic moods, viewing it in the light of history of the past, I did not expect anything more radical than we have at the present time—and I submit we have no radical changes at the present time. The hon. Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell) last evening, I believe, characterized it as a step. I think he was going beyond bounds when he characterized this as a step, either in the right or the wrong direction. I believe the hon. member from Southeast Grey (Miss Macphail) also said it was a step forward and a step backward. I submit this is not a step. I think the hon. member from Brome (Mr. McMaster) characterized it properly. I admire very much all his logical reasoning and argument, and was particularly delighted to find that he was logical with regard to statements he had made as much as two years ago. I think I remember reading about two years ago a criticism he had made of the budget proposals of that time. At that time there were proposed reductions of from 5 to 7½ per cent, and, in criticizing them, from his standpoint, he stated that it might be termed a step in the right direction, but certainly not a stride. The other day, in following to a logical conclusion, he stated that the change at the present time was probably a shuffle. I think that is a truthful statement of the situation, and meets wholly with my approval. However, I want to be absolutely fair, and to give full credit to the Minister of Finance for the results which may follow the slight changes made, particularly with regard to agricultural implements, where he has altered some of the customs taxes by 2½ per cent. My chief objection to the customs tariff, as a means of raising revenue, is that it takes so much out of the pockets of the consumer to place $1 in the treasury. I have heard it stated —and I have not heard it successfully refuted—that for every dollar which, through that means, finds its way to the treasury, $2 is taken from the consumers' pockets.

[Mr. C. W. Stewart..]

If that is a fact, let us consider fairly what even 2½ per cent might mean to the consumer of this country. I am not sure, Sir, that this 2½ per cent reduction is worthy of the commendation I am giving it, or that it would work out in practice as it does in theory, because it is such a slight reduction that, possibly, advantages will be taken of the situation which will not permit it to work out as it should. Theoretically, the 2½ per cent reduction will mean a saving in taxation to the agriculturists of this country of as much as $250,000, which is not a very enormous sum. But if $250,000 is deducted from the treasury, then it means not $250,000 saved to the agriculturists but at least a million dollars, taking into consideration the indirect taxation placed on them. It was suggested by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) that this reduction might mean a loss to his treasury of possibly $500,000. That is so much taxation taken off the people of the country. If therefore my theory is correct there is saved to the people not $500,000 but $2,000,000. And while these are compartively low figures as compared with the whole budget, yet I am willing to give the minister the full credit that is due him in that respect.

Next I want to say a word or two with regard to the sales tax. To me it is one degree less objectionable than the customs tariff as a means of raising revenue, but only one degree less objectionable, in that it is perhaps a more direct method of taxation than the customs tariff. But when I find that there is a difference in the sales tax as between home manufactured goods and imported goods, in favour of the home product the effect, it seems to me, is practically the same, and in reality there is little difference between the two forms of taxation. My objection to this tax is that it is an undue burden on those people who have small incomes. It is not equitably distributed. It is a tax on the necessities of life, a tax on a man's consuming power and not on his ability to pay taxes. It is a drain upon the real source of our wealth, and the Government would have been well advised to have taken that fact into account before increasing this tax by 50 per cent. I know that certain claims have been put forward to justify the present proposals of the budget, among others the contention that the exigencies of the present critical situation demand the increase. I am willing to admit all these things; and I should be most patient, Mr. Speaker, with the present administration if I could see any sign that they were heading in the right direction. But, as I view the matter, I take the position stated in the second amendment, which was refused consideration, that the whole budget is based upon protectionist principles. I therefore cannot give it my endorsation.

The speech of the Minister of Finance does not suggest, either directly by its context, or by inference, that the Government intend to implement their promises towards freer trade either immediately or in the distant future. And I was very much interested last night when the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell) refrained from committing himself on that point although he committed himself on almost every other point that suggested itself to him. If I thought that a readjustment were contemplated and we were given a serious undertaking towards that end by the Government, matters would be different. And by the way, Mr. Speaker, may I say at this juncture that I am becoming very dubious indeed of all pledges, when we find that what we supposed to have been the pledges of members of the Government were only pledges made by their supporters, not, apparently, with their authority and approval. I say I am becoming quite dubious of pledges of any sort. If, however, we had a solemn pledge on the part of the Government at this time that they intended to implement in full their pre-election promises and to put them into legislation, I should be more patient than I am at this time.

Now, I wish to offer a few constructive criticisms, because I am in sympathy only with criticisms of that character. We in this corner have been criticised for not placing on record more constructive material in our criticisms of the budget. In our platform we have some very definite proposals, and I will recommend some of them to the serious consideration of the Government. I believe that the most equitable tax we have ever had in Canada is the income tax. It is my opinion, further, that this tax should be readjusted. There should be a gradation in the scale, following the British system, not only increasing it very much as it ascends, but also recognizing a difference between earned and unearned income. In the same category with that I place the business profits tax which has been discarded by the Government. I would also recommend the inheritance tax which has been suggested already. Another tax which I favour very much, and which I believe should receive the earnest consideration of the Government, is what is known as the tax on unimproved land values. I was much pleased to hear the hon. member for Gloucester, (Mr. Turgeon), the first member on the Government side to do so, suggest that this tax should be considered. Up to the time he made the suggestion it had not been mentioned, and the hon. member expressed his disappointment that some member of the Progressive group had not advocated the tax. Since then several hon. members have advocated the tax on unimproved land values, and I believe that the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Good) outlined it at considerable length. I have criticised the sales tax severely, and now as a practical suggestion I would urge the Minister of Finance to consider the matter of taxing these unimproved land values. I would suggest that there should be placed on all lands throughout the country, both urban and rural, a tax of 2½ mills on the dollar with assesment based on unimproved values. If the Minister of Finance did this he would secure at least as much as he will get through the 50 per cent increase in the sales tax, and it would be a more equitable distribution of taxation throughout the country. This tax, I can assure him, would not bear very heavily on those who would pay, and it should be given a fair trial. In many instances people are afraid of the proposal, because they do not know how the tax would operate; and if the experiment were tried it would satisfy these people. Certainly it would be meeting the demand which is being made for a movement towards more direct taxation. Of all the taxes that can be levied, perhaps the income tax and the tax on land values are the most direct methods that could be adopted. I have done some figuring on this question. The figures I have been able to obtain are from the Chief Statistician and they show that the assessable values of unimproved lands and property throughout the Dominion would probably amount to $16,000,000,000. That is why I suggest 2½ mills on the dollar; it would produce the revenue which the Minister of Finance finds it necessary to secure by means of the increase in the sales tax.

Mr. McMASTER: How much would that tax secure to the treasury? Have you worked that out?

Mr. STEWART (Humboldt): A tax of 2½ mills on $16,000,000,000 would be about $40,000,000. On the average farm in western Canada, with the values of which I am well acquainted, that would mean a tax of about $7.50. As I make it, on an average the sales tax will mean a tax of about $20 to each farmer in the West. It makes then to the farmer the difference between $7.50 and $20. Now, it cannot be claimed that that difference would have been thrown upon the working man, because, as a rule, he is not a holder of land at all, and therefore would not have had any land tax to pay. It would have thrown that difference on to certain companies, perhaps speculators, who are holding valuable lands, some in rural districts, and large areas in the cities.

Now, Sir, in conclusion, what I have said with regard to taxes, the revision of the customs tariff, the lessening of the sales tax, and the adoption of direct methods of taxation is not offered by me as a panacea to cure all the ills that afflict this country at the present time. I come from western Canada where the agriculturists are labouring under very serious handicaps, and they are not simply clamouring that conditions shall be changed in order that they may try something new, hoping that that will be better than the old, but they have given mature thought to the disadvantages under which they labour, and I am sent here, together with a number of my colleagues, as the expression of that mature thought. They have sent us here to place certain definite proposals before this House. They think that wider markets would improve their condition. I may say that for the last twenty years I have been watching the efforts of the agriculturists in western Canada, and although I have not during the whole of that period been directly interested in agriculture, because I am going back to my school days, yet during the years that I have been directly interested I have noticed that the western farmers have overcome the very serious handicaps they laboured under by attacking small points and gaining one at a time. They believe if they could obtain wider markets it would materially help them. In fact, I think the proposals they suggest could be put under three heads of relief.

First, they believe there should be increased returns for the products of the farm. Wider markets would help to bring that about. I have already commended the Minister of Finance for his efforts to that end both in regard to the past and the very near future, for undoubtedly he has made real efforts to obtain reciprocity.

[Mr. C. W. Stewart..]

We from the West have asked for better marketing conditions as we believe they could be obtained under a wheat board. I am not going to pursue that further for the moment because I believe very shortly we shall have an opportunity to debate the advisability of some such scheme of control for marketing our crop. We will also perhaps have the opportunity to debate the manner of lessening the cost of transportation not only of grain but also of commodities that enter into the necessities of agriculturists.

Speaking of transportation brings to my mind the completion of the Hudson Bay railroad, which a very large number of agriculturists in the prairie provinces are convinced would materially lessen their costs of transportation. They believe, Sir, that ten or twelve years ago they made out a case before this House. They had the definite promise of the Prime Minister at that time, the late Sir Wilfrid Laurier, that that road would be built. They saw its construction undertaken and carried on to a very large extent by the last government, and they lived in hopes that the road would be completed. Now, I come to this House pledged to my constituents to work for that completion. I find numbers of hon. members, perhaps new to this House, are dubious of the wisdom of continuing this work. The people whom I represent feel that the case is made out, and that if the completion of the road is considered a dubious undertaking, it is the duty of those in doubt and opposed to the work to make out their case in opposition. I place that before you, Sir, as a means, not of greatly increasing the returns of agriculturists, but as a means to some extent of increasing the returns that would be received for agricultural products, particularly grain.

Then, too, I must mention the necessity for the construction of certain branch lines of railway. The cost of production to the farmer is materially enhanced when he is a great distance away from a railroad. For fifteen years I hauled my grain thirty miles to a railway, and so I think I speak with authority in that regard. I paid as high as 25 cents a bushel for a number of years to get my wheat to the railroad car, and I know if that expense could be saved sometimes a considerable loss could be turned into a considerable gain.

These matters, then, this Parliament has more or less direct control over and could attend to if it thought fit, and if carried out they would all help to increase the returns on the farmers' products. But the people of the West have taken the stand that if the returns for their products cannot be greatly increased, at least we should increase the purchasing power of the dollars that they do receive. I want to make that point perfectly clear to the House. Not so very long ago, in fact in my time as a farmer—and I have been farming only about sixteen or seventeen years—I sold my grain at no greater price than is being obtained at the present time, and yet in those days I considered myself fairly prosperous. But for the past two or three years I know I have been farming at a loss. The difference is simply this, that in the years gone by my dollar purchased something, whereas at the present time a dollar by itself is not worth very much. I think it would be only repetition of my argument if I were to go back and state that that is one reason why I claim the customs tariff on agricultural implements and on clothing and the other necessaries of life should be reduced to the minimum, so that the man engaged in developing not only our farms but all our natural resources should be enabled to obtain the maximum return for his expenditure.

I said there were three methods that the people I represent believe would lighten their burdens. The third is, by readjusting taxation. I am not asking for any special concession for the people of the West. They are perfectly willing to pay taxes according to their incomes, but they do ask that they should be taxed according to their incomes. If this Parliament has it in its power, and should see fit, to readjust these matters I have brought to their attention to such an extent that the farmer—and when I use the term farmer for the people in the West, in my constituency at least, I do not think I exempt any person, because all there are either directly engaged in tilling the soil or are very directly dependent upon the farmer for their living—if it can be so worked out that they will be prosperous, that their incomes will be augmented, that the value of their land holdings will be increased, then they are willing to pay in due proportion of their increased incomes and the added value of their property.

I would like to have mentioned the effect this would have had upon our immigration policy. I am firmly convinced, Sir, that the salvation of this country lies in increasing our population; that we need an immigration policy. But I have in mind an ideal immigration policy, that is, to make all the deserving people of this country so prosperous that they will be anxious to have their friends come to them and settle beside them. When that day comes then we shall have indeed a real immigration.

During the campaign last fall when I had the privilege of speaking to a very large number of my constituents, I made it a point at every meeting that I addressed, about sixty in all, to ask the people there if they would feel justified under present circumstances in inviting their friends to come to this country and become citizens alongside of them, and in all those occasions I did not find one man who felt he would be justified in inviting his friends to come and share with him his prosperity or lack of prosperity. But if these people were prosperous they would be glad to have their friends come here. They are not selfish; they do not wish to enjoy prosperity alone. Nor are they crowded in that country. I want to assure you, Mr. Speaker, that as I travelled through my constituency last fall I was struck as I never had been before with the room there was for more people. I do not know whether my constituency differs in that respect from that of any other hon. member from the West, but I found that section after section of good arable land was vacant, right in some of our best settlements and very close to railroads. I had heard it stated a number of times that we had in this country thirty million acres within fifteen miles of railroads, but I never realized the proof of it until I saw with my own eyes, when travelling through my constituency in a car, these areas of the very best land lying idle.

Mr. McMASTER: Will the hon. gentleman permit a question?

Mr. STEWART (Humboldt): Certainly.

Mr. McMASTER: Who, as a general rule, would own these unoccupied farm lands?

Mr. STEWART (Humboldt): They are almost entirely held by non-residents, usually companies; they are what we in the West call company lands.

I was stating, Sir, that if the system which I have called the ideal system could be worked out we would not need very many immigration regulations or restrictions. If the conditions were such that the people were inviting others to come into the country I would be in favour of allowing all whom we could assimilate to come into Canada. That term "assimilate" has been used very often and very glibly during the present session. I wonder just what interpretation has been given to it. When I use it I have reference to all the people that we can make citizens of this country. We need citizens—I have stated that fact; and when I use the term "citizens" I am not thinking of those who become citizens simply because they are domiciled in a particular country; I refer to those who are willing to share not only the advantages of citizenship but also, if the occasion requires, the responsibilities of citizenship as well. I state, Sir, that if this country can attain a sufficient degree of prosperity to cause people to wish to come here and to stay here when they do come, then we can indeed welcome practically all races, all those who will assume the responsibilities of good citizenship in this country.

Hon. D. D. McKENZIE (North Cape Breton and Victoria): Mr. Speaker, I must indeed congratulate the hon. member who has just taken his seat (Mr. Stewart) upon his very excellent exposition of public questions as he sees them. This is the fifth Canadian Parliament of which I have had the honour of being a member; including the provincial parliaments, I have been in seven different parliaments. The present Parliament is of particular interest, because it is composed of three strong groups. We had in one or two previous parliaments three groups, but the third group was largely, as has been the case in the British House of Commons, composed of middle-bench men who were exercising the right to their own individual and independent ideas but were not calling themselves collectively a party. In this House now we have three distinct parties, of which the Progressive party contains the largest number of new members. While I am not disposed to be fulsome in praise of them, I must do the new group the justice of saying that of the many Parliaments which I have seen on the Hill I do not know of any large group of new members who have brought to Parliament such a good equipment of parliamentarians as they have. Of course, their ideas of parliamentary life and parliamentary usefulness, their ideas concerning the way in which they should carry out their duties in this House, will undergo some changes when they have been here quite a number of years and have become acclimatized to the conditions in the House. I am not saying that from any critical point of view, but as one who has travelled that road I think it is only fair that I should tell my hon. friends that if twenty years hence they are still sitting in Parliament they will be surprised at the striking change which their views have undergone concerning how things can be done and the way they should go about doing them. But it would have been a great mistake for my hon. friends not to express their views upon public questions as they have been expressing them and as they will, no doubt, express them during the remainder of this session.

My hon. friend who has just taken his seat has made reference to the duties of citizenship. He points out that the word is used freely, and he says he is not so clear that its meaning is fully understood. Few things in the world are so important as citizenship. The great Scottish poet, Robert Burns, said: "An honest man's the noblest work of God." There is no doubt that is true, and the attributes which Robert Burns had in mind when he penned these words must of necessity be part of the equipment of every true citizen. It is impossible for a man to be a good citizen in the proper sense of the term without possessing those noble qualities to which the immortal Burns has made reference. I am glad that my hon. friend has referred to citizenship. I am sure we are all proud of being Canadian citizens, and prouder, if possible, to be British citizens enjoying all the privileges that the British flag and the British Crown bring to us. We have one king and one crown, one flag and one country, from the Atlantic to the Pacific. When we talk of groups and divisions, and of one party attempting to build up one section of the country regardless of the necessities of other sections, let us understand at once that such a thing is an impossibility. It is impossible to build up a country by building up one section at the expense of another, with no uniformity of development, just as it is impossible to build any other structure on the same principle. For these reasons I say at once to my friends of the Progressive party, who are here practically as new men—I need not say it to the old hard-shells of the Tory party, many of whom have been here for a long time, and who make it their boast that they are true and loyal, good Imperialists—that we must have regard to the necessities of the country as a whole, and try to find a policy that will enable us to govern and carry forward this whole country from coast to coast, a policy that will be in conformity, so far as possible, with the best interests of every citizen in this great country of ours.

Men and women come to this country, they accept our laws and our privileges, they accept the splendid welcome we give them, and in return we expect nothing from them except that they shall perform their duties as Christian citizens of this country, and in that way become worthy of the heritage which has been handed to us by our forefathers, all of which we are willing to hand down to those who come to this country and make their homes amongst us, exacting only from them that they shall be good citizens. Much depends in that regard upon our own conduct. It is just the same as the example the head of the family sets to his children. As a rule, you will never see well-behaved children in a household where the father has no respect for the amenities which should govern his conduct as the head of the house. On the other hand, if he shows himself well-behaved, a moral, devout Christian man in all the duties devolving upon him, the children are glad to follow in his footsteps. It is the same with citizenship. If we who were born here, or have been here many years, live up to the ideals of British citizenship and of the British flag, if we stand fast by them in honesty of purpose, industry, and everything else that makes for good citizenship, those who come to this country will try to live up to our standards; but if we depart from them, let us beware that we are not dragged down to the standards which the stranger to this country would set up if he found a lack of principles in us who ought to know better.

I have made these observations, Mr. Speaker, I think justifiably, because we have a great many new members, excellent men who are here for the first time. They have heard a great deal about politicians and public men and have perhaps heard that they are men not overburdened with morals, and without any proper conception of what is real manhood, and of what are the duties devolving upon public men in this country. I do not hold myself up to be anything but perhaps a poor example of the good men of this country, but I have been in touch with public men in Canada for the past thirty or thirty-five years or more, and I must bear this testimony, that taking our public men as a class, they are as fond of principle, of honour, of right and square dealing as any other class of men that I ever came across in this country. I want to convey to my good friends who may have brought here with them from the far West or from the Old Country, or wherever they come from, the idea that public men in Canada are such that they must be on their guard against them, and that they have no proper conception of honour in dealing with their fellow citizens, that such is not the case, and if my good friends will do their part, if they will uphold those high standards of citizenship that the old Nova Scotian, the old British Columbian, or the men of any other province of Canada hold as their ideals, we shall be happy together, and no one will have any reason to find fault with our citizenship.

I do not think that I shall follow the speech of my hon. friend very much further. I agree largely with what he says, and I am pleased to find that he has such a clear conception of his duty and of what should be done in connection with the affairs of this country.

A good many words of praise and congratulation have been tendered to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding). These praises have come from all parts and all corners of this great country, and when other hon. members from far-away provinces have tendered their congratulations, and quite properly, to the minister, it is not only incumbent upon me, coming from the same province, a colleague of the minister for many years, and his follower as a humble member of the Liberal party for nearly forty years, but a very great pleasure to tender to him my warmest congratulations upon this the delivery, and the delivery in good style and splendid form, of his sixteenth budget. I suppose, Mr. Speaker, that few men if any—possibly there may have been a few, but I could not myself in any leading countries of the world discover any such person—have had a history like the present Finance Minister. I do not know whether the famous Iron Chancellor—who for many years, although not the real ruler of Germany, was the financial centre and strength of that Empire and was in office at the time of the Franco-Prussian war of 1870—had the great distinction of introducing into his Parliament as many budgets as our present Finance Minister, but if it was not his good fortune to have done so, I do not know of any one else.

May I be permitted to boast somewhat of our Liberalism in the province of Nova Scotia and to hold out to our friends who are not very fond, I believe, of the old party, some of the beauties, the traditions, and the achievements of that party in the good old province down by the sea—a province where law is respected, where citizenship is respected, where property rights are respected, and where religious beliefs—and everything that goes into the making of life what it ought to be and making life happy and contented—are respected. There is no province in the Dominion of Canada, no spot in the world—and that is said without any disparity to any other place—where those essentials of life are better preserved and more respected than in the little province of Nova Scotia. Let me say that while we have had splendid men in the province of Nova Scotia and have given splendid men to the world—we have had such men as Joseph Howe; Mr. Johnson who was the contemporary and also the premier of Nova Scotia as well as Howe—the Tuppers, the Bordens, Fielding, Murray, and many others who stand high in the ranks of the public men of Canada—among them all there was none who contributed more to the stabilising and the elevating of the public life of Canada than the hon. gentleman who is now the Minister of Finance of the Dominion, and who has had the honour of introducing the budget we are now discussing.

I am sure it would be surprising for some people to know that ever since Confederation we have had only one change of government in the province of Nova Scotia. I need not tell hon. gentlemen how long ago that is. During that fifty-four years we had just one change of government. That was in 1878 when the Conservative administration took the reins of office; but in 1882 they went out of power and ever since that time the people of Nova Scotia —who are bright, intelligent and alert people—have consistently followed in the one track, and have consistently recognized the one policy, the one love, and the one system of government. The present premier, who to-day occupies the place of honour and power in the province of Nova Scotia will, some day next month, have been sitting there for twenty-six years, he will have been continuously in office for twenty-six years. I refer to the Hon. George Murray, a gentleman who is well known from coast to coast, a gentleman who, after twenty-six years of office, exhibits the purity and the bright hope of a consistent and progressive life as a politician and a Liberal of the Liberals. If in this great province of ours we can produce from the Liberal party a man like that, who has given us a splendid government and a splendid record of progress, am I not justified in presenting, not only to this House but to the world, the good old Liberal party and saying that within its ranks, and exhibiting its doctrines and its principles, are to be found men and measures worthy of this great country, and that these measures deserve to be developed, perpetuated and continued? Let me add that for fourteen years before the Hon. Mr. Murray took charge of the affairs of the province of Nova Scotia, the Hon. Mr. Fielding, who is now the Finance Minister here, was the premier of that province. That also involved being the finance minister for the province as well, for he was also the provincial treasurer and provincial secretary, the duties of which, in our province, correspond to those of the federal Minister of Finance. So that the fact deserves to be noted that Hon. Mr. Fielding is not only presenting his sixteenth budget in the Dominion Parliament, but he had previously presented fourteen budgets in the Nova Scotia legislature, making a record more unique and more striking than that of any other man, I believe, who ever occupied high office under the British flag.

Now, I may be criticised perhaps, for talking about these things, but I think it is only right and proper that there should be a due presentation of them to this House and to the world. Public men do not always, perhaps, get the praise and the credit that is due to them, and when there are clear and striking evidences of this kind due recognition should be forthcoming. For the province of Nova Scotia is just as exacting—perhaps more so—of a high line of conduct from its public men as any other part of Canada. So happily have the expectations of the province in this regard been fulfilled that for twenty-six years we have had one premier (Hon. Mr. Murray), and for fifty-four years we have had the one government or the one party in power excepting, as I have said, for a brief spell of four years. This shows there is virtue, stability, a high conception of honour, and efficient administration to be found in the party which is so appreciated by the little province down by the sea. I am producing these goods largely for the benefit of my hon. friends of the Progressive party. I would ask them to examine them and, if they are of a proper type and fitness, let them wear them.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

After Recess

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. McKENZIE: When the House took recess, I was referring to the achievements of the great Liberal party of which I have the honour now to be a member, and I was saying that both parties, Liberal and Conservative, from the province of Nova Scotia, have contributed many excellent men to the service of the irrespective parties and the country at large. I felt at the time that I was forgetting one of the distinguished Nova Scotians to whom I should have made reference, and, during the recess, I thought I recalled that I had made no reference to a gentleman who was for some years Prime Minister of this Dominion, the Right Hon. Sir John S. D. Thompson. He was a Nova Scotian of whom we all have reason to be proud, and his name should be mentioned when enumerating distinguished Nova Scotians. I desire to include the name of that illustrious gentleman with those of the other prominent Nova Scotians whom I have already mentioned. The budget is always interesting to the Canadian people. It is the accounting for the year, or possibly for a number of years, which the government submits to the people, on which they are to pass judgment in regard to the financial operations of those who are charged with the business of the country. The present Administration has been but a very few months in office. Hon. members who are familiar with the operation of government and the responsibility of parties will well understand that it takes considerable time to get a proper hold and understanding of various matters to be attended to in the administration of this or any other country. It must not be expected, in reason and fairness, that, in the few months that this Administration had been in power, before the Hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) was called upon to prepare and present his budget, we could have the full and various details that would be necessary in order to give as thorough an account of the affairs of this country as might possibly be expected had the present Government been longer handling the affairs of the country.

I propose paying some slight attention to the manner of criticisms which have been made by the official Opposition, and, particularly by the right hon. leader of the Opposition (Mr. Meighen) and those who were in his administeration. They criticized us as if we had been for years in charge of the affairs of this country and were responsible for the public debt, the way in which that debt was incurred, the way in which the various resources for borrowing money in this country were exploited, the way in which the credit of the country, in so far as borrowing money was concerned, was exercised and used and everything of that kind, when, as a matter of fact, the late government was responsible for all these things, and borrowed money wherever it could be borrowed. Now, we are criticized as if that were all our business, and not theirs, and as if they had no responsibility at all. What would you think, Sir, of a landlord who while living, say, for ten years in a house, had allowed the shingles to blow off the roof, the chimney to break down and become smoky, the floor to be broken, the windows to be smashed, and, in short, had permitted the house to get into a dilapidated condition; who had then managed to rent the house to another man, and who, the day after the tenant had taken charge, came in, and turning savagely on the poor tenant, said. "How is it the house is smoky? What is the matter with the broken floor? How is it the roof is leaky and the windows smashed? How is it this house is in the absolutely uninhabitable, deplorable condition in which I find it?" You would say he was a very daring or insane sort of man. The answer would be 'This is your house; you lived in it for ten years; if the windows are broken, you broke them; if the roof is leaking, it is because of your neglect; if the chimney is smoky, you allowed it to break down and get into a smoky condition; this is your house, under your administration, and you are responsible". But the landlord tries to shake off all responsibility and place it on the tenant. You would say such a person was without any conception of a proper reasoning power as to his own responsibility. That, Sir, is the position in which the former members of the government are placed. They stand up with considerable nerve and criticize as boldly and as strongly as if they had nothing whatever to do with the conditions in which we find the country to-day, and the position in which the minister who has charge of the finances of the country must of necessity be.

The question of raising money is not so hard in one way, because there is only one source from which we can get it. It must come from the people directly or indirectly, and whatever may be the means adopted of collecting it, in the last analysis it must come from the pockets of the individual citizen. Now, everybody knows that we have an enormous debt. We have tremendous obligations that must be met; and every Canadian who is proud of his country acknowledges that those obligations we are in duty bound to pay in due course. The only question therefore is as regards the method of collecting the money, and the application of the revenue so secured towards the discharge of those obligations. Not only does the right hon. leader of the Opposition acknowledge that fact, but the hon. leader of the Progressive party (Mr. Crerar), a day or two before the budget was introduced, predicted that, unless he was much mistaken, the Minister of Finance would be obliged not only to continue the exactions that were already being made upon the people, but to propose new taxes in order to meet the obligations that faced him. Well, that prediction has only been fulfilled; and the leader of the Progressive party and his associates, in view of that judgment pronounced by him, must do us the justice of not criticising us too harshly if we find it necessary to do just what that hon. gentleman thought we should have to do, under the circumstances that exist to-day and in view of the heritage that has been bequeathed us by our predecessors. When the opinion is expressed by the member for Marquette that the Government will have to impose new taxes, it is illogical to tell us now that we should make reductions in the present taxes that are levied.

Some people criticise the war debt with some timidity. I think that I am among those in this country who can talk about the war debt and everything else that relates to the war and our relations to the Sovereign, without fear of adverse comment. I say that without any intention of boasting in any way. But the war is made an excuse for all kinds of extravagance. Now, it was quite proper that we should have done all that we did do in the war, spending the last dollar and sending the last man to the front, to discharge our full duty in the cause. But there is such a thing as doing one's duty properly; and a nation can play its part in a war without any reckless extravagance, spending $50 where $1 could accomplish the same thing. Criticism can properly be offered in that respect, and the outgoing government and the government of the Right Hon. Sir Robert Borden cannot escape criticism at the hands of the people by simply blaming the war for everything, because our debt is out of all proportion and is absolutely beyond the possibility of adequate explanation. For instance, many Conservatives who supported the last government know that hundreds of thousands of men were gathered up in Canada at the expense of the treasury and sent to England although it was fully known that they were absolutely unfit for service and could not pass the test that would be made overseas. Medical men among the Conservatives told us in this House that in the discharge of their duties they were called upon to pass all these men. These statements can be found in Hansard. A man would come to headquarters and say he wanted to be a colonel and he would be told to go and get a regiment. If he could raise the men he was given the commission, so he went into the highways and byways and gathered up a crowd, got his commission and went overseas with the men. These men sometimes were kept for as long as six months in different towns in Canada. Regiments were sent to New Brunswick, Nova Scotia and other places. One regiment was stationed at Amherst in my own province and another in a little town near Louisburg in my county; and this was done simply as a matter of patronage to supporters of the government, in order that the supplies of food and other necessaries required in the camps might be procured from Tory merchants. When these men who were so hastily got together were taken overseas it was found in England in many cases that not one out of fifty was fit to go to the front; and as the authorities were too busy with legitimate business these men could not be transported back to this country. The result was that for years, as military men in my hearing know, hundreds and thousands of men were kept over there doing nothing at all except eating their heads off at the expense of the country. They were sent there simply for the purpose of affording some man an opportunity of getting a commission as colonel, and for the other purpose of supplying patronage to supporters of the party. I see a military gentleman opposite laughing, but I defy him to deny these things. What I say is absolutely true, and the records bear me out. Now, these are some of the ways in which money was squandered improvidently, without the slightest benefit to the country, by the Conservative party when in office.

What happened in connection with the Ross rifle? I suppose millions of dollars have been expended in the manufacture of the Ross rifle for the purpose of murdering our soldiers. When last session the matter was brought up on the estimates, a gentleman now in the other chamber, a much-honoured senator and military man—a general in fact—who was at that time a supporter in this House of the right hon. gentleman's government—of course, I mean the right hon. gentleman who now leads the Opposition—made a speech in which he condemned in the most unequivocal terms the continued manufacture of this rifle and its murderous effect on our boys who had to use it at the front. But it was a case of patronage.

Mr. CLARK: Is the hon. gentleman referring to the Ross rifle?

Mr. McKENZIE: Yes, I am referring to the Ross rifle.

Mr. CLARK: Was it not the Liberal party that adopted the Ross rifle?

Mr. McKENZIE: Is that an answer from my mild-mannered friend?

Mr. CLARK: I am merely asking the question.

Mr. McKENZIE: There was no war at the time of the adoption of the Ross rifle. General Hughes, a gentleman who was high in the counsels of the Tory party, and supposed to be our greatest authority on military matters, approved of the adoption of the Ross rifle, and said that it should be manufactured.

Mr. CLARK: Were you in the House at the time?

Mr. McKENZIE: No; consequently I am not responsible. I am not putting myself forward as an authority on military matters, I am giving the facts of the case, and I am not afraid of contradiction, for I am telling the truth. The excuse which my hon. friend has given is that the Ross rifle was good enough for use on parade and during sham manoeuvres, but—

Mr. CLARK: May I ask—

Mr. McKENZIE: Excuse me—but when it came to war and thousands of our soldiers were being hurled into eternity every hour of the day by putting this dangerous explosive weapon in their hands, is it an excuse to say, as suggested by my hon. friend, who is a true disciple of the Tory party; "Oh, we are not to blame; the Liberals were in power when the Ross rifle was adopted. Now, however, that we are in the midst of war our boys should not be handicapped in any way whatever, the very best weapon is none too good for them. But if we stop equipping them with the Ross rifle there will be nothing doing at the Quebec arsenal, there will be no profitable contracts for the supply of raw materials, and we cannot keep as many men engaged." Consequently, notwithstanding report after report by the highest military authorities in England condemning the Ross rifle, as my hon. friend knows, his leaders said: "We will continue the manufacture of the Ross rifle although it means throwing millions of dollars of the money of the people into the St. Lawrence." That is the charge which I make against the outgoing government, that they are responsible for money ill spent without any satisfactory returns to the treasury. If my hon. friend wants to ask me any question now I am ready to answer him.

Mr. CLARK: No.

Mr. McKENZIE: Very good. I suppose his question has vanished like the Ross rifle.

Now, Mr. Speaker, it is also an undoubted fact that millions of dollars' worth of war waggons and other military equipment was bought in this country at the highest prices and sent over to England, although those responsible for its purchase knew that it was absolutely unfit for use in the field and was being condemned by the Imperial authorities. These are some of the reasons why our war casualities were so heavy. But, we are told, we are not to open our mouths about it because it was all connected with the war. As I said at the beginning of my remarks, I am as loyal to our war engagements as any man can be, and undoubtedly we must pay our debts; but hon. gentlemen who were in control at that time must not think that they are going to escape the responsibility of just and honest criticism simply because they cry, "The war".

Our hon. friends opposite do not seem to realize the responsibility of their days of power. Quite shrewdly they want to evade it, and, as they very well know, the sooner they can get the people to forget their connection with scandals I have mentioned the sooner they will be able to switch the odium off to other shoulders. But I think this is the time to remind the public who really are responsible for the conditions which the late government handed over to us. The few matters I have mentioned are sufficient to indicate what I mean when I say that moneys were spent in such a way as to give neither the best results during the war nor honest value to the people of Canada.

I listened, as I always do, with much interest to the argument of the right hon. leader of the Opposition when he spoke yesterday. He told us that he was absolutely dissatisfied with the budget and that there was nothing that he could do except criticize it. Well, that is not all that the Canadian people expect of the leader of a great party. They expect when national questions are to be dealt with that all parties, and particularly their leaders, shall not only criticize but bring to bear their best judgment and advice towards the solution of those questions. At a critical stage when every nerve and muscle and thought must be strained to arrive at the best policy to be pursued in order to successfully carry on the affairs of the country, would you not expect the right hon. gentleman to make some suggestion as to the readjustment of the tariff and the improvement of the budget if either were unsatisfactory to him? The right hon. gentleman is in duty bound to give the country the benefit of his best judgment and experience. His party has responsibilities to the people that sent them here, and because they happen to be in opposition they are not free from obligation, for they are "His Majesty's Loyal Opposition," and as such are bound to give the country the benefit of any constructive statesmanship which they possess.

Now, what was the constructive statesmanship presented to us yesterday, when the right hon. gentleman pointed out very eloquently and very learnedly that the country was in a bad way and that money was very much needed to carry us along? The only thing that we got from the right hon. gentleman was the amendment offered by the former Minister of Finance (Sir Henry Drayton). I shall not take up the time of the House in reading it all, but this is the substance of it:

> That the Liberal party having been returned to power the budget proposals of the Finance Minister now brought down, constitute, on the part of the Government, an utter failure to implement such pledges by legislation.
> That the making of such solemn pledges, the utilization of them to secure support, and their flagrant violation after the attainment of office reveal a disregard of political honour and tend to lower the standard of public life.

Now, men are out of employment; industrial and financial conditions require adjustment and improvement; yet the leader of a great party, recently Prime Minister of this country, stands up in the House of Commons, the great forum of the Canadian people, and says: "I have nothing to offer; I have no suggestion to make, nor has my party any. But one thing I know, and one thing only, and to it I will pledge my word and the strength of my party—that the Grits did not do all that they might have done; the Grits did not follow out, word for word, the pledges of their platform in 1919." That is not what the Canadian people are looking for. Anybody could have done that; it is not necessary to keep a party together with a leader at its head in order that we may have some little milk and water of that kind. The people are not so particular about the caviling of leaders of parties, about how words and phrases may be placed in resolutions and otherwise; they are concerned with the difficulties with which we are confronted. The man who is unemployed; the man who is trying to support his family on the pittance that he receives as a remuneration for what little work he can get, will not take off his hat to the leader of the Opposition, nor will he cheer for him, because he moved that little resolution. It does not in the slightest way relieve the situation in this country, nor does it bring any credit to the party whose leader is responsible for it. I submit that something more tangible, something more statesmanlike, something more in the interests of the people was to be expected from the leader of the Opposition.

My right hon. friend made reference yesterday to trade with foreign countries, particularly with the United States. He would not encourage reciprocity; he did not think it would be a safe thing for the maintenance of British institutions. Now, my right hon. friend is entitled to his opinion, and I do not criticise him for holding it. I can only say that it is sane, business reasoning on the part of the Canadian people to be anxious to trade with 110,000,000 or 120,000,000 of the best purchasers in the world. I should imagine that the farmers of the West, the farmers of the East —in fact, all who have anything to sell, would be glad to take advantage of the nearest market in which they can get a fair price for their products. I do not wish to throw cold water on the desirability of our trading with the British market and other markets across the Atlantic. We should thank the Lord for those markets and be glad for any developments that may occur in that direction. But surely it cannot reasonably be argued that we should disregard a market which is practically within a stone's throw of our own homes, a market which is right across the line, available to us under all circumstances, and avail ourselves entirely of the only other avenues of trade that are left open to us. I submit that while we should not neglect the one, we surely as sane business men should take advantage of the other.

But let us examine for a moment how the attitude of the right hon. gentleman who leads the Opposition in respect to reciprocity squares with his dealings with the United States in other respects. All governments in this country have spent millions in the opening up of transport routes in order that proper transportation facilities might be afforded from coast to coast. As to the trend of traffic from the great West to the Pacific, we have done our best to provide facilities there; as to the trend of traffic from the West toward the Atlantic, we have done all we could to develop canals, river navigation, railways, everything that goes to make our transportation facilities better; everything that enables us to transport our products within our own borders and upon our own lines, independent of assistance from any other country. That we have done, and we have brought our transportation system into a fair state of development.

You would expect, Sir, that the former Prime Minister would not do anything to interfere with a system of that kind, built up at such enormous expense. But what did he do? In the face of the conditions to which I have referred, my right hon. friend went over to the United States and bought 2,000 miles of railway in that country—under a foreign flag, in a foreign country; bound this country to maintain those 2,000 miles of road to suck the life-blood out of the system which we had created within our own borders. He ignores the system of ocean ports which we have established at Vancouver, Victoria and other places on the Pacific and Atlantic coasts; he creates a connection with a foreign country across the line and opens a seaport at New London and at Portland, Maine. The result is that the goods which would otherwise be handled by our Canadian railways are switched out of this country into a foreign land, and encouragement is given to the importing into Canada through a foreign country—not through our own ports—of goods coming from across the seas. How does that square with the story my right hon. friend told that he would have nothing to do with the Americans which would have the effect of interfering with our traffic?

Nevertheless, the facts are as I have stated them, and this millstone has been placed around our necks for all time. We have this 2,000 miles of railway in the United States under American jurisdiction, subject to American laws, and so far as our legislation is concerned, we cannot say how one spike shall be driven on that mileage, and the hon. member who is so extremely loyal that he would not admit it was a fine day for the Yankees, for fear it might break up our loyalty, is the author of this thing.

But is that all? No, Sir, not at all. The province from which I come, British Columbia, the western provinces, Nova Scotia, and New Brunswick, are all very much interested in the coal trade. It may be necessary to sell the coal produced in Nova Scotia a little dearer in the central parts of Canada than it could be purchased across the line, but this is one nation, one land, and one people, and it is necessary for security and for contentment in this country that we should know that at all times and under all conditions we have fuel within our borders that will enable us to get along in winter and in summer independently of any foreign country. For that reason, to bring about those conditions within our own borders, it is necessary sometimes to expend money and to do things which might perhaps be avoided if we had no regard at all for the national interests. What do we find? We find that the purchasing of this 2,000 miles of railway was not all. The right hon. gentleman also bought 32,000 acres of coal lands. Where is his market? Not in the United States. The market for that coal is Ontario and other parts of Canada wherever coal is wanted. What are the facts? Every ton of that coal that is brought across the line comes across free of duty. We have heard a tremendous outcry from hon. gentlemen opposite because there was some evidence of slight discrepancies in duties and some slight favours shown to people who were not entitled to them, but here we have the people all over Canada who buy this coal from the Government getting it free of duty. The Government may go through the farce of putting on a duty of 53 cents per ton, but it is simply taking money out of one pocket and putting it in the other, because the duty is paid to the customs officer and comes back to the Government. It simply means that this coal is coming in here in competition with the coal produced in this country, and there is no protection for British Columbia, no protection for the Maritime provinces, not a particle of protection against the coal produced on these mines across the line which the former government was so lacking in judgment and so ill-advised as to buy. It comes into competition with legitimate industry in this country, to their disadvantage. The industries of this country are brought into competition with this Government, whose coal does not pay any duty. It is simply fighting the people with their own money, and driving hundreds and perhaps thousands of our Canadians out of work, to walk the streets. The coal that we are burning in our locomotives and everywhere on our railways is coal mined, produced, and brought to the railways by Americans, who owe no allegiance or anything else to us, and who care not what becomes of our country. That is the charge which I bring home to the door of hon. gentlemen who but yesterday went out of office, and who have offered no explanation for taking over these railways or for buying these coal mines.

Evidence as to the ownership and operation and capacity of these mines was given before the Fuel Committee of this House a year or so ago. The committee was warned by an hon. gentleman who had something to do with these mines that they were capable of developing to the extent of an output of at least 2,000,000 tons a year. If we are going to bring into this country 2,000,000 tons of coal a year, you will see the enormous quantity of our own product that will be displaced, and the effect it will have upon our own industry and upon our own men. There is nothing at present that I can see that we can do. This is the heritage that has been handed to us by hon. gentlemen opposite. There may be some way of getting clear of this situation, and so far as I am concerned, if there is anything I can do, or if any suggestion is made that would better the condition of our own miners and avoid illegitimate competition of that kind, I shall be only too pleased to carry it out. So far as coal and the railways, and the situation at Portland are concerned, these things are the result of the lack of business judgment on the part of the outgoing administration. They have been handed over to us, and we have to deal with them. It is only fair to the workingmen of this country, to the coal miners from coast to coast, that they should know the position in which they were placed by the old government, and by those who supported that government when this transaction was put through.

The ex-Minister of Finance (Sir Henry Drayton) stood up in this House a few days ago and told us that we were being scandalized in Great Britain because of our action in connection with the purchase of this very railway of which I have spoken, and that it was said we were robbing English investors, and grabbing at this wonderful prize, the Grand Trunk. If that is the reputation we have to-day in England because of this transaction, what answer have we got? Was there any answer made by the hon. member except to read articles appearing in newspapers in the Old Land about this transaction? If there was anything wrong about the taking over of that road—and I am not saying that there was, though I think it was the most miserable transaction which any Canadian government ever made—if we are being branded as robbers because we took over the property; if any such blame can legitimately be placed, let it go where it belongs. It certainly does not belong to the Liberal party; it does not belong to the Progressive party; it belongs to the Conservative party; and, Sir, at the risk of taking a little of the time of the House, I must place this matter right. It is not a light matter for the Canadian government and the Canadian people to be accused of robbery, to be represented, practically, as highwaymen in taking millions of money out of the pockets of rich and poor on the other side of the Atlantic. That is not a very savoury reputation to be applied to us at this time of our lives; and if such a charge is to be brought and believed the responsibility should be placed where it belongs. The Liberal party has no business to share in any such reputation, if such reputation is to exist, because when this transaction was being put through Parliament the Liberal party fought it at every turn of the road. On October 21, 1919, when this bill was up for its second reading, I moved this resolution:

That the bill be not read a second time but that the House do come to the following resolution:

That the bill proposes an uncertain but very large addition to the debt of the Dominion at a time when existing obligations, arising out of the war and from other causes, are so vastly in excess of all previous obligations as to give much cause for anxiety on the part of all who are concerned in the financial position of Canada and the maintenance of the public credit.

That a measure of such wide-reaching character and large importance requires a study by the House and the people that cannot possibly be given in the closing days of the session.

That the present session of Parliament was called for a special purpose which has already been accomplished.

That on Wednesday October 8th the Honourable the Minister of Trade and Commerce, acting as leader of the House in the absence of the Prime Minister, stated that the Government's expectation was that the session would close within the then current week.

That under such circumstances the introduction by the Government of a measure of such great importance as the acquisition of the railway and property of the Grand Trunk Company of Canada is improvident and inexpedient.

That for these reasons the further consideration of the bill be deferred until a future session of this Parliament.

That, I think, Sir, is a reasonable proposition. That is the position that was taken by the Liberal party at that time. We did not want this road; we did not think the Canadian people wanted it; we did not think that the necessary consideration was given to the question of its acquirement. A vote was taken. There were only sixty-one of us in the House at that time and we all voted against it. There were ninety-one Conservatives in the House, and the whole ninety-one, without a break, voted for the taking over of this great railway. The vote was taken on October 23, 1919, and the division is to be found in Hansard, Vol. 2, page 1330. Now, if on a Sunday at home, or at any other time, my hon. friends opposite feel particularly pious, and wish to look back on some of the wonderful things they have done for their God and country, they might turn up Hansard at the page indicated and they will see that this railway was bought as a result of that vote, and we have it on our hands now. I venture to say, however, there is not a Conservative in the House who will go to his constituents and say what a splendid thing they have done for the Canadian people.

On October 31, of the same year, a motion was moved by Hon. Mr. Fielding to the effect that the bill should not then be read, but that a commission should be appointed and a proper investigation made as to the condition of the road and the advisability of taking it over. But that resolution was voted down exactly in the same way as the other; there were sixty-one votes recorded for the motion and ninety-one against it. Accordingly the late government declared that they wanted this great bonanza for the Canadian people. If there was any robbery of the English people who owned this road, or anything done against them—I am not saying there was—and there are any indictments against hon. gentlemen opposite in that respect, they must plead to the indictment—"not guilty", I suppose—and nimbly step into the criminal box. The Liberal party should not take the responsibility, it must be placed where it belongs; and when those distinguished parliamentarians that I see opposite me go to attend the next conference in London, and are there wined and dined, they can point to this record and say "We are some of the men who have robbed you and taken this wonderful Grand Trunk Railway from you." That is one of the records which my hon. friends opposite can present to their distinguished compatriots and colleagues across the water. I deemed it only fair, as it will perhaps be a matter of ancient history next year to say something about this matter. I think it is only fair to point out that if there was anything wrong about the transaction the great Liberal party of Canada has no responsibility in the matter as it had no part or lot in it at all, and did everything that could be legitimately done to prevent the acquisition of this road by the Canadian people.

There are two things I want to point out. First, we had no business to have this road either on our own account or on account of the commerce of the country. It was contended that we already had too many railways, that we already had too great a mileage, before we assumed the responsibility of taking over the Grand Trunk. If that was true, why was the road taken over? I am not a railway man, and do not care to advance my own views in opposition to those of others as far as the operation of railways is concerned; but I never could understand why, in view of the existing mileage, and with a population of only eight or nine millions, we should acquire four thousand more miles of railway, one-half of such mileage being in a foreign country and designed to switch trade and traffic from Canada when we had spent hundreds of millions of money to keep that trade and traffic within our own borders. I would like someone with keener light on these things than I have, either in this House or out of it, to give a satisfactory business explanation of why these things were done. I charge these follies against the outgoing government and the Tory party. For some sinister motive, which nobody seems to have understood, they lost their heads and their judgment and plunged the country into a condition financially and industrially, which no man within the walls of this House to-day will live long enough to see rectified. These reckless expenditures and extravagances I lay at the door of hon. members who were responsible at the time they happened, and who could have prevented them. But, for some reason or other these things have been done. The Canadian people are the heirs. They have the legacy and must do the best they can to administer the estate.

We were told several times that it would have been ruinous to put the Canadian Northern into liquidation. I am told there is hardly a large railway system in United States which has not, at some time or another, gone through the hands of a receiver. They had to be clipped down. Some baggage had to be thrown overboard, the load had to be lightened and the railways had to be adjusted to the traffic of the country. That has been done several times, and is being done to-day. We were told the credit of the country would be ruined if the road went into liquidation. But were they consistent later on, when they found it would be advantageous to put the Grand Trunk Pacific into liquidation? Did they think it would be dangerous to put the Grand Trunk Pacific into liquidadation overnight, without consulting Parliament or anyone except the minister? The minister was made the receiver under the War Measures' Act, which gave power to the government to do almost anything. Surely, it was never the intention of the government, when they passed the War Measures' Act, that it should be used as an instrument by which the Minister of Railways would become the receiver of wrecks or defunct railways, but that was done. The members who were supporting the government jumped to their feet and confirmed the act of the government putting that road into liquidation, instead of dealing with it along the same lines as they dealt with the Mackenzie and Mann road. There is not a particle of difference between the one and the other. Was it not just as damaging to the Canadian people and the government to have the Grand Trunk Pacific put into liquidation as to put into liquidation any part of the Mackenzie and Mann road? But it suited them in one case and not in the other. They had friends in the one and did not care very much for the people who were interested in the other. The argument used was that to put the road into liquidation would spoil the good name of the country. That certainly is not the reason, and it is not an answer to the question why Mackenzie and Mann were not forced into liquidation when it was found they could not run their own business, and did not have money enough to carry on the vast undertaking on their hands. That is no reason why the good people of the country should be compelled, by act of Parliament, to take this burden on their shoulders and hand it down to their children's children, to the third and fourth generation, and perhaps longer.

I bring these things home to the doors of hon. members opposite, and ask them to prayerfully and carefully think about them, and see what justification they have for their great boast of what their government did and would have done. I am not a man to boast or crow over a fallen foe. It is not characteristic of the Scotchman to crow over a fallen foe, particularly if the foe is a worthy one, but I do not know whether that quality is present in this case or not. The Canadian people have discussed these things and weighed them. Hon. members have said that we are not much of a party, but the more they abuse us, and the less standing they think we have, the greater will be their fall. If they were defeated by what might be regarded as an excellent foe, a splendidly equipped army that came against them, there would be some credit and honour in the victory. They have said all these things about us, yet, nevertheless, with all our sins and shortcomings, the Canadian people say: "Whatever the Grits are, whatever their shortcomings, for Heaven's sake, anything at all rather than this outfit at present in office". And how did they vote? If I had any advice to give to the splendid body of intelligence I see opposite me, I would say, "Don't be running down the Grits, the party the Canadian people put into power over your heads, because the more you do of that the more disaster you bring to yourselves. The Canadian jury heard the evidence against you and dealt with you honestly and squarely, according to the evidence". I think hon. members should accept the verdict humbly and penitently, and try to go back to the former days of the Tory party. They had their day, they had their men and they had their leaders. They have done some thing in this country. They were a party worth reckoning with at one time, but I heard a good Tory saying yesterday in his speech that all these magnificent things of the past, can be wiped off the calendar, as he described it, and that the word, Ichabod can be written above the door—their glory has departed. It seems to me the hon. member who made that speech last night, when he was applying that tradition to us on this side, had some inward thoughts, and, perhaps, made up his mind he would risk the statement, thinking nobody on this side of the House would take notice of it.

I can assure hon. gentlemen opposite, speaking for myself—and I know the same thing applies to the whole Liberal party—that I never heard during the campaign any promises which this Government has failed to make good. Now, there was a long resolution passed by the Liberal party in 1919; and last year when the budget was before Parliament we presented a shorter resolution comprising a concise and comprehensive digest of the 1919 platform. That shorter resolution has been drawn upon by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) in the preparation of the budget, and in its terseness it might be compared to the stereotyped prayer of the coloured gentleman who, being a late sleeper and finding it rather difficult to say his morning prayers—for he was devotional—printed a certain formulary, nailed it at the head of his bed, and of a morning before getting into his working clothes, said: "Lord, them's my sentiments". That form of prayer had one advantage at least: it saved a great deal of time. The only difference between our 1919 resolution and the shorter one is that the latter is more concise; and we say to the Tory party, to the Lord, and to everyone else that those are our sentiments. That shorter resolution is a snug synopsis of the longer one, but it is quite comprehensive.

The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell) last night in a splendid speech reviewed the record of the Liberal party under the leadership of that grand and distinguished statesman, Sir Wilfrid Laurier, under whom we learnt the ethics of politics; and I do not think that a party that has studied the business of government at the feet of that great Gamaliel, could deserve the condemnation which hon. gentlemen opposite are seeking to pass upon us. We undertook in 1896 to do what was best in the interests of this Dominion, and we shall carry out now the Laurier-Fielding policy under the leadership of the admirable gentleman who now heads the Government (Mr. Mackenzie King). Let hon. gentlemen opposite reflect seriously before making any charges as to responsibility for the burden which now rests upon this country. We are willing to take our fair share of that burden, but we will not be taxed by hon. gentlemen opposite with responsibilities which are not ours. We are now trying to houseclean, to reconstruct things, and to pull the government of the country out of the Slough of Despond in which the immediately preceding administrations left it; and given an opportunity we shall be able to restore things to the condition in which we left them in 1911.

In 1896, the affairs of the country were in a deplorable state. We found deficit upon deficit, the credit of the country was bad, and financial conditions generally were frightful. We shouldered that responsibility and in fifteen years we had entirely changed this condition. The Right Hon. Sir Robert Borden said at the time that it was best to leave well enough alone, that things were all right, that we were making splendid progress, and that there was no need to touch the structure because it was magnificent and could not be better. Indeed, the present Minister of Finance was able to hand over to Sir Thomas White, when the books were all squared, $14,000,000 in cold cash. How does that condition compare with the legacy which hon. gentlemen opposite handed over to us recently? The two positions are in no way comparable, for whereas we left the finances of the country in a healthy condition, to-day they are in a deplorable state. Of course, I want to be fair to hon. gentlemen, and I must say therefore that this is partly due to the war. But the present condition is not entirely to be attributed to the war. Hon. gentlemen, if they care to do so, can get hold of the famous speech, delivered on April 28, 1915, or thereabouts, by the late lamented Sir Sam Hughes at his home town in Ontario in which he said that it was the war that had saved the Tory party. He said that when the war broke out in 1914 every available asset of the country, every cent they had, had been spent, and their credit was practically exhausted. And that was the condition in which they left the affairs of the country.

Now, if we are given the time and the opportunity we shall be able, as we did when the Liberal party was in power before, to restore the condition of happiness, contentment and prosperity that existed then amongst the farmers and the labourers. We are making a fresh start, Mr. Speaker, under severe difficulties and handicaps such as no government ever faced before, and it can hardly be expected that within a very few months after the assumption of office we can bring about the improvements that we shall introduce in time. It will take us time to pull the country out of the difficult position in which we have found it, but we shall emerge with flying colours; and a country that is now blighted with blossom into full fruition under the care of the present administration. Under the leadership of the present distinguished Prime Minister, Canada will once more enjoy the prosperity which obtained of yore.

Mr. J. D. CHAPLIN (Lincoln): In view of the oppressive atmosphere, Mr. Speaker, I hope hon. members will not expect me to follow too closely the speech made by the Solicitor General (Mr. McKenzie). He has entertained the House with a very interesting address, directed principally to hon. gentlemen from the West, on the subject of citizenship. Then he became reminiscent, took us down to the old province of Nova Scotia and told us about the great Liberal party in the old home province. He extolled, particularly for the benefit of my hon. friends on the left, the virtues of this great Liberal party, "all wool and a yard wide", and he offered them the wares which he said he had for sale. Strange to say I did not notice any eager response to buy. I might tell new members from the West that it is not the first time the hon. gentleman has put the lamp in the window—

An hon. MEMBER: And the latchstring on the door.

Mr. CHAPLIN: Yes. While he was trimming the lamp a voice came to me in an undertone, and I will tell you what it said.

> While the lamp holds out to burn,
> The vilest sinner may return.

Mr. GOULD: That was intended for us.

Mr. CHAPLIN: He put me in mind of the story of Little Red Riding Hood that we used to be told when boys at school. He lit the lamp, put the latchstring outside the door, and then—"The voice from the inside said: 'Pull the string and the latch will come up.'" But there was no response. I wonder whether hon. gentlemen recognized the voice.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I do not want to take up the time of the House discussing the question of the Ross rifle. It has already been before this House, and if there is any graft involved I can hand it back to the hon. gentleman (Mr. McKenzie), because it was during the incumbency of the Liberal government that the contract was made. He also spoke about the war wagons. Well, no better wagons were ever sent to the front than those made in Canada. Our men had to have wagons as part of their equipment, and the government would have been delinquent in its duty if it had not provided the equipment, and my hon. friend would have been the first to condemn that delinquency. He also spoke about the coal used on the Grand Trunk. But really I must ask hon. members to allow me to proceed with some of my own remarks, because, to me at least, they are more interesting than re-hashing matters that have been before this House so often and so long.

My hon. friend did pass a compliment to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) in which I am very pleased indeed to join. I wish to offer also a word of congratulation to him on the fact that during many years of service to his country he has survived all political strife and worry and has come through the strain with health unimpaired. I sincerely hope that he may be spared for many years to come to perform the work he is now doing. I regret, however, that I cannot unqualifiedly congratulate him on his budget proposals; but on the whole, speaking for myself, as far as I can judge they are not entirely unsatisfactory. That is as far as I can go. The measure of my satisfaction or dissatisfaction will very likely be in inverse ratio to the satisfaction or dissatisfaction of my hon. friends on the left.

I noticed in the speech of the Minister of Finance a very strong note of regret because the people did not accept his reciprocity treaty in 1911. The same complaint has come from others, notably from the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Stewart). These gentlemen have told us since we came to this new Parliament that we should accept defeat uncomplainingly—that we should be good sports and not complain. I should like to ask them: Why do they not take their own medicine? Why do they always complain about the action of the people in rejecting their 1911 treaty? The Minister of the Interior the other day told us: "Oh, the people of Alberta are very much in favour of reciprocity." Well, are they?

An hon. MEMBER: Sure.

Mr. CHAPLIN: Possibly they are; but I would ask that hon. gentleman if the constituency that is now represented by the Minister of the Interior is in favour of reciprocity. I think the minister had better speak for the people whom he represents. He does not represent any constituency in Alberta; he sits for another constituency, and that constituency in 1911 voted against reciprocity.

I represent a border county. The people in my county ought to know something of the benefits of reciprocity. What happened in 1911? When the reciprocity pact was put forward, twelve hundred farmers from the counties of Lincoln and Welland visited Ottawa and protested against that pact; they were told it was too late. Well, they went back home and those in the county of Lincoln elected a Conservative candidate by the largest majority that had ever been given in that county. What happened in the adjoining county of Welland? I regret that the member for Welland (Mr. German) is not in his seat, but in 1911, although he was a supporter of the then government, he voted against reciprocity, and when he went home his people were so well satisfied that they re-elected him by acclamation. Is that evidence that reciprocity is all right to-day?

While I am talking on this subject, it will be convenient for me to give the House an extract from a New York paper. This talk about reciprocity is having its effect somewhere else, and I think that that perhaps is the reason for the talk. I quote from the New York Times of Sunday last, as follows:

> Mr. Underwood declared that Canadian sentiment had changed since the popular vote rejected the Taft reciprocity treaty, and now, he said, Canadians would be glad to enter into a new pact.

I do not deny that there may be sections of this country that favour reciprocity, but I would like to see an election held on that question alone; we would then see what the result would be. It would be interesting for the Minister of Finance to confer with the member for Welland (Mr. German) and find out what his opinion is on the question of reciprocity. In 1911 the hon. member for Welland voted against the government; it would be a good idea to find out what he thinks of it now.

I wish to say a few words in respect to some of the tariff proposals. I do not intend to take up very much time in the matter, because I understand that these various questions will be discussed in committee. The first item that I wish to mention is the automobile tax. The late government tried out a number of luxury taxes. They were anxious, as everybody knows, to find means of raising money and that was one of the things they tried. Before very long they were forced to abandon those taxes, and surely wo do not want to go through that experience again. The automobile people, in my opinion, were very badly used by the late government, as it happened. When the tax was taken off there were hundreds of dealers throughout the country who had paid the excise duty on cars and had no way of getting it back from the consumer, on whom the tax properly rested. They appealed to the late government, and I understand they have made an appeal to this Government. I do not think they are going to get anything out of it; I do not see how they can, but for goodness' sake do not let us perpetrate this evil again. It may be possible to levy a special tax on the higher priced cars; I would not say I would not be in favour of that. But to tax the ordinary car is to my mind out of the question. I am opposed to any special tax on special businesses, and for that reason I also oppose the tax on ginger beer, soda water, and grape juice. These things are not luxuries. Why do you pick out one thing like grape juice and forget about ice cream, for instance? This grape juice business is something that affects my own county. I have a telegram from the farmers of my county, signed by the president of the Niagara Grape Growers. It says:

> We have asked that the ten cents a gallon tax on pure grape juice be struck off the budget proposals. It means a loss to growers of approximately $17 per ton of grapes. Tax would affect 5,000 acres of grapes in this particular district. Would suggest that it be put on imitations which are competitors of agricultural industry.

To put a tax of $17 a ton on grapes, the product in respect to which the farmers in this district have been most successful, is something I cannot understand. I would ask the minister to reconsider the matter, or, at any rate, to give us a chance to discuss it when it comes before the committee.

I have a few words to say in respect to some things that have been said by members of the House. The first that is under my hand is a statement made by the hon. member for South Huron (Mr. Black). He is reported in Hansard as having said:

> When the hon. member who spoke a few moments ago—

Referring to the hon. member for South Renfrew (Mr. Low).

> —said that 73 per cent of the produce of this country was consumed in Canada, I was almost staggered. That may be true, and I am not going to doubt the hon. gentleman's word, but I can hardly credit the fact.

I want to reaffirm that statement and to say that in 1921 the total farm production of Canada was valued at $1,396,233,000, as given in the official returns. According to the figures given by the hon. member for South Renfrew, the exports were valued at $388,000,000 odd. But I find on referring to the speech of the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Crerar) who was formerly a member of the ministry, that, according to his statement, the amount of farm produce exported was valued at $453,000,000. So there is quite a discrepancy between the amount given by the hon. member for South Renfrew and that given by the hon. member for Marquette. Where does the discrepancy come in, Mr. Speaker? What is the object of padding the returns? What object can be served by trying to make it appear that the exports of farm products are greater than they are? I am very sorry that the hon. member for Marquette is not here, but I have no doubt that some of the other hon. members of the Progressive party will have the material from which these figures were given. Let me repeat the facts: The minister from South Renfrew stated that the total export of farm products amounted to $388,000,000; the former Minister of Agriculture, the member for Marquette, gave it as $453,000,000.

Now, I have taken some trouble to find out where the discrepancy is, and I think the House would like to know something about it. I think hon. members would like to know what the object is of deceiving the House—and, Mr. Speaker, if my words get a little too strong I know that you will in all kindness tell me before I go too far. I will tell the House how it comes that the figures of agricultural exports are padded and extended so that it would appear that we are exporting more farm produce than we really are. It will surprise the House to know that in the amount of farm products exported there is included $29,000,000 for fish as a product of the farm. I wonder where the hon. member for Lunenburg (Mr. Duff) and the members from the maritime provinces are when they allow our accounts to be made up in this way. I want to read an extract from the address of the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Crerar) so that we will get on the right basis—Hansard, p. 2558:

> As I say, we exported goods to the value of $740,000,000 last year.

That is the total exports, as I understand it. He goes on:

> But where did those exports come from? Last year was a year of trade depression, a very trying year throughout the world. Of this total, vegetable products accounted for $318,000,000, and animal products $135,000,000; in other words $453,000,000 of the $740,000,000 of exports last year had their origin in the farms of Canada.

Yet I find in the total as given by the hon. member for Marquette, the not insignificant item of $29,000,000 for fish. This is the first time that I ever heard that fish came from the farms of Canada. But that is not all. Another item that comes within the figures as given by the hon. member for Marquette, for padding purposes only, is the very insignificant sum of $14,978,000 for furs, that came from as far north as the Arctic Circle and never saw a farm. They came to Montreal, Quebec, Edmonton and Winnipeg, and that is the nearest they ever got to the farms of Canada. That is another very insignificant item.

Mr. LOVETT: What is the hon. member reading from, and what is the date please?

Mr. CHAPLIN: From the Trade Reports of Canada, March, 1922.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Last Mountain): The hon. member says the figures have been padded. By whom, may I ask?

Mr. CHAPLIN: I cannot tell, but the hon. member for Marquette, having given the figures, must be responsible for them. They are not correct. I can see no other person who is going to benefit from it except the hon. member for Marquette.

Mr. CAMPBELL: I notice that the hon. member for Marquette said "Last year". I presume he meant the year 1921.

Mr. CHAPLIN: No, and to prove that the hon. member who has just spoken is entirely wrong, I have in my hand the skeleton statement which evidently was used by the hon. member for Marquette. The hon. member for Marquette has been a member of this House for many years, and has made a study of these books, as no doubt hon. members are aware, and I say that he has no business to quote from this skeleton statement when he knows that furs and fish are included there. They have no business to be taken in as the products of the farm.

Mr. BIRD: May I ask the hon. member a question?

Mr. CHAPLIN: I do not mind answering questions, but you can very readily see, Mr. Speaker, that I shall not get very far if there continue to be as many notes of interrogation, but I will let this one go.

Mr. BIRD: Do I understand the hon. member to say that the leader of the Progressive party stated that this amount of exports came from the farms?

Mr. CHAPLIN: I read his statement from Hansard.

Mr. BIRD: Will you kindly read it again?

Mr. CHAPLIN: I am not going to do that because the hon. gentleman has the Hansard himself, and I have already read it to the House.

Mr. CAMPBELL: I submit that the hon. member is not stating the figures correctly.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: The hon. member who has the floor is entitled to continue his address, and is not required to answer any questions unless he so desires and intimates. I would ask hon. members not to interrupt without his permission.

Mr. BIRD: Would the hon. member permit me to make myself clear? I understand the hon. member to say that the leader of the Progressive party claimed a total of $453,000,000. Is he aware that that is not according to the figures as given in Hansard?

Mr. CHAPLIN: For the benefit of the hon. member I will read again the statement made by the hon. member for Marquette—Hansard, page 2558:

> Of this total, vegetable products accounted for $318,000,000 and animal products $135,000,000; in other words, $453,000,000 of the $740,000,000 of exports last year had their origin in the farms of Canada

Mr. CAMPBELL: Last year, 1921.

Mr. CHAPLIN: So that there may be no misunderstanding as to what year was intended, I have here the document from the Department of Customs which gives the total exports for 1922 at $740,000,000, just as the hon. member for Marquette stated, and it gives the domestic items, the agricultural and vegetable products, agricultural and vegetable products other than foods, and animal products. So there is no doubt as to what year he meant. I hope, Mr. Speaker, they will be quiet for a moment now.

But that is not all. Not only is $29,000,000 of fish and approximately $15,000,000 of furs padded into the products of the farms of Canada, but when the hon. member also includes in the products of the farm over $5,000,000 of manufactures of leather, and harness and boots and shoes, I think it is pretty nearly the limit. I find by the records that in the figure as given by the hon. member for Marquette there is included leather, $360,000; sole leather, $1,710,518; upper leather, $2,344,024; other leather, $350,410; belting, $1,348; boots and shoes, $272,346; gloves, $9,948; harness, $34,359; other manufactures of leather, $88,584, making a total of $5,171,785. After the way hon. members have talked about boots and shoes and things of that kind, I think it is rubbing it in to pad the exports of farm products with these leather goods.

But that is not all. Notwithstanding all they have said respecting canned goods in this country, they grab the canned goods as an export of the farm and add them to the list of farm exports, and that they have done both in respect to canned fruit and canned vegetables to the extent of something like $2,000,000.

Mr. KENNEDY (Edmonton): Does the hon. member dispute the fact that canned fruits have their origin on the farms?

Mr. CHAPLIN: Would it not be foolish for anybody to dispute the fact that fruits and vegetables come from the farms of Canada; but when an article has had manufacturing work performed on it to the extent that canned goods and boots and shoes have, I think it becomes a manufactured article. If it does not, then the arguments that my hon. friends have been using for years in respect of canned goods and boots and shoes fall to the ground. I never knew that these were products of the farm. But there are many other examples.

The other night, I think it was, the member for Marquette (Mr. Crerar) delivered a tremendous tirade upon automobiles and automobile tires, and yet I find that in the matter of rubber goods, rubber and its manufactures are padded into the lists of goods represented in the figures as given by that hon. member. I will give you the items: Rubber, rubber waste, rubber belting, rubber boots and shoes, manufactured rubber products and tires to the extent of over $4,000,000. But that is not enough, Mr. Speaker. There is another article that our friends from the left have been giving us a lot of talk about and that is sugar; and yet they have taken the whole of the sugar products of Canada and shoved them into farm products. Why? Because a small quantity originates on the farm. Such a thing is unreasonable because these products amount to $11,600,000. Why they have even grabbed the exports of tea and coffee.

An Hon. MEMBER: Tea comes from the land.

Mr. CHAPLIN: Of course tea comes from the land and so does coffee. My hon. friends have also grabbed tobacco, cigarettes and cigars because they naturally come from the farm. Such an article as macaroni, was also purloined, likewise corn starch, potato starch, oil cake, linseed oil and vegetable oils; all were put into farm product. Last, but by no means least, to the astonishment of myself, and no doubt to the astonishment of all the members within the sound of my voice, they grabbed all the whisky, gin and beer that there was and incorporated them in "farm products of Canada." Now, Mr. Speaker, I submit first of all that the items that I have read, which amount to the not inconsiderable sum of over $70,000,000, when taken off the figure as given by the hon. member for Marquette, will make a very decided difference in the aggregate of the export of farm products and will cause a very great difference in the argument.

There is another feature I want to call attention to. I have made no mention of articles that might more properly be said to be articles which are no longer made on the farm but are made from materials produced from the farm. I refer especially to such things as butter, cheese, milk powder, condensed milk, milk products, and oils such as neatsfoot oil. My hon. friends have even got codliver oil, whale oil and seal oil added to their list. I want to say this also that in respect to the articles that I have just read and that I will repeat—bran and shorts, oatmeal, wheat flour, cereal foods, biscuits, vegetable oils, cheese, butter, condensed milk, and other oils—although I readily admit that they are products from the farm their value is considerably enhanced when they leave the farm and go through manufacturing processes. Now I ask in all reason and common sense why the total amount should be put to the credit of farm products when at least 50 per cent must be credited to factories. The total amount of such articles as I am referring to would reach the not inconsiderable sum of another $100,000,000; and if it is reasonable to say that one-half of that amount ought to be credited to manufactures, as it should be, then those farm products that have been exported are further reduced by another $50,000,000. That again spoils the argument of my hon. friend from Marquette, and also spoils the argument of other hon. gentlemen who have dilated at such length on the tremendous amount of our farm exports.

The truth of the matter is just as the hon. member for South Renfrew (Mr. Low) said the other day that 73 per cent —I claim 80 per cent—of the total products of the farms of Canada are consumed at home. Therefore I ask hon. members if it is the intention to do something to destroy the valuable home market that the farmers of this country enjoy? I will make this statement which I can amply prove, that more than 85 per cent of the farm products of the province of Ontario and the province of Quebec are consumed in this country; and yet what did the hon. member from Marquette say here the other night when the hon. member for Fort William and Rainy River (Mr. Manion) asked him a question about it? Oh, he said, that does not count. Does it not count, Mr. Speaker, that 75 or 80 per cent of the products of the farms of this country are consumed in Canada? If it does not I think the Canadian people would like to be informed. Now, I noticed the other night a statement made by the member from Macdonald (Mr. Lovie) as follows:

> We find that implements are sold to the Canadian farmer by the Canadian manufacturer at a profit on the cost of production and then the customs duty added to that, while at the same time the Canadian manufacturer goes to other countries and sells that same machine far cheaper than he sells it to his home consumer. In proof of this I will give you a concrete example.

I have gone through my hon. friend's speech in Hansard and failed to discover the concrete example to which he alluded. I want to submit a statement from the late Mr. Findley of the Massey Harris Company, in reference to a matter concerning their foreign trade, and, irrespective of what any man in the country who does not know the circumstances would say, I am prepared to accept Mr. Findley's statement. He prepared this statement and sent it to the board who were examining him on the question of prices. It was delivered to the board in 1920 and reads:

> My company have exported machines to practically every grain-growing country in the world for well over 30 years, and we have never during that time sold machines in foreign countries at as low prices as in Canada.

Then he gives full details as to the prices in England, France, Germany and every other country in which they are selling, and in every case it shows that the price in Canada is less than in any other country in the world, and, for my part, I am prepared to accept his word. The company of which I have the honour to be president does an export trade; we sell goods based on the cost at the factory, and it is just possible, when I relate the circumstances, that some goods may be sold at less, by the man who buys them in Liverpool, than they would be sold for in Saskatoon. That can be very well understood when I explain that I can ship three carloads of goods to Liverpool at the same price that I can send one carload to Saskatoon. I can send two carloads of goods of the same class to Liverpool at the same price that I can send one to Winnipeg, and if those goods, after they get away from me, are sold for less money, it would not be surprising, but we sell our goods at the factory at a certain price, irrespective of who buys them.

Mr. MORRISON: Under what freight classification are those goods shipped?

Mr. CHAPLIN: Fifth class freight. Most of the goods in our line are carried as fifth class freight. The hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Crerar) told us the other day that the United States would soon be a free trade country. I have not under my hand his exact words, but he ventured to predict that, within a few years, the United States will have its face set definitely against the principle of a protective tariff. I remember reading a speech of Richard Cobden, and he ventured at one time on the realm of prophesy, just as the new economist who sits in the front row did, and made a certain prophesy. In 1846 Great Britain changed her fiscal policy. Mr. Cobden speaking at Manchester in January 15th, 1846 said:

> Europe altogether has been corrupted by the vicious example of England in her commercial legislation. I believe that if you abolish the Corn Law honestly and adopt free trade in its simplicity, there will not be a tariff in Europe that will not be changed in less than five years, to follow your example.

And later on in another address he said:

> You might as well tell me that the sun will not rise to-morrow as tell me that foreign nations will not adopt free trade in less than ten years from now.

While Mr. Cobden may be as great an economist as our hon. friend from Marquette, he was a mighty poor prophet. For the benefit of the members of the House, particularly some of those on the other side who are in control of the treasury benches, I want to read a word or two from the speech delivered by Mr. Fordney, whose name we hear mentioned a good deal in this House and outside of it. I think his remarks will apply to Canada quite as well as to the United States. In an address before the House some time ago, Mr. Fordney said:

> Under free trade we must come to a common level somewhere, sometime, if we are to compete with all the countries of the world. To-day German labour is paid from 60 to 65 cent per day in gold,—not for 8 hours' work, but for 10 or 12 hours per day. Japanese and Chinese labour is paid from 12 to 18 cents per day in gold for 12 hours—about a cent or a cent and a half per hour. Now, if we have to be placed on a par with those countries, to meet the imports from those countries, do you believe that we can lift those foreign countries up from the standard of living which at present prevails in them? Not at all. We have got to come down to a common level somewhere, and we are not ready to do that, and we are not going to do that.

And yet in the face of all that, we have people in this House saying that the American people are going to do away with their tariff. Well, may be. I have a book in my hand which will be interesting to my friends on my left. It is the Farmers' platform, and I want to read an extract from it and make a few comments on it. Before reading this extract I desire to say that I heard some of the hon. members on my left trying to ease their consciences as much as they could for not voting for a protectionist tariff, and saying that their own policy was one that was going to spread over a number of years. I wish to remind those hon. members of something I saw in their platform a short time ago. It was to the effect that the principle of protection was morally wrong and economically unsound.

Some Hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. CHAPLIN: Evidently, I am not very far astray in my quotation, when I find hon. members applauding the sentiment, and I ask, if the thing is morally wrong, can they compromise it? Do they want to make a compromise for five years? Well, if they do, let them make it. Now, I want to quote from this book, and I have no doubt at all that the sentiments it contains will be applauded also. It sets out the Farmers' platform. This book is a sort of treasure now, being one of the first editions published. Hon gentlemen were very specific in those days, but finding that being specific was not altogether satisfactory, they are now dealing in glittering generalities. This book is pretty well edited; it was drafted by the Canadian Council of Agriculture. It is also endorsed by the United Farmers of Alberta, the Saskatchewan Grain Growers Association, the Manitoba Grain Growers Association, and the United Farmers of Ontario. It is issued by the Canadian Council of Agriculture of Winnipeg, and printed by the Grain Growers' Guide. It is quite obvious, therefore, that a great deal of care was bestowed upon its publication. I shall now read the following extract from it:

> As already explained, under a system of protection the consumer is compelled to pay a tax upon all imported goods that come under the tariff schedule. Upon all goods of domestic origin produced under a protective system the consumer must likewise pay a tax,—although in this case the revenue finds its way into the bank account of private individuals alone. Now, it has been estimated that the domestic trade of Canada alone is at least four times as great as the country's foreign trade, and in the United States seven times as great. It follows that for every dollar collected by way of customs dues at least $4 are paid to private individuals. When one considers that the customs revenue for the year ending March 31st, 1916, was $133,000,000, and that four times that sum was paid in addition to the protected interests, it will be seen what a crushing weight is laid upon the country's consumers.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. CHAPLIN: The applause that greets the reading of this extract convinces me that there are some, at least, in the party to the left of us in this House that have not gone back on their previous party professions, but still believe in their policy.

[Mr. Chaplin.]

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. CHAPLIN: It is refreshing to know that there are some people who live up to what they formerly preached. Now, hon. members to my left are reasonable men and I want to discuss this matter with them. Before I proceed I want to refer to a slight error in this book. Whoever edited it gave the customs revenue of Canada for 1916—the figures are as at the 31st of March of that year—as $133,000,000. Now, I am used to figuring myself, and I carefully checked this up. I find that there is a mistake of only $30,000,000 in this statement. Thirty million dollars, that is all! With all the editing to which the book has been subjected, and the endorsation it has received at the hands of the various bodies I have cited who are responsible for it, there is a mistake of $30,000,000. Of course, that is not much, but it is multiplied by four, and I think that hon. gentlemen will admit that that makes no inconsiderable sum.

If the claim is correct that under a protective tariff, all the articles that pass through the customs pay duty, and as well on similar goods produced within the country, the purchasers pay four times as much as they should to some one else, then I want hon. gentlemen to give me their judgment on some of the articles I shall mention: The first article I find in the customs schedule under (a), is "animals", the duty collected being $110,000. Now I want to know from hon. gentlemen in this House whether the duty has been plundered on all the cattle raised in this country. If so, who got the money? You will see from the very first line in this list how foolish is the argument that is put forth. It is not only foolish but false as well. I took the year 1916 because it was the year in which the revenue is given by this book as $133,000,000, when it should be only $103,000,000. Now, item 3 in this list is $4,000,000 collected on coal. Do hon. gentlemen from the West mean to tell the people of Nova Scotia and of Alberta that because we collected a duty on coal coming into Canada, therefore, on every ton of coal consumed in Canada there was a duty collected? That is the argument that is used. Let me give another item. Let us take hay. How much do hon. members think was plundered on hay?—because "plunder" is the word that is used.

Mr. HOEY: How much hay came in that year?

Mr. CHAPLIN: The duty collected that year was $19,000. I am not being personal in these references, but the argument that is used in this book is that a duty is collected on goods produced in this country of a similar character to the dutiable goods imported. Let us take another item, potatoes. I might say here that I gave some of these figures once before, and the hon. member for Victoria and Carleton (Mr. Caldwell) demolished my whole argument by saying that the member for Lincoln ought to know that there is no duty on potatoes. I had not a chance to reply at the time, but I want to say now that in 1916 we collected about $1,000,000 of a duty on potatoes. I am not sure of this figure, but I think it is approximately right. I figured out for the benefit of my friends that, taking their argument as a basis, we had grown on our farms and sold to the consumers of this country, according to the trade returns of that year, in the neighbourhood of 79,000,000 bushels of potatoes. Now, if your argument is worth anything at all it simply means that somebody collected $15,000,000 on potatoes. And I should like to know which of you got that money. The not inconsiderable sum of $676,000 was collected on vegetables. Now, according to the arguments contained in this book every one who bought potatoes and vegetables helped to pay that extra duty. Well, who got the money?

Mr. WARNER: Is the hon. gentleman aware that potatoes might rot at one end of Canada because the railroad freight would be so high that it would not pay to ship them to the other end?

Mr. CHAPLIN: I do not see what that has to do with who got the duty on the goods that were actually sold. I am taking the farmers' own argument. They do not make any objection such as you speak about when we have agricultural machinery or tools lying in store. I am only taking their own argument as it is; I do not believe it.

Mr. WARNER: But you admit it.

Mr. CHAPLIN: I do not believe it, and I am showing how false it is. It seems to me that when hon. members are quoting figures they should be more particular, because I find—

Mr. MORRISON: The hon. gentleman quoted freight rates to Liverpool to Winnipeg and Saskatoon. Is it not a fact that on manufactured products for export better rates are allowed than on such products shipped to points within Canada?

Mr. CHAPLIN: Mr. Speaker, when we are shipping our goods to Liverpool we pay the same rail rates to Montreal from an inland factory as we would on carload shipments to Montreal. Does that answer my hon. friend's question?

Mr. MORRISON: I was informed to-day that manufacturers are allowed better freight rates on export shipments than they are on local shipments. Is that right?

Mr. CHAPLIN: That is possibly right in respect to the long haul over Canadian railways to Halifax and St. John where there are shorter hauls from a United States market. We, likely with all others when it is necessary, get a seaboard rate to our Atlantic ports as low as if we were shipping to Portland, Boston or Philadelphia. Does that answer my hon. friend?

Mr. MORRISON: That is satisfactory.

Mr. CHAPLIN: I was saying when I was interrupted that hon. members should be more careful in their statements regarding duties. I am talking now in all kindness, I am not angry, and I want to say to you that in this book you give the customs returns as $133,000,000. I do not know why they were padded, but they were. It may be a clerical error, I am broad enough to assume that such may be the case, but when you multiply it by four it looks pretty bad. Then another point: Why do you always treat the import duties as if they were on manufactured goods? As a matter of fact, in that particular year which you take in your book, 1916, over $30,000,000 of duties did not apply to manufactures at all. You made a mistake to that extent.

Mr. WARNER: Was not that on the raw material?

Mr. CHAPLIN: It was not on raw material. It does not make any difference what it was on. I make the broad statement that $30,000,000 was collected for duty that did not apply to manufactures at all. Some of that duty was on hay—for which I have given the figures—some on coal, and so on. But what have we got to do with the duty on those commodities? I could give the hundred or so articles in this list, but I do not want to weary the House. I submit that people are too prone to make statements that they cannot back up. For instance, I heard the hon. member from Kindersley, I think it is (Mr. Carmichael) declare he was a schoolmaster and would like to put figures on a blackboard, because he was great at figures and could explain everything on a blackboard. What happened? Metaphorically speaking, the first figure he put on the blackboard was that it cost the Dominion 50 per cent to collect its customs tax! Now, if that is an example of our teaching the sooner we mend our ways the better.

The other night an hon. gentleman complained about the relative prices of a kodak at Ottawa and at Niagara Falls, New York. I am not sure of the comparative figures he gave, but my recollection is that they were $14 and $27. Let us assume those figures. The duty is 25 per cent, and at the full retail price it would not be more than $3.50; the expense of bringing the kodak to Ottawa would not be more than 25 cents, bringing the $14 up to about $18. That is $18 as against $27. Where did the $9 go? Surely, you do not put that upon the manufacturer? You cannot blame that on the tariff. I am only mentioning it so you can be reasonable.

Now, I want to get back to the budget itself. Although I have not been in the House for very many sessions, I have had some experience of politics and of political pledges. I want to read and emphasize something that is on Hansard; I want to give it again because I would like the people to know something about broken pledges. It is from a speech delivered by Mr. J. Irael Tarte on April 20, 1903, in which he said:

> I say it openly, I say it from the bottom of my heart, that I fully expected that the Liberal party, with which I have been connected during the last ten years, would carry out the policy it was understood in 1896 they would carry out. I am weighing my words. I know what arrangement, what understanding took place between some public men. I know what took place. I do not divulge any secrets. I know what we did in the election of 1896 in Montreal. I see within the radius of my eye public men who, at our request, came to the city of Montreal, went to the manufacturers, with the knowledge of the leaders of the party, and told them not only would the tariff not be disturbed, but it would be changed in the right direction when the proper time came. There was no secret about that. I shall not give names. There are men who hear me—I am sorry there are not more on those benches—who know that I am perfectly right. I am out of office because I could not stay in office under the present circumstances. I have had only pleasant relations with most of my colleagues and have for the most of them the greatest respect. But I could not possibly stay in office when I knew that the policy we are following now is not the right policy—when I knew what understanding took place formerly.

I ask the House cannot history repeat itself? Is it not likely that something of the kind mentioned here has been done more recently? Did something of the same kind happen in Montreal in the last election? I leave the question with you, Mr. Speaker. I thank hon. members for giving me such a kind hearing.

Mr. ROBERT GARDINER (Medicine Hat): Mr. Speaker, I desire for a short time indeed to discuss the question of the budget and the tariff schedules contained therein. I quite realize that this debate has been proceeding for quite a considerable time. I propose, therefore, to make my remarks very clear and to the point and to be as brief as possible.

The real reason why I desire to speak this evening is to define my position so far as the budget is concerned. I would like the House to understand that I was elected on the Farmers' platform known as the New National Policy. It might be interesting to the House to know just how this platform came into existence. We all realize that the platforms of the two political parties that sit in this House other than the Progressives were brought into existence by a comparatively few men who controlled their particular party. But our platform came into being in a somewhat different manner. Various resolutions had been passed by farmers' organizations all over Canada, and in 1916 the Council of Agriculture, realizing the importance of many of these resolutions, picked out what they considered the most important ones, codified them and placed them in the form of a platform, known as the Farmers' platform. This platform in turn was placed before all the annual conventions of farmers' organizations for their endorsation or rejection; with some slight modifications it was accepted by practically all the farmers' organizations throughout the length and breadth of Canada, and it became then known, as I have said, as the New National Policy.

I want to tell the House fairly and squarely that I believe in that platform; I stand four-square by all that it contains. I believed in it when it was first brought into existence. I believed in it when I was nominated to contest a by-election in the constituency of Medicine Hat last year; I ran on that platform and the electors endorsed it to the extent of giving me a majority of nearly 10,000 votes. My personality had nothing to do with the winning of that election; what the people were standing for was this platform which I am placing before you this evening. On it that election was fought and won. In the election of December 6 last I stood upon the same platform and was returned with practically three times the number of votes the Liberals and Conservatives polled.

Now, I want to deal for a few moments this evening with some of the contents of that platform. The member for East Calgary (Mr. Irvine) two evenings ago placed the fiscal plank of this platform on Hansard. If I do not mention every part of it so far as fiscal policy is concerned, the House must not think that I am trying to get away from it; I want to say as distinctly as I can that I accept the whole of the fiscal policy as contained in it. But in order to save time I propose to deal with just a few of the principles therein set forth.

The first part of the platform to which I would like to call attention and which I hope to see put into effect some day is the first section:

> By an immediate and substantial all-round reduction of the customs tariff.

We have a tariff in this country which, I believe, is far in excess of what it should be. I am not one of those who would like to see industry destroyed; I believe we need industry just as we need agriculture. But I do believe that most of the industries that benefit through the present fiscal policy could stand a substantial all-round reduction in the tariff and not be any the worse for it.

The next part of the platform deals with the British preference, and here again I want to say that I accept that in toto. We ask that the British preference be brought up to 50 per cent of the general tariff and that gradual or equal reductions be made each year until in five years we have free trade with Great Britain. I believe that that would be sound policy for this country to follow, because I think we should carry on as much trade with Great Britain as we possibly can.

There are other portions of this platform that I would like to mention. We believe in placing all foodstuffs on the free list, and I would point out to the House that if there are any foodstuffs that are now taxed when they enter Canada, it was never by the consent of the farming population that I know of, for we stand for free foodstuffs.

We also would favour the admission free of duty of the machinery that is necessary to apply to the natural resources of this country in order that wealth may be produced; also the raw materials that enter into the manufacture of any machinery of that description that is made in Canada. I certainly believe the policy of this country should be to develop our natural resources to the greatest possible extent, and to the extent that we do develop them we shall become just that much more prosperous. We therefore submit that it would be good policy for this Government to see that no impediment is put in the way of developing our natural resources such as a tariff on the machinery of production which is essential for the development of those resources.

The hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Crerar) made a statement in his address the other day to the effect that it was not desirable to put this policy into effect all at once. That means that he thought it was advisable to give industry a reasonable opportunity to accommodate itself to these proposed new conditions. We have made provision for that in our platform to this extent, that every claim for tariff protection by any industry should be heard publicly before a special committee of Parliament. We have many special committees of Parliament now gathering information on special subjects, and that is a good policy, for I believe the House should at all times have all the information before it that can be made available to guide it in its deliberations. So with the question of the tariff, I believe we should have a special committee responsible to this House to sit and inquire into tariff questions, and if any industry desires to have any protection whatever they should lay their claim before that committee. In that way this House would get real information that would enable us to discuss the budget intelligently.

I would remind hon. members of the fact that we have had tariff commissions in this country galore. We had one a year ago last fall, and I noticed by a return that was brought down the other day that it cost the country between $17,000 and $18,000. We all remember that this commission sat from coast to coast but so far as I am concerned I have never seen any of the information that it gathered. I do not know whether any other hon. member of the House ever got hold of any of that information, but if they did, it is news to me. I submit that inasmuch as this country has spent that amount of money in collecting that information, it should be made available to hon. members so that we can make use of it when discussing the budget.

I should like to make an observation or two as to the effects of the tariff in some respects. I sincerely believe that the tariff is a medium through which the few exploit the many in this country. It is very unfortunate that it is so, but, nevertheless, all the evidence that I have ever been able to get hold of points to the fact that the tariff does give the few an opportunity to exploit the many.

There is another peculiar thing about the tariff. The tariff increases prices, but it does not increase values. To illustrate that I will take an article of food that is used on practically every table in this country, a loaf of bread. The contents of a loaf of bread come into this country practically free at the present time. If we admit that those ingredients come in free, and that after they have been turned into a loaf of bread, that loaf is worth say ten cents over the store counter, we will admit that that loaf of bread is being sold around its actual value; but assume for a moment that we put a tax on the ingredients that enter into a loaf of bread, and after we have computed the cost of that loaf we find that it sells, say for 12½ cents, instead of 10 cents. You can readily understand that in that case the loaf of bread has been increased in price, but it has not been increased in real or actual value, because no matter what its price may be, a loaf of bread can only sustain a person for a certain length of time. That is an illustration of how the price of commodities is increased by the tariff while the value remains the same.

In the early part of my remarks I made the statement that I would like to see the tariff reduced very considerably. I do not like to make any suggestions unless they are more or less of a constructive nature. We understand, of course, that if we had a lower tariff we would lose no doubt a substantial amount of revenue, and in order to provide against that loss we have suggested in our platform certain methods of making up for it. First, we propose a tax on unimproved land values and natural resources. This question was dealt with very fully the other day by the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Good), and therefore I do not intend to take time in going over it again.

Our next suggestion is a sharply graduated inheritance tax, and I submit that that is a very good field of operation for the Minister of Finance if he desires to get extra revenue. We have in this country, as in all other countries, many large fortunes but if hon. members will just sit down and calmly contemplate for a moment how these fortunes are made, and how reasonable it would be for the Finance Minister to place a substantial tax on large fortunes, I think most of us would agree to the principle. Taking the statistics as a whole, and estimating the productive capacity of the average man for a certain number of years, I think every member of the House will agree that it is practically impossible for any man to produce real wealth to the extent of a million dollars in the average lifetime. When we realize that that is almost an impossibility, and that we have many men in this country who are worth far more than that sum, we must realize that they have been privileged by law to acquire something that they did not produce. Consequently, when we suggest the possibilities of an inheritance tax, we maintain that the state is justified in taking from the estate of a person after he has finished with it a substantial portion of that which, by law, he has been allowed to acquire but which he did not produce.

The hon. member for Regina (Mr. Motherwell) last evening brought before us another suggestion with regard to taxation, and while I must distinctly let the House understand that this particular item is not in our platform, yet, personally, I believe it is a good idea—I refer to the excise tax placed on manufactured goods in this country that enjoy a protective tariff. I believe that perhaps a lot of the hard feeling in so far as the tariff is concerned, would be removed if our people felt that their money was going into the Dominion treasury; and the Finance Minister might at least try, in the near future, and see if he could not do something along those lines.

Now I am going to discuss the budget for a few moments. I shall only occupy a short time because the hour is getting late and I do not want to unduly detain the House. The first item I desire to discuss is the sales tax. I regret very much that the Finance Minister has seen fit to increase the sales tax. As a matter of fact, I do not believe in the sales tax in any form whatever, not even at the rate that was in force last year. The reason I do not believe in it, is because of the fact that the sales tax is a direct tax on consumers, and it violates all the principles of taxation—that is to say that taxation should be levied on those best able to bear it. The sales tax is based on the needs of the people and not upon their ability to pay, and when that is the case such a tax is more or less vicious.

As to the one per cent tax on bank circulation, I wish to direct attention to some very pertinent things and I am sorry the Finance Minister is not in his seat at the present time. The Finance Minister proposes to place a tax of one per cent on bank circulation, and I believe that he is, perhaps, starting in the right way provided he can be assured that the banks will not pass this one per cent on to their customers. What I mean by that is this: If the banks are permitted to add that additional one per cent to their interest charges, they will suffer no loss, and they will be contributing nothing to the revenue of the country; the people who do business with the banks will be the ones who will have to pay the piper. I would like to read for the information of the House section 91 of the Bank Act which deals with the interest that banks are allowed to charge. This is section 91:

> The bank may stipulate for, take, reserve or exact any rate of interest or discount not exceeding, seven per centum per annum, and may receive and take in advance, any such rate, but no higher rate of interest shall be recoverable by the bank.

That is distinctly, I believe, an understanding, in so far as this section is concerned, that the banks shall charge no higher rate than 7 per cent. Now, if the Finance Minister desires any evidence I am quite prepared to produce bushels of old notes to show that the banks have been charging interest rates of 9 and 10 per cent, and in some instances a higher figure, in violation of this particular section of the act. Therefore, if no curb is placed upon the banks there is nothing whatever to prevent them from adding this one per cent tax on circulation to the accounts of their customers. The banks have received some very extra privileges in return for which they are supposed to give certain services.

I am going to bring a case before the House to show that the banks are not, so far as I can understand, living up to their contract in the matter of service. I hold in my hand an auditor's financial statement and annual return of municipality No. 302, which is in the province of Alberta, for the year 1921. In this statement there are assets and liabilities columns. The liabilities column shows that the municipality's assets over liabilities amount to $39,327.30—that is to say that they have assets to that amount over liabilities. On the other hand I notice that their debt to the bank amounts to $2,200 for a school loan for the purpose of keeping the schools in the municipality running. That is all that they owe the bank. This municipality, in order to finance the schools in the nine townships contained in the municipal district, went to the bank and asked for a line of credit of $6,000 for school purposes. The bank turned them down, and has not up the present time, so far as I know, given that municipality any line of credit for school purposes, or for any other purpose. In view of the fact that this municipality has assets of close upon $40,000 over liabilities, and that on December 31, 1921, it only owed the bank $2,200, I maintain that the bank, bearing in mind the privileges that this Parliament has conferred upon it, is not doing its duty in refraining from financing that particular school system.

There is just one other matter I wish to deal with for a moment and that is unemployment. This question has received some slight attention here but it is not being given the attention it should receive. We all realize that unemployment is very rife in Canada at the present time; and I merely want to suggest to the Government that in view of the possibility of the situation being somewhat serious, they take steps to see to it that a programme is outlined whereby next winter the services of the men who are unemployed will be utilized in some proper manner in connection with development work required in this country. During the last winter the unemployed were living on doles contributed to by the federal and provincial governments and the municipalities, but I maintain, Sir, that the only way to approach this question of unemployment is to look ahead and see if we cannot provide some useful work, or works, that are necessary to the country so that these men may make a living without being pauperized by the acceptance of doles.

In conclusion I wish to say that I cannot see that the budget in any way meets the views that I hold with regard to the tariff question, and because of that fact I am afraid that I will have to vote against it. I happen to belong to a farmers organization in Alberta whose motto is equity, and this budget, in my opinion cannot be held to be equitable at all. Furthermore, our slogan in Alberta is "Equal rights to all and special privileges to none." Consequently, for the reasons which I have given, I am afraid that I cannot support the budget.

Mr. E. A. LAPIERRE (Nipissing): I wish to preface the few remarks I have to make this evening by complimenting the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) upon the admirable budget he has given this country in one of its most trying moments. All the speakers who have preceded me have been of one opinion, that Canada in its present financial condition must get revenue and that the national debt of Canada must be reduced. It has been my privilege to be associated with a class of business that has, in past years, had to bear a large share of taxation, and that class has accepted, with admirable patience, the burden that has been imposed upon it by the conditions created by the war. We have heard a lot about organized labour. We have heard the critical arguments of our Progressive friends on this budget. I wish to speak this evening for a class to whom no one has yet referred, and that class is the large and unorganized body of wage-earners of Canada.

Under our complex social system there has arisen in Canada, during the last ten or fifteen years, a class of people that has contributed more to the financial, social and moral development of our country, and has accepted with more patience and resignation the burden of citizenship, than any other. I am referring to what is ordinarily called the middle class, in a great measure the clerks, the bookkeepers, commercial travellers, and office assistants. That class has supported, to a large extent, the retail business of Canada which, at the present instant, depends upon such a budget as that elaborated by the Minister of Finance to regain that prosperity which Canada once enjoyed. My Progressive friends have told us what a great burden they had to bear under the taxation that is imposed all over Canada. If they look back to 1917 they will remember that we, of the Liberal party, condemned and criticized the government which was responsible for the national debt which bears so heavily on Canada to-day.

In 1917, the great leader of the Liberal party, at an age when men are seeking comfort and rest, undertook, against the advice of his friends, a political tour of the west. It was my good fortune to have travelled with him on that occasion from North Bay to Sudbury. With all the enthusiasm of youth, and with the utmost confidence in our great West, he undertook that long and tiresome journey, confident of its results, feeling and knowing that the people of the West, to the development of whose country he had contributed so much, would grant him an enthusiastic welcome. It was my sad privilege to announce to him in Sudbury, on his return trip, the disappointing news that, from the Great Lakes to the Pacific coast, they had returned but two Liberal candidates. Under these conditions, our farmer friends in large measure upheld the government that burdened us with taxation. In 1917, we experienced Union government rule. The large debt, and extravagant expenditure of that government, should have been a warning to our Progressive friends. Our great leader, on his western tour, uttered the warning, which fell on deaf ears, that under such a government there must be a day of reckoning.

Now, Mr. Speaker, after three years of Union government that day of reckoning has arrived. The country faces one of the most embarrassing and critical situations that ever a nation of the size of Canada encountered. We have a national debt of very large proportions, and as we listen to the speakers in this House, we cannot help realizing to what a dangerous extent we may go, if we do not curtail our expenditures. We must in the future balance our budget as between revenue and expenditure. This taxation cannot be borne by any one section of the country. Our relations are so closely interwoven at the present time that this burden must be equally distributed. Too long the class to which I have referred have borne the burden. The time has arrived when this great middle class, the backbone of the nation, the class that supplied cheerfully the men who put Canada on the map, is looking to other classes of society, and asking that they, themselves shall have a higher standard of living. This class has never joined the union, and never gone on strike. They walk to their places of business in the morning and fill our churches on the Sabbath. They have cheerfully accepted the responsibilities of citizenship. Under existing conditions, we cannot return to normality until the wheels of industry are put in motion. Our country is suffering to-day from lack of confidence, and the curtailment of industrial activity. It was, in a large measure, the policy of the Union government that created the feeling of distrust, which brought on the first period of business depression. It was by their extravagance and their lack of vision that this condition was created. If such is the case, are we not justified in asking, at least, a more loyal support from everybody in this House. The wheels of industry will never move normally until the purchasing power of the people is restored, and that purchasing power will never be restored until the unemployed portion of our population has resumed its labours. The wheels of industry will assist in creating a purchasing power in Canada for the products of the agricultural classes.

The hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Chaplin) stated that 85 per cent of the agricultural products of Ontario and Quebec were consumed in Canada. If such is the case, how can we hope to have prosperity in agriculture in these two provinces, when the industrial classes cannot go back to work? Under these conditions would it be wise to interfere with the tariff and create distrust in the industrial world? By adjusting the budget to meet the conditions that exist, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) was only carrying out the good Liberal policy of suiting the tariff to the financial exigencies of the country. How else can we have prosperity if we do not maintain the balance between agriculture and industry? The two, co-operative, will in my opinion work out our salvation, and I repeat that the budget submitted by the present Minister of Finance is the only hopeful sign that has appeared on the horizon during the last five years. Speaking for the large middle class of Canada who will bear the extra burden imposed by the sales tax, I think I can safely say that there will be no serious objection on the part of any one, because it is the duty of every citizen in this Dominion to assume his fair share of taxation.

There is another very serious condition in the country. It has often been said in this House that the retail trade of Canada was to a certain extent responsible for the failure to bring down the cost of living. Now, the retail trade in this country is one of the most competitive businesses that we have. As things are to-day, it has to purchase goods long before the season opens, and sometimes to carry them into the following season. So that with the constant changes and vagaries of style and fashion the retail merchants are forced to bear large losses when their stock cannot be disposed of because their goods are out of style. The retail merchant has also to compete with his neighbour who sometimes through lack of sufficient capital to carry on is compelled to dispose of his goods at a loss. Furthermore, our retailers have had to compete with large departmental stores, and it is safe to say that failures in the retail business in Canada have been more numerous than in any other line of business. Now, I want to say this, that the retail merchants in this country constitute one of the most useful classes of society. If you look at the newer parts of the country, especially New Ontario where I have spent most of my life, you will find that in the early days the retail merchant not only supplied all the necessaries to the newcomer and the settler, but was also his banker. This class of the community, therefore, has contributed a great deal to the development of this Dominion, and that being the case I ask whether it is not just, in the re-arrangement of the tariff, that they should be fully considered. Is it not fair that they should receive consideration the same as the farmer, the manufacturer and organized labour? Society owes to that class, I think, a greater gratitude than to any other section of the community, and it is largely on their behalf that I make this appeal this evening.

Mr. H. E. SPENCER (Battle River): I do not wish at this late hour to detain the House, but I do not think I would be doing my duty to my constituency if I did not place before hon. members certain facts and figures as I see them in regard to the budget. I wish to ally myself with the numerous speakers who have preceded me in congratulations to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) on his being able at the age of 73 to present his sixteenth budget. In part of that budget I sincerely concur, but with a large part of it I am sorry to say I cannot agree. During the evening we had quite an interesting speech from the Solicitor-General (Mr. McKenzie), who gave the House more or less of a lecture in regard to the position of public men in this country. He deprecated the fact that so many people to-day did not give our public men credit for what they were doing. I would just say in passing that if there is any fault to be found in the fact that our public men are not appreciated as fully as they should be, it is largely due to the criticism which the public men themselves indulge in at the expense of one another. After the picture which the hon. member drew to-night of the House that Toryism had built, I do not think that any of us who took him at his word, can think a great deal of the public men on the Opposition side. And if we follow up the criticisms that have from time to time been launched at the Government by the leader of the Opposition (Mr. Meighen) and his associates, we cannot think much of the public men of the Government side. I say therefore that if there is any criticism in the country of the public men of Canada it is due to the harsh and very often untrue criticisms that are launched across the floor of the House from side to side between the Government and the Opposition of the day.

I had thought, and at one time I believed, that if the Minister of Finance had had his own way there would have been a vast difference between his budget and that of his predecessor. But he had to consider his colleagues in the Cabinet. They necessarily were the censors, and no doubt the budget is a true mirror of their feelings. But after his statement to the House yesterday that he himself has never been a believer in the Liberal platform adopted in 1919, I am not at all surprised that the budget has been brought down in its present shape.

I should like to place before the House conditions in Canada as I see them, and then touch on the reasons why in my opinion we have such conditions, and suggest a possible remedy. We have a country of unbounded natural resources, and we are a people of tremendous producing capacity, with enormous real credit, but, at the present time, with a shortness of financial credit. That being the case, the purchasing power of a great portion of our people is gone. That is one reason why we hear so much about the need for foreign markets at this time. The purchasing power of the people having gone, the home market has gone also, the wheels of industry are slowing down, unemployment is rife, agriculture is unprofitible, and immigration is reduced. I find that since 1918 the banks have closed no less than 214 branches. At the same time we are informed that the richest man in the world is the Canadian. The reason given for this is because we are now worth per capita no less than $225, while before the war our capital per head was only $55. This, of course, in itself is very misleading, because if you take $1,000,000 and divide it between ten men, each man is fairly well off; but if you give the major portion of the $1,000,000 to one man, the other nine may be close to the verge of want.

[Mr. Spencer.]

In 1920 we had no less than 285 strikes and lockouts, or a loss to this country of 886,754 working days—a staggering loss. The allaying of this unrest calls for the greatest statemanship from all sides of the House. We know full well from what we have heard during this session that there is a group of hon. members sitting to my right who believe that the best way of settling strikes and lockouts is by force—by the use of the military or the police. At the same time I am glad to say there is a growing feeling throughout the country that these troubles should be treated differently, that we should first of all find out the cause and then remove it.

It is only three or four years ago that we passed through the greatest war in the history of the world. We were told that we were fighting for democracy, and for better conditions. Well, the people are now wondering why they have not been led into the promised land of prosperity. For the benefit of hon. members I propose to quote from a speech made by Mr. W. Bell, an associate of the Royal Institute of British Architects, delivered before the Rotary Club of Wakefield, England. Mr. Bell said in part:

> The fallacy lay in the fact that the majority had overlooked the circumstance that England and the United States of America together as a consequence of the war-time expansion of plant, had become capable of producing at least 50 per cent more rapidly than in 1914. At the same time, however, the area of distribution had shrunk considerably because central Europe and Russia (not to mention other countries) were out of the market. Now a 50 per cent increased capacity for production, coupled with, say a 25 per cent reduced area of distribution, inevitably results in "slump". The obvious deduction, if the above premises be accepted, is that production is not essentially at fault, but distribution. For our warehouses are more or less bulging from garret to cellar with goods that cannot be distributed because there is not sufficient Purchasing Power in the hands of those who need the goods. . . . .
> It is well known that for 1921 thousands of industrial concerns paid no dividends whatever, and that many actually worked at a loss on the year's operations. Side by side with this failure of the Producers to pay their way is the fact that the Banks paid their usual dividends for the year. The "Big Five" amongst them made a declared profit of £11,000,000 during 1921, the year of the Great Slump, and this significant sign-post points the way whither the profits go, both in Slump and Boom.
> Thus while Capital rails at Labour, and Labour in turn curses Capital, the other dog, Finance, runs off with the bone for which the two active partners in Industry are contending. The logical inference is that the "Big Five" is the most pernicious Trade Union in existence to-day working in the interests of International Finance. For Trusts, Combines, and Rings are, after all, merely trade unions for maintaining high profits, and consequently high prices. Yet those who affect to support trusts and their kindred are often loud in their "belief" that competition is the life of trade; when all the time they know that Trusts aim at Monopoly, which is the antithesis of Competition. . . .

Now the real business of any sound financial system is to deliver the right goods and services to the right users; so that the present private financing of public production is doomed because it is failing utterly to deliver the goods.

It may be interesting, Mr. Speaker, to state the amount of capital invested in two of our greatest industries—agriculture and manufactures. We have spent millions upon millions of dollars in trying to bolster up our manufacturing industry. Taking 1919, I find that the capital invested in agriculture amounted to $7,379,299,000, and the production amounted to $2,135,043,000. The capital invested in manufacturing amounted to $3,230,686,368, and the production amounted to $3,520,724,039.

Now, we have heard a great deal about the necessity of securing foreign markets for our surplus goods, not recognizing for a moment the huge market we have at home if it was only developed. In this connection I shall again quote from Mr. Bell's speech as follows:

But the reason for this persistent desire to concentrate attention on the foreign markets is not far to seek. For so long as credit is controlled by private individuals for personal profit, instead of by the community, for the public good of the home consumer, so long must the financier look to foreign markets for an outlet for the goods the manufacture of which he controls.

Unless some scientific scheme of credit reform is adopted, whereby credit shall be taken out of private hands and restored to its rightful owners, the community, there can be no permanent return even to the 1914 conditions. Indeed, the more unemployment increases the sooner the next war will be upon us; and until the root, credit, of the industrial problem is tackled, the great industrial people will flounder out of one war into another, with ever increasing velocity.

I shall leave these few words with you, Mr. Speaker, because I think that sufficient attention has not been given to this most important subject of credit.

The figures that I have given in regard to the amount of capital invested in these two great industries show rather striking results as to the wealth being produced and as to the failure of one and the success of the other. I find, looking at the income tax returns, that in 1920 the farmers were able to pay on income tax only the amount of $525,836, while the manufacturers were able to pay no less than $2,551,503. The following year agriculture was able to pay about $100,000 more, while the manufacturers were able to pay upwards of $6,000,000 more, or no less than $8,217,730. I would like to point out here that although the manufacturers had only half as much invested as the farmers, they were able to pay fourteen times as much as the farmers in income tax. In a leading article in one of the Montreal newspapers the other day, I noticed that these figures were referred to, and the editor suggested that in all probability the farmers had been dodging. Now, if the farmers had been dodging it means that they were carrying on an industry that was paying, and I do not think you will ever find any one running away from a paying business. The very fact that the people who are interested in agriculture and who are carrying on that calling are leaving the land, have been leaving it for the last ten or fifteen years and are leaving it faster than ever to-day, is proof that they are not in a position to pay income tax. If they were, they would certainly stay on the land, because income tax would not touch them until they got the means whereby they could live.

I am going to ask the patience of the House for a few moments while I give the prices for some agricultural products and some of the figures bearing upon the cost of selling them. I have here the shipping bills with respect to three cars of wheat. These three cars from central Alberta brought $4,163, but the cost of hauling, threshing, freight and commission amounted to nearly 50 per cent of that amount, without making any allowance for the cost of production of the grain. I have also a shipping bill with reference to a car of barley, No. 1 grade, which brought the farmer $743, but the overhead expenses on which—threshing, hauling, freight and commission—amounted to the large sum of $546. One can easily see how in both these instances it did not pay to raise the grain. I have here also a rather interesting voucher in regard to a car of cattle that was shipped to the Edmonton market. The price received was not as high as some have brought, but it was higher than others. This car was sold about two months ago, and after paying freight and sundry commissions and overhead expenses the amount realized was $14 a head—enough to buy two pairs of shoes. The hides of these cattle were sold with them! when they are not so sold, what happens is this? Here is a copy of a bill from a butcher in Saskatchewan with respect to two hides: weight, 62 pounds; tare off, 6 pounds; balance, 56 pounds at 3½ cents a pound, $1.95; freight, 90 cents; balance due to the producer, $1.05. There was sufficient leather in those hides to make no less than 72 pairs of boots. I am sorry that the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Baxter) is not in his place, because I know he has shed some political tears in regard to boot manufacturing; he has asked from time to time for tariff protection for the boot and shoe industry.

Last fall when I was going over the constituency I now represent I came across a quantity of sheep pelts on each of which there was enough wool to make a suit of clothes. The only sale for those pelts was at the price of 35 cents; it would cost the farmer that amount to get them to market, so he simply threw them away or gave them to his neighbours to dispose of them as they saw fit. And yet some people wonder why the farmers ask for freer trade and ask that some protection be taken off the manufacturer who is charging an extra price for his goods. I notice that the boot industry has been enjoying a 30 per cent protection. Some hon. members have suggested that this protection is necessary because of the high rate of wages, but I find that the average wage paid to men working in a boot and shoe factory is only $715. That does not look as if the boot manufacturers needed a protective tariff owing to the high rate of wages. The producer of raw material, the hides, is getting next to nothing for his product, while the consumers have to pay, as I said, in some cases half as much as the total value of the animals for their boots. Yet all the relief afforded by this budget is the small amount of 2½ per cent.

I have here a voucher which is also very interesting; it is in regard to wool. The member for Battleford (Mr. McConica) when he was speaking some days ago, made reference to the wool business, and I think some hon. members thought he was drawing a rather long bow. I will show you as a wool grower that he was doing nothing of the sort. This statement which I have before me relates to some wool that was sent from the farm. It averaged 13 cents a pound, but after the overhead costs were paid it brought to the producer of the wool no more than 5 cents a pound. So not counting for shearing, packing, and hauling to market, one can readily understand that at that rate it would be necessary for a farmer to shear about ninety sheep for nothing, pack the wool for nothing, haul it to market for nothing, and after he had sold it, if he got that price, he would have enough money to buy a suit of clothes! Is it any wonder that the consumer is complaining? Is it any wonder that the producer is complaining? Yet what do we find in regard to the protection that the woollen industry is receiving? What relief has the Finance Minister given the people in that respect? We find that clothing has had a protection of from 27½ to 35 per cent. If there is any country in the world where the people should have a plentiful supply of woollen goods it is Canada, but on account of the protective tariff which enables the manufacturer to put up the price of goods to the extent he does, very few people can afford to buy the quantity of clothing they really need.

Mr. MALCOLM: Does the hon. gentleman imply that the clothing manufacturers of Canada are taking advantage of the full amount of duty?

Mr. SPENCER: I certainly do. If they are not, I cannot understand how it was shown before the High Cost of Living Committee that the woollen textile industry was making a profit of 310 per cent.

Mr. STEVENS: I think my hon. friend is in error. He means the Dominion Textile Company.

Mr. MALCOLM: I would inform my hon. friend that the wholesale manufacturers of clothing in Canada to-day, due to very extreme competition, are not taking advantage of the tariff at all. In many cases the wholesale price of clothing in Canada is as low as in the United States. I refer to the better grades of woollen stuff. There are other grades which may not be in that position.

Mr. SPENCER: I find that the woollen textile industry produced woollen goods in 1920 to the amount of $28,000,000. This did not all go in wages. Manufacturers often blame labour unions, but I find that in wages and salaries the full amount paid by the woollen textile industry was only $5,407,515. If there is anything that should be given to the people of this country at as low a rate as possible, it is woollen goods.

Referring again to the profits that are being derived from the organized manufacturing industries compared with agriculture, I should like to give some figures that were published in Toronto Saturday Night in reference to the milling industry, as follows:

> Cash dividends ranging from 8 to 47 per cent on common stock, and 7 per cent on preferred stock, together with substantial stock dividends and bonuses have been paid by the principal milling companies of Canada during the period beginning in 1914 and ending in 1920, according to figures quoted in Toronto Saturday Night from the 1921 edition of the Annual Financial Review. The figures appear in an advertisement by the Bankers' Bond Company, Limited, Toronto, who offer for sale stock in a new milling enterprise. They indicate that during the recent period when farmers have been selling their products at cost or below the cost of production the manufacturing of grain products has remained a highly profitable enterprise!

I bring this to the notice of the House because when those representing agriculture in this corner of the chamber have tried to explain the conditions in the country, why the farmer is dissatisfied, and why numbers of them are leaving the farms, some have thought that we were pulling the long bow.

I notice that the Minister of Trade and Commerce said the other day in this debate that the Government of Canada was going as fast as the people would let them go. I only want to say this: He knows as well as I do that if the Government had cared to bring forward the platform that was passed at the Liberal convention in 1919, they would have had the entire support, I believe, of the Progressive group in this House.

Mr. ROBB: We did submit an advanced policy in 1911, and our friends voted against it.

Mr. SPENCER: My hon. friend in his speech the other day was not referring to 1911, but to the present day. The Liberal convention of 1919 was several years after 1911. My hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce also said that the Government was trying to lessen the burden on those who were least able to bear it and to tax those who were best able to pay, but I cannot say that he proved his statement. Right here I would like to bring to the attention of this House a subject that has hardly been discussed at all, and that is getting right down to what we should first of all consider, and that is the need of humanity, the need of every citizen of this country. I think every hon. member will agree that all our citizens, men and women, who work, have a right to the necessaries of life, that is food, shelter, and clothing. Those are necessaries for all people whether rich or poor, and it should be the effort of every government, no matter what its politics, to see that those three necessaries are placed at the disposal of the people without any restrictions or handicaps. At the present time we find that food, and particularly clothing, not to mention shelter, have all had handicaps put on them which makes it very difficult for a great portion of our people to live in as high a social state as they would wish.

I notice that the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Stewart) argues that the Government should go cautiously in the direction of a lower tariff. I was quite surprised to hear him make that statement, considering the school in which he has been brought up in the West, and I can only hope that he is not going to follow the footsteps of his predecessor, Mr. Calder, in that portfolio, and go about face simply because he has come down from the West and now represents an eastern constituency.

With my hon. friend the member for Kings, P.E.I., (Mr. Hughes) I am usually in general agreement, but I notice that he said we have to be careful in our taxation because we must not drive capital out of business. In mentioning capital I think he was referring to organized capital only; he certainly was not referring to unorganized capital. As to driving capital out of farming, the past budgets have already done that. Agriculture, which should be looked upon by all people as one of the most important, if not the most important, of our industries, should be given a fair chance. I had a case brought to my attention the other day where some farmers tried to get a mortgage of $8,000 on 1,400 acres of land which were free from encumbrance and well equipped for business. The mortgage company said "We cannot consider this mortgage because it is unsafe." Now, if such security as that is unsafe I wonder what is safe in this country of ours? If conditions are such that it is unsafe to lend that amount of money on such safe and such good security, I consider that, at least, is driving capital out of business.

Some one, I believe, during the present session, mentioned something about the conscription of wealth; and some people think the conscription of wealth is a harsh proposal. I would like to point out that taxation in any form—because no one likes to pay taxes—is a method of conscription of wealth. During the war we found it necessary to introduce conscription, and probably we did the right thing, but we only adopted one form of conscription. We conscripted the men, but we did not conscript the surplus wealth, although the suggestion was made at the time to the government of the day. Now, if it was right to conscript men it was equally right to conscript the surplus wealth of Canada, otherwise you put the value of wealth above the value of human lives. If we had conscripted wealth in that day we would not be confronted with the stupendous debt that is facing Canada to-day.

