FIRST SESSION—THIRTY-SECOND PARLIAMENT

[English]

The Thirty-first Parliament having been dissolved by proclamation on Friday, December 14, 1979, and writs having been issued and returned, a new Parliament was summoned to meet for the dispatch of business on Monday, April 14, 1980, and did accordingly meet on that day.

Monday, April 14, 1980

This being the day on which Parliament is convoked by proclamation of His Excellency the Governor General of Canada for the dispatch of business, and the members of the House being assembled:

Marcel R. Pelletier, Esquire, the Clerk Assistant of the House of Commons, read to the House a letter from the administrative secretary to the Governor General informing him that the Honourable Bora Laskin, Chief Justice of Canada, in his capacity as Deputy Governor General, would proceed to the Senate chamber to open the first session of the Thirty-second Parliament of Canada on Monday, the 14th April, at 9.30 o'clock.

A message was delivered by Colonel T. G. Bowie, Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod, as follows:

Members of the House of Commons:

It is the desire of the Honourable the Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General of Canada that this honourable House attend him immediately in the chamber of the honourable the Senate.

Accordingly, the House went up to the Senate chamber, when the Speaker of the Senate said:

Honourable members of the Senate,
Members of the House of Commons:

I have it in command to let you know that His Excellency the Governor General of Canada does not see fit to declare the causes of his summoning the present Parliament of Canada until a Speaker of the House of Commons shall have been chosen, according to law; but this morning at the hour of 10.45 o'clock His Excellency will declare the causes of his calling Parliament.

ELECTION OF SPEAKER

HON. JEANNE SAUVÉ, MEMBER FOR THE ELECTORAL DISTRICT OF LAVAL-DES-RAPIDES

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Pelletier, on this first opportunity to meet in the Thirty-second Parliament, I am sure all hon. members would wish to join me in extending our very best wishes for a speedy recovery to the Clerk of the House of Commons, Dr. Koester, who underwent surgery two weeks ago. I understand he is making excellent progress and, thanks to our television facilities, he will be watching our proceedings today with his usual keen interest.

Our business this morning, sir, is perhaps the most important collective decision our parties can make in the life of a Parliament. The choice by members of one of their peers to guide the House of Commons is really second only in importance to the choice Canadians make when they elect their own representatives. The confidence placed in the Speaker by all members is vital to the operation of this House and to the manner in which it discharges its responsibilities to the electors.

Today, as we make our choice, we also make history in this chamber. For the first time, the Canadian House of Commons is being invited to choose a woman to hold this high position.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: This task is a fresh and welcome one in a new Parliament which ushers in a new decade.

[Translation]

While our candidate for Speaker today has unique significance as the first woman, the hon. member for Laval-des-Rapides also brings to the position the tradition of quality to which this House has become accustomed in her predecessors. Her experience in a highly successful career in Canadian broadcasting, on the political hustings, in the federal cabinet and in Parliament for more than seven years all combine to offer this House much more than procedural expertise. Our hon. friend is a fighter—a fighter for fair play; for the free expression of opinion and extension of knowledge; for compromise and the judgment of common sense over emotion. She is also a fighter in the front lines for her country. And all this is done with a combination of determination, patience and grace. That description, Mr. Pelletier, seems to me a fitting job description for one who would sit as the moderator of our debates in this chamber.

[English]

It therefore gives me immense pleasure and pride to move, seconded by the right hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark), that Jeanne Sauvé, member for the electoral district of Laval-des-Rapides, do take the chair of this House as Speaker.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

● (1005)

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Pelletier, first of all I wish to say that, together with my party, I echo the wishes the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) has expressed concerning Dr. Koester. We all hope that he will be with us again soon and return to carry out his duties as Clerk of the House of Commons.

[English]

I am very pleased and honoured to second the nomination of the hon. member for Laval-des-Rapides (Madam Sauvé) to the position of Speaker of this House of Commons.

As you know, Mr. Pelletier, and as hon. members of the House know, it was not very long ago that we went through a similar ceremony. I can certainly say that some of us would have preferred not to have repeated the procedure with quite this rapidity. That is, nonetheless, the way of democratic elections in this country, and we are very well served by the nomination made by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) which I am honoured to second.

As custodian of the rights and the privileges of all hon. members of the House of Commons—and, indeed, as the custodian of the rights of Parliament itself—the Speaker occupies a significant and central role in the functioning of our democracy. Naturally, there are certain qualities and requirements which the nature of the job itself demands of the person elected to this position. A thorough knowledge of the rules, orders and precedents of this House is essential, as is fluency in both of our official languages. Great amounts of patience, courage, wisdom, firmness and compassion are all needed in maintaining order during the heat of debate and in arbitrating parliamentary problems. Needless to say, a sense of proportion and a sense of humour will be great assets.

More fundamental and important than all of these, however, is the Speaker's ability to exercise rigorous and scrupulous impartiality in all matters. The Speaker is the servant of the whole House, not just the governing party, and is duty bound to abandon all traces of normal party affiliation and thereby practice and achieve an impartial and judicious rule. Only in this way can the respect and good will of the House be maintained and democracy well served.

[Translation]

During her many years in the House, the elected member for Laval-des-Rapides demonstrated considerable interest in all the problems Parliament and Canada had to face, and she was very active both as a member of the House and minister. As the right hon. Prime Minister indicated, she had a distinguished career as a journalist and is highly respected everywhere in Canada.

[English]

I have no doubt that Madam Sauvé is fully cognizant of the onerous responsibilities that we are asking her to assume, responsibilities which may well weigh more heavily upon her in this House and in this period of the nation's history than was the case with her predecessors. I am confident, however, that Madam Sauvé possesses sufficient of the qualities needed for the Speakership and will serve this House with honour and distinction. I, therefore, have no hesitation, and indeed am deeply honoured to second the nomination of the hon. member for Laval-des-Rapides, hon. Jeanne Sauvé, as Speaker of this Thirty-second Parliament of Canada.

● (1010)

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Mr. Pelletier, I would like to begin by expressing, on behalf of all my colleagues, the very warmest wishes to Dr. Koester for a speedy and complete recovery from his unfortunate operation.

[Translation]

Mr. Pelletier, on behalf of my colleagues, I wish also to congratulate the hon. member for Laval-des-Rapides (Madam Sauvé) on her nomination as Speaker of the House of Commons. I am sure that because of her many years of experience as a parliamentarian she is very well suited for her new duties. The office of Speaker of the House of Commons is most important, because the Speaker is responsible for the spirit of fairness and impartiality which must prevail in all our proceedings.

[English]

It is, therefore, in our self-interest on both sides of this House to wish her well. I do so with even greater emphasis today because she is the first woman in Canadian history to assume the honour and responsibility of being Speaker in the House of Commons of Canada. We wish her well, indeed.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

The Clerk Assistant of the House of Commons declared the motion carried in the affirmative, nemine contradicente, and Jeanne Sauvé, member for the electoral district of Laval-des-Rapides, duly elected to the chair of the House.

Madam Sauvé was conducted from her seat in the House to the Speaker's chair by Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau and Right Hon. Joe Clark.

[Translation]

Madam Speaker: Hon. members, I want to express to the House my humble thanks for the honour it has kindly conferred upon me by choosing me as Speaker.

[English]

Hon. members, I beg to return my humble acknowledgements to the House for the honour which it has been pleased to confer upon me by choosing me to be Speaker.

[Translation]

Like my illustrious predecessor, whom I take pleasure in thanking on your behalf, I am acutely aware of my responsibility, and that of each and every member of the House, for seeing to it that the voice of the citizens we represent is heard in this House.

It is through you that the country as a whole expresses itself, and it is Parliament which most completely reflects the aspirations of the whole nation. My responsibility is merely to ensure that everyone can speak freely, without constraints. The rules, whose respect I must secure, must serve one purpose only: that of enhancing freedom of speech, the very foundation of parliamentary democracy.

I take up that heavy task in all humility, aware of my limitations, and endeavouring to delineate exactly what role you are asking me to play so that this assembly can toil for the greater good of Canada as a whole.

● (1015)

[English]

You will have noticed that neither the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) nor the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) applied all the force that is customary when putting a Speaker in the chair. Perhaps that is because I did not hesitate as much as I should have, knowing only too well that when this House expresses its will, no hon. member—least of all this one—would dare to escape what is so obviously a duty.

Nevertheless, I approach this awesome responsibility with true humility. The honour which is accorded to this office is such as to sustain the authority of any incumbent, weak or strong alike, and it is from this that I draw my confidence, as I do from your indulgence and your good will which I know, in turn, I will have to earn. But for the time being I am sure that I can count on your co-operation and your knowledge of our rules so that this Parliament can be an efficient and harmonious one.

I thank the right hon. Prime Minister for his graciousness in announcing my designation, and I am grateful to him today for having proposed me, as I am to the right hon. Leader of the Opposition and to the Leader of the NDP (Mr. Broadbent) for having supported me.

[Translation]

I thank all hon. members for their support and I assure them of my wholehearted co-operation. I express the wish that, together, we can work under the eye of our fellow citizens for the unity of our country and the defence of democratic freedoms. In addition, I want to thank my electors of Laval-des-Rapides who were the first to trust me and who even now, I hope, will still support me in my new responsibilities. May I be allowed, despite the solemnity of the occasion, and perhaps because of it, to thank my husband and my son for their support, day by day, without which nothing in my political commitment would have been possible.

[English]

SITTING SUSPENDED

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I suggest, Madam Speaker, that this sitting be suspended until eleven o'clock this morning.

Madam Speaker: The House has heard the suggestion of the right hon. Prime Minister. Is it agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Madam Speaker: This House stands suspended until eleven o'clock this morning.

At 10.20 a.m. the sitting was suspended until 11 a.m. this day.

OPENING OF THE SESSION

Madam Speaker read a communication from the Governor General's Secretary announcing that His Excellency the Governor General of Canada would proceed to the Senate chamber at eleven o'clock on this day for the purpose of formally opening the session of the Dominion Parliament.

A message was delivered by Colonel T. G. Bowie, Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod, as follows:

Mr. Speaker, it is the pleasure of His Excellency the Governor General of Canada that this honourable House attend him immediately in the chamber of the honourable the Senate.

Accordingly, Madam Speaker with the House went up to the Senate chamber. Then the Hon. Jeanne Sauvé, Speaker of the House of Commons, said:

May it please Your Excellency,

The House of Commons have elected me their Speaker, though I am but little able to fulfil the important duties thus assigned to me.

If in the performance of those duties I should at any time fall into error, I pray that the fault may be imputed to me, and not to the Commons, whose servant I am, and who, through me, the better to enable them to discharge their duty to their Queen and country, humbly claim all their undoubted rights and privileges, especially that they may have freedom of speech in their debates, access to Your Excellency's person at all seasonable times, and that their proceedings may receive from Your Excellency the most favourable construction.

The Honourable the Speaker of the Senate, addressing the Honourable the Speaker of the House of Commons, then said:

Madam Speaker, I am commanded by His Excellency the Governor General of Canada to declare to you that he freely confides in the duty and attachment of the House of Commons to Her Majesty's person and government, and not doubting that their proceedings will be conducted with wisdom, temper and prudence, he grants and upon all occasions will recognize and allow their constitutional privileges.

I am commanded also to assure you that the Commons shall have ready access to His Excellency upon all seasonable occasions, and that their proceedings, as well as your words and actions, will constantly receive from him the most favourable construction.

Then His Excellency the Governor General of Canada was pleased to open Parliament by a speech from the throne.

● (1200)

And the House being returned to the Commons chamber:

Madam Speaker: I have the honour to report that the House having attended on His Excellency the Governor General in the Senate chamber, I informed His Excellency that the choice of Speaker had fallen upon me and, in your names and on your behalf, I made the usual claim for your privileges, which His Excellency was pleased to confirm to you.

OATHS OF OFFICE

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-1, respecting the administration of oaths of office.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

Madam Speaker: I have the honour to inform the House that when the House did attend His Excellency the Governor General this day in the Senate chamber, His Excellency was pleased to make a speech to both Houses of Parliament. To prevent mistakes, I have obtained a copy, which is as follows:

Honourable Members of the Senate:

Members of the House of Commons:

I have the honour to welcome you to the First Session of the Thirty-second Parliament of Canada.

During the course of the last few weeks, both my wife and I have come through a period of convalescence and I take this opportunity to express our deep gratitude for the good wishes we received from fellow-Canadians from all parts of the country.

Canada recently received the visit of The Prince of Wales, who undertook engagements in Vancouver and Victoria two weeks ago. In May, The Duke of Edinburgh will attend the Fifth Commonwealth Study Conference which opens in Kingston on May 18. In July, Princess Margaret will take part in celebrations marking the seventy-fifth anniversary of the entry into confederation of the provinces of Saskatchewan and Alberta.

Canada has very close and enduring ties with The Netherlands and I am greatly looking forward to representing our country at the accession to the Throne of Her Royal Highness Princess Beatrix of The Netherlands in Amsterdam on April 30.

I have had the pleasure of visiting all the provincial capitals and the Northwest Territories during my first year in office. My wife and I are now looking forward to certain engagements in the Yukon and in smaller communities across our vast and beautiful land. Discovering Canada and meeting Canadians increases daily our awareness of the great natural and human resources of the country in which we are privileged to live.

We observe today not only the beginning of a new Parliament but the start of a new era. As Canada enters the 1980s, we confront serious challenges, but we look forward to even greater opportunities. Like our forebears, this generation of Canadians will be equal to the test. We will meet and overcome the challenges ahead for the history of this land has proven, again and again, that everything is possible if our will to go on building together is strong.

Canadians expect much of this Parliament. The country asks for action and action now. The first task is to clear the accumulation of essential legislation left from previous Parliaments. This backlog must be dispatched expeditiously so that the affairs of the state may be put in good order. To that end, my government is relying on the good will of members and senators of all parties.

This Parliament must also act quickly to put in place a program for the future. In the recent general election, my ministers received a mandate for a program which will provide security, equity, and opportunity for the Canada of the 1980s. In the course of that campaign, my ministers made a number of pledges which will form the core of this Parliament's work. You will be asked to consider a program of action designed:

—to respond to individual needs by promoting greater security for the elderly, expanded opportunities for the young, and equality for women;

—to achieve security of energy supply at a fair price for all Canadians;

—to promote a national development policy that will provide jobs, stimulate growth, build upon regional strengths, and increase Canadian ownership and control of our economy;

—to strengthen national institutions, while at the same time making them more responsive to provincial and regional goals;

—to ensure that Canada plays a vigorous part in the world beyond our borders.

All these commitments will be kept; these pledges redeemed; the mandate fulfilled.

The character of our people should inspire confidence in the ability of Canada to meet the challenges of the 1980s. We have the capacity and the imagination to make this a decade of opportunity rather than a decade of doubt. But there is one question which clouds the horizon and obstructs the view. It is the question of the unity of our country.

Will Canada still exist as a country at the end of this decade, or will it have been broken up by the tensions of our past and recent history? Will we continue to build our future together as Canadians, or will we give in to the siren song of regional isolationism?

In every part of Canada there are forces which are driving us apart rather than bringing us together. Canada's tradition is one of sharing, but in every region this principle is under assault. In the Atlantic, disadvantaged for so long, the promise of new resource riches has already led to squabbles about their future distribution. In central Canada there are some who fear that the economic strength of this region is somehow slipping away, and this in turn has led to envy and bitterness. In the west, many believe that their problems are ignored, their voices are unheard, and their contribution is unrecognized.

To all these forces of discontent my government has one clear response. Canada will endure, grow and prosper. The men and women of this country have always realized that their participation in a society that spans the northern half of North America is infinitely more exciting and enriching than confining themselves in any one province or one region. The renewed federalism, to which my government makes a fundamental and all-embracing commitment, will not only strengthen individual and collective rights and freedoms, it will also ensure that Canada remains:

—a strong country, with first claim on the loyalty of all its citizens;

—a country that regards diversity as an asset, not a liability;

—a country whose people share their wealth first with those who need it most;

—a country that encourages initiative, welcomes daring, and promotes enterprise;

—a country which opens its eyes, its mind, and its heart to the larger community of nations, refusing to regard its own national borders as the outward limits of the universe.

Doubt must be cast aside, uncertainty must end, the forces of disintegration—whether they be economic or political in origin—must be opposed in every part of the land. That is why my government hopes that the referendum, to be held in Quebec some time during the coming weeks, will be a time when Quebeckers affirm their will and their right to be fully Canadian, a time when all Canadians will reaffirm their desire to live together in the country to which we all belong, and which belongs to all of us.

Because my government wants to strengthen the spirit of Canadian unity and nurture the seeds of renewal, it promises to interpret a vote of No to sovereignty-association as a vote for the rebuilding of the Canadian federation. My government also promises to give effect to a No vote by mobilizing all the forces at its command in order to ensure the renewal of the federation in a spirit of respect and justice for all.

I. Putting People First

Canadians are a sensible people. They understand that these are difficult economic times throughout the world. They know too that Canada cannot insulate itself completely from the effects of global inflation coupled with recession. In responding to these turbulent conditions, my government will be guided by the two main principles at the core of the program my ministers placed before the people.

The first is that Canadians will accept sacrifice to meet the economic challenges of the 1980s, but they will not accept injustice. Canadians have always faced up to difficult decisions—and if necessary they will do so in the future—but only if the burden is shared equitably.

The second principle is equally critical. Canadians recognize the need to live within their national means and they understand that in doing so the state cannot meet every demand or satisfy every group. Therefore, in employing the limited resources available, my ministers will help first those who need help most.

In particular, my government recognizes the need to protect those Canadians most affected by unacceptably high interest rates. My government will act to assist those unable to bear the burden of renegotiating their home mortgages in the present abnormal situation so that the spectre of foreclosure will be avoided. My ministers are convinced that this objective can be achieved without the government embarking upon a major subsidy program. Farmers and small businessmen are also hit especially hard by rising costs, and my government is sensitive to their plight. To assist the individual entrepreneur, the ceiling for loans under the Small Businesses Loans Act and the Farm Improvement Loans Act will be raised to $100,000. Other measures of assistance will also be introduced.

Inflation strikes hardest at the old and those least able to take care of themselves. You will be asked to give urgent consideration to legislation raising the Guaranteed Income Supplement to the Old Age Security pension by $35 a month per household by July 1 of this year. This measure will primarily benefit single pensioners, the vast majority of whom are women. By fulfilling this commitment, Parliament will be providing needed assistance to over 1.3 million elderly Canadians.

Beyond providing immediate relief for elderly people with low incomes, my government intends to convene a National Pension Conference in the fall of 1980. Work must begin immediately to design better methods of providing flexible, portable, and secure pensions both in the private and public sectors. To start this process, my government will soon release a major study on the Canadian pension system.

One of the essential objectives of this government is to put more people to work. Young people, women, natives, and the handicapped face special problems in finding jobs. To meet the needs of these groups, my government will expand its employment program while using its resources more efficiently. There will be an increased effort to develop critical trade skills so as to better prepare today's labour force for tomorrow's jobs.

Expanding native opportunities and training women for new occupations will receive strong emphasis.

Members of Parliament will have a major role in advising on the selection of job creation projects, and my government will enter into a new partnership with voluntary agencies and local organizations in a program of community service.

Additional attention will be paid to the employment problems of the handicapped whose special difficulties cross all regional, sexual, and cultural boundaries. Amendments to protect the rights of the handicapped will be made to the Human Rights Act.

The role of women in Canadian society is undergoing marked improvement, and government initiatives must reflect and support that change. As a major employer in Canada, my government will play a leadership role by implementing affirmative action measures in the public service. My government believes that there is no room in Canada for sexual discrimination of any kind.

The serious problem of violence against women will also be addressed along with other amendments to the Criminal Code, and efforts will be made in concert with the provincial and territorial governments to improve health and social services for women who are victims of violence. It is time, too, to move cannabis offences to the Food and Drugs Act and remove the possibility of imprisonment for simple possession.

II. Security of Energy, at a Fair Price

My government's energy policy is critical to the success of all its economic policies. Energy policy is as important for Canada in the 1980s as railway policy was in the 1880s. Like railway policy in that earlier era, energy development has the potential to create growth and prosperity across Canada.

My government believes that the price of oil in Canada must be based upon Canadian conditions and circumstances, and not upon the vagaries of a turbulent and unpredictable world market. We need a made in Canada price. A new blended price will therefore be established, which will progressively incorporate the costs of the Oil Import Compensation Program, while at the same time maintaining a single national price for consumers. The blended price will reflect the right of producing provinces and corporations to a fair return for their resources and their investment.

Discussions have already begun with the governments of the producing provinces and will be vigorously pursued toward an agreement consistent with my government's energy policy commitment, as endorsed by the people of Canada. My ministers do not intend to impose an 18-cent increase in the excise tax on transportation fuels, and the made in Canada price will result in a lower price to consumers than the one proposed in the budget of the previous administration.

A Petroleum Price Auditing Agency will be established to investigate and report to the government and people of Canada on oil company costs, profits, capital expenditures, and levels of Canadian ownership.

In spite of Canada's large energy resources, which put this country in the extremely favourable position of being a major energy exporter, we remain partially dependent upon imported oil. My government is determined to reduce that dependence by promoting conservation and by stimulating the production of new domestic energy supplies.

To improve conservation of oil and gasoline in transportation, you will be asked to approve legislation setting mandatory fuel efficiency standards for automobiles. Measures will also be introduced to encourage higher standards of home insulation, and the existing home insulation program will be improved.

In co-operation with provincial governments, other steps will be taken to encourage more rapid substitution from oil to other energy sources in order to substantially reduce the significance of oil in meeting our energy needs. Policies will be introduced to encourage consumers to switch from oil to natural gas or electricity for home heating. My government equally favors the earliest possible construction of a natural gas pipeline to Quebec City and the maritime provinces, and awaits with interest the report of the National Energy Board on this project.

Petro-Canada will be maintained and expanded as an instrument of public policy. My government has already increased the budget of the corporation by $80 million this year, and our national oil company will also receive a renewed mandate to engage vigorously in oil purchase negotiations and agreements with foreign suppliers.

You will be asked to approve a new Canada Oil and Gas Act, which will provide new preferential rights for Petro-Canada and other Canadian companies on federal lands, and establish new and more demanding requirements for exploration and development of these promising frontier areas.

An alternative energy corporation will be created with a mandate to stimulate the development of new and renewable energy sources to replace oil.

My ministers believe that, if given the opportunity, Canadian companies and investors would involve themselves more heavily in the energy field. My government, therefore, adopts the specific goal of at least 50 per cent Canadian ownership of the petroleum industry by 1990, and will soon take the first steps to achieve this objective.

III. Developing our Economic Potential

Canada's resource base will be used as the basic building block of a vigourous industrial policy. A paramount objective of my ministers is to develop economic policies that will provide jobs, spur growth, improve regional balance, and promote Canadian ownership and control of the economy.

It is the intention of my ministers to continue the policies of expenditure restraint and improved government administration which were suggested by the Lambert report and initiated by the previous Liberal administration. My government will reduce the federal deficit in a planned and orderly manner, but not to the exclusion of other objectives such as reducing unemployment and promoting industrial growth. Improving the efficiency of the federal government is as important an objective of these reforms as reducing the deficit. My ministers believe that Canadians want more effective government, not necessarily less government.

Food and agriculture are going to be increasingly important to the Canadian economy in the 1980s. To further strengthen the industry, my government plans to create a Canadian Agricultural Export Corporation to expand markets for Canadian producers. A meat import act will be introduced to protect both consumers and producers.

Transportation is a vital part of industrial strategy. My government will ensure that the Canadian transportation system has the capacity to meet the economic challenges of the 1980s. My government regards the production, transportation, handling, and marketing of prairie grain as a national priority. Rail facilities will be upgraded, and port facilities improved. You will also be asked to consider, on an urgent basis, legislation concerning the transportation of dangerous goods.

In the fisheries sector, Canada's harvest is expected to increase substantially in the years ahead. To ensure the maximum return to fishermen and fish-processing companies, my government will undertake major initiatives to further enhance the quality of fish products and to ensure orderly marketing.

Licensing regulations will be changed to permit fishermen to benefit fully from the resources of the 200-mile zone, and legislation will be introduced to guarantee adequate investment in the fishing sector through partial cost recovery and reinvestment of enhanced earnings. To further assist fishermen, the ceiling for individual loans under the Fisheries Improvement Loans Act will be raised to $150,000.

Canada's capabilities in science and technology lie at the heart of our competitiveness as a trading nation. My government will encourage more young people to pursue a career in research through a new technology employment program, and will encourage and insist that industry do more research and development work in Canada. My government reaffirms its commitment to increase Canada's over-all expenditures on research and development to 1.5 per cent of the value of the gross national product.

To improve the ability of Canadian industry to compete abroad in order to create jobs at home, my government will establish a national trading company. My government also intends to make assistance programs more accessible to small business, to simplify application procedures, and to better co-ordinate programs.

To improve our system of collective bargaining, a Labour Information Bureau will be created to provide an impartial clearing house for the statistics and data required for negotiations. A fresh start will be made in the labour management relations of the Post Office by turning that department into a Crown corporation.

My ministers believe that the stake of Canadians in their own economic destiny must be strengthened. Government procurement will be used vigorously, in a manner consistent with our international commitments, to encourage the creation and expansion of independent Canadian-owned enterprises.

The Foreign Investment Review Act will be amended to provide for performance reviews of how large foreign firms are meeting the test of bringing substantial benefits to Canada. As well, amendments will be introduced to ensure that major acquisition proposals by foreign companies will be publicized prior to a government decision on their acceptability. The government will assist Canadian companies wishing to repatriate assets or to bid for ownership or control of companies subject to takeover offers by non-Canadians.

IV. Strengthening National Institutions

To increase the confidence of Canadians that their national institutions can respond effectively to their needs, my government will propose a program to make Parliament both more efficient and more responsive.

You will be asked to appoint a committee of Parliament to examine the electoral system in order to ensure that the highest degree of representativeness and responsibility is achieved and that the confidence of Canadians in parliamentary institutions is strengthened.

As part of its commitment to renewed federalism, my government will revive the process of constitutional reform. My ministers are committed to the full development of Canada's two major linguistic communities and to the enhancement of our mosaic of cultures. My government will seek to constitutionally entrench a bill of civil and human rights, including language rights.

Members of Parliament, whatever their party, agree on the need to guarantee to Canadians greater access to information of concern to them. Freedom of information legislation will be introduced to provide wide access to government documents. The right accorded to ministers to withhold government documents from courts of law under Section 41(2) of the Federal Court Act will be removed.

Legislation will also be presented to extend the rights of access by individuals to their personal information held by the government and to provide greater protection for privacy by further restricting the use that may be made of that information.

Also, in response to the recommendations of the Marin commission, the RCMP Act will be amended to formalize internal discipline and grievance procedures, and to provide for an external authority to review public complaints about the behaviour of any member of the RCMP.

It is my government's hope that these measures will serve in the years ahead as a fundamental bond of trust between government and people.

V. An Active Foreign Policy

My government takes office against the most sombre international background of recent years. Events in Iran and Afghanistan have done great damage to international laws and institutions and undermined confidence and stability.

In response, my government intends to conduct an active foreign policy. Canada will rely upon its strong ties of friendship throughout the world. Part of our international response must be a determination to increase the ability of the NATO alliance to provide security for its members and to advance the cause of peace, and my government is committed to doing its full part. In keeping with that commitment, my government has decided to proceed with the purchase of a new fighter aircraft.

But while recognizing the need for Canada to strengthen alliance security, the dangers of nuclear holocaust cannot simply be forgotten. If anything, these dangers are heightened by current tensions and by the continuation of the arms race. Canada's imperative is clear. This government must continue its strategy to suffocate the deadly growth in the nuclear arsenals of the world. We must, and we will, actively co-operate in international efforts to negotiate agreements on verifiable means of arms control and disarmament, and seek to rally others to a cause that is no less than human survival on this planet. To assist in this process, a new position of Ambassador for Disarmament will be created within the Department of External Affairs.

Before concluding, I address a special message to members of the House of Commons from the three westernmost provinces.

It has been said in recent weeks that the three westernmost provinces have no elected voice in the governing of this country. That is not true. Parliament is the supreme law-making assembly of Canada, and every Canadian is represented in the House of Commons by his or her duly elected member.

Like all of your colleagues in the House of Commons, you who represent the people of Saskatchewan, Alberta and British Columbia, have a responsibility to represent your constituents to the nation. You also have an extra responsibility in the present circumstances to represent the nation to your constituents. It is a task no one else can fulfil. My government is prepared to co-operate fully in helping you to achieve this.

Members of the House of Commons:

You will be asked to appropriate the funds required to carry on the services and expenditures authorized by Parliament.

Honourable Members of the Senate:

Members of the House of Commons:

May Divine Providence guide you in your deliberations.

SITTING RESUMED

The House resumed at 2 p.m.

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

ADDRESS IN REPLY, MOVED BY MRS. ÉVA CÔTÉ AND SECONDED BY MR. DOUG FRITH

The House proceeded to the consideration of the speech delivered by His Excellency the Governor General.

Mrs. Eva Côté (Rimouski): Madam Speaker, in my opening remarks, may I extend my respects to His Excellency the Governor General and his wife who are both vivid symbols of the vitality of this nation. My profound admiration also goes to our new Speaker and it is a feeling I cannot keep for myself especially in the present circumstances. Surely, when it comes to the rights of remote areas and their inhabitants, eastern Quebec's communities will find themselves well represented here in the person of this tireless defender of our ideals of justice, in this bulwark of awareness. In addressing myself to you, Madam Speaker, I most particularly wish to convey to you my gratefulness for your attitude which, if I may say to our collegues, is perhaps not unrelated to my presence in this House.

By granting the privilege of moving the Address in Reply to the Speech from the Throne to the member for Rimouski-Témiscouata, the Prime Minister and his cabinet colleagues inspire me with a great deal of respect for this gesture on their part and this demonstration of their obvious interest for the citizens of Rimouski and Témiscouata who have displayed their unswerving trust in me during the last federal election.

I also want to salute my many colleagues who, both during the election campaign and since my coming to Parliament, have, in a spirit of true generosity tried to understand the precise meaning of the repeated, sometimes noisy and certainly continuous interventions voiced for too many years by the representatives of the regional capital of the lower St. Lawrence. The Rimouski-Témiscouata constituency is bordered on the north by the St. Lawrence. Its neighbour to the west is Kamouraska-Rivière-du-Loup and to the east, Matapédia-Matane. It shares its southern border with New Brunswick and Maine. It encompasses and exemplifies the ways and characteristics of those regions whose people are filled with a necessary spirit of vitality and a form of assertive pride which we will more simply call dignity. The temperament of these people is a product of historical, geographic and sometimes political circumstances. Believe me, it took much determination on their part to reconcile their patriotic love of that beautiful part of the country and their reason for living with all the means suggested, often thoughtlessly, by those in power.

It took much courage on their part to ensure their chances of prosperity. They had to think of ways and means of their own and like them. They had to make do, so to speak. Those men and women had to demonstrate a good deal of dignity to set up an imposing number of regional or sectorial groups to consider and make feasible the most realistic ways of developing the available resources, be they physical, technical or human. There are countless examples of experiments which have been reproduced in other Quebec regions and even the rest of Canada. Let us mention only the Eastern Quebec Development Board, the Regional Development Council, the many co-operatives and resource development corporations and other such organizations all trying to satisfy the urgent need for an efficient and useful participation by all their members.

More particularly, let us recall the studies conducted by the Eastern Quebec Planning Bureau previous to the signature in Rimouski, in 1968, by both the Quebec and the Canadian governments, represented at the time by the late Premier Daniel Johnson and the present Prime Minister of Canada, of agreements for the regionalization of budgetary envelopes totalling $411 million to develop and consolidate regional infrastructures. Therefore, the will to innovate of our fellow citizens from Rimouski and Témiscouata is beyond question. However, our region and eastern Quebec as a whole have yet to achieve prosperity. Of course, local interests have made several proposals for the maximum use of our resources and have checked them against our individual and collective requirements. Yet, an inventory of our available resources leads us to believe that the funds allotted not only to the Rimouski constituency, but also to the vast area comprising the lower St. Lawrence and the Gaspé peninsula will necessarily be increased.

Let no one believe, however, that I underestimate the legitimate needs of our fellow Quebeckers across on the North Shore, in the constituencies of Charlevoix and Manicouagan. In our region, the development of one shore has traditionally been linked to the development of the other. In other words, Madam Speaker, I call on the members for these areas to show the same solidarity and team spirit as their constituents. Their example has been far-reaching and the consultations already started should prompt us to sustain our efforts. Aware of our commitment, the Prime Minister has already met us half way by proposing two economically oriented departments in our area, namely, the Department of Regional Economic Expansion and the Ministry for Small Businesses. Can this be a sign of the times? It might be seen as the recognition of the fine work done by past and present generations, and perhaps even of their wise choice of a representative to the Canadian Parliament.

It also shows an awareness of the tremendous economic heritage that constitute the natural resources of our area—the lumber, mining, fishing, farming industries and so on. It is a reasonable admission of the new trends in the management of our economy highlighted in the Speech from the Throne. In the government's statement on the various elements of the industrial policy and the supporting energy policy, the measures to promote the development of alternative energy sources will urge our entrepreneurs to turn to active and readily accessible resources on which we can depend, particularly in our area. Our hydroelectric resources in northern Quebec are not remote and are very competitive. A rational use of the industrial waste from our forestry and fishing operations is quite possible. We have an abundance of those resources and the Canadian government is ready to support our efforts to use them.

We should always keep in mind that we are a young nation and that there is still much to be done. Those who succeed admit that it is mostly a matter of attitude. In the weeks and months to come the Government of Canada will specify the framework for the co-operation and true leadership it must demonstrate to give a new impetus to our economy. The government will give citizens better access to the services they need to accommodate their legitimate desire to contribute to social and economic development. Small and medium-sized businesses which are critical to our regional economy and to all of the province of Quebec, will benefit from better financial incentives.

The people of Rimouski and Témiscouata are happy to hear that the Canadian government is firmly committed to promote the development of port, air transport, rail and road facilities to increase interregional trade. The emphasis on electronic communications and the whole field of telecommunications will enable these devices to penetrate deeper into this country.

Farmers can also look forward to better financing conditions when applying for a loan. The food marketing policy for export markets is in keeping with a long-standing wish. Such measures adequately meet the needs of my constituency as a whole, because Rimouski-Témiscouata is first and foremost a rural constituency. Madam Speaker, the throne speech heralds the consistency and renewed emphasis which the government will place on the promotion of the economic and social status of women.

Madam Speaker, such fervour is not only a formal recognition of our presence in this House, but an acknowledgment of the change that is taking place in our modern society which at times was reluctant to grant us a full role. Is it through sheer force of numbers or the quality of our actions over the last few years, that our institutions have become more responsive to our presence, or is it the kind of reaction of which Quebec is now giving us an eloquent example which enables us today to oppose intransigence with a new spirit of oneness? The fact is that today we occupy a choice position in the major objectives of this Parliament, and the Canadian government is committed to assume effective and moral leadership in the development of such conditions which are required to protect the rights of more than half of this country's citizens.

Madam Speaker, the receptiveness of the government to the needs of handicapped citizens and its admitted will to extend training and labour market integration programs move me deeply. What a great joy for me after more than ten years of hard work to promote this cause!

The government party is determined to promote a liberal society where the advantaged are encouraged through government intervention to share their economic and social wealth with those of us who are less fortunate or those of us who, after a lifetime of dedicated work have a right to see active generations contribute to recognize their efforts. So the announced measures to increase the guaranteed income supplement are amongst the most evident confirmations of the type of social goals the Government of Canada intends to pursue even though some people believe that, because of our general economic situation, we should without hesitation destroy the very foundations of our collective way of life. Housing conditions are encompassed in that liberal vision.

The Government of Canada will prefer to rationalize the control and management systems applied in some areas of government thereby restoring the conditions for a better administration. Let us simply say that for people in some areas like the one I represent, it is the beginning of an era where authorities could adjust to tangible dimensions and to the positive kind of regionalism which contributed so much to Canada's prosperity.

Madam Speaker, besides enthusiastically endorsing this new orientation and the sense once more asserted by the government of its responsibilities, it is still my firm intention to co-operate in preventing that this country of reason—which did not serve us that badly in the past after all—be divided by a phony gradualism such as the one proposed by the party in office in Quebec. Far from denying the fact that Canada is now facing a certain unrest with respect to its political structure and institutions, I think that the Canadian government, more particularly in the forthcoming weeks or months, will have to claim louder than ever before that we need "a totally fresh start" and that we must reformulate the consensus which presided over the federative union of the ten member-states which make up our country.

The establishment of two independent states north of the American superpower would yield catastrophic consequences for both founding peoples of our nation. I am even led to believe that the rifts within the French Canadian nation would likely be more serious. We should never forget that our permanent status as French Canadians in North America will be a constant reminder for us to be industrious. In this regard, it would seem more realistic for us to admit that the existence of a Canadian government may in the final analysis constitute a solid safeguard against the real threat against us which does not come from the east or the west and even less from the north, but rather from the south. And surprisingly so, the secession menace brings our fellow citizens in the other provinces to the same conclusion. So, Madam Speaker, we must say No to this badly formulated invitation by the Quebec government.

A Yes would mean saying No to the efforts all the provinces are now willing to make to get out of the deadlock; a No to the ostensible PQ project would confirm our intention to carry on with our efforts to update and modernize the structures and institutions of our country. That they must be rejuvenated, no one will deny; but that they should unfairly be called obsolete and good for the trash can, never. To condemn as young a country as ours to death, when, as I said earlier, everything remains to be done, would be gross error of judgment.

The people of Rimouski-Témiscouata will never accept that so many struggles by so many generations might come to naught by soothsayings characterized by uncertainty and defeatism; we worked hard to get what we have today, but we choose to consider the results we have achieved rather than the inevitable constraints we had to put up with in order to get them. We did not run away from the advantageous contributions made by the other regions of our country. We have sought their contribution and made our own. But we did not give up.

Madam Speaker, to those who try to strengthen their specious argument by putting forward the prognosis formulated by our so-called "cousins" who deserted us two centuries ago, I shall reply that our Quebec will be neither French nor anything else but Canadian. Madam Speaker, I thank you for your worthy attention, and I move, seconded by the hon. member for Sudbury (Mr. Frith), that the following address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General of Canada:

To His Excellency the Right Honourable Edward Richard Schreyer, Chancellor and Principal Companion of the Order of Canada, Chancellor and Commander of the Order of Military Merit, upon whom has been conferred the Canadian Forces' Decoration, Governor General and Commander-in-Chief of Canada.

May it please Your Excellency:

We, Her Majesty's most loyal and dutiful subjects, the House of Commons of Canada, in Parliament assembled, beg leave to offer our humble thanks to Your Excellency for the gracious speech which Your Excellency has addressed to both Houses of Parliament.

Mr. Doug Frith (Sudbury): Madam Speaker, may I be the first to congratulate officially my colleague from the province of Quebec, the hon. member for Rimouski (Mrs. Côté), for having the honour to have been chosen to move the Address in Reply to the Speech from the Throne.

It is as well an honour and a privilege for me and the constituents of Sudbury to have the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) ask me to second the Address in Reply to the Speech from the Throne.

Sudbury has been honoured in years past by having as its representative the previous Speaker of the House, the Hon. James Jerome. I am certain that I speak for all members of the House when I congratulate him for the unbiased manner in which he presided over the House of Commons, and I wish him success in his new role as Associate Chief Justice of the Federal Court of Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Frith: I am equally certain that the traditions of this House will be upheld during your tenure as Speaker and that you will preside with the qualities mentioned by the Prime Minister when he selected a previous Speaker, Lucien Lamoureux. At that time he stated that a Speaker——must enjoy our respect without losing our affection. He must be firm yet sensitive, a master of language and a good listener . . . . be prepared to cite a precedent, and to know when to distinguish it . . . . He needs the skills of a judge and a diplomat. He should combine the talents of a tightrope walker, a juggler and, occasionally, a lion tamer.

Madam Speaker, I am certain you will be equal to the task.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Mr. Frith: I was admittedly somewhat astounded when I was asked to deliver my maiden speech on the opening of Parliament. As all other new members, no doubt, I am proud of having been chosen by my constituents to represent and promote their interests within that ancient and noble institution which is Parliament.

[English]

By tradition a new member of Parliament, chosen to move or second the Address in Reply to the Speech from the Throne, describes the social, economic and cultural matrix of his constituency. Let me be brief. The Sudbury region is the geographic, business and cultural centre of northeastern Ontario. The region comprises some 165,000 people, houses the largest nickel producer in the world, the only university in northwestern Ontario, and provides excellent regional medical facilities to northern Ontario residents.

The ethnic breakdown of the regional population is approximately 37 per cent Francophone, 36 per cent Anglophone, a large Italian population, and a wide and exciting cross-section of other ethnic groups. In short, Sudbury is a microcosm of Canada.

The past three to four years have been difficult ones for Sudbury. As a result of slumping nickel markets, massive lay-offs occurred in 1977, and we have recently endured the effects of a long, protracted strike. I mention these facts because I believe that, as a result of these adversities and hardships, the Sudbury region has found innate values to weather the storm, and we can apply the lessons learned to the challenges facing Canada in the eighties.

The commencement of a decade has often been a time to reflect on the past and pursue programs for the future. In 1980 one message is crystal clear. This Parliament must institute proposals which will contribute long-term answers to regional disparities in our country and not simply apply band-aid solutions. This government must develop a comprehensive industrial strategy that albeit it will give very little comfort in the short run, will ensure this generation of young Canadians meaningful contributions to our economic and social institutions.

The most important lesson Sudbury has learned in the past few years is the need to diversify its economic base. Only through diversification can we lessen our dependence on a single depleting resource. We realize that significant changes must take place in the economic infrastructure over the next two decades in order to address this recurring problem that is faced by many Canadian towns and cities.

My saddest moments occur when meeting young, energetic Canadians who, through no fault of their own, are unable to obtain satisfying employment in their field of learning and are forced to waste their talents in other areas. That is why I was so heartened this morning to note in the Speech from the Throne that it is the intention of this government to place high on its list of priorities the industrial strategy that we so badly need in this country. There was also mention of a new technological program for young people to develop their own talents in their areas of professional and technical expertise.

One subject which requires immediate attention is Canada's commitment to the level of research and development. In the November, 1978, budget introduced by the present Minister of Justice (Mr. Chrétien) a beginning was made to provide larger tax write-offs to stimulate research and development. This process must be accelerated. It is a well-known fact that Canada lags far behind other western industrialized nations in the percentage of gross national product used to stimulate research and development. We, as a nation, must place a high priority in this field because it is only through a significant increase in the dollars spent on research and development that we can hope to attain worldwide expertise in new technological bases which in turn generate employment opportunities for Canadians. It will be a combination of a bold industrial strategy and enhanced levels of research and development that will alleviate regional disparities in Canada.

Cardinal Suenens, the Belgian cardinal, once declared, "Happy are those who dream dreams and are prepared to pay the price to make them come true." Well, I have a dream. I dream of a country, understanding of its parts and confident of its whole, welcoming its cultural and linguistic differences, and sharing its economic diversity. I chose to use the word "understanding" rather than the word "tolerating" because I dislike the verb "tolerate". How often have we heard the phrase, "I can tolerate western Canada's ambitions" or "tolerate French Canada's aspirations"? I do not wish to tolerate them; I want to understand them, and to understand them one must live with them, if not in their own habitat, at least to begin to commiserate with their hearts.

As a person raised in northern Ontario I have witnessed the export of our youth to other areas of Canada in search of employment because opportunities in their particular professional or technical area of expertise did not exist in one-industry towns. Most northern Ontario communities depend on the economic fortunes of single, depleting resources. For too long I have witnessed our resources shipped to rich areas south for processing, leaving northern Ontario, 112 years after confederation, the victim of a hinterland economy.

Two weeks ago in an address to the Empire Club in Toronto, Sheik Yamani of Saudia Arabia stated that his country preferred to deal with multinational oil companies rather than state-owned oil companies, for the very selfish reason that multinational oil companies exchange technologies for the resource. By the use of bartering the resources of his country for new technologies, Yamani will create technologies that foster employment for future generations of Saudia Arabians. Should we as Canadians, therefore, expect less from Albertans? Theirs too is an economy based on a self-depleting resource, and as a person from northern Ontario I understand too well their aspirations to develop new technologies and employment opportunies for the next several generations of young Albertans.

● (1440)

Mr. Frith: This development of the various regions of Canada need not be at the expense of others. Surely as Canadians we realize that a strong western and Atlantic Canada are as important to Confederation as a strong central Canada. The development of new technological bases in western Canada can be fueled by the manufactured machinery of central Canada. We must begin to understand that by strengthening the parts we strengthen the whole, and that by promoting regional cannibalism, we begin the road to self destruction. The strength of confederation has been the ability of the federal system to share and redistribute the resources of the various regions of Canada in order to preserve an economically and socially progressive federation.

Of course, the eighties will put the federal system to a serious test and whether it is the alienation feeling in the west or separatism in Quebec, the same challenge remains—the federation will have to meet the new regional needs while representing the entire country.

Madam Speaker, I reside in the largest officially bilingual area in Ontario after Ottawa, of course, the national capital. I say so with pride because the people of Sudbury have learned to appreciate and accept the enrichment of the French culture and language. Thanks to its large French-speaking and multicultural population, Sudbury has become a cosmopolitan area endowed with a bilingual university, a French and English theatre, a French newspaper as well as French radio and television stations.

[English]

In contrast, as a person who represents part of the province of Ontario I am somewhat embarrassed by the treatment of the Francophone population in the province of Ontario when it comes to the schooling of children in Penetanguishene.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Frith: But I would like to have a message go forth in this country that not all of Ontario is representative of the Penetanguishene problem. Not without our own problems, we have introduced in Sudbury the Canadian concept of federalism. It has been a great success, with large numbers of parents of all ethnic backgrounds schooling their children in the French immersion program of our educational systems. With this background, perhaps I feel with more intensity than others the importance of the impending referendum in Quebec.

Often one hears many ethnic Canadians say, "I am a Canadian first". Well, I too am a Canadian first, but I am a worried Canadian, worried about the wording of the referendum, worried about its outcome, and worried about the complacency I feel exists outside Quebec with regard to the importance of the referendum.

One of the advantages of being elected to the Commons is to meet members of Parliament from various regions of our country and to come to learn from our differences, as well as to cherish our common ground. In recent weeks I have met several of my colleagues in the Quebec caucus. I asked one of them what role he would play in the referendum in his province, and he replied that he was darned if he would defend national unity in Quebec. To be frank, Madam Speaker, he did not put it that politely and I was beginning to wish I had never asked the question. He went on to add that he would be delighted to build national unity in Quebec. Such a similarity in words, and yet poles apart in philosophy! I was very happy to hear a member of the Quebec caucus put it that way, that rather than defending national unity he will work as hard as he can to build it.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Frith: I would urge all members of the House, regardless of political affiliation, to make themselves available and to become involved in that crucial vote in the province of Quebec, to prove to the people of Quebec that there is a choice other than René Lévesque's and the Parti Québécois' idea of a French-speaking Quebec and an English-speaking Canada.

The choice is as follows. Here let me quote the final two paragraphs of an article entitled "The Canadian Journey", which read as follows:

> There is a more promising choice. A country's political framework and values are not something to be knocked down this Monday and built anew by next Friday. They are most like a garden, to be nurtured in harmony with the landscape. The Canadian landscape began to shift two decades ago and now the season has come for change.
> It should begin with recognition that the existence of two great language communities and many regional and cultural realities, which we so often insist are problems that cripple us, are in fact opportunities that can enrich and free us. For "they" in the end is all of us.

Let us not forget it.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Frith: I, therefore, take pleasure in seconding the Address in Reply to the Speech from the Throne.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): I propose, Madam Speaker, that the debate be now adjourned.

Madam Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

Hon. Yvon Pinard (President of the Privy Council): Madam Speaker, I move that this House do now adjourn.

FINANCE

REQUEST FOR COMMITTEE STUDY OF INTEREST RATE POLICY—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Hon. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Madam Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

In view of the fact that record increases in interest rates in Canada have occurred since March 3, with the Bank of Canada rate rising from 14 per cent to 16.2 per cent, with the approval of the government, and that record increases in interest rates of the banks, mortgage companies and financial institutions have occurred as a result, with adverse effects on employment, business, especially small business, and consumers, as well as the economy generally, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Joliette (Mr. La Salle):

That this House immediately order its Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs to be set up, and that that committee undertake an immediate review of the interest rate policy of this government and of the Bank of Canada, and that for this purpose the governor of the bank and the Minister of Finance appear before it to explain their actions and what they will be doing to solve the problems which the governor of the bank himself said, regarding interest rates, are now causing for individuals and to business.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Some hon. Members: Shame.

An hon. Member: That is your motion.

An hon. Member: Talk about flip-flops.

HIGH INTEREST RATES—CALL FOR RESIGNATION OF MINISTER—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Hon. Michael Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity under the provisions of Standing Order 43.

In a television program broadcast on February 10, 1980, and in my presence, the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Gray)—former finance critic of the opposition in the last Parliament—stated his abhorrence of the high interest rates in this country and his intention to resign if a government of which he was a member did not lower the interest rates. Therefore, in view of the fact that interest rates have increased four times in the past five weeks since this government took power, and to be consistent with the positions of principle which he has taken in the past, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Burlington (Mr. Kempling):

That the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce do forthwith honour the commitment he made before many Canadians, and resign, in order to maintain his credibility in this House and the confidence of its members.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Do I have the unanimous consent of the House?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

PRORATA PENSIONS FOR WIDOWS OF VETERANS ON DISABILITY PENSION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Hon. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Madam Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, and seconded by the hon. member for Oshawa (Mr. Broadbent), I move:

That this House welcomes the assurance given by the Minister of Veterans Affairs prior to the opening of this session that he would be introducing an amendment to the Pension Act to provide prorata pensions for widows where the veteran's disability pension was below 48 per cent, and this House urges the minister to introduce such legislation forthwith, it being understood that it would be dealt with very quickly by this House of Commons.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Do I have unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

AIR TRANSPORT

EPA APPLICATION FOR HALIFAX-TORONTO ROUTE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Madam Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43 I wish to move a motion of some urgency. As a result of the decision of the Canadian Transport Commission last Wednesday not to grant Eastern Provincial Airways authority to operate the Halifax-Toronto route, and considering the very serious adverse economic implications of this decision on the economies of a number of Atlantic communities, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Halifax West (Mr. Crosby):

That this House records its support for Eastern Provincial Airways in its appeal application to the cabinet, thereby ensuring the continued stable economic growth of many communities in eastern Canada.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Do I have the unanimous consent of the House?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

NATIONAL UNITY

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE—CALL FOR RESIGNATION OF GOVERNMENT—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Arnold Malone (Crowfoot): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity under the provisions of Standing Order 43.

In light of the vicious, insulting and divisive Speech from the Throne which can do nothing except further alienate western Canadians, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Wetaskiwin (Mr. Schellenberger):

That in the interest of the unity of the nation, the Prime Minister and his cabinet resign.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Crosbie: Take Herb with you.

INDUSTRY

MANUFACTURE OF NEW FIGHTER AIRCRAFT—LOCATION OF PLANTS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Mark Rose (Mission-Port Moody): Madam Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

In view of the fact that the signing of the new fighter aircraft contract is reported to have deprived British Columbia, and particularly the community of Mission, in my riding, of some 450 possible jobs, and since out of an estimated $2.9 billion in industrial benefits, only some $400 million is to be spent outside of Ontario and Quebec, I move, seconded by the hon. member for New Westminster-Coquitlam (Miss Jewett):

That the Minister of Insustry, Trade and Commerce, and the Minister of National Defence, if and when arrangements are completed for the manufacturing of the new fighter aircraft, take steps to ensure that a fairer share of the industrial benefits shall be allotted to provinces other than those in central Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Do I have the unanimous consent of the House?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

AWARDS AND DECORATIONS

REQUEST KENNETH TAYLOR RECEIVE ORDER OF CANADA—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Tom Cossitt (Leeds-Grenville): Madam Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, to request the permission of the House to move a motion which is of such a non-political nature and in accordance with the views on all sides of this House, and seconded by a member of the Liberal party, that I hope it will receive unanimous consent.

I refer specifically to Mr. Kenneth Taylor, the former Canadian ambassador to Iran, and his courageous performance in that country which has been a credit to Canada, and also the fact that he has contributed greatly to Canada-United States relations and has been honoured by a special medal struck on the authorization of both Houses of the American Congress. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Ottawa-Vanier (Mr. Gauthier):

That the House of Commons respectfully recommends to the selection committee of the Order of Canada that it consider dispensing with the customary procedures and recommends to His Excellency the Governor General of Canada that Mr. Kenneth Taylor be invested with the Order of Canada.

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY

WINNIPEG—RELOCATION OF MARSHALLING YARDS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Madam Speaker, I would like to move a motion under the provisions of Standing Order 43, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles).

Whereas the recent spill of 10,000 gallons of methanol in the CPR rail yards in Winnipeg could have had very serious dangerous effects on the people of Winnipeg; and whereas it is likely that there will be other spills of dangerous chemicals in the CPR rail yard which is situated right in the centre of the city; and whereas the removal of the rail marshalling yards would free-up 200 acres of land in the core of the city for redevelopment and would stop the blight spreading around the rail yards, I would move:

That this House calls on the Minister of Transport and the Minister of Employment and Immigration to meet as soon as possible with representatives of the city of Winnipeg and the province of Manitoba to plan for the movement of the CPR marshalling yards out of the city, it being understood that the federal government would be prepared to pay a substantial portion of the cost of moving the rail yards.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Do I have unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

FINANCE

REQUEST FOR COMMITTEE STUDY OF INTEREST RATE POLICY

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, my question is to the Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance. I was surprised that his colleagues deliberately rejected the adoption of a motion couched in exactly the terms of a motion they proposed in the previous parliament in relation to a parliamentary inquiry into interest rates, particularly since the government has adopted a floating bank rate, about which the governor of the Bank of Canada expressed serious reservations during the hearings last fall. I wonder if this simply reflects contempt for a parliamentary inquiry, or whether there is some other reason why the Minister of Finance has encouraged his colleagues to stop that kind of an inquiry.

I wonder whether the minister will tell me specifically if he will reconsider that position, whether he would be prepared to recommend that the finance committee be struck, and whether he would be prepared to appear with the governor of the Bank of Canada so there could be a full and public inquiry by members of this House into all matters of policy relating to interest rates.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I was aware that the motion moved by the hon. member was in the precise terms of the motion moved by my colleague, the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. In fact, I have watched these gentlemen so frequently that I can anticipate pretty well what they will do, and what they did today was to move the motion that the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce moved last session. I thought they might have followed a more imaginative course and done something different, but they did not.

I have decided that it might be better to give a little more consideration to the kind of motion the House might adopt. I am not opposed in principle to giving the standing committee a further opportunity to consider the changed interest rate situation, including the floating rate, and when the committees are set up I will give consideration to a reference.

Mr. Clark: Madam Speaker, the minister, with the kind of evasiveness with which he has dealt with economic problems in the country, has indicated that he is not opposed in principle. Does he support in principle the idea that this Parliament has the right to an early opportunity to review interest rate policy? Will he give us a commitment, now, that he will seek the immediate striking of the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs and that he will, personally, seek and support an immediate reference of all questions relating to interest rate policy, including his appearance and the appearance of the governor of the Bank of Canada before that committee? Will he give us that clear, concise and unequivocal assurance now?

Mr. MacEachen: Madam Speaker, I know that the President of the Privy Council will be setting up the standing committees, and I have already undertaken to the Leader of the Opposition that I will give consideration to making a reference to the committee so that that committee will have an opportunity to examine the whole question of interest rates. Perhaps we will be able to hear from the former minister, whose policy is about the same as mine.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: Madam Speaker, I regret that the Minister of Finance is unwilling to give a straightforward answer to a simple question. Let me try him on another simple and straightforward question: will the minister give a commmitment to this House, now, that he will bring in a full budget before the end of May, and will he give us a date for that budget?

Mr. MacEachen: Madam Speaker, in the interest of simplicity, the answer is no.

RISING INTEREST RATES—DETRIMENTAL EFFECT ON ECONOMY

Hon. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance, who I hope will copy me in all that he does. If he does, then he will serve this country well.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crosbie: On October 25, 1979, the bank rate went to 14 per cent. At that time, the finance critic for the Liberal party said in the House of Commons committee on finance, trade and economic affairs:

—it will mean the loss of thousands of jobs, increases in the cost of living, it will bring the housing industry to a halt, it will put housing beyond the reach of most middle and lower-income Canadians, it will hurt small business and it will hurt farmers, and will add to the cost of food.

The hon. member therefore intimated that the Liberal party had other solutions. Why, in the light of this objection last fall, did the Minister of Finance allow the interest rate to go to 16.2 per cent within four weeks of his assuming office on March 3? The minister has allowed the rate to go up another 2.2 percentage points. How could he allow this, in view of the statements made by the finance critic last fall? What is the solution which the finance critic had last fall but which the Minister of Finance does not seem to be able to advance?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I know that the hon. gentleman will be a model to me, but one aspect of his career that I will not follow is to have my first budget defeated by the House of Commons.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

An hon. Member: Bring one in.

Mr. MacEachen: I do not intend to go into the past history of debate in the House of Commons. It will be a natural tendency for opposition parties to oppose high interest rates and to seek alternative solutions to the higher interest rates. The hon. gentleman will follow that practice, and I have no complaint about that customary role taken by opposition parties.

However, it is the responsibility of the government, and particularly of the Minister of Finance, to follow a policy that is in the best interests of the Canadian economy, and the policy that is presently being followed is in the best interests of the economy. If the hon. gentleman or hon. members from any party in the House have alternative monetary policies to the one currently being followed by the governor of the Bank of Canada, which I support, then I would be happy to consider those policies.

Mr. Dick: Give it to the committee.

Mr. Crosbie: Madam Speaker, the hon. minister has said that he is following the course which is the best for the country and the course which I adopted last fall when I was in power. How does he, then, explain the hypocrisy of his party, which opposed that policy when in opposition and which now says that it is the best policy for the country? How does the minister explain the fact that on December 13, 1979, he voted us out of office with his non-confidence motion which said we failed to lower interest rates? How does he explain that action?

• (1425)

Mr. MacEachen: Madam Speaker, the hon. gentleman should remember that the motion which defeated the government last December was moved by the New Democratic Party.

RISING INTEREST RATES—JUSTIFICATION THEREFOR

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Madam Speaker, it is obvious that my Conservative friends to the right are just a little concerned that the Liberals have increased the interest rate four times, which means they have matched the Conservative record in a briefer period of time. I should like to ask the Minister of Finance—

An hon. Member: What does that have to do with the price of bread?

Mr. Broadbent: —since his colleague, the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, told the House last October 26 that every half point the interest rate goes up, it costs businesses in Canada $375 million, does the Minister of Finance agree with that assessment; and, if so, how does he square it with the absurd opinion that he just offered to the House, that this high interest rate policy is good for the Canadian economy?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, obviously the higher interest rates that we are experiencing in this country are harmful to certain segments of the population: no one denies that. They are particularly damaging to small business, to farmers, to home owners—

An hon. Member: Who is that?

Mr. MacEachen: —and it is for that reason—

An hon. Member: Who are they good for?

Mr. MacEachen: —that we announced in the Speech from the Throne our intention to take some steps to help home owners who are presently renegotiating their mortgages.

I say to the Leader of the New Democratic Party that if he can propose any alternative monetary policy, in light of the very high interest rates now prevailing in the United States, in light of the interconnection between the capital markets of Canada and the United States, and in light of the trade that exists between our two countries, then I will be very happy to discuss it with the governor of the Bank of Canada; but I do not want to hear any of the irresponsible utterances which he made from one end of Canada to the other during the election campaign.

Mr. Broadbent: Madam Speaker, I will be very happy to deal with the request of the Minister of Finance for advice, and later this afternoon he will receive some.

INTEREST RATES POLICY ENUNCIATED IN SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): I should like to go to the Prime Minister now, since we have had reference to irresponsible campaign speeches. In light of what the Prime Minister said in the House of Commons last October 29, and I quote:

At what point will the government look at these alternatives, rather than following the American interest rate up to 13 per cent, 14 per cent and God knows how high?

And considering the Prime Minister's promise during the campaign that if elected, his party would have a lower interest rates policy than the Conservative Party of Canada, how does he account for the fact that interest rates have gone up four times since he assumed office, and the categorical rejection of a lower interest rates policy in the Throne Speech that was brought down yesterday?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, the Leader of the New Democratic Party has, no doubt unintentionally, misled the House. I never promised that when we formed the government we would lower interest rates. I was asked that question specifically, and I said I could not give that undertaking.

Mr. Crosbie (St. John's West): Herb Gray gave it—three seats down.

Mr. Broadbent: Due to the courtesy of the Prime Minister, I think he misunderstood my question. I did not say in my question that the Prime Minister indicated he would lower interest rates; I indicated that he campaigned on a promise of lower interest rate policies than the Conservative party. He is shaking his head, but that is certainly what most Canadians understood.

RISING INTEREST RATES—EFFECT ON MORTGAGES

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): I should like to go to the Minister of Finance with a final supplementary question. Considering that with reference to the then high interest rate of 14½ per cent, his colleague, the Minister of Employment and Immigration, said the effect of this was to crucify Canadians—with mortgage rates at 14½ per cent—how does the Minister of Finance view the current interest rate policy as it affects mortgages, which are now up to 17½ per cent?

• (1430)

This means, for some 350,000 Canadians who have to renew mortgages this year, that their monthly bill will go up, on the average, $200 a month or almost $3,000 a year.

An hon. Member: How about that?

Mr. Broadbent: Does the Minister of Finance consider that an acceptable position for the Government of Canada?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I understood the question was addressed to the Prime Minister. I have examined the number of home owners who may be renewing their mortgages this year, and it approximates 350,000. Of that number, it appears to me that a very large proportion can bear the regrettable increases in mortgage payments if we accept the customary ratio of debt to household income. Obviously, it would be an additional burden, but that proportion will be able to carry the burden.

There is a group that, because of the fact their incomes have not increased and because their equity in their homes has not increased, or the value has not appreciated, will face a particular difficulty, and it is to this relatively small group that we are addressing our attention, to ensure that they will be helped to get over this very difficult period.

HIGH INTEREST RATES—EFFECT ON EXPORT BUSINESS

Hon. Michael Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce.

An hon. Member: The late Herb Gray.

Mr. Wilson: The rise in interest rates in Canada and the United States is of great concern to exporters in this country. In view of the fact that the Export Development Corporation quite recently raised about $250 million U.S. at an interest rate of 14 per cent to fund commitments made by that corporation at interest rates between 9 per cent and 10 per cent, are these high interest rates in any way affecting the ability of the Export Development Corporation to fulfil its mandate in support of Canadian export business?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Madam Speaker, I think the Minister of State (Trade) would want to deal with that question.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: Reduce the rate, Herb.

Oral Questions

HOUSING

PROGRAM TO ASSIST HOME OWNERS

Mr. Doug Lewis (Simcoe North): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Public Works with respect to the average Canadian home owner who has been totally abandoned in the Speech from the Throne and it is, perhaps, rather in spite of or despite the previous answer given by the Minister of Finance.

In view of the fact that the average Canadian home owner who is renewing a mortgage today is faced with the spectre of mortgage payments which he just cannot afford, as well as the spectre of foreclosure—which is referred to in the Speech from the Throne—does the minister have a broad program of relief which is in any way comparable to the legislation which was introduced into the last Parliament by the Conservative party?

Hon. Paul J. Cosgrove (Minister of Public Works): Madam Speaker, the Speech from the Throne, I believe, speaks for itself inasmuch as it addresses the problem of a group of home owners that we think are not a majority and probably are not the average home owner in this country.

As you know, shortly after becoming Minister of Public Works I addressed a group of home owners who came under a program which was introduced by the former Liberal government. Our intention was to address those first who needed help the most. I think it is fair to say to my friend that our philosophy and our objective in the program, of which we will announce specifics at a later date, will follow that same policy.

Mr. Lewis: Madam Speaker, while the Canadian home owner waits for this "later date", has the government any legislation which will in any way produce relief which is comparable to the $375 which Canadian home owners could have received in April or May after filing their income tax returns this month? That was under the legislation which we introduced and which was defeated by the Liberal party and its allies, the NDP, last fall.

Mr. Cosgrove: Madam Speaker, again for the sake of brevity, the short answer is no.

An hon. Member: Thank you.

Mr. Cosgrove: No doubt the government's programs will be assisted by the opposition parties as the legislative program of the government generally goes forward.

PUBLIC SERVICE

HIRING QUOTAS FOR WOMEN

Miss Pauline Jewett (New Westminster-Coquitlam): Madam Speaker, to move on to another topic, I would like to ask a question of the President of the Treasury Board. As the minister responsible for implementing the affirmative action measures to improve the position of women in the public service of Canada, measures that were promised in the Speech from the Throne—will the minister give his assurance that these measures will include hiring quotas for women at all levels of the public service?

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (President of the Treasury Board): I thank the hon. member for that question, Madam Speaker. The affirmative action that we plan in Treasury Board is a broad-based affirmative action. It does not include, at this time, a quota system for hiring women in the public service.

Miss Jewett: Madam Speaker, may I, then, turn to the minister responsible for the status of women, who is also the Minister of Employment and Immigration, and ask him if it is not his understanding that affirmative action to improve the condition of women in the public service of Canada in fact includes, among many other things, hiring quotas?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, I would like to point out to the hon. member that at the present time, under the affirmative action program, there is the establishment of certain targets, which is quite a different concept from quotas, but there are targets that are established by each department and Crown corporation. These are registered with the Treasury Board and so monitored.

We are preparing a review of the affirmative action programs that affect both the public sector and the private sector. Submissions will be made to cabinet this spring when that review is completed, and the kind of enforcement actions that we think are most effective will be implemented at that time.

CONFLICT OF INTEREST

GUIDELINES FOR CABINET MEMBERS

Hon. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon West): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. Can the minister assure the House that he has satisfied himself personally that there is nothing in the background, either from a legal or a moral point of view, of any of his ministers which would make it unsuitable for them to be members of his cabinet?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I have followed the usual procedure when asking and inviting a minister to be part of cabinet: I have assured myself from a security point of view that there are absolutely no objections. From a moral point of view, I have relied upon the work of the ministers that they were not in any conflict of situation positions.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Madam Speaker, is it the intention of the Prime Minister to require his ministers to comply with conflict of interest guidelines? If so, when does he anticipate that particular compliance will be met, and when will he make a statement with respect to compliance by members of cabinet?

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, I have already discussed the guidelines that this government intends to apply with ministers. I have reviewed our previous guidelines which applied under the Liberal administration, I have looked at the guidelines which were brought in by the Conservative government, and I have attempted to take the best from both.

I will be announcing, certainly before a fortnight, exactly what the terms of those guidelines are. I will tell the House immediately that I have departed in some instances from the Conservative guidelines, particularly in the matter of applying them to spouses and children.

AGRICULTURE

HIGH INTEREST RATES—EFFECT ON FARM OPERATIONS

Hon. John Wise (Elgin): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Agriculture and it deals with interest rate levels. During the election campaign the minister expressed his concern and, indeed, he expressed his dissatisfaction with interest rate levels at that time. Since assuming office—as has been indicated by my colleague—interest rates have increased four times in five weeks. The throne speech yesterday recognized the problem but provided no direction and no relief.

I want to ask the Minister of Agriculture, what immediate action can Canadian producers expect from the minister to enable producers to simply maintain their existing farm operations and to plan a portion of their 1980 crop?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Madam Speaker, I am sure there are many agricultural programs which the hon. member discovered a while ago. There are even plans that make advance payments to farmers interest-free. I can name one in his area of Canada: soybean producers received $15 million interest-free. There are many other programs along that line. A portion of the interest rate of the Farm Credit Corporation, for example, was raised more during his term of office than during mine. There are many people in other parts of the commercial world of Canada who would love to have the Farm Credit Corporation rate of 13 per cent, which accounts for 70 per cent of all long-term agricultural loans made in Canada.

In many parts of Canadian agriculture we are much more fortunate than our competitors in the United States who compete in many markets with us. For example, they pay a much higher rate of interest, pay more for their fuel, fertilizers, pesticides, herbicides, and so on.

Mr. Wise: Madam Speaker, it is obvious that the minister while in opposition recognized the problem, but today when he is in office he wants to ignore it. Indeed, his first action as Minister of Agriculture was to raise the rate of Farm Credit Corporation loans to a record high.

Is the minister going to stand by and propose nothing and do nothing while producers in this country liquidate land, equipment and other assets simply to have enough capital to plant a portion of the 1980 crop? What is he going to do? Will he just answer the question yes or no, if he can.

Mr. Whelan: Madam Speaker, there are many people in Canada looking for a yes or no answer. The answer to this question would be that the things I have been responsible for have meant a "yes" for many farmers. They will be able to stay in business. With the programs we are developing, when he sees them being developed in the next few weeks he will agree that yes, this minister does care and this government does care.

INCOME TAX

DEDUCTIONS ALLOWED SPOUSES WORKING ON FARMS

Hon. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance. It deals with an important sector, that of family farms. Although the matter was omitted in the Speech from the Throne, will the minister reintroduce the measure included in our budget, which measure was promised, seconded and supported by his colleague, the Minister of Agriculture, allowing the deduction, for income tax purposes, of salaries paid the spouse who works on the farm? In addition, will that policy apply to non-incorporated businesses so that fishermen and several other businessmen might also benefit from it, as we planned in our budget?

[English]

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I agree with the hon. member that it is necessary to decide whether the present government is to proceed or not proceed with a number of proposals that were contained in the December 11 budget. Some of these proposals, like the one mentioned by the hon. member, were of a substantive character; others were of an important but technical nature.

Currently, I am examining the situation. I hope to advise the House as soon as possible what position I will want to take on these matters, including the one raised by the hon. gentleman.

[Translation]

Mr. La Salle: Madam Speaker, I should like to put a supplementary to the Minister of Agriculture and ask him if he still intends to recommend to his colleague that the salary paid to the spouse who works on the family farm be allowed as a deduction for income tax purposes.

[English]

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Madam Speaker, I have every confidence that my colleague, the Minister of Finance, will be a fair man.

INDUSTRY

JOBS AVAILABLE IN AUTOMOBILE INDUSTRY

Mr. Ian Deans (Hamilton Mountain): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce dealing with the ailing auto industry. Given that the Ford Motor Company are going to mothball their casting plant, with a loss of 900 jobs, and that they are going to cut, at Oakville, another 1,500 jobs—cut one shift completely out of the process—can the minister tell the House what conditions there were attached to the $68 million incentive that Ford received which guaranteed that Ford would maintain the job levels that were in Ontario and Canada at the time the moneys were advanced?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Madam Speaker, the contract between the federal government and the Ford Motor Company presently has a clause in it that this information will not be released without the consent of the company. I have asked the company to give its consent so that I can provide the information to the House. This is a matter of deep concern to me and my colleagues. I will be meeting with representatives of the UAW tomorrow to discuss this matter, and I will have further information for my hon. friend as soon as possible.

Mr. Deans: Might I ask the minister what action he proposes to take to provide some kind of future for the 20,000 auto workers currently laid off, and the many others whose jobs are in jeopardy as a result of mismanagement both by Chrysler and Ford?

Mr. Gray: Madam Speaker, I have begun a series of talks with the presidents of the automobile manufacturing companies with a view to getting new commitments from them for additional activity in Canada, particularly in the area of job creation, research and development and production. Also, I met with the UAW and with the independent parts manufacturers. I intend to go on and have similar meetings with the presidents of the parent companies, with a view to beginning formal consultations under the provisions of the auto pact with the American government, with the objective of having a better operation of the pact in the interests of Canadian workers.

SMALL BUSINESS

MEASURES RESPECTING FBDB LOANS

Mr. Stan Darling (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Madam Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of State for Small Businesses. The minister is no doubt aware that at the present time Federal Business Development Bank loans continue to be locked in for periods of five years. Such an arrangement is particularly unsatisfactory in light of the fact that the current interest rate on FBDB loans is 19 per cent.

My question to the minister is this: have any measures been recently introduced which will allow for an individual aspiring to obtain a new Federal Business Development Bank loan, or having to renegotiate an old one, to enter into an arrangement whereby the interest on the loan could be renegotiated on a more frequent basis? I trust the minister is acutely aware that the existing regulations governing the repayment of such loans have been the cause of considerable anguish for a large number of Canadians. It is grossly unfair that an individual—

Madam Speaker: Order, please. Will the hon. member please come to his question.

[Translation]

Hon. Charles Lapointe (Minister of State, Small Businesses): Madam Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his question. I should like to remind him of what was indicated in the Speech from the Throne yesterday with regard to the Small Businesses Loans Act, that is we shall raise the maximum amount of the loans from $75,000 to $100,000. With regard to new measures or policies concerning the Federal Business Development Bank, my colleague, the President of the Privy Council will be tabling a bill in the next few days providing for the refinancing of the bank's equity funds. We shall also look into the proposal made by the hon. member.

[English]

Mr. Darling: Has the minister taken, or does he propose to take, any steps with regard to the bill introduced by the previous government to provide the Federal Business Development Bank with $500 million capital? The bill failed to receive third reading in the previous Parliament.

● (1450)

I am wondering if the minister has been advised about the numerous applicants who are going to be denied any additional money or applications. Even at these staggering rates there are a great many who will still want to negotiate Federal Business Development Bank loans.

[Translation]

Mr. Lapointe (Charlevoix): Madam Speaker, as I indicated in my previous answer, in a few days the President of the Privy Council will table a bill partially based on the previous bill.

IMMIGRATION

MEASURES TO ASSIST CUBAN IMMIGRANTS

Mr. André Maltais (Manicouagan): Madam Speaker, allow me to congratulate you on your appointment to the position of Speaker of this House. I think that all French Canadian men and women are quite pleased with your nomination.

My question is directed to the Minister of Employment and Immigration. Considering the drama in which some families are involved, thousands of Cuban families would like to emigrate to Peru. Does Canada intend for humanitarian reasons to provide some leadership to solve that problem? If so, what steps will Canada take to assist those people?

[English]

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, I would like to thank the hon. member for the question and indicate to the House that the government of Peru has contacted a number of governments, including our own, asking for assistance in the resettlement of "asylees" from Cuba and those who are presently located in the Peruvian embassy.

At the present moment they are in unusual circumstances because they do not fit the strict international definition of refugees; but considering the very severe suffering that is going on, and deprivation that is taking place, the Government of Canada has indicated to the Peruvian authorities and to Cuban authorities that we are prepared to take, at this point, up to 300 "asylees" from that area and also to provide federal financial assistance in resettlement programs when necessary. We are also prepared to consider further measures once the situation clarifies itself, but we are taking that initial step.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

BOYCOTTING OF OLYMPIC GAMES IN MOSCOW

Mr. Arnold Malone (Crowfoot): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. I would like to ask him if he would announce today that Canada will support the United States in the Olympic boycott.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, the hon. member probably heard us make our position clear on this matter during the campaign.

Mr. Crosbie: What is it? Come off it, Pierre; get your skis on.

Mr. Trudeau: We believe that the invasion of Afghanistan is something which not only should be condemned by our country and like-minded countries, but we also believe it is very important to found our policy on the vote of 104 nations at the United Nations which on January 14 condemned the invasion of Afghanistan.

Our policy on the Olympics and on other matters has not just been to take stands of our own, and in this matter I have indicated in a recent letter to President Carter that we would support him in the measures he announced and that we would join him in those measures. However, it is also important for us to bring other countries along so that we maintain this front of 104 nations or as many nations as possible to continue in our condemnation of the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan.

Mr. Malone: Madam Speaker, for a moment I thought I was going to have to say that silence may not be golden; it might be just plain yellow.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Malone: I would like to ask the Prime Minister now if he can tell us how many of the 104 nations he has coming on stream to give that support to the United States when they so desperately need it, as does the world.

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, I might point out to the hon. member that it does not take much courage just to announce that you are going to boycott the Olympics.

An hon. Member: Try it.

Mr. Trudeau: And it would not have much effect, either, on the presence of the Soviet troops in Afghanistan.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: It is perhaps a more difficult policy, but a more important one, to ensure that this united front of nations against that invasion be maintained in as large a proportion as possible, and that is what we are working at.

CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD

LOSSES TO FARMERS DUE TO U.S. EMBARGO ON GRAIN TO U.S.S.R.—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Mr. Stan J. Hovdebo (Prince Albert): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport, who is the spokesman for the Canadian Wheat Board in this House. In view of the fact that the decision by the Carter administration to put an embargo on the shipment of grain to the Soviet Union has already hurt the Canadian farmer to the extent of 80 cents per bushel since December 28, 1979, will the minister tell us if this government plans to follow the policy suggested by the previous administration to make up these losses to farmers so that the nation as a whole—not just grain producers—will pay for the effects of this embargo?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, this is a very debatable subject, but my information and knowledge at this time is that western farmers are not being affected by the policy that Canada has had with respect to the export of grains to the Soviet Union.

Mr. Hovdebo: Madam Speaker, in the light of that answer, my supplementary question is directed to the Prime Minister. Is it this government's intention to continue the policy brought about by the previous administration to support the grain embargo on additional sales of grain to the Soviet Union? If so, will the Prime Minister assure this House that grain producers will not be the only victims who will have to bear the brunt of that policy?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Indeed, Madam Speaker, that is our policy.

INCOME TAX

BENEFITS TO NORTHERN RESIDENTS—GOVERNMENT POLICY IN RESPECT THEREOF

Mr. Doug Neil (Moose Jaw): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Revenue. In view of the uncertainty regarding income tax issues in the north with respect to the fringe benefits traditionally granted to northern residents, will the minister assure this House that this government will bring in an amendment to the Income Tax Act, or a ways and means motion to give validity retroactively to the present moratorium?

Hon. William Rompkey (Minister of National Revenue): Madam Speaker, we have placed a moratorium on the collection of taxation on northern benefits until January, 1981. That applies for the taxation year 1980. We are looking at the year 1979. We have stopped assessments on the year 1979. Officials are now working to clarify exactly how this moratorium will apply, and I am hoping I can make a comment within the next week or so.

AGRICULTURE

PAY-OUT TO BEEF AND PORK PRODUCERS

Mr. Peter Elzinga (Pembina): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Agriculture. I wonder if the minister could indicate to the House what the date of the announcement will be as to whether there is going to be any pay-out under the Agricultural Stabilization Act for the beef and hog industry.

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Madam Speaker, I am sure the hon. member is well aware that by law we have to make a payment for the pork industry. We may make one for the beef industry. That has not been decided. But before the end of April I hope that an announcement can be made for the pork industry.

FORESTRY

EMPLOYMENT OF IDLE WORK FORCE DUE TO HIGH INTEREST RATES

Mr. F. Oberle (Prince George-Peace River): Madam Speaker, my question is to the Minister of the Environment in his capacity as having jurisdiction over forestry. The forest industry is one of the first industries which suffers as a result of a massive downturn in economies and high interest rates, and thousands of forest workers are unemployed at the present time.

The question is whether it has occurred to the minister to discuss with his colleague, the Minister of Employment and Immigration, and his provincial counterparts the prospect of engaging this idle work force in the task of forest renewal, planting and restocking millions of acres of unproductive forest land.

Hon. John Roberts (Minister of State for Science and Technology and Minister of the Environment): Madam Speaker, we as a government do, indeed, attach considerable importance to the revitalization of the forest industry and, indeed, the continuation of the thrust which has been developed by the past two ministers responsible for forestry. I spoke about that subject a few days ago, and I would be happy to send the hon. member my speech. In any case, I will take up the suggestion he has made to me and discuss it with my colleague.

Mr. Oberle: Madam Speaker, I have read the minister's speech and I want to compliment him on his commitment to follow the policy which the former government laid down for a forestry strategy for Canada. Can he tell the House whether it is his intention immediately to give us the name of the assistant deputy minister who should be appointed to restore the position of the Canadian forestry in the public service?

Mr. Roberts: That matter is under very active consideration. I cannot give the hon. member a name at the present time, but I hope to announce one in the very near future.

PRIVACY

OPENING OF MAIL BY RCMP

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Solicitor General, whom I should like to congratulate on his appointment. The Solicitor General stated recently that he has made up his mind that the RCMP need the power to open first-class mail, and that he is "rushing to cabinet" to bring in legislation to grant this power—a very serious interference with the right to privacy of Canadians.

Will the Solicitor General assure the House that he will take no action on this matter at least until the McDonald commission has reported; and will he tell the House what evidence he has, if any, to support the granting of this serious power to the RCMP?

Hon. Bob Kaplan (Solicitor General): May I thank the hon. member for his good wishes and also for the opportunity to correct the record. I am not rushing legislation forward; I am quite content to wait for the recommendations of the McDonald commission, and I am particularly pleased to indicate that, as hon. members know, the McDonald commission will be making its core report by the end of the summer, and its final report and be winding up, if they can maintain their schedule, by the end of this year.

As to the evidence of the desirability and the need for letter-opening under controlled circumstances and with proper safeguards, I hope to be able within the next few days to make the kind of presentation that hon. members would like on that subject.

Mr. Robinson (Burnaby): My supplementary question, Madam Speaker, is to the right hon. Prime Minister, in the absence of the Minister of Justice, who is, I am sure, as concerned as we are on this side of the House about upholding the rule of law. Will the right hon. Prime Minister tell the House whether he intends to recommend to his Minister of Justice the prosecution of those members of the RCMP who have authorized the breaking of the law, section 43 of the Post Office Act, in the illegal opening of first-class mail?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I will be happy to discuss this matter with the Minister of Justice. I am sure he will want to follow the practice of our previous government; that is to say, that whenever we have evidence of any breaking of the law by an RCMP officer, through the McDonald commission or in any other way, we would communicate that information forthwith to the attorney general of a province whose responsibility it was to enforce the criminal law. I am sure the Minister of Justice will continue to do the same thing.

POINT OF ORDER

MR. COSSITT—MOTIONS UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Tom Cossitt (Leeds-Grenville): Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order, about a 30-second point of order concerning the matter of motions under Standing Order 43 in general and which is brought to my mind by the motion I introduced on the subject of Mr. Kenneth Taylor earlier this afternoon. I am asking respectfully for clarification from the Chair in regard to one specific point about Standing Order 43.

I was under the distinct impression that the slight negative shaking of the head by such a person as the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) does not constitute a legitimate "no" and that an audible verbal "no" must be heard before a motion of that nature can be ruled out of order. If it is in order, I would like to ask if I can have the unanimous consent of the House to revert to Standing Order 43 so that members of the House will have an opportunity to prove specifically that the old saying that a prophet is without honour in his own land does not apply to Mr. Kenneth Taylor.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, may I say on that point of order, since the hon. member for Leeds-Grenville (Mr. Cossitt) has mentioned my name, that I can assure him I said nothing. But I can inform him of what was going on in my mind at that point, and this may guide you, Madam Speaker.

An hon. Member: Subliminal perception.

Mr. Trudeau: We have here an example of where a good motion might be proposed by a member on either side of the House and at times the government might say "no" to that motion, not because it disagrees with the substance of the motion but perhaps because we do not find it opportune to discuss the motion at that particular time; or, alternatively, the motion calls for very intricate considerations, and that is the case in this matter.

The Order of Canada, I happen to know—and I am sure the right hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) knows the same—was set up so as to ensure that it would be detached from the political process, so as to ensure that the Order of Canada would be given upon the direction of a committee chaired by the Governor General and his representative, the Chief Justice of Canada, in a way that politicians in particular, but also other pressure groups, would not be able to command upon whom the order would devolve. I feel that before issuing an order from the House to that very select committee chaired by the Governor General and the Chief Justice we should consider whether or not it is within our prerogative to do so. I would submit that it is not at this time.

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, I would simply like to say on this point of order that I would not at all contest the views and the testimony put forward by the present Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau). I suggest that he would do well to reread the motion which was put forward. He would find that the motion which was presented to this House simply suggested that there be a respectful request by this chamber to the Governor General to consider the matter. If he would reread that motion instead of reacting automatically to motions put forward by members whom he might not personally like, the procedures of this House could progress.

Madam Speaker: From where I sit in this chair I am more aware of the noes that I hear—and I did hear some noes. Therefore, the time for presenting motions under Standing Order 43 having expired, we will now proceed to orders of the day.

WAYS AND MEANS

DESIGNATION OF ORDER OF THE DAY TO DEBATE WAYS AND MEANS MOTIONS

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 60, I am tabling a notice of a ways and means motion to amend the Employment Tax Credit Act, and I request that you designate an order of the day for consideration thereof.

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The House resumed from Monday, April 14, consideration of the motion of Mrs. Côté for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session.

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, in beginning let me repeat formally, now that your election is an accomplished fact, the congratulations of hon. members of my party and underline the respect which we hold for you. Let me express on behalf of my colleagues in the official opposition that we look forward to working closely and co-operatively with you in ensuring that this House functions effectively and democratically and serves both the national interest and the national will.

I would like to take this opportunity to congratulate the new member for Rimouski (Mrs. Côté). She made an eloquent speech yesterday and I hope she will often have the opportunity to address the House.

● (1510)

[English]

I would add as well my congratulations to the hon. member for Sudbury (Mr. Frith) who follows distinguished shoes into this House. I will say to him that I did not agree with every nuance of what he said, but he said it well. This House is a place where positions should be clearly stated and disagreements occasionally recorded.

Also I think it is appropriate for me as I begin to express the admiration which I know all of us feel for the manner in which Their Excellencies, the Governor General and Mrs. Schreyer, have conducted themselves. Since this Parliament last met, they both have been afflicted with hospitalization, and yet that has not at all deterred them from the very effective carrying out of their important responsibilities to the nation.

The Speech from the Throne indicates that Canadians expect much of this Parliament. Let me be a little more precise. Canadians expect a great deal of this government. As I have noted elsewhere, our problem when we were a government was that we had a program but not a majority necessary to implement that program and to get it through. This government has a clear majority. It has a long association with office and it has no excuse for delay in facing its full responsibilities and in dealing directly with the problems and the potential of the country.

I must say that I regret the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) did not show more courage and more imagination in choosing a cabinet. Some of his old friends deserve to retire and some of his old prejudices have kept from cabinet members like the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. Reid), the hon. member for London West (Mr. Buchanan) and most particularly l'honorable député de Hochelaga-Maisonneuve (Mr. Joyal) who could have been of real service at this particular point in the life of this country in bringing this government closer to the mainstream of modern thought in the province of Quebec.

Despite the cabinet's collective weakness and weariness, I want to congratulate the members of the ministry on the honour and responsibility bestowed upon them. I wish them well and I give them notice now that this party will co-operate in the passage of constructive measures and will expect the government to accept its responsibility to deal quickly and honestly with the business of Canada.

We are at a time of crisis in Canada on several fronts. The government will be serving the nation badly if it pretends that only the referendum is important, or if it lets the interests of Canada suffer because of the ideology or the inflexibility of certain ministers. When speaking of ideology, I am thinking particularly of the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Gray), and when speaking of inflexibility I am thinking of its champion, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde). We have urgent problems concerning the unity of this nation, problems that were caused in no small measure by the past refusal of the Prime Minister to respond to the changing nature of this nation. I will return to that question later in my remarks, but let me serve now notice on the government that the importance of the referendum is no excuse for delaying action on economic policy, no excuse for delaying action on energy policy and no excuse for avoiding our international obligations. Indeed, delay in dealing with those acute problems may very well aggravate the tensions which now exist in the Canadian family.

First let me deal today with economic policy. Economists are predicting that our economy may have its lowest growth rate this year since 1954. A change in circumstances and the electoral commitments of the present government will add at least $4.5 billion to the budgetary deficit which was forecast by my colleague, the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie), when he brought down a budget in December. The attitude of the government toward the private sector is at best ambiguous.

The Speech from the Throne makes no mention at all of the economic charter signed by this Prime Minister and ten provincial premiers in 1978, an economic charter which, among other things, specifically described "an expanding private sector as the major impetus for growth in the Canadian economy". But the throne speech and individual statements by economic ministers raise the spectre of new government agencies, new government intervention and new government costs.

Interest rates keep going up; the rate of foreclosures and bankruptcies has almost doubled in the last year. The present government voted against the budget or the economic realism which we introduced last year. They knew in December what they were against. They should know in April what economic policy they stand for. In our judgment they have an obligation to bring in a full budget at the earliest possible opportunity.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: The Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance today, in the single most direct statement he has made since he became Minister of Finance, and indeed probably in the single most direct statement he will make in his tenure, said; "No, we will not bring in a budget before May". What he apparently does not understand is that no one else in Canada whose decisions depend upon the planning and an understanding of the direction of the Government of Canada can plan until he knows the economic direction and the economic plans of the Government of Canada. The private sector cannot plan, provinces cannot plan, individuals cannot plan, investors cannot plan.

He cannot blame events. He cannot say that they were not prepared. Because they knew in December what they were against, they must know now what they are for. His deliberate delay is causing an intolerable burden for all of those Canadians who count on certainty in order to make their own plans so that they can make the nation grow.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: Just so that the minister will understand what it means, every day of delay creates more uncertainty. Uncertainty is not some abstraction; uncertainty in the climate of the Canadian economy today means that it creates the risk of more bankruptcies and more foreclosures. The minister was congratulating himself on how few Canadians face foreclosure today. With his policies, with his delay, that number will increase. That is an inexcusable action on his part. It means more unemployment every day that he delays. It means less growth every day that he delays.

I understand that the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin) wants to have economic policy go one way, in a spending direction, and that the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Johnston) may well want economic policy to go another way. But it is the duty of the government to resolve those differences, not to succumb to them. They knew enough in December to vote against a budget which gave a sense of economic direction and realism to the country. They must have known what they stood for when they voted against our budget. They have an obligation now to spell that out in a full budgetary and economic statement to the people of Canada, and to stop delaying, creating unemployment, creating bankruptcies and forcing foreclosures.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Breau: That debate is over.

Mr. Clark: I hear from the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Breau).

An hon. Member: Overlooked again.

Mr. Clark: Overlooked again in the selection of ministers. Indeed, I think he must hold the record in this House for being overlooked in the selection of ministers.

An hon. Member: What about the hon. member for Ottawa West (Mr. Francis)?

Mr. Clark: Excuse me, I did not mean to slight the hon. member for Ottawa West (Mr. Francis). But the hon. member for Gloucester, whose voice is obviously of so little influence in the cabinet that he cannot become a member of it, has made the interjection here that that debate is over. One of the points which must be made and must be understood by all of us who respect the integrity of the House of Commons is that it is simply not acceptable for someone like the present Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce knowingly to go forward and make an undertaking that he would resign if interest rates went up, and then once he had secured the power that undertaking was designed to achieve, to go back on his word, to break his word.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: I say to the hon. member that that debate is far from over, because that debate has to do with the fundamental question of honesty in this country and of integrity in the conduct of public business.

• (1520)

I was proud during the election campaign to stand for a policy that was an honest policy and that reflected the integrity of a government that was prepared to deal directly with the problems the nation faces, and I will be pleased during the next election campaign to go into the constituency of Gloucester if—

If the hon. member can be selected again by his party.

[English]

—and to repeat again the importance of having a national government and a national party that will stand for honesty, that will say the same things before the election that it says after and not carry on in a way that has been characterized by the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Gray) who said he would resign before the election and then, after he had won office, broke his word to the people of Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: Let me deal with the specific question of interest rates because the references in the throne speech to interest rate policy were cold comfort to hundreds of thousands of Canadians who are trying to cope with record high mortgage and borrowing costs. I am tempted to take a little more time this afternoon and review the hypocrisy on this issue of the Liberal party, but I will leave that for the people of Canada to judge every time they hear members of this administration speak.

Interest rate policy has changed in Canada in three ways since February 18. First, rates have gone up, and they have gone up faster during the past two months than they did in our nine months as a government. Second, while our government and our minister of finance faced up squarely and honestly to our responsibility as the ultimate managers of monetary policy, this government and minister of finance prefer to hide behind the gimmick of floating rates; a float which it will not even let the standing committee of this House of Commons examine; a float about which they refuse to let questions begin to be directed immediately to the governor of the Bank of Canada who had expressed reservations about that policy when a parliamentary committee was struck by our government; a float which is nothing but a gimmick to try to pass the responsibility for interest rates away from the government, where it resides, to the governor of the Bank of Canada.

Some hon. Members: Shame, shame.

Mr. Clark: Third, and most serious of all, while we brought forward specific measures that would cushion the impact of unavoidably high rates of interest on Canadians, this government is prepared to let the great majority of home owners, farmers and small businessmen burn while Allan MacEachen fiddles.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Clark: We proposed a major program of mortgage and property tax credits which, even in its first year, would have held to about 12 per cent the effective cost of an average mortgage renewed at current rates. The Liberals and members of the new coalition—the attempted coalition to our left, the NDP—voted against that measure. In its place, according to the throne speech, this government offers only the very vague promise of some kind of assistance that will be limited to those who have to "renegotiate existing mortgages", and who face "the spectre of foreclosure", to quote the Speech from the Throne.

What this government is offering, having cried such crocodile tears over interest rates in December, is minimal aid to home owners who literally have their backs against the wall, but nothing at all for Canadians whose current mortgage costs without any renegotiation already are too high. It is offering nothing for Canadians who have had to renegotiate their mortgages in recent months at abnormally high rates, and nothing for the thousands of Canadians who want to buy their first home but simply cannot afford today's mortgage costs. And this, ladies and gentlemen, from a government which created and literally pushed on to the people of Canada an AHOP program which is causing so much grief to so many Canadians and which stands today as probably the worst conceived and administered housing program ever inflicted upon this country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: That, Madam Speaker, is their helping hand to home owners, the helping hand of this government which is so concerned, it says, about injustice. It talks against it and then it imposes injustice on the people of Canada.

What is there for farmers and small businessmen? Again our government had brought forward in its budget a concrete measure to help those Canadians; a small business development bond that would have allowed small businesses and farmers to borrow up to $500,000 at roughly half the current market rates. Again the Liberals and members of the coalition—those two parties—voted that measure down. What does the government offer in its place? It offers a routine increase in loan ceilings under the Small Businesses Loans Act and under the Farm Improvement Loans Act, a proposal which offers small businessmen and farmers virtually no assistance where they need it and virtually no assistance in meeting the abnormally high cost of money.

Let me say one final word about economic policy, Madam Speaker. As was often the case with the Prime Minister during the election campaign, in yesterday's speech he tried to have it both ways in regard to the budgetary deficit. The government says it is committed to reducing that deficit but—the persistent "but"—not at the cost of all the new spending programs and new government agencies it wants to create. That is a familiar Liberal line. In fact, we heard that line in every budget for 11 years while the Liberal government ran this country into near bankruptcy.

I say to hon. members opposite that Canada simply cannot afford any more of that kind of irresponsibility. They will not reduce inflation—and surely that has to be the number one economic objective—unless and until they are prepared to bring government finances into balance and ease the inordinate claim the federal treasury has been making on the financial resources of this country.

I urge the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) to heed the words of his principal adviser, the governor of the Bank of Canada, who says in his annual report:

> —if large fiscal deficits are continued when the economy has little more effective capacity to increase output they will discourage such investment . . . If we in Canada want to reduce our international deficit on current account and thus our use of foreign savings we shall have to pay careful attention to the rate at which domestic savings are being absorbed by the fiscal deficits of our governments.

Perhaps it is because of advice such as that that the Minister of Finance so resolutely refuses to allow the Parliament of Canada to question the governor of the Bank of Canada.

Madam Speaker, in connection with energy matters, the energy policy of the government shows no sense of urgency.

Apparently they have no idea of the precarious position of Canada which so much depends on foreign oil, those oil supplies and prices which are indeed beyond our control. The energy self-sufficiency which we proposed as a government is not only a praiseworthy aim but it is absolutely necessary for national security and economic development. Among all nations of the world we have a unique opportunity to become self-sufficient in the field of energy.

The Speech from the Throne does not give much specific information about the position of the government on energy prices. Price is a matter of dollars and cents and it is high time that the government disclose to the Canadian people the cost of energy not only for this year but for the next three or four years.

[English]

It is time too, Madam Speaker, that the government comes clean with Canadians over its exact intentions in regard to the oil import compensation program. Again we have a reference in the Speech from the Throne, as we did during the election campaign, to phasing out the oil import compensation program. That program is going to cost the federal treasury at least $2.6 billion during the current fiscal year, and at current trends it will almost double by 1985. This is the program that ensures a single price across the country and subsidizes consumption in Quebec and the Atlantic provinces.

If the government intends to phase that program out, as it promised yesterday in the Speech from the Throne and as the Prime Minister promised during the election campaign, then who will pay the billions of dollars in extra costs? I see that there is present a member from Cape Breton Island, an area where there is a heavy dependence on imported oil. Will it be the people of Cape Breton who will be chosen and selected to pay that extra burden because they elected a Liberal government? Who will pay that extra $2.6 billion, a figure which will increase dramatically between now and 1985? Will it be a special burden imposed upon consumers in Quebec, Prince Edward Island, New Brunswick, Nova Scotia and Newfoundland, or is it the intention to spread that price across the entire country so that the price every Canadian pays for oil will go up much more dramatically than was proposed in the budget brought down last December by my colleague, the hon. member for St. John's West?

The government's so-called blended price, from what is known about it, would take an increase this year of at least $6 a barrel in domestic prices to offset the current cost of imports. The party opposite ran against a $4 increase, and perhaps they are planning a $6 increase for Canadians. If they wish to hide it this year they will dump it on the backs of Canadians next year. We in this country have a right to know the details. We have a right to have the minister of energy tell the truth to this Parliament and the people of Canada as to exactly what will be the price of oil and exactly how they intend to achieve that price.

Let me turn for a moment to the question of international affairs. In the throne speech the government proclaims that one of its basic goals is to ensure that Canada plays what it calls a vigorous role in international affairs. It seems to me that the government exhausted all of its vigour in simply stating that goal, because what follows in the speech shows nothing that is vigorous or even encouraging, except for the welcome confirmation that it intends to carry through the initiative started by the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands (Miss MacDonald), to strengthen the disarmament component in the Department of External Affairs.

The 1980s, Madam Speaker, will not be an easy decade in international affairs. It seems certain to be a period of virtually continuous regional instability. The world economy is fragile, and the intentions and the options of the Third World have hardly begun to be defined. Unhappily as well, there is every indication that relations between the super powers are deteriorating.

This is not a time when nations like Canada will have the luxury of flirting with soft-headed notions of neutrality. A starting point for Canadian foreign policy in the 1980s must be to know ourselves, to know, understand and respect the values and the goals of this democratic nation, and to make sure that the world knows exactly whom we regard as our friends and where we stand on basic issues.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: We in this party are under no illusions whatsoever as to who are our friends. Our principal ally remains the United States of America, not because of the accident of geography, but because of the act of sharing basic goals and basic ideals. There are times and there are issues that go to the very heart of one's values, one's beliefs and one's friendships. We believe that now is one of those times.

That is why we responded as we did in Tehran. That is why we supported as a government, and continue to support as a party, a boycott of the Moscow Olympics. That is why I am appalled at the reluctance of this government to show any leadership or, what is worse, to show any conviction on the Olympic question or, indeed, in response to President Carter's request for additional pressure on Iran to free the hostages. We on this side of the House do not believe your real friends hide in the crowd until it is safe to stick their heads up.

I know that the Prime Minister has strong personal views on this matter. He has expressed them in the Soviet Union, and he also expressed them the night of his victory when he equated our relation with the Soviet Union and the United States of America. I suspect that it is the very influence and strength of his personal views, particularly given, for the first time in my recollection, a foreign minister who sits on the second bench of Parliament, a foreign minister who is a puppet on a string for the Prime Minister of Canada. I suspect that that is one of the reasons this government has refused to allow a full and open review of Canadian foreign policy.

As the House knows, we as a government were ready and prepared to have that kind of review because we believe that Canadians should participate in deciding who our friends are in the world and what our stance should be in the world. This government takes an opposite position. They have stopped that review. My colleague from Kingston and the Islands and others in this party will conduct that open public foreign policy review across this country so that even if the government shuts its ears to the views of Canadians as to what should be the foreign policy of Canada, there will be an opportunity in this Parliament for members, and flowing from this Parliament for Canadians, to speak their minds about who are the friends of Canada and what should be our foreign policy.

Naturally, Madam Speaker, there are some items in the Speech from the Throne, to the degree that we can find their detail, which we on this side of the House can commend and support. We look forward to seeing the detail of the proposal with relation to pensions coming forward. We understand the campaign commitment of the party opposite was to increase the pension of every eligible senior citizen in the country, and we look forward to that measure being realized. I can say that if the measure proposed does correspond with the promise that was made, we can certainly support that measure in this House and we will support it expeditiously. If the government sets a deadline of July 1 and is serious about it, then certainly they will get very real co-operation from this side of the House in achieving that goal.

There are some other proposals which we can support because in so many cases, at least on the basis of the details in the Speech from the Throne, they appear to be measures that carry through to conclusion policies which we ourselves began as a government. I will reserve my approval for the freedom of information bill until I have had a chance to see it in detail, because this Parliament and the people of Canada have been misled so often by the Liberal party on the question of freedom of information that we cannot approve a bill until we see it.

We would prefer to have brought back the bill which we introduced. In any event, we hope that the bill this government introduces will be a bill that is faithful to the two main principles of our legislation, principles which we regard as absolutely fundamental. First, that exceptions to the general rule that all information is public should be narrow and specific; and, secondly, that there can be recourse to an independent tribunal in cases of dispute between a minister and Parliament or the people of Canada.

I do not want to see the idea emerge in legislation that was mooted so often in the Liberal party, that there should be some right residing in a minister or a public servant to stand between the right of the people to information and the interest of the government in keeping that information private.

I assume, again subject to seeing the actual legislation, that a number of other specific initiatives mentioned in the Speech from the Throne carry forward work which was begun by our government. That list would appear to include a meat import law, legislation concerning the transport of dangerous goods, improved privacy legislation, better support for the handicapped and a comprehensive program to improve employment opportunities for women, starting with the public service itself.

I note that there are proposals for a policy paper and a conference on pensions. I should just say in passing, Madam Speaker, that I am a little alarmed that while our government took every step it could, starting with a committee investigation into interest rates, to make full use of Parliament, there is already the evidence that this government is deflecting away to other agencies questions and inquiries which should be carried on in Parliament. They will not let Parliament look into interest rates as our government let Parliament look into interest rates; they will not let Parliament look into pension policy as our government proposed to let Parliament look into pension policy. Instead, they are taking matters that should be the concern of Parliament and putting them up to other institutions.

We fear that what we are seeing again is a manifestation of the Prime Minister's old idea that members of the House of Commons are mere nobodies, with perhaps the refinement proposed by the new House leader that we are nobodies who should work only four days a week. We think we are somebodies; we think there is a role and a right for members of Parliament, and we believe that members of Parliament should work a full week and not goof off on Fridays!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: I also assume that the reference to an expanded community services employment program reflects the work that was begun by the former minister of employment and immigration.

There is one other major matter that I want to touch today, Madam Speaker. It concerns the fundamental unity and, indeed, the future of this unique nation. As we know, the government of Quebec has published a proposal for sovereignty-association, a proposal that is absolutely incompatible with the idea of federalism and, consequently, is absolutely unacceptable to members of this party and, I believe, of this Parliament.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: I believe it essential that we take the opportunity to repeat that the concept of association is also unacceptable to the public of Canada outside the province of Quebec. That position has been made very clear by virtually every provincial premier, most recently by the Premier of Saskatchewan in an eloquent and forceful speech—that there should be no question at all in the minds of Quebeckers that the rest of Canada is not interested in sovereignty-association.

The Premier of the province of Quebec announced today the date for the referendum as May 20. He is seeking support—

Mr. Duclos: Did he consult with you?

Mr. Clark: No, he did not consult with me; did he consult with you?

An hon. Member: Does anyone consult with the hon. members?

Mr. Clark: I understand the difficulties of living in the fourth row after how many years in the House of Commons?

Mr. Duclos: Six years.

Mr. Clark: Six years. I consequently understand the hon. member's interest in consultation, particularly when he is a member of a party that engages so rarely in consultation with its private members.

If I might return to the question of national unity, free from heckling from Quebec federalists, let me say that the Premier of Quebec is seeking—

An hon. Member: Oh, oh!

Mr. Clark: Does the hon. member want me, perhaps because I come from western Canada, not to address the question of national unity? Is that the point of his frequent interventions? If the hon. member for Montmorency (Mr. Duclos) has a point, he might want to get on the Speaker's list and indicate why it is that he wants to stop me as Leader of the Opposition from speaking on questions relating to national unity here in the House of Commons.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: The point of the referendum is that the Premier of Quebec and his government are seeking authority to negotiate with Ottawa on the basis of the document that has been published. This party, as members of the House know, is represented formally and strongly on the committee for a No, represented by prominent Progressive Conservatives from the province of Quebec. But I make the point to the House that the referendum in Quebec is a symptom of much deeper problems in the Canadian family, problems that are most acute now in the province of Quebec but that are acute and growing elsewhere in the country. Our federal system needs reform and indeed, Madam Speaker, the conventional view of the nature of this nation needs rethinking.

There have been several proposals for constitutional change to achieve a situation that would better reflect the Canadian federal reality. Claude Ryan has published one proposal. Various provinces have published elements of other proposals. Our government was preparing proposals and we are continuing that work in opposition.

It is far too early to say, Madam Speaker, which of those proposals will prove to be right. But we know one way that will not work, and that is the kind of insensitivity which was practised for 11 years by the Trudeau government and which, on the early evidence, is being renewed at least with regard to western Canada.

During its brief life as a government since February 18, this government has taken a series of actions which western Canadians are bound to interpret as being hostile to that part of Canada. The Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources acted unilaterally to reduce the price of tar sands oil, when both courtesy and common sense required consultation. The Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin) is talking about breaking the agreement that our government achieved, an agreement that after years of talk and delay would have finally got facilities at Prince Rupert that could speed the movement of prairie grain to world markets. There is talk of bypassing elected members of Parliament from the west. There is talk of moving the grain transport co-ordinator from Winnipeg to Ottawa and making him subject to the minister responsible for the wheat board. There is talk of speeding up metric conversion, despite the opposition to that program that is known to exist in that region.

I confess, Madam Speaker, that I am both puzzled and alarmed by that series of actions by the Trudeau government. I am alarmed because it would be an error—a fundamental error—for anyone in any part of this country, and most particularly in this House of Commons, to underestimate the depth, extent and strength of frustration with the federal system and the federal electoral system that is felt now in western Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: It is dangerous, foolhardy and could jeopardize the federalist cause for this government to continue to take actions which are seen as hostile in that region, given that attitude which they should know exists.

I am puzzled, Madam Speaker, because it makes no sense to me that a government, which argues in Quebec about the sensitivity of the federal system, should act with so little sensitivity in western Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: As we in this party know from our own experience, Madam Speaker, when you are elected to government by part of the country, there is an acute obligation to reflect the whole country. The present Prime Minister has made the easy gesture in naming to cabinet senators to represent communities where his party is weak, even though he condemned me for starting that practice.

I hear him say he did not. He does not recognize the Francophone community of Ontario and indeed the Francophone community of Canada as a community. I do. I say to him, and I underline the point, that it takes more than senators so solve this problem. Our government sought to understand and repair the frustration that Quebec felt with the government in Ottawa, and our success was reflected, among other ways, by a decline in support for separatism during the period there was a Progressive Conservative government in Ottawa.

Mr. Clark: What troubles me, Madam Speaker, is that the Trudeau government is making no evident attempt to understand or to reflect western Canada; and I say simply to the Prime Minister that if he truly wants to maintain and strengthen this federal and diverse nation, that attitude must change. The place for it to start to change will be in the policies of the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, the policies of the Minister of Transport and the policies of other ministers who, too often, have shown an arrogant insensitivity to the concerns and requirements of that part of the country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Mr. Clark: Madam Speaker, Quebeckers and Canadians have a right to demand proof that this government have in fact relinquished their former attitudes, that they renounced their commitment to the status quo and that they finally have understood the concept of renewed federalism. Quebeckers and Canadians have a right to demand that the federal government's good intentions not be limited to the referendum period. They have a right to demand that after the referendum the Canadian government enter into a genuine dialogue with their provincial partners. In my view, all Canadians can still be convinced of this, including those who will be called upon to vote at the referendum if this government publicly recognize that Canada and Quebec are at a crossroads and that we now have an opportunity to renew our federation and put Canada on the road to the twenty-first century.

And Quebeckers and Canadians can still be convinced if this government finally accept the legitimacy of regional drives, if they stop perceiving them as mere signs of regional isolationism.

Why should we fear the emergence of regional identities? Quite the opposite, we should be proud of these, because they reflect constructive forces on which to build tomorrow's Canada.

Madam Speaker, the time has come to stop treating the just demands of provinces as pure bickering. Moreover, this government must be aware that the process in which Canada must engage is much more than a war of words, placards and propaganda. The issue's dimensions are of a fundamental nature. The question is whether or not Canada is ready to proceed on the road to renewed federalism, whether Canada will show through concrete actions that it is proceeding in that direction, whether the federal government will treat provinces as equal partners.

The government I led understood that and that is why in the short time we were in power we established a system of good relations with the provinces, we solved certain controversial issues and particularly we set in motion the process for a renewed federation.

A task force was set up to prepare the federal government's plan for a renewed federation and its terms of reference were made public. Even if we no longer have the same means, the work undertaken last year by Senator Arthur Tremblay is still continuing and it is my firm determination as Leader of the Progressive Conservative Party to submit to the people of Canada a comprehensive plan for a genuine renewal of the Canadian federation, because it is in renewed federalism that lies the key to our collective future, the key to the future of Canada as well as the future of Quebec. Indeed, it is because my party and I believe deeply in that that the Progressive Conservative Party of Canada joined the No forces to fight the proposed sovereignty-association being promoted by the Parti Québécois.

In the context of the referendum debate, our position has always been clear and unequivocal. We are for the renewal of the Canadian federation. But, Madam Speaker, the no of the Progressive Conservative Party has a real positive meaning—to say no is to say yes to the change we set in motion, yes to the renewal of the Canadian federation, yes to the future.

Madam Speaker, the Canada which Quebeckers are being asked to reject by the proponents of sovereignty-association, that Canada no longer exists. There was a time when Quebeckers were the only ones calling for a constitutional change. Today, the change is being called for by all provinces. There was a time when out of necessity only French-speaking members were bilingual. Today, that has changed radically. English-speaking members from all areas of this country, from Kingston, Stratford, Vancouver, Toronto, Woodstock, Oshawa and even Alberta, have chosen to learn French.

There was a time when it might have been a disadvantage to be French-speaking in the public service or in business. Today, that is not a disadvantage, it is an advantage, and that is another change in Canadian life.

Madam Speaker, every community changes, evolves, becomes surer of itself as it grows. Quebec has evolved dramatically since the quiet revolution. So has Canada. Quebeckers have realized the many changes that have occurred in their province since 1960. The same thing happened in Ontario, Alberta, Saskatchewan, Newfoundland. One must also keep in mind that in this vast country, with its oil, its natural resources, its cultural diversity and its open spaces, change has only begun and that change offers us all unique opportunities.

Of course, these opportunities exist throughout the country and they can be rejected through fear of the future. But what would have happened to Antonine Maillet if she had been afraid of the future and had refused to publish her works? She would certainly not have been awarded the Prix Goncourt. What would have happened to Paul Desmarais if he had refused to have confidence in the future? He would certainly not have transformed a small family business in Sudbury into a great financial empire in Montreal.

What would have happened to Gilles Villeneuve if he had not had confidence in his talent and had not agreed to compete? He would certainly not have become a champion racer. When you have confidence in your potential, why confine your future within overly narrow boundaries? When you are proud of yourself, why be afraid? When you are a Quebecker with all the resources and the vitality of an original culture, why limit your horizons and refuse to build a vast, youthful and prosperous country?

We have in all of the questions that face this House of Commons, a House of Commons in which there is a majority government, urgent obligations upon us all. If the government accepts, as I hope it will, the view of Parliament that we tried to introduce during our period as a government, that initiative should flow from all corners of this House and should not be confined to the ministerial benches, two results will ensue. One, there will be a greater richness, variety and accuracy of initiatives on which this House can rely. Second, there will be greater opportunity for the rich resources of knowledge, background, information and instinct that comes here from all corners of the land.

I hope that that lead which we established will be followed by this government. However, even with that, the major obligation rests with the occupants of the treasury benches. They are the ones who control the business of government. They are the ones to bring forward budgets or who, as today, refuse to bring forward budgets when they should be brought forward.

There are urgent matters before this nation. There should be urgent matters before this House. Unfortunately, the Speech from the Throne published yesterday indicated no sense of urgency about the economic crisis facing Canadians. It indicated no sense of urgency about the realization of the goal of energy self-sufficiency for this nation. It indicated no sense of the possibilities and the responsibilities available to Canada in the larger world community. For that reason, Madam Speaker, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Joliette (Mr. La Salle):

—that the following be added:

This House regrets to inform your Excellency that your advisors have failed

(1) To assure Parliament that a full budgetary presentation will be made before the end of May;

(2) To provide adequate assistance to home owners, farmers and small businessmen against high interest rates;

(3) To attach any real importance to reducing the federal deficit as an essential measure to combat inflation;

(4) To offer policies to promote energy self-sufficiency; and

(5) To provide effective leadership in international affairs, including unequivocal support for a boycott of the Moscow Olympics.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I can only subscribe to the feelings expressed in French by the Leader of the Official Opposition (Mr. Clark) at the end of his speech. He pointed out, and we share his opinion, how important it is for the fulfilment of our country not only to have access to both official languages but also to have a Parliament and a population that are increasingly anxious to take advantage of that enrichment which is bilingualism. I would have hoped that as far as his part of the country is concerned, the Leader of the Official Opposition would have at least attributed to us the goodwill he would like us to attribute to him as far as Francophones are concerned. I regret that, in the examples he gave he wanted to indicate that our government denied how important it was to work toward unity in this country and understand as much as possible the yearnings, ideals and fears of the various regions of the country. He failed to mention that our government has tried as much as his party while it was in power or in the opposition to find a solution to that serious problem of alienation in our country. I regret that his examples were based on rumours rather than reality, that they even reflected error rather than truth. The Leader of the Official Opposition tells me to give a few examples. Well, he accused the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde) of failing to consult his Albertan counterpart when he decided not to cut, as the Leader of the Official Opposition said, the price of oil coming from the tar sands, but to limit its increase. Well, on the contrary the minister assures me that he did consult his counterpart.

The Leader of the Opposition also gave other examples in the field of transport. The Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin) here tells me that all these examples are false. The Leader of the Opposition took care to say "there is talk". It may well be that "there is talk" but it is nothing but groundless rumours. In any case, I do not wish to start this session by disagreeing with the Leader of the Opposition on what may well be minor details. On the contrary, I want to assure him that our parties are in total agreement about the feelings he has expressed and about his will to make Parliament work actively and optimistically towards greater Canadian unity. He also gave a somewhat apocalyptic description of the present situation. I agree with him that we are living in difficult times. But I think it is important that at the beginning of a new session of Parliament we remember that Canada remains one of the most fortunate countries of the world.

As the world gets smaller and smaller, as good or bad news from the antipodes are transmitted and analysed within the hour on the streets of Montreal and Edmonton, Canadians are realizing that Canada along with a very small number of nations stands at the top of the pyramid of human happiness and that all the other nations have much less material wealth and freedom, so few of all those institutions that allow men and women to prosper freely in this human life.

This reality, Madam Speaker, must be recalled, because all those other peoples see and imagine Canada as some kind of far away oasis on the horizon, as a land of unbelievable happiness that is not only blessed with earthly wealth, but where people live fraternally in peace, safe from war, and enjoying institutions that aim at always expanding that freedom. And I think the great majority of those countries long for the day when they will be able to share even some of this happiness.

But the Leader of the Official Opposition is nonetheless right when he says that Canadians expect a great deal from this Parliament, from this government. All members of the House and of the Senate are undoubtedly aware of the responsibility they have of not thwarting those expectations. And I can assure the Leader of the Official Opposition that we, on our side, are keenly aware of our responsibilities and that we will do everything we can so that the dangers that exist in all areas of the world have as little effect as possible on Canadians.

[English]

We are entering a very dangerous decade, as the Leader of the Opposition rightly stated, and many lethal currents are swirling about our shores. The Leader of the Opposition alluded to dangers in other parts of the world, and I can tell him that not only when he was the prime minister but also now that he is in opposition we share the feelings he expressed about the dangers to the peace of the world of such events as we have witnessed in the past months: the invasion by military might of the sovereignty of another country; the crushing by oppressive regimes of liberties and very often the very lives of peoples in other countries; and the very dangerous events which can fall from chaotic economic conditions throughout the world which limit our freedom of action and our freedom to pursue our own economic happiness. These are great dangers, but in a sense the greatest enemy is the enemy within, not the enemy without. I remember something Pogo used to say: "We have met the enemy, and they are us".

An hon. Member: "He is us".

Mr. Trudeau: I have looked up the quotation, and it is "they are us".

I believe that the Leader of the Opposition was correct in spending a good part of the time of his speech indicating that indeed in Canada there is this growing doubt about our ability to continue to act as one strong nation, and before looking at who is responsible for that I think it is important that we at least have a fair diagnosis of what is happening. We do see Canadians fearing that other Canadians will be a danger to them. We see provinces closing their doors to capital or labour or goods from other provinces. We see some Canadians acting as though the language and culture of other Canadians was a threat to them. We see Canadians slamming the door one in the face of the other and putting impediments before the free movement of people—I suppose even of ideas and culture—throughout this land, and I think that is the greater of all the dangers present in this coming decade. That is the danger that can bring a proud Canada to its knees if we in this Parliament do not sense our responsibility in acting together and expressing the national will and the national interest.

I was very pleased to hear the Leader of the Opposition when he was commending you, Madam Speaker, and complimenting you on the role which you have courageously undertaken, and I join in those compliments. But I was pleased also to hear the Leader of the Opposition say that you and we in this chamber are here to uphold the national inerest and the national will. That gives me reason to be hopeful that this enemy within will soon be vanquished.

I had occasion to express that hope many times during the eight weeks of campaigning which we all went through when I sensed that in every part of Canada the majority of Canadians see as their first loyalty their loyalty to Canada before their loyalty to their regions. Very often we hear Quebeckers or Albertans say "I am a Quebecker" or "I am an Albertan"; but if you really press them and examine them, they will always say "I am a Canadian first and a Quebecker second" or "an Albertan second".

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: It is this loyalty to the whole country upon which we must build if we want to vanquish this enemy within, this gnawing doubt, this uncertainty as to whether or not we will continue in ten or 20 years to act as a strong, united nation. It is this loyalty to the whole country that we in this chamber have the duty to nourish and develop, and certainly we on the treasury benches and in this party will make every effort in that direction.

If, indeed, we are insensitive in some areas—and if it is not mere rumour but reality—I say in advance that we will try to make amends for that; we will try to show a better understanding of whatever group in society or whatever region of the country feels that it was not justly served by this government.

[Translation]

When I listened yesterday to the mover and seconder of the Address in Reply to the Speech from the Throne, I was proud to hear two new members voice their conviction with such eloquence, not only because they represent a part of the country that they hold dear but also because they managed in their maiden speech in this House to express their desire to serve not only their constituents, but also to serve the best interests of Canada, of the whole country, and to put their policy proposals in the context of a broader Canada which they are here to serve like all of us. And if we in this House do not constantly remind each other that this loyalty to Canada must prevail against the loyalty to the region, to the province or even to the constituency, well, who will do it for us?

● (1620)

We are the only group of men and women in this country who can speak for every Canadian. We are the only group, the only assembly in this country, which can speak for the whole nation, which can express the national will and the national interest. I think it is important that, in the discharge of our duties as the government or as the opposition, we look to that and that when we disagree, that that disagreement not be based on regional interests, on the fact that it might be the duty of provincial governments to serve, but be based on the concept of the whole which we try to serve in our different ways. Because, after all, what is the feeling of belonging to a country, which we call citizenship, and what is the feeling of loving a country, which we term patriotism? They have less to do with our debates, the policies and laws and even the constitution of this country. They have less to do even with the geography and the history of this country, which in a sense are collective notions, history being the recital of things that we have done together in the past.

I think patriotism has to be brought down to a much more individual level. A person loves his or her country and is loyal to it if he or she feels that she can get a fair deal in that country, if he or she feels that in any part of that country they will be able to fulfil themselves to the maximum of their possibilities. That will happen to them regardless of where they were born and regardless of how long they or their ancestors might have lived in this country.

The feeling of being a Canadian, that individual feeling which we must cultivate, the feeling of being loyal to something which is bigger than the province or the city in which we happen to live, must be based on a protection of the basic rights of the citizen, of an access by that citizen to a fair share of the abundance of wealth in this country and to the richness and diversity of its laws. In that sense, the national interest must prevail over the regional interest, difficult as it is for some of us sometimes to set aside our feelings as citizens of this town or inhabitants of that province, because the provincial governments and other groups are there to speak for their interests. That is their duty and that is what they are elected for. But we are elected to speak for all of Canada, and if a person cannot feel that in any part of the country he or she will get a fair share, then they will transfer their loyalty from the whole to the particular part of the country in which they choose to live.

That is the enemy within—when loyalties are no longer to the whole but there is a conflict in loyalties; when we seek protection of our wealth, our rights or our language not in the whole country but in a region or a province of that country. That is how we come to shut doors in each other's face, because we feel we will not get a fair share in every part of the country.

I admit that the concept of a fair share may be defined differently according to one's ideology, one's political beliefs; but I think that when you bring it down to certain basics, we in a democratic society would all agree that it must at least mean that no one will have cake unless everyone has bread. And perhaps, on a more sophisticated level, we could express that, as was done in the Speech from the Throne, by saying that it is our duty to help first those who need it most. Perhaps in our society, as I am looking once again for a common denominator among all parties, we would all agree that equality of opportunity at least must be offered to every citizen, no matter in what part of this country he or she was born or he or she chooses to live.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: That concept of sharing can only be guaranteed, I repeat, if there is a national government which is prepared to state that the national interest must prevail in any situation of conflict over regional differences.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: I think it is important to indicate in an aside that in a federal form of government like ours one cannot hold—and I am not holding—that the national government is the sole voice or that the national Parliament is the sole instrument of the national interest in every area. On the contrary, the Canadian Constitution provides that the exercise of sovereignty will be divided and that in some matters, such as resources or education, the national interest will be the aggregate of provincial interests. But even there, when the Fathers of Confederation, the founding Fathers, wrote the constitution they made sure that even in areas of provincial jurisdiction, if they were exercised in a way which was contrary to the national interest, it was the right, and I suppose we should say the obligation, of the national government to uphold the national interest. That is why we find in the Constitution of Canada such things as the declaratory power, the reservation and disallowance powers, the spending power and the right to make orders in matters of education as provided by section 93, subsections (3) and (4).

I am not saying that these rights cannot be limited or bargained away. As a matter of fact, our government, beginning in 1968 and 1969, proposed ways of limiting the spending power. Our government, as recently as at the federal-provincial conference in February of 1979, proposed ways of limiting the declaratory power. But what I am saying is that when there is a conflict of interest, not of laws which will be judged by the courts, the citizens must be convinced that there is a national government which will speak for the national interest and will ensure that it does prevail.

In spite of this divisiveness in Canada, in spite of the mounting alienations described by the hon. Leader of the Opposition, in spite of the fact that diversity must be recognized and is recognized by the very form of our federalism, in spite of the fact that there always can be some negotiations in the matter of constitutional reform which will try to remove feelings of alienation, we have to come back to the basic realization that if we are in federal politics and choose to sit in this chamber rather than in provincial chambers, first we must look to the expression of national interests rather than provincial ones.

Once again this is not a new doctrine, but I think it is increasingly challenged. I was somewhat worried by the tone of the Leader of the Opposition when once again he accused us of insensitivity, but where he was really saying that the national policies we were following were not acceptable in this or that province. He himself said that his government had been successful in reconciling these regional differences. He knows and we all know that he was not successful in reconciling, for instance, the views of the provinces of Ontario and Alberta on energy pricing. Perhaps there is no way of reconciling them. Perhaps the Leader of the Opposition is now sitting over there because he found out that his national policies—and I respect them as such—were not understood as such and were not accepted certainly by the government of Ontario in the matter of energy. That is one very real difficulty.

I repeat, we can disagree with the policies of the Leader of the Opposition on energy or other economic matters, but we will not criticize them for attempting to express what is good for the whole country. Nor would I expect him to criticize our policies on that basis. If the citizens of Canada want to feel really free in this country, they have to enjoy the basic freedom of movement, the freedom to move or the freedom not to move.

In the matter of resources, if the only way of having access to the wealth coming from a particular resource would be to move to its proximity, then indeed we would be losing one of our basic freedoms. If a citizen of Alberta, for instance, when he is offered a job in Ontario or Nova Scotia, thought he was giving up all claim on the wealth of that province, he would lose something of his freedom to move and he would say, "What happens if I go away? Do my children still have a claim on the heritage fund?" What happens to the family in Newfoundland who likes to live in Newfoundland but knows that if they move to some other part of Canada they may become wealthier sooner?

We have found answers to that over the decades in this country. We have found answers by equalization grants, by grants for regional development, by bringing in policies to help the aged, the unemployed and those who are handicapped to make sure that once again citizens of Canada get their fair share in any part of this country. It is in this spirit that we in this government intend to seek policies which will try to reconcile, or at least diminish, the differences between the interests of Ontario and Alberta, or of Quebec and British Columbia, or of any other part of Canada. It is in this spirit that this government will bring in laws, because we are convinced that if we have the will we can preserve this strong Canadian country; we can conquer the enemy within.

Ernest Renan once said that a nation is an everyday plebiscite and in that sense millions of Canadians have every day been expressing their support for Canada for more than a hundred years. They have spoken of their membership in this country which is based on sharing, on exchange, on brotherhood; through a form of plebiscite they have voted in favour of this country. And now, in the province of Quebec, we are living very historical times where Quebeckers will have to answer the question put to them in the plebiscite or referendum. That of course requires a greater sense of responsibility on their part, while giving them the opportunity to express their views on Canada, their views on the place that Quebec can and must take within Canada.

I for one had hoped that even the Parti Québécois would show more sincerity and more courage in this historical moment. As far back as January, 1977, I expressed the hope that the referendum question would be clear, that it would come soon and that it would be definitive, so that we could leave the issue aside for a generation at least. Unfortunately, the referendum question was slow in coming. It has been about three and a half years since the election of the Parti Québécois; it is not definitive since it is obvious in the very wording of the question that there will eventually be a second referendum, and it certainly is not clear since it is based on a deliberate ambiguity on the part of the Parti Québécois which knew full well that if it simply asked: "Do you, yes or no, want independence?" Quebeckers would say no.

Do PQ supporters want independence, yes or no, Madam Speaker? And if they want independence, why did they not put it squarely to the people of Quebec? They wanted to take them in by proceeding, as they say, by steps, but that is in the mind of everyone a systematic and voluntary ambiguity. I will have the opportunity as a Quebecker, along with other members, to work for the No campaign and express my views clearly on this issue when I go to the province of Quebec and I talk to Quebeckers as a Quebecker.

It is my duty today as Prime Minister of Canada to say, as the Leader of the Opposition did most eloquently, what position we will be taking in the event of a yes or no in the referendum.

Madam Speaker, I repeat that it is not the intention of the Government of Canada to go and wage the referendum battle. Quebeckers in the House will be doing that, and I am sure they will do so well and convincingly. As a government, I believe we have to explain to Quebeckers who will be called upon to vote yes or no what our attitude will be as the Government of Canada in the event of a yes as well as a no. That is what I intend to do in a few minutes if the House will bear with me.

Let us first consider the case of a Yes answer. Let us assume a majority of Quebeckers vote Yes in the referendum. The Premier of Quebec, Mr. Lévesque, will have to start by recognizing that his mandate to negotiate sovereignty-association is a very ambiguous one, as I said earlier. He must first recognize that to associate one must associate with someone. As the Leader of the Opposition pointed out so appropriately, all the premiers noted, sometimes individually and sometimes collectively like the four western premiers, that they were not interested in sovereignty-association. They entirely ruled out the possibility of association, in particular, first because it would be against their interests, as Premier Blakeney said as recently as last week. Association would not be interesting for his province if Quebec were to separate because economically he would not get the same sense of sharing as he does with Canada as a whole.

It is very obvious in the comments made by all those premiers that they have no sympathy for a government bent on destroying the nation and that if they were to associate they would certainly not associate with an independent state that had caused the breaking up of our country. Mr. Lévesque and his government said very clearly that sovereignty and association should be achieved at the same time, as it is clearly expressed in the referendum question, and that at the same time Quebec should maintain an economic association with Canada. And to be even clearer, Premier Lévesque emphasized that several times. I have here his speech of October 10, 1978, where he said, I quote:

There is no question in our mind of first achieving sovereignty and of negotiating association later on. Sovereignty and association must therefore be achieved together and concurrently.

Moreover, in the white paper published only a few months ago, one finds the following on page 77:

Sovereignty cannot go without association: they are inseparable.

Madam Speaker, imagine the feelings of the provincial first ministers who have no economic or cultural interest in negotiating association and who have absolutely no reason to agree to association. By asking this question, the Péquiste government has given them every reason to say no. By saying no, not only are these provinces acting in their interest, but they are also ensuring that Quebec will not achieve sovereignty since, once again, we have been assured that one will not come about without the other. Since Mr. Lévesque will not succeed, if the answer is yes, in dissociating from those with whom he seeks to associate, he will probably come to the federal government, where he will be received with the same courtesy that he has always shown me, and he will say: Do you, the federal government, want sovereignty-association with Quebec? I shall have to tell him first of all that Canada is a sovereign and independent country and that common markets are set up by sovereign and independent countries.

I do not know whether we shall eventually establish one, but since for the moment Quebec is not a sovereign and independent country, there is no way of discussing association with Quebec. On the contrary, Quebec is part of a federation which is itself an association. This federation can be changed and improved, but it is not an association of the common market type which the Canadian government could negotiate with the Quebec government since, in our view, Quebec is not an independent country.

In this case, perhaps Mr. Lévesque will say: Well, since we cannot discuss association, let us discuss purely and simply sovereignty. Obviously, the reply will be: Mr. Lévesque, you do not have a mandate to discuss purely and simply sovereignty because you did not ask this question purely and simply in your referendum. You therefore have no mandate to discuss sovereignty, and as Canadian Prime Minister, I do not have myself a mandate to discuss this with you since your concept of sovereignty is in fact defined in your question as the exclusive power to make your own laws, to collect your own taxes and to establish your own external relations. Not even two months ago, the people in Quebec, together with the rest of the country, unequivocally elected a government to sit in Ottawa precisely to make laws for the entire country, to collect taxes and redistribute them throughout the country and to look after external relations. We have therefore just received from the people in Quebec a mandate to exercise sovereignty for the entire country.

Since this will be a dialogue between two persons without mandates to discuss sovereignty, it seems to me, Madam Speaker, that Mr. Lévesque will perforce be nonsuited. And it is my forecast that this nonsuit will probably prompt some Péquistes to say: "You see, there is no possible talks with the federal government. The other provinces are not reasonable, they will not have discussions with us. You voted Yes on referendum day, but now you are being humiliated by a partner who will not recognize your Yes vote; he will not even negotiate with you."

Then people will say: "The only way out is to slam the door and look for ways to reach independence, period!" You see, Madam Speaker, how the No answer that will be given to the PQ choice by all parties in this House, the No answer that has already been given to the PQ choice by provincial premiers, will be interpreted by some as a No answer to the people of Quebec, and this is what I would like to caution Quebeckers against. Those who will be casting a Yes vote to the referendum should know at the outset they are proceeding into a dead end. They must know at the outset that a Yes vote can only lead to a political and legal impasse, because as I have shown there can be no association without partners, of which there is none. And independence cannot be achieved without association, which is why it will not be achieved.

More serious still than that attempt that will be made by some PQ supporters to interpret such criticism as an insult to Quebeckers, this answer we are giving in advance, is that this dead end will prevent us from renewing our federalism. It will prevent us from putting aside once and for all those constitutional arguments about government levels and the powers exercised by each, which go on at the expense of the people because they are leading all active elements—all creative elements in the Quebec people—into a dead end to which we see no way out.

Another serious matter is that there will be another referendum because the Quebec premier is stating in the question itself that there will be another referendum. He says so in many of his speeches, that there will be eventually another referendum, which means there can be no end to the uncertainty. This uncertainty weighs heavily not only on Quebec but on all of Canada. It has unfavourable economic repercussions on employment and the development of our resources, because nobody will be any wiser as far as Canada's future is concerned. But rather than amplifying on this, which I may have other opportunities to do, let us now see what will happen if a No answer is given to the referendum question. As much as I would like to suggest there would then be nothing but order and beauty, luxury, quiet and bliss, as the verse goes, nothing unfortunately is more doubtful. A No vote by the Quebec people would mean, at any rate for the time being, that sovereignty-association would no longer be discussed. It would mean, as I believe the Leader of the Official Opposition, myself and doubtless the leader the New Democratic Party would have it, that the Quebec people want renewed federalism. But who will be the interlocutor for this renewed federalism, Madam Speaker? The PQ government would destroy federalism, so we really cannot expect it to have a constructive attitude in the search for new formulas.

Before building a house to meet the needs of a family, it must be first decided that family life is wanted. Now, as we know, the ultimate goal of the PQ ideology is to sever Quebec from Canada; we cannot then bank on them to hold very productive negotiations in the field of new federalism. So, I repeat, even a No vote may not necessarily lead to the renewed federalism everyone wants. There is doubtless one way of ensuring it, and that is a massive No, a No that rings so loud and clear that the PQ government would understand that Quebeckers truly do not want to separate from Canada, and that they had better buckle down to the task of renewing federalism instead of destroying it.

That is the knot that we find in the chain that is presented by the kind of question which has been proposed. If the answer to the question of the referendum is Yes, then we are in a dead-end situation because, and I repeat, nobody wants or can associate in a common market type of association with a Quebec which will not be independent by virtue of its very question. Nobody can negotiate the independence of Quebec since the premier of Quebec will not have a mandate to negotiate it unless he gets association and since we as a government have just received from the province of Quebec a massive mandate to make laws for the province of Quebec along with the rest of the country.

What is important at this stage of our political life is to put an end to the uncertainty that Quebec has been in since the PQ party was elected in November, 1976. Once again, that is why the only chance that we can have of obtaining that would be a massive No vote on the referendum. I am not prophesying any result on the referendum; I am only analysing what the attitude of the federal government will be and must be. I do feel that at this time in the life of Canada it is important, if we are going to build bridges between every part of Canada, that we get rid of that doubt. And I repeat, that doubt is not only expressed by the separatists in Quebec, but also by what is hopefully still a small minority across the land who have been closing doors or burning bridges and protecting their particular interest over and above the national interest.

We in this Parliament have a great duty to try and express as fairly as possible the national will of all Canadians. Certainly on this side of the House we have a great compelling faith that it can be done, because we know that in most societies problems which are caused by human beings can be solved by human beings. We are confident that we can find ways to ensure that every part of Canada sees that it is represented in some way, not only in the Parliament of this country but in the government of this country, whatever that government happens to be.

The Speech from the Throne proposed that we look into ways of ensuring this better representation. The Leader of the Opposition attempted, with what means he had when he was prime minister, to represent Quebec in his government. We attempted with what means we had to represent parts of Canada where we had no elected members. They are insufficient.

There are other ways of doing it. We had in Bill C-60 in a previous Parliament proposed that this kind of representation come through the Senate. Propositions have been made by Pepin-Robarts and various premiers that we look at forms of proportional representation. The idea was even discussed after the last election. We hope that a committee of Parliament will look into every way in which our electoral system, or indeed our parliamentary system, can be changed to make sure that the government can not only speak for the whole country but can be seen by each part of the country as speaking for it. Other countries have other systems and perhaps they achieve that better; I do not know. But I hope that this committee will look not only at proportional representation but various forms of electoral or parliamentary change which could ensure that there is an expression of national will when a government speaks.

I do not discard the idea of an eventual national referendum. If that is the only way in which we can get the people of Canada to affirm their loyalty to Canada over and above their regional loyalties, then I think we should not put the idea aside. Eventually I hope to have occasion to discuss that idea with leaders of other parties and perhaps with the premiers. Perhaps we can find some simple question having to do with constitutional reform upon which there would be a large enough measure of agreement to have a positive vote for Canada in a national referendum. But that is not for today nor indeed perhaps for this particular session, although I hope it might be for this Parliament.

In conclusion, I think we all must realize that our economic problems, the questions we must solve in foreign affairs, the challenges we meet in the development of this country in every way, in the exchange of cultures, can only be discussed fruitfully in the context of a strong Canada. And Canada must be strong not only militarily, though that is important, and not only economically, though that is vital, but Canada must be strong in the hearts of its people. Canada must be strong more than in its institutions; it must be strong in the kind of adherence that each individual citizen makes to the common good, to the national will.

Only if we have the national will to share in the common destiny of the country as a whole, only if we are willing to build in justice and freedom a Canada of a meeting of ethnic groups, a Canada where economic and cultural sharing are open and generous, only when we have accomplished that, Madam Speaker, will we have, in this legislature, accomplished the duty entrusted to us by our electors.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTION TO BE DEBATED

Madam Speaker: Order, please. It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 40, to inform the House that the question to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment is as follows: the hon. member for Hamilton Mountain (Mr. Deans)—Industry, Trade and Commerce—Jobs available in automobile manufacturing.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

[English]

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mrs. Côté for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session.

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Madam Speaker, at the outset of this Parliament, at this particularly poignant period in our history, we should be committing ourselves to the kind of future greatness that our combination of peoples and nature makes possible—a greatness whose character rests neither on numbers nor on power, but on the quality of life we make possible for all those who live within our borders.

At this moment in particular, then, our goal must not be merely the temporary patching up of immediate flaws or grievances that we find in the land; our goal should be nothing less than the setting out of objectives which will enable us a decade from now not only to look back and say that Canada is indeed more decent in its arrangements and more exciting for all its members, but is indeed still one country because of the things we started to do in 1980.

We in this Parliament, Madam Speaker, have an obligation to the people of Canada to provide the leadership and policies that will make this reality possible. We must do so not only because that is what a democratic mandate ought to be about in general, but because as the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) recognized, particularly at this moment, such policies, such actions, are necessary to garner and maintain support among all our regions and peoples which is so essential to Canada at this time.

[Translation]

Quebeckers will have to vote on the political future of their province and of Canada on May 20. They have two possibilities: sovereignty-association and Canada. Quebeckers will say Yes to Canada if they think that we want deep changes and that we reject the status quo. Like other Canadians but more strongly, they demand changes in Quebec. In this session, they expect us to act. It would not be enough to insist on the economic benefits offered by Canada to convince Quebeckers, but at the same time I want to stress that it is not enough to have taken action. It is also necessary to convince them that we want fundamental changes to build a society that is more just for everyone in Canada.

[English]

The Speech from the Throne and the Prime Minister have suggested certain laudable goals that might take us in this direction. The Prime Minister focused in a serious and thoughtful way on some of the abstract principles involved in a Oui or Non vote on the question that is before the people of the province of Quebec, and in a general, abstract way on some of the considerations that are involved in developing a sense of loyalty or patriotism in the regions.

There are some matters he did not touch upon which I think are so central to the argument, so important to the reality of genuine feelings of national unity, that I intend certainly to touch upon them, because the argument cannot be left in abstract form. If we learned anything from the recent debate in the province of Quebec on the question before that assembly, we should be convinced that logic, and reason, while having an important role to play, are quite inadequate in terms of winning the hearts and minds of a people to move in a certain direction in history.

Therefore, Madam Speaker, I want to put my argument in somewhat recasted form to deal with the framework that the Prime Minister provided for the argument. When we talk about patriotism and about a sense of fairness being connected, as the Prime Minister suggested, that we are likely to be patriotic and have a sense of the legitimacy of the whole of our country if we have a sense that fairness is in fact occurring where we happen to live, in our work place or in our region, then I will agree with that part of the argument because it is one that we in this party have made for a long time.

But through you, Madam Speaker, I want to ask the Prime Minister to consider his own throne speech in the context of that framework, to reflect a bit upon our recent history when he was Prime Minister and to make some judgments about the accuracy of his own statement today that his own government, through its actions, had moved in rather decisive ways to create feelings of patriotism and feelings of fairness in these regions. In my view, the problems singled out in the throne speech—that of foreign ownership, that of the need to have improvements for women in Canada, that of the need for an industrial strategy—are all problems that are not new in Canada. In fact, they are not new in the sense of being addressed by the government that we have today.

Canadians know that in reality we do not have a new government today. What we have is the same Prime Minister and the same party that has continuously governed for 12 years except for a nine-month interlude. Canadians know that the programs enunciated in the Speech from the Throne are in fact being enunciated in the Speech from the Throne precisely because of the inadequacy of the government that we had for the past 12 years, and that it was the Liberal government itself that created the need for its own throne speech yesterday.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: I ask the Prime Minister to reflect on his own speech when he says that patriotism is related to a sense of a fair deal, and to ask himself how the people of the various regions of Canada who are considering this very important and historic debate today are going to respond to that when they think about his own government.

How are they going to respond to the promises when they consider the following: that it was a Liberal government that created its own problem of a lack of a sense of patriotism, to use the Prime Minister's words, or a feeling of "the enemy within" to use his phrase applied in a new context. For example, Madam Speaker, if you were a western Canadian on the prairies in the last few years and you did not get a commitment for the speedy implementation of the Hall royal commission, and because you did not there was prolonged alienation from western farmers who had a sense of grievance that was not being dealt with by the Liberal party, how would you feel? Or if you were a Cape Bretoner in Sydney in the last six, seven, eight, or nine years and you knew you had the potential steel resources, the coal and the labour force, but you had a central government that failed to address the needs of the people and the human reality of getting stable jobs that could have been provided by serious capital investment in the steel industry that only the national government and not the government of Nova Scotia could provide, then how would you feel about such a situation? How are people going to feel toward a government now that talks about doing something for an industrial strategy when their own sense of alienation and of being cut off as a Cape Bretoner was, in part, a very direct byproduct of the failure of this government to act?

Or if you are one of the 20,000 unemployed auto workers who are in part symptomatic of the reality that the province of Ontario, for the first time in Canadian history, is becoming a have-not province because it has not had an industrial strategy worthy of the name, how are you going to respond to a Prime Minister who talks in very abstract terms today about the need to overcome a sense of personal or regionally restricted grievance? Madam Speaker, it seems to me that you are not likely to respond with a great amount of enthusiasm—if I can put it that way—to the new commitment that we presumably got in the throne speech yesterday.

It is not just the question of a farmer on the prairies, or a potential steelworker in Sydney who is unemployed, or an auto worker in Ontario who is unemployed. There are general categories which the Prime Minister mentioned that I think are more devastating as examples of the reason that we have tension.

The Prime Minister committed himself and his government in 1971 to the view that redistribution of wealth was a hallmark of his party. If it is so, it is the wrong kind of hallmark because during the period he was Prime Minister we redistributed wealth all right, but upwards. After a decade, instead of the poor in Canada being reduced as a statistical entity, their proportion increased numerically.

In 1968, again to deal with the issue that he brings appropriately before us today in his speech, he raised the question of regional development. What happened? In Atlantic Canada both the number of new jobs and percentage of new investment declined in comparative terms with the rest of Canada throughout the decade during which the present Prime Minister governed this country. So we did not get regional development. We got an exacerbation of regional economic circumstances after the present Prime Minister's decade in power.

Similarly in the throne speech concern was expressed about women and inequality. The reality again is that women in our country have, after years of the present government, a large gap between their salaries and those of men because this government talked in abstracts and did nothing about it in ten years. In fact, the gap has widened somewhat not narrowed, in the past decade.

A resource-based economy is indeed central to what the Prime Minister has said, because there are feelings of regionalism in northern Ontario and in much of British Columbia. There are feelings of regionalism in every part of our country that is dependent on resource extraction and export of those resources abroad. These people do not feel they are getting a square deal from Ottawa or from their national government.

A few years ago, in 1968, the Prime Minister said we had to diversify our economy and get away from dependence on the export of resources. Again, the reality is that in 1978, after ten years of Liberal government, our dependence on the resource sector has grown from 51.6 per cent to 54.5 per cent. Instead of making us less dependent, we became more dependent.

I could go on and cite other examples but I will not at this point. The important point about all of these items, as well as the others I could cite, is that not only did the Liberals fail completely to deliver on these worth-while goals during the past decade, but they did so from within the framework of being able to act if they had wanted to.

There are a number of examples, among them inflation and unemployment in general across the country, where a government of Canada is very much influenced by world circumstances; but every one of the examples I have referred to—and they were deliberately selected for that reason—were areas of policy that the Government of Canada could have acted upon and produced measures that would have reduced some of the problems—apart from their inherent justice that the Prime Minister talked about—if it had wanted to act. The reason we have problems in these areas is because the party opposite did not do in 1968 what it promised. So why should we believe them today?

I want to spend half of my time in this important debate on the question of national unity, more narrowly defined in the sense that I want to talk about the referendum. Before doing so, I want to say something about certain particular items that could get immediate action, but which we have had no sign we are going to get from the present government. We got it in the throne speech and, if I may say so, we got it from the Prime Minister today, a nice general framework. If one is complacent and concerned simply with the intellectual framework of arguments, one might go away very impressed and say yes, there is a demonstration of an understanding in broad terms of our problems.

Politics, however, is quite different from that. Politics requires something other than a broad understanding. Politics requires action to meet the real needs of human beings if you want to get the general results.

What are some of the real problems and sources of regional discontent that bear directly on the question of national unity and are not getting action? Interest rates, of course, is one of them. The Conservative party criticized the Liberals on this question before last May when they got into power. I accept in one sense that if you operate within that philosophical framework, you may change your policy. There are some policies they may have to change and maybe they should be a little more hesitant about making commitments in advance.

The Conservatives promised a low interest rate policy. When they got in, they increased interest rates four times. The Liberals in the most recent campaign blasted the Conservatives for their high interest rate program. Now they are in power and they too have increased interest rates four times. I want to indicate that these problems are not abstract.

I want to deal with the reply today of the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) when he asked whether there is an alternative, and I will come to that in a minute. The situation is alarming because not only in Canada but because of the monetary policies of absurd and irresponsible government in Great Britain, and now in the United States, this kind of economic thinking, which I thought went out forever in 1920, is creating the foundation for a major depression on a world-wide scale. That has been widely recognized.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: Just look at some of the indications in our own country. In the logging industry in British Columbia as of yesterday more than 5,000 workers were out of a job, most of them since January. In Saskatchewan today farmers are losing control of their farms, not in high numbers yet but in record numbers for modern times. Young men and in some cases women can no longer go into farming because of high interest rates.

The home ownership situation in our land is now truly calamitous. Once home ownership was a dream for Canadians. In 1980 that dream is turning into a nightmare, and I do not exaggerate. For those who are going to be renewing their mortgages, and most people with mortgages are young families with income levels that qualified them for minimal subsidies in the last few years—I am told there are about 350,000 mortgages coming up for renewal—the average increase in monthly payment is going to be 54 per cent in one year. That is about $200 a month on a typical mortgage, or almost $3,000 a year.

If the government does not act decisively, and not just for those at the bottom end of the income scale but for every Canadian in this mortgage crisis situation, more people will lose their homes in 1980 than in any period since the depression, and any government should be seriously and humanly concerned about that reality.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: I point out to the Minister of Finance that just two weeks ago in Newfoundland for any fisherman wanting to buy a boat the interest rate went up 2 per cent. I understand that with that 2 per cent increase in the interest rate on a 65-foot longliner, a Newfoundland fisherman will be required to catch 250,000 additional pounds of fish just to pay for that increase.

For the first time since the depression credit unions and caisses populaires are having their very existence threatened because of the high interest rate situation. With regard to small businesses, bankruptcies increased 25 per cent in the first two months of this year. The logging industry on the west coast, fishermen in Atlantic Canada, auto workers in Ontario, credit unions, caisses populaires, small businesses and now medium-sized businesses are all under threat because of the absurd interest rate policy of this government, and that means human beings are under threat.

The Minister of Finance asks what can be done. I say to him that Germany, Switzerland and Japan have a low interest rate policy, though as he knows, the rate has gone up somewhat.

Mr. MacEachen: Quite a bit.

Mr. Broadbent: In most cases it is about half what it is in Canada. When you have an inflation rate of 20 per cent in the United States and an inflation rate in Canada of 10 per cent, you do not have to rely on the old argument that we have to move anywhere near the Americans in terms of interest rate policy because the real rate on return in Canada is higher than in the United States.

I say to the Minister of Finance that I will provide him with a list of economists if he wants to listen to some progressive people, instead of following the move to the right that has taken place in economic circles in recent years. In that way he can learn something from others and do something that is good for the people of this country. One of our spokespersons in this debate will dwell on that issue at considerable length.

Then there is the issue in the throne speech that has immediate consequences, that of controlling Canadian gas and oil resources. I thought it was a misprint when I originally read my text. The Liberals said they would commit themselves to obtaining 50 per cent ownership of our petroleum industry by 1990. What a challenge! What leadership! Every other country in the world with oil resources, such as Venezuela, Mexico and countries in the Middle East, have long since taken over completely their oil industry, and that is precisely what we in Canada should be doing. However, in ten years with the Liberals, Canadians will have 50 per cent. That is the marvellous Liberal approach that I am sure will characterize all of the other so-called progressive points found in the throne speech. The NDP says that ten years is not good enough. We should have virtually total control of our industry in this country within five years, not half in ten.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: Another practical measure is in the farming area. In addition to bringing down interest rates, which would help farmers, a number of suggestions have been made that the government should act on and which would be useful. One was proposed by Environment Canada, pointing out that if we developed our own greenhouse industry like a number of other countries have, we could be using heat from our power plants that is now wasted and save a billion dollars annually in imports of fruits and vegetables. A billion dollars is very important in terms of the effect on our balance of payments.

• (1730)

A particular which received almost no attention at all in the throne speech and which was totally ignored by the Prime Minister today was the fate of more than one million unemployed Canadians. We in this party are not going to stand back, forget, and make them part of a forgotten generation of unemployed. When there are a million unemployed there is a human reality, and there is an economic reality in terms of the lost production of goods and services. Indeed, we need a budget soon which will have its prime focus on creating jobs for Canadians who want to work and not receive handouts.

In short, apart from the nice general framework provided for by the Prime Minister in his argument, he should have given us some visible testimony that he is going to move in dealing with our concerns. He is right that a sense of patriotism or a feeling of national loyalty is dependent upon our own economic well-being where we happen to live, and if he had provided that kind of commitment for action in his speech today, I for one, and many more Canadians, would be considerably happier than we are at this moment.

There are a number of other areas which require serious action by this Parliament in the coming decade. I say frankly that at this point my party is facing these, but there is no easy answer. We are developing policies ourselves, but I want to list some of these because whether we are in the Progressive Conservative Party of Canada, the Liberal party or the New Democratic Party, in our parliamentary work in the next few years we should be seriously concerned about the problems which are associated with maintaining a sane and healthy environment for our people in an advanced industrial age.

This country has uranium resources. What kind of over-all policy do we have for the development of uranium, with all its horrific possible implications if we export it for nuclear war? At the same time what can we do with countless nations around the world which do not have the alternative sources of energy which we have?

Then there is the very important question of military spending, which must be of concern to all of us. One of the disturbing events which came up during the election campaign, which is symptomatic of new developments in the relationships between the United States and the U.S.S.R., is the heightening of their tension. I for one as a human being am deeply disturbed by the commitment of both the United Statets and the U.S.S.R., to new and massive spending in the military field.

I am deeply disturbed by reports which are now being put out in both the U.S.S.R., and the United States of America that they could survive nuclear wars. We have to be concerned because just a few years ago in both of those countries—and notably in the United States—there was expression of deep concern about even talking of the possibility of nuclear war. There was appropriate human concern about the holocaust that would be involved. However, the terminology has now shifted, and mililtary people in both those great powers are convincing themselves and, in the documents that they are producing for the first time, are beginning to try to convince their populations that a nuclear war is survivable.

We have to be deeply concerned about heading off that kind of conflict. To say the least, that is a considerable understatement. In that context it is not just the nuclear development that we are concerned about. We are concerned also about the level of military spending as a whole particularly in the context of the problems of the Third World. There was a commission headed by a very distinguished world citizen, Willy Brandt, which completed its report recently. It pointed out the growing inequality between the north and the south, and pointed out in this context the real danger for the poorer part of mankind of the allocation of so much of our resources to armament.

As a Canadian I want to illustrate the point because we ourselves are in the process of spending massively in the military field. On the basis of data produced by the Brandt commission I have made calculations regarding the F-18 which we are going to be purchasing in Canada. Many members of Parliament in all parties have been concerned that when that decision is made the economic benefits should be shared in the country. That is a reasonable argument, but the relevant question is whether we should be spending money at all at this point in history for that kind of murderous weapon.

For each one of those planes we buy we could, instead, be providing 60,000 tons of rice for people who are starving in the Third World. For the price of each one of those aeroplanes we could be providing 30,000 pharmacies to the Third World, where drugs or medical care of a sophisticated nature are almost non-existent. That is for only one aircraft. Just think what we could be doing if we had a priority other than spending money in the military domain!

I stress that this is a problem for mankind. It concerns the west, it concerns the east bloc, and the point I am making is that there are increasing amounts now being allocated as part of the gross national products in each of the major powers for armaments. Surely it is a time to renew once again major efforts to bring about disarmament for mankind.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: Madam Speaker, I would now like to broach the subject of national unity, a subject which concerns not only Quebeckers but all of us. I can say that members of my party share with Quebeckers their independent spirit, their national pride and their love for their heritage but if we want these feelings to blossom we need a solid foundation for our two peoples. My party recognizes that Quebeckers have the right to choose freely their political future; the choice is theirs not ours. As far as we are concerned, the constitution must reflect the country's reality; if it no longer does, then it must be changed. Society evolves and political structures must adapt to its evolution. The Canada of the last century must give way to the Canada of the eighties. As a social democrat party, we must first choose the values we want to implement in our society; then we can decide what constitutional arrangements would be best to reach this goal. Here are some concrete examples of these values: the right to live and to work in one's own language, as language is a fundamental aspect of the personality; the right to hold an interesting and stable job; equality between sexes; security for retired people; Canadian control and development of our own resources. And finally, the effective redistribution of the economic benefits provided by our country.

Madam Speaker, because of the ideological changes that have taken place since the sixties, I think most Quebeckers agree now on these principles. The question is now to decide what form of constitutional system is best: independence, sovereignty-association or a renewed federalism. But now I want to deal with the recent debate held in the Quebec National Assembly. Recently I read the interesting and moving speech made in the National Assembly by Mr. Claude Charron, parliamentary leader of the PQ. In his speech, Mr. Charron cited many examples of the mismanagement of what he called "the old regime". He recalled the indecision about the future of the Guy-Favreau complex, about Mirabel airport, the lotteries, the convention centre in Montreal, the automobile industry. During that debate, several other ministers of the Quebec government denounced the objectionable dealings of the old regime, the problems with the soft sectors, the shipyards, research and development and other such problems. Madam Speaker, my colleagues and myself fully agree with Mr. Charron and his colleagues on this point.

Mr. Trudeau: What's wrong with Mirabel?

Mr. Broadbent: I regret to have to say to the Prime Minister that Mr. Charron and his colleagues are quite right. These are true examples of complete failures of the old regime.

Mr. Trudeau: Not at all.

Mr. Broadbent: Strangely enough, the Parti Québécois did not specify that this old regime was the Liberal government. The reason is quite clear, they did not want to stress the fact that these problems have been created by politicians, namely by the Liberals, and are not the result of federalism, because they wanted—

Mr. Trudeau: But do you agree with what they said?

Mr. Broadbent: The Prime Minister does not like that argument, but it is a fact.

Mr. Trudeau: Do you agree?

Mr. Broadbent: The Prime Minister agrees—

Mr. Trudeau: But do you agree on lotteries, on Mirabel and on everything Mr. Charron has said?

Mr. Broadbent: Yes, I agree on those arguments, as I have already said. The Prime Minister has made his speech, may I continue my remarks now?

Mr. Trudeau: Indeed!

Mr. Broadbent: The members of the Parti Québécois did not say that the Liberals had made the same mistakes in the other provinces. True, we had a problem with airports, not only at Mirabel, but in Pickering. There is no doubt that we have problems in some soft sectors in Quebec; there are also problems in some sectors in the maritime provinces or in the province of Ontario, but the members of the Parti Québécois did not say that for two reasons.

It is obvious to me as a New Democrat, Madam Speaker, that the federal political system is not responsible for those mistakes. Those who are at fault are those who governed the country during all those years, and those people are almost exclusively the Liberal Party of Canada. Madam Speaker, the system is not responsible for those problems, the politicians are. It is the Liberals who did not do anyting about foreign control over our resources. It is the Liberals who did not accept Quebec nationalism. It is the Liberals who did not set up an industrial strategy, not only for Quebec, but for the whole of Canada. Those are facts. For me, Madam Speaker, and for many Canadians in other provinces, a federal Canada does not mean a liberal Canada. But at the same time, as I said, I do not agree with the PQ philosophy—

Mr. Trudeau: Ah, yes, only the arguments.

Mr. Broadbent: Ah, ah, you agree now. Those mistakes can be avoided without destroying federalism. Furthermore, we can find a more efficient solution for our two peoples with a new federalism.

We of the New Democratic Party believe in a new federalism, a federalism that is fair for all regions. It is not enough to give linguistic equality to our two founding groups to arrive at a just society. But I want to point out that we support that principle and we agree entirely with the objectives of the Languages Act. Of course. The right to work in one's language is basic but you need to have work to be able to do that.

I think it is possible to create a new, more equalitarian Canada not only in the linguistic area but also in all other areas. That is the raison d'être of social democracy not only here in Canada but also in Norway, Germany, Sweden and also in Quebec. Canadians must finally be able to share Canada's immense wealth. That can be done within a new agreement.

The NDP represents among federal political parties the more diverse, the more progressive ideas. We believe in the development of our country by ourselves. We do not fear change or new ideas in social, cultural, economic and political areas. And in the provinces where we formed the government, we made the necessary changes. Basically, we are federalists because we think that form of flexible government is the one which allows to bring about the reforms we are hoping for. We do not want to rule instead of the provinces. On the contrary, we want to establish clearly the right for the provinces to control their natural resources and their communications. They have a fundamental role to play, and particularly Quebec due to its unique character.

We have stated several times in the last few years that we agree on the social and economic objectives of the Quebec government. For example, on the following policies, I want to tell the Prime Minister that we agree.

Madam Speaker: Unfortunately, the hon. member's time has expired. Has he the consent of the House to continue?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Translation]

Mr. Broadbent: I want to tell the Prime Minister that we agree on the following programs of the Parti Québécois: the income supplement program, the automobile insurance program, the incentive program for small and medium-sized businesses, the nationalization of the asbestos mines, the free access to the Quebec territory for recreation, hunting, fishing and other purposes, the objectives of the language act, the health insurance plan. To us those programs are acceptable. Those are several examples of programs the Quebec government implemented within the federal system. Those are the facts. It is thus possible, Madam Speaker, to change considerably the social and economic structures of the Quebec society within a federal system. You simply have to change the parties, especially if the federal government is social democrat.

For my part, Madam Speaker, I do not believe that the answer to the constitutional problems of Quebeckers and Canadians lies in sovereignty-association. Why not? There are many reasons for this. It is obvious that no provincial government will support such an association; there will be a permanent conflict between the two sovereign governments. But in my view and that of my party, there is a basic argument against this concept: It would not be a fair arrangement for the ordinary citizens of western and Atlantic Canada. I would like to explain why, Madam Speaker.

At the present time, Saskatchewan farmers, British Columbia lumbermen and Newfoundland fishermen purchase products manufactured in Quebec and Ontario. They can buy these same products at a lower price outside Canada. These products are now protected by import tariffs and quotas. Western and eastern citizens accept this situation because people in Ontario and Quebec pay taxes not only to Toronto and Quebec City, but also to Ottawa. This is the reason.

The Parti Québécois wants one without the other. It wants the tariffs and quotas, but it does not want Quebeckers to pay their share to Ottawa. Madam Speaker, I would like to ask Quebeckers if they would accept such a situation if they were Saskatchewan farmers or Newfoundland fishermen. I do not believe they would because it would not be equitable. Quebeckers want justice like all other Canadians. Once again, is everyone aware that we can say yes to Quebec without saying no to Canada? I am convinced that English Canada is willing to review its whole position within Canada and to negotiate a new agreement. I hope that the present debate will bring us closer to each other. It would be a sad thing if a misunderstanding were to lead to a situation where any agreement would be impossible. There have been inequities in the past. It is obvious, Madam Speaker, that we cannot make up for these inequities, but it must also be said that a lot of progress has already been made in Canada. Much has yet to be done, especially in the areas of economic equality, equality of the sexes, control of our resources and employment.

Madam Speaker, together we can build a Quebec and a Canada which will be fair and exciting for everyone, there is no doubt about it.

[English]

I would like to conclude by moving an amendment to the motion, Madam Speaker. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

That the amendment be amended by changing the period at the end thereof to a comma, and by adding immediately thereafter the following words:

"and this House regrets in particular the failure of the government to change the monetary policies in effect since 1975, and to instruct the governor of the Bank of Canada to take immediate steps to lower the interest rate by at least two percentage points."

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Desmarais: Madam Speaker, may I call it six o'clock?

Madam Speaker: It being six o'clock, I do now leave the chair until eight o'clock this evening.

At 5.55 p.m. the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

[Translation]

Mr. Louis R. Desmarais (Dollard): Mr. Speaker, it is with deep emotion that I rise to make my maiden speech in this House before such a distinguished audience. I feel privileged, Mr. Speaker, to have the opportunity to address my colleagues from the floor of this historic House which has guarded and preserved the rights and privileges of all Canadians since confederation.

First, I want to tell my constituents in Dollard how much I appreciate the honour they bestowed upon me by electing me as their representative in this House. To all the people of Ville-Saint-Laurent, Dollard des Ormeaux, Roxboro and Pierrefonds, I reiterate my deep gratitude for all the help, support and co-operation they gave me so generously.

I should also like to extend my most sincere congratulations to Madam Speaker for the expression of confidence she received from the House. With the electors from the riding of Laval-des-Rapides I feel honoured that their representative should have been chosen by the House to preside over its business.

At the same time I wish to tell my colleagues how pleased I am to be with them today and follow in the footsteps of the parliamentarians of today and yesterday who contributed so much to make Parliament what it is today. I am very grateful to my colleagues on this side of the House for their warm welcome. I am looking forward to working with them as a team.

[English]

I do not hesitate, Mr. Speaker, to express myself in personal terms in this my maiden speech to this House. Reflections on human feelings, individual sentiments and personal characteristics, in so far as they contribute to a better understanding of individual needs are common to the Liberal traditions which my party hold.

We are living in confusing, discouraging, frustrating times. Rising costs, falling productivity, the incredibly complex organization of big business, big labour and big government have reduced the individual to a quivering mass of doubt and uncertainty. We see the most powerful of the world's nations reduced to helplessness before the threats of a group of terrorists in Iran, and we ask what is the meaning of power?

We see Soviet tanks roll into Afghanistan in a brutal and arrogant takeover of a nation. We watch and wonder at this aggression, and we watch and wonder all the more when retaliation consists of an American threat to boycott the Olympic games. It is an exaggeration to suggest that there is a feeling of helplessness growing among ordinary citizens when they witness the helplessness of a major power.

There is a feeling that somewhere along the line we have lost control. Events have overrun us and developed a momentum of their own. This uneasiness exists in spite of the fact that big business has provided us with ever-increasing wealth. Big labour has made sure that the work force gets its share of economic benefits, and big government has so organized the social structures that, in its role of referee, it finds itself in a position where it must attempt to maintain order and a due proportion in the returns allocated to its important and not always silent partners.

[Translation]

In spite of all those developments, today Canadian citizens are more and more isolated from the powers that be. They are entirely dependent upon government, business and labour superstructures which are the framework of our democratic society. It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that the majority of our constituents fall into that category of helpless citizens when dealing with large bureaucracies. Those defenceless taxpayers are but pawns in the power play between the major representatives of the community and they have no opportunity for effective action except for exercising their right to vote every four years. This is a very frustrating situation.

Mr. Speaker, I am far from declaring illegitimate or unacceptable the government business and labour democracies that have developed in our society over the last 50 years or so. Obviously the structural gigantism of government, business and labour is a normal and unavoidable phenomenon in an advanced democratic society, particularly in a country like ours where the people are scattered over a vast territory.

Modern governments are virtually the only ones able to provide various services such as communications, postal service, welfare and others.

[English]

In a society as intricately structured as ours, the difficulties encountered by government in perceiving and resolving the interests of the individual citizens are many and complex. The result is that, from many points of view, individuals today, although enjoying a large degree of constitutional freedom, are nevertheless placed under growing constraints in the conduct of their own affairs.

It is true that political parties and governments throughout the western world, since World War I and before, have been preoccupied with the need to improve the human condition. The purpose of the policies and programs to which almost all parties without exception paid lip service was to ensure that the substance of liberty and benefit of freedom in real terms—that is an adequate standard of living with a right to equal opportunity—should be available to all.

Chimeric as such objectives might seem in the light of what is happening in the world today, the true democrat, the true liberal, the true believer in human freedom will not despair. Nor will he ever relinquish the hope of making it possible for all men to enjoy the fruits of the creative society; that is, a society in which leisure to contribute and create is brought about, not by forced unemployment but by an arrangement of working conditions and social awareness, enabling people to enjoy the benefits accrued through an incredibly complex system of worldwide industrial relationships.

That system has now developed to a point where it has reached a peak of efficiency never equalled in history in producing everything except human contentment. In the process we may be in danger of surrendering our heritage for a mess of multinational pottage. It may be this realization which explains the nostalgia movement, the good earth movement and the no-growth movement. But you cannot have no-growth industrially and politically without having no-growth intellectually and morally. The slogan, "Stop the world, I want to get off", is not applicable in political affairs.

Let me say right away that, in the history of this nation, succeeding Liberal administrations, with different leaders and sometimes differing policies and programs, nevertheless have been remarkably consistent in creating the necessary infrastructure to cope with basic human needs of food, clothing and shelter, and, I might add, the additional ingredients of hope for a better tomorrow.

Governments must often take initiatives which should come from the private sector but which the latter is unable to take in due time because of its shortcomings. Let us take, for example, corporations such as Polysar, Eldorado, Panarctic and Petro-Can. Combined with ever-increasing responsibilities in all fields of social activity these types of government initiatives are such that day by day, the modern state is becoming a terribly heavy bureaucracy which finds it difficult to perceive the needs of the ordinary taxpayer. Big business is motivated by the same demands as big government. Our consumer society has created needs which small and medium-size businesses fail to meet because of the pace of modern living. Consequently, big business tends to spread to all sectors of industrial and commercial activities. In doing so, little by little it eliminates small business, thus forcing an increasingly large number of workers to retrain or to collect unemployment insurance. As with any human structure, commercial firms have always tended to develop into large power conglomerates; very often, these conglomerates tend to withdraw to their ivory towers and therefore to become further and further removed from the people. They become less and less able to recognize the true needs of individuals which they have been entrusted to serve and whose welfare should be their ultimate goal.

The citizen himself is practically prevented, even through his government, from exerting any influence on such large and complex corporations as Exxon, General Motors, ITT and other multinationals whose position is similar to that of city-states in the Middle Ages, that is beyond and outside the effective control of governments. In spite of all the abuse heaped on big business in general and on multinationals in particular, it remains that those corporations, precisely because they are huge, are in a position to meet mass consumer needs while providing a livelihood to millions of individuals.

The substantial growth of those corporations has naturally led labour organizations to become more and more powerful. There is no doubt that, precisely because of their power, labour organizations have contributed to greatly improve the lot of workers, especially in the public sector and among highly skilled trades.

Today, contrary to the situation prevailing some ten years ago, the boss is often at the mercy of the workers. Union members nowadays are part of a labour élite and not only are they in a position to protect themselves, they become as powerful as management.

[English]

In spite of this, Mr. Speaker, our producing and distributing system seems to have a built-in imbalance which makes for unequal sharing of these world goods. Production, both in quality and quantity, seems unable to close the enormous gaps which still exist. And gaps are growing as the disparity between the affluence and luxury of the west and the poverty and hopelessness of a major part of the Third World continues to widen.

In our own society inflation is taking away from workers and those on fixed incomes many of the economic gains which they won over the years. Canadian workers, among the most skilled and highly trained in the world, have seen hard-won gains siphoned away by run-away inflation. Perhaps this is the price we must pay for some phases of social security development. This fact alone makes it incumbent on governments to reduce to a minimum, short-sighted, extravagant, wasteful and non-productive programs which are too often aimed at securing the allegiance of the electorate, rather than contributing to a healthy economy. We, as individual citizens, pay a heavy price for the organizations which we have put in place to deliver the goods and services our society requires.

Recently I listened with admiration and respect as the leader of the Quebec Liberal party spoke in the Assembly on the crucial issue of Quebec's place in Canada. That speech was a model of lucidity, of calm and temperate argument, of forthrightness and honesty of which all Canadians can be proud. I am sure that you will agree, Mr. Speaker, that when he spoke of his love for Canada, of his roots in this country and of the roots of all Quebeckers, and when he said that the attachment of Quebeckers to Canada was "visceral", it was difficult indeed not to be moved by the sincerity of his patriotism. May I say that I share those sentiments, as I am sure does every Quebec member in this House.

Sometimes as one considers the dark and terrible problems hovering over the world, one cannot help but think that we in Canada, regardless of the language in which we express ourselves, are indeed fortunate. At the same time we recognize the existence of individual dissatisfaction, anxiety, dislocation and anguish among both young and old. I attribute these reactions to the phenomenon of depersonalization and institutionalization which is so much a part of our lives.

On a world scale, it would appear useful to review the highlights of the report of a commission headed by Willy Brandt, former chancellor of the Federal Republic of Germany. This report, representing years of independent study by 18 world leaders, was submitted to the Secretary General of the United Nations, Kurt Waldheim, on February 12, 1980, and is entitled, "A Program for Survival".

The picture is one of a world in which the economic system of production, distribution is progressively breaking down.

Starvation, inflation, disorder, escalating unemployment, international monetary confusion, competition for energy, food, and raw materials, increasing population, advancing deserts, overfishing and pollution are some of the horrors described in this authoritative document.

Let us look at some of the specifics. In the western world there are 18 million people out of work. This unemployment is largely located in countries where a subsistence level is required in order to purchase food and provide shelter and heat.

● (2020)

Irreversible destruction of the ecology is taking place in a number of countries, many of them ranked among the world's poor nations. Deforestation is going on apace, and present world wood stocks will be cut in half by the year 2000. World population is growing by one million every five days. There will be two billion additional people to feed in the next 20 years, and there are 800 million below the subsistence level today.

In the affluent society of the west, each person consumes 100 times as much energy as people in the poorer countries of the Third World.

These are among some of the more chilling facts in the Brandt report. I do not cite them in order to impress or stun the House, but merely to show the powerful and cumulative impact of the failure of our system to reach those in greatest need.

The Brandt report makes a powerful appeal for a tough, hard-nosed and realistic approach involving, it is true, sacrifices on the part of the west. Better enlightened sacrifice now than chaos later!

The Brandt report calls for a world summit to consider a massive transfer of funds to developing countries, an international energy strategy, a global food program, and reform of the international monetary and financial system.

All of these proposals are worth serious study, and I am sure they will receive that study from the dedicated men and women at the head of our affairs. I know that the very gifted and knowledgeable Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) is aware of these initiatives and has them under study at the present time. We all recall his notable participation as the chairman of a world conference on north-south problems.

There is also a proposal for an oil strategy to guarantee supplies and prices in the world, and I am sure this is being studied with interest by the responsible minister.

Once again, Mr. Speaker, please let me emphasize my concern regarding our complex and massive institutions. Our institutions have become more powerful and egocentric than ever before. Governments, business, and labour all vigorously defend their point of view without realizing that they are doing so at the expense of the two-thirds of our population which happen to be unorganized. As a result our citizen is progressively losing his battle to shape his own destiny.

I submit, Mr. Speaker, that it is a major objective of modern government, after basic needs are met, to create conditions in which the individuals, while retaining control over his identity and personality, can devote his leisure time to creative activities in arts and culture.

When one thinks of the golden age of the Renaissance, or the Victorian age in literature—a period when writers, artists, composers, architects, engineers, scientists, competed in excellence in Europe and America—these periods stand out for the productive use of leisure. Certainly, along with the Elizabethan age, as A. L. Rouse has written, they represented societies that were both dynamic and creative.

It is a fact that our society faces important problems in the economic and fiscal areas and in the areas of international relations and internal cohesiveness. We must address ourselves to problems of the economy and problems of internal unity.

I am confident that by skill, patience and understanding, these problems will be overcome and Canada will march into a new era or progress. But we must know where we are going and how we are going to get there. In the field of energy, we must conserve, we must develop new sources of energy and we must diversify. I am confident that these things will happen.

I recall that when the United States refused to join Canada in building the St. Lawrence Seaway, Louis St. Laurent said Canada would take the initiative, and we did. Today, we face equally important and challenging decisions with regard to getting energy to market—Bay of Fundy tidal power, northern gas pipelines, moving clean, pure water from the northern watershed to the water-starved cities of the eastern seaboard. To the resolution of these challenges we must bring the same kind of enlightened and patriotic daring that motivated Prime Minister St. Laurent 30 years ago.

Returning to the creative society, our country can do a great deal more to support art and culture than we have ever done. We can do more to bring out into the sunlight of public acclaim the cultures of other races than English or French; the many races who settled in Canada bringing with them the cultural dynanism of the old world. These we must recognize and accept, and to them we must accord the kind of recognition that will result in a new and vibrant form of social expression.

Thomas Jefferson saw the key problem of the modern world, the problem of the individual. A more ancient book said that man does not live by bread alone. Individuals require the social buttressing that comes from institutions that are progressive and flexible, with clearly spelled out and agreed upon purposes. Individuals require also to live and work in a cultural context with which they are familiar and which contributes to their spiritual well-being. When people sense that they are participating in a society that is creative and dynamic, then they are aware of social and spiritual well-being. Great works of art, architecture, ballet, theatre, and yes, triumphs of engineering, help to overcome the depersonalization of institutions and the constraints applied to individual self-expression.

What is modern man to do, Mr. Speaker, faced with the bigness, impersonality, declining standards, self-serving policies, and waste of many modern institutions? I strongly believe that the human personality is crying out for the opportunity to redeem its own soul. Is this too far-fetched? Are humanity and integrity becoming permanently submerged by our mass institutional imperatives?

Henri Bergson wrote "Il faut à l'homme un supplément d'âme"—something to satisfy the spirit. Without this, in the long term, our affluence, technology, our GNP and our prosperity will become increasingly irrelevant.

In the sixties our own young people rejected the values of the corporatist-military state, along with much of its affluence. Today, many of the values of the western world, our acquisitiveness, our greed, our unconcern and disdain for human perspectives, our fatal death wish which sees us polluting the environment with reckless disregard—all of these are totally repulsive to the older civilizations of the Third World.

It is our particular function, in line with the findings of the Brandt report, to establish priorities between technology and human values; between scientific accomplishments and the preservation of the human soul—that is man's capacity to preserve his individual integrity and order his own destiny.

In essence the issue is whether the social structure will be designed in accordance with the needs of the many or simply to perpetuate the tyranny of the few. Whether we are speaking of government tyranny, the tyranny of the media, the tyranny of great corporations, or merely of the all enveloping tyranny of mediocrity, the final result is the same.

Even if we have failed to develop fully this potential of human freedom which we hold so dear, we are witness to the horror of enslavement that is steadily gaining ground in Communist totalitarian countries. All eastern Europe is under the Communist yoke. In Africa, some Communist governments remain in power with the help of Russian tanks and Cuban guns. In Southeast Asia, the idealists who looked upon the Viet Nam war as a war of liberation recognize with terror that their worst fears are coming true. The almost diabolical strength of Russian communism has now caused a genocide unequaled since Hitler's.

President Lincoln once said that the United States could not survive with half of the population reduced to slavery. Men of good will must now recognize that the world cannot survive with one-half of its population free and the other half enslaved, and that Russian communism is behind this cloud of slavery which is spreading over the world.

In pursuing its goal, nothing can stop the U.S.S.R., and the sad situation of the people in Afghanistan is only one example. As a matter of fact, it can truly be said that man's right to exercise his freedom is more threatened than it ever was in the dark ages. Mr. Speaker, I am afraid that we are on the brink of a new dark era where the freedom of man will become a pale light in an ocean of darkness. I feel it is our duty, to the extent that we believe in freedom and democracy, to keep that light shining. Fortunately, there are still signs of hope.

During the recent election in Rhodesia, we were struck by the moderation shown by the black leader, Joseph Mugabe, in dealing with the white people in his country. Let us hope, Mr. Speaker, that the same moderation will be the key, one of the solutions to our problems. Instead of building on fear and hate, as the Marxists do, that man has opted for moderation and compromise, and is urging the whites of Rhodesia to share in the development of the African society in a new spirit of dignity. Mr. Speaker, that is the course to follow.

Specialization has enabled us to channel our efforts quickly in new fields of endeavour. As John Donne said, "No man is an island", we can say the same without hesitation about our governments. They must apply themselves to understanding what is going on in the world, apply themselves to defining the objectives to be pursued and finding the means to achieve them. Our survival depends, Mr. Speaker, on our capacity to adapt to the major changes forced upon us. Our decisions must be taken in the light of those changes.

Allow me to express once again my concern for the citizen as an individual. Allow me to suggest to the governments that they take time to consult and listen to the citizens and their institutions to get a better idea of where the priorities lie. Freeing the human spirit is the ultimate goal of all social activities. Creativity is at the very basis of all social achievement. The importance of human contribution to our decision-making process must be reaffirmed. That is the characteristic of a creative society and the aim I recommend to our leaders in all spheres of human activity.

[English]

Mr. Bill Domm (Peterborough): Mr. Speaker, it is my pleasure to congratulate you and Madam Speaker on your appointments to these very important positions in the House.

Since this is my maiden speech in the House of Commons, I would like first to take this opportunity to thank the voters of Peterborough riding for sending me to Ottawa as their representative. It is less than a year since I first entered federal politics and already I have been involved in two rather quick repetitive federal elections, quicker than I would like to have seen. However, I am grateful for the support I have received from my colleagues in the House. I am also grateful for the support that I have received from members opposite because it was due to their policies that I was able to gain this seat.

There are a number of reasons why I am proud to represent the constituency of Peterborough. Mine is only one of 282 ridings in the country, but all other constituencies would be hard pressed to match the physical beauty and the quality of the Kawarthas. With a population approaching approximately 100,000 people, Peterborough county is the gateway to the Kawartha Lakes, one of Canada's prime tourist attractions. Two-thirds of my constituents live in an urban environment and most of those are located in the beautiful city of Peterborough. Many of the remaining one-third farm some of the best agricultural land in Ontario.

Mine is a riding like few others in Canada because within a ten-minute drive of the huge General Electric plant in downtown Peterborough are some of Canada's best lakes, finest fishing and most beautiful parks. My riding is also one which realizes how essential it is to look after its young people. Our educational system is second to none and includes an excellent elementary and secondary school system as well as Sir Sanford Fleming College and Trent University. To the young people in my riding I send my sincere appreciation for their support in the past election.

The issues in Peterborough county are the same as in most ridings with a rural-urban population mix. More than 72 per cent of the homes in Peterborough county are owned by the occupants. That figure is well above the Canadian average of 62 per cent and the Ontario average of 63 per cent. As a result, many of my constituents are gravely concerned about the current levels of high interest rates.

Because of the Kawartha Lakes and the importance of tourism in the Peterborough area, environmental issues are also in the front rank. Two environmental issues in particular, acid rain and Eurasian milfoil, pose grave threats to my riding, as they do to other parts of Canada, including British Columbia. I will be directing many of my efforts in this House to these two areas, the economy and the environment.

In many ways Peterborough has been fortunate as Canada enters the 1980s. After several years in the economic doldrums during the mid-seventies Peterborough began to perk up in 1979, and last October unemployment hit a five-year low. Employment in the major industries, particulary at General Electric which employs over 4,500 people, has been very encouraging.

The people of Peterborough are also looking forward to the arrival in our city of the Parks Canada regional office from Cornwall. Although the new government has been reconsidering the move, economic common sense dictates that the transfer be carried through. It was work researched by the Liberal government and acted on by the Conservative Parliament. Because of its more central Ontario location, Peterborough riding is much better suited to serve the province of Ontario than the present location of the regional office in the southeast corner.

I remind hon. members that there seemed to be very little objection to the Quebec branch of Parks Canada moving out of Cornwall and going to Quebec. As well, to serve the interests of national unity and to meet the needs of the Francophone employees of Parks Canada office personnel, the two school boards in Peterborough county have already made plans to introduce Peterborough's first French-immersion program. All in all, it bodes rather well for the future of our country. At a time of the referendum vote I find it very encouraging that the government has seen fit to move Parks Canada to Peterborough, and Peterborough in turn has seen fit to introduce French immersion for the Francophones.

As a relative newcomer to the House I would not make my maiden speech without commenting upon impressions I gained during the short Thirty-first Parliament. Although our time in power was brief I feel we did accomplish a great deal. When the Progressive Conservative government of the Thirty-first Parliament is remembered and written about by the historians, it will be because of the two major issues of the 1980s, that is to say, energy and the economy. Perhaps our defeat on February 18 might be compared to the case of the patient who switches doctors because he does not like the diagnosis.

In hindsight many have said that we should not have introduced such a tough budget and that we should have offered more in the way of goodies. That may have been good politics but it would not have been what this country needed.

It is interesting that shortly after the February election, President Jimmy Carter announced massive changes in the 1980-1981 American budget. His proposals included plans for a ten cents a gallon excise tax on gasoline; spending cuts of some $14 billion; a 20,000-person reduction in the civil service, and the first balanced budget in the United States—at least in the last 12 years, or as long as I can remember. When I first heard the thrust of the Carter budget I got the feeling that perhaps we had lost the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie), that he might have moved to Washington and his budget had turned up disguised as President Carter's anti-inflation program.

I cannot say strongly enough how proud I am to be associated with this party. The leadership shown by the right hon. member for Yellowhead (Mr. Clark) and his cabinet during the Thirty-first Parliament and the winter election campaign, makes me very confident about our new role in the Thirty-second Parliament. We can hold our heads high. We told the people how it was. We told them that the free ride was over and it was time to address the major problems in our economy today, problems like high interest rates, inflation and deficits, and how we proposed to deal with those things.

Members opposite felt it was time to bring down that government. They felt they had alternatives they would like to present. I say to them that they are absolving themselves of all responsibility in the financial management of this country if they neglect to bring in a budget within 60 days. I feel very strongly that you cannot stand in the House of Commons day after day, week after week, and month after month, and tell us as opposition and critics, which is our role, that you are not going to introduce a budget for another several months.

I wish I could say I had the same feelings of confidence about the new government that I had about the last government and their financially accountable budget. The throne speech we heard this week offered absolutely no help for the thousands of Canadians suffering because of the current interest rate crisis. Perhaps the clearest comment on the speech was in the reaction of the money markets. The Canadian dollar dropped by more than half a cent in value in one day following the speech, as reported in the Globe and Mail.

We in Peterborough have seen the new government's indecisiveness at another level. The minister responsible for Parks Canada, the Minister of the Environment (Mr. Roberts), announced on March 12 of this year that he would make a final decision regarding the transfer of the Parks Canada regional office from Cornwall to Peterborough within ten to 14 days. The first deadline passed on March 22. The second deadline passed on March 26. It is now April 15. Maybe the minister is too busy. Maybe he is indecisive. Maybe he cannot make up his mind. Maybe he has not had enough study in seven years with regard to where Parks Canada should be located.

The fact is that neither the minister nor his colleagues can make a decision. This is important, and not only to Peterborough. It is important to the people of Cornwall and those families who have moved to Peterborough and are commuting to Cornwall in order to do their job. The employees affected by the lack of decision-making on the part of the government are 20 families who have already purchased homes in Peterborough, plus approximately 125 families in the process of deciding where to enrol their young people in school. In addition, accommodation has been acquired in Peterborough and the building is vacant awaiting a decision by the minister. Many civil servants and their families are living in a town at the cost of the taxpayers of Canada with no job to do. The vacillation shown by the minister in this matter was an indication of what we could expect from the Liberal government at the opening session of the Thirty-second Parliament.

My constituents are also very anxious and concerned to hear about another government decision which it is having a great deal of difficulty making. It will affect the Peterborough riding. This decision is with regard to the constituency of Durham-Northumberland. That constituency was recently the victim of a horrible natural disaster when flooding caused millions of dollars of damage to the town of Port Hope. Last summer Eldorado Nuclear, a federal Crown corporation, announced it would construct a $100 million refinery in Hope township near Port Hope just south of Peterborough.

Last summer the new Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde)—I do not see him in the chamber this evening—announced that for the time being he was going to stop the progress affecting the construction of Eldorado Nuclear.

Last month, Eldorado Nuclear Limited, a federal Crown corporation, announced it would construct a $100 million uranium refinery in Hope township near Port Hope.

An hon. Member: You already read that.

Mr. Domm: Last month the new minister decided to review that in the same way the ministry is reviewing Parks Canada. He made that announcement at the same time as the town was digging out from the $10 million damage caused by the flood. He made that announcement despite the flood, despite the impending closure of the Firestone Canada plant in nearby Whitby, and despite the fact it will cost $24.5 million more to construct the refinery in northern Ontario, as well as an additional $3 million in operating costs to build it in the north.

I would like to know why such a decision would be made at a time when unemployment is 2 per cent higher in Port Hope than in northern Ontario and when $3 million has already been spent on site preparation in Hope township. Common decency says a community should not be kicked while it is already down. I urge the hon. member for Outremont (Mr. Lalonde) to allow the project to proceed in Hope township as common sense dictates, as Liberal research indicated, and as Conservative action proved.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Domm: You laugh; it's your research.

Mr. Kaplan: It's even cheaper to build it in the States.

Mr. Domm: They are even suggesting we build it in the United States.

On another level, I am curious as to what steps the new government will take to help those affected by the current high interest rates. The throne speech was long on generalities but very short on specifics as to how interest rate problems will be handled. Considering that the program the Conservative party put forward for mortgage interest deductibility was attacked for nearly a year by the Liberal party—not all, some liked it and some voted for it—I would like to know exactly what it intends to do to help Canadian home owners.

We were told by members opposite that our mortgage deductibility plan would help the rich. However, it is now estimated that thousands of these Canadian rich people might lose their homes. It is interesting to read some of the comments made by the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Axworthy) when sitting in opposition during the last Parliament. I will quote what the Liberal minister said in this House last November. He said that "approximately 400,000 families must renegotiate their mortgages after the interest rate has risen by close to four percentage points. We are facing a lot more bankruptcies and defaults; that is what we are facing." He asked what the government was going to do about it.

I trust the new government will remember these comments made by the minister at that time and that it will take action to reduce interest rates, or at least figure out a way to give assistance to home owners, not the rich, but the 400,000 people the minister said will be affected.

The new government should be condemned for approving the Bank of Canada's new method of determining interest rate increases. It is a blatant arrogant method of abrogating responsibility.

It is also interesting to recall some of the comments made by the hon. member for Windsor West (Mr. Gray) while he was opposition critic in the last Parliament. I again go back to last November. The Liberal minister said, "The Liberals and I generally want action taken now to prevent the hardship this Conservative high interest rate policy is creating for millions of Canadians and their families". As I said, these interest rates have risen more than 2 per cent since the election of the new government, and we are still waiting to see what action will be taken to help the small businessman, home owners and farmers. Let all Canadians see what specific actions the government now intends to take. Let us see what is planned. We asked in the question period today what the government might propose and when it might propose a new budget. The answer was a flat "no" to the end-of-May date given.

● (2050)

When I first decided to seek election to the House two years ago, I did so as a businessman and a consumer who was provoked by what years of mismanagement had done to the economy of this country. I was ashamed that thousands of Canadians were out of work, that federal spending was out of control, and that the federal government was building up huge deficits year after year. I was disgusted that inflation was eating up the savings of Canadians in my riding and across the country. I believed last December, and I still believe, that during his term as minister of finance the hon. member for St. John's West put the economy of this country back on the right track.

I still think we have to reduce and eliminate the huge federal deficits before we will ever come to grips with the twin problems of inflation and high interest rates.

I was disappointed with the statement in the throne speech which downplayed the importance of reducing the federal deficit, and I disagree completely with the assertion that Canadians do not want less government. That is what it says in the throne speech. The ministers in the new government certainly have not yet figured out exactly what the people of Canada are saying. They are saying they want less spending, less government, less inflation, and less interest. Of course we want more effective government, but that more effective government also goes hand in hand with trimming away the fat and reducing the size of the civil service.

To my mind the federal government in the past decade has taken on all the characteristics of a giant octopus, with its tentacles reaching into every part and corner of the country, sucking every dollar and every cent out of the people in business, stores, on farms, in counties, cities and high rise towers in Toronto and Montreal. What is it all for? Is it really necessary for a government to get this involved in the lives of Canadians? I just wonder how this country would have developed at all if the explorers and settlers who opened up Canada had to dodge piles of Statistics Canada and tax forms, or cross mountains of regulations or rivers lined with bureaucrats.

As I mentioned earlier tonight, one of my prime concerns and one of the major issues affecting my constituents in the Peterborough riding is the matter of acid rain. The minister of the environment in the last Parliament, the Thirty-first Parliament, the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Fraser), recognized the problem of acid rain as one of the most serious problems which has ever faced our country. I hope that the new minister will take the same approach. If we as a Parliament do not start to take measures to deal with acid rain soon, we will leave a horrible legacy of lifeless lakes for our children.

It is a frightening prospect that our lakes and fishing and tourist industries, all the things which are so vital and important to my riding and to many other ridings in Canada, are damaged, and ignored by the present government in its throne speech as it addresses the subject of environmental protection, which is completely absent from the throne speech. It is even more alarming that the ability of the soil and the crops we grow and the forests could also be impaired if this insidious problem is allowed to continue unabated.

The hon. member opposite who spoke just before me, giving his maiden speech, talked about millions and billions of people, "deforestation" and the cost and the necessity of food, and I say that with acid rain falling on us at its present rate of 11 ounces an acre we will have major problems in supplying our own food and our own forest industry if we do not address the subject and present legislation to control effectively the acidity fallout that is affecting our lakes, trees, forests and plant life.

The joint Canadian and American study on acid rain released last fall indicated that some lakes in the Haliburton-Muskoka area of south central Ontario have already lost from 40 per cent to 75 per cent of their acid neutralizing ability in the past decade.

In addition—and this is scary—there are 140 lakes in Ontario, mostly in the Sudbury area, which are already acidified at the present time. They are dead to life, dead to fish, dead to plant life, and dead for human consumption.

The problem is not limited to Ontario because similar results are turning up in the maritime provinces, the United States, western Europe, Scandinavia, and Japan.

Acid precipitation threatens to get worse as oil prices cause electrical utilities to turn to coal to produce electricity. The costs to begin to combat acid rain are going to be tremendous. During the last Parliament we in this House heard that it will cost Canadians between $350 million and $500 million annually over the remainder of this century just to bring about a 50 per cent reduction in sulphur dioxide emissions in eastern Canada. Similar estimates in the eastern United States run as high as $7 billion annually. That is a lot of money, but I remind the House that the forest product industry in Canada is a $17.5 billion industry, and we have to protect that industry. We learned the lesson in Scandinavia ten years ago of what will happen if we do not put the necessary programs in place to purify the air and to purify emissions before we have acid rain fallout.

Even though that sounds like a great deal of money—and indeed it is a great deal of money—we in this House have to remember that there is more at stake here than just hard economics. The real issue is our lakes, our people, and the kind of future we are going to provide for our children. The real issue is the survival of our environment as we know it today. This is an issue which crosses party lines, and I ask that the Minister of the Environment give it top priority as he pursues his duties.

Another major issue in my riding—and with this one I would like to close my remarks on the throne speech—and one that may become important in many more ridings, is that as of next year metrication is again going to take flight. We in Peterborough had the misfortune to be chosen as one of the three test areas for the implementation of metrication in our stores. I do not like to sound facetious, but I wonder if the people of Sherbrooke and the people of Kamloops enjoyed the honour of being guinea pigs as much as we in Peterborough did.

Of course the Metric Commission, in its infinite Liberal wisdom, chose to begin metrication in the retail sector in Peterborough at the height of our tourist season when thousands of Americans and Canadians are visiting and passing through the riding on their way to the Kawartha Lakes.

During the last Parliament the Conservative government appointed an overview committee to study metrication and, following its recommendations, the conversion process was postponed for at least a year. Now it has been announced that the process will continue early next year in over 20 cities in Canada. The point of the delay was to give Canadians a chance to debate the merits of immediate metrication, a chance they never had, and as the Conservative minister of state for small businesses, the hon. member for Capilano (Mr. Huntington), said after announcing the postponement last December, there was little urgency for proceeding immediately because the metrication program in the United States was seven to nine years behind that of ours in Canada.

My only question is: why the rush, why not give Canadians a chance to debate the issue, why force metrication on the people of Canada when there are three cities where the results of that forced metrication could be reviewed? The result is disastrous.

Mr. Pelletier: The results were positive.

Mr. Domm: If you think they are good in Peterborough, then come on down and visit us and we will show you how good they are.

Mr. Pelletier: There was not a single complaint.

Mr. Domm: If this Thirty-second Parliament refuses to listen to the people of Canada, refuses to respond to their wishes to have their day in court, to have that moment of trial here in the House of Commons, there might be disastrous results. Maybe everyone opposite likes the metric system. Maybe all of us on this side have some things we like about that system. But what is the point of being ten years ahead of the United States? What is the point of implementing a form of metric measure that is foreign to most in the world?

What is the point of implementing the metric system in Canada when only 4 per cent of our export market, including Germany, is on the metric system? Germany is still buying four-by-eights, and so is Japan. The wood should fit your home when you instal it. What is the rush? The metric system has never had its day in court and Parliament has never discussed it. Never has a piece of legislation come through this House which has said that the government wants the metric system to be adopted in Canada.

I say to the new government—and I hesitate to call it the new government because this is the old government with the same, tired ideas—review the metric system before its implementation.

Let me say in conclusion, Mr. Speaker, that I hope this is not another example of Liberal arrogance with which we became so familiar during the Thirtieth Parliament. We want answers to fight inflation. We want answers to cut government spending. We want to reduce the size of the bureaucracy. We want to get the interest rates in line with what people can afford. If the government will not listen, it will be held accountable and an election might come about sooner than any of us would like to see it.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Pelletier: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. With your permission I should like to ask the hon. gentleman who just spoke if he would like to respond to a question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): The hon. member for Peterborought (Mr. Domm) has taken up his entire time, and it would require the unanimous consent of the House to engage in that kind of a discussion. Unless I hear unanimous consent, I will have to go next to the hon. member for Scarborough West (Mr. Weatherhead). Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): There is not unanimous consent. The hon. member for Scarborough West.

Mr. David Weatherhead (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, let me begin by saying that it is a great honour to rise once again on behalf of the people of Scarborough West. May I congratulate Madam Speaker, the hon. member for Laval-des-Rapides (Madam Sauvé), on behalf of the residents of Scarborough West and assure her of my attention to her guidance. With the selection of the hon. member for Laval-des-Rapides as Speaker of the House we may have established somewhat of a precedent, but I am sure it will be the impartial and informed leadership of Her Honour that will mark her term as Speaker of this House.

I would also like to congratulate the hon. member for Ottawa West (Mr. Francis) on his selection as Deputy Speaker and Chairman of Committees of the Whole House. May I take this opportunity also to congratulate the hon. member for Glengarry-Prescott-Russell (Mr. Ethier) as Deputy Chairman of Committees of the Whole House, and also yourself, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Lachine (Mr. Blaker), on your appointment as Assistant Deputy Chairman of Committees of the Whole House. Perhaps I could also congratulate my old friend and one time seat mate, the hon. member for London East (Mr. Turner), on his appointment as chief government whip. It is a difficult and sometimes frustrating position, but I am sure he will be a great success.

I also wish to thank the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) for expressing his confidence in me by appointing me Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. It is a very large, interesting, and diversified department, and I am looking forward to facing its challenges and to helping its very capable minister in every way possible.

Before discussing some of the issues that concern me, I would like to touch briefly on two other matters. I wish to pay tribute to the dean of the House of Commons in years of service, namely, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), and I am happy he is here tonight. I do not always agree with him on specific policy or procedural matters, but his willingness to talk to and advise a rookie member of Parliament from another party when we worked together on the committee on labour in the Twenty-eighth Parliament was greatly appreciated.

I had the honour of being elected the first member of Parliament for the new riding of Scarborough West in 1968 and was here until 1972. In the seven and a half years since that time, the riding has been very fortunate in being represented by excellent members of Parliament from the three parties. John Harney, the MP from 1972 to 1974 for the NDP, is widely known and well regarded. He ran very strongly for the national leadership of his party on two different occasions. Alan Martin won the riding back for the Liberal party in 1974 and had an active and distinguished five-year term here, latterly as parliamentary secretary to the then minister of consumer and corporate affairs, and to the then minister of finance. Last May, Bill Wightman was elected to represent the Progressive Conservative Party and was immediately appointed parliamentary secretary to the then minister of labour in recognition of his able career in the labour relations field. I will attempt to carry on and uphold the high standard set by these men in representing the people of Scarborough West and of Canada.

Scarborough West is a riding of approximately 90,000 persons in almost 30,000 households. Of this number, about 17,000 households are privately owned, and the remaining 13,000 are occupied by renters. Slightly more than 15 per cent of the population claim their language to be other than English and French, and the balance is mostly English speaking. With a diversity of ethnic, economic and educational backgrounds, Scarborough West is both a distinct community and an accurate reflection of the concerns of Canada as a whole.

As Scarborough West is an older suburb of metropolitan Toronto, many home owners have lived there for many years. Through their hard work and diligent saving, many of their mortgages are fully paid off. Therefore, they might ask why subsidies are proposed now when they had no such assistance in their day. But all would agree that these are extraordinary times. Never have interest rates escalated as rapidly as they have in the past year. In that time, rates on first mortgages have almost doubled through no fault of persons who must now renegotiate their mortgages. I therefore commend the government for its undertaking in the Speech from the Throne to assist those unable to bear the burden of renegotiating their home mortgages. The Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) indicated this afternoon that the criterion as to who will be entitled to aid will be based largely on the usual ratio between the home owner's cost of carrying the house on his total income. This should ensure that any subsidies will not place too great a burden on taxpayers as a whole.

Also I wish to commend the government and the minister responsible for CMHC for the initiatives which have been taken in the very particular special circumstances of those home owners under the AHOP program. On the same basis it is important and timely that assistance for farmers and small business will be extended through raising the ceiling for loans under the Farm Improvement Loans Act under the Small Businesses Loans Act to $100,000.

The question of interest rates themselves, their so-called floating status and everything related thereto, are very controversial and bring forward strong arguments from experts on all sides. I do not pretend to have all the facts at my disposal tonight on this very important matter, but since there were a large number of new members of Parliament elected last February, and since the economic situation is constantly changing, I think it would be useful to reconsider the whole matter in the appropriate standing committee as quickly as possible. I understand from the comments of the Minister of Finance this afternoon that he is not opposed to this course and that a reference to the appropriate standing committee will be made after the committees have been formally set up.

One of the concerns of all industrial nations is energy security. The most optimistic among us will concede that oil will soon be replaced as a primary source of energy. Therefore I am encouraged that the government is recommending the establishment of an alternative energy corporation. As well, the government is committed to see that 1.5 per cent of the gross national product will be spent on research and development. These two developments recognize the talent, climate, and vast distances in Canada, and will lead to the establishment of Canada as one of the world leaders in the field of energy technology.

In my first speech in the House of Commons back in November, 1968, I mentioned my hope that certain reforms in parliamentary procedure would be effected to expedite the business of the House. While some reforms have taken place since then, I submit there is still much to be done. I am fully aware of the good and valid arguments for the necessity of opposition members of Parliament and indeed of government backbenchers being allowed sufficient time to put forward their points of view. However, surely hon. members will agree that there is no need for excessively long speeches by individual members of Parliament. I would think most of the time that 20 minutes would be ample.

The business of government is becoming more complex. There are always different pieces of legislation and other business competing for parliamentary time. Parliamentary time is a scarce resource and surely it should be used as profitably as possible, as long as the rights of members, particularly those of the opposition, are respected. Also I would like to suggest that there is a need to re-examine seriously the role of standing committees of the House of Commons with a view to making them more independent and useful to the people of Canada. Considerable work has been done on this question by all three parties in the House, and I would hope for some concrete results as quickly as possible. There are many other aspects of parliamentary reform which should be considered, and I hope to speak further about this very important matter on some future occasion.

Since Scarborough West is an older community, we have a higher proportion of senior citizens than many other parts of the country. The seniors are the most deserving of people; they are the ones who built the modern Canada. Their sacrifice through the depression of the thirties and the Second World War was made even greater in that they raised their families through these difficult times. Therefore I fully agree with our campaign promise to raise the guaranteed income supplement to the old age security pension by $35 per month per household by July 1 of this year. This pledge has been reiterated in the Speech from the Throne. This will provide increased assistance to over 1.3 million senior Canadians. More important, however, in the long run will probably be the notice by the government in the throne speech to convene a national pension conference in the fall of this year as a forum to discuss providing better, more flexible and portable pensions in the private and public sectors.

Finally, I wish to refer to the most important issue facing Canada today—whether Canada itself will continue to exist in the face of the strong challenge from René Lévesque and the government of Quebec. The referendum date of May 20 was announced today and these next five weeks will be of critical importance to the future of Canada. As one of English-Irish background, born and brought up in the Toronto area, it is difficult for me to express with any adequacy my strong feelings about the necessity of keeping Canada one.