My hon. friend the member for Kings, (Mr. Hughes) said that Canada must develop or die. In that I quite agree with him, although I observe that the Minister of Marine (Mr. Lapointe) made the statement this afternoon that agriculture is not dying. All I can say is that if agriculture is not dying it is certainly like a cat and must have nine lives; but in my opinion agriculture is on its last legs unless something is done to remedy the present conditions.

I notice that no radical change is proposed in the budget in regard to raising taxation; and there is no mention at all of any change in our credit system. I regret to see this, because these are strenuous times and we must find some other means, if the present means are not sufficient, to bring this country back to prosperity. In this connection I would like to quote a few words that were written by one who is admired all over the American continent, one who is not an agriculturist but a manufacturer, I refer to Henry Ford. He says:

> Affairs are coming to a jam and if those who possess technical facilities do not engage to remedy the case, those who lack that facility may attempt it. Nothing is more foolish than for any class to assume that progress is an attack upon it. Progress is only a call made upon it to lend its experience for the general advancement. It is only those who are unwise who will attempt to obstruct progress and thereby become its victims.

If you want any further proof of the condition of agriculture, particularly in western Canada from which I come, I may say that in a return that was given to me I find it stated that the amount of money that is owed on principal and interest to the federal government in back payments on school lands alone in the western provinces amounts to no less than $3,000,000.

There is one other subject I wish to touch on before I sit down. We have heard a great deal about the necessity of building up our manufacturing industries, of building up great cities; and figures are produced to show the amount of our exports, the amount of our industrial production, and the number of men that are employed in our industries. But there is one thing, it seems to me, that is overlooked. I have before me some astounding figures in regard to infant mortality, and if we have, through our manufacturing towns, produced a great deal of manufactured goods the prevailing system is certainly not lending itself to manufacturing human goods. Looking over our statistics showing the death rate per thousand of children under one year these are some of the figures that are submitted. I find that in St. Hyacinthe the death rate is no less than 252; in Joliette, 245; in Hull, 240; in Levis, 231; in Westmount, 215; in Quebec, 213; and in Montreal, 178. When I point out that the death rate in the whole of Great Britain is only 78 per thousand, it will be seen that the death rate for the city of Montreal exceeds by over 100 per thousand that of the United Kingdom, including London. A few days ago the Minister of Immigration (Mr. Stewart) informed the House that the department were bringing to Canada some 15,000 children from Great Britain. I would like to ask where those children are being brought from? They are not coming from the best of homes, they are not coming from the average homes, they are not coming from homes that can possibly keep them, because their parents would object. Therefore I take it they must come from the poorer homes, or from the slums, of Great Britain, and I would like to ask this question which I think is pertinent: Would it not be more beneficial to Canada if we looked after our own children and stopped this tremendous death rate? Would it not be better if we made it possible for our own children to become our future settlers, before bringing to Canada children from the poorer homes in the cities of another country? I think we are making a mistake to-day in this country—probably in other countries it is the same—because we are possibly laying too much stress on the value and the sacredness of the almighty dollar, and not enough on the sacredness of human life. I have here a Montreal paper with the heading, "Where Disease is Spread in Montreal". The article proceeds to expound on the slums that exist there. Montreal has its slums, as well as its millionaires. I notice that when the last issue of Victory bonds was made a certain number of people in Montreal were able to make a safe investment in those Victory bonds of no less than nine times the amount than the whole of the people of Alberta were able to invest. Yet, with that amount of riches in that city, we find that they have slums there, and that it has been thought necessary by one of their leading papers to make a crusade on the slums to get them abolished. I find in looking up the record of Australia, that they seem to place a greater value on their children than we do. They have brought in an endowment bill, the intention of which is to allow each mother the sum of six shillings a week for each child over three until she with her husband is getting the minimum wage. They think this is necessary in order to look after the welfare of the children.

If I can leave any thought with the House, after my few remarks, it is that we will in the future pay first attention to the needs of our own people, starting at the base, and then as a secondary matter, look to the interests of land and capital.

Mr. T. J. McBRIDE (Cariboo): There are two things, Mr. Speaker, that have struck me very forcibly since this debate started. One was the number of boquets thrown at the Finance Minister (Mr. Fielding). After throwing these boquets, hon. members start to criticise and tear his budget to pieces. The next thing that struck me was the time that some speakers have taken up in this House. I am not referring to the leaders of the parties, or to the ministers. I think they should have all the time they require, but when any hon. member occupies the time of this House for three hours, well, I do not think he should inflict such punishment on his fellow members. I understand it costs $2,000 an hour to hold sittings in this House. Now, does any hon. member think that what he would say in a three hour speech is worth to the taxpayers $6,000? If so, he must have a higher estimate of his value than I have. I think the limit to any member in this House should be half an hour, with the exception of the leaders and ministers. I do not think that any man who cannot say what he has to say in half an hour should be given the floor.

It would seem to me, Mr. Speaker, that I am the only black sheep in the so-called dilapidated annex. Much as I would like to support the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Crerar) and the Progressive party, when it comes to a question of free trade, somehow their glasses do not seem to have the right focus for my eye sight. During the campaign I spoke at nearly a hundred meetings in different parts of my constituency, and I do not think there was one meeting where I did not make the statement that I was not a free trader, never had been a free trader, and that I never would be a free trader.

There are many points in connection with the budget, on which I do not quite agree with the Finance Minister. There is the paragraph in relation to farm implements, clothing and mining machinery. I think they should come in under much smaller tariff. At the same time, I have no doubt the minister and his associates have given the question a great deal more consideration than I have. Therefore, I do not propose to criticise the budget along those lines. The item I take exception to most is the fruit dumping clause; it strikes at the very root of protection. It is practically a life and death struggle for a great many men who went overseas and fought for this country and are now trying to make a living out of a fruit farm. We have a great number of them in British Columbia, and if that clause is struck out, as suggested, the Government will have a great many more idle men, with their families, on their hands than they have at the present time. What are they going to do with them? I do not know. These men fought our battles in France—and their one thought during the long weary nights they spent in the trenches was to win the war—come home, settle down with their families and live comfortably. If this dumping clause is struck out, it will deprive them of the opportunity to do that. I say that without hesitation. Some fifteen years ago, I was engaged in the building supply business in Vancouver, and contracting generally. At that time we could buy brick on the Canadian side of the line for $8.50 a thousand on the cars or scows as the case might be. This price scarcely paid the expense of making, and owing to that condition, the market was never supplied as it should have been. I went over on one occasion to Seattle to size up the situation and see how the market was there. I found that the general price was $10.50 per thousand, a little more or less, according to the quality of the brick, but to my surprise, when they heard I was from British Columbia and was prepared to buy a quantity of brick to take over to British Columbia, they were willing to sell me the quantity I required at $6.00 per thousand, loaded on the car or scow as I might require. I entered into a contract with a manufacturer, had it signed and then I asked him what profit he was making out of the brick. He did inot seem to want to tell me. Later on however in the evening he seemed more talkative. Again I asked him the question. Well, he said, to be honest about it, I am losing about 50 cents to a dollar on every thousand bricks that I have sold you. I asked him why he did it and he said he did it because he considered that it was good business. In the first place, he said, after having sold that amount of brick I shall be able to run my yard steadily and thereby cut down the expense of production, as the men will work for a lower wage if they get steady work. In the second place, so long as I can ship brick to British Columbia and supply the market there, the manufacturers in British Columbia will not feel like making brick, and in that case we shall always have a market to dump our surplus on. How can we expect manufacturers of brick to compete under these conditions?

Let me give another instance. In 1897, there was quite a lot of maple sugar and syrup shipped to British Columbia. The syrup sold at $2.75 to $3 per gallon, according to the package it was put up in. A Seattle firm was at that time shipping what they called pure Canadian Rock Maple Syrup to British Columbia. What did it consist of? It was 80 per cent granulated sugar 20 per cent maple sugar with a little burnt sugar to give it the proper colour. You would be surprised to know that that firm controlled the maple syrup business of Vancouver for five years. Canadians simply cannot compete under such circumstances, and they should not be expected to do so. I have no hesitation in saying that if this dumping clause is not properly enforced it will not only strike the fruit growers and the small farmers in general but it will strike at the very root of protection.

The fruit growers on our side should have a reasonable profit, so that they can make a living. Surely those men who thought Canada good enough to fight for overseas are entitled to a living when they come back. And that is all they are asking for now. Why should they not be given the protection they are entitled to? I am told that there are indications to-day of a very large fruit crop in Oregon and Washington. In fact, they expect the largest crop they have had in years. Now, if they are allowed to ship their surplus to this side, they will dump their No. 3 grades into Canada in competition with the Canadian No. 1 grade. All they have to do is to put a fancy name on their packages and place them on our market. I contend that each box of apples coming from the United States should be marked with the name of its place of origin whether it is Washington, Oregon or elsewhere, and the grade sold be printed on the package, as is required in this country. Are we asking too much in that respect? I do not think so. The American fruit growers can always get the very best prices for their No. 1 grade in Chicago, New York, Boston and the other large cities, and they never have a surplus of this grade. They can also usually dispose of their No. 2 grade in the United States. It is the No. 3 grade that they will try to dump into Canada. I do not think the Minister of Finance has had time to go fully into this question. I have no doubt his time has been taken up with other matters, and I would suggest that he let this question stand as it was until he has had an opportunity of visiting British Columbia and witnessing for himself the conditions there. If he leaves this matter as it is and comes out to British Columbia after the session I shall be willing to take him through some of these districts, and I am sure he will then be convinced of the truth of what I have said. If I cannot convince him I am prepared at the next session of Parliament to support him in his proposals. I do not think that is an unfair proposition.

I want now to refer to the Transcontinental highway. A good deal has been said about this in the past; not so much in other parts of Canada as perhaps in British Columbia, but very little has been done. Suppose the different provinces began building railways, each on its own hook; what would it lead to? And yet that is what is being done in connection with the Transcontinental highway. This Government is supplying money to each province to go ahead and build a road here and there, wherever it likes, always directed to some extent by politics. We have engineers and surveyors who could locate a highway in a very short time. It is the duty of this Government to undertake this work themselves. It would serve two purposes. It would give employment to those who are now out of work. Those men who went overseas and made good there could surely make good again in Canada. If the Government would start this work they would find a portion of the road in British Columbia already surveyed, there is no reason why they could not go ahead with it. I do not suggest that they build a transcontinental highway and leave the taxpayers to foot the bill. No, what I do say, is that they could build the road and then charge a toll on automobile traffic that would not only pay the interest but also the sinking fund. The statement has been made that there are 800,000 automobiles in Canada; and I understand that there are over a million people who do nothing else but tour the United States during the summer. Suppose we had a transcontinental highway second to none in the world, is it not conceivable that a very large percentage of these people would use that highway? The toll that we could charge the automobilists would pay for the construction of that road in a very short time, while the people living along the highway would have the free use of the road. I say it is the duty ofthe Government therefore to construct this highway and let the tourists pay the expence of construction. Soon after I put that motion on the Order Paper I received about sixty letters from automobile companies, clubs, and private individuals urging me to go ahead with it as the Government ought to undertake the work and the writers would be behind me. Why should we not go ahead with such an undertaking? The country wants it and should have had it years ago. I think it is time the work was started. There are many points in connection with the proposal that I should like to explain, but as the hour is late I will not take up the time of the House any longer.

On motion of Mr. Stevens the debate was adjourned.

On motion of Mr. Graham the House adjourned at 12.25 a.m., Thursday.

Thursday, June 8, 1922

The House met at three o'clock.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk).

MILITIA—TEN YEARS SERVICE

Mr. DESLAURIERS:

How many members of the permanent militia force, having served ten years or more, left the service between November 11th, 1918, and July 1st, 1919.

Hon. Mr. GRAHAM: Seventy-two.

CANADIAN MERCHANT MARINE

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT:

1. How many ships of the Canadian Merchant Marine are actually in the Montreal harbour?
2. What are the names of said ships?
3. Are they out of commission or are they to be loaded with freight for a carrying trip?
4. If the said ships are to be commissioned (a) where are they going, (b) when will they sail, (c) what freight revenue will be received from each, and (d) what are the total expenses of each voyage?

Hon. Mr. KENNEDY:

1. Six.

2. Canadian Harvester, Beaver, Carrier, Runner, Ranger and Rancher.

3. In a commission, with the exception of the last-named two.

4. (a) Harvester and Beaver, British West Indies; Carrier, Glasgow; Runner, Cardiff and Swansea. (b) Beaver, June 8; Carrier, June 17; Harvester and Runner, June 21. (c) and (d) These questions are impossible of answer at this time.

RETURNED SOLDIERS

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN (South York): Mr. Speaker, before the Orders of the Day are called I wish to ask a question of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King). As one of the nine representatives of the Toronto and suburban ridings I have received during the last day or two many pressing telegrams from various organizations of returned men asking that at the earliest possible date the Government will announce their policy for dealing with the claims of returned men.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): As my hon. friend is aware, the whole subject of what it may be most advisable to do in respect to the representations presented by the returned men is being considered by a committee of this House which was appointed for that purpose. I am informed by the chairman of that committee that he anticipates the report will be ready very shortly. As soon as it is brought down the Government will be in a position to make a statement as to its policy.

PRIVILEGE—MR. CRERAR

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. T. A. CRERAR (Marquette): Mr. Speaker, I wish to rise to a question of privilege in regard to some remarks made by my hon. friend from Lincoln (Mr. Chaplin) last night when addressing the House.

He brought into question some figures that I had used when I addressed the House last Monday as to the character of our exports.

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Leader of the Opposition): I rise to a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I do not think the hon. member has a right to any special privilege on the Orders of the Day in relation to the budget debate.

Mr. CRERAR: I submit, Mr. Speaker, that I have a right to correct a wrong impression that my hon. friend from Lincoln, unwittingly, I believe, gave the House.

Mr. SPEAKER: I think the hon. gentleman is in order. If he was misquoted or misrepresented, he has a right as member of the House to state the facts as he understands them.

Mr. MEIGHEN: If an hon. member has a right on the Orders of the Day to correct impressions that he believes are erroneous coming from another speaker in a current debate, I think I could occupy the Orders of the Day for several hours each day.

Mr. CRERAR: My hon. friend from Lincoln last night said that in the statement I had made I had padded the returns; and in another part of his speech he made use of the following language: "I think hon. members would like to know what the object is in deceiving the House." I submit, Mr. Speaker, that I have a right to draw the attention of the House to these remarks, and to state that the figures I gave were supplied me by the Bureau of Statistics. I think it probable that in those figures, under the title "vegetable products" some of the articles my hon. friend mentioned were included.

Mr. CHAPLIN: All of them.

Mr. CRERAR: No, my hon. friend is not quite correct. But aside from that, I merely wish to assure the House, Mr. Speaker, that nothing was further from my mind than to convey a wrong impression, and therefore I give the House the authority for the statement I made.

Mr. SPEAKER: In answer to the right hon. leader of the Opposition with regard to my ruling on the question of privilege, I may point out that rule 47 reads as follows:

> Whenever any matter of privilege arises, it shall be taken into consideration immediately.

I find the following at page 302 of Bourinot, fourth edition:

> Questions of privilege may be always considered without the notice necessary in the case of motions generally. It is the practice in the House of Commons to bring up a question of privilege after prayers, and before the House has taken up the Orders of the Day.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not dispute that at all, Mr Speaker. What I urged was that an objection to an argument made in a current debate does not constitute a question of privilege; it is merely a matter to be taken up in the debate itself.

Mr. FIELDING: The correction of an error would be a legitimate question of privilege. It would not be a matter for argument, but it would be justifiable on the part of an hon. member to state that he had been misrepresented in a statement that had been made, and to do so as a question of privilege.

Mr. MEIGHEN: If a question of error or alleged misrepresentation in a debate is to become a question of privilege, then I do not know where the Orders of the Day are going to end. I could now rise to about fifty questions of privilege that are in my mind at the moment.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go ahead.

Mr. SPEAKER: On further reference I find that Bourinot, fourth edition, page 354, says:

> It is a practice, sanctioned by usage but not by any positive rule, for members in both houses of the Canadian parliament to make personal explanations or ask questions of the Government when the Orders of the Day are called. They make them in reference to an inaccurate report of their speeches in the official record, or in the newspapers.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is my view.

Mr. SPEAKER: I take it that we may consider this incident as disposed of.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The hon. member did not allege any inaccurate report of his speech in a newspaper or in the official record. He did not allege an inaccurate report of his speech at all.

CHILDREN OF RETURNED SOLDIERS

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. R. J. MANION (Fort William and Rainy River): Mr. Speaker, before the Orders of the Day are proceeded with, I wish to draw the attention of the hon. Minister of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment (Mr. Beland) to a news item that appeared in the Ottawa Journal this morning, in order that he may have an investigation made. The item deals with the ill-treatment of two children, aged ten years and eleven years respectively, whose father was killed at the front, and whose mother it is stated is also dead. These little children were taken charge of by a farmer's wife, who severely ill-treated them. If the facts are correctly stated, these children should be entitled to a pension sufficient for them to be properly looked after. I ask that this very atrocious case be investigated by my hon. friend's department in the interests of the children of returned soldiers and of those who fell at the front. My hon. friend will understand that I am not making this request by way of criticism.

Hon. H S. BELAND (Minister of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment): If the children's father was killed at the front, they undoubtedly are receiving a pension. I will take congizance of the article to which my hon. friend refers, and instruct my officials to have an investigation made immediately.

BUDGET DEBATE—DIVISION

On the Orders of the Day:

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, if the House will so permit, I would like to make a reference to the budget debate, which is now proceeding. As hon. members are aware, we had all hoped that the debate would be concluded this evening. I am informed, however, that there are still a number of members who would like to speak, and it is quite apparent that unless they are to be deprived of that privilege it will be impossible to have a division to-night. Indeed, it is very doubtful if it would come by the morning if we sat through the whole night. Under the circumstances the Government deems it wise not to endeavour to curtail the debate in any way, but to permit it to run on. It hardly suits the convenience of hon. members—indeed, it has not been the custom—to have a division on a Friday night or on a Saturday; it is therefore desirable that there should be a definite understanding on that point. If it meets with the approval of hon. members, what the Government would suggest is this: that the debate be continued to-morrow with the understanding that on Saturday, instead of continuing the debate, we take up such estimates as have not yet been passed or some of the non-contentious items appearing among the Government orders. We may then resume the debate on Monday with the expectation of having a division some time on Tuesday.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I would like to add, Mr. Speaker, that before the debate concludes, the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) will doubtless wish to make a statement to the House in the light of the discussion that has been had here and of representations that have been made to him, and may possibly suggest some modifications in the proposals that are now before the House.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The procedure is rather unusual—for the Government to suggest a deviation from its own programme in the conduct of the budget debate, looking to an extension of the debate. It is something that naturally I could not give an answer to at the present moment; the matter has not been mentioned to me before. I would suggest that the debate go on. The whips are doubtless aware of how many more hon. members desire to speak, and they may confer on the matter as the debate proceeds.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Of course, we have not made the statement without conference with the chief whip, who, I think, has already conferred with the other whips. Certainly the matter would be dealt with by conference between the whips.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): I would make the suggestion that we ought to try to have the division to-night.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): Furthermore, if the whips have not come to an arrangement, that being the view of the House, it is their duty to see if they cannot make that arrangement, and to let us know as soon as they can.

Mr. MARCIL (Bonaventure): Hon. members should not forget that many opportunities of discussing these resolutions in detail will be afforded to them when the House goes into committee. This debate is merely preliminary to the work that has to be done.

Mr. BOYS: I may say that the original understanding was that the debate should close on Tuesday last. It was found impossible to carry that arrangement out, owing to the number of members who desired to speak and had not been given an opportunity to do so. We then felt that it could be arranged with certainty to close the debate to-night, and up to a few moments ago the understanding, made in perfect good faith—I am not asserting anything but that—was that two Liberals were going to speak and two Conservatives, and that the remainder of this afternoon and to-night should be given to Progressives, twelve of whom, I understood, wanted to speak. I may say that there is a very honest desire on the part of hon. members on this side to come to a vote at this sitting, even if it takes place at three or four o'clock to-morrow morning.

Mr. CRERAR: If I may be permitted, I would suggest that the debate proceed this afternoon, and possibly an understanding might be reached at eight o'clock to-night. If the debate is to go on to-morrow, then I am quite willing to support the suggestion made by the Prime Minister that the other business be taken up and a division be taken later.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): When—this week, or next week?

An hon. MEMBER: Next month.

THE BUDGET

CONTINUATION OF THE DEBATE ON THE ANNUAL FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The House resumed from Wednesday, June 7, the debate on the motion of Hon. W. S. Fielding (Minister of Finance) that Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair for the House to go into Committee of Ways and Means, and the proposed amendment thereto of Hon. Sir Henry Drayton.

Hon. H. H. STEVENS (Vancouver Centre): Mr. Speaker, the occasion of the presentation of the annual budget to Parliament by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) is always one of great interest not only to hon. members of the House but to the business concerns of the country and to the people at large. This is more particularly the case upon the coming into office of a new government, especially, Sir, when the attainment of office has been preceded by indications and suggestions and statements that the public might expect some very important changes in the fiscal policy of the country. So that on this occasion, I say, the pronouncement of the Minister of Finance was followed with great interest by hon. members and with great keenness by the people generally.

I am forced to state this to my hon. friend the Minister of Finance: that his utterances in connection with the budget, having reference more particularly to amendments to the tariff, will, I believe, tend at least to allay any alarm which may have been felt by the manufacturing interests who would have been seriously affected by the carrying out of any such radical changes as were indicated in the platform upon which he and his colleagues attained office. On the other hand, there are some things in the budget to which I feel it is my duty to offer very serious and pronounced objection. As a matter of fact, there is one particular item in the budget to which I intend to give special attention this afternoon, and which I shall come to in a moment, but first I would like to refer to one or two other matters.

There is the question of the stamp tax on cheques. I do not wish to labour this, I merely wish to say one or two things just in a general way. In the first place, I would point out to the House that the issuance of cheques has become a very important part of accountancy in the carrying on of business. It is a system of record more than a system for the payment of funds. In this regard the tax which my hon. friend proposes will, I think, very seriously interfere with the method of doing business to-day as it has grown out of the experience of recent years. I might give one illustration. Many firms, and particularly the best organized firms, attach a voucher to the cheque, which becomes a legal receipt for the transaction it covers.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I would ask hon. members on both sides of the House not to conduct private conversations in the Chamber. It is not conductive to the decorum of the House, and furthermore, it is not fair to the speaker who is addressing the House.

Mr. STEVENS: I thank you, Mr. Speaker. I quite appreciate that the hot weather and the prolonged debate make it perhaps somewhat unpopular for one to be on his feet. However, without desiring to be vain, I think I have something to say which may contribute in a small measure to the debate.

Mr. SPEAKER: Conversation may also be coming from the lobbies. For the last two or three days we have been obliged to keep the doors leading to the lobbies open, in order to ventilate the Chamber and prevent it becoming too stuffy. I will ask the Sergeant-at-arms to see that no conversation from the lobbies reaches the Chamber during the debate.

Mr. STEVENS: I will simply add that I shall try and be as brief as I think the importance of the subject will permit. Many firms, I say, have adopted this system of attaching a voucher to the cheque. It has therefore become a very important part of the system of keeping accounts, and I submit to the Minister of Finance that the cheque tax he now proposes is too onerous, and will seriously interfere with the legitimate and proper carrying on of business.

The tax on confectionery I consider to be of a discriminatory character and on that ground I object to it. I am not objecting to a tax on confectionery as part of a general tax upon other things, such as the sales tax, for instance, but to single out confectionery and put a tax on it seems to be unfair. However, we will discuss that further in committee. Now I merely cite these things and express my general objection.

There are three clauses repealed by this budget to which I wish to make special reference. One of those clauses is what is known as the anti-dumping clause. This was a clause passed, I think, last year, and I would call my hon. friend's attention to the fact that it was a clause passed merely to give proper effect to his own doctrine, in the anti-dumping clause of 1907, in his own tariff of that time. In 1907 an anti-dumping clause was included in the Customs Act. It is a good clause; it has been accepted as a sound doctrine, but it was found that certain commodities were of such a character that it was possible to evade the terms of that clause, and this practice grew up during the years. One of the articles to which I make particular reference is fruit, another is vegetables. The principle underlying the original anti-dumping clause is, that goods shall not be shipped into Canada and entered for duty at a valuation less than a fair selling price in the country of origin. But there are some goods the fair selling price of which in the country of origin it is difficult to ascertain. The price of fruit, for instance, fluctuates from day to day, and fluctuates very seriously. Local markets such as Buffalo, Seattle, New York, and others along the American line, might have a glut of fruit on one particular day or in a certain week and be anxious to get rid of a surplus. Now, a fair market value on a day when the market is glutted would not be a fair market value on normal occasions. So, last year, another clause was inserted which provided in general terms that instead of taking the fair market value in the country of origin it was possible also to apply this principle, namely, the cost of production in the country of origin. In other words the two were interchangeable; either was optional. I may not be giving it exactly right, but I think the main principle I am giving is sound. We appeal to my hon. friend the Minister of Finance not to repeal that clause, or if he does, to amend his own original clause, of his own drafting—the idea originated with him, I believe—so that there cannot be the evasions which have occurred during recent years. If he will do that, it will be satisfactory, but if he merely repeals the anti-dumping clause as he stated in his budget speech he would do, I wish to say to him now that it will work very serious hardship,—no, not hardship, but ruin. My hon. friend smiles. He would not smile if he realized that it takes from ten to fifteen years to make an orchard a producing thing, something that will give a return. It is not at all comparable to a piece of land which can be ploughed in the spring and cropped in the fall. The investment in an orchard is heavy and the period of time the grower must wait is long, and there are many things entering into the business which are intricate, difficult, expensive. So I say to my hon. friend that it should be his object to safeguard an industry of that kind against utterly unfair competition.

Now I turn to what is to my mind the most important proposal in this budget, and that is the repeal of the Marking Act and the repeal of the Depreciated Currency clause of last year. The two go together.

I am not going to spend very much time on the repeal of the Marking Act. I think it is unwise to repeal it. I admit frankly that in the working out of that act the department officials have run up against difficulties; there is no question about that, but it was the duty of the government, of the old government and of this Government, to seek to overcome those difficulties, and not simply, because difficulties were met, to toss the whole thing overboard and say, "We will not bother our heads any more about it." The main difficulties, I think, could quite readily have been overcome. There are many articles that you cannot mark without great inconvenience and difficulty. There are certain citizens who object to the marking of goods. Who are they? The importer, the merchant, the jobber, the wholesaler, and men of that kind. And no criticism is to be offered because they object to it; their business is simply to deal in the transfer of goods, they have no direct interest, for instance, in the manufacturing of goods; they do not feel the competition with the local market; their gain lies simply in the interchange of goods between different buyers. May I refer to that class of business—and I do it with all respect because I am in this business slightly myself—the brokerage business. In regard to that class there is very little capital investment, comparatively speaking, as against the amount invested by, for instance, manufacturers. The manufacturer is keenly interested, very keenly interested, in the competition that he meets with from foreign countries. I shall, in a moment, refer to the unfairness of the competition; but I am not doing that just at present. Now then, in order to overcome that we passed last year what is known as the Markings Act, calling for the country of origin to be marked upon the goods which were imported. Now, I want to say that while a power by Order in Council to continue that is provided, I think that to carry out the doctrine which my right hon. friend the Prime Minister so often insinuates, that power should be in the act—it should be a statute rather than an Order in Council. What I think my hon. friend should do is to address himself—or the officials of the department and the Department of Customs should do so—to the task of meeting the difficulties which have arisen by experience in the application of the Act, rather than that the Government should take the obscure and rather nebulous power to themselves and say what shall or shall not be marked. There is a decided objection to the proposal now before the House. I do not wish to say this in any spirit of recrimination at all, but there is this objection: That it gives into the hands of the minister—or, referring further back, into the hands of the officials who advise the minister—the power which I do not think parliament should give, namely, of saying with respect to this class of goods that it shall be marked, and regarding another class of goods that it shall not be marked. Therefore, I say it would be far better to maintain the Act as passed last year, amending it if necessary in the light of the experience of the year, and seeking to overcome the difficulties that have arisen.

Now, I come to the next point, and that is the depreciated currency clause passed in amendment to the Customs Act last year. It is not necessary for me to go into the details of what it was; it was in effect simply this: That in any country where the currency had depreciated below a point of fifty per cent of par, the valuation for duty purposes upon goods imported from that country should be figured at a rate not less than fifty per cent of par. Now, I am going to deal directly with the German situation, because unquestionably that is where this clause applies most extensively, although, Sir, I would pause to say this: The idea must not be too readily accepted that the Germans, or the German people, are the only ones against whom this is directed, or who would be affected. Now let me review—and I confess, Sir, that it is fairly complicated and perhaps dry and uninteresting on an occasion of this kind, but to me it is the crux of this whole budget, it is the most fatal thing in the budget, and I believe once fully realized by the House will make members pause before allowing it to pass into law—let me review briefly the situation as it is regarding Germany. Germany plunged this world into war. That is the first point I wish to lay down. Germany was defeated. Immediately after the defeat of Germany she began to scheme—and I do not blame her for doing it—how she could evade paying reparation and to seize the fruits of victory which properly belonged to those who had defeated her.

Mr. MARCIL (Bonaventure): She has succeeded, too.

Mr. STEVENS: She has succeeded, too, my hon. friend from Bonaventure says, and I will demonstrate that in a few moments. I make this statement, and I think advisedly, in the face of contradiction by eminent authorities, that she encouraged, actually encouraged, the depreciation of her own currency, and that I think I can demonstrate in a moment. As a matter of fact she was immune during the war;—I want the House to remember this—Germany was immune during the war, and she suffered no destruction, physical destruction, of her machinery, her factories, her plants, and so forth; as a matter of fact, her industrial life was stimulated. But

France and Belgium had hundreds of thousands of square miles of territory, and thousands of villages and towns, devastated; and hundreds of thousands—yes, I guess millions—of workmen thrown out of employment because of the absolute destruction of their implements of production—their factories,—their machines, and so forth—and their mines. Now France suffered that; keep that in mind. Since the war Germany has developed during the last two years—in particular in the industrial and in the commercial realm. She has contributed very, very little to the reparation of France and Belgium—she has contributed a little, but very little—and in the meantime France is bearing a terrific burden. Now, I know that sometimes we think that France is actuated by passion, and revenge and resentment; but let us look at the simple facts. Here is a territory devastated and not yet renewed, belonging to those who resisted and conquered. On the other hand, here is a territory stimulated into greater activity than ever, the territory of a people who caused the war and who were defeated. It is an anomalous position that I do not think any logic can justify. Now, that is not all. If you look over the press from day to day, you will find that the great German capitalists, particularly that eminent gentleman Hugo Stinnes, are displaying remarkable activity. Stinnes is in Mexico, and his agents are in Russia, and all over the world. Doing what? Seeking trade, some one will say. That is true;—not only seeking trade but seeking the investment of German capital in foreign investments; seeking to invest German capital in Mexico, in Moscow, and in various parts of the world. Is not the situation monstrous? Germany protesting to the world at large that she cannot afford to pay any reparation to France, and at the same time sending millions upon millions of dollars in value out of the country for foreign investment?

Now I wish to go into the matter in a more statistical form—

Mr. BROWN: Before you pass from that point—the difference between Germany and France as regards physical suffering. Do you regard that as an essential factor in the discussion of the problem? For we must remember that some of the allied countries did not suffer any more than Germany.

Mr. STEVENS: I consider it as a very vital factor; not the whole basis of my argument, as my hon. friend will see in a moment, but I say it is a situation that is utterly illogical, and I say this further: That we—who are after all participating in these conferences, who have our representative over there at the present time, I do not think he has yet returned—as a parliament ought to express ourselves in regard to this matter, ought to express ourselves, I think, more in sympathy with the French view than the German view at this time. Let me engage the attention of the House, if I dare do so, by some statistics. I do this for the purpose of laying a firm foundation for my subsequent argument. Germany has a deficit loudly talked about daily. There is not a day passes but what one sees, when he picks up the press, the discussion going on in Europe; and this question of the deficit that Germany is constantly faced with and her inability to meet the reparation claims is seized upon by many, for some reason or other, as an excuse why we should not press Germany for reparation. Now I propose looking briefly into that situation. Germany's budget deficits are caused by certain things. They are caused first by subsidies paid by Germany to industries within her own boundaries, and for wheat in particular; they are caused by themselves artificially keeping down the cost of living which I shall prove in a moment, definitely I think; they are caused by the issue of paper currency. During the last three years Germany has encouraged the creation of deficits by these methods I have mentioned. At the end of the year she made good that deficit by putting out another issue of paper currency, with the result that her gold mark, originally worth 23.8 cents, declined, and continually declined until to-day, it is worth about a third of a cent. These are facts I wish the House to remember. During last fall Great Britain had unemployment to the extent of 2,000,000 people, the United States 5,000,000, Canada 200,000. Germany had 150,000, which was below normal for Germany. Germany, with a population of 60,000,000, had only 150,000 to 200,000 unemployed, stated by their economists to be lower than normal; Canada with 8,000,000 people, had 200,000 and over unemployed. Now, we take another step. I want to make a comparison between 1913 and 1921, in order that the House may realize the situation in Germany and the political thesis of her position. In 1913 Germany had an adverse trade balance of 700,000,000 gold marks.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax): Can the hon. member give the exports of Germany for the period prior to the war, and the exports in the recent two years?

Mr. STEVENS: I can give my hon. friend some of the information asked for, but I am not quite certain that I can give it all. I think, however, that my argument will answer the question. In 1913 Germany had an adverse trade balance of 700,000,000 gold marks. That looked serious, but it was not a serious thing at all; there were invisible exports and imports which covered this difference. Let me give these to the House. The invisible imports consisted of 1,250,000,000 gold marks on foreign investment, which was not shown in the trade returns. It was cash to hand, or goods in lieu of cash. There was also the international freight traffic: that is not for carrying German goods for German merchants, but her services rendered to other nations all over the world with her mercantile marine, estimated at over 1,000,000,000 gold marks. Then, from tourists she secured a revenue estimated by this gentleman at 750,000,000 gold marks, or a total of 3,000,000,000 gold marks. Against that, there were foreign labourers who left Germany and took funds with them—and there were a great many of them—and banking exchange, making up about 1,750,000 marks, leaving a profit to Germany, after taking into consideration the imports over exports in actual trade, of 1,250,000,000 gold marks. I am giving these figures from Germany's own statistics. I will take 1921, and I can now give my hon. friend some information, perhaps, directly bearing on his question. In 1921 German imports amounted to 118,000,000,000 marks, paper; and her exports were 96,000,000,000 marks paper, leaving 22,000,000,000 marks, paper, of imports over exports, or an adverse balance of trade. That sounds very ominous—22,000,000,000 marks; but when you reduce it, at present exchange, to a gold basis, it amounts to from $60,000,000 to $90,000,000, so that it was not so very serious after all. But that was her deficit. Germany's mercantile marine has been taken away and her foreign investments have disappeared. She cannot make up the deficit in the old way by services to the world with her mercantile marine, or by interest on the investments abroad, the only way she can make it up is by selling goods abroad. I want to make it perfectly clear that I am not one of those who feel any malice towards Germany, or desire to put undue obstructions in her way at all. That is not my attitude on this question. I think Germany should have an opportunity to sell her goods abroad, if she can do so, but only to do so on a fair basis, and not at the expense of the allied countries. Now she can only make up that deficit of $60,000,000 by selling goods abroad. Canada imported from Germany last year, in spite of the obstacles placed in the way of that trade by this clause to which my hon. friend takes such objection, about one and a half million dollars' worth of goods, but there came into Canada by other ways a much larger amount of goods than that, to which I am going to refer in a moment. Before doing so, however, let me take the House a step further; this, Sir, is the crux of the whole business. First I make this assertion, and then I shall demonstrate it beyond, I think, all possibility of question. The difficulty in determining our relations to Germany in trade matters is increased because the international purchasing power of the mark in Germany is three times its exchange or international value. That may seem extraordinary, but I think I can demonstrate it. I will first give two sets of figures, and then quote certain authorities which, I think, no one will question. And I submit this to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding): if what I say on this point can be accepted as accurate and true, I claim the minister must revise his decision in regard to this depreciated currency, and I most earnestly ask him to endeavour to follow me in this matter. I have simply the one earnest desire, to get at the root and the truth of this matter, because I believe it is going to be a serious thing. I am going to give the House further figures, taken from Dr. Elsas of Frankfurt, a recognized authority on economic subjects in Germany. On September 1, 1921, the internal value of the mark was eight pfennings and the external value five pfennings, a ratio of 8 to 5. November 1, 1921, this had changed to 7 pfennings internal and 2 pfennings external—three and a half times. January, 1922, it was 6 to 2½. March 1, it was four to one and three-quarters, May 1—only a few days ago—it was 3.19 to 1.44. That was the ratio or the difference between the internal and the external value of the mark. But I can give another illustration from figures, also from the same authority. I will give first the bald statement; the depreciation of German currency, from December 4, 1914, to December, 1921, was 4,735 per cent. The cost of living in Germany, covering exactly the same period, was increased 1,638 per cent, or only one-third of the depreciated currency. Here are the actual figures: in 1914 one pound sterling equalled 20 marks; 1921 one pound equalled 947 marks, and that has increased enormously since December, 1921, which is the last figure I am giving in the comparison. The cost of living in 1914, the index figure, was 26.5 marks, but in December, 1921, the figure was 439 marks. In other words, currency had depreciated on the international exchange 4,735 per cent, while the purchasing power of the mark in Germany has depreciated only 1,638 per cent, or only one-third of its exchange value. Now I wish to quote an authority which the hon. member from Brome (Mr. McMaster), if he were here, would at once accept, Mr. Maynard Keynes. He is perhaps one of our most outstanding economists in the British Empire. I do not agree with all the conclusions at which he arrives; but his aim at the present time is to secure a revision of the Versailles treaty in order to make the figure of reparation possible for Germany. That is his general argument and object. With that, I am not concerned at the moment, I refer to it merely so that the House may know that when I quote him, I am not quoting a prejudiced person. At page 82, of his "Revision of the Treaty", a book recently published, he makes this statement:

> During the summer of 1921 the mark gold equalled 20 marks paper. The internal purchasing power of the paper mark for the purposes of consumption was still nearly double its corresponding value abroad.

That was in the summer of 1921, a year ago. He goes on:

> In December 1921 it was between 45 and 60 paper marks to one gold mark, while its purchasing power in Germany is three times what it is outside.

I give another authority, and that is Dr. Melchior, who was the chief of the German economic staff at Versailles, when the treaty was signed. Surely no one will question that authority as regards prejudicing the case of Germany. Dr. Melchior is recognized as one of the leading philosophers on economic questions in Germany, and indeed, in the world. Before reading what he says, let me refer to a statement made by the hon. member for West York (Sir Henry Drayton), that this constituted free trade with Germany. I want to say to the House that it does not constitute free trade with Germany; it constitutes paying a premium on Germany imports. The statement which I am about to quote was made by Dr. Melchior in the Manchester Guardian which, I am sure, would be endorsed by every hon. gentleman opposite, a paper which, I think, is one of the best papers in the world on general economic subjects as regards the assembling of information. I do not always agree with its deductions; but I must pay a high tribute to the Manchester Guardian as being one of the finest periodicals on commercial questions in the world. Dr. Melchior, in a special article in the Manchester Guardian, makes this statement:

> The international value of the mark has a natural connection with its purchasing power in Germany, which in turn depends on inflation. The internal purchasing power of the mark . . . . is at present (April 1922) between two and three times its international value. . . .

I want the House to follow very closely these last few words:

> The falling currency has, it is true, brought apparent prosperity to German industry by means of a premium on exports—

Then he goes on:

> —which at the same time cripples the industries of the competing countries.

This is not my statement; this is not the statement of some wild-eyed, prejudiced person seeking vengeance on Germany; this is the statement of the highest economic authority in Germany who was at Versailles, who was the head of their economic agents and experts, and who has been at the head of almost every one of their conferences. Let me emphasize the words of Dr. Melchior—"Which at the same time cripples the industries of competing countries." I turn from that for a moment to another picture, and I use France in direct comparison for the purpose of impressing upon the House the seriousness of this situation. I am not going to go into any great details; I want to visualize, if I can in a few words, the situation in France. We must remember the prosperity, the activity of Germany; the fact that there is practically no unemployment there; the extension of her trade; the upbuilding of her industries; the safe, sure and preserved position of all her industrial life during the war. France's budget for 1923 shows an estimated deficit of 4,000,000,000 francs. I will translate that into Canadian currency as $360,000,000. To this must be added four or five times as large a sum for pensions, for reconstruction charges. France, for the year 1923, must find $1,860,000,000. That is what France is faced with, in addition to the ordinary expenditures of the country. Germany, however, says that she cannot afford to pay France reparation. Why does Germany say that? "Because," she says, "we have an annual deficit, and if you crowd us, our mark will go lower and lower, and we shall have economic ruin in Europe." This is her whole argument. But if we pay any attention to France with $1,860,000,000 to find for reparations, pensions, and to make up her internal deficits, the situation is appalling. The question I ask of the House is this: To whom is our duty due? Is it our duty to help Germany out of her hole and to plunge France into a worse condition; or is it our first duty to be at least neutral in the situation? I am not at the moment asking the minister to lend any special assistance to France; but I say: Be neutral; do not pay a premium on German goods and thus force France deeper into the mire than she is at the present time.

Austria is also affected deeply by this clause. I am not going into any details; I am going to say only this: Recently, Austria has placed her customs on a gold basis. What does this mean? Hon. gentlemen will know something about what it means when I tell them that at par on a gold basis, the Austrian crown is 24 to the pound sterling, and that is the basis upon which she admits goods to her country. What is the exchange value of the Austrian crown to-day? The other day, May 16, it was 42,600 crowns to the pound. What is Austria doing? Austria says: For customs purposes, the gold basis will rule. Why, she has increased many of her customs charges in addition to that, 1,000 per cent in the last couple of months, and then we, forsooth, are going to throw away this bit of a safeguard that we have and admit German and Austrian goods in competition with our own. In Hungary, the other part of the old Empire of Austria-Hungary, hundreds of articles are absolutely prohibited. I do not need to give the House the particulars; let hon. members turn to the speech of the hon. member for East Quebec (Mr. Lapointe). That hon. gentleman read from records the actions of many European countries in regard to this matter.

I wish to go into another phase of this question. Let me take a specific case. that of knives—and I am using this one illustration, because I think it conveys clearly the whole situation. The figures which I am going to give are absolutely authentic and accurate and may be verified. Germany is exporting to Canada all sorts of stuff, and while I have in my possession a list of the articles, I am not going to go into that, because to do so would only confuse the issue; I will take the one article to which I have just referred. A certain standard pocket-knife is recognized in connection with all manufacturers of cutlery and knives; it is what is known as a pocket-knife, and it may be taken as a sample article. That pocket-knife can be landed in Canada by Germany for 70 cents a dozen, including duty. I want to give my hon. friends who argue that we ought to be privileged to buy in the cheapest market, a few facts and let them come to their own conclusions. This is what will occur, if this clause is removed, that Germany can land pocket-knives in Canada at 55 cents, plus a duty of 16 cents, or 71 cents a dozen. Let me figure this out on the basis of the depreciated currency clause now in the act. This 55 cents is equivalent to 165 marks, and the duty at 50 per cent depreciation would be as follows: 165 marks valued at 11½ cents to the mark, $18.98; the duty at 30 per cent amounts to $5.69 which, plus the 55 cents, would mean $6.24 a dozen for this particular kind of knife. Now, then, I admit at this point that it would appear that this figure of 50 per cent depreciation is perhaps high. I would suggest to my hon. friend, if that were considered to be so, that he reduce it to, say, 35 per cent—there is no particular objection to that—or do as the Americans are doing, make the market value in Canada the basis on which to assess the duty.

But let me take the depreciation of 30 per cent, and then you will see the significance. Suppose we enact that the depreciation be put at 30 per cent instead of 50 per cent. Then we find the duty would be $3.45, and the value of this knife per dozen would be $4. The British knife, exactly the same as the German knife, is laid down at $5 a dozen; the American knife is laid down at $4.75 a dozen; the Canadian knife can be laid down and is sold at $4.50 a dozen.

Now, this is what I want to emphasize. The Canadian manufacturer to-day is manufacturing at a lower cost and underselling both the British and the American manufacturer of this particular article. Why should we ask him, however, to compete with such utterly unfair competition as that to which I have referred with this depreciated currency? I might give a few interesting figures regarding the importations of this German knife, but I shall not do so at the moment.

What I wish to point out particularly to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) is that by the present system of valuation that knife is shipped into Canada at one-third what it can be produced for in Germany; that is, when you take the depreciated value of the mark as the value upon which the knife is entered, and the value of the mark for domestic purposes in Germany, which is three times its value abroad. That, I submit, is utterly unfair competition to which to subject our Canadian industries.

Now, in case there may be those who question the wisdom of this suggestion, let me show what Great Britain and Australia are doing. I shall also, if necessary, refer to what the United States is doing. But first let me refer to this point, and I invite the attention of both the Minister of Finance and the Prime Minister to what I am about to say. In the first ultimatum to Germany which was issued from London in March last, and to which Canada is a party, it was agreed that the various powers interested would pass an act imposing upon German goods coming into their respective countries a special duty up to 50 per cent, which special duty would be set aside and credited to the German reparations account. The British Parliament passed that measure. Why should we not do so? There is owing to us on reparations 4.35 per cent of the 22 per cent due to the British Empire, but apparently we have small chance of ever getting it.

Now, let me bring the House back to the pocket knife and show where the profit is going. As my hon. friend said, the Germans ship that knife to Canada through Great Britain, Holland and the United States. That is true to a certain extent. But how do they ship it? That knife is shipped to an agent of the manufacturer in London, who receives 5 per cent commission. He is virtually a member of the German firm. It is then reshipped to a firm in Montreal—Durkin, I think, is the name, who also are agents of the manufacturers. That firm enters the knife for duty purposes at the figure which I mentioned, 55 cents. I wish the House would follow me closely in this, because I think it amply justifies the position I am taking. That agent in Montreal, representing the manufacturer in Germany, enters the knife at 55 cents, and pays, of course, a low duty. Do the Canadian public get that knife at 70 cents, or with a small profit added? No. That agent distributes this particular kind of knife to the wholesalers at $3.75. Now, do my hon. friends get the point? In other words, there is a differential between 70 cents, the landing price to the agent, and $3.75, the distribution price to the wholesaler, of $3.05. Where does it go? To the German manufacturer; it does not go to the Canadian people at all. Do my hon. friends, the Minister of Finance and the Prime Minister realize this?

Let me repeat this at the risk of being monotonous. That German manufacturing firm—and this applies to all the goods they ship—ship their goods into New York or Montreal, or wherever it may be, in this case Montreal to a special agent, who in turn distributes those goods at a price just low enough to undersell the Canadian made article, in this particular instance at $3.75. The $3.05, the difference between the cost laid down and the distribution cost, goes to the German manufacturer in Germany.

Now, my point is this. We ought to have that $3.75 in the treasury, it ought to go into the funds of Canada, to be credited, if you like, to German reparations account, but I do not think that is necessary, I think it ought to go into the general revenue of Canada. Even then we are allowing those German goods to enter at a figure of 75 cents under the Canadian manufacturer's price.

Mr. ROBB: If I may interrupt my hon. friend—does he argue that these pocket knives have been coming in during the past year, or that they can come in under the proposed changes?

Mr. STEVENS: I know what my hon. friend refers to, and I am not seeking to evade any point in this discussion. These knives have been coming in through the mediums mentioned by the hon. Minister of Finance through Great Britain, Holland and the United States. I reiterate what I said a moment ago, that these agents established in England, Holland, New York and elsewhere are agents of the German manufacturers, not bona fide local jobbers. Do not forget that. The British jobber does not make a profit, the United States jobber does not make a profit. Bokers are the greatest cutlery manufacturers in the world. They ship to their agent in New York who in turn distributes the goods in the United States. I have the figures for the United States: 75,000 dozen pocket knives at 70 cents a dozen; 38,000 dozen razors at 71 cents per dozen; 44,000 shears at 95 cents a dozen—all of which were cleared to the agent of the manufacturer. He paid the duty on the low exchange value of the mark, then he distributed the goods to the American wholesalers at the increased high price, making a tremendous profit of four hundred to six hundred per cent for the German Manufacturer. The Canadian government, the British government, the United States government, in these cases, get nothing, the profit goes into the pocket of Mr. Stinnes, whom I mentioned a moment ago, and the other German manufacturers, who, instead of having those funds remitted to them in Germany keep them in New York for use in invading the Mexican market and other markets in competition with this and other countries. And we are feeding them with the wherewithal to compete with us, without getting for the Canadian purchaser one cent of value. That is the point of the whole business. And now the hon. member for Bonaventure (Mr. Marcil) says they are turning round like rats cornered in a trench and saying: Make us a loan of a billion dollars. I hesitate to express any opinion upon that, because it is a complicated question, but as I study the matter I am more and more inclined to think that France is justified in saying to the Germans: It is about time you mended your own internal affairs; it is about time you put yourself on an economic basis comparable with that of other nations, instead of refusing to recognize your obligations in the way of reparations to the Allied powers and instead of building up an artificial credit by issuing new currency and depreciating the value of your own mark accordingly.

Now, let me refer to our sister dominion of Australia. I pause here—I had forgotten to do so hitherto, and my right hon. friend will forgive me—to congratulate him (Mr. Mackenzie King) upon the honour recently bestowed upon him. I would like to hear him use these words uttered by Premier Hughes of Australia:

> If you think I will vote in favour of trade with Germany, my life has been lived in vain.

What prompted Premier Hughes to say that? It was brought to his attention that German sewing machines had been offered in Capetown and sold there at 18 shillings, umbrellas at 3 shillings, safety razors at 4 pence, silk neckties at 4½ pence, and so on. And what did Australia do? Australia passed an act, which they call the Preservation of Industries Act—under which the value of all goods landed in Australia from Germany was raised to the cost of a similar article made in Australia. What I say to the Minister of Finance and to the Prime Minister is this: Either take the basis of valuing goods for import at the Canadian value of the article imported, or—and this is what we believe is the right thing to do—value them at 50 per cent depreciation, or not less than 35 per cent depreciation. I may say—and I say it advisedly, after a good deal of thought—that I would not object to dropping the depreciation to 35 per cent; I would object, though, to going below that. It is surely unfair competition; it is a competition that does not contribute anything to the public treasury or anything to the saving of the purchaser in Canada. I leave that question, Mr. Speaker, with the Minister of Finance; I hope that when he makes the announcement which is promised he will include in it some change in respect to this matter.

We have heard a great deal in this debate about the alleged unfairness of our taxation system. I want to appeal to those who offer that criticism to consider the figures and to revise this oft-repeated—I do not wish to use a harsh word—fallacy, for I think it is a fallacy, which I believe many begin to look upon as an established fact because it is so often asserted. My hon. friend—I have forgotten his constituency—in speaking on this subject the other night used this same argument. I hold in my hand a pamphlet issued by the Council of Agriculture, an institution that ought to know better, in which they say—the same thing has been heard all over the prairies and has been reiterated here—that we raise only 6 per cent of our taxes by direct taxation. Now, that is a statement which is accepted by countless thousands of people in Canada.

If indirect taxation, which chiefly consists of customs duties, accounted for 94 per cent of our revenues, well might my friends be alarmed; well might they sing the doleful dirge that we have heard in this House. But what are the facts?

Mr. HOEY: Will my hon. friend permit a question?

Mr. STEVENS: Certainly.

Mr. HOEY: Could he tell me what is the date of that pamphlet of the Canadian Council of Agriculture? I think it is an old one.

Mr. STEVENS: I will tell the hon. member when it was used and where I got it. The hon. member for Medicine Hat (Mr. Gardiner) in his election last year had these distributed all over his riding, and I was extended the extreme courtesy of having one handed to me.

Mr. HOEY: I think it is only fair that the hon. member should state that that is an old pamphlet.

Mr. STEVENS: All I can say is that it has on the face of it: "Issued by the Canadian Council of Agriculture." There is no date on it, so far as I am able to see. What I am particularly concerned about, however, is that two references have been made to the matter in this debate, and when I asked my hon. friend where he got his figures he said he got them from the Grain Growers' Guide. Be that as it may, here are the facts : In 1920 we raised 48 per cent of our revenue by indirect taxation and the balance by direct taxation; in 1921 we raised 37½ per cent by indirect taxation and in 1922, for the fiscal year ending March 31, 27½ per cent. Let me give some figures of taxation receipts by way of illustration. Last year we received $105,000,000 from customs; $36,000,000 from excise; $73,000,000 from inland revenue—that would be sales tax—$78,000,000 from income tax and $22,000,000 from business profits tax.

Mr. FORKE: The hon. member will recognize that that $78,000,000 from income tax would not be included in that pamphlet.

Mr. STEVENS: All right; my hon. friend wants me to go back to that pamphlet. The pamphlet gives these figures: it says that in 1916-17 the figure for customs was $134,000,000; excise, $24,000,000, business profits tax $12,000,000, and so on; 1917-18, customs, $146,000,000; excise, $27,000,000; business profits tax, $21,000,000; others, $4,000,000. Yet they say that $146,000,000 is 94 per cent of $27,000,000 plus $26,000,000, or, $53,000,000. And they did not give the other sources of revenue; they do not give all the revenue. My point is this: my hon. friends base their arguments upon inadequate and unfair figures. The hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Crerar) —I wish he were in his seat—took the time of the House to-day to question the accuracy of figures used. My hon. friend is the leader of a great party.

An hon. MEMBER: Hear, hear.

Mr. STEVENS: They are a great party; some of them are over six feet tall. The leader of that party has for some years posed in this House as an economist; he has based all his arguments on economic principles. They may be sound principles, but there are other considerations in the national life besides economic principles; moral, ethical and many other questions have to be considered. You cannot by the use of a two-foot rule set out the bounds of a man's activities: he will be, and has a right to be, moved by this, that and the other influence. Now, the hon. member for Marquette said this during the course of the debate:

> As I say, we exported goods to the value of $740,000,000 last year. But where did those exports come from? Last year was a year of trade depression, a very trying year throughout the world. Of this total, vegetable products accounted for $318,000,000, and animal products, $135,000,000; in other words, $453,000,000 of the $740,000,000—

Came from where? He does not say from vegetable products or from animal products, but, > —$453,000,000 of the $740,000,000 of exports last year had their origin in the farms of Canada.

I have in my hand the very document from which my hon. friend must have got his figures. Certainly it gives vegetable products as $317,814,000, and animal products $135,000,000, but surely to goodness a man ought to check up what animal and vegetable products are included there. All vegetable products do not belong to the specific business of agriculture. In this blue book I have in my hand you will find every article that was referred to by my hon. friend set forth—whisky, furs, leather and every other conceivable thing. Boots and shoes are an animal product certainly, because the hide is tanned into leather. He includes all these various processes of manufacture and says of all these things:

What we quarrel with is that these are a part of the products of the farm, and we exported this huge amount.

I am going to examine the figures. My right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition (Mr. Meighen) says we shall be having the hon. member for Marquette up again on the Orders of the Day to-morrow. Perhaps so, I wish he were here to listen. You will remember when the hon. member for Marquette was speaking the other evening, that he dilated for some time on this alleged iniquitous rubber business in Canada. What need have we of a rubber business? he asked; it was not indigenous to this country, we need not bother with it. But he took good care to include rubber in his products of the farm—something over $3,000,000 worth of rubber tires manufactured in Canada included as a "vegetable product." Of course, it is a vegetable product, and so are boots and shoes an animal product; so is sugar a vegetable product, most of it was cane sugar, some $11,000,000 worth of sugar was included, as well as canned goods, shredded wheat, rolled oats, and all the rest of the cereals; $59,000,000 worth of flour exported and credited direct to the farm! Where is the Agricultural Committee? Where is the chairman of that committee? Does not he and all the members of the committee remember how the followers of the hon. member for Marquette went after the millers before that committee? Why, you would have thought the millers were a sort of curse to the country to hear some of the hon. gentlemen. But the hon. member for Marquette includes this $50,000,000 odd in his figures. Let us look at the figures. First I will give the figures my hon. friend used. He said that $453,000,000 worth of goods out of the $740,000,000 of exports were from the farm. That is not correct. There was some $70,000,000 too much, and there was about $50,00,000 more of manufactured articles credited to the farm which should have been deducted. But that was not the unfairness of his argument at all. The unfairness of his argument rests in this. Agricultural products were roughly $1,400,000,000. Imports of agricultural products, animal and vegetable, aggregating $200,000,000, added to that $1,400,000,000 make a total of $1,600,000,000. Deduct from that even his own figures of exportation, which were exorbitant, and you have left some $1,167,000,000 worth of farm or agricultural products that were consumed in Canada. The point we have been trying to make clear to my hon. friends is this, that the great bulk of the products of the farm are consumed in Canada. There is your market. Are these figures not clear? My hon. friends laugh in derision. That is the thing that embarrasses anybody who seeks to get at the facts. You could not penetrate the minds of some hon. gentlemen, no matter what you did. If the Archangel Gabriel himself stood on the table of this House and gave hon. gentlemen these figures they would not believe him.

Here are the percentages for last year. Taking the false figures—the inaccurate figures, I mean; I will use the more moderate term—taking the figures inaccurate by $125,000,000, that my hon. friend from Marquette gave, and you have this result, that 28 per cent of the products of Canada were exported and 72 per cent consumed in Canada. But the correct figures are these: For the year 1919-1920, 79 per cent were consumed in Canada and 21 per cent exported; and in 1920-1921, 80 per cent were consumed in Canada and 20 per cent exported. The figures for last year, if the accurate figures were given, would show approximately the same amount consumed in Canada, if not a little more.

Mr. FORKE: Does the hon. member realize that if the figures were reversed we would soon pay off the national debt?

Mr. STEVENS: If the figures were reversed we would soon pay off the national debt, the hon. gentleman says. That is what I complain of. What would my hon. friends do? They would take the rubber industry, the boot and shoe industry, the cotton goods industry, the farm implements industry, they would take industry after industry and scrap them because they could not compete with foreign competition. Then where would the local market be?

Mr. GOULD: No.

Mr. STEVENS: That is always the answer when they are cornered. But turn them loose on the broad prairies, and they never say, No. My hon. friend would not say No before his constituents. What I say is mild compared with what my hon. friend said in the Fredericton constituency a year ago. The raging inaccuracies of my hon. friend there were simply appalling. What I want to say is this: I care not what my hon. friends' conclusions may be if they are based upon a sound premise and are reasoned from that premise; but when the figures they accept are wholly inaccurate, and the conclusions they arrive at are so wide of the mark, it is very difficult for us to give credence to their sincerity at times.

Mr. BIRD: May I ask a question?

Mr. STEVENS: My hon. friend is a dandy questioner, I notice.

Mr. BIRD: Does he attribute that inaccuracy to all the members of the Progressive party?

Mr. STEVENS: I was on the point of saying, when I was interrupted, that I believe the great bulk of the hon. members of the Progressive party in this House have been wholly misled by just such literature as I brought before the House a moment ago and which was placed in their hands by men who knew better.

Mr. GOOD: Is the hon. member not aware that in the figures he has given, there is included a very large amount of agricultural products consumed on the farm, some of it fed to animals to produce beef and dairy products?

Mr. STEVENS: Of course, anybody would know that.

Mr. GOOD: If so, is not the hon. member's reasoning entirely erroneous?

Mr. STEVENS: It must be erroneous to my hon. friend; there is no other conclusion to be arrived at.

My hon. friends talk about taxation. I have in my hand the statement that was given some months ago to the press of the country. I am not going into details, but I want to say this in regard to it: The statement is frequently made—my hon. friend from Battle River (Mr. Spencer) made it—let us assess capital—why not take more from those who have it? Now, who are paying the taxes to-day? That is a question that ought to be asked and answered in this House. Let me say that I have never been, and am not now, interested in manufacturing or anything of that kind. Why everlastingly picture the manufacturer as some horned rascal who is seeking to take from his fellow-Canadians that which does not belong to him? That is the common picture drawn by almost every hon. gentleman who speaks. I have been all over Canada many times and into our cities and towns. I worked when I was a boy in the city of Peterborough, as you know, Mr. Speaker, for a firm that represents three generations. They built up their business by attending to it, starting with a blacksmith shop and making plough-shares seventy years ago, until to-day they have a moderately large agricultural implement business. How? By working and toiling for seventy years and turning their profits back into the business. Now let me ask my hon. friends, is it wise, is it good economic policy when you see a firm making a profit above 7 per cent to take the excess for the state? Will the state make better use of that money than the individual who has it and puts it back into his business? Go over Ontario and Quebec, go over the older provinces of Canada, and you will find everywhere institutions that have been there for two, three or four generations —they are the very backbone of the industrial life of this country. Do my hon. friends know that the average number of employees in industrial concerns in Canada is only eighteen, and that in the United States the average is fifty? Why, these huge concerns are the exception, just an odd one here and there; the great bulk of the manufacturing industries of Canada are small institutions controlled by some of the best citizens in the country who serve Canada in a very excellent and a very admirable way. Let me give one illustration. In the year 1921, the last year for which we have records and figures, the rural population of Canada, according to the census, was 4,441,000. For villages, towns and cities the urban population was 4,347,000—just about a fifty-fifty break. Now let us take the business profits tax and the income tax. Who paid those taxes? My worthy friends the Agrarians paid $611,736, and the other classes, the urbans, paid $87,222,000. Now, my hon. friends will say, as one of them said last night, that the farmers do not have the income wherewith to pay income tax. True, but the point I am getting at is simply this: Hon. gentlemen say "We are overtaxed; the people we represent are burdened with taxation." Well, I have given the figures as to one branch of taxation alone. My hon. friends do this: They take the customs revenue and divide it by the population of Canada, and then they say "We are paying so much per capita." My hon. friends are altogether erroneous in that. They must know, if they know anything at all, that the great manufacturing centres of Canada, and the great and the small industries of Canada, certainly pay a higher per capita share of the customs duties than the farmer or the person living in private life does. It is utterly unfair and false to base your economic estimates on simply an average of a general tax collected.

Now let me turn from that feature of the subject. We had a most eloquent speech —I think perhaps the most eloquent of the session from many standpoints,—given in this debate by the hon. member for Springfield (Mr. Hoey), and I want to say I was delighted to hear him address the House in the eloquent way in which he did. His diction was good, as was his assembly of arguments, and I have no complaint to make of those arguments except one. I will demonstrate what that is. My complaint against his arguments and his purpose is this: The remedy which he mentioned—and the only remedy I could find in reading his speech; I heard his speech as well as read it—was "the complete reversal," I quote his own words, "of the fiscal policy of Canada" and, he said, "increasing the purchasing power of the dollar."

Mr. HOEY: Will my hon. friend permit me to make a correction; I feel persuaded he does not want to misquote me. I said "A complete reversal of policy," and I had in mind our methods of farming in the West, our extravagances there and our entire method of doing things. If the hon. member got the impression which he states I certainly did not intend to convey it.

Mr. STEVENS: I am very glad to have my hon. friend's statement. I will not quibble over the matter, I will accept his statement absolutely. My hon. friend now says "A complete reversal of policy." That is a statement under which anybody could crawl. I submit to him that it is so broad that no person could pin him down to anything. I do not know what policy he refers to unless he refers to the policy of my right hon. friend the Prime Minister—and that has been scrapped.

Mr. HOEY: I tried to make my argument clear. I said that I was in favour of a low tariff; that in my opinion the reductions in the tariff were wholly inadequate. I think I made that statement.

Mr. STEVENS: Well, I am very glad my hon. friend has made his explanation, because it certainly clarifies the atmosphere somewhat. As I said a moment ago he made a very eloquent speech. What did he present to the House? He presented to the House a certain picture, which was a list of the grievances of the farmers of the west. Let me run over some of them and then view them in the light of the general argument of my hon. friends to my left. He pointed out that "the average yield of wheat in Manitoba has dropped from 19 to 15 bushels per acre"; and he added to this, "that there were only three crops out of four, which reduces the average to 11 bushels per acre." He also made a statement respecting the character of the land. He said that the "nitrogen of the soil had been reduced 20 to 30 per cent"; that the phosphorous content had been reduced by a similar amount; that the organic had been reduced by 20 to 50 tons per acre. He further said that stem rust caused a loss of 5,000,000 bushels in 1916; and the wheat stem saw fly a loss of 3,500,000 bushels in 1921; that "every forty million bushels of wheat took plant food costing $12,000,000 to replace", and that in southern Manitoba lands produce only 10 bushels of wheat per acre; in northern Manitoba 35 bushels per acre. I will admit that every one of these complaints is correct, and I think my hon. friend gave a very clear enunciation of them. But I ask him, is there one of all that list that is affected by the fiscal policy of this country? Are they not all technical agricultural problems? Has not every problem presented there been under the consideration of the Minister of Agriculture of the previous government,—under the consideration of his own leader when he was Minister of Agriculture—under the consideration of the present head of that department? Every one of them is a technical problem. But the trouble is this: My hon. friend presented these grievances to the House as if they were related to the fiscal policy of the government or, if you like, the fiscal policy of the country. He says the policy of the country, the general policy, is to blame. But these are technical questions that can only be dealt with by experts; and I know of no group of men who know more about the remedy for these things than my hon. friends who suffer from them. Yet I do not recall, during this whole debate, or during the entire session, one single concrete suggestion for dealing with these problems was advanced by any hon. member sitting to my left—not one.

Mr. FORKE: I am very sorry; I thought I had delivered a very good speech explaining them. However, it does not seem to have done any good.

Mr. STEVENS: My hon. friend, no doubt, delivered an eloquent speech, but I do not recall that he ever dealt with these particular questions.

Mr. FORKE: My hon. friend will come to a different conclusion if he refers to Hansard.

Mr. STEVENS: Now Mr. Speaker, I must hasten to close. There was one thing I wished to refer to before we get away from the manufacturing question and the subject of the tariff. My hon. friends on my left are very fond of declaring economic principles. My hon. friend from Battle River (Mr. Spencer) yesterday made the statement that we ought to assess capital. He said that when the war was on and the manufacturers were prosperous we should have taxed their profits. Well, we did do that; we taxed them pretty heavily. I would ask the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Crerar), who does not grace the Chamber with his presence just now, this question: Will he move in the House to increase the income tax? Will he move to reinstate the business profits tax? Why has he not done so? If the income tax is too low, why go out through the country and say it is not high enough and then come to the House for one, two, three, four, five years—it is his sixth session now—and never once propose that the income tax should be increased in any particular way and never once move the adoption of the Farmers' platform? But I am speaking of the income tax and the business profits tax and I would like to put a question to my hon. friends to the left collectively. The question is: Is it sound business policy in periods of prosperity for a manufacturing concern to reserve and hold some of its profits against a decline of the market? Is that not sound? Will any hon. member object to that? Let me tell hon. members that the basis of their whole criticism of the business system of to-day is on that point. They infer and insinuate that, if a business concern makes a profit beyond 7 or 8 or 9 per cent, that profit should be sequestered for the good, as one hon. member said yesterday, of the community. I want to tell them that that is a false doctrine and that it never has and never will lend itself to the prosperity of any country. I notice my hon. friends are very careful about not giving expression to their views now. I hold in my hand the last report of the business end of their institution. Here is the political end which you see here before you, and the business end is the United Grain Growers. I have their annual report.

Mr. GOULD: In the figures you quoted, mentioning the 7 per cent, I suppose you include the watered stock of the companies?

Mr. STEVENS: If the time would permit I could give my hon. friend a very interesting talk on that. As an auditor and accountant, it has been my business, scores of times to liquidate companies and audit their books, but it would take some time to go into that question now. There are comparatively few institutions that have unduly watered stock. That is a stock phrase that my hon. friend and others like him who seek to stir up the passion, and hatred and the envy of persons who are not so well informed as he is. It is about 90 per cent false, and, here and there, about 10 per cent accurate. Here is what the business end of their institution says—

Mr. WARNER: The hon. member speaks about unduly watered stock. I want to know if he considers that watered stock should be protected, and what he considers "unduly" watered stock?

Mr. STEVENS: If hon members must have an answer, I will say this: hon. members have no right to stand in this House, as individual members of this House, and recklessly acclaim to the public that there is wholesale watering of stock, undue, due or any other kind. I say to them, if you know of any case where a company has unduly watered stock, state the name of the company, give the facts, let the country judge it, and let the hon. Minister of Labour, (Mr. Murdock) who has made some very strong statements on the subject, take up the case. I pay no attention to the argument that companies should not water their stock. I think, speaking generally, it is not a sound position. But what I object to is the reckless insinuations, made not in mental ignorance but in ignorance of the facts. When my hon. friends talk about watered stock, they always cite one or two cases from the cost of living committee. They were brought to the attention of the committee by myself, as hon. members will see if they read the evidence. The one main stock cry of the leader of the party throughout Ontario was quoted from the evidence extracted from a witness before the Cost of Living Committee by myself. However, I want to read from the Annual Report of the Grain Growers Limited, of Winnipeg, with which is affiliated seven or eight other companies, including the Grain Growers' Export Company, incorporated, of New York, the Grain Growers' Export Company of Canada, and others. I will quote from this report as the very essence of the wisdom of their own leader. This report reads:

> We have here a lesson in what would have been the proper course to have taken during the tremendous and rapid increases in prices during the war. All stocks—

That is, stocks on hand.

> —should have been marked up as the prices went up, irrespective of what the goods cost and the profits taken and set aside to care for these losses when the prices came down.

That is the doctrine. Are there not dozens of hon. members in this House who have, time after time, declaimed against the companies and the business corporations. And why? Because when there was a buoyancy in the market they took profit, and then when you point out to them that they must absorb their losses, there is an absolute barrenness of sympathy for them. But here is what is said in the last annual report of this institution, signed by their own leader as president of the institution:

> We do not consider it wise to secure machinery from any plants that are not established on what may reasonably be considered a secure and permanent basis, as the difficulty of securing repairs in case they should go out of business has already been experienced.

How could they secure themselves? By adopting the wise economic policy mentioned in the previous clause and reaffirmed in this statement. The report further says:

> There has been a good deal of agitation during the past few years for the company to either purchase or secure the controlling interests in a machinery manufacturing plant.

How often we have heard that sort of thing—"Oh look at the profits made by these institutions, profits to which they are not entitled". Is not the obvious answer echoed back? Has not the hon. member from Assiniboia (Mr. Gould) uttered in his stentorian tones all over the country the answer, which is given by the locals, "Why do you not go into the business?" That is what the locals are saying all over the country. This report says:

> There has been a good deal of agitation during the past few years for the company to either purchase or secure the controlling interest in a machinery manufacturing plant. After a study of the situation which exists in the manufacturing of machinery in United States and Canada over a period of between two and three years, we are of the opinion that it would be a mistake for the company to consider putting any money into a plant for the manufacture of farm machinery.

If I wanted to sum up in one or two paragraphs a complete answer to the economic arguments and dissertations uttered from one end of the country to the other by my hon. friends to my left, I find it in the annual report of their business institution.

I intended to pay my respects to the hon. members opposite, but I shall have to desist at this time. I shall do that by a very vigorous vote against the budget, unless it is adjusted very materially on some points to which I have referred. In closing I simply say to my hon. friend the Minister of Finance (Mr Fielding) that I trust the argument I advanced in connection with the depreciation currency clause will receive very great consideration, because I believe if it is allowed to go as it is at the present time it will wreck many of the manufacturing concerns of Canada and the people of Canada as a whole will receive no benefit, nor will the treasury of Canada receive any benefit.

Hon. Sir LOMER GOUIN (Minister of Justice and Attorney General): May I be permitted Mr. Speaker to add a few remarks to this very interesting debate which has been going on for several days, and which I feel I cannot allow to close without expressing my views on the fiscal policy of our country—views which, during the last electoral campaign I placed before the electors of my constituency and before the electors of the province of Quebec.

Two questions are before us for our consideration. We have first the proposals submitted by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) in presenting his budget. Then we have the amendment moved by the ex-Minister of Finance (Sir Henry Drayton), asking that the Government be censured, because, it is claimed, it did not carry out the promises contained in a resolution of the Liberal Convention of 1919 with regard to the fiscal policy of Canada. Many speeches have been made, many very eloquent, every one very interesting, all, in the main, in continuance of a discussion which has been going on in this country for over forty years, on the merits of the respective policies of protection and free trade. The leader of the Opposition (Mr. Meighen), in a speech delivered at Sherbrooke, in September, 1920, stated that the opposition to the Government of that day was composed, in the majority, of free traders.

And in another speech delivered at London, when he made public that he had decided to ask for dissolution of Parliament, he stated that the main issue, if not the only issue, of the future campaign was to be the tariff. During that very same campaign, indeed, all through that campaign, I constantly maintained that the issue was not between protection and free trade; that the Liberals of this country, as a party, were not free traders; that they had always been in favour of a tariff. And it is to refute contrary and unjust contentions, too often repeated, that I seek permission to say a few words.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Will the hon. gentleman not be fair enough to make clear that, in my references, at Sherbrooke and subsequently, to the fact that the majority of those opposed to the Government claimed allegiance to the gospel of free trade, I included all, including the present Progressive party?

Sir LOMER GOUIN: When I speak of the Liberal party, I speak of the Liberal party. At that time it is possible that some of the hon. members of the Progressive party were supposed, by the leader of the Opposition, to be members of the Liberal party; but I have always thought that the Liberal party, as we have it to-day, as we have had it since Confederation, is the Liberal party which sits to your right, Mr. Speaker, and it is for that party that I speak.

As you know, Mr. Speaker, we have had a tariff since the very first days of Confederation. When the Liberal party came into power for the first time in 1873, we had, as our leader, a man who believed in Liberal principles. Under his administration, the Liberal party, of its own volition, decided to increase the customs duty. The Hon. Mr. Mackenzie declared, not once, but time and time again, that there could not be in Canada any issue between protection and free trade. After him, the Hon. Edward Blake, one of the greatest statesmen that Canada has produced, during the whole of his career, while he was Prime Minister of Ontario, while he was Minister in the Cabinet at Ottawa, while he was leader of the Liberal party, always maintained that the contention of the Conservative party that the tariff was the issue between the two parties was unreasonable and unjustified. To dispel any doubt to which my statements might give rise, and, perhaps, for the good of the electors of this country, I would ask permission to read some extracts from a speech delivered by the Hon. Mr. Blake, at Malvern in 1886. That speech is, I would say, historical, and it sums up the Liberal programme on the fiscal policy at that time. This is what the Hon. Edward Blake said then:

5 p.m.

> You know well that I do not approve of needless restrictions on our liberty of exchanging what we have for what we want, and do not see that any substantial application of the restrictive principle has been or can be, made in favour of the great interests of the mechanic, the labourer, the farmer, the lumberman, the ship-builder or the fisherman. But you know also that I have fully recognized the fact that we are obliged to raise yearly a great sum made greater by the obligations imposed on us by this Government; and that we must continue to provide this yearly sum mainly by import duties, laid to a great extent on goods similar to those which can be manufactured here; and that it results as a necessary incident of our settled fiscal system that there must be a large, and, as I believe, in the view of moderate protectionists, an ample advantage to the home manufacturer.
> Our adversaries wish to present to you an issue as between the present tariff and absolute free trade. That is not the true issue. Free trade is, as I have repeatedly explained, for us impossible; and the issue is whether the present tariff is perfect, or defective and unjust. . . . . My reference there to the fiscal and financial limitations of our condition has increased force to-day, for since that time enormous sums have been added to the public debt; enormous sums have been added to the annual charge; and notwithstanding the great taxation, a larger deficit than we have ever know since Confederation has signalized the last financial year. Therefore the execution even of those measures of readjustment which I suggested in that address, and which had proposed in Parliament in the preceding session, would be found much more difficult to-day by reason of the changed condition of affairs. We have no longer a large surplus to dispose of—we have a large deficit and a greatly increased scale of expenditure to meet. And it is clearer than ever that a very high scale of taxation must be retained, and that manufacturers have nothing to fear.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): Was not that very speech made the issue between Mr. Blake and the Liberal party at that time, practically ending in his withdrawal from the leadership? And was not the Globe newspaper his adversary in connection with that very question as much as the then Conservative party?

Sir LOMER GOUIN: In reply to my hon. friend, I may inform him that hon. Mr. Blake continued to be the leader of the Liberal party.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): No, the Liberal party deposed him.

Sir LOMER GOUIN: At that time, Mr. Speaker, as in 1896, 1911, 1920 and 1921 the Conservatives, to scare the electors in general and the manufacturers in particular, informed the country that if the Liberal party was returned to power it would lower the tariff to a point which would spell ruin to our manufacturing industries; and Mr. Blake, speaking for all the Liberals of Canada from the Atlantic to the Pacific, then said, with the full authority of his leadership, what I am now going to read:

> There remains the duties of customs on other commodities, and the conditions demonstrate the impossibility of diminishing to any large extent this fund. We have no longer a surplus to dispose of; we have a deficit to overcome; and, that done, we have a tremendous yearly charge to overtake. "Oh, but," say some Tories, "you can yet do this and make a free trade or non-protective tariff." The statement is dishonest and absurd. Even in Mr. Mackenzie's time, with his fiscal views, with his moderate expenditure, it would have been absurd. . . .
> I invite the most ardent free trader in public to present a plausible solution of this problem; and I contend that he is bound to do so before he talks of free trade as practicable in Canada. I have not believed it soluble in my day, and any chance of its solubility, if any chance there were, has been destroyed by the vast increase of our yearly charge, and by the other conditions which have been created. The thing is removed from the domain of practical politics. In their discussions the Tories say that Mr. Mackenzie's was a free trade tariff. I will give you high authorities to the contrary. As a fact, substantial duties were laid on almost everything which we could make at home; and Mr. Mackenzie increased those duties beyond the rate at which they stood when he took office. Sir Richard Cartwright has lately stated that he contemplated a still further increase, and he was right. Subsequent experience has demonstrated the fact that the circumstances required that course.

And in this same speech he emphasized that statement, saying:

> I have only to repeat in the most emphatic language my declaration that there is, in my judgment, no possibility of a change in that system of taxation which I have described, the necessary effect of which is to give a large and ample advantage to the home manufacturer over his competitor abroad.

He also stated in the course of that speech:

> There is nothing there—I could not honestly say anything—as to the removal of the tariff of duties having a protective operation in order to the substitution of free trade. I have shown you that this was not possible before 1873; that it was not possible during Mr. Mackenzie's time; that it was still less possible in 1882; and that it is far, far less possible now even than it was in 1882. That being so, I could not honestly propose to accomplish the impossible.

In the main, Mr. Speaker, those are the principles which have always inspired the Liberal party and its leaders. Those in the main are the principles which Sir Wilfrid Laurier and the hon. Minister of Finance embodied in the revisions of the tariff of 1897 and 1907—revisions which brought the most prosperous era in our national history. And we shall see a return of that prosperity under the present administration, ably led by the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), aided by the experience, the wisdom, the ability and the high patriotism of the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding), to whom have been paid such well-deserved compliments by hon. members of all parties, and I beg leave to associate myself most heartily with them.

Mr. Speaker, the policy of the Liberal party on the fiscal question, in the last electoral campaign, is to be found in the speeches of the right hon. Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance delivered in this House during the budget debate last session. I propose to read a few sentences only of a speech by the hon. Minister of Finance to show his attitude on our fiscal policy. Speaking on the budget last year he said:

> I would not have any industry which is at present established in Canada unfairly dealt with; I would not try to strike down any industry that exists to-day, even if it were not wisely established.

And he proceeded:

> There is no issue of free trade in Canada to-day. The Liberal party of Canada has not proposed free trade, did not propose free trade when it was in office, does not propose free trade to-day. And just as we said then to the people that they could trust the Liberal party, if they came into power, to be fair and just while following sound principles, so we say to the people of Canada and the manufacturers of Canada to-day: Do not be misled by the statements made by my right hon. friend about free trade, because it is merely, as I said, a repetition of the old game of 1896; and as it failed in 1896, so it will fail in 1921 or 1922, whenever the election arrives.

The right hon. leader of this House at the same time, in a very eloquent speech, said:

> Let me repeat, Mr. Speaker, the issue is not between protection and free trade. If anyone has any doubhts on that score, let him read the second clause of the amendment which is before the House, and which will be supported unanimously, I believe, by hon. members on this side of the House. What is the first sentence of that clause? It is to the effect that existing financial requirements of the Dominion demand the maintenance of the customs tariff.

Again, in an article published in Maclean's Magazine, under his own name, the right hon. Prime Minister wrote:

> With the Liberal party, the main concern respecting the tariff is not free trade or protection, it is revenue, and the simultaneous development of industry in such manner as is likely to serve best the interests of the Canadian people. There will be required for purposes of revenue large sums of money which, of necessity, will have to be raised by indirect taxation through a customs tariff.

Are these declarations, Mr. Speaker, a contradiction of the resolution submitted by the hon. Minister of Finance? Whatever may be said by hon. members who sit to your left, how could we do better than what is proposed by the hon. Minister of Finance? From 1873 to 1877 the Hon. Mr. Mackenzie told the electors of this country, both friends and opponents, that absolute free trade was impossible in Canada; that we required a tariff to meet our expenditures. The Hon. Mr. Blake, while he was leader of the Liberal party, always contended that the Liberals were not free traders; that free trade was impossible in our country; that we required a tariff for revenue, and that that tariff, while bringing us revenue to meet part of our expenditure, would enable at the same time the manufacturers of our country to compete with those of other lands. He gave as an argument to justify his position the fact that we had a very large debt; that our expenses had increased in such large measure that it was impossible to secure the necessary revenue for the administration of the public affairs without imposing a tariff for revenue.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Did Mr. Blake not change his views when he resigned the leadership of the Liberal party, and did he not, in the letters he wrote to his electors in Durham, give that as the reason why he resigned?

Sir LOMER GOUIN: He did not resign on the question of the tariff; I do not know that the Hon. Mr. Blake ever changed his views on the fiscal policy of this country. When we consider that in 1882 our national debt amounted to $153,000,000; that our revenues totalled $35,000,000 and our expenditures $34,600,000; when we consider that our national debt to-day amounts to $2,500,000,000; that it increased by $92,000,000 in 1921 and by $86,000,000 in 1922; that the estimated expenditure for the current year is $466,000,000 and the estimated revenue $332,000,000, a difference of $134,000,000—when we consider these things, and if the views of the Hon. Mr. Mackenzie and the Hon. Mr. Blake were sound; if the Laurier-Fielding tariff was sound, how can any one pretend that we in this country can do without a customs tariff? Do you know, Mr. Speaker, that to-day the percentage of customs revenues in proportion to the whole is less than 50 per cent of what it was in 1871, in 1881, in 1891, in 1901, and in 1911? In support of that statement let me quote the following figures:

REVENUE.

Year	Dutiable	Duty Collected	Total Receipts	Per Cent.
1871.....	60,094,362	11,807,590	19,375,036 79	60·94
1881.....	71,620,725	18,492,645	29,635,297 54	62·40
1891.....	74,536,036	23,416,266	38,579,310 88	60·79
1901.....	105,969,756	29,106,980	52,516,332 76	55·45
1911.....	282,723,812	73,312,368	117,884,328 36	62
1922.....	.....	105,500,000	381,271,000 00	28

The revenue from customs decreased last year by some $57,000,000, as was stated by the hon. Minister of Finance. The minister estimates that the current year will show another decrease of some two millions and a half. The estimated customs revenue for this year is $103,000,000. Compared with the total estimated revenue, and adding to the latter the probable increased revenue which we shall receive from the new taxes, the percentage of customs revenue for this year will be even less than it was last year; in other words, we shall receive this year from customs collections less than 28 per cent of our total revenue, whereas in 1871, 1881 and even as late as 1891 it amounted to 60 per cent of our total revenue. In the United Kingdom, to which reference has been made many times during this debate, and which is cited as a free trade country, we find that the revenue from customs and excise amounts to about 25 per cent of the total revenue. Mr. Speaker, to-day as last year, as in the first days of Confederation, we require the tariff revenue to meet our expenditures.

Some hon. members have contended during this debate that the industrial establishments of the country have not been beneficial to Canada but have rather hindered its development. I must say that none of the speeches I have heard or have read have convinced me that such a contention is justified. On the contrary, I believe to-day, as I believed in the past, that the manufacturers have been a strong factor in the development of Canada. With the majority if not with all the members of this House, I am of opinion that the basic industry of Canada is agriculture. But I am of opinion also that without our manufactures our country would not have reached the degree of development that it has attained to-day.

Sir Wilfrid Laurier, whose authority we all like so much to cite in this House and outside, before he was entrusted with the administration of affairs in this country, long before, at the very commencement of his brilliant career declared in 1871 in a speech which he made before the House of Quebec that we should not think of remaining a farming country, and he declared in most emphatic terms that we should create national industries in this country. Here is the language used by Sir Wilfrid Laurier on that occasion:

> It is a humiliating confession to make that, after three centuries of existence this country is still unable to supply its own wants and that it is still obliged to have recourse to foreign markets, though nature has lavished upon it all the gifts necessary to render it a manufacturing country. . . .
>
> It is a duty, especially for us Canadians of French origin, to create. . . .
>
> Thus far it seems to me that the Government has been moving in the wrong direction. The Government has devoted itself to recruiting an exclusively agricultural immigration—its efforts will end in nothing. The agricultural population of this country will never be increased from outside. . . .
> We can, however, introduce here with good results, I think, an industrial immigration. I do not mean simple workmen, but master mechanics and small capitalists such as are to be found in all the cities of Europe.

I remember the time when we had in this country very few manufacturing establishments, especially in the province of Quebec. I remember the days when many of our farmers had to abandon their farms, where they could no longer find subsistence for their families, and leave their native parish. The farms of Quebec at that time were just as fertile, just as productive, as they are to-day; our farmers of those days were just as robust, just as hard workers and as thrifty as the farmers of to-day. But they had no market in which to sell their products. They had to abandon their farms and leave their parish to seek work in the neighbouring republic where industry was properous. The same thing was happening in all the old provinces of the Confederation, and so we lost annually thousands and thousands of the best of our citizens, not immigrants who were only passing through Canada, but good Canadians whose families had lived for generations in our Canadian land.

You are no doubt aware, Mr. Speaker, of the many compliments which have been paid to the province of Quebec during the last four or five years. I think I know the good old province of Quebec as well as any Canadian, and I say without any hesitation that what has contributed in a very large measure to make our province prosperous and our farmers satisfied with their lot is the fact that our manufactures have supplied our farmers with a market where they can sell their product, and what I say for Quebec must be true, and it is true, of every province of this Dominion where there are manufacturing establishments. If that industrial development is due in a measure, and I say it is in a measure due, to our fiscal policy, whether we call our tariff a tariff for revenue or designate it by any other name, it seems to me we have no reason to regret it.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Hear, hear. What is the difference?

Sir LOMER GOUIN: I have a table before me which shows the progress of our manufactures in Canada since 1870. I find that in that year the value of our manufactured products was $221,617,773; in 1890, $469,847,886; in 1905, $718,352,603; in 1910, $1,165,975,639; in 1917, $3,015,577,940; in 1918, $3,458,036,975 and in 1919, $3,520,724,039. No one can deny that our manufactures have been great contributors to the growth of our large cities. Through the establishment of industries we have prosperous towns, and villages to-day, where less than thirty years ago we could see but a very few houses.

One hon. member who spoke during the course of this debate said that between 1911 and 1921 we had lost over two million good citizens of this country, and we wonder why so many of our citizens who should have found space and place to build their homes in Canada have left us. I may be wrong, Mr. Speaker, but I am of the opinion that if we had had in this country more industries, we would have kept with us many of those who have left us to go elsewhere. Do you not think that those two million citizens we thus lost, if added to our population of nine millions, would have consumed that 27 per cent of exportation of our farm products? Statistics show that England has invested in our country two and a half billions of dollars, and that the United States have invested nearly two billions of dollars. We have, if our statistics are correct, some three billions of dollars invested in industrial establishments.

Do you not think Mr. Speaker, that if the tariff were removed it would have a very bad effect on those investments and do you not think that capital, which is easily driven away, would seek in some other country the return which it could not find in our land? Listening to the members of the Progressive party I could not but conclude that the inhabitants of the prairie provinces are under the impression that the eastern provinces act selfishly towards them. Do our hon. friends suppose that without our manufacturers Canada would have progressed as it has done, even in their own provinces? We know and we regret to know, that the farmers of the West are going through days of difficulty. But this can be only a temporary crisis, and I would ask them whether they think that by cutting down the revenue of approximately $103,000,000 that we receive from our customs, something like $12 per capita, that by dropping that revenue they would remedy the evils from which they suffer and of which they complain? Would they take upon themselves the responsibility of making radical reductions in our tariff and closing down many, if not the most of our manufactures, and throwing on the street the five or six hundred thousand workers who find in those manufactures a living and subsistence for their families? Moreover, Mr. Speaker, if we have to reduce our tariff to such a figure that we would not receive more than ten, or fifteen, or twenty million dollars, with the obligations we have to face we would necessarily have to find some other sources of revenue, and our friends of the prairie provinces would have to contribute their share of the new taxes. The remedy for the conditions under which we suffer, Mr. Speaker, is the increase of our population and strict economy. Abolish the tariff? No government would think of doing it, and no government could do it even if it tried. Strict economy is needed. Drastic economy is easy to preach but very difficult, and at times painful to practice. Nevertheless however painful and difficult the task may be, whatever government is entrusted with responsibilty for the administration of Canada for years to come, it will have to accept and fulfil that task if we look for the salvation of our country.

As to the increase of our population we can have it by a sane immigration policy. We have already spent very large sums to induce immigrants from the older parts of the world to come and settle in our country. I understand that since 1900 we have spent over $20,000,000 upon immigration. Many of those who have come, invited as they were by our agents, have left our country; but we have kept some of them and I believe that in the future we should look for a good class of immigrants, who would come to our land to help us in the development of our natural resources.

With the Minister of Finance I understand the very serious position we are in, as are many countries in the world, as a result of the great conflict which brought mourning, misery, trouble and anxiety in its train, but a conflict which fortunately terminated in the triumph of right and justice. I realize the weight that rests upon the shoulders of our good citizens. I sympathize and fully sympathize with our good farmers whose service is so essential to the very life of our people and who are actually not equitably remunerated. I do not forget, I cannot forget, that we have in this country at this hour too many unemployed. Nevertheless when I consider our immense riches, when I consider our innumerable possibilities, I am confident in the future. I believe that our good people will unite to surmount and to alleviate the sufferings and miseries of the day and that soon, with the help of Providence, we will see in this good land of ours the return of that era of prosperity, of unity, of harmony, of contentment and of hope which we enjoyed before 1914.

I have very few words to add in regard to the amendment proposed by the ex-Minister of Finance. I am confident that the people, the electors of Canada, will not consider this amendment serious any more than did the Canadian press. No, Mr. Speaker, the electors of Canada were not deceived by the Liberal party during the last electoral campaign. Some of the electors were disappointed, bitterly disappointed, but the majority were perfectly satisfied. The electors of Canada voted in favour of the Liberal party because they had confidence in that party, and they voted against the government because they did not want any more of the National Liberal Conservative régime.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Cheer now.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I shall wait for the argument.

Sir LOMER GOUIN: As to our friends of the Progressive party, when I count the number of members who have come from the prairie provinces in support of the Liberal party, I cannot imagine how the electors of those provinces at all events could ever contend that they were deceived by the liberal promises of the last electoral campaign. As to the provinces where the Liberal party secured its majority, the hon. members who support the Government can confidently return to their constituents, rightfully conscious that they have fulfilled their mandate. For, Mr. Speaker, notwithstanding what was said by the hon. members of both oppositions, the budget submitted for our consideration by the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) is in perfect consistency with the promises made to the electors of Canada by the Liberal party during the last election. Speaking for myself, Mr. Speaker, I will go back to my good province of Quebec, to tell the people of Quebec, that they were right and that they were wise when they unanimously on the 6th December last voted confidence in the Liberal party. I will feel proud to tell them that the leader of this House, the right hon. Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. Mackenzie King) has shown by his eloquence, by his broadmindedness, by his courage, by his sincerity and his patriotism, that he is the worthy successor of our great late chief, Sir Wilfrid Laurier.

Mr. T. W. CALDWELL (Victoria and Carleton): Mr. Speaker, before proceeding to discuss the question before the House, I wish to join with the hon. members who have preceded me in this debate in extending sincere congratulations to the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) on having achieved the unequalled distinction of having delivered his sixteenth budget to the Parliament of Canada, as well as the contribution he has been able to make to the advancement of Canada in other respects, not the least of which was his effort in 1911 to bring about the reciprocity agreement between Canada and the United States and his recent efforts along that line.

Before proceeding to discuss the budget, I wish to refer to some remarks made by the hon. Minister of Justice (Sir Lomer Gouin). I noticed when he was expounding his tariff belief a very peculiar thing, that the applause came from the official Opposition, and not from his own supporters in the House, and I noticed that, when he began to speak of the result of the election last fall, his own followers showed the first symptoms of cheering up a bit. Another statement he made was that the manufacturers of Canada had furnished a market for the products of the farm in Canada. I do not like to interrupt an hon. member when he is speaking, although I would have liked to have asked him if he would pretend to tell the House or this country that the wheat, or potatoes, or other farm products grown in Canada, can find a market here, notwithstanding the fact that we have had forty years or upwards of protection. Last year, in my province alone, there were thousands of barrels of potatoes dumped, because there were no markets in Canada for them. The price we could have received for potatoes would not have paid the freight to market. The same condition continues to prevail and the farmers in the present year have received less than 50 per cent of the cost of producing the potato crop in my province, which is the crop we grow for export.

Mr. McQUARRIE: Will the hon. member tell us if any potatoes came into his district from the United States?

Mr. CALDWELL: No. I want to digress a moment. I was willing when I came to this House to believe that the farmers and the people of British Columbia generally were as efficient and as able to take care of themselves, possibly, as the people of New Brunswick. I have been compelled, almost against my will, to reverse my judgment, because I find the people of British Columbia bewailing the fact that they cannot hold their own against the residents of the United States immediately opposite them.

In the province from which I come the farmers are very anxious to have a reciprocity agreement enacted between Canada and the United States. I live immediately next to that great potato belt in the state of Maine, with the imaginary line between us, and the people of the state of Maine are afraid of their lives that we will get reciprocity with United States. They are urging that barriers be placed against Canada. So that I cannot help thinking that we must certainly be far more efficient in New Brunswick than our farmer friends in British Columbia, because I do not think the farmers of either New Brunswick or the state of Maine will admit there are more efficient farmers in the United States, especially potato farmers, than can be found in the state of Maine. They are afraid of competition with the farmers of New Brunswick, while the farmer in British Columbia is afraid of the competition of his neighbour on the United States side. I can hardly understand this unless it be that the British Columbia farmers and the people generally are not on a par with the people in New Brunswick. It is the only way I can account for it.

Owing to the fact that a committee of which I am a member was sitting last night I had not the pleasure of hearing the speech of the hon. member from Lincoln (Mr. Chaplin). However, when I came to read it this morning I found I had not missed very much, because it was the same speech he delivered two years ago with a few variations. One of these had reference to the duty on potatoes; he said two years ago the farmer had benefitted to the extent of $10,000,000 due to the duty on potatoes. In his speech last night it was increased to $15,000,000, although he quoted from the same statistics. Another thing he said was that I had demolished the argument he made in this House in 1920, and that he had not had a chance to reply to my criticism. The hon. member for Lincoln sat in this House last session, and I think I am right in saying that you will not find his name in Hansard last year. One member of the Opposition last year was unkind enough to say that the reason he did not speak in favour of his government last year was that he had not received a further contract from them to supply goods in connection with the Roumanian loan. I do not know if that was the reason. But he said he had not had a chance to reply to my statement, although he was in the House all last session. Last night the hon member said:

> I might say here that I gave some of these figures once before, and the hon. member for Victoria and Carleton (Mr. Caldwell) demolished my whole argument by saying that the member for Lincoln ought to know that there is no duty on potatoes.

This was in 1920, and he still insists there was a duty on potatoes at that time. He does not seem to realize the fact that the duty was removed from potatoes, either going from Canada to United States, or coming from the United States to Canada during the session of 1918, two years previous to the time he made the statement in this House. He insisted in 1920 that the duty still remained on potatoes. It is just possible he does not know the war is over, although I would think he should know, because he helped supply the goods for the Roumanian loan made by the government, after the war was over.

In coming to a discussion of the budget, I wish first to quote a statement made in this House two days ago by the present Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King). He said:

> I submit as I have already intimated, that in the proposals which the Minister of Finance has brought down, he has succeeded in relieving taxation, as it bears upon the great mass of the people, and shifting the burden of taxation to a more considerable extent on to the shoulders of those who are best able to bear it.

I do not agree with that statement of the Prime Minister, and I hardly think he can be sincere in making it, because I am going to quote from his speech in 1920, when this tax was instituted by the party which is now the official Opposition, and I think this quotation will prove that I have a very good right to think that he has not, unlike the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Chaplin) given us the same speech that he gave us two years ago, nor is he agreeing with the speech which he made two years ago; absolutely the contrary. I contend, as I did in 1920, that the sales tax imposes a burden on people least able to bear it. When that method of taxation was under discussion, I supported the idea of imposing a luxury tax and also a business or excess profits tax, as did the present Prime Minister. I deplored the fact at that time that the government would put a sales tax on the necessaries of life, which tax, I stated I thought would tend to race suicide in this country. I was ridiculed for making that statement in the House, although I think I proved it very well before I sat down. Let us take the case of the workingman who is working for a small wage. He has a large family and he must find for them the necessaries of life, food, clothing, boots and shoes and so on. They are not all taxable; but many of them are, and I think, when I quote the Prime Minister's speech in 1920, I shall have good proof for the statement that I am making at the present time. I said that this would tend to race suicide because, I asked: How can a poor man provide for a family if this sales tax is imposed on all the necessaries of life? I think the House will agree with me that the tendency is for the poor man to raise the big family; and in the imposition of a sales tax, the revenue is collected, not according to a man's ability to pay, but on the necessities of himself and his family, no matter how poor he may be.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

After Recess

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. CALDWELL: Mr. Speaker, when the House rose at six o'clock I was about to quote from a speech made by the right hon. Prime Minister in this House in 1920 in order that I might prove the inconsistency of the statement he made two days ago and of this budget with what he stated at that time. Two days ago he said:

> The present budget would shift the burden of taxation to a more considerable extent upon the shoulders of those who are best able to bear it.

To-day he claims that increasing this tax by 50 per cent will shift the burden of taxation to a more considerable extent upon the shoulders of those best able to bear it. Now I am going to quote what the right hon. gentleman said two years ago about the shoulders best able to bear the burden of taxation. While approving the luxury tax, he criticized the government for introducing this sales tax, and he said:

> But what have they done? Instead of alleviating the high cost of living as it affects the great mass of consumers they have added to it. They have increased the cost of living and made it more difficult for the people of Canada to live than it has been heretofore. To an invisible tariff they have added a visible tariff on a great multitude of commodities, thereby increasing the cost of living to the vast body of consumers. From one end of Canada to the other, in every home, there has been considerable difficulty in coping with the situation. Go where you will, you will find this the baffling problem that taxes the ingenuity of the great majority of the people. As I say, Mr. Speaker, instead of meeting the high cost of living as it was obviously the duty of the government to have met it, by reducing the tariff on the necessaries of life, they have added this visible tariff in the nature of an excise to the invisible tariff which already exacts its toll from the people in regard to commodities in general use.
> But they have done more than that. They have not been satisfied with merely adding one tax but they have heaped tax upon tax on many of the necessaries of life that enter into daily consumption.
> So far as this budget affects luxuries we can heartily endorse all that the government proposes. It is proper that luxuries should be taxed, and taxed just as much as they will stand, but, as has been pointed out by one hon. member after another on this side of the House, there are many articles, such as boots and shoes, clothing, the different articles required in the daily food of poor people, canned goods for example, which are taxed and overtaxed. Consider this excise tax in relation to the cost of living.

Still the right hon. gentleman says that increasing the sales tax by 50 per cent—the tax that he denounced in such round terms two years ago—will ease the cost of living! Well, Mr. Speaker, I am not able to follow his reasoning.

But digressing for the moment from the sales tax, I find a reduction in the duty on clothing, such as ready-made clothing and underwear, of 2½ per cent, while the duty on silk goods is reduced 7½ per cent. Now, this is evidently in the interests of the poor people, because of course all the poor people wear silk clothes!

I desire to point out a few discrepancies in the statements made by the right hon. Prime Minister, and the absolute failure in the budget of to-day to carry out his ideas of two years ago. Speaking about the tax on goods sent out of the country, the right hon. gentleman on June 1, 1920, used the following language, which will be found at page 2973 of Hansard for that year:

> Instead of caring for and protecting the consumers, the government have left them to their fate. One thing I was surprised to see in regard to this matter was that while a tax is put upon the goods obtained by the consumer, there is no tax upon the goods that are being sent out of the country.

The present budget contains the following provision:

> Provided further that the excise taxes specified in this section shall not be payable on goods exported,—

That is in absolute contradiction to the statement made by the right hon. Prime Minister two years ago. And a little further down, in fact in the next paragraph of the budget, we find the following:

> A drawback may be granted of ninety-nine per cent of the said taxes paid on the materials used, wrought into or attached to articles exported—

So they not only do not levy this tax that he thought was so necessary two years ago on articles exported, but they give a rebate of ninety-nine per cent of the tax on raw materials that go into the manufacture of those articles so exported. I want to show why he said at that time that the government did not levy taxes on goods exported. I have already quoted his remarks where he expresses surprise that while a tax was put upon the goods obtained by the consumer there was no tax upon the goods that were being sent out of the country. Then he continued:

> Why?

With a big question mark after it.

> Because in that instance it helps the manufacturer. He, not the consumer, is the chief consideration with the government. Again, the more you export out of the country, the less there is for the consumer. Look it all over and you see all along the line the interests of the privileged classes carefully taken care of while the interests of the great bulk of the people have not been safeguarded.

In this connection, Mr. Speaker, I submit there is—I was going to say absolutely no difference between this budget and the budget he was then discussing; there is, however, this difference: In the budget of 1920 there was a tax on luxuries and on excess profits, while in this budget there is no hint of similar taxes. So if you are to compare the two, this is a more protectionist budget from that point of view.

And this is what the right hon. gentleman stated in regard to the duty on the tools of production in the course of the same speech which I have already quoted from. This will be found at page 2979 of Hansard for 1920:

> I can imagine my hon. friend, the Minister of Finance, saying when I suggest that some of the wartime wealth might be taxed, "It is poor policy to tax capital, because capital is the goose that lays the golden eggs." Well, I can appreciate his not wishing to tax capital, but I wonder if it has occurred to hon. gentlemen opposite that if there is one form of capital that is most essentially capital it is the instruments of production that are used for carrying on further production. Instruments of production for the basic industries are the real capital that is necessary, along with labour, to create further wealth; and as long as customs duties are kept on the implements of production of the basic industries so long you are simply taxing the capital that is necessary to produce further wealth.

I will admit, as the member for Brome (Mr. McMaster) so well put it, that they have made a shuffle in the direction of reducing the duty on the implements of production. Some hon. members have called it a short step, I agree with the member for Brome that it is not a step but merely a shuffle, and I think the consumer is getting much the worst of even that shuffle.

In his budget the Finance Minister estimates that there will be a reduction of revenue on account of the reduction of duties of one and one-half millions; I think that is the figure. He does not tell us what increased revenue he expects to collect by reason of the 50 per cent increase in the sales tax, but anyone who examines the figures as to the revenue derived from the sales tax last year can work that out for himself. Last year the amount collected under this head was $60,000,000; an increase of 50 per cent would result in the collection of $90,000,000, provided that the same amount of business was done, and I think it is fair to suppose that would be the case. So that in this shuffle we get relief to the extent of $1,500,000 in one direction, and we get $30,000,000 shuffled on in the other, which means an increased burden to the consuming public of $28,500,000. I thoroughly agreed with the Prime Minister's attitude on the matter of sales tax and luxury taxes two years ago; I am very sorry that he does not take the same attitude to-day. If he did—and I am speaking for myself only—I would have no hestitation in supporting a budget such as he advocated at that time. It would mean relief to the consuming public by elimination of the sales tax, and the taxing of luxuries, if you will, to take its place—because we all realize that we must have revenue.

I wish to quote further from the remarks of the right hon. Prime Minister with regard to a matter that has not been referred to in the present budget, and it is an item which affects most seriously the interests of the constituents whom I represent. Quoting from the Liberal platform, he said, as reported on page 2982 of Hansard, June 1, 1920:

> That, in the interests of agriculture, in aid of greater production on the land, and for the conservation of the soil in Canada, it is expedient for the Government to arrange for the distribution of fertilizers at the lowest possible cost.

By the way, in the Liberal platform—and I do not need to read it; I think we all know what it says, though unfortunately we are not going to see any of its terms put into operation this year—in that platform it is proposed to put fertilizer on the free list, yet my hon. friends have not given it the miserable little 2½ per cent reduction that they have seen fit to extend to some other items. Before I have finished I shall give to the House some facts as to how the duty on fertilizers affects the producers of eastern Canada—because I believe you do not use them in the West; and as to how very slight the loss of revenue would be if the customs duty on this article were abolished. But before I come to that I wish to deal with the matter of how the duty affects the price of farm implements.

The hon. member for St. John (Mr. Baxter) early in the session censured my honoured leader for stating that the price of machinery and other commodities was enhanced as the result of the imposition of duties upon them. The hon. gentleman stated that a certain article of machinery had been purchased in Maine by a New Brunswick man at just the price of the article in Canada plus the duty. He said that this article had been purchased on account of some breach of contract; it was the purchase of one article on one special occasion. Now, I am not going to cite an instance of the purchase of one article on one special occasion. I have a complete list here of the prices charged in the state of Maine and in New Brunswick by one and the same firm. I have the price list on the basis of which their agents are selling; I am not quoting from hearsay or from newspaper reports or anything of that kind. I shall not give the full details, but any hon. gentleman who wishes to obtain them may see these price lists if he wishes to. Well, for a 10-foot hay rake with 32 teeth, the price in Canada is $52.50 and in the state of Maine, $43.75, a difference of $8.75—and this rake is sold on two farms, one alongside the other, one on each side of the imaginary line. I live within six miles of that imaginary line and I know what I am talking about. The ex-Minister of Finance told us the other day that the actual duty paid on the material that went into the manufacture of a horse rake in Canada was 95½ cents; taking that from the difference in price, we still have a difference of $7.79½ which cannot be accounted for by the duty on material. A 6-foot mower costs in Canada $99 and in the state of Maine $83.75, a difference of $15.25. A six-foot binder with bundle carrier complete is $235.50 in New Brunswick, and $200 in the state of Maine. The ex-Minister of Finance told us that the actual duty paid on the material entering into the manufacture of that binder was $2.65, which still leaves a balance of $32.85. The manufacturer is able to take advantage of the duty and mulct the Canadian farmer to the tune of $32.85 over and above all his outlay on this binder and over and above what he charges the farmer in Maine. I may say that I am referring to the prices of a United States firm with a Canadian branch and with agencies on both sides of the line. When I gave a statement to the Tariff Commission in 1920 I was asked where these articles were shipped from. Well, due to the fact that there is no duty on farm machinery entering the United States from Canada, if the Canadian factory is nearer the state of Maine than the American factory the goods can be delivered from the Canadian factory. The same applies to fertilizers, with which I will deal later.

Now, lest a second Mr. Vincent Massey may come along I am going to quote prices that I put before the Tariff Commission in 1920 when they sat in New Brunswick, and I want to show you that the statement made at that time by Mr. Vincent Massey had no resemblance to the truth. I quoted a long list of farm machinery at that time, but I will give only one item on this occasion, the item Mr. Massey objected to. I was not quoting the Massey-Harris prices at that time; I was giving the figures from the price list of the International Harvester Company. I gave the cash price of a mower in the state of Maine as being $90 and in Canada as $97.50. Mr. Massey appeared before the Tariff Commission in Toronto a few days later and when he was shown my statement he said: "Mr. Caldwell's Maine price is correct—that is, the cash price, $90; but he quoted the long-time price in New Brunswick of $97.50. The difference is the difference between the cash price and the time price." Well, I have under my hand the Massey-Harris price list that was in operation at the time I made that statement in the summer of 1920, a price list on the basis of which one of their agents whom I know very well sold Massey-Harris machinery. This price list shows that the Massey-Harris cash price for a 6-foot mower was $99, or $1.50 higher than I quoted as being the price of the International Harvester Company, and the Massey-Harris long time price was $114. Now that shows the dependence you can put on statements of the manufacturers when they find their corns are being trampled upon: they will tell you anything if the other fellow is not there to contradict it. I cannot help putting the hon. member for Lincoln in the same category as Mr. Vincent Massey

I promised to deal with the question of fertilizers; I want to do this briefly. I want to give you the imports of fertilizers into Canada from 1916 to 1921 as taken from the Dominion government statistics. By the way, fertilizer chemicals come into Canada free of duty; mixed fertilizer pays a duty of 10 per cent. I suppose we will be told that that duty is not taken advantage of, either. But I happen to have a price list under my hand—two of them, in fact—issued from an office in my own province. One is the Maine price list for 1921-1922, and the other is the New Brunswick price list for 1921-1922, issued from the very same office, for the very same brand of fertilizer put up out of the same bin and there is a much longer freight haul to the state of Maine because the fertilizer has to pass over nearly the whole length of New Brunswick to get from the factory to Maine. These price lists show that the same brand and analysis of fertilizer was sold in Maine for $9 per ton less than in New Brunswick right at the factory.

Mr. McMASTER: Where is it manufactured?

Mr. CALDWELL: I am glad my hon. friend has asked that question. This fertilizer is mixed in New Brunswick. They call themselves manufacturers, but they manufacture nothing. They buy their chemicals and import them, put them into a hopper, stir them up, bag them, and put them out. They are not manufacturers at all. They simply mix the ingredients. Our farmers, for the reasons I am going to give, are now importing their own chemicals in large quantities and I want to give the House the price at which they buy their chemicals and the price at which these manufacturers, as they call themselves, sell the stuff. Last year the difference between the Maine and New Brunswick price for fertilizer from this same factory was $15. Of course, there was the exchange rate in their favour last year; American money was worth so much more. That was legitimate, but I do not think it is legitimate for them to take advantage of the tariff.

Mr. McMASTER: That is what it is there for.

Mr. CALDWELL: I stated in this House two years ago that I thought the manufacturers of this country should hail the exchange rate at that time as a godsend, because it furnished them just the same kind of protection that a tariff does.

In 1916 we imported duty free fertilizers into Canada to the amount of $1,622,998. That would amount to 40,824 tons. I have estimated that in the last six years the average difference between the Maine and New Brunswick price of mixed fertilizer is $10. The difference was $9 this year, $15 last year, and it has never been less than $9, I think, in the last six years. So the Canadian manufacturer of fertilizer, as he calls himself, the Canadian mixer, as I call him, was able to exact $10 per ton more from the farmers of Canada on account of this duty, and in 1916 he exacted $408,240 of an extra profit on that 40,824 tons. That same year we imported dutiable fertilizer to the amount of $586,751, and we collected in duty on that fertilizer $58,675. In other words, the customs tariff enabled the Canadian mixer of fertilizer to put into his pocket $408,240 of an extra profit, while it produced in revenue for the country only $58,675. I shall not weary the House by giving the whole list, but the figures for the five succeeding years correspond with those I have given. In the past six years we imported duty free fertilizers to the amount of $13,520,575, and that gave an extra profit to the manufacturers on account of their taking advantage of the tariff of $3,380,170. We collected in duties in those six years on dutiable fertilizer the sum of $587,134. In other words, in order to collect a little over half a million dollars on dutiable fertilizer brought into Canada, we had a tariff that enabled the Canadian mixer to extract from the pockets of the farmers $3,380,170 in extra profits on the duty free fertilizer chemicals that they brought in. Still they will tell you they do not take advantage of the tariff!

I want to give another illustration, and I shall give last year's prices as I have not the figures on chemicals for this year. Last year the New Brunswick farmer paid $76.03 in cash by the carload for 4-8-6 brand of fertilizer in bags, 4-8-6 representing 4 per cent ammonia, 8 per cent phosphoric acid, and 6 per cent potash. That is the price we had to pay, but our farmers' organizations, knowing that these fertilizer mixers were taking advantage of the tariff, imported their own chemicals, and got them laid down at the station freight paid, the very same materials, mind you, for $50.62, or a difference of $25.41 between the cost of the chemicals brought freight paid to our station, and the cost we had to pay when buying the very same article from the factory freight paid to our station. I will now give the ingredients in that brand:

200 lbs. Nitrate Soda at $81 per ton..	$ 8 10
100 lbs. Sulphate of Ammonia at $92 per ton..	4 60
200 lbs. Tankage at $62 per ton.. ..	6 20
800 lbs. Acid Phosphate at $46..	18 40
240 lbs. Potash (50%) at $111..	13 32
	$50 62

You will notice that this does not make a ton. The mixer puts in according to the grade of his fertilizer, and the lower the grade the more it takes, sand or road dust to make it dry enough to go through the machine.

Mr. McMASTER: These are not native New Brunswickers, surely?

Mr. CALDWELL: I am glad the hon. member asked that question. I spoke of the fact that the Canadian mixer of fertilizer was able to collect that vast extra profit of $3,000,000 from the potato growers, chiefly of New Brunswick, because very little fertilizer is used elsewhere, solely on account of the tariff. These people who mix this stuff are not New Brunswick people, or Canadians, so far as I know. They are a Canadian branch of an American firm that has built a little plant down there where they stir up these ingredients, and collect this extra $10 from the farmers of New Brunswick, and then send it back to their American bank. I said in this House two years ago that if we were making Canadian millionaires by the operation of the tariff it would be bad enough, but in this case we are making American millionaires with Canadian money. That is my contention. I do not wish to weary the House by reading any more figures.

Some one may say: The hon. member for Carleton is just like a lot of other men, pointing out a lot of difficulties and not suggesting any remedy, but before I come to that I just wish to show how many barrels of potatoes are necessary to buy a ton of fertilizer from the fertilizer mixers of New Brunswick at the present time. The hon. member for Saltcoats (Mr. Sales) told us the other evening how many bushels of wheat it cost him to buy a box of apples, and I shall give a like illustration with regard to potatoes and fertilizer. At the present time—and this was given in sworn evidence before the Freight Rates Committee the other day by Mr. Porter, who, by the way, is one of the largest potato exporters we have in eastern Canada, as well as one of its most reliable men—the farmers are getting for a barrel of potatoes less than 50 per cent of the cost of production. For the last two months or the last month and a half, and that is the time when a great many potatoes are sold in our section of the country, our farmers have been getting, not 50 per cent, but only 25 per cent of the cost of production. In New Brunswick last year it cost $2 a barrel to grow potatoes. What price are we getting at the present time? Only 50 cents for a barrel of 165 pounds, and it cost us $2 a barrel to raise those potatoes. That is the sworn evidence of Mr. Porter before the Freight Rates Committee. Since the 1st of February our potatoes have not been above 80 cents a barrel, and most of our crop has been marketed since then. At the rate we are getting for our potatoes to-day, it will take 135 barrels of potatoes to pay for one ton of fertilizer, for the price the mixers are asking is $67.50. The average yield of potatoes in New Brunswick is 80 barrels to the acre, so you will realize what a position the farmer is in who has to buy fertilizer, and the necessity for granting him some relief, especially as that could be done without any material loss in revenue for in the last six years we have only collected about half a million dollars in duty on fertilizer. Yet this item is not mentioned at all in the present budget; no relief is granted. I am convinced that it was an oversight on the part of the Minister of Finance, and I earnestly hope—I was going to say, I firmly believe, but I am not so ready to believe as I was two years ago that legislation needed will be passed—but I sincerely hope that relief will be granted on this very necessary article to our farmers before the budget resolutions are approved.

I said I was going to make some constructive suggestions, because I do not think that a speech which is entirely destitute of constructive criticism is any help either to the House or to the country. However, before I come to that, I had better deal a little more fully with the decrease in the customs duty on farm machines. I am not feeling quite so blue over the fact that there have not been more reductions made in the customs duty on farm implements as I am at the increase in the sales tax. I do not think the decrease in the duty on farm implements has been at all sufficient, but the little shuffle that was made in that matter was made in the right direction, while the move made in regard to the increase in the sales tax is absolutely in the wrong direction—that is my belief. However, I think after listening to the speech of the Minister of Justice (Sir Lomer Gouin) this afternoon, and the statement made by the Finance Minister two days ago I have not quite as much hope as I had at the beginning of the session that the Liberal party ever meant to put the tariff planks in their platform into execution; and in that regard I just want to quote a statement made by the Minister of Finance two days ago in reply to the leader of the Opposition. He said:

I have never voted for the tariff items of the Liberal platform, and never concealed the fact that I did not approve of the platform in that respect.

I think, Mr. Speaker, possibly it is becoming increasingly clear to the members of this House just where the pressure is coming from that is preventing the Liberal party from putting their platform, or moving in the direction to put their platform, into active legislation. I want to say further, Mr. Speaker, that I am not criticizing the Government in any particular because they have not put into effect at once their platform in regard to the duty on farm machinery. I do not think any sane man in this country would advocate taking the duty off any one article all at once, especially when it is as high as it is on some articles of farm machinery, but I think a substantial step should be taken in that direction and not a shuffle. I also think the manufacturers should be warned that the Government did mean to implement their platform by legislation if they continued in power, and for them to put their house in order and get ready for that eventuality which should come by stages so that they will be able to accommodate themselves to the situation.