We heard a very moving speech by the Prime Minister, and excellent contributions by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) and the Leader of the New Democratic Party (Mr. Broadbent) this afternoon on this vital matter which contained passages of logic and quiet passion that I could not hope to duplicate. I can recall my pride and interest in travelling from my grandfather's farm in eastern Ontario, years ago as a boy, to Montreal and Quebec City, and being so proud that the province of Quebec was an excitingly different but integral part of our country of Canada. During my trips back to Quebec throughout the years as a lawyer, a sometime politician, and with my wife and children, the realization has never left me that Canada is so fortunate to have two founding peoples who share the same basic ideals.

Canada is truly unique among the nations of the world. Its culture today comes from many sources. From the contribution of the two founding peoples, it has grown to a nation of great international stature. Since its earliest beginnings Canada has welcomed people from all nations, races and economic backgrounds, relatively free from the shocks and tensions which have torn other nations apart. We have a nation which encourages diversity in its citizens, whatever their backgrounds. Our citizens are free to practise whatever cultural or religious beliefs they may have in the context of co-operation and tolerance.

Part of the international stature of Canada comes from the example of tolerance and diversity it gives to the world. It would be a tragedy, then, to allow this opportunity for growth and enrichment to slip through our grasp. I pray that the efforts of the Quebec federalists of all political parties will be crowned with success, and that the results on the evening of May 20 will herald a vote of confidence in our country and a new beginning for a more united and a more understanding Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Ian Waddell (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, I am very grateful for the opportunity to speak in this throne speech debate of the Thirty-second Parliament. I am especially happy to follow the speech of my leader, the hon. member for Oshawa (Mr. Broadbent), the only federal leader today, in my view, who is articulating the concerns of ordinary people in this country.

Also I am proud to represent the constituents of Vancouver-Kingsway. That is a riding located in east and southeast Vancouver. They are working people, they are confident people, and they are self-reliant. They want a fair share of Canada's prosperity which by their labours they have the greatest share in creating. They want I think what all Canadians want, a prosperous and democratic Canada for their children and their children's children. For nine years they were represented in this House by Mrs. Grace MacInnis, and I am conscious of the burden on me here in following in her noble traditions and great footsteps.

Mr. Waddell: Many of my constituents are immigrants, as I am. As a matter of fact, I am a double immigrant. First as a young Scots lad I emigrated to Toronto in 1947 to live through the experience of Canada's first suburban post-war growth in, of all places, Etobicoke, and secondly as a young adult to Vancouver on the west coast to share in the coming of age of that wonderful and golden city.

Where I make sense in my remarks to follow, Mr. Speaker, I thank Canada's public education system which has served me so magnificently. Where I talk nonsense, I put that down to the fact that I was weaned at least in part by the Toronto Star and the Vancouver Sun.

Before I talk about some of the issues that particularly concern me, especially the energy issue, since I am the energy critic of our party, I want to refer briefly, as I feel almost compelled to do tonight, to the speech this afternoon by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau).

I have a note here from a member across the way asking me where my phone books are. The first speech I made in the House of Commons I delivered while on some phone books to make me a little taller. The member over there then started to heckle me. After giving me the phone books he started to say it was a Liberal platform.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: That's the best they had.

Mr. Waddell: I can assure you it was a lot better than the ones they offered during the election campaign.

I want to speak, as I was saying, about some of the remarks the Prime Minister made in this House this afternoon. They reminded me, indeed, of constitutional law lectures at university. That was a subject which was a particular favourite of mine. I always remember the hours spent on detailed and logically exhilarating discussions of the most learned and obtuse constitutional questions. Those lecture took place in the afternoons. Then I would step out in the light of day at rush hour on University Avenue in Toronto and have to make my way home in the real world. When I listened to that rather obtuse and, in many ways, brilliant lecture this afternoon by the Prime Minister, I felt that somehow the real tragedy of this Prime Minister is that he is no longer in the real world of ordinary people.

He spoke eloquently of loyalty and patriotism and the need of our citizens to get a fair deal and a fair share of the wealth of the country, and he dissected logically the Quebec referendum question.

My constituents would ask whether this is the same man who promised a just society in 1968. Look what happened to that vision. This is a man, the Prime Minister, it seems to me, who was given power not once but twice by the Canadian people, in 1968 and 1974, to really move the country. They gave him power on other occasions, but on those particular occasions he was given the power to really move this country. It seems to me that chance comes to a politician once, but rarely twice in a lifetime, yet this Prime Minister, this fallen hero in many ways, frittered away his chance and his mandate to move this country.

We are now welcomed in the 1980s by men who are essentially of the 1950s. They have no credibility to me. The Prime Minister should not be surprised if my colleagues, my constituents, and many people in the country do not respond to his urgings, and that as a nation we do not respond.

I think my leader, the hon. member for Oshawa, put his finger on this matter very succinctly and brilliantly in his speech this afternoon when he said "politics requires action to meet the real needs of human beings". During the recent federal election campaign which we all suffered through, the cartoonist, the brilliant Asselin, caught the campaign beautifully in a cartoon in which he showed a DC-9 jet in the sky; the Liberal campaign plane. The caption underneath said, "Trudeau waving at the crowd from 30,000 feet". It was one of the most sleazy and cynical campaigns ever waged by the Liberal party. We, in British Columbia, could see that when the local Liberal candidates—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Waddell: I say that seriously, that it was sleazy. They raised the matter of oil ports. Can you imagine the Liberal party in British Columbia raising the issue of oil ports? I can see the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Fulton) nodding his head in agreement. Imagine them raising the issue of oil ports and blaming the Conservatives for possible oil spills off our magnificent coast when it was the failure of Liberal policy that caused those tankers to go down there in the first place.

As a result of the election we changed from a naive and incompetent government to one that is run by a small group of men, a dangerously small group of men in my opinion, led by a

"Mr. Kurtz" figure right out of Joseph Conrad's "Heart of Darkness", or perhaps more modernly a Colonel Kurtz from Coppola's film "Apocalypse Now".

The "enemy within" that the Prime Minister spoke about, it seems to me, is the unreformed, unenlightened, tired old retreaded Liberal Party in Canada. That is the "enemy within". Colonel Kurtz's throne speech is simply a steal from NDP rhetoric without, I submit, the commitment to carry it out.

Geoffrey Stevens wrote in his column in The Globe and Mail yesterday that the country finally has a choice between liberalism on the left and conservatism on the right. Although he is a journalist I very much admire, he is dead wrong on that issue. This is the last Liberal government we are going to see in Canada. I suggest to hon. members that they should wait until after the referendum. Wait until after the next election to see what happens. The Liberal party has nothing to offer any more to the people of Canada.

An hon. Member: It's funny that the people like us.

Mr. Waddell: They don't like you out west and they are not going to like you in other parts of the country after a few months.

Take, for example, the freedom of information legislation. That is the critically important area of citizen access to government information. The previous Trudeau government promised that too. Have we forgotten that? The Conservatives brought in a bill which needed some tightening, especially in the exemptions, but it was basically a good bill.

Ged Baldwin had this to say in the House of Commons on November 29, 1979:

> When I leave here, as I fully intend to do when this Parliament is over . . . this permits me to leave knowing that the country will be in good hands and that there is no obstacle to prevent any hon. member, if he or she has an issue, from taking hold of that issue, fighting for it . . . and presenting that issue over and over again.

I predict that those words will be quoted again and again by politicians in this House and by political scientists. Baldwin insisted on the critically important provision in that freedom of information bill that any dispute between the citizen and a minister on the release of a document should ultimately be decided by the courts. Michael Pitfield, the recycled Clerk of the Privy Council, in a recent speech about a month ago rejected that concept. He would let the minister make the decision, not the courts, and thus emasculate the bill. Perhaps journalist Stevens will be holding his breath for the bill, but I am not. I can see what is happening. Colonel Kurtz and his sidekick "The Pits" are going to emasculate the bill and that will be part of the pattern of this government—great promises not carried out.

I want to speak a little bit about energy. In the throne speech the government sets the modest goal of 50 per cent Canadian ownership of the petroleum industry by 1990. This 50 per cent Canadian content is a familiar idea in this country. Look at our broadcasting regulations which have been on the books all these years, and which were intended to ensure the equality of Canadian opportunity on our own air waves. Somehow the idea has been subverted. All the Canadian programming is in the morning and afternoon, while the prime time is still filled with American production.

I fear the same thing will happen to the proposed "Canadianizing" of our petroleum industry. Foreigners will continue to dominate the valuable oil fields of southern Canada, where the lucrative light oils are found and where the profits are enormous. Canadian business is left with the fringe areas, the marginally productive wells, and the high risk exploration. I want to see Canadian companies having a piece of the prime, not the left-overs. I want assurances that the government policy will not amount to token participation in our petroleum industry by Canadians. I suggest to the government that the best way to get into the mainstream of Canada's petroleum industry would be to acquire one or two of the major companies, which already operate in the prime areas, in the prime time.

Production of conventional light crude oils will have dropped off from 1,255,000 barrels per day according to 1978 figures to 516,000 barrels per day in 1990. The highly profitable light oil production from Alberta will be a shadow of its former self by 1990. It will only be 40 per cent of its present production, and most wells will be into expensive secondary production or tertiary production techniques. Meanwhile, the oil industry will continue with the policy of reinvesting its massive profits in non-energy investments and in uranium.

The big oil companies see the writing on the wall. They are not stupid. They are getting out of oil now that they have made their fabulous profits. Now they are gaining a tight grip on the mining industry in Canada and a stranglehold on the uranium industry. What does this government propose to do? It proposes to gain 50 per cent control by 1990. It should be ashamed of that promise. It is too little and too late.

As NDP energy critic, I will have the opportunity of detailing what we would do in energy policy over the next few years. Our policy will be imaginative and it will be detailed. We would take Petro-Canada and expand its stations, not cut it back like hon. members to my right. We would expand it from coast to coast so Canadians could fill up at their own stations and use their Canadian credit cards. Here in Ottawa, the nation's capital, one cannot buy a dollar's worth of Canadian gasoline from a Canadian station. We would end that. Why do we write ourselves short as a nation? Why can we not really develop an energy policy that is imaginative and expand Petro-Canada in that way?

There is no mention of natural gas exports in the Speech from the Throne. Successive Liberal and Conservative governments have been selling the stuff off at record prices for a quick buck. We say that it is time to stop. We say that the minister should be instructing the National Energy Board that there will be no more selling off and no prebuilding of the Alaska pipeline.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Waddell: An NDP government—and I hope that in my lifetime there will be one federally—would keep the good stuff, the accessible gas, for Canadians, and would pipe it throughout Canada.

An hon. Member: All you can do is hope.

Mr. Waddell: I thought that would get a rise from members opposite. We would make sure that the proposed petroleum price auditing agency has teeth. It should report to Parliament and not to the department. I can just see, the Liberals in 1990, if they continue in government, saying as they are with regard to FIRA in 1980, "We would like further legislation to beef it up". They themselves created FIRA and now they are asking for further legislation.

The government is supply oriented. We in the NDP would advocate serious conservation measures. This is the real way to decrease our dependence on foreign oil.

An hon. Member: Oh, oh!

Mr. Waddell: The hon. member, Mr. Speaker, will have his chance. Perhaps he will let me complete my remarks.

Mr. Simmons: I was only trying to cool down your guys so I could hear you.

Mr. Waddell: A Newfoundlander trying to cool down someone from Skeena will get beat out. I was saying, if the hon. member will listen, that the Saskatchewan conservation house covers 80 per cent of its heating bill by passive solar heat and insulation, a $125 heating bill for 1,760 square feet. We have good programs in this country such as the CHIP program, the energy bus program and so on. But the government is not getting out these programs to the people. The hon. member for Vancouver East (Mrs. Mitchell), and I, hope to make a proposal later with respect to neighbourhood conservation, an area where it really matters.

Conservation is no longer an aesthetic or a moral issue. It is now a matter of survival. If there is a revolution in Saudi Arabia like in Iran, then the game is over for the industrialized world. That is a serious matter. We in the NDP are ready to offer ideas and alternatives, and some serious energy policies which we do not see in the Speech from the Throne.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, we are ready to listen to our sisters and brothers from Quebec. We are ready to work together after the referendum and set up a new social democracy for ordinary people but not for large corporations. We have learned a lesson from social democrats. Economic planning is possible in all areas and provinces of the country.

[English]

We are learning, and I say this frankly to my own party, that there can be economic planning and socialism in the regions of Canada. We will see in the next few years, I hope, our party regaining the governments of Manitoba and British Columbia for social democracy, and we will continue our experiments there.

An hon. Member: Experiments?

Mr. Waddell: And continue our good government there.

Mr. Siddon: Experiments. You said it right the first time.

Mr. Waddell: I want to conclude by saying that I am very proud, not of the social crediters over here from British Columbia, but of my colleagues.

An hon. Member: Oh, oh!

Mr. Waddell: I will ask the hon. member to write me a letter. I am very proud of my colleagues. We have activist ministers, teachers, social and community workers, storefront lawyers, and a host of other occupations. We have a young caucus which is willing to be the real opposition in this Parliament. It seems to me that we are a group of people who fought the battles of the 1960s and the 1970s, not like the Prime Minister who did it from high above, but from a street level and gut level.

We have added our experiences to the rock of the Woodsworthian tradition, and I am proud of it. I am proud of the principles of the NDP and the civil liberties traditions of our party.

There are many more things which I would like to say tonight, but I hope that I will get a chance later. I would like to conclude by quoting someone whom I very much admired as a law student. The gentleman's name is Frank Scott, a great lawyer and poet, who said:

From those condemned to labour
For profit of another
We take our new endeavour.
For sect and class and pattern
Through whom the strata harden
We sharpen now the weapon.
Till power is brought to pooling
And the outcasts share in ruling
There will not be an ending
Nor any peace for spending.

[Translation]

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, first I would like to pay tribute to the new Speaker of the House, the hon. member for Laval-des-Rapides (Mrs. Sauvé), to congratulate her on her appointment and wish her much success in her new responsibilities. I would also like to congratulate the member for Rimouski (Mrs. Côté) and the member for Sudbury (Mr. Frith) for their timely and sensible comments. I believe that the prestige of Parliament will be enhanced by the arrival of both new members and we must surely be grateful to their electors for having sent them to Ottawa.

● (2140)

Mr. Speaker, I am aware here today that I am probably delivering the most important speech of my political career. And it is to the voters of my riding of Montreal-Papineau that I want to speak to first of all. And, through you, I want by the same token to speak to all my fellow Canadians living in the province of Quebec, not Quebeckers, no, Canadians living in the province of Quebec. And I set that straight because I think it is high time that we do so because we have for several years now suffered, endured, and tolerated a subtle, sneaky, and machiavellian campaign bent on downgrading Canadian entity, Canadian federalism, Canadian institutions while at the same time we have been beset from all sides by an endless and sustained propaganda aimed at glorifying Quebec's specificity, beautifying the Quebec identity, and sanctifying the word Quebec. In short, we have had a martyr made of Quebec and a villain of Canada. And I think that joke has lasted long enough of having us believe that Canada is a dirty word and that we must always necessarily talk about Quebec. I suggest that this invading propaganda has been the systematic work, of course, of convinced separatists, who have infiltrated everywhere in Quebec, in all quarters, at all levels, in the area of education first, then in the area of information, in the artistic community, of course, in the trade union realm, in the agricultural world, in the provincial public service and also in the federal public service, in intermediary bodies, in professional organizations, in social clubs and even in charitable organizations.

Those separatists have striven hard to spread their philosophy. Without any scrupules, they have carried out their biased activities without any respect for objectivity and have constantly criticized the Government of Canada for nothing and everything. In the name of a free Quebec, and probably in search of equality, they have scandalously abused that extraordinary freedom that is unequalled in Canada. Those teachers who were required to teach objectively have set young Quebeckers against Canada and those reporters who were paid to be objective have minimized for all sorts of reasons federalist activities and heralded separatist activities. We had vivid evidence of that just this past weekend. They talked about an immense success of a meeting of 500 people in Donnacona and a half-success of a meeting of more than 3,000 federalists in Chicoutimi. Those artists, overpaid by the CBC, who have been whining about this country for years, those unionmen and politicians have enjoyed total freedom in their work of torpedoing Canadian unity. There is no doubt that if these people had tried to do this in any other country around the world, they would have been socked, they would have been clubbed, they would have been jailed. More still, in a number of countries they would have been shot for doing less than they could do in Canada, this free country of ours, where they had total freedom to hamper things wherever they could, in order to be able to say that everything went wrong in Canada, where they could unchallenged apply the slogan: "If you don't spare the lies, some will catch on."

There have been so many lies told about Canada that some people in Quebec are led to believe despite themselves that this country is bad for them. The referendum in Quebec will not happen just like that, Madam Speaker. It is being held because, of course, they are people who want Quebec to secede, but also and foremost because there are people in the Canadian government who allow that kind of freedom of thought, freedom of action, freedom of contestation to go on. That it is possible to enjoy in this country such a degree of democracy, of freedom and utmost equality is a tribute to our Canadian federalism.

In Canada, Canadians are really free, and that freedom is closely protected by our federal political system, with its two levels of governments to serve the people. Different levels whose raison d'être is complementation rather than duplication, to ensure healthy emulation in the interest of people, to provide Canadians with all the services and benefits they require. Indeed some people have been seen time and again to approach the other level of government in order to get better service.

In some cases, people go to the federal level saying the province is not doing exactly what they want, and asking for an improvement. And in a number of circumstances the federal government stepped in and granted their request. Conversely, wherever the Canadian government did not fully assume its responsibilities, provincial authorities were seen a number of times playing a suppletive role, stepping in and completing the work of the higher level in order to better serve its citizens. So, Madam Speaker, certain groups in Quebec want a new government. A government which would be that of a free Quebec and would, of course, bring about a unitary state with a single level of government. Quebec separatists tell Canadians and Quebeckers that there is no need for two levels of government, that this is more expensive, that it results in duplication and that it would be much better to have only one, the Quebec level. However, Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the citizens would have the same freedom? How would they be protected against the abuses of such a unitary state? Would they be better served? I am not saying that there would necessarily be less freedom and services provided to Quebeckers under a unitary system. However, what I am saying is that Canada is an experience that we are living and that has already proved worth while. I An independent and free Quebec represents the unknown and uncertainty. Through you, Mr. Speaker, I want to say this to my constituents of Montreal-Papineau: You will have the opportunity to take part in a referendum on May 20. The simple fact that you will be able to express your feelings secretly and democratically about the future of Quebec within or without Canada shows that you live in one of the freest countries of the world, and I hope that you will remember this and take this freedom into account when you make your choice.

I have no intention of trying tonight to quote figures or to use any kind of argument to influence the choice of my fellow citizens or to decide in their place, and I must say, Mr. Speaker, that I have really great confidence in the decision that my constituents will make and I am very optimistic about this referendum. I am not afraid of the results of this electoral consultation because I have a profound belief in my country, in Canada, and I am well aware of the judgment and the good sense of Canadians who live in Quebec and who want to remain Canadians. I have therefore no hesitation in saying that this separatist move on the part of René Lévesque and his colleagues will fail.

Quebeckers will see further than this ambiguous and misleading question, further than all the publicity, the propaganda and the scenario put together by out and out separatists, and they will realize that the ultimate objective of the Parti Québécois is to separate Quebec from Canada; they will realize the danger of going too far in the process of dislocating the country, in the eternal phasing promoted by Claude Morin. I am certain that the majority of them will vote No on May 20.

Mr. Speaker, the PQ was elected in 1976 in Quebec because it had promised to be a good government, to operate within the context of the Canadian confederation, to play the Canadian game fairly, and to hold a referendum as soon as possible on the first option of that party, namely the independence of Quebec. That party has failed to meet any of these three promises. The PQ government has increased the indebtedness of Quebec more than any other government before. Although it had promised to ensure peace in labour relations, we all know that Quebec citizens are plagued with a great many and endless strikes in the public sectors: schools, hospitals, public transit systems.

The PQ government demonstrates more than any other an arrogant and off-hand attitude towards the private sector. It has forced companies out of Quebec, it has prevented others from coming to Quebec and by doing so it has deprived Quebec workers of thousands of jobs. Rather than playing his part in Canadian federalism, Mr. René Lévesque made a fool of himself at federal-provincial conferences by sulking and slamming doors. We saw that not only at one but at two successive federal-provincial conferences. He has not played the federalism game like he said he would. His minister, Mr. Claude Morin, and his comic book peddler, Mr. Yves Michaud, have cultivated world diplomacy and have acted as if Quebec was a totally different country from Canada.

Finally, we have had to wait almost four years before the referendum is held, and not only have we waited four years, or more exactly three and a half years for the Quebec referendum, but the clear and precise question on the independence of Quebec is not even asked in the referendum. Not only is this clear and precise question not asked, but they even have the nerve to add in the question that there will probably be another referendum a bit later. That is outright deception and abuse of power against the population of Quebec.

I say that this government, which had made quite precise commitments on the eve of the 1976 election, has broken its promises and has acted deceitfully toward the population. Today, on the eve of this referendum, we cannot trust this government which is asking for a mandate when we know very well that at the first opportunity it will betray this mandate which could be given by the population of the province of Quebec. Mr. Speaker, I see it is now ten o'clock and with your permission, I will resume my remarks tomorrow.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

INDUSTRY, TRADE AND COMMERCE—JOBS AVAILABLE IN AUTOMOBILE MANUFACTURING

Mr. Ian Deans (Hamilton Mountain): Mr. Speaker, today in the province of Ontario there are some major problems confronting a number of workers, in fact a large number of workers, and I raised two questions with the minister. One was whether or not he could provide information for the House regarding the terms and the guarantees that were given at the time the federal government entered into a $68 million guarantee for the Ford Motor Company. Second, I asked whether the minister might be able to tell the House what sort of steps he proposed to take in order to ensure that the workers in the province of Ontario faced with these very difficult times would be at least guaranteed some form of support.

• (2200)

In this province the auto industry is in a very sorry state. As of today, the casting plant in Windsor will be mothballed. It may open some day in the future, but there is no guarantee. At the moment, 900 employees there will be out of work. In Oakville, another Ford plant, one shift will be laid off with 1,500 workers unemployed. All told in the province there are some 20,000 workers in the auto industry who are presently unemployed or about to become unemployed. That does not take into account the impact of what is happening with Chrysler or the snowballing effect that the closures of Ford and Chrysler will have on the subsidiary industry and of the suppliers who relate directly to those two major corporations.

I found the minister's answer quite unsatisfactory because, to the question of what were the guarantees, he answered that he could not tell me. He could not tell me because he had to have the permission of the Ford Motor Company before he could tell us what guarantees were written into the agreement which gave $68 million of tax money to Ford. It is ludicrous to think that in any business arrangement the person who put up the money would not at least have the right to immediate access to the guarantees and, in the case of a public agency, would not be able to report to the public from where the money comes or what sorts of commitments they were able to get at the time that guarantee or contract was made.

As to the second question, the minister's answer was simply that he was meeting no doubt with a large number of industry people in an effort to try to find a solution. I suggest that he might take another look at the auto industry.

The auto industry and the way in which it must be dealt with must be dramatically changed in this country. We cannot possibly allow the kind of piecemeal approach that has been used over the course of the last number of years in terms of trying to rationalize an industry that is in such a state of decay. Chrysler is on the verge of bankruptcy, if not in fact bankrupt. Ford Motor Company will lose about $1 billion this year. Who is next?

We are having meetings, meetings with suppliers and with the industry. We are in the process of considering whether it might be appropriate to loan, guarantee, or otherwise make available to Chrysler Corporation some half a billion dollars. As soon as that decision is made, Ford will be standing with its nose in the trough trying to find out just what share of the public purse it will be able to enjoy.

There has to be a reordered auto industry in this country. The auto industry is to blame for all of its own problems. Surely it must have been able to see as far back as seven or eight years ago that a dramatic shift was taking place in the purchasing preference of the people of North America. Surely it must have been able to project ahead and to see that the energy crunch that was becoming apparent was going to cause all kinds of difficulties for the monstrous vehicles that it built.

However, the companies did no proper planning. They did not make the transition, they did not invest the money, they did not involve themselves as good corporate citizens might have been expected to do in attempting to find the solution which would have kept their industries viable and competitive.

I think the minister has to sit down with these companies at the highest level. He has to say to them that this transition which is about to take place must take place now, and that there can be no public funds made available unless the people of the province of Ontario who are presently involved in the operation, the Government of Canada, and the people of Canada who will be putting up the money, are guaranteed that the outcome of whatever is finally decided will be that the auto industry in the North American continent, and in Canada in particular, will be competitive with the European auto manufacturers not only here but also in other parts of the world, and will be able to compete free from the encumbrances of parent companies in the United States.

I ask the minister to address himself to those matters. They are vital to the economy of this province and vital to the economy of this country. Two out of every ten people in this province work in the auto industry or in related industries, and I suggest that without it we are going to be in a very sorry state in many communities.

[Translation]

Mr. Gérald Laniel (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I am really amazed to hear the hon. member who seems to be dissatisfied with the judicious reply the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Gray) gave him this afternoon, simply that he could not give out the information requested without having obtained permission to do so from the Ford company. I must point out to the hon. member that, whether it be a union contract, that of an automobile company, or any other contract, even that of marriage, two parties are always involved. The hon. member seems to forget that when responsible people sign a contract they agree on certain premises, they agree to co-operate, and in view of present circumstances, all the more so with regard to jobs in the province of Ontario. To my mind, he should expect the representatives of the Crown to act responsibly. I shall continue in English.

[English]

As the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce said this afternoon, this matter is one of deep concern to himself and to the government. He is meeting tomorrow with representatives of the United Auto Workers to discuss this matter, and is also seeking an early meeting with the president of Ford for the same purpose. Within days of becoming Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, the minister began a series of talks with presidents of the automobile manufacturing companies with a view to getting new commitments from them for additional activity in Canada, particularly in the areas of job creation, research and development, and additional production. If the hon. member had read the press during that period of time, I am sure he would have read the comments of the minister.

The minister also has met with the UAW and with independent parts manufacturers—who are greatly concentrated in the province of Quebec and who are very concerned about the activities of Ford and Chrysler—to discuss how improvements can be made to the operation of the Canadian automotive industry.

The minister intends to go on and have similar meetings with presidents of the parent companies prior to beginning formal consultation under the provisions of the auto pact. This is an important question for all of Canada, not just for Ontario. I refer to the renewal of that pact with the American government. The minister's objective and that of the government is to seek a better operation of the auto pact in the interest of Canadian workers.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order. As the hon. member did himself when he sat in the Chair, with every possible consideration I must now interrupt him and tell him that the motion to adjourn the House is now deemed to have been adopted. Accordingly, this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 10.10 p.m.

FISHERIES

RATIFICATION OF CANADA-U.S. EAST COAST TREATY—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Mel Gass (Malpeque): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity under the provisions of Standing Order 43. In view of the fact that it seems likely the United States Senate may not ratify the Canada-United States east coast fishing treaty, and in view of the importance of this treaty to maritime fishermen, I move, seconded by the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath):

That this House directs the Secretary of State for External Affairs to immediately get in touch with his United States counterpart to impress upon him the importance that Canada places on the early ratification of this treaty.

Madam Speaker: This motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

INDUSTRY

CALL FOR REVIEW OF AND AID FOR AUTOMOBILE INDUSTRY—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Otto Jelinek (Halton): Madam Speaker, I rise on an urgent and pressing matter under the provisions of Standing Order 43. In view of the very serious state of the automobile industry in this country, as reflected by recent actions, including massive lay-offs and statements concerning the operations of the Ford Motor Company of Canada Limited, and Chrysler Canada Ltd., and in view of the imminence of a decision on the request for government financial assistance by Chrysler Canada, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Elgin (Mr. Wise):

That this House immediately order its Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs to be set up, and the committee commence an immediate review of the state of the automobile industry in Canada and the request for government financial assistance by Chrysler Canada Ltd., as well as an over-all review of the obsolete and inadequate auto pact.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

PUBLIC SERVICE

PRIORITY FOR REINSTATEMENT OF LAID OFF EMPLOYEES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Hon. Walter Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Madam Speaker, I would propose a motion, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of the representations made during the recent election campaign by Liberal candidates in the national capital area, that employees of the public service of Canada who were laid off would be reinstated and/or retrained, I move, seconded by the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie):

That the President of the Treasury Board reconsider his position that the Government of Canada has no responsibility for its employees, and take such steps as are necessary to extend the priority status of laid off employees, as requested by the Economists, Sociologists and Statisticians Association.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

HAZARDOUS SUBSTANCES

ASBESTOS—MEASURES TO PREVENT DANGER TO WORKERS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Jesse P. Flis (Parkdale-High Park): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity according to Standing Order 43. Considering that the killer mineral, asbestos, is causing lung cancer in thousands of Canadians, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Scarborough West (Mr. Weatherhead):

That this House call on the Minister of Public Works to remove or seal in federally-owned public buildings all asbestos used as insulation, fireproofing, soundproofing, or acoustics, which is flaking, crumbling, or damaged in any way, increasing asbestos dust in the air.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

FEDERATION OF FRANCOPHONES OUTSIDE QUEBEC—REQUEST THAT GOVERNMENT AND FEDERATION REAFFIRM PREVIOUS AGREEMENT—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Madam Speaker, under the terms of Standing Order 43, I request the unanimous consent of the House to present a motion dealing with an important and urgent matter.

Because in the course of the current constitutional debate the Francophones outside Quebec stand a chance of being overlooked, and because the former secretary of state, Mr. David MacDonald, had ratified an agreement providing for the setting up of a joint commission of the federal government and the Federation of Francophones outside Quebec, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

That this House request the present Secretary of State to reaffirm that agreement.

Madam Speaker: Order. The House has heard the motion of the hon. member. Under the terms of Standing Order 43, the motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL RELATIONS

REQUEST THAT NEGOTIATIONS BE PURSUED WITH QUEBEC ON USE OF MIRABEL FARMLAND—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Hon. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Madam Speaker, under the terms of Standing Order 43, I request the unanimous consent of the House to present a motion dealing with an important and urgent matter.

As the Quebec government and the former Progressive Conservative government had started negotiations with a view to allowing the Quebec government to put to use for farming purposes the land now standing idle at Mirabel—I think all Quebeckers will agree with me—and as the new government intends to adopt a more receptive attitude towards provincial objectives, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Epp):

That this House unanimously urge the responsible minister to pursue the negotiations as soon as possible.

AIR TRANSPORT

CALL FOR REVIEW OF NORTHERN SERVICES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Peter Ittinuar (Nunatsiaq): Madam Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. Air service in northern Canada is inadequate and unreliable, and runways are often only long enough to accommodate the smaller planes which are more expensive to run than in other parts of the country. I, therefore, move, seconded by the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Fulton):

That the Minister of Transport undertake a full review of air transportation services in the north, including a review of the Arctic airport facilities policy.

AUDITOR GENERAL'S REPORT

TABLING OF REPORT FOR YEAR ENDING MARCH 31, 1979

Madam Speaker: I have the honour to table in the House the annual report of the Auditor General of Canada to the House of Commons for the year ending March 31, 1979.

I remind hon. members that under Standing Order 65(1)(g) this report is deemed to have been permanently referred to the Standing Committee on Public Accounts.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

PRESENCE IN GALLERY OF RIGHT HON. EDWARD HEATH, FORMER PRIME MINISTER OF THE UNITED KINGDOM

Madam Speaker: I would like to draw to the attention of hon. members the presence in our gallery of the Right Hon. Edward Heath, former Prime Minister of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland, whom we thank for his visit.

AUDITOR GENERAL'S REPORT

MR. BAKER (NEPEAN-CARLETON)—NOTICE OF QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE TO BE RAISED

Hon. Walter Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Madam Speaker, I would like to give notice of a question of privilege involving the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Axworthy) which I will be raising at the end of the question period.

Oral Questions

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

BOYCOTTING OF OLYMPIC GAMES IN MOSCOW

Hon. Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister: it has to do with his reply yesterday when he was asked about his government's position with regard to support for the Olympic boycott.

Given his confused reply, which subsequently had to be twice clarified, not only by his own office but by the Department of External Affairs—and, I may say, neither time very successfully—a reply in which he indicated at one point opposition to the boycott, and then went on to say that at the same time he had written to President Carter indicating that he would support him in the measures announced—which, I presume, included the Olympic boycott—will the Prime Minister now say clearly and precisely whether or not he supports a boycott of the Olympic Games?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I am not surprised that the department, once again, had to clear up the confusion in the hon. lady's mind.

Miss MacDonald: They had to clear up your confusion.

Mr. Trudeau: My answer was that I had written President Carter in answer to a letter he had written to me indicating some further measures, which was made clear in a press release issued by my office about ten days ago after President Carter's letter had been received. In my answer, I indicated that indeed we were approving the various measures that he was taking in a general sense, and I indicated certain steps that we ourselves are contemplating.

Miss MacDonald: Madam Speaker, the Prime Minister, of course, has not answered the question as to whether or not he and his government are supporting an Olympic boycott, which he seemed to indicate yesterday when he said he had written to President Carter in that regard. Perhaps he would like to re-read what he said. The Prime Minister has said on other occasions that he thinks such a boycott can only be effective if it is widely supported.

● (1420)

Given the fact that some 33 countries have now publicly indicated their support for a boycott, and that includes countries from Africa, Latin America, Central America, the Caribbean, the Middle East, East Asia, Europe and North America, seeing that 33 countries have publicly advocated a boycott and 20 others have privately advocated that to the State Department, whereas only 27 have publicly stated they are against it, will the Prime Minister now say when he thinks that Canada should take a stand on this issue?

Mr. Crosbie: Come on, Pierre. Come on, old slippery shoes.

Mr. Trudeau: On the first part of the question, Madam Speaker, I want to explain once again that in this particular letter, President Carter did not raise the question of the boycott with me. He was raising—and this was made public at the time—the further steps that the United States were contemplating since there had been no recent movement in the Tehran situation. It is these recent steps that I was commenting upon in my answer to him.

Regarding the earlier question of the boycott, I made my position clear in the House yesterday, and I made it clear during the campaign. The boycott, in itself, will only be useful if it serves to show the Soviet Union and the Soviet people that there is, indeed, widespread condemnation of their invasion of Afghanistan.

An hon. Member: Do you condemn it?

Mr. Trudeau: That will only follow, Madam Speaker, if the boycott question is handled in such a way that it does not show division in the western ranks—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Crosbie: Resign.

Mr. Trudeau: —and, particularly, it does not indicate that the 104 nations which condemned the Soviet invasion in January at the United Nations do not seem able to continue that thrust of condemnation. It is to that end that we have been working, and are working now, Madam Speaker, to increase the number of people who would, together, pose some collective action.

Mr. Andre: Boycott, or not?

Miss MacDonald: A supplementary question, Madam Speaker. Given that the government had said that its new foreign policy was supposedly an active foreign policy, and yet we see no new initiatives—in fact, our allies do not know where we stand vis-à-vis Iran or Afghanistan these days—is the Prime Minister now saying that he is going to wait until after 104 nations have had their say, and that Canada will be the 105th? Or will he, now that 57 countries have declared their opposition to the games in Moscow, please state where Canada stands? Will he at least do that prior to the time Secretary Vance comes here next week to consult on this question, since I am sure he already knows the point of view of the United States on this very important question?

Mr. Crosbie: Get your courage up, Pierre.

Mr. Trudeau: No, Madam Speaker, I am afraid it is not realistic to hope that 104 nations will join in this collective action on the boycott. I think that perhaps more of them might have done so if the government to which the hon. member belonged had not made these very brave ultimata to the Soviet Union that they must be out by February 20 or else they would see what they would see. I think it should be obvious even to the former hon. minister of finance that this ultimatum—

An hon. Member: How would you have handled Munich?

Mr. Trudeau: —by his government has not had much effect on the Soviet Union.

Mr. Crosbie: It is better than your pusillanimous behaviour.

U.S. ECONOMIC SANCTIONS AGAINST IRAN—ATTITUDE OF GOVERNMENT

Hon. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon West): Madam Speaker, the Prime Minister avoids answering the question of my colleague, the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands. Yesterday he was clearly confused with respect to the sanctions against Iran and the invasion of Afghanistan, in his confused answer.

I want to ask him today specifically whether or not the Prime Minister and the government endorse the economic sanctions against Iran as proposed by President Carter, as was done by our government, the previous government, before the Security Council on December 30, 1979? Does this government endorse those particular proposals?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, very early in the election campaign I indicated that the actions of the then Canadian government had my support.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Madam Speaker, I recall very clearly—as I am sure many members of this House do—the statements made by the Prime Minister before and during the election campaign. I want to ask the Prime Minister if he has taken any bold initiatives with respect to Iran, as he urged on our government—particularly about getting on the phone within 24 hours—and whether he has spoken to President Carter. Also, has he spoken to the other members of the summit, led the way in getting sanctions and taken steps and initiatives with respect to the hostages in Tehran, or is he just sitting around and waiting until all the other nations go first and then he can come along?

• (1425)

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, the actions I have taken have not been bold, in the sense of those of the hon. member's party, who used them very boldly during the election campaign. But I have taken steps, and indeed our foreign minister is in Zimbabwe today following up on those steps and trying to get a little larger support for whatever action we take to condemn the invasion than the hon. member's government managed to do.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Madam Speaker, the Prime Minister is referring to the invasion of Afghanistan, I am talking about Iran. It is next to Iraq, and it is next to Afghanistan. It is a different country.

I ask the Prime Minister whether or not—he has made reference to these letters and communications with President Carter—he will now table those documents in the House of Commons. He has made reference to them. He is required under the rules of the House of Commons to table these documents. Will he do that, so the people of Canada can see what he is doing, if he will not tell us?

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, I knew, once again, that the kind of bold action that the hon. member describes is not the kind that I would be able to follow up. I do not believe in trying to make political yards with this. I try and get—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Andre: Even MacEachen is smiling at that one.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: I find it more important to take effective action, and that is what we are doing.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

FINANCE

HIGH INTEREST RATES—ADVERSE EFFECT ON MORTGAGES

Mrs. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. In view of the minister's insensitive statement yesterday that most Canadians can afford a home, and only a small number of home owners need help because of high interest rates, and since at least 32,000 home owners face foreclosure or must pay increased interest rates well in excess of 30 per cent of their income, will the minister take steps to ensure that mortgages renewed in 1980 remain frozen at their existing rate for at least one year?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I cannot give that assurance to the hon. member. There is no way that it would be possible for the government to freeze interest rates in these circumstances, or in accordance with the irresponsible suggestion contained in the amendment moved by the Leader of the New Democratic Party.

What we are attempting to do—and this ought to give some comfort to the hon. member—is ensure that home owners renegotiating their mortgages in this period of very high interest rates will be able, through techniques we are considering, to continue their payments and to maintain ownership of their homes. That seems to me to be a very sensitive approach to a critical problem.

Mrs. Mitchell: Madam Speaker, I think the minister does not recall, but I believe in 1965 there were such controls.

CANADA MORTGAGE AND HOUSING CORPORATION

FUNDING FOR NON-PROFIT AND CO-OP HOUSING

Mrs. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Madam Speaker, my supplementary is to the minister responsible for Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation.

Since new housing starts are down dramatically, while rents for about four million tenants are skyrocketing, and many pensioners and women raising families on their own are paying up to 60 per cent of their incomes on rent, and since the greatest housing need in Canada is to increase non-profit housing to lease to tenants who are earning less than $30,000 per year, will the minister responsible for CMHC tell this House how many requests for non-profit and co-op housing were refused CMHC funding this year; and will he confirm that allocations will be increased for this kind of housing?

● (1430)

Hon. Paul J. Cosgrove (Minister of Public Works): Madam Speaker, I recognize the difficulties expressed by the hon. member opposite. I will need some time to get the specifics. However, I am pleased to say that we are aware that there are a number of demands. They seem to be numerous. I will report to the hon. member on the exact number when I have the opportunity, I expect tomorrow.

SOCIAL SECURITY

MONTHLY INCREASE OF $35 FOR PERSONS ON GIS

Mr. Serge Joyal (Hochelaga-Maisonneuve): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Considering that the Speech from the Throne read by His Excellency the Governor General restates the government's undertaking to grant a monthly increase of $35 to persons receiving the income supplement, could the minister tell the members of this House whether she intends to meet her provincial counterparts so that this time, once the House has approved the increase, the provinces will not take it back from the elderly, especially those who live in senior citizens' homes?

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Madam Speaker, I would like to admit that there is such a problem which deeply concerned the members who were in the House two years ago. A week or ten days ago, I believe, I wrote to each of my provincial counterparts to make sure it would not happen again, if possible, and I asked them specifically to increase the allowance given as pocket money to senior citizens who receive the supplement and live in such homes, that is, almost 10 per cent of all senior citizens. For example, I know that if Quebec were to act as it did last time, it would be taking $6 or 7 million from older people.

REDUCTION OF OIL IMPORTS—EFFECT ON ENERGY PRICES

Hon. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Madam Speaker, my question is to the Prime Minister, who last fall had a tiger in his tank when it came to foreign affairs: now he has not even got a pussycat.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Crosbie: At the summit meeting last June in Tokyo, which the Prime Minister missed—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Crosbie: —the real prime minister agreed that Canada would reduce its annual average rate of growth of oil consumption to 1 per cent by the year 1985, with the consequent reduction of oil imports by 50,000 barrels per day. That did not imply any agreement on oil prices.

Will the Prime Minister tell us whether he intends to keep to this commitment. If so, how is he going to keep to that commitment in view of his policy announced during the election campaign in connection with the oil situation?

[Translation]

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, surely the hon. member knows that at the next summit held in Venice the energy issue will be discussed at length and the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and myself are preparing the Canadian position on the matter.

[English]

Mr. Crosbie: Madam Speaker, the question I asked the Prime Minister was whether he was going to honour the commitment given by Canada at the summit meeting of last June with reference to our position on reducing oil imports by the year 1985.

Is the Prime Minister saying that he is not going to observe that commitment, that he and his Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources are going to make some different commitment. Furthermore, what is the Prime Minister going to do about the thousands of Americans who are coming into Canada to buy gasoline, saving $17.40 a barrel provided by way of subsidy by the Canadian taxpayer? When is he going to do something about that? How about an answer on both of those? What is his policy?

[Translation]

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, the hon. member is well aware that this government will not promise to repeat all the promises the previous government had made here and there. The Clark government itself had to renege on several of its promises. The one about Jerusalem is a case in point.

TRANSPORT

FUNDS FOR DEVELOPMENT OF RIDLEY ISLAND GRAIN PORT, PRINCE RUPERT, B.C.

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Madam Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Transport. I would like to congratulate him on his appointment. Would the minister assure this House and western Canada that the infrastructure funds for development of the Ridley Island grain port in Prince Rupert will be made available at levels acceptable to an immediate go-ahead, thereby removing all existing uncertainties.

As I am sure the minister appreciates, grain farmers and producers in the western provinces view this development as crucial, because every day of delay is costing them and Canada millions of dollars.

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Yes, Madam Speaker, I can do that. My generous predecessor committed $42.5 million to that objective. As is well known, however, some of that money was to come from the governments of British Columbia and Alberta. I had to ensure that it was still there unconditionally. It is.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: What about Saskatchewan?

Mr. Pepin: I invited the government of Saskatchewan as sympathetically as I could to contemplate making a similar contribution. The question of the wharf never having been cleared up—I think that is true—I informed the consortium that the wharf would be on a cost-recovery basis.

It can therefore be seen that I am trying to put together all the loose ends. I am convinced the project will go ahead, and I am dedicating myself fully to that objective.

Mr. Fulton: Perhaps the minister will give an unequivocal yes or no as to whether or not the funds for the infrastructure costs will be in place before the end of this month.

Mr. Pepin: Yes, Madam Speaker.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

RATIFICATION OF CANADA-U.S. FISHING TREATY

Hon. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Madam Speaker, in the absence of the Secretary of State for External Affairs, I wish to ask the Prime Minister this question. In view of the very disturbing reports coming out of Washington that the U.S. Senate may not ratify the Canada-U.S. fishing treaty which is so important to the Atlantic provinces, and in view of the fact that two months ago there seemed to be a disposition on the part of senior U.S. congressmen, as well as Senator Church, the chairman of the Senate foreign relations committee, to get on with ratification of this treaty, I wish to ask the Prime Minister what steps the government took to take advantage of the good will that existed there at that time, in order to impress upon the U.S. government the importance to Canada of ratification of this important treaty.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I was very distressed indeed to realize that ratification of the treaty was somewhat in doubt. The hon. member will recall that it was a previous Liberal government which put that treaty in place and negotiated it. I was somewhat disturbed to learn that so little had been done by the Conservative administration to follow up on that treaty.

Mr. McGrath: My supplementary question to the Prime Minister is this: In view of the fact that the failure of the U.S. Senate to ratify this treaty could have very serious consequences on the east coast fishery, especially the very important scallop fishery, and in view of the fact my colleague, the former secretary of state for external affairs, made representations to Cyrus Vance and Senator Church, I ask the Prime Minister why this government failed to impress upon the U.S. government, at a time when there was good will there toward us, the importance of this treaty to Canada.

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, I am sure you recognize the element of rhetoric contained in that question. We negotiated the treaty; we signed it; we were ready to implement it. When we left the office of government, the United States were well disposed. Something must have happened during the Tory six months to cause this indisposition, and we are going to try to correct it.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crosbie: Resign.

EXPORT DEVELOPMENT CORPORATION

STATUS OF LOANS MADE TO IRAN

Mr. Harvie Andre (Calgary Centre): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of State (Trade): it has to do with our business dealings with Iran. Can the minister indicate the current status of Export Development Corporation loans to Iran? Can he indicate if any of these loans are currently in default?

Hon. Ed Lumley (Minister of State, Trade): Madam Speaker, at the present time there are about $125 million in loans outstanding through EDC. I am not aware at the present time if any of them are in default.

Mr. Andre: I realize the minister may have difficulty figuring out the policy of his government toward Iran. Can he advise the House what instructions he has given to the Export Development Corporation? For example, has he instructed them to cease disbursing any further funds in addition to the $125 million in loan commitments that are outstanding?

● (1440)

Mr. Lumley: Madam Speaker, my colleague, the Secretary of State for External Affairs, has stated that our policy with regard to Iran will be announced within a week.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

ALLEGED DISSATISFACTION WITH SALARIES AND GRIEVANCE PROCEDURES

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Solicitor General. Would the hon. gentleman confirm whether it is correct that over 100 members of the RCMP have formed an association to establish collective bargaining in the force, due to dissatisfaction with salaries and grievance procedures? If so, what response is being made by the minister and the government to this initiative?

Hon. Bob Kaplan (Solicitor General): Madam Speaker, I have given a lot of thought to grievances within the RCMP. It is quite true there has been the formation of this collective bargaining association. I am giving it consideration because there has been within the ministry for a number of years an RCMP act in revision and under consideration. I have made this a top priority. That act contains grievance procedures. It was in the Speech from the Throne, and I hope to be able to bring it forward soon. I hope the members of the force will try to live with it and give it a chance before they consider abandoning it and seeking some other way of resolving grievances.

Mr. Allmand: Madam Speaker, would the Solicitor General confirm whether it is correct that a larger number than average are now quitting the force due to low morale and dissatisfaction with working conditions?

Mr. Kaplan: Madam Speaker, no, I do not believe that is the case. There is a report in the papers today to the effect that a larger number than average are quitting in the province of Alberta. That is a fact; I have checked it. But the reason seems to be economic conditions in Alberta, rather than any particular problems with grievance procedures in that province.

AMENDMENTS TO ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE ACT

Hon. Allan Lawrence (Durham-Northumberland): Madam Speaker, now that the Speech from the Throne has indicated that the Solicitor General is proceeding with those amendments to the RCMP legislation which were prepared for him by the previous government, would he tell us why on March 9 he indicated that he did not intend to proceed with those amendments?

Hon. Bob Kaplan (Solicitor General): Madam Speaker, I do not know what the hon. member is referring to. I have never said we will not be proceeding with them. We are proceeding with them. I have made some important changes to them and I shall be bringing them before cabinet shortly. Members of the RCMP themselves, along with members of the House, will have an opportunity to consider them soon. Basically, they implement the recommendations of the Marin commission, but they are updated so as to take some current circumstances into consideration.

GRIEVANCES OF CERTAIN MEMBERS OF FORCE

Hon. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Madam Speaker, I should like to direct a supplementary question to the Solicitor General. In light of his previous remarks, is he prepared to review sympathetically some of the outstanding grievances which have existed with respect to particular members of the force, including people such as McCleery, Brunet and a member of the force called Danch who did not have his court costs paid, despite the fact that he was successful in the Federal Court. Is the minister prepared to review these matters sympathetically?

Hon. Bob Kaplan (Solicitor General): I am prepared to review sympathetically any matter an hon. member wishes to bring to my attention.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

INDUSTRY

TERMS OF CONTRACT WITH FORD MOTOR COMPANY

Mr. Ian Deans (Hamilton Mountain): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. In view of the fact that the contract between the government of Ontario and the Ford Motor Company—which was negotiated concurrently with the contract between the federal government and the Ford Motor Company—was tabled yesterday in the Ontario legislature and contains no clause which in any way gives Ford the right to restrict making public the terms of the contract, does the minister stand by his statement of yesterday that such a clause exists in the federal contract and, if so, why is it there?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Madam Speaker, I understand that a telex confirming Ford has agreed to the release of the agreement on the Essex engine plant is on the way. I am having the contract translated so that it may be available to the House in both official languages, and I hope to be able to table it tomorrow.

Mr. Deans: Madam Speaker, I assume the minister is familiar with the terms of the contract, since he has indicated he has studied it frequently. Is he prepared to tell the House what terms there are in that contract which guarantee the jobs in the province of Ontario which were supposedly guaranteed at the time the $68 million was extended to Ford?

Mr. Gray: Madam Speaker, my review of the contract indicates that the commitments contained in it related to the building, operating and equipment of the new Essex plant. However, at the time it was entered into, it was the expectation of everyone that those activities would be in addition to activities at the existing Ford facilities.

This has been confirmed by statements of the president of Ford of Canada himself, and this is why I am seeking a meeting as soon as possible with the heads of the parent company, as well as of the Canadian subsidiary, in order to urge them to reverse the decision announced yesterday with respect to the casting plant and to the lay-offs at Oakville.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

PUBLICIZING OF CIDA POSITION PAPERS ON INTERNATIONAL AFFAIRS

Mr. Douglas Roche (Edmonton South): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. In the past year, the Department of External Affairs and CIDA prepared two position papers outlining the major trends in international affairs to which Canada will have to respond in the 1980s. These papers were intended to be a base for a parliamentary review of Canada's foreign policy.

It is the intention of the government to release these objective, professional papers and provide a reference to the Standing Committee on External Affairs and National Defence, so that it may proceed with such a study?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I am not aware of the particular content of those papers, but I will take the question as notice and discuss it with the Secretary of State for External Affairs when he returns.

Mr. Roche: Madam Speaker, can I infer from the Prime Minister's response that he is in favour, in principle, of the Standing Committee on External Affairs and National Defence conducting public hearings, and proceeding with such a study, allowing input from Canadians, particularly those who are interested in a constructive and vigorous foreign policy for Canada in the 1980s?

[Translation]

Mr. Trudeau: I have explained to the hon. member that I did not know the content of these papers, and I cannot assure him in advance that I shall make public all the papers which were prepared while his party was in power. I suggest that the hon. member himself would be opposed to that.

[English]

REVIEW OF ROLES OF EXTERNAL AFFAIRS AND NATIONAL DEFENCE

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Madam Speaker, my supplementary is addressed to the Prime Minister. We have heard since the election from the Secretary of State for External Affairs, as well as from the Minister of National Defence, that they do not believe reviews of their respective roles are required at this time. Does that represent government policy?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, the subject was not discussed in cabinet, to my knowledge, but by way of a general answer I would say that I am in agreement with what the ministers are reported to have said. We do not see a need for extensive and fundamental reviews of those two areas of government activity.

Such reviews were undertaken, as the hon. member will recall, in the late 1960s. They were subject to some criticism by the public and, indeed, by the opposition at that time, on the grounds that rather than acting, we were studying. It is our intention in this case to act, because our studies have already been completed.

Mr. Crosbie: What about Iran?

VEHICLE OF FINANCIAL ASSISTANCE TO CARIBBEAN COUNTRIES

Mr. Bob Ogle (Saskatoon East): Madam Speaker, my question is addressed to the Prime Minister and it relates to the grave difficulties which the government of Jamaica is currently experiencing in its financial dealings as a result of a recent conflict with the International Monetary Fund.

In the absence of the Secretary of State for External Affairs, my question to the Prime Minister is this: In view of the fact that Canada has been expected to contribute an urgently needed $8 million U.S. to a World Bank program giving balance of payments support to Caribbean countries, including Jamaica, can the right hon. gentleman assure the House that this needed Canadian assistance will be made available through the World Bank, and that other official Canadian aid programs will not be hampered by this financing crisis?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I will have to ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs for an update on this subject. As of a couple of weeks ago, I know there was an exchange between the government of Jamaica and the Government of Canada. The last communication of which I was made aware was from the government of Jamaica, indicating that there had been a rejection of the IMF approach and consequently it was asking us to hold back on any action for the time being.

Mr. Ogle: My supplementary question is to the Prime Minister: it is of a slightly different nature. Considering that needed Canadian equipment produced for the use of Alcan in Jamaica, which they need and want, is now ready for shipment and is reportedly being delayed because of the IMF decision, will the Government of Canada take supportive action to ensure that such shipments are proceeded with as soon as possible?

Mr. Trudeau: I will be happy to take notice of the question.

IMMIGRATION

TIMOTHY LEARY—REASON ALLOWED TO ENTER CANADA

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg-Assiniboine): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Employment and Immigration. In view of the fact that on previous occasions, former Liberal immigration ministers have refused to issue ministerial permits permitting Timothy Leary entry into this country, what new circumstances presently exist whereby Mr. Leary has been given a ministerial permit, especially in light of the fact that one of the purposes of Mr. Leary's visit was to give his first Canadian commercial performance at a Winnipeg hotel in which the minister and his brother have a financial interest? Does this not constitute a conflict of interest, in which case the minister ought to consider his resignation?

Some hon. Members: Shame on you.

Some hon. Members: Resign.

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, I am very pleased that the hon. member has raised that question, because he has been guilty in the past week of issuing a number of public charges based on totally erroneous information which he has now repeated in this House. Let me point out to the hon. member, first, and to other members of the chamber, that it is not the purpose of the Immigration Act to provide for censorship of view in this country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Axworthy: A previous minister of immigration, Mr. Nicholson, put forward a statement—called the Nicholson doctrine—that there should be no attempt to prevent Canadians from hearing a variety of points of view, whether or not they are controversial. Just because the hon. member for Winnipeg-Assiniboine does not happen to agree with the position of Mr. Leary does not mean to say he should not be given the right to come to this country. In fact, if we were to follow the rules as to what the hon. member for Winnipeg-Assiniboine thought was right or wrong, virtually no one would be coming to this country to present their points of view. I would say, Madam Speaker, that—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Axworthy: In direct answer to the question—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Axworthy: —let me say that on March 6 I was given a recommendation by the department, in which I concurred, that

Mr. Leary be granted the opportunity to undertake a cross-country tour and to be available to entertain in the cities of Montreal, Toronto and Ottawa. I concurred in that recommendation made by department officials, contrary to the statement made by the hon. member for Winnipeg-Assiniboine that we contradicted them.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Madam Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Axworthy: Madam Speaker—

Madam Speaker: Order, please. A supplementary question from the hon. member for Winnipeg-Assiniboine.

Mr. McKenzie: We are not talking about expressing opinions; we are talking about a conflict of interest. Obviously, the minister has not read his guidelines. You are not supposed to assist your relatives. In this case, you were assisting yourself in a commercial venture. You also issued instructions at Winnipeg and other cities that this man was not—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Madam Speaker: If the hon. member has a question, will he come to it very quickly.

Mr. McKenzie: My question is: Are you going to submit your resignation, or have you discussed this matter with the Prime Minister, to whom I have written on this matter? It is clear and simple that you have broken the guidelines of a minister.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Madam Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Axworthy: The question there is really one of my privilege, because the hon. member for Winnipeg-Assiniboine refuses to listen to the truth. The truth is that I concurred in the recommendation on March 6. At no time after that—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Axworthy: Madam Speaker, do hon. members on the opposite side want to hear the truth, or not?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Axworthy: I do not think they do.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Axworthy: The fact of the matter is that on March 6, on an application from a Toronto law firm which was acting as agent for Mr. Leary, the recommendation was made. At that time, I received no further application or representation from anybody, including my relatives, concerning his appearance at a Winnipeg hotel. I learned about it probably at the same time as the hon. member did, by reading an advertisement in a Winnipeg newspaper; but no representation was made, nor was any contact made, about his appearance. The recommendation was concurred in on March 6. The arrangement for him to appear at the hotel was on April 1, and there was no other communication in between time.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Order.

Madam Speaker: Order, please.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

DATE OF PUBLICATION OF DECISION CONCERNING PURCHASE OF MILITARY TRUCKS

Mr. J.-Roland Comtois (Terrebonne): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of National Defence.

Now that a decision has been made concerning the new F-18A fighter plane, could the minister advise the House about the program worth some $300 million to replace some 2,800, 2½-ton military trucks, and indicate at what time a decision will be made concerning this?

Hon. J. Gilles Lamontagne (Minister of National Defence): Madam Speaker, as mentioned by the hon. member, it is true that under the armed forces equipment modernization program, there exists a program to purchase military trucks. We are drafting the specifications and, as usual, we shall make sure that the economic and industrial spin-offs are shared as fairly as possible among all Canadian provinces, in particular Quebec.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

PRORATA PENSIONS FOR WIDOWS OF VETERANS ON DISABILITY PENSION

Hon. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Veterans Affairs. In view of widespread support for the proposition that prorata pensions should be paid to widows of disabled veterans where the veteran's disability pension was below 48 per cent, and in view of the statement made to the media by the minister a couple of weeks ago that he was planning to bring in such legislation, can he tell us if it will be introduced in the House at an early date?

Hon. Daniel J. MacDonald (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Madam Speaker, I am very conscious of the legislation to which the hon. member makes reference. I would also say that I am very conscious of the legislation brought in by the former minister. Much preparation has been done on this legislation to date. I will be making further recommendations, and I will be speaking with my colleagues on this very subject at a time yet to be decided.

Mr. Knowles: When the minister brings in legislation respecting the subject which I just raised, will he also be bringing in the long-promised review of the War Veterans Allowance Act, as well as other pieces of veterans' legislation that need to be brought up to date?

Mr. MacDonald: Madam Speaker, this is all under review by the department at the present time.

RECOMMENDATIONS OF SEVERAL COMMISSIONS—MINISTER RESPONSIBLE FOR RESPONDING TO REPORTS

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Wellington-Dufferin-Simcoe): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. The Auditor General's report, released today, recommends that the government co-ordinate its response to the recommendations in the Lambert report, the d'Avignon commission and the Auditor General's findings.

I ask the Prime Minister, has the government decided to vest the responsibility for responding to these reports in a single minister and, if so, who is that minister?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Yes, Madam Speaker. It will be the President of the Privy Council.

Mr. Beatty: I have a supplementary question for either the President of the Privy Council or the Prime Minister. The Auditor General's report which was issued today devotes an entire chapter to the need for improved accountability and control of federal Crown corporations, as was recommended in Bill C-27 introduced by our government.

In view of the fact that while the Speech from the Throne recommends the creation of at least three new Crown corporations, and no mention was made of the intention of the government to reintroduce legislation dealing with Crown corporations in the Speech from the Throne, and no mention exists on the order paper of today, why has the government refused to take action to date or to give any indication of any intention to take action to bring improved accountability and control to Crown corporations?

● (1500)

Mr. Trudeau: Of all people, Madam Speaker, I would have thought the former minister would know the answer to that question. He knows that preparation respecting the responsibility and control of Crown corporations has been the cause of work by the Liberal government for at least two years, and that when his government took office, a draft bill—which was given to the then minister—was a bill that had been drafted by our administration. So he knows very well what our intentions are in this regard.

PRIVILEGE

MR. BAKER (NEPEAN-CARLETON)—SUGGESTED BREACH OF CONFIDENTIALITY

Hon. Walter Baker (Nepean-Carleton): I gave Madam Speaker notice of a question of privilege involving the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Axworthy).

At 2.15 p.m. today Madam Speaker tabled before the House of Commons the report of the Auditor General to the House of Commons for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1979, in which there are references to the operation of government. Earlier in the day, before this report was tabled in the House of Commons, there was delivered to the office of each member of Parliament a statement entitled: "Unemployment Insurance: Undetected overpayments in 1978 projected by the Auditor General of Canada, Statement by the Honourable Lloyd Axworthy, Minister of Employment and Immigration, April 16, 1980."

That was done this morning before the report was tabled in the House of Commons and during a period of time when there was a lock-up for the press and for members of Parliament, a lock-up which a number of members of Parliament attended. I do not know whether the minister attended or not. Perhaps he did not have any reason to attend. There is no doubt that he was not referring to anything else but the report of the Auditor General as tabled, because in the document which he delivered to all our offices in advance there was the following paragraph:

The Auditor General's annual report, tabled today—

That is in the past tense, "tabled today". It continues:

—estimates that UI overpayments in 1978 may have amounted to $290 million.

It goes on to quote a number of statistics out of the Auditor General's report.

The fact of the matter is that members of the House of Commons who saw that report were subject to quite an appropriate condition of confidentiality until that matter was tabled here in the House of Commons. I think it is a matter that is quite serious. It involves two things. The minister's behaviour is a discourtesy to the Auditor General in the first place.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): I do not know whether it has escaped his attention or not, but the Auditor General is a servant of Parliament, not a servant of the minister. That is the first thing. The second matter is that it is a contempt of this House, and I think a minister of the Crown should know better. I believe the minister should be required to stand in his place, apologize to the Auditor General and offer at least an explanation to this House of Commons and indeed apologize to the House for this contempt of this House.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, it is unfortunate that, in the enforced vacation period the hon. member has received since February 18, he did not take the time to read reports which were previously issued by his government when they were in office. If he had taken that time, he would have recognized that in October of 1979 the Canada Employment and Immigration Commission issued its annual report. Appended to that report was the Auditor General's report relating to the activities of the Canada Employment and Immigration Commission, at which time the exact figures and numbers that were contained were tabled in October of 1979.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Tabled today.

Mr. Axworthy: All the information relating to overpayment under the Canada Employment and Immigration Commission was contained in the report of the Auditor General tabled in this House in October, 1979.

The report that was issued today was simply to give members of Parliament the opportunity to understand a number of corrective measures which we have since introduced upon learning of those statements of the Auditor General. It was simply to provide information to members so that they would not rush off in great haste and make great charges, but would understand that work by this government has been done to take the proper remedial measures based upon the Auditor General's report which was issued last October by the hon. member's own government. I suggest that the member go back and read that report.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

An hon. Member: It was tabled today. That is sleezy.

MR. HNATYSHYN—JAMMING OF BROADCASTS OF HOUSE PROCEEDINGS

Hon. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon West): Madam Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege at the earliest possible opportunity upon being apprised of a set of circumstances which affects the rights and privileges of all members of the House of Commons, their rights and prerogatives in terms of the dissemination of the broadcasting of the proceedings of the House of Commons. Specifically I refer to the fact that in the city of Saskatoon the provincial government, through its Crown corporation, Sask Tel or Saskatchewan Telecommunications, has in fact taken the step of jamming the transmission of the proceedings of this House of Commons to the citizens of Saskatoon.

An hon. Member: Shame.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: In terms of the responsibility which Madam Speaker has to articulate, and in fact to investigate and take steps with respect to protecting the rights of members of the House of Commons, compels me to raise this matter at this particular point in time. Apparently what has happened is that there has been the transmission, through the facilities under Madam Speaker's chairmanship, of the proceedings of this House to Saskatchewan which has been received by the equipment of Saskatoon Telecable Limited. This equipment has received the signals and the intention has been that it be carried over the lines owned and controlled by Sask Tel in Saskatoon. What has happened has been an interference with that particular dissemination.

I would be interested in hearing from the minister responsible, the Secretary of State and Minister of Communications (Mr. Fox), as to what attitude the government takes with respect to this interference and with respect to responsibility for and jurisdiction over broadcasting in Canada, particularly as it relates to the House of Commons. I bring this matter to Madam Speaker's attention as a question of privilege and as a matter which is under her responsibility in terms of the broadcasting of the proceedings of the House of Commons. There has been an interference in the dissemination of the proceedings here to the people of Canada. I ask for a ruling with respect to that matter so that there will be no further interference with the broadcasting to Saskatoon.

Hon. Francis Fox (Secretary of State and Minister of Communications): Madam Speaker, indeed I think it unfortunate that this situation has developed, one which has prevented people, particularly in the area of Saskatoon, as I understand the problem, from witnessing the proceedings of the House of Commons over the past week.

This question was drawn to my attention late last night. I must say that at first glance it appears to be a dispute between the cable company and the Saskatchewan Telephone Company. In any event, if Madam Speaker so desires, I will more than willingly put all the inquiry possibilities at the disposal of my department at the disposal of the Chair so as to get to the bottom of the matter, and to report to Madam Speaker.

MR. ANDRE—NOTICE OF QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE TO BE RAISED

Mr. Harvie Andre (Calgary Centre): Madam Speaker, in view of the absence of the hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark), I simply want to rise to give notice of the intention to raise a question of privilege tomorrow arising out of the remarks by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) during the throne speech debate yesterday, which might be of particular interest to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde).

Hon. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Madam Speaker, you have not ruled yet on the question of privilege which was raised by the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Baker). There can be no doubt that the reference was specifically to the Auditor General's report that you tabled today. Perhaps you, Madam Speaker, would like to take the matter under consideration and bring down a ruling tomorrow.

It seems to me that one of those responsibilities which you have taken on now is to enforce the rights and privileges of all hon. members of the House, and one of those long established in the history of our precedents is that ministers do not act in this way, particularly under these circumstances where a lock-up existed and all of the attendant security for the purpose of avoiding the kind of leaks that this minister apparently has deliberately let himself in for by this press release.

Those words in my submission, Madam Speaker, are unmistakeable and place the minister in a very difficult position. Either he apologizes and admits to the error, or you, Madam Speaker, have the problem on your hands of recognizing the rights and privileges of members of this House and of bringing down a ruling, so that if we see there is a breach we can act further on it.

Madam Speaker: I wish to point out to the hon. member that the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Baker) has not followed his intervention by a motion and therefore that I do not have to follow it up.

It can be considered that the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton's remarks are derived, in a way, from the proceedings of this House since there is certainly some correlation between what he said and the fact that I tabled a document today. But without a motion I could not follow it up and it is deemed that the explanations given by the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Axworthy) were considered satisfactory.

[English]

Mr. Nielsen: I wonder if I might follow that up, Madam Speaker, in no way questioning your ruling, of course.

Madam Speaker: Order. I think the matter is sufficiently clear to members of this House. I have determined that since there was not a motion attached to the remarks of the hon. member, there was no reason for me to follow up on them. I think hon. members have heard the explanation of the Minister of Employment and Immigration.

MR. NIELSEN—PAST PRACTICE ON QUESTIONS RAISED

Hon. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Madam Speaker, I have another question of privilege that relates to the practices of this place.

Madam Speaker: Is this a new question of privilege?

Mr. Nielsen: Yes, it is a new question of privilege, Madam Speaker, arising out of your treatment of this question. The practice of your predecessors has always been, whether a question of privilege raised was accompanied by a substantive motion or not, to rule either that the question of privilege raised at the time was such or was not.

There have been two ways that questions of privilege have been treated under our proceedings; the one such as that raised today by the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Baker), and the other a formal question of privilege preceded by notice under our rules, and which is extensively dealt with in a very formal way.

Always in the past I submit, Madam Speaker, your predecessors, and particularly the one you succeeded, have always ruled on questions of privilege of this nature which have been raised quite consistently and regularly in our proceedings. Indeed, when those opposite were on this side, that was the manner in which these questions were treated; Mr. Speaker always made a decision as to whether there was a question affecting the rights and privileges of members of this House.

I would hope, Madam Speaker, that you would, as I am sure you will, follow that past practice so that we are not forced into the position in respect of this kind of a question, for instance where in future every single question of privilege raised must be preceded by notice and supported by a substantive motion.

Hon. Yvon Pinard (President of the Privy Council): Madam Speaker, I humbly plead with you that you do not let that kind of lecture on procedure influence your judgment, since the Standing Orders are very clear on that point. The second point of privilege that the hon. member is trying to raise amounts to nothing more than a criticism of the decision you rendered in accordance with the Standing Orders of the House. As a matter of fact, all members know that you cannot say whether there is or is not a prima facie question of privilege when no motion has been moved, as is now the case.

In the past, Madam Speaker, some hon. members did use the question of privilege as a pretext to argue or debate a matter, that is true, but sooner or later the Speaker of the House always reached the conclusion that that was a very interesting issue but only for debate. I do not see in this case any question of privilege that requires an examination or a decision by the House, because ultimately it is the House that decides whether or not there is a question of privilege. So, Madam Speaker, I think we can seize this opportunity to remind ourselves that we should not abuse the time of the House and engage in that kind of a debate and that any member who feels his privileges have been really infringed upon should move a motion as required after raising the issue.

[English]

Hon. Walter Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Madam Speaker, I am interested in how attitudes can change here from Parliament to Parliament, depending on where people sit.

I listened to what my colleague, the hon member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen), said with respect to what might have been construed as a ruling of yours, and I use that phrase because my friend, the government House leader has talked about arguing with a ruling of Madam Speaker.

The fact of the matter is, Madam Speaker, that you did not make a ruling, particularly in respect of the substance of the privilege and the substance of my comment. What you said was that there was no motion attached to it. However, there still remains, as the hon. member for Yukon said, even in a case where there is no motion, a question of privilege; and what the hon. member for Yukon was saying was that with regard to my particular submission, however articulate or inarticulate it was, there has been no finding by you as to whether there was a breach of privilege by the hon. member, not involving process but the substance. That question, I respectfully submit to the Chair, is still before the House and I hope it will be resolved.

I would think that the procedure my friend has suggested is a commendable one, Madam Speaker, and I suggest with respect that you perhaps consider it. If there is then an appropriate question of privilege as a result of what has happened, as has happened before, instructions can be given, a motion can be drafted and the motion put. That has happened here before. That is an old practice.

I put that to you Madam Speaker, because it is quite important that what may be questions of privilege—and I am not making any judgment as to what Your Honour's judgment may be—should not be decided quickly, and certainly should not be deemed to have been decided by this House when you in effect have only dealt with the process and not with the substance.

Madam Speaker: It seems to me that if we want order in the proceedings of the House, we should indeed be adhering to the rules. I decided there was no question of privilege because the hon. member did not move a motion after arguing his case. I agree this is a matter that can be debated and I am prepared to hear arguments about it but in the circumstances there is clearly no question of privilege.

MISS MACDONALD—MOSCOW OLYMPICS—REQUEST LETTER BE TABLED

Hon. Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Madam Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege which arises out of the question period. It has to do with the reply by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau)—or the non-reply—when he was asked to table a copy of a letter to which he referred yesterday. It is a letter which he said he wrote to President Carter and from which he quoted or made reference very extensively.

In the time-honoured tradition of the House, when an hon. member is asked to table a document to which he has referred, it is normally so tabled. The Prime Minister has not done so today. His remarks of yesterday have caused confusion both in his own office and in the Department of External Affairs. It has caused confusion to the extent that three explanations were put out after his reply in the House of Commons by various government departments.

In order to clarify this question and to know exactly what the Prime Minister was referring to when he mentioned the letter in the House, it would be the normal and traditional courtesy to table the document when asked. Therefore, on that question of privilege, I ask that you see that the rules are enforced and that that document is tabled by the Prime Minister.

[Translation]

Hon. Yvon Pinard (President of the Privy Council): Madam Speaker, I would suggest you take that question under advisement. I shall inform the right hon. Prime Minister about it, but I was there and it seems to me that the Prime Minister referred to notes, and when referring to notes there is no obligation to table any document. In any event, the Prime Minister will be in a position to explain himself what he said.

Madam Speaker: I think the suggestion of the President of the Privy Council is wise, and I shall take that question under advisement.

[English]

Miss MacDonald: Madam Speaker, I rise on the same question of privilege. The Prime Minister said, and I quote his words for the benefit of the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Pinard) as they are reported in Hansard at page 21:

> Our policy on the Olympics and on other matters has not just been to take stands of our own, and in this matter I have indicated in a recent letter to President Carter that we would support him in the measures he announced and that we would join him in those measures.

The Prime Minister was referring to the Olympic Games. He referred to a letter which he had written to President Carter with regard to measures in which he supported him, and then he had to have his office clarify his answer. What we are asking is that that letter be tabled by the Prime Minister.

[Translation]

Mr. Pinard: Madam Speaker, if I may humbly suggest that you do not take the question under advisement any more; there is absolutely no question of privilege. It is not because the Prime Minister refers to a letter in his speech that he is forced to table it in the House. There is absolutely no Standing Order of the House which forces an hon. member or a minister or the Prime Minister to table a document if he does not refer to it or if he does not have it before him, and it is far removed from the Hansard quotation given by my hon. colleague.

[English]

Madam Speaker: Since this is a matter involving the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and he is not present in the House, perhaps he will want to offer an explanation tomorrow. Nevertheless, I will take the matter under advisement.

POINT OF ORDER

MR. MAYER—SUPPLEMENTARY QUESTIONS ALLOWED GOVERNMENT MEMBERS DURING QUESTION PERIOD

Mr. Charles Mayer (Portage-Marquette): Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order. It concerns the apparent practice that has developed in question period of allowing government members a supplementary question. We have a limited time during question period to raise the concerns that affect the country and our constituents. I am concerned, if the practice develops further of allowing government members to have supplementary questions, that it will deprive me of a chance to raise important issues which come up and affect my constituents.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Mayer: Government members have access to cabinet and caucus. I would respectfully submit, Madam Speaker, that you have a close look at allowing this practice to develop further.

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The House resumed, from Tuesday, April 15, consideration of the motion of Mrs. Côté for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the amendment thereto (Mr. Clark, Yellowhead) (p. 31) and the amendment to the amendment (Mr. Broadbent) (p.43).

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Postmaster General): Madam Speaker, when I interrupted my speech last night, I was saying that the PQ government was not reliable, that it had abused in the past and would still try to abuse in the future the faith of well-intentioned people. Knowing that a large number of Canadians want a new Canadian constitution, the Parti Québécois is trying with its referendum in Quebec to get a mandate to negotiate a new agreement with the rest of Canada. We must not be taken in by that PQ stratagem. The new agreement wanted by a great majority of Canadians is an agreement between Canadians in Quebec and in the other provinces within Canada, not an agreement between Quebec on the one side and Canada on the other, not an agreement between two sovereign entities, apart, face to face, as René Lévesque wants.

So those who would want to give Mr. Lévesque a mandate to negotiate a new agreement within Canada are kidding themselves because they should know and remind themselves that the known option, the avowed objective of the Parti Québécois, is to get out of the federal regime. So sovereignty is their objective, and association is a convenient ploy added by the Parti Québécois to try and get more votes in the referendum. In 1976, by voting for the Parti Québécois, the hand went into the wringer, and in 1980, by voting Yes in the referendum the whole arm is going to go through it, and normally when the arm is in the wringer, it is then very difficult to keep the whole body from following.

That is why, through you, Mr. Speaker, I want to ask my voters in the riding of Montreal-Papineau and all my fellow citizens in Quebec: Frankly, are you tried of being well in Canada? Frankly, are you tired of belonging to one of the greatest countries in the world? Are you tired of enjoying one of highest standards of living? Are you tired of benefiting from all the advantages and the wealth of the Canadian federation? Do you really have grievances so serious that you think you cannot solve them within Canada? Sincerely, I do not believe so. I believe you do not have any reason to be tired of all that and, consequently, it is very important that you vote No on May 20.

The PQ supporters would like us to believe that if the taxes paid to Ottawa by Quebeckers went instead to the Quebec government, this last government could finance the same social programs, provide the same services to the people and generate the same economic advantages. This is false, completely false. There would not be enough money for this, unless of course the taxes of Quebeckers were increased substantially.

During the referendum debate in the National Assembly, the separatists really laid it on. They really showed that ridicule has never killed anyone. The outrageous remarks of agriculture minister Jean Garon were equalled only by his own circumference. How can Mr. Garon seriously pretend that the farmers as a group will be those who benefit most from Quebec sovereignty when neither he himself nor his leader, Mr. Lévesque, are willing to guarantee to milk producers the same level of quotas that they now have within the Canadian system? It is all very well to say that the Quebec government will provide farmers with the same subsidies as does the federal government, but if the quotas are reduced, each farmer will lose thousands of dollars because his production will no longer be sold in the other Canadian provinces and because his overproduction will no longer be eligible for the subsidy.

The total contribution of Agriculture Canada to the economic activity of the various Quebec regions represents between $450 million and $500 million annually, without mentioning the assistance given by the Department of Regional Economic Expansion which also spends several million dollars a year to promote the agricultural development of certain areas in Quebec. Mr. Garon said nothing about the services which Agriculture Canada provides Quebec farmers through its institutions in Sainte-Foy, its experimental farms in La Pocatière and Normandin, its Lennoxville research station, and its facilities in Saint-Jean and Saint-Hyacinthe. Mr. Garon also omitted to speak about the considerable assistance given by Ottawa to the Granby farm co-operative, the largest in Canada, and to several other dairy co-operatives in Quebec. In fact, Mr. Speaker, I could say that the good farmer who has both feet firmly planted on the ground will be the last to be conned by the separatists.

Since I represent a constituency in the Montreal area, I would also like to tell to Quebec minister Bernard Landry, who brags about doing much for the economic revival in Montreal with his OSE program, that he can brag and boast and pat himself on the back, that he can multiply his television advertisements concerning this program, but he will still look like a school boy watering his rink with his little garden hose while the Canadian government is much better equipped with a big fire hose to do something effective and much more meaningful in the Montreal area. We only have to recall that the Canadian government spends directly each year in the Montreal area about $5 billion in wages, social assistance, subsidies, capital expenditures, guaranteed loans and contracts.

The Canadian government is very much present in Montreal in every sphere. I am thinking of Air Canada, the Canadian National, the National Harbours Board, the major postal installations, Transport Canada with its airport at Mirabel and Dorval, the Federal Development Bank, the National Film Board, Canadair, CBC. If Quebec were to separate, all these companies, all these departments, would leave Montreal or would at least reduce their activities by one-half. To make up for those losses, Mr. Landry would need much more than his small OSE program. The contracts awarded by Ottawa to Montreal-based companies or departments—and I shall conclude with this—are vital to the economic momentum of the city. There is nothing mean in saying No the day of the referendum; the No I ask my voters to cast is more significant, reveals more moral strength, courage and indeed wisdom than a Yes expressing abdication, surrender and resignation.

Mr. Speaker, I want to remain in this country and contribute to its renewal.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I regret to inform the hon. member that the time alloted to him has expired.

[English]

Mr. Gordon Towers (Red Deer): Mr. Deputy Speaker, it is certainly with pleasure that I have this opportunity of doing my first pleasant duty in this Thirty-second Parliament in extending to Madam Speaker my sincere best wishes on her onerous and demanding task as moderator of this assembly. May Divine Providence guide her in her deliberations. I have every confidence that Madam Speaker's ability, experience and charm will combine to serve this body well. She can be assured of my respect and co-operation at all times.

It is my sincere hope that this Thirty-second Parliament will be a working Parliament, a responsible Parliament, a Parliament ready to address itself to the root problems which plague this great nation of ours. These problems will not be resolved by cosmetic legislation, by the application of a band-aid here or a lollipop there. They will be resolved only if we identify them, gear in on them and put long-term measures in place to correct them. That is why I was pleased to hear the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) say through the Speech from the Throne that recognition would be given to members of Parliament so that they would have the privilege and the opportunity of stating the cause and the case of the people whom they represent.

I want to read that portion of the throne speech to which I refer. It appears at page 6 of Hansard for April 14, 1980, as follows:

> Like all of your colleagues in the House of Commons, you who represent the people of Saskatchewan, Alberta and British Columbia, have a responsibility to represent your constituents to the nation. You also have an extra responsibility in the present circumstances to represent the nation to your constituents. It is a task no one else can fulfil. My government is prepared to co-operate fully in helping you to achieve this.

That is a challenge the Prime Minister has given to us and one which as a representative of the province of Alberta I am prepared to accept; but we do have to have the co-operation of members of the government and they must listen to us in order for us to accomplish this task. This is of fundamental importance. I must stress most emphatically that the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde) pay special attention to what we have to say because, after all, we are here not only as representatives of Canada, but also as representatives of our respective constituencies and the resources of the province of Alberta, as I interpret this privilege, should exist for all members. We must work together as a Parliament casting partisan gain aside so that the national interest is served. The nation looks to this institution, Parliament, for leadership, for direction, for the social and political sustenance which will feed the search for identity and the quest for national unity.

The Speech from the Throne refers to the siren call. I hear siren calls across Canada; strident, harsh, frightening. Those siren calls would have this nation divided. Those siren calls pit region against region and province against province. They contribute to a further balkanization of Canada. The time for action is now. It is not too late for men and women of good will to address themselves to this fact of life. Now is the time to begin afresh to right wrongs, redress imbalances and bring unity where there is division.

I represent a riding in Alberta, as I said earlier, but I am first and foremost a Canadian and a Canadian I want to remain, a Canadian from Alberta who is a member of a great confederation, a confederation we must make stronger. Certainly any callousness, especially from the minister of energy, can make our work in Alberta much harder because we are here, as I said earlier, to protect the rights and privileges of that province.

The representatives of that province and their own legislature have drawn up programs, and I trust that the minister of energy will listen well to their presentations. Unilateral action on the part of any member of this government can destroy the confidence that we require in order to have a strong confederation. I cannot state that emphatically enough to impress upon this government the situation that can be created if they will not listen and act upon the advice that we give.

What are some of the ills that plague our confederation? What are some of the problems we have to resolve? Actually, when the present Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin) was minister of industry, trade and commerce in the early seventies, he allowed that industry to begin to deteriorate. Under the last administration and the leadership of the then minister of transport, the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski), we in western Canada were starting to pull out of some of the problems that existed. They were mentioned in this House. I remember them well. The former minister of transport who is now in the other place stated that the whole transportation system was in a mess. Under the leadership and guidance of the hon. member for Vegreville, it was being brought out of that mess. I hope the present Minister of Transport will continue down that road of progress started by the hon. member for Vegreville.

I must impress upon you, Mr. Speaker, that up to the present time the Minister of Transport is not off to a good start. He has created doubt in the minds of the farmers of western Canada by suggesting that he might pull out some of the support granted to the development taking place at Prince Rupert. That is not the way to engender confidence in the minds of western people, including those I represent in Alberta.

I must also impress upon you, Mr. Speaker, the fact that the members of the consortium who are also involved in this development must have the confidence of the national government that they are not going to be thwarted or misguided in their reference. Such is not the case at the present time because they are having doubts. I hope the Minister of Transport will give credence to this problem immediately and eradicate any of the doubts in the minds of those representatives who are members of the consortium.

We must never lose sight of the fact that Canada is the envy of most of the rest of the world. We are owners of the most valuable piece of real estate on this planet. We have the natural resources. We have the human resources to achieve greatness. We have the raw materials, physical and human. Do we as a people lack the knowledge and the initiative to use these resources wisely? I think not.

We have the means and the wherewithal to build a great nation but we can no longer content ourselves with temporary solutions to chronic and long-term problems. We lack an industrial strategy. What might Canada have been like today with an industrial strategy and an effective science policy? In 1978 we spent less than 1 per cent of the GNP on research and development. The United States spent 2.3 per cent; Switzerland, 2.2 per cent; West Germany, 2.1 per cent; The Netherlands, 2 per cent, Sweden, 1.8 per cent; Japan, 1.7 per cent; Scandinavia, 1.4 per cent.

In 1972 the Lamontagne science committee recommended that Canada strive for gross expenditures on research and development of 2.5 per cent of GNP by 1980. The recommendation was ignored and expenditures on research and development actually dropped below 1 per cent and have remained below 1 per cent for the past eight years.

You may wonder, Mr. Speaker, why I am so concerned about research and development. Let me impress upon this Parliament that the agricultural community is more dependent upon advancing research and technology than a great many businesses that we have in Canada. We require fertilizers, new types of grains, new types of equipment; what do we do with zero tillage and all that at times when energy costs are increasing?

What would the net effect have been if we had wisely planned and executed even a 1 per cent increase? What if it had been 1.94 per cent, half way between the Scandinavian countries and the 2.5 per cent recommendation of the Lamontagne committee? Economists tell us that even a 1 per cent increase starting in 1972 would have resulted in a million new jobs to date in Canada, 400,000 of them in manufacturing alone, an area where we have a tremendous debt to cope with today in the end products that are manufactured in Canada.

We could have created $20 billion plus in new manufacturing sales for our domestic market and for the critical export trade also. We could have created an entire new industry in the research and development field which would have generated approximately 60,000 jobs for scientists, engineers and the graduates of our universities.

Young farm people go to universities too. They cannot all find jobs on the farms. They have to go out and get jobs. We need to have a market for our farm products. Therefore, it is all tied together and we as parliamentarians must give cognizance to that fact.

Government initiative and encouraging expenditures on research and development could have resulted in $1.5 billion in research and development expenditures by industry and a total of 2.5 billion by industry, universities and government. Industrial research and development would have been funded by the revenues of new product sales. I want to impress that this could have been accomplished without any cost to the taxpayer. This is what I like. For too long we relied on these programs being funded by the taxpayers.

Surely the time has arrived when we can expect this adequate programming to provide for its own funding. If we are to survive as a manufacturing and trading nation, we must begin with basics. We must begin with a strong research and development component in our economy. We must begin to develop the technology at home to process our own resources. Let me impress upon you, Mr. Speaker, that we in western Canada are very cognizant of this because it is what we want to do. We want to do that there because we want to keep our young people in our provinces. We must halt the process whereby we continue to be hewers of wood and drawers of water. We must accept the realization that it is not government which provides jobs in Canada but small business, manufacturing, the marketplace. Only there may be found sustaining means of improving our quality of life and safeguarding our standard of living.

Mr. Speaker, I will not take up the time of this House by dissecting the elements of the Speech from the Throne, but there are certain basic reflections I would leave with you. I am a rancher, a farmer, a small businessman, and as such I know I am speaking for literally thousands of people out in western Canada. Canadian small business is in trouble. Canadian small business is a victim of the cost-price squeeze. When I say "Canadian small business" I mean to include ranchers, farmers, all those involved in retailing and manufacturing. Equity is important to each and every Canadian—equity in the home, equity in the land, equity in a business. Without this equity we become serfs of government, we become crofters, tillers and workers of land we do not own because of the severe economic pressures of money and high interest rates.

Increasing farm credit loans to the maximum of $100,000 is nothing more than band-aid treatment. The debt load on farmers is already too high. Extending further credit to a segment of our population already heavily committed to equity, land and equipment is tantamount to offering a drink of Kool-aid to a drowning person. High interest rates are not the answer to the basic problem. More credit is not the answer. We must look more closely at the global package of problems which confronts the farmer, the rancher, the small businessman. We must adopt measures which ensure that the small businessman is rewarded for risk venture. We must take measures to provide for the continuity of family farms.

We must cease to apply punitive tax measures which discriminate against individual initiative and the rugged work ethic. Where in the Speech from the Throne—this is an omission, I am sure—is reference made to further progress in the abolition of the capital gains tax? We must examine our capital gains law as it applies to the small businessman, the merchants, the small manufacturer, the farmer, the rancher. After all, small business is the backbone of this nation. It is the linchpin of the economy. It provides more than 70 per cent of the jobs in Canada yet it is treated as a poor cousin. Small business does not have the corporate clout, the strong voice of the multinationals. It has few champions in Parliament, it has little input into the making of the laws and regulations which affect its destiny.

Small business was dealt a particularly hard blow when the last Parliament was dissolved. Among the many progressive measures contained within the first pro-business budget in years was provision for the small business development bonds which would have resulted in lower interest rates in the smaller business community. Madam Speaker, unless the government brings back before the House some type of program of a similar nature, that is all down the drain.

Small business is being driven to the wall. If our economy is to flourish we must study and adopt economic strategies which favour all businesses in Canada, both large and small, but my emphasis today is on small business. A current publication of the Canadian Organization of Small Business, the Voice of Small Business, polled its subscribers and 75 per cent of those surveyed wanted a reduction in the size of the federal deficit. One of those who responded said: "If I consistently spend more than I earn I end up bankrupt; it is time government started operating according to the same principle as I apply to running my own business."

One of the phrases used in the Speech from the Throne causes me serious concern. We read that the government intends to increase still further the sphere of government operations. Mr. Speaker, an increase in government means increased taxes and greater burden on every Canadian. I do not think we can afford it.

Uncontrolled government spending threatens every Canadian owner-manager. Continued government deficits have led to double digit inflation which is destroying savings, eating up business investment and profits, forcing interest rates out of sight and stealing the rewards of entrepreneurial courage and hard work. We could all learn a lesson from the Dickens character who equated balanced spending with happiness and harmony and over-expenditure with misery. I hope the government is taking this to heart. Let us set ourselves to the task now.

I want to dwell for a few moments on Bill C-28 of the last Parliament, which dealt with pensions and allowances for veterans and for their wives and families. It was interesting to observe the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) introduce a motion on this subject under Standing Order 43 in the House yesterday and follow it up with a question today. Madam Speaker, it is amazing what a guilt complex can do, even to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. The NDP is well known for its support of motherhood concepts, but when members over in that corner have an opportunity to address themselves to actual legislation, they are quick to put distance between compassion and partisan politics as soon as it serves their own particular purpose. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre and his colleagues had ample opportunity in the last Parliament to address themselves to a continuation of beneficial legislation. But did they? No; they placed themselves and partisan politics before the well-being of this nation. I am sure our veterans are not so naive as not to recognize grandstanding for what it is.

To sum up, this country is great and will be greater because of its people and resources. We have an awesome responsibility to develop programs and policies which pay more than lip service to this thesis. I, for one, am willing to roll up my sleeves and begin to hammer out workable solutions to long-standing problems. An old Chinese proverb declares that every journey of a thousand years requires a first step. We must take that first step to build a better Canada for all Canadians in this, the first session of the Thirty-second Parliament.

[Translation]

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, first I would like to join all previous speakers and extend my best wishes to the distinguished members of Parliament whom we have elected to chair our meetings and our proceedings. I also want to join all those who congratulated the mover and the seconder of the Address in Reply to the Speech from the Throne. They both spoke very eloquently of their constituency and their country, and I wish them a long parliamentary career. Finally I would like to thank sincerely my electors of Outremont who gave me their confidence for the fourth consecutive time. May I simply say to them that I will try to continue to deserve the confidence they have shown in me since 1972.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to comment today on the diagnosis made by this government on energy conditions, our guidelines, our undertakings as well as the steps which we intend to take. I would also like to say a few words about the consequences of the PQ energy project in Quebec.

[English]

There is now a broad consensus that the world is facing a serious oil problem. We rely too much on a resource whose production and price are dictated in large part by the political whims and upheavals of an unstable Middle East. We also realize now that even if stability and reason were restored, the world would have to curb its appetite for OPEC's oil.

Strong efforts are needed for energy reasons; they are absolutely essential for economic reasons. The energy crisis is an economic crisis. Surely, everyone realizes by now that higher energy prices mean bad news for the world economy. The world is paying dearly for its failure, so far, to correct the basic imbalance between oil demand and supply. Continued failure to act will result in a worldwide economic crisis.

From a wide energy viewpoint, Canada is well off. Last year our net trade balance in energy was more than $4 billion. However, this is small comfort to Canadians worried about one commodity: oil. A country as rich in energy as Canada can and must move off OPEC oil and, as soon as possible move off the world oil market.

Canada is rich in renewable energy resources. These must play a larger role. We must also use our more plentiful natural gas and other fuels to replace oil. We must curb our demand for oil. And we will.

The energy crisis is also a crisis of Canadian nationhood. Unlike the situation in unitary states like Britain or Norway, energy benefits and burdens are not evenly shared across the country. The distinction between winners and losers is stark, easy to see, and potentially destructive. Failure to resolve this issue will jeopardize our energy future. Worse, it could pit Canadian against Canadian in a way never before witnessed in this country. Thus we must, when looking for energy solutions, first address issues of fairness and unity.

We must also address the paradox of high foreign ownership and control of the petroleum industry. There is no shortage of Canadian petroleum talent. The list of success stories grows daily. There is money available from Canadians who are among the biggest savers in the world. We must bring more Canadians into positions of ownership and control.

Mr. Speaker, there is a broad consensus on the nature of these problems. But there is no agreement on the solutions. The former Conservative government no doubt tried to respond to the problems, but they were not successful. Indeed, Parliament and the electorate rejected the approach contained in the budget because it was unfair to consumers; it would have let OPEC determine Canadian oil prices, it did not deal adequately or fairly with the revenue distribution question, it was too weak in its encouragement of substitution away from oil, and it offered little to encourage Canadian participation.

I shall be releasing shortly an analysis of some of the budget energy proposals. For now, let me highlight some of the shortcomings I have noticed.

First, let us consider oil prices. The public seems to have the view that the budget package would have caused domestic prices to rise by $4 per barrel in 1980 and by $4.50 per barrel annually to 1984. The reality, however, would have been different. The budget package included continuation of payment of world oil prices to domestic oil sands plants. It also included an automatic adjustment of the domestic oil price to 75 per cent of the world price in 1983 and to 85 per cent in 1984.

The result of these factors, coupled with the dramatic increase in the world prices which took place in 1979, is that Canadian oil prices would have risen faster than expected even at the time the pricing negotiations were under way.

If, for example, world prices were to rise from present levels at 2 per cent above the inflation rate—a very modest assumption—year-over-year changes in our price would turn out to be as follows under the budget deal: In 1980, prices that consumers pay on average for petroleum products would have risen by over $7 a barrel if we include the effects of the proposed excise tax on transportation fuels; in 1981, a further $5.80; in 1982, a further $4.70; in 1983, $10.90, as the domestic price is adjusted to 75 per cent of the world price; and in 1984, $7.60 more, to reach 85 per cent of world price.

These numbers assume that we do not see a repeat of a 1979-style world price increase. Is there anyone in this House who would stake much money on that sort of optimism? No, the reality would probably have been much worse for the consumer.

Of course, no one could have predicted the world oil price outlook which we now face. No one can do so now with any confidence. And that is precisely why in today's world we would not want to link our price to OPEC's price, and that is why we want a price determined in Canada on the basis of Canadian decisions.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lalonde: The budget package would also have given enormous revenues to the major producing province, Alberta. We have no quarrel whatsoever with the concept that provinces deserve a fair share of the revenues from the sale of their resources. And a fair share in Alberta's case means a province that is by far the wealthiest member, in per capita terms, of the Canadian federation.

Furthermore, we welcome the economic surge in the west. Canadians everywhere share in the excitement at what is going on there. We will do our best to help the process of sustained and diversified growth. But there must be some balance in the way the oil and gas revenues are shared. There is no preordained formula for sharing the proceeds of our energy wealth. We must seek together a fair deal.

The previous budget package, in my view, did not contain a fair deal. The budget did move to reduce the revenues which would otherwise have accrued to the industry, and we agreed with that part of the proposals. But the package offered little to help Canadian firms.

Energy is the fastest growing sector in the Canadian economy. We must transform this sector. Not only is our target 50 per cent Canadian ownership of the industry, but we want a number of the large firms to be Canadian owned and controlled and become prosperous.

The amount of the revenues currently accruing to each of the several players is important. So too, however, is the way each party will be affected by future changes in the world oil price. In our view, the budget package did not deal adequately with this.

When our economy is hit by big OPEC price hikes, federal revenues shrink and our expenditures rise as we attempt to offset the effects of the price shock. In short, the federal government loses when OPEC gains. So, too, do the governments of the energy consuming provinces. In contrast, the energy producing areas enjoy all the upside potential. I do not think anyone could describe as reasonable a deal where the federal government bears the downside burden and the other parties get the upside gain.

Let me make a final comment on the budget package. We could use much more of our surplus natural gas and other commodities for our own purposes, rather than exporting more while watching oil imports grow. But our gas producing industry has an export bias. Perhaps the most important reason for this is that the profits from exports exceed by a wide margin those from domestic sales. We have a system in place which encourages producers to seek foreign markets, rather than apply their considerable talents to pushing out oil from the domestic market. We believe that was not addressed adequately in the last budget.

We believe we have a better way. Our way begins with a set of clear, strong, nationally-oriented principles. We set out these principles during the election campaign and I now want to confirm, in case there is any doubt, that these are the foundation for our policies and proposals.

These are our principles: security, fairness and opportunity should be the touchstones of Canadian energy policy. In oil we seek security at reasonable made-in-Canada prices. Certainly this means price levels to the consumer lower than in the budget package. We reject world prices as a standard for Canadian supply prices. We will establish a new blended oil price system incorporating the cost of domestic and imported oil. We agree without hesitation that Alberta is entitled to significantly growing per capita revenues from its oil and gas resources and that other energy-producing provinces should also benefit substantially from the sale of their resources. We want a revenue system which, without further increases in world oil prices, leaves the federal government with at least as much revenue as in the December 11 budget, without having to impose punitive taxes on the Canadian consumer.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lalonde: We want a revenue-sharing system that is structured so that if world prices rise the national government gets the share it needs to carry out its national responsibilities. We seek a pricing and incentive system which fosters rapid substitution of natural gas for oil. We will ensure accelerated development of indigenous supplies especially off the east coast. We will ensure the petroleum industry the incentives it needs to help achieve our energy goals, but we will ensure that Canadian-owned and Canadian-controlled firms play a greater role. We will strengthen and expand Petro-Canada. We will increase our conservation efforts. We will use our energy wealth to create the basis for sustained, widespread industrial growth.

In Atlantic Canada offshore oil and gas developments will, under our policies, stimulate new industries and jobs. We will also encourage diversified development in western Canada whose resource wealth is already a strong magnet for investment.

These principles respond to the concerns of the majority of this House and the majority of Canadians everywhere. We will stick to these principles. They will be at the heart of any decision we make on energy. We have already made some of these decisions. We have provided $80 million in new funds to Petro-Canada and have asked that some of this money be used to establish a new alternative energy corporation which will aggressively seek the energy sources and solutions that we will need for the generations to follow us.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lalonde: We are moving rapidly to obtain new and secure oil supplies, starting with Mexico. As a first step in establishing a new made-in-Canada price, we have notified Syncrude and Suncor that the price of synthetic oil will no longer be automatically tied to international prices.

We ended the special tax allowance for the frontier in favour of a more appropriate incentive program which would promote greater participation in the frontier by Canadian companies. These are just the first steps.

Mr. Crosbie: What will you pay in Mexico? Will it be made-in-Canada oil in Mexico?

Mr. Lalonde: Our principles will be the framework for oil pricing negotiations and for other initiatives we will be proposing to this House.

Mr. Crosbie: The Mexican gas dance.

Mr. Lalonde: However, the framework leaves considerable scope for movement with respect to a range of issues, as it should. We are determined to fulfil our responsibility to the country, but we will not be intransigent. Nor is there any question of our using our powers to override the legitimate rights of producing provinces. We are not declaring war on provincial powers, let alone turning the provinces into colonies or territories, as some appear to have said. On the contrary, we are determined to reach, as we have done in the past, a fair, negotiated settlement. To do so we will entertain considerable flexibility on most of the key elements of a new package: the price of old oil, the price of synthetic oil and so on. There is plenty of room to make a deal if negotiations are carried on in good faith.

I have dwelt at some length on energy pricing and revenue sharing, but we must not become so mesmerized by these questions that we neglect other necessary actions to secure our energy furture. We will not do this. We will act to support new initiatives.

Canada faces serious economic challenges in the 1980s but it also has tremendous opportunities. It is not by a further weakening of the federal government that we will meet those challenges and those opportunities.

The debate has indeed reached a turning point. For some time now, Canadians have been witnessing the erosion of their federal administration and many are deeply shocked by it.

Mindful Canadians are well aware that a province on its own could not meet the challenges of the modern world with as much decisiveness as a large nation united in its diversity. In its most recent publication, the C. D. Howe Institute states the following:

> The main selling point for federalism at this stage is that the ten provinces probably have a better chance of success in solving their economic problems if they work on them together. This conclusion is dictated primarily by the interdependence of the ten provinces occupying the Canadian economic space.

The erosion of the federal government's powers would be dangerous enough were we faced only with economic and energy problems. But we now have in Quebec a premier who wants to break up Canada and he is aiming for the logical and ultimate end product of this process, that is, total decentralization. As a Canadian, I do not feel that is proper for Canadians, and as a Quebecker I am convinced that separation, be it called independence or sovereignty-association, would be altogether disastrous for my province and for its people. Energy is an obvious example of the benefits that Quebec derives from its participation in the Canadian federation. It demonstrates also how a dynamic national energy policy makes it possible for a region to develop its own positive resources in its own way, while recognizing its responsibilities to the rest of Canada and sharing the wealth of other regions. Canadians must unite and state positively their need for a national energy policy; we have to wonder what our separatists have to offer.

Well, what do Messrs. Lévesque, Pariseau and Bérubé, our separatists, say? They continue their long list of complaints about imaginary grievances against the rest of Canada and claim wrongly that Quebec would be better off without the rest of Canada. Quebeckers who read the papers or hear these lamentations see them immediately for the blatant nonsense they really are. There is danger, however, that this nonsense, if it is repeated often enough and not disproved, may convince those who are ill-informed. I am glad to say that several powerful voices are now being heard and contradicting the most extravagant claims of the PQ. I should like to join forces with them and mention a few examples. The PQ representatives, anxious to demonstrate their scorn for the blessings of the Canadian federation, show that they do not care much for the effects oil prices have on Quebec consumers. In fact, some PQ ministers even go so far as to say that Quebeckers should pay world prices for their oil. Are they really aware of what they are saying? If it did pay world prices, Quebec would immediately, and I insist immediately, have to pay $3.8 billion more a year for its oil, that is some $600 more for every Quebecker. And that would be only a start.

The oil pricing agreement we are seeking will be directly related to the cost of production in Canada. But Mr. Lévesque and his colleagues want Quebeckers to pay the prices set by the international cartel known as OPEC. Had Quebec not been part of Canada, it would have paid, to the end of 1980, $9.5 billion more for its oil since 1974 than it will in fact, thanks to the Canadian single price policy we implemented in 1974. Today, I appeal to my Quebec compatriots and beg of them, with all the conviction that I can muster, not to let themselves be taken in by those peddlers of illusions the Péquistes are. Especially in the field of energy, separatist dreams can only lead us directly to a sombre and sinister reality.

If, tomorrow morning, Quebec were to get its sovereignty-association, if, as the PQs are suggesting, it had to pay world prices for the oil it uses, as the PQ ministers would have it, every single barrel of oil in Quebec would cost $20 more than it does now, and every gallon of gas would go up by 57 cents tomorrow morning. And here is what that increase would mean in terms of the pocketbook of every Quebecker, man and woman. It would cost $400 more a year for a Quebec family to heat the home whether it be with gas or oil. A family with a car that drives about 12,000 miles a year would have to pay $450 more for gas. The taxi driver who drives some 60,000 miles a year would have to dig out of his pockets about $2,250 more to drive his cab. And the owner of a dairy farm, who uses about 2,200 gallons of diesel fuel and gas would have to pay $1,250 more a year. In addition to that, the average Quebec family would have to pay an extra $400 for non-energy product consumption, that is for all it buys that is not energy proper but which contains oil products and whose prices would naturally go up. As all those statistics are interrelated, there is nearly no limit to the additions that can be made. If you take an average Quebec family which owns a home, has a car and uses oil or gas to heat itself, well, under the PQ plan that average family tomorrow morning would pay in additional expenses an amount of $1,250 a year. That is what they are trying to sell us. That is the sad reality of the PQ ideology and that is what I am warning all Quebeckers against. The alternative is simple, progress further with Canada or move back with the PQ plan.

The Parti Québécois also lays strong emphasis on the hydroelectric resources of the province and even talks about them as being the miracle answer to the energy problems of an independent Quebec. Here again the PQ philosophy is closer to fiction than reality. Canadians in Quebec and elsewhere are proud of the spirit of entrepreneurship and the technical competence of those men and women who made Quebec's power resources what they are today. It is a considerable asset for the province and the country as a whole. But it is nonsense to suggest, as the Parti Québécois does, that revenues generated by the exports of hydroelectric power could compensate for the costs of imported oil at world prices. At present, Quebec consumes $6.9 billion worth a year of imported oil. If they had to pay the world price, could the sales of electric power to the United States compensate for such an amount? Far from it. If you take 1979 as an example, total sales of Quebec power to the United States would amount to about $200 million to $300 million which would leave only a small deficit of about $6.6 billion. Well, the Parti Québécois has got us used to $500 million deficits but now they are offering us a $6.6 billion deficit.

In any case, even if it were possible to strike a certain balance between the cost of imported oil and the revenues from the sales of electricity, which is not the case, Quebec would find itself in a much worse situation than the one it is and has been in. It would be more vulnerable to higher prices for imported oil, more vulnerable to embargoes and so on than we are now. A PQ minister recently worried about the possibility that Alberta oil deliveries to Montreal might dwindle in the 1980s and that Quebec would then be exposed to oil shortages, while Ontario and the western provinces would be completely protected.

Yet, this is exactly what would happen if Quebec withdrew from Canada. However, Quebec is part of Canada and will go on being part of it. Therefore, the dark prediction of the Quebec energy minister is completely false. We shall do everything possible to reduce our dependence on imported oil. However, as long as there is a risk of a shortage, this risk will be shared equally by all Canadians. This is the basis of our country. This is the profound meaning of being part of Canada. When we imagine what would be the energy and economic situation of a sovereign Quebec, we become rapidly convinced of the need to vote no to the question now asked by the Parti Québécois.

Mr. Speaker, to remain united in spite of our differences, and united for the welfare of everyone is the only logical solution offered to all Canadians if we want to be able to face the numerous problems that will arise in the next ten years. When we speak about oil, natural gas and coal, we are speaking about sources of energy which are essential for our standard of living and quality of life, but at the same time, we are speaking about types of energy which cannot be renewed once they have been used. Not so much for ourselves as for those who will come after us, we may have to think about expanding our horizons. No province and no government alone can develop a true national energy policy. And in this area as in so many others, unity and co-operation are essential.

Mr. Speaker, we are determined to develop a true Canadian energy policy which will take into account the legitimate aspirations of the provinces and the needs of the entire country. In conclusion, I can only invite the people of Quebec not to cut themselves off and not to reduce the importance of Quebec by withdrawing from Canada at such a critical period, and not to deprive themselves of all that the rest of Canada is able and willing to provide them.

[English]

Mr. Fred King (Okanagan-Similkameen): Mr. Speaker, may I count on you to convey to Madam Speaker on behalf of myself and the fine Canadians whom I am honoured to represent in the riding of Okanagan-Similkameen the following message:

Madam Speaker, please accept sincere, warm and appreciative congratulations on your elevation to your present exalted position. May we fortify that congratulatory message with our personal invitation to become acquainted with both the peoples and the scenic values of our favoured part of Canada by favouring us with an early visit?

I feel distinctly honoured, Mr. Speaker, to participate in the throne speech debate as the member of Parliament representing the citizens of Okanagan-Similkameen in British Columbia. Although I was a member of the Thirty-first Parliament, this marks the first occasion on which I have risen to address the House. I would therefore ask your indulgence as I briefly speak of the unique character and personality of this section of Canada which I am honoured to represent.

The riding of Okanagan-Similkameen occupies some 200 miles of international border with the United States. Its western boundary is about 150 miles from the Pacific ocean, and its eastern extremity about 200 miles from the Rocky Mountains. Its geography extends from Princeton and Merritt in the west to Grand Forks and Christina Lake in the east. It centres on the Okanagan Valley, including Osoyoos on the forty-ninth parallel to 100 miles north past the growing community of Westbank. The major city in the riding is Penticton, the city of peaches and beaches and which is also noted as the home town of the famous Penticton Vees Hockey Team, the last amateur Canadian team to capture world hockey supremacy when they defeated the Soviet Union team by the score of five to zero in the crucial final game. I was honoured to be present in Germany on that occasion.

The Okanagan Valley and its parallel counterpart, the Similkameen Valley, are world famous producers of tree fruits—apples, pears, peaches, apricots and cherries. I hope that in season I will be able to share with some of you underprivileged members of this House the incomparable flavour experience of eating freshly picked cherries from my own orchard.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. King: In addition to orchards, these valleys now support Canada's finest vineyards. A thriving and growing wine industry has earned recognition as vintners without equal in Canada or the world. The riding contains the largest cattle ranch as well as many dozens of smaller ranches. Lumber and mining are very important elements of the economy.

Many in this chamber have visited the Okanagan and Similkameen as tourists in the summer seeking sun, sand and water which we have in abundance and in the winter for skiing at any of the dozen excellent ski facilities. Now we see the latest phenomenon of our Canadian society, attracted by its benevolent climate, its lakes and mountains, its quality of life; retired persons from across Canada are moving in increasing numbers to spend their senior years in the most ideal surroundings to be found in Canada and perhaps the world.

With that as a preamble from a native son of the Okanagan, I will move from the virtues of my riding to an equally sincere and objective, but not so flattering, review of the government's intent as revealed in the content of the Speech from the Throne.

My riding was newly created for the May 22 election. The area has previously been represented by the CCF, the Liberals, the Social Credit and the Conservatives. I know that I state the obvious when I say that I was elected because more of the electorate endorsed my positions and policies as well as those of the Progressive Conservative Party than supported the views of the other four candidates. While this is obvious, I mention it because I believe we must impress on hon. members opposite that their situation in western Canada is a direct result of the rejection of the policies and the philosophical positions of their party and their leader.

Unfortunately, nothing in the Speech from the Throne would lead us to any degree of optimism that the offensive nature of that government's position has been noted in more than a cursory fashion and dismissed with the casual statement that in the west many believe their problems are ignored, their voices unheard, and their contribution is unrecognized. We believe it sincerely. There are many other descriptive phrases that could be added to the recitation of the factors that offend western Canadians. I suggest that, using the throne speech as the criterion for change, western Canadians can only look to the future with added apprehension.

Now, Mr. Speaker, permit me to respond directly to the throne speech. The Ottawa Citizen of April 15 gave it the headline, "An Admission of Errors". It went on to say:

> With a fanfare of generalities, the Trudeau government has unveiled a throne speech that reads like an agenda for what it should have done during its previous 11 years in power.
> Changed circumstances, including a weak dollar, enormous government deficits and devastating interest rates (resulting largely from the cumulative effects of the spending of the past), have extracted from the government an expression of concern—
> The throne speech makes no mention of a budget, no mention of a strategy designed to create an economy in which interest rates would not be set to remain competitive with U.S. rates.

It is interesting to note that in the throne speech the government chose to acknowledge duly elected members from the three western provinces under Part V of the speech, a section which is entitled "An Active Foreign Policy". I trust that the government which authored the Speech from the Throne will by its words and actions prove that that inclusion was inadvertent.

Western Canada is not foreign territory. Many of us on this side of the House ask that the government remember and recognize that fact. We are representatives of that great part of Canada, and we will resent any action which demonstrates a lack of respect for the electoral decisions taken in this past election.

Let me dispute a statement made early in the Speech from the Throne which reads;

> We observe today not only the beginning of a new Parliament but the start of a new era.

Yes, we do have a new Parliament and we have a new decade, but we have an era complete with the same old, tired faces in the government, the same old clichés, divisive tactics, tired responses and the same old answers to the same old questions—questions raised because of the same old and damaging Liberal policies which have brought our nation to this low point in its history.

● (1650)

I read that "Canadians expect much of this Parliament" and I ask you if this is so, Mr. Speaker. I would doubt that such high expectation exists. Many Canadians have become cynical and embittered by the disappointments of the last dozen years. The electoral results must emphasize to hon. members opposite that the target of that cynicism in our part of Canada is Liberal policies, past and present. The question that must be addressed to hon. members opposite, Mr. Speaker, is: "Do you care?".

We read in the throne speech that "the first task is to clear the accumulation of essential legislation left from previous Parliaments". And later in the same paragraph we read:

> To that end, my government is relying on the good will of members and senators of all parties.

I think I can assure hon. members of the government that they can rely on at least the same degree of co-operation and evidence of good will on the part of the opposition as they displayed in the Thirty-first Parliament in their role as the opposition. I know, Mr. Speaker, that hon. members of the government will take great comfort in my words as they review their conduct, particularly as recorded in Hansard on November 6 and 7 last year, and on most other occasions as well.

We have a legacy of national misdirection, foisted on Canada by repeated offerings of succulent expediency over a nourishing diet of basic sound policy by federal Liberal governments under disastrous leadership in the past 12 years. This legacy of Liberal government policies has led this nation to a situation which can only be described as a litany of despair and disaster—inflation, high interest, unemployment, bankruptcy and division. Where is this vaunted Liberal ability to govern? It is not to be found in history and, unfortunately for Canada's immediate future, it is not to be found in the performance of this government, judging from the content of the subject matter today.

As a western Canadian I am resentful of the tone and implications of many of the statements contained therein. Who, may I ask, have been the main beneficiaries of this government's past policies? The western electorate? The western electorate in the last two trips to the polls has demonstrated with some knowledge its view of confederation in action under the auspices of the Liberal government.

The sinister, underlying message contained in the throne speech is that this government is determined to centralize more power in Ottawa, to resist regional initiatives and rights, to act highhandedly with individuals and regions in the so-called name of Canada's total well-being, but with the underlying intent of changing forever the face and nature of our nation.

These changes are not being allowed to evolve from the concerns and aspirations of the persons who are citizens of Canada; these changes to our structures, our standards, our social order do not result from a groundswell of sentiment or persuasion but from the dictates of those opposite who seek to force philosophical, ideological and economic change insidiously upon us.

There are many vital factors that this throne speech fails to address. There is the same old theme dominating the message. We have heard it all before—the land is strong, inflation wrestled to the ground, security, equity, opportunity, the future is bright, responsible government, sharing, strengthened national institutions, economic challenges. Mr. Speaker, this government continues to be long on rhetoric and short on substance on matters of concern to Canadians.

The throne speech includes the warning that "in every part of Canada there are forces which are driving us apart rather than bringing us together". It also tells us:

To all these forces of discontent, my government has one clear response.

I suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, that this response is: "Give us more power; trust us, the government that brought you such goodies as 20 per cent interest, metrification, undisciplined spending, damaging inflation, a weakened defence posture, regional, cultural and linguistic division—trust us." Trust us indeed!

We are told that "Canadians are a sensible people. They understand that these are difficult economic times throughout the world". Mr. Speaker, Canadians also understand that the difficult economic times they face as a nation are a direct result of past undisciplined action on the part of tired, uninspired government presently led by the honourable reconstituted Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau).

That understanding is held no more acutely anywhere than it is held in western Canada. One has only to peruse the voting pattern in the last two elections to underline that western Canadians are sensitive to what Liberal philosophical positions hold for our part of the nation.

The throne speech also tells us that "Canadians will accept sacrifice to meet the economic challenges of the 1980s, but that they will not accept injustice". Mr. Speaker, I trust that this government will note well, capitalize that fully and underline it distinctly. A distressed and sometimes disillusioned western Canada will not—and I repeat, will not—accept unjust confiscation of its rights and its resources.

In the next paragraph the speech tells us that "Canadians recognize the need to live within their national means". Mr. Speaker, Canadians as individuals indeed recognize this fact. Our difficulties as a nation have arisen because the government opposite has abused and reabused this basic principle and once again gives every indication that the depth of its commitment to fiscal responsibility is to indulge in clichés while its actions belie its words. The Speech from the Throne is full of promises to expand government activity, to increase control of the economy in a marked and ominous shift to the left.

The speech then states:

In particular, my government recognizes the need to protect those Canadians most affected by unacceptably high interest rates.

Mr. Speaker, it is interesting to note that the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) includes some 10,000 Canadian mortgage holders only in that category; the other 500,000 are apparently deemed by the hon. minister to be enjoying the experience of increased mortgage payments.

"Energy policy is as important for Canada in the 1980s as railway policy was in the 1880s". The railway era was one which had as its major thrust private initiative with the supporting activities of government. We see in this throne speech a deliberate but not surprising direction taken in energy policy by a government whose disastrous record in this field speaks for itself. We see an energy policy that promises greater intervention by government. We see another government agency, the Petroleum Price Auditing Agency, set up to be the window on the agency the Liberals set up to be a window on the industry. PetroCan, which was set up by that government across the floor to be a window on the industry, will now have another agency looking into its window.

How long will this proliferation and duplication of effort by agencies of government go on? Just so long as there is a Liberal government whose objectives are self-perpetuation, larger bureaucracies, greater burdens on the taxpayer, a resolute intent to avoid realities which would require some evidence of a discipline that does not have any place in the philosophies of modern Trudeau Liberalism.

So the energy policy speaks only of greater government activity, new agencies, new measures and new directions. But surprisingly, and totally out of character with the challenging nature of the preamble which was a challenge to Canadians to seize the opportunity, there is no vision for Canada of self-sufficiency in energy matters; no such future. This government speaks instead of negotiating foreign contracts, creating greater dependence on others, which is a step away from national energy freedom. Then the government compares it to the 1880 railway era. That is irresponsible.

In the Speech from the Throne this sentence appears:

My ministers believe that Canadians want more effective government, not necessarily less government.

The Speech from the Throne, Mr. Speaker, clearly signals that Canadians will now suffer bigger government, more government intervention in their lives, new agencies proliferating and the activities of old agencies intensified. It will be a confirmation, as Geoffrey Stevens put it, of the darkest suspicions about the socialistic predilection of the Prime Minister and his cohorts.

Canadians do want effective government. That same Liberal government under the present Prime Minister has been effective. It has effectively split our nation on regional and cultural lines. It has effectively given our nation a gross national debt whose burden voids our ability to act independently on such important basics as internal interest rates. This retreaded

Liberal government has been effective in making this energy-rich land of Canada increasingly dependent on foreign sources of petroleum products. This government has effectively and unnecessarily, by studied inattention and inaction, made our nation's industries and transportation services vulnerable to interruptions in foreign oil supply.

I can go on and on with a recitation of this government's previous failures, but this is the effective nature of the government opposite.

I would characterize the citizens of Okanagan-Similkameen as not too different from the mainstream of citizens across Canada. They are hard-working, honest, patriotic, independent and God-fearing. They resent indifference, and particularly they resent indifference spiced with arrogance, the hallmark of Liberalism.

Please understand this: We do not ask that confederation extend us some advantage denied others. We do ask, and we insist, that we not be taken advantage of because of our loyalty to that confederation. The Prime Minister in equating happiness with prosperity does a disservice to Canadians who believe that there are other distinctive elements in the recipe. Recognition and respect are two which should notably be added, for material prosperity without the psychology of contentment means but little in the well-being of the individual, the region or the nation.

If the policy of government is addressed to favour those regions of Canada with electoral strength to the disadvantage of those areas which do not represent equivalent electoral clout, we can expect the voice for regional autonomy to become more strident.

I have found, Mr. Speaker, that the preoccupation of the people in Okanagan-Similkameen is with national and international affairs. We are deeply concerned with the aloof stance taken by this Liberal government in its past incarnation, a stance which denied a responsible shouldering of the load to defend our freedoms against the growing threat of Soviet expansion and aggression.

Thus I am happy to note for the first time in 12 years of Liberal throne speeches a reference to our commitment to NATO. It is unseemly that it took a demonstration of Soviet aggressive intent in Afghanistan to move this government, and I await with some misgivings based on past attitudes the actions of this government backing up its throne speech statement.

Environmental concerns in the riding of Okanagan-Similkameen require senior government financial assistance. Water quality considerations have the utmost priority. Limited precipitation of only 11 inches per year provides very little natural flushing action in our lakes. It takes 60 years of runoff to displace the water in Okanagan Lake. Increasing populations require immediate action. Sewage outfalls must be removed from limited flow waterways. We will be seeking means from this government to help local jurisdictions accomplish this goal.

In the throne speech reference is made to the multicultural mosaic of Canada. I expect recognition from this government of the aspirations of the many new Canadians in my riding to preserve certain aspects of their culture while engrossing themselves in their responsibilities as Canadians. I look for responsive encouragement from this government to those aspirations.

I see nothing of substance in the throne speech for the fruit farmer or the rancher who has an operating loan of $25,000, $50,000 or $100,000 bearing interest at 20 per cent. I see nothing substantial to help the small independent logger struggling to make payments on his $75,000 worth of trucking equipment. I see nothing substantial to offer relief for the merchant who finds the burden of carrying stock on his shelves and on his racks beyond his capacity under the high interest rates imposed by this government's management.

I see nothing of substance offered to young Canadians seeking to own homes. The policies which we advanced provided mortgage interest deductibility and offered operators of small businesses substantial relief from the burden of interest.

By inference, the Liberal opposition implied that they had something better to offer. The throne speech reveals the shallowness of their criticisms, the audacity of their endeavour and their overwhelming compulsion for power overcoming responsibility and reason.

● (1710)

Mr. Paul E. McRae (Thunder Bay-Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, it is with a great deal of pleasure that I have the opportunity to speak in this Thirty-second Parliament.

I begin by congratulating Madam Speaker on her appointment. She has served Parliament well over the past seven or eight years. I believe she will do a very fine job in her new role. It is fitting that a woman take the chair as Speaker in this House. We look forward to her deliberations and judgments which, as in the past, will be fair and carefully worked out.

I also want to congratulate the mover and seconder on the eloquent speeches they made in initiating this debate.

In spite of what some opposition members have said, this is one of the best throne speeches I have heard since coming here, and this is the fourth Parliament in which I have been a member. What we have in the throne speech is basically a call to Canadians to come together and unite for a strong Canada.

As a representative of two communities very close to the centre of this country, Thunder Bay, being the larger community, and Atikokan, with some smaller communities in between, we take very seriously our role bridging the west and the east, a kind of centre point in this country. As Canada's second largest port and the world's largest grain port, we are very pleased that the throne speech has given prominence to the movement of grain. The government has clearly indicated it will do everything in its power to ensure more grain is moved.

The central role of Thunder Bay is a prime factor in this movement. At the present time, about 70 per cent of our grain moves through Thunder Bay. We have been told by people such as the senior officials of the CPR that if it were not for the Crownnest rates all grain could be moved cheaper through Thunder Bay, through the Seaway and around through the Panama canal to ports in the Orient. That is the best way to move grain.

We are very anxious that some improvements be made in the movement of grain through Thunder Bay. We believe that rerouting the CN and CP track along the same corridor and building new yards near where the grain is to be discharged will help significantly in bringing this about.

The community of Atikokan has a great deal more difficulty. Two mines were shut down in the past two years resulting in 1,200 people being put out of work. There are some serious problems there. I was not happy during the six or eight months the Clark government was in power. There was much that could have been done in that area that was not done. In particular, with the kind of thinking that prevailed in the public service, especially in organizations like CMHC where there was a terror of making a mistake or doing anything because people did not know from one day to the next whether they would be wiped out—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. McRae: The people from CMHC did not support the people in my community who are having massive problems trying to hold on to their homes and so on. I hope there will be a new era in this regard.

The world of the 1980s is extremely complex. As Canadians and members of Parliament in the debate that has gone on over the past several years, there has been a tendency to oversimplify the problems that face us. There is a whole set of unique problems that have not been faced in the past. I have said that many times in this House of Commons, as have some members opposite. We are facing problems of inflation and high unemployment at the same time as massive interest problems. We are facing a whole series of economic problems that are different in magnitude and quality from those faced in the past. There is no question about that. We face social breakdowns that were never experienced in the past. We face problems in terms of global breakdown and the difficulty that individual nations are having in coming to grips with their problems. The same is true of multinational corporations. These are problems that previous governments did not have to respond to.

When I spoke in this House two years ago, we talked of a 5 per cent inflation rate as a kind of base zero. We now talk of 10 per cent as base zero. The rate of inflation in the U.S. has been running at about 18 per cent for the past few months. These problems are not being solved.

Added to that is a single factor that is unique. I refer to the beginning of a realization in the past two, three or four years that there is a very grave energy shortage. It is grave in both Canada and the United States. I want to speak about that and economic problems in a minute.

The point I wish to emphasize is that there are not simple answers to these problems. Increasing the money supply, the interest rate or, as the NDP would do, increasing government spending and creating greater demand and purchasing power will not work and have not worked for quite some time. We have increased demand at a tremendous rate and it has not worked. There are many reasons for that.

We have to look at the eighties as a new kind of era. I wish to refer hon. members to the remarks made by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) on New Year's eve in 1975 going into 1976. He talked about lifestyle changes. He was criticized for that. Some of those lifestyle changes are going to be with us. The energy problem is one that highlights this, but that is only one of them.

I wish to deal with the energy situation. I was particularly pleased with the references in the throne speech to the energy problem. The throne speech was superb in that regard. I was pleased because most of the thinking that went into that came from people on this side, not just government members but members of our caucus. It followed very, very carefully the statements we made during the campaign.

There are a couple of simple things we can say. We were told last June by the National Energy Board that conventional crude oil production in Canada in 1978, the last year for which they had figures, was approximately 1.4 million barrels a day and that that production would be down to something in the order of a little over 500,000 barrels a day by 1990. That is a reduction to just a little over a third. It has presented us with a series of problems. We were also told at that time that the gas supply demand curves would meet about 1992 or 1993. This was revised upwards.

Then we had what I call the famous Thursday when the prime minister stood up and announced that there could very well be a shortage of oil in eastern Canada if there was a bad winter. Then the minister of energy got up two and a half hours later and announced we were going to give away or sell 2.8 trillion cubic feet of natural gas. That was an interesting day, and the interesting thing about it was that he had to be asked six times by our members when we were on the other side what the cross-over date between supply and demand was under the new scheme, and the answer finally came out, after the sixth try—1997.

So we have a serious problem with respect to oil and natural gas. There are some solutions to it but I think this is the basis of the thinking that went on.

The idea that permeates the opposition in this debate is interesting: it is that because you have done something one way for the last 12 years you are always going to continue doing it that way. I tell you, Mr. Speaker, the world is changing and we will have to learn to change with it.

One of the major changes in our thinking in the last six or eight months was that we could no longer go along with the notion of world oil prices—that world oil prices bear no relevance to Canadian needs. It was one thing when the world price was $12 or $13 a barrel. It is another when it doubles or almost triples in the course of a year, when you go from $13 to $30 or $34. It is a wholly different ball game. So we decided we had to abandon the notion of world oil prices and come to the notion that oil prices within Canada should be related to cost, and we came up with the notion of a "made in Canada" price, which is really a blended price.

I am concerned about the interpretation which the opposition, and particularly the producing provinces—I have especially in mind Alberta—place upon this notion of a blended price. I sense in Mr. Lougheed, not in the people of Alberta, a kind of paranoia that worries me. It amounts to an almost desperate plea on behalf of his province. He is looking upon crude oil, and rightly so, as being a depleting resource which will virtually disappear in the next 15 or 20 years, and therefore he has to get as much out of it as he can as fast as he can.

I believe this is a mistake because I think this is not the case. I think Alberta has a depleting resource in oil in a very short space of time, and a depleting resource in a somewhat longer space of time in natural gas. In a much longer space still it has a depleting resource in tar sands, and in a much longer space again in coal.

I think what we have to do with this whole scene is to make people in Alberta and the government of Alberta believe that there is stability in this, that Canadians are willing to pay a reasonable amount to the people of Alberta over a long period of time and that this blended price, which will be made up of a certain price for conventional crude oil and a different price for tar sands, differing gas prices and so on, this blend of prices in terms of secondary and tertiary production, will be very, very gentle to Alberta and will sustain over the long term the economy of Alberta. It is not one of those things where, when it runs out, it is all over. It is a long-term thing and I think it is the long-term agreement which we make with Alberta which will be extremely important.

A final word on this price question—I overlooked one particular point I wanted to make. Getting back to the National Energy Board, the board produced a paper and all members were involved in it in terms of its presentation. It was presented to all sides of the House in November last. It showed that by 1985 revenue from oil and gas based on a $1 increase every six months—not on $4 or $4.50 a year but on $1 every six months—would be in the order of $30.54 billion, most of which would be going to Alberta, and that the provincial share would be something close to $10 billion—$9.80 billion. That is without the $4 or the $4.50 we are talking about.

I am not opposing this, but that would ensure to Albertans something in the order of $5,000 per man, woman and child per year. This would be sustained over a long period of time because the blended price would give us that effect. So I think Albertans have to feel easy about their future. I know they will want to share their resources with Canadians, and I do not think the present government means to grab, as we are hearing. That is not what we are trying to do. What we want is a fair deal for all Canadians while at the same time giving Albertans a generous allowance for enabling us to use those resources. And we believe those resources exist basically for all Canadians.

There are other things we are concerned about in our energy policy as it is enumerated. One of them is, of course, to find alternate sources for conventional crude oil from the world markets where we know we shall need to obtain crude oil. Do not forget that we are talking about moving from 1.4 billion barrels to 516 million barrels by 1990. So we shall need to buy offshore oil, and we on this side are very pleased that shortly after the new government came to power we were able to negotiate a most satisfactory initial arrangement with Mexico. We hope to do the same with Venezuela and the Mexican President will, I understand, be in Canada next month or the month after for the signing. We think this deal is very important because it is important to diversify in this respect. But we do have the problem of having to purchase close to 300,000 barrels a day for the east coast, for the Atlantic provinces, and we think some of this demand can be reduced considerably by the very rapid building of the Q & M pipeline. We think this has a very high priority and that we should substitute natural gas, of which we have a certain abundance. I do not think we have sufficient abundance to sell any more off, however. But there is certainly some abundance at this stage of the game and this would replace the oil we purchase for Atlantic Canada.

The strange Tory government meandering around this PetroCan issue was something I could not understand. It struck me as unbelievable at a time when the Canadian government needed a basic instrument for a national policy, an instrument which itself could do things when it was necessary to do them. This was the whole basis of PetroCan; it was not just something designed to increase Canadian ownership or to keep an eye on the industry. It was basically an instrument for a national energy policy, and it is a fine instrument. To talk about giving it away or selling it or God knows what seemed incomprehensible to me. But we are back on stream. We believe PetroCan is a fine instrument and we shall be doing our best to make it a larger and more viable company, to allow it to move into areas into which it has not moved before so as to develop new sources of oil and gas, and also to act as an umbrella for other energy problems.

We are very pleased the government has announced that there will be an alternate energy corporation. This may begin under Petro-Canada, it may be entirely separate, but it is extremely important that we should have an alternate energy corporation. We are very pleased the Speech from the Throne contains such an undertaking.

I think there is a very serious problem within the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources which has to do with the whole notion of conservation. It seems to me that we must deal with that notion at much greater length than we have until now. It fits in with my thinking of the new world into which we are moving. I am not sure that the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources, functioning as it does now mainly as a department of energy supply, is giving sufficient attention—here I am referring to both governments, not to one or the other—to a reduction in demand, to the conservation that is necessary. It seems to me that the whole alternate energy field as well as the conservation field is a new field we must develop, and perhaps at some point that field should be put under a separate ministry or organized in a somewhat different way so that there is a prime requirement in the area of alternate energy.

I think the throne speech has made a very valuable contribution to the future of Canadian energy in the statement on the blended price notion, that we are trying to develop a long-term pricing system which suits the people of Alberta and also meets the needs of all Canadians.

At the beginning of my speech I alluded to the kind of world into which I think we are moving and the kinds of concerns we have. I indicated that some of the problems which would seem to be almost insoluble were related to our economy. Certainly the Canadian economy is facing very difficult times.

First, I should like to get rid of the notion which seems to be coming from the other side that the budget which was defeated in December and which was a tough budget was one which we were not tough enough to take, that it was ridiculous for us to throw out that budget because we were going to have to bring in the same kind of budget. I can accept that it was tough, there is no question about that, but it was also foolish. I cannot believe that a government whose major concern in the budget was inflation would set in front of this Parliament an 18 cents excise tax which would have increased the inflation rate in this country by 1.5 per cent to 2 per cent. Most economists would agree that it would have had that very effect. There was no problem on this side with the idea that the government should raise more money or reduce the deficit—we did not dispute that fact. But we do dispute the fact that you have to increase the inflation rate by 1.5 per cent to 2 per cent to achieve that aim.

I think that was a basic difference between our outlook and theirs. The point was not that we would not have accepted a tough budget; the point was that it was a foolish thing to do, something that did not make sense in terms of the time or in terms of the expectations of Canadians.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McRae: I went to the Canadian electorate. I do not know whether there was deceit in this or it just happened, but people adopted the idea that gasoline prices must go up and that the 18 cents was going to contribute in some way to providing more gasoline. That was not true. This was straight general revenue. I find it very difficult day in and day out to say this. Let us accept that we did not defeat the government because they gave us a tough budget. We defeated it because the 18 cents excise tax did not make sense.

An hon. Member: How about the Gallup poll?

Mr. McRae: It has nothing to do with the Gallup poll. You were pushing us like mad. But the point is that the 18 cents tax did not make sense because it would have increased inflation by 1.5 per cent to 2 per cent.

We have been faced, in the last two years at least, with interest rates that are exceptionally high and that have grown, certainly in the last 12 to 15 months, to a point where they are creating some very serious problems in the Canadian economy. I am not satisfied that either our government or the Conservative government has attacked this in a total way, and I am pleased that the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) wants to know more and hear more alternate suggestions.

An hon. Member: He does not listen.

Mr. McRae: He has not heard anything to listen to. I am not convinced that the problems being caused to home owners, to small businessmen and to the home construction industry have been tackled correctly. In my community a good, medium-sized engineering firm has no business whatsoever. There is no one coming and saying, "I want to think about this; I have an idea that we should build so and so." That is not happening. There is a basic stoppage at the very basis of our construction trade. These are very serious problems. I hope this problem goes away but I do not think the answers are good enough. I do not think it is good enough to say that we will try to help those who cannot survive otherwise. I commend the government for going that far but I think we are going to have to do more.

I was very concerned during the Thirty-first Parliament about the rationale for high interest rates. We were talking about high inflation rates and comparing the United States and Canada. We said that since interest rates were high in the United States, therefore Canada must have high interest rates. When we in the finance committee met with Mr. Bouey in late October, I was not satisfied with his answers at all because, basically speaking, when I took the real interest rate—that is the prime rate minus the inflation rate—or when I took the deflated real interest rate, I found that Canada had by far the highest real interest rate of all the members of the summit Group of Seven, of which we are part. Ours was 5.5 per cent. I do not have the figures in front of me for that period, but in March the figure was 5.5 per cent, in the United States it was 2.75 per cent to 3.75 per cent, in West Germany 4.75 per cent, in Japan 1.50 per cent and so on. So we were way up there. What I am saying is that someone who actually lends money in this country is doing much better than if they lent money in the United States or some of the other countries, because their real interest rate is considerably higher.

When I pursued the subject, Mr. Bouey said that we can anticipate higher inflation rates because oil prices are going to go up. There was some kind of hint at that time that we were going to have the 18 cents tax. It concerned me, but I was reasonably satisfied when the government decided to let the interest rates float because I felt that at that point we would find out really about the theory that we needed high interest rates to go as high as they did, in spite of the fact that we had high real interest rates; and, of course, they went up a little higher.

I am beginning to wonder what has been happening. I was rather surprised, and I must admit I should have looked at this earlier, when I had a look at the money supply in this country. I began to see that the real money supply, that is the actual nominal money supply with the deflator factor, in the last 12 months was in the order of 2.6 per cent. It dropped to about 2.6 per cent. In other words, just looking at the average money supply, M1—which is the one accepted by the government, and there is no time to argue whether or not that is right—we find that it increased by 6.8 per cent last year, but the consumer price index increased by 9.4 per cent. So there is a 2.6 per cent loss there in actual money supply. I have asked the Minister of Finance if he will take another good look at what is happening to the M1 and also what is happening to our real interest rates and whether there is not some justification at this particular point for increasing the money supply, at least up to the point—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member. I must inform him that his allotted time has expired.

Hon. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, first I should like to compliment the hon. member for Rimouski (Mrs. Côté) and the hon. member for Sudbury (Mr. Frith) for the excellence of their maiden speeches as mover and seconder of the Speech from the Throne. We do not always agree with newcomers, but they had points to make and they both made them extremely well during the course of their speeches.

I intend to speak on defence later in this speech, but in view of the time constraint, with a 15-minute bell I understand starting at 5.45 p.m., I will just make a few introductory remarks and ask to carry on tomorrow.

Perhaps this might be a good time to mention the fact that the new fighter aircraft contract was finally signed today. I was rather dismayed that the new government decided not to announce either the selection of the aircraft or the signing of the contract by a statement on motions which would enable the opposition to cross-examine the ministers, something which they do not seem to accept very kindly. However, it was signed today. I believe they signed for the right aircraft. That was our position. I think the F-18A was the better of the two aircraft and came closer to fulfilling the needs of Canada's armed forces.

An hon. Member: Oh, oh!

Mr. McKinnon: I think I heard a little interjection from the NDP. I was rather amused to hear their defence critic suggest that this should be transferred over to a standing committee to make the choice between the two aircraft. I expect that they were thinking of the Standing Committee on National Defence and External Affairs. The hon. member for New Westminster-Coquitlam (Miss Jewett) is well known for her position about military matters which runs exactly counter to the leader of her party. Perhaps it would have been a grand opportunity for the NDP to sort themselves out and find out whether they wanted a plane at all or, as the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) moved last fall, that we should not have a plane. The meetings of the committee struck to choose between these two aircraft would have been very peculiar. Asking the NDP, particularly those two members, to choose between those two aircraft is rather like asking Truman Capote to judge the Miss America contest.

Miss Jewett: We did not want either.

Mr. McKinnon: While we are speaking so often on the referendum in this throne speech debate, I should like to point out that the unseemly sight of members of Parliament from Quebec and Ontario quarrelling over which province will have 50 per cent of this contract and which province will have 40 per cent rather dismays members of Parliament from the far reaches of the country. It does not really impress the people from the four western provinces, the Northwest Territories, the Yukon or the Atlantic provinces, that 10 per cent should be considered the normal allotment for those eight provinces and the other two territories. I am glad that has died out.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McKinnon: Mr. Speaker, I hope it would be in order if I were now to call it 5.45 p.m.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order. It being 5.45 p.m., it is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 38(3), to interrupt the proceedings and forthwith put any question to dispose of the subamendment which is now before the House.

The question is, therefore, on the amendment to the amendment (Mr. Broadbent). All those in favour of the amendment to the amendment will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Call in the members.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

[English]

GASIFICATION OF COAL RESERVES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bill J. Yurko (Edmonton East): Madam Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, on a matter of pressing urgency. In view of the fact that Canadian natural gas exports to the United States have resulted in substantial economic benefits to Canada, and recognizing the importance of additional exports in promoting the construction of the prebuilt section of the Alaska gas transmission line, and in view of the fact that surface and in situ gasification of coal is now technically workable as well as economically feasible, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Athabasca (Mr. Shields):

That this House instruct the government to request the National Energy Board to consider the gasification of Canada's vast coal reserves as a long-term supplement and back-up to present proven natural gas reserves in arriving at the conditions for additional exports of natural gas to the United States.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

HOUSING

REGULATIONS AND DETAILS OF HOME INSULATION PROGRAM—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. The home heating season is just about finished for this winter period. Home owners and insulation contractors now wish to be able to organize their affairs so that they can insulate properties and take advantage of the savings attributable to better insulation. In the Speech from the Throne there was passing reference to measures to be introduced to encourage higher standards of home insulation.

I, therefore, move, seconded by the hon. member for Brampton-Georgetown (Mr. McDermid):

That this House direct the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, in conjunction with the Minister responsible for Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation, to forthwith issue regulations and detail with respect to the home insulation program, extending that program to all homes built prior to 1975, so that home owners will know for certain the meaning of the promises set out in the Speech from the Throne and will be able to plan to have this necessary work done as soon as possible.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

PARKS CANADA

POSSIBLE MOVE FROM CORNWALL TO PETERBOROUGH—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bill Domm (Peterborough): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity, pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43.

In view of the recent decision of the Minister of State for Science and Technology and Minister of the Environment, responsible for Parks Canada, to review the previous government's decision to move the Parks Canada regional office from Cornwall to Peterborough, in light of the current unrest among civil servants affected by that decision to put the move under review, because of the financial commitments undertaken by the former government to lease office facilities in Peterborough, in view of the actions of the public and separate school boards in Peterborough county to offer French immersion programs to the children of Francophone employees moving from Cornwall to Peterborough, and due to other plans undertaken by the city of Peterborough and the county of Peterborough to receive these employees, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Durham-Northumberland (Mr. Lawrence):

That the minister be directed by this House to confirm to all parties that this relocation of the Parks Canada, Ontario regional office from Cornwall to Peterborough will proceed as scheduled, in order that the employees might continue with the enrolment of their children in school and take possession of their homes in the Peterborough area, as put in place by the Conservative government.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

S.O. 43

THE ENVIRONMENT

ACID RAIN—CANADA-U.S. DISCUSSIONS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Tom McMillan (Hillsborough): Madam Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. Since the Minister of State for Science and Technology and Minister of the Environment (Mr. Roberts) will be in Washington for discussions tomorrow with the United States government regarding acid rain, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Peterborough (Mr. Domm):

● (1110)

That this government express to the United States government the Canadian government's determination to pursue vigorously strategies for the control of acid rain, and that the Canadian government convey to the United States government the unanimous support of this House for the early conclusion of an agreement between Canada and the United States for the abatement of acid rain, which the former minister of the environment, the hon. member for Vancouver South, called "the worst environmental danger Canada has ever faced."

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

AIRPORTS

REGINA, SASK.—CUSTOMS CLEARANCE SERVICE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina West): Madam Speaker, I too, have a motion under the provisions of Standing Order 43. In view of the fact that the federal government has constructed a temporary Customs clearance facility at the Regina airport, but because the federal government refuses to pay overtime to Customs clearance staff, early morning and weekend charter flights returning to Regina have been diverted to Winnipeg to clear Customs—which probably costs about 100 times more than the overtime—adding two hours to the travel time of passengers and wasting 900 gallons of fuel for each plane diverted, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Regina East (Mr. de Jong):

That this House calls on the government to provide Customs clearance service for all flights needing these services at any time of day at the Regina airport.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

OIL EXPORT TAX—SHARE FOR INDIAN BANDS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Stan Schellenberger (Wetaskiwin): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. In view of the urgent need for Indian band financing, and because the federal government six years ago collected certain band funds, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Cooper):

That the government immediately repay Indian bands their share of the oil export tax.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

MODERNIZATION OF SYDNEY STEEL CORPORATION PLANT—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. In light of the fact that the premier of Nova Scotia requested a meeting this week with the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. De Bané), that the minister refused this meeting, that the purpose of such a meeting was to discuss the necessity of a grant to modernize the facilities at the Sydney Steel Corporation plant, and in view of the fact that the Liberal party promised during the last election campaign to provide $50 million to modernize the plant, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

That the minister meet with the premier of Nova Scotia immediately to discuss this matter; and that this government keep its campaign promise to provide at least $50 million for modernization of the plant.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

CALL FOR IMMEDIATE REINTRODUCTION OF BILL C-28—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg-Assiniboine): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity under the provisions of Standing Order 43. Given the fact that Bill C-28, which was introduced by the Conservative government last December to benefit Canada's war veterans' widows, given the fact the filibustering of the NDP and Liberals in the last Parliament prevented it from becoming law, and given the fact that these deliberate and constant delays should not be borne on the back of the veterans, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Grey-Simcoe (Mr. Mitges):

That this government immediately reintroduce Bill C-28 in its entirety and make its benefits retroactive to December 6, 1979, when the bill was first introduced by the hon. member for Victoria.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

SHIPPING

DREDGING OF SALMON ARM, B.C.—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops-Shuswap): Madam Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. Given the fact that a major part of the economy of Salmon Arm, B.C., is dependent upon access to the waters of Shuswap Lake and access is presently not available via the federal wharf due to the natural silting-in process, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Beaches (Mr. Young):

That this House immediately instruct the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans to initiate action to ensure the shipping channel is dredged before the high water of the spring freshet.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

ENERGY

NEGOTIATIONS WITH PRODUCING PROVINCES ON OIL PRICING

Hon. Jake Epp (Provencher): Madam Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. The present oil pricing agreement expires on July 1, which obviously raises the need for new agreement by that date. Can the minister tell the House whether or not negotiations have begun with the producing provinces and, if not, have dates been finalized for the commencement of negotiations with those provinces?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, I had the opportunity of meeting with the ministers of energy from the producing provinces very shortly after my appointment. We conducted exploratory discussions at that time. I have been in touch with the provinces since, and our plan is to get in touch once again and meet in the next few weeks, hopefully in the early part of May.

Mr. Epp: Madam Speaker, we are aware of the exploratory meetings which the minister had with the producing provinces and the ministers responsible. But I specifically asked him if dates have been set for negotiations to commence, in view of the fact there are but a few months left prior to the July 1 deadline. Further, has the minister presented any federal proposals, in terms of either supply or price, to the producing provinces?

[Translation]

Mr. Lalonde: Madam Speaker, I indicated in my reply to the previous question that a meeting would be scheduled for early May. The date will be set by mutual agreement with the provinces concerned and, at that time, we will take up the specific study of certain aspects which could constitute the basis for a new oil pricing agreement.

[English]

Mr. Epp: Madam Speaker, the minister's answer again proves that things are very nebulous and that their policies have not been nailed down, with only two months from May 1 before the expiration of the present agreement. Neither the Speech from the Throne nor the minister's address to the House yesterday made any real commitment to energy self-sufficiency, particularly oil self-sufficiency, for Canada.

Is energy self-sufficiency a goal of this government, or has the minister concluded that the present policies of this government, whatever they may be, will not give us self-sufficiency? If, in fact, self-sufficiency is their goal, can the minister give us a date when he hopes to attain that goal?

Mr. Lalonde: Madam Speaker, of course self-sufficiency is a goal of this government, but I do not intend to give phony dates, like the previous government, which they could not obviously uphold.

Miss MacDonald: You do not even try.

INDUSTRY

CANADA-U.S. AUTO PACT—SUGGESTED REVISION TO PREVENT LOSS OF JOBS

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce: it is of deep concern to every Canadian taxpayer as well as to Canadian auto workers.

Is the minister aware that the, Volkswagen Corporation plans to expand its operations in the United States, and that the American government is now negotiating with Honda and Datsun to build plants in the United States? If so, would he not agree that unless these companies' operations are brought within the framework of a revised Canada-U.S. automotive agreement very soon, the results for Canada can be devastating both in the loss of thousands of jobs and in a major increase in what is now an automotive trade deficit of over $3 billion?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Madam Speaker, it is our intention, when we begin our formal consultations with the United States on the auto pact, to raise the whole matter of the third country imports as well as our interests with respect to the Canadian automotive industry. We also want to deal with the matter of increased activity in Canada by these third countries.

I also want to inform the House that this coming Monday I will be meeting in Ottawa with the special trade representative of the United States, Ambassador Askew. One of the items on the agenda will be this very matter.

Mr. Broadbent: Madam Speaker, talks at this level have been going on for many years between the Government of Canada and officials of the United States. Considering not only the information I have just mentioned, about expansion of non-North American plants in the U.S. which are going to cause us serious problems, considering the announcement today by General Motors of thousands of lay-offs in both countries, and Ford's announcement yesterday of thousands of lay-offs in both countries, will the minister not now seize the opportunity of this genuine crisis in the industry to arrange a meeting at the top level, including the Canadian Secretary of State for External Affairs and himself, to get a renegotiated pact in place by the end of this year?

● (1120)

Mr. Gray: Madam Speaker, we began with a series of meetings I have been holding with the presidents of Canadian companies, within days of the new government taking over, to carry out our commitment to have a better automotive industry in Canada—

An hon. Member: It is really working well.

Mr. Gray: —and we intend to proceed as quickly as possible to do something that has not been done before by the previous Conservative government or previous Liberal governments, that is, to have formal consultations under the relevant clause of the Canada-U.S. automotive agreement.

I am glad to see that the hon. member recognizes that this is a North American crisis problem. We are treating it as such, because our priority is to preserve Canadian jobs and to create more Canadian jobs; and I hope to have the support for this of the hon. member and all members today.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: Madam Speaker, if it is a crisis for Canada, it is a crisis because for 12 years the Liberals did nothing up to this point in getting our share of these jobs.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: That is why we have a crisis. I would like to ask the minister, in that context, since the profits of virtually every one of the North American automotive companies—Chrysler, Ford, General Motors, and American Motors—are all higher in Canada than in the United States, and since their production, with the exception of one company only, this year is not going to live up to its commitments under the Canada-U.S. automotive agreement, will he promise Canadians today that the Government of Canada this year will compel them to live up to their commitments—at least for 1980?

Mr. Gray: Madam Speaker, we are all glad that the hon. member and his party have suddenly remembered the plight of the auto workers.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Gray: This is something we have been concerned with since the outset and began working on as soon as we became the government. We are going to use the authority we have under the Canada-U.S. automotive agreement to preserve Canadian jobs and, hopefully, to add to them.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

ENERGY

DATE OF SELF-SUFFICIENCY IN OIL

Mr. Harvie Andre (Calgary Centre): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. A few moments ago he castigated this side of the House for our stating 1990 as the target date for achieving self-sufficiency. I would remind the minister that on March 21, in a Canadian Press interview, the Minister of State for Economic Development, in the other place, on the question of oil self-sufficiency stated, "It can and must be done before 1990".

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Andre: Can the minister indicate whether that minister was indicating a desire, and how his policies on pricing and revenue-sharing would help Canada achieve self-sufficiency, if not by 1990 but at a date that he suggests is more appropriate?

An hon. Member: Who is stating government policy?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, indeed the previous government had mentioned 1990 as the date, but the previous minister of energy had also indicated that by 1990 we would still be importing 250,000 barrels a day. This is why I said that this target set by the previous government was just a phony date which had no realistic basis.

An hon. Member: It is your own minister in the Senate.

Mr. Lalonde: As far as we are concerned, indeed we want self-sufficiency for Canada and we do hope and think that we can achieve it before 1990.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Who is the phony?

Mr. Lalonde: If the current exploration off the east coast proves to be as encouraging as is thought, we might be able to reach that level much earlier than the most optimistic forecasts that were made by the Tories. But as far as we are concerned, I am not going to be tied to a specific date.

Mr. Andre: Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is for the same minister. During the election campaign, the minister described the Liberal pricing policy this way, as quoted in the January 29 edition of The Globe and Mail:

> If the price of conventional is X, you will have a price of X plus Y for the non-conventional oil, and then the international price—you know what it is—but we have indicated we will continue to subsidize the price . . . So what you would end up with would be a mix of these prices.

● (1125)

Mr. Andre: Since then the minister's statements have been more grammatical but no less clear—or no more clear.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Andre: Can the minister tell the House what his pricing formula is, and how his pricing formula will isolate Canada from increases in OPEC and Mexican prices?

[Translation]

Mr. Lalonde: Madam Speaker, I indicated in our preliminary and later discussions with my colleagues of the various provinces that I had no intention of dealing in speculation about specific figures, neither here in the House nor elsewhere.

COMPENSATORY MEASURES RESPECTING LAPRADE HEAVY WATER PLANT

Hon. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Madam Speaker, my question is also directed to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. I should like to bring up an old story, that of the compensatory measures negotiated with the then government several months ago concerning the Laprade heavy water plant entailing compensation of some $200 million negotiated between the Quebec and federal governments. Does the minister intend to deal swiftly with this matter and settle it once and for all since, to my mind, it is certainly justified?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): The matter was discussed with the former Liberal government and, more particularly, with the then minister of finance, now the Minister of Justice.

I have received a letter from the Quebec energy minister and I am now looking into the situation and more recent developments. I shall be pleased to advise the hon. member of any further developments in that regard.

Mr. La Salle: Madam Speaker, I should like to put a supplementary question.

In view of the fact that we had already agreed and accepted to settle those compensatory measures of roughly $200 million, under certain conditions dealing, for example, with the saving of energy, would the minister assure us that he will recommend to the Minister of Finance the payment of those $200 million since the minister knows quite well that we will have to say yes from time to time if we want to get as massive a No vote as the Prime Minister hopes for?

Mr. Lalonde: Madam Speaker, as the hon. member knows, we did discuss a compensatory $200 million formula when we were in power and, as he also indicated, there were certain conditions related to the matter; and that is what we are considering at present.

EXPORT OF NATURAL GAS TO UNITED STATES

Hon. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon West): Madam Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. I want to ask whether he maintains the position he took on December 6 last in opposition to the export of natural gas to the United States. In particular, does he believe—and I quote him— "everything has to be signed, sealed and delivered, particularly the financing plan . . . for the whole Alaska pipeline . . . before we start exporting one cubit foot of gas out of this country to the United States". Is that still the position of this government, or his own particular position as minister?

[Translation]

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, the hon. member is aware that we have received a number of proposals calling for an increase in gas exports, or even for some amendments to the agreement we had signed when we were in power. We have decided to postpone any action concerning this until we can obtain much clearer indications as to what the Americans intend to do than those the previous government could obtain. We want to get firm assurances that the Alaska pipeline project will be started.

[English]

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Madam Speaker, if that is intended to elucidate the position, I am afraid it does not accomplish that particular end. In terms of the minister's policy with regard to natural gas, on March 4, shortly after being sworn in to his present position, he made the statement that one of his first priorities would be to introduce an export tax on natural gas. Is that a statement of government policy, and does it continue to be so?

Mr. Lalonde: Madam Speaker, I do not recall ever having made such a statement.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Lalonde: If the hon. member has such a quote, I would like to see it. But this is not part of government policy.

GOVERNMENT EXPENDITURES

IMPROVED FINANCIAL INFORMATION TO PARLIAMENT

Mr. Doug Anguish (The Battlefords-Meadow Lake): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the President of the Treasury Board. In view of the fact that the 1978-79 Auditor General's report indicates that the spending of the government is not under control and recommends improved information to Parliament as one part of a remedy, and since the Comptroller General was asked by the public accounts committee on March 8, 1979, to review the topic of improved information for Parliament, as suggested by the Lambert commission and several other government reports, with a mandate to report back to the committee no later than December of 1980, will the minister assure the House that the original deadline will be met and that progress reports will be issued as the report proceeds?

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (President of the Treasury Board): Madam Speaker, the original deadline cannot be met by reason of a series of events that have taken place—changes of government, and so on—but I can assure hon. members that the improvement of financial information to Parliament is a priority item for Treasury Board.

I have had frequent discussions with the Comptroller General on this subject and we shall, I hope, be presenting experimental forms of estimates later this year for the following fiscal period. So the program is delayed, but it is moving ahead efficiently now and I think the hon. member's request will be satisfied in the current year.

Mr. Anguish: Since this is a priority item in the view of the government, and taking into consideration the fact that the public accounts committee is already overburdened with work, will the minister refer reports and recommendations aimed at improving information to Parliament to a special committee of the House which would be struck for the sole purpose of providing recommendations to Parliament for improving the efficiency and accountability of government?

Mr. Johnston: The question covers a variety of points, Madam Speaker. I think I answered the question with respect to the form of the estimates, and we shall be happy to furnish progress reports in that regard.

With respect to the over-all position, the hon. member may be aware of the IMPAC studies being conducted by the Comptroller General in nearly every major department of government. These surveys are being completed; we hope to complete all of them this year in the 27 departments. Plans for action are being agreed upon with those departments and I would say this program is moving ahead very effectively—I believe the Comptroller General will agree with me.

ENERGY

CONSULTATIONS ON PRICE OF SYNCRUDE OIL

Mr. Jack Shields (Athabasca): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Will the hon. gentleman advise the House whether or not he consulted with all nine partners of the Syncrude agreement prior to his unilateral announcement fixing the price of Syncrude oil, and will he provide detailed information as to the time, place and extent of that consultation?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, I did not consult the nine partners in the business. This was a government decision and it has to be taken. However, I did discuss this issue with the minister of energy from Alberta on March 17, in Edmonton, and also around March 26, by telephone.

Mr. Shields: I find it difficult to believe that an agreement made by this government—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Madam Speaker: Will the hon. member please ask his question?

Mr. Shields: Recognizing the total disruption to the tar sands industry, the uncertainty that has been created with regard to their development, and the resulting economic hardship to small businesses in Fort McMurray, Cold Lake and Bonnyville.

Madam Speaker: Order. Will the hon. member please ask his question very soon.

Mr. Shields: Yes, I will.

Some hon. Members: Now.

Mr. Shields: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I am asking the question. In view of the number of small businesses that have gone bankrupt, will the minister inform the House whether an analysis was carried out to determine the cost, not only to the economy of the local communities but to the Canadian economy, of a minimum of a one-year delay in the development of the Alsands project and the project at Cold Lake?

Mr. Lalonde: I am afraid the hon. member has not been well informed as to what the decision has been. The decision has been not to tie, in future, increases in the price paid for tar sands oil to international prices. I have a statement here by the president of Suncor which reads as follows; I am sure it will interest the hon. member: "Suncor will continue to receive the present price until a new pricing agreement has been reached, so there is no immediate impact on our earnings from this decision."

In effect, this means that the tar sands plants are receiving, at the present time, the same price as they were receiving in the past, and I have indicated that while negotiations are taking place with the producing province we intend to continue to pass on the necessary increases which would come under the formula. So nothing has changed, except it has been clearly indicated to the companies concerned that in the future we will not be tied to the international price or to the price fixed by OPEC which, as hon. members know, is the equivalent of an international cartel.

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): I have a brief supplementary. I would preface it by asking the minister, if he was quoting from a formal document and not from a press clipping, whether he would follow the rules of the House and lay it on the Table.

My question has to do with the so-called consultation with the producing provinces. Would the minister confirm that what he and the Prime Minister the other day referred to as consultation was, in fact, a telephone call of advice to the minister of energy of Alberta roughly one hour before the decision which had already been taken was communicated to the press?

Mr. Lalonde: As to the first point, if the Leader of the Opposition is interested, I will table the copy of The Globe and Mail of April 17 in which this statement is reported. I am sure the Leader of the Opposition has full confidence in The Globe and Mail.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lalonde: As to the second part of the question, I want to advise the Leader of the Opposition I had an extensive exchange of views with the minister of energy for Alberta on March 17 and I phoned him on March 26, I believe, which was two days before the announcement was made; if I remember well it was made on March 28.

FINANCE

CONSUMER PRICE INDEX—EFFECT OF HIGH INTEREST RATES

Mr. Bob Rae (Broadview-Greenwood): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance; it concerns the consumer price index which was announced this morning by Statistics Canada, showing that the price of basic products such as home heating fuel has gone up by 19.5 per cent, year over year, and dairy products by 14.5 per cent, year over year.

Can the hon. gentleman tell us whether it is still his view that the way to fight this kind of inflation is by having 20 per cent interest rates, when there is increasing evidence from a number of observers that pouring gasoline on interest rates only fuels inflation rather than fighting it?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): The hon. member has asked for my views on inflation. There are a number of aspects to my views which I could not possibly put forward during the question period.

An hon. Member: Bring down a budget.

Mr. MacEachen: One of my jobs as Minister of Finance is to fight off proposals which would add to the inflationary pressures in this country. I am grateful to the House of Commons that the proposal put forward by the hon. member's leader, which was inflationary and, if accepted, would add an immediate and appreciable increase in prices to Canadians for food, clothing, transportation and other commodities, was rejected. That is one view I would like to convey to the hon. member, but I do not want to accept the outlandish proposals his party is putting forward at the present time.

• (1140)

Mr. Rae: Madam Speaker, I want to thank the minister for that clear and frank reply to my question which, I am sure, will clear the air for those Canadians who are very concerned about knowing the direction of government policy. The government is running on a unique blend of fog and cynicism, which has become its characteristic.

I wonder if the minister can give us a guarantee that consumers who are being so hard hit, not only by inflation but also by interest rates—which are contributing to inflation and not fighting it—will be protected in an economic statement, a budget or whatever the minister wants to call it, as soon as possible by means of a cost of living tax credit or some similar device to ensure that those Canadians who can least afford it are protected from the effects of inflation and higher interest rates, which are now clearly the policy of his government.

Mr. MacEachen: Madam Speaker, obviously one of the objectives of the government is to cushion every possible group, and particularly those groups which need protection most, against the effects of inflation. We have announced in the Speech from the Throne that the government does not wish to revive the 18-cent excise tax on gasoline, which would have been quite inflationary.

We have announced in the Speech from the Throne that we intend to introduce as quickly as possible the guaranteed income supplement, which will be of major assistance to the elderly in this country who are suffering from the effects of inflation. We have already indicated that we are taking steps to assist home owners to meet this particular crisis—

An hon. Member: What are they?

Mr. MacEachen: —as a result of extraordinarily high interest rates. So I tell the hon. member that these are three immediate proposals which are designed to meet and cushion the effect of inflation in this country.

Oral Questions

STATISTICS CANADA

EXPECTED TABLING OF CERTAIN REPORTS

Hon. Sinclair Stevens (York-Peel): Madam Speaker, my question is for the President of the Treasury Board. I wonder if he can indicate to the House whether he has been confirmed as the minister responsible for Statistics Canada for at least the coming months and, if so, when may we expect him to table the three reports which have now been concluded dealing with Statistics Canada, namely, the Newcombe report, the Price Waterhouse report and the Sir Claus Moser report?

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (President of Treasury Board): Madam Speaker, I do have responsibility for Statistics Canada. I hope to table the Price Waterhouse report and the Sir Claus Moser report within the next several days.

With respect to the Newcombe report, I have already indicated that it was not my intention to table it because of some of the personal references which are contained in it, but that I would be pleased to make it available to spokesmen of opposition parties who would like to review its contents. I am prepared to reconsider my position on that, if they insist that it also be tabled.

Mr. Stevens: Madam Speaker, I would like the minister to reconsider his decision not to table the full Newcombe report, but I also ask when he might indicate to the House what remedial action he intends to take with respect to Statistics Canada.

Mr. Johnston: Madam Speaker, the situation at Statistics Canada is now the direct responsibility of Mr. Larry Fry, who is the chief statistician acting under a short mandate. He has already studied the reports and is taking remedial action in the area of management improvement and some of the areas which were recommended in the Price Waterhouse report. I will be making a further statement at the time I table the report which, as I indicated, should be within the next several days.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

BOYCOTTING OF OLYMPIC GAMES IN MOSCOW

Mr. Chris Speyer (Cambridge): Madam Speaker, my question is to the Prime Minister. I would like to return to the general topic of the Olympic boycott. Apart altogether from what the Prime Minister perceives to be the effects of a boycott on the Russian people and the Russian government, and apart altogether from what any other country does, is the time not long overdue when the Prime Minister should assert the moral authority of his office and lead the Canadian people by concrete action, as opposed to sanctimonious statements—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speyer: —and that we as a country should take the view that we are not going to Moscow?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): No, Madam Speaker.

An hon. Member: What?

Mr. Trudeau: I said "No".

Mr. Crosbie: He said "No".

Mr. Speyer: Prime Minister—

An hon. Member: Address the Chair.

Mr. Speyer: Sorry, Madam Speaker. Do you appreciate—

Some hon. Members: No.

Madam Speaker: The hon. member should remember that he must address the Chair.

Mr. Speyer: Madam Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Prime Minister. I wonder if the Prime Minister appreciates the symbolism to our people of a strong stand with respect to the Olympic boycott independent of other countries and independent, even, of the effect that it might have on Russians. Does the Prime Minister appreciate the symbolism of that to the Canadian people?

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, I am afraid I cannot agree with the hon. member. If he thinks that symbolism is just for the sake of symbolism and, in the terms of his own question, has no effect on the Soviet Union, then indeed I disagree with him.

NATIONAL UNITY

QUEBEC REFERENDUM—ESTABLISHMENT OF PROGRAM TO ALLOW GREATER PARTICIPATION BY QUEBEC FEDERAL MEMBERS

Mr. Maurice Dupras (Labelle): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the President of the Privy Council. While I am aware that the business of the House is important and that it is urgent to dispose of it, and although the No team is gaining wider support from Quebeckers in all regions, I should like to know if the President of the Privy Council has obtained from the opposition parties an agreement which would allow us, as Quebec elected members, to be more visible and active during the referendum campaign. I know, Madam Speaker, that all men and women in Canada generally, but more specifically in Quebec, are anxious to know what part we will play if—

Madam Speaker: Order, please. Would the hon. member ask his question.

Mr. Dupras: Madam Speaker, my question is this: I would like to know whether the opposition parties have agreed to a pairing system or any other arrangement which would allow hon. members from the province of Quebec to be more active and more present in the province during the referendum campaign?

Hon. Yvon Pinard (President of the Privy Council): Madam Speaker, it is true that we face a double task in the next few weeks: to deal with an extensive legislative program while at the same time getting involved in and supporting the No forces during the referendum campaign in Quebec.

Personally, Madam Speaker, I am confident that all members of the House will be willing to dispose of the accumulated legislative work in a spirit of co-operation and good will, as required by His Excellency the Governor General in the Speech from the Throne. In any case, negotiations have already been initiated with the parliamentary leaders of the opposition parties, and I am confident that satisfying agreements will be reached, enabling us to deal with the House legislative program within reasonable time while at the same time finding ways to allow hon. members, particularly those from Quebec, to go campaigning. This would be done by postponing votes, if need be, or by organizing the work in such a way that we can contribute, directly or indirectly, to the success of the No forces in Quebec and ensure the unity of Canada.

ENERGY

EXPORT OF NATURAL GAS TO UNITED STATES

Mr. Ian Waddell (Vancouver-Kingsway): Madam Speaker, I want to return to the matter of energy self-sufficiency and put a question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. I think the minister might agree with me that one way to energy self-sufficiency might be to keep our natural gas for our own use.

● (1150)

When he was the Liberal opposition energy critic, he told this House that exports of natural gas to the United States should not be authorized unless there is an ironclad commitment regarding the building of the whole Alaska gas pipeline: those were the minister's words. Now that he is in a position to do something about that, could he tell this House what he meant by "an ironclad commitment?"

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, I had a meeting with the Secretary of Energy from the United States very shortly after my appointment. I reviewed the whole situation with him. I passed on to the American authorities the concern of this government about the delays that were being faced concerning the firm and final decision by the United States authorities on the construction of the Alaska gas pipeline. The Secretary of Energy of the United States indicated that his government now was convinced that the project should go, and that he was pushing very strongly with the private partners in the United States who are responsible for the project, so that this project indeed proceeds.

Very shortly, I am meeting—tomorrow, I believe—with one of the main private sponsors in the United States about this particular project in order to get a full report of the most recent meeting which has taken place. I am keeping very much on top of this question in order to be fully aware of developments, and the government will have to make a decision later on.

Mr. Waddell: Madam Speaker, let me remind the minister that Parliament put an ironclad guarantee into the Northern Pipeline Act of 1978 when Parliament indicated that one cannot prebuild this pipeline without an ironclad guarantee of financing. Yet last week the minister's government allowed the National Energy Board to open up this whole question and to open up the possibility of the pipeline company prebuilding without that guarantee.

Before there is any change in the Northern Pipeline Act, before he lets them prebuild the southern portion and take Canadian gas to the Americans without a guarantee of the northern portion being built, will the minister assure the House that he will come back to the House and get permission from the House of Commons to make any changes to that act?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lalonde: Madam Speaker, no change has been made to the Northern Pipeline Act, and obviously no change would be made to the act without coming to Parliament. What the National Energy Board is doing at the present time is holding hearings under the authority the Energy Board has under legislation passed by Parliament.

NEB REVIEW OF GAS EXPORT DECISION

Hon. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Madam Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. On December 7, 1979, he described the gas export decision of the National Energy Board, and I quote him, "as one of the biggest sellouts in Canadian history".

An hon. Member: Right on.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Nielsen: Does he still hold that view and if he does, is it an explanation of why he is using the Energy Board to review this matter, for the purpose of saving his own face with respect to that statement?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, certainly I said what the hon. member quoted, and I still believe, indeed, that that was the wrong decision made by the government at the time.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

An hon. Member: Without knowing anything about it.

IMPORTATION OF CRUDE OIL FROM MEXICO

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Madam Speaker, I have a further question for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources when he concludes his conversation with the socialists to the left.

In view of the upcoming agreement between Canada and Mexico with respect to the importation of crude from that country, can the minister shed some light on the situation with respect to the capacity of eastern refineries to handle that portion of imports which will fall into the category of heavy crude?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, when an agreement is reached with Mexico, we will be in a position to comment on the details arising out of that agreement.

Miss MacDonald: It was all ready for signing in January.

Mr. Lalonde: At the present time, discussions are taking place with the Mexican authorities. No agreement has been signed yet, and I will not comment until we have that agreement.

Miss MacDonald: Oh, what happened?

Mr. Forrestall: Madam Speaker, I am left with the impression that the minister is not aware that there will be a mixture of heavy and light crudes and that we have no refining capacity whatsoever in Atlantic Canada for heavy crude. If that is their way to self-sufficiency, they are on the wrong track.

My supplementary question has two points to it. The former government had agreed in principle to extend required financial aid to the companies involved in the refining. I wonder if the government is prepared to indicate whether they would honour that commitment; and, second, whether or not in the negotiations with Mexico a firm understanding has been arrived at, or is being pursued, with respect to movement in Canadian ships of that imported crude.

Mr. Lalonde: Madam Speaker, I am very happy to see that the hon. member is aware of the nature of the refineries in Nova Scotia.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Lalonde: As far as the agreement is concerned, again, and the consequences arising out of the agreement, we will comment once the agreement has been reached and signed.

Mr. Forrestall: I will be raising a question of privilege at twelve o'clock.

POST OFFICE

RURAL SATURDAY POST OFFICE SERVICE

Mr. Laverne Lewycky (Dauphin): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Postmaster General. In view of the numerous requests that many rural members of Parliament have received for the retention of rural Saturday post office service, could the minister advise this House whether or not his government is intending to continue the policy of the previous Conservative government in closing down rural post offices on Saturdays?

[Translation]

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Postmaster General): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to inform the House that we will not go ahead with such reductions in services without first consulting the elected representatives of this Parliament as well as the representatives of local associations of postmasters and their assistants.

[English]

Mr. Lewycky: I have a supplementary question, Madam Speaker. Has the minister conducted, or does he intend to do so, any studies on the economic and social hardships that Saturday closing of rural post offices would present to rural communities?

[Translation]

Mr. Ouellet: Madam Speaker, such a study can certainly be carried out. As Postmaster General, I can right now assure the hon. member that my policy will not be to cut back this service on Saturdays and I do not think, either, that it is the intent of the present Liberal government.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

NEW F-18A FIGHTER AIRCRAFT—EFFECT OF INFLATION ON PRICE

Hon. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria): Madam Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence, although the Minister of Supply and Services might wish to reply, concerning a contract which was signed yesterday.

Considering that the inflation rate has risen very sharply in the United States recently, and in the matter of the F-18A may have risen as much as 50 per cent in costs in two years, can either minister tell us how they can rationalize their decision being made based on an assumed inflation rate of 8 per cent?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Minister of Supply and Services): Madam Speaker, although there is a ceiling price which includes the 8 per cent, as the hon. gentleman is well aware, there is also provision that adjustments can be made from time to time in order to reflect the real inflation rate on a yearly basis.

Mr. McKinnon: Madam Speaker, I wonder if the Minister of Supply and Services could inform the House, apart from their contract, and if the worst comes to the worst in the United States, and the United States navy as well as the United States marine corps decides not to buy the F-18A, if they have a contingency plan of what Canada's action will be in that event.

Mr. Blais: Madam Speaker, I can advise the hon. member that we have every expectation that the number of aircraft that are contemplated as being produced by the manufacturer will indeed be produced. We have every assurance that even the numbers which have been contemplated will be surpassed and that Canada's position will be enhanced as a result.

HEALTH CARE

COST-SHARING WITH PROVINCES

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg-Birds Hill): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. In view of continuing crises in Canada's health care system, such as those brought on by the refusal of provincial governments to meet their share of needed health care funds, with the possibility of a nurses' strike in Alberta being the latest result of provincial stinginess, can the minister tell the House what she intends to do about this problem before Justice Hall's report comes down this summer?

• (1200)

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): I studied carefully, Madam Speaker, the possible lines of action before the recommendations are made to us by Justice Hall on putting medicare back to where it should be in every part of Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Miss Bégin: With the state of the matter when we came back to the government, we concluded that it was best not to interfere with the ongoing public hearings, to let the public see more facts and to let Justice Hall and the people he has gathered around him in his team, Mr. Malcolm Taylor and others, do their work and make recommendations to the government which could be, I hope, ideas other than just the two heavy legal tools left to us in today's legislation on medicare.

Mr. Blaikie: I have a supplementary question, Madam Speaker. That was an answer that was unacceptable to the Minister of National Health and Welfare when it was given to her in the last Parliament by the Conservative government, and it is unacceptable to me now.

In view of Liberal party commitments during the election campaign to discourage health care premiums, deterrent fees and extra billing, would the minister indicate what she intends to do now to reduce the cost of health care for individual Canadians which, according to the consumer price index, rose 1.7 per cent in the last month?

Miss Bégin: Madam Speaker, I think the hon. member is forgetting a few facts of life. The commission existed: we did not create it; the Conservative government created it. Do you prefer to have the work of the commission cancelled? My common sense tells me, no: the commission should be supported in its work, and that is the decision we made.

Recommendations should be made to us by June 30. In the meantime, we have always said that the public must get involved and tell us if they want free health care. What did we do? We tried to put the facts to the public. But what happened? In New Brunswick, for instance—am I not right—the Conservative government just withdrew their user fees they had put last year. Is that not a victory for medicare?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

FUNDING FOR NON-PROFIT AND CO-OP HOUSING

Hon. Paul Cosgrove (Minister of Public Works): Madam Speaker, in response to a question put by the hon. member for Vancouver East yesterday, I would like to report that the difference, or shortfall, between allocation and express demand for non-profit starts for 1980 is 6,089, and for co-ops it is 2,978. I cannot confirm allocation increase for this year, but I am considering it as a device to try to take some of the heat out of the tight rental market.

PRIVILEGE

MISS MACDONALD—MOSCOW OLYMPICS—REQUEST LETTER BE TABLED—RULING BY MADAM SPEAKER

Madam Speaker: Order. Yesterday the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands (Miss MacDonald) rose on a question of privilege to ask that the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) table a copy of a letter sent by him to President Carter to which he referred during the question period on Tuesday, April 15, 1980. While the Prime Minister is at liberty to table this letter if he chooses to do so, I must point out to the House that there is no obligation upon him to table the letter, which he did not actually quote but to which he merely referred.

I may refer to certain rulings on similar questions, one of November 16, 1971, at page 9599 of Hansard by Mr. Speaker Lamoureux, where he says:

In fairness, looking at the matter as objectively as I can, I do not see how it is possible for the Chair to make a ruling at this point that a document that has simply been referred to but has not been directly quoted should be tabled in debate. I find it difficult to rule otherwise. Hon. members may look at the citations that have been quoted in a very interesting and forceful way by the hon. members for Yukon and Peace River. They are clear to me. If a document has been actually cited or quoted in debate by a minister of the Crown, it has to be tabled. If only reference is made to it, I do not see how there can be an obligation to table it.

Therefore, I feel that the question of privilege should not be pursued at this time.

MR. FORRESTALL—ENERGY—ALLEGED INADEQUATE RESPONSES OF MINISTER

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Madam Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege arising out of wholly inadequate responses by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde) to concerns in Atlantic Canada in respect of refining capabilities and the negotiations going on with Mexico regarding an energy agreement with that country.

My question of privilege arises from two points. First of all, I accept completely the right of treasury bench members not to answer questions if they choose not to, and I am not questioning that right; but my question of privilege has to do with the right of members in this chamber to be heard, not to be treated in the derogatory manner in which the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources has treated this House and the people of Atlantic Canada.

I do not ask that you make a ruling, Madam Speaker, but I would ask you to advise the Table that at the earliest opportunity I would like to take him to task for his arrogance toward eastern Canada and this chamber with regard to that negotiation at the appropriate time at ten o'clock.

Madam Speaker: We have taken notice of this grievance and the hon. member realizes that it is not a question of privilege.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

WEEKLY STATEMENT

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Madam Speaker, it being Thursday I would like to put the usual House business question to the government House leader. As part of House business, in view of your ruling on the point of order involving the correspondence between the Prime Minister and President Carter, and the reply of the Prime Minister, is it the intention of the Prime Minister to table the correspondence that was referred to in the ruling? I realize he is not required to, but from the point of view of clarity I wonder if he will table that correspondence?

Mr. Trudeau: No, Madam Speaker. I would be very happy in a question period to attempt again to clarify the substance of the Canadian government's policy, but I would not intend to table letters which are exchanged between heads of government.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): I thank you very much. I do not want to interfere, but I wonder if the government House leader is prepared to tell us today the business of the House. I have particular reference to the continuance of the throne speech debate, at least at the outset. Perhaps he could answer that question first.

Mr. Pinard: Yes, Madam Speaker. As the hon. member knows full well, we will have to deal urgently with legislative measures, some of which must be adopted before May 15. My learned colleague knows very well that supply proceedings do not apply since the estimates for this year could not be tabled in time. We have therefore been negotiating on that matter and I am confident that we will agree on a special order of business that will enable us to deal with supply in due course and grant the government interim supply for May 15.

Moreover, some technically urgent bills must be passed by May 15 and that is why we are looking at the possibility of cutting short the throne speech debate by the last two days, after the vote on Tuesday night. That is not final, but I shall inform the hon. member and also my colleague of the New Democratic Party in due time when we reach a decision. Again I give them notice that it is possible that the debate on the address in reply will be suspended so as to give the opposition parties enough time to examine and if need be challenge those measures, some of which must be passed before May 15 and others before June 30.

That is our frame of mind regarding the business for the next few days. I shall let the opposition House leaders know our final decision as soon as possible.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Madam Speaker, there is one further aspect. There is a bill on the order paper standing in the name of the Minister of National Health and Welfare to amend the Old Age Security Act. Will that bill be called for first reading today and is it a priority bill for the government?

The second matter that I wanted to speak to today is with respect to the bill on veterans' benefits. I know that a bill is ready. Is the intention of the government to give notice of that bill and to call it quickly?

Mr. Pinard: Madam Speaker, I will have to look into the hon. member's last question. With regard to the GIS bill, it will be introduced very soon but not today, and it is a matter of priority for this government.

PRIVILEGE

MR. HNATYSHYN—ENERGY—STATEMENT ON SELF-SUFFICIENCY BY 1990

Hon. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon West): Madam Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege on a matter which arose during the course of the question period in answers given by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde). By way of background, I want to point out that the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources during the course of the election campaigning for this Parliament made statements to the effect that I, in the course of committee proceedings, had indicated that we would not attain energy self-sufficiency by 1990 and that we would be some 250,000 barrels short.

That particular proposition, as the minister knows full well, is incorrect and false. In the course of the discussions in that committee report it is clear that I indicated that, on the basis of existing policies, without natural gas substitution and conservation methods we would in fact be short by that number of barrels according to the best estimates of the department.

The minister has brought forward this particular proposition and statement and repeated it again and in my estimation he is misleading the House. This matter was independently reviewed by the press which, after reviewing the record, repudiated the position taken by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. If the minister persists in repeating these untruths, he will gain the reputation of being the Pinocchio of Canadian politics.

Mr. Nielsen: He almost is now.

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, the hon. member has made his case. I will be very happy to table in the House the transcript of the committee session where the statement made by the hon. member is recorded. The statement speaks for itself and I will not engage in a debate on its interpretation.

I would also like to say to my hon. colleague and friend from Dartmouth that he and I are far from being arrogant and are well known for our respective humility as well as our great interest and concern for eastern Canada. I hope that I will have his support in any measures which I bring forward to help the development and growth of eastern Canada, as we are all trying to do.

[Translation]

Madam Speaker: Order, please. It is obvious that the point raised by the hon. member for Saskatoon West (Mr. Hnatyshyn) was a good subject for a debate. It was a matter of opinion, so I do not think I can consider it as a question of privilege.

MR. KNOWLES—OFFICIAL REPORT—ARTICLE IN THE OTTAWA JOURNAL

Hon. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Madam Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege in accordance with a notice which I sent to Your Honour this morning under the provisions of Standing Order 17(2). My question of privilege relates to an article in today's issue of The Ottawa Journal which, in my view, in an unwarranted attack on the editor and staff of the Hansard of the House of Commons.

There seems to be an attempt in this article to indulge in a certain amount of humour, but it starts off by saying:

Hansard lies.

Half way through the article it describes something that appeared in Hansard and then says:

Pack of lies.

Then toward the end the article contends that Hansard is:

—fooling with the facts—

It ends by saying that an effort should be made to:

—make it more accurate—

I am not rising to defend members in former Parliaments—it has not happened in this one—who may have tried to get changes in Hansard beyond genuine corrections. That is not the point. I am rising to defend the dedication and the hard work of our Hansard staff.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles: We all know that they work under trying circumstances, especially during question period when there is a great deal of calling back and forth. It must be awfully hard for the reporters to get as much as they do. We know that they make a serious effort to turn out each day a Hansard that is an accurate report of what went on in this House of Commons.

I feel it is most unfair that these people, who work so hard for us and have no chance to defend themselves, are attacked in this way. I rise on behalf of all hon. members to defend the editor and staff of Hansard. Perhaps Your Honour might consider inviting the writer of this article to call upon the editor of Hansard who, I am sure, would be glad to show that writer the whole process.

Madam Speaker: I am sure that the remarks of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) will be a comfort to the staff of Hansard who work under considerable pressure to give us these reports on time. I will pursue the suggestion of the hon. member.

AUTOMOTIVE INDUSTRY

TABLING OF AGREEMENT WITH FORD MOTOR COMPANY

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Madam Speaker, I wish to table under the appropriate standing order copies in both official languages of the agreement between the federal government and the Ford Motor Company dated October 23, 1978, relating to the Ford Essex engine plant. I also have copies for the opposition spokesmen.

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The House resumed from Wednesday, April 16, consideration of the motion of Mrs. Côté for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the amendment thereto (Mr. Clark).

Hon. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria): Madam Speaker, may I congratulate you upon your elevation to the high post you hold. I am certain you will grace the position and we look forward to a long tenure under your charge.

When the bell started ringing last night I was speaking on the Speech from the Throne and I had mentioned the new fighter aircraft contract which was signed yesterday. I have not quite finished my remarks about it so I will finish them before I get into the main part of my speech.

I would caution the Minister of Supply and Services (Mr. Blais) and the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Lamontagne), who provided the money to pay for this contract, to watch that contract very carefully. We are living in very fluid times, particularly with regard to finances. I am curious about many matters regarding that contract but unfortunately, as I mentioned last night, the minister did not see fit to table the contract and make a statement on motions at the same time. When a statement is made on motions in the House, it gives opposition spokesmen and members on all sides the opportunity to grill the minister and ask a long series of questions. There must be 30 or 40 questions that members of this House would like to put to the Minister of National Defence or the Minister of Supply and Services concerning that contract and the choice that was made. It takes weeks of questions to try and work through such a series of questions if we have to rely upon question period only. I hope this is not an indication that this government is going to return to their old style of not tabling documents and not making statements on motions procedures which help very much to clarify the business of the House and in fact to speed it up.

I would like to say a final word about the allocations to regions, which I mentioned last night. I would be very surprised if the NFA contract, when tabled, indicates that there is an allocation to regions of the work involved. I would be very surprised indeed. I cannot see how the government can dictate to the prime supplier that he must put so much work into any province or any region. This would give the supplier a wonderful opportunity to have cost overruns and then blame the government who directed that the work be put into certain regions. I expect that this will be done in the normal fashion by tender and by contract from the prime supplier to the subsuppliers.

That is all I should like to say about the new fighter aircraft at the present time, partly because there are so many questions that the Address in Reply to the Speech from the Throne is hardly the place to try and get answers to such a multitude of questions.

I should like to refer for a moment to a remark made yesterday by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) in the House which startled me, to say the least. He was asked by the hon. member for Dartmouth-Halifax East (Mr. Forrestall) if the government was considering a review by the Department of National Defence and the Department of External Affairs. The startling answer given by the Prime Minister is recorded in Hansard at page 67 as follows:

> Such reviews were undertaken, as the hon. member will recall, in the late 1960s. They were subject to some criticism by the public and, indeed, by the opposition at that time, on the grounds that rather than acting, we were studying. It is our intention in this case to act, because our studies have already been completed.

If the Prime Minister really believes that a study made in the late 1960s is appropriate for action in the 1980s, I wonder where he has been for the last ten years. I suppose he has been in the Langevin Building, surrounded by his sycophants over there, and is totally divorced from what is going on in the world. The Department of External Affairs and the Department of National Defence cannot stay in limbo or maintain the status quo for 12 years!

I asked one of my staff members to let me know a few of the things that have happened since the Prime Minister had the last study on this matter, Mr. Speaker. I might point out also that just a year ago the Hon. Barney Danson said he could well see the need for a white paper on defence and that he intended to move forward with it as soon as possible. Of course, it is an embarrassment for the government to have a majority; they do not care whether they study things or not and will just go their own way.

To return to those ten or 12 missing years in the Prime Minister's life when he was divorced from reality, I would point out a few events that occurred in that time. In 1968 the Soviet Union suppressed Czechoslovakia's spring uprising and invaded that country with massive forces, deposing Mr. Dubcek's regime.

In 1970 the OPEC cartel for the first time forced foreign oil companies to concede increases in the posted price for oil. This was a change from the 50-50 policy that had held before that.

In that year the Hon. Mitchell Sharp presented a white paper on foreign policy to the House of Commons. That was the last one. As well, Willi Brandt commenced the "Ostpolitik" with the aim of recognizing East Germany.

It was in 1971 that the U.S.S.R. surpassed the United States in the number of land based missiles. In the same year Mr. Trudeau visited the U.S.S.R. and signed an agreement for consultation on foreign affairs similar to Soviet arrangements with France. I have not particularly heard about the consultations that have been going on but since they signed an agreement I assume such consultations have been going on. In that year the Indo-Pakistan war broke out after India invaded East Pakistan, which later became Bangladesh.

In 1972 President Nixon visited both Peking and Moscow, ending 23 years without U.S. diplomatic recognition of China. In that year the SALT I agreement was signed, as was the anti-ballistic missile treaty.

These are things that the Prime Minister thinks are not important enough to recognize or to cause us to look at what is going on in the world.

In 1973 the European Common Market expanded from six members to nine with the inclusion of Ireland, the United Kingdom and Denmark. In October the Arab-Israeli war broke out, followed by the imposition of the oil weapon by the Arab nations at that time. Also, NORAD was renewed between Canada and the United States.

It was in May, 1974, that India exploded their first nuclear device, using the technology obtained from a Canadian reactor. In July, Turkish forces invaded Cyprus causing Canada to send troops to that country. They are still there, 15 years later. In August President Nixon resigned as a result of Watergate. All this has escaped the attention of the Prime Minister.

In 1975, with the fall of Saigon and the collapse of the South Vietnamese government, the war in Vietnam ended. Surely this must make some difference to our thoughts on external affairs and to our thoughts on national defence. Certainly the Israel-Egypt war had a startling effect on the views of the Department of National Defence.

In 1975 came the war in Angola where the Soviets with Cuban help were victorious. The Soviets started building a missile base and handling facilities at Berbera in Somalia.

In 1976 the Soviets deployed the T-72 tank in Europe and completed their first aircraft carrier, the Kiev.

In 1977 the war between Vietnam and the Cambodian communist regimes erupted. Soviet intervention in the Horn of Africa intensified. They first backed Somalia and then switched to backing Ethiopia. The Cubans, as in Angola, did most of the fighting while the Soviets provided equipment and money.

In 1978 NATO agreed to increase defence expenditures in real terms by 3 per cent per annum for five years. The Iranian revolution began. In that year the U.S.S.R. deployed the SS-20 medium range missile in Europe. This, for the first time, gave them the advantage in western Europe. Their missiles could hide behind the Ural Mountains in Russia and hit any target in western Europe. These were missiles that were transportable on their own, they were not from fixed installations. As opposed to that, the NATO nations' missiles could not even hit Russia from West Germany; they could only extend as far as covering satellite nations, such as East Germany.

In 1979 the Sino-Vietnamese border war started as well as the invasion of Afghanistan by the U.S.S.R. occurred. During all of this period our comatose Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) thought nothing was happening; there was no need to look at our defence again and no need to look at external affairs. One wonders what on earth we are going to do. In which direction are we going?

In national defence the budget is now at the $5 billion mark and I think the people of Canada who pay this $5 billion a year have a right to know where Canada is at the present time in the way of defence and where the government is planning to go. If the minister has no ideas on the matter—and there is much evidence that he has none—then I think that he should call for a white paper to clarify his own thoughts, if nothing else. But it would presumably give us a chance to see what is going to happen in the future and what the taxpayer is going to get for his $5 billion.

As far as I can tell, the present government has apparently decided to continue the policies which were enunciated by the Prime Minister in 1968. The Conservatives had planned to issue a white paper on defence in September this year. Given that we are to have no new policy guidance in foreign and defence affairs, we are faced with continued reliance on these tired old ideas of the Prime Minister and his exclusive clique of political senior public servants. It puzzles me that a reshuffling of old ideas would in any way serve the interests of the Canadian people, any more than the reshuffling in the corridors of power would produce anything but the same old mess, which was their sum total of achievement by May, 1979, after some 11 years of accumulated bureaucratic rule.

I would like to speak for a few minutes about this bureaucratic rule. Despite the Canadian tradition of parliamentary government that elected ministers should both make policy and jointly be held responsible for it to the Parliament of Canada, the present Prime Minister had by 1979 perfected a system in which the actual power to make policy was vested in his bureaucrats, and the departmental ministers answered for these policies to the House. They were given enough information that they could answer, or so that they could confuse their answers in the House, and it would appear that is the sum total of their duties.

This demonstration of what amounted to a sweeping contempt for the democratic process permitted the Prime Minister and his inner coterie of senior public servants, led by Mr. Pitfield, of course, to establish in effect a perversion of the cabinet system, especially noticeable in the field of foreign and defence policy. In fact, instead of a cabinet system there was a Privy Council office system and ministers were apparently invited to append their signatures to documents which they had perhaps only a few minutes to read before they were submitted for formal consideration and ratification by cabinet.

Perhaps no other evidence of this Prime Minister's efforts to usurp the role of departmental ministers is needed than this so-called cabinet system of bureaucratic committees and endless paper flow which he had developed by 1979, in which a departmental minister's role was largely reduced to that of a glorified correspondence secretary.

The new Minister of National Defence (Mr. Lamontagne)—I am sorry that he is not in the House but I feel certain that his duties elsewhere require him to be absent—has already begun to make statements and behave in a manner that should disturb all those who believe that the Department of National Defence deserves a minister who makes policy and takes decisions for himself, not simply acting as the mouthpiece for whomever the Prime Minister has entrusted in his inner circle with the role of making defence policy.

For example, in a recent interview the Minister of National Defence was reported to see no need for a new white paper on defence and stated that such studies were "complicated" and, yes, "boring". Furthermore, the minister was reported to believe that there was no need for a new white paper because he had been presented with so many excellent briefing papers by his officials. Let me say that if these papers of his are so good, the minister should offer to share them with other interested people, namely the taxpayers of this country and their elected representatives in Parliament.

As a member of the previous government I had pledged that we would write a new defence white paper by this fall, and I would challenge the present minister to name the date when he will reveal his government's policy concerning defence—if, of course, they have one.

Given the attitude of the minister toward a new white paper, which amounts really to an abdication of his responsibilities as the effective head of his department, it seems we are likely to be treated to a rerun of the last days of the previous Trudeau administration. I might point out that in the National Defence Act, I believe section 2 says that the Minister of National Defence is responsible for the Department of National Defence for its control and of the armed forces.

Some journalists have already detected a shift of the real power from the Department of External Affairs to the Prime Minister's office. Press releases are emanating from the PMO on foreign policy matters, and when journalists call the Department of External Affairs for details, the spokesmen for the department do not know anything about such policy decisions and have to phone the Prime Minister's office to learn what foreign policy is that day.

We are not so much assessing what the new Ministers of National Defence and External Affairs are now doing or are capable of doing in the future, but how the Prime Minister and his selected acolytes will handle defence and foreign policy.

For a good evaluation of the Prime Minister's early views one can turn to a recent book by journalist Peter Stursberg called "Lester Pearson and the American Dilemma". In this book some of the present Prime Minister's errors of omission and commission are recalled and the full betrayal of the Pearsonian legacy in foreign and defence policy is documented. In interviews with former Liberal ministers such as the Hon. Mitchell Sharp, the Hon. Paul Hellyer and the Hon. Leo Cadieux, it clearly points out the attitude the Prime Minister has toward cabinet government. When he first became Prime Minister he moved to initiate his review—the one that he thinks is still current—on both foreign and defence policy. He began his technique of using the Privy Council office and his own close advisers in the PMO to make policy rather than leaving this to the cabinet and the responsible departmental ministers.

The Hon. Paul Hellyer recalls the technique as quoted in Mr. Stursberg's book as follows:

> In the early stages of the cabinet debates certainly the preponderant point of view was the status quo: Why change, we've got our troops there, they're doing a good job—

This is when he was speaking of the likelihood of cutting down on NATO. He went on:

> Little by little, however, opinion changed, or at least it appeared to change, as the Prime Minister's views became privately known to more and more ministers—
> —But in the event, as the days went by, you could see more and more of the leaners in cabinet lining up on the side of change and this was, in my opinion, the whole purpose of the exercise.
> —It was rather interesting that the departmental view was just once again tossed aside, and it was after that, or at least, in so far as discussion was concerned, it was after that, the Ivan Head version, probably prepared in co-operation with the Prime Minister, was brought into the discussion. Ivan Head was Trudeau's adviser on foreign affairs. It's an interesting technique.
> Normally, the person who writes a cabinet document has a 90 per cent edge over anyone else, and the way that they got around it on two or three occasions—and it was an entirely new technique of the Trudeau government—was just to have someone else write a paper; then they would switch gently from one paper to the other.
> The one from the department was in effect rejected and the one written to be more coincident with the Prime Minister's views was the one that was ultimately incorporated into the policy decision.

Not only did the Prime Minister choose to attack Mr. Pearson's foreign and defence policy on the grounds that it was dominated by the military, but Mr. Stursberg shows that his real aim was not just to bring all Canadians forces back to Canada from Europe, but in effect to withdraw from the NATO alliance into a form of neutralism. That he did not succeed was largely due to the strong opposition of the Hon. Leo Cadieux, and no doubt to the many true Liberals, who like Lester Pearson himself, were outraged by this pseudo-NDP policy which took so little account of the real world in which Canada has to live.

If Canada reviews its policy for the 1980s, all members of this House should avail themselves of an opportunity to read some of Mr. Stursberg's work, taken from live tapes and interviews, in order to remind themselves of the true feelings of this Prime Minister.

Since one of the main objectives of a foreign and defence policy review is to identify new factors which will influence, or are already influencing, the kind of world we live in, and then go on to indicate the broad policy directions we should follow, there would seem to be many changes needed in the eighties. However, for the purposes of this debate, and as defence critic of my party, I will turn to two areas in particular. They are the problems of international security and of oil. In some ways these two subjects are becoming closely linked, since the availability and security of oil supplies is by no means certain, and the future supply of oil has become in a strategic military sense both more significant and more precarious since 1970.

However, I do not mean to imply that the solution to the future security of oil supplies is, or should be, seen mainly in military terms. On the contrary, the best solution for the western world from Canada's point of view would surely be one in which the oil producing states were both strong and independent, but friendly towards the west. But political factors integral to both the nationalist feelings of the peoples of the Middle East, as well as the revolutionary currents sweeping through the Moslem world, have, as we all know, changed the situation dramatically in Iran. In the Iranian revolution, the confusion and violence led to, amongst other things, a cessation of oil supplies which not only increased oil prices but, if it had continued, would have threatened the basis of the economies of many western states.

To put it bluntly, if the internal Iranian situation were to get worse again, or if another Islamic state that was a major oil producer were to experience a similar revolutionary disturbance, many countries in the world, both industrialized and non-industrialized, would suffer serious consequences simply because of the cutoff, or cutback, in total supplies.

It is here that the indivisibility of political, economic and strategic factors in an alliance relationship becomes evident, and the need for a fundamental reassessment by both Canada and her allies is apparent. To put it bluntly, NATO is now, and will be for the forseeable future, dependent on oil supplies from the Middle East for a major part of its energy needs. If this is one of the major constraints on ourselves and our allies, then it should be addressed as a common problem, and whatever political, economic or other solutions we can agree on should be jointly arrived at and acted upon collectively.

There is the recent action of the Soviet Union in invading Afghanistan, which has confirmed beyond a reasonable doubt a major change in Russian policy, many signs of which have been visible for some time, and of which Afghanistan represents both the confirmation of a trend and the latest evidence that we must consider that the old relationship of detente is now dead.

The significance of this should not be underestimated. Most of the policy assumptions of Canada and our allies with regard to the Soviet bloc were based on the idea that, after the end of the cold war, we had developed a more constructive relationship which we learned to call "detente". Even though the two superpowers were adversaries, it was understood that not only should there be agreements to limit the increase in the numbers and types of strategic nuclear weapons, but there would also be no overt aggression; that is, no direct use of force to invade small and neutral neighbouring states like Afghanistan.

However, with the direct invasion of Afghanistan while offering only the flimsiest pretext, the Russians have gone one distinct step further. For the first time since 1945, the Red army has crossed an international frontier between a communist and a non-communist state. The difference here between their invasions and suppression of the revolutions in both Hungary in 1956 and in Czechoslovakia in 1968 is an important one. In both the last two cases the Soviets could argue that they were acting under some type of real treaty obligation and also that they were acting to preserve the status quo.

Therefore, Afghanistan should lead us all, both in Canada and in the alliance, to reassess our policies for the future. Afghanistan should be assessed by the west, and NATO in particular, as an example of how their vital interests can be threatened indirectly without apparently any collective response being possible. That is because of the location of Afghanistan. I put heavy strees on the word "collective" because given that NATO is a defensive alliance made up of a large number of independent states, unless much thought and effort is devoted to arriving at a collective policy, nothing much can be done unless there is a precedent. The geographic zone which the NATO states have defined as the NATO area excludes a large part of the sea routes which bring oil from the Persian Gulf to Europe.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. gentleman, but his allotted time has expired.

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, please allow me to first pay tribute and express my friendship and solidarity to the "Yvettes" of Canada. Since you are in the chair at the moment, I will ask you to transmit that to Madam Speaker, and, through the "Yvettes", wish her the best of luck in her new functions.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Miss Bégin: Mr. Speaker, I want to say a word that may surprise you, being of the other sex. I want to say a word about the "Yvettes" in this chamber, and the two "Yvette" happenings. Because, whatever the analysis made now by the media and everyone, the plain truth about these two meetings is that ordinary women, people of every day, the so-called silent majority, got fed up with being humiliated and decided to speak up. It is to those ordinary people, the vast majority of Canadians, that I would like to speak today.

Their massive presence in favour of Quebec remaining in Canada has changed the rapport de forces in the province of Quebec. Women will have played a key role in the vote on the future of our country. In Quebec City, on March 30, there were 1,700 women from the area who shared a brunch to celebrate their No to separation. Sitting next to me was a woman baker in the family business in Lower Town, and next to her was a young student in accounting at Laval University who had just won the Athlete of the Year medal.

At the Montreal Forum where 15,000 women met on April 7, I recognized a woman of 68 years of age who came with friends in a school bus from a community 55 miles from Montreal. I know of a woman doctor, a cafeteria employee and so-called housewives who were in the audience. None of these women belong to the Liberal party. I think it is important to say that they were ordinary Quebec people who knew what they wanted but do not necessarily work through a political party. They suddenly had a way to express their No to separation with pride and enthusiasm.

What they achieved is of great importance. For instance, they untangled a very dirty trick of the Péquiste government by breaking the isolation in which they had confined the ethnic votes and the votes of Anglo-Quebeckers.

[Translation]

In speaking out in favour of a No vote, without self-consciousness, without hesitation, the "Yvettes" have already played a significant role in the referendum debate. For instance, do they realize they have burst open the psychological ghetto in which our ethnic and Anglophone groups were trapped when the PQ government attempted to make them feel guilty about the future No to the referendum? Now, the Quebec-Italians, the Anglophones of Montreal, the Canadian-Haitians know that they do not have to say yes to prove their fellowship with French Canadians because thousands of women whose roots have long since been in Quebec have opposed separation; now, those groups know they do not stand alone, that they can vote No without being bad Quebeckers, false Quebeckers, bad pennies, and express their views about the future of our country. In other words, the "Yvettes" should know, must know, that what they gave back to thousands of ordinary people, of every day people, is their pride, and their loyalty, the right to be true to themselves. Today, on the occasion of the throne speech debate which follows the election of February 18 last, I should like to tell other ordinary Canadians that the government of this country has served them well and will continue to do so.

Today, I should like to find the word to convince those Quebeckers who hesitate, and are unsure about the answer to be given in the referendum, those who have been manipulated, who are sensitive to the PQ propaganda for separation that, overlooking the power struggle of their politicians, the truth, pure and simple, is that federalism has served them well. I would even go farther: nothing can better serve the interests of the humble people, the mass of ordinary Canadians, than Canadian federalism. I want to say this to Quebeckers: do not slip into facility by voting Yes to the question. Keeping federalism, renewing it, improving it, is far more difficult than separating, but it is far more advantageous, and well worth the trouble.

Why do I say that federalism is the best political system we can have, and that federalism has best served—and will continue to do so—the interest of average Canadians, especially those faced with sickness, unemployment or poverty? How can I say this when Canadians so often have difficulty finding their way through the different levels of government which they find, really, a puzzle?