I want to say right here, Mr. Speaker, that I deplore the fact that different speakers in this House have attempted to attribute the statement to us that we desire free trade right away, that we want to wipe out the tariff over night, and that we want to get rid of the manufacturers of Canada. That is not the fact. I do not think there is an absolute free trader in any group in this House. But we of the Progressives want freer trade, and we want reductions of duty on the tools of production and the necessaries of life. The reason why I am not so concerned about the duty on farm implements as I am about the increase in the sales tax is, that the reduction in the duty on farm implements would, possibly, only affect 50 per cent of the people of Canada, whereas the increase in the sales tax affects 100 per cent of our people. And no party in this House or in this country should take a selfish, or a narrow view even, of the tariff. We must have a tariff for the whole of Canada; we must be willing to give and take; but I do not consider the Government have even taken one short step towards putting their platform into effect. I sincerely hope, therefore, that the statement the Finance Minister is going to make later in regard to the budget, according to the announcement of the Prime Minister this afternoon, will carry out some of the changes to which I have alluded.

I said that I wanted to make some constructive suggestions. Now, I have made a suggestion on more than one occasion in this House that an export duty should be put on pulp wood and on round logs going out of Canada, and I will tell you why. I see the hon. member for Brome (Mr. McMaster) shaking his head.

Mr. McMASTER: A duty is just as unsound one way as the other.

Mr. CALDWELL: We all agree that manufactures are necessary in any country in order to build the nation up. All we ask is that the manufacturer get off our backs and stand on his own feet. However, I want to make a suggestion to the Government in the matter of establishing factories in this country; and I do not need to go outside of Canada to demonstrate the truth of what I am saying as to the necessity of offering some inducement to manufacture pulp and paper in Canada. I want to show why I am advocating an export duty on pulp wood. I hold in my hand a copy of a prospectus issued by the Oxford Paper Company of Rumford Falls, Maine. They are getting out this prospectus in order to sell $300,000 worth of stock to develop a water power and an electric plant at Rumford Falls, and I want to show you what they are presenting as their assets, the justification they are giving to induce the people to put money into their enterprise in order to develop that industry in the United States. They say in this prospectus:

> The Company's available supply of pulp-wood is ample. It holds under lease from the Crown the right to cut and remove pulp-wood and all forest growth from a tract of about 1,015 square miles (approximately 650,000 acres) in Cape Breton, Nova Scotia. This lease runs for a long terms of years in 20 year renewable periods, the last maturity June 19, 1998, at an annual rental of $6,000. This rental is a fixed sum regardless of the amount of wood cut from these lands. The holdings are virgin forests and contain, according to conservative estimates by experts, at least 6,000,000 cords of high grade pulp-wood, sufficient to supply Oxford Paper Co. for more than 100 years at its present rate of consumption of spruce and fir.
> In addition, the company owns the right for 12 years to cut spruce and fir from a tract of 55,000 acres in Canada, near the city of Quebec, and also has the right to cut spruce and fir from 125,000 acres additional Crown lands in Canada.

The company has a further large available supply of spruce and fir and pulp through its one-half ownership of Nashwaak Pulp and Paper Co., Ltd. which owns, in New Brunswick, a pulp mill and owns or controls about 359,000 acres of land containing about 1,000,000 cords of spruce and fir timber.

Besides spruce and fir the company uses a large amount of poplar wood, which it is able to buy at reasonable prices in Maine, New Hampshire and New Brunswick. As poplar growth is very rapid a sufficient supply of this wood will, it is believed, always be available.

Mr. McMASTER: May I interject a question here? Would the hon. member consider it wise to have an export duty on potatoes in order that a man who was running a mill in which potato flour was manufactured might get the potatoes and make them up into flour?

Mr. CALDWELL: We have no such mills. I will qualify that by saying that we did have one during the war. During the war there was a demand for this product but not at a price that would enable the factory to use table potatoes. So they took the culls, the small potatoes that were not saleable, and they made them into potato flour and sold it at a price that would pay them for the manufacture. However, even at that time of high prices the demand for potato flour would not warrant the use of table potatoes for the purpose; consequently, since the war, that factory has closed down. Even at fifty cents a barrel a profitable industry cannot be carried on to-day by taking table potatoes, converting them into potato flour, and selling the product at the price they could get.

I have here another clipping which states a certain firm in the United States is buying tracts of land in Nova Scotia, tracts of land such as the Nashwaak Pulp and Paper Company own, and by the way it is expected that the Nashwaak Pulp and Paper Company's mills will close down in New Brunswick in the very near future, and that the pulp wood cut on these lands will be shipped to their American mills. This will also result in the closing down of the mills in Nova Scotia because they can import these raw materials into the United States free of duty, while there is at the present time a bill before the United States Senate to impose an import duty on manufactured pulp and paper and this will be the means of helping to build up the industry in the country to the south instead of our own.

I want to say further, and I know the hon. member for Brome (Mr. McMaster) will agree with me in this. Some people have attributed the prosperity of the province of Quebec to the fact that the sale of liquor is permitted there. I do not agree with that statement. I think it is more attributable to the fact that Quebec has encouraged the manufacture of pulp and paper in that province. I think I am well within the mark, Mr. Speaker, when I say that the province of Quebec to-day manufactures 70 per cent of all the chemical pulp and paper that is manufactured in the Dominion. I think that is correct, but I am speaking from memory, and, of course, subject to correction. Due to that fact Quebec has become prosperous; because possibly there is no industry in Canada so profitable, or has been in the last ten years, than the manufacture of raw pulp into paper.

I want to give more reasons why this should be done, not as an act of retaliation against the United States, but as an act of commonsense for Canada. To-day we have a pest called the spruce bud moth, which is killing the forests of Canada quite rapidly—and I am glad to say I believe it is diminishing very much;—due to the fact that United States corporations are allowed to come in and buy large tracts of land. They are not interested in the conservation of our forests, nor in the condition of the country after the forests are cut, as our own citizens are. They are simply stripping the forests of Canada, and reaping the benefit in their manufactures in the United States. The different provinces of Canada a few years ago pretended to take some action in this matter. However, they have not jurisdiction in international trade, but have jurisdiction over their own Crown lands in the eastern provinces, where these forests are located. They passed an act containing a provision such as this:

That no pulpwood cut on Crown lands shall be exported from Canada.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: What is the difference to the consumer between an import duty and an export duty? Is it not a fact that those duties are paid on the principle of protection?

Mr. CALDWELL: I am glad the hon. member asks the question. An import duty is paid by the party in this country who consumes the article imported. The same applies to an export duty. It applies to the people who consume that product in the United States. The citizens of the United States will pay the export duty. I observe that the hon. member from Brome (Mr. McMaster) shakes his head.

Mr. McMASTER: Is my hon. friend not aware that one of the almost inevitable results of the export duty is to decrease the price which the manufacturer will pay to the producer of the raw material, the market of the producer of the raw material being decreased by the fact that he cannot really export what he has to sell.

Mr. CALDWELL: I am glad the hon. member asked that question. I think, possibly, I would have forgotten that point had he not brought it up by his question. What the hon. member for Brome (Mr. McMaster) states is absolutely correct providing there are unlimited supplies of this commodity that the country that wishes to use the commodity can draw on. That is not the case here. Outside of Canada, I think today, the only country in the world which has an exportable surplus of lumber is Russia.

Mr. McMASTER: Sweden.

Mr. CALDWELL: I think the hon. member will find that Sweden is considering the conservation of her forests. She is at the present time carrying on reafforestation work, something which Canada must come to in the near future. That is an indication that they realize that the end is in sight, as far as the supply is concerned. We have a monopoly of the supply of pulpwood on this continent. There is no question about that.

Mr. McMASTER: Newfoundland has a quantity of lumber.

Mr. CALDWELL: How long would they supply the United States? I have an estimate of it, but I do not wish to weary the House with it. The provincial government of New Brunswick passed an order, providing that pulpwood cut on Crown lands should not be exported. That means pulpwood cut into four foot lengths. Then what happened? At that time the size of the saw log was 10 inches, I think. Immediately after this our provincial government reduced the size of the saw log to 6 inches, and, in fact, I think, you will find lots of them go below that. The United States' pulp manufacturer goes upon Crown lands, cuts logs into 16 foot lengths, puts them on the train, ships them into the United States, cuts them into different lengths and grinds them into pulpwood. So that the provision of the provincial government is a joke. However, an export duty would control the situation. For fear condemnation will be meted out to members who speak at too great length, I will leave that point although I would like to elucidate it further.

I have given the House my criticism of the budget and my suggestion as to a good source of revenue, which would also develop the manufacturing industries of Canada, and would be more beneficial than any other method, because it means manufacturing our own raw materials into the finished product by our own people.

I come to the consideration of the amendment offered by the official Opposition. That amendment is rather peculiar, in view of the arguments put forth in support of it. The amendment declares one thing, and the argument in support of it exactly the opposite. In the argument they condemn the Government because they have made a few reductions in the tariff, and in the amendment they condemn them because they have not made more reductions in the tariff, and state that this failure will result in a lowering of the public morality of Canada, because it is the breaking of a promise. I think, as far as that goes, I will have to agree with the official Opposition, that the breaking of promises, in any case, is a lowering of political or personal morality. However, as this amendment is not moved by a party who have never broken any promises, is it not the case of the pot calling the kettle black, and the pot being blacker than the kettle?

Then take the argument in regard to the tariff. In 1919 Sir Thomas White said there should be a revision of the tariff. The government were very careful not to say whether they would revise it up or down, but said it was long overdue. I have no doubt they received some support by making that statement at the time—western as well as eastern support. We are just as anxious in the East for a reduction in the tariff as they are in the West, and I do not want that fact to escape the attention of the House. In 1920 when the present ex-Finance Minister (Sir Henry Drayton) delivered his budget speech, you will find at page 2491 of Hansard of 1920 that he said:

> Our policy calls for a thorough revision of the tariff.

And he said further.

> The tariff investigation has commenced and public sittings will be held throughout Canada after prorogation.

The investigation was carried on. When the House met in 1921 the Speech from the Throne stated that this investigation had been held and information had been collected to enable the government to intelligently revise the tariff, and that the result would be put before the House at that session. At least, I take it that the Speech from the Throne indicated that legislation would be put before the House. The Speech used the words "Will be put before you in due time" which, I take it, meant during that session. That was not carried out. Here we have promise after promise in regard to the tariff broken by the last government. Therefore, I do not see how a man is going to make a choice between the two parties. I think both have lowered the public morality of the country by breaking promises.

Further, Mr. Speaker, I do not consider the present official Opposition have added much to their political morality by some of the late additions to that party. I want to explain what I mean and I desire to be fairly definite. The late addition, that I refer to consist of men who were read out of the old Conservative party by Sir Robert Borden, because they secured war contracts under very suspicious circumstances. It also contains men who were the remnants of provincial governments, who were notorious for having received rake-offs on railway contracts, on timber lands, and, even, on patriotic gifts to the mother country in time of war. I do not propose to let an aggregation like that use me as a whip or scourge to scourge anybody. I am speaking for myself when I say this, Mr. Speaker. I presume I can find a way of chastising the Government or of reasoning with them, without being made a tool of by anybody. I will be just as unready to be made a tool of by the present Government to scourge the present Opposition. I take that independent stand which I have always taken in this House to judge every question on its merits. I do not want anybody to think they can pull the wool over my eyes and make me believe black is white.

Mr. PIERRE F. CASGRAIN (Charlevoix-Montmorency) (Translation): Mr. Speaker. Before submitting to this House, the few remarks which I intend to make on the budget, allow me to offer to the Prime Minister who so ably presides, ever since last December, over the destinies of this country, my most sincere congratulations for the great honour which was bestowed on him by His Majesty the King in granting him the title of an Imperial Privy Councillor and, by that acknowledgment, placing him in the rank of all the great statesmen who have presided over the destinies of this country. I wish to offer him my respects and sincere congratulations, together with those of the people of Charlevoix-Montmorency, whom he has had the pleasure of meeting and whom I have the honour to represent in this House.

Mr Speaker, if the hon. members will grant me a few more minutes, I shall take the liberty of joining those who in the course of the debate on the address, sincerely congratulated you on the occasion of your elevation to the speakership of this House. Well deserved praise was then showered upon you. I should have liked to have raised my voice in such a chorus, but I was not perhaps so well qualified as others to do so. I shall content myself with endorsing all that was said on that occasion and tell you that you deserved them all. For many reasons do I wish to endorse the sentiments expressed by those hon. gentlemen; first, because on certain occasions, you were like a mentor to me in my first political efforts which I made in our province, later I might even add that you acted as sponsor to my political baptism. Another good reason, is that you are somewhat one of us, considering that the people of Charlevoix have the signal honour, the great favour and the pleasure of counting you amongst them during the beautiful summer season, when you come down to Murray Bay and take up your residence at Pointe-au-Pic, in the county of Charlevoix, the most picturesque of the Province of Quebec.

Mr. Speaker, when we examine the budget which was brought down by the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding), whom everybody honours and respects and who was the right arm of Sir Wilfrid Laurier and had the overseeing of his fiscal policy during the fifteen years, which gave this country its greatest prosperity, we are well aware that the conditions, under which the hon. minister had to labour, were most abnormal. If we consider the economic state of our country, together with all the causes which brought on this state, I think that all unprejudiced public men must admit that the hon. Minister of Finance accomplished a gigantic task when he prepared his budget, which, I frankly admit without being absolutely perfect, without being very satisfactory to the members who sit nearest to your left, Sir, nor to their neighbours, without pleasing everybody, nevertheless solves sufficiently, and very well indeed owing to the circumstances, the complex economic problems of our country. I understand that the minister tried by all possible means to spread in the most equitable manner the obligations which will have to be met by the ratepayers of the country through the great crisis we are undergoing.

The official Opposition, through the former Minister of Finance (Sir Henry Drayton) acting as their mouthpiece, simply contend that the Liberal party has cast aside the principles enunciated at its great convention, in 1919. A good friend of mine whispers to me that there are only fools that never change their mind. I do not wish to say we should apply that sentence or proverb to those who make us such reproaches to-day. Let me only say that if the Government does not carry out immediately all those reforms which we advocated in the great convention of 1919, it is because circumstances do not lend themselves perhaps as much now as they might have done at the time and it is also perhaps on account of the Fordney tariff, a new wall which prevents us from communicating, from trading and from doing business with the United States as easily as we might have been able to do. However, Sir, there is one thing which we must not lose sight of, when the official Opposition reproach us with not putting into practice the platform of the convention of 1919. It is one of the weakest reproaches that I have ever heard for, as the press of the whole country has testified, if we carried out immediately the changes which we are reproached for withholding, these same gentlemen would be the first to tell us that we are going too far and that we are bringing ruin and desolation upon the country. This we must avoid. The amendment moved by the official Opposition must not be taken very seriously It is simply an amendment moved by gentlemen who have no other to bring down and who cannot offer to this House or to the country a progressive policy which might tend to enlighten the Minister of Finance and guide the Government in a better path. I have always heard that the Opposition should not always think of finding fault, but should moreover try to find solutions to all the difficult problems and serious dilemmas in which the country and Government of the day might find themselves. That is what we endeavoured to do while in opposition. We moved, in 1918, thanks to the hon. member from Brome (Mr. McMaster), certain resolutions; and in the years which followed our convention, in 1920 and in 1921, all the amendments which were prepared by the financial critic of the Opposition of the time, always aimed at giving the best advice which we thought in good faith might help to bring relief to the people of this country. All these subterfuges which the official Opposition is resorting to to-day cannot have any other result but to maintain them in the position they are at present that is to say, in the most unfavourable position which has ever been the lot of a party to occupy in this country. We have taken note, from the outset of the session, of the small number of votes which have been registered in favour of the motions and resolutions of the Opposition, so called official, and I am thoroughly convinced that the amendment of the former Minister of Finance, will have the same fate.

When we examine the budget as it is framed to-day, when we take into account the amendment moved by the official Opposition, and when we consider, on the other hand, the stand which the new Progressive party takes, we are apt to ask ourselves which side we should take.

If we consider the speeches delivered by the leader of the official Opposition and his lieutenants, who were in power but a few months ago; if we consider also the speeches made by the leader of the new party who sits opposite to me (Mr. Crerar), and a number of his lieutenants, we cannot help concluding, that in both cases, the leaders of those two parties as well as their lieutenants, including their supporters, go too far. For my part, I cannot accept all the theories, all the arguments and the whole programme of the hon. members who are directly opposite me. On the other hand, I can no more agree to all that is contained in the programme of the official Opposition, who are to your left, Mr. Speaker. In such a circumstance, what is the wisest and best policy, the one which any person with common sense should adopt? I conclude, Sir, that it is the one which the Liberal party has always followed; the policy found in the golden mean, which was so well defined by the hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Lapointe), in a famous speech which he made in this House last year. He then said: "In my opinion, the best policy is the one which consists in a moderate protection, a policy which does not lean too much towards free trade, but which, on the other hand, is not entirely protectionist."

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT (Translation): In medio stat virtus.

Mr. CASGRAIN (Translation): As my hon. friend, the member for Chambly-Verchères has just expressed it, "In medio stat virtus." Sir, all these arguments, these subterfuges of the official Opposition, embodied in the amendment which is at present under consideration of this House, must not be taken seriously by an intelligent person. Moreover, if we consider that since 1911 those who moved this amendment, are those same gentlemen who, through their want of foresight and extravagance, have been the cause of the deplorable state of the finances in which our country finds itself at the present time, we might take them more seriously if they endeavoured to propose to this House some means so as to show us how we might possibly reduce the enormous debt which weighs on us and re-establish equilibrium in our finances. If we take into account all the millions which went to fill the pockets of friends of the Unionist-Tory government, it is not astonishing that in order to meet the situation, the hon. Minister of Finance was obliged to somewhat revise the tariff in such a way as to increase the duty on certain articles and to impose certain taxes and that he was unable to cut down the tariff as much as my good friends the Progressives would have desired.

One of the provisions which gives rise especially to criticism by our opponents, is the increase on the sales tax. Well, Sir, I believe it would be preferable if this tax were increased a little more and if the law regulating the income tax were wiped out from our statutes, because it is the one which is the most liable to be transgressed. It is a well known fact that a great number of business men and financiers do not give the state a just proportion of their income and the consequence is that the greatest portion of the burden—if not the whole—is borne by the small wage-earners who are the least able to carry such a load. While on this subject, let me say that, in my humble opinion, the income tax should be modified and revised in such a way as to make it more simple, so that everybody can understand it and can prepare his return yearly, without being obliged to have an accountant or an expert, and thus deposit in the treasury the money which is due to it or to the country. There is on this subject another point to which I want to draw the Government's attention. It seems to me that it would be an easy thing to alter somewhat the income tax so as to increase the tax of those who are drawing annually an income of ten to fifteen thousand dollars and who have no children, or are bachelors. An hon. member of this House, I believe it is the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Fortier), asked that the father of eight children or more pay no income tax if his income does not reach $10,000 per year. Many newspapers throughout the country endorsed that part of the speech of the hon. member for Labelle, amongst others Le Bien Public, of Three Rivers.

Good things and good men often come from Three Rivers. For instance, that city gave the King Cabinet one of its most distinguished members in the person of the Minister of Customs (Mr. Bureau). Le Bien Public approves the suggestion, but at the same time offers another which it considers better and which I shall submit to this House: "The suggestion would still be more acceptable if the exemption of the tax applied without any restriction to all the heads of families with children and whose revenue is not over $5,000. In reality, this year the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) with his new taxes, especially the collection of 50 per cent on the sales tax, increased in an indirect way the burden of heads of large families; and that amounts to an increase on the income tax, since the exemption of $200 per child shall have a smaller value than in the past; because with this new sales tax, in truth, this amount of $200 will have a purchasing power less than it had in the past.

I believe, Mr. Speaker, that it would be worth while taking into consideration these facts, and when the hon. Minister of Finance comes before the House in Committee of the Whole, we might make some amendments on the income tax so as to alleviate the burden of heads of large families who draw small incomes, have little money to set aside and must pay taxes to the Government. Mr. Speaker, if we examine in details the budget we note that there are certain products exempted from the sales tax, and on this score I congratulate the Minister of Finance. For instance, we find rolled oats, buckwheat flour, pea flour, alfalfa flour, salt, radium, hemp fiber, which is utilized to manufacture ropes which do not exceed 1½ inches in circumference; furthermore, we come across items for the fisheries, fishing boats, supplies and material which enter in the construction of fishing boats for personal use, fiber for binding twine, material used for job-printing, sold to establishments not exceeding in value $3,000; besides substances entering into the manufacture of oleomargarine, we have added the material used in the manufacture of hooks and other fishing accessories.

There is another government tax which is at present much discussed and in regard to which many manufacturers, important financiers and representatives of large business houses have made objections. I am speaking of the stamp tax, the two cent stamp which one will be obliged to stick on each cheque for every fifty dollars. Sir, two years ago, I believe, in this House, but under a different administration, when there was question of a very similar tax on promissory notes and Bills of exchanges and the tax was increased, I am not aware that there was then so much objection as we find to-day. I ask, Sir, is it equitable not to require more for a cheque of $1,000 or $2,000 than for a cheque of $50, the amount which is in current use by all the small traders and by all those whose accounts are more or less restricted? It is but just, in my opinion, that the large merchants and financiers who deal in larger transactions, and who earn more money be taxed in proportion to their amount of business and means.

A suggestion which should be made when these resolutions come up for discussion by the committee, is to find an easier way as to how these stamps should be placed on cheques. I might suggest that it would not be a bad idea if the banks did this work, because they are in a better position to do so than are the merchants and traders and no time would be lost. I remember having forgotten, in one instance, to stick the stamp which has become traditional these last years; the bank simply stuck a stamp on and charged it up to my account. We might, if need be, pay the banks a certain amount extra for the work.

An hon. MEMBER (Translation): Who would pay this amount?

Mr. CASGRAIN (Translation): It would be the person who made out the cheque. With the present system of collecting this tax, it appears difficult to have it paid by the client and this is what at present the financiers, brokers and merchants object to. I believe if we adopted my suggestion that it would have for effect to do away with this nuisance.

We have rightly increased the tax on cigarettes and choice cigars for, in my opinion, although I am a moderate smoker of cigars and cigarettes, I believe it is a luxury and that under these circumstances, the Government must not be blamed for having taxed these articles. We may also congratulate the hon. Minister of Finance for not having taxed leaf tobacco which is used both in the manufacture of domestic cigars and cut tobaccos.

Numerous decreases in the tariff promote the importation of agricultural machinery, gasoline tractors worth $1,400 admitted free as well as linen thread used in the manufacture of Holland cloth. There is also a lower duty on wools, cottons, alcohol used in the manufacture of pharmaceutic products, patent medicines and a great number of other articles too numerous to mention. On the other hand articles of luxury, such as foreign manufactured cars are taxed. I believe, Sir, it is a good policy and the Government has acted wisely. I think the Minister of Justice (Sir Lomer Gouin) had something to say in this matter—he now forms part of the cabinet—because the policy of the Liberal party in Quebec has always been to spread the taxes justly and to collect them from those who could mostly afford to pay them; now, I note that the Government in increasing the tax on motor cars, reach those who can afford such luxuries, and this is good policy.

Mr. Speaker, without entering into further details in regard to what the budget contains, I consider that, owing to the difficulties which the Government had to overcome so as to restore economic conditions to a more healthy state, I may give my assurance that all the electors who gave me their trust in the last general election by returning me with such a large majority, will approve the budget submitted by the hon. Minister of Finance and that they will also approve me, if I vote, as it is my intention to do, to support the Government and its budget. I may conscientiously and sincerely say that all my electors, whoever they may be, will bravely bear up with the consequences and effects, the more so that, as I represent a county to a large extent made up of farmers, navigators and fishermen, my constituents will acknowledge thankfully the few concessions that the Government has granted them. I may therefore, on their behalf, offer the Minister of Finance as well as the Government sincere congratulations for the ability and good sense shown in solving the complex problem of the reconstruction of our economic system. If our opponents, especially those who form part of the socalled official Opposition, want to examine their conscience—

An hon. MEMBER (Translation): They have none.

Mr. CASGRAIN (Translation): They tell me that they have none; I regret it very much—they will perceive that the financial state through which the country is struggling to-day is due to the pillaging of the public funds, the manipulating of the railways which occasioned heavy losses and the depreciation of these ways of communication, which is the cause of the confusion in which the country is thrown to-day. The whole blame can be put down to the very poor policy which the Borden government and the Meighen government inaugurated between the years 1911 and 1921.

While on this subject, Mr. Speaker, let me point out certain things to the Government. When we were in the Opposition, on many occasions your humble servant and all my colleagues, including the hon. member for St. James (Mr. Rinfret) who is now at my side, have fought the railway policy of the then government. Many a time I asked that the board of directors of the Canadian National Railway which was managing these railways and to which I had taken exception when that company was incorporated, I asked that this board of directors be changed and replaced by competent persons and experts who would be able to place our railways on a business-like, economic basis so as to make it pay or at least to prevent the large deficits which we have had from year to year. I am aware that this year the same persons who were managing our railways then, are still on the board of directors. I am willing to admit that the Government is doing all it possibly can under the circumstances, but I also wish to be faithful to the promise which we gave at that time and the policy which we followed, we that have always believed, especially those who hail from the province of Quebec, that the policy of nationalizing our railways was not the best under the circumstances, and that, if we were obliged to accept the fact as accomplished, we should endeavour to manage these railways very economically and to get rid of them as soon as possible.

I hope, Mr. Speaker, that the board of direction will soon change and that at the next session we shall listen to a new policy on the part of the Minister of Railways, a policy which will give us hope and let the country see that we have made some progress and that the enormous deficits which the Government and the country have to bear up with, may be avoided. What I have just said in regard to the management of railways may equally be said of the Government Merchant Marine.

While in the Opposition we took strong exception to this merchant marine. We even kept up the fight for a whole day and night, and up to the present I do not know what is taking place, for we have not yet heard the budget on the merchant marine; but if we listen to the rumours published in the newspapers we can expect deficits as large as those of last year. I trust that the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Railways will bring in a wise policy and put a stop to these deficits and place the country's business on a better footing, so as to alleviate the burden of the ratepayers.

There is a part in the speech on the budget which I agree with, but nevertheless to which I wish to refer. The hon. Minister of Finance and many of those who will approve his budget say that we must absolutely reduce our debts, and that the most strict economy must be practised. I agree. It is exactly what we were told in the past so as to pay off our war debt and re-establish equilibrium in our finances. If we wish to practise economy, it seems to me that we should do so on a larger scale and begin where we can effect the greatest savings. When we were in the Opposition we energetically opposed the creation of the Purchasing Commission which was imposed on the people of this country, not through legislation but by an Order in Council, after prorogation of Parliament, in 1920. This commission costs the country a great deal of money, and it has not yet been shown in this House, that it has given satisfactory results, such as would excuse us in continuing it. I therefore suggest to the Minister of Finance to abolish the commission. The money which might be saved from this source might be usefully expended elsewhere. There is another such commission which I would gladly see disappear, changed or modified. It is the Civil Service Commission, especially in regard to the outside service. The salaries of the commissioners, the secretary, and the other employees of this commission are considerable, and I do not know that this commission, up to the present, has given good results in the administration of the outside service. If it was not that I do not wish to overtax your patience, Mr. Speaker, I could bring out certain details which would satisfy you as well as all the other members of this House, even those on the Opposition side who are the hardest to convince, and I feel certain that everybody would approve of such motion. I certainly believe that those two commissions should be abolished. In my opinion also, we should equally reduce the number of employees in a number of departments. At present, what do we find in certain services? We find two, three, or four lawyers, a fairly large number of architects or engineers, and these branches form really small departments within large ones. In this way, I believe we could economize a sufficient amount to enable us to perform absolutely necessary works which are needed all over the country and which unfortunately cannot be undertaken owing to our present financial condition and because we are not following out the strict economy which is recommended.

Mr. Speaker, ever since I have had the honour to represent, in this House, the county of Charlevoix-Montmorency, I have asked the Government on many occasions, to carry out in that county certain public works which are urgent and very necessary. The answer which I always received was that they had no money for such works—and when I was in the opposition, I believe that the reason which was always given me was due to the fact that I criticized too much the government which for that reason was very little disposed to grant my requests. I must state that as long as I occupy a seat in this House, either on the Government side or on the Opposition benches, I shall never cease to ask on behalf of my constituents, for those who have entrusted me with the mandate to represent them here, the necessary work and ameliorations needed in that part of the province.

During past years, I asked for improvements to be carried out in my constituency at places called Baie des Rochers, St. Siméon, St. Fidèle, Murray Bay, St. Irénée, Eboulements, Baie St. Paul, Ile aux Coudres, Riviere St. François and St. Anne de Beaupré. Mr. Speaker, those localities, I know, are familiar to you, since you go there every year to spend your holidays. My predecessor did ask for works which the Liberal government had recommended before the overthrow of the Liberal party in 1911. I would like the Government to take into serious consideration every request I placed before the several departments with respect to wharves, post offices, public buildings and other improvements; and I trust those undertakings shall be carried out as soon as possible. We are asked to practice economy. I am willing to do so, provided that the Government follow suit to a certain extent, so that we may do justice to those who have elected us to represent them in this House.

Mr. Speaker, I may have spoken too long and I crave your indulgence in case I have somewhat protracted this discussion. I have confidence in the new administration. The few remarks I have just made were made in earnest and the Government, no doubt, will take them into serious consideration. I rely upon the ability and wise policy of the leader of the Administration, and his colleagues; I view the future with calm and I am convinced that prosperity shall be restored in Canada, a prosperity similar to that which our country enjoyed during the fifteen years of the Liberal administration from 1896 until 1911, a prosperity which our late lamented leader, Sir Wilfrid Laurier, had known how to bestow on the country; and thus relying upon the leader of the Government, the ministers representing the districts of Quebec and Montreal and their distinguished colleagues, I invite my friends in the House to vote for the budget proposals; that invitation extends not only to good Liberals sitting on the Government side, but also to the other members who were Liberals formerly—who now wish to move too quickly. I ask that they be willing under these circumstances to join hands with us so that the budget may carry with a good majority.

Mr. H. C. HOCKEN (West Toronto): Mr. Speaker, we have the promise of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) this afternoon that there will be certain modifications in the budget that has been brought down, and I want to express the opinion that there is plenty of room for such modifications. The practice of this Government has been to bring down measures and then to amend them before they get very far, so that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) is quite in line with the practice that has prevailed with the Minister of Militia (Mr. Graham) and with regard to other questions that have been brought before the House. I trust that the Minister of Finance will make these modifications somewhat comprehensive. I think he might, with advantage to the country, modify his stamp tax, because that tax is going to be a very great burden especially upon those who have large financial transactions, and it is going to work very grave injustice Every municipality issuing bonds, collecting taxes, dealing with large financial transactions, is going to be required to pay three or four times on the same money, and I hope the Minister of Finance will be able to modify that provision.

I hope too that he will give some consideration to the complaints of confectioners who have been singled out for a special tax that is not imposed on any other class of merchants or manufacturers. Under modern conditions of living, confectioners play a very large part in the life of the people. At the present time, especially in cities and large towns, there are many living in apartment houses who find the services of men in that business of particular value, and why they should be penalized above all other businesses is something that I do not understand, and something which, I venture to say, the Minister of Finance cannot justify on any reasonable grounds.

I might say the same thing with regard to the prohibitive tax that the Minister of Finance has placed upon imported cigars. I am not speaking for any personal reason because, when I smoke cigars, I smoke domestic ones; but my point of objection to this tax is that he has put such a tax on imported cigars that there will be no revenue at all from that source. The tax is made prohibitive so that, instead of adding anything to the revenue, it will decrease the revenue. In these particulars and in others that might be mentioned, I think modifications are quite in order.

Undoubtedly, this budget is adding very seriously to the burdens of the people of this country. We have been told, for two sessions at least, perhaps longer, about the increasing cost of living; but the 50 per cent increase in the sales tax is going to place upon the people a heavier burden than they have so far borne, and I trust the Minister of Finance will modify that somewhat. The sales tax, as imposed by the ex-Minister of Finance (Sir Henry Drayton) who represented this party, is a very wise measure; but any measure which is wise within reason, can be made very unwise when it is exaggerated, and that is what I think the Minister of Finance has done in this case.

I was not surprised that the members of the Agrarian party were dissatisfied with the budget. They listened to speeches that were made in this House last session and the session before; I have no doubt they took those speeches as expressions of sincerity, and they expected and had a right to expect larger reductions, especially on agricultural implements. Mark you, Mr. Speaker, I do not think there should be any reduction on agricultural implements; but this touches the point of the amendment introduced by the ex-Minister of Finance. I think a party that makes pledges when it is in opposition, puts them into its platform, and into its campaign literature, and then brings down such a budget as the one which the Minister of Finance has brought down, is to be condemned in the terms of the amendment presented to the House. I think my hon. friends to the left have very substantial grounds for complaint as regards the tariff proposals contained in the budget. But those members of the Agrarian party who have followed the course of events with regard to the Liberal party and who have had anything like accurate knowledge of their methods and their record, would not have any ground for being astonished at all, because it has been a feature of the Liberal party, ever since the death of George Brown and the deposition of Alexander Mackenzie as leader of that party, to make promises and not to fulfil them, especially with regard to the tariff. As long as the late George Brown was alive, he kept the Liberal party a free-trade party. As long as Hon. Alexander Mackenzie's voice was to be heard in this House, he argued for a 17½ per cent tariff which, while not free trade, was approximating that. But when those two honest and sincere statesmen disappeared from the scene, the Liberal party shifted its ground, and from that day to the present time, there has been no sign or evidence of sincerity in its pledges or promises with regard to the tariff. Those of us who know that and who have followed its record, are not surprised that it has not implemented its pledges. Some of my hon. friends to the left have not, perhaps, followed the course of the Liberal party so closely, and to them this may be a matter of astonishment. We used to be told that we were going to get free trade as it is in England.

That was the phrase used in the party literature. That is what the late member for Red Deer used to expatiate on so loudly and eloquently in this House; but nobody can expect that; indeed, nobody can expect any particular reductions in the tariff. Personally, I am satisfied that the tariff is not too high. I object to the 2½ per cent reduction on agricultural implements, although my attitude may give a shock to my hon. friends to the left.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No shock at all.

Mr. HOCKEN: But I believe in maintaining our industrial concerns, and I believe in the principle of protection. I say that frankly as this party says it. I would invite my hon. friends of the Agrarian party to consider what a remarkable difference there is between this body and that body sitting opposite on the point of sincerity, and if sincerity is of any value in public life, it ought to be considered. Whatever faults may be charged against this party, it has stood since 1878 four-square for the protective principle. We have not tried to hedge on that at all. Every man in Canada knows what the trade policy of the Conservative party is and has been for over forty years; but no man in Canada can tell from one year to another what the policy of the Liberal party is with regard to the tariff. On that side of the House, there is such a hodge-podge of opinion, that I doubt whether anybody now can tell what their policy is on the question of protection or free trade. They have both classes on that side, not only on that, but on many other questions. The Minister of Justice (Sir Lomer Gouin) to-day endeavoured to prove that the Liberal party had been consistent in its trade policy, and he went back to the late Hon. Mr. Blake to quote him. I think the Minister of Justice was somewhat unfortunate in his selection. He quoted the late Hon. Edward Blake in his Malvern speech to prove that the Liberal party had been a reasonably protective party; or that they had a tariff policy which, perhaps, they did not claim to be protective in its character, but which was substantially so. I can tell the House that the Hon. Edward Blake, that great statesman, one of the most brilliant men the Liberal party has produced, if not the most brilliant man in all its history, was deposed from the leadership of the Liberal party because he held those views as quoted by the Minister of Justice. When he spoke at Malvern, he created a schism in his party, because his party was for unrestricted reciprocity. That was the issue of the election which followed his resignation. It was because he would not adopt that principle and that policy of unrestricted reciprocity that he felt compelled to resign the leadership of the Liberal party and to retire from Canadian politics. In fact, he was driven out of Canadian politics because he announced a policy somewhat similar to that which has since been carried out by this party.

I am going to quote what he said, Mr. Speaker, in this celebrated letter to his electors in West Durham, dated 5th March, 1891. It is a long document and therefore I shall not read it all. Among other things he said:

> The issue which the party has thought fit to tender for the judgment of the electorate is that of unrestricted reciprocity or absolute free trade with the States; an issue which has been maintained as the sole party plank ever since it was put forward in 1887.
>
> Being at that time in Europe, I wrote, and after my return fully stated to leading men my views on this head.
>
> It was agreed that unless the conditions should change, it would clearly be my duty, when called on to address the Constituency, to make known those views; but the desire was expressed, in the party interest, that they should not be then published.
>
> Having decided to yield to every wish of my friends, compatible with honour, and hoping against hope that some turn of events might ameliorate a situation to me most painful, I yielded to this wish.
>
> Lately, when a provincial convention was summoned, and our fifth session was approaching, I though it right to convey to the riding association, as a basis for discussion, some brief intimation of my opinions.
>
> But, on the statement of prominent men that its publication would, even then, be detrimental to party interests, my letter was held back for a few days.
> Pending discussions on the matter, the dissolution has been precipitated; we are now in the throes of the election; and I feel bound to limit my confidence to you alone to-day.

The hon. Minister of Justice (Sir Lomer Gouin) quoted the late Hon. Edward Blake to prove that what he said at Malvern was the policy of the Liberal party; but it was exactly contrary to the policy of his party, and because of the statements he made there he had to retire—to him a very painful thing. And he not only retired from the leadership of his party, but he retired for good from Canadian politics.

I am going to read two or three more paragraphs of that historic letter to show what was the policy of the Liberal party at that time. He said in paragraph 16:

Since any practicable arrangement does substantially involve, not only differential duties, but a common tariff, unrestricted reciprocity becomes, in these its redeeming features, difficult to distinguish from commercial union.

His interpretation of commercial union is given in paragraph 21:

The tendency in Canada of unrestricted free trade with the States,— Remember, he was discussing the policy of the Liberal party.

—high duties being maintained against the United Kingdom, would be towards political union; and the more successful the plan the stronger the tendency, both by reason of the community of interests, the intermingling of populations, the more intimate business and social connections, and the trade and fiscal relations, amounting to dependency, which it would create with the States; and of the greater isolation and divergency from Britain which it would produce; and also, and especially, through inconveniences experienced in the maintenance, and apprehensions entertained as to the termination of the treaty.

Let me give you another extract, Mr. Speaker:

Assuming that absolute free trade with the States, best described as commercial union, may and ought to come, I believe that it can and should come only as an incident, or at any rate as a well-understood precursor of political union.

That was the policy of the Liberal party at that time, and that is how the Hon. Edward Blake interpreted it. And he did a most remarkable thing, Mr. Speaker, for a man of his standing and responsibility. Holding such views, so strongly divergent from those held and advocated by his party, he was so loyal to his party and so disloyal to his country that he declined to make his views known until after the election had been held. He did that at the request of certain of his political friends, because he said:

Without being so presumptuous as to imagine that my judgment is entitled to weight when unconfirmed by that of my political friends, I yet recognize the extensive and effective use, too commonly made by the adversary, of the slightest divergent expression of opinion from the humblest member of an opposing organization.

My late relation to the party emphasizes the present application of this remark.

And I have come to the conclusion, confirmed by the judgment of leading men, that the publication of these opinions would inflict much more damage on my friends than the slight injury which may result from my silent withdrawal.

Here was a public man who because of a mistaken sense of loyalty to his party concealed his views on an issue that was dividing the country—something that has been characteristic of the leaders of that party. I submit that holding the views he did he owed it to the country to state those views before the electors were invited to go to the poll.

But, as I said, that is characteristic of the leaders of the Liberal party, even to the present day, for only this week we have the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) saying:

I have never voted for the tariff items of the Liberal platform, and never concealed the fact that I did not approve of the platform in that respect.

So my hon. friend has run true to form—he did not let anyone know until Monday that he did not believe in the platform of his party. I submit that it is not an act of sincerity for a public man holding views on an important national question to conceal those views. He may justify that concealment, of course, by some method of reasoning which I do not understand, but I do not think his action can be defended upon any high moral ground.

The Globe said at the time the Hon. Edward Blake wrote his letter that they did not know what its effect would be on the party. Well, we have discovered since what the effect was. It led the Liberal party to drop unrestricted reciprocity, commercial union, free trade and that kind of thing, and when returned to power in 1896 to adopt the tariff policy of the late Sir John A. Macdonald, maintaining that policy down to 1911, when by some peculiar aberration of mind the party went back to the old reciprocity idea. Well, the people told the Liberal party what they thought about reciprocity, and I fancy that the second lesson—the first they got in 1891—ought to be sufficient to convince them for all time that reciprocity or free trade, or commercial union or free trade as we have it in England, will not go in the Dominion. As a matter of fact we have the protective policy to-day, and I may say to my hon. friend that I believe we are likely to have it for many years to come. But what could my hon. friends from the prairies expect from a government created by the big interests of this ucontry? I see that causes a smile. It causes a smile, Mr. Speaker, because over the length and breadth of Canada this party of ours has been called the party of the big interests. It is not under the influence of the big interests; the course that the big money power of this country followed in the last election is sufficient proof of that fact. Big business not only refused to support the leader of this party, but turned all its resources not behind the leader of the other party, but behind the Minister of Justice, whom big business regards as the leader of that party. Do my hon. friends take my word for that?

An hon. MEMBER: No.

Mr. HOCKEN: Well, if they will not, I am going to give them some evidence which perhaps they will take. I have here a copy of the official organ of the U.F.O., and I am sure that the third party will accept that as evidence that is substantial and good. I find this, Sir, on November 26, just before the election:

Meighen beaten to a frazzle, say Montreal magnates. Vested interests in Montreal say Meighen will only get forty or fifty seats.

They had them pretty well counted.

They have left him and have swung in behind Sir Lomer Gouin and the anti-public ownership, high protectionist Liberals of Quebec province. Say King does not count. Vested interests now support Liberals. Montreal's big business men forced Meighen to country in first place, backed him until he became a "forlorn hope," and now give their allegiance to Liberal protectionist group. Want Gouin as premier.

And it goes on in quite an interesting way, Mr. Speaker. The gentleman who wrote this was at one time a journalistic colleague of my hon. friend the Minister of Finance; he lived in Montreal, and knows the situation there very well. He says:

This week a Sun representative—

Which was himself.

—visited Montreal and is able to state that the big business men of the commercial metropolis regard Premier Meighen as a beaten man. They have turned away from him and have picked Sir Lomer Gouin and the Hon. Walter Mitchell as the only men to whom they can turn in their hour of need. The hon. Mackenzie King is eliminated by the Montreal interests. They expect him to be defeated in North York, but even if he is not defeated, they declare that the real men in the Liberal party consist of the high protectionist anti-public ownership element as represented by Quebec. It is undoubtedly true that big railway corporations, big shipping concerns, wholesale and distributing houses, manufacturing establishments, banks and other kinds of big business, have their fingers pretty close to the pulse of the people.

Aye, they are the doctors in some cases.

They get reports from all parts of the country and it is the summarized viewpoint of all these from the various provinces that have convinced them that Meighen is worse than a forlorn hope. They have put him down at the bottom of the list with not more than forty to fifty seats. In fact some declare that the Conservatives as such will be wiped out at the coming election and that the only hope of the vested interests is in getting behind Sir Lomer Gouin and his associates. For a variety of reasons, the vested interests of Montreal do not like Mackenzie King. He is disliked because of his Ontario attitude on the tariff, on the railway problem, and in regard to public ownership in general. In addition to all that, Quebec has a friendly spot in its heart for Sir Lomer Gouin, not that he appeals to them as Sir Wilfrid Laurier appealed, but because of what he has done for big business. At a time when Ontario was going in for public ownership, Quebec was offering every possible inducement to private capital to invest in her timber lands, her water-powers, her mines, pulp areas, etc. Sir Lomer himself quit his government, after some fifteen years in office, to become a director of several big corporations. To-day he is a director of the Bank of Montreal, a director of the Royal Trust Company, director of the Laurentide Pulp Company, and of various other concerns. As a director of the Bank of Montreal he is persona grata with the C.P.R.—the two directorates being almost identical. In the Quebec Legislature, Sir Lomer Gouin was a czar. No dictator or autocrat ever wielded the sceptre with more disregard for his opponents. He brooked no opposition. His will was law, and that will was to give every possible consideration to what is known as big business. In view of that fact it is not very surprising to find the vested interests in Montreal swinging in behind the little Napoleon of French Canada. Sir Lomer will be backed up by his former provincial treasurer, Hon. Walter Mitchell, who is a protege of the ex-premier. In fact some go so far as to openly proclaim that Sir Lomer Gouin will be the next Premier of Canada, and that the Hon. Walter Mitchell will be his Minister of Finance.

I gather that the hon. gentleman may fairly be described as the A.D.C. in waiting for the Minister of Finance.

All practically agree that if the Liberals are returned to power, even with Mackenzie King as their head, he will be head only in name, and that the real power behind the throne will centre in this little group of Quebec Liberals—Liberal in name, but Conservative at heart.

And it sounded very much like that this afternoon. The speech we heard today from the Minister of Justice reminded me in a very striking way of the eloquent addresses we used to hear from Mr. Cockshutt of the Cockshutt Plow Company. The story proceeds:

Some even go so far as to predict that Sir Lomer and his high protectionist big interests associates will absorb the remnants of the Conservative party—

Well, there are one or two little remnants that I do not think he will absorb.

—but agree that if this is done a section of the French-Canadian low-tariff Liberals, representing rural constituencies, will break away and follow the Hon. T. A. Crerar. These would be led by Ernest Lapointe of Quebec, regarded by many as Laurier's successor. It is openly predicted that after the election on December 6 the Quebec "block" will split right down the middle—

Well, they are splitting, a little further each day.

—one section under Sir Lomer Gouin, allying themselves more or less with the remnants of the Conservative party, and the other joining up with the agrarian group under the Hon. T. A. Crerar. The outstanding impression gathered by conversation with Montreal big business men, was that they had given up every hope of Arthur Meighen being a factor in the forthcoming Parliament. He is beaten to a frazzle, and like rats leaving a sinking ship they have turned to Sir Lomer Gouin.

As for my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition not being a factor in this Parliament, they have certainly made a miscalculation there, for the facility with which the Government has changed its policy at his direction has been the outstanding feature of this session.

Now, when my right hon. friend (Mr. Mackenzie King), whom I congratulate upon being elevated to the dig-
10 p.m. nity of a Privy Councillor, found himself after the election, to his surprise, at the head of the largest group, I firmly believe, not only from his actions at the time but from what I know of the character of the man, that he pledged himself to form a real, progressive government. I think that was his desire. In fact, he began immediately to negotiate to that end, and his friend, Mr. Haydon, made some visits to the West. I do not know whether my hon. friends know all that happened there, but the net result was that five of them were to come into a coalition government. That is the way the leader of the Agrarian party understood the negotiations. I regret very much that that coalition was not formed. It is true it might have resulted in some reductions in the tariff—it could not have resulted in many—but other Progressive policies would have had a much better chance of success if five of them had entered the cabinet. I refer particularly to the National Railways. My hon. friends to my left believe in the public ownership of railways, and I believe their view is perfectly sound. I believe that if we have the courage to persevere, the National Railways will be a wonderful asset to this country, but you cannot build from five to ten thousand miles of railway in excess of the country's requirements and expect the system to pay until the country is more densely populated. That was the mistake that was made, not the mistake that we made, but the mistake that hon. gentlemen opposite made who built all these railways.

[Mr. Hocken.]

Mr. McMASTER: Both parties.

Mr. HOCKEN: Who built the Grand Trunk Pacific? Was it the Liberal party or this party? Who built the Transcontinental?

Mr. McMASTER: What about the Canadian Northern?

Mr. HOCKEN: Hon. gentlemen opposite built thousands of miles of railway that was not required at all, and that is what is causing the deficits on our National railways to-day.

Mr. McMASTER: Was not the extension of the Canadian Northern through the West largely brought about under the aegis of the Conservative party?

Mr. HOCKEN: The hon. gentleman is entirely mistaken.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Hear, hear.

Mr. HOCKEN: The Canadian Northern was financed and bonused by the government under the late Sir Wilfrid Laurier, and guaranteed by the provinces as well.

Mr. McMASTER: Also by the late government.

Mr. MEIGHEN: No.

Mr. HOCKEN: When the Canadian Northern was being built and the Grand Trunk Pacific was proposed, what happened in the party opposite? Its minister of railways deserted it. He would not follow the policy that was imposed upon him, and he left the party because he knew they were piling up on this country a burden that it would never be able to carry for many years to come.

Mr. MARTELL: What did Mr. Bennett, the ex-Minister of Justice, say about the Canadian Northern?

Mr. HOCKEN: The late Mr. Blair was Minister of Railways in the Liberal government at that time, and his judgment was that the building of the Transcontinental from Moncton to Winnipeg was a political crime, he left his party rather than consent to it, and in leaving them he said that the only reason the Grand Trunk Pacific was being built was that "Cox could not wait." I do not propose, while I am on my feet, to allow any man to try and persuade me that this party is responsible for the railway tangle in which we find ourselves to-day. If the National Transcontinental and the Grand Trunk Pacific had not been built, not only would there not be any railway deficits today, but there would be a very substantial profit, because the Canadian Northern is the only section of the national railways that paid last year. It runs through the best territory in western Canada, as my friends here will admit.

My right hon. friend the Prime Minister would have liked to form a Progressive government, and he knew that Barkis was willing. Barkis, in fact, came down to the city of Ottawa, accompanied, I believe, by some of his colleagues, but between the day he left Winnipeg and the day he arrived in Ottawa something happened, and when he got here that excellent plan had to be called off.

Mr. MARTELL: Was that the first time they came for money for the Canadian Northern?

Mr. STEVENS: Three laps behind.

Mr. HOCKEN: It would pay the hon. member to keep awake. I go further and say that it would have been gratifying to all citizens of a progressive spirit to have seen my right hon. friend form the kind of government he wanted in the first place, and when I say all people of a progressive spirit, that would include practically all the supporters of the late government because, Sir, Canada was never given such progressive government as it had under this party. More progressive measures were put through by this party in ten or eleven years than by any other government we ever had in Canada. This is the real Progressive party. I do not feel at all aggrieved to find such a large party of Agrarians in this House. I think they may be a decidedly wholesome influence in the politics of Canada if they do one thing, and that is to maintain the sincerity which they have so far exhibited, so far as I am able to judge. I know that their whole tendency is naturally to support a government which promises free trade. They have been taught to believe that their strongest political opponents are over here, but some day that sincerity which distinguishes them will convince them that they are mistaken in that, and that their natural alliance is with this corner.

An examination of the records of the hon. gentlemen who form the present Government will not disclose many progressive men. It is a government of the old guard, and the cabinet was built by a master mechanic who fitted in every piece of seasoned timber accurately and exactly. I have heard it said in Progressive circles that there is a progressive faction and a reactionary faction on the Government side, and I think that is true. Manifestly, also, the reactionary faction is the dominant faction. My right hon. friend, of course, selected as his right bower the chief reciprocitarian of Canada, and he has as his left bower the chief representative of big business and vested interests in this country. The left bower is a stronger man, physically—I shall not go any further—than his right bower, and then to show his sense of humour the right hon. gentleman threw the joker into the Militia Department. That hon. gentleman has been very quiet so far and his filled his place very well, but I am sure that progressive men on the other side of the House must feel disappointment at the selections which the Prime Minister felt compelled to make. Take the portfolio, for instance, of Marine and Fisheries. There is a fine able mariner down at Lunenburg that might have been fitted into that place, and I think it was a disappointment in some circles that he was not fitted in. But, Mr. Speaker, whoever formed the Government, or whoever had the chief influence in forming it, seemed to prefer to follow the British example in filling the office of Minister of Marine and Fisheries. Because, Sir, it is the British principle to select such a man, and we find that principle put into poetry, not only put into poetry but set to music, because:

> When he was a lad he served a term
> As office boy in an attorney's firm
> He cleaned the windows and swept the floor
> And polished up the handle of the big front door.
> He polished up the handle so carefully
> That now he's ruler of the King's navy.

So in following up the British principle the Government have given to us just about all that Gilbert and Sullivan embodied in this character in Pinafore.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I suppose there has never been such a strange spectacle in this Parliament as we have before us to-day—as we have before us day in and day out. There are all shades of political opinion gathered into one inharmonious group on the opposite side. Here is my hon. friend from Brome (Mr. McMaster) for free trade "as they have it in England"; and here is my hon. friend the Minister of Justice (Sir Lomer Gouin) as protectionist as Sir John A. Macdonald. Then there is my hon. friend the Solicitor General (Mr. McKenzie), who treated us yesterday to one of those long smooth-bore dissertations which at least, did not show any disposition to cater to free trade. And it is not only on the question of the tariff that there is a lack of harmony; we also find it on the question of the nationalization of railroads. My hon. friend from St. Antoine (Mr. Mitchell) takes one side; my hon. friend from North Waterloo (Mr. Euler) takes another side. And so it is even when you come to the question of maintaining the militia. The hon. member for Quebec South (Mr. Power) says we can only vote so much for training the militia, and the Minister of Militia (Mr. Graham) says we must have the amount of money that was originally asked for, that it is the smallest amount that can be asked in order to secure the national safety. But the member for Quebec South says "It does not make any difference to the national safety; cut it out", and the Minister of Militia cuts it out. What I want to point out is that there is no harmony of view on the opposite side at all on some of the most important questions that concern this country.

I must say that the speeches made by the hon. member for St. Antoine, by the Minister of Justice, and by other members on that side, in relation to the national ownership of railways, must give concern to every man who believes in that principle. I do not know exactly what we will do with them. The Government could not give them away to any private interest that would assume the capital charges; that is a certainty. If we disposed of the National Railways to-day it would be on the understanding that for all time we would assume the capital charges of $33,000,000 a year. Now my view, Sir, is that it will not be very many years, perhaps only two or three years, when the operating deficit on the National Railways will be wiped out; and when we reach that point we will have secured everything that it is possible to get by handing them over to private capital. I do not know, of course, what the intention of the Government is in regard to the management of the road; but I know some of the executive staff and I venture to say there is amongst that executive as great enthusiasm to make the National System a success as there is even among the executive of the Canadian Pacific Railway. Those to whom I allude are fine, capable, experienced young men, and I believe they can repeat next year what they have done this year when they reduced the operating deficit by several millions. They will reduce that deficit by six or ten million dollars this year, and within a very short time they will have the operating deficit removed entirely. From that time on there will be no talk about scrapping the National Railways or handing them over to private interests.

Sir, I thought that the speech made by the Minister of Justice to-day was about full value for the support which was given to him by the big business interests in Quebec during the last election. What the effect of it will be upon my hon. friend from Brome (Mr. McMaster) I do not know. I am surprised to see my hon. friend in his place to-night. I had thought that the statement of the Minister of Justice would have given my hon. friend such a shock it would have put him to bed.

Mr. McMASTER: Liberals are made of sterner stuff.

Mr. HOCKEN: My hon. friend seems to have more vitality and physical strength, than I gave him credit for, because I cannot imagine anything giving him such a tremendous shock as to hear a speech of such a character from that side of the House. What my hon. friend is going to do with the Minister of Justice, or what the Minister of Justice is going to do with him, I really do not know.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I have just a word to say to my hon. friends who do not believe in protection. I suppose that if, for example, we took Prince Edward Island it would perhaps be a little to the advantage of that province, which is purely agricultural, if we had free trade in Canada; but I cannot imagine it being of any real value to any other province in the Dominion, and the point that always occurs to me is this: Are we, as Canadians, prepared to work together to build this into a great country? If we are, then we must work for the establishment and maintenance of diversified industries. It has been shown to-day by my hon. friend from Vancouver (Mr. Stevens) that the products of the farm—which of course are the most important of all products; we all concede that—are enbanced in value after they have gone through the factory by 100 per cent or more. Are we going to have these factories; are we going to be manufacturers as well as farmers; are we going to try to work together and each carry a little of the other's burden in order to make Canada a great and flourishing country? We in this part of the country are bearing our share of this burden for the West. I think my hon. friends from the West will agree that a very much greater part of the deficit on the National Railways is borne by the taxpayers of eastern Canada.

An hon. MEMBER: It comes out of the taxes.

Mr. HOCKEN: Well, where do the taxes come from? They come largely from eastern Canada. There is no complaint about that. I am not making any complaint. I am satisfied that eastern Canada will do what it can to meet the burden to keep these railways in the hands of the people so that we can have a national system publicly owned and operated; and that is a service to the West that I hope will not be forgotten. And, Sir, we must have manufactures in the East if we are going to have resources sufficient to pay our debts; and I can tell my hon. friends that they will never get very much relief from the burdens they carry through tariff reduction. That is not the goal towards which they should direct their efforts in my judgment. Suppose the Government does make a few piffling reductions on agricultural implements, such as the Minister of Finance has introduced what does that amount to? And especially what does it amount to when you take the sales tax into account? While the Minister of Finance made that reduction, the addition to the sales tax left you just about where you were before. I am not complaining about high taxes, because this country has to raise a large revenue. We have to pay our debts, and crawl out of our difficulties the best way we can. I submit that Canadians are men who will and can crawl out of trouble. They have the perseverence, the blood and the breeding to overcome any difficulties and obstacles with which they are faced. We have potentially the greatest country in the world. We can maintain in greater comfort than we are living in to-day over 200,000,000 people. Some day, perhaps by the end of the century, we will have 100,000,000 people in Canada, and they will be a better 100,000,000 than you will find in any other country in the world, because they live and work in a climate that will make them strong mentally, physically and morally. That is the type of people we have to-day. Can we not get together and find some common basis, fair and reasonable for both parties, that will bring prosperity to all parts of the country, and devise a policy to bring us into closer harmony than exists at the present time? Nobody can deplore more than I do that there should be any feeling between the East and the West. I will go as far as I can, as an individual, and as far as I have any influence in removing any friction that may exist, but I appeal to my hon. friends to look over the situation, not with reference to the theoretical views of Cobden and Bright, but with reference to the situation as it stands to-day. We are confronted with a condition. We must not be carried away by theories, but we must meet the situation as it exists.

I want to reply to an argument put forward by the hon. member from Marquette (Mr. Crerar) the other day. He said the farmers of Ontario were too poor to get married. Mr. Speaker, did any man ever refrain from getting married because he was too poor? That is the last thing a man thinks about when he has the mating instinct. He finds his mate and marries her. It is not poverty that keeps people from being married, but it is an entirely different and less noble instinct. It is the instinct of selfishness that keeps people from marrying, and if that condition exists in any place in Canada to a greater extent than it exists in the rural districts of the province of Ontario, I am sorry for it. The statistics which my hon. friend from Peel (Mr. Charters) gave the other night go to prove that. Therefore, do not let us run away with the idea that the rural depopulation of Ontario is due to decreasing revenues and decreasing earnings by the farmer, because a good farmer in Ontario will do as well to-day as he ever did. Prices vary from one season to another, of course, but if the man is intelligent,—and all farmers are,—and industrious, he can make a better living in Ontario on the farm to-day than in the city. Pity the poor manufacturer. I know that does not sound exactly like what you hear in the school house, but if there is any class of people in the country to-day for whom we should express our pity it is the manufacturers. They are all in the hands of the bank, and do not know whether they will finish out this month, next month or the month after, and any man who makes a success as a manufacturer has worries to sleep with every night that absorb his thoughts in a way that the farmer does not know anything about. I admit there is lots of work on the farm. It has its isolations, but my view of government action is that about all a government can do is to remove that isolation by all those modern devices such as good roads, telephones, rural mail delivery and distribution of electric power, as we are having it in our farm houses now. These are things that will make life on the farm better and more profitable, and will tend to draw the people into the rural district. I submit my hon. friends to my left will find, as time goes on, that it is not there their natural alliance is, but here.

Mr. H. J. LOGAN (Cumberland): I am sure this House enjoyed very much the speech of the hon. member from West Toronto (Mr. Hocken) who has wandered far afield, quoting from the Bible and Edward Blake down to Pinafore, and, finally, ending up with that same old flirtation with the Progressives—the hon. gentlemen across the way. I have been listening with much interest, during this debate, to this flirtation by these gentlemen angularly opposite. Do they think the hon. members are fools? Three-quarters of the speeches are not addressed to you, Mr. Speaker. They turn their backs to the Chair, face the Progressives, say to them, "Now, boys, you must forget your half-brothers across the way, and you must climb over the fence and come with us, although we have nothing in common with you." My hon. friends, the Progressives, are not, in my opinion, to be caught with any such false inducements as these people are trying to hold out to them.

I am more than ever convinced, after hearing the speech of my die-hard friend from West Toronto, that the members of the official Opposition are Bourbons. They can neither learn nor forget. They wonder why they are there. They are not the only people in Canada who wonder why they are there. The wonder is that there are as many of them as there are. The once great Conservative party of Sir John Macdonald, Sir Charles Tupper, Sir Leonard Tilley, and Sir George Etienne Cartier, which at one time filled all one side of the House and overflowed half of the other side, is now represented by a remnant that occupies four rows of seats in one corner, and yet they wonder why they are there. The hon. member has referred to the fact that men of divergent views have been taken into this Government. Of course, we have divergent views. Liberalism means independence of individual thought. If we were all of one mind over here, if we all believed exactly the same thing, we would be reactionaries, but we do not and, therefore, we are Liberals serving under a Liberal Prime Minister.

In this debate, apart from the deceptive love-making of the Progressives that has been indulged in by my hon. friends angularly opposite and a great many excellent sermons on the theory of free trade, by members of the latter party, we have had the Dead March of despair and the mournful cry, "The country has gone to the dogs." We are told we are hopelessly lost. We have tremendous railway deficits and burdens we cannot bear.

Would it not be better in the language of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Lapointe), to smile and compare our condition with what they might have been? Four years ago, on this day of June, we were anxiously listening at telegraph offices to learn by despatches coming across the Atlantic cable whether or not we were to pay tribute to Germany for the rest of our lives and to learn the goose step. That was only four years ago. Within a few months we won a glorious victory; we have since demobilized our soldiers; we have those men back with us in this country in different avocations. Although we have a burden of debt, although we have a large taxation, we are by no means the most impoverished country in the world, and we have, what is better than all, the great asset of victory, which might not have been ours.

On this occasion we have an amendment to the budget, moved by the ex-Minister of Finance (Sir Henry Drayton), condemning the Government for not carrying into effect the exact language of a platform adopted in this city three years ago. What were conditions in 1919? Our factories throughout Canada were busy; there was practically no unemployment from the Atlantic to the Pacific; markets were good, and our farmers were happy. We floated a huge victory loan, running into hundreds of millions of dollars, which was over-subscribed, even though the rate of interest was low. Since then, we have spent hundreds of millions of dollars in demobilization; we have taken over a great railway system, known as the Grand Trunk Railway; railway deficits have mounted higher and higher, and a tremendous amount has been added to the public debt of Canada. Is this a time for us to bring down a slashing, radical tariff, when we do not know just what the effect would be upon this country? The Progressives preach free trade; it is a beautiful doctrine; we would all be free traders—if the rest of the world were free traders. They sing these theoretical rhapsodies; but unemployment is knocking at the door.

Public promises should be kept; but sometimes they must be varied according to conditions. The Minister of Militia in the late government of the leader of the Opposition put forward a solemn promise in the election campaign of 1917 that farmers' sons would not be conscripted to go to war. He went even further than that; he said that if they were conscripted, he would see that they were returned to their homes from whatever camps they might be. Did the late government keep their promise? No, they did not keep it. They gave the reason that there was such dire need for more men on the other side of the Atlantic, that they could not keep their promise. They did not apologize; they said that conditions had changed. I am not admitting that they were right; but that was the stand which they took at that time. So, we cannot do what, perhaps, we thought we could do in 1919, as conditions now are entirely different.

Personally, I believe the Minister of Finance would have been justified in not touching the customs tariff at all. Why? Because we have not yet had time under present chaotic conditions to know just what effect a reduction in the tariff may bring forth. This Government were only two months in office before Parliament opened. They were busy during those two months preparing for Parliament, and since Parliament has opened, they have been busy carrying on the business of the session. There has been no time for a tariff inquiry. For instance, I can think of factories employing large numbers of men and women in making boots and shoes. In 1919, I would have been in favour of reducing very materially the duty on boots and shoes because the industry was prosperous; but to-day, what are the facts? In the boot and shoe industry in Canada, there is distress. Over 25 leading Canadian boot and shoe manufacturers have gone to the wall; many others are being carried by the banks, and do not know just where to turn. Would it be wise, without any investigation whatever, for the Minister of Finance to come in at this session of Parliament and materially reduce the duty? We know that boots and shoes that come into Canada come principally from the United States of America. I submit he would not be justified in making a change, because we do not know present conditions.

Mr. KENNEDY (Edmonton): I cannot understand the hon. gentleman's point with regard to the situation in the boot and shoe industry. Is his point that that industry has not enough protection, or that the protection is of no use to prevent unemployment and hard conditions?

Mr. LOGAN: The boot and shoe industry in Canada is carried on, in something over 100 different factories, which manufacture principally all the boots and shoes used in Canada. The competition between those concerns regulates the price. If you removed the tariff from that commodity and allowed this country to be overrun, even for a period of three or six months, with cheap American boots and shoes from factories that can make enough in two weeks to supply the whole needs of Canada for a year, what would be the result? You would drive out of existence seventy or eighty factories in this country; in a year's time up would go the price, and you would find yourself at the mercy of the American manufacturers of boots and shoes. The condition, however, of the boot and shoe industry is a matter to be investigated. I merely say that conditions have changed in that industry, and the question whether there should be a change in the duty on boots and shoes or not is a matter for investigation.

Mr. SPENCER: Do the boot and shoe manufacturers of Canada export any of their products to the United States?

Mr. LOGAN: A most negligible quantity. But the boot and shoe manufacturers of Canada supply the Canadian trade, and it is at any rate one industry in which there has never been any proof that there has ever been any combine to fix prices.

We have before us the serious problem of unemployment. In the town where I happen to reside there are hundreds of idle men; but on the other hand we have a number of men at work in the factories there. Could I take the chance of voting to-day to reduce the duty upon goods manufactured in those factories when I would not be in a position to know whether it would mean the adding to the number of unemployed? Is it good policy by precipitate action to have battalions of unemployed in Canada where we now have only platoons?

The amendment of the right hon. leader of the Opposition (Mr. Meighen) condemns us because we do not do something in 1922 which it might be dangerous, to say the least, to attempt, because we happen to have had a platform in 1919 promising certain fiscal changes. I do not think this House or the country is going to take that amendment very seriously, because the chief matter of concern to the people to-day is: What are we going to do now?

I pass to the leader of the Progressive party. My hon. friend (Mr. Crerar) condemns the budget in that the proposed reductions are not sweeping; he also condemns the sales tax and the stamp tax. Well, how else are we going to get the money? Does the hon. leader of the Progressive party and his followers think we can get money off the trees or out of the sky? We are confronted with facts, not with theories, and the facts are that we need between $450,000,000 and $500,000,000 to carry on the affairs of this country during this fiscal year, and at least $100,000,000 of that sum is not even in sight. The sales tax is estimated to produce $100,000,000; the stamp tax will, no doubt produce many millions of revenue, although I have not heard any estimate of what it is expected to yield; the customs tariff will produce over $100,000,000. Money must be obtained. How are we going to pay our pensions and continue the re-establishment of soldiers if the treasury is empty? How are we going to pay the interest on our public debt if we have not some source of income to meet it? Provision must also be made for the greatest burden of all—our railway deficits. Even when we talk about the tariff and other matters, we must realize that the one great problem of this country to-day is transportation.

It is said that the income tax is already too high, and we hear complaints from all parts of the Dominion that it is more oppressive than in other countries. But the Finance Minister estimates that this tax will produce $40,000,000 less this year than it did last. Again I ask where is the money coming from to meet our obligations? The platform of the party led by my hon. friend from Marquette calls for an inheritance tax and a tax on land. But he now tells us that we should not invade the taxation field of the provinces. Well, the provinces already impose an inheritance tax, and I know that my province has a tax on land as well.

There is no question before the House or the country of free trade or protection. We are confronted to-day with the need of money—rather, I might say we are confronted with an emergency. What we require more than ever before is a revenue tariff which, of course, is bound to give incidental protection. A revenue tariff, to produce anything like the amount of money we require, will give substantial protection to our industries. I submit that while some of our tariff rates may be a little high, there are others that are entirely too low. My hon. friends, the Progressives, condemn protection. Why do they not advocate, then, raising the duty on articles not produced in Canada? My hon. friend, the leader of the Progressives, a few weeks ago said in this House in the course of his speech in the debate on the address:

> I recognize that it is and will be necessary for a considerable time to raise revenue by customs duties;

Of course, he admits it is necessary. Then why is he declaring that he and his party will oppose this budget, which, I submit, is not a protectionist budget such as in generally known, but is absolutely necessary to raise the revenues we require.

But if my hon. friends want to raise revenue without protection I will give them a few suggestions. Last year we imported five million tons of anthracite coal. This was not used by the poor down on the wharves of our seaports, nor by the struggling poverty-stricken denizens of our slums, but by the well-to-do people who can amply afford to pay for it. That coal was brought in free of duty, and its value is given in the customs returns at $40,000,000. A revenue tariff of 20 per cent upon that importation alone would mean an additional revenue of $8,000,000—much more than could be procured from an inheritance tax.

We hear a great deal of talk about the duty on bituminous coal, and it is somewhat annoying to us in the maritime provinces to be continually told that we have always the fear that this duty will be reduced. In fact to hear some people talk you would think there is actually a high protective duty on bituminous coal. But what are the facts? Years ago under the old tariff as fixed by my hon. friend the present Minister of Finance, a specific duty of 53 cents a ton was placed upon American bituminous coal. At that time the price was about $2.60 a ton. That duty of 53 cents a ton was equivalent to about 20 per cent of the value. To-day, when bituminous coal is worth from $5 to $6 a ton, it does not take anyone very long to figure out what percentage that specific duty is. The fact of the matter is that according to the customs returns for last year which I have under my hand, even although bituminous coal was valued for customs duty at what is really a very low price, namely about $4 a ton, the duty was less than 12 per cent. Is that a protective tariff? It is not even a revenue tariff.

Mr. MANION: Would my hon. friend permit me a question? I ask it only as a matter of information, because the expression "revenue tariff" is used continually. Would he mind offering to the House his explanation of where a protective tariff ceases and a revenue tariff begins?

Mr. LOGAN: I will put it the other way: a revenue tariff ceases when it is made so high that manufacturers can get in behind it and rob the people by combines, the competition of the manufacturer outside being eliminated. A tariff remains a revenue tariff, though it does give incidental protection, if it does not allow the manufacturers to get behind it and form combines to bleed the people by extravagant prices.

Let me return to this question of coal. I have said that according to the customs returns the duty on coal last year was less than 12 per cent. Now, my good friends the Progressives advocate the development of our natural industries; that is one of the chief things they talk about. They say: Never mind the exotics; let us develop the natural resources and industries. Is there any more natural industry in Canada than the coal industry? Do you know, Mr. Speaker, that 150,000 Canadians depend upon the coal industry, either directly or indirectly? Besides, provincial governments depend upon it for a large part of their income which they devote to education, roads and bridges, and the works which they carry on throughout the provinces. Yet last year there were imported into Canada 15,000,000 tons of bituminous coal, while the industry in eastern Canada languishes; coal miners are working two and three days a week, many not working at all. I assume the same condition exists in the West. I advocate for another budget the imposition of a duty of at least 20 per cent upon bituminous coal. Twenty per cent cannot be called protective duty; I estimate that it would not increase the price of coal to the consumer in this country according to the value placed by the customs more than 27 cents a ton. If we can give employment to thousands of men who to-day are walking the streets of our mining towns; if we can revive this great industry in Canada, we shall be doing one of the most blessed things that can be done, one of the things best calculated to restore prosperity throughout the land.

I wish to offer some suggestions in reference to the application of the tariff so far as values are concerned. The budget provides that the duty shall be applied on the price of the article at point of purchase, that is, the price at which similar goods are sold at the point of purchase. Let me call attention to the manner in which the tariffs of some other countries are applied. The customs tariff of the United Kingdom provides as follows:

> The value of any article for the purpose of ad valorem duty shall be taken to be the price which an importer would give for the article if the article were delivered, freight and insurance paid, in bond at the port of importation, and duty shall be paid on that value as fixed by the commissioners of customs and excise.

In France duties are levied in some cases according to the gross or the semi-gross or the net weight of the article. The Australian act provides:

> When any duty is imposed according to value, the value shall be taken to be the fair market value of the goods in the principal markets of the country whence the same were exported in the usual and ordinary commercial acceptation of the term and free on board at the date of the invoice relating to such goods, and a further addition of 10 per cent on such market value.

In assessing free on board value of goods subject to ad valorem duty in terms of the above-quoted section of the Customs Act of Australia, 1901, the following charges are included: inland freight charges, coastal freight, canal dues, insurance, cost of labour and material in packing, royalties, etc. For instance, if the Massey-Harris Company ship goods from Toronto to Australia the duty is levied not only upon the cost of the goods in Toronto, but also upon the freight from Toronto to Vancouver, insurance, etc., plus 10 per cent on the total cost of the goods landed at Vancouver. If the United Kingdom system of taxation were applied in Canada it would be a great benefit not only to Canadian ports but to Canadian railways. British goods bought by a Vancouver importer would pay duty at a port in Canada; naturally to save duty on freight charges the port would be on the eastern coast of Canada and the Canadian railways would secure the haulage and the freight upon those goods to the point of destination. Or if goods were imported from the United States the customs duty would apply to the point in Canada at which the goods were brought in, and again the Canadian railways would receive the benefit.

This application of the tariff on the cost of goods, freight, etc., at the port of entry should certainly apply to goods brought into Canada under the British preference. Earlier in the session I devoted some time in this House to a discussion of the desirability of confining the British preference to goods entering Canada by Canadian sea ports, a policy which I think should have received the unanimous approval of the House. I have looked at the United States tariff within the last few days and I find it in the following provision in reference to the Philippine Islands:

> Provided further, that the free admission, herein provided, of such articles, the growth, product or manufacture of the United States, into the Philippine Islands, or of the growth, product or manufacture as hereinbefore defined of the Philippine Islands into the United States, shall be conditioned upon the direct shipment thereof, under a through bill of lading, from the country of origin to the country of destination.

That, Mr. Speaker, is the policy of the United States. I am not going to dwell upon it, but I submit once more that that is the proper policy for this country. The time will come, and I hope it is not far distant, when we will be Canadian enough to look after Canadian interests first, last and all the time.

The transportation question, Mr. Speaker, is to us in the maritime provinces the greatest of all questions. The leader of the Opposition referred the other day to the maritime provinces in connection with protection. I do not deny—and I say it to my right hon. friend as well as to the Progressives—that it was a sad day for the maritime provinces when protection was adopted. There is no doubt about it, had we been left as we were at Confederation, with the low tariff that we had at that time, we would have been a much more prosperous country than we are to-day. But we are confronted now with a condition under which about the chief markets we have left are the markets which are produced as a result of the operation of the factories in the towns in the maritime provinces and the coal mining centres. As to reducing any duty affecting those factories which give a market to our farmers and all the people of our country, I want to see a thorough investigation made to decide whether such a reduction would be in the best interests of the country. We are shut out from the United States by a high tariff wall. We are shut out from the rest of Canada to which we were promised access by the fathers of Confederation, by a prohibitive freight tariff. Realizing the conditions that exist, I would hesitate, before voting to reduce seriously the tariff upon goods which are being manufactured in those towns, where as I said before, the farmers in the maritime provinces have lost their best market.

But the question of transportation is, after all, the all-important problem. We knew it at Confederation, and our statesmen told the delegates that came down to Charlottetown: We can never become a part of Confederation because the markets of Canada are too far away. Our natural market was with the United States of America. Joseph Howe, the greatest tribune of our province, and our greatest orator of his or any other time, said on one occasion: "You could throw a grindstone into the water at any Nova Scotia port, and it would float into Boston harbour." The New England states have been our natural market, but we are shut out from that market to-day, and by reason of the high freight rates we are also shut out from the markets of Quebec and Ontario. Do you realize, Mr. Speaker, that nearly one-eighth of the people of Canada live on the island of Montreal? But we cannot reach that market because the freight rates are prohibitive. Therefore, transportation and the reduction of freight rates are the greatest of all problems in the maritime provinces.

May I just for a moment refer to a provision made in the statutes of South Africa which, it seems to me, might be worked out in this country not only in reference to the maritime provinces but other parts of Canada as well, particularly western Canada, where there might be need from the national standpoint for the operation of a railway, but no reasons from a commercial standpoint. In the Imperial statutes of 1909, Chapter 9, will be found this provision relating to South African railways:

> The total earnings of the railways shall be not more than are sufficient to meet the necessary outlays for working, maintenance, etc. and the payment of interest on capital.

Section 131, which is the one to which I wish to draw particular attention, reads as follows:

If the board shall be required by the Governor General in Council or under any act of Parliament or resolution of both Houses of Parliament to provide any services or facilities either gratuitously or at a rate of charge which is insufficient to meet the cost involved in the provision of such services or facilities, the board shall at the end of each financial year present to Parliament an account approved by the Comptroller and Auditor General, showing as nearly as can be ascertained, the amount of the loss incurred by reason of the provision of such services and facilities, and such amount shall be paid out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund to the Railway and Harbour Fund.

I read that as it is interesting, I think, in view of the railway question which we shall have to discuss in this country, and to which we should give our very best thought and attention.

I do not intend to-night to go over the arguments about the Intercolonial Railway. They are as old as Confederation, but the other day when reading a report of the Supreme Court of Canada I came across judicial recognition of the fact that the Intercolonial was never built for any commercial purpose. Chief Justice Ritchie, in Regina v. McLeod, Vol. 8 of the Supreme Court of Canada reports, page 23, says:

As to the Intercolonial Railway, it was in no sense in the nature of a private undertaking, constructed for reasons influencing private promoters of similar works, or in the nature of a mercantile speculation. It was constructed as a great public undertaking, essential to the consolidation of the union of British North America, and in fulfillment of a duty imposed on the Government and Parliament of Canada by the British North America Act.

In a few weeks, I hope not more than a few weeks, when the new management will be constituted for the Canadian Government Railways and we shall have to consider once more the question of freight rates, I hope the people of this country will realize the position of the maritime provinces and the difficulties under which we labour owing to the present lack of transportaion facilities at reasonable rates.

I intended when I commenced this address to refer at some length to the sales tax provisions of the budget. I wish to say first, that there is no connection between the sales tax and the customs tax. You hear people say that the Minister of Finance is giving something with one hand and taking it away with the other. The facts are the sales tax would have been here if the tariff had never been touched. The sales tax has nothing whatever to do with the customs tariff of this country. To some extent there is a change made in the sales tax by the tariff. For instance, there is a change in reference to importation of goods from countries where there is a depreciated currency. I had a statement here illustrating how that would work out, but I cannot lay my hands on it at the moment, so I will have to give it from memory. A few months ago, under the old customs and sales tax regulations, a certain educational institution in this country imported from Germany certain scientific books. They were free of duty, so therefore the question of duty did not enter at all. The price of these books in Germany, if the mark had been at par, would have been something over $6,000. As a matter of fact, in Canadian currency it was $210, but when the institution secured the books they had to pay a sales tax of $274 on these books that only cost them $210. Under the present sales tax proposals the sales tax upon these books would amount to something like $12 only, so a great change has been made in that regard.

The sales tax itself has been broadened very materially. There has been an increase in the rate charged, but at the same time there has been a large increase in the list of exemptions. I do not think we realize just how many exemptions there are from the sales tax. Let me give a few. The sales tax does not apply to sales or importations of:

Bread; flour, oatmeal, rolled oats and cornmeal; rolled wheat, buckwheat meal and pea meal; animals living; live poultry; meats and poultry, fresh; milk, including buttermilk, margarine, butterine or other substitutes for butter; lard, lard compound and similar substances, made from animal or vegetable stearine or oils; eggs; vegetables, fruits, grains and seeds in their natural state; bran, shorts, middlings, alfalfa meal; oil cake, oil vake meal; grains mixed or crushed for cattle or poultry feed; hay; straw hops; nursery stock; chicory, raw or green; bees; honey; sugar; molasses; salt; other farm produce sold by the individual farmer of his own production; ice; fish and products thereof not canned or melicated; ores of metals of all kinds; fuel of all kinds; gold and silver in ingots, blocks, bars, drops, sheets or plate unmanufactured; logs and round unmanufactured timber; fence posts, railroad ties, pulpwood, tan bark, and other articlesthe product of the forest when produced and sold by the individual settler or farmer; newspapers and quarterly, monthly and semi-monthly magazines and weekly literary papers unbound; materials for use only in the construction, equipment and repair of ships; ships livensed to engage in the Canadian coasting trade; calcium carbide; radium; electricity; gas manufactured from coal, calcium carbide or oil for olluminating or heating purposes; artificial limbs and parts thereof; donations of clothing and books for chartiable purposes; settlers' effects; War Veterans' badges; memorials or monuments erected in memory of soldiers who fell in the great War; Bibles, prayer-books, psalms and hymn-books, religious tracts, and Sunday school lesson pictures; articles admitted to free entry under Customs Tariff item 682; manilla fibre for use only in the manufacture of rope not exceeding one and one-half inches in circumference for the fisheries; boats bona fide purchased by individuas fishermen for their own personal use in the fisheries; fibre for use only in the manufacture of binder twine; job printed matter produced and sold by printers or firms. whose seal of job printing do not exceed three thousand dollars per annum, and so on; and the sales tax shall not be payable on goods exported, or on sales of goods made to theorder of each individual customer by a business which sells exclusively by retail. It is further provided that the Governor in Council has the power to add to the foregoing list of articles exempted, as may be deemed expedient or necessary to execpt from the said sales tax.

To show the importance of the exemptions under Tariff Item 682, let me read that item as it apears in the tariff itself. The section reads as follows:

Fish hooks, for deep-sea or lake fishing, not smaller in size than number 2.0; bank, cod, pollock, and mackerel fish-lines; and mackerel, herring, salmon, seal, seine, mullet, net and trawl twine in hanks or coil, barked or not,—in variety of sizes and threads,—including gilling thread in balls, and head ropes for fishing nets; manilla rope, not exceeding one and one-half inches in circumference, for holding traps in the lobster fishery; barked marline, and net norsels of cotton, hemp, or flax; and fishing nets or seines, when used exclusively for the fisheries, not to include hooks, lines or nets commonly used for sportsmen's purposes.

That is a most important exemption to the fishermen of the maritime province, and to fishermen in all parts of Canada whenever they may be engaged in that important occupation.

The sales tax has been attacked here. It is said to be an objectionable tax but, every tax is objectionable. The school tax is objectionable; the poor tax is objectionable; every tax we have to pay is objectionable. It seems to me that the sales tax is about the least objectionable of any tax which we are called upon to pay—for one reason we do not know when we are paying it, which sometimes is a very pleasant condition of affairs.

Now, Mr. Speaker, we, as members of Parliament, should give the people of this country a lead. There is one thing we must have and that is economy; I am afraid we have not got it to-day. Look at the estimates brought down for the Inside and Outside service this year. See the tremendous increase over the estimates of ten years ago. Note also the increase of expenditure for services throughout the country. Go into your own towns and you will find that where three or four people carried on certain work for the Government ten years ago it now takes often double that number to do that work and the pay roll has been largely increased. We should have economy. Are we giving a right lead in this matter? Let us be honest with ourselves. I beg to suggest, to show we are in earnest in this matter, that we agree to a reduction in our indemnity as members, provided that reductions applies pro rata to every salaried official of the Government of Canada. Let it apply to the big officials as well as the small ones with the exception of the small salaried people who only have a living wage. Take the man who is getting probably $100 a month. When you propose to cut his salary or cut his bonus what is his natural reply? He says "It is all very well for those members of Parliament up on Parliament Hill to reduce the salary that I need for the support of my wife and little children, but what about their indemnity? With them the cost of living is coming down but their salaries are not coming down in proportion."

Take the man who is working on the government railways of this country as a maintenance of way man, on a hot summer day working to protect the lives of travellers. When he is asked to accept a reduction of wages, he fails to see the justice of it, when the head of the system which employs him who is earning more in one day than he is earning in a month is not reduced in salary. What we need in this country is to disabuse the people of the idea that is abroad that everybody is trying to do someone else. Let us try and make the people realize that there is an equality of sacrifice in Canada; and if we wish to be frank in this matter let us be honest with ourselves and let us agree that there shall be a reduction in our own indemnities. I need the money I get as a member of Parliament, but I would like to be able to be consistent with the people of this country, and try to demonstrate that the man engaged upon the lowest possible job is getting an equal show with me. It is our duty, as members of Parliament, to try and remove the chaotic conditions which prevail and, at any rate, to set an example. For my part I think it is important that the proposition I have made should be very seriously considered by this House—not perhaps for the matter of the loss of the dollars that would be involved; that is not the question. It should be a matter of principle to try to bring back the confidence of the man in the street in those in authority.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I am only going to take up your attention for a few moments longer. There are several matters I would like to discuss, but I see we are now approaching the midnight hour, There is an amendment before the House which everybody knows will be voted down; all the votes that amendment will receive will be confined to one corner of this chamber. But we have the declaration of the leaders of the two political parties opposite that they are going to vote against this budget. The leader of the Opposition is going to vote in favour of the amendment of the ex-Minister of Finance which, of course, he has a perfect right to do. He can make an argument in favour of that amendment; but when he says that the tariff we are considering is a protective tariff and that it is only reducing the taxation of the country by a fraction of a fraction, I say to him that he cannot vote against that tariff and be honest with his own convictions. Protection is his gospel, the gospel of his life; it has been so always except for one occasion when he was in opposition and moved a resolution attacking the protection on agricultural implements. If as he claims it is a protective tariff, he is bound in honour to vote for it.

Mr. MANION: What about the German regulations?

Mr. LOGAN: They can be discussed in committee on the resolution, just as well as here.

Mr. MANION: We have not had any word as to a change.

Mr. LOGAN: When it comes to the resolution, the hon. member can speak and vote against it. This discussion is on the general principle of the tariff. Why does the leader of the Opposition not vote for it? Is it because it is brought down by one who is not a protectionist? Why, I would almost suspect in that case he would not vote for it if it were brought down by the late member for Portage la Prairie, (Mr. Meighen) who once moved a resolution condemning protection. The position being taken by my hon. friend, is inconsistent. I do not agree that he is right in his view, and I do not agree that this is a protective tariff.

In conclusion, let me say to my hon. friends opposite me, the Progressives, that we cannot, in this country, get all our own way in reference to tariff legislation, or any other legislation, owing to our geographical position. Canada must be a country of continuous compromise. There are many things in the maritime provinces which we firmly believe we are entitled to, but we know we cannot get all we would like to have, because other parts of Canada have difficulties of their own. In 1911 there was a great problem in this country in reference to the tariff. It was a matter of reciprocity, which was proposed for the particular benefit of our friends, the Progressives. I ran an election in a county that was largely industrial. I went down to defeat at that time fighting to assist these gentlemen, and to place western Canada in a better position. The last opportunity the farmers had to vote in favour of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) was in 1911, when he was fighting their battles, and he went down to defeat. Am I to understand that the Progressive, or Farmers party, is going to forget the men who tried to save them in 1911, join forces with the men who tried to injure them in that same year, and yield to the blandishments of the party across the way. I do not believe, when it comes to a vote, that these gentlemen will assume such an attitude.

We, on this side of the House, have made a start in the right direction, as was said last night by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King). We are travelling the right road. This Government has been in power only a few months, and has not had time to investigate the affairs of the country. There is danger in touching the tariff when unemployment stalks abroad, and surely, the Government should be given time and opportunity to look into the condition of affairs so that, when it comes to another session of Parliament, we may be able to deal with this matter with more experience, knowing better than we know now the real and actual conditions of the country.

We cannot have a divided Canada. We must have a united Canada or no Canada at all. We have interests ir eastern Canada which are distinct from the interests of the prairie provinces. They have difficulties there which we have not in the East. Let us realize what those difficulties mean, and those of us who have lived in that country, or travelled through it, know something of the difficulties in the vast prairie for the men who are trying to make a living there. But they must remember there is an East as well as a West. All we ask them at this time is to adopt the sentiment of that old poem written by an obscure poet in New Brunswick, who said:

Though we're strangers,
We'll be brothers
Having naught, but duty's call.
Bear in mind what'er betides us,
We're Canadians one and all.

On motion of Mr. Brethen the debate was adjourned.

On the motion of Mr. Fielding the House adjourned at 11.30 p.m.

THE LEAGUE OF NATIONS

PROTOCOLS OF AMENDMENT TO THE COVENANT

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved that the following resolution be considered at the next sitting of the House:

That it be resolved, That it is expedient that Parliament do approve of the Protocols of Amendment signed on behalf of Canada at Geneva on May 20, 1922, of which copies have been laid before Parliament, embodying certain proposed amendments to Articles 4, 6, 12, 13, 15, and 26 of the Covenant of the League of Nations, which were adopted by the Second Assembly of the League at Geneva on October 3rd, 4th and 5th, 1921; and that this House do approve of the same.

Motion agreed to.

PRIVILEGE—MR. JOHNSTON

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. J. FRED JOHNSTON (Last Mountain): Mr. Speaker, before the Orders of the Day are called, I would like as a matter of privilege to bring to the attention of the House a news item in the Montreal Daily Star of June 8, in which it is stated that the Progressive members declined to cut down the list of their speakers and will not consent to sit all night. I am not so much concerned with this article as with the opinion that seems to be pretty generally held by members of other parties in this House that that is the fact. In this connection I would point out that this debate has been adjourned on ten evenings, and that the Progressive party have supplied the last speaker on five of those evenings. The total number of speakers of all three parties taking part in this debate is 26 Government, 21 Opposition, and 26 Progressive, or 73 in all. It will be noted on reference to Hansard that it took 173 pages to contain the remarks of Government members, 153 pages for the official Opposition, and 132 pages for the Progressives. We had an equal number of speakers with the Government and five more than the Opposition, but as the figures I have given show, it has taken considerably less space in Hansard to contain the views of the Progressive members. So I think the charge that we have been delaying this debate is not well founded.

Mr. GAUVREAU: But you are not through yet.

THE BUDGET

CONTINUATION OF THE DEBATE ON THE ANNUAL FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The House resumed from Thursday, June 8, the debate on the motion of Hon. W. S. Fielding (Minister of Finance) that Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair for the House to go into Committee of Ways and Means, and the proposed amendment thereto of Hon. Sir Henry Drayton.

Mr. G. A. BRETHEN (East Peterborough): Mr. Speaker, I believe it is customary in the debates of this House to devote some time to the remarks of previous speakers. No matter how distant those remarks may be, that is no obstacle to having them brought before the House and placed side by side with their utterances of to-day in order to prove the inconsistency of opposing parties or of members of those parties. It is not my intention to engage at any length in that practice. I shall rather devote my time to questions of the immediate present and the very near future.

Yesterday the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens), in the course of a very excellent address, made reference to the annual statement of the United Grain Growers of Canada and to a report which was made to that company advising against their going into the agricultural implement business in view of the present situation of manufacturing concerns in the United States and Canada. The hon. member drew the conclusion that the members of the Farmers' group were inconsistent in their attacks on protection for manufacturing concerns in this country. I have no objection to the hon. member drawing those conclusions. That is his privilege. But I think every hon. member of the House will agree with me that in view of the present financial stress in the West and conditions generally throughout the country, the company was well advised in taking the course it did in that matter. It is in keeping with the action of the Minister of Public Works, (Mr. King) who has set his face sternly against any new construction in these times. I think the company showed wisdom in their decision.

The hon. member also made reference to the income tax and laid special emphasis on the question as to who pays the income taxes of Canada. The statement has frequently been made in this House and to the public that the residents of urban centres have paid 99⅓ per cent of the income tax collected in this country, while the rural district has only accounted for the remaining two-thirds of one per cent. I should like to deal with that for a moment because the statement has been made and emphasized so often. I do not think any hon. member will say that the vast army of unemployed in the cities are contributing any of that 99⅓ per cent of income tax. Nor is it contributed by the vast number of average citizens. I presume that it is only a very small percentage of the people in the cities who account for that 99⅓ per cent. I do not suppose that the citizens in the rural districts have any monopoly of brains, or courage, or skill in evading the income tax collector. Therefore, we can assume that the people in the cities who have paid the 99⅓ per cent have done so because they had the incomes.

Mr. McMASTER: No income, no tax.

Mr. BRETHEN: If, after forty years of a fair trial, the fiscal system of this country makes it possible for 48 per cent of the people in the urban districts to pay 99⅓ per cent of the income tax collected in Canada, while 52 per cent in the rural districts, as a result of their small incomes, contribute only two-thirds of one per cent, I think any fair-minded member of this House will agree that that system is not equitable or wise, or likely to produce happiness, prosperity and contentment in this country.

Time and again, so often indeed that it has almost become a matter of history, have we seen these circumstances in the rural districts. Two brothers are growing up together on the farm, Tom and James. Tom, the elder, is taken early from school to assist his father in the work upon the farm. And, because he has done his part so well, James, the second boy, goes on to high school and university, and almost inevitably becomes a resident of the city, possibly one of those who contribute to the 99⅓ per cent of income tax collected in the city. Time goes on, the scene changes, and James, because of his superior educational advantages, becomes the representative of his community in the Parliament of this country. The Jameses evidently who have come to Ottawa have legislated well for the Jameses of this country when it has been possible for them to pay 99⅓ per cent of the income tax collected. James has evidently forgotten good old honest Tom on the farm, with the result that the Toms of this country have been so legislated against that they are only able to pay two-thirds of one per cent of the income tax collected from the whole country. I assure you, Mr. Speaker, that although I come from a rural district some of my dearest friends reside in the urban centres. I am not making any attack upon individuals, but upon the system that makes it possible for these evils to exist. Though the Jameses are not, perhaps as plentiful in the House of Commons as formerly, the Toms are here, and as there is something radically wrong in the system of which I complain they will do their best to right it.

With much in the budget speech of the venerable and honourable Minister of Finance I am in hearty agreement. In the Minister's desire for economy, so forcibly expressed, I believe every member, at least in this part of the House, will agree. But I would draw the attention of the minister, as well as the attention of every other hon. member, to the fact that economy, like charity, begins at home; and I believe that if we are ever to create confidence in the public mind, and show that we are sincere in our preaching of economy, we should be ready to favour some substantial reduction in that part of the cost of government which affects each one of us personally. With the statement of the Minister of Finance in relation to the method of raising the current revenue I am also heartily in accord. I believe it is highly desirable that the revenue raised should cover current expenditure, but something further is needed to which I invite the attention of the minister: I believe that at an early date steps should be taken toward the reduction of the national debt. I do not agree with the opinion expressed by some hon. members that it is always advisable to raise money for the public needs by domestic loans. On the contrary, I quite agree with the Minister of Finance that under certain circumstances such would be very inadvisable. For example, where such loans would result in the flow of the public coffers of such a large volume of money that legitimate and desirable businesses would be crippled, and practically annihilated in some instances, I believe it would be very undesirable to raise money by domestic loan. Possibly we are in such a position at the present time, and so I quite agree with the Minister of Finance in his policy of raising this first loan at least, outside the country.

I was very pleased to hear the statement of the Minister of Finance regarding his renewed efforts toward making the reciprocity agreement of 1911 effective. I must confess to the House that I was born a Tory and, up to 1911, adhered to that political faith; and generations of my family, as far back as I have any knowledge of them, also belonged to that party. However, in the year referred to, the principle of reciprocity appealed to me so strongly that I left the party fold, and I have since had no reason to change my opinion respecting the wisdom of my course. The argument is frequently advanced, whenever trade arrangements between this country and our big neighbours to the south are suggested, that because of their great volume of business, and because of the keen competition they could offer, Canadian industries would be overwhelmed and would face ruin. That reminds me, Mr. Speaker, of an incident that happened many years ago in the history of the world when certain twelve men were sent by their people to inspect the Promised Land. Upon their return and all reported "The land to which thou sentest us is surely a land flowing with milk and honey." But ten of the twelve brought in a majority report and it was this "But the people be strong that dwell in that land and their cities are walled and very great, and the children of Anak are there, the children of the giants, and we were in our own sight as grasshoppers and so we were in their sight." Looking back over the years we now recognize the fact that in that case the majority were wrong, and the two were right. May I be permitted to draw the attention of hon. members to the fact that the majority are not always right. In one of the darkest days in the history of this old world a truly great Man was brought before a certain judge who said of Him "I find no fault in Him; see ye to it." A majority took Him and crucified Him. Again the majority were wrong. In 1911 two men were sent by this House to Washington to investigate and report upon a certain trade proposition. Their report was favourable. The country was asked and gave their verdict. The majority pronounced against it. After eleven years in the wilderness I believe there are thousands of people in Canada to-day who, like my hon. friend from Portage la Prairie (Mr. Leader), frankly confess that they were misled and mistaken at that time and who would to-day support that trade proposal. I do not think, Mr. Speaker, that we are likely to get reciprocity to-morrow. Nevertheless I believe that to-day it is not only a very live question in Canada, but when that vast army of consumers in the adjacent cities of the eastern United States begin to realize that they are being cramped in their desire to get better food and get it more freely, I believe they will exert their power in trying to have some such agreement as the reciprocity pact renewed. As to the argument, to which I referred a moment ago, that Canadians will be overwhelmed in competition with the United States, I would like to cite an actual experience as to how trade with the United States works out in the case of pure-bred cattle. In 1918, three men were sent by the Holstein-Friesian Association of Canada to meet the Holstein-Friesian Association of America regarding a reciprocity agreement in records and registration. The fact that the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. Tolmie), who was Minister of Agriculture in what is recognized as a protectionist government, was one of those three men does not detract from my argument. The result of their visit was that the agreement in question was put through, so that as a result we not only have reciprocity in records but every barrier against trading in Holstein cattle between Canada and the United States was removed. As an argument against the removal of trade restrictions between the two countries it is claimed that because of the fact that there are 526,000 Holsteins in the United States and only 100,000 in Canada, a ratio of five to one, the Canadian breeder would be overwhelmed by reciprocity—that his market would be destroyed and that he would face a great financial loss. But what are the facts? I believe I am quite in accord with the facts in stating—and hon. members can correct me if I am wrong—that for every Holstein-Friesian animal that came into Canada in the past year, at least fifty Canadian animals entered United States. Not only that, but these animals have sold much above the values in the Canadian market, up to the point where the Hon. A. C. Hardy, now a Senator in this Parliament, sold a five-months Holstein calf for the world record price of $106,000 at St. Paul. This free trade agreement in registered Holstein cattle was so successful that practically every live stock organization in Canada followed suit, so that we had shorthorn breeders, swine breeders, and sheep breeders all doing the same thing. I think this argument proves, as far as Holstein and other pure-bred animals are concerned, that, instead of we Canadians losing and suffering from this trade, it has opened to us one of the widest and best markets in the whole world. I believe the same argument would hold good with regard to many other things, if people would only lose a little of their hysteria and consider more the fact of the wider market which is thrown open to us and less the competition that they feared they might have to contend with. We have in the city of Toronto Mr. T. A. Russell, who is head of a large automobile factory there. He will be remembered by many people as one of those very strong advocates, some time ago, of the doctrine "No truck or trade with the Yankees." Mr. Russell has also a shorthorn breeding establishment near Toronto, and I have observed that, while he is very strong in his condemnation of any trading in automobiles by Canadians with the United States concerns, he does not assume the same attitude when it comes to selling shorthorn cattle. As a reader of the Breeders' Gazette of Chicago, I have noticed that, when Mr. Russell had cattle to sell, he had a very large advertising space in the Breeders' Gazette, in order to induce American buyers to come to his sale. If they came, as they often did, the success of his sale was assured, and these American buyers took back with them the highest price cattle offered at his sale. I do not blame Mr. Russell for trading freely with United States in shorthorn cattle, but—"Consistency thou art a jewel."

While I have found several things in the budget speech of the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding), the support of which has afforded me great pleasure, I cannot as strongly support the budget itself. I will mention some ways in which I not only have no desire to support it, but I am strongly opposed to it. I am not going into all of these things, but I will deal lightly with them in passing, as I desire to draw the attention of hon. members to my position in regard to them. I oppose the increase in the sales tax for the same reason as given by many hon. members, that it bears too heavily on the persons least able to bear it. My hon. friend from Vancouver centre (Mr. Stevens) yesterday sought to support the doing away with the business profits tax, and he stated it was inadvisable—I believe he made the statement that it was wrong—to tax a man on his profits in order to raise this revenue. As I understand the excess profits tax, it concerns only that man's excess profit. In view of the fact that, not only in the west but right here in the vicinity of Ottawa, there are many men who have been unable to pay their taxes—and if it is wrong to tax the excess profits of any man, it is a crime it seems to me, to tax the man who has no profit and is not able to pay the tax—I would suggest, Mr. Speaker, that the business profits tax and luxury tax be introduced as a source of revenue. I desire to draw attention of the hon. minister to a tax on unimproved land values, as suggested by my hon. friend from Humboldt (Mr. Stewart) the other day, for two reasons: first as a source of revenue, but I have no intention of giving the last word in this matter because I have not made the study of it that some hon. members have. I say that a tax on land values might possibly have the effect of decentralizing the population of this country and avoiding that great evil which we see in any country where they have a few very large cities and a few small towns. If we can do anything to discourage industry going to a few big cities, through higher taxes on the land values there, and can induce or force them to build in thousands of medium-sized towns, we will have a better country. We will have a home market that will be right at the doors of the farmers, and the transportation question will be settled. That will be a real home market. I think the income tax might well be revised on similar lines to those adopted in Great Britain, that the medium or moderately large income would be taxed more heavily. It is all right in theory to tax a big income at a higher rate than they tax in England, but it does not work out very well in Canada, because they are so very scarce, and, as a source of revenue, I think a revision might help some. In the unrevised Hansard, on May 23, page 2910, the hon. minister, in making his budget speech, stated that on cars sold for under $1,200 an excise tax of 5 per cent would be levied and on cars sold for over $1,200 a 10 per cent tax would be imposed. Taking that word "excise" as I read it, I believed it was a tax upon home manufactured cars, and, in view of the fact that these cars were already being protected with the 35 per cent duty, it seemed to me that a prosperous industry highly protected was going to be forced to pay something into the revenue of the country. But what was my sorrow, upon reading more closely, to learn that this 5 per cent excise tax was merely another sales tax applied on imported cars as well as domestic cars, with the inevitable result of any sales tax, that it was passed back to the consumer, and the manufacturer of cars went free. I would like to draw the attention of the minister to the fact that to-day the light car is not a luxury, but a necessity. It is a necessity to the business man as well as the farmer, and it is a profitable investment. I am quite in accord with the proposal that the duty should be smaller on such a car for the good of the greatest number; but I believe the luxury car could well be taxed much higher than is shown in the budget, because a man who can afford to buy a luxury car should certainly contribute more to the Dominion treasury. In discussions in regard to the protective tariff, the argument is always brought forth that it is a good thing to establish new industries in this country, thereby giving employment, providing more wages and developing for the farmer a home market in which he can sell his products. I should like, for a moment, to deal with this question as it affects the automobile industry in Canada, and as the argument applies equally well to other manufacturing industries, I am going to go into the matter in sufficient detail to make it quite clear. In the Canada Year Book for 1920, the latest edition, it is stated on page 332 that there are in Canada ten automobile manufacturers with 4,668 employees. I may say that the figures are given for the year 1918, and I am using all the figures for that year so that my comparisons will be correct. They pay wages to the extent of $5,558,042, and the total value of the product is over $66,000,000. On these cars there is a protective duty of 35 per cent; that is the Canadian manufacturer is protected to that extent. This works out that Canadian manufacturers of automobiles are protected to the extent of $17,332,217. I want to draw two deductions from this. In other words, we in Canada pay over $17,000,000 to establish industries which pay wages to the extent of about $5,500,000. It seems to me that we are paying rather dear for our whistle. In other words, we might pay the wages of every man employed in the automobile industry in Canada, give him a holiday, buy imported cars, and the people of this country would be ahead each year to the extent of some $12,000,000. The argument has been advanced—and it was questioned by the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Chaplin) the other night—that under some circumstances, under the protective tariff, for every dollar in revenue that comes into the country, two or three or four dollars go into the pockets of the manufacturer. Taking the figures which I have given, I find that, in the year 1918, the government drew in revenue on imported cars sold in this country $3,961,000, or, in round figures, $4,000,000, and they protected Canadian manufacturers of cars by over $17,000,000. In other words, for every dollar that went into the government coffers, some $3 went into the pockets of the automobile manufacturers.

I understand that Mr. Ford, in reference to his Detroit cars, stated that he was well satisfied to make $20 clear profit on every car; but owing to the workings of this 35 per cent duty in this country, there is a difference between the price of the American Ford and that of the Canadian Ford of anywhere from $140 to $175 per car, with the result that the Ford Motor Car Works, according to the press the other day, are paying $215 revenue per share. From 1905 to the present time, starting with a capital of $125,000 and returning dividends they to-day have a capitalized industry worth $30,000,000. I believe the Minister of Finance would be well advised if, instead of placing another sales tax on a protected industry of this kind, he would impose an excise tax that the manufacturers would have to pay. In that way, I believe, we would be getting some real money from an industry that is well able to pay. I am a free trader in theory, but under conditions as we have them to-day where revenue has to be raised, I do not pose as a free trader. I am, however, absolutely opposed to the principle of protection as displayed in many cases in this budget. I do not object so much to the protection that, according to the budget, is being afforded to agricultural implements; it is getting down in the right direction. But I believe there should be a material reduction in this 35 per cent duty on automobiles, and similar duties on boots and shoes, woollen goods and many other things that the bulk of the people use. Or, if it would break the hearts of some of my hon. friends opposite to reduce the tariff to any material extent, I think it would be a wise thing at least to impose an excise duty and get some of that protection into the public coffers as revenue.

I believe that "Every tub should stand on its own bottom." I believe a manufacturing industry should arise because of a demand. In our local town, we have a couple of small industries, large comparatively to the town. One of these is a cheese box factory. In former times cheese boxes came in from outside points. The man who started that factory discovered that there was a need, a demand. He started his factory, and he to-day is making cheese boxes for 87 factories. He is making them at a satisfactory profit to himself, and selling them lower than the cheese box trust, which is after him for cutting prices. That is a manufacturing industry established on a man's personal initiative and capital. It is not bonused by a municipal, government or any other bonus, and it is a success.

An hon. MEMBER: Without protection?

Mr. BRETHEN: Without protection. I believe this is the principle upon which industries should be established. The hon. member for Brantford (Mr. Raymond) the other day stated in this House that the whole success of his constituency depended upon the protective tariff being afforded to agricultural implement industries in his riding. In the city of Toronto there was a large manufacturing business of the same kind which also had its warehouses full, and it found it necessary to turn its 5,000 employees into the streets. This was done under the operation of a protective tariff. It was not due to the abolition of protection by any means; the sole cause was the inability of this manufacturer's customers to buy his goods owing to the high prices that were being charged for this class of articles. He was not getting money for his stock and therefore could not carry on. The old binder, the old mower, and the old horse-rake had to do another year on the farm, while the new ones remained in the warehouse in Toronto. Now, if the manufacturers of these implements had taken their losses as the farmers of this country have had to take theirs, there would have been a different situation in the warehouses of Tononto; every one would have been satisfied and there would have been less unemployment there.

I do not agree with the conclusion of the hon. member for South Renfrew (Mr. Low), who asked the question, facing the members of this group, whether they would be prepared to suffer an individual loss of $9 or $10 each to prevent the agricultural implement manufacturing industries of this country going out of business. Let me assure the hon. gentleman that the people whom I and other hon. members in this corner of the House represent are just as much interested in the successful operation of the manufacturing industries in Canada as he is. But there is a difference between the hon. member for South Renfrew and the gentlemen who form this group in the House, and that difference is not in the direction he suggests but merely as regards the means we would employ in making the various industries of the country successful. We would regard the manufacturing industries as secondary, making their success dependent on the prosperity of the primary or basic industries. He, on the contrary, would make the secondary industry a success at the expense of the basic industries.

The question of the home market has often been introduced, and I do not think there is a member in this group who does not realize the importance of that market. But I would draw this to the attention of the House: While we value the home market, the fact is that the prices of goods which we sell at home are set in the markets of the world. Only a year ago milk products were selling at satisfactory prices in Canada about this time, or a little earlier. Suddenly there came a slump in cheese in the British market, and as soon as the cable reached Canada the price here fell. The prices of the goods we sell are not set in Toronto. The bulk of the produce which the Canadian farmer places on the market is disposed of at the prices which rule in the markets of the world; and I am one of those farmers who believe that, given a fair chance, we can compete with any nation on the face of the earth. Last fall a little cheese factory in the Belleville district sent 4 p.m. some exhibits to the great British Dairy Congress, and in competition with cheese from all parts of the world those exhibits carried off the blue ribbon, winning the grand championship. Time after time, competitors from the agricultural colleges of this country have gone to international shows at Chicago and carried off the prizes. We have had them from the Ontario Agricultural College, the Macdonald College in Quebec, and the Manitoba Agricultural College, and time after time they have gone to Chicago and in competition with picked teams of the United States have brought home the bronze bull. Time and again, Jimmie Leask of Greenbank has gone to Chicago and won the grand championship in shorthorn steers; time after time J. D. MacGregor has repeated the victory with his Aberdeen Angus; year after year, Graham Brothers, of Claremont, have taken their string of Clydesdales and won the chief trophies. It is now a matter of history that whenever Graham Brothers of Canada compete at the International they sweep the boards. America has her Luther Burbank, but Canada has her Seager Wheeler.

Now, I do not claim that the rural districts have a monopoly of the brains, the skill or the pluck of the people of Canada. I believe that the people in the cities of Canada, as the war has proved, are quite the equal of the people on the farms, although I do not admit they are superior. I do think, however, that they are equal to the people on the farms, and in the realm of sport they have admirably acquitted themselves. The Falcon Hockey team, of Winnipeg, a couple of years ago, at the Belgium Olympic, in competition with the hockey teams of the world, licked the Yankees, winning the championship not only of America but of the world. And I would not have hon. members forget this afternoon what the Canadians did during the last great war. At Vimy, in the second battle of Yyres, when others were falling back in the face of shells and poison gas, the Canadian boys gasping, bleeding, dying, held and barred the way to the Channel ports. During the recess a couple of weeks ago I took a trip to the northern part of my riding, one of those places of rocks, and lakes and sparkling streams,—and, at this time of the year, mosquitoes;—one of those places where agriculture is carried on under very great disadvantages but where manhood excels. In this place, one day, a little Yankee horse buyer came upon the scene and stepped into a field where a big brawny Scotchman was picking up boulders—the field was literally covered with them—and placing them in position in a fence he was building. The Yankee horse dealer asked: "What do you grow here, Mac?" And the big Scotchman reached down and took up a huge boulder, placed it on the fence and replied: "Men, my friend." I think it is fair to say that in these days of depression the farmers of the country have taken their loss standing. I would like to compare what we see in this Parliament from day to day with the condition when Rome was at the height of her glory:

> Then none were for the party; then all were for the state,
> Then the rich man helped the poor, and the poor man loved the great.

I want to say that we, as Canadians, are proud to refer to our great national resources, to our wealth of mines and fisheries, woods and fertile soil. But the greatest wealth we can leave this land of ours is a nationhood of bright-eyed, rosy-cheeked boys and girls with the will to do and to serve in this God-given country whose chiefest heritage should be "an equal opportunity to all and special privilege to none."

Mr. JOHN MORRISON (Weyburn): Mr. Speaker, I intend to speak but briefly this afternoon. I realize that the House is weary of this debate, but I have a few figures which I think should be put before hon. members for their consideration. I want the House to get a true perspective of what the western farmers are really up against in selling their wheat and buying their implements.

The constituency of Weyburn, which I have the honour to represent, extends along the international boundary for sixty-six miles, and the farmers there, particularly those who live near the line, have a living demonstration every day as to the opportunities of Saskatchewan farmers compared with those of the North Dakota farmers. I am going to give a comparative statement which I think is a fair one for the three prairie provinces, for I live in central south Saskatchewan, with Manitoba to the east and Alberta to the west. I have the comparative prices of wheat in Fortuna, North Dakota, and Tribune, Saskatchewan, thirty miles apart; also the retail prices of farm implements of average size, such as I use on my own farm. I got the daily prices of No. 1 and No. 2 northern wheat at the elevators at Fortuna and Tribune for the months of November and December, 1921, both heavy wheat marketing months, and I find that the Dakota farmer received 7⅞ cents a bushel more than the Saskatchewan farmer during those months for the same quality of wheat, and that he received 3⅞ cents more for the same grade. But, Sir, No. 2 Canadian wheat makes an American No. 1 wheat. I hold in my hand a copy of the report of the grain trade of Canada for the crop year ending August 31, 1921, on page 121 of which, table 91, the monthly average cash prices of wheat, and all grains are given. Taking the average monthly prices, I find there is just 4 cents difference between the No. 1 and the No. 2 grades of wheat. No. 2 Canadian wheat requires 58 pounds of good wheat; No. 1 American also requires 58 pounds. Our farmers know that No. 2 will almost invariably catch the No. 1 grade when they take it across the line, so that, it is fair to say that the Dakota farmer got 7⅞ cents more for the same quality of wheat.

Then I compared the prices of farm implements. In order to be accurate I went to the trouble to get the prices of Massey-Harris implements for the years 1920, 1921 and 1922, and of the McCormick-Deering and International, the latter with branches on both sides of the line, the former—Massey-Harris—only in Canada. I am going to quote the comparative prices, and I am sure that the figures will surprise most hon. members and enable them to understand then why there is so much dissatisfaction with the two old parties. These booklets are marked "confidential", so I will ask hon members to be good sports and to keep faith with me. In the McCormick-Deering and International lists, it is stated that "these prices include sales tax." It is not so stated in the Massey-Harris lists, but it holds good, just the same. That is another outstanding proof that the sales tax, so-called, is really a buyers' tax; the manufacturer and his salesmen pass it on to me. It is a consumers' tax, first, last, and all the time.

Like many other hon. members, I have received a number of letters and telegrams protesting against certain taxes. One phrase included in a communication I received—I could not help noticing it—was this: "I cannot take care of it; competition in other lines will kill my business." What does that mean? It means: "I cannot evade the tax." That is putting it in plain English—cannot take care of it, cannot pass it on to the other fellow. People seem to think it is quite honourable to evade their taxes and pass them on to somebody else. A man who would be very careful about paying any other debt thinks it is quite the manly thing to do to evade, if possible, his debt to the country. I think something should be done to see that every man carries his share of the taxation. If I escape my share, some other person has to carry it; there is no dodging it. We have had a real good time; we have borrowed money; pay-day is upon us—and everybody thinks the other fellow should bear a little more of the load. I can sympathize in a measure, at least, with the Finance Minister in that respect; each person thinks he himself is the goat.

Until the first of March, 1921, the price of an 8-foot binder in Saskatchewan was $286; then it was raised to $337. There is a difference of one dollar between the price of the Massey-Harris binder and that of the McCormick or Deering binder. The price of a drill jumped from $261 to $303; that of a 5-foot mower from $103 to $125; hay-rake, $67 to $71; manure spreader, $263 to $300; large cultivator, $158 to $184; drag harrow, 6-section, $46 to $64.50; disc harrow, $75 to $84; disc plough, 3-furrow, $165 to $205; packer, $150 to $196; wagon, ordinary size, $209 to $236; sleigh, $53.50 to $75; scuffler, $22.50 to $26.50; grain grinder, 10-inch, $118 to $138; cream separator—no duty—$123 to $127; tip-top wagon-box and seat, $85 to $98; wagon seat, $7.50 to $9.50. When election day was announced, these prices fell back to the old basis. Across the line the American manufacturer was not taking advantage of the tariff in that way. Prices over there stayed the same right along. This is just another instance of how the Canadian manufacturer is taking advantage of the customs tariff. He has also taken advantage of those who represent him in Parliament, and has made it hard sledding for them. There was no reason given, in my estimation, why they should have raised their prices to take full advantage of the tariff, they simply make the bald statement, without submitting proof, that they could not stand up against the competition of the American manufacturer.

An eight-foot binder in New Brunswick was selling last year for $268; in south Saskatchewan it sold for $337, or a difference of $69 for the same binder. The freight on a binder to Saskatchewan points is $20.60, so they cannot blame the difference in the price wholly on the freight. I am speaking of the McCormick and Deering machines. Across the line, the difference between the Dakota price and the Maine price for that same binder was just $20, as compared with a difference of $69 between New Brunswick and Saskatchewan on this side. Last year Canadian manufacturers of farm implements shipped their goods to the United States to the amount of almost three and one-half million dollars, —$3,439,000 to be exact—exclusive of threshing machinery, and the total exports to all countries amounted to $12,500,000, approximately. Our manufacturer has the preference in the home market. He says he cannot manufacture for a population of eight and a half million, while the American manufacturer has a market of one hundred and ten million people; but the Canadian manufacturer has free access to both the American market and the home market, and he sold in the United States last year farm implements to the amount of approximately three and a half million dollars.

I have here some comparative prices for McCormick and Deering machines, 1921:

	Canadian Price South Saskatchewan	American Price North Dakota	Canadian Price higher by	Expressed in wheat terms (at average price last November and December) the Canadian farmer pays—
8-ft. binder	$336 00	$220 00	$116 00	150 bus. more than American farmer pays
(McCormick or Deering) Drill, 20-disk	304 00	200 00	104 00	135 " " " "
Mower, 5-ft.	118 50	85 00	33 50	43½ " " " "
12-ft. hay rake	60 50	44 00	20 50	26½ " " " "
Manure spreader	289 50	231 00	58 50	76 " " " "
Large cultivator	159 50	119 00	40 50	52 " " " "
Six-section drag harrows	56 85	54 10	2 75	3½ " " " "
Wagon and box complete	254 50	212 00	42 50	55 " " " "

On the purchase price of these seven or eight articles there is a total difference of 541 bushels of wheat; that is, No. 1 Northern, but No. 3 is the average grown in that country.