A few years ago Gordon Fairweather, then one of our colleagues in the House and now chairman of the Canadian Human Rights Commission, told the following story about the complexities of our work as federal politicians. One Friday evening when he arrived home in New Brunswick around 10 p.m. a constituent phoned to say: "There is a bear in our backyard. What can you do about it?" Telling this story, Mr. Fairweather turned to his audience and asked, facetiously: "Now, is a bear municipal, provincial or federal?" What does one do when there is a bear in a backyard, and in a city, on top of it all? I am sure Mr. Fairweather managed to find a solution which was good for the man and for the bear because he is aware of the complexities of different levels of government in a country like ours.

We are all at the service of the people and we must bridge these gaps and find our way through the puzzle. It is because our system is complex and power is shared between provincial, municipal and federal governments that we have the best in protection of freedoms and rights and the best in redistribution of income.

This is the subject I would like to speak on today, Mr. Speaker. Canadians have now been living under a federal system for 113 years. Historically, our federation is the third oldest in the world, coming after the American federation, established in 1787, and the Swiss federation established in 1848. Half of the global population now lives under a federal system. This proves that the viability of the system, its success as a type of political organization that allows for diversity and unity, that is unity in diversity, has long since been demonstrated.

After the United States, Switzerland, Canada and Australia, the Federal Republic of Germany more recently divided its powers between two levels of government. These federations met with such success that other nations chose to take on at least the appearances. Unfortunately, they have not always applied the major principle of federalism. And countries that may not necessarily appear to us to be worthy from the standpoint of human rights, welfare and freedom of the people happen to be federations and the party now in power in Quebec tell the people: Look at such and such a country, naming a few, we must always see whether such nations are truly applying federalism. Federalism means that there are at least two levels of government, each with specific and strong powers, that check each other, in order that neither can exert expansionism at the expense of the other. That in a federation is the key to the equilibrium and the welfare of all its citizens. It is in the concept of a balanced division of powers between two levels of government that the strength of a federation lies. Nations where that principle has been applied are successes, and as I say countries such as the United States and Switzerland, Canada and Australia serve as models known to everybody.

However, Canadians over the years accumulated grievances against the government, the bureaucracy, the politicians and the system. I am sure that the large majority of Canadians who speak that way have constructive purposes. And of course this is part of the democratic process, because improving the system is an unending task.

But when each and every imperfection can be debated publicly, the pictures and words conveyed finally give people who are not very politicized the impression they live in an undescribable chaos while all the other countries of the world envy them their standard of living and their democratic rights. So I say to myself that we must help Canadians make over-all comparisons and not be blinded by the dramatization of some minor issues. True, there are and always will there be things to improve in our country, but I also know that we are much better off than others and that it is the extraordinary freedom we have that allows and furthers the work of reformists who want to change things for a better world.

So I feel like saying to all Canadians and to Quebeckers, of course, let us keep on enjoying the exceptional freedom we now have. Let us keep criticizing severely all our governments, but let us not be foolish enough to destroy the very system which enables us to be more critical, more demanding of our governments.

There are numerous benefits specifically related to federalism, to the fact that Canada is a federation. I could talk about them for hours. However, what I would like to do today, as it is of more particular concern to me as Minister of National Health and Welfare, is talk about social programs and explain to Quebeckers, as well as to Canadians in other provinces who might be tempted to forget it, just what redistribution of income is.

It is one o'clock. Therefore, I will continue this afternoon.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): It being one o'clock, I do now leave the chair until two o'clock this afternoon.

At 1.01 the House took recess.

The House resumed at 2 p.m.

Miss Bégin: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I was saying this morning in the first part of my speech how Canadian federalism is precisely the form of political organization that allows the redistribution of wealth, which is what has served Quebeckers best and will continue to serve the ordinary Canadian, the everyday Canadian, best.

Of course, it is not my responsibility to decide what should come under federal or provincial jurisdiction in the area of health and welfare. For that matter, this is of little significance, because I want to deal with redistribution, and in any case, it is quite obvious that some services are better provided by the provinces which are on the spot and can take into account regional disparities and group particularities. On the other hand, it seems to me that we should not over-decentralize because beyond a certain point, decentralization becomes harmful to the very people it should be helping. So the federal system has served our people well not only because of the real savings it brings with it, but because of the significant distribution of wealth it allows.

Right now, in the province of Quebec, as my colleagues can verify, we are constantly being told by those who believe that the separation of Quebec is a good thing, "because we will no longer have to pay taxes to Ottawa and everything will go to Quebec, we will be able to do this or that and to have such and such a program." Having been Minister of National Revenue before becoming Minister of National Health and Welfare, I can tell you for a fact that the federal government taxes all Canadians evenly wherever they live in any one of the ten provinces, and I mean that all Canadians pay federal taxes and provincial taxes. The only difference is that the residents of the nine other provinces, except Quebec, pay their taxes by filing a single return which saves on administration costs, the federal government send back to each of the provinces its own share. Therefore, all Canadians are interdependent through the taxes they pay to the federal government according to their personal incomes.

If a province has fewer rich people, taxpayers with high incomes, it pays a little less than its share of federal taxes, which is in itself a form of help to the underprivileged. Now, for example, and I quote this figure because those given by the PQ government in Quebec are not realistic at all, Quebec pays at most 22 per cent of the federal taxes, even if its population represents 27 per cent of the population of Canada.

According to this reasoning, therefore, the situation is as follows: Quebeckers paid on the whole $13 billion in both federal and provincial taxes for 1978. Now the amount is shared between Quebec and Ottawa, but if all the taxes paid by Quebeckers go to Quebec, there will be at most $13 billion left, neither more nor less. Thus the question is whether existing programs can be maintained if Quebec separates. In fact the question is whether the people will still get the same old age security pension, the same supplement, the same family allowance, the same child tax credit? Will doctor appointments, operations, hospitalization, drugs, ambulance service for senior citizens still be free? These are the questions that people are asking about the referendum, and this is where I believe that the PQ government has made the most effort to buy the vote of the silent majority. Whoever tries to reply to these questions or even discuss them is accused of economic terrorism. However, we must not be afraid of facing economic realities. Then, Quebeckers will decide in full possession of the facts.

The social programs offered to the population are so numerous that I shall attempt to explain the general rule applied before going on to particulars. Generally speaking, I believe it is fair to say that if the money paid to Ottawa by Quebeckers for universal programs were paid directly to Quebec, the people would probably go on benefiting from the same programs, for instance family allowances and old age security. However, the so-called selective programs, that is those aimed only at those groups who need them, such as the child tax credit, the pension supplement, certain health programs, medication, free ambulance services, and so on, could certainly not be paid in a separated Quebec without substantial tax increases or cutbacks in the programs of other departments. Why is this? Because these programs are aimed at redistribution and federal redistribution is not only from rich families to lower income families, but also from rich regions to underprivileged areas. This means that a Quebecker who receives a pension supplement or child tax credit cheque receives money from other areas in Canada and not money that he has paid in income tax.

Let us take the case of health care, to begin with. First of all, I hope that people are aware that when it comes to health expenditures, all fees paid to doctors and specialists in Quebec as well as the wages of nurses and health care workers are provided by the federal government. Unfortunately, the Canadian provinces—and it must be said that at the present time Quebec has a better record than the others in this regard—are now trying to save money at the expense of ordinary citizens by not allocating their share to health services. Indeed, we have been forced to set up an inquiry commission which is to report by June 30. But according to our analysis of public accounts, we pay 55 per cent of the Quebec health budget and the province pays 45 per cent. Ideally, it should be 50-50. It is a fact, and I challenge Mr. Lazure to deny it, that we paid $1.5 billion for health services in Quebec in 1978-79.

This represents 27.2 per cent of the total amount paid to the provinces for health services. It means that this is equal to the percentage of the Quebec population compared to the rest of Canada. Of course, Quebeckers have contributed part of that amount through taxes, but as they pay no more than 22 per cent of federal taxes, they get about $250 million more for health services than they pay in taxes to Ottawa. As concerns the drug insurance about which Mr. Lazure pats himself on the back, I wish to remind him that two-thirds of the recipients already got it under the Bourassa government. In fact, he just increased the number of recipients by a third with federal money.

On the other hand, the free ambulance service is a completely different matter. It will be impossible to maintain that service if Quebec were to separate, for a very simple reason. The financing does not belong and never belonged to the Quebec government, and I want to tell this to the people who are listening to us. I want to say that this ambulance service set up about a year ago at a cost of $1.5 million is financed with the $2.7 million the PQ government took from institutionalized senior citizens. As you will remember, we raised the pension supplement by $20 a month for every single person or couple in January 1979. Mr. Lazure took $15 out of those $20, which belonged to the people and not to the Quebec government, and used that money to fund the ambulance service. I challenge him to tell the pensioners that he did not take 75 cent of our increase in the supplement. That is why I ask: where is the good government?

As far as social and welfare services are concerned, the situation is about the same as for medicare. The federal government reimburses the provinces 50 cents on each dollar they spend. That in effect means, and I do not think that people are aware of this, that each salary paid in the community health centres, each community project, the Drummondville Handicapped Bureau, the public day-care, the new home care service for the aged, and countless other services, are funded on a 50-50 basis by the federal government. The same is true where the 120,000 employees of the social affairs system are concerned.

Under that program, Quebec received 35 per cent of the funds allocated to public welfare schemes in Canada, that is $664 million for 1978-79. While receiving 35 per cent, as I mentioned earlier, Quebeckers making up 27 per cent of the population and paying only 22 per cent of federal taxes, earned a net amount of at least $220 million. Can the Péquiste minister, Mr. Lazure, deny that? This is a question that I am putting to the people.

Let us deal now with the cheques which are not given to the government but directly to people. And I quote an article by Claude V. Marsolais in the newspaper La Presse who stated on April 11 that Mr. Lazure will have to convince the pensioners to vote for sovereignty-association, that is for separation, and I will quote the text:

> If he has been chosen to convince, it is apparently due partly to his personal popularity with senior citizens especially older women.

I would like to tell him: Be careful Dr. Lazure. There are many "Yvettes" among elderly women. You are not the first fine speaker that they have heard. They have seen many others. Do not forget Dr. Lazure, to tell those people—elderly women—and especially those who are alone, separated, divorced, widowed, deserted or single that you are going to take away the full $35 increase in July, tell them. Tell them that you will do as you did the last time when you robbed them of $2.7 million. Tell them this time if you are going to take away from them $6 to $7 million. I would like him to say that. On Saturday, he will be addressing senior citizens in Verdun probably to convince them to vote for separation. The elderly should ask Mr. Lazure this question and obtain a reply, to find out where the PQ government stands on this issue.

Messrs. Lévesque and Lazure, how dare you claim in your pensioner's booklet which you have published jointly with the Société Saint-Jean Baptiste de Montréal that if the Yes team wins, nothing will change and the pension cheques will continue to arrive the following day. You know perfectly well that after you take action to separate Quebec from the rest of Canada, no matter how many months have passed after the referendum, you will have enough money to pay the pensions, but not enough to pay the supplements. You know that for the year 1978, before the $20 increase to the supplement, and before the new $35 increase granted in July, still based on my tax reckoning, Quebeckers received $120 million more in pensions than they paid out to the Canadian government. Would you dare deny that?

Another cheque which is sent directly by the federal government to the people is for family allowances and child tax credits. First of all, I want to make it clear that 75 per cent of the family allowance cheques to Quebec mothers come from the federal government, which means that the greater part comes from the federal and the smaller part comes from Quebec. Here again Quebec is the net winner in that it gets more family allowances and tax credits than it pays out in taxes, again because of the redistribution of income from the richer to the not so rich provinces.

So in that field we have an additional $80 million for family allowances, an additional $60 million more for the child tax credit scheme that people have received as benefits for children. On that subject, the program of the Parti Québécois is quite clear, there is no mention of that at all and one can surmise that the vote of elderly people, because they have the right to vote, is perhaps more important in their eyes than the fate of children despite the state of poverty and the lack of opportunities prevailing among many families. Children cannot vote. I leave it at that. One thing for sure is that where poverty still exists and is unacceptable mothers will have to do without the child tax credit if the Yes vote wins. So I say: Where is the good government?

If you add up the social programs instituted by the Canadian government you will notice that Quebeckers collect cheques worth $680 million more than they pay in taxes to the Canadian government. That of course comes in addition to the famous equalization scheme which in itself is worth $1.27 billion a year. So I say that our social system is probably the most eloquent evidence of the value of federalism and of what federalism can give to ordinary citizens, because it is in the provinces' best interest to help the economically weaker ones to go through difficult periods. The system works both ways, by the way, since these provinces get stronger and there comes a time when they can pay their full tax share.

Were Quebec to become independent, then it could, of course, collect the taxes, the same amount it now pays to Ottawa. With this they could pay the pensions but not the supplement because they would not have enough money to pay this supplement to the 340,000 pensioners who receive this benefit in Quebec. So what would they do? They would have, beside the $500 million deficit in education, another deficit of $680 million for social programs alone. What are they going to do? Raise taxes? I for one say no because—and I see in front of me the hon. member for Joliette (Mr. LaSalle) who certainly agrees—Quebeckers already have the heaviest tax burden in Canada. Could they raise their budgetary deficit? I do not think so, given the present circumstances.

In closing, Mr. Speaker, I would like to say that it was somehow repugnant to me to report on the social programs organized by the Canadian government in favour of Quebec simply because I feel that people are not for sale; pensions and social allowances are rights that people acquire by contributing to the building of our society. They are rights and not rewards that people will be granted according to their vote. I decided I had to find out what those figures were to show how Premier Lévesque and the PQ government try to psychologically manipulate the elderly.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): I regret to inform the minister that the time allotted to her has expired. Nevertheless she could carry on with unanimous consent of the House.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Miss Bégin: I am very grateful to my colleagues for their good will, Mr. Speaker. All I want to say, and I shall try to be short, is that pensioners—and I take it everybody agrees on this—all need to be protected and reassured as to their economic security. It is crystal clear. But pensioners are tougher than that and fighting with figures on their back is to me the worst favour that the PQ could do them. That's what I think, and what I would like to say today is that people want to know the facts clearly and then be able to judge for themselves. The golden age clubs where I go regularly as the minister responsible for pensioners know very well that we have not dragged the pension question into the referendum debate. The PQ government decided to do so and with such insistence that I had no other choice as the minister responsible for all Canadian pensioners than to set the record right about the social programs offered to the population.

In closing, I wish to say that there are still so many urgent things that should be undertaken to continue to remedy the injustices and give everyone a fair chance. In the next few months we intend to undertake the reform of private pension plans so that every Canadian can enjoy an adequate retirement income. The Canada Pension Plan has to be updated as well to protect the housewife who has no income from private pension plans. The Quebec Pension Plan needs the very same reforms. We have to examine whether the annual guaranteed income is feasible, when and how. So I ask: Whom could we work with in Quebec? We do not believe in a country only for what it can give us, a country means a lot more than that.

Today, I tried to explain that it is not by accident that Canada is a success. It is so because of federalism. It is not by accident that it has so well served the poor and the ordinary people, wherever they live. It is thanks to federalism which allows a fair distribution of riches. It is not by accident. There are many new and relatively young members in the House of Commons who have little experience in public life. But let us just recall a few dates: it was not by accident that the federal government rather than the provincial governments established unemployment insurance back in 1935, family allowances in 1945, universal old age pensions in 1951, the pension supplement in 1967, cost-shared social services and hospital insurance in 1957 and medicare in 1967. It was thanks to federalism.

For those who suffer hardships at some time in their lives, Canadian federalism is a friend, a much needed brother that has a face; it is an Albertan, an Ontarian, a woman in British Columbia. In a word, it is another Canadian.

[English]

Mr. Vic Althouse (Humboldt-Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I want to begin by congratulating our new Speaker on her appointment to that important office in this new Parliament. I wish her well. I would also like to congratulate the hon. member for Rimouski (Mrs. Côté) and the hon. member for Sudbury (Mr. Frith) for their speeches as the mover and seconder of the Address in Reply to the Speech from the Throne.

As this is my first speech in this House I would like to take a moment to thank the voters of my constituency for their confidence in electing me to this Parliament.

My riding is an agricultural riding with farmers producing most products that are produced in Canada. It is a particular honour, as a farmer myself representing such a riding, to have been named the agricultural critic for my party.

In this vein I also wish to congratulate the hon. member for Essex-Windsor (Mr. Whelan) on his reappointment as Minister of Agriculture. I wish him well in his position. I also want to convey this sentiment to the hon. member for Elgin (Mr. Wise), a member of the Conservative party, in his position as chairman of the Standing Committee on Agriculture. I am looking forward to working with both of those gentlemen on the Standing Committee on Agriculture and in the House.

My riding, Humboldt-Lake Centre, is located in the centre of rural Saskatchewan, east of Saskatoon and north of Regina, comprising about 150 or 160 miles of territory in each direction from those cities. The town of Humboldt is the largest centre in the riding with a population of about 4,500 people. Our industries are agriculture, potash mining and farm equipment manufacturing. We have about 12 farm equipment manufacturers manufacturing large cultivators, rod weeders, stone picking equipment and various kinds of grain hauling equipment. We have four potash mines in Guernsey, Colonsay, Allan and Patience Lake. Our production is diversified and efficient to the point of being world competitive by force of our small local domestic market for our goods, and because we have developed a world class technology to compete on a worldwide basis, both with the production of potash and our agriculture products and, I might add, our farm machinery production.

In the farm machinery field I should also point out that the Prairie Agriculture Machinery Institute is located in Humboldt. It is supported by the three Prairie governments, and it is recognized across North America and, indeed, around the world, as a leader in the testing of farm equipment.

As is always the case, the people of our constituency are shaped by our history and our environment. Though our province of Saskatchewan will be 75 years old this year, there have been people there much longer than that, and all of those people have been immigrants. Immigrant peoples who have been there the longest are the Cree, followed by the Saulteaux who moved in from the northeast a few hundred years ago. From the south we have the Sioux who moved in after the days of white man's recorded history. Others who followed were Europeans, Americans and some Asians. They arrived mostly in the last 100 years. They founded a part of Canada that is vast and lonely but with plenty of room for growth, not only economically but for future generations as well.

To many of these newcomers, that vastness meant security. Our climate and geography can be harsh, and the immigrants who pioneered that region quickly found that life was easier for individuals if they combined forces against the elements. The Indians worked and lived in groups to combat those elements. When the white man came he followed a similar pattern. The white man used building bees so that shelters could be constructed quickly. Both groups co-operated in managing food supplies, the Indians by working together on buffalo hunts and the white man by setting up beef rings so that when an animal was killed the meat could be distributed around the community to avoid its spoiling.

As well, the people there worked together to provide necessary community services, roads and trails, schools, and hospitals. Having established a system and tradition of co-operation and working together to survive the natural elements and to develop some semblance of social service, the early settlers of our region very quickly turned their attention to trying to tame the economic system that they lived within. They reasoned that if man can use his skills and talents to survive the natural elements that give us prairie winters and drought, then surely man can use that same intelligence to ameliorate the violence of the market economy.

Whether one views the market as a natural or a man-made phenomenon, one cannot dispute the logic of their approach. Perhaps that explains the history of political and economic activism that generated from our region and why I am honoured to have been chosen by my constituents to carry on this long, honourable and necessary tradition. I hope to be equal to the task.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Althouse: As we begin this Parliament, Mr. Speaker, I think that it is important to spend a moment considering some of the leftovers from previous governments which affect the agricultural industry. The hon. member for Yorkton-Melville (Mr. Nystrom), in his role as agriculture critic in previous parliaments, has raised a number of matters which have yet to be addressed. The Minister of Agriculture recently tabled the report prepared by the National Farm Products Marketing Council concerning the Canadian Egg Marketing Agency. Our party will be asking for an opportunity to examine this report along with the annual report of CEMA in the Standing Committee on Agriculture.

The former minister of agriculture, the hon. member for Elgin, established an interdepartmental committee to examine the effect of hydrogenated trans-fatty acids in margarine upon the health of Canadians. We will be expecting a report from this group to the appropriate committee of this House at the appropriate time in the upcoming session of Parliament.

In 1978 the current and then Minister of Agriculture established an interdepartmental committee to examine allegations concerning the toxicity testing by Industrial Biotest Laboratory of many of the major farm chemicals used in Canada. It is our understanding that an interim report of this committee has been completed, and we will be asking that it be tabled by the minister in the House at the earliest possible opportunity. We continue to view this situation as being of serious importance indeed.

Finally, we have been promised by successive ministers of the environment that a national land use policy will be established across our country. It should set out at the very least a policy for the use, purchase and sale of federal lands. This affects our Indian people, ranchers, farmers, and users of recreational land and it should therefore be dealt with quickly. We will continue to pursue this issue in the House and in the appropriate committee. Our party cannot understand the delays and stalling in producing any sort of document outlining a national land use policy.

After that brief outlining of some leftover issues which remain with us, Mr. Speaker, I would like to look at some of the issues that are of prime importance to agriculture today. The biggest of these concerns is the crisis of high interest rates. High interest rates are sapping the strength of every sector of our economy, but nowhere are they more strongly felt than in the agricultural community.

Next week we will see two mass rallies and demonstrations held in Ottawa demanding emergency action on interest rates for farmers. The National Farmers Union will be on the Hill on Tuesday, and the Ontario Federation of Agriculture will be in the Chateau Laurier on Thursday to show their concerns over this crisis. Why are these farmers coming to Ottawa? They are coming because of the combination of chronically low prices for many commodities, the rising prices for fuel, chemicals, and fertilizers—all of which are oil or natural gas based—machinery and high land costs make the additional burden of increased interest costs intolerable.

The president of the Ontario Federation of Agriculture points out in a recent issue of Farm and Country that interest rates have almost doubled since 1978. Many farmers are paying 19 per cent on their floating loans for operating capital. And what about the federal Farm Credit Corporation, the agency set up to provide long-term debt financing? Interest rates there have gone from 10 per cent in March, 1979, under a Liberal administration to 12 per cent under the Conservative administration, and now it is 13 per cent under the Liberal administration again. The number of loans in 1978-79 actually declined, in over-all amount and in number of loans, over 1977-78.

The Liberal government had been starving the FCC of funds, and while the hon. member for Elgin increased the capital to the FCC by $50 million during his term in office, this still amounts to a drop in the basket. Farm debt is increasing at a rate of about $1.5 billion per year. The amount of farm debt has tripled from 1968 to 1978, going from $4.1 billion to $12.3 billion in those years. Certainly a massive injection of capital is needed to rejuvenate the Farm Credit Corporation.

As a concrete step to allow young farmers to continue to get into farming and to allow other farmers to make major investments, this government should have frozen the interest rate at 12 per cent. Instead, we see in the Speech from the Throne increases in the farm improvement loans ceiling to $100,000 which prompted the Canadian Federation of Agriculture to say, "more rope to hang yourself".

The current interest rate for farm improvement loans is 18.5 per cent. In 1978, first estimates indicated that $212 million was loaned under this act. That amounted to only 2.7 per cent of the total credit extended to farmers in that year. Some banks provide almost no funding under the Farm Improvement Loans Act. Most farmers will tell you that no matter what bank you go to these loans are hard or nearly impossible to get, even at the rate of 18.5 per cent, which is still no favour to the farmers.

It is obvious that this government will have to do much more if they hope effectively to assist farmers with the current problem of high interest rates. Farmers need help this spring to put their crops in, and we must develop programs rapidly if we are to provide the assistance they need. Accordingly, I would offer the full support of our party for rapid passage of any reasonable legislation to put this assistance into force.

I would like to spend a moment discussing the reasons for this ever-increasing debt. It seems to me that we have an industry which is in very serious trouble, and that we should be looking at the reasons for the serious situation which was developed. You do not have a viable industry if you see the debt load of that industry tripled in ten years. Why is the industry not developing enough capital to refinance itself? Why are farmers continually having to borrow ever-increasing amounts of money in order to stay in business? I think we have to look at the kind of prices farmers have been getting.

This spring we find that potato prices are disastrously low, for the third year in a row. They are well below half the cost of production. Hog prices are about one third below the cost of production. Prices for finished cattle have slipped badly. Calf and feeder markets have followed. The Carter grain embargo is affecting grain prices and in particular is affecting feed grain. That embargo trapped a great deal of feed grain that previously had markets in the United States, where farmers are trying to get around the problem by feeding more to hogs and chickens. As the price of grain has fallen, so has the price of beef, hogs and chickens. Indeed, many analysts were predicting increases in grain prices prior to the implementation of the Carter boycott and this trapped unexpected supplies of grains in the United States.

We can contrast the problems in the hog, beef and potato markets with the egg, turkey and chicken industry in this country today. In these commodities, where national orderly marketing agencies help to stabilize price and supply and provide some security to both the farmer and to the consumer, things are not quite so bad. These agencies organize producers, give them some control over imports being dumped into our markets and provide consumers with a lower price for the product when international supply and demand swings the other way—to high prices on the world market.

Certainly there are problems from time to time with these agencies, but they are open to public scrutiny and are responsible to Canadians through Parliament in a way that no private corporation is ever expected to be.

In this context I want to say a few words, Mr. Speaker, in support of a Canadian potato marketing commission. How long must we watch the bickering amongst provincial marketing boards? Shortsighted and corporate dominated provincial governments and this federal government conspire to keep potato producers in a quagmire of debt, uncertainty and potential bankruptcy. I notice that another marketing agency has been established in the province of New Brunswick. It seems to me, having worked with a provincial board in Saskatchewan dealing with hogs, that it brings about only a minor improvement to the market situation. Until those marketing boards can work together in a national scheme, or at least a regional scheme, no real solution to the problem begins to emerge. I propose that we move as quickly as possible to the establishment of a potato marketing commission with the provinces transferring some of their powers to the federal jurisdiction.

The potato industry in Canada is in very serious trouble. Prices this year are 1.75 cents per pound while the cost of production is 4.5 cents. This is the third bad year in a row. Parts of New Brunswick had massive crop spoilage problems and as many as 20 per cent of the farmers will not be able to put a crop in without considerable financial assistance.

If we were to set up an agency similar to the Canadian Wheat Board to provide standardized grading and inspection systems for all potatoes and hire top flight marketers like those in the Wheat Board, we would begin to realize the tremendous potential for expansion in the potato industry.

Let us consider now the benefits of this on the farm. Firm prices would attract and hold new farmers, would stabilize the farm supply and processing industry, and would allow farmers to move to a proper rotation of crops with better soil management, instead of the current continuous cropping and exploitation of the soil that some farmers are forced to adopt just to stay in business and beat the cost-price squeeze.

I would further argue that the hog industry is ripe for a similar orderly marketing system. The instability of the last decade has been very wasteful of resources. We have allowed the industry in Quebec to become heavily vertically integrated, with farmers at the mercy of the corporations and their "here today, gone tomorrow" contracts. We now see that Cargill, for instance, is moving to vertically integrate the hog industry in Manitoba as well.

Is Canadian production to be replaced by U.S. imports in the long run? Are we going to allow the same situation to occur with hogs as occurred in the past with chickens? Are we going to try to pick up the pieces in five years' time, when we negotiate with the United States on import levels, because we do not have a national marketing agency today? We should be moving on this now. Hog supplies are not far from being in balance with demand in this country at the present time. We have the potential to maintain and expand exports to the United States and other selected markets. Now is the time to set up a national agency, not five years from now.

I am pleased to see mention of a meat import law in the Speech from the Throne, Mr. Speaker, not because I believe it represents any long-term solution, but rather because it is a step in the right direction. I hope that it includes all meat and that we will also have effective controls on the movement of live animals for slaughter.

Before I close, Mr. Speaker, I want to mention a couple of other issues that are likely to come before us in this Parliament or that are recurring issues in this country. I hope to see, as does my colleague the hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Hovdebo), a full commitment to proceeding with the development of the port of Prince Rupert by this government.

I hope that feed grains will be restored to the Canadian Wheat Board and that the board will be given jurisdiction over oil seeds. I would recommend the adoption as soon as possible of the Hall commission report and its solutions regarding the Crow rate and I would ask this government to maintain all branch lines where elevator companies are committed to retaining service.

I should also like to place on record the continuing opposition of this party to plant breeders' rights legislation. This would result in higher costs of seed to farmers, would result in the takeover of many of our breeding programs and our seed companies by foreign companies, and would also bring about a decline in those breeding programs by our public research institutions. It would contribute to fewer varieties of seeds being available and could present many problems to seed growers across Canada as they face imported seed or the contracting out of new seed varieties by the companies that would own the rights to these seeds. I would urge the minister, through you, Mr. Speaker, to set aside plans to introduce such legislation.

I hope that we will have an opportunity to debate the setting up of new marketing agencies, expanding and improving the Farm Credit Corporation, the Farm Improvement Loans Act and measures such as these which would boost Canadian self-sufficiency in the production of fruits, vegetables and other commodities. I also hope that we will have legislation providing for the labelling of food by country of origin and that we will have the means to provide for energy conservation and improved storage and handling techniques. Changes are needed as well to the Agricultural Stabilization Act to make it responsive to the needs of individual producers and to improve its ability to stabilize net farm incomes.

We face many challenges and many opportunities, Mr. Speaker, as we begin this new Parliament and this new decade. I look forward to working with all members so that we can make these opportunities a reality. It has been an honour to be able to participate in this throne speech debate by making my maiden speech in Parliament, Mr. Speaker.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Hon. Francis Fox (Secretary of State and Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, let me start by saying I am very happy to take part in the throne speech debate. I had first intended to deal mainly with my responsibilities as Secretary of State and Minister of Communications. I decided against this because I think that we in this country are currently living critical times and that we have to tackle problems which somehow transcend our own interests, whether they be regional, provincial or other, and focus on interests and matters which have more bearing on the Canadian nation as a whole.

[English]

I feel most strongly, Mr. Speaker, with the referendum staring us in the face, that my first speech in this Parliament should address itself primarily to an issue of vital interest to the nation, because notwithstanding arguments to the contrary, the referendum is not only a French question, not only a Quebec question, but a question affecting the future of Canada, with Quebec being an important part of that future.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, the statements made by the ultra-nationalists, and particularly the separatists, indicate that they interpret the history of Quebec and that of Quebec within Canada in a way which, according to them, shows that the French language and culture have constantly been imperiled and kept from developing in our country. The conclusion drawn is that the separation of Quebec from the rest of Canada is necessary to ensure not only the respect but also the survival of French culture.

This separatist rhetoric, Mr. Speaker, is clearly fallacious. It is a fabric of lies feeding the political ambition of a group of people who merely seek total power over their fellow citizens. Mr. Speaker, the French language is alive and well as it never was before. French culture is alive and well as it never was before. To maintain that Canadian federalism has not allowed the French language and the French culture to develop and flourish within our boundaries is unfounded. It is also unfounded to maintain that Canada's central government has jeopardized the stability and the flourishing of our French fact in our Canada. In fact, the facts are quite the opposite. The facts are quite different from the separatist fiction.

Mr. Speaker, I have found in recent years, especially when meeting groups of young people in our CEGEPs, that it is always hard to explain that there is a difference between reality and fiction and to make them understand that Canada through its central government and its federal system has in fact enabled the French language to be used and to be improved in Quebec and throughout the country.

I know that some realities are hard to swallow in some separatist circles, but the fact is that they are realities. First, through its Official Languages Act, the Government of Canada acknowledged not only the historical contribution of Francophones, but also the basic role Francophones will play in the future of our country. And this has happened, Mr. Speaker, without any need to think about separation, about a break. That act had recognized, long before the Parti Québécois started to move, that Canada must be bilingual and must remain so in order to be truly its own self. Progress made since the inception of that act is encouraging. That is a reality much more important than the separatist fiction.

Contrary to separatists' claim, who by the way are making entirely false statements and even distort historical facts to their advantage, Canadians know that they can communicate with the central government in the language of their choice wherever they are in Canada. They know that the Government of Canada is increasingly promoting access by all Canadians to the learning and use of the other official language and is sparing no effort to allow them to live and develop in the official language of their choice. The provincial governments also have the responsibility to ensure the development of the French-speaking community living within their territory. After many historical difficulties, some of which continue to exist, that responsibility is being increasingly recognized.

I would like, Mr. Speaker, in that respect to quote just one figure. For instance, who knows in Quebec that today in the far away province of Alberta there are as many as 75 Francophone schools? Who among the big names in the separatist movement in Quebec would tell the people of that province that today in Canada more than 203,000 children of English-speaking families outside Quebec are attending French immersion classes in school? This is an example of the kind of change that has occurred through the years in English Canada, in the other provinces of this great country, mention of which is very seldom made in the province of Quebec.

The members of this House know that quite well. The government of Canada encourages the teaching of the minority language in each province all across Canada. A total of $160 million has been paid by my department to the provinces for that purpose during the fiscal year 1979-80. This is a fact. To the province of Quebec alone, some $733 million, that is $300 million in direct transfers and $400 million in tax transfers, were contributed to education in 1979-80.

Who, among the staunch supporters of separatism, Mr. Speaker, has had the courage to recognize those efforts made by the central government in the field of education in the province of Quebec during the debate at the National Assembly? No one of course. But this is a fact. The young people in Quebec have more than ever before the opportunity to take advantage of new working tools, to take part in meaningful exchanges with other young Canadians, to benefit from teaching materials which help them to acquire a better command of their French and to learn English if they wish. For that purpose, an amount of $10 million, including $6 million for linguistic exchanges alone, has been paid under the Open House Canada program. That is a reality, Mr. Speaker, a verifiable fact.

The Government of Canada also helps newcomers to Quebec. It helps them to get their education in French. That is a program about which Quebec separatists keep quiet. They do not talk about the amounts spent to enable new citizens to better integrate in the Francophone life of Quebec and Canada, nor about the $11 million spent by the Department of Manpower for that purpose. Let us also mention the amounts put at the disposal of young Francophones through employment, animation and training programs such as the armed forces programs which enable young Quebeckers to get a better education in French. Quebec separatists do not talk about that either.

Mr. Speaker, I also want to mention translation programs which promote communications in both our official languages. We invest each year huge amounts in that field. Last year, for instance, the translation bureau in my department spent $50 million on its translation programs in the official languages. This amount includes $6 million for research to ensure the quality, updating and universality of the French language within our society, to set up a modern terminology bank, and link French-speaking Canada to the international data banks. Therefore, it would not be true to assert that the central government did nothing to promote the French language. Reality is quite different.

So I call upon all Quebeckers to make an honest and thorough examination because indeed, Mr. Speaker, this matter has never been examined with the intellectual honesty and earnestness it calls for. What are those realities involved? Let us take, for example, the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, the National Film Board, Canada Council and all the other cultural agencies of the Government of Canada; those agencies, Mr. Speaker, did not need the outbursts of the separatist government in Quebec to contribute substantially to the survival and use of the French language, and to bring about a great improvement in the quality of the French language and culture in the province of Quebec and throughout Canada.

What would the French fact be in Canada today? Would it have the same quality, the same status, the same significance if it were not for the CBC, the National Film Board, Canada Council, the National Museums, Public Archives and all the other agencies of the central government? Again, those are realities, not illusions, not talk, but facts, real facts, true facts. No honest citizen, can pretend that Radio-Canada has not been in the past and does not continue to be a major catalyser of the most dynamic elements in the Francophone information, and artistic communities, which enabled them to achieve success and growth. It would now be opportune to make a few comments about the quality of the French language, which Radio-Canada announcers have been displaying for many years. From Henri Bergeron to René Lecavalier, all announcers have always promoted high standards for the French, not the English language, not the promotion of "joual", but the promotion of good French. That is a fact.

I could also quote figures in this connection. Let us take for example the year 1977-78. Radio-Canada spent over $200 million in the province of Quebec, that is 36 per cent of its over-all expenditures in that same year. That is much more than the strict mathematical percentage that is so dear to the Péquistes, a strict mathematical percentage based on population. That year the corporation employed 4,300 persons in Quebec. Is that really a federal government that tries to hinder French culture? The salaries of those employees and related expenses total more than $100 million. The total value of Radio-Canada's capital investments in the province of Quebec as of March 31, 1978, amounted to $151 million. That also is a fact.

How many of our artists have benefited some time or other from Radio-Canada? How many of our cultural or even social and political groups have come to be known through Radio-Canada? And that situation prevails since the very beginning of TV in Canada. It did not wait for separatist agitation.

I could also speak of the National Film Board, Mr. Speaker. Let us ask our Quebec separatists where our Quebec filmmakers, our Francophone filmmakers, would stand without the National Film Board. We could point out that the Government of Canada, and the National Film Board, have within a federal Canada given an opportunity for all our talents to come of age; for Claude Jutras to create Mon oncle Antoine, for Gilles Carle, Jean-Pierre Lefebvre, Pierre Perrault and so many others to express their creativity.

And what about the new tax measures giving a new boost to the Francophone film industry in Canada? That is also a fact. The Government of Canada does not lay any conditions for its support of Francophone creative talents and cultural instruments. It does not impose any political censorship. It does not urge artists to become members of a particular committee rather than another. To my knowledge, Radio-Canada has never been known to be teeming with federalists.

An hon. Member: That is another fact.

Mr. Fox: This real freedom is also a fact. Do we really find the same freedom in all the interventions of the Parti Québécois government on linguistic and cultural matters? Is there really the same quality of freedom and the same opportunities to express different views within some agencies of the Parti Québécois government? Have we heard many federalists over Radio-Québec? We must think about that too, Mr. Speaker.

I could also say much more about Canada Council. Once again, reality is far from separatist fiction. It is the opposite of the false statements that are rammed down the people's throats under the guise of nice songs and high-falutin elucidations. Where would all our creative talents, all our artists, all our craftsmen, all our drama groups, all our musical and dance organizations be without the support of Canada Council and Radio-Canada? The Government of Canada has for several decades been the mainstay of artistic creation and the major prop of Francophone artistic development. Once again, this is a fact. This is a fact that hurts in some circles, but that is one we must not overlook.

I would like, Mr. Speaker, to address for a few moments the most creative minds of our society. Where would we be today if, at a time when the government of Quebec was not much concerned with culture, information or university education, when some public figures derided what they termed "artistic art", the Government of Canada had not been there and if a federal system of government had not been able to compensate—and I emphasize compensate—for a lack of understanding in some responsible quarters. Those things did happen in the past and they are true. Those are facts. How could anyone now argue that the Government of Canada has tried to overshadow the French fact, to make French-speaking artists subservient to the English-speaking majority whereas what really happened is exactly the opposite? How could we reasonably claim that artistic creation would be stimulated if Quebec were to secede? Those issues require more pondering over.

Furthermore, in a sovereign Quebec in which the Parti Québécois is committed to maintain all social transfer payments, pay the salaries of former federal employees and many other expenditures, what would be the working margin, what resources would be left for the government to support artistic and cultural activities? This is a question we must now ask ourselves and answer without delay.

Those are the facts we must face now. Under the guise of lovely songs which are sometimes I quite agree very beautiful and displays of passion probably, the big guns of the Parti Québécois go around distorting reality, disguising facts, spreading lies which if repeated often enough will finally be accepted as truths. They ask the people to trade their birthright for a mess of pottage, to trade the positive support of the Government of Canada which is a concrete reality for a would-be society of which the only indisputable feature is the fact that a small elitist group would gain absolute power over the people of Quebec.

Furthermore, Mr. Speaker, at this political turning point in our history, on the eve of the Quebec referendum, I would like to deal with two other matters which are of particular interest to me.

Personally, I have always been irritated by the way the separatist speakers seem to enjoy confusing the issues. And such confusion which has been deliberately spread around for a number of years must be dispelled. I am referring to the fact that they confuse the problems that may confront the French-speaking community with the problems that may confront Quebeckers as citizens of a particular region. How can anyone go on suggesting that all of Quebec's problems are due to the fact that there is in our country an English-speaking majority and a French-speaking minority?

A very large number of the existing problems are regional, social and economic problems that have nothing to do with the French nature of Quebec. A very large part of Quebec's problems are caused by social, geographic or economic conditions that have nothing to do with le fait français as such. It is dishonest to have people believe that all the existing problems in Quebec have as their one and only cause the strained relationship between the two linguistic communities.

Unemployment problems in some areas, the problem of industrial development in Quebec for example, are based on geographic and economic data and having nothing to do with the French fact. It seems to me that it should no longer be possible to make the people believe that all those problems would disappear immediately after Quebec achieved sovereignty.

However, we all know very well that the separatist star performers are spreading all those dreams. The liberation of everyone is now connected to a so-called liberation of Quebec. There is some confusion there between a certain type of problem related to the linguistic make-up of our country and another type of problem related to geographic and economic data, and this confusion should not be ignored any longer.

This leads me, Mr. Speaker, to another aspect of the debate which deserves close attention. Preserving the French language and culture, setting up the framework and the tools to guarantee their dynamic development are not the game preserves of the separatists. They are dear to the hearts of all Quebeckers, whether they toil in the private or public sectors, whether they toil in Ottawa or in Quebec. The will to remain French is every bit as strong among federalists who work with the central government as among the separatists who work in the National Assembly. To claim the contrary is dishonest.

There certainly have been moments of tension in our Canadian history. Those moments must neither be downplayed nor exaggerated. But they cannot be expected to disappear some day. Tensions are part of life itself. They would even exist in a system born of a type of sovereignty-association. But just as it has been done in the course of the last decades and as it will always be necessary to continue doing so, every means must be taken to make both linguistic groups in our country understand the positive contribution of the other, the need to fully respect it and appreciate its differences.

Those past incidents which often go far back in our history have been such, and I readily agree, that no Francophone wants to leave his linguistic fate entirely in the hands of the other linguistic group of the country. This political will is a basic political fact in our country. But this political will, Mr. Speaker, does not necessarily require going from a federal to a unitary system, from a Canada with two co-existing linguistic communities to a separate Quebec state.

We find, Mr. Speaker, that in Mr. Camille Laurin's white paper, an anthropological method is used to interpret society. In that white paper, the linguistic phenomenon is referred to as a basic feature of daily life in Quebec around which are centred all other aspects of life and which serves to interpret the remainder of the community. All the vital manifestations of a community are subjected to the language criterion alone.

The anthropological method is an interesting interpretation tool. But it is far from being as relevant as some would suggest or as effective in the daily life of every citizen of our province. Every Quebecker understands that there are other factors in his life besides the linguistic one, that there are, among others, political, social, economic, ethnic, religous factors. It is true that there are English-speaking Canadians on the one hand and French-speaking Canadians on the other, but it is equally true that there are a great many other factors which differentiate amongst our fellow-citizens and which, in fact, unite Canadians much more than they divide them. There are many more elements which unite the citizens of our country than elements which divide them. What unites us is much stronger than what makes us different. What we have in common is more important than what sets us apart.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to go over this same argument differently. For me, in my political philosophy, in my view of the political organization of the country and society, in my conception of the instruments needed by a society to ensure its development, I am completely opposed to any kind of exclusive jurisdiction and control. I am all the more opposed to such control as this type of society which some are trying to sell us would destroy one of the best means we have had throughout our history to develop and to ensure as much as possible that individual rights are respected. I cannot accept that a single government could have complete control over my life, over the legislation which affects me, over my taxes. On the contrary, I believe that it is healthy, especially in the areas which affect our everyday life, which affect the fabric of our society, which affect culture, for no government to have complete control over what concerns us. I believe it is healthy that there should be some competition between two levels of government to better protect the rights of citizens.

Mr. Speaker, the debate on Quebec separation has been going on for several years. A majority of citizens are still dead set against the projects of the separatists, that of sovereignty. In fact, this relentless opposition has been understood even by the Parti Québécois. At the present time, the referendum debate does not deal with the separation project because it would be categorically rejected by the population. But they are still trying to bring Quebeckers gradually to take one more step in a direction they reject. There is dishonesty in the gradual approach being proposed by the Parti Québécois. There seems to me to be a basic lack of respect for the people of Quebec. They seem to me to be trying to do indirectly and gradually what the people do not want to do directly and clearly.

The present referendum debate still remains a historical debate that will be an essential element in the evolution of all citizens of Quebec as well as that of all other citizens of Canada. That historical debate has led the separatists of the Parti Québécois to make totally false assertions. It is false to pretend that Quebec needs a Yes to secure a mandate to get things moving when, quite to the contrary, the reality is that the mandate to get things moving is on the No side. It is false that Quebec must separate to ensure the maintenance and the development of the French language and culture in Quebec itself. Contrary to what they say in separatist circles, the Government of Canada, both in the past and in the present—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I regret to interrupt the minister, but his time has expired. He may continue with unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Fox: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and I thank my colleagues. In concluding, Mr. Speaker, I must say that contrary to what separatists have been saying for a long time, the Government of Canada, both in the past and in the present, and it will be the same in the future, has been an all essential and privileged instrument to promote the development of the quality of the French language and culture. That French fact which is recognized today not only at home but all over the world would not be as vigorous, as rich, as promising had it not been for the whole positive contribution of the Government of Canada.

Mr. Speaker, the federal system of our Canada is a much better instrument to ensure the progress of French and the promotion of Francophones than a unitarian system would be, a political system that would isolate Quebeckers from the real challenges, the challenges of a universe in which people who are different will have to have learned to live together to ensure peace, freedom, security and prosperity for all.

[English]

Mr. G. M. Gurbin (Bruce-Grey): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of my constituency of Bruce-Grey I welcome the opportunity to join in the response to the Speech from the Throne which has opened this Thirty-second Parliament.

First, may I congratulate Madam Speaker on her appointment as Speaker and wish her a successful term. Second, I congratulate the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and his colleagues on their successful campaign. I wish them well in their deliberations on behalf of this country.

In my initial speech in this House I would like to exercise the privilege of referring to my constituency of Bruce-Grey. One of the most unique aspects of this constituency is treasures which are hidden within its boundaries: from the caves of the islands off Tobermory, down the beautiful Niagara escarpment and Georgian Bay and along the shoreline of unspoiled Lake Huron, from the awesome Bruce nuclear power development and its surrounding Scottish communities to the industrious Hanover which forms the heartland of a thriving furniture industry, and from the German community of Neustadt to the resilient Durham, and beyond this to the security and stability of Walter's Falls; they are treasures in themselves and all enclosing a productive rural community.

This riding should be identified as a breeding ground for some great politicians, at least until now. The Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker was born in Neustadt, and the great-grandfather of the right hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) homesteaded in Kincardine township. Its basic resource in people, however, is in those who have remained in the farming communities, which continue to thrive. This human resource has recently been augmented by people who have come in numbers to the area to build and operate what is to be the largest nuclear complex in the world.

The natural attributes have allowed many of our citizens to work in the tourist trade, while others find employment in a variety of manufacturing industries but particularly in furniture and wood products.

The main issues which are important to the people I am here to represent are really not much different from the basic concerns which exist across my province of Ontario and throughout our whole country.

Beef and other farming activities in Bruce-Grey are among the most productive in Canada. Farming through our independent farming operations is to our future what oil and energy resources are to today. Unfortunately, in the throne speech we have failed to take any meaningful initiatives to allow farming operations to continue their economic survival.

Worst of all, because of debt and costs, this year some cannot afford to sow their crops unless they sell capital investments. Some will not plant. The individual economic hardships farmers face are serious enough; the loss of productive farm capacity in a world of hunger is tragic. This problem has a good deal to do with the prices farmers are able to get for their products. I applaud the proposed expansion of export markets through a Canadian agricultural export corporation. I am encouraged by the indication of meat import legislation and hope that it will be an effective instrument for beef producers. I hope that the election promise of a farm price review will in fact happen. I sincerely hope that this government will provide some short-term relief for the survival of our farmers until economic conditions improve.

Nuclear energy has had a very emotional and uneven history. It has developed in the shadow of the most destructive force yet devised by man, and in the wake of Three Mile Island this shadow has almost eclipsed the entire American nuclear program. Our nuclear resources in Canada have developed on the basis of need, particularly in the industrial heartland of Canada, in Ontario.

Bruce-Grey has in progress the second major phase of a construction program which will provide approximately one quarter of all the electrical energy in Ontario. This complex, based on the prize of Canadian technology, the Candu system, will also provide the largest steam plant in the world and enough steam to run four of Alberta's syncrude plants.

This complex also gives the largest North American example of the combined use of an energy source to produce both electricity and steam energy for industrial activity. The heavy water plants use massive amounts of steam to produce heavy water for our Candu system.

Mr. Speaker, I apologize for the digression, but the explanation was important both in terms of the indication in the throne speech to create an alternative energy corporation and also in the critical energy future of Ontario.

Amazing economic opportunities could result from the full utilization of the energy facilities now in place. Improvement of fuel efficiency from less than one third to more than two thirds is an exciting potential. The combination of this efficiency improvement with the existing technologies of portable fuels, including methanol, ethanol and hydrogen, give Ontario an energy future which can be capable of significant independence. I believe we could have energy self-reliance for Ontario by the year 2000.

An additional comment is appropriate in discussing this energy future. The integration of the conservation of cogenerated heat units combined with biomass from trees or other cellulose sources, cash crops starch sources, sugar sources or from waste products, forms a cycle to produce a hydrocarbon from a renewable source.

The nuclear component of this combination presents to Ontario an opportunity to achieve a degree of independence and remain competitive with those provinces which are endowed with fossil fuel deposits or massive hydroelectric opportunities. In addition, significant reductions in carbon dioxide emissions can occur. This can help avoid the so-called atmospheric greenhouse effect.

An important element in the ongoing Canadian energy discussion is the provincial constitutional control of energy resources. This dialogue can be assisted by the understanding in Ontario of the potential we have.

In our own area we have in process now the development of a particular expression of cogeneration. This expression is in the form of a small greenhouse prototype which is one acre in size. This prototype in fact is developed using three different types of greenhouse structure, and at the present time it is in the middle of its second crop of producing cucumbers and tomatoes for the markets of Ontario and Canada.

In developing this technique and producing this variety of greenhouse produce we expose to Canada a technology that can be used to develop a marketable produce from our own energy resource. We can in fact replace imports which are coming in at the rate of approximately $200 million a year, and we can do this with an energy source that is now in place.

In the throne speech there is one item which gives me cause for concern, and this is the projection of Canadian ownership of our petroleum industry to the extent of 50 per cent by the year 1990. I do not understand how this can occur unless we are talking about nationalization. I do not understand how we can in fact achieve 50 per cent Canadian ownership without massive government involvement. I think that the government must be more clear in designating how this is to occur and what technique will be used.

Tourism is an ongoing important source of revenue and it is also a source of employment in Bruce-Grey as in many other areas of Canada. Tourism can be seen to be neglected by the Speech from the Throne. My hope would be that we will give more attention to this in the coming months. A specific national tourist policy and specific initiatives to help the industry develop could help local economies and Canada's balance of trade deficits.

Railways and mass transportation systems of the last decade are inadequate for present needs. It is encouraging to note a recognition of this in the throne speech, but little comfort is seen in the lack of specific planning except for the wheat transportation improvements already initiated by the last government. The deterioration of facilities almost guarantees continued loss of current rail services. I believe a review process, the so-called rationalization of rail services, that is taking place now for the first time in Canada in our own area should provide an excellent prototype for the development of a national, economically-viable, integrated rail system. This integration of systems would allow the use of freight, rail and tourism lines combined together to provide an economically viable unit.

I think it is important that the members of this House remember, while we debate the Speech from the Throne, that the impact of our deliberations will not be felt today but by future generations of Canadians. Therefore, we have an obligation to ensure that our decisions are not based upon selfishness but upon an honest regard for the needs and aspirations of our children.

Governments too often place themselves in positions of serving the desires of today by ransoming the future. Social programs are instituted, non-renewable resources are consumed and new laws are created with a flagrant disregard for the effects that such decisions will have upon the quality of life of our descendants. As representatives of the people, we must keep vigil over their interests. We must attempt to protect the rights not only of the majority, but also those of groups unable to stand in self-defence. Such a group is the young.

The young are eager to prove themselves. They want to get out in the world and establish their credibility. This is a task which is becoming increasingly difficult. No longer is an education enough to get a secure and well-paying job; no longer is a home within the means of most young Canadians; no longer can the young look forward to the standard of living that we promised them.

What promise does this throne speech, this government, hold out to the young? Oh, yes, I see a reference to creating new jobs. But what does this mean? Does it mean a new opportunities for youth program? If so, it will not be of much use to Bruce-Grey or, for that matter, many other parts of the country. We need permanent, meaningful employment, not band-aids. We need protection from interest rates so that young people will be able to continue the family farm or business. We need new industry and new jobs based not upon the wishes of a bureaucracy, but upon the real needs and the vast potential of our country. We need to put an end to inflation so that once again young people will feel secure enough to be able to own a home and raise a family.

We need to re-examine the educational system and the role it plays in preparing young Canadians for what lies ahead. This may mean an increased concentration on skills training, but it definitely means that access to education must be affordable. We need to be able to assure the young that we have taken adequate precaution to preserve a secure source of energy for the future. We need to come to terms with our environment in such a way as to protect valuable farm land and vacation areas from the challenges posed by pollution, and thus save these resources for our future needs.

But most of all we need to be able to convince the young that they have a government which is committed to looking out for their interests. This implies a government which is willing to set an example, a government which is willing to provide some standards by which the young may judge themselves. In short, it requires a government which understands the needs of Canada and is willing to respond with vigour and determination.

While providing for the economic well-being of the nation, the government must also prove that it has an understanding of laws that give a country its spirit. It must be willing to enforce those laws which are just and should change those which are not.

If I could be allowed to digress again for a moment, the government must be able to understand the need for capital punishment as well as a tightening of the abortion laws. I have yet to be convinced that the government is capable of that level of understanding. For example, the government has stated its intent to decriminalize simple possession of cannabis. I would hope that the government would place careful consideration into the framing of such legislation. I for one do not believe that the government should take any steps which might lead Canadians to believe that this House supports the use of marijuana. On the other hand, it is important that young people not be faced with the spectre of a criminal record for experimenting with a habit which has received tacit approval from certain sectors of our society.

Cannabis serves as an excellent example of a policy area where a decision made today could have serious detrimental effects upon our country a few years down the road. Recent information more and more points to the likelihood of cannabis being dangerous to one's health. Just as we must worry about the dangerous effects of giving young men and women criminal records, we must also worry about the dangerous effects of the widespread use of drugs. The government will not receive my support for any piece of legislation that does not include substantial penalties for those who traffic in drugs.

An hon. Member: Hear, hear!

Mr. Gurbin: Furthermore, I believe it essential that the government ensures that a program of drug education is instituted to teach young Canadians about the possible effects of marijuana use.

Today our Canadian family is faced with a predictable circumstance. As dependencies between the Canadian parent and the provincial offspring have changed with time, so too the formal relationships of these must be re-established. Fate, as a father, has typically wandered off to thrust his proverbial finger in other directions. As a mother, Canada has an historical and geographical bonding with her provincial children that will withstand politics, economics and even temporary insanity so long as our borders are secure from external forces. Even as we continue our constitutional and referendum debate, the failure to recognize the extraterritorial threat handicaps us, because by recognizing it fully the crisis could help reaffirm the bonding and secure our family unit.

By not recognizing the Russian military and political expansion for what it is, we contribute to the increased isolation and vulnerability of our provinces and our country. The purchase of new fighter aircraft and a recommitment to our full part in NATO is a hopeful indication that this government recognizes the threat, and in the face of this crisis will do its part to secure peace and a continuation of confederation.

I thank Mr. Speaker and my colleagues for the opportunity of joining them in this debate.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Hon. Yvon Pinard (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, earlier today during the question period one of my colleagues asked me a question to which of course I gave the best possible reply under the circumstances, but I would have liked to be much more precise. The colleague who put the question is a federal member from the province of Quebec who seemed concerned about the time available to him to play effectively his role as a legislator in the Canadian Parliament while supporting those who are fighting for a united Canada in the present referendum debate in Quebec.

My colleague was wondering whether as government leader in the House and as President of the Privy Council I could not assure him that he would have the necessary time to discharge the double task entrusted to him. And I have every reason to believe that since he was chairman of the Quebec caucus in Ottawa he was speaking for most if not all of his colleagues. I replied that of course our mandate will be practically double during the coming days and weeks. Double in the sense that first we have a mandate and a duty to govern this country and at the same time we have to get involved and help our brothers and sisters in Quebec who do not want to abandon Canada and are anxious to fight for building a strong and united Canada. It is in that context that I had to reply that I would have to co-operate with the official opposition and the New Democratic Party and rely on their co-operation.

The aspect on which I would like to dwell at the outset of my remarks, Mr. Speaker, is that of course all hon. members wish for a majority of No votes in the referendum which will be held on May 20 next and of course all hon. members would like to contribute directly or indirectly to that victory for Canada. I would respectfully suggest that one way of contributing even indirectly would be to allow the proceedings in the House in the weeks to come, as an example for the future, to get on in the most complete harmony among all parties without denying the right and privilege of the opposition parties to criticize government measures thoroughly but not dilatorily.

Today I call upon the sense of responsibility of the opposition parties so that we and all members of the House who so desire can, in the next few weeks, organize rationally their work schedule and devote all their time and energy to not only governing the country, which of course is essential, but also to defending the cause of Canada and of Quebeckers who want to stay in Canada, in their country, in the province of Quebec.

I am sure that my colleagues will give me their full co-operation, and I refer specifically to the House leaders of the two opposition parties. I am sure that they are aware of the very positive role they can play in the present debate, not by relinquishing their right, as opposition parties, to criticize government legislation, but by showing as much flexibility and co-operation as possible to allow us parliamentarians from Quebec especially to meet both objectives and fulfil both roles so that we can help govern Canada and work towards its unity.

Mr. Speaker, I entered politics for a very simple reason. It was not for a question of boundaries, but for the economic and social well-being of the region I come from. I entered politics to improve the social and economic conditions of my province and also of my country, Canada. When I first ran, in 1974, in the riding where I was born, a region based on the textile industry, a region, I would say, of average economic growth rate, my objective was, and that is the expression I used, to go into public life in the hope of trying to make people smile. My objective was to try and make the people from my region, my province, my country happier. It is as simple as that. In the present debate, in the referendum debate, it is in that spirit that I will deal with the question that is asked of my fellow citizens, both men and women, from Quebec.

It seems that since the debate on the referendum question in the National Assembly, a large number of my fellow citizens in the province of Quebec are somehow hypnotized by glib, pompous speakers, albeit short on logic.

The danger is that during that debate in the National Assembly when the referendum question was supposed to be discussed, they dealt with everything except the question itself. And as a member from an area where 99 per cent of the people are ordinary people, in the coming days and the coming weeks I want very much the debate to be brought down to their level so that they may understand. I would like the debate that the Péquistes have been conducting at the level of academics to be stopped so that the people in Quebec may be told very simply: Well, we have a question to put to you, this is the question, and that is where the answer we want will lead you. And what is happening now is that all sorts of gratuitous assertions are being made, as mentioned by previous speakers, assertions which are not based on facts, are often misleading and have the effect of hypnotizing my fellow citizens, as I said earlier. So what I want to do today actually is to warn my fellow citizens against what is going on now and prompt them to give much thought to the matter, if they are asked a question, to analyse its content and take into consideration who is asking it.

In my riding of Drummond, Mr. Speaker, there are textile workers, workers in small and medium-sized business and industrial milk producers. That is fairly characteristic of several areas in the province of Quebec. They are hard-working people. They are people for whom bread and butter issues, economic issues are vital in that debate. And it is very important that they know that a Yes or No can have serious consequences and repercussions on their lives after the May 20 referendum.

So I ask those people to consider two things: first, and it is normal, someone is asking you a question that you will have to answer on May 20. We should ask ourselves first who asked the question, because before we give an answer, it is always important to know who asked for something, and for what? We can appreciate the answer is very simple but we must be careful because it is an important question; and it is also important to know who asks the question, it is a question of credibility. The question is asked by the government of the Parti Québécois. The question has been prepared and adopted by the majority of a political party, a party whose program is seeking very clearly the independence of Quebec. So, in the beginning, it is important to indicate to all those ordinary people that someone wants an answer, they want a Yes from you. Those people are members of a political party in Quebec which is dedicated to the separation and independence of Quebec. That is the primary reason to be careful, to be fully aware of the fact that the Parti Québécois refused to really debate the question at the National Assembly a few weeks ago. What is really the question being asked by politicians of the Parti Québécois who want Quebec to be independent? Well, let us have a look at the wording of the question. We will not likely be mistaken if we look at the second paragraph of that long question, and I quote:

> That agreement will allow Quebec to gain exclusive power to pass its legislation, to collect its taxes and to establish its foreign relations, which is sovereignty and at the same time, association.

The question is crystal clear, Mr. Speaker. The Parti Québécois wants a Yes for a mandate to negotiate sovereignty, which is synonymous with independence and separation. So the ordinary people from my riding, who work for average wages and who, when unemployed because of difficult economic times, avail themselves of the very generous unemployment insurance plan we have developed in this country, those same people who, when sick, benefit from medical and hospital care or, when aged, receive old age security pensions, these same people have the right to ask themselves: the political party which is asking me this question wants to say Yes to the independence of Quebec, that political party wants me to give it a mandate to negotiate the separation of the province of Quebec and at the same time achieve economic association, an impossibility in itself, considering what the provincial premiers and the Prime Minister of Canada have said, namely that sovereignty was not negotiable and that we did not have the mandate to negotiate it.

The important thing is to say to these people: Listen, the Parti Québécois is asking you to agree to a mandate to negotiate Quebec independence. If you are asked to say Yes to this question, you are entitled to demand that they prove clearly that following this mandate, you will live in economic and social conditions at least as good as those which now prevail. Mr. Speaker, the burden of proof lies with those who want to break up a country to attempt to create another one.

It is up to the Parti Québécois to show the ordinary citizens of Quebec and to all Quebeckers that once this mandate is obtained, these people will be as well off as they are now. The question I am asking it is a legitimate one. The Parti Québécois supporters are the ones who want to change the order of things, they are the ones who want to change federalism for an independent Quebec in the more or less short term, and it is up to them to prove conclusively that if they obtain this mandate, the ordinary citizens whom they seem to want to exploit by calling unduly on a so-called pride will be able to live in conditions at least as good as those they now enjoy. God knows that this proof is far from made.

We are now living, as we are well aware, in a province, and a country, which have virtually the most advanced social legislation in the world.

We live in a rich country, and those who want to change the order of things, the political status of part of this country, should at least have the decency to show clearly to Quebec citizens that they will enjoy at least the same economic and social advantages as those for which I have been fighting since my arrival on the political scene. However, Mr. Speaker, I am not so sure that they will have the honesty to debate the issue at this level. Mr. Speaker, I shall come back to those whom I represent more particularly because I know them well. Let us talk about the textile workers. They are well aware that in the last few years the Canadian government has succeeded in negotiating bilateral agreements with seven, eight, or nine southeastern Asia countries to limit imports of clothing manufactured at a lower cost to allow our textile industry to be more competitive and more efficient.

These quotas were imposed by the then minister of industry, trade and commerce (Mr. Chrétien) and were renewed last year, that is quite recently, for three years and even five in some cases. The simple fact of limiting clothing imports forces citizens in other parts of Canada to pay more for their clothes. It is obvious that if fewer shirts made in Hong Kong reach our market, British Columbia or Alberta citizens will have to purchase a shirt made in Canada which will cost more than if it came from Hong Kong.

Mr. Speaker, we now have Canadian men and women who are willing to pay more for their clothes because they agree to some degree to protect our textile industry. And by protecting our Canadian textile industry to some degree we are protecting those jobs. There is another way in which the government protects our textile and clothing industry to some degree, because that protection is always limited, and this is the GATT and its agreements on tariffs and quotas on textile and fibre imports.

When we put together those two Canadian policies, the result of sound federalism, we see that our Canadian textile industry is able to fare better, perform better, and as a consequence prevent the erosion of its workers' standard of living and job security in general. This way we can save hundreds if not thousands of jobs in the Canadian textile and clothing industry in Canada, thanks to our sound Canadian policies in that area. Those policies have been implemented and made possible because Canada was powerful enough to reach bilateral agreements, as I said, with seven, eight or nine countries, and also achieve favourable results at the Geneva talks under the GATT.

What I am asking from the Péquistes who are soliciting a Yes vote which means a mandate to separate Quebec from Canada, is that they prove, since the burden of proof is on them, to the textile workers in my constituency of Drummond, and everywhere in Quebec, that the morning after their mandate there will not be such insecurity that Canadians will not feel inclined to put pressure on the government to be able to buy their clothes cheaper, and that the morning after Quebec is sovereign we will enjoy similar protection for the textile industry which accounts for the majority of jobs in the province of Quebec. This is my first question to them.

I would also like to ask them to prove to my voters, to my textile workers, just how, in the wake of Quebec sovereignty, independence or separation since that is what it is called, there could be as many jobs and as sound health standards as there are now, for these are due, chiefly, to federal policies in this sector.

About 15 years ago the textile industry employed 45 per cent of all the industrial manpower in my area. At this very moment, it hardly employs 8 per cent of active manpower in the riding of Drummond. What has happened in the meantime? A department which was created here in Ottawa in 1969, the Department of Regional and Economic Expansion, tries to redress regional inequalities and it had a very positive impact on areas such as the one I represent. This, Mr. Chairman, is another positive aspect of our brand of federalism. By injecting capital supplied by this Department, we were able to diversify our industry and see to it that jobs in the textile sector which were doomed to disappear because of the modernization of the industry could be transferred to newly created small and medium-sized businesses.

In fact, millions of dollars were spent in the riding of Drummond alone by the Department of Regional and Economic Expansion in an effort to help us achieve this industrial diversification and to provide jobs to our Quebec fellow citizens living in that area. This is another advantage which the Parti Québécois is duty-bound to mention. It must prove to my fellow citizens in that Drummond riding that the same diversification would be possible in a separate independent Quebec. I am not saying that it will not be done up to a certain point. I ask them to do their duty, because it is up to them to prove it during the referendum campaign. This is what the people want to know. They want to know whether on the first day of sovereignty they will hold the same jobs and get the same social benefits.

Will we have the same freedom, will we be as secure as we are now after having agreed to give the Quebec government the mandate to negotiate sovereignty-association? This question is quite legitimate, Mr. Speaker. It is essential that the Parti Québécois give the ordinary people in Quebec the proof they ask for and stop spreading these half-truths or untruths in some cases in order to hypnotize the population and take undue advantage of a false sense of pride.

Our approach in this debate is noble, Mr. Speaker. What we say is that it is much more courageous and much more generous to take up the challenge of diversity. Canada has its two founding peoples. Certainly injustice has been committed in the past and I have already indicated in the House that we should not react with frustration and egoism as the PQ would have us do. History should teach us a lesson of generosity and courage.

Our ancestors, Mr. Speaker, have worked hard in this country to give us the wealth we have from one ocean to the other. Our children have the right to insist that we do not take a decision which will deprive them of that wealth they are entitled to. In this country, Mr. Speaker, we have the opportunity to meet a challenge, to go forth on what the Prime Minister often calls the road of excellence and to fight here in Ottawa in order that our two founding peoples may live in harmony and full equality. The fact is that there are many Francophones sitting here in this Parliament.

There are 16 French-speaking members of the cabinet out of 31 or 32. That is a little better than the equality talked about by the Parti Québécois. What the people are asked in the referendum is for the exclusive right to make laws. They are told: "People of Quebec, you made a mistake last February 18. Some 68 per cent of all of you have sent men and women to Ottawa to make laws, to represent you, to try and bring harmony and development in the strictest equality of a strong and united Canada; you clearly and massively asked those people to act as your representatives, precisely to make laws. Now we tell you to forget that and give us an exclusive mandate to make laws here in Quebec." I think it is ridiculous, Mr. Speaker, and that it is to play a bad joke on people and not respect them to ask them, after they have given their massive support to men and women who are now members of Parliament from Quebec in Ottawa, and proud to be Canadians, for an answer that negates the intentions expressed by the people of Quebec a few weeks ago. That is something the ordinary people should easily understand.

The attitude of the Parti Québécois toward the injustices I mentioned—this may seem a paradox since they are asking for a Yes vote—is a very negative one. They say: Well, listen, there is nothing else we can do about it, the solution is territorial withdrawal. Let us abandon to their fate a few hundred thousand French-speaking people outside Quebec, let us leave them to their fate, we are going to work it out for ourselves in Quebec, we will make our own laws, we will collect our own taxes. Of course this is not practically feasible without an economic association. However, people know very well that this economic association accompanying sovereignty is not negotiable, that answering Yes to this question would lead Quebec in an absolute dead-end, a cul-de-sac. The result of this dead-end will not be the constitutional changes so greatly hoped for, it will not be a renewed federalism, the result will quite simply be yet more uncertainty, harmful to the economy of this country and particularly to the economy of the province of Quebec. That is another aspect which must be pointed out in this debate.

Mr. Speaker, as it has been said many times over, one can be both a good Quebecker and a good Canadian. I was born in the area I represent and when, over the weekend, with my fellow members of the No committee I launched its campaign in my riding, I said that my soul belonged to Drummondville and my heart to Quebec, but that body and soul I was a Canadian. It is in that spirit that today, as simply as possible, I ask of my fellow citizens of the riding I represent, that when the time comes for them to answer the question which basically constitutes one step towards the independence of Quebec, they reflect seriously upon the element of pride inherent in the gesture that is generous, that is constructive, the gesture which really tries to avoid barriers and boundaries in our society, that we might seek to live in harmony, in as sound and just an economy as possible.

It seems to me that when the time comes to answer that question, the people will have to ask themselves whether the PQ government has proved that, should it be given the mandate to negotiate for every part of the province of Quebec, its citizens will have at least the same advantages they now have. Should the mandate to negotiate be granted, should the Yes have it, will we be proud of having sulked about past injustices, of having followed the examples set by those who were frustrated by history and who preach territorial withdrawal instead of having the courage to build a strong and united Canada under the most flexible system in the world which can function perfectly only when its members, men and women alike, really want to negotiate and talk to each other.

Mr. Speaker, I can give you more that one example of what I have just asserted. Mr. Lévesque already has the mandate to negotiate the best terms possible for the people of Quebec: he has it now. When twice he slammed doors in our faces here in Ottawa during federal-provincial conferences, he had the mandate to improve the economic and social conditions of the citizens of Quebec. In fact, that is the mandate he was given when he was elected: give Quebec a good government. But instead of negotiating, he came here with the deliberate intention of proving that no success was possible in negotiations with the Canadian government and the governments of the other provinces. He is a slave to the program of his party, he must achieve the independence of Quebec and his strategy is very simple: slam doors here in Ottawa and implement the good recommendations of his chief advisor "Père Gédéon", that is, achieve independence on the QT.

And that, Mr. Speaker, is what Quebec people must know. With his referendum, Mr. Lévesque is putting into action a carefully planned strategy whereby twice he would slam doors here on the economic and social development of Quebec and Canada, and now, claiming his so-called pride to be a Quebecker, he is asking a mandate to come and negotiate the impossible. And then he would be able to return to the men and women in Quebec and say: "You see, they refuse to negotiate sovereignty-association. So, give us the authority to separate." He will have achieved what he set out to do and he will have completed his carefully planned strategy. People must be made aware of this.

People must consider this question in the context of the PQ election in 1976 up to the independence of Quebec which is part of the PQ platform. And this question is nothing more than a step toward the independence of Quebec. And I say to my fellow Canadians that we can be proud to be Canadians, to vote No to such a question, to work in a Canada where we feel fine as Quebeckers, to live as I do in Drummondville and to follow the road of excellence and courage rather than the path of defeatism and separation from a country and wealth which belong to us and our children.

[English]

Mr. Robert C. Coates (Cumberland-Colchester): Mr. Speaker, I heard the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) say "There cheers for Nova Scotia". It is nice to have the kind of ally he has been for Nova Scotians during the period that he and I have served together in the House of Commons.

• (1610)

This is a rather different Parliament for me from any of the nine previous in which I have served, different because the Right Hon. John G. Diefenbaker is no longer with us. While he did not sit in the last Parliament he was elected to it, and he added much indeed to the folklore of this nation from every point of view, much to the history of Canada, much to the commitment as one individual to one Canada, from the Atlantic to the Pacific, from the 49th parallel to the Arctic, and much to make Canada a better place for all of us to live. I miss him very much and I am sure that there are many other Canadians like me who miss him a great deal, especially in troubled times like these when we could always look upon him as a great champion for the people of Canada regardless from where they came, regardless of their ethnic extraction, regardless of their role in life. Whether they be the high and mighty or the lowly, he was their friend, their champion. He was special.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Coates: As I listened to the speeches made by my colleagues from the province of Quebec, I can only say to them that they carry a very heavy burden these days for all Canadians. I wish them well. I wish them success because, from a parliamentary point of view, our fate as a nation in many ways rests in their hands. They are our delegates to take our message to the people in their province telling them how much we want them to continue to be a part of the Canada we know today.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Coates: Mr. Speaker, I say that in many ways I miss the fact that we do not have the former Speaker with us. Over a period of time as the chairman of the management and members' services committee I came to have a high degree of respect for the fairness and for the capacity of James Jerome. He was an outstanding representative in the Parliament of Canada. He was the first among equals in this House for a long period of time. He did his job with exceptional impartiality, and I am sure all of us who were here and served with him will miss him; but at the same time we wish him well in the new, heavy responsibilities he has assumed in the Federal Court of Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Coates: Today, Canadians almost appear determined to involve themselves in a form of constitutional masochism, whether it be Quebec separatism or western alienation, rather than accepting the God-given advantages that almost make us the mother-lode of this planet.

At a time when the world is broadening its horizons, when new economic and political unions are binding areas of the earth together, when these new unions are cutting through narrow nationalistic ties, without threatening those nationalistic bonds and achieving significant economic benefits, it seems almost impossible to conceive that we would consider marching down a road that could ultimately destroy this confederation.

We now know that the agony of the present debate in Quebec on the specific matter of sovereignty-association—whatever that means—will end on May 20. In view of the fact that the issue seems little more than an operation in frustration, since all of Quebec's partners have indicated no willingness to discuss the matter after May 20, what is to be gained by Quebec or the nation is beyond my comprehension. I wish my colleagues in this House my very best wishes as they put forward the many sound and sensible reasons for maintaining this union that has been of such tremendous benefit to all in this nation and comparatively provides so much more to those who live here than is possible almost anywhere else in the world.

And yet with all of this evidence marshalled on the side of retaining our confederation, it seems that everywhere one goes in Canada today and from what we read and hear in the media leads one to conclude that the most common feeling or perception is that Canadians are puzzled, apprehensive and nervous about the future. A sense of malaise is widely prevalent across the land.

How can we account for this widespread feeling of malaise and apprehension? I do not profess to be any great analyst of the condition of modern society. I do not understand the jargon and many of the concepts that some of the so-called analysts use. Sometimes I wonder if they do so themselves, but I think having been re-elected successfully ten times to this House, having served as president of my party and having known and worked with a great many politicians over 23 years, I think this gives me some credentials to answer the basic question which is being asked more and more these days at home and abroad: "What seems to have gone wrong with Canada?".

It may well be that our thoughts have centred on our own deficiencies because we have been involved almost totally in the electoral process since. 1978. It is often said that one cannot see the forest for the trees. We have not been looking at what has been actually happening in the world, although we know with the energy crisis that has been upon us since the early 1970s that OPEC, by using the vehicle of an international economic union, has caused havoc with the financial viability of the industrialized world.

With the EEC we have witnessed, once again, that the economic clout of Europe has been enhanced without any real erosion, feared by many, occurring to the participating nations.

We hear a great deal of the economic nationalism that frightens many because of what they perceive to be the economic domination of our industrial base by the multinational corporations that are mainly based in the United States. What we do not seem to want to face up to is the fact that Canadians are traders and have proven over our 113-year history to be good traders. Indeed, the people from my province were expert traders long before there was a Canada, and indeed provided a success story prior to confederation that has not been equalled since 1867.

If we are to enjoy the benefits that match our potential we must look outward, not inward. We must look at the total North American continent, Canada, the United States and Mexico, and decide how as the people of this continent we can harness the possibilities that exist.

Let me say that I welcome the forthcoming visit of the President of Mexico and hope his visit will provide a productive opportunity for some discussions about the many common interests we share with that great nation. Mexico has come alive as a vital and vibrant nation in the new economic order. It, like Canada, sits on the border of the economic giant of the free world. It, like Canada, must face up to the identity problem that comes from being a neighbour of this great nation.

But neither Canada nor Mexico can achieve anything but benefits from charting a course that takes advantage of the possibilities that accrue from the fact that 220 million or more people in the United States provide a market, close at hand, with fewer obstacles than exist anywhere else on earth.

Let me just stress a few realities. Our economic relationship with the United States is overwhelming. Our Canadian investment patterns are showing a strong thrust into the U.S.; more and more Canadians are buying properties in the U.S.; and on all the big issues in the world our interest and those of the Americans are identical.

We are currently wrestling with the issue of the Olympic boycott. Our citizens feel as the Clark government felt when we stated we would also support that boycott. We are now awaiting the decision of the Trudeau government. I would feel a deep sense of betrayal for our best friend if our positions were to be anything other than the positive one taken by the Clark government.

We are indeed fortunate to have as the United States ambassador to Canada the hon. Kenneth Curtis. Ken Curtis has a history of a lifetime of close association with Canada. When governor of the state of Maine, he spearheaded the development of a formalized association between the governors of the New England states and the five eastern provinces of Canada. He later assumed heavy obligations within his own political party, the Democratic party, as chairman of their organization.

We then have in Canada today a man of significant ability, one who knows Canada well and knows the United States and its political institutions in a way not available to most in that nation, and who has already displayed a special and unique style of diplomacy in international affairs in our midst. What better man could be found to help us embark upon a new initiative in North American relations?

I have been impressed with the amount of activity of a positive nature that has been developing in recent years regarding closer arrangements between Canada and the United States. I refer to the Canadian Senate and especially its standing committee on foreign affairs. That committee produced a most helpful report on Canada's trade relationship with the United States. There are also the reports of the C. D. Howe Research Institute and reports of the sub-committee of the United States Senate chaired by Senator Baucus.

But one of the most imaginative suggestions I have seen comes from a former adviser to my leader, Mr. Duncan

Edmonds, who has developed proposals that could lead to a treaty of North America. Mr. Edmonds has established himself as a significant person in the political, academic and business community, as a man of great foresight in national and international affairs. His production of a draft treaty approach among Canada, the United States and Mexico provides the catalyst for the type of discussion that can only be of value and benefit for all who live on the North American continent. Mr. Edmonds' provocative proposals have recently been published in a number of Canadian newspapers across Canada, as well as being reprinted in the congressional record. I believe that Mr. Edmonds' analysis and suggestions for a closer structured relationship with the United States and Mexico would benefit all three countries and would certainly work to greatly strengthen Canada.

I would like to draw to the attention of the House some very interesting developments which have been stimulated by the national governors' association of the United States. That body today, comprised of the governors of all 50 states of the United States, has recently passed a detailed resolution earlier this year, from which I quote:

> Finally and most importantly, the federal government is encouraged to explore the possibility of immediate trilateral discussions concerning the establishment of an appropriate forum for discovering potential areas of future co-operation. Such a forum whether achieved through existing or newly created channels, should:
> 1) Guarantee the integrity and interest of each country;
> 2) Ensure that areas identified for study and discussion are agreed upon by full consensus;
> 3) Provide for equal representation for each country;
> 4) Ensure, in addition to federal participation, adequate representation from state and provincial governments, local governments and the private sector; and
> 5) Reserve actual policy decisions to the sovereign discretion of each country.

The chairman of the international trade committee of the national governors' association, governor Busbee of Georgia, has in co-operation with the Dean Rusk Centre at the University of Georgia produced some very excellent material,including a very major fact book and a very substantive memorandum on how we might proceed to get a greater degree of co-operation between Canada and the United States. I recommend that those who believe there is the type of merit I see in such future initiatives look closely at the proposal from the Dean Rusk Centre for the establishment of a North American council. Quoting from their report of November 16, 1979, on North American co-operation, they state on page 12:

> The centrepiece of the proposed National Governors' Association initiatives is a trilateral framework organization, which will serve as the most visible manifestation of the willingness of all three countries to solve continental problems through a continental approach, while ensuring the participation of those parties most actively involved in North American affairs.
> As is generally the case with framework organizations, the North American council would be primarily consultative in nature, with most of its work carried out in the normal activities of its membership. During the initial phase at least, plenary sessions of the council would be utilized to flesh out the commitment of Canada, Mexico, and the U.S. to a trilateral decision-making approach, establish personal contacts among the representatives, and set up a system for communications to ensure the continuation of council work in the interim period. This work can be further defined—and concrete responsibility assigned—by setting up specialized committees (trilateral) and subcommittees (either bilateral or concerned with specific projects) with authority to make findings of fact and recommendations to the council as a whole. Committee and subcommittee members could be left to make mutually convenient arrangements for meetings, timetables, and internal distribution of responsibility. The proposed trilateral communications system will provide the main forum for committee work. The major purpose of the council is to inculcate the habit of trilateral thinking among the decision-making elites of North America. Establishment of full-time representatives—or even a full-time staff, beyond the minimum necessary for administration—would be self-defeating, since the council is designed to reach persons who may spend only a portion of their time in foreign relations matters.
> The National Governors' Association can take the initiative in establishing a North American Council and thereby assure itself a leading role in all subsequent trilateral endeavours. With this end in mind, the following steps are recommended:
> (1) NGA should appoint regional committees to contact public and private parties involved in trade or other contacts with Canada and Mexico, to "talk up" the project, solicit ideas, and obtain pledges of participation and support;
> (2) NGA may then select a number of governors (representing each region) most interested in the project as its delegation to the council;
> (3) Federal authorities should be contacted and a representative group of federal policymakers co-opted to the delegation;
> (4) The delegation should be filled out with business leaders, academicians, and local officials, with the paramount criteria being a position of influence affecting relations with Canada or Mexico and at least general support for the project as a whole;
> (5) NGA should then sponsor a "call" to appropriate institutions in Canada and Mexico for the selection from each country of a delegation equal in number to that chosen by NGA; stipulated as principles for selection should be diversity in both geography and function, experience and authority in North American affairs, and inclusion of private interests.

I believe that there is enormous potential in these developments. In my judgment, the working out of a new set of arrangements with the United States and Mexico will be the dominant question of the 1980s. I commend this material to the House and suggest that it is the area where we can finally rediscover a sense of direction for Canada.

● (1630)

As Sir John A. Macdonald said over a century ago, geography is destiny; and as we move into the 1980s we are very fortunate to live beside the United States and to have an opportunity to work out with them and the Mexicans a closer set of relationships. The new set of relationships should strengthen Canada and should allow us to retain our sovereignty and independence while continuing to make a significant contribution to the world at large.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to conclude by reiterating Mr. Edmonds' conclusion in his own proposal:

> We have an opportunity to manage the process where history is inexorably taking us anyway. Rarely do a people have the opportunity we have now as Canadians to seize the moment where we are faced with a great national uncertainty and a sense of malaise and to replace that with a dynamic new sense of ourselves in partnership with the whole North American continent. We ought to begin this great task immediately.

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Lincoln): Thank you, Mr. President.

An hon. Member: Oh!

Mr. Mackasey: I apologize for calling you "President", Mr. Speaker, but I have just spent 18 months in another assembly where the Speaker is referred to as the "President" and it comes automatically.

I am not too sure whether I am to be categorized as a new boy. It is tempting to assume so because it gives me an opportunity to speak about my riding, the riding of Lincoln. I must confess I am rather pleased to be back in the House of Commons.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mackasey: Much has changed, of course. Television and radio, for instance, were not here four years ago. But much remains the same. When I came to the House in 1962 the Speaker was the present hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert). I sat so far back in the opposition ranks that I refused to sit in that position every time they filled the Rideau canal. I want to welcome the continued presence of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), one of the newer members of the Privy Council.

One change I note since I was here last is the disappearance of the Social Credit party and, unfortunately, the growth in numbers of the gallant little band of misfits in the corner over there. It is food for thought and, I am sure, for debate in the future.

An hon. Member: Just wait!

Mr. Mackasey: I am pleased I can still arouse some passion from the hon. member over there. We shall see as the session progresses, though certainly not in this speech.

It goes without saying that all of us in the House of Commons are concerned about the future of this nation. It goes without saying that the issue of the referendum in Quebec is in reality a non-partisan issue in the House of Commons. Certainly from my years of presence in this chamber I know that no particular party, including the Liberal party, has any monopoly of concern for this great country. Some of us in the House, as has been pointed out, do, of course, bear a unique responsibility at this particular moment in Canadian history—the responsibility of convincing millions of Canadians who reside in Quebec that they must reject categorically the inducements of those who would divide this wonderful country.

In the short time during which I have been privileged to represent Lincoln, certainly in the months prior to the election, I have found a surprising similarity between the make up of Lincoln and that of my old riding of Verdun which I represented here for from 1962 to 1976. Verdun could be described as a bedroom community on the outskirts of Montreal and at first glance it would seem to have little in common with the riding of Lincoln, with its large rural population, its fruit growing industry, its wineries, its industrial area outside of Hamilton. In reality, however, the problems of the small businessmen of Verdun and those of the farmers burdened with unnecessary and intolerable high interest rates are very similar.

Then there is a common concern about dumping in the fruit markets. As a Quebecker for years I agonized over dumping and its negative impact on the textile industry. I certainly appreciate the problems of the industrial worker in Hamilton, Stoney Creek or Grimsby who came here not too long ago from Italy or Spain or Portugal or Yugoslavia and who worries about his inability to purchase a home or make ends meet in facing the present rate of inflation. Regardless of the type of riding we represent, these problems which all of us face represent a common demoninator. So, Mr. Speaker, I look to the transition from one province to another not with trepidation but with interest because of the challenge it presents.

I want to talk now about this country as I see it and I know I am speaking for most members. Those in Quebec who try to portray federalism as a failure are totally inaccurate. Federalism, with all its faults, has been a tremendous success. It has not been a total success, but it has been a tremendous success. There is no country in the world whose citizens have the degree of freedom of expression that we have in this country. We even have the freedom to advocate separation, independence, balkanization, or the total end to the country as we know it. We have freedom of expression, freedom of movement and freedom of religion. Ours is a country which perhaps we take for granted. There are countries which, as many of the new citizens of Lincoln have reminded me, deny their citizens these freedoms, hence their determination to come to this great country. Yes, despite all its faults ours has been a system which has made it possible for the French language and the French culture to survive and prosper, to the betterment of all of this country.

There was a time in Quebec when I could have understood the present movement, even a referendum. It was a time not too many decades ago when French-speaking Canadians in that province felt like second-class citizens. They were denied in too many instances the job opportunities which were rightfully theirs as Canadians. They were denied even in this House of Commons as recently as 1962 bilingualism to the degree we now accept. People in Quebec were denied the right to speak their own language at work in many of the areas of that beautiful province. All of us, then, can understand the anger, passion and resentment of these proud people, with their great heritage and culture.

However, I submit that that threat to the French language and the French culture in Quebec is past. It is behind us, and if there is a threat to the French language and the French culture in Quebec, it is not because Quebec is part of Canada; rather the threat comes from technology and the ability of everybody in that province to tune in to radio, television or what have you—the electronic media—in any language in the world.

So the fight, thank goodness, for equality in that particular area is one that I like to think is over. I might say that there are one million English-speaking Quebeckers who rejoice at the fact that Canadians can live in relative harmony and with total freedom and access to all opportunities in either of the two official languages in this country. Many of the doors that were locked to French-speaking Canadians in the sixties in the business community were also out of bounds to the Irish Canadian, the new Canadian or people of the Jewish faith. Prejudice is all-embracing at times.

This is why the dedicated separatist is now focusing on economics as a reason for independence. Without control of economics you do not control power. Some of the politicians in Quebec, like some of the politicians in other provinces and like some of the politicians in the federal House, lust for power. The question is, what do you do with power after you acquire it? Obviously the Parti Québécois government is determined, through a policy of gradualism, to control the economic levers of that province at all costs.

The message of the Parti Québécois to Quebeckers is a seductive one, but when, as I have on occasion in my 18 months in the Quebec assembly, I put the question squarely to this minister or that minister in a little bull session after hours, as we often have here, he was hard pressed to say what single particular power or concession or change in the constitution he would ask for if he had that opportunity because—and I come back to my theme—federalism, despite its faults, has been the proper type of government for this great country of ours.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mackasey: I think too, as the debate warms up and as we approach the crucial date, that it is good to remind ourselves that many people who support the cause of separatism in Quebec do so because of a legitimate concern. It is their right in our society to endorse whatever political form of government they wish. Some of them are convinced that unless there is a separate Quebec, their language and their culture shall disappear. Some of them are convinced that economically it is to the best advantage of that province to separate.

It is wrong, as some people may have a tendency to do, to look on people who preach independence or separation as mystics, freaks or aberrations. I have found myself in my 18 months in the Quebec assembly almost seduced at times by the eloquence of the arguments which flowed from some people with the intense conviction that it is in the best interest of this country to disintegrate and retain some form of relationship.

I think that in the longer run there is an equally great threat to the future of Canada, and that is if we weaken further the central government in those spheres where it is important for the government to be strong. The greater threat to this country is the perpetuation of regional disparity and inequality of opportunity. If we are going to offer the youngster in the Atlantic provinces the same opportunities we offer the youngster in Central Canada—in Toronto, Montreal or our larger cities which are so close to our great institutions of education and learning—the central government must have the economic means at its disposal to provide those youngsters with equality of opportunity in all fields.

If we deny the central government access to capital—to money—then we will inevitably be denying less privileged provinces equality in such basic programs as medicare and education, and in playing decent roles and having access to the very best professors and universities. They go hand in hand, and if we continue to have no policy or if the central government is so weakened that the poor grow poorer and the rich grow richer, then it is inevitable that the strains on confederation will be greater in ten years than even that imposed on confederation by the Parti Québécois in its dedication to two countries.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, I simply want to tell my fellow citizens from Quebec that this land belongs to every Canadian and that it is unthinkable that the French-speaking Quebeckers choose independence, thus depriving their children and grandchildren of the innumerable advantages offered by Canada. This country was explored by French-speaking Canadians. As soon as the French landed from France on our continent, Mr. Speaker, they went up its rivers, explored its wilderness, set up hamlets and outposts. Quebeckers fought for Canada during two world wars in foreign countries. Their poets, writers, politicians, intellectuals, businessmen, have all contributed largely to the development of what can be considered as one of the most prosperous and freest countries in the world.

Those who dare suggest to Quebeckers that, after all that, they should give up what they have contributed to and take the road to independence cannot pretend to care for the interests of Quebeckers. We would rather be led to believe that those who are advocating that careless action line are more interested in power than in justice.

[English]

Finally, I would say that regardless of the outcome of the referendum—perhaps particularly if the No vote succeeds, and I say "if" because it is "iffy", if you like—constitutional change must cede to the provinces those powers that are needed to retain regional differences, cultural traits and the unique way of life of the maritimes and the west. At the same time I repeat that it must strengthen the central government in those areas where it is important that the central government have the power and the resources to equalize opportunity in this great country.

One of the advantages which I know new members will appreciate in this House—a fringe benefit, I may add—is an opportunity to see Canada to the degree that is denied most Canadians because of the vastness of this country. I am glad that I have had the opportunity and the inclination to visit the interior of British Columbia, to see for myself the grandeur of the Rockies on a sunny day, to fly over them, to go deep into the Okanagan Valley and wonder at the majestic beauty of that part of the world, to marvel at the wheat fields in the fall and perhaps, to touch bases, in British Columbia and Cape Breton seeking the elusive salmon.

An hon. Member: What about the Fraser Valley?

Mr. Mackasey: Frankly, hon. members will have an opportunity when they visit Quebec to understand its joie de vivre, its excitement. When they hear some of the folk songs, they might recognize a little of the music that was brought here from Ireland, if you like, 100 years or so before the conquest. It is that kind of a country, a great country. We must work together to keep it that way.

The hon. member who preceded me quoted at length from a prominent Canadian. Perhaps I might read into the record the views of another Canadian who said the following:

I look to the future of my adopted country with hope, though not without anxiety; I see in the not remote distance, one great nationality bound, like the shield of Achilles, by the blue rim of ocean—I see it quartered into many communities—each disposing of its internal affairs—but all bound together by free institutions, free intercourse, and free commerce; I see within the ground of that shield, the peaks of the western mountains, and the crests of the eastern waves—the winding Assiniboine, the fivefold lakes, the St. Lawrence, the Ottawa, the Saguenay, the St. John, and the basin of Minas—by all these flowing waters, in all the valleys they fertilize, in all the cities they visit in their courses, I see a generation of industrious, contented, moral men, free in name and in fact, men capable of maintaining, in peace and in war, a constitution worthy of such a country.

Those were the words of Thomas Darcy McGee in the confederation debate.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Bill McKnight (Kindersley-Lloydminster): Mr. Speaker, I should like to congratulate Madam Speaker on her appointment. I was first elected to the House in May 1979 and I did not know the former Speaker that well. But during the time that I was here he was fair and impartial, and I am sure that Madam Speaker will follow in his footsteps.

Briefly, I would like to say thank you to the people of Kindersley-Lloydminster for returning me to the House of Commons. It is an honour I greatly appreciate, and I commit myself to representing them in the House of Commons to the best of my ability. But as a member of Parliament from Saskatchewan, from one of the western provinces, I took exception in the throne speech to the reference that was made to the elected members of the three westernmost provinces, that we have a special responsibility to our constituents in this Parliament and that we have a special responsibility to represent our constituents to the nation and the nation to our constituents.

What is the nation? Is the nation only central Canada? Is the nation only Ontario or Quebec? I can only agree with the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Fraser) who said that the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) was the last person in Canada to lecture western members of Parliament on their responsibilities to their constituents. The throne speech sets out the Trudeau Liberal policy to rob western Canada of its resources.

We have heard much in this debate about why we have Canada. I want to say at the outset that I think we will have Canada and I will work to have Canada. But we cannot have Canada when we sell our resources and our products at less than world prices and pay greater than world prices for those things that we buy from the rest of Canada. My region of Canada has long been neglected by Liberal governments. After hearing the Speech from the Throne, I think again we will be neglected by the present Liberal government.

I know that there are inequities in Canada. There are inequities in the Atlantic Region, in British Columbia, in Ontario and in Quebec, but those inequities have developed over the last twelve years, the twelve years that the present Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) has been the Prime Minister of Canada. Having a debate on national unity, and having the forces to try to keep Canada together under the control of the Liberal government would be like putting a coyote in Saskatchewan in charge of the chicken coop.

In the throne speech the hopes and aspirations of the people of Canada, particularly the people of western Canada, were ignored. It made mention of railways and ports. It pointed out how important the railroads were to the development in the 1800's. Let me say they are still important. They have not finished what they started, and we would hope that they would be instructed to do so.

There is mention of the government's commitment to upgrading rail and port facilities, but there are already concerns expressed by producers in western Canada about the statements made by ministers of the Crown, including statements made by the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin). I do not doubt that they are mixed up and I can understand why they are confused as to the direction of this government.

Let me refer to the Prince Rupert grain terminal at the port of Prince Rupert. The senator for economic development stated on April 2 that the minister did not understand what the Minister of Transport was up to. On April 9 the senator responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board said in the strongest terms that the government will go ahead with the terminal at Prince Rupert. On April 16, in the other place, the government leader of the Senate said:

Negotiations are, as I said, proceeding today, but the present plan involves a significant portion of that coming in the form of a grant. May I suggest to the hon. senator that the essence of this proposal varies not one whit from the agreement that was originated by the previous Liberal government—

I would just like to take a moment, Mr. Speaker, to say that there was not any agreement by the past Liberal government. The understanding of an agreement was negotiated by the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski) after he had been in that portfolio for two months.

I will give you a brief history. The then minister of transport, now no longer in this House, in 1978 offered $16.3 million in federal funds to the port of Prince Rupert. It was the understanding of the consortium that this was in the form of a grant. Shortly after the minister said it was not in the form of a grant, the funds were to be found in accordance with that famous saying, "user-pay" the minister implemented.

The negotiations developed a little more and the consortium became ever more convinced that it was being asked to pay an inordinate amount of the infrastructure; no longer $16 million but $45 million, of which it was being asked to cover $27 million for the Ridley development, to the greater glory of the National Harbours Board, the coal companies of Canada, whoever the consortium bought.

The consortium objected strongly to having to provide the $20 million performance bond demanded by the National Harbours Board. The consortium objected strongly to the concept of a through-put charge. It was a means of recovery by the National Harbours Board of its costs. The National Harbours Board was requesting a 15 per cent to 18 per cent return on its funds invested for the complete recovery in 20 years.

I should just like to say, Mr. Speaker, that there was not any agreement. The only agreement was the agreement put into effect by the hon. member for Vegreville.

Already in Saskatchewan, and in western Canada as a whole, we hear concern expressed about the future of the Canadian Wheat Board. Of all the choices available to this government as a representative of the people of Saskatchewan, this government chose the one with the least ties to my province; this government chose one with no ties to the Liberal party of Saskatchewan; no ties to the NDP of Saskatchewan, and certainly no ties to the Progressive Conservative Party of Saskatchewan.

Our people in Saskatchewan would have been well served had this government chosen the Senator from Prince Albert or the Senator from Saskatoon, or even the hon. member for St. Boniface (Mr. Bockstael) who, I know, would have served western Canada well. I had the opportunity to get to know and understand the hon. member for St. Boniface while on the Standing Committee on Agriculture, which I had the honour to chair in the last House. He would have been a great champion of western Canada, and that is perhaps why he was not included in the cabinet. I think maybe—I do not think, I know—that the Prime Minister chose the wrong member from Manitoba to represent western Canada.

We in my part of Canada, Saskatchewan, have had the problems and promise of Confederation for 113 years. The major concern and the major problem for those 113 years have been in respect of transportation. How do we move our grain? How do we move our potash? How do we move our oil, and how do we move our coal? We move these products, or the majority of them, by rail. In the words of Mr. Justice Emmett Hall:

> Transportation in western Canada is a most important component of its economic and social structure. It has—since confederation—been an instrument of public policy and a tool of development.

The only commitment we have heard from this government, and the only commitment we heard during the campaign, was that of double tracking. I cannot believe that the hon. member from Cornwall, who was the transportation critic, or the hon. member for Laprairie (Mr. Deniger) who is very knowledgeable about transportation, would put that into a policy bulletin.

An hon. Member: Why not? They have double tracked everything else.

Mr. McKnight: No, they double back. The only thing that comes to my mind is that it had to be put in by that senator-in-waiting from Saskatchewan, that twice defeated candidate in Assiniboia. There is no justification for someone to say that the Liberal government has studied it and is closely informed about it, particularly when ministers come out and say they can do this very cheaply and very easily. They have suggested that what they will do is join the rail sidings at elevators. This would be fine if they were all on the left-hand side of the track or all on the right-hand side of the track, but they are not. There are some on the left and some on the right, and you would have the railroad track go like that. I do not think that even the Minister of Transport could run trains that way.

Double tracking is not a joke, unless double tracking is talked about from Winnipeg to Vancouver. Double tracking is old hat to the railroads. The CN has been planning double tracking west of Edmonton since the early 1970s. The CPR now has four double tracking programs, three of them under construction, and the fourth, the Beaver Tunnel, is still in the planning stage. The expansion west of Edmonton and Calgary is expensive and necessary, but I did not hear any commitments from this government in the throne speech to finance the cost of $2.7 million per mile. The only comments that I have heard about financing were made by the Minister of Transport who has said that the method of raising the capital may be the resolution of the Crow rate. That means that the farmers of Canada will pay the per mile rate which totals $2.7 million.

The same minister has also said that the Crow rate is an impediment. He went on to say that if we cannot change the Crow rate now, in a time of growth and prosperity, we may have missed our time in history. I would like to say to members opposite that if the Crow rate is changed now they will have more than missed their place in history, they will disappear completely in the history of that part of western Canada.

Although the fact is not very well known, Saskatchewan is an oil-producing province. Most people think that Alberta is the only oil-producing province in Canada. Other oil-producing provinces are British Columbia, Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Ontario, and Newfoundland. However, I would like to talk about Saskatchewan and the resources which belong to the people of that province. Saskatchewan gained control of its resources in 1930 under the Resources Transfer Act. They were not given to us when we entered confederation, but they were given to us in 1930 by a Conservative government. Alberta received its resources under the same act.

In the Speech from the Throne we do not see these resources being treated as resources but as a public utility. They are not a public utility. They are resources which belong to the people of Saskatchewan. I would like to hear other members from Saskatchewan who are not in my party stand for the people they represent in that province, not for the people of Ontario and the Canadian Labour Congress, but for the people of Saskatchewan who elected them and who will re-elect them if they do not sell out to big interests and big labour unions.

An hon. Member: That's your problem; that was your government's policy.

Mr. McKnight: We had a policy, but you did not give us time to implement it.

An hon. Member: That's your problem.

Mr. McKnight: It was your motion, but if you wish to interrupt and get on to last year's problems—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I regret to interrupt, but would the hon. member address his remarks to the Chair?

Mr. McKnight: We have heard talk, Mr. Speaker, of heritage funds. Saskatchewan, as well as Alberta, has a heritage fund, although it is not as large as Alberta's fund. It is not one tenth as large as Alberta's heritage fund. Saskatchewan's heritage fund contains approximately $600 million which is broken down into $350,000 in cash, $18 million in investments, and the balance invested in Saskatchewan government corporations which pay no interest and therefore there is no return to the people of Saskatchewan.

The pricing system of our resources must be based on the same pricing system as that of the other provinces. Why is there an export tax for the sale of oil outside Canada? There is no export tax on the sale of hydroelectric power from Quebec to the United States. There is no export tax on gold exported from Ontario. There is no tax on Ontario's nickel or Quebec's asbestos, so why is there an export tax on oil? I am sorry to have mentioned this fact, because with the present government's inclination toward taxation it will probably tax the products of the provinces that I have mentioned.

What do we produce in the province of Saskatchewan? We produce grain which is sold on the world market at the world price, the price which the farmer can get. When we buy goods in Canada, it is under the protection of a tariff. When we try to sell all our oil resources it must be according to a blended price, not a world price! Saskatchewan has shared greatly with the rest of Canada and will continue to share, but we do not like to have our resources treated in the export market differently from the resources of the rest of the country. We would like to have our resources treated in the same way. We do not have a blended price for nickel or asbestos, but a price which the market will bear.

With the present government's lack of commitment to energy self-sufficiency, we will continue to pay large subsidies for the importation of oil into Canada. We in western Canada pay for the subsidy through taxation, and we do not receive the world price for our resources. That is not fair. It is not what Confederation is about, and it is not acceptable to the people of Saskatchewan nor, I am sure, to the other provinces.

Another major resource in Saskatchewan is uranium. The premier of Saskatchewan has spent millions of the taxpayers' dollars to develop this resource. But we cannot develop uranium or the other minerals found in our province unless we know that they will not be taken away from us. We cannot continue to put our tax dollars into development and have it taken out by having to share through lower prices to the rest of Canada.

A great deal of concern has been expressed by some members of the CLC and NDP about development in other countries. I would like the members from Saskatchewan in that party to express the concerns of their constituents for the development of their regions. I hope that they will express these concerns to their leader so that we can get on and develop our part of Canada and contribute to the rest of Canada.

We have made a contribution to Canada, and we will continue to contribute.

An hon. Member: Practise what you preach.

Mr. McKnight: I hear some members saying "practise what you preach". Western Canada, through its oil resources, has contributed and will continue to contribute up to $20 million in subsidies to the rest of Canada. Another form of contribution which we make is the two-price wheat system. For those hon. members who do not understand what it is, the two-price wheat system is a system through which the western wheat farmers subsidize the consumers of Canada in the price of bread. This is costing the western Canadian grain farmer over $50 million a year, approximately $1 million a week.

The interest rate is higher now than it has ever been in the history of Canada. The Speech from the Throne recognizes the problem but offers no solution. The burden felt by the farmer and small businessmen of Saskatchewan cannot continue. We presented a small development loan plan which would have substantially reduced the cost of interest to the farm and business communities of Canada. Right now the Farm Credit Corporation is short by $50 million in its funding, $50 million more than it would have been had our government stayed in power. The interest rate for the FCC is 13 per cent. This is the highest in its history, and it comes at a time when there has been a net decrease in farm income in the province of Saskatchewan over the past three years. The effect on farmers is devastating.

Farmers, both young and old, are being forced to sell their land. Unfortunately, in Saskatchewan their land is being sold to the Saskatchewan Land Bank. They are selling to the land bank, which is a system whereby government owns the land and the farmer is a tenant. This is the only option open to some of the young and older farmers in the province of Saskatchewan. If the goal of the government of Saskatchewan is to assist individuals in farming they could do it, presumably, by allowing the farmer to hold the mortgage. That way he would be able to build up equity and eventually own his farm, but there is a socialistic insistence by this government that it own the land. Right now this policy has made the province of Saskatchewan the largest holder of cultivated land in Canada. Over one million acres are owned and controlled by that government.

To add insult to injury, the province of Saskatchewan will take freedom away from people who love freedom, from people who came to this country as individuals to make their mark, to better themselves, and make a better life for their families. The Saskatchewan government has set up a committee to study the size of farms, and to limit individual ownership in the province. This is intervention in private life. I know that hon. members opposite are not concerned about government intervention because in the throne speech I noticed the creation of four more Crown corporations.

Mr. Broadbent: In Alberta?

Mr. McKnight: Four more Crown corporations, Mr. Speaker, and then they make the statement that the people do not want less government but that they want more efficient government. If the record continues as it has in the past, it will not be more efficient, it will be more expensive government.

I hear a member of the New Democratic Party asking what about Alberta? Well, what about Alberta? We in Saskatchewan know the meaning of government bureaucracy because we have the highest percentage of government employees for our population, west of Ontario. In Ontario it is .99 per cent; in Manitoba, 1.13 per cent; in British Columbia, 1.42 per cent; in Alberta, 2.41 per cent, while Saskatchewan has 2.79 per cent of the population employed by the government.

An hon. Member: They are a bunch of socialists.

Mr. McKnight: Yes, Mr. Speaker, I think they are a bunch of socialists!

It was mentioned in the Speech from the Throne that the Post Office was to be made a Crown Corporation. Apparently that is a brand new idea. As I recall, a member of our party was commissioned to do a study of the Post Office. He recommended that it be made a Crown corporation and, Mr. Speaker, if we had continued in office we would have moved in that direction.

I should like to refer to the present situation in Saskatchewan, Mr. Speaker. I know the Postmaster General (Mr. Ouellet) would not understand the postal service in Saskatchewan. I am sure he understands it in Papineau and Montreal, but he does not understand it in rural Saskatchewan. The condition of the post office buildings and the working conditions of the post office employees are abysmal—

An hon. Member: Pathetic.

Mr. McKnight: Somebody said pathetic, so maybe I could use both words. I suggest to the Postmaster General that he should look at some of these post offices and try to find a washroom, a bright interior—try to find anything in a post office in rural Saskatchewan in my riding of Kindersley-Lloydminster that would make it a pleasant experience to work there, or that would make employees happy and comfortable in their jobs.

That is not the worst of it, however. Now they want to close up on Saturdays and at noon hour. People in rural Saskatchewan drive 20 miles and further to pick up their mail. When you drive 20 miles to pick up your mail you would like to do something else as well. The social and economic problems that will be created by post offices in rural Saskatchewan closing on Saturdays will be the death of some small communities. I know the Postmaster General is concerned with the quality of life in the new suburbs and the cities, and that he is concerned with daily door to door delivery. But when we in Saskatchewan and rural Canada pay 17 cents to mail a letter or a postcard, we at least deserve an open building when we go there to get our mail. I should like the minister to visit these post offices; indeed, he should spend a day in one.

I have an example of the patient waiting of people in Saskatchewan. In a letter to me dated April 8, 1980, the town of Landis informed me that the federal government has been considering upgrading the postal facilities at Landis since 1964. The people of the community forwarded a petition in 1978 requesting improvements, and to date they have not received an adequate response saying when they may expect some action. They are patient; they are in no hurry; it is only 12 years since they asked, and another 12 years later on they will have the same old rundown post office building, and I am sure they will petition again.

Is it any wonder that there is a feeling of alienation in western Canada? Is it any wonder, considering the callous disregard for regional aspirations in all parts of the country apparent in the Speech from the Throne, that the people of Canada are dissatisfied to the point of wanting to withdraw—to break up Canada? In my part of Canada we have concern. So that hon. members opposite and this government may understand that it is not just one region of Canada that is concerned, I should like to read from the Montreal Gazette of April 15, as follows:

> In the western provinces, he said, 32 per cent of the population favour the status quo, compared with 33 per cent in Quebec; 58 per cent of westerners favour change in the form of renewed federalism or independence compared with 59 per cent in Quebec; and 10 per cent of westerners favour joining the U.S. compared with eight per cent of Quebeckers.

These are the figures of the Canada West Foundation given by Stanley Roberts, the former leader of the Liberal Party of Manitoba.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but the time allotted to him has expired. He may continue with unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

An hon. Member: Tell us about Dick Collver.

Mr. McKnight: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and I should like to indicate my appreciation to my colleagues. My remarks will be brief. I shall try to explain my point of view and my feelings toward our country.

I have expressed the concern from my region of Canada and I feel they are valid concerns. I am speaking for myself, but I sense that particularly among my French Canadian friends there is often a feeling that those of us not from Quebec may not understand and may not care about what happens in that province. Let me say, Mr. Speaker, that those of us not from Quebec also understand the problems of Quebec.

I agree with the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Mackasey) who said that by being members of Parliament we will be enriched and will have opportunities that we may not otherwise have had. My colleagues in this party, and the leader of this party, are trying to bring insight and understanding to the aspirations of the people of Quebec, even though they do not live there.

I would implore all sides of this House, particularly those responsible for developing policies and constitutional changes, not to ignore what might be said by those who do not come from Quebec, because we do care about Canada, we do care about Quebec. As a Canadian who has lived most of his adult life in Saskatchewan, I care that Quebec stays in Canada. I want to say to my fellow-Canadians who live in Quebec: stay in Canada. "Dit Oui". Say no. We want you. We need you.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mrs. Suzanne Beauchamp-Niquet (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, when we went before the Canadian people last winter, we stated what would be the meaning of our policies if we were re-elected. A few days ago, the throne speech confirmed our intentions of solving the problems experienced by the majority in a way which would favour the majority.

In short, the government has kept its word, as we commonly say. The policy statement of the government introduces realistic measures for all of us, including the communities in the Saguenay and Lake St. John area. That region is one of the most typical and owing to its physical geography and its social fabric, it is one of those parts of the country which could be self-sufficient, if its people so decided. This is surely a caricatural description. However, it explains the character of its inhabitants who have learned to rely on themselves before depending on some external aid.

Madam Speaker, the economy of the region depends, like other outlying regions of Quebec and Canada, on the development of natural resources. In the Saguenay-Lac-St-Jean area forestry, mining and hydroelectric industries are predominant. A secondary industry based on these resources has been developed.

After a period of stagnation in the 1960s, the seventies saw a slight increase in population, although lower than the Quebec average. The main centres, towns like Alma, La Baie, Chicoutimi, Jonquière, as well as the towns in my riding of Roberval, namely Roberval, St-Félicien, Normandin, Mistassini and Dolbeau, of which I am the mayor, encompass about 80 per cent of the total population of the area, which is of approximately 300,000. As in other Quebec regions, and I am thinking here of eastern Quebec, the migration of young people towards Quebec City and Montreal shows that there is still room for improvement and that the people's ingenuity deserves the attention of central governments.

In 1977, Mr. Speaker, in the Saguenay-Lac-St-Jean, the personal disposable income was 9 per cent lower than the Quebec average and a labour market survey shows that unemployment is far greater than that of Quebec in general. Earnings, as far as employment is concerned, are in the manufacturing industry, especially following the opening of the Donahue plant in St-Félicien, and in the building sector. Since its implementation some months ago, the Alcan development project in Ville-de-la-Baie for example has created over 500 jobs. Besides creating hundreds of jobs, the taxation data centre of Revenue Canada in Jonquière opens interesting opportunities for the available manpower.

However, Mr. Speaker, despite these important efforts made at developing our region, the backbone of our economy—I am referring to our forestry, mining and hydro industries—require constant attention. Our prosperity depends closely on the development and processing of our resources in these three specialized sectors. But as production becomes more and more specialized, it gets more and more dependent upon the efficiency of government policies and the fluctuations of international markets. Given the fact that these three industries are largely dependent upon government actions, I look forward to the establishment of a coherent industrial policy on the development of remote areas.

In another vein, the emphasis put by the government of Canada on the use of sources of energy other than oil—and I am thinking here, Mr. Speaker, about energy produced from wood scraps, bark, for example—can only promote the competitive accounting of production costs. The consolidation of access roads as envisaged in the Speech from the Throne will provide another element of rationalization of transportation costs which, as everyone knows, are constantly on the rise.

So we can anticipate in the rather near future a framework likely to reassure the main participants in those sectors. I note with relief the possible gradual conversion of enormous investments made available in the form of social programs into more productive investments, particularly, as already pointed out by the present Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. De Bané), in so far as an industrial strategy will be solidly backed by fiscal and monetary measures more likely to promote reinvestment. I am assuming here a close relationship with the Department of Finance in any step towards regionalization, including the regionalization of the fiscal policy.

Mr. Speaker, the Saguenay-Lac-Saint-Jean area is known favourably as one of the places in Quebec where pride runs high and the sense of belonging to something is perhaps very deeply rooted. A Jeannois or a Bleuet speaks loudly and does not go unnoticed. Such a will to overcome the humiliations suffered as a result of our remoteness has led us to answer those who reply yes, but your place is far away. Far away from what? It is right to say that we of the Saguenay-Lac-St-Jean area are somewhat our own masters.

In that respect, Mr. Speaker, I would point out the unique testimony in our history of the setting up of Entraide Économique, one of the more progressive financial institutions in Quebec. Started from a simple but good intention less than 20 years ago, that savings co-operative now handling billions of dollars has undoubtedly contributed more in at least the past ten years to the development of small and medium-sized businesses in our area and in Quebec as a whole than all levels of government put together. You know, Mr. Speaker, there is no miracle there.

But there was a certain Jacques Gagnon, a worker from our own region, who 20 years ago, having enlisted the help of other workers, was determined to do something and to enable the people of his own region to help themselves. These people I say have now regrouped around the new president, Mr. Eric Forest. They are still working very hard, not only at the regional level, but also at the provincial level, and I believe that they have now proven themselves completely.

I have quoted this particular example to illustrate what I consider the profound meaning of the present constitutional debate. The main issue concerns on the one hand the distribution of present powers, and on the other the coherent use of the powers already existing. In this regard, Mr. Speaker, in the eventuality of redistribution of jurisdictional areas, we have to take into account the irreversible upward thrust of the regions and I would even suggest, as Senator Maurice Lamontagne said, that no commitment to any constitutional change can be undertaken before we evaluate the impact of these regional characteristics on which our opportunities for economic, social and cultural development will increasingly depend. My experience within regional organizations and as head of a municipal government has convinced me and many others that the real debate does not concern a fight between central powers, but rather the means that those who hold these powers are willing to take to provide the members of regional communities with the control required to better develop the ways of meeting their regional needs.

[English]

The upcoming reality tends towards the virtual admission of "small is beautiful". Indeed, no constitutional changes should be initiated without respecting regional assets. And, when I think of regional powers, I refer to the latitude to which local communities could afford to go in the administrative process, in political and financial issues concerning the quality of life of all citizens of a region, normally defined by human and natural factors.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, in view of the trends which I have listed, I would support any proposal to renew our political equilibrium which would take into account the true aspirations of the citizens. The political history of Quebec in this regard and the disequilibrium it is now causing in the Canadian structure do not in my view provide the whole context of the problem. The separation of Quebec would not solve anything, but could well delay the granting of the regional powers which are so important for our communities, and my region is certainly not the least concerned in this matter. The political separation of Quebec from the Canadian nation would bring about an undeniable flow of centralization towards Quebec City at the expense of the regions, and the process has already begun with Act 57 on municipal reform, Mr. Speaker. This eventuality can be verified by the consequences of jurisdictional reorganizations which a sovereign Quebec would have to face.

The mood and the temper in the Canadian government as well as in that of Quebec, temper which has been obvious for several years already, would threaten to abort and minimize, if not contradict, reality. The same phenomenon in other parts of Canada, if they too decided to copy the behaviour of present day Quebec leaders, would provoke a comparable imbalance. Still, Mr. Speaker, those other areas express their regional needs energetically without rejecting the federal formula for political organization. Of course, some will say that Quebec is a different province. I recognize that. But how is it different? In that we are Francophones, but if we have survived to this day, it may be that some protection spared us from becoming the fourth underdeveloped state of northern United States.

Mr. Speaker, as a Quebecker, proud to be a Quebecker and proud to be a Canadian, I want to repeat to this House what I said throughout my election campaign: I consider myself every bit as much of a Quebecker as any woman who is a member of the PQ in the province of Quebec. I am Quebecker and, as I have already said, I am proud to be a Quebecker, and I want to remain a Quebecker in a united Canada.

[English]

Mr. Ian Deans (Hamilton Mountain): Mr. Speaker, it is certainly a pleasure to be here. I have looked forward to this day for some time, as you can appreciate, having watched the workings of the federal Parliament for a long number of years.

I first want to congratulate Madam Speaker on the assumption of her new role, and to say that if the last two or three days are any indication of the way in which she will handle the business of the House, she is to be commended for the way she has picked up and assumed that role.

I also want to congratulate all members who are either returned or have been elected for the first time. I know as a first-time member how exciting it is to get elected to Parliament, and how important the role is that we all have to play. I want to say to the constitutents who trooped out to the polls on election day and voted in vast numbers to send me here that I hope I will provide them whith the kind of satisfaction and leadership they anticipated and that, in the final analysis, they will find what I have done here on their behalf will be to their liking and they might even consider sending me back, which is unusual for the constituency that I represent.

I do not intend to dwell at great length on the constituency, although I want to point out a couple of things that are important in terms of what my constituents feel about both government and Parliament. To begin with, I sent out a little questionnaire not long after the election. I asked them to explain to me what they felt were the important matters that should be dealt with by this government and what they expected of me in terms of what I should be saying.

It came through loud and clear that the primary concern of the majority of people, all of whom are very hardworking and have spent a great deal of time trying to build their place in the Hamilton community, is the impact of interest rates, not only in terms of mortgages, although that would be one of the primary concerns, but also in terms of the purchasing power that they are losing day by day to the ever-increasing mortgage interest rate and the ever-increasing consumer rate that they are going to have to pay and, indeed, are now paying.

They are also expressing a concern about the impact of that on jobs as they are unable to find the necessary consumer dollars to buy the goods that they normally would purchase. They know, as I know, as any member here knows, that the impact of that on the people who are working and producing those consumer products that would normally be purchased, is a very great impact indeed. Over the course of the next short while, because of the reduction in purchasing power that the higher and higher interest rates are bringing about, there will undoubtedly be a reduction in the manufacturing sector. That reduction will mean fewer people working. As one person said to me, as fewer people work, those of us who can find jobs will be required to pay even more in order to maintain the structures that we have set up.

It seems to me, and to a lot of people like me in this country, that it is vital that this Parliament address itself immediately to the problem of high interest rates. The cost of purchasing in terms of what must be paid in interest alone has gone all out of proportion. I expect to hear better from the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) than his statements which, frankly, made no sense in the last two days when he spoke about the small number of people who may be assisted by a mortgage interest program. He spoke about the others who will simply have to bear the burden and find a way to pay it. I know my constituents do not agree with that, and I want to make it clear to the Minister of Finance on their behalf that I do not agree with it either.

The high cost of living, which is a subject rarely addressed, exacts its toll on pensioners, on low and middle income families attempting to find their own way. It is time Parliament set aside a block of time to deal with the components which make up the ever-increasing cost of living. It is time members set aside time to speak to each other and to the government about what specific actions might reasonably be taken to control the ever increasing cost of living because, unless we do, we shall find that the industrial base of the country is being undermined—less and less of the money people earn will be available for the purchase of the things we produce across the country, and if we cannot buy what we produce because we have to tie up so much of the money which is available simply to provide the essentials, then obviously the effect will once again be a reduction in manufacturing and employment.

We must ever be cautious that we do not allow the cost of the essential part of life—housing, food, medical care, education—to reach such outrageous proportions in terms of capacity to earn that people having nothing left to spend on other and more enjoyable but, nevertheless, in our society from an economic point of view, equally important areas in which money ought to be spent.

I want to say a brief word about the problems in Quebec. I do not understand them well, I must confess, and I say to my colleagues from Quebec, not being from Quebec, that it is difficult to be truly understanding of what is happening in that province. I would have liked, tonight, to say a word or two in French, but I say to you, quite truthfully, Mr. Speaker, that had I done that I would not have understood it and, perhaps, neither would you. But I have enrolled in a French class and some day before this Parliament is over I swear I will stand here and do it, believe me.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Deans: Nevertheless, let me tell hon. members something that I do understand, or at least, I think I do. I have watched Parliament work for many years, as you know, and I do not understand why it is that the people of Quebec feel their grievances have not been adequately presented to Parliament. I do not understand this, given that the proportion of the total membership of the House of Commons which is assigned to the province of Quebec is significant, and I do not understand it in terms of the fact that the Liberal party from which most of the Quebec members come has formed the government for a significant period of time and that, during this period, the members who represent Quebec have surely made representations to the government, to their colleagues in the cabinet, about the problems of the province, and surely they have been listened to. Now, either the cabinet has not paid attention to its own members or the members have not made the arguments well. I am not going to judge which is the case. But there is something terribly wrong when a province feels so alienated, giving the strong representation that it has.

I say to you, Mr. Speaker, that it is important the people of Quebec should understand that the rest of us in Canada would very much like to find a resolution to the constitutional problems which seem to bedevil the relationship not only between the province of Quebec and the rest of Canada but also between other parts of Canada and the federal system. I think it is fair to say there is no member in this House who is not prepared to devote whatever time is necessary to find solutions to these constitutional problems, to hammer out the sharing arrangements which must be made, and to take part in the effort which must be undertaken to create in Canada a society to which everyone feels they belong. I believe this can happen. I believe it can happen because I know the federal system has worked. I think my leader put it very well when he suggested that even within the federal system which Mr. Lévesque dislikes, the province of Quebec has done remarkably well.

The government of Quebec and the Government of Canada have been able to provide for the people of Quebec in proportion to what they have been able to provide for the people of the rest of Canada and they made every effort, I hope, to accommodate the legitimate requests put forward by representatives from Quebec to the cabinet.

I want this evening to speak about another and, I believe, equally important matter, but before I do so let me say that in Canada there are major problems. People are very concerned about government. I do not think they are concerned because government is doing too much; I think they are concerned because they do not know what government is doing. They wonder, as I wonder, how it can be that a country so rich can have so many problems. They wonder how can it be that a country with such energy potential not only in crude oil but in all forms of energy can be faced with an energy crisis? How can it be that a country with natural resources in abundance, natural resources which have been used by every other country in the world to build their economies, has not used its resources to develop the manufacturing sector and the secondary sector which are so obviously necessary here, and which have to be in place when, as is inevitable, the resources become depleted or are no longer required in the manufacturing sector? How can it be that a country with human resources like our own, an educational system second to none, should be faced with these massive and, for some, maybe, even insurmountable problems?

It is because of mismanagement on the part of the government. It is because government has not, first of all, set out, on behalf of Canadians, goals which are attainable using the resources both human and natural which are available to us to build society and an infrastructure for that society which would sustain it through these difficult times. It is because governments have tended to use a band-aid approach, have tended like brush fire fighters, to meet the tiny though important problems as they rise without looking at the much larger problems of planning the economy so that it will be able to withstand the infiltration and pressures which are the inevitable result of our being a branch plant of a much larger economy.

This is what we are seeing in the auto industry and it is about the auto industry that I want to speak shortly, because the auto industry is crucial not only to Ontario but to all of Canada. Within the auto industry there lies the opportunity to expand the manufacturing sector; within the auto industry lies the opportunity to source products all across the country; within the auto industry lies the opportunity to utilize better the natural resources of the province.

When we come back at eight o'clock, Mr. Speaker, if you will permit me, I should like to spend 15 minutes talking about just that subject. With your permission I will now call it six o'clock.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. It being six o'clock, I do now leave the chair until eight o'clock this evening.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

• (2000)

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

Mr. Deans: Mr. Speaker, when we rose for supper at six o'clock, I mentioned that I intended to spend some time speaking about the conditions which currently exist within the auto industry, and I want to do that now.

The House will recall that on Tuesday and Wednesday of this week I raised with the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Gray) the problems which seem to be revolving around the contract which was signed between the federal government and the Ford Motor Company in the year 1978. That contract afforded to Ford the opportunity to gain access to some $68 million in return for the building of a plant in Windsor. I asked the minister if he would produce for the House the relevant sections of the contract which afforded us the opportunity to insist that the Ford Motor Company should continue and maintain the levels of employment that it currently had in 1978 and beyond, during the time that this new plant was being built. Today the minister tabled the documents in the House, and it is no wonder we are being ripped off.

I read both the contract and the letter of agreement over the signature, in both cases, of the then minister, Mr. Horner—long departed, thank heavens! In any event, the contracts do not provide any protection for the workers in the province of Ontario, and it is no wonder that the minister did not want us to see the contracts. In fact, not only is there no provision for the workers in the province of Ontario, but also nowhere in the contract does it say that the minister could not have told us that. It does say, of course, that, and I quote:

> Subject to the federal laws of Canada, the minister will maintain normal commercial security and privacy in respect to the project and will not disclose any information relating to the scope and cost of work encompassed by the project to any person or government outside Canadian federal and provincial government departments, agencies and Crown corporations without the . . . written consent of the company.

One does not have to be a corporate lawyer in order to understand that that did not preclude the minister from telling us that there was no provision for the protection of the workers in the plants of the Ford Motor Company.

To draw in that he had to wait for approval from Ford was a red herring. Of course, what the minister did not bring to our attention was the fact that not only is there no protection for the workers in Ontario and Canada but also, in fact, when it was signed the contract said the following:

It is understood and agreed that nothing contained in this paragraph— .

This is the paragraph dealing with protection.

—shall in any way . . . limit . . . any right—

Of the company.

—to arrange its business affairs in any manner it shall see fit.

That is exactly what has been done. The company has arranged its business affairs in the province of Ontario in the manner it has seen fit, and the end result of what the company saw fit is that at this point in time, together with its other companion companies, we see 20,000 employees, generally employed in the auto industry or related industries, out of work.

These employees are not all in Windsor. One might have expected that the minister would understand the problem, given that he comes from Windsor, given that he claims to be championing the workers of Windsor, given that he says that it is nice to hear the NDP finally speaking about the problems of auto workers and given that the minister claims to be expert in the matter of the auto industry, the trade pact and related matters. It is strange to me that he does not understand the terms of this contract.

What was given away? Not only the $40 million federal dollars but also the additional $28 million given by the province of Ontario.

Let me tell the House what is happening across this province, because I think it is important to know. Not only is unemployment happening in Windsor, where there are major lay-offs. We all know of the Budd Manufacturing Company which has laid off upwards of 1,900 people in Windsor. In Brampton, American Motors has laid off some 700 people. In Brampton, Gabriel Company has laid off 20 more people. In Brampton, the Canadian Ferrow Company has laid off another 108 people. In Stratford, Sealed Power has laid off 180 people.

In Ottawa, Beach Foundry just recently announced the lay-off of 240 people. In Windsor, Chrysler laid off an entire shift in April of 1980, 1,200 people, and Chrysler intends this summer to lay off yet another 2,100 people. In Windsor, Ford in its casting operation laid off 840 people. In Oakville, Ford laid off an entire shift of 1,400.

When we take a look around the province even further, we find that in subsidiary operations in a place like Otter Lake, which is near Parry Sound, the Rockwell Corporation, well known to most, has just announced that it is likely to shut down permanently. It used to employ 200. One hundred have already been laid off, and the only other major industry in the area, CIL, has indicated that it too may well be comtemplating closing. Of course, when they are closing the operation in Otter Lake, they are maintaining their operation in Mississippi. That is what we would expect, of course, from a corporation which does business in the atmosphere created by a government like the one we have had for the last far too many years.

When we look in summary at what has happened in the auto industry, for heaven's sake let us not get the impression that the auto industry can sit in splendid isolation and be viewed as only one industry, because there is nowhere in this country that is not affected in one way or another and will not be affected in one way or another by the massive lay-offs which are taking place in this major industry. As I said the other day, two out of every ten people working in the province of Ontario work in the auto industry or in a related industry. We have 20,000 unemployed now, 10,000 of them in Windsor. Do hon. members know that 35 per cent of all Ford workers there are laid off and 40 per cent of all Chrysler workers there are laid off?

When we look around the country, or this part of the country, we see that in Kitchener, St. Catharines and Ajax between 40 per cent and 80 per cent of all the people who were employed in the auto industry are now laid off either permanently or temporarily. The minister cannot claim that this is new and that all of a sudden this was dumped into his lap—poor soul!—because this has been clearly and evidently coming for a long period of time.

I will not burden or bore the House with all of the detail, but I can say that there was news story after news story through last year, with headlines such as "Parts firms stung by slowdown". More than 1,000 were laid off. "1,175 face lay-off after Ford move". "Auto lay-offs kill Windsor's short-lived boom". It goes on. "Auto parts industry fears major lay-offs". Then it points out the places where those lay-offs will take place.

These were all stories from last year, and the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce, the ministry and the ministers, whoever they may have been, surely must have been able to see the handwriting on the wall. But what do we get from the minister? Well, he is going to have some meetings. I want to tell the House that those meetings are not nearly good enough for the unemployed workers in this country, in this province, and in Windsor in particular. Another series of meetings between the minister and some inconsequential people will not resolve the problems of the auto industry.

I do not know if the House realizes just how many people are involved in this and what happens to their families. I do not think the minister understands—and he should understand—that the entire infrastructure in social services in place in his own community is in jeopardy. Of course the reason is evident. It is because most of the agencies which provide the social services require donations through United Appeal or through governments, and governments are cutting back. Of course the United Appeal cannot raise the money it could raise before because there are fewer people working to contribute. So, at the very time when they need the money, at the very time when the need is greatest, when more people stand in line looking for help—most for the first time—they cannot get the help because the agencies do not have the money to provide it and the government does not produce any of the funds necessary to make up the shortfall.

It will not end here. Today I was speaking to one of the major tire manufacturers in Canada. I was told by one of its senior officials that we can expect not only the Whitby lay-offs, the closure announced less than a week ago, with a dramatic impact on the town, but we can anticipate that there will be lay-offs all across the country where tire manufacturers are located. For example, we can expect that there will be lay-offs in Joliette. Of course there will be lay-offs in Hamilton, which I represent. What does the government do? Here is a tire industry faced with the problems the auto industry is facing, and the government turns around and gives something like $40 million to Michelin in Nova Scotia to go ahead and build a new plant. What possible use can that be when there is an idle capacity all across the industry, when the industry is presently laying off? Why would they give $40 million or $50 million to build a plant where no plant is needed? Why would they further jeopardize the work and the livelihood of the people presently involved in the industry by handing out money at a time when money can do nothing but harm?

It has not been announced yet, but we will see, as we will in all other related industries, major cutbacks in the rubber industry. Those major cutbacks will touch every one of us here in one way or another. Whether the House believes it or not, the auto industry is crucial to the well-being of this country. The minister should be prepared to establish once and for all the role the auto industry in Canada can and will play, a role which must be established in one way or another, albeit with agreements, separate and apart nevertheless from the United States industry. We cannot afford to have an industry that in its own right could well be profitable, if given an opportunity, dragged down by management which really does not much care about the Canadian component or about the families of the people in Windsor, Oakville, St. Catharines, Kitchener, Parry Sound, Hamilton or any other place across this country, and makes its decisions in isolation from what is in the best interests economically and socially for Canada.

How can we possibly develop an industrial strategy which does not encompass the auto industry? How can we possibly look forward to the creation of new jobs? I am not only referring to producing jobs for the people who are presently looking for work, but how can we look forward to the creation of new jobs, unless we are prepared to sit down with that industry and insist that it establishes reasonable levels of manufacturing based on Canadian sales, and stop being simply assemblers of automobiles and start being manufacturers of component parts in every single community across this country?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Deans: We must start now to attach the kinds of conditions to government subsidies that will give us some opportunity to require from them a level of performance which is commensurate with what we anticipate we need. We never do it. This government is historically tied much too closely to the corporate boardrooms, and that is the problem. They do not understand. They cannot treat public money differently than they would treat private money if asked to invest. They must require from the people to whom they give the money the same kinds of guarantees in terms of performance that they would if they were giving them their own money, because it is their own money. It is about time this government understood it. Over the course of the next two or three years, I look forward to seeing this government bringing forward whatever it is—I see my colleague on the other side holding his hand up indicating four years.

Mr. Collenette: Five.

Mr. Deans: Be that as it may. In fact, I expect to be here longer. Perhaps he does not. In any event, over the course of the next few years I expect to see the government unveil its strategy for industrial development. But in the meantime, for heaven's sake, take the steps to protect those workers, take the steps to exact from that corporation which has taken its toll on Canada the kinds of guarantees which will assure that we will have not only short-term but long-term benefits that will last for this generation and for many other generations to come.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Henri Tousignant (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, first I should like to join the previous speakers to extend my sincere wishes to our new and distinguished Speaker and to all the hon. members in this new Parliament. I take the opportunity to thank my constituents in Témiscamingue for the confidence they put in me.

Mr. Speaker, the riding of Témiscamingue I have the honour to represent in the House of Commons is a good reflection of Canada, both through the richness and the diversity of its human potential and its vast natural resources. As far as human resources are concerned, this distinguished audience will remember for a long time my famous predecessor, Mr. Réal Caouette, who was a great Canadian and a great advocate of federalism. May I also bring to the attention of my colleagues that the man who is almost always on duty here, in the House, under our eyes, was born and grew up in my parish; I refer to the Deputy Clerk on duty, my good friend from my childhood and college days, Mr. Pelletier. I want to pay a tribute to him for the dignity he shows in assuming his great responsibilities.

● (2020)

Mr. Tousignant: Mr. Speaker, nature in our area has been kind by blessing us with abundant resources; we have huge forests, our lakes and rivers are breathtaking, our sub-soil is full of minerals, but then we must have the tools that are essential to a rational and necessary development. Agriculture could make good progress given the appropriate incentives.

I am pleased to find in the Speech from the Throne various elements meeting exactly certain priorities I had set forth during the last election campaign and which I believed essential to the development of my area and the better-being of my fellow citizens. With respect to the quality of life, here are the intentions of the government: We will be asked to give urgent consideration to legislation raising the guaranteed income supplement to the old age security pension by $35 a month per household by July 1 of this year. This measure will primarily benefit single pensioners, the vast majority of whom are women. Beyond providing immediate relief for elderly people with low incomes, the government intends to convene a national pension conference in the fall of 1980. Work must begin immediately to design better methods of providing flexible, portable, and secure pensions both in the private and public sectors. To start this process, the government will soon release a major study on the Canadian pension system.

One of the essential objectives of this government is to put more people such as young people, women, natives and the handicapped to work. To meet the needs of these groups, the government will expand its employment program while using its resources more efficiently. Knowing the high rate of unemployment prevailing now in my area, those measures will certainly be welcomed by my fellow citizens. The role of women in my riding is a dominant and a most positive element in the social, cultural and economic areas, and one of my dearest wishes is that the Parliament of Canada will lift the discriminatory barriers against women in the market place, and I also welcome its intention to set the example in the federal public service.

Mr. Speaker, I want to say that I am deeply pleased to see that the government is committed to giving members of Parliament an important role in the elaboration of job-creation projects and closer co-operation with voluntary and local organizations in the implementation of a community services program which indeed I had advocated in my election campaign. It would be an illusion to expect reasonable economic development in my constituency and the area without a substantial injection of incentives and financial assistance to small and medium-sized businesses.

Let me point out that my constituency has been hardly favoured during these last three decades, perhaps because none of the elected representatives, as far back as 1957, belonged to the government, which caused apathy and disinterest in our people. Anyway, times have changed and to make up for that we will have to double up. Citizens in my constituency are getting increasingly involved at the various levels of economic development, and I will make it a point to change the face of my constituency during my term of office.

In the circumstances, I feel that these aspirations are quite legitimate. I intend to be firm and expect help from the government. Moreover, Mr. Speaker, I see in various parts of the throne speech the opportunity for me to fulfil the commitments I made in my constituency of Témiscamingue. First, the government promises to promote a new policy of national economic development, provide jobs, stimulate growth, use regional forces and increase the level of Canadian ownership and control of the economy, and second, to consolidate the federal institutions while making them more sensitive to provincial and regional aspirations. What about that famous federal building which was to be built in Rouyn-Noranda and which made headlines during so many election campaigns? It is urgently needed. There is no reason any more to delay the project, and when I say no reason I hope I will be understood. Third, to guarantee Canadians energy supplies at a price that is fair to all, and, in order to improve the ability of Canadian industry to compete abroad in order to create jobs at home, our government intends to establish a national trading company. It also intends to make assistance programs more accessible to small business, to simplify application procedures, and to better co-ordinate programs. Further, in order to conserve energy, an objective I fully support, it is becoming imperative to improve the current home insulation program through initiatives aimed at promoting higher standards.

Mr. Speaker, all my constituents and particularly those living in the south of my riding will be very happy to learn that this government intends to propose a new legislation on oil and natural gas in Canada. It will give Petro-Canada and other Canadian corporations new preferential rights on federal lands and will establish stricter requirements for the exploration and development of the enormous potential of the isolated areas. At the same time I think it would be advisable for the government to consider seriously the possibility of giving a flat rate for gas and heating oil to Canadians of every region. Why should remote regions like ours with harsh climatic conditions pay 10 cents more per gallon? Would a fair distribution of natural resources not be in the true spirit of federalism? This government intends to create an alternative energy corporation responsible for promoting the expansion of new renewable energy sources that might replace oil.

Mr. Speaker, let me mention that serious projects aimed at recovering energy from wood residues are presently being developed in my riding and are the subject of a study filed with the Department of Regional Economic Expansion. It is one more evidence of our determination to develop our economic potential. The natural resources of Canada will be our tool to implement a vigorous industrial policy.

If it is true that agriculture and food will play an ever-increasing role in the Canadian economy in the 80s, we in Témiscamingue hope that our cattle, sheep and goat raisers will be able to make that essential sector thrive and find young people to carry on. To this effect, I wish to mention to my honourable colleagues that tax concessions are essential. To be profitable, if we except capital funds, a business must have an operating fund or a bank loan of $100,000 or more every year. The present interest rates considerably reduce profits. That era of prosperity is open to us. We are now in a position to entertain such hopes.

The genius of man transforms the wool of the sheep into clothes fit for a king. I know that my fellow citizens are capable of extraordinary things. However, Mr. Speaker, since there are no thornless roses, we have to recognize that an active minority—and I do say an active minority—is trying to destroy everything, to grab some pieces of furniture and set fire to the house. I am talking about the phony and ridiculous exercise initiated in Quebec by this same government, that is the referendum.

We are now witnessing in Canada and Quebec the greatest fraud that our country has seen since its discovery. Let me explain: Since it had not succeeded in being elected on two or three occasions by stating categorically that it was for independence, the Parti Québécois decided in the last election to hide its true face and disguise itself by telling Quebeckers it would be a good government and promising to hold a referendum during its mandate. So far so good. No one has any objection to having a good government and no one has any objection to this government holding a referendum. In fact, this is about the equivalent of holding an election. However, immediately after the Parti Québécois is elected, it becomes anxious to achieve its objective.

Instead of keeping itself busy with the affairs of the state on a full-time basis, they hurry to get everyone on their side. All ministers and members of the National Assembly spend most of their time in small meetings or in trying to get an individual or the mayor of a municipality to say yes in exchange for a job or a grant. Many resist, but some get taken in this game.

An hon. Member: It is coercion.

Mr. Tousignant: My colleague is right in saying that it is coercion. What is even worse and quite unacceptable, Mr. Speaker, is that these people are trying to impose a system which goes against the will of the majority of Quebec citizens, and this at our expense. We are forced to use our own money so that a government can use all the means at its disposal to force on us a drastic change in our political institutions. Mr. Speaker, this is unadulterated political piracy.

Of course, the scenario is a masterpiece and is inspired by the intelligentsia of certain foreign powers. The proposal of the Parti Québécois, which is a socialist government—and we all know that socialism is a forerunner of communism—the proposal of this government is nothing more than a poisoned cake with an icing of overheated nationalism served on a silver platter. In fact, an abusive and even psychotic use is made of nationalism. Yes, Mr. Speaker, this type of nationalism is a retrograde step which should be denounced. At this time, while taking care to protect our interests, we must show understanding, openness of mind and more farsightedness if we want another reality and other results than a sterile contemplation engendered by an exaggerated nationalism. Yes, Mr. Speaker, the scenario is a masterpiece.

As the member of the National Assembly, Mr. Samson, used to say this is the trick of the hook hidden in the meatball. You will remember that when we were young and we wished to get rid of a stray dog, we used to hide a hook in a meatball and the trick never failed. You could also compare it to the bear trap. We are ingenuously asked to put a foot in it and are being told that it will be possible for us to get out unharmed.

Personally, Mr. Speaker, all this exercise in charm and superficial seduction on the part of the Quebec government reminds me of the gallant gentleman who wants to seduce the belle. Will he directly tell her about his intentions? Like the PQ he will rather skilfully divert the conversation and offer her, obviously, a candlelight dinner. This is what the Quebec government is offering us, Mr. Speaker, a candlelight dinner. We agree. There is nothing wrong with having a candlelight dinner together; however, by accepting, the irreversible process has just been started. The PQ is in no hurry, and neither is the gallant gentleman. It does not matter if it takes one dinner, two dinners, three dinners. The effect is slow but sure. The conversation is about natural resources, the lady's beautiful eyes, her potential and guaranteed bliss. The candle keeps on burning, and the rest is known, the wine becomes an all-risk insurance. I light your cigarette, we talk about grants. The point of no return is reached, all there is to do then is wait for the consequences.

Yes, Mr. Speaker, the consequences of a disguised proposition. We are asked for a mandate to negotiate sovereignty-association, how about that! Mr. Lévesque himself has said that sovereignty-association is nothing but independence. To be sovereign, as someone said this afternoon in the House, is to be able to make one's own laws, collect one's own taxes, take charge of one's external affairs. It is plainly independence, but to reassure us it was carefully coupled with association, in the full knowledge that Quebeckers who are used to the benefits of the present system will be inclined to believe that it will continue to exist indefinitely after their rejection of Canada. Let us not have any illusions, an association is not possible and the privileges also will disappear.

Mr. Speaker, we are told about a common currency to hoodwink us precisely so that we will not refer to it since we know quite well that this could frighten investors and small savers. Let us not forget that when money is involved, it is touching, but they resort to window-dressing. Now I say that a common currency is impossible. Why? I will give a few quite simple examples. We all know and the fact has been noted quite often that at present Quebec is importing 550,000 barrels of oil daily, seven days a week, 365 days a year, thus creating a deficit of $4 billion last year which was made up by the federal government.

We can add to that deficit another $400 million for natural gas. Working out a quick calculation, supposing that till 1990 we succeed in maintaining our consumption at 550,000 barrels a day—it could reach 800,000 barrels, but the minister, Mr. Joron, tells us that he will restrict consumption to 500,000 barrels—let us be conservative and say that in 1990 we will still use 550,000 barrels of oil daily in Quebec.

Let us make a simple projection using a 9 per cent annual increase in the price of oil. This year the price has gone up by 40 per cent. But if we figure it on the basis of a 9 per cent increase each year, we find out that an independent Quebec will pay something like $90 for a barrel of oil in 1990 and these are conservative figures. Such a price represents an annual deficit of $16 billion which the province of Quebec will have to face and we are only talking about oil. How could we make it? A moment ago I said the issue of common currency was impossible. How could we set a value for our dollar against the dollar in the rest of Canada?

Mr. Speaker, I would like nothing more than to have these modern time theoreticians explain to me the miracle equation by which they will make things work out. They could not succeed even if they kept the 50 per cent of our taxes they are so fond of talking about. They try to lure the people of Quebec by telling them they would have only one income tax return to fill out. Imagine, only one income tax return! They need to use such trifles to sell their idea just as if it were an ordinary consumer good. I should like somebody to explain to me how the province will manage financially when time comes for it to assume fully the costs of road construction for which the government now pays 60 per cent, not to mention shared-cost health services, medicare, family allowances, old age security pensions, unemployment insurance benefits, welfare programs for Indians and veterans, housing subsidies, railroads, postal services, national harbours, national defence, embassies in almost all countries of the world, international organizations such as NATO and the United Nations to which an independent country must belong of necessity, and I mentioned only half of them.

There are people who go so far as to say that they have not seen any embassy in Abitibi. That is what PQ supporters say: We did not find any embassy in Abitibi. Let me say that in 1978 the federal government spent directly in Abitibi-Témiscamingue $188 million. This does not include of course outlays embassies, national defence and external affairs. Yet, these same unscrupulous people made no bones about quoting all sorts of extravagant figures during the televised debate on the question in the National Assembly, but they monopolized and extorted more than two-thirds of the time allotted for that debate. What a fine example of democracy, Mr. Speaker. What balance, what a deep and developed sense of justice-guillotine is awaiting us. What an insult to intelligence to put up figures, any figures provided they are unfavourable to the federalist cause.

Mr. Speaker, they had the nerve to insinuate that in the Abitibi-Témiscamingue area the expenses by the federal government represented only 8.6 per cent—and they quote that 0.6 fraction because of course those people like accurate figures—of total government expenditures. Imagine! Right on national or Quebec television, they mentioned that figure of 8.6 per cent of expenditures, when we know, and that can be substantiated, that the federal government spent $188 million in our area. If that represents 8.6 per cent of government expenditures in my area, I would like very much to know how many billions the Quebec government did spend there. For all those reasons, I am firmly convinced that it will not be possible for a half-bankrupt state to maintain parity of the dollar with the other provinces which will refuse to maintain or support an ailing dollar. Besides, is it necessary to add that several factors have a direct effect on the value of the dollar? Where are the figures? Have we been shown a balance sheet pro forma? No, all we have to work on are surmises and feelings. On another subject, Mr. Speaker, I would like to emphasize that if Quebec separates, it will not only lose nine-tenths of other Canadian provinces but above all it will lose the Northwest Territories and the Yukon which—as is known—are extremely rich and upon which Canadians depend more and more for their future.

In closing, Mr. Speaker, I venture to question seriously the loyalty and real intentions of those who dare contemptuously criticize a country as exceptional as Canada, a country that protects its citizens through its legislation and its bill of rights. Allow me, Mr. Speaker, just as an example and as a matter for reflection to quote some excerpts from the bill of rights that may bring some independentists to their senses.

Here are our country's commitments to its citizens:

The right of the individual to life, liberty, security of the person and enjoyment of property: the right of the individual to equality before the law and the protection of the law; freedom of religion; freedom of speech; freedom of assembly and association; and freedom of the press.

Every law of Canada shall, unless it is expressly declared by an act of Parliament of Canada that it shall operate notwithstanding the Canadian Bill of Rights, be so construed and applied as not to abrogate, abridge of infringe or to authorize the abrogation, abridgement or infringement of any of the rights or freedoms herein recognized and declared, and in particular no law of Canada shall be construed or applied so as to authorize or effect the arbitrary detention, imprisonment or exile of any person; impose or authorize the imposition of cruel and unusual treatment or punishment; deprive a person who has been arrested or detained of the right to be informed promptly of the reason for his arrest or detention, of the right to retain and instruct counsel without delay, or of the remedy by way of habeas corpus for the determination of the validity of his detention and for his release if the detention is not lawful; authorize a court, tribunal, commission, board or other authority to compel a person to give evidence if he is denied counsel,—

Does the Parti Québécois guarantee us those things?

—protection against self-incrimination or other constitutional safeguards; deprive a person of the right to a fair hearing in accordance with the principles of fundamental justice for the determination of his rights and obligations; deprive a person charged with a criminal offence of the right to be presumed innocent until proven guilty according to law in a fair and public hearing by an independent impartial tribunal, or of the right to reasonable bail without just cause;

Mr. Speaker, I would like to conclude with these words spoken by Mr. Diefenbaker:

I am a Canadian, a free Canadian, free to express myself without fear, free to serve God as I see fit, free to rise against what I consider unjust, free to choose the leaders of my country. I pledge to safeguard for myself and for humanity this legacy of freedom.

Mr. Speaker, these are our country's commitments to its citizens, and in return, the commitments of all good citizens to their country. What more could we expect? Once again, I say that I liken whoever would want to destroy such a wonderful country as ours to an offspring who would dare raise his hand against his father.

[English]

Mr. Douglas Roche (Edmonton South): Mr. Speaker, through you, I wish to congratulate Madam Speaker on her election. I am sure that she will carry out with distinction the duties of the post that you share tonight, and add that grace which is so much a part of her person. Acting as the first woman Speaker of the House of Commons in Canada is but a continuation of her past accomplishments in her many fields of interest in Canada and on the international scene.

● (2050)

I am proud to be here as the representative of Edmonton South which is part of a growing city full of promise for the future. This year marks the seventy-fifth anniversary of the province of Alberta, and I hope many Canadians will have the opportunity to visit our province as well as the city of Edmonton and experience for themselves the spirit of growth and adventure that characterizes our community.

I thank my electors for having shown confidence in me for the fourth time, and I hope that I will be able to merit the continuation of that confidence.

Canada is engulfed in a crisis of staggering proportions. Not in our lifetime have the combined economic, energy and political problems of Canada been greater than at this moment. The country is reeling under unprecedented interest rates, intolerable government, debt and ceaseless inflation. Polls indicate that the separatist voices could win the Quebec referendum, which would be the bitterest blow to confederation in our 113 years.

A new government, elected with virtually no support west of Winnipeg, has already twice given the back of its hand to western Canada on the essential questions of energy and transportation. Is it any wonder that the air is filled with anger, and anger that I personally experienced at a town hall meeting I called for my constituents in Edmonton South after the election? People seek order and they are given chaos. They want stability and they are given drift. They want leadership and they are given politics. It is a moment for all of us who want a united Canada with economic strength and renewed federalism, to stand up. If we who want to build on the legacy that we have received do not speak out to protect Canada, the Canada that we love, then the forces of those who would separate and destroy the country will surely grow.

I appeal to members on all sides of the House. I say let us together repair the terrible divisions in this land.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Roche: I say let us through this institution provide the economic, social and political leadership Canadians so desperately seek today. Let us unite—at least in this analysis—that a Yes vote in the referendum will tear Canada apart irreparably, for western Canada will never tolerate a government rejected by westerners at the polls and which, in turn, is rejected by the very province that the government depends upon for electoral support.

We must abandon sophisticated interpretations of the referendum question. I know that it is deviously worded, but, outside Quebec, Yes will mean that Quebec wants out, and when that happens Canada will explode.

As an Albertan my appeal to the people of Quebec is to vote No in the referendum. A No vote is not a vote for the status quo, for the western provinces also want a renewed federalism, one which would reflect the new position of the west in confederation, a renewed confederation, and which would also provide Quebec with an acceptable alternative to separation.

My work has taken me into every corner of the world. I know how blessed our land is with space, resources, technology, industry, and an environment that promotes a quality of life second to none in the world. We cannot fail to be proud of our country. It is all the more reason to be angry over the problems that beset us, that keep us bogged down, constantly turned inward when we should be raising our heads looking out into the world that needs the leadership and production that Canada can offer.

The problems of Canada are not insoluble, but they require more political honesty, more belt-tightening, and a greater sense of justice than they now receive. Like Quebec the west is frustrated by the current federal system which has failed to respond adequately to the changing conditions within Canada today. Western frustration is rooted more in economics than in culture as Albertans see the money that they provide through equalization payments, income taxes, oil and gas revenues going to a government which is more attentive to the large electorally strong consumer centre of Canada than to the sparsely populated regional resource regions.

The separatist movement which has grown out of the seeds of discontent is not yet strong in western Canada, but the potential is there if the federal government is not responsive to western concerns that have been elaborated for many years by western members that I see surrounding me tonight in the House.

A recent poll taken by people at the Edmonton Journal and The Calgary Herald shows that 68 per cent of Albertans feel that their interests are not being adequately represented in Ottawa. What does that tell us? It tells us that the west is waiting for clear signs of this government's commitment. So far the signs have not been hopeful. I listened carefully two days ago when the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) made his speech. I have to say in all honesty that I felt the Prime Minister again dismissed the problems of regional fair treatment too casually. The decision by the federal government to use the emergency provisions of the oil sands pricing agreement to put a ceiling on the price of synthetic crude oil has disrupted the industry and cast doubts upon the intentions of the federal government in the oil-pricing negotiations with Alberta. The Alberta government has already reacted strongly against the move, and the future of the two oil sands plants is in jeopardy because of the industry's lack of confidence in federal government agreements.

I plead with members on the other side of the House to think about these problems for they are every bit as much at the heart of the question of unity in our country as is the Quebec referendum. The refusal by the federal government to commit itself to the Conservative government's agreement to provide $30 million for infrastructure costs at the proposed Prince Rupert grain terminal has also jeopardized western reactions to this government. It has certainly jeopardized the future of grain transportation in our country.

There have been other moves by the government seen as discriminatory in the west. For example, the reduction in private utilities federal income tax rebates to the provinces affects Alberta more than any other province and has been felt directly by many Albertans through increased utility costs. It is a needless thing for the government to do.

The sincerity of the government's commitment to the west can be tested in several ways. An energy pricing agreement should be concluded with Alberta that provides no less benefits than would have been received as a result of negotiations with the Clark government. The producing provinces must be compensated fairly for their rapidly depleting resources. That is the essence of the Alberta position today. We heard it conveyed by Premier Lougheed to the Canadian Press dinner last night in Toronto. I want to tell my colleagues in the House that the people of Alberta are 100 per cent behind Lougheed as he defends the Alberta position nationally.

Transportation policies are needed for both goods and people, policies that recognize the essential role played by transportation in the continued development of the west. Grievances persist in the area over the adverse effect of the Crowsnest Pass rates on producers of finished goods in the west, over the irrationality of the grain transportation system, over the destruction of railway communities caused by rail line abandonment. The time for action is now if serious economic repercussions in the west are to be avoided.

Westerners also want industrial development policies which will provide more incentive to manufacturers to locate in the west. Agriculture and livestock policies should ensure a more equitable and stabilized return for western farmers. These are some of the things that are fundamental to our position as we come into the House to start a new Parliament.

We give a commitment to renewed federalism. We want to see the government move forward in those concrete steps that show a sincere concern for the interests of western Canada. Our constitution has proven remarkably adaptable in the years of our confederation, but I think we are pretty well all agreed that it needs to be changed. It is no longer appropriate for today's reality. That is the essence of the Quebec position.

Renewed federalism through constitutional amendment should reflect the desire of the regions to respond effectively to the needs of their people while maintaining a united Canada under a strong central government.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Roche: Any proposals for change to the federal system will have to take into account the views of the west. The Alberta government has already outlined its proposals in its paper called "Harmony and Diversity" which is designed to encourage national unity as well as effective operation of the federal system. The paper suggests that the division of powers be modified to strengthen provincial ownership and control of natural resources, provide provincial access to direct and indirect taxes, and establish concurrent jurisdiction in the fields of communication, fisheries, transportation and culture. The federal ability to act in provincial jurisdictions would be restricted to well-defined limits. The principle of equalization would be entrenched in the constitution and French and English recognized as Canada's official languages.

The Quebec Liberal party's document "A New Canadian Federation", the Ryan beige paper, offers a rational and comprehensive analysis of our current dilemma. That paper is worthy of support. I personally have some disagreement with some aspects of the Ryan paper, but it is at least dedicated to the fundamental principles of equality of the two founding peoples and respect for regional and cultural diversity principles that Canadians share today.

There are differences in the various proposals and papers put forward, whether they are talking about the Canada West foundation, the Edmonton Chamber of Commerce, the city of Edmonton, the Pepin-Robarts report that we discussed in the Parliament before last; all of these share the same basic objectives of a strong and united Canada where we are willing to negotiate compromises. This willingness to negotiate will help to ensure that the central government is not weakened to the point of ineffectiveness in the face of economic and social problems that require a strong national response.

A renewed federalism will enable all regions of Canada to develop to their fullest potential and take advantage of the opportunities that this country has to offer, opportunities that we could not spend enough time exploring and exposing in this House for all Canadians who are reading and seeing us here, for them to appreciate as much as we who have the opportunity of travelling regularly across this country.

We need sound economic and energy policies. That is part of our struggle for national unity. We should recall the sentence given in the speech by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) in his contribution to this debate two days ago when he said:

> —the importance of the referendum is no excuse for delaying action on economic policy, no excuse for delaying action on energy policy and no excuse for avoiding our international obligations. Indeed, delay in dealing with those acute problems may very well aggravate the tensions which now exist in the Canadian family.

Severe economic problems are controlling the country rather than the other way around. Despite their strong and vibrant economy, Albertans are concerned about the trends in other regions of Canada. Our strength depends on the strength of these regions, and we look to the federal government to take action in its sphere of influence.

Alberta would like to see less government influence over the economy and more reliance on the private sector. Government waste and mismanagement have to be curbed, and a climate of confidence created for investment in our country. This requires an answer to the problems of high interest rates, inflation, and government debt, and a comprehensive industrial development strategy. Alberta is willing to make its contribution, and in fact already forgoes $4 billion in oil and gas revenues each year. Loans have been provided through the Heritage Fund to six other provinces, helping Canada's balance of payments by lowering interest payments outside of the country. And the Alberta government is willing to increase the amount available for provincial loans.

These remarks tonight would not be complete if we just dealt with economic problems. I want to talk for a minute about social problems. Just as we should not be diverted from our economic problems by the national unity problem, we should not allow these two problems to divert our attention from the deep social problems in our midst today. The powerful tide of change which is sweeping across the world today is tearing our families apart, rocking our economy, paralysing our political systems, shattering our values, while at the same time paradoxically sowing the seeds for a saner, wiser and more humane society. For more on this I would refer you to Alvin Toffler's "The Third Wave". It is an interesting analysis of the changes that are taking place in the world today.

What we must learn from this process is that development in our supertechnological society should focus on values of humanism, on values of the person, not just on values of the economy. We must encompass our natural environment, social relations, education. Those are the questions that are concerning Canadians very much tonight.

We in this House must ask ourselves, as this Parliament proceeds, some very hard questions about the quality of life in our society today. Why have crime, violence, divorce, suicide, abortions, drug abuse, and alcoholism soared in the last decade? In 1978, 140,000 Canadians were victims of violent crimes. Divorce rates have doubled in the last decade. More than one in four marriages in Canada ends in divorce. Suicide is the number two cause of death among 15 to 34 year olds. It is not my purpose here tonight to assign blame regarding these very complicated and meaningful statistics, but only to indicate to this House the ethical crisis that we face in the midst of a growing economy. Politicians cannot solve these problems alone; we are the first to know that. But I think there must be more leadership from all levels of government today concerning the deep social problems in our midst.

We must ask why there are so many poor among us in our society? Some 24 per cent of Canadian families lack the financial means to ensure the basic necessities of adequate food, clothing and shelter. Three-quarters of our elderly are living on incomes of less than $5,000 a year. The struggle by native people to share in the benefits of our life continues. This is a point I have argued on several occasions in the time I have been in this House, namely, the need to integrate more closely economic and social planning on behalf of human beings who, after all, are the object of our policies, not just national statistics. With a strong and united Canada dedicated to the economic and social well-being of its citizens and the citizens of other countries, I think our country would be able to exercise a more vigorous role in the international community. I conclude, Mr. Speaker, with a few remarks in that area.

A declaration of support for the boycott of the Moscow Olympics would today be a clear sign of leadership in the international community.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Roche: By delaying that decision the government is merely weakening the effectiveness of the response. The Soviet invasion of Afghanistan has been condemned by the world community. A boycott of the Olympics is the strongest indication of our condemnation that we can deliver to the people of the Soviet Union without entering into military action. So why do we not take this initiative now? The people of Canada are looking to us in this House to give them some leadership in response to the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan. In the past Canadian foreign policy has been diverted from longer term interests by short-term economic problems and goals.

Another publication that I commend to members of this House is the Brandt commission report. The Brandt commission has been studying for two years the whole problem of North-South relations. It is the finest single document you can put your hands on today, putting into perspective the problems of and the solutions to the north-south dilemma—the dilemma of the rich and poor nations of the world. It is called, "North-South: A Program for Survival," and it outlines the magnitude of the changes and the multidimensional dangers and unprecedented opportunities we now face in a world which is changing rapidly before our eyes.

A new way of thinking is required to turn our mutual interests with developing countries into creative partnerships—partnerships which would increase the chances of achieving global stability and security, and meet the human needs of the world's peoples. This is an opportunity and an obligation for Canada. Canada needs to develop an integrated policy in response to changing conditions in the world. Such a policy would include trade investment, aid and immigration objectives. The UN special session on international development strategy for the beginning of the third development decade is fast approaching. What is the policy of the government toward it? What thinking is being done to advance a realistic, sensible approach for Canada in the North-South role? A start, Mr. Speaker, would certainly be a parliamentary review of foreign policy. Our party has been advocating this for some time. We believe that in the ten years since foreign policy has been totally reviewed in our country, so many things have happened—it would take a whole speech in itself to outline all the things that happened in the 1970s—to make a further review necessary and that the government would be well advised to move in this area.

I applaud the government decision to establish an ambassador for disarmament. The arms race poses the greatest immediate threat to world security, and a strong Canadian initiative should be welcome. An ambassador will help to put the spotlight on disarmament and mobilize public opinion behind the necessity to attack this very real problem. We face a dilemma here. Security is a two-sided coin. Just as we must maintain our commitment to NATO and play our role militarily in contributing to the defence of the western world, so at the same time we must work through the UN agencies to control the arms race. This seems to some people to be a contradictory position but it is only a reflection of the paradox of our age. If we are to make the world a safer place, these are the steps which must be taken by the government.

The response of the government to the plight of the Indo-Chinese refugees and Cubans seeking asylum in the Peruvian embassy is also to be applauded.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, I think that in this Parliament we should look for action in the ways the directors of the United Church suggested in their letter to the Prime Minister which was published just a day or two ago, a very important letter that I commend to all members of the House. I quote this one sentence:

> With what degree of urgency and priority will your government act to remedy current injustices at home and overseas? How will the official welcome sound to refugees needing Canadian asylum; to native peoples with their land claims; to pensioners pauperized by inflation; to the unemployed and unemployable; to home owners ousted by record interest levels; and to the growing numbers concerned that Canada cannot continue indefinitely in social peace and prosperity without greater economic independence?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Roger Simmons (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State for Science and Technology and Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, it seems such a short time since I first stood in this chamber, albeit on the other side, to deliver my maiden speech. Just over four months ago, on December 13, I spoke in the budget debate. Earlier that day I had bought a house. The same day I had registered for a French language program. After my speech that night I cast my vote in the House and the government fell.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Simmons: Mr. Speaker, you will probably be aware that last evening I cast my first vote in this Parliament. I should also mention that yesterday I registered for a French language program. Today I am giving my speech. It goes without saying that I received the Prime Minister's (Mr. Trudeau) full blessing to make this speech tonight after I had sworn an oath before him that I would not buy a house today!

Mr. Speaker, first of all let me convey my congratulations to Madam Speaker on her election as presiding officer of this chamber. I want to assure her and all those who sit in the chair, including you, Mr. Speaker, of my loyalty and support for the important principles that the office represents and to wish you the best for a very enjoyable and successful term.

My colleagues, the hon. member for Rimouski (Mrs. Côté), and the hon. member for Sudbury (Mr. Frith), are to be commended for moving and seconding the motion to draft an address in reply, for the eloquent manner in which they did it, and for setting the commendable tone of this entire debate today.

My riding of Burin-St. George's comprises 102 communities along the south and the southwest corner of the island of Newfoundland. I do want to thank my electors and my workers there for their support in two elections, on November 19 and February 18. I shall do my very best to carry out the mandate given me in this Parliament to work with others in all parts of this House on behalf of the people of Burin-St. George's and Canada.

While I am on the subject of February 18, allow me to recall a couple of incidents which I am sure made impressions on all of us on election night. The gentleman who is now the right hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark), in that very magnanimous and thoroughly dignified speech on election night in which we conceded his government's defeat at the polls, I believe made us all very proud to be Canadians, and I want to thank him sincerely.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Simmons: If the former prime minister, the right hon. member for Yellowhead, gave us one of the high points on election night, it was certainly his minister of finance, the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie), who clearly provided the low point that night. That should not be construed as any aspersion on the Leader of the Opposition. I am sure the hon. member for St. John's West is just as big an embarrassment to the Leader of the Opposition as he is to all of us in Newfoundland and all of us in this chamber.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Simmons: On election night the hon. member for St. John's West intimidated voters from coast to coast with his remarks on television, and he impugned the integrity of fully more than half of the people in this chamber. That kind of insolence cannot go unchallenged. Coming, as it did, from the minister of finance for Canada, renders it all the more reprehensible and incredulous. I know the hon. member was under great pressure that night, and now that he has recovered his composure and regained his sanity—I must admit he looks these days as normal to me as he ever looked—and now that the circumstances are less emotional, I invite and urge him to apologize to this chamber and to the country for his election night outburst. I do not think it can go unchallenged, and I invite him to do the honourable thing, and to do it very soon.

Just as the Leader of the Opposition and the hon. member for St. John's West evoked in me on election night feelings of pride on the one hand and of disgust and pity on the other, so it was the Leader of the New Democratic Party (Mr. Broadbent) who provided for me—

Mrs. Mitchell: Hear, hear!

Mr. Simmons: I thought my good friend from Vancouver would cheer on this one. It was the Leader of the New Democratic Party who provided for me comic relief during the campaign. Every night he was on television proffering his solutions to the day's problems. One night he solved inflation. The next night he had a definitive answer regarding high interest rates, and the next night the energy dilemma succumbed to his ruthless intellectual stamina. So it went throughout the campaign.

It was an American president, Mr. Franklin Roosevelt, who promised to deliver the goods within 100 days of taking office. Our own late Prime Minister Pearson talked about 60 days of decision. Both were mere tortoises compared with our friend from Oshawa. At the stupendous rate which he cures the country's ills, as prime minister he could easily deliver Utopia by the end of the month. He is our very own patron saint of instant solutions. His cures were so complete and so all-embracing during the campaign that I became concerned about his very survival. At the rapid rate at which he was solving the nation's problems it was clear to me that by week's end he, with no more worlds to conquer, would, like Alexander the Great before him, sit down and cry himself to death.

Then, just as things were looking their bleakest for our very own "made in Canada" patron saint of instant solutions, a Liberal—who else?—came to his rescue—albeit a Liberal gone astray, the former Liberal member for Northumberland, the present NDP member for New Westminster-Coquitlam (Miss Jewett) who has positioned herself directly behind her leader, which is to her credit but not his. "All the better to jump you, dear leader", which is exactly what she was obliged to do during the campaign. In the interest of liberalism she did it, you understand. Hon. members will recall the incident, I am sure. I know NDP people do not want to hear about it. It is a sore thing for them, but it happened, so let us talk about it. Our patron saint of instant solutions had just administered his daily potion to the ailing nation. The problem that night was Russian aggression in Afghanistan. His cure was military force.

Mrs. Mitchell: You had better listen to him.

Mr. Simmons: I do not just have to listen. I can give the hon. lady the press clippings and the actual quotations of her leader's comments about the need to use military force, if necessary. He was going to back Mr. Carter to the hilt, the hon. member will recall, including, he said, military force, if necessary. I am sure the hon. lady does not like it any more now than she liked it during the campaign, and that is why what I have to say at the moment is the absolute truth about the subject.

An hon. Member: Get on with it.

Mr. Simmons: His cure was military force. His cure, maybe, but he neglected to consult the good doctor from New Westminster-Coquitlam. Indeed, as I hear it, he also forgot to consult his party. That was when and why she jumped him. "He is not speaking for me" she said, "not speaking for the caucus or for the party". Those were her actual words, and she said them just two weeks before election day. I refer to the hon. member for New Westminster-Coquitlam.

Mr. Crosby: She didn't say it loud enough.

Mr. Simmons: Oh, she said it loud enough, but one of the handicaps we had, I say to my friend in the official opposition from Halifax, was not that he could not hear but that the NDP network was at work that night.

An hon. Member: What does that mean?

Mr. Simmons: The same NDP network that was at work during the byelection in Burin-St. George's last November, the CBC, in case the hon. member is not sure.

Mr. Blackburn: Get on with your speech.

An hon. Member: What are you smoking, Roger?

Mr. Simmons: They are tender tonight, are they not, Mr. Speaker?

It comes as no surprise that in this throne speech debate the Leader of the New Democratic Party on Tuesday of this week was no longer the sabre rattler that his friend called him during the campaign. He was no longer the warmonger of less than three months ago. Now he tells us how much rice we could buy for the price of an F-18A aircraft. As with every other problem he has ever confronted and his party has ever confronted, he solved it just like that the same day. What was his solution for the old guns or butter argument? He solved it in the usual manner by coming down squarely on both sides of the issue.

Mrs. Mitchell: Where do you stand?

Mr. Simmons: I will tell the hon. lady in a moment exactly where I stand.

In January the Leader of the New Democratic Party advocated guns. In April he advocated butter.

Mr. Blackburn: No, rice.

Mr. Simmons: Oh, the wondrous advantages of a forked tongue! Of course, speaking out of both sides of your mouth is somewhat less hazardous when you know full well you will never ever have to put your money where your mouth is.

• (2130)

Mr. Simmons: In any event, I am delighted that the hon. member for Oshawa is chastened by the experience which his friend, the hon. member for New Westminster-Coquitlam, put him through during the campaign. He is chastened by it. Now he finds himself happily on the side of humanity and compassion, a very good place to be. I thank our Liberal in exile for setting him straight.

Mr. Knowles: Sounds like jealousy.

Mr. Simmons: Like that hon. member, we on the government benches are also profoundly concerned over the present international situation. That is why in the throne speech the government announced its intention to appoint an ambassador for disarmament and thereby action our concern over the high proportion of the world's scarce resources which is being expended on military hardware while humanitarian needs are going largely unattended.

That brings me to the subject of those in this Parliament who, unlike the hon. member for Oshawa and his happy band of followers, had the chance to put their money where their mouths are, those who have had, albeit briefly, the reins of power. In the brief few days we have been here during this session, it is becoming increasingly clear that the Tories learned little from their chronologically short though otherwise harmfully long stint in office as the government of this country. The right hon. Leader of the Opposition berated us in the last two or three days here in the House and on television. He berated us rather openly for not bringing down a budget, just one week into Parliament and barely six weeks after the government was sworn into office.

An hon. Member: Your microphone is not working.

An hon. Member: Add one minute to his time.

Mr. Simmons: Thank you.

An hon. Member: He has had enough time.

Mr. Simmons: What about eastern Canada? Are you not concerned about that?

An hon. Member: Yes, we are very concerned.

An hon. Member: Of course the east needs help.

An hon. Member: Six months in the House of Commons and already he is a tiger.

Mr. Simmons: The Leader of the Opposition has been berating us about the absence of any budget in the first week of this Parliament or six weeks after the government was sworn into office. Does he have a short memory, or just a convenient one? The Tory administration which he led waited five months after the election before it would even face Parliament, five whole months, and another nine weeks after that before bringing down a budget.

Perhaps the Leader of the Opposition subscribes to the popular conception in this country so eloquently articulated by his minister of finance during the election, the popular conception that Liberals are more able at governing the country. Is that why the Leader of the Opposition insists that a budget be produced in less than one-third the time it took his own administration to produce a budget? If he too is cursed with a forced tongue—with a forked tongue—

An hon. Member: Forced tongue?

Mr. Simmons: It is the member for Oshawa who has the forced tongue. It is the right hon. member for Yellowhead, I suggest, who might have the forked tongue. If he does, the very least he should do is learn to wield it to his own advantage.

An hon. Member: A sore tongue.

Mr. Simmons: Considering the budget which they brought down ultimately, the agonizing weight of five months and then another nine weeks was pleasant compared to the reality. "Short-term pain for long-term gain", the Tory finance minister called it, or to put it differently, "I am certain I will know how to cure a patient just as soon as I do the autopsy".

An hon. Member: The patient died.

Mr. Simmons: Is it any wonder that the right hon. member for Yellowhead and his colleagues have returned by the grace of the Canadian people to the opposition benches?

An hon. Member: How original.

Mr. Simmons: I come now, Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. Members: Finally.

Mr. Simmons: I come now to the gravest issue of all which faces this nation—

Some hon. Members: The Liberal government.

Mr. Simmons: —its very survival as a nation. I have never felt prouder to be a Canadian or more comfortably at home in this nation than during the speech in this chamber on Tuesday by the right hon. Prime Minister.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Simmons: In a most eloquent manner he spelled out for us the very essence of this confederation and the urgent justification for its continuance, though, of course, in a renewed form which recognizes present day realities and requirements.

I was not born a Canadian. My fatherland was the dominion of Newfoundland which was a sovereign state for over a hundred years until 1949 when it joined confederation. I still remember the campaign in favour of Newfoundland's joining confederation as well as the referenda. I recall the anxiety, the bitterness and the fear of the day. My father who is now 75, though he voted in favour of confederation, still considers himself a Newfoundlander first but takes pride in being a Canadian. My father as well as many other persons in Newfoundland who remember the events that preceded 1949 have discovered that it is possible to be both a Newfoundlander and a Canadian. And I will tell you why.

When Newfoundland became part of our confederation, we did not relinquish, suppress or liquidate our sovereignty. On the contrary, we increased it, we put it to work in order to steer our aspirations towards economic and cultural freedom. We have indeed succeeded.

Freedom is an empty word if you have no market on which to sell your goods, if you have no employment, if you run the risk of losing your heritage, your culture because you are overly concerned by personal financial hardships. Our culture and our heritage are precious to us Newfoundlanders, and today we are witnessing a thriving period that we did not experience in the forties and all of that was made possible because we are now part of Canada.

In Newfoundland and Labrador, our culture and economic freedom have flourished remarkably since 1949, and that, because of confederation. Ours is the only Canadian province which negotiated its union with Canada during this century. Despite everything, after an alliance of 31 years, we believe that union must be improved. So, we are not surprised that the people of Quebec, one of the founding provinces of confederation, should ask that a closer look be taken of the terms of confederation after 113 years. There is not a single province in Canada which would agree to confederation continuing as it exists today. All political parties in this House have expressed publicly their wish to see confederation improved, renewed. And our Prime Minister has indicated to us that he and his government not only agree but are eager to work towards that end.

There is not a province anywhere in this country, be it one of the western provinces, to which reference was made a moment ago, Quebec, my own province of Newfoundland and Labrador, or any other, which should be content to have the Canadian confederation existing in its present form. On that I believe, partisanship aside, either in this House or across the country, we are all very much agreed. As the Prime Minister said on Tuesday and on many occasions before, we in this government are ready to get on with the job. That is why a Yes result in the Quebec referendum is unthinkable. It is unthinkable both in terms of Quebec's interests, in the interests of Newfoundland and Labrador, and in the interests of every province and of every Canadian.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I want to appeal to my fellow countrymen in the province of Quebec to record a resounding No vote on May 20 because that is the only vote which will launch, not only Quebec but my province, this nation and all of us, on the road to renewed and better federalism. Thank you.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. John Thomson (Calgary South): Mr. Speaker, I should like to begin by asking you to convey to Madam Speaker my sincere best wishes and congratulations on her appointment to the prestigious position of Speaker of this House. While I have only been a member of this House since last May, during that time I have learned to appreciate the difficulty of her task, and the integrity and the courage demanded by her assignment.

It is my hope to convey to this House this evening the feelings of my fellow Albertans, and particularly the feelings of my constituents in Calgary South as they relate to national unity. The people of Calgary South are very concerned about the Quebec referendum and about the possibility that Quebeckers may choose to separate from the rest of Canada. The people of Calgary South earnestly hope that our country will stay together.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Thomson: I will not presume to speak of the concerns of the Quebeckers in the national unity debate, other than to say that my constituents have no sympathy for the argument of sovereignty-association. It is equally important for Quebeckers to know that Albertans pray with all their hearts that Quebeckers will find it within their hearts to stay within confederation. Albertans are deeply concerned for the future of Canada. They are frustrated and discouraged with their federal government, but they are loyal to Canada and they want to resolve those frustrations within the context of confederation. There is very little support for the idea of western Canadian separation.

The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) in his speech stated that disagreement among the members of this House should not be based on regional interests, but should be based on the concept of the whole which we are trying to serve in different ways. I am certain that each member of this House is trying to serve Canada no less than he.

There is no argument, I believe, in this House that this House must represent the national will and the national interest. But, Mr. Speaker, if I do not represent the regional aspirations of Alberta and of my constituents in Calgary South as those aspirations relate to the matters governed by federal jurisdiction, who will represent those interests?

In our present federal electoral system it certainly would be unreasonable for me to accept the view that the two most populated provinces of Canada by themselves represent the national will or the national interest.

The Prime Minister talked of patriotism and the feeling of belonging to and of loving a country. I believe that every Canadian deeply loves Canada in his own way, even if he expresses it differently than his fellow Canadians.

I spoke of the frustration which exists in Alberta today. In Calgary South these concerns, frustrations and even hostility are expressed very openly almost every day. What puzzles me, and what puzzles other Albertans, is the lack of understanding by eastern Canadians of the spirit and the potential of western Canada. We have failed to get through to eastern Canada.

The Prime Minister has stated on a number of occasions that he does not understand the west, and this is evident, unfortunately, by his government's statements and actions which seemingly are designed to antagonize the people of western Canada deliberately. Let me give two recent examples of this antagonism. They are with respect to the Prince Rupert terminal facility which has been spoken about in this House on numerous occasions, and the reneging of the oil sands pricing agreement. It may well be that the oil sands pricing agreement should be changed. Maybe Syncrude and Suncor should not receive escalating world prices, but the point I want to make is that these decisions were made unilaterally by the federal government without the slightest consultation. In the case of the oil sands pricing agreement, does consultation mean a telephone call one hour before it is announced to the press? Is that consultation?

Metrication and federal intrusions into housing and medicare are other examples of policies which have alienated western Canadians, just to name a few. The domestic oil price freeze of 1973, and numerous government interventions in the oil and gas industry are seen by westerners as discrimination against their interests. Albertans, particularly those from the generations preceding me, have enormous pride in Canada. I am not trying to suggest that their pride is any greater than that of the gentleman from Newfoundland or members from the other provinces of this country. All I am trying to say is that people of Alberta have a feeling of belonging to something that they have built themselves with very little help from the rest of Canada. These are self-made men and women who have developed self-reliance. They are entrepreneurs and are fiercely independent. They resent deeply the heavy hand of government.

The farmers and cattle raising communities in Alberta are bitter because of the lack of help they received during the hard times of the 1920s and 1930s when there was no, or very little, market for their produce, and the droughts of those years destroyed many of their crops. These people feel that they were left to fend for themselves during the years of the depression with precious little assistance from the central government.

During recent years transportation and terminal facilities have failed to keep pace with western Canadian grain production. Tariff and freight rates have consistently discriminated against western Canada. Albertans feel that they have been ignored, and now, when western Canadians are enjoying prosperity from their natural resources and agriculture, they feel that the central government and eastern Canada are trying to steal something away from them for which they have worked very hard. They feel that the rules of the game have been changed in mid stream.

There is also the firm belief that westerners have been unfairly called upon to pay world prices for eastern manufactured goods which are protected by tariffs while, at the same time, they are being asked to sell their resources and their crops at less than world value. Since 1947 when the Leduc oil field was discovered, Alberta has moved ahead in giant steps, largely because of the strength of its oil and gas industry. I was fortunate enough to be a part of this economic development, and I can say that eastern investors would not help to finance this development and that the oil and gas exploration industry was forced to turn to the United States for investment. Again this is one of a number of reasons for the feeling of hostility which expresses itself today in Alberta. Is it small wonder that the oil and gas industry is owned to such a high degree by foreigners?

It is ironic that this ownership is resented by many economic nationalists today, and yet without those foreign investors we would not enjoy the benefits that we do today from the oil and gas resources of western Canada. I think that is ironic, considering that we have today in the country a feeling of economic nationalism. It is also a mystery to me why the Speech from the Throne indicates the intention of the government to buy back foreign ownership when Canada is facing a crucial shortage of needed capital to help it achieve energy self-sufficiency.

Does the Liberal government or, for that matter, does anyone really believe that Canada really has the necessary resources in this country to finance energy self-sufficiency? No, my friends, we do not have it. And to lead the Canadian people to believe that we do is false. Many easterners think that Alberta is greedy and is being unreasonable in its demands with respect to oil and gas pricing. The oil and gas resources of Alberta are being depleted quickly. Over the next ten years our production capability will be reduced by more than one half. Alberta has a very short time to diversify its economy so that future generations may enjoy the same prosperity that we do today. Our production will be reduced by one-half in ten years' time. I am not exaggerating. Those are known facts as stated by the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources. They are well known to members on all sides of the House.

Alberta is not, and has not been, inflexible with respect to the pricing of its oil and gas, as some people would have us believe. The province of Alberta has made an unparalleled subsidy to the rest of Canada in terms of the difference between the world price for oil and that being charged to Canadians. The sum total of this subsidy since 1973 has been in the order of $15 billion. The agreement which was reached between the Conservative government and the province of Alberta would have provided further subsidies to Canadians totalling almost $20 billion over the next five years.

There are a few other points on the energy issue which I would like to draw to the attention of members of the House that relate specifically to the oil prices. The federal minister of energy made reference in his speech yesterday to the fact that the former Conservative government would have let OPEC determine Canadian oil prices. That statement is not true, Mr. Speaker. The agreement reached by our government would have ultimately tied Canadian oil prices to 85 per cent of the composite price for oil in the United States. This is usually referred to as the Chicago composite price. It bears no relationship whatsoever to the OPEC price today, nor would it in the future. The minister went on to say that the federal government loses when OPEC gains. The reason for this is quite simple. It is due to the fact that under the Liberal energy policy established in 1975 they chose to subsidize Canadian consumers for the difference between the cost of imported oil and the domestic oil price. In short, the Liberal government chose to deficit finance the cost of this subsidy. That is why the federal government is losing when OPEC gains.

The Liberal government deliberately chose to pass on the debt that was being incurred as the result of the difference between imported oil and the domestic oil price to future generations of Canadians. Our government, the Conservative government, believed that Canadians should face up to the reality of the cost of imported oil and that this cost should be borne by Canadians who are using that oil today, and not by our children.

● (2200)

Another point with respect to OPEC oil prices which I think many Canadians misunderstand is that they believe that OPEC oil prices are still being determined by a cartel and that this price bears no relation to fair market value.

I see it is ten o'clock, Mr. Speaker, but perhaps I could finish this paragraph. Let me just finish this one paragraph—

Some hon. Members: Ten o'clock.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member for Calgary South (Mr. Thomson), but I did not hear consent for him to finish that paragraph.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[Translation]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

POST OFFICE—RURAL SATURDAY POST OFFICE SERVICE

Mr. Laverne Lewycky (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, I wish to thank the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Postmaster General (Mr. Ouellet) for the answers he gave me this morning about the postal service.

[English]

I was pleased to hear the minister say this morning that he does not wish to cut back Saturday postal service in the rural areas. I was pleased to hear him say that this is also the present Liberal government's policy. Many of my colleagues and I have received numerous representations protesting the proposals of the previous Conservative government.

Let me mention at the outset several reasons why the people of my constituency found the Conservative proposals unacceptable. In my constituency I have some 34 municipalities as well as many unincorporated villages and village communities which would be affected if there were any reduction in Saturday postal service.

First of all, before I proceed I should like to thank my colleague, the hon. member for Kootenay East-Revelstoke (Mr. Parker), our postal critic, who encouraged me to raise my constituents' concerns regarding their postal service.

The postal service in my constituency is a vital public service, Mr. Speaker. The postal service must be looked at as the hub of a wheel, not as a mere spoke in a wheel. The Saturday postal service is an economic hub in the rural village wheel. If the post office were closed on Saturdays the rural residents would drive to the nearest city where there is a sub post office. They would do all their shopping there, to the detriment of the smaller village. The removal of money from a village also means the removal of jobs.

Weekly newspapers would also be hit. Many newspapers in my riding publish in the latter part of the week. If the newspapers did not make Friday delivery, they would not reach their destination until Monday. Hence, all the advertising functions are lost, hurting the small businessmen who want to capitalize on the day many people come to town.

The postal service in rural constituencies is also a political hub in the rural wheel. For many rural citizens the post office is the only link with the federal government. They see the post office as more than a place for stamps and mail; the post office is the place to pick up income tax forms, passport forms, and information on government programs.

I should also like to argue that the post offices are a social hub in the rural way of life. Postmasters in my constituency are community leaders. They are dedicated to their tasks. They believe in service to the public. They provide a personal service that cannot be found in larger, more impersonal urban centres. Saturday, for the postmasters, is one of their busiest days.

In the February 15, 1980, issue of the Journal the previous postmaster general was reported as saying that he was studying the idea of closing post offices on Saturdays in order to save money. In fact the previous government has closed Pembroke and Peterborough on an experimental basis. The response to the previous government's suggestions can be illustrated by some of the representations I received from my constituency. Specifically, for example, Mr. Drebinsky, the secretary-treasurer of the rural municipality of Gilbert Plains, writes as follows:

> The reeve and council of the rural municipality of Gilbert Plains strongly object to the proposal. It may be fine in larger towns and cities. But it will only further reduce the business in smaller communities if Saturday closing is implemented.

He goes on to say:

> There must be other means of reducing Canada Post costs. Please pass on our objections to the higher authorities in the best way possible.

Similarly, Mr. Speaker, the mayor and council of the village of Gilbert Plains have passed the following resolution:

Whereas current plans of the Canada Post are to implement a Saturday closing of postal services in all small communities in Canada;

And whereas the council of the village of Gilbert Plains deems this action to be detrimental to the economic welfare of the community and is of the opinion that such actions will adversely affect the survival of all small communities;

And whereas the council of the village of Gilbert Plains is of the opinion that all services cannot be equated with dollars as is the apparent suggestion of Canada Post;

Therefore be it resolved that we petition our local representatives to both the provincial and federal governments to intervene and stop the actions of Canada Post which are so detrimental to the well-being of small communities such as ours.

● (2205)

Likewise, Mr. Speaker, the reeve and the council of the rural municipality of Ochre River have passed a resolution which reads:

Whereas closing of the post office on Saturdays will impose a severe problem towards smaller communities, both towards businesses and mail service to customers;

And whereas a move in this direction will further speed up closing of smaller communities as well as movement out of the surrounding country;

Therefore be it resolved that we strongly protest against the closing of the post office on Saturdays.

The secretary-treasurer of the village of Minitonas, Mr. Bruce, writes on behalf of that northern village in my constituency:

The opportunity to have mail service available in the small communities is vital to the economy of the community. I cannot estimate the numbers of persons who come to towns Saturday to get mail. Likely an accurate figure would not be available. The important fact is, however, while in town these individuals, in most cases, also shop while in town. Thus the business places prosper. If the post offices are closed, a portion of the monies usually spent will be lost and the economy of the town suffers.

My constituency extends roughly 200 miles north and south. From the southern end I have also had representations concerning proposed postal closure. Mrs. Ed Rempel, the secretary-treasurer of Plumas, writes:

This idea is very unfavorable. Some people only come to town on Saturdays to do their weekly shopping, pick up the mail and other business.

Our daily papers come through the mail. They are a day late now. This would mean the Friday paper wouldn't be gotten until Monday. We the committee of Plumas do not see it as being feasible to close the post office on Saturday.

The mail at present is slow enough coming now. Why delay it more?

My concern is shared by my rural colleagues as well. For example, my neighbour to the west, the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville (Mr. Nystrom), recently sent out a questionnaire. Yorkton-Melville is a rural constituency very much like Dauphin. Cards were sent with the message: "Yes, I am in favour of retaining Saturday postal service in rural communities". Within nine days the hon. member received well over 500 responses stating opposition to the proposed Saturday closing. Over 500 people immediately replied, signing their names to the document. Many signatures represented husbands, wives and families. I thank my colleague for allowing me to bring these responses here tonight to show you, Mr. Speaker.

But Yorkton-Melville is not the only constituency thus affected. Many of my colleagues from other ridings such as Prince Albert, Humboldt-Lake Centre, The Battlefords-Meadow Lake, Kootenay West, Mission-Port Moody, as well as Selkirk-Interlake, have also been concerned and have expressed their concern to me.

In conclusion, I wish to thank the minister again for his response this morning. I commend him for giving a straight answer. May I say that we in this House will be holding him to his words, just as our constituents will who asked us to raise this issue.

Miss Aideen Nicholson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, Canada Post has traditionally played an important role both in the development of this nation's economy and its social fabric, and the Post Office continues to perform a vital role in the every-day lives of all Canadians. For this reason the Postmaster General (Mr. Ouellet), in answering the question put this morning by the hon. member for Dauphin (Mr. Lewycky), sought to reassure not only the members of this House but also those Canadians living in rural areas that no unilateral decision would be made concerning Saturday delivery on rural routes. The minister clearly said that no such changes would be made without full consultation with those Canadians who would be affected by such a decision.

The Post Office, like any organization, must constantly review its operations if its services are to remain up-to-date. Demographic patterns are changing constantly across Canada. New communities begin and grow rapidly; other communities decline. If the Post Office is to operate efficiently and economically in the best interests of all Canadians, changes in service will have to be made, but we are always cognizant of the fact that all Canadians are entitled to good service wherever they live.

Recently the Post Office has had to adjust to the rapidly escalating costs of energy. The high cost of energy is a reality confronting individual Canadians from coast to coast and it seriously affects the cost of moving the mails.

Governments have been exhorting the Canadian public to practise energy conservation for obvious reasons but mainly because the money we pay for foreign oil has an adverse effect on the nation's economy and our balance of payments. The energy problem affects the pocketbooks of all Canadians and that is one reason why Post Office officials have been considering the possibility of reducing service on 5,000 rural routes, in order to conserve energy. We cannot exhort the Canadian public to conserve energy without attempting to reduce the government's own consumption of energy. Of course, this has to be balanced against the fact that Canadians want to receive the best mail service possible. In fact, the Post Office has been improving service while reducing operating costs. The minister's aim is to ensure that all Canadians, wherever they live, receive adequate service from Canada Post and that while the search for increases in efficiency go on, the service does not decrease.

TELEVISION

ALLEGED RACIST PROGRAM SHOWN ON CTV—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Ian Waddell (Vancouver-Kingsway): Madam Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

Whereas the Canadian Television network CTV recently produced and televised a program entitled "Campus Give-Away" on the television program "W5"; and whereas committees of Chinese Canadians objected to the program as racist; and whereas, as a result, Mr. Murray Chercover, the president of CTV, has now acknowledged that distorted statistics, combined with the visual presentation, made the program appear racist in tone and effect, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mrs. Mitchell):

That this House condemns racism in any form, applauds the efforts of the committees of the concerned Chinese Canadians, welcomes the admission of president Chercover, and urges the Canadian Radio-television and Telecommunications Commission, CTV, and other media to take steps to ensure that this sort of program is never aired again.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

STATUS OF WOMEN

FOURTH VICE-PRESIDENT OF CANADIAN ADVISORY COUNCIL ON STATUS OF WOMEN—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Miss Pauline Jewett (New Westminster-Coquitlam): Madam Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

In view of the fact that the Canadian Advisory Council on the Status of Women has a staff of fewer than 20 and already has a president and three vice-presidents and, therefore, that the appointing this week of a fourth vice-president—who was drawn directly from the Prime Minister's office—is totally superfluous and highly partisan, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

That the Prime Minister reconsider his decision to promote his correspondence secretary, Hellie Wilson, to the position of fourth vice-president of the Canadian Advisory Council on the Status of Women.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

PRICE OF OIL IMPORTED FROM MEXICO—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Thomas Siddon (Richmond-South Delta): Madam Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

In view of the fact that the government is contemplating the importation of Mexican oil at a price in excess of $36 per barrel, while it continues to hold the price for western Canadian crude oil at less than $15 per barrel, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Edmonton East (Mr. Yurko):

That the government be censured for its hypocrisy in claiming greater benefit to Canada by paying more to the Mexican oil industry for their oil than it would pay to Canadians for our own.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

SMALL LOANS ACT

CALL FOR REPEAL OF LEGISLATION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Charles Mayer (Portage-Marquette): Madam Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

Considering the fact that the Small Loans Act was passed in 1939 to serve problems of a different era, and in view of the fact that the act can now harm the very consumers it was intended to protect—specifically, those who require a loan under $1,500—and that the Superintendent of Insurance has indicated in committee that the act now has no value, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Mississauga South (Mr. Blenkarn):

That this House does hereby repeal the act immediately, thereby providing long-overdue relief to credit unions and caisses populaires which are so restricted under the current regulations.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

HEALTH

REPORTED OUTBREAK OF "RED RASH" DISEASE IN DAUPHIN, MANITOBA—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Laverne Lewycky (Dauphin): Madam Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

In the light of reports that a "red rash" virus has so far affected 200 young people aged five to twenty years in the Dauphin area, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

That this House call on the Minister of National Health and Welfare to investigate reports of a serious disease affecting people in the Dauphin area, and to co-operate with the Manitoba Department of Health and Community Services to deal with the situation.

Madam Speaker: Presentation of such a motion at this time requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

SALE OF GASOLINE TO UNITED STATES CITIZENS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of the fact that Americans are coming across our border in increasing numbers, buying our subsidized gasoline and oil products at prices at least 50 cents a gallon cheaper than are available in the United States, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Fundy-Royal (Mr. Corbett):

That this government institute immediately control measures to prevent foreign purchases of gasoline and oil products in excess of the reasonable demands of tourists and businessmen.

REQUEST THAT CANADA-U.S. AUTO PACT BE RENEGOTIATED—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Ian Deans (Hamilton Mountain): Madam Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

As a result of the massive lay-offs in the auto industry which have resulted from the inability of the Canadian government to enforce the "fair share" provisions of the existing auto pact, with subsequent economic hardship to Canadians, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

That this House instruct the Secretary of State for External Affairs, and the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, to proceed forthwith to Washington for the purpose of renegotiating the auto trade pact in order to ensure that the Canadian industry receives a proper share of all manufacturing in the auto industry based on the Canadian percentage of total sales in the North American market.

EQUALITY OF PENSIONS FOR SURVIVING SPOUSES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Hon. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Madam Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, and seconded by the hon. member for New Westminster-Coquitlam (Miss Jewett), I move:

That this House urges the government to review all the employee pension plans that come under its jurisdiction, and to take the necessary steps to provide that in all cases the pensions of surviving widows—or of surviving widowers where applicable—will be not less than 75 per cent of the contributor's pension, and that the eventual goal be a full 100 per cent pension for either survivor, in accordance with the principle of equality between men and women.

AIR TRANSPORT

EPA APPLICATION FOR HALIFAX-TORONTO ROUTE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Howard Crosby (Halifax West): Madam Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

The recent decision of the Canadian Transport Commission, refusing Eastern Provincial Airways permission to establish a Halifax-Toronto route, has jeopardized the air transport industry in Atlantic Canada by endangering the viability of Eastern Provincial Airways and contradicted the recommendations of the Atlantic provincial premiers. Accordingly, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Annapolis Valley-Hants (Mr. Nowlan):

That this House direct the Minister of Transport to conduct a review of air transport policy that allegedly precludes EPA from servicing the Halifax-Toronto route.

Madam Speaker: Presentation of such a motion at this time requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

SANCTIONS AGAINST IRAN AND SOVIET UNION—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister, who indicated in his press conference this morning that he had been consulting with leaders of the economic summit countries and other countries to try to figure out where he wants to go regarding sanctions against Iran because of the hostage situation, and sanctions against the Soviet Union because of their invasion of Afghanistan.

Since he has had two months to consider this, and has said nothing publicly, and since Prime Minister Thatcher of Great Britain has certainly made her views known publicly, Chancellor Schmidt of West Germany has certainly made his views known publicly, President Carter has certainly made his views known publicly—

• (1115)

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Miss MacDonald: —when is the Prime Minister of Canada going to make his views known publicly with regard to sanctions?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, as the hon. lady knows, I am a rather modest person.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Hees: For a very good reason.

An hon. Member: There is no joke there.

Mr. Trudeau: If Prime Minister Thatcher, Chancellor Schmidt and President Carter, and even the then prime minister Joe Clark, have not managed to have any effect on the hostage situation in Tehran or on the withdrawal of troops from Afghanistan, I think she is lending me great credit indeed if she thinks the world is hanging on my statement.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Miss MacDonald: I have a supplementary question, Madam Speaker; perhaps the Prime Minister of Canada might try. I would like specifically to mention the Olympic boycott. The other day I mentioned that some 57 countries have made their views known in that they favour an Olympic boycott, many of them being from the Third World.

In his press conference this morning, the Prime Minister implied that he, personally, did not favour a boycott of the Olympic Games. Could he state if this is the official view of the government?

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, I beg to differ. I did not imply that. I made the point that my personal views were irrelevant.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Miss MacDonald: There are a lot of Canadians who think that, too.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Miss MacDonald: In his press conference, the Prime Minister, when he was talking about sanctions, indicated that certain measures that had been taken by the former government against the Soviet Union because of its invasion of Afghanistan—specifically, the measure to cut off scientific exchanges—were no longer in effect. I would like to ask the Prime Minister, how many more of the sanctions that were imposed by the former government have been cancelled by his government—and why?

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, I don't know where the hon. lady got that information. I said no such thing, and I know of no measures which have been cancelled by our government. On the contrary, in December, when the campaign had just begun, I indicated that our party supported the measures that had been taken on the economic front by prime minister Clark, and there has been no action taken to withdraw from any of those measures.

Oral Questions

BOYCOTTING OF OLYMPIC GAMES IN MOSCOW

Mr. Joe Reid (St. Catharines): Madam Speaker, my question, too, is directed to the Prime Minister. In light of the open vote taken within the legislature of the province of Ontario—a decisive vote supported by the leader of the Liberal party—calling upon the Government of Canada to support the boycott of the Moscow games, will the Prime Minister not, now, tell the people of Ontario and, indeed, the people of Canada, that Canada will not be represented at the Moscow Olympics?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I have indicated that we hope that our government would make its policy known before the meeting next weekend—a week from this weekend—of the Canadian Olympic Committee.

An hon. Member: What is wrong with this week?

Mr. Trudeau: In the meantime, I hope to hear from the Secretary of State for External Affairs—who is coming back this weekend from Zimbabwe—on the efforts he has made to seek a consensus among an increasing number of those nations which in January voted against the Soviet invasion and to get their views on what effective measures we could indicate to show collectively to the Soviet Union—

An hon. Member: What are your views?

Mr. Trudeau: —that not only the capitalist countries, not only a few western countries, not only a small number of African and Asian countries, but a great number of non-aligned were taking renewed action against the Soviet Union.

ENERGY

INQUIRY WHETHER DEPARTMENT PAID FOR SURVEY ON OIL PRICING AND ENERGY MATTERS

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Would the minister confirm that the federal government is following the dubious practice of the government of Ontario by using taxpayers' money to do public opinion surveys which it keeps secret?

Specifically, would the minister confirm that his department paid for a survey done by Canadian Facts during the first week in April to determine the attitude of the public on oil pricing and related energy matters?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, I am not aware of such a survey. I will inquire in the department to see whether any such survey was ordered, and I will be very happy to report to the hon. member. I will let him know in the next question period.

Mr. Broadbent: Madam Speaker, my supplementary is to the Prime Minister. Could the Prime Minister tell the House if it is government policy for other departments to do such public opinion surveys at taxpayers' expense. If so, could he tell us which departments have been doing this kind of polling? Also, would he provide the House with the results of all such polling, and the cost to the taxpayer?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I will inquire, Madam Speaker. I missed the precise nature of the exchange, but I do know that surveys had been taken by some departments when we previously formed the government. I know that some surveys—subject to correction—were taken by the previous Clark administration, and it is possible that some surveys are being continued now. But I will inquire.

Mr. Broadbent: Given the importance of this question, will the Prime Minister make it his policy to make a statement in the House soon regarding the policy of the government on public opinion surveys that will cover such matters as who will pay for them, how much of each department's budget in the coming year is going to be allocated for such surveys, and whether he believes—as we do in this party—that if surveying is done, there is an obligation that that information be made available forthwith to all members of the House of Commons and to the public of Canada?

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, I am sure the Leader of the New Democratic Party will agree that it is important for the government, in any way it can, to know what the people of Canada think about various important matters of public policy. Therefore, the idea of surveys is one which is not rejected by the hon. leader or by myself.

I think, as a general rule, we would both agree that those surveys should not be purely political in nature; in other words, they must tend toward informing the administration of administrative and policy problems rather than on partisan problems. I certainly would agree that no partisan survey should be made by any party in office, with public funds. Beyond that, Madam Speaker, it is possible that some surveys may elicit the kind of information that it would not be in the interest to make very widely public, but I would certainly—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: I just say "may"; I do not know. I told the House I would look into it. In such cases, it might be useful to have a procedure whereby at least the leaders of other parties might be informed of the results of the survey.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

DOUBLE-TRACKING OF WESTERN SECTION

Hon. George Hees (Northumberland): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the right hon. Prime Minister. Can the Prime Minister bring the House up to date on the progress he is making with his plans to double-track Canadian National Railways from Winnipeg to the Pacific coast, and when may the House expect an estimate of the cost of this very large project?

• (1125)

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Yes, Madam Speaker, great progress was made. I understand that up to 30 per cent has been double-tracked so far. I will keep the hon. member up to date as to the figures.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hees: Obviously, then, only 70 per cent remained to be done when the Prime Minister made his lavish promise. My supplementary is this: Is it true that it is the government's plan to have the CNR survey crews make their first appearance on the job to coincide with the calling of the next election?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Hees: Would the Prime Minister advise the House whether this twinning operation has any connection with—pay attention now, Pierre; I will repeat the question for you: I want to give you every chance to try to make an answer—the right hon. gentleman's plan to twin eastern members of Parliament with western ridings?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, the hon. member has dazzled us with his mathematical prowess. If he is concerned about having a real answer, maybe I could defer to the Minister of Transport.

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): I shall try not to dazzle the hon. member with my answer.

An hon. Member: Who are you twinned with?