Threshing machinery is not included in the statement I have given. There is a fifteen per cent duty on threshing machinery and it makes threshing a very costly business. Last year threshing was done by the hour in our country because of the rust, and it cost some of our neighbours 38 cents a bushel to thresh their wheat, and they left a lot of their wheat unthreshed and let the stock run over the fields, because it did not pay to thresh at that price. They started threshing many fields, and then dropped it. Farmers living near the line thirty or forty miles from Canadian shipping points are obliged to pay the duty, and for these unfortunate men the conditions are very much worse still.

Our manufacturers claim they cannot compete with the United States. The United States is their particular Philistine. I find, however, that in the years 1914 to 1921 inclusive, and for the eleven months of 1922, Canadian exports of farm implements into free trade Britain averaged $1,236,374 per year. Can our manufacturers compete there? Of course they can, when they have to. They won't compete when they don't have to. They have never proved to any parliament of Canada that they cannot compete. They have simply shown that they won't; they never had to prove it. They ask, for the most part, that their joy may be full. Before the standing committee on Agriculture on May 1, Mr. Sanford Evans was giving evidence, and in answer to a question by a farmer, he said:

> If you farmers cannot produce at the price which the world's consumers are prepared to take wheat for, you should not be in the wheat farming business.

How would it be if we applied that doctrine to our infant manufacturing industries? Mr. Evans is a man of some authority, a long-headed reputable business man, but he was side-stepping the issue when he made that statement. So far as the farmers are concerned, if we cannot compete, we cannot expect somebody else to carry us along. We are willing to compete, but we want the other fellow to compete too. We are willing to put our wheat on the world's market; we have to do it whether we are willing or not. We are forced to put it on practically in three months of the year. We would like to have the privilege of selling it over twelve months, but it is pretty hard sledding to get that privilege.

The right hon. the Prime Minister, in speaking on the budget, said that the tariff was to protect our industries, to raise revenue, stabilize business, and give employment. Well, they have protected industries. Industries have had protection for forty years. I wonder why those industries have only been running twenty, twenty-five, or thirty per cent of the time during the last two years. Can they blame that on free trade? Had free trade been in force during that time it would certainly have got the blame for the business depression.

I submit that there was more unemployment under protection than there ever was before in this country, and there has been less stabilization of business.

Mr. MANION: How about unemployment in Great Britain under free trade?

Mr. MORRISON: I am not an Imperial statesman, and I am not prepared to answer every question that may be thrown at me from all sides of the House. I am not solving the British problems or suggesting a remedy for conditions over there.

The figures I have quoted show that the customs tariff is inadequate to raise revenue. Our patriotic manufacturers simply frustrate the apparent intent of the Customs Act by taking unto themselves through its operation a great deal of the revenue. I think that an excise duty should be put on those goods when they have demonstrated that they can compete in the world's open market. If they would only charge the market value for their goods in Canada they would have the jump on the outside fellow to the extent of fifteen per cent, and a lot more goods would be bought from them. As a result would there not be more land brought under cultivation? I think so. If that was done, if they would sell to us at the real market value, then their outside competitors would have to pay the duties imposed by this country. But to-day, the American manufacturer gets as much for his goods f.o.b. from the Canadian farmer as he gets from the Dakota farmer. Then, who pays the customs duties? The American manufacturer? Not much; he passes it right on to me. At the same time that is not the worst of it. We have to pay more than the actual value of these goods to the home manufacturer. I submit that is one of the chief reasons why Canada is not flourishing. I would like to see some of my hon. friends that are high protectionists farming out in the West beside me. I think, like Saul, most of them would see a great light; they would not only be converted, but they would become regenerated and sanctified Progressives.

We have about 40,000 miles of railway in Canada, with 200 people to the mile. The expense of running this government is increasing year by year, and it is puzzling our best men to know how to raise the revenue. It is pretty hard to get the perspective of this whole situation. We know we cannot lower our tariff to let in other nations' goods, but one of the big fundamental difficulties we are labouring under is that our overhead is killing us. Supposing we were directors of any company and the industry had developed to the extent of about twenty or twenty-five per cent, that our overhead was such that we could not meet expenses, but still we ran along for forty years, what would the shareholders say at the annual meeting? They would say "You fellows are all right, you are getting your salary, and what more should you care?" If this country had such a policy that we could get all our natural industries under full development there would be work for everybody. The reason people are flocking to the cities is because lots of them in the poorer rural districts cannot make a living on the farm. There is a big district not very far from my constituency where the people abandoned the country on a strip of about ten miles wide. The land was not as good as elsewhere and did not hold the moisture for as many days as necessary, and therefore they abandoned it. There are other districts not so bad as that where the people engaged in farming are merely eking out an existence. Then there are small districts, under better conditions, where the farmers are making a little money but the general rank and file of them are hard up. We have been losing money there within the last few years, and before that many of the farmers never made any. Now, I submit that conditions are fundamentally wrong, and the experience of the past forty years has demonstrated the truth of that statement, My right hon. friend the leader of the official Opposition stated that we could not compete with the industries in the United States. He said that that country was developed from eleven to fifteen times beyond what Canada was commercially, and I think, perhaps, that is a proper statement; at any rate it is near enough for me to use for the purposes of illustration. My right hon. friend would not admit that the United States has from eleven to fifteen times the natural resources that Canada has. I do not know what percentage of good land Canada has, but it is one-half as much at least as the United States has. We had British goodwill behind us all the time, we had British capital, we had British immigrants coming here, and we had protection. Why should Canada not have developed a little more as compared with the United States?

Mr. MEIGHEN: She did not start so soon.

Mr. MORRISON: She started at practically the same time as the United States.

[Mr. Morrison.]

Mr. MEIGHEN: Not in protection.

Mr. MORRISON: She started building up about the same time virtually, and I do not think it is much of a recommendation to Canadian statesmen that we are not in a better position than we are to-day as compared to the United States. I do not like to say anything about men who are not present to-day to speak for themselves, but really Canada should have developed a little faster when she had such a wealth of natural opportunity, and such wealth of natural resources. The capitalists of Great Britain would have preferred to invest their money in Canada; and the people of Great Britain would prefer to come to this country from motives of loyalty. That we are not in a better position to-day is because there has been something fundamentally wrong with the policy we have pursued, and the position in which we find ourselves does not reflect much credit on the protective system. The hon. member for Centre Winnipeg (Mr. Woodsworth) said that repudiation was a word that does not look very well. At the present time we have this situation on our hands: We find that the railways of Canada want to repudiate a covenant which they made with the people of the prairie provinces. We had the heads of these railways down here using every influence that is at their command, and that is no small amount. What for? The one big object sought is to annul the Crowsnest pass agreement permanently. If they cannot influence the special committee on railways to bring in a report to that effect, they are willing to have the agreement annulled temporarily; and then next year will take another drive at permanent annulment. I say that is an unpardonable breach of a covenant on the part of the railways. Where does honour come in, if the railways enter into an agreement with the people and then want to annul that agreement? Not only that, but they come down here and make excuses and endeavour to set the maritime provinces and British Columbia against the prairie provinces. They say, "We cannot put the Crowsnest pass agreement into operation, and at the same time give the other provinces a better rate." Well, I have here the annual report of the Canadian Pacific Railway, and I find that in 1920 their net earnings amounted to 15.30 per cent, and in 1921 their net earnings were 17.72 per cent. It is true we had hard times in 1920 and 1921, but a little lower rate of interest for that company would not have been out of place. We know that the railways, and every man who invests money in this country, should make a profit. That is their object in investing it; if they do not make a return on their money there will be no further investment. We Progressives are not here to knock our railways; we are all so interdependent on one another that we must all have a measure of success or the machine cannot run.

Now the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Chaplin) said the other night that he could ship three cars of merchandise to Liverpool for the same price as he could ship one to Saskatoon, and that he could ship two to Liverpool for the same price as he could ship one to Winnipeg. When questioned, he admitted reluctantly that he got a cheaper rate for export shipments, than he did for local home shipments. Contrast that statement with the sworn evidence of Mr. Porter, of Perth, New Brunswick, an exporter of potatoes, who said that the export rates are 100 per cent higher than the local rate on potatoes, and that in consequence of not being able to find a market large quantities of potatoes are rotting.

Mr. MARTELL: Does my hon. friend mean to say that in all cases the export rates are lower than the domestic through rates?

Mr. MORRISON: I am quoting sworn evidence given before the railway committee; I am not a railway expert.

Mr. MARTELL: I would like to tell my hon. friend that in the province of Nova Scotia, as the result of order 350 of the Railway Board, we have to pay to-day about eight cents more a barrel, say upon apples, from Windsor, Nova Scotia, to Halifax, than if we shipped those apples for domestic purposes.

Mr. MORRISON: That is not refuting my statement

Mr. MARTELL: No.

Mr. MORRISON: I am not an expert on freight rates, but I have quoted a sworn statement, and the House can consider it and do as they wish about it. It is quite evident the manufacturer has been getting the preference in this matter. Now, Sir, there must be a maximum reduction in freight rates in order to get things going properly. People have not been going to the farms and remaining there. We have an immigration problem on our hands, and we are wondering where we will get suitable men to put on the land. We can get lots of men to go into the towns, but we must make conditions a little better on the farm. If we are not holding the men with experience on the farm, what is the use of spending money to get more inexperienced men? Let us make the farms more livable for the returned men, and the settlers, that are there doing their utmost. I submit, if we make conditions for the basic industries attractive, the manufacturers will prosper. And we farmers want them to prosper; we have nothing against them. Some hon. members, while speaking, get pretty hot against the Agrarian group, because the members of that group express opinions which are contrary to their own opinions, but we like to present our case. If the truth is not good enough, there is something wrong. An hon. member stated last night that twenty-five boot and shoe firms had gone broke lately. I wonder if they were getting too much protection, or not enough. I am wearing a pair of shoes that cost me $11 or $12. During the last year the best I could get for a calf skin or a cow hide was from 50 cents to $1. The Labour people say they are not getting very much out of it. Where is the nigger? I have a suit of clothes which I bought from one of the biggest tailors in Toronto and which cost me $50. I have a couple of hundred sheep and was selling wool last year. At the price I sold that wool, I did not get $1 for the wool it took to make this suit of clothes. An hon. gentleman quoted prices of cloth the other day, and showed that it took $7 for enough cloth to make a suit of clothes. Now, labour may be getting a good big profit, but capital is not absorbing all the balance. Somebody is not working. Honest labour is not getting it. I do not know where it is going. These are matters which should be investigated. People cannot buy. We want the goods, but we cannot buy them. We cannot exchange our wheat for the commodities that the other fellow produces. Here is a gem. I read in a Conservative paper this week that the leader of the Progressives lacks the qualities of iron and ruthlessness, essential to political leadership.

Mr. CALDWELL: That is surely a Tory point of view.

Mr. MORRISON: I submit, Mr. Speaker, that the proper qualities for a leader is not iron and ruthlessness. We believe a leader should have a good knowledge of his country's affairs and should have the ability to apply the Golden Rule to public business.

Iron and ruthlessness have destroyed most of the countries in the world. They have been largely responsible for the hell that is in Europe and in the world generally; we need the application of Christian principles to public business to-day.

In conclusion I must say that I cannot support the budget, and I am not going to support the amendment, because I think it was political trickery.

Mr. T. W. BIRD (Nelson): Mr. Speaker, it is not my purpose to go very deeply into this discussion. I wish to remark, at the outset, that during the progress of the debate the various attitudes of the three main groups in this House have progressively cleared themselves. The Government have manifestly followed the dictates of expediency, and incidentally they have exposed themselves to the adverse judgment of that section of the public which is still old fashioned enough to believe that the same standard that applies to public conduct applies to personal conduct. The Opposition, on the other hand, have quite ignored the claims of expediency and have levelled a charge of moral aberration against the Government. I do not wish to enter into the question of expediency. It is a matter of long dispute, but I notice that it is a matter of great importance to the politicians. They have great need of it at times, and, although I am not very well versed in political history, I believe, from information I have received, that, even our rigidly righteous friends to the right have had occasion to use it now and again. I am reminded of a quotation given in this House the other day from an American writer, to the intent that Providence made politicans hollow in order to facilitate the disposal of inconvenient principles. Our friends to the right seem to believe that the members of the Government are very hollow, indeed—so hollow that they have swallowed all their present principles and still there is room. On the other hand, I am reminded of a quotation from another American writer, which runs something like this:

> A foolish consistency is the hobgoblin of little minds,
> Of little statesmen, philosophists and divines.

You see the Government on the one side, and the Opposition on the other, stand in a compromising light before the public at the present time. One is exposing its integrity and the other is exposing its—well, its "consistency." I am glad I am a Progressive at the present time. I think we have got the two old parties in a position in which we could smack them very well, if we wanted to. But it is not our duty—at least we do not conceive it to be our duty. We do not wish to reflect upon the integrity of the Government, nor upon the sincerity of the Opposition.

When I thought of these remarks, the hon. member for East Calgary (Mr. Irvine) had not spoken—the right wing of the Labour party, I mean—I do not know whether it is the right wing or the left wing, but one of the wings of the Labour party. In his speech he took occasion to criticise the Progressive party, and I am sorry to say that, in his remarks regarding the Progressive party, he seemed to be labouring under the same mist that enveloped the first part of his speech in regard to our credit system. The former part of his speech about the credit system reminded me of the famous saying about "the blind man groping in a dark room for a black hat that was not there." I am sorry the hon. member is not in his seat. I do not wish to disparage the sincerity and ability of that hon. gentleman; I have known him for many years, and I think in both regards he is the equal of most members in this House.

I want to make just one general remark in regard to the budget, and that is that, I think, this budget proves the old truth that whenever a government begins to revise a budget, the people do not stand to gain very much, if anything at all. When once a protective system is established to the degree it is in this country, it is almost impossible for any government, however sincere its intentions may be, to modify that system in the direction of the interests of the people. If, Sir, you will pardon another parable—and truth sometimes enters in by lowly doors—I am reminded of a legend about a cage of monkeys. There was once a cage of monkeys who had lived for some considerable time upon a diet of six chestnuts in the morning and four chestnuts in the evening. They got discontented under those conditions, so they resolved to present a petition to their keeper in order that that tariff might be revised. The keeper was somewhat perplexed; but by and by he made this proposition that, in future the monkeys should have, instead of six chestnuts in the morning and four in the evening, four chestnuts in the morning and six in the evening. We are told that the monkeys were well satisfied with the generosity of the offer. Some of the members in this House, I have often observed, are Scotch in descent, and they do not easily see the point of an illustration.

Mr. McMASTER: An English joke.

Mr. BIRD: I am a North of England man myself, so that I am pretty nearly a Scotchman, although I have preserved my sense of humour in spite of the atmosphere in which I have been brought up. It is difficult to imagine a cage of nine or ten million monkeys; but I believe there are often more proofs of the theory of Darwin than we imagine, especially when the question is one of economic or political matters.

I want to say a word or two regarding the speech of the hon. member for Brome (Mr. McMaster), seeing that he has interrupted me, and the speech of the hon. member for Brantford (Mr. Raymond). These two hon. gentlemen, each in his own way, possess gifts of expression which are a distinct acquisition to this House. I was sorry to see them placed in a position that was somewhat apologetic, somewhat retrospective, with regard to their political affiliation. It seems to me to be a peculiar circumstance when these two gentlemen, tracing their political descent from a common source, should have arrived eventually at such divergent points of view.. If you will pardon me, Sir, this far-fetched illustration: you may begin with the original cell that we are told of in our school books, the primordial cell, and after ages of slow development, you get a tiger on the one hand and a sheep on the other. I suppose it should not be impossible, beginning with the primary germ of Liberalism away back in history, eventually to get the hon. member for Brome on the one hand and the hon. member for Brantford on the other. The hon. member for Brantford, it will be noticed, traced his lineage back to King John and the Barons bold. I do not know by what principle of interpretation he did that; but I thought at the time that, for his brand of Liberalism, he might as well have gone back considerably further, in fact, a few million of years further; because I should imagine that in the dim ages the Cro-Magnons and Kitchen-middeners had a protection on their stone hammers and flint knives. But the Liberalism of the Barons is rather an obscure point, I must say. John Ruskin, however, tells us that the Barons bold were protectionists. They built their castles alongside the trade routes on those days, and they levied a toll upon the passing caravans. They were Liberals in the sense that they were liberal with other people's goods. I do not think the hon. member for Brome is anxious to trace his lineage so far back as that and, as a matter of fact, he did not do so. I noticed this phenomenon in regard to his speech, and I want to pay tribute to that speech. Some of the sentiments in it went much further back than King John; I think some of them went back 1,000 years behind King John, and some of the sentences in his speech were almost memorable. But I noticed that the latter part of his speech lacked the enthusiasm and verve of the first part, and I came to the conclusion that there is a difference between eulogising the past history of a great party and apologising for its present conduct. Sometimes the springs of eloquence suddenly dry up, and there is always a reason for that. The hon. member invoked the spirit of many estimable men of the past, without very much effect, I thought. When he was invoking them, he turned to his own party; but I think there was a rustle of wings above the Progressive party at the time he was doing that. If I read history aright, if I can add my view of history in contradistinction to the views which these hon. gentlemen put forward in regard to Liberalism, I would say that the historic Liberalism, the Liberalism of John Bright, Cobden, Gladstone, Campbell-Bannerman and Lloyd-George in his palmy days, is represented, not on that side, but upon this side of the House. Progressive-ism is Liberalism redivivus and carried to a further degree of enlightenment. That is the position which we on this side of the House hold.

Mr. JACOBS: That is Liberalism for the farmers.

Mr. BIRD: I think my position in this House has proved that it is not Liberalism for the farmers. I was not going to make this remark; but I will make it now. If there is any analogy in history that fits the party opposite it seems to me that it is Joseph's coat. Hon. members will remember that Joseph's coat was a coat of many colours—about the only thing, I think, about Joseph that is like the present party opposite. If I remember rightly, Joseph was in favour of a wheat board.

Mr. McMASTER: He got corrupted by living under a tyrannous Pharaoh.

Mr. BIRD: I think he was very successful. His wheat board conserved the food of the people for seven years.

Mr. McMASTER: He enslaved the people.

Mr. BIRD: Yes, he saved the people.

Mr. McMASTER: No, I said "enslaved."

Mr. BIRD: Well, that was ancient slavery; you cannot compare the twentieth century with that age when they took slavery as a matter of course. Well, I will add this personal reference: I was brought up in a school of Conservatism, all my relatives and ancestors having been deep-dyed in the old doctrines of that political faith. When I entered my later 'teens, however, I fell under the influence of Lloyd George, that splendid idealist in British politics. That was the beginning of my Liberalism, and I feel that I still entertain the ideas of Liberalism that I had at that period. But it is not by any means the Liberalism of my friends opposite, excepting one or two very notable instances. I should like to see a revival of the old Liberal spirit amongst our friends on the opposite side, I should like to see them come back to the true faith, especially the younger men among them; I should like to see them cast aside their superstitious adherence to party tradition and party names. Let hon. gentlemen opposite throw off those shackles and get back to the realities in politics. I do not say that they ought to come over to this side, speaking in a topographical sense; but they should come to our side in the matter of adherence to realities in national politics.

Now, I do not wish to go fully into that part of my speech in which I intended to deal with the tariff. I desire, however, to refer for a short time to the attitude which our hon. friends to the right have taken towards the Progressive party. I am sorry that our Liberal friends have not criticised us throughout this debate. With one or two exceptions they have treated us very kindly, and as a consequence we have to direct all our artillery towards the right. That leaves the impression that we are somewhat biased, which I assure the House is not the case. If hon. gentlemen opposite will give us the opportunity we shall be glad to turn some of our attention in their direction.

Mr. JACOBS: Go on and do your work.

Mr. BIRD. I do not want to put the courage of hon. gentlemen to the test; and the opportunity is not always favourable to the display of courage.

[Mr. Bird.]

Mr. PUTNAM: Was the hon. member satisfied with the attitude which the Liberal party took in 1911 with regard to reciprocity?

Mr. BIRD: Theoretically I was. But, frankly, at the time of that election I was just a fresh immigrant to this country, and since then I have not entered into the niceties of that contest. In theory, however, I was whole-heartedly on the side of the Liberals then.

Mr. PUTNAM: That is the last time we had power.

Mr. BIRD: Well, it would be a strange thing if the Liberals were not sometimes true to their principles. Now, in regard to the attitude of our friends to the right, they have two or three charges to make against our party, and the main one apparently is with reference to our accuracy, or rather our want of accuracy. Hon. gentlemen to our right have assumed a very superior position on the necessity for exactitude of statement in this House, and during three and a half months of session they have caught the Progressives twice in this respect. Ever since, they have tried to disparage this party because of that, which I do not think is either fair or dignified. I hope, therefore, that hon. members will excuse the littleness and meanness of the reference I am about to make. The other day—and this is in regard to a quotation I have already made—an hon. member quoted the words I had used from the Bigelow papers and attributed them to Sam Weller. Now, this is undoubtedly a small matter to bring up. But suppose we Progressives decided henceforward to despise hon. gentlemen to our right, and always to question their accuracy, simply because one of their party happened to have made a lapse in a literary reference. That would not be nice; and yet we should be perfectly justified in doing so if we were to follow the example that hon. members have set in that regard. They have caught one or two of our members on little trivial points, and some of their first debaters have devoted almost half of their speeches to an endeavour to show that the Progressive party is irresponsible when it comes to a basis of fact. I refer particularly to the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens). We all admire the clearness and the logical character of his thinking, but I think he descended very low in his speech when he bent his efforts to show that we as a party were to be disparaged and despised because one or two of our members had made a slip. The member for Kindersley (Mr. Carmichael) during this session has been corrected no fewer than three times for a slight slip in statement, and that is the kind of argument which the Progressive party has to cope with from our friends to the right. I admit that we Progressives are so inexperienced in parliamentary ways that we have not yet arrived at the point where we can make inaccurate statements and get away with it. No doubt the time is coming when we shall be able to do so. However, we are determined to base our main criticism always upon the facts of the case. The hon. member for Vancouver Centre, charging the Progressives with inaccuracy, quoted some of our figures. He quoted the revenue figures for 1917-18 from a pamphlet I have in my hand, the only pamphlet in this connection the Progressives used in the campaign. This pamphlet deals with taxation and the hon. member, having quoted fairly accurately the figures of the revenue, went on to say:

> They say—

That is, the Progressives.

> —that $146,000,000 is 94 per cent of $27,000,000 plus $26,000,000.

I contend that there is no such statement nor anything approaching it in the pamphlet. Now, turn to his own figures. This is what he says:

> In 1921 we raised 37½ per cent by indirect taxation and in 1922, for the fiscal year ending March 31, 27½ per cent. Let me give some figures of taxation receipts by way of illustration. Last year we received $105,000,000 from customs; $36,000,000 from excise; $73,000,000 from inland revenue—that would be sale tax—$78,000,000 from income tax and $22,000,000 from business profits tax.

That makes a total of $314,000,000. Now, out of that there is approximately $100,000,000 that fairly could come under the head of direct taxation, which means that 67 per cent was from indirect taxation. And yet the apostle of rigid righteousness says that 27½ per cent was collected by way of indirect taxation. I am sorry he is not here to correct his own figures. It does not amount to very much; if I had not been making a speech in defence I would not have referred to the matter; it is not worth while. It is not the kind of argument that even a new member ought to condescend to, but it is sufficient to show that hon. members, living as they do in their glass houses, should not throw stones. It would be well if they would be more accurate in the quotation of very simple figures.

Now, I want to detain the House just a little longer with one or two brief arguments in regard to the tariff. First of all, I want to say that so long as a protective tariff raised the greater proportion of the revenue of this country it was almost impossible to oust it from its strong position. When a system floods the treasury with money from year to year until the conscience and intelligence of the people are pretty much asleep, that is a bad thing for any country and it is a bad thing for any system of taxation that does that. Conditions in Canada, however, have changed; the tariff revenue is no longer the largest proportion of our revenue; in fact, it has a very secondary place in it. I am afraid, Mr. Speaker, that the protectionist tariff has through war conditions, lost the old prestige that it formerly enjoyed—the almost superstitious regard which the people of Canada have accorded to it for so many years. I foresee the time when it will exercise very little influence over the minds of the people of this country—that is, in a superstitious sense, because now that it has sunk to such a secondary position in our revenue the people are more inclined to look at it critically. I am glad that the war has hastened the time for Canada to see that it must supplement its revenue by direct taxation, because when you once introduce that principle it is the beginning of the end for protection. We are told that it was the budget of Peel in 1842 that sounded the death knell of British protection, because it introduced for the first time an income tax into the British fiscal system. I believe that once the people have tasted the economy and the equity and the simplicity of direct taxation they will no more go back to the protective system for getting revenue than an old cow would leave fresh grass to go back to a three-year old strawstack. I am not one of those who criticise the sales tax unconditionally, because I recognize in it a plain family resemblance to an excise tax. But a tax may be all right or approximately right in principle and yet be very wrong in its application, and I am sorry that the Government have thought fit to add fifty per cent to the sales tax this year. It is well-nigh nefarious for a country like Canada to indulge in that kind of taxation. But sometimes good comes out of evil, and I am pleased to think that here is another blow at the old protectionist superstition; here is another manifestation to the people of Canada that a free trade government could get its revenue if it wanted to. It has been an obsession of the protectionists for a great many years that a free trade government has no channel open to it whereby it can get its revenue. But I believe there was no need for a sales tax. I believe it would have been a splendid thing if the Government had inaugurated an inheritance tax at this time. We all would have been very proud to see the name of Fielding bracketed with such a name as Harcourt in the annals of British taxation as the originator in this country of a taxation which appealed equally to the reason and to our humanity; and I believe that is what the inheritance tax does. I hope to see the day pretty soon when the federal government will introduce that tax. Of course, the cry will be raised that it is a tax on capital, but can anybody in this House point to a tax that is not a tax on capital? It is only a matter of whose capital you are going to tax, whether it is that of the rich man or that of the poor man.

Now, just a word to the protective character of protection. We have been told—

Mr. McQUARRIE: May I ask the hon. gentleman a question? Would he also tax land?

Mr. BIRD: Well, yes, if that is any satisfaction to my hon. friend.

Mr. McQUARRIE: That is to say—

Mr. BIRD: I do not wish to enter into the matter, because I want to go on with my argument; time is pressing. I want to say, in regard to the contention that protection protects the farmer, that the advocate of that view is up against a very serious difficulty in the fact that the farmers almost universally do not believe it. I know that certain protectionists believe that that attitude on the part of the farmers throughout Canada is due to some deep-seated weakness of mind. I read a protectionist speech the other day that almost went so far as to say that the farmers' attitude was due not to any understanding on his part of his own interests but to some kind of imbecility. I think I know the western farmer at any rate, and it is pretty plain that he bases his economic convictions upon very simple facts. I do not need to repeat the threadbare argument of the farmer, which is this: that protection can never, under any circumstances, increase the price of his product but that it does under all circumstances increase his cost. These are nuts that the protectionist can never crack. The farmer is no longer in the a-b-c of economics; I think the presence of these sixty-five members in the House of Commons is proof of that. There was a time when the Scottish laity could discuss points of theology with as much ability as the college man; I believe the time has come when the farmers of Canada can pretty nearly discuss economics with any of the professed politicians of this country. And the more deeply they go into this subject, the more they question the beneficence of protection in this regard, knowing as they do that the countries to which they sell their produce can only pay for it by exporting manufactured goods. The farmers doubt whether the protective tariff can be of any use to them. How can it be? How can protection help the farmer by getting in between him and his ultimate market, by stopping the flow of trade? There is another pretty hard nut for the protectionist to crack.

We have heard a lot about the home market. Well, I think nobody knows more about the home market than the farmer. Every time he drives a load of wheat to the elevator and brings back some trifling piece of machinery or household equipment, he feels like cursing the home market. It is the market that fleeces him; it is the market where his produce sells at a minimum and where everything he buys is at a maximum. So, do not cite the home market to the farmer, please. We have heard a lot about Ontario and Quebec, and we will admit that the Ontario and Quebec farmers sell 85 per cent of their produce in the home market. But are the Ontario farmers and the Quebec farmers any better off than the western farmers? I have yet to see it. I have passed through the country a good deal, and in my opinion the conditions in these respective sections do not differ very much. My contention is this. You can multiply the population of Canada four times, and the farmer would be no better off than he is now. In fact, he would probably be worse off, and instead of being a self-respecting man owning his own farm, he would be a tenant farmer, as sixty per cent of the farmers in the United States are to-day. So it is no use to talk the home market to the average farmer, because that is the place where he gets fleeced and skinned.

Just a word about the labouring man. I notice that the protectionists, especially when they talk anti-dumping, are always solicitous for the labouring man. They always wish to see a pile of work for the workingman. I know that a protectionist can point to this industry or that, and argue that free trade would kill it. I know that is possible, and there is a reason for it. But is not that just one of the results of competition everywhere? Is not that one of the fruits of competition, even if that competition is internal? Why, of course it is. It is just one of the ordinary every-day results of free and fair competition. Now and then the man who is incompetent goes to the wall, and that is all that argument amounts to.

Let me refer to the English farmer for a minute. The English farmer at the present time is complaining that the Canadians are dumping their wheat over there, and they are urging that this should be prevented. They want to stop Canada sending wheat to England. The British farmers, there is no doubt about it, are going to get out of the wheat business pretty soon, and thousands of their labourers are going to have to seek employment elsewhere, and thousands of acres will go back to pasture. That is a splendid opportunity for the British protectionist to say: Let us protect the British workingman by putting a tax on Canadian wheat and keeping it out of the country. I wonder how the manufacturers of this country would like it if England adopted their own logic and did that? I think they would go out of business pretty quick if our wheat was excluded from Great Britain to protect the British farmer in growing his high-priced wheat. There are a good many people who would like to go back a hundred years and have a tax imposed on Canadian wheat to protect the farmer. But in England that kind of talk seems immoral to the average person. It sounds almost like plain stealing to the average Englishman, and such a proposal has not much chance in a country where for many, many years every industry, agriculture included, has had to stand on its own bottom.

In this country what have we done? By a system of protection we have built up certain parasitic industries that could not possibly stand on their own feet, and when we begin to talk of free trade in relation to these industries, we are asked to think of the poor workingman. I want to say this: When we discuss the work of the workingman we want to take a wider view. We do not want to think of the workingman in this or that parasitic industry, but of the workingmen throughout the length and breadth of Canada. What is the position? It is just this: The protectionists propose to give the workingman work by keeping out of this country the manufactured articles that are paid for by the work of the workingmen of this country. Is that giving the workingman work? It is not. It is just transferring the workingman from one kind of work to another kind of work. Let me illustrate that. A short while ago in England the glove fabric people asked for protection against the German glove fabric people. They could not compete with them, although the German people are now producing their glove fabric at about four times the pre-war cost—and that is a strange thing considering the arguments we have heard from the Opposition about the effect of currency on the cost of production in Germany. The glove fabric people in England wanted to give their workingmen work by keeping out the German glove fabric. Do hon. gentlemen to my right think that is all right? Do they think the British people should keep out the German glove fabric to give the British workingmen work? Is that the position they take? They do not say, because they feel there is something else coming, and it is this: These glove fabric people in England did not think about the cotton spinners in Lancashire, who provide 90 per cent of the yarn that goes into the German product. So this talk about giving the workingmen work by protecting the industry in which he is engaged amounts to this: You take a man from a job where he works to advantage and put him at a job where he works at a disadvantage. What does that mean to the workingman? Any one can figure that out. It means that he has to work longer hours, for less pay, and under conditions that are worse all round. That is the logic of that situation. So, you cannot give the workingman work by keeping out the goods for which he pays with his work; you can only transfer him from a job at which he works to advantage and put him at a job where he is at a serious disadvantage.

Just a word as to the manufacturers themselves. They have preached to us; let us now preach to them a little. What has protection done for the manufacturer? We cannot have the small manufacturer here and put him on the witness stand because, poor fellow, he is dead; he died years ago. I know that some speakers in this debate have said that Canada is a country of small manufacturers. I do not believe it. I have been a long way over Canada and I have yet to see the small manufacturers. If Canada was besprinkled from coast to coast with small propietors, it would be very hard to argue against protection, but it is not. The small manufacturer has gone the way of all flesh many years ago. There is a story told of Kipling who made two visits to the United States. On his first visit he met a friend, a manufacturer, who was looking very blue, and who gave as a reason, "I am fighting a losing battle against the trusts, I cannot keep it up much longer." The next time Kipling came over, the man was wreathed in smiles, and fairly exuding contentment. Kipling found out that he had sold out to the trusts. He was lucky to get out from under in that way. But what did it mean? That man had the humiliation of seeing his life's work come to nothing. That is the position we are in. We have no small industries in Canada, and any one who visits the West knows that.

Mr. McQUARRIE: Will the hon member give his definition of a small manufacturer?

Mr. BIRD: I would if I thought the House did not perfectly understand what I mean.

Mr. McQUARRIE: We had the statement made yesterday by the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens) that there were a great many small manufacturers in this country. Now the hon. gentleman says there are none, that the small manufacturer is dead, and I am simply asking him to give us his definition of a small manufacturer.

Mr. BIRD: I wonder if the hon. member has ever read a work by Kropotkin. I will refer him to that, and by the time he has read it he will know what I mean by a small manufacturer.

Mr. McQUARRIE: I am simply asking the question.

Mr. BIRD: The other day I asked a question, but I was dealt with very rudely, and I felt it. Since then I have determined that I shall always treat questioners with absolute courtesy from now on, because it is not pleasant to be dealt with rudely, even in the House of Commons, where rudeness is sometimes the rule. The question which my hon. friend has just asked me is quite legitimate. However, I do not desire, at the present time, to enter into a discussion on the point, because the general remark I made will be perfectly understood by the House.

Mr. McQUARRIE: My hon. friend has not answered my question.

Mr. BIRD: It would take considerable time for me to define just what small industries are.

Mr. McQUARRIE: As far as I can see it is a pertinent question.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: The hon. member is not required to answer questions unless he so desires, and he has indicated that he does not wish to do so.

Mr. BIRD: I do not wish to repulse the hon. member in any way, but really I do desire to continue my speech. I think that in a general way the fact is as I have stated in the case of the small industries. As a general rule it is true in the United States and Canada that the small industries have given way to the big industries, and that we, at the present time, are pretty well in the grip of these big combinations. I tell you that a big industry to-day can tax the clothes and the boots I wear with more impunity than our Finance Minister can tax soft drinks or candy. I believe these big trusts can tax us in a way that would turn King Charles I. green with envy if he were looking on, and make such men as Pym and Hampden turn in their graves, and that is a long time ago in the history of British liberty. I can refer you to a book on industrial relationships, issued by the United States government, that would make you sit up and take notice of the conditions on this continent in regard to the freedom and liberties of the people. We are pretty well within the grip of these big industries, and what does it mean? It means this: The people of Canada, as a rule, do not read much Red literature; they are better balanced, I suppose, than to do so. But they do observe the operation of the big trusts in their daily life; and I tell you that the operation of those trusts is a better argument for socialism of the most extreme type than any Red literature that was ever spewed forth from a Bolshevist press. Now that is where you manufacturers have gone; there are no longer any manufacturers in the usual historical sense. Now just let me conclude with a word—

Mr. ROBB: Before my hon. friend leaves that, are we to understand that he is opposed to all trusts including the Grain Purchasing Trust?

Mr. BIRD: I am not opposed to any Grain Purchasing Trust at all.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. BIRD: Let my hon. friend present a case and I will give my judgment upon it; but I am not going to be led into any digression. Just the same I do believe in a Wheat Board.

Now I am going to say a word on the patriotic aspect of these questions. The protectionists are nothing if they are not flag wavers. We have had a lot of talk about Germany. We have heard something about the "Blood-stained hand of Germany" and we have heard even worse statements about that country; and when you get that spirit turned inwardly on internal affairs you get an attitude that is very hard to bear. I mean you get a superior attitude; you get an attitude that ought not to obtain between reasonable citizens in the same country as to patriotism and fidelity to one's country. What does all this talk by protectionists about the building up of our country by protection amount to? I want to say very briefly that in my humble view we have three difficulties in Canada in the way of building up a strong or united nationhood. The first of these difficulties is that we are a federation of divers political units. I think it is, Bagehot who says, "Of all forms of government, a federation demands most of its people and of its statesmen." Now in the future Canada is going to demand much from its statesmen and its people by reason of the fact that it is a far flung country with divers political units federated. The second difficulty is of a geographical nature. Nature—the greatest sectionalist in Canada, infinitely worse than the Progressives —has divided this country very effectually. Nature could not very well have reared a higher range of mountains than the Rockies; it could not very well have made a wilder wilderness than Ontario—I beg your pardon, western Ontario.

An hon. MEMBER: Are you sure you do not mean Toronto?

Mr. BIRD: No, I do not mean Toronto although I believe some one has said that the hub of the universe visibly protrudes from that part of Canada; but nature has so destined our conditions that the influences that play from east to west, and west to east, should be permanently obstructed; and from the time of the Greeks down to the present conditions of that kind have militated against the building up of united countries. It seems strange that nature should have so effectually obstructed the interplay of influences east and west; and having done that should have so effectually exposed us to the influences that play from the south—should have laid us wide open to the influences that come from the great political unit to the south of us. I want to say that these three conditions are going to demand much of the statesmen of Canada in the future. To keep this country united is going to require a lot of wise planning. It is not a case of loyalty at all, it is just a case of economic necessity; and economic necessity, which is the first law of our existence, on occasion will come before that perhaps finer sentiment, patriotism itself. But let me say that protection seems to aggravate every one of these conditions—every one of them. It comes in and seems to deliberately drive a wedge in each one of these conditions. We have long believed that protection was a mischief maker internationally; but we are also beginning to see that it is a mischief maker internally, and when hon. members to my right talk about sectionalism in a strain of irony, working us up, so to speak, they are doing something the final influence of which they cannot very well be aware of, and I would advise them to go lightly on that strain. If conditions were different in this country they might do it to their utmost; but seeing that we are so far flung, and so loosely knit together, they would far better get on to some other and more safe line of argument than that.

Mr. O. R. GOULD (Assiniboia): It may seem rather strange to the House that the Progressive party should persist in continuing the debate in this manner. However, we have a story to tell and possibly, even if we do not take up so much time individually as some other hon. members, we may be excused for not remaining silent. I believe we have all arrived at the conclusion that one day more or less here at the present time does not matter materially, seeing that we who are engaged in agriculture are now unable to get home to take part in the very important occupation of earning a livelihood—that is to say, putting in the crops in the western country; that time has passed.

Now in my earlier remarks, and I do not propose to take up any great amount of time—I must associate myself—and I do so with great pleasure and earnestness —with all that has been said by way of compliment with respect to the Minister of Finance, (Mr. Fielding). I pay that compliment to him almost in the sense of a son to a father—that is, with the respect that a son should have for a father —for I must say, Mr. Speaker, that long years before I had the honour of entering this House I had watched with much interest the endeavours—yea, the accomplishments—of the hon. minister, and, certainly, it had not occurred to me in those days that the privilege would be afforded me of coming here and being a colleague of that hon. gentlemen. Yet, I must confess that I was to a great extent, by precedent, perhaps, by the teachings of my people, taught to be a believer in the principles upon which he stood. But, as time progressed, and I arrived more at years of discretion, I began to see that I would have to reason for myself, and that he, and the party to which he belonged, after having had opportunities afforded them for many years since Confederation, were not seemingly bringing to a fruition those things for which the Liberal party professedly stood. I recollect distinctly, going back to 1893 and 1896, the first platform of his party, and I followed it all through. That is an aside at the present time. I wish, though, to state that, as I have come up to this House, I have watched the keen and sprightly walk of the Minister of Finance, and I have thought to myself that he was a man older in experience than he was in years, and I am sure we are all impressed with that.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the expressions of opinion that have come from this corner of the Chamber have all been initiated, perhaps, by the consciousness of conditions which obtain in the country, particularly affecting the class of people, whom we represent; that is the agricultural class. Many theses and doctrines have been promulgated. The effort has been made—and it has come from many sources in this corner—to persuade the powers that be that we have a real grievance, but while advancing that claim we believe we have a solution for it. This question has been repeatedly before the House. The presentation of the case has been made in like manner, except, perhaps, not in as great volume, ever since 1919. The hon. member from Marquette (Mr. Crerar) led a small party of men in this House, in deference to expressions of opinion that were coming from sections throughout the country, and those few followers put forth the contention that agriculture in this country had not been receiving its due recognition. In spite of predictions, the fact that we have 66 members in this corner of the House belonging to the Agrarian party is a concrete evidence of the fact that people throughout Canada believe that we have not been receiving a proper deal, or that we have not been receiving justice, and we have been sent here for the distinct and express purpose of again explaining to Parliament, and, by all honourable means, obtaining for our people the things we have been so long denied. That is the reason we are here. And I have wondered, as I have looked over the provisions of the budget speech, whether we should consider that speech and the provisions thereof, as representing love of us, or fear of us, or neither.

Before proceeding to deal with the budget, I wish to ask a favour, because I desire to digress a little from the budget address, and bring up a question which, perhaps, should have been dealt with when the estimates were considered, and if I had had the information when the estimates were before the House which I have at the present time, I would have mentioned it then. This question has to do with the national expenditure on the briquetting plant in the district of Assiniboia. We all know that the Dominion government has expended certain sums of money for a number of years to erect a briquetting plant at Bienfait and endeavoured to find out the best means—at least that is the professed idea—of preparing lignite coal, which is there in large quantities, for the people of the country. I have expressed my opinion on this matter previously. The lignite coal exists there in such large quantities that I believe there is sufficient to energize all the electricity required in the southern part of Saskatchewan, yea, perhaps, in the south western part of Manitoba, and, not being a wooded area, we would like to have that coal brought into such a state that the settlers could use it in furnaces, or others could use it commercially. About $820,000 was expended on that briquetting plant, but it seems to me, from information I have received, that we have been working upon wrong lines. It is proposed to extract the moisture from that coal and form it into briquettes by means of a binder. Something is expected from the by-products thereof. I find now that the estimates of the price of briquettes far exceeds the first estimate that was given when the project was first undertaken.

This is a national undertaking. Apart from the scientific aspect, it represents moneys that are taken from every district of Canada, it is of great importance in a national way, and that is one reason why I introduce it. I put questions on the Order Paper some time ago and received replies from the minister. He stated that he would have some by-products in the recovery plant, but he did not know to what extent the by-products would be useful. He states that the recovery process is for the extraction of coal tar, and yet on the other hand, we find that coal tar is to be the basis of the binder that is to be used for that lignite. But we also find that $8 per ton is the price, at the head of the Great Lakes, of tar to be used as binder, that has to be imported into the province of Saskatchewan, carried down to Bienfait, and used there to replace the tar which as a by-product is being extracted. The price of the briquettes which contain 11,500 heat units per pound is $12.25 per ton and we at once realize the commercial impossibility of manufacturing lignite into briquettes, and the commercial failure that must result, in competition with other briquette coal that is being brought in at the present time. In the city of Winnipeg briquette coal, with about 16,000 heat units per pound, is being sold at $17 a ton. If you take into consideration the number of heat units supposed to be incorporated in this lignite coal, the price of the tar, and so on, that has to be imported to bind it, you will see that for us to further pursue that as a commercial proposition would be inadvisable.

It is said then that we must have an alternative. On that point I have some information which I wish to submit to the House, and I hope the Government will pay attention to this. We desire to have the coal made commercially available as quickly as possible. We would like to have erected a plant whereby the moisture in the coal, about 30 per cent, could be extracted, before the product is shipped out to us. Experiments have resulted in demonstrating the fact, that whether it be lignite, anthracite, or even peat, it can be used in powder form much more cheaply, and without waste. In the use of lignite coal there is much waste and ash and clogging of flues or pipes, whether it be used in stoves or furnaces or in a manufacturing way. It can be used in a powdered form, both for stoves and manufacturing purposes, and it can be powdered by the addition of a plant, requiring about one fourth the capitalization necessary for a briquetting plant, such as we have at the present time. I believe this powdered coal can be turned on and burned in that form in a pressure plant, the same as gas or oil. The tars not being used in the binder, there is very little waste, and practically no residue after the coal is burned. We get practically 95 per cent out of our coal, whereas at the present time, I believe, in the case of lignite coal, the available heating element is almost 70 per cent over and above waste.

That is a problem which I think the Dominion government should look into. I do not know whether to condemn the past government because a sufficiently thorough investigation did not take place; but it is certain that we, in the West, as a people are disappointed because years ago we expected these briquettes to be placed upon the market and, according to information contained in answers to questions which I placed upon the Order Paper, the time seems just as far distant as ever. Nevertheless, $126,000 is being voted again this year for the purpose of this plant. It is quite unusual for a member to protest against expenditures in his own electoral district; usually, hon. members are in the habit of asking for greater expenditures; but I am talking in the interest of economy, and I state that, in my humble opinion, this money might be better employed for some other purpose. I hope, naturally, that it will not be taken away from my constituency, because I should like to see the money expended on a railway which runs right across our coal fields. This would tap four lines of railway running east and west; and if this money were spent in that way, the railway would be a real asset to the people of my constituency which is lacking in wood, so that they must rely on fuel from outside sources to keep themselves warm and comfortable during the winter. As I have said on many occasions, we have reached the point where settlers have actually attacked cars and taken the coal off rather than see their children go cold. Therefore, if the Government will pay heed to this, I hope that next year we in the West will learn that a real solution of the problem has been found. I repeat that I do not believe a solution will be found in following out the present plan of briquetting that lignite coal. That is all I wish to say on this matter at the present time.

I want to deal for a few minutes with some statements that have been made by the hon. member for Centre Vancouver, (Mr. Stevens) who, I am sorry to say, is not in his seat. He rather deprecated the fact that the agricultural portions of Canada did not pay their share of the income tax. I almost gathered the impression that he would have the people of Canada believe that this was wilful on the part of the agriculturists. I am sure hon. members will believe the statement that has been repeated so frequently from this corner of the chamber, that the agriculturists are not doing this for any other reason than that they are unable to do so. Is it not a known fact to hon. members—I see the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell); he will bear me out in this statement—that in Saskatchewan there are many school districts, in which during the past three, four or five years the people have questioned themselves whether they could pay taxes to keep the schools open. Even last winter municipalities took the question up and municipal meetings were held in many parts of that province, the question being asked: Can we extend our credit any longer in order to keep our schools open? The money is often not available to keep these schools open. Fortunately, through the intervention of the provincial government and the co-ordination of the municipal authorities, the schools were kept open until the banks offered credit again whereby the schools could be carried on. Why should hon. members in this House or men throughout the country try to give the impression that the farmers are wilfully escaping or endeavouring to evade or avoid their proper share of income taxation? They are not; they would be only too pleased if an opportunity were afforded them of paying a good round sum in income tax, because that would mean, as it does to those who have to pay tax, their ability to pay.

Again the hon. member, in reply to a question which I asked him concerning watered stock, said that 7 per cent was surely not an excessive profit. No, we say it is not an excessive profit if it is on actual cash that is invested in a company; but the hon. gentleman spoke of "unduly watered stock." To what extent must a man or a corporation go before the term "unduly" is applied? Do they recognize it as a right that incorporated institutions in this country, through, perhaps, some concession, or through, perhaps, the value of an asset paying a huge dividend, may or shall or should, as they do, go throughout the length and breadth of the country and sell stock which is largely fictitious? They take money from widows, orphans or any one else, and they say: "This is an institution capable of paying 20 per cent and we want your money, why not buy some of this stock?" It does not, however, represent any equity or value except the ability of that company to pay interest on watered stock. If a depression should come, or the value go down so that they pay only 2 or 3 per cent, they call that hard times. We maintain still that, in many institutions which have a large amount of watered stock, two per cent on the watered stock would represent a good profit if it were paid on the cash value of the plant. We believe we are justified in calling the attention of the House to the fact that we do not believe in watered stock, whether it is unduly watered or watered to any other extent. We want all interests in Canada to stand on their own feet, on their own base, and this "unduly watered" proposition is something that we agriculturists know nothing about.

I have been listening to conversations concerning the banks. I do not think I am betraying any secret in saying that when I have listened to remarks and discussions in some of the committees and in this House, it has seemed to me that men who talk of corporations and so on have not the proper perspective; they have not the right viewpoint. They seem to look upon the banking institutions of Canada as corporations that possess the credit of the Dominion of Canada, given to them by the Dominion of Canada, so that they can take the deposits of all the people and their own currency, inflated more or less by acts of Parliament, send the money out of the country and invest it in foreign bonds. I deprecate this. When we, having legitimate local interests, appeal to these institutions for legitimate credits to carry on our businesses, we are told that money is not available. For example, some years ago a subsidiary company owned a lighting plant in Rio de Janeiro, and we in the West were unable to get loans of money necessary to capitalize the businesses that we were endeavouring to carry on for that year. That is one reason why I consider that the moneyed institutions of Canada should have greater restrictions placed upon them. They should not be privileged to the extent they are taking out of the country funds that rightly belong to the people of Canada, where there is so much need of money for the development of our natural resources. The farmers, who are working under such disadvantages, in the best of circumstances, and on whose activities the prosperity of this country depends, are absolutely handicapped because of the higher rate of interest that is charged them in that respect. As a layman I would urge that point as forcefully as I can upon the Government and upon members of this House, because I have had some experience in this matter, as I know my neighbours have who are struggling in the West to develop the resources that lie dormant in this great country and are doing their best to convert those resources into national wealth.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

After Recess

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. GOULD: Mr. Speaker, since the House rose, three hon. members have asked me to deal a little more fully with the briquetting plant at Bienfait, with regard to which I had made a few remarks before six o'clock. I have some figures here, which, perhaps, will be interesting to hon. members and also to many of the people of Canada, particularly the people of western Canada. We are very much interested in the question of the supply of fuel; in fact, to us in the West the matter is quite as pressing as is the question of the tariff. As the time of the House has not been occupied at any considerable length in a discussion of the fuel problem, I wish to devote a few minutes to it now.

The information that I wish to give to the House is with regard to the value of the briquettes manufactured at the town of Bienfait as compared with a like product which is being sold in Winnipeg at the present time. According to information which I have received, the briquettes manufactured at Bienfait would be worth $12.25 a ton, as at present estimated, f.o.b. Bienfait. These briquettes have approximately 11,500 heat units per pound, and exactly what they would be worth in the city of Winnipeg can easily be computed. We find that under the present freight rates, this commodity, worth $12.25 per ton, must be retailed in Winnipeg at $17.50. It is quite evident, therefore, that a product selling at $17.50 in Winnipeg, and containing approximately 11,500 heat units per pound, cannot successfully compete with a similar product containing 15,000 heat units per pound, and selling in Winnipeg at $17 per ton. I think I am justified in directing the attention of the House to the fact that even if we should find it possible to make a briquette from the low grade lignite which is found in the southeastern part of Saskatchewan, we are not warranted in continuing its manufacture, because we should have to compete with a briquette product already on the market which can undersell us on the basis of heat values, by one-fifth. Now, that is good, sound reasoning..

I have also been asked to explain further how this low grade coal can be used. It has been proved beyond doubt that anthracite, lignite coals in all their grades, and even peat can be successfully produced in powdered form and used in furnaces and ranges, both for domestic, and for commercial purposes. By the use of a very cheap power plant, operating by air pressure, the powdered product is forced into the receptacle in which it is burned and the amount used can be controlled by a tap. It is estimated that the use of such a plant would save in the household or in the manufacturing plant approximately 23 per cent of the amount now being expended for fuel, and that is a large item, especially on our western plains. If we can commercialize in this way these large deposits of lignite coal and save every farmer and every industry in western Canada 23 per cent of their present fuel costs, the effort shall have been well worth while.

Now, here is a splendid opportunity for the high protectionist to step in and to say that we should introduce protection on behalf of the production of this commodity, with its lower heat unit content and its relatively high cost. That is the argument of the protectionist in all cases; but I do maintain that the principle is fallacious. This is, in my opinion, a very clear illustration of the fallacy of high protection, and many cases analagous to the one which I have cited may be mentioned. We have an almost unlimited supply of this coal and it can be commercialized and prepared for use in an economical way—economical, because of the elimination of waste. All we would require to have at the mine would be a drying plant and a powdering plant. The coal would then be distributed throughout the country in the form of powder, and, as I have said, by the use of a small power plant it can be fed to the stove in a very satisfactory manner. It is much cleaner than ordinary coal and is much more satisfactory in every way. Without going into the matter any further I may say that I have in my office a long treatise on the subject and I should be only too pleased to give any further information to hon. members who are interested in it.

I wish again to draw the attention of the Government to a matter which has been mentioned on the floor of this House on two or three occasions during the present session. It has to do with the liquor question as affecting the southeastern part of Saskatchewan. A very regrettable condition exists there. In the lower part of my own electoral district, about seventeen export liquor houses have been continually carrying on the export of liquor, both to other provinces and outside the country, since the referendum was taken in that province. I do not want to say this with any egotism, but last year I endeavoured to find out who was responsible for granting permission to these institutions to operate in that province, and was unable to do so. Again this session, with the co-operation of the hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Millar), I endeavoured to place the responsibility. I am not sanguine enough to hope that I have yet succeeded in finding out who is responsible for the condition which still obtains there. Not more than three days ago I received a letter stating that what are known as booze cars were running back and forth throughout the country. My people have protested in all earnestness against the existence of these houses, and if I am impotent to find out who is responsible for their existence, I think I have done my duty in bringing this matter to the attention of the House, and I hope that the Government will still co-operate with the hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Millar) and myself in an endeavour to place the responsibility.

I was much interested in an item I read in the paper a few days ago, and it may have some bearing on a solution of this problem, to the effect that a decision which was given in the Michigan courts some time ago sustaining the export of liquor to foreign countries and its importation from outside had been over-ruled by the Supreme Court of the United States. On May 15 the Supreme Court of the United States handed down a decision in which they held that liquor while within the boundaries of the United States en route from one foreign port to another, could be seized under the national Prohibition Act. It may be that the United States will take advantage of this decision in connection with the international exportation and importation of liquors, and that may have some effect on those establishments in the United States. I hope it will have, simply because, as I have said repeatedly, the establishment and the retention of these institutions is much deplored by our people. These houses are a veritable nuisance in my district.

I wish now to say a few words with regard to the banking system of Canada in connection with the budget which has been presented to the House. Some people speak very strongly in favour of the banking system of this country, yet I think there are many reasons why we should consider whether we really have the very strongest banking system possible. Some years ago we had in the west the Northern Bank, which later merged with the Northern Crown Bank, which in turn was absorbed by the Royal Bank. A few years later we had the failure of the Farmers Bank, and there was a sorry story to be told in connection with that. Only recently we had the merger of the Merchants Bank with the Bank of Montreal. Fortunately, in that case the Bank of Montreal was strong enough to take care of the depositors of the Merchants Bank.

Bank clearings last year amounted to sixteen billions of dollars. That is a huge sum of money for the banks of Canada to handle, and it seems to me that in view of that huge turnover we have a right to make the banks pay a proportionate amount of the taxes of this country. In an address I gave in this House last year I made the statement, which can be substantiated, that the banks receive very liberal concessions, both in the way of credits by this Government and in the way of license they receive to send their own credits in and out of the country, and a further concession in connection with their building assessment. I pointed out particularly that in making their returns the banks give only the initial price of their buildings. I stated that I believed the great banks of Canada could hide, and were hiding their assets by being allowed only to send in the initial cost of their buildings. Let me give a homely illustration. An individual, whether he lives in a town, city or village or in the country, when he purchases a house or a farm soon finds that the initial price is not the price the property is allowed to be assessed at for very long. As the district improves and settlers come in, the value of the property is increased, and the assessment accordingly. If that holds good in the case of the individual, I think it should also be applied in the case of the banks. I do not know what portion of this sixteen billions of dollars represents cheques, but the total will be made up of cheques, acceptances, and general currency. If that is the case, at a very conservative estimate this sixteen billion dollars should stand an assessment of at least $5,000,000 to be paid into the Dominion treasury.

With regard to the stamp tax on cheques, and I am sorry to say that my leader was the first member of this House to regret the placing of stamps upon cheques issued by great corporations, let me say that many corporations in this country are only stock companies that are doing business on the money subscribed for their stock by the people of Canada, and they can well afford to pay this stamp tax. Let me give another homely illustration. The average individual whether he lives in a village, town or city, sometimes leaves ten or perhaps fifty dollars on deposit at the bank, if he is fortunate to have any money to bank, and when he wishes to purchase the necessaries of life, particularly in the country, he sends in his boy or some member of the family to buy five dollars' worth of groceries by cheque against his account, and in that way it will very soon cost him 50 cents in stamps to cheque out that fifty dollars. The individual has to pay that, so why should not big business men be called upon to pay the two-cent tax on every fifty dollars? I have seen it stated in the newspapers that the Finance Minister might modify his proposals in regard to the stamp tax. I trust that he will do nothing of the kind, simply because we have pleaded long and hard and earnestly that big business should pay its fair proportion of the taxation, and so far as this stamp tax is concerned, they have no right to hedge. Furthermore, if I can afford to pay $5,000 or $10,000 for a house or farm I can afford to pay two cents on every $50 cheque I issue, as the budget proposes. I would again urge the Finance Minister, if he was thinking of making a change in this tax, not to do so. I would rather see the tax graduated so that the larger the amount paid out by cheque, the greater the tax would be.

To return to the banking system of this country, and to show you to what extent the business of this country is tied up in these large banking institutions, we had in March, 1922, $1,230,000,000 of savings deposits in the banks of Canada, and of that amount $290,600,000 was on deposit with our largest institution, the Bank of Montreal. I am not singling that bank out for criticism at all, and only mention it to show the extent to which the banking institutions of this country control our credits. The savings deposits in the banks and the credits of the country are proportionately the same, and if the Bank of Montreal controls, as it does, one-quarter of the savings deposits of this country we have a right to assume, and we do, that it controls 25 per cent of the credits of the whole Dominion of Canada. That is an enormous power to be placed in the hands of any one institution, and while there are people who will say that it is all right, there are other people, and perhaps more, who will say that such a power needs looking into to see if we cannot find ways and means whereby these large institutions can be made to serve the basic industries of Canada and the interests of the people as a whole.

In any case, I hope the Finance Minister will not be persuaded to make it more difficult for the fundamental businesses of this country to find the cash, or the wherewithal, to carry on their undertakings. As has been stated, Mr. Speaker, we had a national debt of $2,427,296,798 in 1922, but in 1914 it was only $335,966,850. I have compiled a few figures which I will give you approximately. I do not do so with the idea of causing the publication of newspaper headlines to scare the people of Canada, but rather with the object of pointing out to them the absolute necessity of realizing the burden which rests upon the shoulders of each individual, so that they may better apply themselves to the task in hand of meeting that burden. My whole argument would be to arrive at some equitable means of assessing the taxation of this country. I am sure that when the people rightly understand the burden that is placed upon them they will not cry out so loudly. Convince the people that the taxation is necessary and that the method of assessing that taxation is equitable, and they will be better satisfied. On the basis of the figures that I have submitted the per capita debt of Canada would be $277.70. Now for a family of five, which is usually accepted as the basis of computation, the debt would be $1,388.50 for the year 1922. In 1914 the per capita debt was $38.20, and in the case of a family of five would be approximately $191. It is no wonder there is concern in the public mind. Even in 1910 and 1911 there was a great hue and cry throughout Canada at the cost of government and the per capita debt; and when we view the situation to-day and find that we are burdened with approximately $8 for every $1 of debt at that time, the people are justified in paying more attention to this question of taxation. Apart from this huge national debt, we require to pay $466,983,359 this year which means a per capita charge of $53.27. Multiply that by the figure 5, representing the average family, and it comes to a total of $266.35. Furthermore, we have provincial and municipal debts, and taking these into consideration the debt per capita for carrying on business this year amounts to $466.35. Now it is positively alarming that we should have to bear such a per capita annual debt as $466.35. Even this does not make provision for the payment of one solitary cent of the bonded indebtedness of Canada which, as I have already said, is dangerously near $2,500,000,000. Bearing these facts in mind is not the question of taxation one that should be seriously considered? Is it not urgent that much greater attention should be paid by the people as a whole not only to the principles upon which that taxation is based, but also to the problem of devising ways and means whereby that taxation can be met.

Now, I want to make a few references to some of the things which have been said during this debate. The Minister of Justice (Sir Lomer Gouin), for example, gave figures to show the operation of the tariff from 1876 to 1901. He endeavoured to show that the percentage of taxes now gleaned from the tariff was not as great as it was in the period referred to. In so far as percentages go, the figures given by him were absolutely correct; but the minister failed to state that since the time to which he had reference many new forms of taxation have been applied, and therefore the percentages which he gave with respect to the operation of the tariff are less deserving of weight than he seeks to make out. The minister asked whether we could get along without the manufacturers. Certainly we cannot; no one in this country ever thought of such a proposition. I am sure that notwithstanding the fact that the Progressives in this House have invariably been characterized as free traders, the fact remains that never from this corner of the chamber this session has any one proclaimed himself a free trader, nor do I think that any such statement was made during the election. We have asked, in particular, that in fulfilment of the planks of the platform upon which we stand, and likewise in fulfilment of the platform upon which the Liberal party professedly stand, the implements of production should be free of duty. Let me give you an illustration of how the tariff works out in that regard at present. Take a section of land, the cultivation of which probably necessitates an expenditure of $3,000. Before the man who farms that land can commence to raise anything with which to compete in a free trade market—for he really has to face unrestricted competition when he sells his products—he has to meet an average duty of 15 per cent. This, if applied to a capital of $3,000, means that he is fined to the extent of four or five hundred dollars. The amount will vary in localities in accordance with the difference in the value of the farm land. On the average, however, the farmer finds that he has to meet a charge of $400 or $500 before he can enter into business. In addition to that he bears his share of the duty on other articles that enter into consumption the same as any one in the town, city or village. But I maintain that the duty referred to is an extra tax levied upon his industry, and he is handicapped to that extent when he goes out into the markets of the world to sell any of his products. Success in agriculture is a doubtful thing. When it flourishes in Australia it may be a failure in Russia; when there is a good crop here in Canada the crops may be poor in the Argentine. These are factors that have to be considered. I suppose that if there ever came a time when agriculture was successful in every country of the world the industry would become depressed and be liable to succumb by reason of its very productiveness.

I recognize that simply to stand here and indulge in pious wishes with respect to the beneficiaries of a protective system will never get us anywhere. But the people of Canada have been lectured and lectured on tariff matters ever since 1873, at least, and wherein have they benefited? What have the people of Canada received? Well, we have received nothing.

It is amusing to realize the position taken by the small group known as the Conservative party on the question of the tariff. They say, "We stand for a protective tariff," but I have heard them quote instances where they lauded and praised themselves, because they had succeeded in reducing the tariff. It seems to me that it is absolutely inconsistent for them, at one moment, to be raising the banner on high and proclaiming "We are a protective party," and the next moment to take the compliment which might be paid them for reducing the tariff. Yet, on the hustings and in this House we have had instances of this, and I ask hon. members to try and explain their attitude. However, it is useless to plead with, or to quote instances, and give illustrations to, the beneficiaries of the system. We have been sent here for a direct and specific purpose, and I think we should have received more consideration in the budget which has been presented to the House. If we should link our forces with those on the other side, our platforms being very much the same, are we not right in assuming that all Canada is strongly in favour of the sentiments expressed in our platform, or in their platform, or in both? It was stated on a thousand platforms during the last campaign, that there was no difference between the two platforms, and that was one of the strongest pleas and arguments advanced why the Liberals should be returned to power. There was so little difference in our platforms, it was argued, that they should be returned to power.

It is extremely disappointing, now that the opportunity has been given the Liberal party to implement the pledges made since 1896, now that the people of Canada have said, "We will try them once more," and have reposed their trust in them, to find the country presented with a budget such as that which has been brought down by the Minister of Finance. I think, Mr. Speaker, the people of Canada will not forget it, and if the rejection of this budget at this time should render it necessary to go back to the country, a different story will be told, because the people did expect, Sir, that there was going to be another kind of budget brought down. Listening to the speeches which have been made by hon. members opposite, the thought came to me with a rush, and came to me repeatedly: Are these deliverances typical of the speeches made at the great Liberal convention held in August, 1919? Is this the type of speech which one would expect, following the resolutions which appear in the Liberal platform? I think not. While the excuse has been offered during this debate that conditions have changed, I want to point out the conditions at the time the platform was framed, and when the war was on. The people knew or anticipated what the conditions would be, in fact we knew, and it was advertised at that time, that there would be a period of depression and yet the Liberal party went into convention in Ottawa in August, 1919, and framed their platform. I have been informed by one gentleman who attended the convention, with whom I have talked to a considerable extent, not a member of the House of Commons, but a gentleman who was present when the platform was framed, that he was ashamed of the interpretation that was placed upon this platform by the budget speech.

Mr. GAUVREAU: Will you not give his name?

Mr. GOULD: No, that would not be honourable, but this clause of the platform which I will read will be an answer:—

> And the Liberal party hereby pledges itself to implement by legislation the provisions of this resolution, when returned to power.

Mr. MARTELL: Does the hon. member expect that everything will be done in a day?

Mr. GOULD: Possibly, tomorrow, you will go back to your constituency, and later you will be able to say "We were in power", and then you will have no further opportunity of implementing the promise. You will be told that you had been in power and the pledges were not implemented. The last clause in the Liberal platform distinctly and expressly states "When returned to power". The people of Canada—and well do we know it, Sir,—depended upon it and expected, particularly with reference to implements of production, that a change would be made, that that would be the point where it would start, and that implements would be made free of duty, so that we would have an opportunity of going into business of production on a much sounder and stronger basis than ever before. I referred to the similarity of the tariff plank of the Liberal party with the tariff plank of the Progressive party. And the story I tell the Canadian people and the story I tell the Liberal party to-day is that the Progressive party is the one who would implement that promise. Let the Canadian people know where we stand. Let the people know that this representative from Assiniboia is a Progressive, and that he is still absolutely standing upon his platform.

Mr. MARTELL: Does the hon. member believe in the Liberal tariff platform plank of 1919 that he referred to?

Mr. GOULD: I would reply to that more fully. I believed in it in 1896. I believed in reciprocity in 1911, and regret that it was not adopted. I believe in it at the present time. I believe more in the tariff plank of the Liberal party than I believe in the Liberal party itself.

Mr. MARTELL: Will the hon. member permit me a question?

Mr. GOULD: No, I think the hon. member's question has been answered already. Let me illustrate a little bit further. I have a word to say to the hon. member from Brome (Mr. McMaster) whom I have learned to respect, yea, to revere. I have admired him on many occasions when he has stood in his place and advocated the principles which he believed his party was advocating. Well, do I remember them. I might go back in history to the time the hon. member paid me a visit in Assiniboia, when he came out there preaching the doctrine, very nearly, of free trade, telling the people most positively what the policies and principles of the Liberal party were. A lot of the people believed his statement, and had it not been for the feeling of my constituents and myself that the Liberal party would not fulfil their pledges if they had the opportunity, this being practically the doctrine I preached on every platform, I honestly believe the arguments and persuasions of the member for Brome would have prevailed. But the people of Canada know now what interpretation means as compared with profession, and I regret—and I am very sorry to say this once again—the very, very small thing that has been handed out to the great majority of the people of Canada, who at least believed in the policies and principles enunciated in the Liberal platform which were similar to the policies in our platform.

Mr. MARTELL: How far would you like to see the Government go at the present time in regard to the tariff? Do you want it wiped out entirely?

Mr. GOULD: I would start specifically, as my honoured leader stated the other day. It seems there has been no discussion whatever of the question why in the case of two implements made of steel, one should bear a duty of 15 per cent and the other 10 per cent in the tariff. It shows there has been no discussion in the caucus to ascertain the relationship, and it is a question that schoolboys might settle. One of the first things I would do would be to find out the relationship if protection was desired. I have never said I would sweep the slate clean, but I would spend a little time considering whether there should be this inequality when both implements are made of steel.

Mr. LOVETT: Does the hon. member not think the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) gave this question great consideration?

Mr. GOULD: According to the statement made by the Minister of Finance, he does not believe in your platform. I am speaking of the planks in the platform and not of the individuals in the party, who were supposed to make the confession that they did not believe in the platform. That is the attitude which I wish to take. That is the expression of opinion which I wish to place before the House and the country to-night—that individuals who compose the so-called Liberal party have a platform and have not implemented it, and there are a number who have definitely stated in the House that they do not think they ever will; they do not approve the platform. It is on that declaration that the people of Canada will pronounce judgment.

Mr. MARTELL: When did the Minister of Finance say that he did not believe in the Liberal policy or platform?

Mr. GOULD: He did not say the policy, but the day before yesterday the Minister of Finance made that statement. I do not know whether the hon. member was in the House or not.

Mr. MARTELL: No. He referred to the tariff plank.

Mr. GOULD: If you burst one wheel of a buggy, your whole machine is gone. I do not think anything is to be gained by my standing here answering questions that are being put to me by my hon. friends across the floor. As I have stated, the possibility at least exists that we shall go back to the country. When we go back to the country, we will have a right to say that the Liberal party had an opportunity of implementing their pledges, and they had not done so. Consequently, we stand upon good ground, as we stood upon good ground when we campaigned last fall and told the people that we did not believe that until a purification had taken place in the Liberal party they need ever expect to have their platform implemented by legislation. We have waited long, patiently and earnestly; we have given an opportunity to the great Liberal party of Canada ever since 1896 to implement pledges made in 1891 and 1893. We have waited and waited and waited almost in vain. Grey hairs are now over my head. When I was a boy going to school I believed in those promises; I believed in the Liberal party. My father told me that they would implement those pledges. I am as old a man to-day as my father was in those days, and those pledges are not implemented yet. I will tell my boys that the Liberal party will never implement their pledges. That is all I wish to say concerning the matter to-night. Without expressly stating how I am going to vote, I think indirectly I have stated that.

Mr. JAMES STEEDSMAN (Souris): Mr. Speaker, in rising to continue the debate, I realize that the House is over weary, and I will keep that fact in mind as I go along. I will promise that I shall not detain the House very long. I want, however, to add my voice to that of hon. gentlemen who sit around me in expressing my regret—I do not know that that expresses exactly what I want to say; I am not disappointed in the budget; I do not want to convey the impression that I am—my sorrow that such a budget has been brought down in this House at this time: I should like for a moment to discuss a question that was touched upon very briefly by my colleague (Mr. Gould), who has just sat down. I want to discuss some of the inconsistencies of the tariff which were touched upon to a certain extent the other day by the leader of this group (Mr. Crerar). Starting out with the mower and the binder, we find that prior to the present time the duty on binders and mowers was 12½ per cent; it has now been reduced to 10 per cent, the duty on ploughs, harrows, drills and so on was 17½ per cent; it is now 15 per cent; the duty on wagons was 20 per cent; it is now 17½ per cent. Think of the inconsistencies, and let me point out to the House that before a man needs a binder, if he is going into agriculture, he must have a plough, harrows, drills and so on, and before he needs those, he must have a wagon. Where a farmer requires two binders in the operation of his farm, he will require at least four and, perhaps, five wagons. Let us see how that affects the agriculturist in western Canada. Prices were quoted this afternoon by the hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Morrison) on various agricultural implements, amongst others, the wagon, and I want to follow that through a little further. Supposing that the agriculturist has four wagons to buy, what is the situation? Let us suppose that he buys one of imported make, made in the United States, because that is where we get all our agricultural implements that we do not manufacture in Canada, and three Canadian-made wagons. That is about the proportion in which we buy imported implements. As my hon. friend pointed out this afternoon, the price of a wagon in North Dakota, just below the boundary of my constituency, is approximately $200. The Canadian farmer buys an American wagon which, on the market in Dakota along any of the lines of railway there, would cost him $200; but when he buys it in Canada, it costs him, with the 20 per cent duty that was in existence prior to the present budget, $240. There is $40 that he pays into the public treasury. But when he goes to his implement agent to buy three Canadian wagons that he finds necessary to carry on his business, what happens? He pays the same figure, or $240 for each wagon. He gets $200 worth of wagon, and he pays $40 over to the Canadian manufacturer of that article; or, on the three wagons, he pays $120 into the coffers of the manufacturer, and, on the four wagons, he pays that much into the coffers of the manufacturer and $40 into the treasury of the Dominion. That is how this works out with agricultural implements in proportion to the amount of the duty on each article. I do not propose to follow that further. That will illustrate how the thing works out.

The other day in this House an hon. member from British Columbia—I have forgotten his constituency, but he is one of the members of the group to my right—stated that British Columbia afforded one of the finest locations for manufacturing in Canada, at least, if not in the world. He told us that, on account of their immense water powers, their mines, their coal, their timber and so on, it was an ideal spot for manufacturers. But in the same breath he told us that British Columbia manufacturers could not exist, could not compete with United States manufacturers immediately alongside of them, if it were not for the protective tariff. He told us the same thing applied to fruit. Well, if the manufacturers and fruit growers of British Columbia, or of Ontario for that matter, cannot compete with the manufacturers and fruit growers of the United States, then, as some one has said, they will have to get out of the business. That is the solution so far as I can see. How does the fruit question affect the agriculturists of the prairies? After all it is at the expense of the agriculturists of the prairies that the people of British Columbia are asking for protection for their manufacturers and their fruit growers.

Mr. CHAPLIN: Does the hon. member believe, then, in free trade in fruit of all kinds?

Mr. STEEDSMAN: I have not said so, but I am pointing out how protection bears on the agriculturists in western Canada, and am trying to show the inconsistency of continually insisting on the prairie agriculturists paying tribute to the manufacturers and growers of fruit in other parts of the country. We in the prairie provinces are just as close to the United States as are the people of British Columbia, and the states immediately to the south of the prairie provinces are our strongest competitors in the production of hard spring wheat. It is against the producers of wheat in the United States that we have to compete with our 9 p.m. hard wheat in the markets of the world. Now, then, is it reasonable to suppose that we can stand up and compete with those men under the handicaps I have indicated with regard to agricultural implements and other things? To illustrate how this question works out in the matter of fruit, I might tell the House that two years ago, as the result of protection—not entirely as a result of protection, I admit, because other factors entered into the case—the people in the community from which I come paid for British Columbia strawberries, for preserving, $8 a case, equal to a 24-quart basket. At the same time, two years ago, we paid $10 per barrel for No. 1 winter apples, Ontario fruit, in the constituency in which I live. If my information is correct, there were thosands of barrels of apples that went to waste in Ontario that year, simply rotting in the orchards. I do not contend that the tariff was responsible for that, but it was responsible to a certain extent for keeping away from the agriculturists of western Canada the American grown fruit that we could have got at a cheaper rate. We do not ask that the tariff be wiped out on fruit. We want to help to a certain extent our neighbours in other lines of industry. It was said the other day by two hon. gentlemen that it is impossible to bring down a budget that will suit everyone. Well, I would ask the House very seriously, has it ever been attempted to bring down a budget that will suit any other than one particular faction of the people? It has never been attempted. And so long as we keep telling people that they cannot stand up without protection, it is absolutely certain that they will not be able to do so, for the simple reason that they will not make an effort to do it.

I do not want to be tedious, and I do not propose to repeat the figures that were given to the House by my hon. friend from Springfield (Mr. Hoey) the other evening. Besides, they are fresh in the minds of hon. members. I would, however, emphasize the fact that they are absolutely true. It was pointed out by my hon. friend that the cost of production of wheat in western Canada, as well as in the western states, is away beyond the market value of that commodity at the present time. What does that mean to the agriculturists? It means that they are paying these bonuses, of which I have been speaking, out of principal. They have not been getting any profit, because, as I pointed out, there has been no profit out of wheat. No; they have been paying these bonuses out of principal. Two of my honoured colleagues made the statement the other day, when the question was brought up, that they had disposed of their small holdings of Victory Bonds in order to carry on their affairs on their farms. And I have had to do the same, as thousands of others have also done. We have been carrying on farming operations out there out of capital. We have been paying these bonuses out of capital, and in thousands of cases the municipalities have been furnishing the seed to re-seed the land. They did so this year. Can you realize what that means? There are lots of municipalities out there that are involved, and I am here to tell you that unless the agriculturists in those municipalities are given relief from some of these burdens they are bearing, the municipalities that are so badly involved will never be able to clear themselves. Now, it is not a pleasant thing for us in this corner of the House to get up and tell these tales, and to tell the House that our neighbours and friends are not prosperous. We would rather tell another tale. Nor is it pleasant to find that when these statements are made they are disbelieved, are contradicted by certain members of the House, and that somehow or other the sceptics are always able to pick up statistics here and there to prove that we are wrong, notwithstanding the fact that we are the men on the ground and know the conditions.

In conclusion, if I might be so bold, I have a suggestion to offer. I notice that the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell) is in his place, and to him particularly would I throw out the suggestion. I must confess I got the idea from the report that was sent out by the Manitoba Agricultural College on the work they have done there in the way of survey. I am not proposing that the minister should continue that work along the line that has been pursued, but I have this to suggest, that if he or his government happens to have any doubt about the conditions as they exist not only in the municipalities throughout the West, but in all the provinces of the Dominion, he might take a township or a municipality, or perhaps two townships, one at either extreme of each province, which would be fairly representative of the whole, and make a survey that would take into account the financial standing of the people living in that territory. That would provide an adequate estimate of conditions throughout the whole of the various provinces. It may be said that that would be rather a delicate thing to do. But after all, would it? It need not be a personal thing. Everyone in this corner of the House at any rate will know that I am correct when I say that if you go to a bank or a machine agency to borrow money or to buy a machine of any value, they will ask you for a correct statement of your financial condition, and on that they will tell you whether or not the advance will be made or the machine delivered; in no other way can you get it. Now, that would give the Government an idea of what the conditions are in the various provinces with regard to agriculture; as to other concerns, I am not so much interested. We believe that a survey of that nature would give the Government the opportunity for which they have asked. They have asked for time, Mr. Speaker, and it is quite evident that if they are to do anything in the way of affording relief to the great masses of the people they must have time and a good deal of it. Had they, for instance, brought down the duties on agricultural implements to the level of the duty on binders, or had they even reduced them in the same proportion by which the duty on binders has been reduced, the difference would have been considerable. We would have looked upon an all-round reduction of 20 per cent as a real step in the right direction. But the only relief afforded is 2½ per cent on some agricultural implements, many of the remainder carrying a duty of as high as 35 per cent, with no reduction at all on the food and clothing and boots and shoes that all the people use. Had the Government gone to the extent that I have indicated, we would have waited with at least some degree of patience for further developments in other years as it is, we can see no prospect of anything better.

With regard to clothing, boots and shoes, I wish merely to touch on the question of shoes, which was mentioned by the hon. member who spoke last yesterday (Mr. Logan). With that hon. gentleman's statement that many of the shoe manufacturers of Canada at the present time are in financial difficulties I have no quarrel; I do not know. But he said also that if the American shoe manufacturers were permitted to flood this country with cheap shoes the rest of the boot and shoe manufacturers would go out of business. Now, here is the point I want to make. Is the raw material of which they make these boots and shoes any cheaper in the United States than it is here? My hon. friend told us this afternoon how cheap the raw material was here. Is skilled labour any cheaper over there? I hear an hon. member say no; then how is it possible that the manufacturers of the United States could flood Canada with cheaper shoes than can be produced in this country? The argument is ridiculous; it could not be done. That they could sell cheaper shoes than we can buy in Canada to-day I am convinced. When I was a lad I could go to a boot and shoe maker—and by the way, there were boot and shoemakers in those days; there are not any now. You can go along the streets and see a sign "Shoes repaired", there are no shoemakers. In those days I had boots made, with more material in them than there are in three such pairs as I am wearing now, and possibly better material, at that, and they cost me $3.75 to $4. In fact, if we had to pay $4 we thought the shoemaker was doing us a little. Now, what is the trouble? Raw material was not any cheaper then than it is now. Labour may have been a little cheaper, but surely not so much as to make that difference. In those days the shoemaker applied skilled labour to every part of his manufacture. My hon. friend says, that to-day he pays $11 and $12 for his boots; why the difference? The system under which we are working entails a maximum outlay of capital in connection with goods that are manufactured. Take the quantity of boots and shoes that are in warehouses, wholesale and retail stores, and so on throughout the country; undoubtedly there is a tremendous amount of capital involved. But who has ceased to wear shoes? Not anyone in the prairie provinces, especially if he is an agriculturist. I cannot see that there is any force in the arguments of my hon. friends on the other side.

I do not wish to detain the House any further. I will just say in conclusion that had the Government gone as far as I have suggested; had they taken these inconsistencies out of the tariff and placed agricultural implements on a level with binders and mowers so far as duties are concerned, we would have felt disposed to wait with some degree of patience. If the system that I have suggested were adopted I have no doubt that the Minister of Finance would be able to come before the House next year with proposals involving a great reduction of customs duties and to justify his position to this House and to Canada.

Mr. GEORGE G. COOTE (Macleod): Mr. Speaker, it would seem almost in order to apologize for taking part in the debate at this time. When the matter was mentioned in the House yesterday by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) and there was some suggestion of closing the debate last night, I sincerely hoped that that would be arranged, and for my part I was quite willing not to inflict on the House any speech on the budget. Seeing that that was not arranged and that the debate is continued, I want to say a few words in explanation of my position in regard to the amendment which is before the House.

The other night when the Prime Minister was speaking he quoted part of a parable from the sixth chapter of Luke, where it speaks of removing the mote from thy brother's eye. I could not help thinking that he had omitted the best part of the parable, which starts off with these words:

> Shall the blind lead the blind? shall they not both fall into the ditch?

When it comes to a question of political morality, Mr. Speaker, which this amendment seems to raise, I feel that that verse is very applicable. I do not feel that it is my duty to charge the Government with being guilty of immorality in a political sense. When this amendment was first introduced I felt that I should support it, but after listening to the argument of hon. members to my right I came to the conclusion that I could not consistently vote for it, because it was proved to my satisfaction that many members who are supporting the present Government stated during the campaign that they were not in favour of any tariff such as was set forth in the tariff plank of the Liberal platform. The thing to me seems to be rather inconsistent. I think that individual members of the Liberal party will have to be judged by their own constituents. I was glad to hear Mr. Speaker remark the other day in this House that he did not recognize parties; that he recognized only individual members. I think that the individual members of this House are responsible to their constituents. Therefore Mr. Speaker, I feel at the present time, unless some argument is advanced which would change my mind, that I shall not support the amendment. I shall leave the Government to be judged by their constituents. I believe that no government and no party can rise any higher in a moral sense than the people, and if the people at home will judge them, and if they care to send them back, that is perfectly democratic, and I shall be satisfied with that.

I feel there has been far too much time taken over this budget debate. I believe that if party politics had been left out of it, if the washing out of party political linen had been avoided, the debate might have ended before this. Speaking for myself, I did not come here to play politics. I came here to endeavour to represent the people who live in the constituency of Macleod to the very best of my ability. In fact, I think that party politics is the greatest curse from which this country is suffering to-day, and I do not think it is possible, or at all events probable, that that idea can be given too much prominence at the present time. I think it is the duty of every member of this House seriously to consider whether we could not evolve some better system of government in this country. I want to say frankly that the budget is to be a great disappointment. If we could have in this House an honest vote regardless of party affiliations and political reasons as to whether we should have in this country a lower tariff or the present one, I should be very glad and I should be willing to accept that vote as final for the next few years; but we are not able to have that honest expression of opinion on the tariff, for under our present system I realize quite well that many low tariff Liberals cannot give expression to their honest feelings in regard to the tariff. Therefore I say that party government is at least a hinderance to the development of this country. I had expected that the budget would contain some kind of a compromise on the tariff, a compromise between low tariff and high tariff views, but the budget as brought down shows that the Finance Minister has leaned a great deal too far towards high protection. It reminds me of a story I heard in my election campaign of an Irishman who had been predeceased by two wives. When his friends asked him before he died where he would like to be buried he said, "Well, bury me between Betty and Bridget, but incline my head a little towards Bridget." I think the Prime Minister inclined his head too far towards those in his party who are desirous of having a high tariff, and that is the reason why the budget brought down is so much at variance with the tariff plank in the Liberal party platform.

The most striking thing in the annual financial statement presented to this House, I think, is the immense national debt. I believe that two billion dollars of this debt is the result of the great war, and in my humble opinion the greater part of it, at least, should never have been incurred. Had the government which was in power while the war was on been possessed of real patriotism, they would have collected from the people of this country in the way of taxation a sufficient amount to have paid the larger part of the expenditure necessary to carry on the war. I think Sir Thomas White is reported to have said at the time of the flotation of our second last loan that Canada was then wealthier than when she entered the war. I maintain that he is condemned by his own words. Had he had the courage, he could have collected during that time from the people's increased earnings, through taxation or conscription, or whatever you wish to call it, sufficient to have paid the greater part of the cost of carrying on the war, and this would have served a double purpose; it would have kept down the high cost of living, or what became the high cost of living, and would at the same time have saved us from the financial plight in which we find our country to-day. The exemption from taxation of the income from Victory bonds was, to my mind, nothing less than a crime. These bonds have now very largely found their way into the hands of the wealthy class in this country, and when our fighting men returned they as well as the rest of the people are compelled to pay taxes on their cigarettes, their soda water, their chocolate bars, to raise the interest on this immense amount of tax-exempt bonds. I consider the action of the government at that time in conscripting the manhood of the country and exempting wealth was nothing less than a national sin. I believe that nations, as well as individuals, are punished for their sins and as the Good Book itself says, the sins will be visited on the children to the third and fourth generation, and I believe that will be true in the case of this country. We have a millstone of debt around our necks to-day which I doubt if we will ever get rid of.

I should like to see placed on the statute books of this country a law which would compel any government which might happen to be in power to conscript the wealth of this country in any future wars in which this country might engage, if we ever do, and I pray we may not. Our debt now is approximately seven times as great as it was in the year 1914, and I maintain that a policy which might have been adequate to enable us to carry our debt in 1914 is not adequate to meet the needs of the country to-day. Our interest charges have increased since 1914 by 1,300 per cent, while the value of our export of wheat, which is the greatest single item in our export trade, has increased in that time only 55 per cent. This will surely bring home to hon. members what an awful interest charge we are carrying. We are so used to talking in millions that I do not believe our people realize the full extent of our national debt and of our interest charges. I am told that our interest charges to-day are more than the people of Canada spend for bread, which is the staff of life. If this terrible amount of interest is ever to be paid, it can only be done by all the people of this country who are able to work being put to work, and we must also give them the very best machinery and tools available. The only way in which we can create new wealth, as a basis for taxation to meet our annual expenditure, is to put to work every man in this country who is willing to work, giving him the most modern and up to date tools and machinery which can be had and making his tools and machinery as cheap as possible. We have in this country great natural resources. Why should we place in the way of any man who is willing to work at these resources in developing them, any hindrance in the shape of a tariff duty on tools and machinery. For my part I never could see the sense of making any man who was willing to work a bucksaw pay a tariff tax on that saw. If that be true in respect to a bucksaw it will also apply to any other of our tools.

I just want to give one instance of what this would mean to the development of wealth in Canada. Take in my own constituency; we are told by our geologists that we have there a large oil area. Now, there is nothing which western Canada is more in need of than a larger supply of oil, kerosene and gasoline. To-day in my constituency gasoline is retailing at from 60 to 65 cents a gallon, yet we persist in maintaining a duty of 27½ per cent on oil drilling machinery of the kind made in Canada, as well as a duty on casing and practically everything required for the drilling of a well. When I was in the Black Diamond oil field in Alberta last year one of the drillers there told me that he was fully convinced that if the tariff was taken off their tools, machinery and supplies they could drill three wells for what it now costs them to put down two. Surely it would be in the interests of Canada to promote this oil industry. If we can drill more wells we can get a larger supply of oil; that would cut down our importations from the United States—practically all our oil is coming from there at the present time—and it would help to diminish the adverse balance of trade which some hon. members to my right are so much concerned about.

The present budget proposes to put small farm tractors on the free list for the purpose, we are told, of encouraging production on our farms. Surely the Minister of Finance knows that it takes either gasoline or kerosene to run those tractors; they will not run of their own accord. And yet tractors are put on the free list, and a prohibitive duty is maintained on oil well drilling machinery. To put it mildly I think that is absurd. What I said about oil well drilling machinery will apply equally to all well drilling machinery. The Minister of Agriculture has told us in very strong language that mixed farming is the salvation of that part of western Canada. Now the Minister of Agriculture, who should back me up in this, knows that there is one kind of stock which must be well watered, and that is the kind of stock which we have out there. It cannot be watered on a great many of our farms at the present time because we have not sufficient water. Drilling for water is a very expensive proposition. On my own farm, I think, the well cost me $500, and it takes every drop of water we can get to water our work horses and milch cows. Under these circumstances how are we going into mixed farming, and into stock raising? I have a neighbour that drilled two dry holes, each 200 feet deep which cost him $800 and then he had no water. If there is one kind of machinery which should be put on the free list it is the machinery for drilling wells. I remember a few years ago reading an article in the Grain Growers' Guide by a city man who was trying to point out to the farmers that they could live so much cheaper than men in the cities. One of his arguments was that it did not cost us anything for water, whereas the city man had to pay water rates. Sir, the interest on my investment in that particular well and pump cost me far more than the water rates that that man paid in Winnipeg. If I have to pull that pump out of a 200-foot well for repairs that operation of itself will cost almost as much as it costs that city man for his year's supply of water. The trouble in this country is that we do not know each other's problems. I can assure you, Mr. Speaker, that from the remarks I have heard in this House there are many men here who do not understand the problems of the farmer in western Canada. I only hope those men who feel that they do not know these problems will come out and see them. I hope they will not think they have seen them from the window of a pullman car, but that they will come out to where I live and we will be very glad to take them out and introduce them to some of those problems. One of them, by the way, is grasshoppers. I have had three letters from that district in the last two days and this statement, or something very similar, was in each of the letters:

It is hot and dry and the grasshoppers are hatching by millions.

The other statement is:

We are having a dry time and fighting grasshoppers as hard as we know how to.

The reason I speak of these grasshoppers is that our Department of Agriculture assures us that the only way we can combat them is to poison them. Yet paris green, which is necessary for this purpose, is subject to a tariff duty. Last year I spent three of the worst weeks in my life fighting grasshoppers, and I assure hon. gentlemen that if they have never done this they have a treat in store for them should they ever be required to do so. I have seen grasshoppers so thick where they hatched that there was not room enough on the ground for all of them to hatch—they were three deep. They would eat off the wheat and make the land as bare as the floor of this House. The only way in which you can stop them is by poison, and yet poison is subject to a tariff tax, to maintain some manufacturer in eastern Canada. The farmer when he has to fight grasshoppers must fight with his back to the wall; if he does not poison them they will surely eat his crop.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I am going to try and get away from the tariff; I want to say just a few words in regard to the cattle industry. First of all I wish to commend the Minister of Finance for endeavouring to secure reciprocity with the United States. If it can be secured it will be the salvation of the cattle industry in western Canada; if it is not secured I do not know what is going to happen to the industry. Chicago is the natural market for the cattle of western Canada. When the Emergency Tariff was put into force by the United States it made it very difficult for our cattle men to ship to Chicago, or at least it left them very little profit after the cattle were shipped. At the same time that is where most of our cattle had to go last year. In the summer of 1919 and even 1920, some of the banks in western Canada were urging the ranchers to buy more cattle and even to buy grazing lands and leases. The winter of 1919 was one of the worst, from the ranchers point of view, which we have experienced in a great many years, and practically all these men were compelled to buy great quantities of feed at prices ranging from $20 to $60 per ton. In the summer of 1920 our hay crop was very short again, and although this winter was not quite so hard, they were again forced to buy great quantities of feed at fairly stiff prices. In 1921 the United States put on their Emergency Tariff against our cattle, thus almost closing the Chicago market to our ranchers. This fact was pointed out to the government which was then in office, and the announcement was made through the papers that they had concluded arrangements with the banks that the banks should carry the cattle men over until this year so that they would not be forced to sell at the extremely low price prevailing last fall. In spite of all that appeared in the papers in this regard, it is an actual fact that many of these ranchers were forced last fall to sell many of their cattle which were not properly finished. In some cases they were forced to sell cattle which had cost them at least $90 per head to raise, for from $30 to $40 per head. I have a letter here from one rancher, and I know of the case personally, stating that he was forced by the bank to sell over a hundred head of cattle, three year old steers, at a little over $30 per head, although he had sufficient hay to carry them over the winter. These cattle had cost him $40 the year before, and he had fed them for a full year. If he had been allowed to carry these cattle over another season, there is absolutely no question that he would have made another $25 per head and I think the bank should have helped him. The bank which forced him to sell the cattle was the Merchants Bank of Canada, and within a couple of weeks after this forced sale was made, it was stated in the press, that this bank had lost in one bad loan approximately $4,000,000. That loan was made to a firm of stock brokers for what might be termed gambling purposes. The banks are forcing the real producer out of business, but will furnish money to stock brokers to gamble with.

I think it is a matter of regret that the Finance Minister should have considered it necessary to give his approval to the amalgamation of the Merchants Bank with the Bank of Montreal. This Parliament should have ordered a parliamentary inquiry into the Merchants Bank case. We might have secured very valuable information which would help us to make a proper revision of the Bank Act next year. This banking question is getting to be rather a burning one in western Canada. As a rule a three months' loan is no good to an agriculturalist. He would be better if he never got it. I think perhaps it would not be out of place if I should put before this House a few facts in connection with the banking business in this country. During the last eleven years, the number of banks in Canada decreased from twenty-nine to seventeen. Practically speaking, the directors of seventeen banks have the power to say whether any individual or group of individuals in Canada can secure any credit for carrying on their legitimate business enterprises. If the same decrease in number of banks through failures or amalgamation is continued for the next eleven years, we shall then have five banks in complete control of the credit of this country. The paid up capital stock of all Canadian banks has increased in the last ten years by only 32 per cent. Since the amalgamation of the Merchants Bank with the Bank of Montreal, this capital has decreased until it is now only 28 per cent greater than in 1911. During the ten year period from 1911 to 1921 the savings bank deposits increased by 109 per cent. This is one of the alarming features of the banking situation as the Toronto Globe recently said:

> The most disquieting feature of banking in Canada is the continually decreasing ratio of capital to deposits. Twenty years ago capital constituted over 31 per cent of the funds in the chartered banks of Canada. At the close of 1921 capital represented less than 15 per cent of these funds, while six-sevenths of all the credit used in doing the country's business was based on the deposits of the general public. It is doubtful if this change is for the better. The investor in bank stock cannot withdraw his money at will. His capital provides a fairly solid foundation for the structure of bank credit. This cannot be said with assurance of deposits which may be, and usually are, withdrawn. The billion and three quarters of deposits in Canadian banks are of what is known as "time" deposits, and could be held in the vaults during any sudden gust of panic, but if the ratio between capital and deposits in 1901 was reasonable and secure, then capital to-day needs a very considerable re-enforcement. Is Canadian credit as solidly based on six-sevenths public deposits and one-seventh private capital and reserves as it should be?

Let me point out another very important aspect of this decreasing ratio of capital stock to deposits, which is that the double liability clause attached to the capital stock of our banks is supposed to give ample security to depositors. This security is seriously impaired, if the proper ratio between capital stock and deposits is not maintained. Another disquieting feature of the situation is the fact that one bank now controls approximately one-quarter of the savings bank deposits in Canada, and this bank in addition, controls one of the largest trust companies in this country. There are many other features which are of national concern but which I will not take time to mention now.

Surveying the whole situation, I think it shows the need of some new system of credit in this country. I would like very much to see the Government give consideration to the proposal of the hon. member for East Calgary (Mr. Irvine) for the appointment of a committee of the House to study every phase of this credit system. We have been told repeatedly during the last two days how Germany had put her people to work, and had produced goods so cheaply, and I have been told—I cannot guarantee this fact—that the reason Germany has been able to do it is that she has issued so much currency. I think the fact that Germany has done that, and has probably made it hard for this country and other countries to compete with her, makes it imperative that we must study this question to see if we cannot secure some better system of credit.

In addition to a better system of credit, we need a new system of distribution. I only desire to mention the question of distribution in connection with wheat. The farmers of western Canada, as hon. members know, or should know, are asking for a wheat board to distribute their wheat. I have been a little bit vexed sometimes at the comments which have appeared in the press in this part of the country regarding our demand for a wheat board. I just want to give you one sample which reads:

> One aspect of the case is not an impressive indication of consistency. Ottawa finds it strange that they who most vigorously preach free trade or something near it, in things they have to buy are so insistent upon protection against possible loss or reduced profits in things they have to sell.

I presume that a great many people who read that article will nod their heads in approval of this little paragraph, without, even, a thought of the causes which brought the farmers of the West to their present financial condition, and which have driven them to ask for what this writer calls protection, although I do not for one moment admit there is any protection in it. These men have been brought to their present plight largely by means of protection for somebody else and at their expense—protection for the manufacturer of the farmer's implements, the manufacturer of the clothes he must wear, and the manufacturer of much of the food that he eats, of the furniture which is in his home, of the materials used in the buildings which he must have to shelter him in that cold climate, and protection for the railway company so that they may be enabled to pay their usual dividends and maintain their reserve unimpaired regardless of whether the farmer himself can buy clothes and shoes for his own family. I think it ill becomes any journalist in this part of Canada to hand out such comments as those after the way in which the great majority of them have consistently supported our manufacturing friends in their demands for protection. This Parliament cannot escape responsibility in this matter, as they are responsible for the economic policy of this country which has been maintained by them, in spite of very strong protests from the farmers on the prairies who are now asking for this measure to help in some degree to solve their marketing problem.

Possibly, Mr. Speaker, my remarks have been a little bit disjointed, because I have tried to cut out most of what has been previously referred to in this debate. So as not to weary hon. members and, I want to mention only one more matter, namely, the remarks made by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill), whose candour I certainly admire. In speaking of the tariff, he said something to the effect—I do not think I can quote his exact words—that the tariff was a geographical matter; that a man's view on the tariff was determined according to the province in which he lived, that as a citizen living in Brittish Columbia he was perfectly justified in advocating a protective tariff; that if he lived in Manitoba he would be justified in asking for free trade or something approaching it. If that be correct, I think I am safe in saying that the people of my province would be quite agreeable to British Columbia or Ontario or any other province having a protective tariff, if they so wished, provided that they would give to our province the same privilege of having a tariff that would satisfy us. If they are not prepared to grant that, the only alternative is a compromise; but it is a great stretch of the imagination to say that the compromise offered by this budget is anything like a fair one.

I am not sure whether I should say these last few words which I have on this note or not.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go ahead.

Mr. COOTE: I have the backing of some hon. members behind me, and I will say them. I wish to say in plain language, that western Canada has been unfairly treated by this House for many years, and that unless this Parliament recognizes that fact and makes a real effort to placate the growing feeling of resentment which this treatment has created, there may arise a situation with which Parliament will find it hard to deal.

Mr. M. N. CAMPBELL (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, it is not my purpose to enter into what some hon. members have been pleased to term a political inquest; but I feel that I would be failing in my duty to my constituents if I did not at this time draw to the attention of the House some of the definite promises and pledges made by the Liberal party prior to the last election. I have in my hand a copy of the platform drawn up at the 1919 liberal convention, and while this has already been frequently referred to, I think it is of sufficient importance for further reference. Under the heading of tariff, the second resolution reads:

> Reducing the cost of the instruments of production in the industries based on the natural resources of the Dominion, the vigorous development of which is essential to the progress and prosperity of our country.
>
> That to these ends, wheat, wheat flour and all products of wheat; the principal articles of food; farm implements and machinery; farm tractors; mining, flour and saw mill machinery and repair parts thereof; rough and partly dressed lumber; gasoline, illuminating, lubricating and fuel oils; nets, net twines, and fishermen's equipments; cements, and fertilizers, should be free from customs duties, as well as the raw material entering into the same.
>
> That a revision downwards of the tariff should be made whereby substantial reductions should be effected in the cost of wearing apparel, footwear and other articles of general consumption, other than luxuries, as well as on the raw materials entering into the manufacture of the same.
>
> That the British preference be increased to 50 per cent of the general tariff.

And I wish hon. gentlemen to pay particular attention to the next clause:

> And the Liberal party hereby pledges itself to implement by legislation the provisions of this resolution, when returned to power.

Under the heading of "Finance and Taxation" I find the following resolution:

> Whereas, national disaster will overtake this country should the present method of financing the country's affairs be continued; and,
>
> Whereas, both Great Britain and the United States at present raise more than 80 per cent of their revenue by direct taxation, while Canada raises not more than 20 per cent;
>
> Be it and it is hereby resolved:
> 1. That the serious nature of the country's financial situation calls for the profoundest consideration of all patriotic citizens, and the exercise of the severest economy by the Government;

2. That increase of revenue must be sought from an equitable and effective imposition and collection of graduated taxes, on business profits and income, applicable to all incomes above reasonable exemptions;
3. Taxes on luxuries.

The Prime Minister, speaking in my constituency, in the town hall at Yorkton, Saskatchewan, on November 8, 1920, is quoted by the Enterprise as speaking as follows:

The tariff is too high and must be revised downward. The cost of living must be reduced. Why put a tax on the necessities of life, on food, clothing, boots and shoes and building material? Duties should be reduced. They were nothing but a tax put on the people. The sales tax is a tariff—a visible tariff.

He advocated the doing away with these taxes.

There is no doubt where the Liberal party stands on the question of tariff. Taxes have to be raised, but it is not necessary to do it all by direct taxation. I would tax incomes, business profits and luxuries. All could be raised in this way. A tariff should exist for revenue, and only to supplement those taxes. I think there are certain classes that should be exempt—the large body of consumers and the large body of producers in regard to instruments of production. All agricultural implements should be placed absolutely on the free list. Gasoline, fuel, oils, cement and fertilizers were some of the commodities that he would also exempt.

Further on, he said:

Our platform is the same as the farmers, with one or two differences.

It seems to me that the budget before the House to-day constitutes a very serious repudiation of those promises and pledges. It is not my purpose to enter into a criticism of the action of the Prime Minister; in fact, I believe he deserves more sympathy than censure at our hands. Let me say that, in my opinion, if the Prime Minister were surrounded by men as advanced thinkers and as liberal-minded as himself, we would to-day be considering a budget of an entirely different nature. Some hon. members opposite have reminded us that the budget is a step in the right direction, and that the platform cannot be put into effect immediately. I should like to ask them how long, at the present rate, it will take to have it in effect. This reminds me of the mathematical problem of the frog that fell into the thirty-foot well and tried to climb out. The first day he made four feet, but after that he got tired and lazy and crawled up twelve inches each day and slid back eighteen inches each night. How long would it take him to get to the top? The Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding), in presenting his budget, drew attention to the serious financial condition of the country and to the necessity of producing a revenue to meet those conditions. But, Sir, I submit that the budget before the House to-day is not one based on the principles of producing a revenue, but rather on the principle of protecting our manufacturers. We are not complaining particularly of the duty in so far as it produces a revenue; but when we are obliged to pay that duty not into the Dominion treasury, but into the pockets of Canadian manufacturers, we have a legitimate cause for complaint.

I wish to deal very briefly with some items of the tariff and like the last hon. gentleman who spoke, I find it necessary to cut out a good deal of what I intended to say on account of the lateness of the hour and the length of time that this debate has dragged out. I will deal first with the automobile industry. Automobiles and automobile parts are protected by a tariff duty of 35 per cent. In fact, with the alteration in the sales tax, the duty is a little more than that. There is a sales tax of 6 per cent on imported goods and 4½ per cent on home made goods, which gives the manufacturer an additional protection of 1½ per cent. So that the actual protection enjoyed by the automobile manufacturer is 37½ per cent. Now, I do not wish to take an extreme stand in this matter, but I suggest to the minister that if his budget is really based on the principle of producing revenue he should reduce the protection on automobiles at least to the very reasonable figure of 20 per cent. Surely there is no hon. gentleman in this House who will contend that 20 per cent is not a good and sufficient protection for the automobile industry. I would suggest further to the minister that he increase the present excise tax by 15 per cent. That system would have this virtue: it would still leave the manufacturers a very substantial protection; it would turn in a very considerable revenue to the Dominion treasury; and it would not increase the price of the product to the purchaser. I find that in the year 1920 there were manufactured in Canada automobiles and automobile parts to the value of $137,420,531. Wages paid in the manufacture of these goods amounted to $19,368,009. Of these automobiles there were exported $20,911,262 worth. So that the amount sold at home totalled $116,509,089. On this basis the wages chargeable to the goods sold at home would be $16,376,852. These automobiles, on the import basis,—that is, taking the prices that would be paid for them in the United States, apart from the duty—would amount to $101,792,852.

Had these goods been manufactured in a foreign country and been imported into Canada and the duty paid, it would have turned into the treasury that year the substantial sum of $35,627,498, or nearly enough to have retired the deficit on the Canadian National Railways for that particular year. Hon. gentlemen will say, however, that if they were imported, while there would no doubt have been a substantial increase in the revenue, the workmen would not have had employment.

Hon. gentlemen will probably ask, what about the wages and the employment of the men? Well, I will go a little further. The Dominion treasury could very well have afforded to pay all the wages of these men, allowing them to do nothing, and would still have had left the substantial balance of $19,250,648. Had the excise tax I have suggested been in effect that year, it would have brought in, to enrich the budget of that time, the sum of $17,924,393, which otherwise went into the pockets of the Canadian automobile manufacturers. We imported in the year 1920 goods of this nature to the value of $25,548,348, on which there was collected duty amounting to $8,059,895. Taking these figures, the actual amount of duty paid by the people of Canada—because it is a duty regardless of whether it is paid to the manufacturer here or to the customs collecter—was $43,787,393; but of that amount only a little over $8,000,000, or less than 25 per cent, went into the Dominion treasury. So that on this basis it took over a dollar of taxation to turn 25 cents into the treasury. I would draw attention again to the fact that there was nearly $21,000,000 worth of these manufactured goods exported in the year in question. That shows that our Canadian manufacturers were able to ship goods out of this country and compete in foreign markets with the manufacturers of the world, proving thereby most conclusively that they did not need protection.

When Sir John Macdonald introduced his National Policy in the House in March, 1878, he stated at the time that it was only a temporary measure, intended merely to give the manufacturers a leg-up, so to speak, and in that time, as they got on their feet, it would be abandoned. He was asked rather ironically from the Opposition benches as to just when he would regard the manufacturers as being no longer in a position that called for protection. Sir John was equal to the occasion and his answer was both sensible and logical. He replied that just so soon as these protected manufacturers began to ship goods out of the country in competition with foreign manufacturers in the world's markets, they would thereby prove beyond question that they no longer needed protection. That was the basis on which the National Policy was instituted in Canada. But let me come to a period somewhat nearer our own time; I will quote a more recent authority. On January 18, 1911, the right hon. the present leader of the Opposition (Mr. Meighen) moved, in the House of Commons, the following resolution:

> That in the opinion of this House a substantial reduction in the import duties on agricultural implements is now due the agriculturists of Canada, and is in just accord with the true ends of a protective tariff.

I observe that in his speech he quotes Sir John Macdonald and quite a number of the other leaders of the Conservative party, citing these very facts to prove that the policy of that party was to retain this duty only until such time as it was clearly demonstrated to them that the manufacturers were no longer under the necessity of protection. Let me quote briefly from one section of his speech. I should like very much to place the whole of the right hon. gentleman's remarks on record in Hansard, Mr. Speaker, because they are interesting. However, I do not wish to weary the House and so I shall quote just one part of his speech.

> But the charge I have to make, and which I hope to bring home to the Government this afternoon, is not that one, though it is the most serious;

He was referring at that time to the question of broken pledges, as he is doing at the present time.

> —it is this, that in their attempts to continue the National Policy which had obtained for years before, they have overlooked, they have neglected one essential feature of that policy, they have quite forgotten its guiding principle—

I want the House to note what the right hon. gentleman here refers to as the guiding principle of the National Policy.

> —namely, the principle that as our industrial institutions advanced in strength and as they were able with every advance to acquire a hold on the home market, the import duties were to be diminished and adjusted in order to meet the evolving and changing conditions. It is that restraining, guiding principle, which I claim this government has entirely overlooked, and as a consequence they have allowed, in the respect which I am discussing this afternoon, protection to run rampant.

Now, I am not one of those who take an extreme stand. I do not advocate that we should do away with the industries we have and import all our goods, even though that might increase the revenue. There is no one who is more anxious than I am to see industries in this country and to see them prosperous and flourishing. I submit, however, that the contention that the automobile industry requires a protection of 35 per cent in order to carry on is not only a fallacy, but an absolute absurdity. I note that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) has allowed farm tractors to remain on the free list, and I am not complaining in that respect, for I would not suggest that a duty be placed on these tractors. But at the same time I would call his attention to the fact that the farm tractor is not the most essential requisite; the important things are binders, mowers, rakes, drills, ploughs and waggons; and if the minister feels that he must retain a certain amount of duty on agricultural implements, then I would ask him, in all fairness to the poor farmer, and particularly to the new settler whom we are trying to induce to come to Canada, and who will not have sufficient funds to purchase tractors, to place a small duty on farm tractors and reduce by a corresponding amount the duties on the essential implements.

Now, I pass on to something else, which is perhaps even more important, namely, the matter of cotton and woollen clothing. I would just like to say here that while farming implements are used by only one section of the people, cotton and woollen clothing are required by people of all vocations, regardless of their station in life. I suggest still further to the hon. Minister of Finance that if he must retain a certain amount of duty, we would prefer that he apply it to the farm tractor rather than to cotton and woollen clothing. There were manufactured in Canada in 1920 cotton and woollen clothing to the value of $186,711,174. The wages paid in the manufacture of those goods amounted to $31,267,601. Of the amount manufactured $13,809,576 worth were exported, so that the total amount sold at home was valued at $172,901,598. I find that the average duty paid on dutiable cotton and woollen clothing amounted to 30.7 per cent. I mention dutiable cotton and woollen clothing, because a large amount of woollen goods come in free—what are known in the customs tariff as worsted tops, very largely the coarsely spun yarn used by the wool factories. Goods of this nature to the value of $11,913,824 were allowed in free. I may say incidentally that while wool and hides are allowed in free, wool blankets and clothing are protected to the extent of 35 per cent, so that you will see just how this protective tariff protects the farmer. Reducing these figures again to import value, as I did in the case of automobiles, we get the sum of $142,854,762. On the basis of the average duty, had these goods been manufactured in a foreign country and imported in the year 1920 they would have turned into the national treasury the very substantial sum of $43,856,411. Again with this item I do not wish to take an extreme stand, but I would suggest to the minister that he at least make a reduction of 10 per cent, thus saving the working people, the poorer people of Canada, the large sum of $18,000,000.

Let me deal just briefly with the protection that is afforded to the farmer. Cheap corn comes in in competition with his oats; raw hides, wool—all these things are imported free, but when the farmer comes to buy manufactured goods he has to pay this very substantial duty. The farmer is not particularly seeking protection; the farmer considers that a protective tariff is vicious in principle and destructive in its application. The farmer has never asked for protection and he is not asking for it now. But I submit that the men who framed this customs tariff, had they themselves firmly and honestly believed in the principle of protection, would have protected all industries alike, and would have imposed duties on these articles the same as on manufactured goods. And, Sir, what is the reason for this? Is it because the farmer has not done the usual amount of lobbying? He has not done any lobbying, but I do not think that is the reason; there is a deeper and more vital reason than that. It is simply that all these years the highly protected manufacturing concerns have been contributing very liberally to the campaign funds of both the old political parties. All down the ages, from the day of Judas Iscariot, men have been ready to sell their principles, their honour—yes, their country and their countrymen—for financial gain and for political power. Judas, when he took the thirty pieces of silver for the betrayal of his Master, committed no greater crime than scores of men who, during the course of our political history, have betrayed the confidence reposed in them by the people of Canada and have sold their own countrymen into the bondage of a group of manufacturers and financiers in exchange for the campaign funds with which to win their election.

I would carry you back to a red letter day in the history of Canada, a day to which the hon. member for Brome (Mr. McMaster) in his speech a few days ago, so ably and eloquently—yes, I will say almost pleading and tearfully—referred, that of 1893, when those great Liberal principles were laid down as the Magna Charta of liberty and progress and as the guiding star of Liberalism in Canada. But I will pass on for four years to what Porrit calls the great betrayal of 1897, and I will pass further on for nearly a quarter of a century until we come to another red letter day in the history of Canada, to what we at that time hoped was a brighter and happier day, that of 1919, when the same old platform and the same old principles were once more laid down as the foundation rock of the grand old Liberal party of Canada. But to-day we are in another period, a period that marks another milestone, a period to which the future Canadian historian may well and rightfully refer as the greater betrayal of 1922.

On motion of Mr. McKay, the debate was adjourned.

CANADA TEMPERANCE ACT AMENDMENT

On the Order being called:

Second reading of Bill No. 51, to amend the Canada Temperance Act—The Solicitor General.

Hon. D. D. McKENZIE (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I move that this order be discharged. My purpose is to introduce another bill of somewhat the same character.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. McKENZIE moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 132, to amend the Canada Temperance Act.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Explain.

Mr. McKENZIE: When I introduced the former bill I explained that it was called for more particularly by British Columbia, though it had general application to the whole country. In British Columbia they have to some extent control of the sale of intoxicating liquors, and under the proposed legislation any liquors imported into that province must be imported by the local government and by nobody else, with the possible exception of liquors imported by parties who are licensed to take them in for purposes of export. After the former bill had been introduced into this House, representations came from the government of Quebec to the effect that they have control of the sale of liquor to some extent in that province and that the provisions of the bill which I had introduced might interfere with them. And some slight change, therefore, was necessary in that respect.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): Has Ontario the power of exporting liquor?

Mr. McKENZIE: The present situation is not changed at all by this bill. Then came requests from the province of Saskatchewan and the province of Ontario, and some from the province of Nova Scotia on certain other lines, which would have so overwhelmed the first bill with changes that I thought it better to withdraw it, and introduce a new one covering the requests made by the different provinces.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): What do the the amendments propose to do briefly?

Mr. McKENZIE: I thought I had made it plain. So far as British Columbia is concerned, it is to prevent the importation of liquor into the province except through the local government, which has control of the matter now.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): Is that the same power that Quebec has?

Mr. McKENZIE: In Quebec the business is handled by a commission appointed by the local government, and not by the local government itself. This will bring the commission under the law, as well as the government of British Columbia. As far as Ontario and Nova Scotia are concerned, it is requested that certain sections of the Doherty Act, sections 4, 5 and 6, if I remember rightly, shall be made a part of Part IV of the Canada Temperance Act. That is the act upon which New Brunswick, Ontario and Nova Scotia took a vote some time ago. There are certain sections of the Doherty Act which the temperance people of these provinces think should be made a part of Part IV of the Canada Temperance Act, and this the bill proposes to do.

There is very little new legislation. It is only transferring legislation from one place to another, made necessary through the provinces having adopted these different acts.

Mr. CALDWELL: How will this affect the present control of liquor in New Brunswick?

Mr. McKENZIE: It will not affect it at all, as I see it.

Motion agreed to, and bill read the first time.

ANIMAL CONTAGIOUS DISEASES ACT AMENDMENT

House again in Committee on Bill No. 62, to amend the Animal Contagious Diseases Act, Mr. Marcil in the Chair.

On section 1—compensation:

Mr. TOLMIE: I had some conversation with the Minister of Agriculture this morning concerning this matter, and I have looked into it a little further during the day. I find there are a number of hon. members who are interested in this question of the reduction of compensation, and I would ask the minister to be good enough to let the bill stand over until about Wednesday, when the budget debate will be over.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I will promise to leave the bill in committee, but I think we might spend the next half hour in discussing it. Would that be satisfactory to my hon. friend?

Mr. TOLMIE: Yes.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: The committee will remember that when this bill was up before, almost everyone who spoke agreed as to the compensation allocated for pure bred cattle. The sum of $150 was thought by some hon. members to be too small, it being a reduction of $100 from the old indemnity, but as a matter of fact, in getting out this new schedule of indemnities we have felt that the reductions made are not as large as the reductions that have taken place in the commercial value of animals. Consequently, the indemnity is really just as high as in the former schedule. Giving high indemnities is very nice, of course, if you have lots of money, and we would like to give high indemnities for the sake of the man who has had his animals slaughtered. It is a tremendous loss to a man to have his whole herd slaughtered, as sometimes happens, but our first consideration is the public safety and to get as much value as possible for the money expended in the way of eradicating tuberculosis. In actual practice it does not help to eradicate the disease to give indemnities bordering on the value of the animal. If the indemnity is too low, the owner is not tempted to get his cattle tested at all, and if it is too high, he is apt to be careless on the ground that the indemnity will be so high and generous, plus the salvage of the animal, that not much loss will be incurred, and there is a predisposition to carelessness on his part. So we have reduced the indemnity to correspond with the reduction in the value of the animals as compared with two years ago. I shall be very glad to hear from the committee, not from the angle of buying these cattle, because we are not buying them, but from the point of view of indemnifying the owner for the loss he has sustained, and helping him to start over again with government assistance. To that extent, also, we are protecting the public from the further spread of this disease. I firmly believe that when an indemnity is too high it actually encourages the dissemination of the disease, and that is not what any of us want.

Mr. CALDWELL: Is an indemnity paid for the destruction of cattle suffering from any other disease than tuberculosis?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I think it is.

Mr. McMASTER: If the compensation relates to swine my hon. friend from George Etienne Cartier (Mr. Jacobs) can give some information to the committee on that.

Mr. CALDWELL: He does not know anything about swine.

Mr. JACOBS: Since the hon. member for Brome (Mr. McMaster) comes from an agricultural county he is an expert on swine.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: In the interpretation clause of the act I find the following:

(e) "infectious or contagious disease" includes, in addition to other diseases generally so designated, glanders, farcy, maladie du coït, pleuro-pneumonia contagiosa, foot and mouth disease, rinderpest, anthrax, Texas fever, hog cholera, swine plague, mange, scab, rabies, tuberculosis, actinomycosis, and variola ovina.

About twelve diseases are enumerated, but cattle are not all subject to these diseases.

Mr. CALDWELL: What diseases are compensated for in cattle when the animals are destroyed?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Foot and mouth diseases, pleuro-pneumonia and tuberculosis are the three principle ones.

Mr. TOLMIE: Tuberculosis is the only disease prevalent in this country of the diseases you mentioned.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: We happen to be free from the other diseases.

Mr. BROWN: Is the indemnity paid in proportion to the value of the animal?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: The indemnity consists of two-thirds of the various sums mentioned in the bill. If the animal is a 100 per cent animal, two-thirds of the respective amounts is granted. If in the opinion of the inspector, the animal is second, third or fourth rate, the indemnity is paid accordingly.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Is $150 the maximum in the case of a pure bred animal?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: That is the maximum.

Mr. GUTHRIE: And in any case the man would only get two-thirds of $150?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: The amount would be $100?

Mr. GUTHRIE: Then $100 is the real maximum?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: That is right.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Well, take the case of an animal, an eight months' old Shorthorn bull costing $33,000, which was bought in my county and which the former Minister of Agriculture had the honour of christening. In the event of the destruction of an animal of the class all the man gets is $100 regardless of its real value? Is any exception made for high class stock of that kind?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: No. I may say, Mr. Chairman, my staff tried hard, as I did myself to work out some system that would make an exception in the case of animals such as those described by my hon. friend, but the moment you mention a fancy price for a fancy animal it sets everybody on edge. A good many people think their stock should get into that class and it creates a good deal of dissatisfaction. There are so many others in the same category that it would simply mean you would have to make one more maximum. We tried also to give recognition to the animals in the dairy class whose performances we get a record of. You take an animal that would give from 2,000 to 2,500 pounds of milk per annum, a young animal we will say five or six years old; it does look as if that one would be worth a higher indemnity; but the difficulties in the way of fixing an amount were such that we had to agree on a flat rate and a reduction in proportion, to the full in price although not quite as much as the animals have fallen in value on the market to-day.

Mr. GUTHRIE: One other point. In the case of these very valuable animals, insurance is always carried by the owner against both accidents and disease. Now in the event of the government authority deciding that the animal should be slaughtered, does that void the insurance? Can the minister say that?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I have not looked up the act on that point but I would not imagine that it would affect the insurance one way or the other. I am not sure upon that point, but since we are leaving the bill in committee I will make enquiry and acquaint my hon. friend with the result. My hon. friend from Victoria (Mr. Tolmie) having administered the act must have run up against that feature of it.

Mr. McKENZIE: A valuable animal such as that mentioned, I think, would be insured, but I do not believe there is anything in the act, although I am not familiar with its terms, as to insurance.

Mr. TOLMIE: As far as I know the act has no reference whatever to insurance. I think the insurance is a matter of the owner's own concern.

Mr. GUTHRIE: In the event of the animal being slaughtered can the owner collect insurance?

Mr. TOLMIE: In the event of the animal being very slightly affected and sold to an abattoir under inspection, I think the owner is entitled to any sum he can obtain in that way. In the matter of compensation for contagious disease we do not aim at paying the man in full for the value of the animal. The idea is simply to help him along in his misfortune and enable him to get on his feet again.

Mr. CALDWELL: I cannot help thinking that the minister is wrong in his statement that the maximum indemnity paid for the slaughter of a pure bred animal was $100?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: That is right.

Mr. CALDWELL: In the act it says $150?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: It is two-thirds of the value.

Mr. CALDWELL: Two-thirds of the value of the animal until the indemnity goes up to $150? In other words if the animal is worth $225 the owner gets $150? If the animal is worth $150 the owner gets $100? Am I right in that?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: The maximum valuation is $150. You do not see in the amending bill the two-thirds provision. If my hon. friend had read section 7 of the original act, with the amendment which he has before him, he would more readily have grasped the situation. Section 7 provides:

> The compensation, if any, shall be two-thirds of the value of the slaughtered animal, determined as aforesaid, before it became affected with infectious or contagious disease, or came in contact with or in dangerous proximity to animals so affected.

So the owner will just get $100 for that animal; that will be the maximum. I think a little less complicated method of computation may be worked out.

Mr. CALDWELL: I think so too.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: As we were just making the one amendment we thought we would not change the method until we were sure where it was going to land us, besides which it would have involved changes in the bill in probably several other directions. So we retained the same method. It is a little complicated but not so bad when you become familiar with it.

Mr. CALDWELL: Then the maximum compensation for a pure bred horse would be $200?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: It is set out in the bill.

Mr. CALDWELL: What is meant is that compensation would be paid up to the amount stated there?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: No.

Mr. CALDWELL: Only two-thirds of that valuation?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Only two-thirds.

Mr. CALDWELL: When the bill was introduced and got its first reading I absolutely misunderstood its purpose. I certainly did not think the compensation was excessive. I am a pure-bred cattle breeder myself.

Mr. JACOBS: That is why you find the compensation too low.

Mr. CALDWELL: It is certainly. But I should say the same with respect to pure-bred cattle even if that were not the case.

Mr. JACOBS: It depends upon whose ox is being gored.

Mr. CALDWELL: It depends upon the ox of the hon. member; it will not depend on mine.

Mr. TOLMIE: In making a valuation of the diseased animal we must not forget to ask ourselves what a glandered horse is worth, what a pure bred cow with tuberculosis is worth, and what a hog with cholera is worth.

Mr. MILLAR: Is there any provision in this legislation for an appeal in case the owner of the animal is not satisfied?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: No. There is an appeal to the court from the Inspector's decision as to whether the animals were diseased or not, but no appeal as to amount, and, invariably, the appeals have not been sustained by the court. In other words, the courts have sustained the decision of the inspector. There is nothing compelling the owners to come under this act. It is not necessary to have your animals examined. If you are supplying milk to certain cities that come under this system of certified milk, then you must apply for inspection. In other respects, it is voluntary. Therefore, knowing the compensation, there is no grievance. As a matter of fact, hundreds of cattle were slaughtered before this was adopted, and the owner received no compensation, but anyone familiar with this matter knows that there is a general tendency, whether it be tuberculosis in the human family or in the bovine family, that there is a tendency to hide it, even from oneself, and simply go on with your eyes shut and try to convince yourself even against the evidence that you have not the malady. Where there is a big prospective loss, like this, the compensation encourages a man whether he is poor or in moderate circumstances. He feels there is somebody ready to help him in the event of the worst coming to the worst. The idea is not to purchase the animal, but simply to indemnify him, to a certain extent, and to safeguard his animals by inspection. What is the situation now? The fact that we have 150 odd herds waiting to be inspected shows that the public are clamouring for it faster than we can get the men and money to carry it out. If we gave more money, we would be wasting it, so far as the public treasury is concerned. And, furthermore, it would encourage the man, and give him a sense of security, because he is going to get nearly the value of the animal, and, perhaps, he would not be half as careful, in regard to the animal contracting disease. I know about it, because I had my herd examined and slaughtered. Unless a man is a loser to some extent, he will not have the same care in regard to his herd, especially if it is a valuable herd. You must clean up your premises and get your animals inspected, and it must be done continuously, if you are to keep your herd clean.

Mr. CALDWELL: Is the inspection free?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Yes.

Mr. CALDWELL: Only in pure-bred herds.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: No, any inspection done by the Government is free.

Mr. JOHNSON (Moosejaw): In the case of glanders in horses, does the minister say there is no complusion on the part of the owners to have the animals inspected and slaughtered, if it comes to the ears of the authorities?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Unless you are near to a city or a community—

Mr. JOHNSON: Suppose it is a horse that is inflicted with glanders?

Mr. CALDWELL: I think, if there is a complaint made, these horses must be slaughtered. In our district, in a rural community, complaint was made and the horses were tested and slaughtered. What standard has the department to determine whether a pure-bred cow is a 100 per cent cow, or up to the perfect standard? What standard have you to gauge them? Do they have to make 30 pounds of butter a week, or what is the standard?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Just the same standard as the judge would have. I do not care whether they have a score card or not, but my hon. friend is sufficiently familiar with it, and he would size up the cow. First it is the pure-bred cow. That would be one thing that would give it a value. That is a different class altogether. Then you would certainly look at the pedigree. The inspector would call for the pedigree, and it would have to be forthcoming before he would go into that class at all, and the age of the animal would be determined, if not by the rings on the horn, then by the pedigree.

Mr. CALDWELL: He might have no horns.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: There is a number of things about animals the inspector could not determine on a cursory examination,—how safe she was, as a breeder, what her progeny was, and all that sort of thing. It would entail a rather minute examination, but I think a competent inspector will get approximately near the mark.

Mr. KENNEDY (Glengarry): What is the maximum compensation?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: One hundred dollars.

Mr. JOHNSON: In the case of glanders in horses and hog cholera in swine, I am informed that it is compulsory.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON: In that case, is there no appeal against the valuation of the inspector?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: No, and I hope there never will be. Somebody's judgment has got to prevail, and quite frequently without any appeal, and, if there is dissatisfaction, a new man is put on the job, and there is a second inspection.

Mr. JOHNSON: In other words, reinspection.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Yes, and it is one of the most difficult duties, I think, I can conceive of for a conscientious inspector to examine a herd of cattle. A man will probably take 15 or 20 years to build up a pure bred herd. He is in the dairy business, and his whole living depends on it, and, just like a bolt from the blue, it is announced to him that his herd is tubercular. Well, the natural tendency for the inspector is to be sympathetic, and yet his judgment tells him that he must be just. There are two sentiments warring in him; one to be sympathetic and help out the man who has suffered a severe loss, then secondly he is dealing with the Government's money, and, as a matter of fact, it is the people's money—it is the same man's money. The inspector knows there is only a certain amount of it, and, if he is a good officer, he wants to show results and get the best out of that money. He knows his duty is to give a just valuation. If you had an appeal you would involve the whole thing with such a lot of cumbersome legal expenses and proceedings that I do not know where you would get. I know there is a sort of feeling that this should be something like an ordinary case in court, where a lower court renders a decision and you can appeal to a higher court, and so on. I think you would drive the Government out of business altogether, if that system were in effect.

Mr. TOLMIE: I might be able to throw a little light on this, having had a good deal of practical experience actually in the field, in enforcing the provisions of the Animal Contagious Disease Act. In the first place, in the event of an outbreak of glanders being reported at a certain place, an inspector is sent immediately and makes an inspection, and if he finds suspicions of glanders he makes out form 49, placing all the animals, stables and building in quarantine, preventing the owner moving the diseased animals out. Then he proceeds to test the animals with malleim and if he finds reactors, the reactors are destroyed and the buildings are disinfected. The premises are kept in quarantine and the remaining animals kept there for a certain period, until all danger is passed.

Mr. CALDWELL: That is just with regard to glanders?

Mr. TOLMIE: Yes, or any of those diseases scheduled in the Act.

Mr. CALDWELL: Tuberculosis in cattle?

Mr. TOLMIE: Yes.

Mr. CALDWELL: Is it compulsory that the man must have his herd inspected?

Mr. TOLMIE: The application of the law, as far as tuberculosis is concerned, is compulsory in connection with the testing of herds supplying milk to any city where the city has applied to have the milk supply herd tested.

Mr. CALDWELL: And not otherwise.

Mr. TOLMIE: Under the accredited herd system, you have to apply to the government to have your pure-bred herd tested. It was found necessary for us to adopt the system, for the reason that one of the greatest markets for pure-bred cattle is across the line. In the United States they have adopted the accredited herd system, and quite naturally the owner of an accredited herd on the United States side would hesitate before coming over to the Canadian side and buying cattle that were not accredited here. That was why the system was adopted; and by that system we are able, through an arrangement, to ship our cattle from an accredited herd to them without any testing on the boundary line. Cattle are tested when furnishing milk to towns over 5,000 population when application is made by the municipality.

As regards fixing the compensation in the case of a pure-bred animal, the animal, unless it is a very scrubby one, carries its pedigree on its back, and there is no difficulty in fixing the value, because if it is worth anything at all, it is worth as much as the amount of the valuation allowed on it. The amount of compensation is established not to exceed the amounts mentioned by the minister. In the case of a calf not worth that amount, the value is fixed by the inspector. In the case of a dispute, there is not much difficulty. In rare cases of dispute, it is usual to send for the chief inspector, who is a man of wide experience, and who can handle the public pretty well, and a satisfactory arrangement is arrived at without any further difficulty.

The Health of Animals branch in Canada stands as high as the Inspection of Animals branch in any other country in the world. In fact, the Health of Animals branch in Canada stands in a class by itself. I am very glad to say that, at the present time, our herds in Canada are freer from contagious disease than the herds of any other country in the world, with the possible exception of Norway. The situation is most excellent.

During the budget debate, I gave some figures in connection with hog cholera showing what a splendid improvement had taken place. For instance, in 1915, we had no less than 34,779 head of hogs destroyed for hog cholera. In that year we adopted what are known as the garbage feeding regulations, making it necessary to sterilize or cook thoroughly all garbage fed to swine. The result has been a gradual reduction in the number of swine destroyed. In that particular year just under $200,000 was paid for compensation. That has been gradually reduced, until in the year ended 31st March, 1922, only 429 hogs were killed on account of hog cholera, and compensation of less than $4,000 was paid. In my address on the budget—I think the Minister of Agriculture was not present at the time—I urged that he take advantage of the present occasion to clean up the herds of Canada so as to render them entirely free from this particular disease. We succeeded in doing that in British Columbia, and for two years prior to the time that I fell from grace and entered politics, we did not have a single case of hog cholera in British Columbia.

Mr. WARD: As one who has had some experience in having cattle tested and who has also sustained a serious loss running into many thousands of dollars, I heartily agree with what the minister has said with reference to an appeal. I think it would be dangerous, to say the least, to introduce any appeal. My experience has been that the inspector's decision is usually a very fair one. I should like, however, to reply to the ex-Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Tolmie) in his reference to the value of a tubercular cow. I should like to draw the attention of the committee to a herd in northern Manitoba. Possibly the best herd of Shorthorn cattle in northern Manitoba was tested for tuberculosis last fall, and out of 41 head, 37 cattle reacted. Many of those cattle had been over a good part of Manitoba last year at the shows and had won many prizes; yet 37 of them went down under the test. Until those animals were tested they were just as valuable to the man who owned them as any other animals; in fact, one animal of that herd was sold for $800, subject to the test. Of course, the animal reacted, and the owner lost the sale of it.

As a breeder, I think a breeder who establishes and maintains a standard herd, is making the biggest sacrifice of any man who is in business in Canada, and he is not getting the encouragement that he should receive. I venture to say that there are not half a dozen men in western Canada who are raising pure-bred stock, who have not lost money every year for the last three years. Apart from the fact that such a man is losing money in endeavouring to build up a standard herd of cattle, there is the effect—I am not going into the details of that—that this has upon the human race. I would advocate that the compensation be left where it is, but that the matter be made more flexible. I agree with the minister when he says that owners of many herds in this country would be much better off if their herds were all slaughtered, if they got only $100 apiece; but those are not standard cattle; they are no better than grades. If a man is trying to build up a standard herd, he is not getting the compensation he should get, and if the compensation is reduced to $100 for a No. 1 animal, it simply means that the man who has a good herd will not risk having the herd tested. Some of the biggest breeders in the West have so far refused to have their herds tested because they claim that the loss might be too great. I personally would not risk having my herd tested. Those are matters that should have serious consideration.

Mr. LEADER: As one who has had experience also in this matter of testing cattle, it, perhaps, would be in order for me to give the House a few observations on this subject. I have some real interest in this work, and I have had some practical experience as to the operation of the accredited herd system. I do not say this in any egotistical spirit, but three weeks after the regulations came into force, my application was in Ottawa asking that I might come under this system. The system was inaugurated in September, 1919, and in October, my application was in. I do not know whether it was the first in Canada or not, but I know it was the first received from west of the Great Lakes. I am very proud of that. My practical experience goes through the whole system. I had my herd tested; I took my loss, and I operated under the system until finally last fall I received my certificate of accreditation. I am proud of that certificate. Not only does it give me the satisfaction of knowing that my herd is absolutely free from tuberculosis, but I have the additional satisfaction that my children and the members of my household are, so far as human science can determine, receiving pure and clean milk. I wish to congratulate the ex-Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Tolmie) who, during his regime, inaugurated and carried out these regulations, until the breeders of this country took it up with a desire and enthusiasm to clean up their herds. A great deal of credit is coming to the hon. member for Victoria City for the way in which he handled this matter. The inspectors under his charge gave great satisfaction, and the system is altogether working to the satisfaction of the breeders who really are the ones most concerned.

I wish to protest against the reduction of the indemnity paid for pure-bred cattle. I have received numerous letters and telegrams and I know if I stay here long enough I shall be besieged by sheaves of letters and telegrams in regard to this matter. Breeders are just waking up to the fact that there is going to be a reduction in the indemnity. I would just read this telegram that I received from C. W. McMillan, president of the Manitoba Shorthorn Club:

HARRY LEADER, M.P.
Ottawa, Ont.

I understand that the Government intends reducing the valuation of pure bred cattle destroyed under the accredited herd system from $250 to $150 and grades from $80 to $40. If this is so, I want to protest on behalf of the Manitoba Shorthorn Club and the cattle breeders in general as this would have a tendency to discourage rather than stimulate the cattle breeding industry of this province. I am writing you fully to-day.

Manitoba Shorthorn Club,
C. W. McMILLAN,
President.

I believe also that this will have a tendency to curtail the work. We have spent considerable money, but not sufficient. Of $1,500,000 spent last year 50 per cent was paid to the inspectors and less than $500,000 to the owners of reacting cattle. Now is the time to begin a vigorous campaign against this disease. If I might be allowed to do so, I might mention my own case. When I decided to bring my herd under the accredited system I had one reactor in seventeen. The loss was not great, and the Government did not have to pay me much by way of compensation. To-day I have over 40 head and they are all absolutely free from the disease. We should begin right away to combat the ravages of tuberculosis, but if we go after the disease in any half-hearted manner and loaf on the job we shall certainly make no headway. I would urge upon the Government that we institute an aggressive campaign in this matter. No big victory was ever won in France as a result of passive defence; it took active aggression; and we must have an aggressive campaign if we are to conquer this disease. I have a report from the Veterinary General, Dr. Torrance, which shows that in 1904-5 there was paid for glandered horses $147,851, as against some $6,070, in 1920-21. In 1904-5 there were slaughtered 2,113 horses, and in 1920-21, fifty-nine. Now that concise comparison proves conclusively that an aggressive campaign will accomplish whatever you set out to do. Dr. Torrance, speaking at a meeting in Toronto last summer, said:

Our control work is having a marked effect in stimulating interest in tuberculosis in general;

This is in regard to cattle.

We may expect the movement to grow until tuberculosis is as rare a disease among cattle as glanders now is in horses.

I protest against the reduction in the indemnifications for cattle. One is astounded when he considers the losses that are sustained, economically and materially, from tuberculosis. But what about the effect of the disease on human beings? The statistics show that one child, in every three under the age of ten who have tuberculosis, contracted the disease through a bovine origin. Whether or not this is true, it is generally agreed by all doctors that tuberculosis is communicable to man from animals, and if we could save the life of one child our efforts would be fully warranted. I think we should do everything within our power to eradicate the terrible scourge of the white plague from the human race.

Mr. DENIS (Joliette): I agree with what has been said by my hon. friend (Mr. Leader) and I have a question to ask the minister. What steps are being taken to protect the public who buy milk that comes from uninspected herds? The former Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Tolmie) said a minute ago that there were some municipal regulations, but that is no protection at all. Is the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell) going to wait for the municipalities to pass by-laws and see that they are observed, and so on? I think it is incumbent upon the minister to see to it that all herds that are kept for the purpose of supplying milk to the public should be thoroughly inspected, and if they are affected by disease they should be slaughtered according to law. I should like to know what steps are being taken to safeguard the public against the man who offers for sale milk that has been obtained from herds that have not been inspected.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Reforms of this nature have usually to be introduced gradually and, at the beginning, voluntarily. After a certain progress has been made through voluntary action and co-operation, then probably the time will come for compulsory action. But my hon. friend (Mr. Denis) will probably be surprised to learn that even the provision with respect to cities was on the statute books for several years before advantage was taken of it, even voluntarily. The public sentiment must be aroused, and during the last three or four years this sentiment has grown to a wonderful extent compared with what it was seven or eight years ago, when the act was first passed. I do not remember the exact year the act was put through, but it must have been about eight years ago. It provided that cities of 5,000 and over might take action, pass a certain by-law, and get the health inspectors to take the necessary steps with regard to cattle that supplied milk to the particular municipality. And it took a distressingly long time before all that procedure was taken advantage of. Now, however, we have reached the stage where neither men nor funds are sufficient to keep up with the work. I do not know when the time will come when the Government can issue its fiat to all and sundry to have all their animals examined, irrespective of whether the municipality in which the milk is sold has passed by-laws or not. Compulsory action of that kind must depend on the state of public sentiment, and whether that sentiment is strong enough to warrant such action I do not know. I have no doubt the time will come, but as a matter of fact nearly all reforms are introduced first by the voluntary method. When half or two-thirds of the people have endorsed any particular policy the Government can then say to the rest of the country: "The majority of the people are desirous that this policy shall be adopted and therefore it is in the interests of the whole country that it shall be made general."

Mr. DENIS (Joliette): I submit that the people do want this inspection now. They want to be protected. I have a concrete case to submit to the minister. No longer than a week or two ago a veterinary surgeon told me that he had been called by a man who owned a herd of cows from which he sold milk to the public. One of the cows was sick and he gave it a cursory examination. From what he could detect, he thought it had tuberculosis. He wanted to submit it to the test but the owner would not consent because he was afraid that if the veterinary surgeon discovered that it was affected with tuberculosis the whole herd might be slaughtered and the man would suffer a heavy loss. This is a serious matter and it was my intention to visit the minister at his office and ask him the question I have just put to him. Is it not time that the Government should see to it that all owners of cattle who sell milk to the public should have their herds inspected? There is nothing that compels this man, to whom I have referred, to have his cows inspected. His cows may be tuberculous and yet he is allowed to continue selling milk to the public. This should not be done.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I do not know whether the hon. gentleman was in the Chamber the other evening when I spoke on the budget, but I outlined what I thought should be the object of the Department of Agriculture in the way of development during the next few years. Among the various things I mentioned I referred to the extension of the accredited herd system. I suggested the acquirement of certain blocks of territory in three or four municipalities where we might have herds kept, cleaning up those areas entirely before starting on others. I instanced two particular cases where this might be tried to advantage because of the natural boundaries of the territories. These were Prince Edward Island on the east and Vancouver island on the west. In these two places the system might be tried with splendid results. We have an application from the province of Manitoba, where a certain number of municipalities have already petitioned that we adopt this plan. But if we adopt the plan I will have to come back here and ask for an estimate of about a million and a half dollars. If you are prepared to provide that money, I am prepared to spend it, but you cannot do things like that and still keep on objecting about sales taxes and the other taxes.

Mr. LEADER: Does the minister not think that it would be a good plan and in the interests of this nation if we took about $1,000,000 off the military estimates and spent that amount on the eradication of tuberculosis? An hon. member on the other side wonders if this is compulsory or voluntary. Of course, it is not compulsory yet, but I think it should be. The attitude of the public toward this disease is deplorable. As an indication of the extent to which the disease prevails, I quote the following from a statement by Dr. Schaffner, president of the Anti-Tuberculosis League of Canada, made in Toronto last summer:

> I repeat further a sentence from my address of last year. Devastating war took a heavy toll from our young manhood. 1914 to 1918 about 40,000 Canadian soldiers were killed in action.

I assume he did not take into account the ones who died of wounds or disease.

> During the same period 43,000 died of tuberculosis in Canada.

While 40,000 soldiers were killed in France and Flanders, 43,000 died at home of tuberculosis, and the nation thought nothing of it. The death rate from this cause in Canada is about 10,000 a year. I repeat that we should take off a few million dollars from the militia estimates and spend the money in the eradication of this dread disease.

Mr. TOLMIE: We all recognize the great importance of any work having in view the eradication of tuberculosis, but I would point out the necessity for great caution in moving along these lines. An attempt was made to eradicate this disease in the state of New York, but it was finally abandoned. Similar efforts were made in Massachusetts and in Illinois. It was estimated in Minnesota some years ago that in that state alone it would cost $35,000,000 to make a real start in the eradication of tuberculosis. The work that has been commenced here should be carried on. We have started properly by creating centres which are free from tuberculosis. In British Columbia this work has been carried on perhaps longer than in any other part of Canada. We found there that in districts where people opposed the testing of their herds, as soon as some of the prominent breeders had their herds cleaned up the others would fall in line, and now whole districts are as free from the disease as it has been possible to make them under present conditions. Nobody is more enthusiastic than I am about the desirability of cleaning up the herds of Canada, but I would like to point out the necessity for moving very cautiously.

Mr. WALLACE: Would the minister feel like venturing an opinion as to what percentage of cattle in Canada have been found to be affected by tuberculosis?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I think in the case of hogs it ran to about 17 per cent. I am not sure what the figure would be for cattle; I think it is about the same.

Mr. TOLMIE: For the year ending March 31, 1922, some 700,000 head of cattle passed through our inspected abattoirs; the affected animals amounted to about 5.6 per cent. In the same period, in the case of about 1,750,000 hogs, the average was about 22 per cent.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: At that rate it is really increasing.

Mr. TOLMIE: In the case of hogs the proportion increased from 9 per cent in 1910 to 22 per cent at the present time, and in the case of cattle from about 2.3 per cent to about 5.6 per cent.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I know that the last figures I had, about two years ago, indicated a percentage of about 17. With regard to the caution of the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. Tolmie), I may say that we are not going to go into the work too extensively, for the very good reason that we have not sufficient money to be extravagant. If we could adopt the suggestion of the hon. member for Portage la Prairie (Mr. Leader) possibly things would loosen up. But the militia estimates were pretty well cut down, if I remember rightly; possibly we could take a chunk out of the Welland canal. However, as I am not familiar with the utility of that waterway, possibly I should not make that suggestion. I will read a sentence or two from my remarks on the budget:

> For the last year or two we have been spending annually half a million dollars in connection with the extermination of tuberculosis amongst our cattle. We are doing this for two purposes. I think, in the hearts of many of us, it is primarily for taking care of the youth of Canada.

So we are not entirely oblivious to the necessity of extending this work. The question is, first, what is the proper direction in which to extend it; second, how much are the people of Canada prepared to spend on it; third, how much do the farmers want by way of indemnity? The more you give per animal the less herds you will clean up for a given amount of money. That is the whole thing in a nutshell.

Mr. THOMPSON: When this question was discussed on a previous occasion I inquired whether the regulations with regard to inspection of milk applied to villages, and I was told that it applied only to milk sent to towns and cities. In view of the argument made by the hon. member for Portage la Prairie, I think that this matter should be considered. In many cases the milk is supplied to villages under exactly the same conditions as it is furnished to towns and cities. I would recommend that the regulations be amended so that they will apply to villages as well.

Mr. MILLAR: Is there any information available to show the extent, if any, to which bovine tuberculosis may be communicated to human beings through the medium of butter and cheese? There are many supplying butter in towns and villages who do not supply milk.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: It is thought to be communicable more largely by the medium of milk to children under five years of age than to adults. The danger has been modified by the pasteurization of cream, resulting in the production of butter which will keep better and stand exposure better than butter made from unpasteurized cream. But butter made from pasteurized cream is not, I think, absolutely free from power to communicate the disease.

I read an article recently to the effect that they are beginning to pasteurize milk for cheesemaking also. It is some forty years since I had anything to do with cheesemaking, but perhaps the hon. member for Qu'Appelle would know about that. At all events, there is very serious danger of communicating the disease not only through the cheese but through the whey, unless you pasteurize, and that is why the Dairy Standards Act of Ontario was passed to provide, not only for the buying of milk on grade, but for the pasteurization of whey in cheese factories. So from the fact that they are pasteurizing the whey, I would judge that they are not pasteurizing the milk, although I think they are talking about doing it.

Mr. LOVIE: Has the department taken any steps towards co-operating with the deputation that came down here from Carman, Manitoba, representing the three municipalities of Dufferin, Roland and Thompson, represented by Doctor J. H. Munn and Mr. Evans, Deputy Minister of Agriculture in the province of Manitoba? The farmers in those three municipalities want to clean up their herds. Has anything been done in the matter?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: A deputation did come down here about two or three weeks ago. I do not know whether I ought to divulge the extent of our negotiations, but I may say that it was partly as a result of that delegation coming down here that we have thought it wise to take up this additional work. The matter had been under consideration, but here was a deputation representing three municipalities, which came voluntarily to us and took the ground that the people there were practically a unit in desiring to have those municipalities cleaned up.

Mr. LOVIE: There are a lot of grade herds there as well as pure-bred, which they want cleaned up. I understand that Doctor Munn considered the compensation too high.

Mr. TOLMIE: With regard to butter communicating tuberculosis, I have no figures here in connection with children, but I do know of the experiments that have been carried on in the United States showing that tuberculosis is communicated to swine. There is another very striking thing. In those dairy districts where by-products are fed to swine, we find at the abattoirs that ten per cent more hogs are infected with tuberculosis than in the case of hogs coming from grain districts where no dairy products are fed. At the same time the percentage of infected cattle coming from these districts is just about the same, showing that it is the consumption of dairy by-products that communicates the disease.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I promised that we would leave the bill in committee. I notice there has been no change suggested in compensation by anybody.

Mr. LEADER: I beg the hon. gentleman's pardon.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Well, we will sleep over it. I am prepared to consider raising the compensation for pure bred cattle to a certain extent. It may be the figure is too small, but I am a little afraid of the consequences of raising it. However, there is no harm in trying it. We will sleep over it.

Progress reported.

SALE AND INSPECTION OF ROOT VEGETABLES

On motion of Hon. W. R. Motherwell (Minister of Agriculture) the House went into committee to consider the following proposed resolution, Mr. Gordon in the Chair:

Resolved, That it is expedient to bring in a measure to regulate the Sale and Inspection of Root Vegetables and to provide:—

1. For the marking and grading of potatoes when offered for sale in bags or barrels or in bulk, and to define the grades and quality to be prescribed; but the provisions of the proposed legislation shall not apply to new potatoes when shipped between 1st June and 15th September inclusive, nor to potatoes imported into Canada, nor to seed potatoes, nor when compliance would prevent the sale or exportation of potatoes to any foreign market.

2. That no person shall sell or offer for sale any potatoes in any package in which the faced or shown surface gives a false representation of the contents of such package, that is when more than ten per centum of such potatoes are substantially smaller in size than, or inferior in grade to the faced or shown surface; and no person shall sell or offer for sale any potatoes so diseased or otherwise depreciated as to render them unfit for consumption.

3. That whenever any potatoes in any package are found so packed that the face or shown surface gives a false representation of the contents of the package, any inspector may confiscate such package which may be destroyed or otherwise disposed of as the minister may direct; and whenever any potatoes in any package are found to be falsely marked, the said inspector may mark the same "below grade" or efface such false marks and place the proper grade marks thereon; and the inspector shall give notice to the packer within twenty-four hours, of his action in regard thereto.

4. That all potato barrels manufactured in Canada for sale in Canada, and all barrels containing potatoes for sale in Canada, shall contain as nearly as praticable seven thousand and fifty-six cubic inches; and the Governor in Council may make regulations as to quality, form and dimensions of containers, and penalties for violation of the regulations.

5. That no person shall sell, or offer, expose or have in his possession for sale, potatoes packed in a barrel, for sale by the barrel, unless such barrel is well and properly filled.

6. That inspectors may enter upon any premises to make examination of any potatoes suspected of being marked or packed in violation of these provisions, and may detain any shipment of potatoes for examination, in respect of which he has reasonable grounds, for believing there is a violation of these provisions, upon giving notice thereof to the owner.

7. That provision be made for the marking, grading and inspection of onions, offered for sale by the bag, crate, or package; excepting what are commonly termed "green onions," and not applying to onions imported into Canada, nor when compliance would prevent the sale or exportation of onions to any foreign market.

8. That similar provisions as to false representation, and as to diseased or otherwise depreciated onions, and as to seizure, confiscation and examination of onions, be enacted as proposed in the case of potatoes.

9. That all potatoes, onions, artichokes, beets, carrots, parsnips and turnips offered for sale, shall be sold by the unit one standard pound avoirdupois: Provided that when any of the foregoing vegetables are offered for sale with the top leaves attached, commonly termed by the trade "green vegetables," this provision shall not apply.

10. That penalties be enacted for violation of the proposed legislation and for the procedure to be adopted in prosecutions therefor.

Mr. FIELDING: This whole matter will come up on the committee stage of the bill, and if there is no objection, it would facilitate the business of the House if we took the present stage to-night. Every opportunity will be afforded for discussion at the committee stage.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: We brought down a bill for this purpose last year, as a result of the large number of petitions received from various parts of the Dominion that provision be made for the grading of potatoes, onions, and such like. It is in accordance with the general tendency of the times to grade all produce. I know there are some who think we are going too far in the matter of grading, but I do not see how you can get a basis for dealing intelligently unless you have an established grade. Up to the present time we have been selling potatoes without a grade. Suppose a man in Edmonton sends a carload of potatoes to Montreal, and the price drops and the dealer refuses to take them; what is your basis of settlement? Without a grade there is no basis.

[Mr. Motherwell.]

I might just add to what the Minister of Finance has said that the law provides that any bill involving either money or the regulation of trade must be preceded by a resolution, and as this matter deals with the regulation of root vegetables we have had to proceed by way of resolution. The whole subject will be open for discussion when we reach the committee stage, and if there is no objection it will facilitate business if we could get the resolution through to-night.

Mr. CALDWELL: Are all the points that will be covered by the bill embodied in this resolution?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Yes.

Mr. CALDWELL: If that is the case, I really think we had better proceed with the discussion now. I do not wish to insist on that, but I think that a bill framed on this resolution would be totally inadequate to meet the situation.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Well let us have the discussion.

Mr. CALDWELL: In fact I do not see any grades established in this resolution.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: The grades are mentioned in the bill.

Mr. CALDWELL: Section 2 provides:

That no person shall sell or offer for sale any potatoes in any package in which the faced or shown surface gives a false representation of the contents of such package, that is when more than ten per centum of such potatoes are substantially smaller in size than, or inferior in grade to the faced or shown surface; and no person shall sell or offer for sale any potatoes so diseased or otherwise depreciated as to render them unfit for consumption.

This provision applies when more than ten per cent of such potatoes are substantially smaller in size or inferior in grade to the faced or shown surface. According to this bill the size is an indication of quality; evidently the larger they are the better the quality. Because the section states that if they are 10 per cent smaller in size than the face shows they are not up to grade. Last fall in the province of New Brunswick, in certain fields, the potatoes grew so large that the market would not take the large ones although they were sound and nice looking tubers. I know of one grower of potatoes who had as high as four barrels culled out of a load of sixteen barrels all over size, and he had to take them back because the market would not accept them. Yet according to this bill those big potatoes would be the standard for quality—potatoes that our market would not take at all. It is a good thing for the Government to act in this matter and I am pleased that it is moving in this direction. I think, however, that in a proper grading act we should set up some standard for each grade. For instance, in our province we have graders with a wire mesh by means of which we grade potatoes in three different sizes. Any potato that will not go through a mesh of 1¾ or 1⅞ inches—I am not absolutely sure of the size—grades as No. 1 provided it is sound, free from blemish and so on. What goes through a 1¾ inch mesh but will not go through a 1½ inch mesh grades as No. 2, and what goes through a 1½ inch mesh grades as No. 3. But in this resolution there is no definition of grade. As to size the resolution indicates that the bigger the potatoes the better the quality, which is not the fact. Another objection I see to it is this—

Mr. MOTHERWELL: The bill itself makes that provision?

Mr. CALDWELL: I asked the question if the resolution contained all the provisions that would be embodied in the bill and the minister said "yes".

Mr. MOTHERWELL: The resolution contains all the principles but not the details. The bill itself is quite extensive. The main principles of the bill with regard to the regulation of trade, are incorporated in the resolution, but the bill itself is more detailed, and that is inevitable.

Mr. CALDWELL: Just one other point I would like to mention in connection with this matter, and I will not detain the House very long. Can the minister tell me if it is proposed to make the grades conform to the grades in the United States?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I think the grade is one inch and three-quarters but I am not sure about that.

Mr. CALDWELL: I suppose I might as well cease the discussion now until I have a copy of the bill and have had a chance to look it over because it is an important matter and one in which I am interested, and I know something of the necessity for grading. I would also like to impress on the minister that I think it is absolutely necessary that any vegetable grading, especially for potatoes, should conform very closely if not absolutely to the grades in the United States, because I think the time is not far distant when we shall market our potatoes in that country again.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: The barrel will be the same size as the apple barrel.

Mr. CALDWELL: I think you are absolutely unsound in prescribing the size of the barrel. In New Brunswick we haul potatoes to the local shipper in barrels. This bill would penalize a farmer for hauling his potatoes to market in barrels which were not of the regulation size. In New Brunswick we do not buy any potato barrels, but we buy our fertilizer in barrels, and those barrels are of various sizes. This bill would compel the farmer to throw away hundreds of barrels which he has at the present time, and which he uses for hauling his potatoes to the market. We sell potatoes by the barrel because barrels are convenient to handle and haul, and lift on to the cars, and so on. I do not wish to discuss this matter at any length. I hope I shall be able to attend the meetings of the committee when it sits, although I have two or three other committees to attend that are sitting at the present time.

There is another provision I wish to draw attention to, contained in Section 3. That section reads as follows:

> That whenever any potatoes in any package are found so packed that the face or shown surface gives a false representation of the contents of the package, any inspector may confiscate such package which may be destroyed or otherwise disposed of as the minister may direct; and whenever any potatoes in any package are found to be falsely marked, the said inspector may mark the same "below grade" or efface such false marks and place the proper grade marks thereon; and the inspector shall give notice to the packer within twenty-four hours, of his action in regard thereto.

Now this resolution, and I presume the bill to be founded on it will follow it very closely, provides that if ten per cent of the potatoes in the package, below the surface, are under that surface size then the inspector may confiscate and destroy that package. It might well happen that on the surface of that package there would be these large potatoes that I have spoken of and that the market does not desire at all. The rest of the package may be of a smaller size than those on the surface and still be of better value. Yet with respect to that package of potatoes—it may even be a carload—the inspector is given absolute authority to confiscate and destroy it. I have no objection to the confiscation and destruction of potatoes that are unfit for food; but here the result may be the destruction of potatoes of good quality and grade. I am offering these suggestions to the minister so that in framing the bill he may overcome some of the objections enumerated. I do not believe in giving authority to any inspector to confiscate and destroy another man's property unless it would be unsafe to put that man's goods on the market as food.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: The provision does look a little severe but there has been so much humbugging in regard to the packing of potatoes and apples that some action was called for. I am sure my hon. friends from the prairies who have bought apples in barrels have often discovered the fact that the apples on the top were very much superior to those lower down. I am not familiar with the practice of selling potatoes in barrels; but in this case it is not so much a question of big potatoes as it is a question of their quality. There may be nice potatoes on the top of the barrel and smaller potatoes in the bottom. You can plug a barrel of potatoes in the same manner as you can plug a barrel of apples. In regard to the matter of confiscation, unless you have a provision with teeth in it, it will not bite, that is all there is to it. I am a little bit familiar with provincial laws with regard to this matter. It looks a little severe, but, in the working out of it, there is no injustice. I might call attention to the act regarding fruit marks and fruit packages. One does not require a long memory to recall the day when there was no Fruit Marking Act. It was simply scandalous, and it can be improved a lot yet. However, it has been substantially improved since the following clause was inserted in the act.

> All packages of fruit not branded or marked in accordance with such regulations shall be forfeited to His Majesty, and may be destroyed or otherwise disposed of as the minister may direct.

That is pretty hard. The act was amended in 1907, 1908, 1912 and 1913; so that that provision has been there since 1913. There have been only two prosecutions under that clause, and they were such flagrant violations of the law that I asked Mr. Baxter, the fruit commissioner who recently left us, in regard to them. He told me there were two prosecutions, and that both had a very salutary effect.

Without the law, he could not have had the prosecutions. I do not think any inspector with any common sense—and if he has no common sense, he will not be in the position long—is going to worry the life out of people by prosecutions, unless he has substantial reasons. If he exercises his power indiscreetly, we will get rid of him. These prosecutions will have a salutary effect. We already have this power in regard to apples, and we are now adopting it in regard to potatoes. Can hon. gentlemen see any more danger in the provision in regard to potatoes than there would be in regard to apples? All law must be administered with a reasonable amount of common sense, sound judgment and discretion. If a man tried to make trouble, of course, he could make all kinds of trouble. With regard to the size of the barrels, anybody who has ever sold potatoes in any kind of packages, knows that they vary in weight just as wheat varies, but to say that the package shall hold so many pounds of potatoes—

Mr. CALDWELL: That is done already.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Is that the American law, do you know?

Mr. CALDWELL: Yes, and the Canadian law.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I will take that up with my staff. I can imagine that, with some kinds of potatoes, you would not be able to get the required weight in the package. We are trying to sell by weight, and it is thought this barrel will hold, with any reasonable kind of potato, the required amount. With regard to section two, it will be noticed that it provides for certain exemptions. Certain kinds of early potatoes come here before our own potatoes are ready for use. They are undersized potatoes, only partly matured. These would not qualify under the act, and are allowed to come in without being graded. There are certain other grades allowed to come in without being graded, because you cannot test them with the eye. You must have a test for fungus development in those potatoes, to see that there is no fungus disease, but not a chemical test. There are a number of exemptions of that nature. But I will not take up the question of the barrel now, because I do not feel any too sure about it. I frankly admit I do not know anything about it, but if we are going to designate it either by pounds or cubic inches, I rather think cubic inches is the preferable method.

Mr. CALDWELL: Originally a barrel of potatoes in Canada contained 185 pounds. I think in 1918 it was changed to 165 pounds, to make it conform to the American barrel. We were shipping to that market. I think it is unwise to change the weight because the United States has not changed the weight of the barrel. I very strongly urge the minister to leave the barrel at 165 pounds

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I will consider that.

Mr. CALDWELL: I would like to deal with the clause saying that it shall not apply to potatoes imported into Canada. I think it is making a regulation with teeth in it, that will bite the potato grower in Canada, and does not propose to bite the fellow who competes with him. Very recently, some potato shippers waited on the minister to see if something could not be done to eliminate the competition of the early potatoes from the United States, that we might be able to market the very large surplus in eastern Canada at the present time, which will be dumped over the hillside, to get rid of them, because the new potatoes will take their place. I think potatoes coming in competition with our own product should be subject to the same regulation as our own potatoes and I hope, by the regulation, that you will not bite any one. I will not detain the House now, but I wish to give notice of my contention in regard to this matter.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Motherwell thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 133, to regulate the sale and inspection of root vegetables.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

On motion of Mr. McKenzie, the House adjourned at 11.40 p.m.

Saturday, June 10, 1922.

The House met at three o'clock.

SUPPLY

RAILWAYS AND CANALS

The House in Committee of Supply, Mr. Gordon in the Chair.

Railways and Canals—Welland Ship Canal—construction, $8,000,000.

Mr. STEWART (Lanark): Will the minister state how the $5,000,000 appropriation for this item stood at the end of the fiscal year?

Mr. KENNEDY (Essex): That appropriation was all used up last year, and in addition there was expended $435,000 under a supplementary estimate.

Mr. STEWART (Lanark): With reference to the increase in the appropriation for this year, perhaps the minister would tell the committee what work is proposed to be done.

Mr. KENNEDY (Essex): The details in connection with the proposed expenditure of $8,000,000 are as follows: Sections 1 and 2, $2,000,000; sections 3 and 4, $2,700,000; section 5, $800,000; gravel, $40,000; sand, $200,000; cement, $1,000,000; metal work for locks, $330,000; timber, lock 1, $35,000; bridge superstructure, $250,000; moving superstructure, Grand Trunk bridge No. 11, $25,000; land expropriated not paid for, $110,000; engineering staff, $410,000; construction railway staff, $100,000; making a total of $8,000,000.

Mr. STEWART (Lanark): Would the minister inform the committee how the work is being carried on, whether on straight contract or cost-plus basis?

Mr. KENNEDY (Essex): Sections 1, 2 and 5 are being carried on under straight contract. On sections 3 and 4 the work was on a cost-plus basis. We have asked for tenders, and they are now in, and will be considered within the next day or two.

Mr. STEWART (Lanark): What new contracts have been entered into this year in connection with this work?

Mr. KENNEDY (Essex): No new contracts.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): Can the minister give the committee some information about any new scale of rents that the department is charging for water-power in connection with our canals? I believe that the new plant near Peterborough is coming into operation. What does the Government propose to charge the Hydro-Electric for that service?

Mr. KENNEDY (Essex): That matter is under consideration and has not been determined.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): What does the Dominion Power Company, of Hamilton, pay for the power rights it has on the old Welland canal?

Mr. KENNEDY (Essex): I am afraid I cannot give that information offhand, but I shall be glad to give it to my hon. friend at an early date.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): Also the information on the other point.

Mr. KENNEDY (Essex): I shall be delighted.

Mr. McCONICA: Will the minister tell us something of the present status of the work,—what new construction is ahead, how far this appropriation will go towards completing the work, and what the condition of the canal will be when the work is completed? I have been told that the channel both above and below the canal is such that when this work is completed the canal will be able to accommodate no larger boats than are now using the old canal; in other words, that this new construction will add comparatively little to the navigability of that water route.

Mr. KENNEDY (Essex): The original estimate of the cost of the whole canal was $50,000,000. Contracts for sections 1, 2, 3 and 5 were let in 1913, at an estimated value of $20,350,000. When the contracts were abandoned under agreement early in 1918, the total expenditure on the work to the end of 1918, including the purchase of plant, material and stores from contractors was $16,069,000. Work was resumed under cost-plus agreements in January, 1919, and total expenditure to March 31, 1921, was $25,340,000. Early in 1921, Section 5 was put under contract; later in the same year, Sections 1 and 2 were combined and re-let; and at present Sections 3 and 4 are about to be placed under contract. The estimated value of a schedule-rate contract for completion of Sections 3 and 4 combined is $16,500,000, which includes $2,000,000 for plant and stores which the successful tenderer will have to take over. The estimated amount yet required to fully complete the canal from Lake Erie to Lake Ontario is $55,000,000.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): Will the minister say what will be the position of the completed Welland canal in relation to the proposed further improved waterways system in order to allow the passage of seagoing vessels to the ports of the upper lakes?

Mr. KENNEDY (Essex): When this canal is completed, I understand, there will be a depth of 25 feet available for vessels, as against 14 feet in the old canal. There will be that additional draught which will mean increased tonnage.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): Could that depth of 25 feet be extended to say 30 feet without entailing any very great additional expense, or without interfering with navigation?

Mr. KENNEDY (Essex): I understand that could be done without interfering with navigation, and that all the locks are being built with an extension to a depth of 30 feet in view.

Mr. McCONICA: Do I understand that when this work is completed it will be possible for vessels of 25 feet draught to enter from either end of these canals? Will the lock depths and the depth of the route up through the Detroit river be sufficient to accommodate vessels of that draught?

Mr. KENNEDY (Essex): As I understand, at low water on the Limekiln crossing on the Detroit river there is a depth of 21 feet. Of course this canal will not be finished for some years, and by that time there may be considerable difference in the depth available for vessels passing up and down the lakes.

Mr. BRISTOL: I understand the minister to say that the estimated cost of completing the canal is $55,000,000? What amount has been spent already?

Mr. KENNEDY (Essex): Approximately $30,000,000. Fifty-five million dollars was the estimated cost when the work started.

Mr. BRISTOL: And that is the estimated cost now for completing it?

Mr. KENNEDY (Essex): Yes.

Mr. BRISTOL: In what period of time, assuming that normal conditions prevail, do you expect to complete the work?

Mr. KENNEDY (Essex): We expect to have these five sections completed in 1927.

Mr. BRISTOL: Would that be the whole canal?

Mr. KENNEDY (Essex): There are nine sections altogether. The date of completion depends absolutely upon how much money there will be available and how readily we can obtain it.

Mr. BRISTOL: Unless the conditions are favourable it will not be completed in 1927?

Mr. MACLEAN (York): Does the Government intend to avail itself of the co-operation of the United States?

Mr. BRISTOL: Will there be any benefit to navigation from the expenditure already made until the canal is actually completed?

Mr. KENNEDY (Essex): The depth for boats of the draught in use to-day is 14 feet, but they will have only seven locks instead of twenty-four as at present.

Mr. BRISTOL: What I am asking the minister is this: Presuming we spend the $55,000,000 in addition to moneys already spent, estimated to complete the work at present under construction will it benefit navigation?

Mr. KENNEDY (Essex): Yes.

Mr. BRISTOL: In what way?

Mr. KENNEDY (Essex): The sum of $55,000,000, it is estimated, will complete the whole canal.

Mr. BRISTOL: By 1927?

Mr. KENNEDY (Essex): If the money was available in all probability it would.

Mr. MARTELL: In view of the present financial condition of the country could we not get along very well without doing any more work upon this canal? I may say that in the town of Windsor, in the county of Hants, the country owned certain wharves, but in 1914 the government leased them to the Canadian Pacific Railway, and to-day the small lumbermen are paying 75 cents a thousand for shipping lumber over those wharves. If the minister is going to spend some eight or nine millions of the people's money at the present time on canals, I think he should at least take those wharves back from the Canadian Pacific and give the people of the county of Hants their wharfage for nothing, and remove that handicap from the lumber industry.

Mr. McCONICA: I would like to ask the minister this question: When this canal is completed, if there is no further work to be done on the St. Lawrence farther down the river, would it be possible for vessels of 25 feet draught to get into lake Ontario?

Mr. KENNEDY (Essex): When this canal is completed the largest vessel that is now on the lakes will be able to go as far as Port Colborne, and then on to Kingston and Prescott.

Mr. McCONICA: If we were to stop construction at the present time, except in regard to existing contracts, how much of this estimated expenditure could be dispensed with until we have more money in our treasury?

Mr. KENNEDY (Essex): That is rather a difficult question to answer. When we took up the question of the estimates for this year we went very thoroughly into the matter with a view of seeing whether it was possible to curtail the expenditure in view of the financial condition of the country. But in the case of at least three contracts we found that the material was on hand and that it would depreciate, and the expenditure of some $20,000,000 would be jeopardized. We therefore thought, after giving the matter every consideration, that the best thing to do would be to carry on as economically as we could in the meantime.

Mr. LEWIS: What proportion of the work on the canal has been completed?

Mr. KENNEDY (Essex): My recollection of the figures formerly given, and I think they are correct, is that about 33 per cent is finished at the present time.

Mr. LEWIS: And the expenditure has been in the neighbourhood of $25,000,000 so far.

Mr. KENNEDY (Essex): Thirty millions.

Mr. LEWIS: At that rate the total expenditure would be approximately $90,000,000, whereas the minister told us a few minutes ago that the total cost would only be $55,000,000.

Mr. KENNEDY (Essex): Well, the cost of the plant is included in that $30,000,000.

Mr. LEWIS: I presume the cost of the plant would be $4,000,000. Excluding that, the total amount would be in the neighbourhood of $75,000,000. And it must be remembered that since the canal has been started contracts have been let time and again at an advanced price.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): I wish to say I am thoroughly in accord with the plans of the Government in going on with the deepening of the Welland canal; I think it is in the interest of the transportation service of this country. It is absolutely in harmony with our projects for improving the transportation systems of Canada, and lowering freight charges. All I regret is that the Government has not pushed its proposals more vigorously. I know there are financial reasons, perhaps, for not proceeding, but the sooner that work is done the better for the country and the sooner the Government decides to accept the offer of the United States the better. The United States have, for the first time, made an offer to co-operate with Canada in the direction of deep waterways that will allow the passage of seagoing vessels to the upper ports of lake Superior, to the great benefit of western Canada especially, which will give us a real competition in the matter of transportation charges of wheat and things of that kind.

Mr. MARTELL: What about the railways?

Mr. MACLEAN (York): My hon. friend is very sore about the railways. Let him go to the committee of this House considering freight rates at the present time, if he wants some information, and he will get some surprising information. But the point I wish to make—and I say it on behalf of the commercial interests of Canada, and the agricultural interests of the West, especially—that you do not often get a proposal made of this character by the neighbouring country, with the money it has at its disposal. It would probably be an easy thing to make a joint arrangement, as between Canada and the United States, for the early completion of the deep waterways from the St. Lawrence right up to the upper ports of lake Superior.

Mr. KNOX: I would like to ask the minister if the argument submitted in favour of continuing the work would not apply equally as strongly to some other projects? I have in mind the completion of the Hudson Bay railway.

Mr. KENNEDY (Essex): We might discuss that later in the afternoon.

Mr. STEWART (Lanark). With reference to the question of unemployment which has just been raised, I would like to make it perfectly clear that, so far as the continuation of this work is concerned, there is no question in this section of the House. But I desire to draw the attention of the House to the fact that in the contracts, as I understand them, that still exist in connection with this work, there is a provision that the work could be discontinued. I would like to have the minister give us a statement as to that—that is that the continuation of the work is a matter within the discretion of the Government and of the House.

Mr. KENNEDY (Essex): I understand that is correct. If the Government does not vote the amount, the contract will be suspended.

Mr. MEIGHEN: In view of the unemployment situation, perhaps never more severe than now, probably, the minister will consider it very unwise to take such a step.

Mr. CRERAR: I want to get a little information from the minister as to what real value the Welland Canal will be in the haulage of grain until the deepening of the St. Lawrence is carried out, and the work has been advanced so that it will enable the grain to be carried in large lake freights eastward as far as Kingston and Prescott. I cannot see that that will be of any very great advantage as reducing the transportation cost of grain. As a matter of fact, there are boats of comparatively small draught now that run from Fort William to Montreal, and the carriage of grain in large vessels down to Kingston will not prevent them from using the smaller boats for the whole distance. I believe that essentially the Welland canal project is a sound one, but it should certainly never have been undertaken until the whole scheme could be carried out, and these 20 and 25-foot vessels provided to carry the grain right through from Fort William to Montreal. I was opposed to the grant a year ago, and I see no reason for changing my position now. I quite realize that it might be a very costly thing to leave work, upon which twenty five or thirty millions have been spent and not carry it through. In other words, when you get a job half done it may be more expensive to leave it in that condition than to complete it. I would like to have some information from the minister upon that point. I wish to say that the results that will come from the completion of the Welland canal in itself, as far as moving grain from Fort William eastward is concerned, will be very small indeed.

Mr. BRISTOL: I may, perhaps, give the hon. member from Marquette (Mr. Crerar) some information on this subject, as I have been connected with transportation matters more or less for a few years. With reference to the ships that come down from the head of the lakes to Port Colborne and Buffalo, I do not know just what their grain rate is, but I think it is 1¼ cents a bushel. It is true they often get a return cargo. They carry from 450,000 to 750,000 bushels of wheat. If the Welland canal were deepened to-day the boats would go to Prescott, and it is a cheap proposition from Prescott to Montreal,—probably half a cent a bushel would cover the cost of taking it to Montreal, and putting it on the ocean liner, or into the elevators. As a matter of fact, my information is—and I believe it to be accurate, because it is obtained from the best sources of information—that it would take practically seven boats, to-day to bring what the Grant Morgan would carry from the head of the lakes to Port Colborne, going through the canal. I think the highest capacity of these boats is about 100,000 bushels, and the average would be about 80,000 bushels. These large boats could run to Prescott for another cent or two, as against five cents, which is the cost to-day. Of course, the rates would vary. When you get a straight rate, it varies from four to eight cents, depending on how anxious they are to get the cargoes. It takes seven or eight of these smaller boats to carry what one of the large boats can handle, and the large boats have only about two more of a crew, so that the cost of operation of one of these small boats is about the same as the cost of the operation of a large up-to-date freighter. By this means relief would be given to the extent of about 3 cents a bushel to the farmers of the West, and I believe the St. Lawrence project would probably give them relief to the extent of another cent and a half. I favour the speeding-up of the Welland canal. There is competition between the two routes from the head of the lakes, between the line that goes through Canada to Montreal, and the line that goes through the United States to New York. The Americans have the use of our canal for nothing, and if they want to pay half the cost, let them do it. You cannot put a dollar into our canals, but the United States gets five times the benefit that Canada receives. The United States is willing to pay, and I do not know any reason under the existing conditions why she should not pay her share. There is no international complication that I can see, because you are going to have all the money necessary for our purposes. There is no reason why, if the United States are getting ten times the benefit of the canal, they should not pay their share. And the only reason they are making this offer to us is because it is worth ten times as much to the farmers of the United States as it is to our farmers. It would make a difference of 4 cents a bushel on the price of the wheat on the continent. That is a great deal of money. What influences are to-day at work to stop the St. Lawrence project, and prevent our friends in the Cabinet from conferring with the United States, I have not the slightest idea.

Personally, I think it is extraordinary that when the government of the great United States wants to talk about a project of this kind, one that affects vitally every farmer on the northern part of the American continent, we cannot at least listen to what they have to say. I am absolutely in accord with the statement that has often been made that the carrying out of this great project will mean a difference of three cents a bushel to the farmer, and I do not believe the railways of this country will suffer materially, because what has heretofore come by rail will continue to come that way. Some arrangement should be made about the matter in this way. The reason that we are getting via Montreal a great deal more grain than is going via Portland is because our transportation facilities are better than those of the United States, and as regards freight rates we are beating the Americans by two cents a bushel. Last year 47,000,000 bushels came to Montreal out of Chicago, and it comes a little earlier than the wheat of the Canadian Northwest. We should have some control of that situation, because it should not be possible for the situation to arise that when our Canadian wheat is being transported, the Canadian farmer finds that the elevators are already filled up with United States wheat that has come through our canals free. That is only an incidental matter; but you have to consider it. Wheat ripens in the United States two or three weeks earlier than it does in Canada, so that they are ready to transport it sooner than we are. Last year 138,000,000 bushels were shipped out of Montreal, and 47,000,000 bushels of that came from Chicago, for the first time in the history of the country. This grain is going to come more quickly in future, and Montreal is found to be one of the greatest ports on this continent; nothing can stop that. There can never be any really intelligent opposition to this project from Montreal, and I do not think there is any. There is only one place as vitally situated as it is, although there may be certain ports that will store wheat at the head of the Great Lakes. The Canadian farmer is vitally interested in the price of wheat, and the price that he receives for his wheat depends upon the price of wheat at Liverpool and the cost to transport it to that city. If you can lessen the cost of inland transportation by three cents a bushel, you are going to make the price of wheat to the farmer three cents higher, because that will be the price for wheat grown west of the Great Lakes.

Mr. CRERAR: I recognize the force of the argument of the hon. member for Centre Toronto (Mr. Bristol), and it may be that the completion of the canal with the considerably larger vessels that can pass through it, will bring about the result, or, at any rate, part of the result that he has stated. I will admit that that aspect of the question is one that I have not looked into very closely. I believe, however, that it would mean the erection of elevators at Prescott and Kingston for the transfer of this grain from the lake vessels that brought it down to those points, to the barges that would carry it on to Montreal. What expense would be involved in doing that, is also a matter for consideration. I am free to admit, though, that my hon. friend in that respect may have substantial reasons to support his argument. My whole attitude to the question was rather governed by the idea that we should control, as much as possible, our public expenditures, in view of our financial situation, and I still think that is a consideration that should weigh with the Government. I am quite in agreement with what my hon. friend has said as to the attitude that should be taken by the Canadian government to the recent offer of the United States government to consider the question of the development of the St. Lawrence waterways. Without question or doubt, that great project will some day be undertaken; it must be undertaken. That great system of waterways which we have through the St. Lawrence and our great lakes into the very heart of this continent will be, and it should be some day, an enterprise that will be taken up jointly by these two governments. Canada and the United States are going to live peacefully together, and it is to their mutual interest to co-operate in a matter of this kind. As I understand the situation, the proposal of the United States does not involve any outlay of money at the present time, excepting in a very small degree. It was rather along the line of getting action started with the ultimate development of this project in the way that I have stated. I certainly believe that that matter should not have been turned back by the Government in the way that it was. They would have been well advised had they met the Washington government half way in a consideration of this enterprise.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): I should like again to present, on behalf of the people of Canada, the opinion that the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) and his Government owe an explanation in regard to their decision that the present was not an opportune time to take the matter up. Why is it not timely? The Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) has been to Washington, and he must be of opinion that if there is some way in which we can co-operate, we ought to try to do so. The United States have come to this decision after their experience in connection with the Panama canal, the greatest proposition as regards canalization for the improvement of transportation, that was ever accomplished. The expenditure in that case was much larger than the original estimate; but they went to work and completed the canal, and by reason of their experience and success in connection with the Panama canal, they are determined to improve waterways elsewhere on this continent. They have made an offer, and for the time being the people of Canada are told that this is not the right time to take this matter up. I should like to have an answer from the Government—perhaps the Minister of Railways (Mr. Kennedy) will give it—why that offer has been declined for the present. If the question is one of money and the getting of money, I have no doubt that the money immediately necessary for expenditures in connection with deepening the waterways up to the Great lakes can be found by the United States without any trouble at less than four per cent. I imagine the United States Government can get all the money they want for the immediate development of the St. Lawrence waterways at probably 3½ per cent, and that they would charge us nothing more than that rate.

Mr. CARROLL: Did they make the same offer in connection with the Welland canal?

Mr. MACLEAN (York): That is what I want to know, and that is what the people want to know—whether they made the same offer in connection with the three waterways. All our chambers of commerce in this country are holding meetings and a great international association has been formed for the promotion of this proposal. It involves diplomatic relations and it necessitates correspondence. It involves the President of the United States, who is a man of his word, and who comes to a friendly government, as I believe he takes Canada to be, and makes an offer to us at this time when transportation is a fundamental question in America. We are, however, told in a short answer in this House, that this is not the time to take up the matter. I hope the Minister of Railways will give us more details about the correspondence and will give some assurance to the people of Canada and at the same time to the people of the United States, that Canada is prepared to consider this question and is ready, at least, to have the proposition laid on the Table, so that the people of Canada and of the United States may appreciate what the proposition is.

Mr. MICHAUD: I think it is about time that we should stop speaking of great schemes and of spending more money on transportation facilities. We have given the West three transcontinental railways; we are constructing the Welland canal, which requires a great deal of money. I think the scheme of deepening the St. Lawrence should be dropped immediately for the time being and we should go on with the Welland canal if it is necessary to finish it at an early date. If we had not spent so much money on that canal, we should discontinue it; but from what I can gather from the minister, he is obliged to go on in order to take care of the work that has already been done. As regards this great scheme of deepening the St. Lawrence, I think we have spent enough money for some years to come in transportation facilities, and our friends from the West and Ontario should be satisfied. We in the East are satisfied that our friends from the West and Ontario have sufficient transportation facilities for the moment.

Mr. CHAPLIN: During the last few years the work on this project has slowed up very considerably owing to financial stress and the necessities of the country in other directions, and in that period a great deal of damage has been done to the half-finished work. Now, the minister would be well advised in doing one of two things: he should either stop the work entirely or else go ahead and do it in a businesslike way. What is the use of allowing half-finished work to depreciate? It seems to me to be a piece of absolute folly, as any one will admit who takes a look at the work. I have seen bridge abutments go out and slip down into the canal, and I have also seen the banks slip. The minister will hardly pretend that it is reasonable to spend $25,000,000 on a work of this kind and then leave it in that condition. The thing is too childish to think of.

Mr. McCONICA: There is one aspect of the question that occurs to me. I thoroughly agree with my hon. friend as to the desirability of improving the St. Lawrence waterway, I am strongly in favour of that improvement being made as soon as it is possible to bring it about. I think the time will come when it will be absolutely necessary to do this in the welfare of the people of Canada, both from the point of view of the manufacturing centres in the East and from the standpoint of the grain producing regions in the West. I believe that the matter should be looked to very early and earnestly by the Government of Canada. But the question that suggests itself to me is this: Will not the improvement of the Welland canal be better carried on as a part of the whole project that is now under consideration than as a piecemeal operation undertaken by Canada when she is very much in need of money? I have no notion of wanting to delay the completion of that improvement, but I do question the propriety of our proceeding to piece out here and there this particular work while the whole project is under consideration. If it is proposed that we shall enter into this arrangement, as I sincerely hope it is, then would it not be better for us to undertake this work as a part of the whole scheme rather than do it on our own account?

Mr. HOCKEN: Of course, I am in favour of the completion of the Welland canal. But I have always thought it somewhat strange that we should have undertaken a work of that character unless we had it in mind to carry it a good deal further. The development of the Welland canal will allow us to bring boats of very great tonnage into lake Ontario from the northern lakes and from lake Ontario into lake Erie, but it is very doubtful in my opinion whether the advantage we shall gain by the completion of that work with the limited amount of service we can get from it justified the undertaking at the commencement unless we had something else in view. My hon. friends from Montreal and the province of Quebec, as well as their newspapers, seem to be afraid that the development of the St. Lawrence is going to be injurious to their interests. To my mind that is a very shortsighted view to take of the project. I confidently believe that that work will be proceeded with before many years, and I venture the prediction that no province in the Confederation will profit more from its completion than the province of Quebec. It will enable them to transport their manufactured goods to the head of the lakes at a cost of perhaps one-eighth of what is charged by the railways to-day. That fact is all that need be stated to men engaged in large businesses in Quebec to convince them that the work will be of great benefit to that province. Such advantages as the manufacturers in the province of Ontario have in the matter of freight rates as against Quebec would be entirely eliminated, for a vessel could load at Quebec and be given the same freight rate as if it were loaded at Toronto. My hon. friends from Quebec and their newspapers enlarge on the cost and tell us, perhaps truly, that we have not enough money to embark upon so considerable a project. Well, as I think has been pointed out before, the Dominion of Canada does not need to raise one dollar to carry out the work. The plan that has been suggested is for the government of the United States and the government of Canada to charter a commission that will render the service at cost, giving that commission power to issue bonds. There can be no doubt that they could issue bonds at 4 per cent for two or three times the amount of money necessary.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): At 3½ per cent.

Mr. HOCKEN: At least, what I have stated is the opinion of very eminent men with whom I have talked on the subject.

Mr. FIELDING: Without government guarantees?

Mr. HOCKEN: No, both governments would guarantee the bonds.

[Mr. Hocken.]

Mr. FIELDING: That is another thing.

Mr. HOCKEN: But I submit that the project is of such a character that we should never be called upon to pay anything on our guarantee. I do not know that this is the time to go into the details of the question, but that is the plan that has been proposed, and to my mind it is one that is entirely feasible. The credit of the country would, of course, be involved, but the country would not be called upon to undertake the issuing of bonds at 5 per cent.

Now, with regard to the cost of the Welland canal, I think the problem will be largely solved by the completion of the larger work. The project, as set out in the report which my hon. friends have read, takes the Welland canal as part of the whole undertaking, and the cost of that canal—what we have spent and what is still to be spent—is to be part of the international obligation. That is a very material fact. It means that we go on and complete the Welland canal and make the waterway from the Atlantic ocean to the head of the Great lakes, and all the money that would be spent in completing the canal would be shared by the United States as a part of the entire project. I have been surprised that hon. gentlemen from the West, and the people of those provinces, have not gone into this international project more deeply and shown a greater interest in it than they seem to have taken. It means to them not only getting their grain out at somewhere between eight to ten cents a bushel less than it costs to transport it to the seaboard to-day, but all the manufactured goods that they take into the western provinces would share equally in the lower freight rates. And to my mind it is not to lower tariffs that my hon. friends from the West must look for relief, but to lower transportation costs.

An hon. MEMBER: Both.

Mr. HOCKEN: Well, you have a long way to go before you will get tariff reduction, as I think you must be convinced by what has happened this session. But, Sir, you have not very far to go to get the other, and personally I regret that the Government did not at least show more sympathy with the approaches made to them by the authorities of the United States than the newspaper reports would indicate. I do not think that there is anything before the people of Canada to-day that will give them greater relief from the burdens they are carrying, and greater advantages for the future development of the country, than the completion of this great waterway. Providence has put in our hands something of inestimable value, and we are letting it lie undeveloped. The time will come when all the railways we have will not be sufficient to carry the traffic from the central and western portions of this country. That state of affairs has already arrived in the United States; that country must have other and better means of transportation for the products of the western and central western states. We are not as congested as they are yet, but we hope that that congestion will come, as it must come with additional population. Therefore it is wise for us to have some vision on a great project of this kind and if we are not prepared to say, "We will look with sympathy into those representations which have been made to us by our great neighbour to the south;" we might at least say, "Whatever we may do in the future, we think this is worth talking about and looking into." But, unfortunately, the Government has not gone that far, and I sincerely regret the course which the negotiations have taken.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): I still press the Minister of Railways (Mr. Kennedy) for an answer to the very fair question I put to him, namely, to give the House the reason why it is not informed of the policy of the Government in delaying action in this matter. To that I would add this thought. Imagine the relief that would be given to unemployment in this North American continent to-day if the policy which the President of the United States has in view, involving perhaps an expenditure of $300,000,000 or $400,000,000, for the building of a great highway, largely at the expense of the United States, were undertaken. I believe that money would be forthcoming at 3 or 3½ per cent. It was not long ago that the government bonds of the United States were saleable all over the world at a price that gave a return of 3 per cent. I believe that day is coming back again, I predict that when the building of that international waterway is undertaken all the money will be found in the first place by the United States at 3 per cent, and that we will not be charged any more than that rate for our proportion of the capital outlay. In that way relief will be given to unemployment, and, most of all, relief will be given to transportation.

With regard to the opposition to this project from Montreal, the people of that city think there is only one solution of 4 p.m. the transportation problem—by rail. There is, I contend, a better solution of that problem by developing our waterways and so enabling sea vessels to reach the upper lakes. Montreal's vision is distorted because it cannot see any other solution of the transportation problem, and this rail solution would perhaps be controlled by the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, of Montreal. Now, that company is in the ocean business and has large fleets of its own, but it would not like to see its vessels sent up to Duluth, Port Arthur and Fort William in competition with its railway. What is holding back this great undertaking? The railway interests of Canada and of the United States. But they cannot get by the President of the United States and the farmers' bloc. The President has brought forward this policy and has invited our co-operation—the first time that we have ever been approached by the United States to participate in a great international project. And yet the party that was in favour of reciprocal trade arrangements with the United States is not prepared to co-operate—or at least is prepared to delay entertaining the proposal for a solution of our transportation problem based on seaways as well as on railways.

Mr. FIELDING: Has my hon. friend read the despatch from the Canadian to the American government which was laid on the Table a few days ago?

Mr. MACLEAN (York): I have read it. But I have not read the reply of the Prime Minister to the despatch from the American government; that is what I want to see.

Mr. FIELDING: That is where my hon. friend has taken only a one-sided view of the case.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): Give us the other side.

Mr. FIELDING: It has been given already. If my hon. friend were looking after parliamentary affairs constantly instead of only occasionally he would know that that document was laid on the table.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): What is the policy of the Government?

Mr. FIELDING: I was just going to follow that up. If my hon. friend had read that despatch—

Mr. MACLEAN (York): I have read it. What is the policy of the Government?

Mr. FIELDING: He said just now that he had not read it.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): There was no definite statement contained in the despatch I read.

Mr. FIELDING: My hon. friend is asking what is the reason for the Government's action. All I suggest is that if he will read the despatch sent by the Canadian Government to the United States government he will find that that reason could not be expressed in shorter or more concise terms than those set forth in that despatch.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): What is the reason for the delay?

Mr. FIELDING: I have not a copy of the despatch in my hand. My hon. friend can send to the Clerk and get a copy.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): The minister ought to be able to state what is the policy of the Government.

Mr. FIELDING: It is not set forth in the despatch which my hon. friend admits he has not read.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): As a member of the House I request the Government to give an answer. What was the reply?

Mr. MILLAR: I am interested in the conflicting statements that have been made in regard to this matter. The member for West Toronto (Mr. Hocken) has just stated that there would be a saving of from 8 to 10 cents a bushel on grain from the West to Montreal if the Welland canal and the St. Lawrence river were opened up for seagoing boats. I find that in a discussion which took place a short time ago in the Senate a statement was made that it now costs 7 cents a bushel to carry grain from Fort William to Montreal. So how it would be possible to save 8 or 10 cents a bushel when the total cost is now only 7 cents is something that I cannot understand. From information I have received I understand that during last season a private company purchased and placed on the lakes five new boats for the grain traffic as they found the business so profitable. In looking over the report of the International Joint Commission I was struck by some of the information it contains. In the discussion that took place in the House some time ago in regard to this matter I was led to believe that the total cost would be $252,000,000. I have been rather surprised to find that that sum only covers the cost up to the Welland canal, and that to get at the total cost one would have to add $50,000,000 or $60,000,000 for the widening and deepening of the Welland canal, and that there has already been spent $2,900,000 on what are called the St. Clair flats. These would have to be deepened, as well as the Soo canal, in order to enable great boats to pass from Fort William to Montreal.

I have heard nothing in this discussion so far about great ocean liners from Liverpool going up the lakes to Fort William. I believe that prospect carried considerable weight at one time. In the evidence given before the commission I was surprised to find the statement that it costs three times as much to build a boat for the transatlantic traffic as for the lake traffic; and added to that is the fact, also rather startling, that one of those large boats would carry only about 60 or 65 per cent of the amount of cargo that a lake boat of similar tonnage would carry because of its deeper draught and special form of construction for deep sea traffic. Let me repeat that. A boat that is intended to carry grain from Fort William to Liverpool would have to be built so strongly that it would cost three times as much as a boat of the same tonnage on the Great Lakes. Think what that means in extra cost and overhead charges, and the greater cost in man power. This cost would have to be borne—and would bear interest—up through all these canals. I was also surprised to find that between Prescott and Montreal there are some forty-four miles of canal. It showed me how little I knew of the geography of my own country. The evidence given before the commission would show that a large boat could not pass through these canals at a greater speed than four miles an hour, and there is great danger of them being rubbed against the side, causing considerable damage, and hours delay before they can be released.

Mr. MARTELL: Does the hon. member think they could use some of the Canadian merchant marine boats on those canals? It would not be much loss if they were damaged.

Mr. MILLAR: I have heard some rumours about the merchant marine, but I would not like to pass any opinion on that question. One hon. member has said that there would be a saving of 1½ cents per bushel on grain passing through the Welland canal, and of 1 cent a bushel passing through the other canals to Montreal, or a total saving of 2½ cents a bushel. If we reckon up the interest on the large amount of money required to complete this waterway, and reckon what would be saved even if grain could be carried for two or even three cents a bushel cheaper,—and that would be near the limit, I believe,—we shall find that it would be a losing game, and that grain could be carried free, through the Welland and Lachine canals for less than the interest on the investment.

There is another matter that should be considered, because I believe some are still of the opinion that we can open up a route between Fort William and Liverpool or London. The great carriers that come across the ocean bring with them a cargo, That cargo at the present time, and for years to come, must be unloaded at Montreal. It is not a cargo for Fort William, and for many years to come Fort William cannot be a distributing point. Think what it would mean for one of these boats to stop at Montreal and unload, and then have to crawl empty, at the rate of four miles an hour, through 44 miles of canal, through the Welland canal, the St. Clair flats, the Soo canal and up to Fort William. Think of the lost time when they could be loading and unloading at the same time, as they must do if they are going to make dividends. You cannot load at one time and unload at another and make it pay.

I am not going to go more fully into the whole question of the deep waterway except to say that much of what has been said, and is believed, is based on information that is not well founded. We have our railway transportation problems at the present time, and great problems they are. While this waterway might result in a slight saving in transportation costs, it would take a certain amount of traffic from the railways. The time may come —I would not go so far as to say it never will come—when this route will be feasible and the Welland canal may pay, but at the present time, I am convinced, it will not pay, and considering that money is so much needed for other things I think it is unwise for the Government to expend this amount of money at this time.

The argument—and it is a very good one —has been made by the minister that much of the work that has been done would deteriorate if further amounts are not spent. But that argument also holds good in connection with several branch lines of railway. I referred to one some time ago, where the farmers were so anxious to have the railway that they offered to build it themselves and pay for it out of the freight. I receive letters quite frequently in regard to this branch line, saying that the farmers are drawing their grain nearly twenty miles, and that it is turned over to the Canadian Pacific rather than to the Government railway.

There is also the plea made on behalf of the unemployed. I think it would be much better if this Government would undertake to build with a part of this money some of the branch lines that are very much needed, and take those who are willing to work in the Welland canal district over the railways free to places where they are required, and bring them back again free. This would be work that would open up the country, and encourage an industry that is not now getting the consideration it should. These branch lines would serve as feeders for the present railways, would be an encouragement to agriculture, would produce freight, and, due to the greater buying power of those who are on the land, would help industry as a whole. On the other hand, I am convinced that if $8,000,000 is spent on the Welland canal this year, the benefit will be so small that very few will feel it. I think the Government would be well advised to reduce this item by one-half and spend the other $4,000,000 where it is much more needed. I do not say, spend it on branch lines necessarily, although I think that is perhaps where the money is most needed, but spent it wherever it is most needed. If there is any industry that is requiring assistance more than the agricultural industry spend it there. Certainly there are many ways in which it could be spent to advantage.

I know there is an inclination to pass this item without further discussion, but it is a large appropriation, and I do not feel I would be honestly representing my constituency if I allowed it to pass unchallenged. I would just like to ask the House for a little sympathetic consideration. How would this project look to the man—I know this is an extreme case—who in order to keep the sheriff from the door last fall borrowed $400 at 25 per cent interest, and the loan was partly or fully covered by giving in return a Ford car and some other goods. That man has worked hard all his life. How would this undertaking look to him?

I notice an inclination on the part of some people to say, and I have heard it said in this House: You farmers ought to quit grumbling and get down to work. I assure you, Mr. Chairman, that the farmers are not grumblers. With fair treatment, they are prepared to take their losses and gains without any grumbling whatever, but I can point to thousands of men who know the business of farming, who are slaves to work, and economizing more than they should be compelled to do, who waste nothing, and yet at the end of their year's work find — and this is no exaggeration — that they have not made one cent. The return they get for their grain in many cases does not pay the cost entailed in securing the seed, sowing the grain, reaping, harvesting and threshing it. Now, I know some will smile and say that statement is surely exaggerated. However, I venture the assertion, that if I could not prove it to be correct in a reasonable length of time, on the authority of hundreds of letters, I would be willing to resign my seat in this House. Bearing that fact in mind, if my seat mate will act as seconder, I am going to move that this item be reduced by one-half, that is reduced to $4,000,000.

Mr. EVANS: I believe this has been an ill-advised scheme from the beginning. To think of constructing a canal in the middle of this continent, without having the approaches at either end of the same capacity, is most unreasonable. Thirty million dollars have already been spent, which will not be revenue bearing, at least, until about 1930. By that time another $30,000,000 will also be spent, and the interest on that at 6 per cent would meet the cost of carrying the whole of the western wheat crop that goes by this route, clear across the peninsula. I am very much surprised to hear the warm advocacy of this scheme from our friends in Toronto. I believe they see the possibility of deriving more benefit from it than anybody else, and perhaps they are thinking only of their city.

Mr. HOCKEN: We are thinking of the West.

Mr. EVANS: The greatest surprise of all to me is to hear hon. gentlemen to my right warmly advocate the co-operation of the United States on the ground that this is an international undertaking when, only a few years ago they told us we were not to have "truck or trade with the Yankees" in relation to a scheme that would have been of international benefit, and revenue bearing from the very beginning. As to unemployment this project will not result in any lasting benefit, even though it may relieve unemployment for the time being. Our unemployment problem will rightly be solved by further developing some of our natural resources and building branch lines. As one hon. member has already stated these would be revenue producing from the time they were completed; and it would only take a few million dollars to furnish facilities for those in the West who to-day are not only suffering inconvenience, but absolute hardship. My hon. friend from Welland (Mr. German) has emphasized the unreasonableness of leaving a project like this remain unfinished and to deteriorate year after year. I can point out to him a project started in western Canada over ten years ago upon which $20,000,000 has been spent, and I see an item of $40,000 in the estimates this year to take care of the terminals of that railway only, although the grades are levelling down and the steel is rusting. I certainly oppose this estimate and do so with a clear conscience.

Mr. MANION: I do not wish at this stage of the proceedings to cause any delay in the passage of the estimates of any branch of the government. I do not think, perhaps, that this is the most suitable time to discuss the Great Lakes and St. Lawrence Waterways project, and I do not intend to do so except to offer two or three sentences which will perhaps clear the air a bit. My hon. friend from Qu'Appelle (Mr. Millar) has said that he did not see where the saving would come from in connection with this enterprise. Well, I am not authority enough to tell him exactly where the saving would come from but the best authorities in the world who have investigated this scheme say it will save anywhere from five to ten cents a bushel on the wheat handled, not only from western Canada but from the western states. Julius Barnes, perhaps the best authority in the world to-day on grain statistics, says in the report from which my hon. friend quoted, that it will save ten cents. Herbert Hoover makes the same statement. Some of the other authorities assert that the saving will be five cents on the wheat coming from the West to-day or at least very much of the wheat —I refer to the proportion which goes down to Port Colborne, or perhaps to some of the Georgian Bay ports, and is there transferred and taken to Montreal. If the wheat does not go by the Canadian route, it is shipped to Buffalo where it is transferred either to the Erie canal or to railway cars and taken to New York. I believe the cost of shipping from the Georgian Bay ports and Port Colborne to Montreal, and from Buffalo to New York, is in the neighbourhood of nine or ten cents. The saving would be there. If wheat could be carried by boat all the way from the head of the lakes to Montreal that would result in a great saving. At present it is transferred at Port Colborne, or Buffalo, or some of these other points, and shipped by rail to Montreal and New York. That is where the saving comes in. My hon. friend made the statement—it was made by other members when this question was up before in the House; the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Brown) made the same statement if my recollection serves me correctly—that the interest on this expenditure was too great. But if the actual saving should happen to be five cents a bushel, if this scheme were carried through, it would mean a similar amount on every bushel of wheat grown in the prairie provinces. Not only that but as my hon. friend knows the price of wheat is fixed in Liverpool for the whole of the western provinces—not merely for the wheat sent to Liverpool—and supposing the saving in the carriage of wheat amounted to five cents a bushel, the total saving on 300,000,000 bushels would mean $15,000,000 a year which would pay the whole interest, as a mater of fact, on Canada's share of the cost of this entire project.

Mr. MILLAR: I would like to ask my hon. friend some questions. Is he aware that the Erie canal, which is a strong competitor with us in the carriage of wheat, has a draught of only eight or nine feet? Secondly, would he say positively that the present freight rate is more than seven cents from Fort William to Montreal? My figures are taken from a speech delivered recently in the Senate by Senator Casgrain.

Mr. MANION: Senator Casgrain is very much opposed to this scheme and loses no opportunity of expressing his opposition. Leaving that aside, in answer to my hon. friend let me say that I cannot give the actual figures, but I know that what I stated is correct. In the very report from which my hon. friend quoted, Herbert Hoover and Julius Barnes say that the construction of this enterprise will make a saving of ten cents a bushel on the carriage of American and Canadian wheat. However, cut it down to five cents, which other authorities in the same report say would be the right figure. I believe my hon. friend will find that you cannot carry wheat to-day with navigation open from Fort William to Montreal for anything like seven cents a bushel. I may be wrong, but I think I am right, I am quoting authorities from the report of the commission appointed by the two governments. They took up an entire year to investigate this matter and this is their report. I must confess that when I was told that five or ten cents a bushel would be saved I did not believe it; but when the report came out and gave that figure on the authority and as the finding of the commissioners I had no hesitation in accepting it, speaking generally. My hon. friend mentioned the idea of boats coming from Liverpool to Fort William, or to the head of the lakes. I do not think there is very much likelihood of that happening, at least not to any extent. The idea would be this: Wheat would be carried from the head of the lakes to Montreal and there transhipped to ocean-going vessels. There is a type of vessel projected for canal, lake and ocean service, and I am told by competent engineers that the construction of this class of vessel would not cost any more than the building of any other type of boat.

An hon. MEMBER: Some of the Canadian Merchant Marine vessels?

Mr. MANION: I am not referring to the Canadian Merchant Marine. Still, I have enough confidence in Canada to believe that we can build a merchant marine to suit this service. There seems to be a tendency, a continual tendency, to make fun of the Canadian Merchant Marine and at times, to make fun of everything Canadian. I admit many boats of the Canadian Merchant Marine are probably idle at the present time; so are many boats of the private corporations. I do not think there is anything particular to be gained by interjecting uncalled for references to the Canadian Merchant Marine, because it has nothing to do with the matter. The point I was making was that I had been told by competent engineers, one of them living in Ottawa, a representative of Sir Robert Perks, the gentleman who wishes to build the Georgian bay canal. This engineer has been studying the question for some years, and he told me personally that a boat could be built to serve both lake and ocean at little, if any, greater cost than the ordinary cost of building boats for ocean or lake. However, the point I wish to make is that it is not the intention in this canal scheme mainly to have boats run straight across the ocean. They would probably run to Montreal or to Quebec. The saving would be in the carrying without breaking bulk from the head of the lakes to Montreal or Quebec. I do not think the statement of the hon. member from Qu'Appelle (Mr. Miller) should go unchallenged, especially when we have the report of the commission which states the opposite.

I think it is rather an extraordinary proceeding for the Government to have practically refused to discuss this question at all with the United States' government. I know that my hon. friend the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) has suggested that the reason is the lack of money. I do not dispute that, and I do not argue that the Government should not take any particular stand they choose. That is their right. But it is an unprecedented thing, it seems to me—and some of the Washington papers made a similar statement when the matter occurred—for one government to absolutely refuse to discuss with another government a question of international importance such as this. I do not say this particularly with a desire to criticize the Government, but I think they might be well advised to reconsider the question of discussing this matter with the United States' government. The fact, that they consented to discuss the matter would not by any means tie them up to the proposition, and it would not in any way tie my hon. friends to my left or any of them, to the proposition, but certainly all information on such a subject as this might well be gained by all of us, and certainly by the government in power. So that, I submit, with all due respect to the Prime Minister, that he might well reconsider the stand he has taken on the question and listen to and take part in such discussion, if the opportunity arose, wholly in the interest of getting information for the Government, and for the people of this country. If, after those discussions the Prime Minister chose to take an attitude absolutely opposed to the building of the canal, it is his right, but I do not believe it is in the interests of the Government or of the country for the Government to absolutely refuse at this time, or any other time, to discuss a question of such great magnitude and importance as this.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The Government never refused to discuss it. We said it is not an opportune moment. We were asked to enter into a treaty, and we said no; that having regard to the magnitude of the matter, the expenditure involved and the importance of the question, we have not had time to consider it. We have not closed the door to discussion.

Mr. MANION: I am only going by the Prime Minister's own words. He said in reply to a question asked by Sir Henry Drayton:

—"the Government has replied to the effect that the present is not an opportune moment to take the matter up."

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The hon. member was asking about entering into a treaty, and the reply was that this was not an opportune moment to discuss the question of making a treaty.

Mr. MANION: But has not the Prime Minister and the Government absolutely refused to discuss the matter at all with the Government of the United States?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Not at all. I am glad you have brought up the question. That impression is erroneous.

Mr. MANION: The hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Crerar) made a similar statement a few minutes ago, and he must have taken it from the words of the Prime Minister, as I did.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I laid the correspondence on the table of the House, and I think it was ordered to be printed. I do not know if it has been printed, but if hon. members will read the correspondence they will see that the communication received by this Government from the United States government related particularly to the question of entering into a treaty, and the reply related to the question of the treaty, and the discussion of the matter was not precluded. What I wanted to say particularly was that the Government had not had time to study the report. And until we have time to study the report, it would be unwise to talk about a treaty.

Mr. MANION: I am pleased to have the Prime Minister make the statement he has made. We drew a wrong conclusion from his words, but the conclusion drawn by me, the hon. member from Marquette, and other members of the House, was drawn from the words of the Prime Minister. I admit I have not read the correspondence, but I took his words in the House. However, his statement now is more satisfactory. I do not dispute it at all, and I believe it better that this information should have been given to us all.

Mr. SALES: I would like to say a few words on this question before the vote is taken. The hon. member for West Toronto (Mr. Hocken) said that he was surprised that the farmers were not interested in a proposal which would save them so much money. The hon. member for Fort William (Mr. Manion) and the hon. member for Centre Toronto (Mr. Bristol) also spoke in the same strain. They are surprised we are not interested. Well, we are interested, but we are also sceptical. I wonder who the saving is going to be for.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): The farmer.

Mr. SALES: I doubt it. I say that we have spent millions of money on the waterways, and the more money we spend the higher our rates go. There was an increase from 1919 to 1920 of 2½ cents a bushel.

Mr. MANION: Could we get the crop of western Canada out of the country at all, if it were not for the money that has been spent on the waterways of the country?

Mr. SALES: That is all right, perhaps we could not, but the more money we spend the higher the rates go. Is that saving going to be for the farmers or for the big watered stock companies, such as the Canada Steamship Company?

Mr. HOCKEN: No. A commission will be appointed to work on costs.

Mr. SALES: This battle has been fought in this House time and again, year after year. for the control of the rates on our waterways and has been objected to by my hon. members on both sides of the House. They will not allow those rates to be brought under control, as the railway rates have been. A gentleman named Armstrong used to be a member of this House, and I find that, year after year, he brought up this question very very forcibly, and it was always resisted, and there was no control given over these rates whatever. Suppose we do improve these waterways, and we can carry the wheat and goods from the head of the lakes to Montreal so much cheaper, does that not mean that railway rates also will have to be reduced in the East to compete with that water transportation? And if they are reduced in the East, does it not mean they will be increased in the West to make up for it?

Mr. MANION: No.

Mr. SALES: My hon. friend says no, but that is the experience we have been having for years.

Mr. MANION: Let me answer the hon. member. The hon. member knows that today all of the wheat of western Canada, or at least a large proportion of it,—until very recently 65 per cent—went by the Erie canal and New York. I know that to be a fact. The building of these canals would permit that same wheat to go straight down the Canadian route, and there would be a saving. It costs I think in the neighbourhood of 10 to 11 cents to take it from Buffalo to New York. That saving could easily be made on that trip alone for sixty-five per cent of the wheat that is exported from western Canada at the present time.

Mr. SALES: The hon. member may be correct, but I have my doubts, because I find that the boat freight was 8.6 cents; it is now 11.8 cents all the way from Fort William to Montreal by the boats which we have now. In 1919, the rate was 11 cents, and in September, 1920, it was 13¾ cents. In October, when our wheat really begins to move and they could do us a service, they increased the rate from 11 cents, as it was the year before, to 15½ cents, and we have no control over them.

There is something else that I wish to know. There are a few boats running down from the head of the great lakes, boats like the Grant Morden—I have been to Fort William and Port Arthur and I have seen them—that can carry these big loads; but there are only a few. Does the Canada Steamship Company intend immediately to scrap all the boats it has at present which can go through the Welland canal and all the way to Montreal, and replace them by these big boats which can carry 500,000 bushels? I do not think so. Until the canals at Montreal are finished, I can see no good in this Welland canal project, because the boats which now can go through the Welland canal can now go through to Montreal. When you get your larger boats through the Welland canal, you have to build bigger elevators at Kingston and Prescott, transfer elevators, or the scheme is of no value at all. If my hon. friends would move that the whole item be cut out except just what is needed to keep the canal from falling into decay, I would vote with them. I will vote with them as it is; but I think they do not go far enough. I think the whole proposition was a mistake, as the hon. member for Saskatoon (Mr. Evans) says, in beginning in the middle a scheme of this kind. At this time, when economy is needed, what is the use of talking about economy and then voting millions of dollars for a proposition like this? The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell), last night, I think, had some matter on which he could spend $2,000,000 of this very money, and I would like to see the Minister of Railways (Mr. Kennedy) do what has been suggested without our having to take a division on the question. The Government should practice economy as well as preach it.

Mr. McBRIDE: In the first place, I think the Government used very good judgment when they said that the time was not opportune to enter into any agreement with the United States. We have heard a great deal about some people having a vision of a greater Canada, and some people think they can see further ahead than others. Some years ago we had that class of men in British Columbia, and they told us about some railways that were needed. They also told us that the proposition would not cost the taxpayers of British Columbia one dollar; but when it was completed, the taxpayers of British Columbia have had to foot a bill of over $40,000,000, and that railway is not making a cent. It started nowhere and it ends nowhere. We have too many people working up propositions in their own interest and not in the interest of Canada as a whole. I claim to know a little about steamboats, and there is in my mind a question whether ocean steamers of large tonnage would ever come up through the St. Lawrence canal when completed. If we take insurance and other things into consideration, I do not think it would pay them to do so. As an hon. member has stated, ocean steamers are built much heavier; the captains and engineers get higher pay; they have to carry a larger crew than would be required on the canal travelling at a low speed. While those boats were on the ocean, they would go at twelve or thirteen knots an hour, whereas, through the canal, they would have to go at three or four knots an hour. The wages of the crew and other expenses including the interest on the investment in the boat, would go on just the same. The heavy machinery and other things would add to the expense. I question, therefore, whether the proposition would ever be used to the extent some people think it would. I do not think, with the amount of burden that this country is carrying at the present time, this proposition should be given any consideration at all. We are not sent here to consult with the United States and to consider their propositions; we are sent here to represent the people of Canada, and to work in their interest.

Mr. JOHNSON (Moosejaw): Before I can intelligently vote on the amendment and on the resolution, I shall have to have some more information from the minister. I will ask my question first. What would be the probable cost to the Dominion were work discontinued on this project and it were allowed to stand over for a year or two? I should like to refer very briefly to the amendment and to the resolution. I should like very much to support the amendment of the hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Millar), but I fear that it is subject to the same criticism as was offered against the project generally,—it starts in the middle and does not go anywhere. If the principle is right, I think his amendment should have read to delete the entire thing except such as would be required to prevent loss, or else to go ahead with the thing in a whole-hearted manner and complete it. When the debate started, I had an open mind on this subject, although I was probably a little inclined to cut it out in the interest of economy, because I think economy is demanded at this time. I was, nevertheless, very much impressed by the remarks of the hon. member for Centre Toronto (Mr. Bristol). I am not able to judge as to the correctness of his figures, I should like to have them confirmed. If those large boats, as he states, can, by this expenditure, go through the Welland canal, unload at Prescott instead of at Buffalo, transfer their cargoes to barges which can cheaply be carried down the St. Lawrence river and unloaded at Montreal, that is a very desirable thing. The other day we had it on information given us by the Chairman of the Montreal Harbour Commissioners that 135,000,000 bushels of wheat passed through that port last year—I think the quantity was quoted by an hon. member a short time ago as 115,000,000 bushels; but my recollection is that the correct quantity is 135,000,000 bushels,—about 65 per cent of which was Canadian wheat. If we can, by a development of this sort, bring down a larger volume of wheat from Buffalo to Montreal and develop the port of Montreal rather than the port of Buffalo and, consequently, New York, that would be a very desirable thing. But it involves a considerable expenditure; it involves transfer houses at Prescott, while we already have transfer houses at Port Colborne and elevator space at Buffalo. Another hon. member, who represents, I think, one of the Toronto seats, referred to the return cargoes. In my opinion, that argument has very little weight, because, if I am correctly informed, the return cargo carried by those boats is principally coal from the Pennsylvania mines to western Canada. There is practically no heavy package freight going from Montreal up through the lakes to western Canada. Freight which goes that way has to go mostly over the railways.

Mr. HOCKEN: Why?

Mr. JOHNSON (Moosejaw): I suppose from the very nature of it; it is not bulky like coal. I do not know of any freight of any considerable volume going up the lakes to the western prairies.

Mr. HOCKEN: Why could the boats not take package freight?

Mr. JOHNSON (Moosejaw): Because package freight is a freight that has to be speedily carried through, and boats take a longer time to do that. The freight rate is not the consideration which it is on bulk commodities, on such heavy stuff as ores, lumber and coal. On the whole, I think that ultimately this entire project, in the interests of this country, must and will be carried through. I want to see it carried through for the development of the eastern ports and the various facilities which we have built at enormous cost. But at the present time, when the need for economy is so great and there are other projects requiring huge expenditures, when, according to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) under the best circumstances possible we can scarcely hope that our revenue will be equal to the expenditures that are to be made during the present year, unless it is necessary to spend a large amount of money in order that expenditures already made may not prove futile, I think we shall be very well advised if we cut out these expenditures for some considerable time. I cannot vote for the amendment, because it begins in the middle and goes nowhere; but for a reduction in the entire amount I shall be glad to vote.

Mr. KENNEDY (Essex): This whole matter was gone into very thoroughly by the department. We fully investigated the possibility of shutting down the work, and we have found that if we abandoned operations for two years it would involve a loss in depreciation and deterioration of between $5,000,000 and $6,000,000, to say nothing of the claims which the contractors would naturally put in for such work as has already been done. It must also be remembered that the five sections must be finished as nearly as possible about the same time. The only way you could reduce the vote by $4,000,000, would be to stop the work on one section. That would mean that you would finish four out of five and be unable to use them at the proper time. I can assure hon. gentlemen that we have gone into the matter very thoroughly, and while the members of the Government are as anxious as anybody else to avoid all unnecessary expenditures, we are asking for this vote only because we are convinced that it is absolutely in the best interests of economy.

Mr. JOHNSON (Moosejaw): I understand from the minister that the country would suffer a loss of between five and six million dollars if we postponed this work for two years.

Mr. KENNEDY (Essex): Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON (Moosejaw): Then we had better make the best of a bad job.

Mr. SALES: Has the minister been over this work personally?

Mr. KENNEDY (Essex): Yes, I have been over it with the engineers. We spent days discussing the matter with the chief engineer, and went thoroughly into the whole thing. We have not rushed things in any way, nor are we asking for this vote without the most careful consideration. We believe that it is in the very best interests of the country to spend this money.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax): In view of all the statements that have been made I think the mover should withdraw his amendment. It is quite obvious that the reduction from $8,000,000 to $4,000,000 does not give expression to any principle. It gets us nowhere, and I do not think the committee should accept the amendment. I do submit that under all the circumstances, the mover should withdraw it.

Mr. WARD: I do not rise to criticise the estimate at all, because I agree with the hon. member for Moosejaw (Mr. Johnson) that the minister having been quite convinced that it is necessary to go ahead with this work in the interests of economy, it would be unwise to reduce the vote. I do want to suggest to the minister, however, that he be consistent in all respects, and give to the various railways that are now half constructed the same consideration that he is giving to this particular matter. We have several miles of railway partly built in the West, and if the minister thinks it is in the interests of economy not to postpone the work under this vote, he should, I think, take the same view in regard to those railways and carry to completion the work in connection with them. The grades have already been built, and I would urge that he seriously consider the advisability of completing those lines.

Mr. MILLAR: In view of the fact that some of my statements have been contradicted, I should like to read an extract from a speech of Senator Casgrain. Some hon. members have referred to the fact that he was opposed to the project. If I might do so I would quote some remarks of his.

The CHAIRMAN: The hon. member would be out of order in quoting from the Senate debates of this session.

Amendment negatived.

Item agreed to.

Trent Canal—construction and betterments, $240,000.

Mr. STEWART (Lanark): How much remains unexpended of last year's appropriation?

Mr. KENNEDY (Essex): The amount voted last year was $339,000, all of which was spent.

Item agreed to.

Rideau Canal—construction of storehouse at Ottawa, $4,000.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax): I do not offer any criticism of this vote, nor am I moving to reduce or to strike it out. I see that on the next page there is a vote of $25,000 additional for the Rideau canal. Placed in such financial straits as we are, it is of course desirable that we should eliminate all expenditures that are unnecessary; and I submit that the minister should immediately decide to part ownership with the Rideau canal. It is as idle as a painted ship upon a painted ocean; economically it is absolutely useless. It handles not one single cent of traffic, although it is true that a few cart loads of sand are carried through it. I do not know what it costs to carry on the Rideau canal, but probably it takes a considerable sum. I should like to see the minister decide before twelve o'clock to-night utterly to abandon this canal, and hand over to the city of Ottawa the greater part of it, retaining the lower part for railway purposes. I do not suggest that we should strike out this item or the item on the next page, but I certainly do not think that there is any justification whatever for the further retention of this canal. The amount of the vote is small, it is true, but it could as well be expended in purchasing soap bubbles as in further operating the canal, and I hope the minister will rise and say that next week he will advise the city of Ottawa that he is prepared to donate the canal to them for the purpose of beautifying certain sections of the city, retaining the lower part, as I say, for railway purposes.

Mr. STEWART (Lanark): I would judge from the remarks of the senior member for Halifax (Mr. Maclean) that in his opinion the Rideau canal is limited to that part of the waterway adjoining the city of Ottawa, and that that is the reason why he would present it to the city. I submit, Mr. Chairman, that the point raised by him is much more serious than perhaps he appreciates. The Rideau canal was built by, and at the expense of, the British government and was presented to Canada upon an undertaking by our government that it would be maintained as a canal. So I feel that it would be impossible for the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Kennedy) to act upon the hon. member's suggestion.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax): My hon. friend surely does not mean to contend that the British government would expect us to carry out that obligation now in view of changed conditions?

Mr. STEWART (Lanark): I would at least feel that it was an obligation on the part of the people of Canada that should not be decided by the minister inside fifteen or twenty minutes as suggested by my hon. friend; I would think there should be a conference between this Government and the British government before any action is taken as proposed by him.

Mr. FORKE: Was not the canal constructed for military purposes?

Mr. GRAHAM: No doubt that was the underlying consideration.

Mr. STEWART (Lanark): I presume that the British government one hundred years ago was influenced largely by military considerations in building this canal. But there is no doubt the canal was built at a very great cost, extending as it does from the Ottawa river here to lake Ontario at Kingston, considerable engineering difficulties having to be overcome, boats being raised 200 feet out of the Ottawa river by lockage between here and the height of land and then being let down 168 feet into lake Ontario. I am not urging that from the strictly commercial stand-
5 p.m. point there may not be something in what the senior member for Halifax suggests, but the canal has been operated since 1828, and the items in these estimates are surely not of sufficient importance to call for the offhand decision suggested.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax): I felt so sure of my ground that I thought my suggestion could be carried out instantly. But I will qualify that and say we might take a few days or a few weeks to put it into execution.

Mr. STEWART (Lanark): My hon. friend is entirely mistaken when he says that the canal is of no commercial advantage to the people of Canada. The canal is of very great commercial advantage to the people who live along its banks.

Mr. MARTELL: Is the commercial advantage commensurate with the cost to the people of Canada?

Mr. STEWART (Lanark): I am speaking of the advantage to the people who live along the canal. Since the question of transportation has been a live issue in federal politics we have heard arguments not only in favour of maintaining but of constructing railway lines into territory where there was no suggestion that the traffic returns would justify the cost of construction.

Mr. MARTELL: Not from western Nova Scotia.

Mr. STEWART (Lanark): I am not talking of Nova Scotia. We have here a means of transportation that is of very great convenience to the people whom it serves.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax): I would be very glad to be informed about that. I understood that there was practically no business carried on through the canal, with the exception of a little sand brought down to Ottawa from a point a few miles up the river.

Mr. STEWART (Lanark): Well, my hon. friend has not been properly informed. I am quite free to confess that the traffic upon the canal has been very seriously interfered with by the construction of the Canadian Northern Railway along the south shore of the Rideau lakes. Prior to the advent of the railway the canal served all the villages and settlements between Ottawa and Kingston, and even yet boats ply to and fro. I am not prepared to say that the traffic would justify the government of Canada or any one else in the construction of this canal as an original enterprise; but we have the canal there, and if after having constructed locks which make the waterways altogether different to what they were in a state of nature we abandon this canal we would at once place the people who live along its banks at a serious disadvantage. The canal is of very great use to those people and they should not be deprived of the service they and their predecessors have enjoyed since 1828. I do not wish to be understood as saying that the freight traffic or any other remuneration that the government gets would justify maintaining this canal, but I do think my hon. friend has an exaggerated idea of its cost of maintenance. It is a splendidly built canal, and if my hon. friend has not gone over its whole course it would do him good to do so, for he would see a wonderful piece of engineering and would pass through the most picturesque part of Canada—a part exceeding in natural beauty the Thousand Islands that we hear so much about. In a word, my hon. friend has suggested something which should not be entertained by the Government.

Mr. BROWN: When I came down to Ottawa as a new member I naturally wanted to get busy, and one of the first matters I inquired about was the cost of the Rideau canal, which was suggested to me from noticing that repairs were being made to the locks here. I therefore consulted the Auditor General's reports to find out the cost of this canal for the last six years. I am not much accustomed to going through these reports, but my figures are as nearly accurate as I could make them. I found that during the past six years we have paid for the upkeep of this canal in salaries and repairs a total of $1,205,534.66. The revenue derived from it in the same period amounted to $40,798.-63. Being interested in the matter I put a question on the Order Paper—

Mr. MARTELL: What was the revenue derived from?

Mr. BROWN: I presume from tolls.

Mr. STEWART Lanark): There are no tolls charged on the canal.

Mr. GRAHAM: The revenue was from water-powers probably.

Mr. STEWART (Lanark): There are developed water-powers on the canal.

Mr. BROWN: As I was saying, I also put a question on the Order Paper, but the answer, I confess, does not mean much to me. This is my question, which will be found on page 734 of Hansard:

How many vessels and what tonnage passed through the Rideau canal during each year since 1915?

The answer will be found on the same page, but I shall not read the figures as they can be very easily referred to by hon. members. Those figures convey no idea to me because I do not know what was the nature of the traffic. As the season opened up I saw that a considerable amount of work was being done on the canal here, but I question very much if, apart from this end of the canal and possibly a few other limited sections, very much traffic is going on.

When the hon. member for Halifax made the suggestion that it be presented to the city of Ottawa, it occurred to me offhand that that was just the thing to do with it. I am not certain that the figures given by the hon. member for Lanark as to what this canal has cost are absolutely correct. I was out at his town of Perth the other day. It is situated at the head of that famous ditch, as we used to call it; we heard of it back in the elections of 1896. I was interested to know just what that canal looked like, and what it was being used for and from the information I could gather I would suggest that the Tay canal be presented to the city of Perth. I confess after seeing that canal in the town of Perth, some of my prejudices were removed. While there was no traffic on it to any extent, there is a basin and some docks, and no doubt it is a very beautiful thing for the town, but it is absolutely useless from a commercial standpoint. I believe the Tay canal does help to take away the sewerage from Perth and give the town better drainage. So I would suggest that the Tay canal be presented to the town of Perth. I came across a little item,—it is a trifling sum in the Auditor General's report,—showing that it costs $95 a year to put down, take up and care for the buoys in the Tay canal. I doubt if the canal is even worth that much for commercial purposes. I admit that the Rideau canal for scenic purposes and excursion parties undoubtedly is some value to the people of Canada, but as a commercial proposition I do not think it is worth considering. I would again call attention to the figures. The Auditor General's report shows that for 1916, 1917, 1918, 1919, 1920 and 1921 the people of Canada have spent $1,205 534.66 on this canal. To what extent it would be wise to continue that expenditure in future, I am by no means certain, but certainly it is not a commercial proposition.

Mr. GARLAND (Carleton): I think that some of the work my hon. friend mentions should be charged up to the Ottawa Improvement Commission, and not to the Rideau canal.

Mr. BROWN: I think the figures I quoted are accurate. If anything, I think the expenditure would be more rather than less.

Mr. GARLAND (Carleton): The hon. member said that when he was here last March he saw a lot of work being done along the Rideau canal. That work was being done for the relief of the unemployed and should be charged, I think, to the Ottawa Improvement Commission, and not to the Rideau canal. There was a retaining wall built, for instance, to give work to the unemployed.

Mr. GRAHAM: I am very strong on the financial situation. I believe that we ought to be economical, but there are cases where it is a mistake, I think, to insist on estimating the value of a certain work in dollars and cents. The Rideau chain of lakes forms one of the most beautiful spots on the whole North American continent. There is no question about that in the mind of anyone who has seen them. The tourists who spend their summers along these lakes bring thousands and thousands of dollars annually to the Dominion of Canada. We often discuss in this House the desirability of opening up beauty spots in Canada, and it would not be wise, I think, for the sake of a few dollars to close up this one. It has a historic value, to my mind, apart altogether from its commercial value. It was originally constructed by the Imperial government, I believe, for the purposes of defence, and anyone who will take a trip through this chain of lakes and inspect the masonry will discover something that would be a revelation to the modern mason. On several occasions I have given many Americans the trip from Montreal to Kingston, through the Thousand Islands, down the Rideau chain of lakes, through the canal, and down the Ottawa to Montreal again, and although I am very proud of the Thousand Islands and think it a wonderful beauty spot, the Rideau chain of lakes is in a class by itself. We have spent millions of dollars to build the Trent canal, and the great argument in its favour was that it would enable those living inland and farther west up towards Georgian bay a short and quick method of transportation for light draft freight. The Rideau canal affords the same facilities. It may be that during the last two or three years little freight has been carried over it, but let me point out to the committee that during the war a great many things went wrong. Before that time I know of my own personal knowledge that coal was transported from lake Ontario to points along the Rideau waterway. There are many bright little towns bordering these lakes, Westport, Portland, Smith's Falls, Perth, and many others I could name. These have all been served for years by this waterway, and I would hesitate for the small expenditure involved to give away this waterway that belongs to Canada. The city of Ottawa could not look after it, and this end of the canal would probably be used as a yard for the railway companies if it belonged to the city. The proposition was made to me when I was Minister of Railways that this end of the canal, where it empties into the Ottawa, should be transferred to one of the railway companies, to increase their facilities and allow them to make a tunnel from that point down to the other end of the city. I pointed out that if they would arrange another outlet into the Ottawa that would be just as satisfactory, we would discuss the matter.

As to the expenditure, hon. gentlemen will see at a glance that if we gave up the proprietorship of this waterway tomorrow, we would still be obliged to keep up the bridges over this stream. The committee will see, when we come to the estimate, that quite a large amount of the money expended has been spent on maintaining the old bridges and constructing new ones over this stream, and we should still be obliged to look after them if we gave up the canal. It is a matter that might be investigated, but certainly this House is not in a position to give instructions to the Minister of Railways at this time to interfere with the situation that has existed for many years. The canal is not altogether useless financially, and otherwise it is a great asset to the Dominion of Canada.

Mr. WARD: If it is the grand summer resort my hon. friend says, and I have no doubt he has stated the facts correctly, has any effort been made to induce tourists to come here? If this is the most picturesque spot on the American continent, let us advertise the fact and get people here and make the canal pay.

Item agreed to.

St. Lawrence ship canal—surveys and investigations, $50,000.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It might be opportune for me to take advantage of this item to make a statement with regard to the point raised in discussion on the St. Lawrence ship canal. I have in my hand the communication from Mr. Charles E. Hughes, Secretary of State, Washington, which was sent to the British Ambassador on May 17, 1922, and which, amongst other representations, contains the following statement:

> The report of the Joint Commission and the accompanying report of the Board of Engineers have doubtless by this time been considered by the Canadian government. I am authorized by the President to state that he favors the negotiation of a treaty to be framed on the basis of the report of the Joint Commission, or such modifications as might be agreed upon, and I should be glad to be informed whether the appropriate British and Canadian authorities are disposed to undertake the negotiation of such a treaty.

The communication was forwarded by the British Ambassador to His Excellency at Ottawa and came before the Government a few days after it was written. The Government's view on the matter was expressed in a report to Council, the essential part of which is contained in the following paragraph:

> The minister represents, in connection therewith, that Your Excellencys' advisers have not thus far had opportunity to give to the report of the International Joint Commission and the accompanying report of the Board of Engineers appointed to examine the subject, that careful consideration which their importance merits, and that moreover, having regard to the magnitude of the project and the very large outlay of public money involved, the Government is of opinion that it would not appear to be expedient to deal with this matter at the present time.

The whole correspondence, hon. members will observe, relates to the immediate negotiation of a treaty. This Government deems it desirable to have a careful study of the report made, and possibly further expert opinion obtained in regard thereto, before a final answer is given. There was no intention to preclude further consideration and discussion.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): Has this correspondence been brought down?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It has been on the table for a couple of weeks.

Mr. HANSON: I would like to ask the minister for some little explanation of this item. I am told that a staff of engineers has been employed by the department for some time past making surveys along the St. Lawrence waterways. I merely rise for information, not to oppose the item, but in making my statement I would like to point out that I have learned that the more expensive members of this staff are being retained, and the junior members, or the lower priced men, have been let out. Now, that hardly seems fair especially, as I understand, it has created a certain amount of hardship in connection with the staff. If the work is not to be proceeded with it does not seem to me that it is necessary to retain an expensive staff, especially when we remember that expert engineers are paid as much as $10,000 a year. In view of these facts I would like to have an explanation from the minister.

Mr. KENNEDY (Essex): May I say that this item of $50,000 is exactly the same amount that was in the estimates last year, but under a different heading. Perhaps it will appeal to some hon. members who have argued in the past that the Government have rushed into expenditures that upon consideration might not have been undertaken, if I state it was felt that in so far as the deepening of the St. Lawrence is concerned the department itself, and the Government of the day, should have every possible information. The engineering staff employed are taking borings and investigating and checking matters up, so that when the issue does arise we will be in possession of first hand information on the matters to be decided. As far as my hon. friend's question is concerned I understand the staff is not larger than is absolutely necessary; there may have been some dismissals, but they were perhaps made for the reason that economy was in the air. I am told by my department, and I have every reason to credit what they tell me, that we are not carrying a single official more than is absolutely necessary to give the Government intelligent information.

Mr. HANSON: Is any boring work being done now?

Mr. KENNEDY (Essex): Some borings are being made.

Mr. HANSON: Where?

Mr. KENNEDY (Essex): At the Long Sault rapids.

Soulanges canal—improvements, $214,000.

Mr. STEWART (Lanark): I notice that the appropriation under this heading last year was $9,500 as against $214,000 this year. I would like to ask the minister why there should be such a large increase?

Mr. KENNEDY (Essex): The increase in the amount asked for this year in comparison with last year is largely on the account of the necessity for re-surfacing the roadway along the canal. The road along the canal is one of the main highways between Montreal and Cornwall. Built at the time of the construction of the canal twenty years ago, it has only been superficially repaired since and is now gradually disintegrating under heavy traffic. It is proposed to re-drain the whole road and reinforce it with macadam and asphalt binder.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What is the length of the road.

Mr. KENNEDY (Essex): Fourteen miles. We are now under legal liability for the proper maintenance of this roadway, this being a condition when settlement was made for the lands taken for canal purposes, and those situated to the north of the canal were cut off from access to existing roads. We simply have the legal liability, we cannot get away from it. The amount is the estimate that was arrived at by the engineering department and the work is absolutely necessary at the present time.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: How do you propose to do the work by contract or day labour?

Mr. KENNEDY (Essex): By contract.

Mr. McCONICA: What proportion of the appropriation goes to the building of the road, and what amount to the maintenance of the canal itself?

Mr. KENNEDY (Essex): The amount necessary for re-surfacing the roadway along the canal is $168,000 The other items are:

Reinforcing Weir No. 4	$20,000
Shop for construction of lock gates	16,000
Spare lock gates	10,000

Item agreed to.

Welland canal—improvements, $150,000.

Mr. JOHNSON: Is this in connection with the present canal?

Mr. KENNEDY (Essex): Yes, in connection with the present canal.

Item agreed to.

Rideau canal—improvements, $25,000.

Mr. BROWN: The matter of the Rideau canal has come up, and I would like to repeat what has been said by the Minister of Militia (Mr. Graham), that we must not measure everything in dollars and cents. I am heartily in favour of the principle of maintaining everything in our country that has any historic interest, and that canal has an historic interest. I think it might possibly be preserved on that account, if it would not mean too heavy a drain upon the country to maintain it, ostensibly for commercial purposes which, perhaps, it may not serve. In order that the House may know the way in which the money is being spent on that canal, I will read some details I gathered from the Auditor General's report. I do not criticise them, because I do not pretend to be in a position to do so. Perhaps those in charge of the operation of the canal will know whether the money was well spent. The figures are as follows:

Rideau Canal 1919-1920

Staff	$ 66,877 80
Bonus and sundry labour	34,679 60
Bonus	7,338 75
Repairs	102,140 94
Dredge vessels	28,965 25
	$240,002 38

The revenue was as follows:

Revenue

Kingston Mills	$ 333 00
Ottawa	3,696 66
Smiths Falls	3,198 95
Other revenues, fines, etc	385 00

I need not give the other years. They follow similar lines, and the minister might well inquire whether the money that is being spent ostensibly for commercial purposes is really serving those purposes. At the same time I would like to endorse most heartily the suggestion that the canal should be preserved because of its historic associations.

Mr. KENNEDY (Essex): I will be glad to look into the matter, but I might say, in so far as the lockmasters and other officials are concerned, that they are under the control of the Civil Service Commission, and we do not regulate the wages.

Mr. BROWN: But the matter of repairs is in your department?

Mr. KENNEDY (Essex): Yes.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What is the improvement?

Mr. KENNEDY (Essex): The amount asked for is required to replace the present inadequate bridge across the locks in the town of Smiths Falls. This bridge is situated upon a main thoroughfare of the town and is wholly inadequate to carry modern traffic. The present bridge was built in 1887 and has of late years required frequent repairs. The above work will be performed under contract.

Mr. KNOX: This is being charged to income and I would like to know what income we have from the Rideau canal.

Mr. KENNEDY (Essex): That is simply a matter of book-keeping, to differentiate between income and capital account. We could not charge it up to capital account; so we charge it to expense account.

Mr. KNOX: There is really no income?

Mr. KENNEDY (Essex): No.

Item agreed to.

Railways—to supplement pensions allowances payable under the provisions of the Intercolonial and Prince Edward Island Railway employees' Provident Fund Act so as to make the minimum payment, during the current fiscal year, the sum of $30 per month instead of $20 as fixed by the said act, $50,000.

Mr. STEWART (Lanark): I think that item was carried when these estimates were before us previously.

Mr. KENNEDY (Essex): I thought so, but was not quite sure.

Mr. JOHNSON (Moosejaw): I wish to bring before the minister a matter which perhaps is not relevant to this item, but I telephoned the Department of Railways this morning, and was told this would be the place to mention the matter. It is in connection with branch line extension. If I am not in order now, and the hon. minister will mention the item under which the subject may be considered, I will defer the discussion of it. The matter to which I refer is a small branch line extension in the southern part of the province of Saskatchewan.