Mr. Pepin: This question was aired a few weeks ago in Winnipeg; the hon. gentleman should know about that. On that occasion, the progress which had been made toward double-tracking was assessed. It is rather interesting that the CN indicated that, by 1988, according to their 1978 planning, 40 per cent of CN rail between Winnipeg and the coast will be double-tracked. They will upgrade that estimate in the fall. Mr. Bandeen, the president of CN, indicated also that if western Canada continued to grow at its present momentum, double-tracking would be a reality before the end of the century.

An hon. Member: Which century?

ENERGY

PRESS BRIEFING ON OIL PRICING AGREEMENT

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Wellington-Dufferin-Simcoe): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources: it arises from the tawdry use of public servants for partisan purposes. Yesterday, the minister of energy instructed his officials to hold a press briefing designed to discredit an oil pricing agreement reached by the former government.

Why did the minister not have the courage to hold that press briefing himself, instead of sending his officials to do the job for him?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, no attempt was made to discredit the previous budget. That budget discredited itself.

Some hon. Members: Hear, Hear!

Mr. Lalonde: I said in this House last Tuesday or Wednesday, I believe, that I would make available a detailed statistical analysis of the implications of the last budget on the basis of the latest increases in the international price of oil. I gave a number of figures in my address to this House; they are on record in Hansard.

The figures were provided in more detail in statistical information which was made available to the press, and an official was available to provide the press with any information of fact in which they might be interested. Some journalists may have tried to get information concerning policy from that official but, obviously, policy has to be provided by the minister.

An hon. Member: What a coward!

Mr. Lalonde: I might also say that I was available to the press after my address in this House: I was in Room 130-S, downstairs, and talked extensively to all the press people who were there. I am still available to the press; there is no problem.

Mr. Beatty: This is a sorry performance by a minister of the Crown, to use public officials for partisan purposes. I want to ask the minister whether he instructed his officials to withhold mention in this summary which was released in the briefing yesterday of the force majeure clause which existed in the pricing agreement and which renders this whole analysis invalid.

• (1130)

Mr. Lalonde: Madam Speaker, what the hon. member seems to forget is that there was no agreement under the previous government: no agreement ever took place.

Mr. Andre: This whole analysis is absurd, then.

Mr. Beatty: Madam Speaker, it leaves the House to wonder, then, why this press conference was even held yesterday, if the minister felt there was nothing to discuss. Does the minister not feel that the time of the officials involved in trying to discredit the proposals made by the previous government could better have been used by this minister to work out his own proposals which have yet to be put to the producing provinces?

Mr. Lalonde: Madam Speaker, the figures which were released yesterday were on the basis of the content of the last budget, which was rejected in this House, not on the non-existent agreement that the hon. member tends to refer to.

Mr. Nielsen: Why don't you put your own forward?

CONSUMER AND CORPORATE AFFAIRS

INQUIRY INTO OIL INDUSTRY—RELEASE OF INFORMATION GATHERED

Mr. Ray Skelly (Comox-Powell River): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. In light of the fact that for the past seven years there has been an inquiry by his department into the oil industry, could he explain to the House why there has been such a delay in laying charges or proceeding with this information?

Second, would he be prepared to release to the Parliament of Canada information gathered on the oil companies, so that we may have the benefit of the thousands and thousands of dollars which have been spent on this long study?

[Translation]

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Postmaster General): Madam Speaker, it is indeed a very important inquiry which covers several years. Consequently, the director has an extremely serious mandate and I think that it is in the public interest to allow him to conduct his investigation and not to rush to conclusions, thus preventing him from making an exhaustive and productive investigation.

[English]

Mr. Skelly: Madam Speaker, my supplementary is to the Minister of Justice. It is my understanding that the material has now been forwarded to the Department of Justice. Could the Minister of Justice or, in his absence, the Prime Minister, give us an indication of when his department might be prepared to proceed with charges in this matter?

Hon. Bob Kaplan (Solicitor General): Madam Speaker, the Minister of Justice is at the moment absent from the House; but he is here for the question period and will be back before the end of it.

FINANCE

INTRODUCTION OF BUDGET—OIL PRICING AGREEMENT

Hon. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. Yesterday, apparently, he told certain reporters that there will not be a budget, or even a financial statement or even a mini-budget until there is an oil pricing agreement; there will not even be a teensy-weensy budget.

The hon. minister was supposed to be the engineer of the defeat of the last budget. Why is he so reluctant to engineer his own budget now, four months later; and will he guarantee to the House that he can prevent the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources from further falsification of what was in the budget while he waits to bring down his own budget? Will he give us that guarantee and tell us what is to happen if there is no oil pricing agreement? Why is he the reluctant debutante in bringing down a new budget?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, it seems to me that the hon. gentleman was the reluctant debutante, because he waited from June 4 to December 11 to bring down his budget—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacEachen: —so I hope that I will not delay any longer than he did. I understand that he had legitimate reasons for delaying the presentation of his budget—

An hon. Member: That is an understatement.

Mr. MacEachen: —as I do, because I do not see the point in bringing in a budget based upon uncertainty. When there is some certainty with respect to—

Mr. Andre: You are supposed to bring certainty with a budget.

Mr. MacEachen: —oil pricing arrangements, then it will be possible to proceed in satisfying the hon. member's desire that a budget be brought in. I will certainly bring in a budget as soon as possible, but I do not see that possibility within the near future, or even beyond the near future.

An hon. Member: Before Christmas?

Mr. Crosbie: Will the hon. minister explain to us why there is uncertainty? Is his government not the muscle-men who were going to impose an agreement on Alberta so that the increase will be less than $4 this year? Can he not, therefore, assume that the increase will be less than $4 this year, or is this gobbledegook from yesterday supposed to excuse the minister because the increase is going to be far more than $4 this year?

Does he not think that he should explain to the country whether he is going to permit the deficit to increase beyond the amount I projected? They are the muscle-men; they are going to run the west. Why can they not assume that their oil pricing agreement will be less than $4 a barrel this year? Come on; come clean with the Canadian people!

Mr. MacEachen: Madam Speaker, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources has already stated that he hopes to negotiate an agreement with the oil producing provinces.

Mr. Crosbie: He is going to impose one.

Mr. MacEachen: The hon. member is now suggesting that unilateral action be taken and that an immediate imposition of a settlement be made. That point has not arrived. I recall the former prime minister telling us that he would seek diligently to reach an agreement. He failed.

Mr. Nielsen: It was reached. That is false.

Mr. MacEachen: But he also put in his statement that if it was necessary, unilateral action would be taken by his government. We have not reached the stage where we are contemplating unilateral action. We are proceeding in good faith to reach a negotiated settlement with producing provinces.

Mr. Crosbie: In the recent election the minister assured the people of Canada—and the Prime Minister—that there would be no increases in oil prices this year beyond those that were outlined in the budget: $4 per barrel this year, of which $1 went into effect on January 1.

How can he now say that he is not contemplating imposing an agreement, when Alberta has made it very clear and had made it very clear during the campaign that it would accept nothing less? How can he now say that this government, his government, is not contemplating unilateral action? What kind of action is he contemplating? Is he somehow going to force Alberta to accept less, voluntarily, than what it agreed to when we were in government?

Mr. MacEachen: Madam Speaker, the hon. gentleman has stated that an agreement had been reached between the government of which he was a member and the province of Alberta. I do not believe that the budget statement itself, as I recollect it, would support the statement made by the hon. member today—

Mr. Nielsen: But you know it is true.

Mr. MacEachen: —that an agreement had been reached. If an agreement had been reached, why had it not been signed—

Mr. Andre: It needed to be typed.

Mr. MacEachen: —so that it would be available to a new government which was faced with redoubled uncertainty—

Mr. Nielsen: That is your fault.

Mr. Crosbie: You stopped it.

Mr. MacEachen: —as a result of the failure to reach that agreement? The hon. member obviously fails to understand the nature of negotiation. The purpose of negotiation is to have movement and some change of attitude in the process of negotiation. That is what we hope to achieve in the negotiations that we will be undertaking with the province of Alberta.

Mr. Crosbie: Nonsense.

PLANS TO REDUCE INTEREST RATES, THEREBY INCREASING EMPLOYMENT

Mr. Sid Parker (Kootenay East-Revelstoke): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance. Since more than 20,000 workers in the Canadian forest industry, and over 145,000 Canadian construction workers, are unemployed as a direct result of the government's high interest rates—which have killed the housing industry in Canada—and since Weldwood of Canada has just announced the lay-off of another 1,600 plywood workers in Vancouver, will the Minister of Finance tell us what plans he has to reduce the interest rate and put these people back to work?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, the hon. member must have been pleased yesterday, as I was, that there has been a slight decrease in the bank rate—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Dick: Take all the credit, Allan.

Mr. MacEachen: —and that a number of commercial banks took that as the basis for reductions in their prime rates. I believe that is a move in the right direction. If it is possible, over time, to reduce inflationary expectations, that is the best hope that all of us can have in the expectation of lower interest rates.

• (1140)

EXTENSION OF UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE BENEFITS TO LAID OFF FOREST AND CONSTRUCTION WORKERS

Mr. Sid Parker (Kootenay East-Revelstoke): That is not much of a solace to workers who are unemployed, Madam Speaker.

My supplementary question is for the Minister of Employment and Immigration. What does the minister plan to do to get these workers back to work? Second, is the minister prepared to extend unemployment insurance benefits to the unemployed workers in the forest and construction industries? In the minister's absence, could the Prime Minister speak on his behalf?

[Translation]

Mr. Dennis Dawson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, I would like to point out to the hon. member that this is not necessarily a supplementary question. I will take it as notice and on the minister's return from the OCDE meeting on the status of women, I will convey to him the comments of the hon. member.

[English]

FISHERIES

STATUS QUO OF CANADA-U.S. FISHING AGREEMENT

Miss Coline Campbell (South West Nova): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Fisheries. Is the minister aware of the discussions and proposals presently taking place in the U.S. Senate foreign relations committee concerning the future of the Canada-U.S. fisheries agreement and, if so, is he concerned over the direction they seem to be taking?

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Madam Speaker, if the former secretary of state will give me a chance to answer, let me say that a year ago, after prolonged and difficult negotiations, we and the American administration—

Some hon. Members: Author.

Mr. LeBlanc: Madam Speaker, I am sure that my predecessor knows of the seriousness of this question and the answer.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. LeBlanc: We reached a difficult—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: They don't want to know the truth.

Mr. LeBlanc: After a year of negotiation, we reached a difficult and balanced agreement. Three things have astonished me—as, I am sure, they have astonished those members in the opposition and on the government side who know something about fisheries—since the signature took place: first, it took 12 months for the U.S. Senate to consider the agreement; second, in the interval the United States fleet has carried out an uncontrolled scallop fishery, changing the conditions and balances prevailing at the time of the agreement; third, when the Senate finally got down to considering the agreement, some senators put forward a number of amendments which even the spokesmen for the U.S. government declared to be unnegotiable and unacceptable.

Next week, Secretary Vance will be in Ottawa and I hope he will be in a position to indicate that the U.S. government intends to solve this serious problem.

Some hon. Members: Order.

[Translation]

Madam Speaker: Could the minister shorten his reply?

[English]

Mr. LeBlanc: If this is the best that the United States has to offer to settle this long-standing dispute, from this side of the House and, I am sure, from the side of my predecessor, that is just not good enough.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

BOYCOTTING OF OLYMPIC GAMES IN MOSCOW

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, I will preface my question to the Prime Minister with the observation that the United States might be more agreeable in working with Canada on questions of the kind to which the Minister of Fisheries has referred if there were more co-operation on important question of principle in foreign policy.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: My question to the Prime Minister relates directly to that and to the Olympic boycott. We know one reason of the Government of Canada for the refusal to take a position on the Olympic boycott is that the Prime Minister wants to count heads in the world before he takes a position of principle for Canada.

I would like to ask the Prime Minister this: Apart from this business of counting heads before we know where Canada stands, what are the other factors that are causing the Government of Canada to delay standing up, as 57 other nations representing a variety of races, a variety of continents and a variety of conditions, have been prepared to stand up and oppose the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan? What more does it take before this government takes some action on behalf of a principle?

Right Hon. P. E Trudeau (Prime Minister): The right hon. Leader of the Opposition is suggesting that agreement with the United States on the Olympics would in some way resolve the fisheries dispute.

An hon. Member: It wouldn't hurt.

An hon. Member: Right on.

Mr. Trudeau: An hon. member says it would not hurt. The question remains, then, why—since the former prime minister very docilely adopted the same attitude on the same date as the United States—the fisheries dispute is going on. Obviously, saying exactly the same thing as the United States did not help his government to have this fisheries agreement sanctioned by the Congress.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, I am answering the remarks of the right hon. Leader of the Opposition. If hon. gentlemen on that side are not interested in hearing comments on their own leader's remarks, I wonder why they have taken him for their leader.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: You have resigned, Pierre; you are not even here.

An hon. Member: You are the ghost prime minister.

An hon. Member: Shadow.

Madam Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Trudeau: As to the second part of the question on counting heads, Madam Speaker, I have made the government's position known repeatedly in that respect. It is that we must impress on the Soviet Union that we are not divided on the question of the invasion of Afghanistan. My concern is not, principally, to add one or two countries to the list of those that have already taken one or another position; my concern is to make sure that an increasing number of countries stand together—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: —as they did on January 14 at the United Nations, and that is what we are working at.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: The Prime Minister knows, from public statements made by Senator Church and Secretary Vance, that there was progress on the fisheries agreement, at least at that time, when the United States knew where Canada stood on questions of foreign policy interest.

My question is directed to the minister responsible for sport, who was quoted as having said the other day—if I can get his attention; I see I have it now—that certain events have made the chances of a boycott greater on the part of the Government of Canada.

Will the minister responsible for amateur sport tell us what those factors are which have made the chances of a boycott by this government greater—which has changed the policy of Canada? It is not a question of our joining other nations. This Prime Minister and this government have taken Canada away from a position of principle in support of other nations which want a boycott; that is what has happened. Will the minister of sport tell us what the other factors are that led him to make the statement attributed to him in the newspapers the other day, that the chances of a boycott are greater?

Hon. Gerald Regan (Minister of Labour): Madam Speaker, I thank the right hon. gentleman for his question. I want to remind him of the fact that our Prime Minister indicated as early as several months ago that for a boycott to be a worth-while sacrifice to ask of our athletes, it must be meaningful, de facto, and widespread. I do not believe that we are interested, as Canadians, in playing "The First" game.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Regan: I think we are interested in whether an effective message can be conveyed to the Russian people and to the Third World, through the television coverage of the Olympics, that a vast number of countries are standing together and athletes across the world are prepared to make the sacrifice to show how strong is our disapproval of the invasion of Afghanistan.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

• (1150)

Mr. Regan: Beyond the consideration that has been pointed out, that of the number of countries which may decide to act together in such a boycott, is the question of whether the athletic organizations which have the final say in free countries will accept the invitation to go, or decide to abide by the decision of their governments.

I ask the right hon. gentleman to consider whether anything could be more harmful to our desire to show the Russian people what is wrong about their invasion of Afghanistan than a large number of countries deciding to boycott, yet the athletic organizations nevertheless having their athletes there. Surely, then, the Russians would say—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Madam Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Clark: Madam Speaker, on the question of the Olympic boycott, the only particular in which this government has been first is that it was the first to back away from our friends after a position of principle had been taken in defence of democratic values.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: The minister of sport has given a rather long response, but in the course of his long response he forgot the question. The question was, what factors led him to suggest that there is not a greater chance of a boycott being adopted by the Government of Canada? What are those factors?

Mr. Regan: I thank the right hon. gentleman for his patience in view of the fact that perhaps I did not directly answer the question. I am rather new to this forum, and perhaps I will catch on. I find, as a matter of fact, Madam Speaker, that there is more hooting and hollering and lack of politeness than I was accustomed to in another forum.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Regan: I want to say to the right hon. gentleman, through you, Madam Speaker, that if it is my personal feeling that there is a greater chance that our decision may have to be made in that direction, when it is made, it is perhaps because of the fact that there seems to be, across the western world, an increasing willingness on the part of athletic organizations to go along with the decisions of their governments in that regard; and because according to the reports about which I have been informed, it appears that there may be some movement among additional countries in the general direction of a boycott.

An hon. Member: Take a stand, then.

Oral Questions

NORTHERN AFFAIRS

RECOMMENDATIONS ON POLITICAL DEVELOPMENT OF THE NORTH

Mr. Peter Ittinuar (Nunatsiaq): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. The recently released report of the special representative for constitutional development in the Northwest Territories, which argues in favour of maintaining the status quo—which report has been categorically rejected by the majority of northerners—also makes certain recommendations regarding political development of the north.

Will the minister assure the House that these recommendations will not be accepted without a fundamental position being taken on division of the Northwest Territories?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Madam Speaker, I would like to thank the hon. member for notice of his question. I cannot give him that specific assurance, but I can tell him that the government will seek the fullest consultation with reference to all the people of the north and the feelings they have in respect of the recommendations in the report.

I might say that many recommendations and feelings of the various groups in the north are coming to us now, and we are studying them very closely. As I mentioned to the hon. member yesterday, I would hope that this consultation process can take place so that we can develop some type of joint response to many of the recommendations in the report which may be beneficial to all concerned. Certainly, before the government makes firm decisions we will endeavour to take all views into account.

INDUSTRY

STATUS OF NEGOTIATIONS WITH CHRYSLER CANADA

Hon. Michael Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Madam Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. In view of the imminence of the decision that will be made on the Chrysler negotiations—which I believe is expected some time toward the end of this month—will the minister please bring the House up to date on the status of the negotiations and confirm the question of timing?

In addition, will he state whether any agreement in principle has been made between the government and Chrysler Canada, and whether the government considers that the statements made by himself and the Prime Minister during the course of the election campaign constitute an agreement in principle, or a feeling in principle, toward providing assistance to Chrysler Canada?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Madam Speaker, the statements made by the Prime Minister and myself during the election campaign govern very much our approach to dealing with this matter which is very important to the Canadian economy and the jobs of thousands of Canadians.

I have been negotiating directly, and through my officials, with the executives of Chrysler Canada and the parent company. I think we have made considerable progress. We are not yet at a point when the government itself can announce a decision on this important matter. However, we are very much aware that the situation in the United States is such that it may well be necessary for us to make and announce a decision before too many more weeks go by.

Mr. Wilson: Madam Speaker, this question is also directed to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce.

In view of the statements made by the Ford Motor Company on lay-offs and the closure of their plant at Windsor, and the fact that they have lost $1 billion in the North American operation—which is something of the same order of magnitude as the losses of Chrysler Canada—what implications does this have for the negotiations the government is having with Chrysler? What impact will that have on the possible aid package the government is considering for Chrysler Canada?

Mr. Gray: Madam Speaker, these are two quite separate matters. But I would say—expressing my own view—that the Ford situation certainly will be useful to us in working out the terms and conditions—I think this is the government's view as well—of our eventual decision in respect of any Chrysler aid package.

FINANCE

ATTITUDE OF IMF TOWARD THIRD WORLD COUNTRIES

Miss Pauline Jewett (New Westminster-Coquitlam): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance, who I think is attending the meetings of the IMF next week.

Considering that in the past the International Monetary Fund has made excessively stringent decisions in relation to Third World countries and, recently, particularly with regard to Jamaica, will the minister assure the House that at the IMF meetings he, on behalf of the Canadian government, will urge the IMF to show a more demonstrable concern for Third World countries?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I look forward to attending the meeting next week, because it will be the first opportunity I have had to deal directly with some of the problems which I faced earlier as co-chairman of the Organization for Economic Co-operation and Development which dealt basically with that set of questions which will now be before the IMF and, presumably, before the summit leaders later this spring.

I have not made any specific commitments or conclusions on these points, but I assure my hon. friend that I will attempt to take as sympathetic an attitude as I attempted to enjoin upon others in my former role.

Miss Jewett: Madam Speaker, I am very glad that the minister is going to show sympathetic concern, and I do believe him when he says he will. But, specifically, with Jamaica having such vast difficulties right now in renegotiating the rescheduling of its debts, will the minister give particular concern to Prime Minister Manley's current problems at the IMF?

● (1200)

Mr. MacEachen: Madam Speaker, as the hon. member knows, Canada has considerable interest in Jamaica, not only through membership in the Commonwealth but through economic interests. He also knows that we have helped Jamaica from time to time in the past. I regret that Jamaica did cut off its negotiations with the IMF, which is the organization that is best equipped to assist in balance of payment problems. Nevertheless, that will not preclude us from maintaining a continuing interest in the economic future of that country.

AID TO SYDNEY STEEL AND MICHELIN TIRE

Hon. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Madam Speaker, may I ask the Prime Minister or the Minister of Finance what specific measures have been taken since this government took office to expedite two matters of great concern to Nova Scotia? They are the matters of aid to Sydney Steel Corporation and the expansion of Michelin Tire.

Mr. Maurice Harquail (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Madam Speaker, those matters are being seriously considered at the moment by the ministry. The minister will be in a position to make an announcement shortly.

POINT OF ORDER

MR. BAKER (NEPEAN-CARLETON)—ANNOUNCEMENT BY PRIME MINISTER OF TASK FORCES

Hon. Walter Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Madam Speaker, before the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) leaves the House, I would like to raise a point of order with respect to his announcement this morning of what he described as the formation of six parliamentary task forces in the areas of the economy, social affairs and foreign policy. I watched on television the announcement that he made in the course of his press conference.

The Prime Minister indicated that the government House leader or someone had consulted us on the matter. I want to make it clear to the Prime Minister so that the record will be straight that we were not consulted in the sense that I understand the word "consultation", although I was alerted by my friend yesterday as he and I were leaving the chamber that the Prime Minister would be making an announcement on a task force of some kind. There was no decision and no indication that the chairman would be appointed by the government, that the task force would appear to be responsible to a minister of the Crown rather than to Parliament. There was no indication at all as to what the membership on these task forces would be.

I thought that I should correct the record with respect to that matter of consultation. If members will read the announcements, there is a real question, and something that should be of concern to the House, as to how these task forces can be legitimately called parliamentary task forces. The only way I can see they can be called parliamentary in any sense of the word at all is that there is an indication that members of Parliament will be invited to serve on these task forces. I am sure that even the Prime Minister will agree that parliamentary committees, task forces, or whatever label one wishes to put on them, carry with them certain rather heavy obligations on the members.

There is a system in place to protect the members and the rights of members. For instance, fundamentally, will the minutes of the meetings of these task forces and the evidence which is given before them be recorded and will it be made public without some reference to a minister of the Crown? That is a parliamentary protection that we have, that Parliament is not subservient to the minister. To whom will these task forces be reporting? If they are reporting to Parliament, that is one thing; but what does "the responsible minister" mean, and what does it mean when it said that the Prime Minister wants advice from the task forces? Is this to be secret advice? Are members of all the parties to be co-opted to the ministry with respect to the advice?

Is there a right, for instance, for there to be a minority report from the task force, as there is right now? Are we to have the opportunity as parliamentarians to debate the efficacy of the subject matters that are set forth? Those subject matters are quite different, except in one case, from the subject matter that we had brought forward and, as well, there was a parliamentary debate in that respect. Will we have that opportunity?

Another question is, will there be a term of reference submitted for debate? There has been no discussion with respect to that matter. And what about the reports? Will they be tabled in the House? Will these task forces be reported in the usual sense so that we may have an opportunity to debate the reports? Before any matter is dealt with regarding these task forces, these are all questions which ought to be dealt with in consultation.

As I see the situation, we are departing in a great way from what is a traditional parliamentary practice with traditional parliamentary rules to safeguard and protect, not only the rights of members of Parliament, but the rights of the public in terms of the information that the public will receive from these reports.

Point of Order—Mr. W. Baker

Some time during the course of the question period or just prior to it there appeared on the desk of the hon. member for Brandon-Souris (Mr. Dinsdale) what purports to be a term of reference of some kind for some form of committee on disabled persons, a copy of which the hon. member delivered to me. I do not know where this document came from. No one has consulted us about the form of it, which is contrary to the usual parliamentary courtesy.

The document covers a number of areas and purports to be in the form of the normal term of reference that would be approved by the House of Commons. It says in part:

> That the task force will submit reports from time to time, as appropriate, with a final report to be submitted by October 31, 1980—

It does not say to whom those reports will go, whether it be a minister of the Crown, Parliament or whatever. It purports to give this ad hoc committee the power to send for persons, papers and records. That is a power which comes out of the rules of the House of Commons. It does not come out of the air and certainly it does not come out of this piece of paper. It cannot come out of the mouth of the Prime Minister, however well intentioned it may be.

There was a House leaders' meeting on Wednesday, and we could have been consulted at that time. Rather than have the matter come up in an amicable discussion between House leaders while leaving the House, rather than suddenly having terms of references appear—for which apparently there will be no opportunity to debate—and rather than following this peremptory approach to Parliament by making the announcement of the formation of the task forces, it is advisable that some form of consultation take place.

There is also the matter of choosing the chairman. I always thought that it was the right of Parliament to choose parliamentary committee chairmen. Rather than choosing the chairman peremptorily, the Prime Minister might have been better advised if he had arranged to have the consultations in the formal manner. Perhaps he did and those consultations did not take place, I do not know. In any event, it does present Parliament, the government and certainly the opposition with a dilemma with respect to this announcement which was made this morning. It is a dilemma that will have to be resolved one way or another with regard to what is the normal parliamentary practice. Because of the importance of this matter to our institution and to the safeguards for Parliament and the public, I felt that I should raise the matter. I knew of no other way to raise it than by point of order, Madam Speaker.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I understand the concern of the House leader of the Conservative party and I think that he quite properly raised the matter by way of a point of order. I accept the hon. member's distinction between "informing" and "consultation".

The sequence of events is as follows. Yesterday in cabinet the government agreed to the setting up of these task forces. Therefore, there could not have been prior consultation. The government House leader quite correctly informed the other House leaders that there would be an announcement. Obviously, now that it has been announced, consultations will follow, and we will attempt to respond to all the questions raised by the hon. gentleman.

Of course, the simplest answer of all is that we were attempting to take a leaf out of the book of the Conservative party. We thought that they were quite correct in establishing not parliamentary committees as such, but task forces to inform the government. They themselves in their period of government set up three task forces to my knowledge without any consultation with my party, certainly not with myself. There were three of them, one on grain transportation, one on rail line abandonment and one on beef import legislation.

You will recall, Madam Speaker, that the question of these task forces was discussed in this House last November and December and that your eminent predecessor, Speaker Jerome, as he then was, ruled that task forces of this nature were fine, that they should be encouraged and they should be funded. I believe reference was made to one that our party had set up in 1974 when we were the government to look into the Millhaven incident. Speaker Jerome found fault with the initiative of the other side of the House only in that they were one party task forces, and if public funds were going to be spent he indicated in a gentle way that it would have been well if other members could have been part of that task force.

Our initiative, I repeat, is building on the Tory action of last summer. We are creating task forces. We think it right and proper that members of Parliament can and should be used to inform the government on particular subjects. Therefore, there is no disagreement between us. The only difference is that we have announced to the other parties that we hope some of their members would sit on these task forces.

That is where the matter rests at this stage. Consultation will follow, particularly on the terms of reference and the mode of action of that particular task force which will be discussed within the task force itself, to make sure that everyone is in agreement.

As to the members who would sit on that task force, we will await answers from the House leaders of the other parties to indicate if they are interested in joining some of our members and participating in some of these task forces. If they are, we will assemble them and seek agreement on the terms of reference. Terms of reference have been proposed but, of course, they can be modified if all parties can find some more proper way of conducting the study.

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, I should like to just carry on for a moment with this point of order. I shall not detain the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) long in the House. We are dealing really with three kinds of instruments. There were established internally during the period of our government the series of task forces that the Prime Minister has referred to and to which the Speaker found some gentle exception. Action was taken by our governement to remedy the situation.

There was also the very clear proposal by our party when in government to establish select committees of the House of Commons to look into some of the matters which are proposed here and which were announced by the Prime Minister earlier today. Those select committees would operate with all of the force and all of the safeguards of committees of the House of Commons of Canada, which is something quite different from what I gather has been proposed by the Prime Minister.

There is also a third variant to which he made reference, and that was the assignment to a subcommittee of a standing committee of the House of Commons during one of his previous incarnations as Prime Minister of a study into the question of penitentiaries. It is not clear to us exactly what is intended here.

Clearly we on this side, assuming there could be agreement on the terms of reference, would prefer that a task force so established would have all of the power of a parliamentary select committee. We believe that provides the best protection both for individual members of Parliament and for the public. It means that a minister such as, say, the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin), if she received a report on the handicapped that she did not personally like, would not be in a position to hide that report. As we understand what is being proposed now, the minister has the power to hide a report that she does not like. We think that is a power which could very easily be abused and could seriously erode or undermine the parliamentary system.

It would be very helpful to us, therefore, to know exactly what is being proposed here. Our preference would be for select committees of the House of Commons. We naturally would want to have the opportunity for full discussion of the terms of reference to ensure that the ambit of inquiry was broad enough to allow members of Parliament and the interested public to have the fullest possible productive participation.

Hon. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Madam Speaker, may I first of all confirm what I think has now been made clear, namely, that although we were informed yesterday that this announcement was going to be made this morning, we were not consulted or asked for our consent or approval. As a matter of fact, I suggested that the announcement should be made in the House rather than at a press conference, but that position was not accepted. Now that the idea is out in the public arena, however, we welcome the suggestion that there will be consultation before any further action is taken.

I want to support wholeheartedly the position taken by both the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Baker) and by the Leader of the Official Opposition (Mr. Clark) that these tasks forces must be parliamentary committees. Maybe they will have to be set up as special committees or what have you, but certainly we as members of opposition parties do not want to find ourselves simply co-opted by ministers of the government and made servants of them for whatever their purposes may be. We think the idea of a special task force on special subjects—which after all is another way of saying a special committee study—is a good one, but we want it kept in its parliamentary context. When there are consultations among the House leaders about these task forces, that will certainly be our position.

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, the Leader of the Opposition indicated that his government had done both—had set up select committees and task forces. In the case of the Millhaven incident in 1974, the hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce (Mr. Allmand) reminds me that indeed it was a task force. I believe the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands (Miss MacDonald) sat on that one.

The Leader of the Opposition is confusing that task force with a subcommittee of the parliamentary committee chaired by the then member for Windsor-Walkerville, now Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. MacGuigan). But there was a task force. We had set one up and the hon. Leader of the Opposition set some up.

He is now saying, if I understand him, that he would prefer to have select committees to task forces. Madam Speaker, his government showed that you can have both; our government shows that you can have both and we are proposing today to announce our desire to set up these task forces. We hope we will have co-operation from the other parties. If they do not want to hear of task forces in the future, although they did in the past, we will see what can be done.

Out intention is to involve members from all parties in a task force, as was done in 1974, to have all parties come together to give advice to the government of the day and, hopefully, to parliament on a specific situation, as was done in the case of Millhaven.

We are in the hands of the opposition parties. If they do not want to sit on task forces, in view of Speaker Jerome's ruling we probably would not presume to proceed with the creation of such task forces in such circumstances as were regretted by Speaker Jerome because of the unilateral manner in which it had been done by the Leader of the Opposition. We will discuss the formation of these task forces and I hope it will be possible to set them up, Madam Speaker. Members on every side of the House have frequently regretted that Parliament was being ignored, that members were not present enough at the formation of policies and that they should be involved in some way in the establishment of those policies. That is our aim.

Mr. Clark: Madam Speaker, one very brief question for clarification. Is the Prime Minister also prepared to discuss with parties on this side the establishment of select committees for the same purpose?

● (1220)

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, certainly I would hope that the House leaders of all parties would discuss, when needed, setting up such select committees.

I think we felt when we were in the opposition that the government had perhaps overdone this a little bit in setting up that many and that Parliament could not easily manage regular standing committees, select committees and task forces. Maybe there will be an inclination to set up less of them, but we have not at all rejected the idea of select committees as provided for under the rules of the House.

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Madam Speaker, I would like just a brief word on this important subject because I was closely involved in the breakthrough which occurred last fall. I believe this was a breakthrough that was regarded by all members sitting in Parliament at the time as one which would allow private members of Parliament to have a direct input in developing policy at long last.

As I recall, the then opposition House leader, who is now the Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen), was concerned that the proper parliamentary procedures be observed in establishing, in particular, the special select committee dealing with the subject of rehabilitation services. In fact, there was such a long delay in making sure that the parliamentary niceties would be observed that our committee did not really have final approval until November 29.

We are all aware, at least those of us who have been in the House of Commons for a number of years, that there has been a gradual erosion of the rights of private members of Parliament. The hope has always been that the committee system would remedy some of this intrusion of the executive. In most instances I think hon. members will agree that even the committee system unfortunately has become a creature of the government. But here in the special select committees was a breakthrough which gave for the first time parliamentarians—private members of Parliament—the right to deal with areas of urgent concern and to bring in recommendations through the regular parliamentary process.

I might add that I was the member of Parliament who had the privilege of leading off in the debate on November 29 that established finally the special select committee of Parliament. The then House leader for the opposition, now the Minister of Finance, objected to the fact that I was the lead-off speaker. I am sure hon. members will recall that debate and the then government House leader, now the opposition House leader, explained in quite explicit terms that it was a gesture that indicated that at long last private members of Parliament were going to have an important role to play in select committees. In particular, they were going to be dissociated from the influence of ministers of the Crown.

In summing up his statement at that time, the then House leader of the opposition stated this at page 1837 of Hansard for November 29:

> I do not wish to embarrass any further the hon. member, who has a deep interest in this subject, but I would like to advise the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Baker) that it is a precedent which, I suggest, should have a very short life.

I hope that as consultations proceed on this important subject we can use the same quotation, that a task force directly responsible to a minister is a precedent which will have a very short life, and that we will return to the structure which was a real breakthrough in allowing private members to participate independently through the select committee procedure.

Mr. Mark Rose (Mission-Port Moody): Madam Speaker, I will be very brief. I am sorry the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) has left. I know he can read and I hope this will be drawn to his attention.

The Prime Minister indicated that he was approachable by other House leaders on the nature and kind of committees and whether or not there should be any. I have not seen the complete list. However, I was very interested during the last Parliament in the contemplated select committee on nuclear power and nuclear proliferation. There was mention of that very serious matter, not only for world peace but also for human survival, in the throne speech.

Therefore, I want to ask whether or not the Prime Minister or the government would be approachable on some other kinds of additions in terms of the subjects being addressed in these select committees. Perhaps that matter can be drawn to the Prime Minister's attention and an answer can be given in some other way at some other time.

[Translation]

Hon. Yvon Pinard (President of the Privy Council): Madam Speaker, in answer to the last two members who expressed their preference for select committees I simply want to draw to to their attention the fact that according to Standing Order 65 there are already 20 standing committees of the House of Commons. In the past we have found it most difficult to interest more than a third of the members in actively participating in the deliberations of the standing committees of the House. I wonder if it is wise and advisable to plan the creation of select committees at this time before it can be demonstrated that with the already existing committees it is not possible to make the system work properly.

Still I find their suggestion interesting because it conveys to some extent the idea of a change. But, as the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) mentioned this morning, it is an original idea to which, surprisingly enough, the Progressive Conservative Party had already given some thought since they themselves had considered setting up task forces. So all we want is to allow backbenchers an opportunity to participate more directly in the decision-making process. That is a form of participation that we want and that we suggest to the official opposition party. If members opposite prefer the striking of a select committee, that could be included in new discussions on a more general parliamentary reform. I remember quite well that the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Baker) sat as I did on a committee on procedure and organization in 1975 and 1976. We got a very interesting report on committees that had been prepared by the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert), who is now in the House, and that contained all interesting ideas. But there were never any concrete results about that parliamentary reform so desired and so desirable, Madam Speaker.

So the action we are taking today is that intention which has been expressed by the right hon. Prime Minister of Canada to give members from all regions of Canada and particularly from western Canada a chance to participate in those committees he described this morning in replying to the right. hon. Leader of the Opposition, who is here, and to the House leader of the official opposition. That is our approach on that matter. We believe it would not be wise for the moment to add committees of the House to the twenty or so that already exist in accordance with the provisions of Standing Order 65. Now an invitation has been made to members from both sides of the House to participate. I am sure that the right hon. Prime Minister will not prevent backbenchers from working in a constructive way on matters of national interest. I am certain of it, and I am also assured of it by the House leader of the New Democratic Party.

That is all we are aiming for. We want to make members work, we want to get them more interested, we want to enhance their role. That is a first step in parliamentary reform, and I wonder why reactions are not negative. Questions asked will be the topic of negotiations between the House leaders, as required. Yesterday, I acted merely out of courtesy. I advised my colleagues that the right hon. Prime Minister was going to make an announcement. That is all I was supposed to do. We are open to any positive suggestion for improving the efficiency of the task forces. We are counting on the participation of Progressive Conservative members as well as of the NDP. As for the proposed select committees as such, I respectfully submit that this could be the topic, in the near future, of a study on parliamentary reform.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Madam Speaker, I just want to say I am very happy to note that the government House leader has indicated that all aspects of this question will be subject to negotiations, because I think that is quite important. That is the kind of assurance my friend and I want and I thank him for giving us that assurance.

[Translation]

Mr. Herb Breau (Gloucester): Madam Speaker, since we are given the opportunity to discuss this matter briefly, I should like to add just one more point to what the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Pinard) has said. I would co-operate with the Leader of the Opposition and the leader of his party in the House in setting up those task forces for one simple reason. I do not think we should discuss those task forces as such as select committees of the House for one reason only.

I therefore urge them to co-operate because, whether we want to or not, a parliamentary body such as a select committee can in some cases be active and positive, especially in those cases where it is asked to play an inquisitorial role. But often political opposition in the House of Commons can make itself felt through a select committee, which is not to say that this is necessarily a bad thing. However, I do think a task force set up by order in council can be a mechanism that is more positive and efficient than a select committee of the House. But that need not mean that we will not have select committees. But I would ask the Leader of the Opposition, however, not to make co-operation on task forces conditional upon whether or not we have select committees. In some cases, I would agree with that. What I liked about his proposal last year was that in some cases task forces could make more positive studies because, despite the philosophical differences reflected in task forces, chances are they might be less imbued with party politics. As for me, I have agreed to be a member of a task force and I have invited a member of his party to become involved in it, because I feel he could study the matter very well.

PRIVILEGE

MR. NYSTROM—REPORTED STATEMENT BY MEMBER OF SASKATCHEWAN LEGISLATURE

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Madam Speaker, I raise a question of privilege on a subject today that I find very difficult because it has racial connotations to it. That therefore makes it very difficult. It concerns a statement made by a member of the Saskatchewan legislature, Mr. Dennis Ham who, with another member who up until a few weeks ago was leader of the opposition and leader of the Conservative party in Saskatchewan, Mr. Dick Collver, left their party to sit as independents to advocate the separation of the west from Canada and the joining of the west with the United States.

[Translation]

Madam Speaker, I have here an article that made headlines in Le Journal de Montréal on April 17, 1980, and which I should like to quote:

If the hostages in Tehran were Quebeckers, they would say:

That is, people from western Canada.

"Leave them there".

A member from western Canada—

[English]

I will repeat that in English. If the hostages in Tehran were Quebeckers, they would say in western Canada "Leave them there".

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: Who said that?

Mr. Nystrom: A member from western Canada.

[Translation]

But, Madam Speaker, as I said, it is not with pride that I rise on a question of privilege this morning, but an article datelined Regina from the Canadian Press says, and I quote:

> If 50 French Canadians were held hostages in Tehran instead of 50 Americans, the majority of western Canadians would say, "Leave them there".
> That is at least what the independent MLA for Swift Current, Mr. Dennis Ham, claimed during a conference at the Saskatchewan Press Club on Tuesday.
> Mr. Ham, who has already been campaigning for some time for the secession of western Canada and its incorporation into an American state, is also predicting an uprising in Quebec.

Madam Speaker, Mr. Ham, a Saskatchewan MLA, like all other Canadians, has a right to express his opinion freely, but that opinion does not reflect at all the opinion of the people in my province of western Canada.

Unfortunately, as you know, a minority in western Canada does not understand the meaning of the aspirations of Quebeckers. But Mr. Ham's words do not reflect the opinion of that minority, let alone of the majority of the people in my province in western Canada. Mr. Ham's words were an insult to Quebeckers, to the Canadians from Saskatchewan, from western Canada and all Canadians.

[English]

Reflecting back to the speech made by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) in this House three days ago when he said that we in this House represent all of the people of Canada, as a representative of my province and my constituency I feel that a statement of this sort, made by an elected member who has as his colleague a highly respected member, distorts badly in this time in Canada the sentiments of a number of people in western Canada. Because of that, I feel it is an infringement upon my work and my ability to speak accurately for the people of western Canada, as this gentleman does not in any way whatsoever represent the feelings of people in western Canada. I have never found anyone who would like to have the American hostages replaced by hostages from Quebec and who would then say "Leave them there".

I want to take this opportunity to dissociate myself and the members of my party, especially those from western Canada, from the statements made by that member of the Saskatchewan legislature. I am sure the same is true of western members of the Conservative party and the Liberal party as well. If you in any way see this as a question of privilege, Madam Speaker, I would be prepared to move a motion that we refer this statement and articles of this sort to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections for study and elaboration.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, briefly on the question of privilege, I doubt very much that this is a question of privilege for a House like ours. I am sure the hon. member had his own reasons to raise this issue and quote that article in the House of Commons, and I do not want to elaborate on his motivations or his reasons. But I, as a member from western Canada, along with my colleagues, want to take this opportunity to join with the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville (Mr. Nystrom) in the position he took, namely, that the statement attributed to Mr. Ham does not represent at all the opinion of the people in western Canada. The basic thing that should be pointed out here today is that the House of Commons is not powered to restrict the freedom of speech of members, private citizens and even of members of another House in another jurisdiction. But for us, as individuals, and myself as leader of a party with a large support in western Canada, this is an opportunity to reject outright the views that were quoted and attributed to Mr. Ham.

[English]

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina West): Madam Speaker, I must add some comments to those of my colleague from Yorkton-Melville (Mr. Nystrom) and the right hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark). As my colleague and the Leader of the Opposition said, no one would contemplate limiting the right of any individual to express his opinion. But when that individual expresses an opinion and claims or infers that his opinion is held by most people in western Canada, then that is an insult to most western Canadians.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

● (1240)

Mr. Benjamin: It does, I believe, infringe on the privileges of members of Parliament, particularly on those from western Canada, when that kind of allegation is made so all-inclusively, asserting that some sort of general feeling, attitude or state of mind or piece of insanity is held by western Canadian people.

I want to say to you, Madam Speaker, and to my French Canadian compatriots that the French fact in all parts of Canada is what has made the major difference between our country and most, if not all, of the other countries, and particularly the difference between our country and the United States. The French fact in all parts of Canada has made us an example to the world of how peoples of different cultures can live together in peace and work together to solve differences, some of which go back decades and decades, to make our country stronger, freer, and, what is most important, more sovereign and independent.

It is not new that there have been a few people not only in western Canada but in all parts of Canada who from time to time over the last 200 years have held such views as this, but invariably those few who held such views were the kooks, flukes, flakes, freaks and right-wing reactionaries who are an infinitesimal minority of insanity. It is not just peculiar to a handful of western Canadians; it is peculiar among a handful of people in different parts of this country.

I say to my French Canadian compatriots that the opposite is the case. The great majority of western Canadians feel the opposite; they respect you and your contribution to our nation.

We, the great majority of us, the overwhelming majority of us, will work with you to keep this country sovereign and independent and freer and better, and we shall do it as an example to the rest of the world.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Bill McKnight (Kindersley-Lloydminster): Madam Speaker, as a member of the House of Commons from the province of Saskatchewan, I should like to add my voice to the voices of my leader, the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville (Mr. Nystrom) and the hon. member for Regina West (Mr. Benjamin). I should like to repudiate the statements which were supposedly made on behalf of western Canadians by Mr. Ham, as quoted by the hon. member.

The hon. member for Yorkton-Melville mentioned that these two gentlemen had been associated with the Progressive Conservative party of Saskatchewan. That is correct; they had been associated. They have since been repudiated by their constituency associations in the province of Saskatchewan—in the constituency of Nipawin in the case of Mr. Collver and in the constituency of Swift Current in the case of Mr. Ham.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McKnight: They no longer have any ties or any connection with the Progressive Conservative Party in Saskatchewan or, for that matter with the Progressive Conservative Party of Canada. I suggested yesterday that there are feelings in western Canada, as there are feelings in the rest of Canada, that we are not all being treated equally. But the feelings expressed by those two members are not the majority feelings in western Canada, as they are not, I hope, the majority feelings of the people in Quebec who are trying to break our country apart. We will stand with our fellow Canadians from Quebec and our fellow Canadians in the rest of this country to try to make Canada a better country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Yvon Pinard (President of the Privy Council): Madam Speaker, I simply wish to commend the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville (Mr. Nystrom) for raising that question of privilege.

Mr. Irénée Pelletier (Sherbrooke): Madam Speaker, when I gave the clipping to the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville (Mr. Nystrom) yesterday, I did not expect him of course to raise the matter in this House. I would like to thank him most sincerely.

Madam Speaker, I have had many opportunities to travel across this country and I know that sometimes in some areas, including western Canada, certain government policies or programs were not accepted, but never did Canadian citizens in those provinces show any lack of concern for human tragedies such as the hostages in Tehran. I commend the opposition members, both New Democrats and Conservatives, for putting the record straight, and I am confident that on this side of the House, we appreciate that enormously in this most difficult period we are going through in Quebec, in view of the efforts we have to make to convince French-speaking Canadians that Canada is still for every one of us the land of the future.

Mr. Gérald Laniel (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Madam Speaker, being the only member from Quebec who has been here 18 years, which makes me the senior representative of this province, I would like to thank particularly the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville (Mr. Nystrom) as well as the other members and the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) for what they said about these comments undermining the honour and the attachment of Quebeckers towards the rest of Canada.

I would like to tell the hon. member that in the last 18 years we have heard a few such insinuations from both sides. However, I believe that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) or the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert), who have been here longer than I have, would recognize that a lot of progress has been made during these 18 years and that this House is perhaps one of the instruments which has contributed considerably to a better understanding and a rapprochement of all Canadians. I believe that the testimonial given by the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville this morning, who was strongly supported by the hon. member for Regina West (Mr. Benjamin), shows that westerners have a lot of affection for Quebeckers and Canada as a whole and I am sure that the comments made this morning will be greatly appreciated by all Quebeckers of good will who want more understanding, solidarity and friendship among all Canadians, whatever their origins or language.

Madam Speaker: The question raised by the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville (Mr. Nystrom) was certainly timely and it was greeted appropriately by members on both sides of the House. If I may judge by the applause that we heard, I can conclude that such statements are certainly offensive both for Quebeckers and for westerners. However, this comment was made outside the House and attacks a group rather than one member in particular. I therefore believe that I cannot find any grounds for a question of privilege, but I still wish to thank the hon. member for his intervention which was so well received by both sides of the House.

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The House resumed, from Thursday, April 17, consideration of the motion of Mrs. Côté for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the amendment thereto (Mr. Clark) (p. 31).

Mr. John Thomson (Calgary South): Madam Speaker, at the time the House adjourned last evening I was addressing my remarks to the frustrations of my constituents in Calgary South with respect to the federal government. I would like to say at this time that those frustrations in no way reflect the sentiment which was expressed in the newspaper article which was just described.

In my remarks I was dealing with the question of oil pricing and, in particular, I had commenced to talk about OPEC oil prices. I think that many Canadians believe that OPEC oil prices are still determined by a cartel and that these prices bear no relationship to fair market value. This was certainly the case in 1973 when the supplies of oil from OPEC countries far exceeded the demand for their oil. This has not been the case since 1978. As Sheik Yamani said several weeks ago, OPEC has lost control of price levels. In the years 1978 and 1979 the demand for OPEC oil far exceeded the supply. There is no longer a uniform OPEC price. Each OPEC country, other than Saudi Arabia, is charging whatever the market will bear.

Surely at the very least Canadians should be prepared to pay a price for domestic oil which is equivalent to the cost of developing alternative forms of energy. Failure to recognize this as a fair value for domestic oil is to put our heads in the sand in terms of achieving energy self-sufficiency.

In his speech the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) stated that "Prime Minister Clark was not successful in reconciling the views of the provinces of Ontario and Alberta on energy pricing". That is not the case. Our government did reach an agreement on energy pricing with all of the provinces in Canada. While neither Ontario nor Alberta were happy, the fact of the matter is that an agreement was reached. There was a meeting of the minds and that, in my view, is a definition of an agreement.

The founding Fathers of Confederation wrote into the constitution that it was the right of the national government to uphold the national interest, even in areas of provincial jurisdiction, if such jurisdiction was being exercised in a way which was contrary to the national interest. There can be no question that the wealthier provinces of Canada must share with the less fortunate provinces, but the question is, what do we mean by share? How far does sharing go? Does it mean that one particular province should be compelled to sell its resources on a different value basis than the other provinces sell their resources? Surely this was not the intent of the Fathers of Confederation.

There is no dispute by the people of Alberta that every citizen of Canada should enjoy equality of opportunity, no matter in what part of the country he or she chooses to live. Certainly the Alberta government is not discriminating against equality of opportunity; far from it. So many people are flocking to Alberta because of the very existence of equality of opportunity.

The west must have the opportunity to develop its own economic and social objectives within the Canadian framework. That is all we want. All the west is asking for is that opportunity to develop its own social and economic objectives within the context of confederation. This is no less true for the Atlantic provinces, Quebec or any of the other provinces.

Certainly Canada needs a strong central government, but that strength must come from a feeling of togetherness that is freely given and not given under duress. In my view, national unity is not something that can be dictated by a central government. National unity must evolve from a sense of participation within confederation, and again all the west is seeking is an opportunity to participate in confederation and not be ignored or neglected.

I personally have always seen Canada as a country trying to find itself. There has not been an urgent need for the heavy hand of a central government to pull the country together and to create for us a national identity.

I believe that Canadians could knit themselves together to find a national identity for themselves. I say in all honesty that I have many misgivings about changes to our existing constitution. For all its imperfections it has given Canadians individual freedom, civil liberties and one of the highest standards of living in the world. At the same time, I am reluctantly coming to the conclusion that if we are to hold Canada together, there has to be a change in the constitution which would permit the regions of our country to achieve the diverse objectives which fulfil regional aspirations.

I do not believe that we can continue to cling to the concept that the federal government must control all economic, social, cultural, language and communication policies in Canada. Nor do I believe that Canada can or should try to become uniform with respect to these policies. More importantly, I do not believe that the federal government can succeed in promoting national unity by enforcing a constitutional solution with respect to these policies.

Mr. Speaker, Albertans are ready and willing for constitutional change but, more importantly, they are crying out for eastern Canada to recognize them as full partners in confederation.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): I will call it one o'clock, if I may. It being one o'clock, I do now leave the chair until 2 p.m.

At 12.59 p.m. the House took recess.

● (1400)

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 2 p.m.

Hon. Pierre De Bané (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, in this debate on the unity of our country, I think the real question should be whether Canadians want at all costs to open their hearts and minds in order to ensure the survival of a country where Francophones and Anglophones will live together as equals and brothers or whether they prefer to turn over a new leaf in our history books and live as two sovereign and independent nations in a land called Canada.

Everything else is nothing but discussion and quibble between legal experts, constitutional lawyers or economists.

Personally, I have made up my mind and I want to live in a mature, fraternal, dignified and equal partnership together with all those who were the builders and the beneficiaries of this country. If by misfortune my wager based as much on my openness as on others' generosity should fall through, then, and only then, would I extol the value of a closed society.

By the way, this is the fundamental difference between my option and that of the Péquistes who have decided to close their hearts to others before trying to find out what lies in other people's hearts. You may have noticed that their rationalization is always different. For instance, a PQ supporter will tell you that he took his stand because Quebeckers pay more taxes out to Ottawa than Ottawa spends in Quebec. But if you point out to him that this is a misrepresentation and that Mr. Parizeau himself has admitted that over the last few years the federal government has spent many more billions of dollars in Quebec than that province has paid out in taxes, he still will not change his mind.

Could it be that the present system is too inflexible and that that rigidity is the basis of his attitude? Not so. We could be reminded that Péquiste sovereignty-association was founded when Mr. Pearson was Prime Minister of Canada, a period when federalism, as Mr. Parizeau has himself recognized, has been of unprecedented flexibility. Could it be then that our system is over-centralistic? Of course not because when you remind him that out of each tax dollar paid to the federal government, the federal government retains only 32 cents and the remaining 68 cents go back to the provincial and municipal governments, he still will not be persuaded. So it is not because our system is too centralistic. May that man have endorsed the PQ philosophy because federal policies relating to Quebec are ill-conceived and ineffective? Not so. Once again this is only a pretext because I have never seen a Péquiste who would be willing to abandon his option whether or not, for the sake of discussion of the federal government was willing to go along with any policies he wishes. In fact, this question was asked recently to the Quebec minister responsible for economic development, Mr. Bernard Landry, who was saying that federal policies were not to the advantage of Quebec. Reporters asked him: In the eventuality that these policies were amended as you wish, would you become a federalist? He admitted that of course he would not and that he would remain a supporter of independence.

Mr. Speaker, this shows that all the arguments used to try to explain the independence option are only a smokescreen. Basically, there are not two reasons for wanting independence, there are not three, there is only one: It is because a certain group speaks French and the others English. All the other arguments used to try to justify this option are only a smokescreen. As a matter of fact, the Parti Québécois is now admitting that what it wants basically is to break up a relationship which exists in this country where Francophones and Anglophones together govern the largest country in the world after the Soviet Union. I therefore wonder why they want to hide the basic reason for their option and give out so many reasons which have nothing at all to do with the philosophy of their party.

In this regard, Mr. Speaker, I would like to recall the low blow dealt by Mr. Claude Morin, minister of intergovernmental affairs in Quebec, who stated recently that the only people who could suffer from the consequences of their option are those who represent Quebec in this House. In my 12 years as member of Parliament and now as minister, I never thought that a fellow Quebecker would dare make such an insidious attack against people who do not agree with him politically. Indeed, who are those people who are now preaching independence? Who are they whose administration has been stamped with incompetence? We must recall that for years they criticized their predecessors for having undertaken the James Bay project and that as soon as they were elected, they admitted what was very obvious, that this might have been the wisest decision made by the former government.

For years, they have argued that nuclear power should be developed without delay, before hydropower. Look what happened immediately after they came to office. Mr. Bernard Landry, who reminded us that there has always been a 2 per cent difference between the unemployment rate in Ontario and in Quebec, must admit today that, for the first time in history, the gap between the two provinces has systematically exceeded 3 per cent during the first three years of their administration, whereas it had always stood at 2 per cent or less during the years previous to 1976, 1977. It was 2.5 per cent in 1976, 3.3 per cent in 1977, 3.7 per cent in 1978 and still over 3 per cent in 1979. This had never been the case before they came to power.

Look at their budget. Out of $17 billion, they will be spending over $10 billion on social and education programs alone. The hon. minister Lazure himself indicated that for every patient treated in Quebec costs amount to over 30 per cent of the costs in Ontario.

In the area of education, I should like to quote a few excerpts from Mr. Parizeau's budget speech. Having recognized on page 34 that—

Quebeckers are overtaxed.

—he added on page 15 that he agreed, during the latest round of collective bargaining, to admit 1,600 more teachers within the system. He said:

In my opinion, this is the settlement's only inconsistent and stupid aspect.

He added:

Had we known at the time these offers were made what we know now about the actual cost of education, such offers would never have been made.

Here is what the minister of finance stated three and a half years after taking over the financial administration:

If I had known what I know today, I would have done that a month ago.

And on page 24, Mr. Parizeau stated—

We have even come to a point where our annual costs per student in our schools are $500 higher than in Ontario. That is nothing to be proud of.

In those two departments alone which engulf more than 50 per cent of his budget, we see what the minister himself and the minister of health are admitting. Fortunately, the department of highways does not come under federal jurisdiction because they would say, of course, that, if the highways in Quebec have become the biggest death traps in the province, the federal government is to be blamed.

But given their incompetence, Mr. Speaker, I have tried to demonstrate on the basis of their own statements—and history will bear witness to it—that the greatest harm they have done to our country has been the division that they created and fostered between Quebeckers of all origins. We shall never be overly stressing the extent of the damage they did during the last 15 years by having our people and particularly our youth believe that federalists are not as patriotic as they are, that they do not love Quebec as much as they do, that they are themselves more patriotic, that they monopolize patriotism. And even on the day Mr. Trudeau was elected with the support of the population to govern Canada, one should remember all that they did to destroy him, and by the same token to undermine everything that we did. They have the gall to chastise us for not progressing fast enough. The most important legislation passed by all sides of this House, with the support of each and every member, from all parties, has been, of course, the Official Languages Act which, in section 2, sets French and English on an equal footing. Remember what René Lévesque and the others had to say on that occasion.

Because they deny us the opportunity of doing our job in our country, they are trying today to win us over to their cause, drawing us within a society which, in spite of all their artifices will be nothing but a closed society. While they pretend to be of a social democratic strain, to foster division they went as far as supporting the Socreds from the very beginning until the last election. I think they are trying to hide under that ambiguity the fact that they want to enhance their national values at all costs. And of course, this ambiguity is also flagrant in the question they will be asking the people of Quebec. In the first part they say, and I quote, that they want the exclusive power to make legislation, to levy taxes, to establish external relations. This for sure amounts to independence. In the same question they want a mandate to conduct negotiations between a sovereign Quebec and Canada. But if the question specifies that both mandates are to be fulfilled as one, "at the same time", as the wording puts it, it remains true that the two are quite different in themselves. And that should be obvious to anybody.

Independence, sovereignty, separation, secession, all that can be decided among Quebeckers alone but if one can decide on his own whether he is going to divorce or get a separation, it takes two to decide upon marriage or association. Therefore nothing would be possible if on referendum day the answer is Yes to the question asked by the Lévesque government, because Canada would not have been consulted about any association with a sovereign Quebec. And Mr. Lévesque has given the rest of Canada, which incidentally has no reason to say Yes, all the reasons in the world to say No since he himself has stated many times that sovereignty and association cannot be dissociated.

On this planet where there are 2,500 languages and cultures but merely 160 countries, there have been many other movements toward separation and independence, but I know none which was marked from the start by ambiguousness and humiliation. To say that something that cannot be negotiated, like independence, will now be indissolubly linked to association, is a most humiliating statement, because it means that we who are supposed to be the embodiment of pride are putting our future into the hands of someone else. I say, Mr. Speaker, that as far as bargaining power is concerned, I have seen better and that when you want to bluff, you do not start by showing your cards to your opponent.

Is it possible, anyway, to imagine that Canada would say yes? In my opinion, there is but one possibility left for such a scheme. It is the hypothesis of a ruined sovereignty, of a sovereignty on paper only, a sovereignty where we would share the same currency while being a minority as far as monetary decisions are concerned. I recall what Mr. Parizeau himself said three or four years ago: If Quebec has the same currency as a country whose economy would be stronger than its own, it would become a banana republic. This is what is offered to us; to remain in the wake of another country which would have a permanent right of veto in all economic areas.

How can anyone have the nerve to say that it is a challenging outlook on the future? Let us wonder for one moment how long an individual from Trois-Rivières, Matane, Bois-Francs or Beauce would be willing to leave his or her fate in the hands of a man from Vancouver, Toronto or elsewhere? For how long? Is there another country in the world which gives a right of veto on its daily fate to another country? In my opinion it is the only hypothesis which would be accepted by the other country. Besides, it is not for nothing that Canada, which has very close relations with the United States, has never asked for an association because we know quite well that to the extent that we could have a right of veto on their policies they would have one on us and we would then remain in their wake. This is why I never heard of any sensible person in Canada who would dare approve such a solution.

Let us consider for a minute how much that thesis is unrealistic. Let us consider the opposite hypothesis. If the western provinces, which are now substantially richer than the rest of Canada and have a larger population than Quebec, decided tomorrow to separate, after their separation from Canada they could say to Quebec, Ontario and the maritimes: The western provinces will have one vote and Quebec 30 per cent of a vote.

And Ontario, which is even more densely populated than we are, will have 40 per cent of one vote, and the maritimes the balance. Would it be accepted? Is it possible to disregard realities and to think that through legislation Quebec, which has almost three million fewer inhabitants than Ontario, will turn tomorrow to Ontario and say, "we in Quebec, we have one vote and you Ontario, even with your greater population, you as well as the west and the maritimes will have one vote, and if you do not agree, I shall remain in Canada." What kind of ruse is this, if not an attempt to humiliate Quebeckers collectively to lead them to a dead end where we shall all be humiliated, an attempt, by insulting our people, to urge them to take a step, whereas, according to every survey, the percentage of independentists is strictly the same after twenty years?

Mr. Speaker, on that proposition which, I think, is totally unrealistic, which is a dead end which would humiliate all of us who form the government of this country, who have just been mandated with far more support than the PQ, we ask the population to really show some self-respect and urge them to make with us a mature decision for the future, an enlightened choice that has nothing to do with wishful thinking, a courageous choice that will not confuse obliviousness and audacity, a logical choice that will not be dictated either by the economic or the cultural components. In sum, a choice rather than the failure to choose as proposed by the promoters of sovereignty-association.

It is quite ironical that if tomorrow Quebec accepted sovereignty-association, a number of policies it can now establish in total liberty would no longer be possible tomorrow. Whether it be the selective repeal of the sales tax in the fiscal field, industrial development incentives or preferential buying policies, all this can be done today but will no longer be possible tomorrow without the agreement of the other country next door, assuming that country agreed to enter into a common market.

Mr. Speaker, what is most saddening to me is that a large number of my fellow Quebeckers who are totally opposed to the independence concept feel compelled to vote Yes, if only to express our pride. I am not tempted like Camille Laurin to suggest that I am the embodiment of Quebec's soul, quite the opposite, I feel that those who are ready to lead us all together into humiliation in order to make their point have in the back of their minds something much different than a language of pride and dignity. One thing I can tell them, they have no monopoly on the passion for Quebec. That passion we have as much as they do, and to me no scheme is more diabolical than the drawing of cheques on Quebeckers' patriotism, on that goal we all share of living in dignity.

This, Mr. Speaker reminds me of one of the most severe crises we went through, the conscription during the Second World War. One of its heroes was André Laurendeau. During that period where the whole world saw it as a duty to share in the defence of freedom, we believed in Quebec, everyone without exception, that we could not be on the side of liberty, participation in the war. Laurendeau who fought so hard against conscription wrote in his book, and I quote:

> That crisis went deep. It moved us. It changed some of our ideas. Then it seemed to be over . . . out of common agreement we stopped referring to it, as if on either side we were not that proud of what we had done.

● (1430)

Of course, had I lived during that period and had I been told that it was patriotic to refuse to be used as cannon fodder for England, that it was once again a matter of fighting to defend the Empire, I would have said no. But now these passions have waned and we realize that in fact the Second World War was fought to defend freedom. Today they are trying to rekindle our fellow citizens' patriotism by telling them that a Yes vote is a vote for dignity.

In my view, Mr. Speaker, I think I have shown they are trying to impair irretrievably the dignity and pride of the people in Quebec. For our part, we offer them something infinitely more encompassing. Rather than have a country based on religion, as emphasized by the Tremblay royal commission hardly 25 years ago, they want one founded on race or language; we invite our fellow countrymen from Quebec along with other Canadians of all regions to make up an open, brotherly society based on mutual aid. We want them to be part of Canada, but not because Canada spends more money in Quebec—if that were the reason we would not deserve to be Canadians.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. De Bané: Furthermore, the word "federal" comes from the Latin word foedus, or a pact, with fides which means confidence, promise, commitment, obligation, wish. The idea of a pact does not conjure up only a solemn promise between two or more people to have confidence in one another and to respect a commitment. It also suggests co-operation, reciprocity, mutual aid. It is not just by whim that the great French political scientist Raymond Aron stated recently that federalism is wisdom and fraternity applied to politics. A great minister in the de Gaulle administration, who is still a minister in France, Alain Peyrefitte, said recently in his book: "Le mal français":

> Many people think that France has a great advantage, owing to its unitary system. However, after observing the scene for three decades, I am convinced that polycentric countries—

And he mentions the Swiss, German and United States federations—

> —that the polycentric countries constitute more flexible societies.

These are the words of the minister of justice in France, Alain Peyrefitte, who has studied the unitary and polycentric systems for three decades.

Mr. Speaker, where we want to lead Quebeckers is toward an open, fraternal society, that will participate within a country in this system of mutual aid, fraternity, co-operation. Ask a Frenchman, a German, an Englishman, a Spaniard, an Italian, what is their impression of us and they will tell you that we are by far the luckiest people in the world. That is my most deep-seated conviction.

Recently, in a world survey, Gallup found out that the happiest people live in Canada. People in France were asked in a recent survey in what country other than their own they would most like to live. The country that came far ahead of all others was Canada.

A Canada that for us is a land of freedom, a Canada where the relationships between French-speaking and English-speaking Canadians will be characterized by equality and fraternity, a Canada that will be even more generous toward its people who suffer, are sick or poor, and precisely because we will be still richer in the years to come, a Canada that will be interdependent with all other countries of the world. A Canada that, for all of us, for each and every one of us, will keep on being a challenge to our intelligence and an appeal to open our hearts.

And I conclude with this thought of Saint-Exupéry, Mr. Speaker, that the noblest profession of man is to unite men.

[English]

Mr. Bert Hargrave (Medicine Hat): Mr. Speaker, may I just take a moment to commend the previous speaker for his intense and very passionate plea for national unity. It was a privilege to sit on this side and listen to him, and I want to tell him that.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hargrave: I want to begin today, Mr. Speaker, by saying it is a personal privilege for me to participate in this throne speech debate. I should like, first of all, to extend my congratulations and best wishes to Madam Speaker on her very significant appointment. I should also like to commend the mover and seconder of the address in reply for their well prepared and ably delivered lead-off speeches.

In my remarks today I intend to discuss several serious issues of special concern to our western prairie provinces, issues that I would describe as much too important to be dealt with in a partisan political manner.

I want to begin by talking about energy, drought, and a lost generation. Alberta's present-day energy resources are really the end result of a fortunate accident in climate and geography that involved dinosaurs and tropical growth many, many millions of years ago.

During the late 1920s and the 1930s I well remember the numerous gas wells, all appropriately called oil wells because that was what their drillers were looking for, on widespread range lands adjacent to our ranch operation in south east Alberta where I still live today. These gas wells had located gas without any trouble, were able to produce, and in some cases were blowing off uncontrolled into the atmosphere. There were no pipelines, of course, and no markets for this early natural gas.

It was not until about 1940 that the Alberta government introduced and passed the necessary Alberta legislation to export both oil and natural gas to other provinces and to the United States of America.

It was also another accident in climate and geography that brought on the great North American drought throughout all of the 1930s, and covering our three prairie provinces in Canada. Coinciding exactly with this continental disaster, was the ten years of business depression. That ten years of drought and depression was, in reality, half a generation lost, followed immediately by another half generation in a sort of recovery phase. We had to learn again how to handle money, how to borrow and spend it, and that may sound strange today. That was the period of our history when small "c" conservatism was truly entrenched in the west, and especially in Alberta.

While our economies began to turn around in the mid 1940s, it was really only during the 1960s that our western prairie economies truly began to come back. We are only now regaining that lost generation of 40 years ago. This is the reason we now value so highly those energy resources that lie below the soils that drifted so disastrously in the 1930s. I ask hon. members most sincerely to try to understand that Alberta's present Heritage Fund of about $6 billion does not even begin to make up for that lost drifted soil and that lost generation 40 years ago.

I remind the House of this grim history of our western prairies because of my deep concern that the same combination of climate and geography could bring about another drought, even ten consecutive years of it. In spite of immense improvements in agricultural technology, there is no reason why another drought could not occur again all across North America, in the interior, of course.

For our cultivated crops, the results would be exceedingly serious, but not as severe as in the 1930s, thanks to our incredibly sophisticated mechanical farm equipment, and more so, thanks to our chemical herbicides—provided we will be allowed to use them.

During the 1930s, one weed, Russian thistle, single-handedly destroyed thousands of acres of spring seeding, because once the seed was in the ground and sprouted there was no way of controlling Russian thistle other than by plowing down the crop, and, of course, there was insufficient moisture to reseed if that was the course that was followed.

For our western grass pastures it is a different story. The consequences of another drought will be just as serious as that first one for those of us involved in grass growing. There are 45 million acres of grasslands presently used for domestic livestock production in western Canada. Grass, hay, surface stockwater and local flood schemes would suffer severely.

Some members may recall the remarks pertaining to a one-year western drought in 1977 that I made on various occasions in this House. Our mountain snow pack that year was only about 60 per cent of the average. That was the lowest snow pack since 1941 and our 950,000 acres of intensive irrigation just barely survived the growth season that year. Not generally known is that the cities of Calgary and Regina had dangerously low domestic water supply levels. Calgary was within three days of initiating water rationing. A sustained drought now would have a far more serious impact on our entire western prairie human population because of the enormous increase in the demand for water.

The three southern cities of Calgary, Lethbridge and Medicine Hat in Alberta and the three cities of Moose Jaw, Regina and Saskatoon in Saskatchewan have seen their total populations increase from 230,680 in the mid-1930s to well over one million today. That is a 337 per cent increase over 45 years. Add to this the substantially increased water demand from the many hundreds of smaller towns and thousands of individual farms and rural acreages, all with automatic dishwashers, laundries and flush toilets. Of course, very few of the latter group I have just mentioned enjoyed this running water luxury in the 1930s.

I suggest that we all read again the startling evidence presented to the Standing Committee on Regional Development in November, 1979, when PFRA officials, Dr. Harry Hill and Mr. Collinson, were witnesses. Mr. Collinson pointed out that the cost of producing electricity throughout the prairies was an extra $100 million in 1977 because the snow pack in the Rockies was so short. I want to commend Dr. Harry Hill for his initial consideration of this matter relating to drought since he assumed his responsibilities not long ago with the PFRA.

In addition, I would like to remind all concerned of the personal suggestion that I was privileged to make before that same committee calling for a small select parliamentary committee review of PFRA, including its past history, its present status and its future role as the appropriate federal agency to assemble and implement a suitable drought contingency program. This suggestion received all-party support in November, 1979.

It should also be noted that the Canada West Foundation, located out of Calgary, has recently initiated a western Canada water resources project to provide an information base and define the problems, the most important of which in my opinion is drought.

I can assure the House that I am not desirous of deserving the doubtful distinction of being the drought conscience of this Parliament, but we should be doing much more than reminiscing about these matters in 1980. Our southern prairies have just emerged from a very mild winter with very little snow. In reality it was a winter drought, and there is presently very little soil moisture to sustain whatever spring growth is now occurring.

On a related matter, the federal government has a long-standing commitment to repair the Bassano dam on the Bow River in southern Alberta. Certain complex legalities concerning the ownership of this streambed have delayed this long overdue repair. I say we should get on with this undertaking, and if the legal complications cannot be resolved, then the Eyremore site somewhat downstream should be proceeded with.

There is one final suggestion I would like to make concerning drought. We should be proceeding now with long-range water planning. This includes serious consideration of northern Alberta river diversions to southern Canada. This sort of thing takes years of planning and involves both federal and provincial governments. In the west it will be the three prairie governments who will be involved and it must be undertaken within the provisions of the prairie provinces water apportionment agreement.

I want to turn now to another very emotional issue not related to anything I have said up to this point but nevertheless a very important issue. We are all very much aware of the Quebec referendum and the national public debate it has generated. Of course, this debate has made us conscious of that. However, I want to bring to your attention an issue that deals with the Crowsnest Pass freight rates. Debate on this issue is presently under way in western Canada and in its own significant way it is almost as important to the west, and even to Canada, as the issue I have just mentioned.

During the last two years there have been some excellent public debates at various annual agricultural meetings and symposiums throughout the western provinces. The subject is now freely discussed with much less emotion than it was for many years when it was rarely, if ever, raised in a formal way. But this debate is only taking place in western Canada. There has never been a proper formal parliamentary debate on this Crowsnest Pass freight rate issue.

The closest approach to such a debate was a Conservative opposition day which took place on May 26, 1977, when we discussed the Hall report. It seems that we all avoid a direct debate on this issue by a variety of points of view on the deliberately vague phrase "the Crow benefits". Various contributing issues dealing with such things as hopper cars, producer cars, switching, off-board quotas and our domestic feed grain policy, are really symptoms of the basic problem, namely the Crow freight rate.

Thanks to Carl Snavely's report, we now know what it costs to move our prairie grain, and that knowledge is now generally accepted by all concerned. Surely this political reality is now apparent; that our two railways cannot be ordered or forced to haul grain at less than compensatory rates.

With a majority Parliament that may very well last for as long as four years or more, this Thirty-second Parliament should have a formal Crowsnest Pass freight rate debate complete with a standing committee whose members would travel throughout the prairie provinces, possibly in about two years. That will give us another two years for the informal debate to develop. In the interval, before such a debate, would it not be appropriate to request the Supreme Court of Canada to examine and rule not on the legality of those statutory Crow rates—that point is surely not in question—but on the often repeated claim that the profits of various CPR subsidiaries be used by that railway, namely the CPR, to supplement their inadequate freight revenues on grain. Some of those subsidiaries are Cominco, Pine Point Mines, Marathon Realty and literally dozens of others that are closely related to the CPR.

It seems to me that this carefully considered and serious suggestion is a necessary preliminary step to a meaningful parliamentary debate on the Crow freight rate issue, and I hope it receives serious consideration.

I want to turn now to another issue that I think is disturbing many of us throughout the country. I think it has been referred to once or twice in this throne speech, but I want to put forward one or two ideas of my own. I refer to the metric issue. I sincerely hope that all members do not underestimate how disturbing and controversial the metric issue is. It has been a serious and disturbing issue throughout two election campaigns and continues to be.

• (1450)

Here is my considered opinion on how we might deal with metrication. We should allow the present status of metrication to remain unchanged, that is, no changeover deadlines such as those scheduled for January 1, 1981, but allow for voluntary participation in those sectors which wish it, unless one of two courses is adopted. First, there should be a proper, formal debate on metrication in all stages proceeded with in this Parliament, including a travelling standing committee stage across Canada. Incidentally, if we have such a debate, it will be the first formal debate on metrication to take place in the Parliament of Canada. Over the past 11 years there has been an off and on informal debate only.

The second possibility, and this is my preference, is that we proceed with a formal agreement or treaty with the United States which provides for both countries to proceed together on the metric changeover. Until we can agree on a date and schedule for acting together, we should not proceed.

Before I conclude, I want to make a brief but very specific mention of something in the throne speech that really pleased me. Up until now I have not said a word about my special labour of love, the cattle industry. That may surprise some members. However, there were three or four words in the throne speech that pleased me very much. There was mention of a meat import law. I would be much less than human if I did not say how pleased I was to see that. I am very anxious to get some details from the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) especially with regard to how he proposes to define the term "meat" rather than "beef", which is my favourite. It no doubt has some connotations which are a little different, but the fact that this reference is in the throne speech is worthy of comment and I appreciate its being there.

In conclusion, I wanted to cover subjects in my remarks that are too important for partisan politics. I hope my hon. friends in this House will agree that these are in that category; they are at least in my opinion.

CANADA ELECTIONS ACT

NOTICE OF ELECTION OF MR. DAVE NICKERSON IN WESTERN ARCTIC

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I have the honour to inform the House that the Clerk has received from the Chief Electoral Officer a copy of the notice which will be published today in the Canada Gazette regarding the election of Mr. Dave Nickerson in the electoral district of Western Arctic.

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mrs. Côté for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the amendment thereto (Mr. Clark) (p. 31).

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Justice and Minister of State for Social Development): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to congratulate you on your election as Speaker of this House. You are the first woman ever to hold this important office, and I am convinced that you feel much pride in your appointment. I am also proud of the fact that it is to a Quebecker that this historic honour has been conferred. I hope that in the next and subsequent centuries, a great number of women, including a great number of Canadian women and people from Quebec, will follow in your footsteps.

As you know, Madam Speaker, my hopes concerning the role in the House of Quebec men and women may not be realized. Last Tuesday, Mr. Lévesque announced that the referendum would be held on May 20. The PQ is seeking the mandate to end all participation in the Canadian Parliament of the duly elected representatives of the people of Quebec. It is seeking a mandate to make you the last woman from Quebec to hold the office of Speaker of the House. It is seeking a mandate to make Pierre Elliott Trudeau the last Quebecker to hold the office of Prime Minister of this country, and the mandate to make me the last Quebecker to be justice minister of Canada, and so on for all the other Quebeckers who are in the House today.

For the past 113 years this House has been at the centre of Canadian history. If it is exceptional, it is because it is the only forum where the elected representatives from all regions of Canada can meet. We all try to formulate to the best of our ability the aspirations, ideas and interests of our constituents. We listen to what other members have to say and try to understand fully the wealth and diversity of our country.

The PQ is asking for a mandate which would forever leave vacant the 75 Quebec seats in the House, a mandate which would prevent 75 men and women elected by the people from being present to express the will of Quebeckers to live a better life within a better Canada. During the next few weeks, we shall fight to make sure that Quebeckers continue to occupy in the Canadian Parliament the seats to which they are entitled. Madam Speaker, I do not think that the people of Quebec want to break up Canada. I urge them to avoid the trap which the PQ has prepared for them in the referendum. That party used to display some measure of honesty. It said openly that its objective was independence, separation. Even now, at times it does express its intentions clearly as it did, for instance, on March 16, 1977, when Mr. Lévesque stated in the National Assembly that, and I quote:

Our political option is to break away from the federal system. That is our objective: independence, sovereignty. There is no point in mincing our words.

That statement is a slip of the tongue, an accidental admission, because the aim of the whole PQ strategy is to hide the real intentions of the party behind a flow of reassuring words, such as sovereignty-association, true confederation, sovereignty with association and a new agreement. The truth of the matter is that the new agreement he means in 1980 is nothing other than the separation he spoke of in 1968. Under the disguise of all those words, Mr. Lévesque and the PQ are every bit as separatist as ever. It would be a tragedy for a majority of Quebeckers to give a mandate to the PQ. They would then have rallied to a cause whose premises they do not believe in. They would then make a renewed Canada far more remote, when in fact that is the Canada they really want. The government of Canada knows full well that the people of Quebec are acutely aware of the need for change. Unfortunately, the PQ created a climate in Quebec in which it is difficult to judge the importance of what changes have already been made, and the value of what we already have in Canada. Doubtless, Canada has achieved a lot. Federalism has evolved considerably.

Let us look at a few examples. The institutions of the government of Canada were changed forever by the Official Languages Act, as my colleague the hon. member for Matane and Minister of Regional Economic Development (Mr. De Bané) put it so eloquently a few minutes ago. We now have a highly developed system of federal-provincial consultation which has transformed the relationships between the federal and provincial governments. You can see it at all first ministers' meetings which have become an annual event.

Since the war which perforce was an era of centralization, fiscal and financial agreements within the Canadian federation have changed radically. In 1945, provincial and municipal governments controlled only 31 per cent of all government revenues, after transfers. In 1960, their share was nearly 50 per cent, and in 1979 they controlled no less than 67 per cent of public revenues in Canada. In view of those figures, it can be said, as the Parti Québécois does, that Canada is a highly centralized or a centralizing country. Behind those significant figures are other changes of very great importance. Take, for example, the parallel creation in 1965 of the Canada and the Quebec pension plans which gave the government of Quebec enormous sources of investment. For example, the 1974 agreement on family allowances allowed a major federal program to be geared to the particular needs of each of the provinces. And I do not have to stress the importance of the established programs financing agreement in 1976.

Canadian federalism has changed spectacularly in another financial area, namely equalization payments to the least privileged provinces. Equalization payments amounted to only $46 million in 1957-58. They have soared to $3.3 billion today and represent one of the central elements of modern federalism in Canada. That benefit of Canadian federalism will provide Quebec this year with an amount of $1.6 billion, more than 50 per cent of the whole program. That is the equivalent of $262 or more than $1,000 per family of four. None of those changes—and I mentioned only a few of the more important examples—suggest that our federalism is fixed or unchanging. Those major changes were possible without having to amend formally the written constitution of our federation. These changes prove that it is possible to renew the Canadian federation. As you are aware, the writing of a new constitution remains a fundamental objective for all Canadians. Since there is no amendment formula, we must do our utmost to reach a consensus among the partners in the federation about a new constitution. I suggest such a consensus is emerging at this time. It can be seen in the various proposals made by most provincial governments, by all parties in this House, by the Pepin-Robarts Commission, by the Canadian Bar Association, and many others. Although different in many respects, these proposals all agree on the core of the reform. They all call for a modernization of the distribution of powers, for bettering the central institutions, for constitutional safeguards concerning fundamental civil rights for Canadians and linguistic rights for minorities throughout the country, and also for a renewal of the role of the federal government in distributing the wealth of the country in order to ensure equal opportunities for all Canadians.

But what did the Parti Québécois do regarding this growing consensus? It adamantly rejected any federal solution to the problem of Canada. It is absolutely not interested in the renewal of Canada. What it wants is a mandate to negotiate the end of Canada and the creation of an independent and separate state. It is not seeking a mandate to come and sit at the conference table to negotiate. It only wants to come and demand independence and association. It is obvious, Mr. Speaker, that to give such a mandate to a political party that has always rejected any federal solution can in no way help the renewal of Canadian federalism.

Thus the argument that the Parti Québécois, if given a mandate, will be able to start negotiations and reach a compromise does not hold. Such a mandate would have exactly the opposite result in that it would generate much uncertainty and foster a significant deterioration of the relations within Canada. It would certainly jeopardize the will to change which has has been evident and it would postpone for several years the constitutional reform.

What is more serious is the fact that it could cause positions to harden and create misunderstandings which could result in a division of our country.

It is appropriate to mention that in its campaign, the PQ has emphasized the absurd idea that a mandate given to a separatist party would bring about a constructive change and promote a new deal. I repeat that the new deal of 1980 is in fact the separation of 1968. Only the words have changed!

I trust in the common sense of my fellow Quebeckers. They will look into the details of the PQ's proposal before making up their mind. They will find that the mandate the Parti Québécois requests is aimed at putting an end to the Parliament of Canada, the Canadian nationhood, the role now played by Canada on the international scene and to the benefits derived by all Quebeckers from our resources.

All Canadians are justifiably proud of the significant position held by our country on the world scene. Canada has greatly contributed to the allies victory during World War II. She played a decisive role in the creation of the United Nations and other major international organizations set up after the war, like NATO. Mr. St. Laurent and Mr. Pearson, through their statesmanship, have made Canada's name well known during the forties, the fifties and the sixties. Today, Canada is governed by a man who is recognized as one of the great leaders of the western world. The Parti Québécois is asking for a mandate to put an end to all that.

It would be the end of a Canada endowed with the greatness, confidence and historic ties which gave her a unique role in the world. Quebeckers would no longer have the right to carry the Canadian passport which is so respected. The Parti Québécois is asking for a mandate to divide and to reduce the presence of Canada in the world, a mandate to create two small countries next to a giant, two bitter countries which will distrust each other and which will be isolated in an unstable and uncertain world.

If you doubt for a minute that the Parti Québécois is committed to independence just read last week's newspapers in which Mr. René Lévesque recognizes that a PQ victory in the referendum would be a mandate to create a separate army in Quebec. This is what a new deal means: a separate army, a separate country. PQ members are also asking for a mandate to negotiate an end to the wealth sharing process in Canada. The so-called association they propose would only be a vague reflection of the true economic association which exists at present. In their so-called economic association, Quebeckers would lose what they now have, namely their share in the Beaufort Sea, the Athabasca tar sands, the prairies' wheat, the offshore resources of the Pacific coast and Atlantic oil resources, etc. Canada's strength lies in the fact that all Canadians are partners sharing common resources. The separatists are asking for a mandate to deprive Quebeckers of these riches. The PQ proposition is all the more stunning that it means the relinquishment of other riches that are vital to Quebec. For example, Quebec asks for a mandate to negotiate an end to the sharing of revenue derived from Canadian taxes and Canadian oil supply to Quebec. In both cases, Quebec stands to lose a great deal. Actually what does a mandate to negotiate the end of the sharing of tax benefits mean?

Mr. Speaker, it amounts to a mandate to increase Quebec provincial income tax by 33 per cent should it wish to retain the same social services; a pension, family allowances, contribution to various provincial expenses, and so forth. In any case, they would have to find $900 for each household, or a total of $1.4 billion. That will be another hole that Mr. Parizeau will have to fill, the independence hole. Let's not forget that Quebeckers are already paying the highest taxes in Canada. For example, they pay 21 per cent more than their western neighbours, the Ontarians, and 28 per cent more than the average resident of the other nine provinces. The PQ also puts a great deal of emphasis on the need for Quebec to have full control over its resources.

As a Quebecker, I am proud of the success of Hydro-Quebec. However, I am not blind to some fundamental facts which are as follows: Quebec is relatively poor as far as energy is concerned. In 1978, it produced only 38 per cent of the energy it used. While it has exported some electricity, it imports all of its natural gas, oil and coal. Hence Quebec is very lucky to be a part of Canada, which produces more energy than it uses. Quebec has benefitted directly from Canadian energy resources in two ways: first, by paying for western Canadian oil at a price much below the international price; second, by receiving a substantial grant which enables it to buy foreign oil at the Canadian price.

These two advantages mean for Quebec a saving of $3.8 billion. The PQ makes no mention of this in its so-called economic association. In effect, it is asking for a mandate to negotiate an end to the grants. This will add a further $1,250 to the energy bill of the average Quebec family of four. That is the kind of mandate the PQ is seeking in the field of energy.

Mr. Speaker, I may have quoted too many figures, and I apologize, but I think it is important for my colleagues and myself to take this opportunity to correct certain misconceptions. I am privileged, Mr. Speaker, to have sat in this House for 17 years and served my country as a Minister of the Crown for over 12 years. I came to Ottawa in 1963 with some of my colleagues, with some apprehensions of the federal system. But I have learned much about Canada. I have had the privilege for six years, one month, three days and two hours to be Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, and that is how I learned what Canada was all about. I have learned for example that in Arctic settlements there are more sedimentary rocks than in Louisiana, Oklahoma, Texas and California, but I will not dwell on those economic aspects.

I had the privilege to look after citizens of this country who were here before the French-speaking and English-speaking people came—the Indians and the Eskimos. And in the mandate I was given,I had to speak to them about their belonging to Canada. And you do not know how proud I was to be able to tell them that in Canada they could be what they were, Indians and Inuits, and at the same time full-fledged Canadians. It is possible in this country to keep our linguistic and cultural differences, it is possible for those people who were the first citizens on this soil to share a historical cultural heritage unlike ours, and at the same time share the benefits and the responsibilities of Canadian citizenship.

We have made enormous progress in our society. What irks me a little in the on-going emotional debate in Quebec is that they are still talking about the mistakes of the past, a time when there was a lot of discrimination before Canada grew into a more mature society. Of course there was discrimination. But there is no point, Mr. Speaker, in trying to rewrite history. I too would have liked Montcalm to be able to defeat Wolfe on the Plains of Abraham. I was not there to wake up Montcalm when Wolfe arrived in the night. There is no point in wanting to rewrite history.

But take today's reality. The other day I was in Toronto and I was really moved by something I saw. A man of Italian origin who had arrived in Canada with a bag on his back when he was very young and single went up to the mike. He has now become a very successful businessman. I was at a meeting where there were 500 or 600 people, generally of ethnic groups, to honour a person of Jewish faith. That man of Italian origin said: When I was a little boy I went to a swimming pool where you had to pay 5 cents. I had my 5 cents. When I got to the door I was asked: "Have you seen the sign up there?" The Italian man said: "Yes, I did." It read "For Gentiles Only", people of another faith than the Jewish faith. So the Italian man said: "I am not Jewish, I am Italian". The person at the door answered back: "That's even worse!" And that is the kind of society we have overcome; that no longer exists today. You do not know how proud I was to tell them: Well, this is your brother the peasouper who is with you tonight. That's what this country is all about.

We have made enormous progress and what irritates me in this debate is that they try to sow hatred in our society. Some people hate us because we are federalists, because we decided to come here to Ottawa and defend the interests of our constituents. It hurts. In recent years, when visiting the province of Quebec, I have seen in meetings young brainwashed Quebeckers who hated me because I am a Quebecker like them, I love my people and I come to serve them in Ottawa.

This is what hurts, Mr. Speaker. We probably had some unhappy times in our Canadian history. But today millions of human beings would give their shirt and all their possessions to come and share with us what we call our miseries.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Chrétien: And it is possible to build a fraternal society in Canada. Arrangements are possible. Everybody wants a new Canadian constitution. No political party wants the status quo. I had some very stirring times Wednesday at the federalist meeting in Quebec. My hon. friend from Joliette (Mr. La Salle) who is here would have been very surprised to see me sitting side by side with Marcel Masse, both of us speaking for a united Canada. This is what is happening in Quebec. It is possible for people who believe that you can be a Canadian and a Quebecker at the same time. As far as I am concerned, Mr. Speaker, I have no problem with my identity. It does not give me any problem, I am a Maurician before anything else. I am from the province of Quebec and I am a citizen of Canada. It does not give me any complex. I can be a Quebecker and a Canadian as well.

Mr. Speaker, what concerns me right now is that people are trying to bring about divisions rather than unity. We have received too much from our creator not to open our eyes to our fellow citizens. Canadian society is one of the most democratic in the world. Our country is the freest in the whole universe. You can hold any type of opinion and support any cause you want in Canada, you can have a different language or a different culture, and your government will encourage you to maintain these differences because a person can achieve his potential when he accepts his own personality and adapts it to the personality of others.

When I look at my country, when I look at the progress accomplished in the last 25 years, I see that there has been a lot of change. Seventeen years ago, when I came here, the Canadian Parliament was not the same as it is now. I can wander around the House and see people of all political parties who spend hours trying to learn the language of the other group. This was not the case 17 years ago. There are schools throughout Canada which are full and refused, where Anglophones want to take immersion classes in French. Of course, we do not expect all the Anglophones to become bilingual. People in Shawinigan or Joliette who work in plants can very well go on speaking French only and those who do the same work in Hamilton or Windsor can very well go on speaking their own language. However, the fact that we have two official languages in Canada is not a problem, but an asset, Mr. Speaker. The fact that we have access to the two greatest cultures of the western world is what makes Canada great.

My last function as finance minister was to sign an agreement with the government of Algeria, and I asked the ambassador why he was signing an agreement in which we granted a credit margin of $2 billion to purchase Canadian goods. His reply was very simple. He told me: Because Canada is the only country which can give us North American technology in French. This is Canada. This is why we are accepted as a nation throughout the world. This is why when you sport a maple leaf or hold a Canadian passport abroad, you are always received as a friend, because we are sufficiently developed to help others and have no extraterritorial ambitions.

This is why, Mr. Speaker, we Quebeckers must now think seriously about what the Parti Québécois is asking, about the true nature of the mandate it has requested.

And I would like to briefly sum up this mandate. It is a mandate for putting an end to the Parliament of Canada; it is a mandate which will make you, Madam Speaker, the first and the last lady from the province of Quebec to preside over the House of Commons; which will make my colleague, Mr. Pierre Elliott Trudeau, the last French Canadian to ever be Prime Minister of Canada; it is a mandate which will guarantee that Quebec men and women will never sit again as elected representives in the Canadian Parliament. To all of that, Mr. Speaker, I say no. This mandate would put an end to equalization payments to Quebec, would oppose any reform of Canadian federalism, would create a separate Quebec army, take away from Quebeckers their Canadian passport, would deprive them of the riches of Canada, would put a stop to the sharing of the benefits of the Canadian tax system. It is a mandate to increase the taxburden of the Quebec people or lower their level of government services. To all that, Mr. Speaker, again I say no. Finally, it is a mandate to negotiate an outrageous increase in the price of gasoline and heating oil consumed by Quebeckers.

Mr. Speaker, I say no and I invite all Quebec citizens to say no with me because the Canadian experience is not over yet, because we are able to face up to the challenge and be recognized as full-fledged citizens of Canada while assuming all our responsibilities both as Quebeckers and as Canadians. That is why, Mr. Speaker, we will all meet this new challenge with the knowledge that there can be a better Canada and this is why we will reject the mandate requested by the PQ government by saying, no, thanks, Mr. Lévesque.

Mr. Terry Sargeant (Selkirk-Interlake): Mr. Speaker, first I should like to extend my congratulations to Madam Speaker, the hon. member for Laval-des-Rapides (Madam Sauvé), on her appointment to the chair of this House. I extend my best wishes to her, and to you as Deputy Speaker.

I am very proud to be able to speak today on the motion before the House. I am proud to be here as the representative of the people of Selkirk-Interlake. I thank these fine people for having shown their faith in me twice in the past year. I only hope I will never betray that faith.

Although I was rather active in the last Parliament, having risen on a number of occasions during the question period and in Committees of the Whole, I have never had an opportunity to make my so-called maiden speech. I was scheduled to be my party's next speaker in the budget debate last December, but events deprived me of that opportunity.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Sargeant: So it is with much pleasure that I do so today.

As is customary on the occasion of maiden speeches, I would like to share with the House a brief view of my riding.

Selkirk-Interlake lies in central Manitoba, stretching north from the city limits of Winnipeg 250 miles to Grand Rapids. It is bounded east and west by lakes Winnipeg, Manitoba, and Winnipegosis. It is diverse in its makeup. The southeast is given over to urban centres, the west and central parts to agriculture, and the north is a largely unpopulated spread of muskeg and spruce. Scattered throughout are some 12 Indian reserves.

Selkirk-Interlake played a not inconsiderable role in the development of western Canada. It was into this area that Sieur de La Verendrye first led his fur traders from Montreal. It was into this area that Chief Peguis led a band of Salteaux Indians from north central Ontario. In 1812, Lord Selkirk came with his first group of settlers. A few years later these same settlers returned fleeing the massacre at Seven Oaks.

Subsequent settlers included Icelanders who, in 1875, established a colony on the shores of Lake Winnipeg—a colony with its own republican form of government. A few years later came the first Ukrainian settlers to western Canada, followed by Poles and Germans. Among the German settlers were the ancestors of our present Governor General.

From this brief outline, let us turn to look at the concerns of the people of Selkirk-Interlake today. They share with most Canadians a desire to share in the good life that we know that this country can offer us. They share the same frustrations at not being able to share fully in this good life. They share the hardships, both economic and social, that are the result of decades of unconcerned and misdirected government in our country.

Let me be a bit more specific, Mr. Speaker. In my riding there is a large number of farmers. Some are fortunate enough to have some of the best grain land in the west. Others have land that seems to grow rocks better than any other crop. Some run large cow-calf operations; others are market gardeners. All of these farmers are looking to the immediate future with considerable uncertainty. Increases in interest rates and energy costs, and threatened increases to the Crow rates are adding considerable costs to their operations. Meanwhile the price they receive for their product does not keep pace with their cost increases. Indeed, in some cases their prices have dropped. A way of life that is very important to much of Canada, the very continued existence of the family farm and of farming communities, is seriously threatened, and successive Canadian governments do nothing but exacerbate the problem.

Many hundreds of persons and thousands of their family members rely on the lakes bordering Selkirk-Interlake for their livelihood. These are commercial fishermen. They share the farmers' concern about ever increasing costs for energy, and interest rates. They share with their east-coast counterparts an anger at the last government for removing a subsidy which assisted them to upgrade their equipment. Their immediate future is threatened by a provincial government which would like to dismantle the federally constituted Freshwater Fish Marketing Corporation, a body which has brought stability to the industry and a better standard of living to the individuals. Their future is further muddied by the construction of an irrigation project in North Dakota.

The Garrison Diversion unit has been making waves for years. An International Joint Commission report has confirmed that serious harmful effects would result in Manitoba from the completion of this project. One effect would be the eventual wiping out of Manitoba's freshwater fish industry. Successive government ministers have mouthed assurances that no harm would be done to the Manitoba environment, yet construction continues.

The least fortunate people of Selkirk-Interlake, and those for whom I am most concerned, are the native peoples. Status and non-status natives represent 25 per cent of the population of my riding. They represent a vastly larger proportion of the unemployed. In all native communities unemployment is scandalously high; in some it is in the 90 per cent range for much of the year.

Natives of Selkirk-Interlake are concerned about unemployment. They are concerned about the lack of adequate educational opportunities. They are concerned about the lack of decent housing. They are disturbed about the lack of understanding among the bureaucrats in a bloated Department of Indian Affairs. They ask to be allowed to run their own lives, a not unreasonable request in Canada of the 1980s something that Canadians have struggled and even fought for, for years. Indians ask to run their own lives. It is too typical of the dearth of understanding and of the arrogance of Canadian governments that they claim to know best how to run the lives of our natives One has only to look at the quality of life on most reserves to see how badly these arrogant bureaucrats have failed.

There are many others in my riding, among them women, small businessmen, workers, who all share similar concerns, concerns about where the Ottawa government is taking us. In the past year we have twice gone through the considerable trouble and expense of an election, but nothing has changed. The problems have worsened, and this throne speech offers nothing concrete to turn the country around. It is merely full of tired old platitudes.

Is it any wonder that people in many parts of this land feel alienated from their federal government? Is it any wonder that westerners feel alienated from a government that sends as its ambassador to the west a man who insults western voters for electing so-called eunuchs. To paraphrase my leader, as he so aptly put it the other day, westerners are not alienated from the federal system, we are simply alienated from the practitioners of that system. The people of Selkirk-Interlake share in this feeling and look to this government for better offerings than those made in this throne speech.

We have heard a great deal in recent weeks about the Liberal party's "innovative" plans to represent western Canada. I believe they call it "twinning", and somehow it is strangely related to railroad tracks. The Liberals seem to think that such a plan will put them into touch with the grassroots concerns of westerners, but their record, when it comes to responding to the grassroots concerns of their own constituents, is hardly anything to brag about.

For instance, in my riding of Selkirk-Interlake, the unemployment rate has reached an unconscionable level of 9.1 per cent, the highest rate in all Manitoba. A Liberal twin, say, the Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen), might come to my riding to hear the concerns of westerners, and be told, "Mr. Minister, please help us; we want very much to work so that we can pay our bills and feed and clothe our families, but there are no jobs". How would the minister respond to their request? No doubt he would respond in the same way that he responds to that same request in his own riding of Cape Breton Highlands-Canso which, I would add, has an unemployment rate of 16 per cent plus, the highest in the maritimes. How does he respond to that request from his own constituents? In silence!

Perhaps the minister might, while visiting my riding, meet a fisherman who would no doubt tell him, politely, of course, that he was having a tough time making ends meet because he needed a new fishing boat and the government's freeze on the 35 per cent subsidy on the purchase of fishing boats means he just cannot afford that new boat. The minister has heard that complaint too. The fishermen of Cape Breton are feeling the effects of this freeze as much if not more than their counterparts in western Canada, and yet what has he done for his constituents? I suggest he has done nothing.

On the other hand the minister might have the chance to meet farmers or small businessmen in Manitoba's Interlake and he might ask what was on their minds. They would be quick to tell him high interest rates and high energy costs are just unbearable. A farmer might also add that freight rates for his livestock are reducing him to a subsistence level of farming.

The minister has heard all these concerns from the farmers and small business people in his own riding. We have seen his response to these questions—raise the ceilings for loans under the Small Businesses Loans Act or the Farm Improvement Loans Act. Big deal! For most farmers and small businessmen in Cape Breton or Selkirk-Interlake, that amounts to virtually nothing.

The point of this brief exercise in comparative economic problems is to show the government that there is no need to twin with western ridings to discover what bugs them. Members opposite need only to look in their own backyards to become conversant with the sources of western discontent. The sources of western discontent are those same problems that face their constituents, and the same problems that hon. members opposite have been unable to cope with for the many years they have sat as the government of this nation.

As I have said, there were many omissions from Monday's throne speech, but perhaps the most disturbing for me, as my party's defence critic, was the absence of any announcement that this government intends to launch a full-scale review of Canada's defence policy. Perhaps I should not have been all that surprised by this omission in light of some of the extraordinary statements that have been made recently by the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Lamontagne).

In response to the question of when will a new defence white paper be undertaken, the Minister of National Defence replied:

I don't want to talk about a white paper, when you consider it means a stack of studies and all kinds of evaluation—

He went on to say in addition that he would not mind so much, but white papers were "complicated and, yes, boring". That is right, Canada will continue to flounder endlessly without direction in its defence initiatives because the current minister feels that a white paper would be complicated and boring.

Make no mistake, Canada is floundering when it comes to an up-to-date defence policy that recognizes the reality of changing world affairs. In 1971 the last white paper on defence policy was drafted and presented to Parliament. Since then the government of the day has changed, seemingly at random, Canada's defence role to suit its short-term political needs. This government is planning to spend as much as $5 billion on defence in this coming fiscal year. We, as members of Parliament, and Canadians from all walks of life, have no way of knowing that we are getting the best value for our defence dollar.

While Canada flounders aimlessly in search of a defence policy, the world teeters closer to the brink of catastrophe. Escalating tensions between the United States and the Soviet Union do not bode well for our future. The government's intention to work toward disarmament is truly admirable, but the sincerity of such a statement is quickly called into question when, in the same breath, the government announces that it will buy 137 of the most sophisticated fighter aircraft in the world. The F-18A is not a weapon of peace.