The CHAIRMAN: This item relates to Prince Edward Island.

Mr. JOHNSON (Moosejaw): I quite agree, but I do not know the item under which this question might be discussed.

The CHAIRMAN: If the committee is satisfied, the hon. member may proceed.

Mr. JOHNSON (Moosejaw): This is a branch extension of the Canadian Northern Railway known as the Bengough extension. In 1919 I believe an appropriation was made for its construction. Owing to some little difficulty which arose as to location it was not constructed, although I understand the money was twice voted for its construction. As to the nature of this railway, I will not weary the committee with any of the information I have, except on one point. I desire to mention certain figures I have from one township, which is typical of the very large territory which would be served by this railway. I sent out some time ago letters asking for specific information. One of my correspondents was more specific than the other, and in order to be brief, I shall take his figures for a certain township. The figures are:

Township 1, range 30, west of the second meridian.

I asked the amount of crops produced there last year, the number of settlers, how much they could grow if they had not the railway facilities, and how many people would leave if the railway were not constructed. My correspondent has given me that information in regard to the farms in this particular township as follows:

Farmers; population of this township	151
Number of bushels of wheat grown in 1921	44,375
This township was hailed over 50 per cent on an average last year.
No. of acres under cultivation	8,030
No. of acres that can be put under cultivation	15,760
No. of acres that will go unseeded	1,000

Thirty one farmers have left by not having the railway.

I will not give any more figures to prove the facts, except to say that this is typical of a great number of townships. I took the matter up with the Minister of Railways, the deputy minister and the chairman of the Canadian Northern Railway in Toronto. I quite realize the situation presented by the minister, that money cannot be granted for railway extensions this year, particularly in view of the proposed re-organization of the board. I might say incidentally, that it seems to me high time that some steps were being taken to have that re-organization completed if we are going to get it in time to be of service to us. The officials I have mentioned have given me the assurance, verbally, it is true, very largely, but also by correspondence, which I could read but would prefer not to, that this branch to which I have referred is recognized as most important, and having one of the first claims. This information was given to me in correspondence from the department and also by the minister and the chairman of the board of the Canadian Northern verbally. I have taken their word. I ask one further concession which I think the people of that country are entitled to and which will not cost the Government anything. I refer to the location of the branch line. It was delayed two years owing to some difference of opinion over the location of the three surveys going through the country. I asked the minister, I think in April, if he could assure me that the location of this railway would, at least, be definitely settled during the present year. It will make a great deal of difference to the people in that locality, if they can know just where this railway is to go when funds are available for it. Seeing that that was a verbal communication and that it was very important to me, I rather think I endeavoured to steal a march on the minister. I do not know whether I succeeded or not. I acknowledged that verbal report in writing, in order that I might have the record for my file. I wrote the minister this letter on April 26:

Dear Sir,—I wish to give you written expression of my appreciation of your verbal promise of Monday that you would undertake to see that the location of the Bengough extension of the C.N.R. is definitely settled during the coming summer.

While of course, in view of the imperative necessity of early construction of this line, assurance of such construction would be more welcome, the assurance that the location will be definitely settled during the present summer will give some measure of encouragement to the settlers along that line.

I may add that representations of the most decided character continue to reach me.

That was on April 26, and I thought the matter was settled then. On May 2, I received a letter from the department, and I will read the last sentence which is as follows:

It is the intention that, when the new board of directors is appointed, they will go into the matter of branch lines very thoroughly, and, no doubt, the proposed Bengough line will be one of the first to be considered.

That was not definite enough for me, so I replied, and on the 23rd of May I received a letter which again made me sceptical. The minister, I am sure, will pardon me if I say that this letter from his department on the 23rd of May appeared to me as being evasive. I wanted that promise very much, so I wrote him again on the 25th of May. I wish to read this letter, and then I will ask the minister to tell me whether he intends to carry out his promise or whether he recognizes it. This letter was written on May 25 to the Deputy Minister of Railways:

Dear Sir,—Replying to yours of April 5th, again setting forth the attitude of the Government towards branch line extensions and stating that it is the intention of the Government to submit the whole matter to the new board of directors, when such is appointed, I quite agree with you that such action should be taken. Permit me to say, however, that in my opinion, the Government cannot thus entirely avoid all responsibility in the matter.

Promises have been made in years past on behalf of the government of Canada, that such lines would be extended at the earliest possible date, and it makes no difference what political party may be in control, the government of Canada is still the government, and must be responsible for any contract entered into, or promises made on behalf of the Dominion.

I fully understand from my frequent interviews with yourself, the minister and the president of the Canadian National, that these lines cannot be built during the coming year. I have, however, distinct recollection of the promise of the Minister of Railways, and by Mr. Hanna that, recognising the importance of the Bengough extension, it should be one of the first to have consideration when construction work is again commenced, if they have anything to do with it. I further have the verbal promise of the Minister of Railways that the location of this line will be definitely settled during the present summer.

While conceding, under present circumstances, that the line cannot be built during this year, I still rely on the promise of the minister and of the President of the Canadian National Railway that this Bengough line will be one of the first to receive consideration and that the location will be definitely settled during this summer.

It is on those two points that I would like a word from the minister.

Mr. KENNEDY (Essex): I think, perhaps, my hon. friend has answered himself, because I gather, from what he has said in that letter, that he still relies on the Minister of Railways and the president of the board of directors of the Canadian National Railways. I say again that this shall be one of the first extensions that shall receive the consideration of the new board. I understand that the delay in building the line was largely because the people in that locality could not decide where they wanted the line. There were two factions; one wanted it to run in one direction, and the other in another. As I told my hon. friend when he called upon me, the matter of locating a line by the board of directors of the Canadian National Railways will not be at the whim of the people of the particular district, but rather it will be located where it is essential in the interest of the people of this country.

Mr. JOHNSON (Moosejaw): I know this difficulty existed; but the local difficulty has been done away with, I think, almost entirely by conference of the people concerned. People have money invested in that locality. Only two or three days ago I received a letter from a gentleman in Montreal, who has a farm along the line, and he does not know what to do with it until the location is settled. I quite agree with the minister that, when the people have a difference as to the location of a line, the Department of Railways or the board must take the responsibility. I am quite prepared to accept that. The thing I wish to know is whether we can get this location settled during the present summer, so that people will know what their investment is and whether they will stay on and wait for the railway. They are going out now by hundreds.

Mr. KENNEDY (Essex): I have no doubt the hon. member will get the decision this summer. This is a matter which the board must decide; but I appreciate the importance of the extension, and I cannot for the life of me see any reason why they should not settle this summer where the location shall be. I certainly will bring the matter to their attention at the earliest possible moment.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): Perhaps the minister will tell the committee and the country when we are likely to have the appointment of the new railway board, and when the work of consolidation will be undertaken.

Mr. KENNEDY (Essex): My hon. friend will, perhaps, appreciate that, in order to answer a question of that kind, I would require the consent of the Governor in Council, in view of the fact that the board has not yet been passed upon by the Governor in Council. When the right time comes—and I hope it will be in the near future—I shall have pleasure in telling my hon. friend.

Mr. MILLAR: When it is possible for the department to undertake building new branch lines, will preference be given to branch lines where road beds are already built?

Mr. KENNEDY (Essex): That is a matter which the board of directors will have to decide. As they will be railway men and men of experience who will acquaint themselves with conditions throughout the country, I have no doubt branch lines will be built where most needed in the public interest.

Item agreed to.

Railways and Canals—chargeable to income—arbitrations and costs of litigation, $2,000.

Mr. MARTELL: I think this is a fitting opportunity to bring to the attention of the Minister of Railways (Mr. Kennedy) and the Government as a whole, the question of the ridiculous incongruities which exists as regards legal costs. Some time ago, I moved for a return of fees and costs paid to barristers and solicitors of the Supreme Court of Nova Scotia, and in going over the return, which is only partly here, I find that different departments of government are paying different amounts of fees. For instance, I find that where a man is asked to advise on a claim to property, that is to say, to search the title to the property, make an abstract of title and so on, he probably puts in an account of $25 or $30, which I consider to be a very reasonable amount, as he has drawn up a deed and so on. But this is very often taxed by the secretary of the Department of Justice down to the sum of $18 or $20. On the other hand, I find that governments have been prone in the past—I do not blame the last government any more than the present Government—to differentiate as between solicitors, whereas the bar societies of the respective provinces to which these gentlemen belong do not recognize a difference. For instance, regarding tthe Grand Trunk arbitration, the Government of Canada paid one gentleman from the province of Nova Scotia over $27,000. This man received fees of $150 a day; he also received $20 a day for living allowance and a sufficient amount to pay his fare wherever he was going. He is not a poor man by any means; but the government, at the outset of the arbitration, advanced to that man $12,000 for the purpose of carrying him on. That is quite a good advance to give a man, particularly when he only had to go from Halifax to Toronto and Ottawa.

Mr. POWER: Who is he?

Mr. MARTELL: Mr. Hector MacInnes K.C. of the city of Halifax. I only want to call a spade a spade. When I see other lawyers from Nova Scotia being paid $30 a day and expenses for work that they have come to Ottawa to do on behalf of the government of the country, I submit that it is absolutely unjust and unreasonable to give Mr. Hector MacInnes or any other solicitor from Nova Scotia $150 a day and $20 a day expenses.

Mr. MARCILE: Was he a candidate in the last election?

Mr. MARTELL: Yes.

Mr. MICHAUD: Is he still receiving some money?

Mr. MARTELL: I do not know; the members of the Government will probably tell you that.

Mr. CANNON: Did that gentleman have something to do with the vote overseas in the 1917 election?

Mr. MARTELL: I think so.

Mr. POWER: Then he deserves $150 a day.

Mr. MARTELL: Not out of the public treasury, though. Now, I protest against a system of this kind. I know these two members of the Bar in Nova Scotia, neither of them a political friend of mine—they are both Conservatives, I may say—who came to Ottawa and did some work for the government. One man did a lot of hard work and received $30 a day, the other man.

with no more ability,—I doubt whether he had as much—was given $150 a day and expenses. It is high time that there should be some co-ordination in the matter of legal services rendered the Government, so far as the question of allowances and taxation of costs is concerned. The people are told that it is necessary that we should have government ownership and operation of railways; and while I am not committing myself as to which side of this question I prefer, I should like to see the deficit of $70,000,000 wiped out. But if you are to have a successful administration of the railways you cannot secure it by paying $150 a day and $20 expenses to solicitors. When I moved for this return I did so for the purpose of showing to the Government that in this particular matter there is confusion worse confounded. But this is also true of every other branch of the public service; and the sooner the leader of the Government (Mr. Mackenzie King), and every individual member of it, examine into the whole system of public administration and the expenditures that are made in every department, the better it will be in the interests of economy in this country. As things are at present you have department overlapping department. One department pays a solicitor a certain sum of money for work done, and another department pays another solicitor, in no better standing in his profession, twice as much. The same thing exists in the engineering department, and it is time that the people of this country got a fair accounting and had things run in a business way. To-day the citizens of Canada are crying out, in the words of Revelation, " How long, O Lord, how long?"

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Things are getting bad.

Mr. MARTELL: But the time is coming when they will no longer raise that cry but will wreak vengance on those who are squandering their money without adequate returns. I think that this is one of the most flagrant pieces of legal robbery ever perpetrated in the Dominion. It is a most serious matter that is not to be lightly brushed aside; it is a matter of vital importance to the people of Canada. I think that if the people could only come to the city of Ottawa and go through the various public departments, where they would find men falling over one another and three men filling one man's job, there would not only be a state of Bolshevism, but there would be a rebellion that, I think, would eventually be almost condoned by any parliament. I would urge upon the minister therefore that in future we have these bills of costs taxed. This bill of Mr. Hector MacInnes has never been taxed by the Department of Justice. Now, why should Mr. Hector MacInnes of Halifax receive better treatment at the hands of the Government of Canada than any other individual? As my hon. friend from Cape Breton South and Richmond (Mr. Carroll) has pointed out, he is no better than any other lawyer who practises at the Bar in that province, and why should he not have his accounts taxed the same as any other barrister? Is this mighty Mr. MacInnes any greater than any other man? I do not think the electors of Halifax thought so in December last when they elected the present member for that constituency (Mr. Blackadder) to represent them, Mr. MacInnes almost losing his deposit. This is an important matter, and I shall ask the Government some other time to submit to the House a fully itemized statement of the costs paid to every solicitor in connection with the Canadian Northern deal and the Grand Trunk arbitration. The people will then no longer wonder why it is that government ownership does not pay.

Item agreed to.

Board of Railway Commissioners for Canada —maintainance and operation of, $221,635.

Mr. COOTE: I would bring to the attention of the Minister of Railways and of the Government a statement made by the Hon. George Langley in his evidence before the special committee appointed to consider the question of railway transportation costs. He said:

> If we do not get the Crowsnest pass agreement reinstated, we are immediately thrown into the hands of the Board of Railway Commissioners and I want to say this just as emphatically as I can say it that the farmers of the West have lost all confidence in that body.
>
> As a proof of that, when Mr. Motherwell the Minister of Agriculture, was running his election in Regina, he made this statemtnt and it is in print and he won't repudiate it. He said if he was elected as member for Regina he would put on the order books of the House of Commons as one of the first things he did a motion asking for Mr. Carvell to be removed from the Board of Railway Commissioners.

Mr. CHAPLIN: Did he do it?

Mr. COOTE: I am not sufficiently familiar with the rules of procedure of the House to know whether it is customary for ministers to do this sort of thing. I thought that possibly the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell) might have made representations to the Government since he assumed office, and I would ask the Government or the Minister of Railways whether or not he has made such representations, that is, to the effect that we should have a new chairman of the Board of Railway Commissioners.

Mr. KENNEDY (Essex): I am sure the hon. gentleman will appreciate that the proper authority to ask is the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell). As Minister of Railways I have no knowledge of the matter.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The Minister of Agriculture is here, and I have no doubt he will tell us.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Mr. Chairman, if the hon. gentleman will wait a moment, I think I have the statement in my desk—

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I may say that the Minister of Agriculture has made representations to the Government which have been carefully considered.

Mr. COOTE: Is that as far as the matter got, or has any definite decision been reached? I am asking this question because the people in western Canada are very much interested in it.

6 p.m.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That is as far as the matter got.

Mr. COOTE: Then, Mr. Chairman, in case the Government needs a little encouragement to proceed in that investigation, I want to state plainly that I believe opinion, in western Canada at least, is very similar to that expressed by the Minister of Agriculture in his election address, and I think we have good reason for entertaining that opinion. As it is six o'clock I do not wish to detain the committee, but if desired I will read a statement which Mr. Carvell made in Calgary while the Railway Commission was in that city.

At six o'clock the Speaker resumed the Chair, and the House took recess.

SUPPLY

RAILWAY COMMISSION

The House in Committee of Supply, Mr. Gordon in the Chair.

Board of Railway Commissioners for Canada, maintenance and operation of, $221,635.

Mr. COOTE: Before the House rose at six o'clock the Minister of Agriculture stated that he would make a statement to the House regarding what he had said about the chairman of the Railway Commission, and before proceeding with my remarks I should like to hear that statement made. It might not then be necessary for me to speak.

The people of western Canada are very much dissatisfied with the Railway Commission as at present constituted, and they were, I think, greatly interested in the statement the Minister of Agriculture was reported to have made in his campaign address which, I believe, was to the effect that he would have Mr. Carvell removed from the board. As the Minister of Agriculture has not yet made his statement on that point, I wish to give to the committee some reasons why he should persist in carrying out his promise to the electors of Regina.

When the Railway Commission was sitting in Calgary on April 18, 1921, the chairman is reported to have said to Mr. Wood and Mr. Brownlee, when they attempted to present a statement from the United Farmers of Alberta regarding existing freight rates, that there had been a misunderstanding and that the only evidence which the commission would hear would have to be in relation to the equalization of freight rates between the East and the West. Mr. Brownlee and Mr. Symington both protested against that attitude on the part of the chairman, but he was very obdurate, and although he finally consented to hear Mr. Wood, he warned him that the evidence he was submitting would not be considered unless it had a direct bearing on the equalization of freight rates as between the East and the West. The following day the commissioner addressed the Canadian Club at a luncheon in Calgary, and in the Daily Herald of April 19, he is reported as saying:

"A healthy railway system is just as necessary to the country as sunshine and rain, and without it the West would still be left to the Indian and the buffalo. It is not pleasant to have a man like H. W. Wood, President of the U.F.A. make the statement, as he did, that he had no faith in the railways, and that because the rates on grain have been increased the railways are no good." The speaker said that he liked and respected Mr. Wood, but that he was a man of one idea, a thing he admitted himself. He was working for the farmers alone, while the Railway Board were in such a position that they had to consider justice for everybody, not one particular section.

"I don't think that a man like Mr. Wood is entitled to very much credence," said Mr. Carvell. " I would far rather take the opinion of the average business man who is vitally affected by railway and freight rates and let him be the judge.

Now, what I would like to ask the minister is this: Does this country pay the chairman of the Railway Commission a salary of $12,000—I believe that is his salary, if not, I stand to be corrected—for the purpose of travelling around Canada and telling people that he would put no credence in the word of a man who was working for the farmer? Do they believe that we should have a different status in this country for a farmer than for a business man? I would like to point out that I think the farmer is more vitally interested in freight rates than is any ordinary business man. The ordinary business man adds the freight that he pays to the cost and he charges that to the purchaser of his goods. The farmers' price is set at Fort William and the freight is deducted from that price.

An hon. MEMBER: I thought the price was fixed at Liverpool?

Mr. COOTE: Well, Liverpool; it does not make any material difference as far as I can see. When I sell my grain I know it is always quoted at a certain price f.o.b. Fort William. I think it would not be out of place if the minister would give us his opinion in regard to this matter—whether we should continue to pay this salary to a man who travels around this country making such statements as that. The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell) addressed a meeting in Regina on November 16 at which the Prime Minister, the then leader of the Opposition (Right Hon. Mackenzie King) was present. Speaking of the necessity for reduction in freight rates Mr. Motherwell said:

He would expel Mr. Carvell from the Board of Railway Commissioners if for nothing else, but for the improprieties which he has been committing in addressing club dinners throughout the country and trying to justify existing rates.

I would like to have the Minister of Railways answer this question, if he will be good enough to, and then I think this item should be allowed to stand until the Minister of Agriculture is present and reads us a statement, which he offered to do before we adjourned for dinner.

Mr. KENNEDY (Essex): In answer to what my hon. friend has said I am sure he needs no assertion that the Government has not instructed the chairman of the Board of Railway Commissioners to go through the country making the statement that he had no faith or belief in what was said to him by farmers. My hon. friend will readily understand that no government would issue such instructions. As far as the chairman of the Railway Commissioners is concerned, the position is one of a semi-judicial character, and there must be a way under the rules of the House to lay a charge if such is warranted. I am not sufficiently conversant with the act to express an opinion, but I believe there must be some other way of dealing with the matter than the one proposed by my hon. friend when he asks that the vote for the salaries of the staff be allowed to stand over for the time being. I think this item is one which concerns the whole department, practically, and I think it is only fair and reasonable, at this period of the session, to ask that this item be passed. If my hon. friend has any charge to make against the chairman of the board I have no doubt that a means will be found to enable him to do so. The salary of the chairman, I may explain, is not included in the item under discussion.

Mr. SHAW: I think that at this stage we are entitled to a declaration from the minister in regard to the policy that is proposed to be inaugurated in respect to this matter. Mr. Motherwell, who is now the Minister of Agriculture, sitting on the same platform as the present Prime Minister made the assertion to the electors of the city of Regina which has been quoted for reasons which have already been indicated by the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Coote). I may say that I had the privilege of hearing the remarks of the chairman of the Railway Commission at the dinner in the city of Calgary on the occasion referred to. There was a great deal of talk at the dinner dealing with the justification of existing freight rates, indicating the high labour costs and indicating also that apparently the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, at all events, must get a dividend of seven per cent per annum. Now my point is simply this: If the attitude of the chairman of the Railway Commission was so unworthy of that official on November 16, 1921, it seems to me that the situation has not particularly changed since. What we want to know now is whether or not the Minister of Agriculture has implemented the promises that he made the electors of the city of Regina at that time, and if not, what action if any, is proposed to be taken in connection with this matter? The item we are discussing, I understand, deals with the salary of the Railway Commission, and I think we have the right to know what the policy of the department is on this subject.

The CHAIRMAN: I may tell the hon. member that this vote does not include the salaries of the chairman or the other members of the Board of Railway Commissioners.

Mr. COOTE: May I ask the minister whether the salary of the chairman of the Railway Commission is paid by the department? If so, has the vote for that purpose been passed, and if not, under what item does it appear?

Mr. KENNEDY (Essex): My hon. friend will see, if he refers to the Estimates the item on page 36:

> Authorized by Statute—salaries of Board of Railway Commissioners, $58,500.

The item under discussion does not deal with the salary of the chairman of the Board of Railway Commissioners.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall the resolution carry?

Mr. COOTE: May I ask the minister if stenographic reports of the evidence given at all the hearings of the Railway Commission are available at any place either for the public or for members of Parliament?

Mr. KENNEDY (Essex): I understand that when the commissioner goes out through the country he takes his stenographer with him. Stenographic reports of the hearings are taken and the transcripts of the evidence are kept. No doubt they are available for members of Parliament.

Mr. COOTE: Would the minister be good enough to take into consideration the suggestion that copies of these stenographic records should be placed in the Library of Parliament? I think it would be a very proper thing if the records of all this evidence were available to members, without having to apply to the Railway Commission for them. It is sometimes very hard to get them, through the commission. I was told by the secretary of the Railway Commission, if I understood him, that he would have to send to Toronto to get copies. It seems to me that when the proceedings are recorded, a duplicate might be placed in the library and made available to members.

Mr. KENNEDY (Essex): It seems to me the suggestion is a reasonable one. I cannot, for the moment, see any reason why it should not be complied with. I shall be glad to look into the matter, and, if possible, will have the hon. member's wishes acceded to.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I should like to ask the minister if we might have some declaration of policy with regard to the personnel of the Railway Commission? I notice in the pamphlet headed "Liberals and Labour", published from the National Liberal Committee rooms, 115 Sparks street, Ottawa, the committee rooms of the Right Hon. W. L. Mackenzie King, the statement that:

> In Parliament the liberals have advocated the appointment of representatives of labour on permanent boards and commissions like the Board of Railway Commissioners and the Board of the Canadian National Railway.

It seems to me we might well ask whether this principle has been carried out, and whether the labour people have a representative on this board?

Mr. KENNEDY (Essex): They have at the present time Mr. Lawrence, who represented organized labour before his appointment to the board. He is one of the commissioners.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Have they a representative on the board to-day?

Mr. KENNEDY (Essex): Yes, Mr. Lawrence is a commissioner on the Board of Railway Commissioners, and he was connected with organized labour when he was appointed.

Mr. STEWART (Lanark): When the House adjourned at six o'clock I think the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell) was about to make a statement. He is now in the House and possibly, we might have the statement.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I support my hon. friend's request that we should have a statement.

Mr. GRAHAM: He does not have to.

Mr. DUFF: There is too much nonsense to-night.

Mr. COOTE: I think the Minister of Agriculture stated that he would read a statement to us. I know the people of western Canada, at least, are anxious to hear it.

Mr. STEWART (Lanark): Before the resolution carries, I think we ought to know whether or not the minister refuses to make a statement.

Mr. DUFF: The hon. member has no right to say that he has a right to know whether the minister refuses to make a statement or not.

Mr. STEWART (Lanark): I do not know whether the hon. member from Lunenburg (Mr. Duff) is the authority as to what is proper.

The CHAIRMAN: The Minister of Agriculture is not introduced in this item.

Mr. STEWART (Lanark): I am simply asking if that is the position.

The CHAIRMAN: He does not require to answer the question. The Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Kennedy) is here, and he should answer questions relating to these estimates.

Mr. STEWART (Lanark): The matter was raised in the House, the question was asked, and he was prepared to answer, but if he does not care to answer now, all right.

Mr. STEVENS: I remember very distinctly quite a discussion in regard to this matter which, I think, arose again this afternoon. I have just one brief remark to make: The Minister of Agriculture pledged himself to the public in Regina, that when, and if he came to Ottawa he would fire the chairman of the Board of Railway Commissioners. Now, I took issue with him on a previous occasion on his power to do so. I think he was exceeding by far all his anticipated powers at that time.

Mr. GAUVREAU: It was a slip of the tongue.

Mr. STEVENS: I rather agree with my hon. friend from Temiscouata (Mr. Gauvreau).

Mr. DUFF: Then why talk about it?

Mr. STEVENS: But the tongue of the Minister of Agriculture is altogether too slippery. Sometimes it is desirable—

Hon. MEMBERS: Order, order.

Mr. DUFF: That language is not parliamentary.

Mr. STEVENS: If any hon. member desires to rise to a point of order, I shall be very glad to take my seat and let him raise the point but I think I am in order. I was going to point out to hon. members, as I did on a previous occasion, that there is always a constitutional, a sensible and an orderly way of doing these things. I have before me the Railway Act of 1919, and this is the way, in my estimation, that steps should be taken to criticise, question, or discipline any member of the Board of Railway Commissioners. Subsection 3, of section 9 of the Railway Act, under the heading "Board of Railway Commissioners, —Constitution"—I find the following:

> Each commissioner shall hold office during good behaviour for a period of ten years from the date of his appointment, but may be removed at any time by the Governor in Council, upon address of the Senate and the House of Commons.

As I intimated to my hon. friend on a previous occasion during this session, the constitutional method would be to impeach the chairman of the Railway Board if he were guilty, or thought to be guilty, of any act which was inimical to the best interests of the country at large, or a violation of the position that he held, and, certainly, the hon. Minister of Agriculture owes to the House and the country some explanation of the very rash, and I think irrational, statement which he made in Regina in regard to this matter. I am not here to defend the chairman of the Railway Board, but I say that it is in the interests of good government and respect for law and order, that every public body, such as the Railway Commission, the Supreme Court and all the subsidiary courts, should have the respect of the people of Canada, and that they should not be open to attack, except by constitutional method. I have stated the constitutional method. If the minister is not prepared to file a charge against the chairman of the Railway Board, he owes to him, to the country, and to his constituents, an explanation of the statement that he made on that occasion.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I will make a statement to the House in reply to the hon. member, if it is proper. The Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) made a statement in reply to the hon. member who raised the question before we rose at six o'clock which would seem to cover the point. However, if the Chairman will rule that a question raised in this committee on a matter that has occurred in the Railway Commission, and which has not yet been reported to this House, is proper, I will have no objection to reading the statement I did make, and hon. members will find, after their curiosity has been satisfied, that there is not very much in it. I will submit to the ruling of the Chair as to whether a statement made by a witness before another committee, before it has been reported to this House, is properly in order for discussion.

The CHAIRMAN: The ruling which I wish to give and to draw to the attention of the hon. member who introduced this particular matter of discussion is this, and I am reading from Bourinot at page 358:

> All references to judges and courts of justice and to personages of high official station, of the nature of personal attacks and censure have always been considered unparliamentary and the Speakers of the British and Canadian Houses have always treated them as breaches of order.

If the discussion does not go beyond the bounds of that rule, I do not know that there is any serious objection to its continuance; but I would draw the attention of the hon. member to the fact that, in this particular item, the salaries of the Board of Railway Commissioners, including the chairman, are not included; but they are included in item No. 141, and the discussion has already gone beyond the bounds of relevancy to the item under discussion.

Mr. GRAHAM: The salaries of the commissioners are paid under statute; the commissioners are appointed under statute, and we could not very well reach the chairman of the Board of Railway Commissioners in this House in this way if we wanted to do so. As a matter of fact, I had something to do with the Railway Act in the matter of the appointment of one or two of the chairmen, and the Railway Act was framed to prevent just what we are doing here now.

Mr. MACLEAN (South York): Firing the chairman?

Mr. GRAHAM: No. The Railway Act, as regards the appointment of the Board of Railway Commissioners was drafted to conform to the act under which judges are appointed and the act under which the Auditor General is appointed, so that his conduct, as theirs, is not open properly to review in the House of Commons and in the Senate in any way that might tend to influence his judgment, except in one way, and that is the way stated in the statute, of impeaching him. If he has done wrong, there is a proper method of procedure to bring about his dismissal, just as there is a proper way to go about accomplishing the dismissal of a judge or the dismissal of the Auditor General. No government in power in this country can dismiss the Auditor General, because that would make his life miserable, and it would make him inefficient in the performance of his duties. The same applies to judges, and that applies to the appointment of the chairman of the Board of Railway Commissioners just for the purpose of getting him above discussion from political or any other standpoint. The only way by which he can be reached at all is as I outlined a moment ago. If any member of this House wishes to impeach the chairman of the Board of Railway Commissioners, he must proceed as he would if he purposed impeaching a judge. On the joint resolution of the House of Commons and the Senate of Canada, he can be impeached and he can be dismissed; but in no other way can that be accomplished.

Mr. DUFF: The discussion is out of order.

Mr. COOTE: Might I ask the minister (Mr. Graham) who has just spoken, whether, if we refuse to pass the item for the salaries of any particular body, he thinks we could get rid of them in that way?

Mr. GRAHAM: No.

Mr. SHAW: The question which I addressed to the Minister of Railways (Mr. Kennedy) is to this effect: Having regard to the report of the utterances of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell) made, as pointed out by the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Coote), at a public meeting in Regina on the 16th of November, at which public meeting the present Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) was present, is it the intention of the Governor in Council or of the Government to commence impeachment proceedings against the chairman of the Railway Commission? That is the question we want answered.

Mr. DUFF: No. That is a foolish question.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I made the statement I did as a private citizen. I am now a minister of the Crown, and there seems to be in the minds of some members of this committee a doubt as to the propriety of my making the statement in this House. If I were even a private member of this House, do you think I would stand this taunt about this matter for five minutes? Not at all; but as I am a minister of the Crown, there seems to be some impropriety as such. I shall have much pleasure in showing the hon. member for Centre Vancouver (Mr. Stevens) the actual statement, and he will wonder what the trouble is all about. I am willing to show this statement to any hon. member of the committee; I am just as anxious to show it to them as they are to see it.

Mr. STEVENS: Give it to us then.

Item agreed to.

Surveys and inspections and general expenditure: Railways, including salaries and expenses of experts employed temporarily	$ 50,000
To provide for payment of expenses in connection with the acquisition of the Grand Trunk and associated railway systems and the arbitration proceedings in connection therewith	400,000

Mr. COOTE: Seeing that the salaries of the Railway Commission come under this item—

Mr. KENNEDY (Essex): They do not.

Mr. COOTE: I understood the Minister of Railways to say that they did.

Mr. KENNEDY (Essex): I beg the hon. gentleman's pardon; I said that this was immediately under item 141. If the hon. member will look at his book of estimates, he will see item 141 for $450,000; and then underneath that comes "Authorized by statute: salaries of Board of Railway Commissioners." They are not covered by this item at all.

Item agreed to.

Canals—staff and repairs, $2,265,000.

Mr. STEWART (Lanark): Will the minister give the particulars of this item?

Mr. KENNEDY (Essex): There is a decrease of $5,000 as compared with last year's vote. This vote is required for the maintenance and operation of canals.

Quebec Canals—
Quebec canals, salaries	$ 38,000
Lachine canal	309,000
Soulanges canal	177,000
Chambly canal	129,000
Carillon & Grenville	77,000
St. Anne's lock	15,000
St. Our's lock	16,500
Quebec canals dredge fleet	58,000
Hungry Bay dyke	15,000
Ontario-St. Lawrence Canals—
Cornwall	177,300
Williamsburg	84,300
Murray	14,900
St. Peter's canal	14,750
Rideau canal	208,250
Dredge vessels	30,000
Sault Ste. Marie canal	79,000
Trent canal	220,000
Welland canal	520,000
Miscellaneous	.....
General	7,000

Item agreed to.

Miscellaneous—compassionate allowance to the widow of the late James Innes, electrical foreman, who was electrocuted while in discharge of his duties on the Lachine canal, on September 30, 1921, $2,000.

Mr. CAMPBELL: Is this an annuity?

Mr. KENNEDY (Essex): No, it is merely a gratuity.

Item agreed to.

Canadian Government Railways—toward any deficiency in receipts and revenues necessary to meet working expenditures for the twelve months ending December 31, 1922, the management of the railways being hereby authorized to apply receipts and revenues toward payment of the said working expenditures, $7,000,000.

Mr. KNOX: I think the wording of this resolution is comprehensive enough, and the amount involved large enough, to justify me in speaking on a matter which I have been waiting for some little time to bring to the attention of the House. I have reference to the Hudson Bay Railway project. Earlier in the session I placed a notice of motion on the Order Paper in connection with this matter, but in deference to the wishes of the minister, on the day that I expected to take it up I allowed it to stand; and as private members' day has now passed I have been waiting for an opportunity to bring the subject to the attention of the Government. The question I refer to is the consideration of the report of the Senate Committee in regard to the navigability of the Hudson bay and the fishery resources therein, and also in regard to the ports and railway. On the 23rd of April, 1920, the Senate of Canada ordered that a special committee of the House be appointed to take evidence and report upon these matters. The order reads:

> That a special committee of twelve of this House be appointed to take evidence and report at this session upon the navigability and fishery resources of Hudson bay and strait, and of the character of the ports of said Hudson bay with regard to their fitness as railway terminals, and that such committee shall have power to call for persons and papers, and that the said committee do consist of the honourable Messieurs Bostock, Casgrain, Dandurand, Daniel, DeVeber, Fowler, Lougheed (Sir James), Michener, Schaffner, Sharpe, Watson and Willoughby.

This matter has been a live, burning question in the West for very many years. In fact, it has been discussed on the public platforms in that part of the country for over 40 years, and I have personally heard it so discussed for three quarters of that time in Saskatchewan. The people who discuss it believe earnestly in the feasibility of the project and are looking forward to the time when the matter will be brought to a successful conclusion. Some years ago it was so prominently before the minds of the people of Canada, and its success was so apparent, that both political parties adopted it at that time as part of their policies. During the discussion of this subject last year the views of the leaders of both the old parties in this House at that time were placed on Hansard, so that I need not repeat them on this occasion.

Mr. LOVETT: What has Hudson Bay to do with the item before the committee?

The CHAIRMAN: I understand that the Minister of Railways intimated in committee on a previous occasion that, with the consent of the committee, the question of the Hudson Bay Railway might be discussed on one of the last items. If there is no objection, therefore, the hon. member (Mr. Knox) may proceed.

Mr. KENNEDY (Essex): That was absolutely the understanding. When the estimates were before the committee on a former occasion we passed an item in regard to the Hudson Bay Railway on the assurance that hon. members might discuss that subject when the last item was before the committee. This item therefore affords the hon. member an opportunity to take the matter up.

Mr. KNOX: In 1910 the government of Sir Wilfrid Laurier had this matter well in hand, and in that year a bridge was constructed over the Saskatchewan river at the Pas. That was the beginning of the project, and if I remember rightly the present Minister of Militia (Mr. Graham), who was at that time Minister of Railways, turned the first sod on the occasion of starting the work. I look upon that hon. gentleman, therefore, as the godfather of the project, and I am sure we shall have his sympathy in our efforts to have this matter taken up by the Government. In 1911, the Conservative government on assuming power held up the work only long enough to check matters over, and then continued what had been begun by their predecessors. It progressed fairly satisfactorily, though slowly, right through the war years until 1918. I think the last work was the building of a bridge across the Saskatchewan river at Kettle rapids. The total cost of the project up to that time is stated in the following extract from the evidence of Major Bell, Deputy Minister of Railways, given before the committee.

> The total cost of the Hudson Bay Railway, which includes the total expenditure of every kind and covers the Nelson terminals to 31st March, 1919, was $20,851,816.53. Of that amount $14,526,560.43 is applicable to the railway, $6,325,256.10 is applicable to the terminals at Fort Nelson. The original estimate for the terminals at Fort Nelson was approximately $25,000,000. Up to date I find no report that that amount will be exceeded. If the work had continued, without interruption, and had been completed, it would not have exceeded that estimate. Of course, as traffic grows at Fort Nelson it will necessitate extension to the harbour. The original estimate of the work would not have been exceeded, but owing to the closing down of the work it will increase the cost. That estimate comprises the dredging to deep water. The $25,000,000 covers the railway and all, including one storage elevator. —maintenance and operation of, $221,635.

From this you will see, Mr. Chairman, that three years ago the expenditure amounted, roughly speaking, to $21,000,000, and had the work been continued, according to Major Bell another $4,000,000 would have carried it to completion. But although the work had been continued right through the war years, up to 1918 the government of that day saw fit to close it down.

The Senate Committee, as I said, was appointed on the 23rd April, 1920, and after taking sworn evidence from witnesses drawn from all over the Dominion, brought in a report on the 4th June following. I regret to have to take up the time of the House, but I think under the circumstances this report should be placed on Hansard, because I am afraid it has not been considered as carefully as its importance deserves. It is as follows:

Final Report

The Senate, Committee Room No. 534,
Friday, June 4, 1920.

The special committee of the Senate appointed to take evidence and report at this session upon the navigability and fishery resources of Hudson bay and strait, and of the character of the ports of said Hudson bay with regard to their fitness as railway terminals, beg leave to make their Second report, as follows:

We have held some fifteen meetings and called and examined twenty-one witnesses drawn from all parts of the country. The committee had in view acquiring information on the following points:

1. The length of the season during which the bay and strait were reasonably navigable, having in view the presence of ice, the occurrence and persistence of snowstorms, the advantages to be gained by aids to navigation such as wireless telegraphy, lighthouses, fog signals, and hydroplanes.

2. The style and size of vessels to be used for the carrying trade.

3. The relative merits of the two ports, Nelson and Churchill, and the relative cost of the development of each port.

4. The fishing resources of the bay and strait and of the rivers emptying into the bay.

5. The mineral resources of the country tributary to the bay.

6. The utilization of the country for the production of meat and furs to be obtained from the reindeer and musk ox, which would subsist upon the extremely nutritious grasses grown there.

A large number of witnesses were called with respect to the length of the season during which the bay and strait can be safely navigated. There was some variation among the several witnesses regarding the length of the season of navigation, but all agreed that the minimum would under ordinary circumstances be at least four months, while the maximum would not likely exceed five months. Voyages have been made through the strait as early as the fifth day of June, and as late as the first part of November with the ordinary type of vessel without meeting any difficulty, but these were admittedly rather exceptional cases. All were agreed, however, that modern navigating appliances such as lighthouses, wireless stations, hydroplanes and fog signals would greatly facilitate navigation in these waters and in a large measure overcome the natural difficulties from ice and snow. In order that the route would be able to compete with the more southerly channels of communication between this country and Europe, it would be necessary to have a type of freighter capable of carrying from 5,000 to 10,000 tons of dead weight, and in the opinion of this committee, from the evidence adduced before us, there would be no difficulty in handling so large a vessel on the route, provided it was properly strengthened and protected in the forward part. Of course, heretofore only vessels of smaller size have been used because ships of larger capacity have not been required.

The concensus of opinion is that Hudson bay remains open all the year through and that the ice does not extend beyond thirty or forty miles from the shore. The strait is also open for the greater part of the year, and would probably be open all the time except for the ice which comes down late in the autumn from Fox channel and obstructs navigation in the strait. It was generally conceded by the eight witnesses who gave evidence on this point that the aids to navigation which might be installed along the strait would greatly facilitate the passage and considerably extend the season of navigability.

Your committee took a large amount of evidence regarding the relative merits of the two western ports, Churchill and Nelson, and there was a considerable divergence of opinion among the different witnesses as to which of the two should have been selected, having in view the shorter railway haul in the one case and the cheaper construction of the port itself in the other. Churchill was shown to be an absolutely land locked harbour entirely protected from every wind no matter from which quarter it should blow, where a few ships could at all times ride at anchor in perfect security. Nelson, on the other hand, has no natural protection from the sea except such as it receives by reason of its remoteness from the body of the sea, there being a twenty-mile stretch of shallows between it and deep water. A narrow channel bordered by wide shallows connects the proposed harbour of Nelson with the open bay. A very large amount of money has already been expended upon the harbour improvements of Nelson but a much larger sum is still required before the present plans can be carried out. There seems to be considerable doubt whether or not, even when the proposed plans are completed, the harbour at Nelson will be an entirely safe one against an easterly gale. To utilize Churchill it would be necessary to build about eighty miles of road across a country which has been described by one witness as very difficult, it having a stretch of thirty miles of morass almost impossible to cross owing to the difficulty of getting a firm foundation for the roadbed. This is, however, denied by the testimony of two witnesses by each of whom the committee was greatly impressed. Both J. B. and J. W. Tyrell testified that there was a perfectly good and comparatively short route from the present route deflecting at a point some fifty-six miles from Nelson and going north and east to Churchill. The present harbour of Churchill is rather small, but, according to the evidence of the Messrs. Tyrell, uncontradicted, could easily be enlarged enough to accommodate all the trade likely to offer for many years to come. Beyond the present deep water harbour there is a large basin of shallow water, the bottom of which is composed of hard clay mixed with boulders, which could be easily dredged and the resultant harbour would be of its size one of the finest on the continent. The Tyrell Bros. are very familiar with the country around Hudson bay, having spent several years each in research and in examination of these regions. Mr. J. W.

Tyrell spent one winter at a station in Hudson strait taking observations for the Canadian government and also looked over the country from The Pas to Churchill on behalf of a company who had some intention of building a railway in that part of the country—a scheme which was afterwards abandoned. He had no hesitation in saying that no difficulty whatever would be found in extending the railway to Churchill. It is the opinion of this committee that the Government would be well advised if before expending any more money on the harbour works of Nelson they were to appoint a committee of expert engineers and railway builders to examine the route to Churchill and ascertain whether or not it is really possible, as the Messrs. Tyrell say, and what would be the cost and advantage of making Churchill the port and terminus of the Hudson bay road rather than Nelson.

In the meantime, the laying of the rails could be completed to Nelson, and that port could be used for the present in its present state.

While no one was able to speak with certainty as to whether the cod fish were plentiful in the bay or not, there is no doubt as to the strait. All the rivers flowing into the bay teem with fish, and walrus and seal are also found in large numbers in the strait. No doubt as soon as the Hudson bay route is established a very large and lucrative fishing industry will be established there. Recent discoveries have shown that the country surrounding Hudson bay is strongly and richly mineralized, particularly in gold and copper.

Mr. Stefansson, the distinguished Polar explorer, gave evidence before your Committee. He is a devout believer in the possibility of utilizing what have always been known as the barren lands of the north, and the islands within the Arctic Circle, in the cultivation of the reindeer, caribou and musk ox for the production of meat. He gave evidence as to the splendid quality of the flesh of these animals as food for the people, and as to the cheapness with which it might be produced. He said that the wild lands of the north which have always been looked upon as worthless could carry at least fifty million head of reindeer and ten million head of musk ox, and that the cost of handling these huge numbers would be trifling in comparison with the profit to be made. The effect of this upon the world's food supply would be tremendous, and your committee would strongly recommend that the matter be energetically taken up by the Government.

Your committee makes the following findings upon the evidence adduced before them:—

(1) That the Hudson bay route is feasible and will probably in time be profitable.

(2) That the season of navigation under present conditions is at least four months in length and may by reason of improvements in aids to navigation be considerably increased.

(3) That in the opinion of this committee sufficient care was not taken in the selection of Nelson as the terminus of the railway, and that the Government should not make further important expenditures upon this port without first making a new and thorough examination into the relative merits of Churchill and Nelson as a terminus for the railroad.

(4) That the waters of the strait and rivers tributary to the bay teem with fish and valuable marine animals, and we believe that the bay is equally well stocked but there has not yet been sufficient data collected as to the extent of the fisheries of the bay to enable an authoritative statement to be made as to their value.

(5) That the mines already discovered in the Hudson bay district are of sufficient number and richness to indicate the existence of great potential mineral wealth.

(6) Your Committee feel that they cannot too strongly endorse the valuable suggestion of Mr. Stefansson as to the cultivation of the reindeer and musk ox, and would urge upon the Government that the Department of Interior be empowered to take hold of this matter, earnestly taking advantage of what has been done in this regard by the United States government.

(7) Your Committee, although it is somewhat outside the scope of their mandate, cannot close this report without making some reference to the national value of the explorations of Vihljalmur Stefansson. He has completely revolutionized our ideas of the region within the Polar Circle. He has demonstrated that it is possible for white men to live and thrive in that northern region though drawing from no other resources than those afforded by the country itself, and he has proven that those lands which were looked upon as barren and utterly worthless will eventually be a valuable asset to Canada. The committee ventures the hope that the Canadian government will not be unmindful of the great services performed by Mr. Stefansson, whose reward so far has not been commensurate with the national importance of the work he has accomplished.

(8) Your committee expresses its thanks to the gentlemen who have voluntarily come forward and given valuable evidence upon the important matters under consideration.

(9) Your committee submit herewith an extract in narrative form of the evidence given before the committee, and beg to recommend that 1,000 copies of this report and the extract of the evidence be printed in pamphlet form for general distribution.

All which is respectfully submitted.

GEO. W. FOWLER,
Chairman.

Having given this summary of the evidence, I think it is unnecessary for me to go into detail, but I should like to point out one or two strong reasons, as they appear to me, in addition to those outlined in the committee's report why the completion of the railway and the development of a port on the Hudson bay should be proceeded with.

Since 1918 delegations have waited on the government here on a number of occasions, seeking to have this work pushed forward to completion. I have been a member of some of those delegations, and I might say I was a member of a delegation that waited on the present Government only recently in regard to this matter. Resolutions to the same effect have also been passed by boards of trade in the West on innumerable occasions, and recently the associated boards of trade of Saskatchewan passed a very strong resolution urging that this project should be pushed forward to completion. In view of the fact that railway men claim that the average life of a railway tie and the woodwork of a trestle is only seven years, more particularly when the railway is not being operated I would urge that something be done because this work will certainly deteriorate very rapidly if it is not kept in a state of repair. I know that some slight appropriation is set aside for keeping it in repair, but from the fact that 92 miles of grade remains without steel laid, we must draw the conclusion that that grade will undoubtedly be deteriorating, as it cannot be kept in repair. I might point out that steel was laid to that bridge at Kettle rapids on the Saskatchewan river, and for 92 miles between that point and the bay grading has been done but no steel laid. Judging from the conclusions of the Senate committee, I think it would be advisable for the Government during the present summer to have engineers go over the route described by Tyrell Bros., to look into the advisability of branching off at the point they mention south of Nelson and going to Churchill, because from all the evidence submitted we are forced to the conclusion that Churchill is the better harbour of the two.

Naturally I would like to see the project pushed to a conclusion right away, but I know the policy of the Government at the present time is economy, and that is my policy also, but I think a small appropriation could be made to inquire into the feasibility of this route to Churchill. I have discussed the matter with J. W. Tyrell, and he is perfectly confident that there is good railway building all the way to Churchill. He says there is a ridge of gravel running parallel to the coast which has probably been the beach of an ancient sea, and on which there is as fine railway building as could be found anywhere.

I would also point out that wonderful mineral discoveries have been made in that portion of northwest Manitoba and northeast Saskatchewan close to the Hudson Bay railway. Companies, American, British and Canadian, have secured properties there and last year 813 claims were recorded in that district, and during the month of March of the present year 240 claims were recorded, so I think we may conclude that the mineral wealth in that district is well worth looking after. In fact, the district tributary to the railway has been described as containing enough mineral wealth to pay the national debt. I would not take it on myself to go that far, because our national debt is very large at the present time, but I do know that there are very large deposits there well worth looking after.

I might also allude to the agricultural possibilities in the regions nearest to the bay, which have been settled for many years. Owing to the fact that they receive a reliable rainfall they can depend on a sure crop every year. In my own district, which is some 600 miles distant from the bay, and has been settled for over forty years, there has not been a single crop failure during that time, and from that portion of my constituency known as the Carrot river valley I have information that the amount of grain shipped during the past season ran between seven and eight million bushels. This region is even nearer the bay than the Prince Albert district to which I first referred.

We have lately been hearing something of the possibilities of shipping western wheat and western meat to the European market via the Panama canal. While this may be feasible at the same time it is difficult to believe that it will be profitable because of the length of the haul and the time it takes a ship to get around and to negotiate the canal, and also by reason of the canal tolls that have to be paid. I find from the Panama canal record that last year only 3,500 tons of Canadian wheat passed through the canal, and the tolls amount to something like $1.20 per ton. I think, though, that that represents a ton's space as known to nautical men. However, it is a very considerable handicap on the price received by the producer. I would further point out that the distance from Vancouver to Liverpool via the canal is 8,572 miles. The distance from the Hudson bay ports to Liverpool is only 2,926 miles, not much more than one-third of the total distance from Vancouver to Liverpool, and the distance from Montreal to Liverpool is 3,000 miles, so that the ports on the bay have the advantage by some 74 miles even over Montreal. This is something which, I think, should set us all pondering, whether we are interested in developing the great waterways to the head of the lakes, or otherwise. We have here a port distant I would say, only 1,000 miles from the very centre of the wheat producing area of the West. This project is something that people out there have been looking forward to seeing brought to fruition years before this, and they are still looking forward to it.

Now, Sir, I would like to point out, in view of the evidence given before the Senate committee and the report founded thereon, that in all fairness to the western provinces this project should be sympathetically considered, and some steps taken on the part of the Government towards completing the railway at as early a date as possible. I know I shall be asked the question: when is that possible? To that I would say that if we can expend between eight and nine million dollars on the Welland canal then, in all justice, let us apply at least one-half of that amount to the completion of the Hudson bay project. By so doing the Government will regain the confidence of the West, a confidence which, I must admit, has been waning of late. It has been shown that the project is perfectly feasible. The climatic conditions are not by any means an insuperable obstacle. Meteorological readings show that the temperatures were higher than those recorded at Winnipeg during the same year. It has been shown that the districts tributary to the railway and the bay carry enough mineral wealth to justify the building of the line. It has also been shown that immense quantities of fish of unsurpassed quality can be secured in this northern region, so located that they are within easy reach of the markets in the centre of the continent. Last, but most important of all, it has been shown that the project would bring the grain and the beef of the western provinces nearer an ocean seaport, and consequently nearer the markets of the world by a distance of 1,000 miles. Surely this should warrant the Government in making a favourable pronouncement on the matter. I have a firm conviction, Sir, that Providence placed the Hudson bay as a natural outlet for the great grain and beef producing areas of this Dominion; and I have enough faith in predestination to believe that it was predestined to carry, at no very distant date, the produce of the western provinces to outside markets. I would most respectfully ask the Government through the minister, to give us some assurance that this project dear to the heart of the western producer, who is so seriously handicapped at the present time, will be sympathetically considered and brought to a successful conclusion at an early date. Such an assurance would do much to restore a feeling of confidence on the part of the West, which, as I have already said, is fast ebbing away.

[Mr. Knox.]

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I would ask my hon. friend if he would recommend the building of the Hudson Bay Railway in advance of the construction of branch lines in the West that are being so earnestly pressed for at the present time? I would enumerate the following branches: Turtleford to Prince Albert; Bengough westward; Prince Albert straight north; Thunder Hill branch westward, and many others. Is it not a case of giving consideration to the most pressing demands first? The feasibility of the Hudson Bay Railway can only be proved by building it first. The kernel of the whole thing is the matter of priority. What undertakings are the most greviously needed? These branch lines that I have enumerated, and others that could be mentioned, or the Hudson Bay Railway?

Mr. KNOX: In reply to the minister I would like to say that I certainly wish to see the branch lines completed, and I emphasized that fact on previous occasions. As to the Hudson bay project I think there should be an investigation of the merits of Churchhill as a port before any further work is done at Nelson. I have already suggested that that work of investigation should be proceeded with during the present summer. I certainly desire to see the branch lines completed because the settlers in the districts concerned are in serious straits for the want of transportation.

Mr. MILLAR: I quite agree with what the member for Prince Albert (Mr. Knox) has said that it would not be wise at this time to complete the Hudson Bay railway in view of the necessity for the construction of branch lines. I would also like to add my support to the request that he has made that the Government should take steps to decide which is the better port on Hudson bay. The opening of the Hudson Bay railway may seem to be a matter in which the industrial centres of the East are not very much interested, but it appears to me that if they would look into the matter very carefully they would see that the project is one of very great importance to them. They should realize what the opening up of the provinces of Alberta, Saskatchewan and Manitoba means to the East. There was a time I think, when it was said that the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway would not pay for the axle grease, but after the lapse of a few years it was found that the construction of that railway was of very great value to the East.

Now I wish to touch briefly on a few points in connection with the territory north of where the member for Prince Albert now lives, because he is located pretty close to the northern boundary line of the settled district. Let me refer hurriedly to the southern states and say that there they can grow cotton but they cannot grow corn. A little farther north they can grow corn but they cannot grow wheat. Farther north still, in Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta, they can grow wheat but in the extreme north we find a territory where wheat cannot be successfully grown. Nevertheless they can raise oats, barley and the coarser grains much better than we can farther south. Just a week ago I was talking with a man who had spent a few weeks in Athabaska, which is about 100 miles north of Edmonton. This man was brought up on a farm in Ontario where he spent nearly all his life and he made this statement. He said "The best hundred acres of wheat that I have seen in my life I saw last summer at Athabaska" and as I already stated that district is 100 miles north of Edmonton. He told me of the districts up there where there were large settlements of foreigners. Both men and women worked the land there and were making a great success of it. I was also surprised when he told me of a large settlement of negroes, a fact of which I was not aware. Going over the report to which the hon. member for Prince Albert Mr. Knox) has referred, I say that this country that will grow rich grass, that will maintain millions of heads of caribou and musk-oxen, is a country well worth paying attention to. In the report I notice this statement:

> Muskox are found as far north as 400 miles from the North Pole.

And they are grass-eating animals. One explorer tells us he saw a herd that he estimated at a million and a half. Another explorer states that he saw a herd that he estimated at three and a half million.

Mr. STEWART (Lanark): When was that?

Mr. MILLAR: Just a few years ago. They are there in millions now. The caribou is practically the same animal as the reindeer, and in the Yukon they are being ranched and herded like sheep. The Americans are making a great success of the business. Stefansson, the explorer, says that the muskox is probably the most valuable animal in the world at the present time, and that it yields about three times as much wool of as fine quality as the sheep, and about three times as much meat. The Eskimo herd them as they would a flock of sheep. When you come to consider what cheap meat is going to mean in the near future, when you consider that our lands further south have become too expensive for ranching, and that we do not get the rain-fall they do further north, it gives one some idea of that great country north. To put it briefly, the rivers and bays are teeming with fish. I suppose some of you have the idea "Oh, that country is simply a great tract of ice and snow, that will never be settled." Why not? The same explorer states that the snowfall there is very much less than in Winnipeg. I believe the figures are from 25 to 50 per cent of the snowfall in Winnipeg, yet Winnipeg has a population about three times as large as Ottawa. In speaking of the islands of the north and of the coal area, he mentions five large islands in succession, and he states that these islands are all rich in coal, except one. It is well known that coal is very plentiful on the mainland. Some time ago I was talking to a man who had travelled around the country a great deal. He is quite a fancier of pure-bred stock, and he said: "I have never seen at the Chicago exhibitions, or at any of the other large exhibitions, animals better finished than I have seen on the grass in what is known as the Carrot river country." That is, I think, a little east of where my hon. friend from Prince Albert lives. He referred to this district in his address a moment ago.

I wish to add a word in regard to the two ports. I have looked into the matter very carefully, have studied all that I have been able to get hold of in the last two weeks in regard to the two ports, and it seems to me a mistake was made in choosing the port of Nelson. The port of Churchill is protected from all quarters from the wind. It is quite plain from the report that it could be made into one of the best—in fact, the words that were used were one of the best—ports of its size in the continent, with very little expense. I am going to make one further request, and that is this. The American people have taken steps in the Yukon—I do not know just how long ago, but some years ago—to protect their herds of caribou from the wolves. They are animals that do not readily protect themselves. Only at certain seasons of the year are the muskoxen in very great danger from the wolves, but the caribou are in danger all the year round. They have engaged a number of rangers, and are paying them from $4,000 to $5,000 each to destroy the wolves in order to protect their great herds of caribou, but the rangers turn the pelts back to the government, and the return from these pelts pays nearly all of their expenses. It may look a long way off, but I would ask the committee to consider, if a farmer had a flock of sheep, and the wolves were destroying those sheep, would he not be ready to take some steps to protect them? These are our flocks. They are a long way off, it is true, but they are ours, and the time will come when we can make good use of them, and I think in the very near future the Government ought not only to take steps to discover which is the best port, and what it will cost to build to that port, but also to take steps to gather further information about that north country, and look into the plan adopted by the Americans for the protection of their great herds of caribou and muskoxen.

Mr. BIRD: I regret to have to trespass on the time of the House in these crowded closing hours of the session, but the Hudson Bay railway is in an important part of my constituency and perhaps hon. members will tolerate me for a short time. I understand the reason for discontinuing this project was the state of our country's finances at the close of the war, and I judge that the same reason obtains as to the further suspension of the enterprise. I am not at all disinclined to give the fullest weight to that consideration. There are times when every part of the world is called upon to restrain itself, even in regard to its legitimate desires, for the sake of the common weal. But I do not think that any part of Canada ought to be asked to suffer from a discriminating economy of any kind, and I would like to see the Hudson Bay railway put into the same category as the enterprises of a similar kind in the eastern part of Canada.

I think there is a tendency in the public mind to entertain a somewhat distorted view as to the relative cost of this enterprise, and consequently as to its demand upon the public purse. Some few weeks ago I was privileged to view the Quebec bridge, and I was told that this enterprise cost something like $25,000,000, and yet there it lay quite comfortably within the sphere of my unarmed vision, a single link, a golden link if you like, in the long extensive chain of communication between the West and the East. In the Hudson Bay railway, you have, not a single link, but an entire system of communication between the great prairies of the West and a whole hemisphere; that is it opens up the prairies to trade with the Atlantic and every shore on the Atlantic. By adding less than one per cent of the total mileage of our Canadian railways, you bring the prairies actually to the sea at the mere cost of a Quebec bridge. I think that is putting the matter in the right focus.

I want to say a few words regarding that aspect of the question which deals with the natural obstructions which lie in the way of the completion of this enterprise. As regards those obstructions that lie overland, they have already been accurately measured and completely overcome, so that does not enter any longer into the discussion. The real difficulty begins only at the seaboard, and it must be admitted at once that nature has not very richly endowed the Hudson bay with natural harbours. With respect to Port Nelson, I think the facts are pretty well known already. It seems that nature has left very much to the engineer as regards that port, but in such a way as not to make it impossible for the engineer to make a very workable and successful harbour. I think a fair-minded review of the evidence shows that the advocates of Port Nelson have very much in their support, and I believe they are right in prophesying for that port a great future. It is almost worthy of a great future, standing as it does at the mouth of one of the world's greatest rivers. I am sorry this controversy has been revived at the present time to becloud the issue.

As regards Fort Churchill, it seems that nature has been a little more generous, and that there you have, in a somewhat miniature way, a natural port. It seems, however, from all the evidence that I have read, that Fort Churchill does not possess those possibilities of expansion that might conceivably some day be required. In addition to that, it would require 100 miles of additional railway to reach that port, which lies further north in a more inhospitable climate, and we are told that that railway would have to pass over very difficult ground, in fact, over a morass 30 miles in extent. If that matter could be settled in a satisfactory way, I feel that one would have to admit that Fort Churchill might be the proper place for the port in this scheme, at least, during its experimental stages. Supposing it was established as a port, and afterwards it was demonstrated to be inadequate, it might even then, when it had to give place to Port Nelson, serve as a subsidiary port especially in times of bad navigation.

It is scarcely necessary, however, to discuss the matter of a port, because the crux of this situation lies in the Hudson bay strait. The whole difficulty with respect to this scheme centres in the Hudson bay strait, where the drift ice from Baffin bay and Fox channel moves backwards and forwards with the tide all the year round and provides a serious obstacle to navigation. I have no doubt that we cannot in any way mitigate the seriousness of the obstruction that there exists to all-year-round navigation; but that it is navigable, there has been no doubt for the last 300 years. Hudson, the famous explorer, entered that strait on his fatal voyage early in July, and since that time we have records to prove that the strait has been navigated from the 5th of June until the early part of November. I think we may assume that the minimum period of navigation—and this is proved almost conclusively by the Senate committee and the evidence given there—for the Hudson bay strait is four clear months of the year. That is the irreducible minimum, therefore; but on the other hand we are told that the Hudson bay strait never freezes over; that with a properly constructed ship you could get through there at any time of the year. So, between these two limits, between the minimum of four months and that larger limit of almost twelve months in the year, you have quite a margin for the operation of modern science as applied to navigation, and he would be a bold man who would set any limit to achievements in that direction. The Senate committee had no less than eight witnesses to show that by modern appliances the strait might be navigated considerably longer and with greater safety than it can be at the present time. Having read all the evidence that is available on this aspect of the question, I have to conclude that these obstacles are not such that a born Canadian would willingly admit to be in any way insuperable. Our history is a succession of just such conquests as this enterprise sets before us.

In the history of Canada there have been many enterprises that have seemed absolutely insuperable until they have been reviewed in the light of the possibilities that lay behind them. Therefore, I want to say a few brief words in regard to the incentives that exist to overcome those admittedly serious obstacles. First of all, as regards the Hudson bay itself, this immense inland sea with approximately half a million square miles, deserves, on its own account, a humble connection with civilization. An eloquent member of this House, in the early part of this session, compared the Great Lakes with the Mediterranean sea. With greater truth I think the Hudson bay might be called the Baltic of the North American continent. The differences between the Hudson bay and the Baltic are these. It is a little more to the south than the Baltic; it is about twice the area, and it connects with an interior which is not only vaster in extent, but infinitely richer in natural resources. The Baltic has played a great part in the history of Europe. As we were told, it was the scene, in the middle ages, of a great trade league that placed Europe on the map of the world, and in later years, we are sorry to say that it witnessed the rise of a nation that was so powerful as nearly to put Europe off the map. If the Hudson bay ever becomes to this continent one tithe of the value that the Baltic has been to Europe, it will certainly have a great history before it.

Its waters, its estuaries, its rivers, are simply teeming with all kinds of finny wealth, marketable, edible fish; and its interior, as we have been told to-night, abounds in mineral and animal wealth which some day will be of great commercial importance to this country. Now, as to the land that is traversed by the railway itself, I need hardly say that the resources of the district through which the Hudson Bay railway passes are forever beyond the sphere of speculation. In agricultural value, in mineral value, in fur, wood, pulp and power, that land can no longer be classified as barren. On the Nelson river alone it is estimated that there is a potentiality of 2,500,000 horse-power, which, as is well known, is equivalent to 20,000,000 tons of coal a year. And yet there are those who would contend that this country through which the Hudson Bay railway passes is a barren and impossible country. That 2,500,000 horse-power is equal to our share in the possibilities of the St. Lawrence water scheme, and it is altogether our own, secure within the Canadian hinterland.

Now, our western wealth is not dependent upon the products of our mines, and forests, and rivers. Our future depends on our wheat fields, and some of us on this side of the House have been yearning for the sight this spring which we have missed for the first time in many years. I refer to the young growing wheat, as with swift strokes it paints the prairies and the beautiful rolling lands to the north of the three provinces. To look upon a growing field of wheat through the yellow haze of a quiet spring night is one of those things which to have seen once is to love the West forever. Some of us have yearned for that sight during this spring. On an occasion of that kind you can almost hear nature making her promise of the great wealth of autumn. Our wheat crops, in quality and quantity and in ease of production, have no equal in this wide world. But unfortunately they have one almost fatal drawback, and that is their distance from the ultimate market. The Premier of Alberta, speaking recently, said that if our western crops were as near to the markets as the crops of Ontario they would be worth approximately 100 per cent more than at present. That is a very serious consideration for the western farmer, and added to that drawback there is the immense cost of production, which is another story. It is only under great difficulties that many of our western farmers, even in the best wheat growing districts, carry on at all; and if they were as sensitive in the matter of profits as other Canadian business men are they would have given up long ago. But the farmer is not so very sensitve to the rise and fall of profits. There is a good deal of elasticity about the economic position of the farmer. Rather than give in he will take it out of himself and unfortunately out of his family. He will take it out of his bank account rather than give in. I read the remarks of, I think, one of the British Columbia members, who I presume is a protectionist, who in going through a boot factory some time ago turned to one of the western farmers and said: "Would you put these people—mostly girls in their teens—out of work for the sake of a few cents on a pair of boots?" The obvious retort was: "Would you put hundreds of thousands of farmers out of business for the sake of a few cents a bushel on wheat?" And that is what it amounts to. The western farmer stays by it and he and his family sometimes suffer considerably. Here, then, we have a scheme that brings the wheat belt within 500 or 600 miles of the sea; it brings us within easy touch of the seaboard, within a few miles as near to Liverpool as is Montreal. A speaker in this House said a short time ago that Montreal owes its superiority over Quebec as a seaport to the fact that it is 100 miles nearer to the sources of production than is Quebec. What would you say about a port 1,000 miles nearer the sources of production than Montreal? It could afford to have a good many more obstacles than it has at present. In order to put Montreal in the same position as Port Nelson with reference to the western wheat fields, you would have to transplant it to a point a little east of Winnipeg.

I think our contention goes a little deeper than I have already indicated. The western people are proud of the West. We do not talk so much about it perhaps as the eastern people do about the East, but we are just as proud of our country all the same. At the same time, while in the bottom of our hearts we are proud of it, we sometimes feel its isolation. I know I do, living 400 miles from any city of importance. We are hemmed in on all sides. To the west there is one of the world's greatest mountain ranges; to the south one of the world's greatest tariff walls; to the north the frozen regions inhospitable to man; and to the east a wilderness that is almost as forbidding as the frigid north. I wish I had more weight in order that what I say here might impress the House, but I want hon. members to feel that these conditions have had their influence upon the West in a way no easterner can imagine. No one who has not lived in the West can realize what these conditions have meant to those provinces during the last few years. They have welded us together, and given us a self-consciousness. They have brought us to the point where we have one outlook economically, one social feeling, one aspiration. One would think that in the West where we have such a miscellaneous population, of whom over 50 per cent are Europeans, there would be an ideal opportunity for the maximum of religious, racial and political friction, at least to a greater extent than in Ontario. But what do you find? In all these respects, in racial matters, in religious matters, in political matters, we have been brought together. We have been unified and at the present time we are at one in many things. Those hon. gentlemen opposite or on the right who are looking for any serious reversion in the West to the old state of things, politically or in any other sense, are, I am afraid, inviting very serious disappointment to themselves, because they are leaving out of consideration the economic factors that have driven us together in recent years. Out West if Protestant and Catholic, Jew and Gentile, European and Canadian, and Grit and Tory did not get together and capitalize their humanity, life would not be worth living at all. They simply have to do it, and I should like this House to remember the tremendous urge that is behind the movement represented in this quarter of the Chamber.

So it would be unreasonable, Mr. Chairman to expect that such a large body of population as we have in the three prairie provinces existing under the same economic conditions practically one unit, a vigorous, ambitious, self-conscious people, should permanently be content to be frustrated of even a visionary hope of getting an avenue to the sea—the great way of commerce. I do not think it reasonable to expect that we will forever submit to being denied a "place in the sun".

Now, it would be very regrettable if any other section of Canada should obstinately refuse to the West this privilege because, mark you, Mr. Chairman, if you read history rightly, it is just the opposition to that kind of aspiration that causes all the trouble. We have heard a lot about the origin of the Great War. What was its origin? It was simply that the great bullying commercial nations of Europe denied to little Serbia its right to an avenue to the sea for the purposes of commerce. That was the beginning of the war. I do not think, in fact I am sure that there is no such sanguinary possibility in these circumstances, but statesmen are always willing to take into account the remotest considerations when the uniting of a great country like this is concerned.

I for one stand very solidly for the loyalty of the West, despite its 50 per cent European population. I think there is no section of Canada more loyal than the West. But, mark you, I am not inclined to get sentimental about it, just the same, because I recognize that loyalty, sterling virtue as it is, is always finally over-ridden by economic necessity—the first law of our being.

Now, as you pass up the St. Lawrence and enter Canada you are struck with one feature in particular—those narrow strips of farms, so picturesque and peculiar, that run back from the water's edge away to the distant bush. I presume that that condition of things arose in the early days when the St. Lawrence was the only channel of inter-communication, and that the original settlers were indisposed to be pushed back into the interior and denied access to that channel. That method of planning out homesteads is not economically justifiable. But it has led to general contentment and has certain picturesque characteristics. But I mention that peculiarity because the feeling of the original settlers is something like that which the people of the West feel —they want to be at the front, to have a place at the water's edge. That is all the West wants. It wants a breathing point, an ocean avenue whereby it can come in touch with the rest of the world.

Coming into this building one notices this inscription above the doorway:

> The wholesome sea is at her gates,
> Her gates both east and west.

I wonder who was responsible for selecting that inscription. It must have been some one who was against the Hudson Bay Railway proposition, I know. I think some day that couplet ought to be amended, and if I am a judge of poetry, you could not very well hurt its poetic qualities by adding these words:

> —and the north.

I hope that amendment will be made so as to render the inscription apt and accurate to the condition of things which will then obtain.

Mr. STEWART (Humboldt): Mr. Chairman, speaking in this House the other day I remarked that the people of western Canada believe that the case for the completion of the Hudson bay railway had been made out. That belief has been entertained for many years, and as long ago as I can remember in the West the people have referred to this project as feasible. In 1906, I believe it was, the Hon. Walter Scott, the first Premier of Saskatchewan, speaking to a large audience of farmers of that province, remarked:

> "The people of western Canada refuse to take their eyes off the Hudson bay route. For twenty years they have been looking that way."

That was in 1906. The hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Knox) stated to-night that this project had been in the minds of the people of western Canada for forty years, and this is borne out by the facts. The Hon. Walter Scott continued:

"I have received an assurance that the Dominion government admit this project to be a national undertaking, and that they will not deny their responsibility."

It was a number of years later before the Dominion government assumed that responsibility.

I want, if possible, to make clear to this House some of the reasons why the people of western Canada believe that they have made out their case conclusively with regard to the Hudson bay project, and to this end I shall quote the words of Sir Wilfrid Laurier. I believe the first time that in a public way the admission was made that this was a national undertaking, and would be undertaken in a national way, was at Niagara Falls in September 1908, and these are the words of Sir Wilfrid Laurier as reported at that time:

"We have undertaken the construction of another railway, the Hudson bay railway. The Hudson's bay railway, I am sure, does not appeal very much to the people of Welland county. It concerns more the people of the West. But I say to you, gentlemen of Ontario, and you will agree with me, that what concerns one portion of the community concerns every part of the community. Now, we have come to the conclusion that this railway is a necessity, owing to the condition in which our fellow-citizens in the west are placed. This railway will give an alternative or optional route. At the present time all the wheat as soon as it is tracked is sent out to lake Superior. We want to provide another railway by Hudson's bay. There will then be the present route and the Hudson's bay route and the man who raises wheat and cattle will have two outlets for his production. We have been asked: "Are you not going to hurt the trade of the St. Lawrence, if you do that?" Oh, ye of little faith! the trade of Canada is too great even for these two outlets. What we see coming will be more than sufficient for both the St. Lawrence and the Hudson's bay routes. We have come to the conclusion that the time to build this railway is now; not to-morrow, but now; and we have surveyors in the field looking at the condition of the country and preparing plans for us, which we shall be prepared to put into execution as soon as we receive them. The Government will build the railway, or rather somebody will be entrusted with building it for us, but whatever we do, all the terminals and all the elevators shall be built by the Government, and retained under all and every circumstance by the Government so as to insure the largest measure of benefit possible to the Canadian people in the North-West provinces."

Speaking that same year and referring to the speech of Sir Wilfrid Laurier, Mr. later Sir Robert Borden, said:

The Conservative party has been pledged to the building of that railway since 1895, when it was promised by Sir Charles Tupper. The present Government has reached the same conclusion in the thirteenth year of its administration.

[Mr. C. W. Stewart..]

In the light of those statements, Mr. Chairman, I think it is only reasonable to assume that the people of western Canada believe their case is well made out, and they feel that if there is opposition to this route on the ground that it is not feasible, they have a right to claim that a report shall be made to them setting forth the circumstances in that respect.

I also want to place before the committee a few extracts from other reports which have been quoted in western Canada. The hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Knox) has given to the committee tonight the last report that has been placed at our disposal, but for many years, at least since 1905, there have been a great number of reports made available to the people of this country on the Hudson bay project, and I believe that all these reports are now available to members of this House in the Library of this Parliament. I have gathered a few extracts from these reports which I shall give to the committee to show why the people of western Canada, having faith in the accuracy of these reports, believe they are justified in demanding that this route shall be carried through to completion.

The first extract is from a report made by Walter Dickson, for twenty years in the employ of the Hudson's Bay Company:

"From what I have observed of the movement of ice in Hudson bay during the summers I passed there I am perfectly assured that an ordinary screw steamer would never have any difficulty in getting through or around that ice which is usually met with in the bay or strait. The chief reason why the old sailing vessels of the Hudson's Bay Company often met with detention in the ice was that in the season when floe ice is met with, there is generally very little wind, and sailing vessels are as helpless amongst ice as they would be in a dead calm in the centre of the Atlantic or elsewhere. The bay has always been found of ready access to a good and careful navigator. From what is known, and my experience already obtained on the subject there is every reason to believe that were the Hudson bay thoroughly surveyed it would be found to be one of the safest of known seas. I have known the season when the harbours were accessible for seven months of the year.

Another captain in the employ of the Hudson's Bay Company, James Hackland, for thirty-nine years with the company, says: "The strait is open all the year round." Captain Colin Sinclair, for six years with the Hudson's Bay Company, says: "No unusual danger or difficulty in navigating the bay or strait." Captain Silsby, in the employ of the company from 1884, "saw no reason why steamships could not make excellent speed on that course to and from Europe for four months certainly in the year, and in open winters, five months." Captain Kennedy, with the company ror eight years, "found no ice after July first and only once on November first. The currents which open up the channel of ingress and egress are very regular and convert the bay and strait into a pathway for commerce."

These reports from which I have quoted, and similar reports, are probably the basis upon which the people of western Canada argue that the Hudson bay route is feasible. Their reason for requiring that route has been put before the committee with some detail in this debate by hon. gentlemen who have preceded me, and I am not going into that part of the question at this time. I simply want to point out that agriculturists in western Canada, in the position in which they find themselves at the present time are forced to look for every means which might alleviate their circumstances, and they have found that by attacking those things which were a hindrance to them and overcoming them, one by one, they have for a great many years been able to carry on in the face of countless obstacles. The cost of transportation before them at the present time is a problem they feel they must tackle and overcome. They believe that if this route were open, although it might not add greatly to the returns, would be of material help. The most optimistic figure is that it would add very materially to the returns, and that it might possibly mean all the difference between Fort William and Montreal, which is eleven or twelve cents a bushel, at the least. The most conservative estimate is that it would mean a difference of five cents a bushel on wheat, which at the present time would be something worth while for the western farmer.

Two or three hon. members who have spoken on this subject to-night have been so situated locally that this project appeals to them and their constituents in a personal way, because they are so close to the route and to the bay, comparatively speaking, but we must remember that all of western Canada is very much interested in this project, and not only western Canada but the northern states as well. It is perhaps not generally known that Winnipeg would be 600 miles closer to Liverpool via the Hudson bay route as compared with the railway route at the present time via Montreal. Duluth would be 470 miles closer than it is via the Great lakes. St. Paul perhaps the greatest market in the western states for their grain, would be 150 miles closer to Liverpool via the Hudson bay route than it is via Chicago and Montreal. This is something that should be taken into account in considering this question.

In conclusion, I wish to refer to a letter I have in my hand, not that it has any particular bearing on the subject for, as I stated in the early part of my remarks, this is a national undertaking, as the Hon. Walter Scott said, and one which must be undertaken by the federal government, but it is from a correspondent who lives in a community which is in the unique position of having gone after a railroad and got it—not that they persuaded any great railway company to build for them, but when they could not get the railway company to build it they went to work and got out a charter and constructed the railway themselves. It is now a part of the Canadian National system. This correspondent urges me to take up this matter of the Hudson bay route, and suggests that if the Dominion of Canada is not in a position to finance it at the present time a charter should be granted to some of the western farmers, and they would finish the road themselves. He states in his letter that he is ready to pay $1,000 into any company that would be formed for that purpose, and he believes the project would meet with success. That shows you, Mr. Chairman, that the farmers of western Canada are not talking about this project as something which they believe in only theoretically, but they regard it as something that is absolutely practical.

Mr. CALDWELL: After listening to the recent speeches, I cannot help but agree that the Hudson Bay railway is needed, and needed badly. I know something of the want of an outlet for the produce of our farms in the East, and while I do not live in western Canada, I believe that unless we can look at these questions from a broad national standpoint and be willing to help the other fellow as well as ourselves, we shall not get very far. But I did not rise to speak on this subject. Would the minister inform the committee who are the directors of the Canadian National Railways at the present time.

Mr. KENNEDY (Essex): Mr. Hanna, Mr. Mitchell, Mr. Riley, Mr. Hobson, Mr. Wood, Sir Hormisdas Laporte, Mr. Barnhill, and Mr. Bell.

Mr. CALDWELL: Is Col. Cantley still a director?

Mr. KENNEDY (Essex): No.

Mr. CALDWELL: Is it proposed to make any changes in the personnel of the directorate of the government railways at the present time?

Mr. KENNEDY (Essex): The whole question of the directorate of the government railways will be taken up by the Government in Council when the consolidation of the railways is considered.

Mr. CALDWELL: My purpose in asking this question was because we had a speech in this House by the present Prime Minister on May 19, 1921, a small portion of which I wish to place upon Hansard. When I have done that I think it will be obvious why I asked the question I did.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax): It is in Hansard now, are you going to put it on record again?

Mr. CALDWELL: Yes, with the permission of the House I am going to put it on record again because very few members ever go back and read last year's speeches. It is punishment enough to listen to some of the speeches this session.

Mr. GRAHAM: We are doing it.

Mr. CALDWELL: I have not wasted very much of the time of the House this session, and I think what I am going to read is very pertinent to the present question, if it were not I would not seek to waste the time of the House. The debate from which I am about to quote took place on the refusal of the former government to give information to this House in regard to certain expenditures by the board of directors of the government railways. I am not going to quote all the speech because, I think, that speech occupied a longer time in delivery than all the time I have taken up in speaking in this House possibly for two years. Beginning at page 3609 of Hansard of 1921, the right hon. gentleman said:

> Compare this now with the methods devised by the present administration in the expenditure of public moneys on those vast transportation systems. Both in the case of the Canadian National railway and the merchant marine, the government has constituted boards of management. These boards are composed almost exclusively of the government's own friends; almost without exception the gentlemen who compose these boards are associated with large industrial enterprises and businesses which are engaged in the manufacture, selling and distribution of the equipment and supplies required by these government undertakings. In the awarding of contracts, they are given a perfectly free hand. They may award to whomever they please, in whatever quantities they please, and at whatever prices they please. That of itself one would think, where there was no personal liability, and where the moneys to meet the required payments were not coming out of the bank accounts of the parties concerned, but out of the public treasury, would be sufficient to encourage an all but unlimited degree of extravagance. But what is to be expected where, in addition to this opportunity of helping one's friends, an undertaking is given by the ministry that, no matter what the transaction, notwithstanding it is out of the taxes of the people that payments have ultimately to be made, the people's representatives in Parliament shall be denied all right of inquiry, all right of information, on the score that such right and knowledge are not in the public interest? And yet, Mr. Speaker, that is exactly the situation as it has existed for the past couple of years, and as it exists to-day. Is it any wonder there are huge expenditures and colossal deficits? The wonder of wonders would be how deficits could be avoided under such a system.
>
> Now, Mr. Speaker, that it may not be said this is a mere theorizing, let me give to the House the names of the members of the boards concerned, and the names of the companies with which these gentlemen are concerned. But, first of all, let me give a list of a few articles of commerce required in connection with the equipment and supplies of these transportation systems. It requires no understanding of human nature to believe that, unless the gentlemen who are directors of companies directly or indirectly concerned in furnishing such equipment and supplies are woefully neglectful of the business interests it is alike their duty and personal advantage to watch and further in every manner possible, the companies of which they are directors, or businesses associated with such companies, are not likely to be forgotten in the contracts awarded, and in the prices paid for the articles necessary to the equipment and supplies of these vast transportation systems.
>
> But before I speak of the companies with which these gentlemen are connected in a business way as directors, let me refer to the classes of commodities which are likely to be required in large quantities as supplies and equipment for the government railways and the government merchant marine.
>
> Iron and steel (locomotives, rails, cars, castings, couplers, bolts, bars, etc.)
> Cement.
> Oil; coal oil, white lead oil, boiled linseed oil.
> Gasoline.
> Lumber and timber, for car decking and roofing and for construction (fencing).
> Paints.
> Cotton and wool waste.
> Uniforms for conductors and employees.
> Coal.
> Foods of all kinds.
> Ties.
> Pullman and sleepers materials.
> Electric materials.
> Fuses.
> Wheels.
> Hose.
> Air-brake materials.

Tie plates.
Hotel supplies.
Insurance.
Advertising.
Printing.

It requires only the mention of this list to show what enormous patronage is extended through this particular source—a patronage running into millions of dollars; and all of it, mark you, under this arrangement is disposed of by the Government's friends just where they think best, and the people's representatives in this Parliament are denied all knowledge of where the contracts are placed. Now who are the members of the Board of Directors of the two companies? The personnel of the two directorates is the same, and is as follows:

Mr. D. B. Hanna, of Toronto.
Mr. A. J. Mitchell, of Toronto.
Mr. E. R. Wood, of Toronto.
Mr. R. Hobson, of Hamilton.
Major G. A. Bell, C.M.G., of Ottawa.
Sir Hormisdas Laporte, of Montreal.
Mr. A. F. Barnhill, K.C., D.C.L., of St. John, N.B.
Colonel Thomas Cantley, of New Glasgow, N.S.
Mr. R. T. Riley, of Winnipeg.

What are the companies with which these gentlemen are connected? Now, Mr. Speaker, I wish it distinctly understood that I make no reflection upon any of these gentlemen or their business integrity, I merely place the information before the House and let it speak for itself. This list is taken from the annual Financial Review for June, 1920, and, by the way, it does not, I believe, begin to include the companies with which these gentlemen are connected in an indirect way, nor is it complete as regards the companies of which they are directors, Mr. D. B. Hanna, is president of the Canada Flour Mills and a director of Canada Steamship Lines, Limited; Electrical Development Company of Canada, Limited; Canada Mortgage Investment Company; British-American Assurance Company; Western Assurance Company; Canadian North Prairies Lands Company; Brazilion Traction, Light and Power Company, Limited; Rio de Janeiro Light and Power Company; Sao Paulo Light and Power Company. Mr. A. J. Mitchell is a director of the Western Canada Flour Mills. Mr. R. T. Riley is vice-president of the Union Bank of Canada and of the Great West Life Assurance Company. Mr. Robert Hobson is president of the Steel Company of Canada, Limited, and a director of the Canadian Locomotive Company, Limited; Bank of Hamilton; Tuckett Tobacco Company, Limited; North Star Oil and Refining Company; Chartered Trusts and Executor Company; British Empire Trust Company; Dominion Power and Transmission Company; Toronto General Trusts Corporation. Sir Hormisdas Laporte is a director of Credit Foncier Franco-Canadian; Société d'Administration Générale; Frontenac Breweries, Limited; La Sauvegarde Life Assurance Company. Mr. A. P. Barnhill is president of the New Brunswick Electrical Company and the Acamac Land Company, Limited, and a director of the Eastern Trusts Company; St. John Iron Works, Limited; James Pender and Company, Limited; Telegraph Publishing Company; Fenton Land and Building Company; Westfield Land Company; Times Publishing Company. Colonel Thomas Cantley is a director of Eastern Car Company, Limited; Nova Scotia Steel and Coal Company, Limited; Brandram-Henderson Paints and Varnishes. Mr. E. R. Wood is president of the Central Canada Loan and Savings Company, vice-president of the Canada Life Assurance Company; National Trust Company; Brazilion Traction, Light and Power Company, Limited, and director of British-American Assurance Company; Western Assurance Company; Canadian Bank of Commerce; Dominion Steel Corporation; Toronto Savings and Loan Company; Calgary Power Company; Mexico Northwestern Railway Company; Barcelona Traction, Light and Power Company, Limited; Rio de Janeiro Tramway Light and Power Company; Soa Paulo Tramway, Light and Power Company; Mexico Tramway Company; Mexico Electric Light Company; Toronto Railway Company; Toronto Power Company, Limited; Toronto Electric Light Company, Limited; Electrical Development Company of Canada, Limited; Dominion Securities Corporation, Limited.

Major Bell, being the Deputy Minister of the Department of Railways and Canals, is not included in the list of directors of any companies. I imagine that if he is doing his full duty as a deputy minister, which I believe he is, his whole time is taken up in the department and practically none of it can be given to the work of this Board of Management.

In this connection, Mr. Speaker, let me repeat that I do not for a moment desire to be considered as reflecting upon the honesty or business integrity of the gentlemen connected with these various boards. All I wish to say is that if these gentlemen are directors of a large number of business enterprises from which commodities in the nature of supplies and equipment for the railways and merchant marine can be or are being obtained, they are not true to their obligations as directors of those business concerns if with the inside knowledge they have of what is available in the way of contracts they do not go after those contracts and try to get them for the companies with which they are connected. That is their duty. The duty of a director is to watch the interests of the businesses with which he is connected, and I say that these gentlemen being on the board of directors of various companies, and having knowledge of large numbers of contracts running into millions of dollars, it is certain that they would not be doing their best by the companies of which they are directors if they did not look out for the interests of those companies.

Could interlocking of directorates be carried to a degree of greater perfection? Just think of it, Mr. Speaker, all these vast industrial concerns, and many more, to all intents and purposes represented by this little circle of favoured individuals who comprise the board of directors of the government railways and merchant marine, who have a free hand in the disbursing of millions upon millions of the public moneys, with a guarantee that no information will be given to the people through their representatives in Parliament as to how or to whom the moneys were distributed. Need we look further, Mr. Speaker, for an explanation of the size of the deficits in these undertakings, and the vastly increased expenditures, and consequent increased taxation to which the people of Canada are being subjected. Would a more powerful combination of business interests be imagined? What government under such a system should be able to keep itself in power indefinitely?

In view of this statement by the hon. member who is at the present time Premier of Canada—and we are told that this board of directors is the same to-day, as it was at that time, with the exception of one man, who, I presume resigned in order to run as a candidate in the election last fall—in view of the fact that we saw in the newspapers just before the election last fall, in big headlines, a statement to the effect that contracts had been let to the Canadian Locomotive Company and the Eastern Car Company, amounting to an aggregate of $25,000,000, and this was used as campaign literature last fall, and in view of the fact that we are asked to vote $114,049,500 for the upkeep, or for payment of the deficits on the national system, I think it is due this House that some explanation should be made, and that some guarantee should be given that if this condition was as terrible as it was declared to be last year, there should be some changes in this board before the vote is passed. I have not discussed this matter with any other member of the House. I happened to be absent from the House this afternoon and when I came in I found the House was in the middle of the estimates.

I want to offer these few remarks and comments in the manner I have done, and I think an explanation is due to the House, as to what is proposed to be done, in connection with the present board of management of the government railway.

Mr. KENNEDY (Essex): My hon. friend stated that he was not in the House this afternoon, but I may tell him that the hon. member for South York (Mr. Maclean) asked a question this afternoon bearing on this point, and, in my reply, I told the hon. member that the Government hoped at an early date to be in a position to announce its board of directors to govern, not only the Canadian National lines but the Grand Trunk as well; in a word, the board would be provided for when the co-ordination took place. When the time comes the Government will make the announcement to the public. In the meantime, I can assure my hon. friend that what he has said, and everything, indeed, that bears upon the question of the fitness of any gentleman to occupy a position on that board, will be fully considered before the appointment is made.

Mr. CALDWELL: Has any investigation been made into the report that huge contracts were let to the Eastern Car Company and the Canadian Locomotive Company just previous to the election. If those contracts were let at what date were they let; what was the size of the contracts, and who let them?

Mr. WARD: Before we leave that question of the new directorate, I would like to ask the minster if he intends in the reorganization of that board to give the employees representation on it.

Mr. KENNEDY (Essex): That will also be considered when the opportune time arrives. In regard to the question the hon. member (Mr. Caldwell) asks, I do not understand that there were any contracts given to the Canadian Locomotive works just previous to the election.

Mr. CALDWELL: It was so reported in the papers, and I never saw any contradiction of it.

Mr. GARLAND (Carleton): I wanted information in regard to the highways, and I thought it would come up under item 134, but I observe that only provides for payment for services. I asked some questions in regard to the Ottawa-Kingston and Ottawa-Pembroke highway, and the reply was that nothing had been done in regard to having the highway projects submitted to the federal government. The question was asked by the hon. member for Wentworth (Mr. Wilson) as follows:

Road projects in Ontario

Mr. Wilson:

1. What road projects have been submitted to the Department of Railways and Canals by the Ontario Department of Public Works?

The answer gives a list of some 30 roads, but neither of the roads that I have referred to is mentioned in the answer. The next question is What road projects have been approved by the Department of Railways and Canals?

And neither of these roads appears in the answer. These roads are pretty well on the way to completion, and I wondered in what way the amount was paid from the federal treasury towards those roads.

Mr. KENNEDY (Essex): So far, there has been no application by the Ontario government for the approval of any plan in connection with the two roads he mentions and no roads bought by the Dominion government.

Mr. CALDWELL: The minister has not answered the first part of my question. I asked if the contracts had been let to either firm. He said no contract had been let to the Eastern Car Company.

Mr. KENNEDY (Essex): No, to the Canadian Locomotive Company.

Mr. CALDWELL: Was there a contract let to the Eastern Car Company?

Mr. KENNEDY (Essex): I understand there was a contract let to the Eastern Car Company for the repair of 500 cars. The matter was discussed when my estimates were before the House previously. The whole evening was spent discussing it. I think the former Minister of Railways on that occasion explained that the contract was let at that time with a view to relieving the unemployment that then existed.

Mr. CALDWELL: That was the only contract let. No contracts for new cars?

Mr. KENNEDY (Essex): No, they were all for repairs.

Mr. CALDWELL: Do you know the amount of the contract and the date?

Mr. KENNEDY (Essex): I cannot give an answer at the moment, but I will be glad to obtain it for my hon. friend, and give him full particulars with reference to it. In fact, a copy of the contract was laid on the table of the House at the time.

Mr. EVANS: Coming back again to the question of the Hudson Bay railway, I can remember away back about 1891, not long after I came to Canada, one of the leading papers in the West had a cartoon in which appeared a locomotive, with the engine driver sitting at the lever, just about ready to start. A questioner came up, and said, "Well, sir, what do you hope to carry over this road anyway?" And the driver replied, "The province, my dear sir, the province." The engineer happened to be Sir Charles Tupper. This road for the last forty years has been made the political football of the parties, and I think it is about time that we dealt with these matters with some broad outlook for the future. I do not wonder that this has been the case, particularly after the information that my hon. friend in front of me has given to the House to-night. This Hudson Bay railway is one of the necessities of the present time, and has been for many years. When Sir Wilfrid Laurier was in the West in 1911 he said this line would be built as soon as the survey could be made and the feasibility established, with ports, terminals and everything under governmental control and ownership. Later on, it was promised by Sir Robert Borden, and after the change took place in 1911, when the call from the West became so insistent that it could not be put down, the construction of the road was begun. Some $21,000,000, I believe, has been spent on this road already, and it will take somewhere about $2,000,000 more to complete it. For many miles north of the Pas at the present time the steel is laid, and the grade has already been made to tide water. The steel has been left to rust and the grade has been left to crumble down, and it is time we looked after this to prevent the deterioration of the work that has been done. I know that, during all this time, this railway has been viewed with hostility by interests in the East, by those cities and railways which are benefiting by keeping the commerce of the western prairies coming this way to its ultimate market. The plea has been put forward that we have no money, notwithstanding the fact that millions of dollars have been voted for other purposes, which, to say the least, are of questionable benefit to the country at this time. But now that the war is over and labour is plentiful, we find the counter proposal put forward, which is attracting interest in the East at the present time, namely, the deep waterway scheme to the head of the lakes. We are told that nearly half a billion dollars can be found for this scheme, while $2,000,000 cannot be found for the completion of the Hudson Bay railway.

Indeed, I think it would not be out of place to make some few comparisons between these two schemes at the present time. The deep waterway project can be used possibly for seven months of the year, and we might compare the cost of the completion of this scheme with the paltry sum that is needed to complete a route to what will, perhaps, be and is admitted to be one of the finest harbours on the North American continent, if a deep sea harbour at the least possible cost can be constructed. Some doubt may be expressed as to the feasibility of this route; but this great inland sea seems to have been placed there by Providence for an outlet for what is, perhaps, the largest pastoral and grain growing area in the world. It is a route to the great West, and part of the immense domain that was seized on by that great trading company, the Hudson's Bay Company, over two centuries ago to take in supplies and carry out the produce gathered from the natives in barter. We know that, during all that time, this great company did not lose one ship by ice or storm, and its captains of navigation have told us that they have gone in and out through those straits at any time of the year that they have been ready. We have been told that this great inland sea is one frozen mass of ice during the winter. This is not so. With the great volume of fresh water flowing into the bay every day through such streams as the Nelson river, the Churchill river, the Severn river and, perhaps, half a dozen other streams just as important, meeting the tide there which comes up through those straits every twenty-four hours, and all having to go out again, it is impossible that any ice could be formed except some shale ice on the shores. We used to be told that the country round about was one desert on which nothing could grow, on which human beings could not live. We know that now to be a fallacy, and that the railway would pay for itself independently of the traffic and commerce that might go out through the Hudson Bay strait. Anyone at all familiar with salt water will know that it is many degrees warmer than fresh water, and as compared with lake Superior, this is a fact. When we know that there is a rise and fall of a good many feet every twenty-four hours, we must realize that it is impossible that ice should form. We have been given a good deal of information about this route by certain expeditions, some of which before now have wintered in Hudson bay. Perhaps one of the most complete reports is that given by Captain Freakly before the committee here in 1920. Some extracts from his evidence are certainly very interesting. I do not think I need weary the House with much reading; but he says:

> There are no icebergs in Fox channel or Hudson bay and comparatively few in the west end of Hudson straits, but numerous in the eastern portion of the straits.

He informs us of some of the peculiarities of the bay, where a strong current goes west from the straits and practically goes all around that great inland sea, attaining sometimes a velocity of seven miles an hour and keeping all ice moving at any time of the year.

I am convinced that the Hudson Bay Railway is the only salvation for agriculture on the western prairies. For instance, a trainload of cattle could be landed at the bay terminus of the Hudson Bay Railway in just about one-third of the time that it takes now to land them at any point where they can be transferred to ocean-going steamers. This would mean a saving in feed and care of nearly four days, besides the tremendous shrinkage in weight consequent upon the movement of livestock. The advantage in mileage of this route is not generally realized, say from the centre of the wheat belt to the bay. Moreover, the producing area of the West, either in grain raising or for pastoral pursuits runs up very close to the bay itself, and I believe the northern limitation of wheat can be very much extended yet as the right varieties are propagated. From Saskatoon, which is about the heart of the wheat growing belt, it is 742 miles to tide water on the present route of the Hudson Bay Railway. From Saskatoon to Fort William it is 900 miles, and then we are further away from Liverpool than we are at Hudson bay. On this account alone, there would be a saving of over 160 miles, or over one and one-half day's travel. But even after getting to Fort William there is still 1,000 miles of a haul before the grain can reach the seaboard. The distance from Saskatoon to Liverpool via St. John in the winter months is 4,998 miles; from Saskatoon via Montreal in the summer months it is 4,587 miles; from Port Nelson to Liverpool the distance is only 3,708 miles, or a distinct saving of 879 miles over the route via Montreal and a distinct saving of 1,280 miles over the route via St. John. The utility of this route is unquestionable, if we only consider that it is important to the people of the West to be within one day's run to the ocean where the fish may come down to the millions who occupy the prairies, as well as the millions yet to come.

Again, we must not lose sight of the fact that the St. Lawrence carries about the highest rate of insurance of any navigable route in the world, while here is a route that has been used for 40 years now by people we know and who can speak of it with some knowledge. Sailing vessels have gone in and out any time of the year they were ready. When we consider the cost it means the difference between success and failure to the prairie provinces to-day. There will be a saving of at least 5 cents a bushel between Hudson bay and the present route to the present terminal at Fort William. The time has come when it is absolutely necessary to lower the cost of production on the prairies if agriculture is to continue there. Even if we did have the deep waterway to the head of the lakes we have a road that could be open six and a half or seven months at the outside during the year. But I am convinced from what I have read from the evidence contained in this bulletin that navigation can be carried on for at least five months in the year with safety, as compared with any other navigable route in any part of the world. Several of the most valuable minerals are found along the route of the railway, besides timber, game, fish, etc. I think, therefore, that the work should be done. All the boards of trade as well as the farmers' organisations of western Canada are anxiously looking to the Government to complete this work, believing that it is going to be of great service to that part of the Dominion. Besides, the work already done is deteriorating, and much labour and material is going to waste. It is not too late yet to provide for this matter in the estimates for the present year. There is no scarcity of labour, and in fact thousands of men are anxiously waiting to get work. I do not think there was ever a more opportune time than the present to carry this work to a completion, and I should like to know what the policy of the Government is regarding the scheme. Are we to take it now that the policy of the Government is represented in this estimate of $40,000 for the care of terminals this year? The Government should let us know whether they intend to complete this road at the earliest possible moment, and what reason there is why the work cannot be proceeded with at the present time.

Mr. McBRIDE: I think it is time we had a change in this programme. Most of the Progressive members speak of the West as though it comprised just Alberta, Saskatchewan and Manitoba. One would imagine that these were the only places in the West. Well, I consider that coming from British Columbia I come from the West. We have heard a great deal of the Hudson Bay railway, and I do not object to hon. members putting their claims before the Government. I think that is their legitimate right and they should get every consideration. But I want to point out that we have been promised a railway in British Columbia for many years now. It was left in abeyance until the close of the war, and when the war was over the late government started work on it to give employment to returned men. Now I am told that between 200 and 300 of these men have bought land along that road and have settled, expecting the road to be completed and that they would then have transportation. I am referring to the railway between Kamloops and Kelowna. According to a report I have received from the Minister of Railways, there has been $5,265,000 spent on this railway, and it requires a little over $1,250,000 to complete it. The ties are there, the bridges are in, the rails are very largely there, and everything is ready to complete the work. This road would be one of the greatest feeders that the Canadian National system could have. It would take practically all of the freight from the Okanagan valley to the Canadian National railway which is now taken by the Canadian Pacific railway. I do not complain because the Canadian Pacific railway has this freight, but I think that we should look to the interests of our own railways, and the Minister of Railways ought to see that this line is completed at the earliest possible date.

Mr. WARNER: I just want to add a word to the discussion on the Hudson bay question. It is not considered very seriously by some people, but this is perhaps because of their lack of appreciation of the facts. Now, I would not ask to-night, nor in the near future, for what the people are hoping for in the district in which I live. We have great possibilities in our mines, and we ourselves can hardly conceive the undeveloped natural resources that we have. We would not ask that the Hudson Bay railway be completed for our especial benefit at the present time, but there is a hope that some time when that road is completed there will be built a connecting line between our district and Fort Churchhill, which is not more than about 800 miles from Edmonton. But the Hudson Bay railway must be completed before we ask for anything of that kind. Naturally, of course, we are looking forward to the time when that can be done. The people in the wheat fields of Saskatchewan are more directly interested in the matter than perhaps we are, but I have been practically half way across from Edmonton to Fort Churchill, and have seen people already settled in that country from 125 to 150 miles distant from railways, who are anxiously waiting for railway accommodation. A large portion of that country is suitable for settlement. There is other wealth there besides agriculture, and I found that in places thousands of tons of hay could be cut if there were transportation facilities; but in the present state of things it is simply going to waste. Perhaps such a railroad at this time would not pay, but we are looking ahead to when it would be not only advisable but necessary, for I have no doubt that the Hudson bay route is feasible. There is no question about the desirability of the Hudson bay route, but we will never know whether it will be a practicable outlet until we try it, and the people in our part of the country are very anxious that this should be settled one way or the other.

I feel that Canadians generally do not realize the immense potentialities of that part of the Dominion, and I believe that it is our own lack of enterprise rather than any natural handicap which has held back its development. I know people who are developing that country successfully, but they are very much discouraged by reason of lack of transportation facilities, and they will not continue their work until such facilities are provided. For instance, fish teem in the lakes there, and I heard a man state before the Board of Trade of Edmonton last winter—he was interested in a fishing company—that it cost as much to send fish from a small town on the Great Waterways railway to Edmonton as from the Pacific Coast clear through to Winnipeg. Therefore if a road were constructed from that country eastwards it would afford an outlet for the great mineral, agricultural and timber and fisheries wealth of that extensive country.

The people of Alberta join with the people of Saskatchewan in the hope that some time a railroad will be built through to Fort Churchill and so afford an outlet for the cattle, grain and other products of the settlers who are developing that country.

Mr. EVANS: What is the policy of the Government regarding this road?

Mr. KENNEDY (Essex): I am sure that every member, irrespective of the constituency he represents or his party affiliations, is interested in the transportation facilities of the West. It does not matter very much to most of us whether the grain be shipped eastward via the Great Lakes, westward to the Pacific coast, or northward, to Hudson bay; but we are all interested in seeing that every facility shall be afforded the grain growers of the West to market their grain at the lowest possible cost.

This Hudson bay project, as has been stated to-night, has cost so far approximately $20,000,000. The estimates I have seen indicate that it will take another $5,000,000 to complete the railway to the bay, and an additional $10,000,000 to complete the terminal facilities.

We have been told to-night that notwithstanding our expenditure of $6,000,000 at Fort Nelson we should abandon that port and select Fort Churchill as the terminal. You can readily see, Mr. Chairman, that the Government can scarcely be expected to give an immediate answer to the question submitted to it when even among those who are advocating the completion of the project there is no unanimity of opinion. I did tell the delegation which the hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Knox) referred to this afternoon that when the new board of directors of the Canadian National Railways was organized the matter would be brought to their attention, and I have no doubt they will at the earliest possible date give it the consideration it deserves.

Mr. KNOX: Is there a likehood of an investigation this season of the desirability of selecting Fort Churchill as the terminal?

Mr. KENNEDY (Essex): I am not in a position to answer the question at the present time. That matter will have to be determined by the incoming board.

Mr. STEVENS: Was not an exhaustive investigation made some time ago?

Mr. KENNEDY (Essex): Yes, some years ago.

Mr. KNOX: There will be no tendency on the part of the Government to allow this matter to drop?

Mr. KENNEDY (Essex): There is not any tendency on the part of the Government to refrain from doing anything which they conceive to be in the public interest, and when the opportunity offers—as we hope it will at an early date—this problem, among many others, will be taken into consideration.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: In answer to a question asked a few minutes ago by the hon. member for Dauphin (Mr. Ward) the Minister of Railways (Mr. Kennedy) said that the matter of appointing an employee on the reorganized board of the Canadian National Railways would receive the consideration of the Government. Now, it seems to me that this House might rightly expect a rather more definite answer, I quoted a little earlier in the evening the policy of the Liberal party as set out in a pamphlet which was distributed broadcast throughout the country. Here it is:

The Liberal policy to-day. In Parliament the Liberals have advocated the appointment of representatives of labour on boards and commissions like the Board of Railway Commissioners and the board of the Canadian National Railways.

Mr. HANSON: That is scrapped.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: It is suggested that this policy is scrapped. That, it seems to me, is for the Government to say. This is not a matter that requires mature deliberation as I see it. It has been advocated by the Liberal party, and I think a good many of us will admit that it is of great importance to a considerable section of the community. Therefore now it is contemplated to reorganize the board of the Canadian National Railways I think we have a right to expect assurances that the policy advocated so recently by the Liberal party will be put into effect. It seems to me that we ought to receive something more than simply the stock answer, "It will be given consideration." I hope the minister will see his way to give us more definite assurances to-night in regard to this matter.

Item agreed to.

Post Offices—outside service, $28,833,200.40.

Hon. CHARLES MURPHY (Postmaster General): Just a word of explanation as to this item. The committee will observe that as compared with the estimates of last year there is a decrease of $700,470.85. I might explain for the information of the committee that this decrease is due in the first place to the dropping of a number of positions whose incumbents have left the service; secondly, to the reduction of the amount required for temporary assistance during the year; and thirdly, to the dropping of an amount that was formerly voted for what is called a provisional allowance, but which has been replaced by the cost of living bonus.

Mr. STEVENS: Is this saving the result of the reorganization undertaken last fall in the department?

Mr. MURPHY: To a certain extent, but not altogether. Under the heading of miscellaneous in this item, there is a net increase of $29,250. This is due to the increased amount required for printing and stationery, for the manufacture of postage stamps, stamped envelopes, post cards, and other requisites of that kind, but even with this small increase there is still a net decrease of $700,470.85 in the whole item.

Mr. STEVENS: An hon. member desired me to get certain information as he could not be here. It is as to the greater use of our National Railway system for the carrying of the mails. I am not prepared, as he was, to discuss it fully, but I should like to bring to my hon. friend's attention the situation which exists to-day in British Columbia, and I have no doubt it is duplicated in other sections of the country, not through any intentional neglect on the part of the department, I believe, but through the growth and development of the National Railways in recent years.

There is a section between the city of Kamloops and the northern part of British Columbia served by the Canadian National Railways. Any mail that is posted in that district is carried to the city of Kamloops, then down by the Canadian Pacific to Vancouver; it goes into the post office at Kamloops and is sorted there, I believe, causing a delay, whereas the Canadian National runs daily trains right into Vancouver, and the mails could be carried on just the same schedule as the Canadian Pacific makes, the Canadian Pacific not touching the district at all.

There was the question also of sending mail into the considerable town of Prince George. The Canadian National could very well carry that mail from Vancouver to the Yellowhead, and then send it back on the Grand Trunk Pacific into Prince George. At the present time we send it all up the coast five hundred miles by Prince Rupert, a much longer distance, to Prince George and taking perhaps a day longer, and costing as much if not more. What I wish to say is this. I think a careful study should be made of the whole mail service, and that more business should be given to our National Railways than they are receiving at the present time. This is somewhat a large question to enter into in any extensive manner, and I am merely giving a very rough outline and simply enunciating what I think is the principle that should be adopted.

I may add this. We now have a schedule on the Canadian National Railways from Montreal to the Pacific coast that equals the Canadian Pacific schedule. They do not carry mail, I understand, on their fast trans-Canada train, but No. 1 on the Canadian Pacific and No. 1 on the Canadian National have a similar schedule; one is just as fast as the other, and there is no reason in the world why a great deal more of the mail of this country should not be carried over the National railways.

Mr. MURPHY: The matter to which my hon. friend has drawn the attention of the committee, as well as of the department, is one of very great importance to the great province which he has the honour to represent in this House. I may inform him and the committee that the whole question is a very wide one and entails a good deal of consideration, much investigation, and a careful decision after these preliminaries have been carried out. It happens that at the present time such an inquiry is under way, and after the House prorogues it is the intention of the department to have one of the inspectors go over the whole route between here and the coast with a view to determining on the spot what changes can be made in the direction indicated by my hon. friend. Wherever it is possible to do so, preference will be given to the carriage of the mails by the National Railways, but this has to be borne in mind, that in view of the economy prescribed by the Minister of Finance, and of the financial condition of the country, with which my hon. friend is as fully conversant as I am, regard must be had to the cost of carrying the mail. Just on that point I might explain that in connection with one of the new railway services, the establishment of a daily train service between Edmonton and Prince Rupert, application was made for a corresponding change in the mail service; that is, instead of a tri-weekly mail service, there should be established a daily mail service. At first glance that seemed the most natural thing in the world and personally, before seeking the advice of the officials of the department, I was inclined to favour it, but a few days later, after the matter had been thoroughly gone into, and I found from the reports presented to me that even this seemingly proper change and, at a superficial glance, this small change would alone entail an extra expenditure of nearly $75,000. Well, I had to hesitate before giving any instructions for the adoption of this change. I mention this merely as one illustration of how much money even an apparently slight change will run into. However, I can assure my hon. friend and the committee that special attention is being given to the postal service generally, and British Columbia will receive its full share of attention in this regard.

Mr. HANSON: How much in dollars and cents was saved to the department by reason of the recent reorganization, and secondly, what is the policy of the department with respect to the establishment of new rural free delivery routes.

Mr. MURPHY: In answer to my hon. friend's first question I may say that while I would be very pleased indeed to give the exact information for which he asks, I am informed that it is not possible to do so principally for the reason that the Post Office Department is one of the departments in which the re-organization was not completed at the time that the firm engaged in that work was discharged from its duties. Now the policy with regard to the establishment of additional rural mail routes has of necessity during the last few months continued to be that applications for new routes have been taken into serious consideration but up to the present time the Postmaster General has not been advised by his trustworthy officials that it is safe to venture on new expenditure in that direction. However, better things are hoped for in the future. I might add, for my hon. friend's information, that the practice of establishing new rural routes was suspended during the war and has not since been resumed.

Mr. HANSON: I quite appreciate that fact and that is why I asked the question. I would like to point out to the Postmaster General and to his officials, that people living in rural communities who desire these extensions of new routes get very little other service from the Dominion Government; they are located for the most part in back districts. Nearly all the thickly settled districts in my county are now well served; but there are communities which have not received free mail delivery and are very jealous of those communities which do have them. As every member of this House knows, the people in such districts are persistent in their requests for the extension of this service, and it is a matter which, I think, should receive the very sympathetic consideration of the Postmaster's department just as soon as the finances of the country will permit.

Mr. MURPHY: I entirely agree with the observations that have just fallen from my hon. friend, and I hope, before the expiry of the present year, to be able to act upon them in a practical way.

Mr. GARDINER: I would like to inquire from the minister what the attitude of the department is going to be in regard to the contracts that may expire during the coming year. Does the department propose to keep these rural mail routes open?

Mr. MURPHY: If I correctly apprehend my hon. friend's question he desires to know if it is intended to renew the rural mail contracts which may expire during the present year?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes.

Mr. MURPHY: Well, each case will have to be considered on its own merits. Generally speaking I know of no reason now why these rural mail contracts should not be continued; but, as I have just observed each case will have to be considered on its own merits.

Mr. GARDINER: I presume that means that providing the department can get reasonable tenders it is intended to continue those rural mail routes that are in operation at the present time? Is that the intention, or is it proposed to operate only some of them?

Mr. MURPHY: If the tenders are reasonable I do not know at the moment of any reason why those contracts should not be continued.

Mr. EVANS: What is the salary of railway mail clerks, letter carriers, and similar employees? Is the salary to be continued as it was before?

Mr. MURPHY: In reply to my hon. friend I may say that the salaries of railway mail clerks are graduated on a scale running from $840 to $1,560, and in the case of letter carriers from $780 to $1,260. I believe, however, there are some exceptional cases in which the maximum is a little larger than that mentioned.

An hon. MEMBER: Plus the bonus?

Mr. MURPHY: Plus the bonus. In regard to the bonus I may inform my hon. friend that the employees of the Post Office Department will, of course, share in whatever bonus is granted, in accordance with the announcement made by the Prime Minister a few days ago, in the same way as the employees of the other departments.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: This matter of a bonus, I suppose, can hardly be discussed here but I would remind the minister that in the West the postal employees, before the bonus system was instituted, received ar extra allowance of $180 a year. When the bonus system came in, that special arrangement was cancelled. In that respect then it seems to me that we have somewhat of a right to inquire, even at this stage, as to what the salaries for the year of postal employees, mail clerks, and other public servants of that kind will be. I would like to know whether the Government has in view the revision of the salaries of these men so as to bring the stipend up, in the case of lower paid employees, to a decent standard of living. Seven or eight hundred dollars, I think, is not a sufficient salary to enable a man to live decently to-day.

Mr. MURPHY: In answer to my hon. friend I may say that the question which he has raised is one that has been under discussion. However, the salaries to which he has referred, are fixed by the Civil Service Commission, and it is my intention as soon as the House prorogues to take this matter up specially with that body and see what can be done, if anything, in the way of meeting the view expressed by my hon. friend. The extra allowance of $180 to which the hon. gentleman alluded was dropped and was replaced by the bonus. That has been the situation within the last couple of years.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: One other question. Have we to wait until the session is over so that we may ask the permission of the Civil Service Commission to increase the salaries of the employees of this Government? It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that if there are salaries being paid that are lower than a decent cost of living—lower than the cost of living as decided by the government's own bureau —that matter should not be left to any Civil Service Commission to decide, but that it ought to be decided here and the necessary instructions given to the Civil Service Commission.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. MARTELL: That is right. Will you vote to change the law?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I will vote to change the law in that respect.

Mr. KENNEDY (West Edmonton): I understand that the rural mail routes and the cost of running them are included in this item?

Mr. MURPHY: Yes.

Mr. KENNEDY (West Edmonton): I would like to ask the minister if there is anything in the contracts against subletting? I know that in a particular mail route that I am familiar with—I refer to that from Peace River west to Dunvegan —we have had during at least seven years a very poor mail service; and I think that in every case where we have had a poor service it has been due to sub-letting the contract. The good service that we had during three years was attributable to the fact that the parties who had the contract were reliable farmers who had good horses and were able to make the trips in time; but whenever the contractor who has the original contract starts in to sublet he can always get someone to accept it at a very low tender. It usually works out that the lowest tenderer gets the contract and very often he has not the stock to do the work. I think the minister ought to undertake to prohibit the subletting of these contracts entirely. I would like to ask also if the minister has any objection to giving full information as to who has the contract for the particular route referred to? I would like to get exact details as to who is actually doing the work at the present time.

Mr. MURPHY: Will my hon. friend mention the route again I did not quite catch it.

Mr. KENNEDY (West Edmonton): From Peace River to Dunvegan or Spirit River.

Mr. MURPHY: I regret that I have not any information at hand at the moment, but I will obtain it and give it to my hon. friend when a subsequent item relating to the Post Office Department comes up for consideration. I will be very pleased to furnish that information.

Mr. BLACK (Yukon): In connection with the item for Yukon mail service, Mr. Chairman, I would like to call the Postmaster General's attention to the fact that during the winter months the people of the Yukon get no parcel post service; only first and second class matter is carried, and I do not think the public get a sufficiently good service for the money expended. They get what the contract calls for, and I quite appreciate that the contract was made by the minister's predecessor in office, but it is none the less unsatisfactory to the people of the Yukon on that account. I would ask the minister to give the matter his attention and try to secure for the public a better service.

Mr. MURPHY: Although we have been in office but a few months, we have not overlooked the important part of the Dominion which the hon. member represents in this House. I am informed that his statement with regard to the parcel post is quite correct, and that matter will receive attention. Another matter which has been receiving attention, but does not relate to the winter service, is the proposal regarding a mail service by aeroplane to the Yukon. As with other suggestions, we have to look at that through glasses of economy, and we do not know what the position will be. I am not able to say at the moment, but the Yukon is receiving attention, and the observations which the hon member has addressed to the House will be specially looked into.

Item agreed to.

Progress reported.

On motion of Mr. Graham, the House adjourned at 11.30 p.m.

The House met at three o'clock.

PRIVATE BILLS

FIRST READINGS

Bill No. 134 (from the Senate), for the relief of Roy Wilbert Shaver.—Mr. Wilson.

Bill No. 135 (from the Senate), for the relief of James Henry Boyd.—Mr. Boys.

RECIPROCITY WITH AUSTRALIA

On the Orders of the Day:

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Leader of the Opposition): In the budget speech the Finance Minister referred to negotiations for reciprocity with Australia commenced by the late government and prosecuted further by this Government, but mentioned that no progress had been made since the refusal of a certain proposal advanced by Canada. I read in the London Times of date June 2, a Melbourne despatch of June 1, as follows:

> The government has submitted to the government of Canada proposals for tariff reciprocity.

The Times adds:

> This is a sequel to the recent arrangements between Australia and New Zealand reported by our correspondent in the Times on April 8.

May I ask the government if this report is correct, and if so are they in a position to state what advance has been made since Australia's proposal was presented?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, it is correct that the Australian and Canadian governments are at the present time in correspondence by cable respecting reciprocal tariff arrangements between the two countries. I do not think it would be in the public interest to disclose at this particular moment the nature of the proposals.

Mr. MEIGHEN: May I ask if it is correct that the proposal has been made as stated on June 1, by the Australian government?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: As to its being a sequel to the arrangement with New Zealand?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The Times says that the Australian government has forwarded to the Government of Canada proposals for tariff reciprocity, is that correct?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It is the other way round. Our Government made proposals; those now alluded to are modifications of an original proposal that was not accepted.

Mr. MEIGHEN: But the present proposals are from Australia?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes.

UNEMPLOYMENT SITUATION

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Centre Winnipeg): I believe that the Unemployment Service Council of Canada has recently been meeting and has brought in some recommendations in regard to unemployment. Would it be possible to furnish these recommendations to members of the House, or will they be at all available? I think, in view of the unemployment situation and the fact that we shall shortly have a report from the committee dealing with Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment, it would be wise to have these recommendations before us.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think that the council referred to by my hon. friend is in the nature of an advisory council to the Minister of Labour. Whether the minister will think it wise to make public the recommendations made to him I am, of course, unable to say, but I shall have pleasure in bringing the question of my hon. friend to his attention.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk).

SENATE AND HOUSE OF COMMONS

Mr. BLACK (Yukon):

1. Is the total amount of expenditure in connection with the House of Commons as shown on page sixteen of the main estimates, without taking into account any amounts that may be supplementary estimates, $1,703,390, and the expenditure for the Senate as shown on the same page the sum of $561,205?

2. Why is the Chief Accountant of the Senate, as shown on page seventeen of the main estimates, paid $4,020, and the Chief Accountant of the House of Commons paid only $3,450 as shown on page nineteen of the estimates?

3. How are these officers classified to make this difference in salary?

4. Does the Chief Accountant of the Senate have to furnish bonds in connection with his office?

5. Does the Chief Accountant of the House of Commons have to furnish bonds in connection with his office?

Hon. Mr. COPP:

1. Yes, in so far as the House of Commons is concerned.

2. The Chief Accountant of the House of Commons was classified in 1908 as Accountant and Chief of Miscellaneous Branch with a salary range of $2,800-$4,000, annual increases of $100 per annum. The annual increase of present incumbent starts 1st October in each year, therefore $3,450 is voted in the estimates to complete the year ending 31st March, 1923.

3. The position of Accountant of the House of Commons has been classified by the Civil Service Commission with a salary range of $2,100-$2,700, increasing at the rate of $120 yearly.

4. No information.

5. Yes.

IMPERIAL CONFERENCE

Mr. DESLAURIERS:

1. Is it the intention of the Government to take part, during the present year, in an Imperial Conference in which amendments to the British North America Act will be discussed?

2. If so, will Parliament have an opportunity of discussing this question before the departure of the Canadian representatives?

Right Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE KING:

1. The Government has not received any intimation of an Imperial Conference being held this year.

2. Answered by No. 1.

ST. VINCENT DE PAUL PENITENTIARY

Mr. DESLAURIERS:

1. How many men are employed at the St. Vincent de Paul Penitentiary?
2. What are their names and nationality?
3. How many convicts are actually in said penitentiary?

Hon. Sir LOMER GOUIN:

1. 120.

2.

Nominal roll of permanent officers employed at St. Vincent de Paul Penitentiary as on June 8th, 1922.

McLEOD POST OFFICE

Mr. COOTE:

1. What was the gross revenue of the post office at Macleod for the last two fiscal years?
2. Has the Government any idea of the unsuitability and the inadequacy of the present post office building at that point to serve the needs of the community?

3. Does the Government pay rental for the building now used as a post office?

4. If so, what amount, and to whom paid?

Hon. Mr. MURPHY:

1. Year ended 31 March, 1921, $11,027.75; year ended 31 March, 1922, $10,091.24.

2. The Public Works Department is endeavouring to obtain more adequate accomodation.

3. and 4. The postmaster provides his own building for which he receives the usual allowance based on the revenue, covering rent, etc. This allowance amounted to $750 for the last fiscal year.

Mr. DUNCAN McPHERSON

Mr. BLACK (Yukon):

1. Was there in the Internment Operations Branch, Department of Justice, an official named Duncan McPherson?

2. Is he still employed by the Government?

3. Has he been offered superannuation under what is known as the Calder Act?

4. If so, has he accepted same?

Hon. Mr. COPP:

1. Duncan MacPherson is employed in the Internment Branch of the Department of the Secretary of State.

2. Yes.

3. Mr. MacPherson has applied for superannuation under The Calder Act, and his application is now pending before the Treasury Board.

4. Answered by No. 3.

MAIL SERVICE—LACHENAIE, QUE.

Mr. GARLAND (Carleton).

1. Was J. Z. Tisdale, of Lachenaie, County of l'Assomption, Quebec, awarded a contract on October 8th, 1919, for the carriage of mails?

2. If so, has this contract been cancelled and when will it be terminated?

3. What is the reason for the cancellation of the said contract?

Hon. Mr. MURPHY:

1. Yes.

2. The contract will be terminated on 4th August, 1922.

3. The reason for the action taken is contained in the following clause in the contract:—

"Le Ministre des Postes se réserve aussi le droit d'annuler le présent contrat lorsqu'il sera d'opinion que l'intérêt du public l'exige, en donnant trois mois d'avance avis par écrit à l'entrepreneur."

QUESTIONS TO BE REDRAFTED

On the questions being called:

Mr. CHURCH:

What action does the Government intend to take to disallow an act and schedule agreement of the Province of Ontario for the alienation of 3,000 square miles of Ontario's Resources to an American citizen, E. W. Backus, without any tender whatsoever or adequate survey of this English River Limit and to see that the interests of the Dominion are safeguarded and protected and to protect the exploitation of the Public Domain without tender?

Mr. CHURCH:

1. Has the Government of Canada agreed with the Government of Ontario to appoint a Joint Board consisting of four Members to regulate and control the outflow of the waters of the Lake of the Woods so as to maintain the level of the lake and also of the waters of Lac Seul and of the Winnipeg River?

2. Has the Government decided to introduce legislation this session to repeal an act of the Parliament of Canada "The Lake of the Woods Regulation Act, 1921, being Chapter 38 R.S.C. 1921," and at whose request?

3. Will the Government lay on the table all documents, letters, correspondence, and any other material dealing with this matter with the Government of Ontario, or any other person or persons?

4. Why has the Government agreed to a political settlement of this question which should be settled by engineers?

5. What International Treaty, if any, is there covering this question or will the Act introduced by the Government of the Province of Ontario not interfere with the consummation of such an International Treaty?

6. What Interprovincial and International Legislation is there in existence at present on this subject and why should the Dominion surrender its rights at the behest of the Province of Ontario?

Mr. SPEAKER: I would ask the hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Church) to redraft the first question in accordance with Rule 37. In this connection I would draw the hon. member's attention to Bourinot, page 313. The same remark applies to the second question, particularly to paragraph No. 4. I would remind the hon. member that according to Bourinot no question of an argumentative nature can be placed on the Order Paper.

On the question being called:

Mr. GARLAND (Carleton):

1. Why did the Government grant the increase of $1,000 to Deputy Ministers?

2. Why does the Government propose to cut off the bonus from all civil servants receiving $2,400 or over, and from many single persons under that amount?

3. Does the Government intend to grant more equitable salaries to the Civil Service?

Right Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I ask, Mr. Speaker, if this question does not come within the scope of the ruling you have just given, particularly paragraph No. 3?

Mr. SPEAKER: I would not think that it was so much against Rule 37 as question No. 7. At all events I will let the question stand and examine the point.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURN

Mr. COOTE:

1. How many hotels are owned by the Canadian Government Railways?
2. Are each of these hotels being operated by the Railway?
3. What was the cost of construction and equipment of each of these hotels?
4. What is the present value of each hotel and equipment?
5. How much fire insurance is carried on each hotel and equipment?
6. What was the revenue of each of these hotels in each of the last three fiscal years?
7. What was the expenditure in connection with each of these hotels in each of the last three fiscal years?
8. In each of said hotels what was the net profit or loss in connection with the operation, including all charges such as insurance, interest on investment, and allowances for depreciation on building and equipment?

UNOPPOSED MOTIONS FOR PRODUCTION OF PAPERS

Mr. STEVENS:

For a copy of all letters, telegrams and documents or correspondence passing between the Order of Grain Buyers and the Board of Grain Commissioners or passing between the Order of Grain Buyers and the Government or between the Board of Grain Commissioners and the Government or officials thereof respecting the said Order of Grain Buyers.

Mr. HUMPHREY:

For a copy of all letters, telegrams, petitions, memoranda, Orders in Council, Minutes of Council, and other documents in the possession, or under the control of the Government of Canada or of any department thereof, of date subsequent to April 30th, 1920, relating to the proposed reclamation of the area in the Province of British Columbia and the State of Idaho known as the Kootenay Flats.

ANIMAL CONTAGIOUS DISEASES ACT AMENDMENT

House again in Committee on Bill No. 62, to amend the Animal Contagious Diseases Act, Mr. Gordon in the Chair.

On section 1,—compensation.

Hon. WILLIAM R. MOTHERWELL (Minister of Agriculture): When this Bill was under consideration by the committee last week, the committee seemed to agree with the schedule of indemnities, with the exception of that relating to pure-bred cattle. Since then I have looked up the list of pure-bred cattle, as compared with the list before the war, and I feel that I would be justified in agreeing to the representations made by a number of hon. members in the committee, with respect to this indemnity of $150, and, in moving that this indemnity be raised to $200. The former indemnity, at the high water mark, was $250. The proposal in the bill was to make it $150; my suggestion is to make it a straight $200 for pure-bred cattle, and, if it is agreeable, I will move the amendment.

Mr. SALES: I would second the amendment.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: A number of hon. members are particularly interested in this matter, and seem to be all agreeable to this. I, therefore, move that the words "One hundred and fifty dollars" in line 18, section 1, be struck out, and the words "Two hundred dollars" be substituted therefore.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. KELLNER: I wish to call attention to what I consider an unfair basis of valuation for cattle. Evidently the question whether an animal is pure-bred is the only thing that determines the valuation of a cow. I think a hand-milked cow, especially one that has a production record, should receive some special consideration in the valuation, and if the valuation of a pure-bred cow is increased to $200, I would suggest that milch cows be raised to $125, especially in the West. In British Columbia the average price of milch cows, according to the report from the Government, is $85, whereas in Alberta it is $48, in Saskatchewan $49 and in Ontario $59. The only source we have for obtaining milch cows in Alberta is from Ontario, and a $59 cow in Ontario, after paying the cost of freight and so on, is only a $49 cow in Alberta. I therefore request that the Government raise the price of a milch cow to $125 in the province of Ontario.

Bill, as amended, reported, read the third time and passed.

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL DEFENCE

CONCURRENCE IN AMENDMENTS MADE BY THE SENATE

Hon. GEORGE P. GRAHAM (Minister of Militia and Defence) moved the second reading of and concurrence in amendments made by the Senate to Bill No. 27 respecting the Department of National Defence.

Mr. MEIGHEN: We should have a statement from the minister on this bill.

Mr. GRAHAM: I wish to be absolutely complimentary and to say that the other chamber has made several sweeping amendments to this bill as passed by this House. In one portion of the bill, where it was intended to have the reorganization made by statute, the bill has been amended so that it will be necessary to make that reorganization by Order in Council. I believe it can be made by Order in Council. In another part, what was intended to be done by Order in Council, the Senate has amended to make statutory. Let me make the explanations. Section 5, subsection (3) reads:

> The Governor in Council, on the recommendation of the minister, may appoint an officer who shall, in relation to the Naval Service, administer, exercise and perform all the powers, duties and functions vested in or exercisable by the Deputy Minister of the Naval Service by or under the Naval Service Act, and who shall have the rank and salary of a deputy head of a department and shall be a member of the Defence Council.

The Senate amendment is to insert, after the word "appoint" in line 2 of subsection (3), the words "for a period not exceeding six months." I have no objection to that amendment.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What I should like the minister to have given is a statement of what is in the bill, even after the Senate amendments, which the Government is not fully empowered to do now under the statute of 1919. I do not see why the bill is introduced at all except for purposes that the Senate has now eliminated. I merely ask the minister to be good enough to make clear to the House why the Government asks for the bill any longer—what there is in it that the Government would not be empowered to do without the bill passing at all.

Mr. GRAHAM: I cannot speak from technical legal knowledge; but the Government's object in this is to establish a new department, called the Department of National Defence. The establishment of that new department, as I understand the matter, could not be made by Order in Council. It is true, as the right hon. gentleman (Mr. Meighen) says, there is a provision by which you can send departments or portions of departments from one department to another; but in this instance we are doing more than that, we are establishing a new department and making provision that this department shall include the Departments of Naval Service, Aviation and Militia. It will not continue to be a Militia Department; it will be a department of a broader scope, called National Defence. This bill changes the title of the minister, and there is another amendment which has been introduced which will enable the minister to be paid under this new arrangement. While many of the things that were in this bill in the first place could have been done by Order in Council, it was the desire of the Government that it should be made clear that what we were doing was by statute and to make the rearrangement of this department statutory. The Senate has made some changes; but it has not changed the important features of the bill, and the amendments that they have made will not prevent the minister from carrying out, by Order in Council, what he intended to do by statute. But I maintain that the bill is necessary if practically a new department is to be established.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I have not yet succeeded in turning up the statute; but having read it some weeks ago, I can speak from memory until I can get the statute before me that I may read it. I am not arguing that the Government, under the statute that now exists, can create a new department; but the Government can unite departments, amalgamate them, and there is no limit to the amalgamation which the Government has power to make. It may be that the department so formed by the union of other departments would require to be called by the name of one of the other departments. It would not be a very serious matter if this department were to continue to be known as the Department of Militia and Defence instead of the Department of National Defence, and it would scarcely be worth while passing a new statute to alter the name. The old name is just as significant as this, and this one has no advantage except, perhaps, that of brevity. Naval Service would be included under the title of Defence; but the old title is just as embracive as is the present one. Consequently, the Government was able, under the statute as it was, to do what it seeks to do by this bill. The minister says: "Oh, under the old statute we acted by Order in Council; we want to act by statute." Under this statute the minister must act by Order in Council, just as under the old.

Mr. GRAHAM: Now.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Undoubtedly. Statutes determine the will of Parliament. Statutes enable the Government to do certain things.

The old statute determined the will of Parliament and enabled the Government to do this work of amalgamation as it might see fit. This new bill does just the same thing; it is coming back to Parliament, I fear, merely for purposes of advertisement, in order to enable the Government to do what it already could do. Of course, I know that under the original bill the Government was able to do what it could not do under the old statute; that is to say, under the original bill, it was virtually able to take the whole Department of Defence, the Departments of Militia, Naval Service and Aviation, out of the operation of the Civil Service Act. Now, under the amendments of the Senate, I understand, the Government cannot do that,—all credit to those instrumental in protecting the public to that extent. But now we have this bill, and the minister has not made clear what he can do under this bill that he could not have done without the bill. Let me read the former statute, which was assented to on the 12th April, 1918:

> His Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate and House of Commons of Canada, enacts as follows:—
> 1. (1) The Governor in Council shall have power,—
>
> (a) to transfer any powers, duties or functions or the control or supervision of any part of the public service from one minister of the Crown to any other minister of the Crown or from one department or portion of the public service to any other department of portion of the public service; or,
>
> (b) to amalgamate and combine any two or more departments under one minister of the Crown and under one deputy minister,
>
> (2) All orders made by the Governor in Council under the provisions of this act shall be laid before both Houses of Parliament within fifteen days after they are made if Parliament is then sitting, and if not, then within fifteen days from the commencement of the next ensuing session of Parliament.

This was a bill passed by the late government without any sounding of trumpets.

Mr. BUREAU: In 1919?

Mr. MEIGHEN: In 1918. Under this act the minister could do all he set out to do under the original legislation, save the evasion of the Civil Service Act and the holding of two deputies instead of one. Consequently, all the minister really set out to do by the new legislation was, first, to evade the Civil Service Act and, second, to preserve two deputies instead of one. Now, why does the minister withdraw this bill and act under the legislation that is already on the statute books?

Mr. BUREAU: In 1921 there was a fusion of the Inland Revenue Department and the Customs Department, and my right hon. friend passed legislation covering the matter, because he had to amend certain statutes. Certain words had to be changed to authorize the proceedings under the new Customs and Excise Act, and legislation was therefore necessary.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What was the subsequent act?

Mr. BUREAU: I cannot give the chapter.

Mr. GRAHAM: I do not think hon. members have a right to make half a dozen speeches at this stage.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If hon. gentlemen desire to discuss the matter in detail we had better go into committee.

Mr. GRAHAM: I move, Mr. Speaker, that the House do now resolve itself into Committee of the Whole to consider the proposed amendments.

Motion agreed to, and the House went into Committee, Mr. Gordon in the Chair.

On Amendment 5, page 2, line 12—Leave out sub-clauses (5) and (6) of clause 5.

Mr. JOHNSON (Moosejaw): Do I understand the leader of the Opposition (Mr. Meighen) to say that it is not necessary to pass legislation, because the object in view could be secured by Order in Council, but that such Order in Council would have to come before Parliament for ratification?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The statute reads, like all others of the kind, that the regulations passed by the Governor in Council under the authority of the act must be laid on the Table of the House within fifteen days, if the House is sitting, or within fifteen days of its next ensuing session.

Mr. GRAHAM: The statute gives certain powers, but not all the powers which the present situation demands. My right hon. friend says that we could, without additional legislation, bring other departments into the Department of Militia. I should like him to try to bring the Naval Service under the Militia Department. Possibly it may be a small thing, but the Government decided to follow the practice that obtains in several of the other overseas dominions and call the defence department the Department of National Defence, which would include the militia and the navy. It will be conceded, I think, that this is wise, and hon. gentlemen will agree that it becomes necessary, if we are to do that, to have this legislation in order to create that new department. The object is not, as my right hon. friend suggests, to get around the Civil Service Commission. That is all imaginary. Correspondence passed between the commission and myself and they thoroughly understand the object of the Government, which is not as my right hon. friend indicates. Owing to the amendments a classification will have to be made before clerks from other branches are taken in. Under the terms of the original bill we could have taken them in and then they would have been classified, but it would take three or four weeks longer to make the amalgamation. That is the only difference; but there is no attempt to get around the Civil Service Commission.

Mr. BUREAU: The same procedure was followed by my right hon. friend (Mr. Meighen) when he was in power. Last year he amalgamated the departments of Inland Revenue and Customs, under Chapter 26, 11-12 George V, in exactly the same way as we propose here. And it is only natural that legislation should be passed, because you have to amend certain sections of the existing act. This act is cited as "the Department of Customs and Excise Act". Section 2 reads:

> The Minister of Customs and Excise shall be substituted for the Minister of Customs and for the Minister of Inland Revenue, etc.

The change is made by statute.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The act to which my hon. friend refers undoubtedly was passed, but he will find that it was composed practically entirely of amendments to the old act, entirely aside from the question of amalgamation. Certainly if the amalgamated departments are to be known by a new name legislation is necessary, if it is considered important enough. And there may be one or two other things in the present case that make legislation indispensable. I do not know what they are, and I ask the minister to point out what there is in the new legislation that he could not do under the existing statute.

Mr. GRAHAM: I have pointed out one very important thing, and that is the necessity for changing the name. At least, we think it is better to have the department called the Department of National Defence, and the change therefore necessitates new legislation. Let me quote a part of section 7:

> 7. (1) All the powers, duties and functions vested in any minister or deputy minister by The Naval Service Act, chapter forty-three of the statutes of 1910; the Militia Act, chapter forty-one of the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1906; the Militia Pension Act, chapter forty-two of the said Revised Statutes; the Royal Military College Act, chapter forty-three of the said Revised Statutes, and all Acts in amendment of any of the said acts, shall be vested in and performed and exercised by the Minister and Deputy Minister of National Defence respectively, and wherever the terms "Department" "Minister", and "Deputy Minister" appear or are referred to in any of the said acts, or in any order or regulation made under any of the said Acts, the same shall, after the passing of this act, mean the Department of National Defence, the Minister of National Defence, and the Deputy Minister of National Defence respectively.

It seems to me that this plan is so plain that there can be no reasonable objection. The right hon. gentleman said that the statute which he cited gave the Government the right to make the amalgamation in the way it chose. That being the case, we choose to make it this way, by statute, which is the simpler and better way.

Mr. BAXTER: If the minister only wants to change the name, I do not see why we should not get together and assist him. In view of the reduction in the estimates for the militia and naval defence, why not call the new department the Department of National Pretence?

Mr. GRAHAM: You need legislation to do that.

Section agreed to.

On Section 9—act to come into force on proclamation by the Governor-in-Council:

Mr. GRAHAM: Owing to the amendments it appears necessary that this clause be inserted to enable the act to come into force, not when signed, but by proclamation after reclassification of the department is completed.

Section agreed to.

Senate Amendments reported, read the second time, and concurred in.

DOMINION ELECTIONS ACT AMENDMENT

On motion of Hon. D. D. McKenzie (Solicitor General) Bill No. 92 to amend the Dominion Elections Act was read the second time, and the House went into committee thereon, Mr. Gordon in the Chair.

On Sub-section 2 of Section 1—Change of elector's residence, etc.

Mr. JOHNSON (Moosejaw): I have no fault to find with this subsection, but I do not think it makes clear whether the elector so referred to shall vote in the constituency which he has left or in that to which he has gone. It merely says that he may vote.

Mr. McKENZIE: It is clearly the intention that the elector shall vote in the district in which he resided immediately before the election.

Mr. HANSON: I agree with the intention, but it does strike me that the hon. member for Moosejaw has clearly stated wherein the subsection is insufficient. There should be some words of limitation. I am afraid that as the subsection now stands many a man might think he was qualified to vote in two places.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Suppose you insert after the word "qualified" in the tenth line, the words "to vote in such electoral district"? Then the subsection would read:

> At a general election, any person who would have been qualified to vote in an electoral district if he had continued to reside therein, shall remain so qualified to vote in such electoral district, notwithstanding that he has, within two months—

And so on.

Mr. BUREAU: That is, he would have to go back to his former place of residence. That is hardly right.

Mr. BAXTER: I think the sub-section as drafted is perfectly clear, but I see some difficulty as to its utility. If a man has simply moved, we will say, from one district in the city of Montreal to another, the amendment will be practically helpful to him; but suppose a man moves from Vancouver to Winnipeg, you are giving him no vote at all by this legislation because the cost of travelling back to Vancouver is prohibitive to him. Would it not be possible to devise ample yet well-guarded means by which a man's vote will really be transferred? I know we spend a great deal of time trying to get votes for people who do not bother to go to the poll. The usual experience is that you have to chase your man and find out where he came from and that he is entitled to vote, and then get him on the list. But that does not end your troubles. After having taken those steps you very often have to see that he goes to the poll, and to do this without violating the law is not at all an easy matter. Unfortunately, some electors will not take the trouble to look after themselves. But if we are going to try to make this legislation absolutely perfect so that no one will be without opportunity to cast his vote, why not have a system that will meet all cases, instead of a system that will meet only a very small percentage of cases?

Mr. McKENZIE: As far as I am concerned, I am merely implementing the will of the House which passed the two resolutions asking that an amendment along this line be made. This amendment is recommended by the officers whose business it is to see to the proper drafting of legislation of this kind. Under the present law a man can vote only in the district in which he resided at the time the writs were issued; if he moves one hundred yards away to another street in the same city—even if he moves across the street—he is deprived of his vote. The amendment is to provide that if he wishes to get back to the place where he lived when the writs were issued, he shall have the right to vote. My own view was that a man who moved away should have the right to vote where he went, but after a good deal of consideration we have reached the conclusion that it is better perhaps to leave the law as it is in that respect. The hon. member for St. John (Mr. Baxter) says that there is a great deal of difficulty in getting people to vote. There is no doubt about that. Sometimes, coming pretty close to the borders of the law, we have to go to some expense in getting people to the polls, and I do not want to put any further temptation in the way of my hon. friend by making it possible for him to bring a man back from Vancouver to vote in St. John. Of course, if any further words are necessary to make the law clear, I shall not object to adding them.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Without doubt the proposed amendment will cure by far the greatest number of difficulties which arises in regard to the votes of people who have changed their residences immediately prior to an election. There will be odd cases where men will go long distances and it will be impossible to give them votes. In going those great distances they must forfeit something, and for the time being they will forfeit their votes. But in seventy-five per cent of the cases the changes take place either in the large cities, through the voter moving from one riding to another, or on account of his moving from one part of the province to another, from one constituency to another—very often adjoining constituencies. All such persons will be relieved from disqualification by this amendment. I do not think we should go further. If you attempt to frame legislation to give the elector the right to vote in the constituency to which he goes, you will make it possible to colonize votes, should any one be inclined to go to that extent. I am satisfied that the section as now drafted carries out the will of Parliament as expressed in the resolutions. On reading it over I think the clause was well enough drafted in the first instance, but the addition of a few words would no doubt make it clearer. I therefore move that after the word "qualified" in the tenth line, the following words be added:

To vote in such electoral district.

Mr. NEILL: I think this amendment is worse than the evil which it seeks to remedy. The result will be that these men who are entitled to vote in another district may be paid to come back and vote in the original district. They will have lost all interest in the place which they left, and it will be in the interests of those who have ample campaign funds at their disposal to bring them back. That is not desirable. Moreover, it will lead to the possibility of personation, because when there are on the roll, especially in a rural district, a number of names of persons who are not in that district, there will be greater temptation to others to vote under their names, and greater possibility of their doing so. In British Columbia provincial elections we have a very excellent regulation which almost entirely prevents personation. Every man, when he goes to vote, has to sign his name, and that is compared with his original registration. Apart from that, men who are away are dealt with in this manner. By what is called the absentee vote, a man who is entitled to vote in Vancouver may vote in any district in British Columbia by signing a certain form; the vote is then put into an envelope, marked with the name of his riding, and is in due course forwarded to the returning officer of that riding. This enables any man in British Columbia to vote in any riding in which he is entitled to vote, and it also entirely prevents personation. The only objection to it is that it delays a little the final returns, because you have to wait until letters can reach the returning officer of the riding in question from some other portion of British Columbia. If the system followed in British Columbia cannot be adopted here, I suggest that instead of putting a man back to where he was originally, his vote be taken in the district to which he has moved. An hon. member has suggested that that might lead to colonization of votes, but that might easily be prevented. Under the present arrangement, a man has to be two months in the riding prior to the date of the issuing of the writ. In the case of the last election, which was held on the 6th of December, the writ was issued, I believe, about the 13th of October. That means that a man must be in the district about four months before the election in order to be entitled to vote, and hardship results in the case of people who have been less than four months in the district. It is the object of the present amendment to remedy that. I submit that the difficulty would be just as easily remedied by reducing that period of two months to one month prior to the date of the issuing of the writ. That would still provide for three months' residence before election day in the district in which the elector would be entitled to vote. It would be a preventive of colonization, a preventive of personation, and enable a man to vote where his interests are more likely to lie than in a district with which he has, perhaps, entirely severed his connection.

Mr. HOCKEN: When the hon. member (Mr. Guthrie) says that it would facilitate colonization of votes to allow a man to vote in the constituency that he has left, I do not agree with him. I am satisfied that to allow the man to vote in the constituency that he left within the two months is more likely to result in an honest vote than to allow him to vote in the constituency to which he has gone. As I have stated before in the House, it was discovered that almost twenty per cent of the voters in about half of my constituency had during the two months left that riding—at least, they were not to be found in it—and gone to another riding. Now their names are on the voters' lists, you cannot get lists prepared on which such names will not appear. If any person felt disposed to canvass the district and find out how many persons were away at election time those voters could be personated; it would be almost impossible, at any rate it would require a tremendous organization, to prevent very wide personation. I have said I believe this difficulty exists almost entirely in the cities, and it certainly prevails there to a very great extent. In saying that I know I can speak for the city of Toronto; but I believe it will be found that in Montreal the removals are quite as numerous especially at certain times of the year. Then the removals would be greater, perhaps, than in any other city in the Dominion. I think the way in which the minister has framed the bill makes the very best provision for overcoming the difficulty.

Mr. SEXSMITH: I think the addition of the words suggested by the hon. member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie) should probably cover the point. A new contention seems to have arisen but this matter is not entirely confined to the cities —in fact that is not the case to nearly as large an extent as members from the cities may think. I would be quite prepared, if time permitted, to show that this condition has existed in rural constituencies. However, there are two classes of voters dealt with here. Take a Canadian citizen who has resided in, let us say if you like, a Toronto riding. He has moved some distance away but he has still the right to vote although not in the constituency to which he has gone because he is a Canadian citizen; he could go back to the constituency in which he formerly resided. The other case is where the voter has been three months in a constituency, and might not have been entitled to vote at all but nevertheless did vote.

Mr. NEILL: I could point out one large class of people that were disfranchised last year by this practice, and that is the school teachers of British Columbia. School begins about the first of September and practically ninety-five per cent of them were unable to vote at the last election because they had not qualified; they had been away for their holidays, or had gone to their homes, and they were not back before August 13, and consequently were all disfranchised. One hon. member said it is easy for them to go back. I would like to ask, how many school teachers in country districts have facilities for going back to the districts from which they came? The same can be said of other people who in many cases are not able to go back either on account of business conditions, or because they feel they cannot afford the expense.

Mr. CARROLL: I fail to see the necessity of discussing the merits of this amendment to the Dominion Elections Act. It was debated at very considerable length some weeks ago, and the unanimous opinion of the House at that time was that such an amendment should be made to the law. There can be no doubt as to the meaning of the amendment in view of the words placed in sub-section 2 of the act on the motion of the hon. member for South Wellington. No doubt there are difficulties in connection with the working of the act, and difficulties will arise so long as elections are run, but the Solicitor General, or the Justice Department, is doing no more or less than to put into effect the unanimous recommendation of this House as passed some weeks ago, and I fail to see why, at this particular juncture, the merits of the bill should be discussed.

Amendment agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN: Is sub-clause 2 as amended carried?

Mr. NEILL: I have an amendment to move, to be known as clause 2:

That in rural subdivisions election day should be a public holiday.

That amendment does not require any explanation. It is a well-known feature of several of the political platforms in this country to-day, and it is a very necessary thing. Large numbers of rural electors were disqualified at the last election because they had only two hours in which to vote. Now two hours in a city is ample; you have only got to go a few blocks in order to vote, but two hours in rural districts is absolutely prohibitive. A man lives five or ten miles from the polling division and he has to go by water or by road. He is allowed off, we will say, at four o'clock in the afternoon, he has got to get his supper, and drive ten miles. Which of us is able to do that in a couple of hours? It is not a case of one or two men losing their votes, but upwards of fifty, sixty and eighty votes in a polling subdivision were lost at the last election, because two hours is not sufficient time in the remote rural districts to allow men to go to the polling station. I think that must be known to many of the members of this House. It is no great concession to allow this privilege once every four years. I do not suggest that the employers should be compelled to pay their employees for that day off. Let the men take the day off at their own expense. Surely the individual voter has enough interest in the affairs of his country to be willing to take a day off at his own expense once in a period of four years. I have heard the workers themselves express their opinions on this point. They are quite favourable to it, their only fear being that if a man took a day off he would lose his job. It is for that reason I move the amendment. I am asking that it be confined to rural constituencies, not that it be applied to polling divisions in urban constituencies.

Mr. GUTHRIE: According to the Election Act an urban polling division is one where there is a population of not less than 2,500; all others are rural polls. Hitherto in this House a demand that polling day should be made a holiday has always come from the urban centres; this is the first time I have heard the suggestion that polling day should be made a public holiday so far as rural sections are concerned. When the act was under discussion and was brought into effect a couple of years ago, this question was pretty fully discussed and it was the sense of the House that polling day should not be made a public holiday in Canada, on the ground that we already had a great many public holidays by statute. And, as the demand then came exclusively, I think, from urban centres, it was felt that the two hours granted for polling in those centres and in other centres too, was ample for the purpose. My hon. friend who is moving this amendment would, I think, agree in that view—that two hours is sufficient in urban centres. Now I have never heard any demand, apart from the motion moved to-day, that polling day in rural sections be declared a public holiday. Personally I do not think it is necessary at all. I think we should have evidence, in the shape of some general demand in that respect, before we agree to this proposal.

Mr. CALDWELL: I want to support very strongly the amendment by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill). I know that in my own riding there are a number of employers who employ a large amount of labour, such as lumbermen, mill workers and others; and if the men vote right they are given a holiday at election time, if they do not vote right they are absolutely forbidden to attend the election, and if they do so will be dismissed. I think it is only proper that such an amendment as this should be carried into effect, but only as to rural constituencies. I think myself that in the urban centres especially, the advance poll that is now provided for commercial travellers, railway men, and others, who cannot attend at the usual hour of polling, meets the case. At any rate I would be inclined to allow the members representing urban constituencies to be the best judges as to that. But certainly in the rural polling districts election day should be declared a public holiday.

Mr. HANSON: I dissent emphatically from the statement made by the hon. member from Victoria and Carleton (Mr. Caldwell). I am astonished to hear him say that such a state of things prevails in his constituency. I do not think that sort of thing prevails in the province of New Brunswick generally. I would like to be furnished with the names of the employers. Things are not in such a state, in any of the rural parts of the province of New Brunswick, that the free expresssion of opinion on the part of employees is interfered with in any way by employers. I think the hon. member has done a grave injustice to a certain class of men in his constituency. Furthermore, elections now as a rule, occur in the summer season, when the people in the rural communities can get to the polls.

An hon. MEMBER: No.

Mr. HANSON: Well, they should be in a summer season. Any political party that brings on an election in mid-winter ought, in my opinion, to be assasinated.

An hon. MEMBER: Well, they were.

Mr. HANSON: I would like to say, that being the case, the farming community, except a few, come out and vote, and go back to work as quickly as they can, and they would be the last to ask that it be made a public holiday. In my opinion, there are too many public holidays.

Mr. MARCIL (Bonaventure): I see no advantage in having election day a public holiday, and no necessity for it. For the last six general elections in which I have been a candidate, the most inclement season of the year has been chosen for holding the election. I have never been in an election except in the end of November or the beginning of December. That places the people in these rural parts at a great disadvantage. On account of the very bad roads, they have great trouble in reaching the polling boothes in their constituencies. Owing to lumbering operations hundreds of men lose their vote at the general election because they are absent, probably camping hundreds of miles away. These men never vote. For years they have not been able to cast a vote.

Mr. CALDWELL: Then why not have a holiday?

Mr. MARCIL (Bonaventure): Because they cannot get to the poll. Some of them work for $15 or $18 a month. Those who could secure employment in my constituency were paid that wage. They cannot afford to take three or four days to go back to cast their vote. If the elections were held in the proper season, in the fall of the year, or at some propitious time, a much larger vote would be cast than the vote which is now recorded. In my constituency the advance polls were an utter failure. In one poll one vote was cast, and in another poll two votes were cast. It was entirely unnecessary to hold those advance polls. Therefore, I think there is no necessity for a holiday.

Mr. GOULD: So far as the vision of the members of the House is concerned, it would not be very difficult for them to realize conditions similar to those I shall refer to. On our plains, with an election coming on in the winter time, as occurred last year, many of our residents were, at least, fourteen miles from the polls. Again, perhaps a man had in his employ one or two men who were diametrically opposed to him in political ideas, and this employer prevented those men going to the polls, to express their wishes. Such cases did occur, not only in my district, but in many districts throughout Canada, and the resolution proposed by the hon. member from Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill) has in view eliminating those conditions. I know that there are provisions made whereby we can have polls located more conveniently. I did succeed, in a measure, in having some more polls in my district, but not sufficient to meet the requirements. People simply could not come out to the polls. Fortunately, we had a very good day on the 6th of December last, and that, of itself, induced many of our women to come out. So far as the holiday is concerned, I think, for the rural districts, as expressed in the resolution, it is not going to work any hardship upon any one. While the hon. member from South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie) never had a request from the rural districts, he has likewise never heard any condemnation, and if we in the rural districts express ourselves in favour of it, I am sure the hon. member will approve of our stand.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): I desire to support the proposition submitted by the hon. member from Comox-Alberni. In our part of the country, fortunately, the good people take such a keen interest in political matters that we always have a holiday, even if it is not in the statutes. In the United States, the first Tuesday in November, their election day, is always a holiday. I see no valid reason that can be urged against putting it in the statutes, and providing that one day out of every four years, when there is a general election, when our people want to determine which party is going to govern the country in the next parliament, should be a holiday. I think it is of sufficient importance that they should take the whole day off in order to arrive at a proper conclusion.

Mr. HANSON: This is only for rural polls—not for urban polls.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I should like to draw the attention of the House to the circumstances. The amendment we are discussing is one that passed the House in the form of a resolution which was carefully debated. The Government had not thought of opening up the Dominion Elections Act for general discussion at this time. Doubtless the act will require to be gone over before another election and possibly several amendments made. I would submit to my hon. friend that, inasmuch as his proposed amendment has a good deal to be said in its favour, and against it, perhaps, this would not be the best time to press it for a vote. I am drawing his attention to the fact that the only amendments that are suggested here are amendments that were carried at an earlier stage in the session, and I think it would be better to consider the amendment that my hon. friend has made some time when the Elections Act itself is before the House.

Mr. NEILL: In deference to the suggestion of the Prime Minister, I am willing to withdraw the amendment. But I wish to point out, as he truly says, that this act is the result of two resolutions debated in this House, I suppose, for six or eight hours at very considerable expense. I had, at that time, the same amendment that I wish to move now, but I did not conceive it was my duty to introduce a resolution on the subject. It appears to me that we have gone in too much this session for government by resolution. Everybody who wanted something passed introduced a resolution, and wasted, or spent, a day on it. I thought I would wait until the Act was being amended and then introduce it at the proper time. That is the reason I did not propose it. But in view of the lateness of the session, and, let us hope, the impossibility of an election for a long time, I would be willing to withdraw my amendment.

Mr. BAXTER: I have no objection to the hon. member withdrawing the amendment. But has the Government any intention this session, or at a future session, of basing any resolution on the report of the chief electoral officer? He is required to make a report for the purpose of calling our attention to the difficulties which may arise in working out of the act. Some difficulties have arisen. I confess that I have only partly read the report. If my hon. friend had pressed this motion, I would have followed it up by another one, to meet one of the real difficulties with regard to the advance polls. Some things have been said in this chamber—more, I think, in private conversation on this side of the House than for all members to hear; but I noticed a remark of one of my hon. friends that in the advance polls where the people had not voted, they would not get a chance to do so again, because, automatically, under the act, the chief electoral officer must cut them out. I have an instance in my constituency—which I shall call that of St. John and suburbs, as the name is a long one—where, through a peculiar description in the schedule, it is practically impossible to get the right for the railwaymen, of whom there are a considerable number in that constituency, to vote at an advance poll. The chief electoral officer has held that the elector must be resident within the limits of the place named in the schedule. As a matter of fact, they have named Fairville in the schedule for New Brunswick. Fairville is not a place at all; it is simply the name of a locality; it has no boundaries; it is not incorporated; no one can say where it begins or where it ends; it is a portion of the parish of Lancaster, and that is all you can say about it. But both the chief electoral officer and the returning officer refused to take a broad view of this matter, and held that men could not vote who were outside of what is popularly recognized as Fairville. They could not vote even though they were railwaymen and even though the intention of the act was undoubtedly to assist them in that regard. I was going to ask for a change in the schedule because, undoubtedly, I think the people in this particular locality, by not getting the advantage of the act in this instance, have probably lost the right to the benefit of it in the future. They ought not to lose that right; it is a wise convenience if it is properly made use of; but I think it should not be read in such a restricted manner as it was by the chief electoral officer. If the Government is going to consider the matter later on, I will not bother moving an amendment at the present time.

Subclause, as amended, agreed to.

Mr. CALDWELL: I have another amendment which I should like to offer and it is this:

> Where any new polls are established, they shall be established not less than two months prior to polling day.

I want to give my reasons for moving this amendment. Last fall, I learned quite accidentally one evening, just two weeks prior to the election, that six new polls had been established in my riding. Last session there was an amendment passed that there shall be a registrar or enumerator for each polling division; that he shall prepare a copy of the lists, and that the candidates shall be furnished with a copy of the lists for each polling division and the name of the registrar two weeks prior to polling day. I went to the returning officer to inquire if it was a fact that those new polls had been established, because I had no notice of the enumerators, and he said that it was. I asked him if he had his enumerators or registrars appointed for the polls and who they were: He said: "No, and I do not propose to appoint any." I asked him how he proposed to get a list of those polls and to furnish it to the candidate on nomination day. He said that he did not propose to have a list for each polling division. He was subdividing one polling division into four. He said that he was going to have them all prepared as one list and revised as that. He said: "We will provide a copy of each poll for the deputy returning officer on election day, but no lists will be prepared for the candidates." This would mean that the elector would not know at which of the four polls he was entitled to vote. Neither the candidate nor the elector would know this; nobody but the deputy returning officer would have a copy of the list on election day. To make a long story short, I had to employ a lawyer and to threaten an injunction to stop the election in order to get those lists, and I got them two days after I should have had them. Had I not found this out accidentally, I would not have had them at all. When we got the lists, we found as many as forty names left off lists in one or other of these polling divisions.

Every one of these new divisions had a very badly prepared list, a list that would have worked to my disadvantage. On one list there were names on, that should not have been on, that we probably would not have been able to detect until election day, and this would have meant that electors who had resided in that district for years would have been deprived of their franchise.

Mr. GUTHRIE: In what way?

Mr. CALDWELL: The polling district was very large—

Mr. GUTHRIE: An elector is entitled to go and vote in the district in which he resides.

Mr. CALDWELL: I do not wish to be interrupted. The polling district was large enough that a man might go to, say, Holmesville. He would be told: "Your name is not here." He might then go to Upper Kent and he would be told: "Your name is not on this list." He might then go to Bath and be told: "Your name is not here." By the time he got to the fourth poll, it might be too late for him to vote. The electors have a right to know before polling day at what poll they are entitled to vote; they should not be compelled to travel from one poll to another to find that out. Had I not found this out through an accident and threatened an injunction to stop the election, nobody outside of the deputy returning officer would have known where these electors were to vote. There was no boundary given, and we had absolutely no way of telling where any man should vote in that very large section of country.

Mr. GUTHRIE: No elector would be disqualified, even on the statement of my hon. friend. They could vote where they could swear that they were resident. We put that in this law expressly for all rural polls to enable a man to vote where he had a right to vote, whether he was on the list or whether there was a list or not.

Mr. CALDWELL: I understand that perfectly, but I think I pointed out plainly to the hon. gentleman that we did not know which poll they had a right to vote in. We had no definition of the boundaries of those new polling divisions and no lists for them. At least, we would not have had, had I not taken the steps that I took, and this put me to some bother and expense. We compelled the returning officer to provide the lists for us before election day. Moreover, I think there should be a provision in the act—I am not sure that there is not—that where there is a sheriff in a riding, he should be the returning officer. In my riding, there are two sheriffs as it comprises two counties. One sheriff is a Liberal and the other a Conservative, both very estimable men. I do not know whether they were not selected as returning officers because they were too honest, but they were not selected. The then government selected as returning officer a man for whom I have a great regard; but many things occurred in this election that would not have occurred if one of those sheriffs had been returning officer. I do not think I would have had to put an injunction on the election had either of these sheriffs been returning officer. They have both been returning officers in elections time and again, and they have discharged their duties satisfactorily. This was what we were up against last fall when the government passed over the heads of these two men to select another man, on I do not know what qualifications.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The remarks which I made to the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill) apply equally to the hon. member for Victoria and Carleton (Mr. Caldwell). There is no doubt that the Dominion Act will need some revision, a number of amendments will have to be made; but I think the House will be well advised not to attempt to-day to consider any amendments other than those we are discussing in the form of resolutions in this House.

Mr. BAXTER: I should like to ask the hon. member for Victoria and Carleton if he brought those circumstances which he related to the attention of the Chief Electoral Officer.

Mr. CALDWELL: I did not have time. The time was so short.

Mr. BAXTER: Since?

Mr. CALDWELL: No, I did not.

Mr. BAXTER: I only ask the question for the purpose of trying to emphasize something that I consider is of a great deal of value to us all, because I think our aim ought to be to have the people treated fairly in the matter of an election, utterly regardless of what party they intend to support—that is their right. There is no more valuable provision in this election act than the one by which anybody, especially a member of Parliament, is invited to communicate to the Chief Electoral Officer any irregularities, defaults, or improper conduct on the part of any one in connection with an election. If hon. members would do that it would save us a lot of time spent in debating matters here. I know that if we went into the past electoral history of my hon. friend's constituency we could be very acrimonious, but we should not get very far. There are many people in that constituency that neither of us would trust in connection with an election. But if an officer has, in the opinion of my hon. friend, misunderstood or failed to do his duty, there is the place to make the report; and if legislative intervention is necessary, the Chief Electoral Officer, before Parliament meets, can not only make his report but draft adequate legislation to protect the interests of the people. We should get very much further ahead by such a method, and I would suggest that that be done. I might say that in regard to the very matter I spoke of a few moments ago, as well as touching several other matters that came under my observation, I made a report to the electoral officer. Fortunately, in my constituency I did not have a single complaint to make in regard to any one, and I was very glad of the fact. I trust that when the time comes the Government will keep the electoral officer working and let him submit a bill, the Government acting merely as sponsor, so that the legislation might be as non-partisan and as useful as possible.

Mr. CALDWELL: The hon. senior member for St. John and Albert (Mr. Baxter), said that I should have made a report to the Chief Electoral Officer, as he did. Well, I do not see any amendments in acordance with the recommendations he made to him. The amendment which is before the committee I moved for the purpose of bringing it to the attention of the Government in order that it might receive their consideration, and perhaps might impress upon them the necessity for a great number of changes in the Election Act. However, I am perfectly willing to withdraw the amendment in view of the statement made by the Prime Minister that an opportunity will be given to amend that act.

Bill, as amended, reported, read the third time, and passed.

THE FISHERIES ACT, 1914, AMENDMENT

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Marine and Fisheries) moved the second reading of Bill No. 70, to amend The Fisheries Act, 1914.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the House went into Committee thereon, Mr. Gordon in the Chair.

On section 1.—Penalty for leaving any port in Canada with intent to fish for salmon or lobsters in sea beyond territorial waters.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What changes are contemplated?

Mr. LAPOINTE: There are no changes; the section is merely to confirm by statute regulations that already exist. Both lobster and salmon fishing are carried on not only inside territorial waters, but outside as well, and if there were no regulations with regard to fishing outside, the fisheries would undoubtedly be depleted within a short time. There is nothing new in the principle; it has always been understood, and up to the present time there has been no attempt to violate the intention of the regulation. It has come to the notice of the department, however, that in some sections of the country people who are not given licenses are prepared to challenge the authority of the Government restraining them from fishing outside territorial waters. As a matter of fact the lobster fisheries regulations have always contained a provision of this kind, as do the British Columbia salmon regulations. It is the opinion of the Department of Justice that it is better for us to have this regulation enacted in legislation instead of merely being enforced as at present. I may add that the United States have a similar provision in their fisheries law.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: All that is being done, therefore, is to enact in the form of a statute regulations that are already in force.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Exactly.

Section agreed to.

On section 2.—Burden of proof.

Mr. BAXTER: Does the minister not think that perhaps, in view of the fact that the magistracy of the country is not always of the calibre that one would like to see, it is going a little too far to place the burden of proof in this matter on the accused? If such an accused were tried before a jury he would have more chances of getting off, even if the burden of proof were put upon him, than he would have before a magistrate when that burden rests upon him. The magistrates, somehow, especially the less business they have, seem to think that it is their duty to convict a man who is brought before them; the assumption seems to be that he must be guilty if he comes before them. The burden of proving absence of intent or knowledge lies with the person accused, and I should be sorry indeed to be called upon to prove that on behalf of the most worthy client I ever had, before a certain species of magistrate with whom I have come in contact. The section goes rather too far; it should be enough if there is at least a prima facie case made against the accused. But to have imposed upon one the absolute burden of proving innocence is further than our laws go, except with regard to whiskey.

Mr. MARTELL: I appreciate what the minister is endeavouring to get at. The regulations apply practically only to our own Canadian people, and they cover fishing in extra-territorial waters as well as in the territorial area. I presume these regulations are intended to apply particularly to lobster fishing. There is a section of the Fisheries Act that provides that no person shall offer for sale, or have in his posession, lobsters caught in a manner or at a time prohibited by law. Prior to amendment the act contained a clause to the effect that:

> No one shall without lawful excuse, the proof whereof shall lie on him, have in his possession fish caught at a time or in a manner prohibited by law.

It was found very difficult to prove that the fish were caught "at a time or in a manner prohibited by law." Now that the act is being amended, the minister undoubtedly wants the amendment to apply to extra-territorial waters. But I quite agree with my hon. friend from St. John (Mr. Baxter) that it is almost an outrage to place this burden of proof in all cases upon the defendant. In my short experience as a legal practitioner in Nova Scotia, I regret to say, usually I have found the magistrates are not fit persons to administer justice. As the hon. member for St. John says, the mere fact that a person is brought before the court is usually regarded as conclusive evidence that he should be convicted. If cases were dealt with by a court of competent jurisdiction, you would feel that justice would be administered; but to cast the burden of proof upon the accused who is at the mercy of the magistrate is, I think, going too far. In fact, the whole tenor of criminal and quasi-criminal legislation seems to be to cast on the accused the burden of proving himself innocent rather than that the prosecution should prove him guilty. I do not believe this sub-section is necessary at all, and I would urge the minister to strike it from the bill, because there is ample provision to deal with these cases under our present law. Do not compel a man to prove himself innocent who is charged by some officious officer or half detective on very slight evidence perhaps of some such offence as this subsection is intended to cover. I move that section 2 of the bill be struck out.

Mr. LADNER: This affects British Columbia as well as the other maritime provinces, and if this clause is struck out I know that the effect of the bill will be vitiated entirely in British Columbia. It is extremely difficult in cases of this kind to prove intent, especially among certain classes of foreigners. Therefore I submit that, with all due regard to our legal tradition, which place the onus of proof upon the prosecution, there are some circumstances, as in the present case, where that tradition may safely be departed from. In this case the fine is not very burdensome, and the purpose is to aid an important industry. The bill as drafted is intended to meet special circumstances, all of which are not before the House. I think the clause should be accepted.

Mr. CALDWELL: I cannot help but think that it is setting a dangerous precedent to say that a man accused of crime must prove himself innocent. It is contrary to British justice, and I know the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Lapointe) is pretty good at quoting British precedents. One can imagine a case, an extreme one it may be, where a fishery inspector having a grudge against a certain man could put him to all sorts of expense and annoyance by accusing him of intent to break the law as set forth in this section. I do not think you should prosecute a man before he puts his intentions into execution. Therefore, I think that the amendment moved by the hon. member for Hants (Mr. Martell) is sound. I do not think we should pass special legislation to meet the very lawless condition in British Columbia referred to by the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Ladner), and so put in jeopardy the law-abiding citizens of the eastern maritime provinces.

Mr. BAXTER: I would suggest to the minister that he report progress on this bill and have the clause redrafted along the lines of making the possession of certain things or the doing of certain acts prima facie evidence of guilt, rather than require the accused to absolutely prove his innocence. No doubt the officers in this department will advise my hon. friend as to what could be fairly taken as prima facie evidence of intent. The difficulty is that the penalty does not stop even at $1,000, but that the whole catch, the vessel itself, the gear and everything may be forfeited. That may be done by one justice of the peace, and he may be very much prejudiced against the accused. At first I was inclined to agree with the suggestion of my hon. friend from Hants (Mr. Martell), but on further consideration I think that if adopted it might be going a little too far in the other direction. I can see the difficulties in the minds of other members. There should be what I might term a half-way house, by which, while the accused would not be able to escape the law too easily, yet at the same time he would not be absolutely ruined through perhaps not even a feeling of spite, but an ignorant desire on the part of some official to do what he thinks is right.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I agree that on general principles it is dangerous to put the burden of proof of his innocence on the accused party; but, as my hon. friend from Vancouver South (Mr. Ladner) said, this is a special law intended to meet special conditions, and if this provision, or one of a similar nature, is not inserted in the bill perhaps the purpose of this legislation would not be achieved. I do not see that the section as drafted would work any great hardship, because after all a person cannot go fishing without a license, and the moment a man is caught fishing without a license, the purport of the law is accomplished and it should be for him to prove that he does not come within its provisions. However, I am willing to accept the suggestion of my hon. friend from St. John (Mr. Baxter) and will ask that the committee rise and report progress so that the clause can be redrafted to meet the objections raised.

Mr. DUFF: There is nothing wrong with the clause. Let us go ahead and put it through.

Mr. MARTELL: There is something wrong with it.

Progress reported.

CANADA SHIPPING ACT AMENDMENT (PILOTAGE)

On motion of Hon. Ernest Lapointe (Minister of Marine and Fisheries) Bill No. 79, to amend the Canada Shipping Act (Pilotage) was read the second time, and the House went into committee thereon Mr. Gordon in the Chair.

On section 1—Foreign ships of war and hospital ships may be made exempt ships.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Under the Pilotage Act all ships have to pay pilotage dues whether or not they require the services of a pilot. There are some exceptions, and this bill is for the purpose of adding to those exceptions. The first amendment exempts from the payment of pilotage dues the ships of war and hospi-

5.p.m. tal ships belonging to such foreign nations as may be specified by the Governor in Council. The idea is to extend that privilege to those nations which grant a similar privilege to British warships. As a matter of fact, in practice they never have been required to pay the dues; the amendment is to bring the law into accord with recognized practice. The second exception excludes ships registered in Canada which are engaged exclusively in fishing. These ships have not been compelled to pay the pilotage dues in the past. The amendment is to prevent any difficulties which might arise from the fact that under the law as it now stands these vessels could be compelled to pay such dues.

Mr. DUFF: I am quite in accord with these amendments, especially the first, which says that ships of war and hospital ships belonging to such foreign nation or nations as may be specified by the Governor in Council shall be exempt from the payment of pilotage dues. If only as a matter of courtesy, Canada should be quite willing to pilot ships of war of other nations, so long as they are friendly nations, into our ports without asking them to pay pilotage dues. Everybody will agree that so far as hospital ships are concerned the amendment is a good one. Subsection (j) however, provides that the following ships shall also be exempt:

> Ships registered in Canada engaged exclusively in fishing.

I suggest that the word "exclusively" be struck out. A great many fishing vessels, after they put in the season's fishing from, say, January until October, go coasting or freighting, and you are going to have a mix-up if you leave the word "exclusively" in.

Mr. BAXTER: Why not make it read, "while engaged exclusively in fishing"?

Mr. DUFF: No; that would not serve my purpose. These fishing vessels are small schooners; they are not really coasting or freighting vessels. They are not engaged all the time in coasting or freighting, but if they can enter a harbour while engaged in the fishing business without paying these dues, they should be able to do so while engaged in coasting or freighting in the fall.

Mr. CALDWELL: Is it not a fact that these vessels never employ a pilot?

Mr. DUFF: They do not; the captains of these vessels are as good men as the pilots themselves.

Mr. CALDWELL: Under the present act they could be compelled to pay pilotage dues, although they never avail themselves of the pilotage?

Mr. DUFF: Exactly.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Are they ever charged pilotage?

Mr. DUFF: Oh, yes.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Those engaged in fishing are not.

Mr. DUFF: Yes, those over a certain number of tons, I think.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I do not object to the striking out of the word "exclusively".

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I move that the following subclause be added to clause 1 of the bill:

2. Subparagraph (1) of paragraph (c) of the said subsection one is repealed, and the following is substituted in lieu thereof:

"(i) employed in trading from port to port in the same province, or employed in any one port or harbour, or

As the law is to-day the exception reads as follows:

(i) employed in trading from port to port in the same province.

A case arose the other day of a ship which was engaged in trading, not from one port to another port in the province, but from one part of a port to another part of the same port. As the law stands, that ship was not exempt and the amendment is to cover cases of that kind.

Amendment agreed to.

[Mr. Duff.]

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Where you have coastal business going on between New Brunswick and Nova Scotia why should you discriminate at all?

Mr. LAPOINTE: There is a special provision for that.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Are you going to look after that?

Mr. LAPOINTE: There is a provision already in the bill dealing with trading between any or all of the provinces of Quebec, New Brunswick, Nova Scotia or Prince Edward Island. I move, also, Mr. Chairman, that the following be added to clause 1 of the bill as subsection "k".

Vessels engaged in salvage or towing operations.

AIR BOARD ACT AMENDMENT

On motion of Hon. G. P. Graham (Minister of Militia and Defence) the House went into committee to consider the following proposed resolution, Mr. Gordon in the Chair.

Resolved, That it is expedient to amend The Air Board Act, chapter 11 of the statutes of 1919 (1st Session), to provide that the Governor in Council may make regulations prescribing the compensation to be paid, the persons to whom, and the manner in which, such compensation shall be payable, for the death or injury resulting directly from a flight undertaken in the course of duty in the public service of Canada of any person employed in the public service of Canada, or employed under the direction of any department of the public service of Canada: Provided, however, that such regulations shall not extend to the payment of compensation for any death, or injury in respect of which provision for the payment of compensation, or a gratuity or pension is made by any other act.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Explain.

Mr. GRAHAM. In chapter 11 of the statutes of 1919, will be found the following section:

It shall be the duty of the Air Board,—

(l) to consider, draft, and prepare for approval by the Governor in Council such regulations as may be considered necessary for the control or operation of aeronautics in Canada or within the limit of the territorial waters of Canada, and,

(m) to perform such other duties as the Governor in Council may from time to time impose.

Section 5 provides that:

The Air Board shall have power to employ such officers and men under this act—

That is the Air Board Act—

—as may be authorized by the Governor in Council, under such conditions as to discipline and pay as the Governor in Council may determine,—

And so on. Under the provisions of that act an Order in Council was passed on May 29, 1920, setting out what should be paid to the dependents of an aviator in case he was killed, also the amounts that would be paid in case he was injured. Now the question has arisen whether the statute really gave such full authority, and this is to make it clear that that authority does exist. That is to say, the authority may exist but it has been questioned. The existing legislation would only apply to the civil aviator, but, in carrying on the operations of the air force, employees of the Forestry branch of the Interior Department sometimes accompany the aviators in order to make explorations and observatons of forest lands. Under the old Order in Council such persons would not be covered by any provision for a gratuity in case of injury. The legislation to be founded on this resolution will enable the Governor in Council to make regulations that will include any employee of the government.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: In other words what you did in the past was merely to look after the pilot and not his passenger?

Mr. GRAHAM: Not the other civil employee.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Who was also engaged upon your work?

Mr. GRAHAM: Yes.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: It seems to be proper expenditure. What do you seek to prevent by your proviso? Give the committee a concrete case.

Mr. GRAHAM: Let us say that the Forestry branch of the Department of the Interior wishes to send a man up with the aviator. That man, who is employed by another department, and is not in the civil aviation force, would not, under the Order in Council, be eligible for a gratuity.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: You have already explained that point. What I want to know is why the resolution contains the proviso which says:

Provided, however, that such regulations shall not extend to the payment of compensation for any death, or injury in respect of which provision for the payment of compensation, or a gratuity or pension is made by any other act.

What is the precise matter in view there?

Mr. GRAHAM: A man who is entitled to a gratuity under the Military Pensions' Act cannot draw two gratuities, or his dependents cannot draw both the gratuity under this act, and under the Military Pensions' Act as well.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Is there any reason why, if this is the greater, he should not get it? If you provide, as a matter of fairness, a greater gratuity—as you very likely will—for accidents occuring from aeronautics, should not the party have the right to get whichever was the greater?

Mr. GRAHAM: It might work out that way. It is possible that, on entering the Air Service, he might give up his right to the gratuity under the Military Pensions' Act.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I suggest that whichever is the greater should be given.

Mr. CALDWELL: Does this bill cover the case where a man might be part of the time engaged in military service and part of the time in some other department of the service? I have in mind a case which came before our committee regarding a man named Holland.

Mr. GRAHAM: I might say that the wife of Major Holland was paid $7,500 under the Order in Council, and she also gets paid, not under the Military Pensions' Act or anything of that kind but under the Soldiers' Insurance Act she also gets, I think, $5,000.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I am drafting a proposed amendment to read something like this:

Unless the compensation otherwise payable hereunder be in excess of such gratuity or pension payable under such other act, and in such case only to the extent of such excess.

Mr. GRAHAM: I have no objection to the principle. My hon. friend might move that amendment to the bill.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Graham, thereupon, moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 136 to amend the Air Board Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

VANCOUVER HARBOUR

On motion of Hon. Ernest Lapointe (Minister of Marine and Fisheries) Bill 106, to amend the Vancouver Harbour Commissioners Act, was read the second time, and the House went into Committee thereon, Mr. Gordon in the Chair.

On section 1—Section amended so as to repeal power to appoint port warden and deputy.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What is the change?

Mr. LAPOINTE: Under the Harbour Commissioners' Act, 1913, the corporation of the harbour commissioners may appoint a harbour master, deputy harbour master, port warden, deputy port warden, shipping master and deputy shipping masters. This bill is to strike out the words "port warden, deputy port warden, shipping master and deputy shipping master." Under the Shipping Act, those officers are under the control of the Department of Marine and Fisheries. Such a provision does not exist with regard to the port warden and shipping masters in the other harbours, for the very reason that it is the duty of those officers to see that the provisions of the act and the regulations of the department are complied with. None of their powers or duties has any relation to or connection with the powers of the harbour commissioners. They are officers of the Department of Marine and Fisheries, and it is an anomaly that, in the Vancouver Harbour Commissioners Act, the harbour commissioners should have the right to control, to appoint, or to supervise the acts or duties of those officers. It is to make the act apply to Vancouver as it applies to the other harbours of the country.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Can the hon. minister tells us how the matter comes up? Has any inefficient work been done at Vancouver recently? Have any men been got rid of?

Mr. LAPOINTE: No, nothing of the kind. This is suggested by officers of the Department of Marine and Fisheries, in order that the law may be uniform anywhere.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: When was this difficulty discovered? there is usually some reason for a provision of this kind?

Mr. LAPOINTE: I do not know. I was not the discoverer of that anomaly.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Perhaps you can find out from the deputy?

Mr. LAPOINTE: I am informed that this difficulty has been noticed many times during the last few years, but especially last year the shipping master got into difficulties with the British Board of Trade with regard to certain funds and the Board of Trade at Vancouver, of course, reported and applied to the Department of Marine and Fisheries, which, under the law as it is, had no control over that officer, although he is the officer who applies the laws and regulations of the department.

Mr. LADNER: There must be some reason why the act was framed in the way in which it now exists.

Mr. LAPOINTE: So far as is known in the department, there never was any reason for it. I may assure my hon. friend that there is no ultimate or secret reason.

Mr. CALDWELL: No "joker".

Mr. LAPOINTE: No "joker". This is merely and simply to make the law as it should be.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I understand, from what the minister says, that he is following precisely what is done at Montreal, Quebec, Toronto and everywhere else.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Yes.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I should like the list to be clearly defined, of appointments to be made by the Government under this. What are they?

Mr. LAPOINTE: The shipping master and the port warden are the only ones.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The only two?

Mr. LAPOINTE: Yes.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Is there a vacancy in the positions of shipping master and port warden at the moment?

Mr. LAPOINTE: No.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Will there be?

Mr. LAPOINTE: I cannot speak for the future. Not that I know of presently.

Section agreed to.

Bill reported.

ADMIRALTY ACT AMENDMENT

On motion of Hon. D. D. McKenzie (Solicitor General) Bill No. 123, to amend the Admiralty Act, was read the second time, and the House went into committee thereon, Mr. Gordon in the chair.

On section 1—Governor in Council may appoint a deputy registrar for any district or registry division.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What is the object of this?

Mr. McKENZIE: As regards clause 1, under the old act, the Governor in Council appointed a registrar and the deputy registrar was appointed by the registrar. It was thought best that the governor in Council, who had authority to appoint a registrar, should also have power to appoint a deputy registrar. To make the change it is necessary only to insert the words "a deputy registrar."

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Why is it that the man who ought to know best should not appoint the deputy registrar?

Mr. McKENZIE: In our own case, in the province of Nova Scotia, we have an admiralty division in the city of Halifax, where the registrar is appointed. We have also an admiralty division at Sydney in the island of Cape Breton. The registrar who resides at Halifax, some three hundred miles away, does not know the kind of man that should be deputy registrar in the city of Sydney nearly as well as the Bar Association, for instance, in that city. I think the Governor in Council who appoints the registrar should also have power to appoint the deputy registrar who, to all intents and purposes, is a separate officer, over whom the registrar has no control at all.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Is there a deputy registrar there now? How has the business been carried on in the past?

Mr. McKENZIE: The business has been carried on in the past by a deputy who was appointed by Order in Council some years ago; but that Order in Council gave him jurisdiction over only four counties instead of sixteen counties. At Halifax, the registrar has full sway over the province; but while we have a court in the Cape Breton end of the province, we have a deputy registrar having jurisdiction over only four counties, and it would appear that the registrar at Halifax is not willing to give him any more jurisdiction as it might possibly be interfering with his territory. We think that our authorities ought to have power to deal with ships arriving in Sydney harbour, from whatever quarter they may come, and in regard to which proceedings in Admiralty are necessary, and not be confined entirely to something that might arise in the four counties of Cape Breton. We want the power to be vested in the Governor in Council to give us a deputy who will have jurisdiction all over the province.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: If I understand my hon. friend aright, this is not necessary for the purpose of a new appointment. It is not proposed to get rid of the present registrar in Cape Breton.

Mr. McKENZIE: I have no intention of getting rid of him; I intend to reappoint him.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The intention seems to be to enlarge his jurisdiction at the expense of the jurisdiction of the registrar at Halifax.

Mr. McKENZIE: There is really no such trouble at all.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: If there is no trouble, why the Bill?

Mr. McKENZIE: The appointment of a deputy registrar in the Admiralty Court in Nova Scotia or in any other province should not be left in the hands of the irresponsible person who happens to be registrar. The position is an important one, and as the registrar himself is responsible to the government of the country, so should be the deputy, but he is responsible only to the registrar. I can assure my hon. friend that there is no intention at all of making a change in the personnel of the office. The same man will be reappointed, but his jurisdiction will be wider.

Section agreed to.

On section 2—Appointment of deputy judge.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What is the effect of this section?

Mr. McKENZIE: There is nothing new in it. The late government passed a similar section in 1920, and we are amending that law so as to leave the sole power with the Governor in Council. Under the law passed in 1920 the jurisdiction in the matter of the appointment of the deputy, was left either with the Governor in Council or with the local judge. We are abolishing the jurisdiction of the judge and leaving it entirely with the Governor in Council. That is the only difference between this legislation and the act of 1920.

Section agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time, and passed.

THE OPIUM AND NARCOTIC DRUG ACT

On motion of Hon. H. S. Béland (Minister of Health) the House went into committee to consider the following proposed resolution, Mr. Gordon in the Chair:

That it is expedient to amend The Opium and Narcotic Drug Act, chapter 17 of the statutes of 1911, as amended by chapter 31 of the statutes of 1920 and chapter 42 of the statutes of 1921, and to provide:—

1. That subsection one of section five of the said act be amended so as to provide that a written order shall be required in connection with all sales of narcotics to druggists and others, and that it shall be unlawful to refiill narcotic prescriptions except where the preparation might lawfully have been sold in the first instance.

2. That subsection two of section five be amended so as to provide that it shall be unlawful for any physician, veterinary surgeon or dentist to prescribe, administer, give, sell or furnish any drug to any person except for medicinal purposes, or as may be prescribed for the medical treatment of a person who is under professional treatment.

3. That subsection two of section 5A be amended to prescribe heavier penalties for manufacturing, selling, giving away or distributing drugs without license, and for neglecting or refusing to keep the record required by the regulations.

4. That section 7 be amended to empower any constable or other peace officer who has reasonable cause to suspect that any drug is kept or concealed upon any premises to search for the same, and bring it before a magistrate having jurisdiction in the matter.

5. That no person shall, without lawful authority or without a permit signed by the Minister of Health or some person authorized by him in that behalf, import or have in his possession any opium pipe, opium lamp or other device or apparatus designed or generally used for the purpose of preparing opium for smoking, or smoking or inhaling opium.

6. That penalties be prescribed for violation of the provisions of the proposed legislation.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Section 5 of the resolution provides that no person shall import or have in his possession any opium pipe, opium lamp or other device used for the preparing of opium for smoking, without lawful authority or without a permit from the Minister of Health. What legal purpose can there be in the importation of such apparatus? What has the minister in mind in contemplating their importation?

Mr. BELAND: If these devices for the consumption of opium are found in the possession of any person that person shall be subject to a penalty.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The minister has not my point. We all know what a terribly dangerous thing opium is in itself, and I was wondering if it is possible that any useful purpose could be found for these appliances.

Mr. BELAND: Not that I know of.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Then why is the minister reserving the power provided for in this paragraph?

[Mr. Beland.]

Mr. CARMICHAEL: Section 6 provides:

That penalties be prescribed for violation of the provisions of the proposed legislation.

In view of the fact that of 835 convictions last year 634 were of Chinese, would it not be advisable to incorporate, as a penalty, that all orientals found trafficking in drugs shall be deported? This would help to some extent to solve the oriental question in this country.

Mr. BELAND: Such a provision would naturally have to be incorporated in the Immigration Act. As to the other penalties, they are fully described in the bill which will be introduced, based on this resolution. When the bill is before the House my hon. friend will see the penalties in each case. I shall be glad to explain the provisions in regard to the penalties because they vary, as applying to persons who have received a license, and to others who have not. So far as a provision for deportation is concerned, the committee will realize that it could not very well apply to Canadians. Only to Chinese, who have not been naturalized, could it apply. Personally, I have no objection to such a provision being incorporated in the Immigration Act, because I do not think that the country is profiting in any degree whatever by the presence of foreigners who administer, sell, or distribute narcotic drugs, especially to the younger people.

Mr. LADNER: I happen to have some knowledge in regard to investigations carried on into the illegal sale of narcotic drugs, both in Vancouver and in Winnipeg, and I know that the investigators were in all cases people of the highest responsibility in their respective communities. I understand that an investigation was also held in Quebec, and even in Ottawa. There is a certain psychological aspect to any legislation that will be effective in deterring men from carrying on this illegal sale. One effective deterrent is deportation, and I would urge upon the minister the wisdom of inserting in the bill a provision empowering the authorities to deport men or women convicted of the illegal sale of drugs or of the commission of other serious offences under the act. I would also strongly urge upon him the necessity of giving discretionary power to magistrates to order the lash in those cases where it is proved that the accused deliberately and cold-bloodedly induced young people to become drug addicts. This is neither the time nor the occasion to go fully into the matter, but there is an appalling traffic in drugs. The addict must be treated as a patient. The trafficker, generally an oriental, a cool, calculating person, does not take the drug himself because he knows its terrible effects on those who become its slaves, but he ingeniously inveigles innocent people into the habit. He has a well-planned system of business, covering importation, wholesaling and retailing, and hon. members would be amazed if they knew what was disclosed to a representative committee which investigated conditions in Vancouver. The lash would be the most effective deterrent you could possibly apply, because one thing these traffickers do fear is corporal punishment. And surely a man or woman, white, brown or yellow, who deliberately induces young girls to become addicts is guilty of a more serious crime against society than robbery with violence. Scores of associations throughout Canada have passed resolutions most emphatically favouring the infliction of the lash upon these nefarious traffickers, and I hope the minister will see that the bill contains the necessary provision to this end.

Mr. TOLMIE: I heartily endorse what the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Ladner) has just stated. We find that this traffic is increasing very rapidly in British Columbia, and is becoming a serious menace there, being largely, though not exclusively, engaged in by orientals. We feel that the penalities cannot be made too severe against those who profit from this nefarious traffic. Apparently the penalties now in force are inadequate, for they have not resulted in stopping the traffic. I would suggest that there be a much more vigorous application of the law by our police forces, and that they be made to realize the seriousness of this traffic, so that increased vigilance on their part will produce better results. I agree with my hon. friend that while many men will take chances of a heavy fine or imprisonment, they are fearful of receiving the lash, and that the prospect of such punishment and subsequent deportation would make them think twice before breaking the law. In a word, the deterrent effect of such penalties would be very helpful in putting down this traffic.

Mr. BELAND: To a very large extent I share the views that have been expressed as to the proper punishment of those engaged in illicit drug traffic. Heretofore the infliction of the lash has been confined mainly to the punishment of physical crimes. But we are only considering the principle at present, and after the bill has been given its second reading and is in committee, we can go over it clause by clause, and whatever course is agreeable I am willing to carry out.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: When this bill was up about two years ago we had the same question raised which is covered, as I recollect, by the first paragraph, which renders it unlawful for any chemist to refill a narcotic prescription. At that time representations were made, particularly by hon. members from the prairies, that in the West where many people lived great distances from doctors they very often could not get to the doctors in time to have their prescriptions refilled just when it might be absolutely necessary, to say nothing of the expense involved. It was thought that some degree of latitude should be given to druggists and a certain number of refills allowed. I wonder if my hon. friend has considered the objections raised at that time, and which must still obtain. I would also ask him what narcotic drugs can be supplied except under prescription. I thought we had stopped them all. This clause has an exception covering narcotic prescriptions which might have been "lawfully sold in the first instance." What is meant by that?

Mr. BELAND: The law permits of certain preparations being sold which contain narcotic drugs in very small quantities. I have not in mind at the present moment what the exact quantity is for each teaspoonful, but it is so small that it was considered advisable that such prescriptions should be permitted, largely on the suggestion, I think, of some of the western members. It is felt that some relief should be afforded in cases where necessary without a prescription, and the law has been framed so as to permit the refilling by druggists of prescriptions containing certain small proportions of narcotics. It is these preparations that the present law refers to when it provides that they could be lawfully refilled as if they were ordinary prescriptions. But I can give my hon. friend further details when the bill is in committee.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I do not think the exception refers to prescriptions at all; it refers merely to preparations which druggists themselves put up without the intervention of a doctor.

Mr. BELAND. That is what I have in mind—preparations.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I understand my hon. friend to say however, that in these cases the drugs are present in such small quantities that they could not hurt anybody. What does my hon. friend think of those cases where prescriptions of a perfectly proper character and for a perfectly proper purpose required to be refilled? Has he considered whether they might be refilled once or twice before the persons to whom they are issued are penalized to the extent of another visit to the doctor? Then there are the distances to be considered in the country districts.

Mr. BELAND: I do not believe that any hardship is incurred in that respect. It is always possible for the patient or the mother of, say, the young sick person to make an arrangement with the physician as to the number of times that the prescription can be refilled by the local druggist. Or, in the case where such an agreement is not reached, it is always possible within a day or two to communicate by mail with a doctor and ask permission to have the prescription refilled.

Mr. TOLMIE: Would that apply also to veterinary prescriptions?

Mr. BELAND: It would.

Mr. TOLMIE: I would point out in that connection that these narcotics are used for the relief of acute pains suffered by horses and other animals. It is necessary that this relief be administered quickly, and if the veterinary is ten or fifteen miles out in the country the animal might die before his return. This provision would seem to be quite inconvenient so far as the treatment of animals is concerned.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in.

Mr. BELAND moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 137 to amend the Opium and Narcotic Drug Act. He said:

I would like to say that it is my intention to add a clause to this bill limiting the right of appeal. I will explain it later in committee.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

AIR BOARD ACT AMENDMENT

On motion of Hon. George P. Graham (Minister of Militia and Defence) Bill No. 136, to amend the Air Board Act, was read the second time, and the House went into committee thereon, Mr. Gordon in the Chair.

On section 1:

Mr. GRAHAM: I move that the following words be added to clause 1:

——unless the claimant elects to accept such compensation, gratuity or pension under any such other act.

Section as amended agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

After Recess

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

ESCHEATS ACT AMENDMENT

On motion of Hon. D. D. McKenzie (Solicitor General) Bill No. 124 to amend the Escheats Act was read the second time, and the House went into committee thereon, Mr. Gordon in the Chair.

On section 1—Escheat extended to property of defunct corporations.

Mr. BAXTER: What has led to the necessity for legislation of this character? I presume that it can only be applicable to land and only in those provinces of Canada which have not, as yet, been entrusted with their natural resources. Am I right or wrong in that presumption?

Mr. McKENZIE: Evidently this refers to personal property which becomes the subject of escheat in the right of the Crown and the right of the Dominion. The present bill does not materially change the character of the Escheats Act as passed by this parliament in 1910, except that the original act contains no provision as to the period within which actions must be brought for or on behalf of the Crown. The present bill simply fixes the time within which action must be brought. I may say to the committee frankly that I am not very familiar with the act, never having conducted any proceedings under it. This bill comes to me from the Department of Justice, and it appears that in the working out of the act they have found it necessary to have such a provision.

Mr. BAXTER: Under section 2 an action must be brought against the government within two years. Now I know of no such limitation in actions except in civil proceedings for some form of violence, as in cases of assault, slander, or like actions that everybody wants to see disposed of. In the province of New Brunswick an action for the recovery of land may be brought within twenty years, and under certain circumstances within forty years, so that it takes forty years to establish proscription in that province. The period may be less in some of the rest of the provinces; I think it is less in the province of Ontario. That is between party and party—between one subject and another subject—but here we are asked to say that action must be taken in the short space of twenty-four months. People may be absent and not aware of their rights; but, unless they approach the Crown and ask leave to sue within that short period, they are forever debarred. There must be some extraordinary reason moving the Department of Justice to ask for such legislation. I do not wonder the Solicitor General cannot comprehend it, and it is a most unfortunate thing that the Department of Justice did not furnish him with some memorandum showing the difficulties which had arisen and the need for action in this way. The only thing I can conceive is that possibly it is in aid of the Soldiers' Settlement Board. But if so, let him give the facts, and if the reasons appeal to us, we may be justified putting it through. I cannot justify a vote to destroy the right of heirs on a two years' limitation.

The first section is aimed at corporations. I can conceive that in those provinces where the title of the land is in the Crown in the right of the Dominion of Canada, and only in such cases, there may be a way in common law called escheat. That, simply, means that, in the failure of any heirs appearing, the Crown steps in and takes the property. The Crown has the power, and generally exercises it, of granting that land to the parties who are morally, though perhaps not legally, entitled to possession. The Crown meets cases of illegitimacy in that way, and it is quite right and proper that that should be done, but, with regard to land in the other provinces, I do not see that it can have any possible effect. Yet the language is very broad. Now, the attempt is to extend this to corporations. A corporation in one sense cannot die; in another sense it can, but if a corporation ceases to function legally, the people who are interested in that corporation have always a right to get the property by some process. It does not go to the Crown. I cannot think of a case where the property of a corporation went to the Crown at common law, unless the corporation had forfeited its title in some way by some misconduct, but I cannot conceive of a case where a corporation can so utterly die that no person will be entitled to claim the estate. Suppose it was a company of five men; you have to presume that they are all deceased and that none of them has left any heirs. That is a very large assumption. Some extraordinary case must have occurred to cause the Department of Justice to ask the Solicitor General to introduce a bill of this kind, and why does the department not furnish him with the information, so that we can know the reason for passing this legislation? Until I have some such mandate before me, I am sure the Solicitor General will excuse me if I say it is not such legislation as, at first blush, commends itself sufficiently to warrant my support.

Mr. McKENZIE: I might say that this measure comes from the Department of Justice. This bill was presented to me with the intention that I should introduce it, and I did so. A request was made that I should call on the deputy minister and get some further history in regard to it. I have been so busy with other matters that I have not found time to do that. The bill is here now, and I have to deal with it. We are not bound hard and fast to any number of years, and if we can agree upon any number of years—say four years if that would be satisfactory to hon. members opposite—I am sure the Minister of Justice (Sir Lomer Gouin) and the department have no particular purpose in placing the time at two years. The idea is to take hold of these properties and prevent them from lying idle and going to waste, where there are no heirs to take possession. The department has decided, in the shortest possible time, to put an end to these conditions. That is why it fixed this comparatively short period of time within which parties would have a right to bring action. In many cases the property is going to waste, falling to pieces, and nothing is to be gained by delay. It is rather hard to be waiting for many years, without closing the matter and disposing of the property. If we leave it open for any great length of time for anybody to step in and, rightly or wrongly, make a claim to the property, of course it affects the sale and final disposition of the property. These are the reasons that moved the department to provide a means of closing up the matter as quickly as possible, or to give the property to those who are entitled to it, if an action is brought and somebody is found to be entitled to it. The department wants to make as short a job of it as possible, and not let it run from year to year. If my hon. friend from St. John and Albert (Mr. Baxter) thinks we ought to extend the time, under the circumstance, the Department of Justice has no purpose in view, except to do what is absolutely right, but it is not desirable that matters of this kind should remain open too long.

Mr. BAXTER: I hope that nothing I have said would intimate in any way that I thought my hon. friend was trying to obtain any advantage, because I have no such thought in my mind, but his explanation, or want of explanation, if he will pardon me for saying so, convinces me I am right in the conjecture I formed but had not expressed. The moment he said the bill had come from the Department of Justice, I came to the conclusion that this was a very bureaucratic measure and not needed, and that some over zealous official was asking for legislation, without thinking seriously of the consequences. The explanation, or want of explanation, convinces me that I was perfectly right. I do not think the change from two to four years is going to help much. As a lawyer, the Solicitor General must appreciate that he will not, by a bill imposing a limitation of two years or four years or any other short space of time, prevent the making of claims by people who have no claim. It is not the people who have no rights he is cutting off; it is the people who have rights. Suppose a man comes from England, gets a farm out West in one of the provinces where the Crown owns the soil, and he has a regular title to that farm. He is not married, so far as any one knows, and has no family. He is working alone, and some years elapse. He dies. How does the Crown know that there are no legitimate relatives somewhere? How do the relatives know this man has died, if he is a man who has, perhaps, not kept up very much correspondence with his family? My hon. friend will hardly expect that he should write a letter telling of his premeditated demise, or that his spirit should write a letter telling that he has actually passed out of this sphere. How do they know whether he is dead or not. But we pass this bill, and if claimants do not appear within two years, their title is dead. What right has the Crown in respect of Canada to that property? Somebody else paid for it; somebody else worked on it; somebody else earned it; and even if his relatives are somewhat remote in degree, they and not the people of Canada are entitled to that property. If that man's property has been invaded by some trespasser who had acquired a footing upon it, and if the man was away and did not know that, he would have, under the law of the western provinces, I think, twelve years in which to vindicate his rights. If it was in my province of New Brunswick, he would have twenty years.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: In Ontario, ten years.

Mr. BAXTER: If he died before that term was up and his children were under age, a further time would be allowed to enable them to reach their majority and to vindicate their title. Why should the Crown ask for such a right as this, not a right to deny the title of a man who has no title, but a right to deny and extinguish the title of people who have good title? That is what it is. I cannot understand the mind of the man who drafted this bill. He cannot have thought of the consequences; he probably was thinking only of squatters coming in on the property; and if they were going to assert title, he wanted them to do that properly. I am in entire sympathy with that; but the Crown did not need the help of any new legislation for that; under the common law, the Crown could have taken that property and held it against the world except the rightful owner. The Crown does not need this bill to-day to do that. What is the emergency? What is the reason? I would feel much more content if my hon. friend would kindly consent to get the names of individual cases and mention them in this Chamber. There will surely be in the representation of this House some hon. members from the West who will recognize the cases if they are mentioned. Such cases are rare. In my province, a province of something less than half a million population, I can recall three instances in the last fifty years, and the province of New Brunswick has a general escheat law, but no such legislation as this, where grants are made when it is found that people are morally, although not legally, entitled. There can be no great number of cases and no great hardship. Would it not be better to bring us all the information, so that we might know why some official in the department got so exercised as to think it necessary to draft a law that would cut away, upon a two years' proscription, the rights of people lawfully entitled to property?

Mr. McKENZIE: There is hardly a legal case or a case of law in regard to property, either real or personal, but would be placed by my hon. friend in the extreme position which he has described. It would appear, according to his contention, that by reason of this legislation, severe hardships are to be inflicted upon certain individuals. It is a well-established principle that the Crown can do no wrong. On the Crown bringing this action, there must be service on somebody; there must be service of some kind or information that must be exhibited in connection with this action. The Crown cannot go on without somebody representing the supposed heir or whoever is supposed to have a right to this property. He must be represented before the court. Are we to take it for granted that the party who is appointed to represent the alleged heirs; or if there are heirs, after the service of these papers or their advertisement in the newspapers, in the Canada Gazette and in whatever other way the practice of the court and the order of the judge may direct—

Mr. BAXTER: Will my hon. friend permit me to interrupt him for a moment? There is no need for our having a misunderstanding of the plain wording of the law:

> Where His Majesty the King, in his right of Canada, is entitled to any land or other real or personal property by reason of the person last seised or entitled thereto having died intestate and without lawful heirs the Attorney General of Canada may cause possession thereof to be taken in the name of His Majesty, or if possession is withheld may exhibit an information in the Exchequer Court for the recovery thereof.

There is no need to advertise for heirs or anything else. You simply take possession.

Mr. McKENZIE: Supposing the Crown takes possession; the Crown holds possession; but before the Crown can part with the property, or pass it over to anybody else, there must be a judgment of a competent court to enable the Crown to do so. It is a well-established principle of British law that no person's right can be affected without notice; there must be notice. My learned friend will find, in the very early cases of the Supreme Court of Canada, that the principle was established, that no man's right to property, or any other tangible right, can be affected without notice. Courts can go on giving titles and judgments as much as they like; but while that decision in the Supreme Court of Canada holds, notice must be given before anybody's rights can be affected by those performances at all. Therefore, the greater part of what my hon. friend has pictured cannot happen at all. I wish simply to point out that this is property which nobody claims. It stands there for two years. The Crown has possibly taken possession ten days after the man has died; the Crown has possession; it holds possession for two years. No heir appears or there is no claimant to the property, and it is found desirable to sell it. Then the Crown, within those two years, will put itself in a position, by judgment of a competent court, to dispose of the property, and it is for the Exchequer Court to say what provision should be made. Supposing a man has made improvements worth $2,000 to a property; the Exchequer Court will say to the Crown: "You may sell this property provided that, before you dispose of it or alienate the title, you must get that $2,000 and put it into the bank and leave it there awaiting any claimant". All those rights will be preserved by the judge. All that we say is that these steps must be taken. We have a court to deal with these matters, and we have every reason to believe that, if there is no real, proper defendant before the court, a judge will be even more careful about what becomes of the property than if there was a real live defendant and claimant represented by counsel before him. I have no desire to appear solicitous in regard to this matter; I am quite willing that the committee rise and report progress on this bill and ask leave to sit again. In the meantime, possibly I can find out the real facts that have moved the department or some important official of it to ask for this legislation.

Mr. BAXTER: I thank my hon. friend for taking this course. I think it will clear the air. If the minister will give the House the information which I have requested, I think the House will be better satisfied.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I am not disposed to take much exception to the bill or the object which it is sought to obtain by it. I do take exception to the very limited term, two years, which the bill proposes to fix as against any claim that may be made against the Crown. In my view, there should be some finality in all these matters. I agree also that the law of escheat is not so common in this country, and the ordinary practitioner has not had a great deal of experience of it. It is invoked only at odd intervals; and I think I am right when I say that in respect of personal property this bill will be of exceedingly limited application. It could only possibly apply to personal property in unorganized districts or territories of Canada. I think the law was settled as far back as the year 1883 in a case which went to the Privy Council from the province of Ontario. By the judgment of the Privy Council in that case—I think, the Attorney General of Ontario against the Attorney-General of Canada—it was settled that escheated estates became the property of the province and not of the Dominion of Canada. The application of this bill will be limited to real estate in those provinces where the Dominion still owns land, and to personal property only in the unorganized districts of Canada. So that in regard to personal property the application of the bill will be extremely limited. Practically, the bill deals only with real estate, and I for one think that in the case of a man dying without a will and without heirs there should be some finality in the matter of his estate, some final method of disposal. If it goes eventually to the Dominion of Canada, the right of the Dominion should at the earliest convenient time become absolute and action should be barred. I do think that the period of two years proposed in the bill is entirely too restrictive. If the Solicitor-General will recommend a period of six years, which is the usual term of limitation in respect of ordinary actions in law, or even longer, in regard to land, I personally do not see any great objection to the bill passing the House. Perhaps, in the interval, as the bill is not to be proceeded with to-night, the Solicitor-General could think out the question of a more extended limitation, and if he will submit a bill providing a period of six or even ten years, speaking for myself alone, I do not see any objection to the bill. I think it is a bill that should be passed.

THE JUDGES ACT AMENDMENT

CONCURRENCE IN SENATE AMENDMENTS

On motion of Sir Lomer Gouin (Minister of Justice) the House went into committee to consider the amendments made by the Senate to Bill No. 19, to amend the Judges Act, Mr. Gordon in the Chair.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Perhaps the minister will explain the amendments.

Sir LOMER GOUIN: The amendments provide that whenever a judge, by reason of age or infirmity, becomes incapacitated for the due execution of his duties, he shall cease to receive his salary, but this shall be done only on report of the Minister of Justice to the Governor in Council after an inquiry has been held by one or two judges or more of the Supreme Court, or a judge of the Exchequer Court, or one or more judges of the highest court of the province concerned, after notice has been given to the judge in the matter. If it is established that such a judge is incapacitated by age or infirmity to perform his duties, on the report of the Minister of Justice his salary ceases. Subsection 3, however, provides that, nevertheless, even after such procedure has been decided upon it shall be possible for the Government to pension the judge. Moreover, the Minister of Justice has power to grant leave, for good cause to such a judge.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Does the minister himself approve of the amendments?

Sir LOMER GOUIN: I have read them carefully and I approve of them.

Motion agreed to; amendments read the second time and concurred in.

CRIMINAL CODE AMENDMENT

On motion of Sir Lomer Gouin (Minister of Justice) Bill No. 93 to amend the Criminal Code was read the second time, and the House went into committee thereon, Mr. Gordon in the Chair.

On Section 1—Offence for police commissioner to take bribe or for person to offer him bribe.

Sir LOMER GOUIN: We propose to amend Section 157 of the criminal code to cover police commissioners.

Section agreed to.

On Section 2—Reference to numbers of sections, etc.

Sir LOMER GOUIN: Since the "three preceding sections" were passed an amendment has been inserted between Sections 242 and 243, and therefore it becomes necessary to amend Section 244 as in this bill.

Section agreed to.

On Section 3—Age of consent.

Sir LOMER GOUIN: This section was passed by this House last year but was rejected by the Senate.

Section agreed to.

On Section 7—Penalty of seven years or ten years for subsequent offence.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What is the penalty under the act?

Sir LOMER GOUIN: This prescribes the maximum penalty for stealing automobiles.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: For the first offence?

Sir LOMER GOUIN: Yes; but it is the maximum.

Mr. McKENZIE: I have heard a great deal of complaint that the minimum penalty below which the judge has no right to exercise discretion is too high.

Sir LOMER GOUIN: The minimum is one year.

Mr. SHAW: I would point out, Mr. Chairman, that some of us in this end of the Chamber who are interested in this particular bill cannot hear a single word that the minister has said.

Section agreed to.

On Section 8—Conveyance of cattle without proper rest, etc.—Carriage of calves under three weeks old.

Mr. NEILL: Why is it an offence to carry a calf under the age of three weeks by boat or rail? I understand the object, but let me point out that a calf one week old is perfectly old enough to be shipped ten or twenty miles by boat or rail, and it is being done every day of the week. Why make it a criminal offence?

Sir LOMER GOUIN: That is the old law. The only amendment is to strike out the necessary consent by the owner to keep the animals in any car or vessel for more than thirty-six hours.

Mr. NEILL: That amendment may or may not be desirable, but what I am asking is why it is illegal for a common carrier to transport a calf less than three weeks old, when it is not harmful and is being done every day of the week. What is the use of having laws which are unreasonable, and are not being observed?

Sir LOMER GOUIN: If there is any good ground to amend the law I shall be willing to consider it.

Mr. GUTHRIE: My recollection is that this clause was inserted owing to representations made by very worthy citizens who constitute the Humane Society. It was represented that it was an act of cruelty to ship calves under three weeks old without their dam.

Mr. NEILL: I have always observed, Mr. Chairman, that people who know most about farming are those who live in cities. It is not a cruelty to a calf to ship it when it is three weeks old unless it is shipped a very long journey without nourishment. A distance of twenty or thirty miles can be covered by boat or rail within four or five hours, and it does not injure the calf to have it go without nourishment for that length of time. Many of these societies for the prevention of cruelty to animals are very admirable societies, kept up largely by ladies who cannot be expected to be familiar with the intricacies of agricultural life. In the state of nature, which is supposed to be the nearest we can get to proper conditions, a cow will leave its calf cached somewhere for nearly a whole day while it goes out for food, and will come back and nurse the calf at night, with no resulting injury to the calf. As a matter of fact, I am told that this section was introduced with some vague idea of restricting the shipping of calves which are not pure-bred, but I do not know about that. I think this is an unreasonable provision.

Mr. GOULD: With regard to the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals, some hon. members will recall that three sessions ago there emanated from the same society the suggestion that it would be unholy or criminal to use poison gas on grasshoppers because it might injure without killing them. It seems to me that the sentiment expressed in this present provision is similar to the sentiment which was expressed on that occasion. What the hon. member (Mr. Neill) says concerning the feeding of calves is quite right; I have known the dam to leave her young for twenty-four hours without causing the slightest injury. As a matter of fact, if you tried to catch the calf during that period you would find it a very strong youngster and quite capable of keeping out of the way. I think that this is an unwarranted intervention.

Mr. NEILL: The section says that it shall be illegal to ship calves under three weeks of age other than calves at foot of milch cows, or purebred calves. In other words, if a calf is under three weeks old it must not be shipped unless it is purebred. What peculiar quality is there in a purebred animals which enables it to do without nourishment longer than one which is not purebred?

Sir LOMER GOUIN: In order to make this amendment complete I think it will be necessary to strike out the word "is" after "1921" in line three of the section and to substitute therefore the following words:

—and section 544A as enacted by chapter 9 of the statutes of 1909 are—

As to that part of the section which has reference to calves, I would ask hon. members to let it pass for this year and next year we may consider it.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 11—certain fines in Ontario to be paid to the municipalities.

Mr. BAXTER: Why does this apply only to Ontario?

Sir LOMER GOUIN: Representations have been made by the province of Ontario on this point, and they seem to be unanimous. That is why the amendment is made in relation to Ontario.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The distinction is quite clear. In Quebec the provincial government provides for the building of the court houses and the like, as well as all the machinery for the administration of justice. In Ontario the municipalities build the court houses and maintain them. It seems right, therefore, that the municipality should get this very small recompense arising out of the administration of justice.

Mr. BAXTER: What my hon. friend has said with regard to Ontario applies equally to New Brunswick, and I think, to Nova Scotia as well. In both these provinces the municipalities build the court houses and meet all the cost of administering justice so far as the magistrates' courts are concerned if it is right to extend this provision to Ontario it is right to apply it to the other provinces.

9 p.m.

Mr. MICHAUD: I can corroborate what my hon. friend (Mr. Baxter) has just stated. The municipalities in New Brunswick build their own court houses and meet the magistrates' expenses, the cost of fuel, caretaking, and so on, so far as preliminary inquiries in the magistrates' courts are concerned.

Mr. SHAW: I should imagine that in Alberta the proceeds of estreated recognizances are as considerable as they are in any other province. While the local authorities are not responsible for the building and maintenance of court houses, they meet a substantial portion of the "expense of administering the law," to use the expression in the section. Perhaps the situation there should also be considered.

Mr. BAXTER: I would move, if the minister will accept the amendment, to strike out the words "with respect to the province of Ontario". If the principle is right as applied to Ontaria, it is right as applied to every other province.

Sir LOMER GOUIN: I would ask my hon. friend not to insist on that amendment. We had delegations from Ontario on this subject at the very beginning of the session. The bill was introduced four or five weeks ago, and its terms have been familiar to all hon. members. I know that some of the provinces oppose this amendment and possibly the good province of New Brunswick is with the opponents of the bill. If this amendment passes, possibly one or two other provinces may come to us and represent that they should be treated the same way. Just now we desire to pass the amendment which applies to the province of Ontario alone.

Mr. BAXTER: This legislation is not helping the province of Ontario at all because it is not a matter of interest to that government. Nor is there any reason for asking the province of New Brunswick, or any of the other provinces, for their opinion. In New Brunswick the province does not bear one penny of this cost. In Ontario, I suppose it is the municipalities that are benefited. The province itself does not get the money under this legislation.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: They got it before.

Mr. BAXTER: They got it before this act was passed?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Certainly.

Mr. BAXTER: We never got it in New Brunswick.

Sir LOMER GOUIN: The province of New Brunswick received all the money.

Mr. BAXTER: Oh, no.

Sir LOMER GOUIN: Yes.

Mr. BAXTER: Most of the fines are received by the police magistrates and under special statute have to be paid over to the particular department under which the prosecution is brought. In New Brunswick fines that are not allocated go to the municipal authorities.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I can tell my hon. friend that so far as Ontario is concerned that is the situation. They came down at the very commencement of the session. I thought nearly everybody knew the facts; certainly the newspapers knew all about it. There was a very large deputation and it was shown, if I remember the figures rightly, that the provincial government, in connection with its enforcement of criminal procedure, derived a profit of $105,000—certainly over $100,000—while at the same time the whole machinery was supplied by the municipalities. Now, what the Minister of Justice means—and this is a matter in which all the provinces are interested—is that it has not been demonstrated whether the provinces should or should not lose that revenue. As regards Ontario it does seem to me that that province should not lose any chance of getting this small measure of justice.

Section agreed to.

On section 12—Section made to extend to corporations:

Sir LOMER GOUIN: I have an amendment to propose to section 542. Paragraph (a), of section 542, as at present framed reads as follows:

Everyone is guilty of an offence and liable, on summary conviction before two justices to a penalty not exceeding fifty dollars, or to three months' imprisonment with or without hard labour, or to both, who—

(a) wantonly, cruelly, or unencessarily beats, binds ill-treats, abuses, overdrives or tortures cattle, poultry, dog, domestic animal or bird, or any wild animal or bird in captivity.

I propose to replace paragraph (a) by the following:

(a) wantonly, cruelly, or unnecessarily kills, slaughters, beats, binds, ill-treats, abuses, overdrives, overloads, tortures, infuriates or terrifies any cattle, poultry, dog, domestic animal or bird, or any wild animal or bird in captivity, or subjects or causes or procures or, being the owner permits, any animal to be subjected to any operation which is performed without due care and humanity or, being the operator, does not when proper and possible use some general or local anesthetic of sufficient power to prevent such animal from feeling pain when so operating; or

The amendment has been asked for by the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals. Whenever an operation is performed they want the operative to use an anesthetic.

Mr. McBRIDE: How would this provision affect the branding of cattle?

Sir LOMER GOUIN: I do not think it would apply to the branding of cattle, it refers to operations.

Mr. SHEARD: Would it apply to the docking of horses' tails?

Mr. BROWN: Is there anything to define what an "operation" is? Because I can conceive it to be quite possible that "operation" might be defined in such a way as to handicap operations on the farm.

Sir LOMER GOUIN: It is a very hard thing to define. This provision is demanded by the Department of Agriculture, I understand, and I am told that the same legislation has been passed in England and all the other dominions.

Mr. TOLMIE: Then it does not apply to the ordinary operations on the farm?

Sir LOMER GOUIN: Not ordinary operations.

Mr. TOLMIE: That ought to be very clearly pointed out, because if the interpretation of the paragraph were left to some uninformed inspector or magistrate very serious results might follow?

Sir LOMER GOUIN: The matter is left to a judge. If the House deems the provision to be dangerous I will not insist upon it.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What has the Minister of Agriculture to say about this, seeing that the amendment emanated from his department?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I was not listening.

Mr. COOTE: I did not quite catch the entire wording of the amendment but, I want to point this out: I know from personal experience that to give chloroform, or any anesthetic, to one of these animals that we sometimes have to operate on is very expensive. I had a favourite horse that needed to have a rather serious operation, and I asked the veterinary what it would cost to give him an anesthetic. He replied that it would cost more than the horse was worth. I think the committee should be a little careful about passing these amendments without really knowing just how far they go, and what the result is likely to be.

Mr. McBRIDE: I am afraid such a provision as this if applied to the branding of calves would be rather hard to comply with. I know of one justice of the peace who declared that if he had his way he would put in the penitentiary any person found applying a hot iron to a calf, and we have got to brand our calves. I do not think this should carry. There is considerable feeling in our part of the country that all cattle should be dehorned. Now how would we get along if we were dehorning cattle? There are many operations that cattle have to undergo, where they are ranching in a large way, and, I think, if this provision were enacted, it would be rather difficult to get someone to decide what the law really meant.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I think there can be no objection to the provision for giving anesthetics to animals undergoing painful operations. Would the hon. member not want an anesthetic himself, if he had to undergo an operation? If it be used in the human family, it should be used in the case of animals. We have our tonsils cut out, and other operations, and we do not consider the question of cost. It is evidence of advanced civilization when we consider our dumb animals in this respect. I think we should enact this provision.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Would that apply to branding, dehorning or similar operations?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: My hon. friend does not want me to enter into a minute classification of the painful operations?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Yes.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I do not think it would affect dehorning. That is a very rapid operation, and over in a very short time, and, if performed, with proper equipment would not require an anesthetic.

Mr. NEILL: Is there not an act which provides that if you administer chloroform or an anesthetic, a medical man must be present?

Mr. COOTE: I would request the Minister of Justice to withdraw that clause relating to operations performed on animals. I think the expense would be prohibitive.

Sir LOMER GOUIN: I will withdraw the whole amendment.

Amendment withdrawn.

SUPPLY

The House in Committee of Supply, Mr. Gordon in the Chair.

Trade and Commerce—Canada Grain Act, Administration of $1,300,000.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What is the reason for the increase?

Mr. ROBB: It is the usual increase of business, and is based upon the estimate of last year.. Last year there was not quite sufficient to cover the amount required, and we had to put through some orders in council and supplementaries.

Mr. CARMICHAEL: Under this item, I notice, there is an increase in last year's expenditure of $125,000. I do not wish to enter into that feature of this estimate, but wish to bring another matter before the committee in connection with the estimate. It is a matter that was mentioned in this House some two years ago, it has come before the Department of Trade and Commerce a number of times, and it was taken up with the present leader of the Opposition (Mr. Meighen) when he was Prime Minister. I believe that he and the Department of Justice have had correspondence on the subject. I refer to the case of one of my constituents, Mr. J. A. Campbell, of Sovereign, Saskatchewan, who shipped a car of flax in November of 1916 to the Acme Grain Company, of Winnipeg, Manitoba, with instructions to sell the flax when it reached a certain price. On February 2nd, 1917, Mr. Campbell enlisted and went overseas. In April of 1917, while Mr. Campbell was overseas, the car of flax was sold, because flax had reached the stipulated price, but the Acme Grain Company defaulted. Their liabilities were $35,000, and their assets, which were represented by the guarantee bond they had obtained, were but $7,500. Mr. Campbell's flax was sold for $2,894.55, but, when he got his share of the bond, he received only $621.86, being a net loss to him of $2,272.69, and this loss was sustained over five years ago. Mr. Campbell claims this amount, with interest, for a period of something over five years. I might enter into some proof of the legal ground for his claim. I will read some sections of the Canada Grain Act, which are not very lengthy. Section 210 reads:

> Any person desiring to carry on the business of grain commission merchant in the western inspection division shall make application in writing to the board for a license to sell grain on commission, stating the locality where he intends to carry on such business, and the probable amount of business he will do monthly.

Then section 211 reads:

> On receiving such application the board shall fix the amount of a bond to be given to His Majesty with sufficient surety for the benefit of persons entrusting such commission merchants with consignments of grain to be sold on commission.

In section 213, provision is made for the issuing of a license to such company on payment of a fee. The board referred to in this legislation is the Board of Grain Commissioners, which is under the supervision of the Department of Trade and Commerce, which department is a department of this Government, which Government represents the people of Canada. Mr. Campbell claims that this Department of Trade and Commerce should make good his claim. I am well aware that the Department of Justice has ruled that Mr. Campbell has no legal claim on the department, so that I do not care to enter into the controversy and try to prove that he has. If he has not a legal claim, I am quite sure that he has a moral claim. This is the case of a Canadian citizen. He is a resident of my constituency, and I know him personally. He went overseas, and for nearly two and one-half years was in the service of his country. For about seven months of that time he was in hospital. We can easily imagine the thoughts that a person would have while overseas presumably to protect our interests as well as his, on hearing that his property at home was looted to the extent of over $2,200. We can easily imagine what kind of effect it would have upon him to get word from the Department of Trade and Commerce that he had no legal claim to recover this loss. He might easily reason that Britain had no legal right to go into war to protect Belgium. Indeed, I question if she did have any legal right; but yet she went in because she had a moral right, and to show that she had that moral right, about 1,000,000 of her sons gave up their lives. Also he might reason that, even though Britain went into the war, Canada was not legally bound also to go in. Yet Canada went into the war and about 50,000 of her sons are mouldering in Flanders to-day, not because she was legally bound to go, but because she felt morally bound to go. Therefore, if the department is not legally bound to make good this claim, it seems to me that this gentleman, a returned soldier, has a moral claim on the finances of this country. I might refer the committee to item No. 168 on page 43 of the Estimates, where we passed in this committee an expenditure of $5,000 to provide for the building of a tablet to the memory of the late Bowman B. Law, who lost his life in the fire which destroyed the old Parliament building. When this item was going through, I was revolving in my mind what claim there was on the Government of Canada to make this expenditure of $5,000. I did not raise any question in opposition, because I, like the rest of the committee, felt that, perhaps, there was a moral responsibility on the Government to make this payment. If there is a moral responsibility on the country to pay out $5,000 in this case, there is a greater moral responsibility on the Government to pay out something over $2,200 to make good an actual loss for one who left his country and left his property in the care of the citizens of Canada.

There is another item in the Estimates, that for militia annual drill. We recall quite well in this committee that we made provision to expend $1,100,000 for the ensuing year on annual drill. While there was some opposition to this item of expenditure, it went through. During the discussion, the point was raised that it was very necessary to keep up annual drill in order to have people in shape in case of some future possible war. The expenditure of $1,100,000 under this item will not have as far-reaching effect as the payment of this just claim against the Department of Trade and Commerce. I make this statement because the injustice done to this individual is known throughout western Canada. He is the type of individual that does not let a small matter drop. He is the kind of individual that made good at the front because he is the kind that sticks to and hangs on when there is a point to be gained. He has written in several of our western papers; he has corresponded with the Department of Trade and Commerce. I venture to say that they have a voluminous correspondence over this case. He has also corresponded with the Department of Justice, with the Department of Soldiers Civil Re-establishment, with the ex-Prime Minister (Mr. Meighen) and with the Great War Veterans' Association. His correspondence has reached tremendous proportions, and this has been going on for several years, so that the case is very well known in western Canada. He has taken the matter up with western members; there are other members in this House who are well acquainted with the facts in this case. Others suffered loss through the defaulting of this company; but Mr. Campbell, to the best of my knowledge, at least, is the only returned man who has suffered loss in this way. Therefore, I would suggest that his case be given favourable consideration. I am aware that I would not be within my rights to move that this estimate be increased to make provision for this loss; but I would submit to the minister of this department that, in bringing down his supplementary estimates, he make provision for taking care of this liability.

Mr. McCONICA: I desire to associate myself with the hon. member for Kindersley (Mr. Carmichael) in support of the contention which he has just presented. I am personally acquainted with Mr. Campbell, and I am aware that he has no legal claim against the Government. I believe, however, he has a moral claim in this regard. The board, appointed by this government, were directed by the statute to provide a sufficient bond to protect him in the business which he entrusted to these commission grain merchants. They failed to provide a bond that was sufficient to cover his loss. He was at the front protecting the lives of the people of this country; he suffered a very severe loss, and he is a man who could ill afford to stand a loss of this character. He feels, and his associates, soldiers who were at the front with him and are now his neighbours, familiar with the circumstances, all feel, that while he has no legal claim he certainly has a moral claim upon this country, which he helped to defend. For that reason I sincerely hope that the suggestion of the member for Kindersley (Mr. Carmichael) may receive the earnest consideration of the minister.

Mr. ROBB: It is only fair to say that the member for Kindersley (Mr. Carmichael and the member for Battleford (Mr. McConica) have already urged Mr. Campbell's claim upon the Department of Justice. To-night they have put it upon a new ground, and I am glad to know that they have withdrawn the contention that Mr. Campbell has a legal claim. The matter has been fairly stated by the member for Kindersley. It has been several times reviewed by the previous government, and was referred to the Department of Justice. That department, having examined the Manitoba Grain Act and all the claims and pretensions of Mr. Campbell, have given their ruling that Mr. Campbell has no legal claim. Now, it is fair to say on behalf of the grain commissioners that the bonds upon grain companies are always based upon the previous year's business, and to add that while there were other firms willing to purchase grain, Mr. Campbell himself selected the Acme Grain Company, to whom he shipped his grain on the 20th of November. On the 18th of December the bank surrendered the bill of lading to the Acme Grain Company. We have the statement that Mr. Campbell enlisted on the 19th of February, 1917, so it is apparent that Mr. Campbell was himself in the country when the bill of lading was surrendered to the Acme Grain Company. He cannot evade that share of responsibility. Mr. Campbell on the 7th of April, 1917, gave instructions to the Acme Grain Company to sell the grain and in the month of May the company defaulted. Now, I am bound to say that my hon. friends have convinced me that upon compassionate grounds Mr. Campbell may have some claim upon the country. Even supposing that he himself had surrendered the bill of lading to the Acme Grain Company, whom he had selected among all others to ship his grain, it is fair to assume that had he been in the country before the company defaulted it is possible he would have crowded them and obtained payment. Therefore, having in mind that Mr. Campbell spent seven months in hospital, that he voluntarily enlisted and went to defend the country, I am prepared to admit that it is possible that a claim might be made out on compassionate grounds. But I am not prepared to-night to commit myself and say that the Government will recognize that claim. We will take into consideration the representations made by the members for Kindersley and Battleford and at a later date, if not this year, then during next session, make a statement as to what we shall do.

Mr. MORRISON: I wish to associate myself with those who have spoken on this matter. I do not know Mr. Campbell personally, but I have had considerable correspondence with him with regard to this affair and have also interviewed the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Robb). I am convinced that the real reason why Mr. Campbell's claim is not recognized is the fear of the Government that there would thereby be created a precedent which would result in many more claims. But Mr. Campbell is the only soldier who has suffered loss through a grain company defaulting. I can sympathize with him because the first car of wheat I grew and shipped was stolen, and I know how it goes. Mr. Campbell is a young man just starting out in business, and he entrusted the car of flax to this firm which should have been bonded with sufficient security. They should not have got away with all their assets except their bond of $7,500.

The Minister of Trade and Commerce admits that the matter has been put on a new plane and that we are admitting that Mr. Campbell has, not a legal, but a moral claim. Suppose I owed the minister some money and could evade payment legally: I admitted that, but I had the upper hand, and would not pay him, although I was morally indebted to him, because I was not legally bound to; what would my neighbours think of me? They would think I was a beautiful specimen, a pretty fine fellow. I submit that the country owes Mr. Campbell this $2,270 and should pay it.

Mr. ROBB: I do not even admit a moral claim. I say that on compassionate grounds his case might be considered.

Mr. MORRISON: I do not consider that there is any "compassion" in the matter, I think the country owes Mr. Campbell the money, at least morally.

Mr. McKENZIE: On what moral ground does the country owe him the money?

Mr. MORRISON: He was protecting our interests and the country should have protected his, when he was not here to look after them.

Mr. McKENZIE: I am sympathetic with Mr. Campbell, but this country never undertook to insure anyone against the loss of any kind of property.

Mr. MORRISON: The country did undertake to protect the farmers in the shipping of grain, in providing that all grain companies should be bonded with sufficient security. The Acme Grain Company were not bonded with sufficient security or Mr. Campbell would not have sustained the loss he has suffered.

Mr. SHAW: In view of the recent decision of the Manitoba court, have any steps been taken to insure that companies will not spring into existence without putting up the necessary bond which the law now requires? Further, what, if any, steps have been taken to protect the sellers of grain in that connection?

Mr. ROBB: Perhaps it would delay the proceedings to go into that question at any length to-night. As my hon. friend is perhaps aware, the Manitoba Grain Act was passed to safeguard the handling of western grain, and that act was attacked by the people for whom it was enacted. It was taken into the courts and a suspicion was aroused that some parts of the act were ultra vires. That suspicion led to action being taken in the courts, and a judgment was rendered upholding the pretensions of certain people that the Government had no right to bond these grain dealers. Now, the Government had done all that they could be expected to do. They have appealed the judgment, and until that judgment is reviewed in the higher courts the Government will still act on the principle that the Manitoba Grain Act is legal.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: In other words, you are continuing the present practice?

Mr. ROBB: Yes.

Mr. MILLAR: Because of the belief that the Grain Act is in some respects unconstitutional, is it true that certain terminal elevator companies have been refusing to pay overages since 1920?

Mr. ROBB: That is quite true.

Mr. JOHNSON (Moosejaw): We are asked to vote a considerable sum of money for the administration of the Canada Grain Act, and I think the producers of and dealers in grain are entitled to know whether their interests will be protected. It is quite true, as the minister says, that the Grain Act was passed in 1908 and the Board of Grain Commissioners constituted to administer it. He also informs us that until this contentious question is decided in a higher court it will be assumed that the act is constitutional and that the commissioners have full power to carry out their duties. The question has been raised whether the Canadian grain trade should be administered solely by the federal authorities, or jointly with the provincial authorities, and such joint administration would necessitate certain amendments to the Grain Act. But if that is right, Mr. Chairman, let me repeat, those who are subject to the provisions of that act have a right to know what protection they enjoy.

The case which has been brought before us this evening, peculiar and special though it be is by no means singular, for we know that whether grain companies are bankrupt after conducting their business in a proper way or not, these cases are coming before us continually. Last year I am informed that a grain company in the city of Edmonton defaulted to the extent of many thousands of dollars, and the people who had consigned their grain to it were the losers. Last winter, before I left for the session, we had a similar case in the city of Regina where another firm, the members of which were respected citizens, went bankrupt under very sad circumstances indeed. The Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Robb) perhaps is familiar with that case, but at any rate my hon. friend, the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell) will know what I refer to. I would not care to go into the details of that case here, but many farmers lost a considerable amount of money by that failure. One man told me that he consigned several carloads of grain to that firm, and simply had to write them off as a dead loss. It would appear therefore that either the act itself is defective or the Board of Grain Commissioners are incompetent to administer it.

But that is not the worst, Mr. Chairman: the act is being openly defied. I shall not deal with Section 215 which is at present the subject of controversy. But some grain firms of Winnipeg last year declined to pay to the federal government those overages which were legally due if the act is constitutional. On the 27th April last the following answer was given to a question put on the Order Paper by the hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Millar), and will be found at page 1254 of Hansard:

> For the crop year 1920-21 the total value of the overages to be delivered to the government was $130,524.06. Accounts have been rendered for this amount, but no payments have yet been made.

To my mind that is a serious state of affairs, and I cannot refrain at this stage from asking hon. gentlemen who have opposed our demand for a new system of marketing grain: Can they wonder that the farmers of western Canada are up in arms against this condition of affairs and determined that it shall cease? I contend that if nothing else justifies their demand, that action on the part of certain grain firms does. Of course, the alternative suggestion is: Deal only with firms who have established a reputation for honesty and have ample capital to cover their losses. That is all very well, but under the law two or three people, members of this House if you like, could organize themselves into a grain-handling firm and proceed to do business with very few, if any, assets at their disposal and no guarantee beyond a bond, which represents only a very small percentage indeed of the value of the product that they will at times be called upon to handle. If we are to have no better guarantee than that that our business will be properly transacted, I submit that we have a right to question this item and before it is passed insist on an assurance that in the administration of the Grain Act by the Board of Grain Commissioners the producers of grain as well as those who deal in it shall be amply protected.

[Mr. R. M. Johnson.]

Mr. SALES: How long does the minister propose to allow the grain commission to issue licenses to private concerns?

Mr. ROBB: Permission to issue licenses to private elevators was given by an Order in Council passed, I think, at the request of gentlemen in this House who at that time represented the farmers of western Canada—the grain producers. Now, if representations are made to us that they do not desire the practice to be continued we will consider those representations.

Mr. SALES: What Order in Council is the minister referring to?

Mr. ROBB: I have not the Order at hand.

Mr. SALES: If the minister is referring to the Order in Council which created the sample markets, I can only say that there was very considerable opposition to their creation.

Mr. ROBB: There was also a demand.

Mr. SALES: But I can assure my hon. friend that that demand was not from the farmers of the West. How long does the minister intend to allow the commission to permit private elevators, or elevators with private licenses, to conduct a public business?

An hon. MEMBER: Is that a public business?

Mr. SALES: Yes. sir.

Mr. ROBB: I do not quite understand the question.

Mr. SALES: Do you intend to continue to allow an elevator with a private license to conduct a public terminal elevator business?

Mr. ROBB: So far as I know that is not allowed. It has been brought to my attention. Within a public terminal elevator there was what is termed a "private house," and I have given the grain commissioners strict instructions that all such abuses must cease. I might as well tell my hon. friend and the House that we have now before us complaints of irregular inspection and inferior grades—

Mr. SALES: Hear, hear.

Mr. ROBB:—inferior grades that have been delivered to our customers in Great Britain. I have under my hand a complaint respecting certain cargoes of grain shipped to Great Britain, and this complaint contains the names of the shippers and the vessels on which the grain was carried. I am not making any threat to expose those shippers, but I say now for the benefit of those gentlemen who have been so shipping, and who cannot be exonerated from doing a grave injury to the Canadian grain trade, and to those representatives at the foreign ports to which that grain was shipped, that this Government cannot stand idly by while the fair name of our western wheat is injured by mixing in transit, and I warn them that unless the practice is stopped there will be a full exposure of their transaction.

Mr. SALES: I am very glad to receive the assurance of the minister on that ground. I noticed as I came in that the hon. member for Moosejaw (Mr. Johnson) was making some remarks regarding the commission. This commission is a very important body—none more so in Canada. If the right men are on it they can render exceedingly good service; if the wrong men are on it they can do great harm. Almost since its inception the commission has been, I was going to say, a crime. One man who was appointed on it had no qualifications whatever for the position; the appointment was purely a political one. Another gentleman was appointed on it, I do not know what for. He surely knew all about the elevator business; the farmers of the West thought he knew a good deal too much about it.

Mr. MARTELL: Who were they?

Mr. SALES: Well, the second gentleman of whom I have spoken was manager of a company which was twice convicted and fined while he was manager for carrying on illegal operations, and he was put on this commission to act in a judicial capacity.

Mr. LOVETT: Who appointed these men?

Mr. SALES: As far as I can remember, they were appointed shortly after the election in 1911.

Mr. LOVETT: I thought so.

Mr. SALES: I am not quite sure, but I think that is the case. The third member of the commission was a man of undoubted ability; he was the chairman. The farmers had great faith in him; but here again the Government pursues a niggardly policy by paying only $6,500 a year, and the Grain Exchange, by paying him more than the government paid him, took him away from the service of the country, in which he was doing really valuable work. I contend that the salaries paid on this commission should be higher. I do not see how a man who knows as much as one of these commissioners knows about terminal elevators and the grain trade—a very highly paid business—can afford to take the position of commissioner at $6,000 a year and be honest. Now I want to refer a little to the assurance that the minister has given us. This commission has always proved itself—some members of it at any rate—to be a willing tool in the hands
10 p.m. of the parties interested in the grain trade. For instance, in the Canada Grain Act I find no reference whatever to a private elevator; the only thing I can find in that respect is a reference to the hospital elevator. But when this sample market business was forced upon us by the late government in 1917, an Order in Council dated August 25 was passed and in it I find the first reference to private terminal elevators, as follows:

> The board will issue public terminal elevator licenses and private terminal elevator licenses.

The first fight was to get the warehouse receipts issued by these private elevators put on the same footing as those issued by the public elevators. The trade managed to secure that. A regulation was made governing the sample markets; it reads in this way:

> Grain received into private elevators must be the property of such elevators. Private elevators are prohibited from doing a public storage business; provided, however, that nothing contained herein shall curtail the right of sale of grain in store in any private elevator.

Later, as I have said, they issued warehouse receipts and began to trade in them. Clause 17 of the regulations reads as follows:

> Notwithstanding the foregoing rules and regulations for private terminal elevators, the owner or owners of grain may enter into a contract for the handling and mixing—

Mixing, you will note.

> —the handling and mixing of grain in such private terminal elevators.

That was the whole fight of the trade. When they talked about sample markets they wanted the right to mix the grain, and once they got that legislation through they cared nothing about the sample market. It is true the Government found a place for a sample market at Fort William, but it was never used. And now we come to the gem of the whole business. They wanted to get the right to do a public business. This regulation, which should be issued each year before the opening of the grain trade, came out about the first of September. On the second of September, 1920, by Order in Council, section 17 was cancelled and the following was substituted therefor:

> Notwithstanding the foregoing rules and regulations for private terminal elevators the owner or owners of grain may enter into a contract for the storing or handling and mixing of grain in such private terminal elevators, and such contract may, if desired, be in the form of a warehouse receipt, which shall be registered by the board as to quantity only.

If desired by whom? I would like to ask the minister that question. This Order in Council was put through by the grain commission at the request of the trade and was absolutely unknown to the farmers of this country, whose grain was to be handled. This grain has been going into these houses; mixing has been going on; the grade of our grain has been degraded; No. 3 has been lowered to such an alarming extent that we have the statement of one of the millers before the agriculture committee that they did not want to buy any grain out of a mixing house. I make the statement that the result was to degrade the whole grain of Canada.

I know there is an item of $40,000 for a grain inquiry, if it is desired. I say there should be a grain inquiry. Our Grain Growers' Association in Saskatchewan passed a resolution to the effect that such an inquiry should be carried on. But we do not want a political inquiry; we want a real inquiry, an inquiry which will tell us how much of the grain goes into these mixing houses and how much comes out. We want an inquiry which will tell us how much of the farmers' wheat was sold without their permission. We do not want an inquiry which will send out miles into the country for the purpose of bringing witnesses to give evidence against certain firms. We want a real inquiry which will ascertain the facts, an inquiry into the physical handling and grading of our grain.

I would like them to inquire into another thing. There is a very strong suspicion that grain is taken into private elevators, mixed, and then transferred by rail to public elevators. I would like that to be inquired into. I am certain that the farmers are robbed of millions of dollars a year by this mixing alone. Let me explain what I mean: Take a car of No. 3 which just narrowly misses being a 2, and take a car of No. 4 which narrowly misses being a 3. Now there is at times 14 cents a bushel difference between those, and it is quite possible for a man skilled in the mixing of grain to take that high 3 and that high 4 and turn them both into a 3, and gain 12 or 14 cents a bushel. It is quite possible to take a car which is graded "tough" and mix it with some dry grain, and do all this kind of thing which, Mr. Chairman, to say the least of it should be stopped. These are the practices I would like to see a real grain inquiry into.

Mr. HOCKEN: You will never see it.

Mr. SALES: I do not think we ever should had my hon. friends to my right remained in power. I am hoping, however, to see a real grain inquiry. While I am on my feet I would like to say this further: I think that the producers of grain, whose interests this commission are supposed to guard, should certainly be represented on that commission, and they certainly should be represented on any inquiry that would be held in the future.

Mr. McKENZIE: Before the hon. gentleman gives up the subject will he explain how those things which he has described are done? We eastern men know practically nothing about the handling of grain. We know how coal, and steel, and fish, and other commodities are handled, but we know nothing about the handling or transhipping of grain. Perhaps the hon. member will explain how the cars that he speaks of get their grade? Who gives them their number—whether it be 1, or 2, or 3 or 4—in the first instance, and how is it possible for these frauds to be carried out? I am anxious to know how they can be provided against. I think I can assure my hon. friend that as far as this side of the House is concerned nothing can be more desirable, from our standpoint, than to make such frauds absolutely impossible, and my hon. friend will help hon. gentlemen on this side by showing how it is possible that with ordinary, intelligent officials in charge of the business these frauds can be perpetrated on honest farmers in this country.

Mr. SALES: Mr. Chairman, I will do my best to explain the matter to the Solicitor General. First of all, the cars are graded under the Grain Commission. They have charge of the grading. They grade the wheat at Winnipeg and it is forwarded to the terminal elevators at Port Arthur and Fort William. A terminal elevator will take grain of certain grades which is not its own and store that grain, but this is not where the frauds are perpetrated. We will take grade No. 3, for instance, which is the one which is most used. Very often there will be a difference of 12 cents a bushel between No. 3 and No. 4. Now here is a car of No. 3 wheat which is just below No. 2; and a car which is not good enough for No. 3 and goes into No. 4. In the public bin we have this situation: Here is a car which misses being a 2 and is a very good car of 3. Here is my hon. friend next to me with a car of what we call on an average grade of 3, that is in the middle; and here is another man with a car which narrowly misses being a 4—all cars grading number 3 wheat. When they all go into the public terminal elevator and are mixed together what comes out is the average 3. Have I made myself plain there? That is the public terminal elevator—

Mr. McKENZIE: Just on that point, does the hon. gentleman say that these different grades should be kept separate—

Mr. SALES: No sir.

Mr. McKENZIE:—and not be put together?

Mr. SALES: No, sir, they are one grade; but there is such a lot of difference between the car which narrowly misses being a 2 and the car which narrowly misses getting into the 4—quite a difference. Mix these grades together as I have stated, and we get the average 3. Now we will take the private elevator.

Mr. McKENZIE: What is the purpose of showing grades 1, 2, 3, and 4 in a car if they are all to be dumped into one and the chances taken of what will come out?

Mr. SALES: Evidently I have not made the matter plain to my hon. friend. I am speaking of one grade only. There is a grade No. 1 that should go together, a grade No. 2 that should go together, and a grade No. 3 that should go together. I am speaking of the No. 3 grade because there is such a wide spread between 3 and 4. There is perhaps 3 cents difference in price between 1 and 2, and 4 cents difference in price between 2 and 3; but between 3 and 4 is a wide spread and this is the grade which lends itself so readily to manipulation. I have spoken of the public elevator business. Now for the private elevator business where I maintain this mixing goes on which is detrimental to the producer. A car of good 3, which narrowly misses being a 2 is taken and mixed with the best of 4 and then it is graded out as a 3. It all comes out as a poor 3 which narrowly misses being a 4; in fact the charge is made that the inspector when the grading is going on will say "I cannot allow any more of this to go, it is too poor, it is too near the line" and they strengthen it by putting a little better wheat into it; but it is the lowest of the grade. Have I made myself clear, Sir?

Mr. McKENZIE: My difficulty is that I do not understand why once the government inspector names a car No. 3—that certainly must be the class or he would not call it No. 3—why he mixes it up with a No. 4—there is certainly a mix-up of some kind—to get the proper grade.

Mr. HUGHES: Which farmer loses? Where does the fraud come in?

Mr. SALES: We have always contended the farmer suffers that loss.

Mr. HUGHES: Who suffers the loss? The farmer that has the No. 3 wheat or the farmer that has the No. 4?

Mr. SALES: Well, the farmer gets paid for No. 4 wheat but if, by mixing that wheat with No. 3, the elevator owner can obtain 12 cents a bushel, you know who gets the money. Further than that, let me say this when our degraded No. 3—which is just above a 4, that is all—gets into the British market you cannot fool the man in England who is buying our wheat for milling purposes—

Mr. ROBB: Hear, hear.

Mr. SALES: — and he will only pay for the low 3 because that is what he expects to get. In that way Liverpool sets the price of wheat to the farmers; and if this degrading is permitted to go on, even those not used to the grain trade can see that the farmer must be the sufferer.

Mr. ROBB: I understand the Minister of Finance desires to make a statement so perhaps we had better pass this item, and we can have a full discussion on the next item.

Mr. SALES: Before the item carries I would like to have an assurance from the minister that enough money will be paid to get really good men for this commission who will honestly serve this country. I know that as salaries go in the grain trade you cannot possibly get good men at $6,000 a year. This grain trade is a very highly paid business. You cannot expect to get a really efficient man at $6,000 a year, as the minister will find out, if he makes inquiry. I should like it to be put on a basis where we could expect to have really efficient men on the commission.

Mr. ROBB: If this item is passed, I think it would be fair to consent to a full discussion of the whole grain trade on the following items.

Mr. STEVENS: Is it the intention of the Government, in view of the allegations or charges made in the last few months in regard to this—

Mr. ROBB: Permit me to finish. This whole item has not yet passed. There are other items in it, and the hon. member can make his point—

Mr. STEVENS: I would like to propound a question. Is it the intention of the Government to proceed with the grain inquiry which was commenced and suspended for lack of appropriations, in view of the added charges, which, I understand, have recently been filed in affidavit form with the Board of Grain Commissioners at Fort William?

Mr. ROBB: There is an item in the estimates for that purpose, and, when that item is under consideration, the Government will be glad to listen to representations from Parliament.

Mr. STEVENS: If the minister would be prepared to make a definite statement at that time, I would be satisfied. I think the House is entitled to a statement in regard to this matter.

Mr. ROBB: We will make a statement when that question is under consideration.

Item agreed to.

Progress reported.

THE BUDGET

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON THE ANNUAL FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The House resumed from Friday, June 9th, the debate on the motion of Hon. W. S. Fielding (Minister of Finance) that Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair for the House to go into Committee of Ways and Means, and the proposed amendment thereto of Hon. Sir Henry Drayton.

Hon. W. S. FIELDING (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, my first duty—and it is a pleasure as well—is to offer my grateful acknowledgment of the very many kind words that have been said in the course of this debate concerning myself and my public life in what, I suppose, must be called the evening of my career. It is a pleasure to me to feel that, in a somewhat long political career, through all the storm and strife which seems to be incidental to political discussion, not only have I had the good fortune to have the loyal support of the great party to which I belong, but it has been my great good luck, I count it, that, in almost all these movements, I have had, in a very large degree, the goodwill and friendship of hon. members whose sense of public duty obliges them to differ from me. For all the good words that have been said from all portions of the House, for the loyal support of friends, and the very generous observations of my political opponents, I desire to offer sincere thanks.

Before I proceed to inform the House of the changes which the Government desire to propose in the budget resolutions, I shall ask permission of the House to call attention to some of the criticisms that have been offered. The field is a broad one, and the temptation is strong, but I shall try to resist it, except to deal with a few points. First, let me say that I shall deal with the attitude that has been assumed by my good friends of the Progressive party in relation to this budget. I think we had a right to expect a rather more generous criticism of the budget than has come from them. We expected no help, no aid and no sympathy from my hon. friends of the official Opposition. It is not their business to be pleased with anything we do, naturally. On the trade question there is a broad line of demarkation between the official Opposition and the Government. They boast that they stand for protection. We of the Liberal party have never stood for protection, and we do not stand for it now. In our resolution of the last session, which I had occasion to read at an earlier stage of this debate, we distinctly took issue with them on that ground. They declared for protection. We declared in our resolution that we were not prepared to accept that principle.

Our Progressive friends do us the justice of saying that, as far as we have gone, the budget is all right, but they think it should go much further. Well, from their point of view, it is reasonable, perhaps, that they should think that. But then most of us learn that we cannot in all things have our own way. All political matters are essentially matters of compromise, in some degree, and, so long as the compromise is not one of principle, there is no reason why men should not compromise, because it is only by a policy of that nature that government can ever be carried on. So I say to my friends the Progressive party, that they are not asked to compromise any principle, but if they believe, as most of them have said, that as far as the budget has gone, it is in their direction, then it seems to me they should be willing to accept it, they may say, as a temporary measure; but, whatever view they may want to take of it, it is a step in the right direction, and, for that reason, I think they should give it their support. A year ago the Liberal party voted for a certain resolution. I read it in the House before. May I call attention again to a portion of it, as follows:

> That, while recognizing that existing financial requirements of the Dominion demand the maintenance of a Customs Tariff, the House is unable to concur in the declarations by the Government that the tariff should be based on the principle of protection; the tariff is a tax, and the aim of legislation should be to make taxation as light as circumstances will permit;

And further on—

> That, while keeping this aim clearly in mind, the House recognizes that in any readjustment of the tariff that may take place, regard must be had to existing conditions of trade, and changes made in such a manner as will cause the least possible disturbance of business.

I want to call attention, Mr. Speaker, to the fact that this is not only our own policy, but it was the Progressive policy, because every Progressive in the House did us the honour of voting for it. We had not as large a Progressive group as we have to-day, but the hon. member for Marquette then, as now, was their leader. He did not have a large group, but he had a very energetic group. They found the Liberal policy of that day was entirely in harmony with their own policy, that resolution called for a revision downward, and made in such a manner that business should not be disturbed, and that is exactly what the budget proposes. I say, in all sincerity, that this budget ought to commend itself to our Progressive friends, not as a finality, not as something that is entirely in line with their own views, but as something which follows the right direction, and, so far as it goes it should have their cordial support. If, instead of having the large group they have to-day, being the second group in this House, they had the good fortune, or the misfortune to be group No. 1 and to be charged with the responsibility of carrying on the government of this country, and if the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Crerar) were standing in my place at this moment, I venture to say that he would be obliged, in the light of that resolution, to bring forward a budget substantially in line with that which I have presented. The responsibility is over the whole of us, and I believe if any hon. gentleman of the Progressive party were charged with the responsibility that has come to us to-day, he would feel, if he listened to the representations that have been made, that this was not a time for radical changes, but a time for caution, for moderation, for seeking to take into consideration the interests of the whole country. We are so apt, each of us in our own part of the country, to look at things from a sectional point of view, and that is unavoidable. One of the great things of Parliament is that mind meets mind, from east and west and from north and south; and while we look at things from different angles, we discover, for the first time, many of us, that there is another side to every question. As we meet together and mind rubs against mind, in the contact of mind and mind we discover that we are able to take broader views. I said this in opposition and I say it now that, while I believed the Liberal party would win, I had no fear that the Progressive party would do any great wrong to this country. I believed a sense of sobriety would come to all men placed in a position of responsibility and would lead those men to apply moderately the doctrines to which they had committed themselves. So I say, in all sincerity, if hon. gentlemen opposite were standing in our place to-day, they would be obliged to pursue a policy very much along the line of that which we are trying to follow now. It is a policy of moderation, a policy which conforms entirely to the resolution that I have read.

Very much attention has been called to the fact that although we make small reductions in the tariff, we have increased the sales tax, and emphasis is laid on that fact. The sales tax and the customs tax are two different things. No matter what customs duty you might have at the present time, you would need to have a sales tax. The hon. member for Marquette expressed his disapproval of the principle of the sales tax, and that is a fair matter of opinion; but to the best of my recollection, he did not propose any substitute for it. Last year we received $60,000,000 from the sales tax. We are increasing it one-half, and this year we expect to get $90,000,000 and possibly $100,000,000 from that tax, One or two hon. gentlemen in the Progressive party have suggested other things. One suggested a land tax, another an inheritance tax. There may be merit in either or both of these suggestions; but they are not what we might call "ready reckoners"; they would not yield money very quickly. We have not the machinery to establish a land tax, and even an inheritance tax would not bring us much revenue in a hurry. Death is sure; but sometimes it is slow, and I am not sure that either by an inheritance tax or a land tax we could get much money in this year of our Lord. I am not condemning either of those taxes. I regret to say that all that we can get out of these proposed new taxes will still leave us short of money at the end of the year; whoever may stand in my place a year hence will probably have to devise new taxes, and, perhaps, some of the suggestions coming to us to-day will be found to be exceedingly useful. Therefore, because a tax is not adopted to-day, it does not follow that it may not have to be adopted at no distant date.

As regards the question of the tariff proposals, I think my hon. friends of the Progressive party should have given the matter more consideration. They should not be antagonistic to them; they should regard them, as being in their own direction, although they do not go as far as they wish the reductions to go. The leader of the Opposition (Mr. Meighen) and the ex-Minister of Finance (Sir Henry Drayton) have both treated these reductions that we make as small things. The leader of the Opposition said that they were microscopic; the ex-Minister of Finance said that they were so unimportant that they were hardly worth mentioning, and I think it was the hon. member for West Toronto (Mr. Hocken) who said that they were piffling. Well, I hope they will tell that same story when they go back to the manufacturers of the country and when they are asked what they think of this thing; but I get an inkling of what they will say then, because before the leader of the Opposition had finished his speech, he pictured, and called the attention of the hon. member for Brantford (Mr. Raymond) to what he said was a fact, that as a consequence of these reductions, microscopic and piffling, the workmen of Brantford were going to walk the streets in idleness. When he goes to the manufacturing districts, he will not find that these are viewed as mild as piffling reductions. They are reductions which account for a great deal. Two and a half per cent off an item in a manufacturing industry is often regarded as a very serious injury, and I know to-day there are many interests in Canada which are alarmed at the reductions that are made. I think their alarm is needless. Capital is usually easily alarmed; manufacturers are easily alarmed.

I remember that two days before the budget of 1897 was brought down, I was waited upon by a deputation of bankers. I do not think I have ever made this statement in public before. They came to me and pleaded that we should not touch the tariff at all. They pointed out, as men always do, the interblending and the interdependence of interests. It was not the manufacturer alone; it was the banker, the labourer, the merchant. All interests were interwoven into a network, and if we touched the tariff at all, dreadful things would happen. If we had acted on their views, we would have made no changes at all. We made changes, important changes, as I shall proceed to show. What happened? Was the business of the country ruined? How far the tariff had anything to do with the matter, I will not venture to say, because it is not for me to boast. But for many years afterwards, the business of Canada flourished as it had not flourished for years before. So, if there are manufacturers who are disturbed over this, I ask them to look back to the records of 1897 and to remember that the alarm which they then felt was uncalled for, and it is uncalled for to-day.

We have been delving into ancient history in this matter. I am not sure that that is very profitable; but if we are to have ancient history, we had better have it correctly. The statement has been constantly and frequently made in this discussion that the Liberal party in 1897 made no material changes in the tariff. Perhaps, when men hear a statement made first, they do not look into it closely; but when they hear it made a dozen times, they begin to believe it. I suppose that when my hon. friend from West Toronto, who is a decent, respectable and God-fearing man, stated the other day in this House that the Liberal party in 1897 adopted the tariff of Sir John A. Macdonald, he was repeating an ancient fabrication which at one time he had heard, and which possibly had gradually grown upon him until he believed it himself. There is no shadow of foundation for such a statement. The Liberal tariff of 1897 was not the tariff policy of Sir John A. Macdonald. It made important changes. To begin with, it introduced the British preference. Did that distinguished stateman ever introduce such a tariff? Yet, my hon. friend from Toronto only echoes what other people have said when he declares that in 1897 we simply adopted the Conservative tariff policy. But that was not all. The British preference itself brought considerable reductions in the tariff, but beyond that there was a long list of reductions, and substantial reductions, made by the dozen in the general tariff at that time. Therefore, when we are told that the Liberal tariff policy of 1897 was a policy adopted from the Conservative party, I want to tell my Conservative friends who make that statement that they are simply repeating an ancient fabrication which never had any foundation, and which should no longer be imposed upon this House. I could read the items if I had time.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That statement was embodied in the campaign literature of hon. gentlemen behind my hon. friend, including the hon. member for St. Antoine (Mr. Mitchell) in the last election.

Mr. FIELDING: What statement?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The statement which my hon. friend has just denounced as a fabrication.

Mr. FIELDING: I have never seen it in that form. I have never heard it made by any Liberal; I have always heard it made by my Conservative friends. I am willing to be generous and to believe that they are misinformed, and that gradually the thing has grown upon them until they imagine it to be a fact.

I think that instead of undertaking to prove what the Liberals said at the time I might do as well by producing another witness. It will be remembered that at that time the leader of the Conservative party was Sir Charles Tupper. Now, bear in mind that we are told that the policy we adopted was the policy of the Conservative party; it is said that we were merely continuing the National Policy. I was under the impression, Mr. Speaker, that I had by me the extract from the speech of Sir Charles Tupper, but I find that it is not among my papers. However, I remember distinctly hearing Sir Charles Tupper denounce that policy. He declared that a greater crime could not very well be committed against the industries of Canada than was to be found in the tariff of 1897. He said, virtually, "I have heard the sorrowful wail of the manufacturers and the workmen of the city of Montreal rising up in protest against this tariff." Well, if it was the National Policy, the old Conservative policy, if there was no material change in it from that policy, why in the world did that veteran leader of that day find it necessary to denounce it as a crime against the industries of the country? I am going to ask my hon. friend from Toronto to forget that dream of his and never to repeat that ancient proposition.

Now, we have heard in this debate a good deal about reciprocity. I am glad we have, and we shall hear more about it again. And there we have another broad line of demarcation between the official Opposition and ourselves. My right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition (Mr. Meighen) has said distinctly that he does not want any reciprocity. Well, I am glad to have that open confession. He gets back to the old slogan: "No truck or trade with the Yankees." I am glad to have the statement from him, if it is his view.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I cannot sit while my hon. friend misrepresents me. I stated that I was opposed to any extensive reciprocal arrangement with the United States, but I have never used the words, "No truck or trade with the Yankees," nor have I ever heard any one on this side, supporting this party, use that expression. I have only heard the hon. gentleman himself make use of it in seeking to put up a shadow that he might knock down.

Mr. FIELDING: I never attributed to the right hon. gentleman the words "No truck or trade with the Yankees," but the sentiment is there. Those words express the sentiment of the Conservative party.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Oh, no.

Mr. BUREAU: It was the Conservative slogan of 1911.

Mr. FIELDING: Will the right hon. gentleman deny that in the debate the other day he said that we had reciprocity and it took years to recover from it? Why did we have to recover from it? And who tried to recover from it? From the time we had reciprocity, between 1854 and 1866, up to the time the Tory party were driven out of power in 1896, there never was a public man in Canada, Grit or Tory, who did not stand for reciprocity. My right hon. friend says that it took us years to recover from the effects of that reciprocal agreement. How and where does he get his evidence in support of that statement? I repeat, Sir, that there was never a public man, either Grit or Tory, who sat in the seats of government during all that period who did not stand for reciprocity Did they not send delegate after delegate to Washington, almost begging for reciprocity? Yet we are told now that it took us years to recover from reciprocity. If it was an evil from which it was considered desirable, in the interests of the country, that we should recover as quickly as possible, why did the Conservative party go begging for reciprocity?

Mr. MEIGHEN: That was during the period of recovery. From the breaking of the pact, those pilgrimages ceased, and Sir Wilfrid Laurier announced that they had ceased for good.

Mr. FIELDING: He stated that we would not go to Washington, and he was right. And we did not go to Washington; Washington came to us. Washington sent her delegates to us after years, as we thought, of ungenerous treatment. Washington sent to Ottawa delegates who said: "Never mind the past, we are prepared to meet you in a fair spirit now?" Were we right or wrong, then, in treating with them? What would this country have said if we had replied to those delegates: "Get you gone. You quarrelled with us in bygone days and refused to consider terms with us. Go away; we will have no truck or trade with you at all"—what would the country have thought had we made any such reply? That would have been the attitude of the Conservative party, however, if I understand, and am to judge by, their position to-day. Now we have a clear understanding from hon. gentlemen opposite; they do not want reciprocity. Indeed, Sir, it will be a difficult thing for us to secure reciprocity; I am afraid we lost the golden opportunity in 1911. It will not come again, I fear, but if it does come, there is this difference between our friends opposite and us. We the Liberal party say that if at any moment our American neighbours are prepared to meet us in the spirit in which they came to us in 1910 and 1911 we are ready to discuss the matter with them with a willingness to make a satisfactory arrangement so long as we protect the interests of Canada just as we did in 1911. My right hon. friend and his associates on the other hand, take the opposite stand. They say: "Don't come; keep off the grass!" And that is a big enough and broad enough difference to divide two parties in this country. I do not hesitate to say that, in my judgment, any political party that deliberately declares that it does not want to establish friendly and better trade relations with the great Republic beside us can never win the confidence of the people of this Dominion. Hon. members of this House have been discussing tonight the estimates of my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Robb). Let them take up that little booklet his department issues, "Commercial Intelligence," if that is the proper title, and they will find therein a list of men whom we are sending out with the object of helping to encourage trade between other countries and Canada. We have these men in Europe, in Asia, in Africa, in fact all over the wide world, and we want trade from all these various countries. But right alongside us are 110,000,000 of the richest people on earth; and what are we told? Hon. gentlemen opposite would tell them we do not want to trade with them. I say that it is in the interest of Canada and, indeed, of the Empire, that we should cultivate friendly relations with this great nation beside us, and my only fear is that we have lost our opportunity. But let it be known that there is this broad line between hon. gentlemen opposite and ourselves, that when the same opportunity comes again we shall be ready to grasp it, while they say they do not want to have anything to do with the United States on any such conditions. That is a big question. I had occasion to discuss this matter some years ago, and while I do not often indulge in the vanity of quoting from speeches of my own, I shall venture to do so to-night.

Mr. GRAHAM: You cannot do better.

Mr. FIELDING: During the campaign of 1911 I addressed a meeting in Windsor Hall, Montreal, and I am going to ask the indulgence of the House while I read a passage or two from that speech, which I think has a bearing on the present situation in Canada. I said:

Four years ago, I think it was. I had the pleasure of addressing a meeting in this same hall, at which I ventured to discuss the question of the tariff in its relation to East and West. I would like to quote for you a passage in my speech then, but I will give you the substance of it. I ventured to point out to the manufacturers of Canada that it was a mistake for them to array themselves in antagonism to the people of the western provinces. That opinion I want to express again to-day. There is the danger that East and West may be brought into antagonism. The danger is not to be found in reciprocity itself, but the danger is that the manufacturing interests of this country and their allied moneyed interests will array themselves in hostility to the growing feeling of the western farmers. Don't make any mistake about it—the day is within sight of the younger men here, and of some who are not so young, when there will be more people west of the Great Lakes than east of the Great Lakes. The West is going some day to dominate Canada and we, who live in the East, if we are wise, may as well look ahead and see this. What kind of a West is it to be? Is it to be a wise and prudent and sympathetic West, or is it to be a rash and reckless and dangerous West? The answer can be made by the manufacturers of the Dominion and the allied moneyed interests to-day. I do not hesitate to say that with proper care, with fair treatment, with reasonable argument, we can bring the western farmer to be sympathetic and to be willing to work in harmony with the people of this eastern country, who have done so much for the building up of the West.

A Voice: Will there be no factories in the West?

Hon. Mr. Fielding: That is a very proper question to ask. Certainly there will be factories in the West. But I think the gentleman will agree with me that while factories will grow as they grow everywhere with population, for the present and in the early future agriculture is to be the dominant force in that Western land. My friend will admit that. There will come factories, but for the present and for the future, and may be for the future far ahead, the agricultural interest is going to dominate in that country. We must consider whether we are going to antagonize and irritate that interest or whether we are going to meet them as brethren and deal out to them fair consideration.

Then after some further remarks, I said:

Now, I believe that if we meet the farmers in a right spirit, if we point out their extreme views, as we have to point out their extreme views when they insist on free agricultural implements, if, I say, you meet these people in the right spirit, if you reason with them, if you let them understand that you are not trying to oppress them, if you give them a kind and sympathetic hand, they will be disposed to be more reasonable and fair and to take their full share of the burden of developing our vast Dominion.

But suppose you do not do that. Suppose the manufacturers should organize to-day with their money to defeat this agreement, I want to tell you, my brethren, that there will grow up in that western country a dangerous feeling. Don't make any mistake about it. I beg the manufacturers of this country—I always talk frankly to them and I am doing so now—I beg them not to range themselves up against the farmers of the West. The manufacturers are not hurt; they are more frightened than hurt. I give it to you as my opinion, worth much or worth little, that if by the forces of the manufacturers this agreement be destroyed, there will grow up in that western country a feeling that will be dangerous to the manufacturing interests of Canada and dangerous to the welfare of this Dominion.

That was eleven years ago, Mr. Speaker, and I do not hesitate to say that while other causes may have had an influence in upsetting the western people, if I may so express it, yet the gravest charge the western people were able to bring against eastern Canada was that that reciprocity agreement which gave them some help was destroyed by the attitude of the manufacturers and their allied monied interests in the West. If there is unrest to-day, if we have men in that western country saying things against the integrity of the Dominion, make no mistake, you can trace their origin to the fatal error made by eastern Canada in 1911. I do not want to dwell further on that question of reciprocity, but I should like you distinctly to understand that we accept the broad issue that is laid down on that question.

A curious phase of this debate has been the picture presented to us of the industrial condition of Germany. There is an economic condition in Germany to which our attention must be drawn. But it seems to me that hon. gentlemen opposite have not been content to deal with the economic question only; they have traded, if I may say so, on the anti-German feeling. Now, undoubtedly the picture they present is this. Germany has a remarkable depreciation of the mark. But Germany is prosperous, her people are willing to work long hours for low wages, industry is humming, business is good, and Germany is flourishing because the mark has depreciated. Well, if that is true, what fools we mortals be in Canada and the rest of the world! Here we have been struggling to keep our credit good, here we have been fighting to make our dollar 100 per cent, and when a few months ago our dollar in New York was worth 15 cents less than par we did not know whether to be angry or sorry, but we all felt it was something to regret: and when a few days ago my hon. friend from Marquette mentioned incidentally in debate that he was glad to know our dollar to-day is worth almost par the sentiment was applauded all over the House. Evidentally we are wrong; we should be sorry that the Canadian dollar is worth 99½ cents to-day, for if worth only 50 cents, 40 cents, 10 cents, then, according to this picture of Germany, we would be in a happy and prosperous condition. Well, I refuse to believe that.

There is a situation in Germany which demands some attention. It is an economic law, which usually is found in operation, that where a country's currency is severely depreciated, that depreciation, if not accompanied, is soon followed by a corresponding advance in the price of commodities and wages. There is to-day a race on in Germany between the continued depreciation of the mark and the relative advance in the price of commodities and wages. At present the mark has won. It used to be that about 4¼ marks would buy a gold dollar; to-day it would take nearly 300 marks. That is a condition which cannot continue much longer. There is now coming an increase in the price of commodities and wages, and there can be no doubt that as the months roll on that increase will be very pronounced, and when conditions become very bad we will not of course hear such glowing reports of German prosperity.

However, there is that economic condition to which attention must be drawn. But, as I remarked a moment ago, my hon. friends have not been content with calling attention to that economic condition, they have tried to drag in all the horrors of the war. I think it was my hon. friend from Vancouver (Mr. Stevens) who pictured the horrors of the war and asked: Are we going to trade with these German people? And my hon. friend from St. John (Mr. Baxter) went further, if I am not mistaken; he thundered his denunciations against the Germans and asked beseechingly: Are we going to trade with these Germans? Every other nation in the world is trying to trade with the Germans to-day, and we should not be too proud to trade with them. I have an individual right as a citizen to say whether or not I want to buy German goods, and I know what my preference is in the matter; but as a nation we have no right to legislate against Germany.

My hon. friend from St. John paid a high compliment—and one which I am sure we all admired—to his leader, and declared his loyalty and devotion to him, but before he finished his speech he denounced in vigorous terms one of the great acts of his leader's career, at least the Conservative party think so, that is the Treaty of Versailles. When my hon. friend waves the bloody shirt and thunders out his denunciation against what he terms the premature peace, and regrets that the cities of Germany were not devastated as were the cities of France—when he does all that, I tell him he is denouncing his leader, because that leader and his friends were the people who brought about that peace. They cannot say I did it. "Never shake thy gory locks at me." I was not one of those who joined in the joy-ride to Paris, nor did any colleague of mine, when our friends opposite went through the amusing farce of pretending to negotiate the peace treaty. Be it good or be it bad, I had no responsibility in the matter. They are the men who signed, sealed and delivered that document, which on the first page declared that its purpose was to put an end to the state of war and bring about between Germany and the allied countries, including Canada, a firm and enduring peace. That is what my hon. friend's leader and his colleagues did. But they did more than that—they wasted $1,000,000 of the money of the people of Canada in a special session of Parliament for the purpose of approving that treaty—about as useful and necessary a proceeding as the fifth wheel of a coach. However that may be, they signed, sealed and delivered that bond, and declared that Canada and the Empire were at peace with Germany. Now they come here and talk about the harm that would be done if we trade with Germany. I am not more anxious to trade with Germany than other people, but in view of their action at Versailles I do not like to see my hon. friends waving the bloody shirt and denouncing Germany. We have made our peace with Germany, and we ought to treat her decently; and that is all I propose to do.

Now, on the economic question relating to Germany, much can be said. The German mark is worth to-day one-third of a cent; under normal conditions it was worth 23 cents and a fraction. By the act of last year the government declared that for customs duty purposes it should be valued at 12 cents—for convenience I take that figure as half of the 23 cents and a fraction. The hon. member for Centre Vancouver, who gave much attention to this matter the other day, rather held that that was a mistake; that if anything the percentage was too high. it was piling on the taxes too heavily. He said it might be better to make the percentage 35 and there is merit in that suggestion. After studying this question we have formed a conclusion of our own as to what will be the best method of dealing with this matter, and at a later stage of my remarks I will inform the House what that is.

It has been stated over and over again that we are taking off 2½ per cent on agricultural implements and adding a certain percentage by way of sales tax. Now, I want to put a fair question, and I will put it to my hon. friend from Vancouver, who generally takes a fair view of these things when politics allow him to do so. Does my hon. friend say that we can carry on efficiently the government of Canada and meet our obligations without new taxation? He will not say that; I am sure he would admit at once that if we are to meet our obligations—I do not say whose obligations they are; I am not making any point in that regard; they are the obligations of Canada—if we are to meet those obligations; if we are to pay interest, if we are to pay our pensions, if we are to make provision decently at all for the public service of the country, we must have increased taxation. That being the case, why alarm the people by saying that we are taking off 2½ per cent and piling the taxation on in the form of sales tax?

Hon. gentlemen opposite are constantly saying that the sales tax hits everybody. I think it was the hon. member for Carleton who said the other day that the sales tax affects one hundred per cent of the people. Now, that is rather a magnified statement. There is a very large list of exemptions from the sales tax, chiefly foodstuffs. The only change we have made in the matter is that we have increased the list of exemptions. I do not see how in the world it can be said that there is anything wrong in that respect. We do adopt the sales tax, and we increase the amount of it, because the country needs it.

With further reference to the German business, I think one hon. gentleman said that if we had any favours to give in this matter we should give them not to Germany, but to our friends. Well, one of the misfortunes of this matter of depreciated currency is that it hits one of our friends. Is Italy our friend? Was Italy our ally in the war? In what we are doing we are penalizing not only Germany, but Italy as well.

Mr. STEVENS: If my hon. friend will permit me, the suggestion that I made to reduce the percentage to 35 would meet the case of Italy.

Mr. FIELDING: The hon. gentleman's suggestion as far as it went, was a good one, and I have given him credit for that. The Italian lira is usually worth the same as the French franc, a fraction under 20 cents; I call it 20 for convenience of calculation. Under the law of Canada, as it was last year, goods coming from Italy have been valued for duty purposes at 10 cents. The actual value of the Italian lira was 5½ cents, the value for duty purposes being, therefore, really double. I know there is trouble in connection with these depreciated currencies, but I would like to point out that it is not only Germany that is hit; it reaches Italy also, one of our friends. I will come to that a little later and suggest what I think will be a reasonable way of meeting the difficulty.

I have been surprised to be told that this is a protectionist budget. I cannot understand the logic of that statement. With the exception of one or two items in relation to tobacco for purely revenue purposes, every change that is made in this budget is a downward revision of taxation. How can anbody make a protectionist budget out of a reduction of taxation? Is this to be the final word? There is no finality in politics. I say again, with all due respect to my hon. friends opposite, that if they stood in our place to-night they would not be able to go any further than we have gone. Whether we shall be able to go further another time is a question that we must leave to the future. But let me add this: You know the mind of our Conservative friends; you know the direction in which they are looking in regard to the tariff, and you know the direction in which the Liberal party has been looking through all the years. That is the direction in which they will continue to look.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Is not all my hon. friend says with regard to this budget true of the 1919 budget?

Mr. FIELDING: Well, I have not studied the 1919 budget.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Everything a reduction, and the hon gentleman opposed it.

Mr. FIELDING: I do not think the hon. gentleman will find that I opposed any reduction at all.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Opposed the budget.

Mr. FIELDING: No, I think my hon. friend will find he is mistaken in that view. However, I am more interested in the budget of 1922 than I am in the budget of 1919, though I do not mind a little delving into ancient literature for the purpose of trying to correct the errors that have been made.

I think it was the hon. member for East Lambton (Mr. Fansher) who dwelt on the payment of drawbacks to various companies, and he saw in this some great wrong. Why, he said, you have paid half a million dollars by way of drawback to the Ford Motor Company, and a million and a half to the Atlantic Sugar Refineries, but I have seen no drawback paid to the beet sugar people. Well, as the beet sugar people had not paid a cent into the treasury they could not very well have any drawback. There are two phases of that matter to which I want to give a little attention by way of explanation. If my hon. friends have not already heard it, they will see at once that the explanation is very simple and that there is no favouring anybody in these drawbacks. First, in regard to the Atlantic Sugar Refineries, I may point out the duty on sugar varies according to the character and quality of the sugar. When a cargo of sugar arrives at Montreal or Halifax, it would be a great convenience if you could then and there determine the amount of duty to be paid and settle the matter forthwith. But you cannot do that; it takes time, and in the meantime the steamer is lying at the wharf and expense is being incurred. Now, common sense generally prevails in government matters; I will say that even of my hon. friends when they were in power, because they did have some common sense policies. What they do is this: there are two tests in the sugar business. There is the colour test, which is called the Dutch standard, the value of the sugar being judged by its colour, and there is another test of the strength of the sugar which is called the polariscopic test. It takes time to apply these tests and to ascertain exactly the rate of duty to be paid on a cargo of sugar. So the customs people say: "We will let you pay your duty now at the very highest rate which can apply; we want to take no chances. Then we will test the sugar, and if it is found that your sugar is not valued as high as that, you will be entitled to a refund." Is that reasonable? Is that businesslike? It is simply a refund of duty that was overpaid by the Atlantic Sugar Refineries. Is there anything wrong in that? I think it is a businesslike transaction from beginning to end.

Now, let us turn to the question of drawbacks made to the Ford Motor Company. In every case it will be found that the drawback paid to the Ford Motor Company was for exports. It is a principle of our Canadian law, and I think it is a principle of commercial law everywhere, that you levy your taxes upon consumption in your country. If an article comes into the country and enters into consumption, it is taxed; if it does not enter into consumption, it is not taxed. Suppose two bales of goods are landed on the wharf at Montreal. One of them goes into warehouse and awaits the judgment of the owner, who next day or next week makes up his mind to send it off to the West Indies. It goes out; no tax is paid on it. It has contributed nothing to Canada except the labour of the men who handled it in taking it off the ship and putting it in the warehouse; it is simply passing through. That is reasonable; you do not want to collect duty on goods in transit. Well, the man who owns the other bale of goods says: "I will not leave that bale in the warehouse. I will send it up to the factory; I will put it through the mill; I will give employment to people; I will turn it into manufactured goods; and then I will send it out to the West Indies." Is he not then entitled to a drawback on the duty he has paid? Is he to be penalized because he gave employment to a large number of people? The other man passes his bale out of customs, but he gave no employment. The first man, for his own selfish profit—of course this is a selfish world—takes that bale of materials, puts it through his factories, and does other things to it. He pays a duty on it and then when it is ready to be exported abroad, he says: "That has not been consumed in Canada, that is going away to the West Indies; I am entitled to a drawback," and so he is.

Mr. MORRISON: What was the manufacturer's object in importing the raw material and manufacturing it; was it not to make a profit on it?

Mr. FIELDING: Yes, and he paid the duty when he brought it in.

Mr. MORRISON: And he gets a drawback when he exports it?

Mr. FIELDING: Of course, but if wealthy the income tax man will reach him. But after all, in that particular transaction what he has done has been a benefit to Canada. That is the difference between one man and the other. The other man pays the duty but does not do anything for the benefit of Canada. This man manufactures the material in his factory and benefits Canada to the extent of the labour he has employed and the business he has caused to be done. That is the whole story, Mr. Speaker, of the drawbacks and the refunds. There is no favour to anybody in the matter. It is a business transaction, it has been going on for years, and it will be going on for years even when my good friends the Progressives come into power, as I suppose they will one of these days.

Now I do not wish to detain the House any longer, but I ought to say a little on the amendment of my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition. It was described by the hon. member for Springfield (Mr. Hoey) as being unworthy of a great party. That may have seemed to be a harsh criticism but really I do not think it was too harsh. The great Conservative party has been capable of great things and it ought not to descend to little things. With respect to the budget, let them, at this time in our history, establish some principle and lay down some policy, and do something more than indulge in mere nagging and scolding. That is all my right hon. friend has done; he scolds the Government. He stresses the policy laid down in the Liberal platform in 1919 and inquires "Is that statement true?" There are some statements in it that are true. "Is this budget to-day rigidly complying with the Liberal platform of 1919?" he inquires. No, nobody ever expected it to do so.

Some hon. MEMBER: Oh, oh.

Mr. FIELDING: I do not believe the Liberal platform of 1919 played any considerable part in the election campaign last winter.

Some hon. MEMBER: Oh, oh.

Mr. FIELDING: I never mentioned it, I never heard it mentioned; it was never discussed in any election in which I took part. I know from reading the press, however, that my Conservative friends referred to it. It was always the tariff they talked about and the Liberal platform of 1919, and they generally talked in that way for two reasons: The first was in order to declare that the Liberals were not living up to that platform; and they pointed to this, that and the other constituency where they alleged somebody was saying something that was not in harmony with the Liberal platform, and therefore they argued "The Liberal platform is dead and gone." The other reason they referred to it was to enable them to take the stand that if the Liberal platform was adopted the country would be ruined. I do not think the Liberal platform of 1919 had any material result in influencing the election. The election did turn upon the general tariff policy but I am going to say frankly I do not think that was the reason the people voted so enthusiastically for the Liberal party. I think something else was responsible for their enthusiasm. They made up their minds that whatever was going to happen they were not going to have any more of the Tory government.

My right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition, who was then the Prime Minister, made a tour of Canada. We will all do him the justice to say he worked very hard. He worked very hard and it was greatly to his credit; he travelled the country from ocean to ocean; he was engaged in addressing meetings morning, noon and night. Everything that he has told us here about the sins of the Liberal party he told on the hustings repeatedly; he repeated it, as I say, morning, noon and night. I do not like to say that the people did not believe in him but what they probably said to themselves was this: "Perhaps these Liberals are no better than they ought to be; perhaps these Progressives are worse, but we will take the chance rather than have the Meighen government again." That seems to be responsible for the whole result, that is the explanation of the whole thing. If we had been hearing something new about this Liberal platform of 1919 I might be able to draw some other inference. But it was not a new story; we had heard it not only in the House but on every hustings in Canada. I will do my right hon. friend the justice of saying that he told the people on every platform in Canada all the things he has been telling us here and they said: "Perhaps it is true but we will take no chances; we will get rid of the Meighen government." That was the upshot of the whole matter.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I desire to call your attention to some proposed amendments in the resolutions of which I have already given notice. What I propose to do is to lay on the Table resolutions in amendment of those tabled on May 23rd so that the two may stand separately and by comparing them hon. members may see exactly what is proposed. Then, after the amendments have, in that way, been laid on the Table by way of notice, we will consolidate the two, and in consolidated form the resolutions will be considered in committee. In the meantime I am sure the House will desire to know at the earliest possible moment at least what the most important of these amendments are, and it is for that purpose I will detain hon. members for a few minutes longer.

In the resolutions already tabled there is provision for a tax on confectionery of 5 per cent. The tax remains but we are making a proviso that it shall not apply to "goods packed ready for sale in cartons or other packages bearing the name of the manufacturer, selling by retail at 10 cents or less per carton, nor to include candy known as 'gross goods,' selling by retail at 1 cent." There is a lot of confectionery that is made in moulds, and the changing of these moulds would be a very troublesome and expensive business. I have reason to believe, therefore, that this modification will go a long way towards removing the objection that was raised.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Is that the same modification we had before?

Mr. FIELDING: In the sales tax? I think it is along the same line.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: It seems to be the same.

Mr. FIELDING: That is right. Of course every interest that is touched feels badly about it. I would not care to say that every interest is going to be completely satisfied. Every interest that is touched feels injured, and comes and complains that it has been particularly singled out when it has not. However, we are doing the best we can to modify cases and meet some of these objections. In levying taxes for revenue there is always a danger that you may shoot too high and miss your mark; that if you put your tax too high you may affect consumption and get less revenue. I rather subscribe to the doctrine that moderate taxation will give more revenue than high taxation. Upon reflection we are going to apply that doctrine to some of these things. Now we have had representations from day to day from numerous large and powerful deputations representing each interest, and we have had oceans of correspondence, and we have had the benefit of a long debate in this House. It would be strange, therefore, if, out of all these things we did not learn something and find ground upon which to make some changes. In view of all these facts we have decided to propose certain changes for your consideration.

I have already mentioned confectionery. We propose to put a tax of 10 cents a gallon on what is commonly called "soft drinks". Complaint was made that as the resolution read it discriminated against the "bottled goods" and turned business into the hands of the soda fountain man who escaped. What we are proposing here is to take in the soda fountain man, applying to him an ad valorem tax of 5 per cent, and as respects the remainder we reduce the tax from 10 cents to 5 cents. I think the 5 cent tax in this way will largely meet the objections that are raised. I do not think it will be found necessary to increase the price of the bottle which was selling, say at 5 cents; I think the small tax of 5 cents will probably be absorbed and not reach the consumer. However, that is to be seen in the future. In the case of ale, beer, porter and stout, we had proposed a tax of 15 cents per gallon. We propose that it shall be reduced to 12½ cents. In the case of cigarettes, we have proposed an increase of excise from $6 to $9 per thousand. We now make it $7.50 per thousand.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The existing tax on cigarettes being how much?

Mr. FIELDING: The excise was $6. We proposed to make it $9 and now we are making it $7.50. We are proposing to add to the exemptions from the sales tax two items—fertilizers and dried beet pulp, the fertilizer being what its name implies and the dried beet pulp being something the farmers will recognize. In the case of the stamp tax, the present tax is 2 cents on all cheques. We had proposed to make it 2 cents per unit of $50. We still keep that principle of a unit of $50 with 2 cents on each $50, but we place a limitation on it. We provide that the graduated tax shall extend up to $5,000 which would mean a tax of $2. It has been shown very clearly that very many large transactions, involving apparently a great deal of money are handled on exceedingly small margins, and if these are subject to the heavy tax first proposed, it would really wipe out the profits, and would work a great hardship. We propose that the maximum tax shall be $2. The rate will remain 2 cents per unit of $50. The large proportion of the cheques of the country are $50 or less, and this will remain as at present at 2 cents. On all cheques above $50 the graduated tax will apply until we reach $5,000. That will mean a sum of $2, and from there on there will be no increase. It will be a $2 tax on everything above $5,000. In the case of stock transfers there is a tax of 2 cents per share. We had proposed to make it 5 cents per share. We now propose to make it 3 cents per share, but we will include bonds as well as stocks, so that we think in that way we will probably have a very slight falling off in revenue.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Is that per unit of $100 in the case of the bond?

Mr. FIELDING: The same as stock.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: A unit of $100 in the case of a bond?

Mr. FIELDING: Yes it is 2 cents per share already. Now we make it 3 cents per share. I have not the exact words of the resolution. I think it is intended to make it a unit, but I make the statement with that reservation.

On beet root sugar we proposed an excise tax which would have netted 49 cents per 100 pounds. We propose to make it 24 cents per 100 pounds.

Canadian raw leaf tobacco has a tax now of 5 cents a pound upon it. We did propose to remove that tax, as respects the portion of the raw leaf sold to the Canadian factory, because when it goes in there and later on comes out, we get the tax on the manufactured article. There remained a tax on that portion which was not to be sold to the factory. It has been represented to us that there is a very large quantity of raw leaf tobacco on hand almost unsaleable, and that where they get sale for it, it does not command more than 6 to 10 cents a pound at the most. It would mean a tax of 5 cents on goods which, in some cases, had to be sold at 7 or 8. Therefore, we have concluded to abolish the tax altogether. We propose to put a tax on receipts. There is an English tax on them now of two pence, I think. We propose in the case of receipts that up to $10 they shall be exempt, but for every receipt of $10 or upwards we propose a tax of 2 cents —simply a straight tax. In the case of cigars we had proposed a re-adjustment of the duty the object of which was to make the tax on the cheaper cigar a little less, on the medium cigar the same as at present while on the higher priced cigar—the rich man's cigar—the tax would be increased. The duties are somewhat readjusted, as will be seen in the notice, but the substance is the same. The higher priced cigar will pay a little more, the medium cigar will be as at present, and the lower priced cigar will be a little cheaper.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: That will be a change in the classification. Do you continue the exemption of $120?

Mr. FIELDING: There will be a readjustment of the figures, but, substantially, it will be what I say. We are not aiming to get more revenue out of it, we are aiming to cheapen the lower priced cigar. That is the essence of the whole movement. To do that the medium priced cigar pays the same, the higher priced cigar a little more and the lower priced cigar a little less. Any change made is to correspond with that.

In regard to automobiles, we had proposed a tax of 5 per cent to be levied on automobiles up to $1,200 and 10 per cent on the larger and more expensive vehicles. We propose that the 5 per cent shall apply to all automobiles, up to the cost of $1,200, whether they be small or large, and the 10 per cent will apply to the excess. The small automobile costing $1,200 will pay 5 per cent. The more expensive will pay 5 per cent up to $1,200 and 10 per cent on the balance. The figures are the same, but there is a little readjustment in the way they are stated. All bona fide sales of automobiles up to the 23rd May shall be made exempt from taxation. That will apply not only to automobiles owned in Canada, but to the imported automobiles, provided they can prove a bona fide sale, and that they shall be entered into Canada not later than the 1st July coming.

I think I have mentioned all the important items. There are some minor ones I will not trouble about, except the question of depreciated currency. I have referred to the past history of the matter. The effort of the late government was to obtain a standard of valuation by valuing the mark and determining what value should be put upon it, having regard to various considerations. What we are trying to do is this: We are not thinking of the value of the mark, but we propose to have the value of the article determined by the standard of the English value. If two parcels come into Canada on the same day, one being from England and one from Germany, both of the same character, the value shall be determined by the value of the English article, if articles are made in England of like class. Where the articles are not made in England, and, therefore, you cannot get the English standard of value to serve your purpose, you take the value in a neighbouring country where the currency has no substantial depreciation. We might take Holland or Switzerland, or some of those countries where there is no substantial depreciation. The standard is the English value. Whatever is the English value of the article we will take as the value of the foreign country, in any case in which there is a depreciation of currency. We have approached it in a different way from my hon. friends opposite, and, perhaps, we shall accomplish the same purpose.

I think I have spoken of all the important changes. I need not say that the increase in taxes is not a very agreeable thing for any government. I have told more than one friend that by the time I get through the budget I do not expect to have a friend on earth. But I am going to ask the House and the country to regard this budget as an earnest effort to meet a condition, which however we may regret it, faces us, and which we must face seriously and courageously. With all the taxes we will get under the new system, we will fall short of the needs of the year, and whoever may stand here a year hence may have to adopt some other means of taxation But I say that in the budget that we are presenting to the House, we have carried taxation about as far as we think the country can stand it, and though there will be difference of opinion here and there as to the method, we hope that on reflection this budget will recommend itself to the country as an earnest effort to meet conditions which face us, and which, I am sure, we all agree must be faced bravely and courageously.

AMENDED RESOLUTIONS

1. Resolved, That it is expedient to amend section forty of the Customs Act by providing that in the case of importations from a foreign country, the value for duty shall not be less than the value that would be placed on similar goods produced in the United Kingdom and imported from that country, if such similar goods are produced there. If similar goods are not produced in the United Kingdom, the value for duty shall not be less than the value of similar goods imported from any European country in which the currency is not substantially depreciated.

The minister may determine the value for duty of such goods, and the value so determined shall, until otherwise provided, be the value upon which the duty on such goods shall be computed and levied under regulation prescribed by the minister.

2. Resolved, That it is expedient to amend the said act by adding at the end of section one hundred and one thereof the following provise:—

"Provided, however, that upon the entry outwards of wines and spirituous liquors to be exported from a Customs warehouse either by sea or by land or inland navigation, as the case may be, the person entering the same for such purpose shall give security by bond of an incorporated Guarantee Company authorized to do business in Canada and whose bonds are acceptable to the Dominion Government, such bond to be in form approved by the minister, in double the duties of importation on such goods, that the same shall, when the entry aforesaid is for exportation by sea, be actually exported to the place provided for in said entry, and when the entry aforesaid is for exportation by land or inland navigation, shall be landed and delivered at the place for which they are entered outwards, unless in either case the said goods were after leaving Canada lost and destroyed, and that such proof or certificate that such goods have been so exported, landed or delivered, or lost and destroyed, as the case may be, as shall be required by any regulation of the minister, shall be produced by the collector or other proper officer within a period to be appointed in such bond. This proviso, however, shall not apply to wines and spirituous liquors in a Canadian port, without entry thereat for warehouse and for no other purpose than their transportation in transitu on a through bill of lading, from a port outside of Canada to another port of destination outside of Canada via a Canadian port or ports."

3. Resoved, That it is expedient to amend section one hundred and two of the said act by inserting the words "or in such bond" between the word "exportation" and the word "there" in the second line thereof, and by adding at the end of the said section the words "and if security by bond is given, the said bond may be cancelled."

1. Resolved, That it is expedient to amend proposed resolution number 2 amending schedule A to The Customs Tariff, 1907, by striking thereout tariff items: 143a, 197a and 198a, the several enumerations of goods respectively, and the several rates of duties of Customs, if any set opposite each of said items, and to provide that the following items, enumerations and rates of duty be inserted in schedule A:

Tariff Items	——	British Preferential Tariff	Intermediate Tariff	General Tariff
143a	Cigarettes, the weight of the paper covering to be included in the weight for duty, per pound.....	$4.70	$4.70	$4.70 and.....	25 p.c.	25 p.c.	25 p.c.
197a	Super-calendared or machine finish grades of book paper, not coated, when used exclusively in the production of magazines, newspapers and periodicals, printed, published or issued regularly under regulations prescribed by the Minister of Customs and Excise.....	12½ p.c.	22½ p.c.	25 p.c.
198a	Coated papers, when used exclusively in the production of magazines, newspapers and periodicals printed, published and issued regularly under regulations prescribed by the Minister of Customs and Excise.....	17½ p.c.	32½ p.c.	35 p.c.
638a	Hatters' bands (not cords) and hat sweats; hatters' tips and sides when cut to shape; and cashmere when cut to shape for underbrims and hat covers. All articles in this item when imported by hat and cap manufacturers for use exclusively in the manufacture of hats and caps in their own factories.....	Free.	Free.	Free.

2. Resolved, That it is expedient to amend proposed resolution number 3 amending schedule B to The Customs Tariff, 1907, and to provide that in item Number 1028 after the word "parts" the words "not finished" be struck out and to provide that the said resolution be further amended by striking thereout tariff item 1029, the enumeration of goods, and the rate of drawback of customs duties set opposite to the said item, and to provide that the following item, enumeration and rate of drawback of customs duties be inserted in said schedule B:—

Item No.	Goods	When subject to Drawback	Portion of Duty (not including Special Duty or Dumping Duty) Payable as Drawback
1029	Hatters' plush of silk or cotton, and hatters' bindings.	When imported by hat and cap manufacturers and used in the manufacture of hats and caps in their own factories.....	99 p.c.

1. Resolved, That it is expedient to amend the proposed resolution respecting amendments to The Inland Revenue Act and amending acts by striking out paragraphs (g) and (h) of section one of said resolutions and substituting the following:—

1. 279 (g) On cigarettes made from raw leaf tobacco or any substitute therefor, weighing not more than three pounds per thousand, seven dollars and fifty cents per thousand;

(h) On cigarettes made from raw leaf tobacco or any substitute therefor, weighing more than three pounds per thousand, twelve dollars and fifty cents per thousand.

2. Resolved, That it is expedient to amend the proposed resolution respecting amendments to The Inland Revenue Act and Amending Acts by striking out of said resolution the proposed amendment to subsection three of section three hundred and twenty-eight A of the said act and substituting therefor the following:—

Resolved, That it is expedient to amend The Inland Revenue Act by striking out of said act section three hundred and twenty-eight A, as enacted by chapter twenty-eight of the statutes of 1918 and by striking out of said act section three hundred and twenty-eight B, as enacted by chapter fifty-two of the statutes of 1920.

Resolved, That it is expedient to amend the proposed resolutions respecting amendments to The Inland Revenue Act and amending acts by striking out paragraph 6 of said resolutions and substituting the following:—

"6. Resolved, That it is expedient to amend The Inland Revenue Act, chapter fifty-one of the revised statutes, 1906, as amended by chapter six of the statutes of 1914 and chapter thirty-four of the statutes of 1921, by adding the following:—

"There shall be imposed, levied and collected on all sugar produced in Canada from sugar beets, the following duties of excise:—

"Sugar, sugar drainings, melado, sugar concrete and molasses testing over fifty-six degrees and not exceeding seventy-five degrees of polarization, per one hundred pounds, 12 cents; and for each additional degree over seventy-five degrees, per one hundred pounds, ½ cent.

Provided that fractions of five-tenths of a degree or less shall not be subject to the duty and that fractions of more than five-tenths shall be subject to the duty as a degree. Provided that such duty of excise shall not be payable when such sugar is exported."

4. Resolved, That it is expedient to amend The Inland Revenue Act, chapter fifty-one of the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1906, by repealing section one hundred and ninety-nine of the said act, which provides that beer brewed for private use shall not be liable to any duty under the said act; and to provide that section two hundred and four of the said act be amended by striking out the words "except for use of himself or his family, as by this act provided" in the third and fourth lines thereof.

1. Resolved, that it is expedient to amend the proposed resolution amending the Special War Revenue Act, 1915, by striking out paragraphs two, three and four of said resolutions and substituting the following:

"2. That subsection two and three of section eight of the said act be amended by providing that the tax imposed on cable companies and telegraph companies shall be increased from a sum equal to one cent upon each despatch or message therein mentioned to a sum equal to three cents upon each such despatch or message; and that every company may charge the three cents to and collect the same from the person paying or liable to pay the regular charges for the transmission of the despatch or message, and that any enactment founded on this paragraph shall come into force on the first day of July, one thousand nine hundred and twenty-two."

"3. That it is expedient to amend section 12 of the said act by striking thereout subsections two and four and substituting the following:

(2) No person shall issue a cheque payable at or by a bank unless there is affixed thereto an adhesive stamp or unless there is impressed thereon by means of a die a stamp of the value of, if the amount of money for which the cheque is issued

(i) does not exceed $50.. .. .. ..two cents
(ii) exceeds $50, for every $50 or fraction thereof.. .. .. ..two cents but not to exceed in any case two dollars, and every adhesive stamp affixed to a cheque shall be cancelled by the bank at which the cheque is payable at or before the time of payment.

"(4) No person shall sign a receipt for money paid to him by a bank chargeable against a deposit of money in the bank to his credit until he has affixed to the receipt an adhesive stamp or unless there is impressed thereon by means of a die a stamp of the value of, if the amount of the money for which the receipt is signed

(i) does not exceed $50.. .. .. ..two cents
(ii) exceeds $50, for every $50 or fraction thereof.. .. .. ..two cents but not to exceed in any case two dollars, and every adhesive stamp affixed to such receipt shall be cancelled by the bank at the time the money is paid."

Resolved, "That it is expedient to amend section 12 of the said act by striking thereout paragraph (b) of subsection 3 as enacted by chapter seventy-one of the statutes of 1920, and substituting the following:

"(b) If a bill of exchange transferred or delivered to a bank or issued by a bank is payable on demand, or at sight, or on presentation, or within three days after date or sight, such bill shall, for the purpose of the value of the stamp to be affixed thereto or impressed thereon, be deemed to be drawn for an amount not exceeding five thousand dollars."

Resolved, "That it is expedient to amend section 12 of the said act by providing that wherever subsections 3 (a), 3 (c), 3 (d), and 3 (f) of said section 12, as enacted by chapter seventy-one of the statutes of 1920, provide for payment of a tax at the rate of two cents for every one hundred dollars, the said subsections be amended to provide that the tax shall be at the rate of two cents for every fifty dollars of the bills, notes, advances or overdrafts therein mentioned."

Resolved, "That it is expedient to amend section 12 of the said act by striking thereout subsection 13, as enacted by chapter seventy-one of the statutes of 1920, and substituting the following:

"(13) No person shall sell or transfer the stock or shares of any association, company or corporation, or any bond, other than a bond of the Dominion of Canada issued exempt from any taxes imposed in pursuance of any legislation enacted by the Parliament of Canada or subject to any agreement specifying the amount of fee to be paid on transfer thereof, by agreement for sale, entry on the books of the association, company or corporation, by delivery of share certificates or share warrants or bond endorsed in blank or bond payable to bearer, or in any other manner whatsoever, or accept the transfer or delivery of any stock, share or bond unless in respect of such sale or transfer there is affixed to or impressed upon such stock, shares or bond, or a document showing the transfer or agreement to transfer thereof, an adhesive stamp, or a stamp impressed thereon by means of a die, of the value of three cents for every one hundred dollars or fraction thereof of the par value of the stock, shares or bond sold or transferred. Provided that in case of sale where the evidence of transfer is shown only by the books of the company the stamp shall be placed or impressed upon such books; and where the change of ownership is by transfer of the certificate or bond the stamp shall be placed or impressed upon the certificate or bond; and in case of an agreement to sell or where the transfer is by delivery of the certificate or bond assigned in blank or bond payable to bearer there shall be made and delivered by the seller to the buyer a bill or memorandum of such sale, to which the stamp shall be affixed or impressed; and every bill or memorandum of sale or agreement to sell before mentioned shall show the date thereof, the name of the seller, the amount of the sale, and the manner or thing to which it refers, provided that the first delivery by a corporation or company or such shares or debenture stock, in order to effect an issue, or the first issue of a bond, shall not be subject to the tax proposed by this resolution; and to provide that any person who violates any of the provisions proposed by this resolution shall be liable to a penalty not exceeding five hundred dollars and that any enactment founded on this resolution shall come into force on the first day of July, one thousand nine hundred and twenty-two."

"4. That it is expedient to amend section 13 of the said act by striking thereout subsections 2 and 3 and substituting the following:

"(2) Every express company carrying on business in Canada shall before the issue of a money order or traveller's cheque affix thereto an adhesive stamp of the value of, if the amount of money for which the money order or traveller's cheque is issued

(i) does not exceed $50.. .. .. ..two cents
(ii) exceeds $50, for every $50 or fraction thereof.. .. .. ..two cents but not to exceed in any case two dollars, and the company may charge the amount of the stamps so affixed to and collect the same from the purchaser of the order or cheque or from the payee thereof. The company shall before delivery of the order or cheque cancel the stamp by writing on or across the stamp initials or other identification of the company together with the date of the issue of the order or cheque."

"(3) No money order shall be issued under the provisions of the Post Office Act until there is affixed thereto or to the relative advice a postage stamp of the value of, if the amount of money for which the money order is issued

(i) does not exceed $50.. .. .. ..two cents
(ii) exceeds $50, for every $50 or fraction thereof.. .. .. ..two cents but not to exceed in any case two dollars, to be paid for by the purchaser of the order. The postmaster or other officer of the Post Office Department issuing the order shall cancel the stamp by impressing thereon when affixed the date stamp of the post office at which the order is issued."

"Any enactment founded on this resolution shall come into force on the first day of July, one thousand nine hundred and twenty-two."

2. Resolved, That it is expedient to amend the said act by providing that no person shall give a receipt unless there is affixed thereto an adhesive stamp or unless there is impressed thereon by means of a die a stamp of the value of two cents, which is to be cancelled by the person by whom the receipt is given before he delivers it out of his hands; that the expression "receipt" shall mean any note, memorandum or writing whereby any money amounting to $10.00 or upwards, or any bill of exchange or promissory note for money amounting to $10.00 or upwards is acknowledged or expressed to have been received, deposited or repaid or whereby any debt or demand or any part of a debt or demand of the amount of $10.00 or upwards is acknowledged to have been settled, satisfied or discharged or which signifies or imports any such acknowledgment and whether the same is or is not signed with the name of any person; and to provide that any person who violates any of the provisions of any enactment founded on this resolution or who refuses to give a receipt duly stamped, shall be liable to a penalty not exceeding $100; and to provide for certain exemptions from the foregoing; and to provide that any enactment founded on this resolution shall come into force on the first day of January, one thousand nine hundred and twenty-three.

3. Resolved, That Schedules I and II to paragraph 8 of the said proposed resolutions to amend The Special War Revenue Act, 1915, be struck out of said resolutions and the following schedules substituted:—

Schedule I

Automobiles adapted or adaptable for passenger use:—
(a) valued at not more than twelve hundred dollars each five per cent

4. Resolved, That it is expedient to provide that any enactment founded on the aforesaid resolutions shall not apply to the excise tax provided for in Schedule I on automobiles purchased before the twenty-fourth day of May, one thousand nine hundred and twenty-two, and sold by a dealer in Canada to a bona fide user prior to that date and imported and entered for consumption on or before the first day of July, one thousand nine hundred and twenty-two; and to provide further that any enactment founded on the aforesaid resolutions so far as it imposes an excise tax on beverages mentioned in Schedule I shall come into force on the first day of July, one thousand nine hundred and twenty-two.

5. Resolved, That it is expedient to amend paragraph 7 of said proposed resolutions amending subsection one of section nineteen BBB of the said act by adding to the list of goods, to which the taxes specified in the said paragraph shall not apply, the following:

Fertilizers;
Dried beet pulp.

6. Resolved, That it is expedient to amend the said act by providing that any taxes imposed under the provisions of paragraph seven and paragraph eight of the proposed resolutions relating to The Special War Revenue Act on sales and deliveries by manufacturers, producers, wholesalers or jobbers shall apply to sales to and also to importations by His Majesty whether in the right of His Majesty's Government of Canada or His Majesty's Government of any province in Canada for the purpose of resale; and by providing further that under the provisions of paragraph seven of the said resolutions the purchaser shall be furnished with a written invoice of any sale, which invoice shall state separately the amount of such tax.

On motion of Mr. Maclean (Halifax), the debate was adjourned.

On motion of Mr. Mackenzie King the House adjourned at 11.25 p.m.

The House met at three o'clock.

ALBERTA LIBERAL CANDIDATES

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I would like to ask the Government if its attention has been called to a despatch in the Morning Albertan, Calgary, of June 8, in which appears a report of the meeting by the unsuccessful Liberal candidates in the Alberta Dominion election. Criticism was levelled at this meeting by the Conservative press and it was stated, that it was held for the purpose of assisting in the distribution of patronage in that province. Subsequent to the meeting Mr. E. F. Ryan, defeated Liberal candidate in Calgary, gave an interview in the course of which he said:

What the defeated Liberal candidates met for was to discuss redistribution in Alberta and to report to the Liberal Government. If the federal Liberal Government is not officially represented in Alberta it is up to the Liberal candidates who were defeated to try and guide the Government in the coming redistribution.

I wish to ask the Government if they have had a report of that meeting, and whether or not they are in a position to state to the House the day upon which the question introduced by Mr. Shaw will be discussed.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): The speech of my hon. friend calls the attention of the Government for the first time to the article to which he has referred. I had not seen the report he speaks of. I have had a communication from one of the Liberals of Alberta about a meeting which was held, but that communication did not refer in any way to the subject of redistribution, which, I think, is the point my hon. friend has just raised. In regard to redistribution, the Government will naturally welcome advice from every source.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Has the Government decided on the day on which redistribution will be discussed by this House?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: We have not decided on the day, but there will be a chance before the session is over.

NATIONAL RAILWAY BOARD

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (North Toronto): I desire to ask a question of the Government as to the appointment of directors to the National Railway Board. Will the Government consider the appointment on that board of representatives who are sympathetic with public ownership? Will they consider the views of the appointees on the question of public ownership?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The Government will be glad to consider any names or representations an hon. member may wish to have considered.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. T. L. CHURCH: I wish to ask another question. I notice a series of articles in the Montreal Herald. I will just read three lines as follows:

Mr. Hanna is not running the National Railways. Neither is the Government. The man who is running the Canadian National railways is not even a Canadian. He is a foreigner. His name is Mr. Carey. He lives in Indianapolis.

Mr. SPEAKER: That question is not in order, on the Orders of the Day.

THE BUDGET

CONTINUATION OF THE DEBATE OF THE ANNUAL FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The House resumed from Monday, June 12, the debate on the motion of Hon. W. S. Fielding (Minister of Finance) that Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair for the House to go into Committee of Ways and Means, and the proposed amendment thereto of Hon. Sir Henry Drayton.

Hon. A. K. MACLEAN (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, I know it is a very doubtful adventure on the part of any hon. member to engage in the discussion of the budget at the present time. So much has been said concerning it, and so little has been left unsaid, that really it is difficult for one to justify himself in asking the attention of hon. members to a further consideration of that subject. However, I avail myself very gladly of the opportunity of presenting some remarks to the House this afternoon. I do not intend discussing the budget with any great particularity, I wish to address to the House some general observations regarding it. I desire to say a few words in connection with the changes in the taxation resolutions, as announced by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) last night. These taxation resolutions have been in force since May 23 or May 24, I believe. In the meanwhile, actual experience has demonstrated that these taxation proposals were not in the interest of trade or of revenue, and the Minister of Finance, in his good judgment, has seen fit to vary them. I have no doubt that if, later on, he finds that experience does not justify the tax proposals in their amended form, he will exhibit that same good judgment in announcing to the country and to parliament his willingness to make further amendments if necessary, in the commercial interests of the country and of the public revenue. There is a lesson, perhaps, to be drawn from our experience of the operation of these tax proposals during the past two or three weeks. We see how quickly and markedly taxation affects trade. When taxation is carried beyond a certain point, not only does it diminish business and commerce, but also it does not bring into the treasury the revenue it was designed to bring. We see further, that the framing of taxation schemes is not, after all, an easy matter; it is not as easy as some hon. gentlemen think. From the way in which taxation proposals are suggested in this country to-day by many people,—yes, and even in this Parliament—one would fancy that this question was accompanied with no difficulties or complexities whatever, that almost anybody could suggest a scheme of taxation that would be workable and practicable in Canada.

I do not wish to say anything in particular concerning the amended resolution in relation to the depreciated currency of European countries. I favour the widest trading between this country and the countries of Europe; but while giving my adhesion to that principle, I do not mean to say that, in certain circumstances due to disrupted international exchanges, certain results must not be corrected, as the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) proposes correcting them by his amended resolution in relation to the depreciated currencies of Europe. The free trader likes fair trade. Fundamentally, he means that he believes in what we know as barter. But the depreciated currencies, of Europe to-day prevent what is or was usually heretofore known as barter. Not only are conditions abnormal in this respect; but they are unnatural, and however in theory we may view them, there is a practical side to these questions, they must be dealt with in a practical way. German exporters of goods are able to establish for themselves credits in foreign countries, and these credits are of great advantage to them in disposing of their productions. I am perfectly satisfied with the efforts of the Minister of Finance in seeking to control this in a practical way, and in some degree.

The statement of the Minister of Finance in his budget in reference to our debt and to our revenue necessities make very plain the serious financial obligations confronting us to-day. Our debt is alarmingly high; it cannot go very much higher without endangering everything in the country. Our actual revenue necessities are also very large; they may continue to grow higher, but I hope not. It will, however, be difficult, as the Minister of Finance has stated, to secure further revenues. We have reached almost the limit of taxation; we cannot proceed in this direction much further; and it is becoming more difficult day by day to discover new sources of revenue, or to explore new avenues through and by which additional revenue may be secured. There is no ideal form of taxation known to us in Canada or to men in any other country. The income tax is regarded the world over, I think, generally speaking, as the fairest form of taxation; but it itself works many hardships. All revenues which come to the treasury of any country come only through taxation; all forms of taxation are more or less of a burden, and they come from earnings and savings of the people generally and from nowhere else. It has been remarked on two or three occasions by some hon. gentlemen that the British government have reduced their debt and that their income tax is declining. I think it was the leader of the Opposition (Mr. Meighen) who discussed this particular point, and, I think, with perfect accuracy. The reduction in the British income tax was not due to the fact that they were reducing their debt by taxation; because the truth is that the British debt has been reduced by war salvages and from no other source. The income tax was reduced in Great Britain because it was thought it was becoming a burden upon business, that it was destroying business initiative and enterprise. It was thought that in the end revenues would be encouraged and the economic security of Great Britain better maintained by a reduction of taxation. I refer to this only to impress this point upon hon. gentlemen, because we hear, too frequently I think, expression of the idea that there is no limit to the amount of taxation which this country can impose upon certain people and certain industries. We must all agree that it is morally wrong to impose excessive taxation upon people who cannot afford to pay any taxation whatever, upon poor people. In Great Britain, the idea behind the reduction of the income tax is that it is economically wrong to impose excessive taxation upon people who earn large incomes, and that we should not, in these days of confusion and problems, allow ourselves to be possessed of the idea that business can be indiscriminately taxed, or that men of a certain class can be excessively taxed. I agree with the general proposition that taxation must be imposed upon those who can best afford to pay it; but I wish to emphasize the idea that this can be carried too far, and by excessive taxation, we may destroy the very sources from which we obtain our revenues. Our debt is exceedingly high to-day; our revenue necessites are extremely burdensome upon the people, and the man who can devise a more suitable scheme of taxation than that which we have to-day will deserve the gratitude of the nation. The hon. member for East Calgary (Mr. Irvine) a few days ago presented to the House some scheme which I understood to mean that, if put into operation, it would, within a year or two, wipe out the public debt and would practically avoid the necessity of further taxation. If the hon. gentleman can produce such a scheme and make it practicable, I am sure there is nothing this country would not do for him. Personally, I would favour withdrawing from the British Empire altogether and establishing a new kingdom here, and I would consent that he be placed upon the throne and the crown placed upon his head.

Mr. McMASTER: Not a crown of gold.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax): As I have stated, we have, in my judgment, pretty nearly reached the limit of taxation in this country, and if so, what is to be our relief in the future? I think, as has already been stated by many hon. gentlemen, it should come from a reduction of public expenditure. I know that the ideal of economy is popular, but the practice of it is not so popular. The Minister of Finance intimated this when delivering his budget on the 23rd day of May. I think it is a fact that the people of this country are naturally extravagant; and we might naturally expect that of the people of a new country as compared with the people of older countries. At any rate, I believe that this charge may be fairly levelled against us. But a very radical change must come over us all in that respect. As the Minister of Finance said, we are willing to be economical in so far as the constituency of any other hon. gentleman is concerned, but each of us is not so particular in regard to the constituency we represent. I very modestly suggested the other night that we might suspend the operation of the Rideau canal, particularly what looks to me like the business operation at this end. At the moment I did not know that the town of Perth was situated on the Rideau canal; I was not aware that there were those beautiful Rideau lakes beyond us here. But I never intended to destroy the town of Perth nor to impair the beauties of the Rideau lakes. I merely suggested that certain sections of that canal, which were apparently or outwardly, conducted as a commercial operation might well be done away with. However, my suggestion, which was well intended, was not very well received. The hon. gentleman who sits immediately to my left, the member for Cumberland (Mr. Logan), offered the suggestion the other night that the salaries of civil servants, members of Parliament and judges, and all that class of people generally, should be reduced by 15 per cent. I do not know that the Minister of Finance has received any cheque, implementing this suggestion, from the class of people designated by the member for Cumberland; nor am I sure whether he himself has tendered a cheque on his own account.

The Minister of Finance expressed doubt as to the permanence of his popularity if he endeavoured to curtail public expenditure. I wish to assure him that, in my judgment, the members of this Parliament, irrespective of their party allegiance or alignment, and the people of the country, regardless of party considerations, will be behind him in his efforts to reduce the public expenditures. And it is my judgment, further, that the supporters of the Government would rather go down upholding the Government in a genuine effort towards the reduction of those expenditures than upon any other public issue which might remove them from office.

Now, the economic conditions in this country are not very agreeable to our people. We have our problems here just as they have them in every other country in the world; and those problems are many and serious. The idea, however, too commonly prevails that we can rehabilitate ourselves economically by restoratives and palliatives that we ourselves suggest individually and sectionally. Formulas are proposed by hon. gentlemen in the House and by people outside of the House based upon local or class considerations, by which they hope to rid the country of the tremendous problems that confront us. Being in economic distress, it is only natural that we should seek the nearest harbour, and we find all forms of suggestions as to the causes of the conditions that obtain to-day, many of which suggestions are erroneous and should never be presented, but which nevertheless must be considered. For our economic conditions to-day it is very common to hear charges made against organized capital, against banks, against railways, against public policy, against farmers, against wage-earners; and in the end hardly any organized human activity escapes the accusation of being responsible for the commercial and economic state of the country. A gentleman residing in one of the western provinces suggested during the last campaign that all classes of the community should be organized independently; that is to say, that all sections of human activity engaged in any particular line of work should be politically organized —and I have not in mind the Progressive party. It is quite clear to me, from my observation of their work in the House this session, that they are not an occupational group. It is true they may very largely belong to the agricultural classes; it is true that they represent to a large extent the agricultural sections of the country, and when they speak they must speak largely for the interests of their people, which are agricultural interests. But I do not think that in any respect they can be termed an occupational party, or a farmers' class party. It is another thing, however, to have it suggested that the whole of this country should be organized into classes politically, in the hope, thereby, of solving the problems that face the nation to-day. That would simply accentuate the differences that exist between the various peoples of our country, differences which we should always seek to minimize if not to obliterate. Such a system of organization would compose no differences. Economically, I should regard it as the purest nonsence—a system which should receive no support from any section of the country, or any individual thereof. It would prevent clear thinking and would make impossible a correct visualization of our own situation, or of the problems of the world at large.

Again, we find it suggested that there should be restricted output on the part of industries in order to ensure more employment and better wages. This has been put forward on more than one occasion in this country, and possibly in this Parliament, although I cannot recall any instances of the kind in the House. But at least it is suggested as a means of correcting the economic condition of the country to-day. Well, it is unsound economically, for you cannot have output restricted without first hurting the man who is a party to that restriction. It means, in the first instance, lessened production, and, in the second place, higher prices and consequently lessened consumption; and this would react quickly and surely upon those very people who believe in the false economic theory that restriction of output is a good thing for them or their country. All these proposals are tendered as cures for the economic diseases of the world to-day.

Now, there is a tendency to forget one of the great events of human history, namely, the fact that a great world war prevailed from the years 1914 to 1918.

We are apt to forget that that war shook the world to its very foundation and that it still trembles, and will, for years to come, and that probably a century will pass before its effects will have wholly passed away. We know further, the effect of that war upon Europe. We cannot understand our own economic position or that of the world to-day if we forget the consequences of that war. Canada cannot return to normal business conditions until Europe has recovered her normal economic position. We may of course, do some things to improve our position, but we should always keep in mind that many of the problems confronting us to-day are due to the fact that the war has left Europe in the position which she to-day occupies. And that should bring home to all of us—it does to me at least—something which I never understood in the past as clearly as I do to-day, namely, that continents are dependent upon continents, countries upon countries, nations upon nations, for a sound trading and commercial position. The world to-day is very small; modern transportation has made intercommunication convenient and rapid. As a result the social and commercial conditions of the world are more complex to-day than they ever were in our history, and we are so inter-dependent, countries upon countries, and peoples upon peoples, that we cannot recover our lost position until the world as a whole has recovered from the disturbing effects of the war. And our own commercial position will not be normal so long as the commercial position of other important countries is abnormal.

This brings me to the idea—and it is merely a restatement of that which I have already expressed—that we are interested in international trade. The opinion has been expressed very frequently during this debate that we in Canada can get along very well without international trade, and that our commercial position can be improved by our trading wholly within ourselves. That, I think, is an economic fallacy. The war again has shown in many practical ways of late how dependent we are one nation upon another. Take the position of Russia, where is being enacted to-day the greatest tragedy of all the ages. Russia was a great cotton consuming country, and when she collapsed financially and economically the United States lost a great market for its cotton goods; that loss immediately reacted upon the production of raw cotton in the southern States; which in turn reacted upon the whole of the United States, and finally we became affected.

Take another instance. Russia consumed about twenty-five per cent of the tea production of India. When Russia collapsed India lost that market, and her purchasing power to that extent was lessened. India was a great consumer of cotton goods manufactured in England. So the loss of her tea trade with Russia and her resultant restricted purchasing power meant that she bought less cotton goods from England, and that consequently less of these goods were manufactured; which in turn reacted upon Canada, because it lessened the purchasing power of the British people and they bought less of our products.

A further illustration of how utterly dependent one country is upon another is afforded by what occurred in England quite recently. Large importations of a certain kind of gloves were made from Germany into a certain town in the northern part of England. That town sent representatives to the British Board of Trade asking that these importations be prohibited or restricted. Immediately the workingmen of another town close by met together and protested against any such prohibition, pointing out that these gloves were made from wool which they themselves produced, and that consequently their work would be taken away if the manufactured gloves were not allowed to be imported. So after all, Mr. Speaker, it is very difficult in these days to follow cause and effect in trading transactions, but everything clearly indicates, if I may be permitted to repeat, that we are very much dependent upon and easily affected by the condition which prevails in the other countries of the world.

While I am talking about these matters which are outside Canada, and which perhaps are not interesting, may I refer to another matter? I have already said that we in this country are interested in international politics and international trade and have tried to give a few facts in support of that statement. We are interested in every country of the world, and we can never revert to a purely Canadian viewpoint of trade, except to our own disadvantage and detriment.

Mr. IRVINE: Does that apply to tariffs? If our commercial life is very largely conditioned by our commercial relations with other countries, would not our tariff have to be conditioned by the tariffs of other countries?

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax): I think the tariff would play a very important part in that way.

Mr. IRVINE: Is not that exactly the same as the right hon. leader of the Opposition (Mr. Meighen) said a couple of years ago?

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax): I forget what the right hon. leader of the Opposition said a couple of years ago. But I was remarking, Mr. Speaker, that though we are citizens of a new and undeveloped country, not ranking as one of the first nations of the world by any means, still we are interested in international trade and international questions, and the condition of European countries, should appeal to us just as much as the condition of the people of one of our provinces should appeal to the people of the other provinces. We hear a great deal about Germany these days; she is the subject of much discussion and conference in Europe and of much discussion in this country. I think it is apparent to every reflecting person that unless Germany is put on the road to commercial activities every country in Europe will be adversely affected. It is a commonplace saying, and should not require repetition, that Europe can never be right until Germany is right—that is, in the economic sense. I think it is also a commonplace saying that we are intensely interested in the economic recovery of Germany, or any other country of Europe which is politically and economically disrupted. But, strange to say, the tendency the world over is to enact legislation of one kind or another with the object of preventing her recovery. As was suggested the other day by some hon. members, the war is over, and that part of it had better be forgotten. We can never forgive the guilt of Germany in forcing the world into the greatest tragedy known to all history; nevertheless for our own good and for the good of all the peoples of the world, it is necessary that she be restored, economically at least. Notwithstanding the necessity of this, there is a tendency the world over to do everything to prevent her from resuming her commercial processes. It is expected that she can pay the reparations assessed against her, while at the same time she is prevented from trading with other countries. Obviously that is an unsound position to take. Germany can pay the reparations only by the exporting of goods. She has no money; there is not enough gold in all the world, by two-thirds, to pay the amount of reparations assessed against Germany by the allied powers. There is no other means known to the human intellect by which she can pay one dollar of the reparations except by the export of goods. Yet in many countries of Europe that procedure is being not facilitated, but rather retarded by restrictions of various kinds. Now, the effect of this was made clear just recently. It would appear from the report of the International Bankers' Association that they have decided that they cannot recommend an international loan to Germany until such questions as the reparations are settled. We are interested in that question; if we as Canadians are interested in our own country, we must of necessity be interested in this matter. And we have a right to speak about it, because we are interested in the restoration of international trading and in international politics. Great world events have brought us into that position, and whenever we have an opportunity to do so we should express what we believe to be the wish and the judgment of this country in that respect.

The member for St. John (Mr. Baxter), much to my surprise, gave expression to the view a few days ago that he would be perfectly content to see the German people dropped out of the universe altogether and become extinct. I was surprised, I say, to hear my hon. friend make that statement. I am dealing with the case of Germany merely from the economic point of view; I am not particularly discussing it with the view to presenting Germany in any more favourable light than she deserves. Well, what would this world be like if in the twinkling of an eye you took out of its economic system sixty millions of people? Disaster would overcome all the European countries. There would be a complete breakup of the present commercial fabric and of commercial institutions. We in this country would suffer tremendously. Any economic doctrine of that kind should find no support in this country any more than it should find support in any European country.

The member for Centre Toronto (Mr. Bristol), speaking on the budget a few days ago, left the impression with me that he thought it undesirable for this country to trade with Germany, but he admitted in the same speech that a company in Nova Scotia in which he is interested is exporting ore to that same country. Well, how could Germany pay for that ore if we did not buy any goods from her? After all, Mr. Speaker, we get back to this position: that no country can sell unless it buys; it must import just as much as it exports; the moment it ceases to import it will cease to export, and that is true of all countries. What we want more than anything else is a resumption of normal trading among all the countries of the world, and it is the duty of all countries to do what they can to bring about that condition.

I fancy that it has been hardly profitable or interesting to the House that I should have taken so much time in a discussion of trade matters which are, perhaps, more of international than domestic importance. My only excuse for doing so is to impress upon the House that we cannot eliminate consideration of the commercial condition of the various countries of the world when we are discussing economic matters relating to Canada.

I was very glad, Mr. Speaker, that the Government saw fit to have Canadian representatives at the Genoa Conference. We have earned the right to be represented at these international conferences and we should always be found there. Perhaps we cannot exert the same influence that can be exerted by many other countries of the world. Though politically we may not be a nation, economically we are, and we have a right to be heard in the councils of the world as loudly and persistently as our rights and interests demand.

The Minister of Finance, in his budget, referred to the question of reciprocity with the United States. I speak of the matter only for the purpose of making one suggestion. I am sure that this Parliament, or the people of this country, did not and will not object to the visit of the Minister of Finance to Washington very shortly after his accession to office. Any efforts made by the Government to facilitate trade relations between Canada and the United States, particularly at the present moment, cannot but meet with commendation from all reflecting people in this country. It is true we cannot criticise the actions of the legislation of the United States in respect to commercial matters, tariffs, and things of that kind, but we cannot be prevented from expressing our surprise that in that regard that country does legislate in the way that it does. We cannot help expressing our surprise that they take the view that they do, particularly at the present time, of international trade. I say it is commendable that public men should de everything they can, when opportunity offers, to encourage closer and freer trading relations between Canada and the country to the south of us. Possibly we in this country hesitate to express as freely as we should our opinion of tariff legislation and other enactments of that kind enacted by the United States Congress. That may be due to the fact that we have not any instrument to vocalize Canadian thought and ideas in regard to such matters, and I feel like suggesting that Canada should have a representative in the United States somewhat after the form of our High Commissioner in London, there to give expression to Canadian ideas and views with regard to the commercial relations between the two countries. Perhaps this might be a very much better and a more practical thing than having, as was suggested a year or two ago, a representative at Washington closely associated with the British Embassy and more in the nature of a diplomatic than a commercial representative. Any trade that is done between this country and the United States is done between the people of this country and the people of the United States—trading is not carried on by countries—and I would think there would be a splendid opportunity in the United States for such a representative of this country to represent our commercial interests, and in my judgment it might bring about very beneficial results. It was only a year or two ago that a delegation from Sheffield, England, appeared before one of the congressional committees on finance and brought to their attention the fact that a certain section of the American tariff then under consideration, if put into effect, would prevent Sheffield manufacturers from selling their wares in the United States. The delegation was well received by the committee, and with very practical results, because, my recollection is, the proposed tariff upon the particular articles in which the delegation were interested, never became operative, but was abandoned by reason of the representations then made.

Now, a few words as to business conditions in this country. Conditions here are not good, as has been stated time and again by other speakers. But our future is not without hope. There is one great distinction we should keep in mind as between this country and the European countries which are in distress to-day, and it is this. We are a very large country with a very small population. We have the capacity to expand. There is the opportunity to develop latent resources. There is room for millions and millions of people yet in this country. These two facts alone should give us great hope. Our problems are great, but they can be overcome, and they will be overcome, and that brings me to say just a word about immigration, which has been discussed by a number of speakers during this debate.

We generally agree that we require immigration into Canada. Some desire a restricted and selected immigration. I merely refer to this for the purpose of expressing my own personal view, and it is this: We must not be too particular about the class of people who come to this country. I want to be understood: we cannot be too discriminatory. There is work to be done in this country and it would be impossible, unwise, and not in the interest of the country, present and future, to say that all of our immigrants should be handpicked. The degree of our growth will very largely depend upon the numbers in which immigrants come to this country in the next few years, and it is the next few years which are the very important and serious ones for us. I want to express my personal opinion only, that any immigration policy that is adopted should not be too restrictive or selective. We must take the longer view. This country will take decades and centuries to fully develop. It took many thousands of years for the British Isles to develop the stock of people who inhabit it to-day, and it would be very difficult indeed to trace their origin through all the ages that are gone. Time in its ceaseless flight works many ethnic changes in the different races which inhabit any country, and so I say we must always have the longer, rather than the shorter view in such great questions.

We have other problems in this country, Mr. Speaker, and one which must always be present to the minds of hon. gentlemen is that Canada is a very difficult country to govern. My friend the member for Cumberland (Mr. Logan) referred to this the other night. We have a very extensive country, extending from coast to coast, with adverse interests, or rather with a lack of community of interests, at least in a great many respects. We must endeavour to reconcile these adverse and opposing interests by public policy which is fair and just to the whole country. I wish as briefly as I can to refer to the different sections of the country which constitute Canada, and to point out as I pass along, the difficulties and disadvantages under which some of them live.

Starting in the East, I might well take my native province as being typical of the maritime provinces. There I find that the commercial relations of the maritime provinces with the rest of Canada are not very intimate. There is not a close commercial connection. Economically we are apart. Nova Scotia produces fish, lumber, and some surplus agricultural products. It finds no market in Canada for that surplus. It cannot and never will. That surplus is produced for export and sale in foreign countries. In the line of minerals, we find a market in the province of Quebec for a considerable portion of our coal, but it reaches that market only under a very severe competition, and not by reason of any tariff. True, there is a market in portions of Canada for some of our steel products, but it is also a fact, in my judgment, that that industry will never develop to its true and proper proportions from what might be called a purely Canadian trade. Therefore, I say that our interests are not bound up wholly with Canadian trade. In fact, our true destiny is involved in trade relations with the world; in other words, with international trade. It can be said, therefore, that the maritime provinces are little interested, as compared with other sections of Canada, in the policy of tariff protection. We have not the same possible advantages from that policy as have other provinces of Canada, and this must be kept in mind more in the future than it has been in the past. The maritime provinces have practically not grown at all in population in the last quarter of a century, and they are rapidly becoming conscious of that fact. They are giving expression to the idea that economically their position is not what it should be, and I would say to those who shall be identified with public affairs in this country in the future that they will have to take cognizance of the fact, that in the maritime provinces our development will depend altogether upon international trade. Our traditions are all that way, and our destiny points in that direction. At the same time, it is only fair that I should say for the people of my province that they are not objecting to the federation of the provinces, and they are willing to bear some of the commercial disadvantages of the union,. But I say also that they will insist more and more in the future, as years go by, that a more careful consideration be extended to them, by reason of their commercial isolation from the great populous centres of the rest of the country, a condition which, I think can never be changed by any fiscal policy or programme which this country can adopt.

We come then to the larger and more populous provinces of Ontario and Quebec, where we find, I think, more than half of the population of the country to-day. We have in those provinces greater industrial development; practically the whole of the industrial development of this country is to be found in those provinces. I do not think that it has been brought about by tariff policy only. Usually, the expansion of one district more than another is due to conditions which that district inherently possesses. One would expect to see the commercial metropolis of Canada just where it is. I hope I am not offensive to any other city in Canada in saying that. The city of Montreal is to-day situated where lake meets river and river meets lake. Her geographical position is a commanding one, and her future is assured, regardless of economic policy and any other consideration. She is also indebted for her development to her splendid people. Even at this day, and even at this present moment, that province seems to attract industry which might be located elsewhere, but, for some reason they prefer location in that province in preference to another. At any rate, Mr. Speaker, it is true that, in the provinces of Ontario and Quebec, we find a community of interests. The public policy, and the taxation policy, which might suit one very probably would suit the other. and, in so far as these two provinces are concerned, constituting a very large portion of this country as they do, and having more than half of its population, they have not the same commercial disadvantages that other provinces have. There are no differences between these provinces caused by existing public policy to compose, such as we find in other sections of Canada. Yet, these two provinces must remember that they have not themselves alone developed their provinces. The maritime provinces are the markets of the provinces of Ontario and Quebec. Goods are distributed from that section of the country to the maritime provinces. We are their consumers, just as much as the people living in those provinces, and, by reason of that fact, I say that, while they have done very much for themselves, and while public policy may favour them very much, still much of their progress is due to the fact that conditions give them good markets in the sections of Canada east and west of them.

Next we come to the prairie provinces, so much talked of these days, largely because there are, in this House, many men to talk for them, and by reason of the conditions which prevail there. That section of the country is of great interest to Canada. They are a large exporting country, and that is of great importance to the people of the other sections of Canada. The exports of the prairie provinces assist to a considerable extent the imports of the industrial sections of Ontario and Quebec, which sections must import, in large quantities, raw materials from other countries—their cotton factories must, of necessity, import the raw cotton, their woollen factories must import wool from abroad, the rubber industries must import raw rubber, and so on; and there would be no way of paying for these importations, if there were not exports from these provinces or some other parts of the country. In that respect, we are interested in the West. There is a peculiar situation there. It may be over-accentuated by its citizens. The conditions there, which are very seriously adverse to-day, may possibly be exaggerated.

Mr. GOULD: No chance!

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax): Well, there is a chance. There is always a chance for anything. I am rather preparing myself for a consideration of that particular matter. That section of the country is engaged in producing things which find a sale in international markets, and the price which they receive for their production is the price fixed in the international markets. The things they buy, as hon. members opposite assert, are bought largely in this country under the protective tariff, which, in some degree, at least, adds to the cost. They are far from the seaboard. Hon. members opposite who belong to these provinces frequently protest against this condition of affairs. There is much in their contention, I admit—a great deal, perhaps—and that, doubtless, has been accentuated by reason of the unusual commercial depression existing throughout Canada to-day and even the whole world. We are all much interested in the development of the prairies provinces. Our hope, for the near future, at least, lies in the degree of development which takes place in that section of Canada. From 1900 to 1910 was the period in which the whole of Canada developed. There is no other decade comparable to it in our history, and I was very much impressed with this a few hours ago, when I was looking at the census returns for those four provinces. I found that in 1891 there were only 152,000 people in Manitoba; in 1911 there were 455,000, and in 1921, 610,000. There was no census taken of Saskatchewan and Alberta in 1891—they were then organized territories—but in 1901 Saskatchewan had 91,000, in 1911 she had 492,000 and in 1921 she had 757,000. Alberta had but 73,000 in 1901, 374,000 in 1911, and 568,000 in 1921. British Columbia had but 98,000 in 1891, 178,000 in 1901, 392,000 in 1911, and 521,000 in 1921. Now this represents a great development and growth.

Perhaps only an exposure of these figures would bring home to us this very important fact. During that period when immigration was coming into this country, there was, as I said before, a great expansion of business throughout Canada. It was that immigration which developed Ontario and Quebec industrially so much, because we were practically adding every year to the population of Canada, a number almost equal to our smaller provinces. That incoming population had to be transported, clothed, fed; it was that which led to the extension of our railroad system; it was that which gave impetus to the industrial life of Canada. The industrial development did not bring into the country the new population, but the immigration brought the development. Therefore, it follows that anything that can bring about a return of a corresponding development in those three prairie provinces, or in the four western provinces, is a consummation devoutly to be wished. Any public policy which can do that will command the support of the intelligent and reflecting people of this country, and our problem is to find that policy. Business in the West is unfortunately depressed to-day; but our western friends must remember that the same conditions prevail in other sections of Canada. The agriculturists faced deflation first of all the producers on this continent. In 1920, their productions fell to pre-war prices, while the things they had to buy remained inflated. That produced the condition and the result which we have to-day in the West. The same thing occurred in the United States; it occurred in some countries of Europe, and I do not know of any public policy that could be enunciated by public men or governments that could have prevented it.

It has been said by someone, I forget whom, that the West will never become a manufacturing country. I can hardly concur in that idea. I do not know that it is very important to determine the fact one way or the other; but to some extent there is manufacturing there at the present time. It is almost impossible to conceive of a province, having the great resources say, of Alberta, not becoming more or less industrialised sometime in the future,—perhaps it may be said, in the remote future. I was sorry to hear a very excellent speech delivered by the hon. member for Springfield (Mr. Hoey) a few days ago, detracted from, I thought, just in its last moments, by a painting of the future of those provinces. He was reading from a survey made of Manitoba by somebody, in which survey the writer intimated that the wheat yield per acre in Manitoba was falling; and the future was painted in dark colours. It is not necessary for anybody to make a survey in order to come to that conclusion. That is a fact known to the ancients as well as to moderns. You cannot have an omelet without breaking an egg, you cannot grow anything from the soil without extracting the fertility; and the only way of perpetuating production is by returning to the soil, by artificial means, if you will, the fertility which has been taken from it. The West will grow no matter what government is in office in this country, and no matter what be the nature of the public policy that may prevail. Immigration has ceased; but it will not be long before we hear the West crying to send them men to "match their mountains and men to match their plains" as in years gone by. Nevertheless I have sympathy, and I believe every one in this country has sympathy for the agriculturists who reside in the prairie provinces over the conditions now prevailing there. The point, however, which I wish to place before hon. gentlemen for their serious consideration is the fact, that in that section of Canada you have a tremendous area and a very large population, engaged largely in one industry, whose interests are not identical with the interests of the rest of Canada, and it is not unnatural that from time to time we hear well considered and persistent complaints against public policy prevailing—perhaps with success—in other sections of the country, but which policy they believe is unsuitable for their conditions. I mention that only again to present the thought that this is a very difficult country to govern.

In the province of British Columbia, the last province of the Dominion, we find the situation much as it prevails in my province. It is far removed from populous centres, and is separated from the prairie provinces by mountain ranges. The people of British Columbia naturally expect a market for their productions in the prairie provinces, but the value of that market to them depends very largely upon the success which the people of the prairies have each year in their agricultural pursuits. That market is variable and transportation charges, they allege, are unfavourable for the development of that market. That market besides is shared in by the East. The major portion of the productions of British Columbia find a market in foreign countries. If British Columbia develops to any great extent—and I believe it will in the future—it will be because it has become an exporting country. Its destiny to a very large degree is out upon the seas, and the future interests of the people of British Columbia are closely connected with the countries of the Orient and the Antipodes. If the harbours of British Columbia are to develop as great shipping ports—and I believe they will—that will depend entirely upon international trade, because a port will never develop unless there are imports and exports for ships to carry as inward and outward cargoes.

That is a rough picture of this country, and it shows how much in conflict are the interests of the various sections of this wide-flung young nation. Little wonder is it that it is difficult to govern. Little wonder is it that we find it difficult to compose the inevitable differences of these different sections of Canada. But, at any rate, these differences call for the best attention and consideration of Parliament and of the public men of this country, and only in a spirit of compromise is it possible to pursue our national career with success, so that provinces shall march side by side in the development of the nation as a whole, and we may thus achieve our true destiny. Only in this manner is it possible for each province to secure the development which each deserves and to which each naturally aspires. It is only by a just consideration of the interest of each, that the whole confederation can work out its destiny and purpose.

Just a word or two more upon one phase which I have already discussed. What is one of the chief factors contributing to the depression of trade in this country to-day? It is desirable in discussing the present adverse conditions of the country, to understand, if we can, the actual causes of those conditions. If we do not know those causes and have not them clearly in our minds, we cannot intelligently discuss the effects. One of the causes contributing to the depression in domestic trade to-day, is the fact that the true equilibrium in the exchange values of commodities with commodities is wanting. Some hon. gentleman opposite remarked the other evening to the fact that he could not get more, I think, than a dollar for a hide, although he had to pay $12 for a pair of shoes; and after making that statement he asked the question: Where is the nigger? Well, that question left the impression in my mind that that hon. gentleman was suspicious as to the existence of some sinister public policy and believed the whole cause of this particular condition to be easily ascertained, and to be capable of immediate remedy by public policy. One of the difficulties of trading in the world to-day is that goods do not exchange the one with the other upon a fair basis. That is true. The prices of some commodities are too high altogether in relation to other commodities. It prevents exchange, it destroys business. Now, you cannot long have wheat selling at $1 a bushel and flour at $10 a barrel; nor can you have leather or hides selling at low prices and boots and shoes at high prices. You cannot have cotton and wool almost unsaleable, or barely saleable, and cotton and woollen manufactured goods selling at high prices. One must go up and the other down or there will be disaster. It is impossible to have any sound commercial conditions when the primary products are low in price, and manufactured products abnormally high in price, and that is one of the present difficulties that confront agriculturists and producers of raw materials to-day. Wheat will not, for instance, buy for its producer a fair quantity of the goods of another producer. If this continues production will fall and prices will rise. The proper balance or equilibrium in the exchange values of goods with goods has been lost, and that it what we want to restore. But how to restore it is the question and the problem. Now, there is only one suggestion that one can make, and that is that in the industries which have not yet deflated, the controllers or managers should do all they possibly can to bring about that deflation. We cannot have prosperity in this country with a deflation in primary products and continued inflated prices in manufactured goods. The true prices of commodities are the prices that will permit them to freely exchange with other commodities. The right level of wages, the economic level, is that standard which will give men employment, and which will permit wage to exchange with wage or commodity with commodity, which is the same thing, on a fair exchange basis. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) in his budget speech, in referring to the conditions between labour and capital, had in mind, I think, this idea —if he had not, then I wish to make the suggestion myself—that there is a great opportunity for the leaders of industry and the employees of industry to render a service to their country and to their fellow-citizens at the present time In coming to a proper understanding as to wages, labour conditions and production. I think they owe to the public and their fellow-countrymen the duty of doing everything they possibly can towards bringing about a deflation in the prices of manufactured and semi-manufactured goods, so that they may exchange on an economic basis with the primary products of the country. If they fail to bring about that condition, the present commercial depression will continue. And no absolute power rests in governments or in Parliament to bring about that condition; it can be facilitated at least in the way I have suggested.

Mr. GOOD: The hon. member has expressed the desire that the prices of manufactured products should go down, but he does not seem to understand how this Government can have any control over deflation. I want to ask him if it is not reasonable to suppose that by a reduction in the tariff on, say, shoes, we can force the Canadian manufacturer of shoes to deflate his prices, just as well as we can—and perhaps better—by asking him to deflate them of his own free will.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax): I had not in mind merely the manufacturers, but of course my remarks, perforce, must apply to that line of production. What I say, however, is this, that in all lines of industry where there has not been deflation it should be brought about, and I urge that those engaged in industry, or large labour employing concerns, should do everything possible to secure that end. Now, as my hon. friend from Brant (Mr. Good) suggests, it is possible that the tariff might be utilized as a factor in that directon. There might, however, be difficulties at the present time in using the tariff as a lever in the way suggested. Take free trade in England to-day, where practically no tariff exists, and you find the same conditions prevailing there, or at least they did in a very marked degree a few months ago. I have though in mind the factors which enter into the situation outside of tariffs. I am appealing to individuals and not to governments. Perhaps the situation is less acute to-day, but a few months ago in England there was an abnormal disparity between commodity prices, and the problem that had been engaging the thought of public men and business men of England more than tariffs or anything else, was how to re-establish a true equilibrium in prices as between commodities and the true relation between commodities and prices.

Mr. FORKE: Would the hon. member for Halifax assert that there is any comparison whatever between the spread in England and in Canada to-day as between the price of wool and the prices of woollen goods? Does he contend that the two countries can be compared at all in this respect?

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax): I am not in a position to give an intelligent answer to my hon. friend offhand, but if the spread is not so great in England I am glad to know it, and perhaps I shall satisfy the hon. member by expressing the hope that the spread will diminish gradually in this country.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I must hasten to a close, as my remarks have extended far beyond the length I had intended. Before I resume my seat, however, I just wish to refer briefly to the amendment before the House. The amendment moved by the hon. member for York (Sir Henry Drayton) suggests failure on the part of the Government to implement its pledges; and the Progressive amendment, which was ruled out of order, contained a suggestion of the very same nature, and also stated that the principle of protection as a basis for a fiscal policy is not in the best interests of the country. I have been unable to see any practical good or any useful public purpose to be served by the amendment of the member for York. He seeks to enact a new political decalogue by moving his amendment to the budget.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I was not at the Liberal convention of 1919, for very good reasons—

Mr. McMASTER: And to our great regret.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax):—and had I presented myself there in the flesh I might have had some doubt as to the cordiality of my reception.

Mr. McMASTER: No, no, not the slightest.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax): But at any rate the convention proceeded without me and my absence mattered nothing. I agree with the general statement that political parties should live up to their public professions and their commitments as to policy. At the same time I think political parties should exercise very great care in giving pledges to the public but we must be practical in these matters. I have been in public life long enough to realize that it is better to be practical than theoretical about such matters. Party government is inevitable, but after all, though it is not the reign of saints, there is just as much morality and courage and adherence to principle in the world of parliament as in the world outside.

Not having been present when the Liberal platform of 1919 was being constructed, I may perhaps be allowed to stand off at a little distance and with no impropriety make some remarks concerning that platform. In my judgment political conventions—and they are a necessity at times—should only commit themselves to principles. Had I been present at that convention I would have protested, although perhaps without effect, against the designation of specific articles to be put upon the free list; the fixing exactly of rates of duties, in other words, I would have objected to a party convention attempting to do what should be left to the people's representatives in Parliament, that is, to carry out public policy in detail. I think everyone will agree with me in that. The Progressive party adopted a policy after the same fashion. I think that they also made a mistake, and I have not the slightest doubt that if I could take hon. gentlemen opposite beyond the green doors yonder one by one and put the question to them, they would say that it was a mistake for a political party in convention to commit itself to the details of public policy. I do not say that some of the articles mentioned in the Liberal platform or in the Progressive platform might not without disadvantage to any section of the community be placed upon the free list; but I do say that it is better for party conventions to declare themselves upon general principles, and leave to the people's representatives in Parliament the duty of saying how principles are to be worked out in their details.

I have never yet been able to understand why some people think it is so easy to revise a tariff vertically. I can understand its treatment horizontally, because then the action taken relates to whole classes of commodities and proper relationships are not destroyed. I am not saying that specific articles cannot be treated by themselves; I merely wish to suggest for the consideration of hon. gentlemen that once a country commits itself to the principle of protective tariffs, you rear a tariff structure of considerable complexity, and it is not as easy to take some timbers out of that structure as certain hon. gentlemen think. Further, you cannot always be sure that you get the best results in that way for the public generally. However, these remarks do not do away with the Liberal platform.

The present Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), when addressing the Liberal convention which nominated him as leader of his party, expressed the view that he would take the adopted platform as the chart and compass of the Liberal party. He was just putting out on the political sea, and I suppose it was only natural that he should employ nautical terms to express his ideas. I think he showed a good deal of pre-vision and political sagacity in making that statement. He is not in the position that he can be charged with having sought a variation of the party policy at a time subsequent to the convention, because his statement synchronized practically with his nomination as leader, and therefore I do not think he is open to criticism on that account. He expressed the thought and his adherents had in mind the idea that the tariff resolution contained within it a principle which was the essential matter and not the details of it nor the complexities of working it out.

And, during the campaign, I think, the Prime Minister's public utterances were consistent with the view which he expressed at the convention. The tariff changes which the Minister of Finance has brought down are not inconsistent in the vital principles with the Liberal platform of 1919. At least no one can argue that the compass is not pointing in the direction indicated by that convention.

An hon. MEMBER: It is only a flicker.

Mr. MACLEAN: At any rate the reductions made in the tariff indicate that the compass is pointing in the right direction. Had there been increases there might have been some justification for the criticism of the Liberal party and its leader, which has been made by hon. gentlemen directly opposite me. It must be remembered that the revision of a tariff which has in it the elements of protection is not a very easy task to accomplish, particularly at this time. If hon. gentlemen of the Progressive party were placed upon the ministerial benches to-morrow, they have admitted collectively, and many of them individually, that they could not abandon the tariff at once. So far all the differences in opinion is one of degree. The Government has been in office barely five months, and it does not seem to me quite fair to demand that in that short time they give full expression to what some sections of the country or certain individuals think should be done in the way of tariff revision. That would be too much to expect of any government, and particularly of any Minister of Finance, considering the short time which has elapsed since he and his colleagues came into office. I do not think that the practical people of this country can in justice claim that any extensive revision of the tariff could be expected at the present session. It is not a very easy matter to-day, considering the great confusion in trade and commerce the world over, to revise our tariff and know exactly what the effect of that revision will be. As I said at the opening of my remarks, it is difficult to see the incidence of taxation as proposed by the resolutions of the Minister of Finance. To-day, to-morrow, or the next day, he may ascertain that the effects of his amended resolutions are not what he expected them to be, and it is difficult to approximate or estimate the effects of fiscal policy or of public policy generally upon the world activities to-day, largely because of the political and economic confusion which prevails the world over.

The discussion of the amendments has brought forth the usual amount of talk about protection and free trade. I am inclined to think that too many people make a fetish of each of these theories of trade. For myself, I do not regard one as a virtue and the other as a sin. The hon. member for Brome (Mr. McMaster) remarks that he does think that one is a virtue and the other a vice. In principle one may be sound and the other unsound; I will go that far with my hon. friend. It is true that a protective tariff may help some people and hurt others. It is also true that there is a difference of opinion in this country upon the effect of tariffs. As I pointed out in the earlier part of my remarks, in some sections of this country you will find public opinion strongly in favour of protection. In my province you will find some support for the principle of protection, but on the other hand the majority I believe do not look for any great development that province in the future as a result of the adoption of the principle of protection. In fact, I will go so far as to say that I do not think it can be hoped that my province can be developed under a protective policy. At the same time as a part of the Confederation we must submit to the law in this regard as established by the majority. The minority cannot get just what they want in respect of tariffs or in respect of anything else; neither can the majority for that matter, because their demands are reduced as the result of opposition, and in the end, by compromise. I appreciate the fact that there is something to be said in some countries for the policy of protection, though I would not concur in it as a principle. Whether one believes in it or not, it is nevertheless a fact that in a young country which is without capital, large population, industrial experience or foreign markets, there is a desire to have diversity of industry so as to give scope to the imagination, the intelligence and the enterprise of its people. Whether right or wrong, that idea will exist in any new country, and it exists in this country, even in our western provinces. After all, protection is state aid; it is the doing of something to help some people at the expense of others, there is no doubt about that. If it did not do that, it would not be protection and nobody would want it. Very few protectionists to-day deny that. In my earlier days in political life every exponent of protection denied that the tariff exaction meant any increase in the price of commodities to consumers, but that is admitted to-day. Now, if the people of a country, in order to bring about diversification of industry or for any other reason, adopt tariffs as a national policy, it is there, and once adopted it cannot be got rid of in a moment. We all agree to that,—Progressives, Liberals and Conservatives alike. We all agree also, I think, that free trade is not a possible public policy in this country to-day. Not a single hon. member of this House, so far as I know, has given expression to that view. In fact, many members of the party directly opposite me, the chief exponents of low tariff in this Parliament, have stated time and time again during the past few weeks that we cannot now have free trade in this country. So therefore that is not in issue. The war has settled the matter; this country cannot for many years to come have free trade as they have it in England. We will require a tariff for revenue purposes at least, because it will not be possible for the Government to get in any other way the revenues which it requires. We have not accumulated reserves of wealth in this country from which we can get the needed revenue. We are young in development; there has been no great national saving as yet which could be the source of sufficient revenue for the nation's needs through an income tax.

I confess that one reason why I have not been antagonistic to the idea of a tariff in this country is the fact that the great nation to the south of us have always put up against us exceedingly high tariffs, frequently to prevent fair trade between Canada and the United States, —at least, I have got that impression. I am not going so far as to say that it is economically sound for us to give heed to the tariff legislation of the United States. If free trade theoretically is right, I suppose in the end we might disregard the actions of that country from time to time in respect of tariffs. But every practical man must admit that to take down the Canadian tariff and leave this country open to the American producer would bring about so sudden a change in the economic life of Canada that consequences would ensue which might be quite disastrous in their character. As to that, one cannot tell; but I think I express the view of this country as a whole—of protectionists, free traders, and fair traders—that in the circumstances, in view of our geographical relation to the United States, in view of the tariff policy of that country, frequently designed against us, we cannot embark upon a policy of free trade here. I doubt if in the ranks of hon. gentlemen opposite or in any other section of this country you could find a very substantial body of opinion to the effect that we should go so far in that direction as to leave the Canadian market absolutely open to American productions, and to place this country in such a position that she would have at her disposal no economic weapon to employ in dealing with a country whose tariff legislation is not, we feel, always wise from their own standpoint, or fair and favourable to us from the viewpoint of our material interests. I should, however, like to see freer trade relations between the two countries.

Now, I have taken some time to give to the House a rough idea of the varying economic interests of the different sections of Canada. I think it is fair to say that in the circumstances a compromise upon fiscal policy as between those different sections of the country is inevitable. I trust that some common ground can be worked out, fairly acceptable to all.

I have not the slightest doubt, Mr. Speaker, as the leader of the Progressive party (Mr. Crerar) intimated when speaking in this debate, that the thought of the world to-day is in the direction of lower tariffs. I think that is true of the United States. You cannot read the utterances of their princes of commerce, their leading merchants, bankers and economists, their boards of trade and chambers of commerce, during the last few months in the eastern part of the United States, where the Republican party has always been strong, without reaching the conclusion that the leaders of thought in the United States believe in the reduction of tariffs in that country, and that hereafter she must give more liberty and freedom to the importation of foreign products.

Mr. HANSON: Is the hon. member able to point his finger to one single leader of public opinion in the political world of the United States who has come out and avowed himself in favour of a lower tariff?

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax): I do not know that I could mention the name of a political leader in the United States whose views upon the tariff issue I could quote to my hon. friend. I am sure that I would be very much impressed one way or the other with the opinions of political leaders in the United States, because, the actions of a majority of them at least in recent days would not indicate to me that their viewpoint was sound. I can say this, however, that the dominant note in the industrial, commercial and financial life of the eastern section of the United States to-day is in the direction of lower tariffs. And of necessity that must be. The commerce of the United States is depressed to-day. Why? Because she is not exporting the surpluses which she is producing. How does that happen? Because she is not importing goods. She cannot expect other countries to buy goods of her unless she buys goods of them; there is no other way, which human beings know of to pay for goods except by goods. Money is not a factor in it at all. Gold may be used, it is true, in the settlement of small international balances, but large international balances as a rule cannot be settled in gold, and then you have a depreciation in currency. We could not settle one hundred dollars worth of international adverse trade in gold, because we haven't got it. What little we have cannot be exported. The United States is a great creditor nation, and they cannot export unless they import, and they cannot live, economically, in the future unless they import very much more largely than they have been doing in the past.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Is Canada a great creditor nation as the hon. member has described the United States to be?

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax): No.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Then does not the hon. member's argument apply in the reverse?

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax): Before the war the balance of trade was rather against the United States, but it was made up by her borrowings from abroad, because even in 1914 she was a heavy borrower from other countries of the world. The United States government did not borrow but the people of the United States borrowed from the people of other countries. To-day the United States is making investments abroad, placing heavy loans in almost every country in the world, and how can she receive payment of interest except in goods? There is no other way to receive payment of heavy amounts of interest. She must import.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The hon. member knows so well, that is the reason I am asking. Will he not admit that Canada is in precisely the opposite position to that in which the United States has been since 1892? Canada is a debtor nation with large payments of interest to make, and consequently not requiring to import on an equality with her exports.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax): In one sense Canada's position is different from that of the United States, because she is not a loaning nation, but, nevertheless, it is just as true of us that we must grow as an exporting country if we are going to take care of our great public debt and continue to be able to raise the necessary annual revenue for our public requirements. It is also true that we cannot export unless we import. Our exports, as I have said, must pay for our imports, of raw cotton for instance, rubber, wood, and many other things. I know what is in the hon. gentleman's mind. We perhaps cannot travel as fast as the United States can, but, nevertheless, it can be said truthfully of this country as of all other countries, that if by mutual arrangement our commodities could be exchanged freely for those of other countries, it would be better for the countries concerned.

5 p.m.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Will the hon. member permit one or two questions more, because I think it is worth while? Will he say that with Canada having to pay annually over $2,000,000 of interest to the outside world, we require in order to pay our debts to import as much as we export, or that we even can import as much as we export?

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax): Canada's exports, of course, should exceed her imports in commodities as much as possible, because we must remit abroad for services and for interest and we can only do this by exports.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Hear, hear.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax): But, after all, it matters little whether your imports are commodities, money or securities; they must balance your exports. International transactions are no different from private transactions in that respect; they must balance. It is either money or commodities which people deal in. That is all that business consists of; that is all that international commerce means, and all that domestic commerce means; and in the end the whole thing ultimately means merely exchange of commodities. I fail to see the distinction my right hon. friend has in mind. I think he is wrong, entirely wrong.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The hon. gentleman has argued that I was right.