Surely, Mr. Speaker, world peace through disarmament should be the goal of our foreign policy. Canada should take the lead with strong independent foreign policy designed with the sole intent of bringing peace to our world. It follows quite logically that we should be using our defence policy as an effective tool for achieving this goal. Canada can lead through example by demonstrating to the world that peaceful co-existence is possible and that there is no need to join in the great rush to the apocalypse. I note only in passing that the new Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. MacGuigan), like his colleague, the Minister of National Defence, seems also to think that white papers are too complicated and boring, and has shelved that laudable initiative of his predecessor.

In September of last year the U.S. Secretary of Defence said that excessive defence spending was risky. Events since that time have proved him all too right. As super powers heat up their cold war and try to leap-frog each other in military supremacy through huge and provocative increases in defence spending, the fuse of the global holocaust becomes shorter. As Canadians, and as a nation that has tirelessly devoted its energies to international peacekeeping and world disarmament, we need to know that our defence dollars are being productively spent and are not simply heightening world tension. A complete and thorough review of Canada's military role could examine how and where Canadian military dollars are spent. All facets of our defence policy could be reviewed—NATO, NORAD, UN world peacekeeping, and the protection of Canadian sovereignty.

At present our NATO forces are divided into two small groups. One, the land group, is composed of roughly 3,000 people, while the second, the air group, is made up of roughly 2,000 people. There are approximately 5,000 Canadians in Europe as part of our commitment to NATO. That, my friends, represents one tenth of 1 per cent of the total manpower of the alliance. We must ask ourselves if this is a meaningful commitment or whether, for our energies, we can better contribute to our allies in the North Atlantic. There is already concern within the Department of Defence that our airfields are so badly protected now that, in the event of a conventional conflict, our new $4 billion fighters would be destroyed before they could take off and fire a single shot in anger. Surely our role vis-à-vis our European allies should be rethought so that it is rational and effective in maintaining a stable and peaceful Europe.

Let me briefly mention here our participation in NORAD. The NORAD agreement was first drafted when the principal threat to American security was the manned bomber. But by now we all know that such a threat is virtually non-existent. In 1975 then U.S. Secretary of Defence, James Shlesinger, said that the threat of manned bomber attack was unthinkable in this day of ICBM's and nuclear submarines because of the strike-back capacity of the United States. In the time it would take for a manned bomber to reach North American targets from the Soviet Union, the world would have been destroyed three or four times over by nuclear missiles.

Canada should rethink its role in NORAD. No one denies that we must be able to protect the sovereignty of our nation, but we must be realistic when we identify those things that threaten our sovereignty. Unfortunately I fear our defence planners have not been realistic in their thinking.

It is this same lack of realism, the fact that our planners seem to live in an action-adventure book world, that has led our party to be so critical of the new fighter aircraft project. We have now purchased one of the most advanced fighter planes in the world to protect North America from an eventuality that is only likely to occur, as General Simonds said in a committee on national defence ten years ago, "if all the Russians are crazy". I am sure almost everyone in this House will agree they are not. Surely this is wasteful government spending to the highest degree. And to add insult to injury, it seems very possible that we have purchased an aircraft which the government in Washington will shortly put into mothballs. The NORAD agreement is now up for reapproval. This government should, at a minimum, ensure that the decision whether to renew is referred very soon to the Standing Committee on External Affairs and National Defence for a full and thorough study.

Earlier I made mention of one of the problems that maritime fishermen are facing. Another problem has to do with Canada's extension of its territorial boundaries to 200 miles. This extension has meant that problems of enforcement have arisen. Not enough attention is being paid to the need for Canada to be able to protect the sovereignty of its territorial waters. We do not have the patrol aircraft and the naval vessels to allow us to protect Canadian offshore interests adequately. This proposed defence review could address itself to these problems.

I should like at this time, Mr. Speaker, to respond to some comments directed my way a few days ago by the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. McKinnon), the former minister of national defence. In referring to my recent suggestion that the purchase of the fighter be referred to a special committee of the House, he once again showed his complete inability to understand a clearly enunciated position. If he had thoroughly read my release he would have known that I was suggesting a special committee, not the standing committee. He would have known that the terms of reference were such that my colleague, the hon. member for New Westminster-Coquitlam (Miss Jewett), could have made very valuable contribution to such a review. If the hon. gentlemen were to cut through his myopia, he would discover that the NDP does indeed have policies on defence. These policies are consistent with our over-all philosophy. In our defence policies, as in all others, we put people first. We say that the ultimate goal of our foreign and defence policies must be peace. To achieve peace we must seek disarmament. Does it not strike you as strange, Mr. Speaker, that people who seek peace are ridiculed and very often dismissed as being a bit soft?

One of my colleagues in recent days said to me, "The best way to prepare for war is not to prepare for it". It strikes me as sheer insanity that in the cause of world peace the nations of this world are spending $1.5 billion each and every day on weapons of war. If I may quote George Ignatieff from a recent Maclean's article: "The one sure thing about nuclear weapons is that they do not contribute a defence; they can only be a threat."

If I may repeat myself, I say that the commitment of this government to pursue such a path of peace is suspect. In one paragraph in this throne speech the government speaks of the need "to suffocate the deadly growth in the nuclear arsenals of the world", and of the need for arms control and disarmament. Yet I am reminded that only last fall when my colleague from New Westminster-Coquitlam called for Canada to join with those of our NATO allies that were opposed to the placement of nuclear missiles in Europe, not a word of support was heard from these same Liberals. The appointment of an ambassador for disarmament, while very laudable, will, I fear, be no more than cosmetic until such time as this country spends as much on disarmament as it does on armament.

I do not live in a dream world. No, I am firmly rooted on this earth in the late twentieth century when it is our misfortune and to our shame that we must maintain armed Forces. However, I contend that we can do a far better job with our forces than we have been doing. We can use our forces in a much more positive way, in a way that will better serve Canada's needs and interests. Once we determine these needs it is then incumbent upon us to provide our forces with the best and most suitable equipment. But, as I pointed out earlier in this speech, this government does not seem interested in defining these needs and interests.

It is to the credit of the former minister of national defence that he has once again taken a trip along the road to Damascus, and now sees the wisdom in having an early review of our defence policy. I say that this review must be done in conjunction with a foreign policy review. Our defence policy must serve our foreign policy, and not run off on a completely different track. I repeat that our foreign policy must, as its first premise, pursue peace through disarmament, and that our defence policy must reflect this.

We are stagnating in our approach to rapidly changing world events. In an age when cutbacks and restraint are the catch words for our budget drafters, why are we not taking a long hard look at where we spend our defence dollars? As the hon. member for Oshawa (Mr. Broadbent) said at the outset of this debate, "the $15.7 million for just one fighter is enough to purchase 60,000 tons of rice". Surely, as legislators, we must be sure that every dollar spent on defence is needed. A great American general once said:

Every gun that is made, every warship launched, every rocket signifies a theft from those who hunger and are not fed, from those who are cold and are not clothed.

American President Dwight Eisenhower said that in the 1950s. The defence problems of which he spoke then are as true today.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Patterson): The hon. member for Sainte-Marie (Mr. Malépart).

Mr. Pelletier: A question of privilege, Mr. Speaker.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, in his speech the hon. member for Selkirk-Interlake (Mr. Sargeant) mentioned that my constituency is twinned with his, and he inferred I was trying to represent it. Mr. Speaker, this is absolutely untrue, I am not attempting to represent other constituencies than mine. I am proud to represent my constituents from Sherbrooke, and have no intention whatsoever of representing other people than those who elected me. I am somewhat surprised the hon. member feels offended because another member of Parliament went into his constituency. I remember very well three years ago, one of Mr. Firth's colleagues invited me to his constituency and asked at one point if he could come into mine. I thought this was an excellent idea. I had to travel through Mr. Firth's constituency, and well, some 40 per cent of all Canadian territories, and I thought this was an excellent idea. Another member—

Some hon. Members: Order!

[English]

Mr. Hees: You are making a speech. Sit down, buster. That is not a question of privilege.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Patterson): Order, please. I believe this was a point of debate rather than a point of order, and I would invite the hon. member to begin his address.

Mr. Pelletier: I will conclude in a second, Mr. Speaker. I simply want to remind or tell the hon. member for Selkirk-Interlake that I do not and am not representing in this House the people of Selkirk-Interlake.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Patterson): Order! Order, please. Is the hon. member raising a point of order?

Mr. Hees: Mr. Speaker, I was told some time ago that I followed the NDP and my turn is up.

An hon. Member: By two centuries.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Patterson): I have been advised that the hon. member for Sainte-Marie is next on the list.

[Translation]

Mr. Jean-Claude Malépart (Sainte-Marie): Mr. Speaker, my first words are to congratulate the hon. member for Laval-des-Rapides (Madam Sauvé) for her nomination as Speaker of the House of Commons, and to commend my colleagues for her election. I would also like to express my gratitude to the constituents of Sainte-Marie who re-elected me as their member of Parliament. This honour I am accepting with deep humility, and I would like to assure them of my total co-operation. I note with pleasure in the throne speech important elements that meet the needs of the Canadian people and more particularly the citizens in my constituency of Sainte-Marie, such as the $35 monthly increase in the guaranteed income for the elderly, the reallocation of resources to job creation for young people, women and the handicapped, a lower price policy for Canadian oil than was proposed by the former government, the establishment of a Petroleum Price Auditing Agency, promoting the establishment and development of Canadian businesses through a government-buying policy, as well as assistance to companies wishing to repatriate assets and the revival of the process of constitutional reform.

Today, Mr. Speaker, I wish to draw your attention to a point which I take to heart, that is the future of Quebec and Canada. We all know that on May 20, Quebeckers will vote on the referendum question as set and I emphasize "set by the PQ." The same party is asking us for a mandate to negotiate the separation of Quebec from the remainder of Canada, a scheme it has called sovereignty-association. It is a well known fact that the leader of the PQ has often objected to the federalists' mention of the word "independence" in the present debate, and stated in the legislative assembly that his party had always advocated sovereignty-association. Following those statements, I checked the PQ platform from 1975 to 1979 and in chapter 2 we find in black and white a reference to accession to independence and on page 62 of the 1978 platform under the title: "Mandate to all representations of the party" the following in paragraph 6 and I quote: The sixth convention asks that an evaluation of federalism be made to show the necessity of independence to carry out the platform of the party. To my knowledge, Mr. René Lévesque, an active member of the PQ, attended that convention.

Mr. Speaker, the PQ government is promising the Garden of Eden to the people of Quebec. Promises, promises and more promises! At that rate, I think they are about to beat the record set by the Parti Rhinocéros for impossible promises. You can find them in the white paper of the Parti Québécois. This is all very nice, but I would like to remind Quebeckers of all the promises the Parti Québécois made before 1976 and never kept. Here is one of the very first the party made. It appears in its 1975 program at page 19, and I quote:

A government led by the Parti Québécois would commit itself to providing all people, including the elderly, with a guaranteed minimum income based on the following principles:

a) the minimum income of a person cannot be allowed to fall below the poverty line—

I would like to know why Mr. Lévesque is keeping social assistance benefits below the poverty line. For example: a single person on social assistance in Quebec receives only $301 per month, and a single person who receives the old age security pension with the federal supplement will get $361 a month as of July 1, 1980, and that pension is indexed every three months whereas in Quebec it is indexed only once a year. I would like to know why Mr. Lévesque did not live up to his commitment and why he so quickly abolished the indexing of welfare benefits and decreased, not to say stole, by some $15 million family allowance benefits, when the federal government decided last year to grant a $200 child tax credit. Mr. Speaker, the leader of the Parti Québécois also made another commitment which is set out on page 21 on the party's program. It says that a Parti Québécois government is committed to indexing the minimum wage rate to the increase in the cost of living.

Another promise gone up in smoke. On page 24, chapter 9, of the same program, under the heading "Senior Citizens," one finds that a Parti Québécois government promises to build housing units with rents based on income which will provide, apart from the usual services, superintendent, elevators, laundry facilities, tuck shop, medical services and a lounge. The Quebec finance minister recently informed us that this project will be abandoned next year. This statement appears on page 33 of the Parti Québécois budget speech.

• (1600)

In that same program, the government guarantees free transportation for the elderly in urban areas and transportation at reduced fare for intercity travelling. Everybody in Montreal remembers the increase in fares for older people. Moreover, those who live in homes know full well that every three months the Lévesque government deprives them of their indexation; who knows what will happen to the $35 the Canadian government intends to give them?

Another promise made by the PQ government on page 27 concerning the education of young people reads as follows:

To implement universal free education at all levels, to raise the compulsory school age to 18, to set up a coherent system of scholarships and living allowances or possibly a pre-salary system.

Just another unfulfilled promise.

Mr. Speaker, how could we believe all the fine promises in the PQ's white paper and in the statements Mr. Lévesque and his team have made, when they were not even able to fulfil those they had made before being brought to power?

The PQ's advertising during the referendum campaign reminds me of those finance companies which prevail upon the public to borrow from them without indicating that they charge twice as much as any other institution. That is why the PQ is exerting a pressure on the feelings of Quebeckers to sell them its project, without having the courage to tell them the truth about how much this sovereignty-association adventure is going to cost them.

Mr. Speaker, in 1973 the Parti Québécois had presented its so-called year one budget but the electorate, knowing the true cost of sovereignty-association, massively rejected the Parti Québécois and its option for independence. Let us not forget that a Yes vote in the referendum would achieve nothing but maintain uncertainty, and that Yes vote would put our country in jeopardy, as the Prime Minister of Canada put it in his speech to the Parliament of Canada: since provinces refuse to negotiate the association, the Canadian government has no mandate to negotiate sovereignty and Mr. Lévesque will not get the mandate to negotiate association pure and simple. Which means that a Yes vote leads to nothing but uncertainty. Can we afford to pay the price for that uncertainty and take the risk of seeing it last until the second referendum? Moreover, who says that in two or three years the PQ, afraid again to present its option honestly, will not use new tactics to perpetuate this climate of uncertainty?

I would also like the chief of the Parti Québécois to tell us what would be the consequences of a Yes for the 3,000 employees of CBC, the 8,000 employees of Air Canada, the 1,050 employees of Teleglobe Canada, the 600 employees of the Federal Development Bank, the 900 employees of the National Film Board, the 500 employees of the St. Lawrence Seaway, the 500 employees of the Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation, the 14,000 employees of Canadian National and the thousands of civil servants of the Montreal area who work in various federal departments. I would like Mr. Lévesque to answer this question.

I should also like to remind the citizens of the Montreal region of the contribution of the Canadian government in the field of social and community aid in 1977-78. With regard to family allowances, the Montreal area then had over 975,000 children and the Canadian government paid the mothers of those children an amount totalling $303 million. Under the heading of old age security, there were 300,000 senior citizens in the Montreal region to whom the Canadian government paid globally over $783 million. Under the heading the New Horizons Program, which program the Canadian government implemented to allow our senior citizens to take a more active part in the life of their communities, the Canadian government paid $1.4 million. Under unemployment insurance, it paid $723 million in 1977.

Under housing, from 1975 to 1978, through Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation, the Canadian government granted loans totalling over $173 million for the construction and purchase of houses and income-producing housing complexes in the Montreal region. Direct loans for public housing there totalled over $102 million. Moreover, the corporation lent in the Montreal area more than $21 million for rehabilitating individual and multiple housing units. And CMHC guaranteed in the same area loans totalling more than $1.5 million from 1975 to 1978. All those direct and guaranteed loans contributed to the acquisition and rehabilitation of 92,199 dwellings. What did the Government of Canada do to help the municipalities? Municipalities in the Montreal area benefitted under CMHC programs, particularly those dealing with municipal infrastructure, neighbourhood improvement, public housing and medium density promotion. CMHC paid the municipalities in the area more than $428 million from 1975 to 1978 under those programs. Furthermore, the Department of Finance of Canada contributed in excess of $16.2 million in payments in lieu of taxes to municipalities and school boards in the Montreal area in 1977-78.

I would also like to remind people of the assistance of the government of Canada to businesses. The Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce guaranteed loans totalling $18.4 million to small businesses in the Montreal area in 1977-78. With respect to business expansion, the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce of Canada paid grants of $2.5 million and guaranteed loans totalling $13 million in the area under the program to promote business expansion and efficiency. In 1978 the Federal Development Bank awarded in the Montreal area 731 business loans totalling $50.5 million. In 1978 the Export Development Corporation concluded with Montreal businesses agreements exceeding $150 million.

Those are accomplishments, Mr. Speaker, not promises like those made by the PQ. In concluding, for all the negative reasons I have outlined with respect to the Parti Québécois and for all the positive reasons I have set out in respect of the Government of Canada and because I am proud to be Francophone, a Montrealer, a Quebecker and a Canadian, I will be voting No to the PQ question and I am sure the very great majority of Quebeckers will say No to the PQ proposition.

[English]

Hon. George Hees (Northumberland): Mr. Speaker, one of the very important things which Canada must do is to become self-sufficient in oil, thereby enabling this country to get out of the hands of foreign oil producers who are now able to charge us anything they like and cut off our supplies whenever it suits them to do so.

To bring this about the government must first of all introduce a very extensive program of research and development to develop cheaper alternative sources of energy, such as energy produced from the sun, grain alcohol, coal, uranium, the tar sands, hydroelectric sources, solid municipal waste, agricultural and forest waste, unutilized industrial by-product heat, and biomass conversion.

The government must also greatly increase the use of natural gas for heating houses, office buildings, factories and apartment buildings. This can be done by subsidizing the cost of the change-over from present oil-heating equipment to gas-heating equipment, and thus greatly encourage people to make this change.

We have abundant supplies of natural gas in this country. Our supplies of this excellent fuel increased by 7½ per cent during the past year and we have more than 7,000 capped gas wells which have had to remain capped because of lack of demand for this valuable heating fuel.

If we can change over from oil heating to gas heating and develop the alternative sources of cheaper energy which I have mentioned, we can use Canadian oil for transportation and plastics only; become self-sufficient in oil; and become independent of the present costly and uncertain supplies of off-shore oil which our present position makes necessary.

As an example of what can be done to introduce a positive program to bring about self-sufficiency in oil, I would like to mention briefly what my own province of Ontario is doing at the present time. In the area of conservation they have set themselves some tough goals. By 1985 they are aiming to reduce the growth in demand in Ontario for all forms of energy to no more than 2 per cent a year while the annual growth in demand for petroleum will be cut to zero per cent per capita.

● (1610)

To my mind, conservation is the most valuable energy resource we have. It is cheap, powerful, abundant, and easily accessible. All it takes is a little common sense, and in some cases, a little help from the government.

The province's new five-year $5 million "Heat Save" energy conservation project, for instance, will utilize thermography and home energy audits to aid Ontario home owners in discovering where their homes are losing valuable heat. Thermography is a process for identifying heat loss by measuring infra-red emissions from a building.

In these "heat pictures", which are taken from an aeroplane, home owners can see where heat is escaping from their homes. Armed with this information, home owners can decide for themselves where and how much to insulate their homes.

Over the past three years, the Ontario government has conducted eight pilot projects in thermography, and home energy audits have reached well over 16,000 home owners. In the process, Ontario has become the world leader in the application of aerial thermography.

The government also has a wide range of projects to develop renewable and recoverable energy. As announced in a major policy document last fall entitled "Energy Security for the Eighties: A Policy for Ontario", the government set targets for solar energy to supply 1.8 per cent of the province's total primary energy needs by 1985, and for municipal, forest, industrial and agricultural wastes to contribute another 3.2 per cent.

These goals are part of the government's target to increase Ontario's capacity to produce more of its own primary energy from the present level of 22 per cent to at least 35 percent by the year 1995. Just a few weeks ago the government initiated a program for the development of energy from waste projects in Ontario. In making that announcement, the energy minister pointed out, and I quote:

> If properly utilized, energy from waste and biomass conversion could displace the equivalent of 27 million barrels of oil a year, worth about $400 million in 1979 terms. That's enough to heat one million single family dwellings each year.

Over a 15-year period, the government estimates that the production of energy from municipal solid wastes, industrial, agricultural, and forest waste, unutilized industrial byproduct heat, and biomass conversion will require an investment in 1979 dollars of some $3 billion. The government expects a large percentage of the investment will come from the private sector, with the balance coming from the Ontario government, municipalities, the Ontario Energy Corporation and Ontario Hydro.

The ministry of energy has budgeted $2 million in this fiscal year for cost-sharing in feasibility studies and engineering design work. The ministry will provide preliminary assessments of projects as well, and technical advisory services, once a project is under way. Additional assistance will be available under the Canada-Ontario bilateral program.

The government firmly believes that local governments and private industry have a vital role to play in developing energy from waste projects. Such projects will benefit Ontario's economy and will also make it possible for many municipalities and industries to solve their solid waste disposal problems.

In Hamilton, for example, the Solid Waste Recovery Unit, or SWARU plant, is now operated by Tricil Limited. This plant, commissioned in 1972, has a design capacity of 600 tons of prepared refuse a day. It was the first plant of its type in the world. Tricil has a ten-year contract with the regional municipality of Hamilton-Wentworth to process at least 120,000 tons of refuse a year, and plans to expand its operation to include electrical generation from steam in co-operation with the Ontario Energy Corporation.

In the Sudbury region, Inco Limited and the Sudbury Regional Development Corporation have recently announced a joint plan for a similar plant with a capacity of more than 100,000 tons of waste annually.

The government of Ontario feels that these are just two of the existing opportunities for business and government which are waiting to be developed in the area of new energy forms.

Besides energy from waste projects, industry is becoming interested in producing synthetic liquid fuels, in developing solar energy technology and products, and in devising more energy efficient appliances, automobiles and building products—to name just a few. At present, the ministry of energy is reassessing the potential of synthetic liquid fuels, and the minister of energy expects to be presenting a major policy proposal to cabinet in the coming months.

These fuels, which can be produced from natural gas, coal, grain or other agricultural crops and wood, do have a role to play in our future as a means of conserving conventional fuels. Although it is hard to know at this point in time how much of the fuel market they will eventually comprise, very real opportunities exist for the development of the synthetic liquid fuel industry.

This country has the potential to develop a secure supply of energy compared to other industrial countries. Since security of supply is the major consideration of most industries, this availability of energy would give this country a very real industrial advantage in the marketplace. All we need to do as a country is to grab the brass ring.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I have outlined to the House what a province with initiative, knowledge, and sound leadership is doing to move toward self-sufficiency in energy, in the shortest possible time. I sincerely hope that the federal government will show the same kind of leadership, so that this country may become self-sufficient in oil with the least possible delay.

Mr. Ralph Ferguson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State, Small Businesses): I want first of all to congratulate Madam Speaker on having been selected as the Speaker of the House. The qualities of discipline and tact, the firmness and sensitivity that she has shown during her past service in government will serve all of us well during her tenure as Speaker of this Thirty-second Parliament. This is indeed an historic Parliament to be under the direction of the first woman Speaker. I also want to commend my colleagues from Rimouski (Mrs. Côté) and Sudbury (Mr. Frith), who moved and seconded the Address in Reply to the Speech from the Throne, on the excellence of their speeches on that occasion. They were beyond reproach.

The background information they have given the House regarding the parts of Canada they represent certainly assists us all to reach a fuller understanding of our country, with its diversities and its common problems. As the newly elected member for the constituency of Lambton-Middlesex I shall, in my maiden speech, take the opportunity to speak about this part of our country—its past, its present, and the potential contribution it has to make to our nation, Canada.

I want to place on the record my appreciation to the electors of the constituency of Lambton-Middlesex for giving me this opportunity to serve them in this Thirty-second Parliament. The riding is a 6,400 square mile area on the southern tip of Lake Huron, bordering part of one of the world's great seaways. It embraces a blend of agriculture and small business that is unique. It is also rich in history.

In the early 1800s, when our relations with our neighbours to the south were not as friendly as they are today, the victorious battle of the Longwoods was fought in the southern part of this constituency. Later, some of the United Empire Loyalists settled here and carved homesteads from this wilderness land. In the next four decades much of the area in both Lambton and Middlesex counties was settled by immigrants primarily from Ireland, Scotland, and England, who made that emotional decision to leave the country of their birth for a country of their choice. They named their settlements after communities in their homelands, and towns like Glencoe, Appin, and Watford grew, reminding them of their roots. The area prospered and the population increased as the pioneers cleared and cultivated the fertile soil, established their businesses in the context of woollen mills, flour mills, cheese factories, and blacksmith shops, and built their schools and their places of worship.

Historians tell us of a man named Lucas who was forced to leave his farm in New York during this period. He set out to find freedom in Canada. As he proceeded through the Enniskillen swamps, the bedding in his wagon shifted and was dragged along the ground. When he arrived at Watford to spend the night, he was refused lodging because of a foul-smelling substance on his clothes and wagon. He was ordered out of town. A short time later the people in the community realized what the source of the pollution was. It was oil, and after a full investigation the oil industry in Canada was born in my community near a town which was later named Oil Springs. Shortly after, a few miles away, a new community was established named Petrolia.

Today, more than 100 years after that initial discovery, some of these oil wells are still producing in Lambton county and new ones are being brought into production. These are not, of course, on the scale of productivity we find in other areas of Canada today. It is significant, though, that we are rebuilding part of this old oil field and it is being called Discovery Petrolia, due to be opened in July for tourism in the area. In those early days, the area prospered as a result of the oil industry and the agricultural sector. One of those early pioneers had over 200 oil wells on his property. His name was J. H. Fairbank and he served in this House in the Fifth Parliament of Canada.

It is also interesting to note that another member from the Lambton area was represented in Canada's first four parliaments—Alexander McKenzie, a former prime minister of our country.

Of later note, we in our constituency had the honour of having a very lovely and gracious young lady, Sheila Rose, presented with the Order of Canada at the residence of the Governor General. This was for her work in the field of education and promoting the cause of Canada from coast to coast. The award was very well deserved, I may say.

The technology developed by those early pioneers of the oil industry spread abroad during the following generations. Men went to the Middle East, to South America, to Borneo and other parts of the world, taking their experience and equipment with them. Drill bits are still manufactured in the town of Petrolia for shipment to domestic and foreign fields. To this day, Canadian technology developed by those entrepreneurs is being utilized all over the world. This technology has benefited the world, and as Canadians we can be justifiably proud of our pioneers and of our heritage.

For a number of years at the turn of the century many thousands of people moved to the prairie provinces from my region taking with them their resourcefulness and their expertise in agriculture. There, they were joined by immigrants from all over the world who were making this their country of choice.

In my area, in my lifetime, I have witnessed people from other nations joining us, the Slovak people in the 1930s, the Dutch in the 1950s and the Portuguese in the late 1960s, to name but a few. They came to Canada, a land of opportunity, a land of freedom, and they have made our lives richer by their presence here. I admire their courage and remember that our ancestors too, made this their country of choice. They settled among our native people who still reside in the area today in the communities of Kettle Point, Muncey and Caradoc. It is with pride that these native people contribute and involve themselves in sports, community activities, and society in general.

Incidentally, I want to commend the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville (Mr. Nystrom) on his question of privilege in the House this morning which allowed participants from all parties to express themselves on the issue he raised. I think it was a proud occasion in the House when we saw such unanimity among hon. members about certain comments which had been made outside this area.

I am aware of the traditional differences which historically have developed between the east and the west as well as between individual regions, misunderstandings which unfortunately seem to be increasing in intensity rather than decreasing. Perhaps it is due to the nature of modern day communications that we are instantaneously aware of regional advantages and disadvantages. It sometimes seems we have forgotten the hopes and dreams of the Fathers of Confederation as they struggled to unite this vast and diverse land into one great nation.

If we are to fulfil our duties in this House we must not forget that we all have a common bond—the bond of being a Canadian. Whether we were elected to represent a constituency in the east or in the west, we were elected to the Parliament of Canada. This institution is Canada, and if we are to fulfil our duties as elected representatives we must work for a common objective, and part of that objective is a better understanding of our fellow Canadians and the problems that are unique to the respective regions.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Ferguson: I would suggest that the Speech from the Throne encompasses and reflects our heritage and our objectives when it refers to ensuring, and I quote—> —a strong country with first claim on the loyalty of all of its citizens; a country that regards diversity as an asset, not a liability; a country whose people share their wealth first with those who need it most; a country that encourages initiative, welcomes daring and promotes enterprise and a country which opens its eyes, its mind and its heart to the larger community of nations, refusing to regard its own national borders as the outward limits of the universe.

Ours is a great and beautiful country which has been blessed by vast and diverse natural resources as well as by as great and diverse human resources. We must look ahead in a positive manner and plan to develop, nurture and utilize those resources. Our greatest resource, of course, is our people. Let us give our young people the incentive and encouragement to travel throughout our land so that they, unlike many of us, may understand the diversity which is Canada and the cultures which have given us such a unique identity. I feel fortunate that my children have had the opportunity to travel across this land from west to east to see and understand its vastness and grandeur. I am proud, too, that they have learned to communicate with Canadians whose first language is French as well as with Canadians whose first language is English.

Another potential I am enthusiastic about is the potential of our renewable resources, and again, in this area, we are the envy of the world because we can develop such a variety of energy sources. Like those early entrepreneurs from the oil industry we now find many young and energetic individuals utilizing crop and communal refuse in a manner which will allow us to conserve our non-renewable resources. We are enthusiastic about a more efficient concept of heating being developed by two young men in my constituency, a concept which will utilize materials presently considered to be waste. I trust that the Renewable Energy Corporation will be of assistance to such individuals and entrepreneurs. The alternatives are there and must be utilized as quickly as possible.

The over-all philosophy of the Speech from the Throne was one of a positive continuation of the potential of our nation, and certainly I am pleased to see included the proposal to establish the Canadian Agricultural Export Corporation that will enable our producers to sell abroad as Canadians, rather than seeing one province competing against another for the same markets. Such a vehicle will enable us to focus on specific markets and expand our sales abroad, utilizing the potential of a renewable Canadian resource. We are one of the few nations of the world with mechanisms in place to plan our production for specific markets and to sell on long-term contractual arrangements. The spinoff effects of such as positive move will create new jobs and be a boon to small businesses and the agro-industries in this nation.

These spinoff effects will not only give us a better balance of trade and thereby benefit all of society, but will enable farmers in Canada to work together as Canadians as envisioned by the Fathers of Confederation.

Mr. Speaker, may I call it 4.30?

● (1630)

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. It being 4.30 p.m., it is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 38(4), to interrupt these proceedings and put forthwith the question necessary to dispose of the amendment now before the House. The question is on the amendment. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the amendment?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: All those in favour of the amendment will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Call in the members.

Madam Speaker: I declare the amendment lost.

Mr. Nowlan: Madam Speaker, when the Table called the roll, I distinctly heard them call the name of the hon. member for Durham-Northumberland (Mr. Lawrence). We have shadow spokesmen in the opposition, but I am Mr. Nowlan. I do not know if my name is on the roll. The hon. member for Durham-Northumberland is away and I believe that his name was called twice.

Madam Speaker: We will check the roll to make sure the hon. member's name is on it.

QUEEN ELIZABETH THE SECOND

BIRTHDAY GREETINGS TO HER MAJESTY—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Madam Speaker, today, April 21, being the real anniversary of Her Majesty Queen Elizabeth the Second, by the Grace of God, Queen of Canada, I move, seconded by the hon. member for South Shore (Mr. Crouse):

That this House convey to Her Majesty Queen Elizabeth the Second, on the auspicious occasion of her birthday, our sincerest good wishes for many additional years of happiness and good fortune.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Madam Speaker: The House has heard the terms of the motion. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

NORTHERN AFFAIRS

REPORT OF NORTHERN MINERAL ADVISORY COMMITTEE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Dave Nickerson (Western Arctic): Madam Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

Whereas the report of the Northern Mineral Advisory Committee has been received with considerable interest by both the northern minerals industry and the general inhabitants of the territories; and whereas by a unanimously adopted motion of the Thirty-first Parliament of Canada the report was referred to the Standing Committee on Indian Affairs and Northern Development which, however, because of the intervening election was unable to complete its study, therefore I move, seconded by the hon. member for St. Catharines (Mr. Reid):

That the report of the Northern Mineral Advisory Committee be referred by this House to the Standing Committee on Indian Affairs and Northern Development.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

NATIONAL RESOURCES

CALL FOR STUDY ON NON-RENEWABLE RESOURCES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bill J. Yurko (Edmonton East): Madam Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

In view of the existing and developing controversies among federal and provincial governments on non-renewable resource pricing, taxation and royalty structures, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Calgary East (Mr. Kushner):

That this House instruct the Government of Canada to appoint a royal commission to examine and make appropriate recommendations on the adequacy of present pricing, royalty and taxation structures in relation to national, regional and provincial objectives of all substantive non-renewable resources produced in Canada and marketed nationally and/or internationally. In particular, the commission is to study the pricing, royalties, and taxation mechanisms and regimes on hydrocarbon resources, ferrous and non-ferrous metals, asbestos and phosphates, and the commission is to specifically document the inconsistencies and anomalies in national practices in regard to the federal pricing and taxation of non-renewable resources involved in interprovincial and international trade.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

MULTICULTURALISM

REQUEST FOR CREATION OF FULL MINISTRY—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Laverne Lewycky (Dauphin): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity, under the provisions of Standing Order 43.

S.O. 43

In view of the necessity of safeguarding the interests of ethnic groups in Canada, and considering the request of the National Congress of Italian Canadians, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

That this House call on the government to create a full ministry of multiculturalism.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

HOUSING

TAXES PAID BY RESIDENTS OF NATIONAL PARKS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Mark Rose (Mission-Port Moody): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. Since there have been extremely disturbing and worrisome reports that ground rents of the permanent residents of Banff National Park, and perhaps other western parks, are to be increased dramatically, meaning that home owners will face taxes of from $3,000 to $10,000 yearly, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

That the Minister of the Environment look into this matter immediately, with the view to ordering an immediate roll-back so that long-time residents no longer need fear the loss of their homes.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

INDUSTRY

CALL FOR COMMITTEE STUDY OF AUTOMOBILE INDUSTRY—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Ian Deans (Hamilton Mountain): Madam Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

This weekend, further cutbacks in employment in the auto industry were announced. It is now generally agreed that the industry is in need of major overhaul and that the auto pact is not providing adequate protection for the Canadian industry and Canadian workers. I, therefore, move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

That a parliamentary committee be struck for the purpose of reviewing the state of the auto industry, the auto pact and the government's responses, and that this committee meet immediately with industry, union and government representatives for the purpose of making recommendations to the government on an appropriate course of action which it should follow in dealing with the future of the industry in Canada and the terms and conditions which Canada should require be included in the auto trade pact.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

ENVIRONMENTAL AFFAIRS

SPRING FLOODING IN ONTARIO—MEASURES TO ALLEVIATE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Doug Lewis (Simcoe North): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity, under the provisions of Standing Order 43.

In view of the fact that there has been a great deal of flooding this spring throughout Ontario, and in view of the fact that a crisis has arisen in the riding of Simcoe North, where water levels are under the jurisdiction of the Minister of the Environment, through Parks Canada, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Mississauga South (Mr. Blenkarn):

That the Minister of the Environment order that immediate steps be taken to order Parks Canada to alleviate the flooding in Simcoe North, and commission a study to seek a long-term solution of the problem.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

BOYCOTTING OF OLYMPIC GAMES IN MOSCOW

Hon. Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Madam Speaker, my question is to the Prime Minister, whose two-month delay in announcing the government's decision regarding an Olympic boycott has caused anxiety, not only among our allies but untold difficulty regarding the government's intentions among Canadian athletes.

I would like to ask the Prime Minister: given that the Conservative government had initiated detailed discussions with other countries about the holding of international games of a comparable standard in one site, or several sites or countries, since this had already been undertaken, what has the Liberal government done to advance this planning so that our athletes could be assured of such kind of international competition?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I know the question had been discussed by the previous government. My recollection at the time was that that alternative was not a very serious possibility. But I will inquire if the subject matter is still being kept alive.

Miss MacDonald: Madam Speaker, I thank the Prime Minister, because I am sure that our athletes want very much to have this question kept alive. They want to know that they will have the opportunity to participate in games of an international standard elsewhere.

Will the Prime Minister give the House a commitment today that his decision, the government's decision on the boycott will be announced prior to the visit of Secretary Vance on Wednesday, so that it will not appear that Canada is being pressured into taking a position; so that it will at least be assured that the government has the moral fibre to take a decision on its own.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, I answered a similar question last week, and indicated that Secretary Vance's visit was not considered as a deadline by me. On the contrary, it might be used as an occasion to inform myself, from the Secretary, of various aspects of their international politics and international relations.

• (1115)

I did say that the deadline for this government was, perhaps, the meeting next weekend of the Canadian Olympic Committee. But we may make a decision before, we may make a decision after Secretary Vance's visit, Madam Speaker.

Miss MacDonald: We already know that 53 countries oppose going to Moscow. Twenty-seven countries, many of them Warsaw pact countries, favour going. I would like to ask the Prime Minister, what further consultation or what further information does he require before he is able to take a stand on Canada's behalf.

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, I believe this is a repetition of the question the hon. lady asked last week. I suspected then that her figures were inaccurate, and now I have confirmation of it.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

ENERGY

DEPARTMENTAL SURVEY OF ENERGY QUESTIONS—REQUEST FOR TABLING

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Would the minister confirm today that his department did conduct a survey on a variety of energy questions, and would he assure the House that the results, which should now be available, will be tabled either today or tomorrow?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his question and for having given me time to check on the facts.

The department has had a public attitude survey conducted on energy conservation in February and March of every year since 1975. The contract is let out to Canadian Facts by the consumer research and evaluation branch of the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs.

The report has not yet been received by Energy, Mines and Resources. It is expected shortly. I would like to advise the hon. member that the report will be made available to the public, as have all previous attitude surveys carried out every year in February and March on this subject. The report can be obtained from the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources or the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs as soon as it is ready. As soon as I have received a copy, I will be glad to send the hon. member a copy, if he does not already have one.

Mr. Broadbent: I thank the minister for that full answer. My next question, which is broader in its implications, is directed to the Prime Minister. On Friday, the Prime Minister said he would inquire into what polling was being done by other government departments.

In that context, I wish to ask him if he is now prepared to table information concerning all such polls, including questions and answers, and ask him what he meant when he said in the House on Friday that some surveys may elicit information which should not be made "very widely public". More specifically, can he tell us which opinions of Canadians would be inappropriate for Canadians to know about themselves?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, that is a repetition of the question that was asked on Friday, and I undertook then to look into the matter. This is Monday morning, as the hon. leader of the New Democratic Party knows. I have not had the information yet from the departments, but it appears to me from the answer just given by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources that at least the way the hon. leader asked the question the other day was incorrect, since in his question he implied that we were keeping these polls secret.

Mr. Broadbent: No.

Mr. Trudeau: The hon. member says "No". I have his question here. He said, "the dubious practice of the government of Ontario by using taxpayers' money to do public opinion surveys which it keeps secret?". The Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources just indicated that for the past six years we have been making the results of these surveys public.

Mr. Broadbent: Madam Speaker, I know the Prime Minister would not consciously distort what I had to say in my question. The words which he quoted said, "the dubious practice of the government of Ontario"—

Mr. Trudeau: Read it.

Mr. Broadbent: I was attempting to obtain assurances from his government that the Liberal government was not pursuing such dubious practices. I was not implying that it was; I was happy with the answer I received from the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. I would like to ask the Prime Minister: given the fact that in one year alone the government of Ontario spent almost a half-million dollars on such polls, which they originally intended to keep secret, and since the minister has referred to only one poll which has been taken periodically and made available to the public, the general question remains open. Will the Prime Minister assure us that all such polling by other departments will be made available to the public?

• (1120)

Second, what are his grounds for saying—as he indicated in his answer on Friday—that some should not be? What are the criteria?

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, as to the first part, I would refer the hon. member to his own question which I will now read in full from page 158 of Hansard: "Would the minister confirm that the federal government is following the dubious practice . . .", and so on, "of doing public opinion surveys which it keeps secret." If that is not an inference and a veiled accusation that we are keeping such opinion polls secret, I do not know what is. That was the question.

As to the rest of the question, I have just told the hon. member that I have asked the departments to inform me of such surveys. I do not have the information yet, but as soon as I have it I will let the hon. member know the answer, as well as the answer to the other part of the question in response to which I indicated that perhaps some surveys which are made at a particular point in time should not be made public. I will give the answer to that, too.

SPORTS

INTERNATIONAL GAMES AS ALTERNATIVE TO OLYMPICS

Mr. Joe Reid (St. Catharines): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the minister responsible for amateur sport. In view of the fact that the former government took a position with respect to an Olympics boycott and had entered into discussions with localities so that the games might be held at alternative sites, notably, here in Canada, such as the Velodrome in Montreal, the Commonwealth Games facilities in Edmonton and the yachting facilities at Kingston, would the minister tell us whether he has followed up these discussions with any of the organizations concerned, so that Canadian athletes may be assured of alternative games at an international level?

Hon. Gerald Regan (Minister of Labour): I thank the hon. member for his question, and compliment him upon being chosen to be the critic for his group on the subject of fitness and amateur sport. I am sure his keen interest over the years will enable him to perform that function very well indeed.

May I say, in response to his question, that examination has been made by Canada and other countries as to the possibility of holding games which would enable our athletes, if a boycott did occur, to participate in important events since they would otherwise, perhaps, be losing a lifetime opportunity to take part in the Olympics. It has been determined that it would not be practicable to hold all those games in one place at one time; the preparation period which would be necessary is much greater than is available.

It should also be noted that no games of an international character held within six weeks of the Olympics could be accredited, and that athletes participating in such games might well lose their status in respect of future international competition. That is another hindrance. Beyond that, a number of countries have examined the possibility of staging individual-event games, and Canada has certainly been considering the possibility of utilizing some of the existing facilities in different regions of this country to stage events in two or three sports, if this should turn out to be desirable and if, indeed, a boycott were to take effect.

Mr. Reid (St. Catharines): Madam Speaker, the delay which has been imposed upon the athletes with respect to these alternate site locations is a cause for serious concern.

Has the minister put forward any recommendation or suggestion to any international gathering with respect to alternate sites and what games may be played there, so that the athletes of Canada and, indeed, of the world, will not find their opportunities jeopardized as a result of the government's delay in making a decision with respect to the boycott?

• (1125)

Mr. Regan: Madam Speaker, I thank the hon. gentleman again, and I would say to him that there has not been a delay because of a position in relation to alternate games, because obviously you are not going to plan alternate games until a determination is made as to whether you are going to participate in the Olympics.

We did send, as an observer, a functionary to a meeting in Geneva, which certain other countries attended, for a general discussion of the possibility of international competitions in other parts of the world. As a consequence, we have information on the thinking of some of the countries.

I do not believe that the hon. member is correct in suggesting that it is interfering with the preparations of the athletes, because the athletes are continuing to train for the Olympics on the assumption that we will be participating, until any decision is made to the contrary. However, I assure the hon. member that, on an informal basis, very careful examination has been made by my department, and soundings have been made, as to what is feasible. I point out that this cannot be a unilateral decision by Canada because you cannot have an international competition unless athletes from other countries also participate.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

SANCTIONS AGAINST IRAN—POSSIBILITY OF ANNOUNCEMENT BY GOVERNMENT

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. In anticipation of the visit later this week of Secretary of State Vance, and as a means of indicating to the United States, to the world and to the Canadian people that this government is prepared to make some sort of stand on its own, is this government prepared to impose sanctions on Iran as an indication of this government's condemnation of Iran's failure to uphold and respect international law, so as to effect the release of the United States hostages?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Yes, Madam Speaker, that matter will be discussed with Secretary Vance.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Madam Speaker, I am not sure that the Prime Minister understood my question. I did not ask whether he is prepared to discuss this with Secretary Vance, but whether he is going to make an announcement in anticipation of this.

There is a further visit in about ten days by a prime minister of a country which has also announced sanctions against Iran. This is a very courageous stand by Japan, and we are expecting a visit from the Prime Minister of Japan. Is the Prime Minister going to wait for that visit, also, before he takes any stand in support of the recognition of international law and in support of diplomatic personnel around the world?

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, I certainly will be discussing that question with Prime Minister Ohira also. The hon. member knows that I think the breach of international law which took place last fall by the terrorists seizing hostages in Tehran was something that all countries should have condemned more strongly at the time than they did.

I indicated to the other participants in the upcoming Venice summit that we intended to raise that subject there, and our officials have already raised it at the meeting in Sardinia preparatory to the summit meeting.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

ALLEGED ILLEGALITIES COMMITTED BY MEMBERS OF FORCE

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby): Madam Speaker, my question is for the right hon. Prime Minister. In the last couple of days there has been substantial evidence released by the McDonald commission of criminal wrongdoing on the part of the RCMP security service under the operations Checkmate, Oddball, and a number of similar operations. These illegalities included the interception and destruction of first-class mail, filing false income tax returns, making threatening telephone calls, and so on. My question to the right hon. Prime Minister is whether he or his solicitors general authorized, either directly or indirectly, these particular operations.

Second, what action will the government take to ensure that similar illegal operations do not take place in the future? Specifically, what disciplinary action will the Prime Minister and his government be taking with respect to persons who have been found to have been violating the law, and what prosecution will the Prime Minister be recommending in this regard?

• (1130)

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I should like to advise the hon. member, as I advised the House in the previous Parliament, that our government does not, and will not, comment on the day to day testimony given before the McDonald commission. We will wait for the commission's report to indicate what our actions will be in that regard.

In so far as any illegalities are concerned, the hon. member might want to address his question to the Solicitor General. It has been the practice of the government and of previous solicitors general—and I feel it is the practice of this one—to supply provincial attorneys general with information which might be of the kind to incriminate criminally members of the force. However, the Solicitor General might answer that part of the question.

Mr. Robinson (Burnaby): Obviously, the Prime Minister is unaware of the fact that prosecutions for breaches of certain federal statutes are made by the federal government and not by provincial attorneys general. The commission has been going for three years, and I would ask the right hon. Prime Minister what action he intends to take before the commission reports, to ensure that similar violations do not take place. Second, who in his government authorized destruction of the files relating to this particular operation shortly before the establishment of the commission?

Mr. Trudeau: The hon. member has a different view of the law than I have, Madam Speaker. The Criminal Code is a federal statute, yet prosecutions under it are enforced by provincial attorneys general.

IMMIGRATION

TIMOTHY LEARY—ENTRY INTO CANADA—HOTEL ENGAGEMENTS

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg-Assiniboine): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Employment and Immigration. Last week, I questioned the minister on Mr. Timothy Leary making his first commercial appearance in Canada at a hotel in which the minister has an interest. At that time the minister said he had read of Mr. Leary's appearance at the hotel in an advertisement in a Winnipeg newspaper.

I would like to ask the minister—as he, also, made a statement to the Winnipeg Free Press and to Mr. Peter Warren, of radio station CJOB in Winnipeg, that he was notified the weekend prior to Mr. Leary's appearance at his hotel—whether he would tell us which statement is true. Did he read it in an advertisement, or was he advised by his brother?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, I would be very glad to clarify, for the hon. member, that when I said I was notified, I meant I read it in the newspaper that weekend prior to his arrival. That was how I was notified. I think the word "notified" means that I was made aware of the fact. I went home for the Easter weekend and read the advertisement; that is being "notified", Madam Speaker.

Mr. McKenzie: As the minister is aggressively working to replace the present Prime Minister, has he discussed with the present Prime Minister his conflict of interest, his having shares in this Winnipeg hotel in which the first commercial appearance of Mr. Leary took place, which is definitely a conflict of interest? Has he discussed it with the Prime Minister, as well as his possible resignation from the cabinet?

Mr. Axworthy: Madam Speaker, as I pointed out to the hon. member beforehand, there was no conflict of interest. The approval of Mr. Leary was based upon the application for him to appear in several other cities, but it was never brought to my attention that he was to appear in Winnipeg. I set out those facts before the Prime Minister; he has the letter.

I think there is absolutely no conflict involved, and I think the hon. member's own peculiar obsession with the hotel is one on which I would be very glad to sit down and clear up with him, as well as his interest in the hotel business. I should also say that I have now divested myself of the interest, which is now in a blind trust, and I hope this will further ease his mind.

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Employment and Immigration. The minister issued a special permit for the temporary immigration into Canada of one Timothy Leary.

Did the minister get the list of hotel engagements before he issued the permit? If he did not get the list of engagements, will the minister please table in this House the terms of the application and how the application was approved? Would the minister give us this exact detail, because this is a matter of serious conflict?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Blenkarn: If what the minister has said is so, he should be happy to table the details of the application for the permit and the nature of the permit offered. Would the minister do that?

An hon. Member: It is a question of acid rain.

Mr. Axworthy: As the hon. member well knows, there are literally hundreds of applications to this government for temporary work visas in this country.

An hon. Member: If you are not going to read them, why sign them?

Mr. Axworthy: Several of them, where there may be a question of safety to the country involved, require ministerial application and approval, which I gave. The initial application, which I point out again to the House—I am repeating myself and I ask for your indulgence, Madam Speaker, because I gave that answer last week—the original application and recommendation that was forwarded to me on March 6 exclusively asked for Mr. Leary to appear in Ottawa, Toronto and Montreal. I approved that in principle.

No further notification was given to me at that point. But I did unquestionably—as I would do again—allow Mr. Leary to come to the country on the grounds that whatever he has to say, some Canadians might want to hear it even though the hon. member might not want to hear it.

Mr. Blenkarn: Dealing with this question of a permit, the minister is quoted in an article in the Winnipeg Free Press as having said:

> Our judgment was that he (Leary) didn't constitute any major problem—

He went on to say that he had granted several permits on compassionate grounds, one to a Polish seaman and one to an Indian girl who is blind. Is there any compassionate ground on which Mr. Leary was given access to Canada—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Blenkarn: —or is it a question of LSD promotion, or was this a question of business reasons to do with the minister's hotel? If the permit, as the minister has suggested, was only for Ottawa, Montreal and Toronto, is Leary in default of the permit by appearing in Winnipeg? Will the minister please explain why the permit was only for Montreal, Toronto and Ottawa, and why, all of a sudden, it turns out the appearance was at Winnipeg?

Mr. Axworthy: Madam Speaker, to come back to the issue again, there are a variety of reasons why people make application requiring ministerial permits. Some are on compassionate grounds, others are simply because they are required under the act because of their past records. Mr. Leary had already served his parole. The judgment of the officials who had examined the case was that he did not constitute any kind of danger to the country. The application was for those three cities.

I agreed in principle with the judgment of the department. When a further application was made by his lawyers or agents to extend his visit, that was given approval. It did not come to my attention, and I would have to say, Madam Speaker, that there was absolutely no occasion whatsoever for any conflict to occur. I suggest that the hon. member, by suggesting that, is really stepping out of turn and should be answering to his own privileges. I simply made the judgment on the grounds of operating the act as it should be operated, and that is not to censor opinions of people coming to this country.

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY

WINNIPEG—RELOCATION OF MARSHALLING YARDS

Hon. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. In view of the fact that the council of the city of Winnipeg has taken a stand in favour of relocating the Canadian Pacific railyards—a matter of great importance to the future of the city of Winnipeg—and in view of the fact that this position has been supported for a long time by the four members in this party who represent the city of Winnipeg and also by the two Liberals from Winnipeg, the Minister of Employment and Immigration and the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Transport, will the minister tell the House, now, that the government is prepared to consider favourably federal participation in this important relocation project?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, the question is not about federal participation or non-participation; it is about the level of federal participation. The federal government is already committed to spending, if I remember correctly, about $7 million of UTAP money in Manitoba. But what the municipality is doing now is to come up with another type of project, the most expensive one with respect to the relocation of track yards, at the level of about $167 million.

In their assessment of the situation, they have assigned roles under which the municipality would pay about one-sixth, the province about one-sixth, and the federal government about two-thirds. Two-thirds of $167 million—I do not have a computer with me—is a heck of a lot of money. I am sorry, but we do not have it. So we have to be reserved in the extent of the commitment we make to this very worth-while project.

● (1140)

An hon. Member: Tracking operations.

Mr. Knowles: Madam Speaker, the minister has said that agreement to participate has been announced already by the federal government, that all that is at stake is the level. Unless the level of participation is adequate, that participation will mean nothing.

I ask the minister this supplementary question: in view of the fact that the relocation of these yards is terribly important to the economic and social future of the downtown part of Winnipeg, and in view of the government's commitment to assist other municipalities with relocation, will the government give favourable consideration to the appeals to be made to him by the delegation from Winnipeg representing the city council and the legislature of Manitoba when that delegation meets with him on Thursday of this week?

Mr. Pepin: This has been done already, Madam Speaker. I will receive the group and listen to their arguments. I am just trying to indicate the size of the project in Winnipeg, and also that similar projects exist elsewhere. All over Canada there is hardly a municipality which does not have a track relocation problem to solve: Regina, Toronto, Montreal—name it—all over Canada. So, obviously, measures less expensive than the full relocation of tracks and yards will have to be taken because probably the country cannot afford to go the whole way in remedying this problem and embellishing all the cities of Canada in the coming years.

HAZARDOUS SUBSTANCES

ASBESTOS—MEASURES TO PREVENT DANGER TO HEALTH

Mr. Jesse P. Flis (Parkdale-High Park): Madam Speaker, I should like to direct this question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. In view of the fact that the mortality rate of asbestos workers is increasing—for example, 43 employees who work for the Canadian Johns-Manville company in Scarborough, Ontario, have already died of asbestos cancer—what steps does the minister plan taking to ensure that owners of asbestos plants reduce asbestos dust levels for workers to at least the levels regulated by the federal government on December 31, 1978?

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Madam Speaker, I understand that the national guidelines which we issued—I am not sure if the date is correct; I take it for granted—now are respected by the provinces and enforced by them. Also, my officials are now working with those of the United States to see what strengthening we can give to the national guidelines. We would pass on the information and eventually recommend much more severe guidelines, in order to reduce the level of asbestos permitted in plants.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

JAMES OAG—CRITICISM OF PAROLE

Mr. Chris Speyer (Cambridge): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Solicitor General. In 1968, one James Oag was convicted in London of an extraordinarily brutal murder. In 1971, he was a participant in, and convicted of, the death of two inmates at the bloody Kingston massacres.

Prior to 1968, he had a criminal record which included arson, involving the throwing of molotov cocktails, assault causing bodily harm, assaulting a police officer, and numerous other offences. My question for the Solicitor General is: just what was the Canadian Penitentiary Service doing, allowing Mr. Oag on the streets of Canada unescorted?

Hon. Bob Kaplan (Solicitor General): Madam Speaker, I am having an investigation done of this particular case and I will be glad to inform the House about the results of it. I might also indicate that I am collecting statistics in general about the performance of inmates on parole and on all forms of conditional release. There are over 6,000 inmates on various forms of conditional release—a very substantial number.

If the parole system is jeopardized, that could involve extra costs, among other things, of hundreds of millions of dollars to provide for incarceration of all inmates until they complete their sentence. So I think it is important to support the concept of parole and to look into cases where abuses, obviously, like this take place and try to get to the bottom of it in order to minimize the risk of the sort the hon. member has described. I can tell the hon. member that this particular individual was released twice before. His behaviour was exemplary on both prior releases—

An hon. Member: It sure sounds like it.

Mr. Kaplan: —and I am told, in a preliminary way, that he was considered a good risk by the officers who dealt with him.

An hon. Member: Oh!

Mr. Speyer: Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is to the Solicitor General. On the basis of his current investigation, would the Solicitor General confirm that Mr. Oag has had a history of protracted violence? Would he agree that a person with such a history ought not to be released on the streets, having in mind that he participated in separate acts of murder in 1968 and 1971?

Mr. Kaplan: He has a violent history; so do many persons who are safely on parole and are not jeopardizing the public interest. I would like to wait for the study to be completed and to have the statistics before I give assurances to the hon. member about changes in the way the parole system operates.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

HOUSING

ASSISTANCE FOR HOME OWNERS ADVERSELY AFFECTED BY RISING MORTGAGE INTEREST RATES

Hon. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Madam Speaker, my question is to the Prime Minister, in the absence of the minister responsible for housing. Last week, I sent a petition to that minister of 470 home owners in Newtown-Mount Pearl, in my district, who have mortgages coming up for renewal under the AHOP scheme this year. In one case the rent has already been doubled, or the mortgage payments, from $161 to $338 a month, and the interest rate has gone from 9.5 per cent to 14.5 per cent. That case is already concluded.

Will the Prime Minister direct the minister responsible for housing, or discuss with cabinet extending the plan that is now to be limited to some 7,000 individuals, so that it will be retroactive as well as apply in the future, to assist in these AHOP cases where mortgage interest rates have gone up so much in recent months?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, in the absence of the minister I would be very happy to give him notice of the question on behalf of the hon. member.

Mr. Crosbie: My supplementary question is to the Prime Minister, Madam Speaker. The Prime Minister's housing critic, on November 6, 1979—the present Minister of Employment and Immigration—proposed a principle that if there was a requirement to raise interest rates, if interest rates had to go up, there was an equal requirement to help people who were hurt by those interest rate increases. That was a great Liberal principle when they were out of office.

Does that great Liberal principle now apply when they are in office and when interest rates have again gone up something like 2 per cent since this government took office? Is that principle to be applied so that everybody will get relief, those who have already been stuck by AHOP and CMHC, as well as those who will be stuck in the future? Will that principle be carried out, or is the Prime Minister repudiating his putative successor who made that statement last November 6?

Mr. Trudeau: No, Madam Speaker, I am not repudiating him as a minister nor as my putative successor, if that is what interests him, providing he does not start too soon.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

An hon. Member: He has already started.

Mr. Trudeau: Also, I certainly do not repudiate the principle he enunciated. On the contrary, it must be understood and read with that other great Liberal principle, that we must first help those who need it most. That it what this government will do, rather than—to quote the hon. member—trying to help everybody: we will try to help those who need it most.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

ENERGY

SALE OF GASOLINE TO UNITED STATES CITIZENS

Mr. Harvie Andre (Calgary Centre): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. The minister is aware that thousands of American drivers are coming across our border to fill up on subsidized Canadian gasoline, and that foreign airlines, trucking and shipping companies—even pleasure boat owners—are doing the same thing. I am sure the minister has asked his officials to get an estimate of this. Can he tell the House just how many thousands of barrels of fuel oil and gasoline are being transported across our border in that way?

• (1150)

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, Canada has always been a country that welcomes tourists, particularly American tourists. One must remember that even with the large influx of tourists into Canada, the consumption of gasoline by them represents less than 1 per cent. There has been an apparent increase in the number of American residents who are coming to Canada to fill their tanks. In some of the bordering areas the situation is being monitored.

At the present time, there does not appear to be any reason to take any special steps in that respect. One must remember that a large number of Canadians consume a large amount of American gasoline every winter, in California or in Florida.

We are monitoring the present situation. My officials, in consultation with the provincial governments, are examining the situation. If any steps are required in the future, I will advise the House.

Mr. Andre: Madam Speaker, the minister did not indicate if, in fact, he has an estimate. I wonder if he would quarrel with the estimate of another organization, that there are some 20,000 barrels a day involved. This represents a subsidy by Canadian taxpayers to these foreign consumers. They are not tourists; they are people who come into Canada to fill up their tanks, and then to go home. There is a big distinction. According to one estimate, Canadian taxpayers subsidize airlines alone by $5 million to $10 million.

Besides being aware of the situation, as the minister has indicated, what plans does he have in mind to stop this situation? Obviously, it is ludicrous to have Canadian taxpayers spending tens of millions of dollars to subsidize foreign consumption, not tourists coming to Canada but foreigners consuming the gasoline in their own country.

Mr. Lalonde: Madam Speaker, I would not want to endorse the specific figures mentioned by the hon. member.

TRANSMISSION OF LOWER CHURCHILL FALLS POWER

Hon. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Madam Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. In view of the fact that the government of Quebec has now demonstrated that it is not prepared to enter into an agreement with the province of Newfoundland for the transmission of Lower Churchill Falls power through the province of Quebec in order to get it to customers in New York and Ontario, is the minister prepared to exercise the authority of the federal government under sections 91 and 92 of the BNA Act to permit a corridor of Lower Churchill Falls' power through Quebec; and, indeed, is the federal government prepared to assist in the building of the transmission lines?

[Translation]

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, the existing contract between Newfoundland and Quebec concerning Churchill Falls electricity has been the subject of many debates not only in the last few months but also in the last few years. I understand that recent discussions took place between the governments of Quebec and Newfoundland. I shall meet the energy ministers of Newfoundland and Quebec in the near future. During those meetings I shall take the opportunity to examine with them the present situation but I do not intend now to recommend any particular measure, at least as long as I have not had the opportunity to meet my provincial colleagues and to examine with them what is exactly the present situation. I remind the hon. member once again that the contract has been signed freely betweeen both governments, and it is under the authority of both governments concerned.

[English]

Mr. McGrath: Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is to the Prime Minister, in view of the fact that the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources does not seem to fully understand the question, because the contract to which he referred deals with the Upper Churchill, which is already a fact, a fait accompli.

We are talking about the development of power on the Lower Churchill River. That power cannot be developed unless Newfoundland can get it through the province of Quebec, which has indicated that it is not prepared to enter into an agreement with Newfoundland to provide a corridor. Under sections 91 and 92 of the BNA Act, the federal government has clear constitutional authority, as it does in the case of pipelines for the transmission of gas and other forms of energy.

My question to the Prime Minister is very simple, since the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources does not seem to understand. Is the federal government prepared to exercise its constitutional authority and provide a corridor through Quebec to Lower Churchill Falls, so that the power can be developed? Indeed, is the Government of Canada prepared to assist in the building of that corridor, or transmission line through Quebec?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, of course the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources understands that; if only the hon. member would understand that the minister believes that it is better for the provinces to at least attempt to reach an agreement between themselves before we invoke the superior federal power. I should have thought that would have been a position approved by the hon. member and his party which sometimes accuses us of using the federal power too willingly.

Mr. Crosbie: Read your correspondence.

Oral Questions

SMALL BUSINESS

PLANS TO ASSIST BUSINESSMEN

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops-Shuswap): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of State (Small Businesses). The minister well knows that these are difficult times for small businessmen, who face exorbitant costs for inventory and are experiencing increased bankruptcy rates and a manufacturing downturn which is adding fuel to this fire.

Will the minister inform this House what he plans to do in the immediate future? Does he really care for small businessmen, and when can we expect some specific action?

[Translation]

Hon. Charles Lapointe (Minister of State, Small Businesses): Madam Speaker, of course I care about the present general economic situation and its effects on small business in Canada, as also do all my colleagues of the government. To answer more specifically the question of the hon. member, I should like to indicate that at noon today I shall be tabling for first reading a bill amending the Small Businesses Loans Act to raise the ceiling on loans so that small businesses can have easier access to financing. In a few days, I shall also be tabling another bill to again raise the maximum financing allowed the Federal Business Development Bank. If I may add something else, Madam Speaker, I should like to say that we have undertaken two major studies of general as well as financial problems of small businesses. Those studies which are being made by the Economic Council of Canada in co-operation with the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce, and The Canadian Bankers Association, will give us a broader view of the solutions we can bring to the problems of small businesses. But I can assure the hon. member that we are really concerned about those problems and continue to hold regular consultations with small businessmen themselves and their associations.

AIRPORTS

INQUIRY WHETHER FLIGHTS ARRIVING AT DORVAL WILL BE DIVERTED TO MIRABEL

Mr. Robert Gourd (Argenteuil): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Transport. In view of the inertia and incompetence of the former government in the field of transport, can the minister tell the House whether or not he intends to authorize the transfer of flights from Dorval to Mirabel in order to allow for the development of the largest airport in North America and pull it out of its impasse?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, the original intention, when the Mirabel airport was built, was to transfer there all flights except short domestic flights. I believe the objective remains the same today. However, in achieving it, such things must be taken into account as the state of access roads, the habits of the travelling public and the economic situation in the Dorval area. Those are the elements my department is now putting together in a study of the situation I expect to get by June and intend to use as the basis for the discussions I shall hold with all parties concerned.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

STATUS OF LIEUTENANT-GENERAL PARADIS

Hon. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria): Madam Speaker, my question is to the Minister of National Defence. Would the minister inform the House if Lieutenant-General Paradis, the forthright officer who commands Mobile Command, approached him to prevent any posting action being taken that would have resulted in him, General Paradis, resigning; and did the minister intervene, as he has every right to do?

[Translation]

Hon. J. Gilles Lamontagne (Minister of National Defence): Madam Speaker, it is one of the Minister of National Defence's responsibilities to make sure that generals in charge of certain commands may communicate with him as freely as possible. Recently, however, I have had no conversations with General Paradis concerning a possible resignation or promotion or whatever. The hon. member is certainly aware that, in co-operation with the high command, we are making a number of changes among higher ranking generals, and he should therefore obtain the information he is seeking within the next few days.

● (1200)

[English]

Mr. McKinnon: Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is for the same minister. Recently the commander of Air Command resigned without giving any particular reason, and I have been informed that the commander of Mobile Command was asked to resign. Admiral Allan has been posted from the position of commander, Maritime Command, after only ten months in that position. Admiral Martin, commanding officer of Maritime Command, Pacific, is resigning a year ahead of his age limit, and the chief of personnel development, a major-general, is also resigning.

Could the minister tell the House if he is aware of and interested in these matters, and could he tell us if some kind of witch hunt is going on?

Mr. Lamontagne: Madam Speaker, I think the hon. member is wrong in mentioning a witch hunt. If some of our generals are retreating or—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Lamontagne: Not "retreating".

Mr. Hees: You just made the headlines.

Mr. Lamontagne: I mean, retiring before time, it is because—

An hon. Member: They have no place to go!

[Translation]

Mr. Lamontagne: Madam Speaker, perhaps it would be better for me to speak French and explain that the English word "retreat" means, in French, retirement of certain generals. Our generals are certainly highly competent, and those who decided to retire early hold very good positions and earn a very decent living. Because of their expertise and training in the armed forces, these people can certainly look forward in the final analysis to a very good job and a new career following that of general.

HOUSING

RISING INTEREST RATES—EFFECT ON MORTGAGES

Mr. Doug Lewis (Simcoe North): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Acting Minister of Public Works. On Tuesday, April 15, the Minister of Finance suggested, on page 17 of Hansard, that people only have difficulty renewing their mortgages for the following reason:

—their incomes have not increased and because their equity in their homes has not increased, or the value has not appreciated—

Will the minister admit that mortgage loan officers are only interested in income available to meet mortgage payments when considering whether to renew a mortgage, and that an increase in equity or appreciation in value only helps mortgage companies avoid the spectre of foreclosure, rather than helping the 350,000 average Canadians who are renewing their—

Madam Speaker: Order, please. Would the hon. member please ask the question.

[Translation]

Hon. Yvon Pinard (President of the Privy Council): Madam Speaker, as the Minister of Public Works is absent, I will gladly refer to him the hon. member's comments.

POINT OF ORDER

MR. BAKER (NEPEAN-CARLETON)—ACTING MINISTERS

Hon. Walter Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Madam Speaker, I have a point of order. The answer to the last question prompted me to rise. Is it the intention of the government House leader to arrange to table a list of acting ministers in the government, so that members of the House may know who has responsibility during the question period?

[Translation]

Hon. Yvon Pinard (President of the Privy Council): Madam Speaker, if I am not mistaken, that has already been done or should be done without delay, and for my hon. colleague's information, I am the acting Minister of Public Works, which is why I rose to answer the question.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): It has not been done!

Mr. Pinard: Now my colleague says that he has checked and that it has not been done. I assure him that it will be done forthwith.

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The House resumed, from Friday, April 18, 1980, consideration of the motion of Mrs. Côté for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session.

Mr. Ralph Ferguson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State, Small Businesses): Mr. Speaker, when I referred to the Canadian Agricultural Export Corporation at the last sitting of this House, I spoke of its potential spin-off effects on all of society. We must ensure that we utilize the potential of this food production sector, because food provides the first essential of human life. By expanding this area of productivity, we will be further giving our processing industry the volumes of output required for efficient and economic operation. I am confident that such a move would help reverse the trend away from further processing that has occurred in Canada over the last few years.

In this context, Mr. Speaker, I am certainly alarmed at the volume of imported foods that Canadians bought last year, particularly in the meat sector. Close to $2.5 billion worth of manufactured foods and semi-processed meats and fish products that might have been processed in Canada came from other countries. I believe that we should be working to correct this imbalance, because we have the most efficient producers in the world.

I am pleased that the Speech from the Throne provides for a meat import act: this should provide the stability required for both producers and consumers. I trust that the remarks made by the hon. member for Medicine Hat (Mr. Hargrave) on Friday of last week reflect the position of his party and assurance of speedy passage of this bill before the House.

While there are specific areas of our agricultural industry facing very low prices at the present time, retail price comparisons with other capital cities of the world usually show our Canadian consumer prices to be either the lowest in the world, or second only to those of the United States. Also, the time spent by our workers to earn the retail value of our food products in selected world capitals as of March, 1980, is the shortest in the world. Our Canadian producers can compete on world markets. The creation of the Canadian Agricultural Export Corporation is essential to our total agra-industry and economy based on our current productivity, our potential productivity and the need for food in specific areas of the world. The Canadian farmer realizes that the Canadian consumer is his best customer; but, as any businessman, he must show a profit to survive. Farming is no longer a way of life; it is big business, requiring adequate funding and public support and appreciation.

One cause for alarm for us is the fact that some of the vast deserts of the world are spreading at an everincreasing rate. For example, the Thar Desert, in India, is expanding at the rate of 30,000 acres per year, and the great Sahara—which was at one time the granary of the Roman empire—is expanding rapidly, partially due to poor agricultural practices and management.

I believe that, as energy was the challenge of the 1970s, we must accept the fact that energy and food will be the challenge of the 1980s. I trust this House will appreciate the efforts of the Ontario Federation of Agriculture, who publish the prices that producers receive and prices that consumers pay for the same products at the retail level. This step, I trust, will bring about a better understanding between our rural and urban societies and will be of benefit to all Canadians. The concerns expressed for our farmers and small business people in the throne speech must be acted upon in a positive manner to ensure the expansion of our most essential renewable resource.

Last, but not least, if the creation of social and economic opportunities is the ambition of this Thirty-second Parliament, we must move to ensure that the qualities of life in rural Canada are maintained in our countryside, our small towns and our villages, because they provide the setting for our small businesses and light industry and so create jobs. This job creation provides opportunities for our young people. Canadian small businesses employ more than 2.5 million people, representing 40 per cent of the work force in the private sector. We must ensure that these small businesses, many of which work in close harmony with our farm sector by providing allied services, are given the incentive to develop and expand.

This quality of life must be protected. Young people must be encouraged and helped to establish themselves. Our farmers and small business people must be able to plan with some confidence; and, above all, retirement must be a time of rewards, not apprehensions.

At the outset of my remarks I spoke briefly about the area that I represent in the House of Commons. It is a great part of this nation. We grow many products that cannot be grown in other parts of Canada because of climatic conditions. We produce fruit, vegetables, tobacco, corn, soybeans, wheat, and most meat and poultry products. In the last few years, the town of Strathroy has become the turkey capital of Canada: in this context I refer only to the feathered species! But one of the largest hatcheries in Canada, with subsidiaries in several other countries of the world, is located in my constituency. Again, a dedicated Canadian entrepreneur has distinguished himself and his nation in a highly competitive industry.

I am proud of the area that I represent. It is an area that, although it now has a wide diversity of products, is rich in productivity and potential that can be of benefit to all of Canada, but these benefits can only be realized and utilized by working together with other Canadians.

Each and every part of Canada has its own unique contribution to make to the whole. Each is equally important. I have travelled across this nation many times, from the rugged shores of Newfoundland, along the Cabot Trail of Cape Breton in the east to the majestic Rocky Mountains and to the Pacific in the west. We, as Canadians, can be justifiably proud of our country and its people. I trust and pray that the uncertainty existing in some parts of this nation can be overcome in the months ahead, and that we can work together as Canadians to utilize all of the potential that is ours.

I submit that the Speech from the Throne has provided us with a foundation upon which we can build an even greater Canada in the decade ahead.

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, it is with some pleasure that I rise to participate in this debate, for it is a privilege that I have enjoyed for the past 23 years while serving in Parliament representing the citizens of the South Shore of Nova Scotia.

First, I wish to congratulate you, sir, on your appointment as Assistant Deputy Speaker. Also, I wish to congratulate Madam Speaker on her appointment to that high office. It is one that I know she will fill with dignity as well as show fairness to all members of this House. I wish to congratulate the newly-appointed members of cabinet and the parliamentary secretaries. Some of them are old friends and I know it will be a pleasure to work with them during this Parliament.

I wish to congratulate the mover, the hon. member for Rimouski (Mrs. Côté), and the seconder of the Address, the hon. member for Sudbury (Mr. Frith). Both hon. members gave a good account of themselves. While I did not agree with all the views they expressed, I believe they are a credit to the constituents who elected them to this House.

The throne speech is one that is long on rhetoric and long on promises, as have been all the throne speeches presented by Liberal governments since coming to power under the leadership of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) in 1968. However, in looking back over the years, the performance has fallen far short of the promise since the Liberal party came to power in 1968; that is with the exception of the brief period in which my party was in power.

I believe, therefore, that the present government must be held responsible for our present economic conditions, our high unemployment rate, our high interest rates, our lack of leadership at the top, and the disunity we know exists within the nation. In fact, the present depression in Canada, with inflation running at an annual rate of something like 13 per cent—if we take the March figure of 1.1 per cent as a guide—can be directly addressed to the policies and the programs that have been initiated by Liberal governments since 1968.

The throne speech, among other things, says that we have the capacity and the imagination to make this a decade of opportunity rather than a decade of doubt. But there is one question which clouds the horizon and obstructs the view, and that is the question of the unity of our country. The throne speech points out that this unrest is in Atlantic Canada—my part of the world—it is in central Canada, it is in western Canada, and it promises that in spite of the evident unrest, Canada will endure, grow and prosper.

Naturally, all of us approve of that high principle. But, like the man who rows a boat, we must sometimes look back to our point of departure, if we wish to arrive safely at our destination which lies ahead. We must ask ourselves, how did this all unrest in Canada start; from whence did it originate? I listened attentively to the Prime Minister when he spoke on leaders' day in a philosophic way, in the tones of a university professor fascinated by the internal logic of his own arguments. He spoke out forcefully against René Lévesque's proposals for sovereignty-association, and asked for a negative response to the referendum being held on May 20—a stand with which I agree.

He also spoke of the enemy within Canada, an enemy which is eroding the legitimacy of the federal government. He said there is growing doubt about our ability to act as one strong nation. We see Canadians fearing that other Canadians will be a real danger to them. We see provinces closing the door to labour, capital and services from other provinces. We see Canadians acting as though the language of other Canadians was a danger to them. Unfortunately, Mr. Speaker, all of this is only too true.

● (1220)

The Prime Minister's philosophic lecture on today's problems caused me to look back over the years to the days when he helped found Cité Libre which was the mouthpiece of a group of young Quebec intellectuals. It is most interesting to read his written statements and views at that time, when he was helping to start the quiet revolution along with his friends André Laurendeau, Gérard Filion, Gérard Pelletier and René Lévesque. Compare them with his statements today. According to all reports, the group supporting Cité Libre were rebelling against accepted systems, rebelling against established order, rebelling against conformity and conservatism and traditionalism.

Following the provincial election of July, 1952, the Prime Minister lent the pages of Cité Libre not only to the then spokesmen of the socialist party, but also to Pierre Gélinas, the director of agitation and propaganda for the communist party in Quebec. The Prime Minister wrote at that time:

> After the British conquered French Canada, French Canadians made up their minds to abuse, not use, the parliamentary system. They played the parliamentary game, but they didn't believe the basic principles upon which it was founded. They were so worried about preserving their national identity that they subordinated the national good to French Canada's good and lost their sense of political morality in the process. French Canada's answer to the great depression was to demand that the state reaffirm its nationalism. As far as we were concerned, our misfortunes weren't the result of the economic system but of a system dominated by "the English".

Those are the words of the present Prime Minister as written in 1952. I regret that he is not in the House to explain them or to respond to them. There are many more, but I quote those words only to show that the fires of unrest and the fires of disunity were lit many years ago, assisted by our present Prime Minister.

Mr. Collenette: Nonsense, absolute nonsense.

Mr. Crouse: They have been slowly, but steadily, burning until they have flared up in the referendum on sovereignty-association set for May 20. To expect the present Prime Minister to be effective in solving this problem is like inviting an arsonist to put out the fire. I say there is nothing more important today for the security, at least, of North America than unity within Canada.

To date, there has been too much written about "we" and "they": we English Canadians speak the language of business, the language of North America, they do not; we French Canadians have our own profoundly original culture and identity, as well as our special privileges as a founding race, and they do not; we in central Canada own our industries, we in the western provinces own our resources, and "they" had better not get in our way. So many Canadians are clutching economic and cultural chattels to their breasts, or making fists in their pockets as they watch others clutch theirs, that they seem to have forgotten the fatal flaw in such feelings, namely, that "they" is "we".

Living in a pluralistic federal Canada has its difficulties and heartbreaks. This is bound to occur when different races and cultures live together; and we must remember that the English and French language groups are large and powerful enough to break up this country. However, there is another choice. A country's political framework and values are not something to be knocked down on Monday and rebuilt by Friday: they are more like a garden, to be planted, worked and nurtured in harmony with the landscape.

Our Canadian landscape began to shift almost three decades ago for the reasons I gave previously and, in my opinion, the season has come for a change; the season has arrived for all of us not to consider ourselves as hyphenated Canadians, but to consider ourselves Canadians. That is what we must start to do.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crouse: It should begin with the recognition that the existence of two great language communities and many regional and cultural differences—which we often insist are problems that cripple Canadians—are, in fact, opportunities that can enrich and unite us, for "they", in the end, is really all of us. Speaking personally, I sincerely hope that French Canada votes to stand as a part of all of Canada, for we need French Canada. We need them as part of a united nation. It is only if we unite and work together that we can make progress and go forward.

I turn now to another section of the Speech from the Throne entitled "Developing our Economic Potential", where we read:

My government will reduce the federal deficit in a planned and orderly manner, but not to the exclusion of other objectives such as reducing unemployment and promoting industrial growth . . . My ministers believe that Canadians want more effective government, not necessarily less government.

These words are from a government which in 1968 required some $10 billion to look after the needs of approximately 20 million Canadians, while today they require well in excess of $50 billion to look after the needs of a little more than 23 million Canadians—an increase of more than $40 billion in expenditures in 12 years. It is not enough for this government to say it will reduce the federal deficit; it is much more important for this government to plan to balance the budget within the next four years.

In Atlantic Canada there is unrest, as was pointed out in the throne speech. We are fearful of the economic drift experienced by this country since 1968. Our interest rates, our balance of trade deficits, our relatively poor showing in terms of productivity are all symptoms of that drift. We have little confidence that this government is going to offer any solutions or even improvements.

It is difficult to be optimistic about our future when the prime interest rate exceeds 16 per cent, when our small firms are suffering financial hardship and going bankrupt, when our productivity is declining and mortgages are being foreclosed. We could, perhaps, accept those conditions temporarily if we could believe that the government had a plan or made a commitment to live within its means; that is, to balance the budget at least in terms of actual cash requirements.

This act alone would set an example. It would show Canadians and Canadian businessmen that there is a determination to bring inflation and the cost of money under control. In 1978-79, the federal government went into the financial markets of this country and borrowed some $11 billion. The government outbid all other borrowers for that amount of money. It outbid other levels of government, the provinces and the municipalities. More important, it outbid the private sector borrowers who needed money for the construction of new tourist facilities, new factories, and building hydroelectric dams. The government was also competing with farmers, fishermen and small businessmen, all of whom I represent. Interest is the price of money, and interest rates are governed by supply and demand. The government is in the market now. At this very moment it is bidding for millions of dollars at something like 12 per cent for people to invest in Canada Savings Bonds.

The government rate sets the pace for all other borrowers, and the more the government borrows, the more it increases the interest rate while making money scarce for the individual entrepreneur and, at the same time, increasing the nation's tax burden. Today, the public debt absorbs something like 16.5 per cent of all budgetary outlays, or roughly $9 billion of our total expenditures.

Since the budget deficit determines the level of government borrowing, the government can, and must, control its spending and balance its budget. These are not my views alone. While I served as chairman of the public accounts committee, the Auditor General in his report of March 31, 1976—four years ago—stated:

> I am deeply concerned that Parliament and, indeed, the government has lost, or is close to losing, effective control of the public purse.

A year before that, he stated:

> The present state of financial management and control systems of departments and agencies of the Government of Canada is significantly below acceptable standards of quality and effectiveness.

In his most recent report, he voices similar concerns over the productivity and effectiveness of government civil servants. According to the Auditor General, employees in various departments of the public service worked at an efficiency rating of only 60 per cent, compared to 87 per cent in private industry.

Members sitting on the front benches opposite cannot say that they have not been warned or that suggestions to help solve the problem have not been made. In his most recent report, the Auditor General stresses the need for top-level financial controllers in each department, a recommendation with which I concur. I would also suggest, having spent many years studying the public accounts of Canada, that the committee system should be revised so as to give individual members and senators more clout in ensuring that the government is held accountable for its actions. If such a course had been followed earlier, perhaps the billion dollars, plus, spent on Mirabel and the $1 million a week losses it is racking up might have been saved. In my opinion, the government has a responsibility to set out clearly the objectives of public policy. Parliament then has the responsibility of measuring how effectively these objectives are met. We, as parliamentarians, need better mechanisms for doing that job.

The Speech from the Throne states that transportation is a vital part of industrial strategy and promises that the government will ensure that the Canadian transportation system has the capacity to meet the economic challenges of the 1980s. If the government is sincere about this, I hope a feasibility study will be undertaken immediately in Shelburne, Nova Scotia, to determine the course to be followed in strengthening the freight and passenger connecting links between Nova Scotia and New England. Due to the needs of our expanding fishing industry, as well as of the papermaking industry and the manufacturing industry generally—to say nothing of our important tourist industry—there is growing interest in establishing a new ferry service in the port of Shelburne, one of the finest ice and fog-free harbours on the Atlantic coast. Shelburne is relatively close to a number of American ports, and European shipping companies have expressed an interest in providing this service once suitable docking facilities are available. I hope the government will take this matter under serious consideration, since action on these lines would be beneficial not only to Nova Scotia but to the maritimes generally.

In the Speech from the Throne we read these words:

> The government is determined to reduce our dependence on imported oil by promoting conservation and by stimulating the production of new domestic energy supplies.

This type of thinking is, of course, commendable—but words without action are meaningless. For example, it has been known for some time that an automobile makes the most productive use of the energy available in gasoline when it is driven at speeds of between 50 and 55 miles per hour. However, speed limits throughout most of Canada are still set at 100 km per hour, or approximately 62.5 miles per hour. I would suggest to the government that if they are sincere in their conservation efforts, they should make lowering the speed limit throughout all of Canada to a maximum of 55 miles per hour a top priority for discussion at the next federal-provincial conference.

Another project worth considering is the further development of our coalfields, a source from which energy is available in great quantities in almost every province, by extracting oil from coal using a process of gasification. The immediate product of this process is gas, the final products being petrol and dieseline. Byproducts such as ammonia, pitch, alcohols, paraffin waxes and liquid gas are also obtained. Projects of this type could go a long way toward lowering our unemployment rate by making positions available in a vast, new petrochemical industry which could make use of the skills of trained fuel technologists and chemical engineers.

I submit this proposal for consideration because there are many young, trained people leaving the universities today some of whom, unfortunately, are without hope. Projects of this type could make use of their training by providing opportunities in new fields. In light of the manner in which we are being held for ransom by some of the oil producing countries, I endorse what is said in the Speech from the Throne: we must work for self-sufficiency. There has been quibbling about the years we mentioned and the years the Liberals mentioned. All I want to see is some action in this area, some forward steps being taken, and if we can move toward self-sufficiency in this field, it matters not to me who gets the credit. But we must get on with the job.

There are many other items in the Speech from the Throne on which I could comment. The promise to amend the Foreign Investment Review Act simply means, in my view, that greater emphasis will be placed on controlling Canada's over-all economy. This amounts to bigger government and more problems for us in Atlantic Canada. Our region has prospered from foreign investment. The companies which have located in Nova Scotia have become good corporate citizens, providing our people with new skills, new job opportunities and a chance for a higher standard of living without having to move to central or western Canada.

The new proposals will make FIRA a more intrusive instrument in the marketplace, frightening away new investment capital at a time when Canada desperately needs such capital for the creation of additional jobs. It is for these reasons that, to my mind, the thrust of the Speech from the Throne is not reassuring; it looks like another Liberal interventionist government in power at a time when the economy is crying out for less government, less by way of controls and lower taxes, all of them desirable concepts which appear impossible under present conditions.

[Translation]

Hon. J. Gilles Lamontagne (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to take part in the throne speech debate. However, I would have liked to discuss and emphasize the exceptional legislative program put forward by our government, a program designed to improve the situation of the Canadian people, to take a positive approach to various economic problems and to enable us obviously to assume our responsibilities under the serious and difficult conditions both at the national and the international levels referred to in the Speech from the Throne. However, in our present situation, there is a priority, the preservation of a united and indivisible Canada which I believe is, for all Canadians, and especially for Quebeckers a matter of national survival, because the possibility of a disastrous fragmentation of the finest and most prosperous country in the world is a real threat.

Therefore allow me to speak on behalf of the great majority of Quebeckers who sent 74 members from Quebec to represent them in the Parliament of Canada and who have given us the mandate to protect the interests of Quebec and Canada in this House and in our ridings. We have already begun and intend to continue, to put our energies, our capabilities and our heart at their service in order to defend this country and Quebec against those who are trying in a vicious and intellectually dishonest way to brainwash, as never before, the people of Quebec. They do so with a view to taking power under the camouflage of a narrow and biased nationalism by promoting a sense of pride in Quebec which, they claim, only separatists possess. I can assure you that even if Péquistes have the monopoly on ambiguity and confusion, they certainly do not have one when it comes to the pride of being true Quebeckers. They may have temporarily appropriated the flag of Quebec and the fleur-de-lis and are using them as political instruments, but they are not going to take away from us, the members of this House who come from Quebec, our pride of being Quebeckers.

Mr. Speaker, as a veteran let me now point out a fact which irritates me very much, even though I am trying to stay calm. According to communications I received from all quarters, it also irritates thousands of women and men who have served and who still serve their country in the armed forces. I think of thousands of veterans, of their families, of our dead, of former prisoners of war and of so many other unknown victims.

In a Radio-Québec interview, Premier Lévesque compared the Canadian army to a comic opera with more chiefs than Indians. He stated that the Canadian army included 1,600 generals, adding that this was costly for the taxpayers. First, let me tell you, Madam Speaker, that we are getting used to these unfounded allegations, because there are not 1,600, but exactly 107 generals in the Canadian armed forces. He went on, and I quote: "A sovereign Quebec would have its army which would play a more effective role within NATO than does now the Canadian army". In my mind, this is an unjustifiable insult from one of our fellow citizens, an insult that we would have never thought possible. To this, General Richard, commander of the Valcartier base, gave a very adequate answer: "The army to which you belong has earned and deserved the respect of the international community in all the tasks that have been entrusted to it—" He then explained the various roles assumed by the Canadian army both at the international and national levels.

Does Mr. Lévesque realize that this insult is directed to thousands of Quebeckers, men and women? I hope they will express their disagreement during the referendum campaign and on their ballot. I consider this statement as an act of extreme cowardice, when it is well known that members of the Canadian forces are not allowed to appear on the political scene in order to protect their reputation and even that of thousands of others who are no longer here to do so. This is why I speak in their name and it is my duty to set the record straight.

The armed forces that some are trying to denigrate must necessarily be composed of professionals to fulfil the multiple roles assigned to them. In order to defend North America, we need interceptors whose crews are constantly on the alert, always ready to detect, to intercept, to identify and if need be to destroy enemy aircraft which would violate our air space. In order to fulfil its commitments towards NATO Canada must have outstanding airmen, very competent seamen, perfectly trained soldiers who will implement our measures of collective defence. We need impartial and professional servicemen with whom to entrust the peacekeeping operations designed to prevent the outbreak of war in tension zones.

Those servicemen are necessary to the national well-being. They are ever ready to intervene to assist Canadians when all hell breaks loose, when forest fires are raging, when floods threaten our property or even our lives. Those servicemen are on call 24 hours a day, seven days a week to come to the rescue of victims of maritime tragedies or plane crashes.

In order to defend the territorial integrity of an independent Quebec, Mr. Lévesque thinks of, and I quote:

—a small army, modest in size but efficient.

But he forgets about air defence or the absolute necessity of ensuring air support to a field army. Nor does he say anything about the naval forces that are essential to the security of a maritime state. He seems to think that a minimum contribution to the Atlantic Alliance would be sufficient to solve all these problems and that it will not cost him anything. Indeed, the Premier of Quebec is quite naive. Let's ask him the question: how important will his small, modest and efficient army be? What will be its role? And its budget? We now know one thing for sure; if Mr. Lévesque is already toying with the idea of a Quebec army, then his statement is clear: he is talking about independence and separation.

Anyway, it is a very troubling statement and given the contribution of our past and present armed forces, an insulting one. Has he forgotten all the veterans who gave their life in combat so that Mr. Lévesque could display the freedom of speech he now enjoys, a freedom unequalled in any other country of the world and that he is using to demolish his own country?

Does Mr. Lévesque realize that it is a Quebecker, like him, who is Minister of National Defence and that two of the last four chiefs of staff are native sons of Quebec? General Jean Victor Allard and General J. A. Dextrase have both held the highest post in the Canadian armed forces. The present deputy chief of staff is also a Quebecker. Right now the highest ranked woman in the armed forces is a Quebecker, she is Anne-Marie Bélanger, a colonel, who is director of women personnel. Quebeckers have their rightful place in the armed forces and they have had in the past, just as they have today, an enviable reputation, and I wonder why Mr. Lévesque is insulting them.

To demonstrate the importance of the armed forces in Quebec and in Canada, I will just mention that Quebec now has 39 marine cadet corps offering naval training to some 2,500 young people, and that there are some 8,000 young people in the 109 army cadet corps. There are also 86 air cadet squadrons, with 6,500 youths. In Quebec, this program will cost the defence department over $5 million this year, not counting the great support given by bases. I also want to mention the military contribution to the Summer Youth Employment Program, which represents an investment of some $1,800,000 for approximately 10,000 man-weeks of valuable training and work. And everyone knows about the Katimavik program for the youth. All this means that Quebeckers have a large part of our armed forces' participation.

Let us see now very briefly what national defence brings to Quebec on the equipment side. The military training, operations and support facilities are of necessity very significant. Right now our lands in Quebec are worth some $160 million. The total estimated value of the equipment in Quebec is $1.3 billion. These investments are on a constant increase from week to week. Their operation involves a sizeable budget. Looking at personnel management expenditures, both military and civilian, the figure exceeds $275 million, mainly salaries. Operating costs are $29 million for facilities, and $87 million for large equipment such as ships, vehicles and radars. During the last fiscal year, the net operating cost of national defence establishments in Quebec topped $393 million. Not many corporations spend that much in our province. Orders for defence material awarded to the Quebec industry are a source of even greater fallout. Last year, the Department of National Defence purchased roughly $334 million worth in Quebec.

In short, the Canadian armed forces are a major economic asset for Quebec, an incomparable training and education asset for young Quebeckers, an important source of new technology and research. That is still a peacetime army at the service of the people of Canada.

I would like to refer again to the news article from the Canadien Press, and I quote:

> Premier Lévesque added that a sovereign Quebec would take over the military equipment on Quebec soil and reduce its cost while at the same time make it more efficient.

Madam Speaker, I ask Mr. Lévesque whether he intends to take over all of those assets paid for by all Canadians? Once again, if that is his intention, then that is because he intends to carry out his dream of independence. Indeed, I will have in the appendix, Madam Speaker, all the figures for investments and expenditures by the Department of National Defence in Quebec to show in the final analysis that DND represents a major asset in Quebec and I, for one, as Minister of National Defence, do not intend to let those assets go to anyone but the Government of Canada.

Another issue that was mentioned in the Speech from the Throne was the purchase of the new fighter aircraft. I would like now to deal with the contract for the NFA. In awarding the contract, we had to work hard to protect the balance of payments and the balance in Canada's economic exchanges. And we succeeded. We also had to get the most economic benefits for Canada. A lot of deals were made favourably but that purchase worth $3 billion from the United States is an investment that will result in $3,260 million worth of economic fallouts for Canada. We also had to choose the best plane to be able to meet our commitments for the defence of the sovereignty of our Canadian territory as well as our collective commitments to our NORAD and NATO friends. The choice of the F-18 was undoubtedly, following elaborate technical studies, the best fighter to meet all the required criteria. A fair distribution of industrial benefits was also among the main objectives of that contract. We should remind ourselves here that it was the Government of Canada that built the Quebec aeronautical industry and we want to continue to support and expand that industry to make it an advanced industry in the two major central provinces.

We also wanted to ensure that Quebec would benefit as much as possible from our choice. We saw to it that benefits for Quebec would be at least the equivalent of those that could have resulted from the project which was rejected. This is what we did. If we take into account only the sales and purchases elements of the economic fallout, which gives the best idea of the financial aspects of an activity, the program proposed by McDonnell Douglas is evaluated at about $3,260 million for Canada as a whole. By using the same analytical method to establish the economic fallout for Quebec, we obtain a figure of about $1,570 million in the case of McDonnell Douglas, or about 48 per cent of the total economic fallout.

It therefore seems that the best choice for Canada was also the best for Quebec. Now that the choice has been made, we must see to the execution of the contract, and to do so, my colleagues and myself must have the co-operation of all parties, whether they be governmental or not. We already have the guarantees needed, and if we read the press release published last Friday by McDonnell Douglas and parts of the speech made by its president, Mr. Graff, we can find concrete actions and statements which prove the goodwill of the company and give us every justification for having confidence in the future.

Here are a few excerpts of the speech made by the president:

Now is the time to sign the contract. Some have suggested that this step marks the end of the project, but such is not the case. In fact, the CF-18 program has only just begun. The challenge has changed, but it still remains. We have already begun to meet it.

Work is now well under way for delivery of the first CF-18 in 1982 and the important program of industrial fallout that we have undertaken is in the process of being carried out.

Already, a contract of over half a billion dollars to manufacture the guiding system for cruise missiles has been awarded in Canada.

He also said:

Morever, the contract that we shall be signing today includes a clause providing for fallout of at least $150 million in new technology derived solely from the high technology program activities related to the F-18.

So, I think what he said in his comments about his corporation is worth repeating.

Our corporation is proud to have been a good corporate citizen for more than 15 years.

It is important for a corporation.

It is a fact. During that period, McDonnell Douglas has entered into contracts worth more than $1.5 billion with over 700 Canadian businesses. For more than 20 years, Canadian industry has had the opportunity, like that of other countries, to bid for McDonnell Douglas contracts; and—

—and this is very important, Mr. Speaker—

—it got a large number of contracts. There is not one DC-10, DC-9, F-15 Eagle, F-4 Phantom or DC-8 that does not comprise parts and equipment made in Canada and Quebec.

I think it is very important to realize that they are not just interested in the F-18.

Madam Speaker, I also wish to quote from a letter of the president, Mr. Graff, when he corrected a press report:

I deeply regret that a remark made last week in Ottawa by one of our representatives has been completely misinterpreted by some reporters and the general public.

McDonnell Douglas entirely agrees that government projections about the industrial spin-offs of the new fighter are reasonable and accurate. As concerns the economic benefits accruing to the province of Quebec referred to in the press report, we certainly agree with the projection amounting to $1,573 billion in industrial benefits and we also agree with the projection of $248 million for the structural components of the F-18A—

—that will be made in Quebec.

I am also thinking of another passage from the speech by the Minister of Supply and Services (Mr. Blais) that I would like to recall and on which I agree. Mr. Blais once again mentioned that it was thanks to the intervention by Quebec federal members that the economic spin-offs that will accrue to Quebec with the F-18 contract have increased from $1.358 billion to $1.573 billion. Thanks to them also, numerous amendments have been made to the contract in order that the General Electric plant designed for the manufacturing of vanes and blades be set up in the eastern townships and that a $225 million numerical control machining centre be also provided for in the contract.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): I regret to interrupt the minister, but I see the time is one o'clock and I must now leave the chair until two o'clock.

At one o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 2 p.m.

[Translation]

Mr. Lamontagne: Mr. Speaker, before the House took recess for lunch, I was saying that in the final analysis there is no loser in the F-18 contract, since Canada has made a profitable deal and I think that it may not always have been the case. On a purchase of $3 billion in the United States, we could recover as marginal benefits the amount of $3,250 million and this means that at trade level, the balance of payments was well maintained. Second, we say to it that we were buying the best possible plane to discharge our responsibilities and the mission entrusted to us by our NATO friends as well as by our American friends of the North Atlantic defence. In addition, we have taken steps to ensure that the sharing of economic effects will be fairly distributed between the two provinces in which most of the air industry is located. Above all we have taken into consideration the fact that we had set up the air industry in Quebec, that we did not intend to let it go down the drain and as the result of the action of my colleagues from the caucus and the cabinet, we all worked together to see that Quebec had its own fair share of those economic benefits, that is 48 per cent.

Some of course are incredulous. I saw an article about Mr. Duhaime who asked for some figures. In my last letter, I offered to Mr. Duhaime to send some representatives of the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce, the Department of Supply and Services and the Department of National Defence to brief him on all the information he wanted to obtain on the issue. He chose to ignore my proposal—

An hon. Member: As always!

Mr. Lamontagne: As always, he would rather remain ignorant to criticize in his own way that contract which in the end is a very good deal for Quebec.

Mr. Speaker, there is no confusion, as I said earlier, and we note that in his letter, the chairman of McDonnell Douglas, Mr. Graff, explains quite clearly that the commitments would be fully respected and that finally there would be no way to avoid attaining the percentage and the economic benefits promised by the company. Mr. Blais, who is responsible for the contract, has made it clear that the contract will be complied with as strictly as possible.

I said earlier that there is certainly no confusion. Mr. Duhaime and his colleagues are looking for excuses. He says that we distort the facts, that we lack good faith. He even accuses us of lying. I can assure you that those accusations do not bother me very much, considering where they come from. He wants guarantees. The best guarantee I can give him is that we, the Quebec delegation in the federal government—I think our past record in the aeronautical industry in Quebec answers for the future—will make sure this industry will be able to grow and take its proper place in Quebec. In that regard, the annex of the documents I will provide gives every detail on the industrial subsidiaries Quebec should get.

It is nonetheless extremely surprising to see Mr. Lévesque and his friends get involved and interested in such a project while at the same time devoting all their energies to separation from Canada. It is even more surprising to hear them always talk of confusion about the contract of the century, about the F-18, when the question of the century, the referendum question itself, is the perfect example of confusion and bad faith. The referendum question asks for nothing else but a mandate to separate. And I hope Quebeckers will see through it. Let Mr. Lévesque as well give us guarantees. He wants guarantees about the F-18 contract, let him give us guarantees that the referendum question does not amount to a mandate to achieve independence and separation. Let him guarantee that the aim of his referendum campaign is not independence and the separation of Quebec from the rest of Canada.

Mr. Speaker, I know Quebeckers well. My association with them dates back a great many years. I fought side by side with them during the last war. I did business with them for 20 years. I was at the helm of their provincial capital for 12 years. I have been the elected member for the Langelier riding in the House of Commons for nearly three years. I suggest that we should trust to Quebeckers' common sense and insight, as well as to their sense of belonging to this great country, Canada. As a matter of fact, they demonstrated these qualities when they elected our candidates in seven provincial byelections. They demonstrated them again recently during the last federal election, when they gave us large majorities in 74 ridings.

Mr. Speaker, I feel that Quebeckers did not elect 74 out of a possible 75 members of our party to come here and work for the separation of Canada. Finally, Mr. Speaker, I shall say briefly that a No vote in Quebec would guarantee the future of our children and our own security.

[English]

Hon. Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, I take part in the throne speech debate today recognizing indeed the problems that we face in Canada. To take part in this debate today is to speak to a very troubled Canada and, indeed, to a very troubled world.

I think that all members of the House would agree on the problems that are facing us. The difference, of course, is how each party deals with these problems and how it responds to them. As members of Parliament we will be called upon in the course of this session to deal with serious economic problems. As well, the tensions of confederation—never more real than today—will have to be faced. We cannot forget either that Canada lives in an international world that sees trouble growing daily. We face very stiff challenges.

Canadians have much to hope for in the recent throne speech. As we enter a new decade, the decade of the eighties, there is no other country that has a greater potential than Canada. I am sorry to say, however, that the throne speech and subsequent statements made by ministers of the Crown do not offer all that much hope for certain problems which Canadians face.

For instance, there is the present housing situation. Hundreds of thousands of Canadians are having to face high mortgage rates. This year 350,000 Canadian households will have to renegotiate their mortgage rates at record high levels of interest. There are over 5,000 such households in Kingston and the Islands alone, but not much hope has been offered to them. The Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) has callously dismissed their difficulties. He said that the government will assist only a small percentage of this vast number of householders who have to renegotiate their mortgages. Out of the 350,000, perhaps between 5,000 and 10,000 will be assisted.

What will happen, for instance, to the 5,000 families in Kingston and in all the other Kingstons across this country, communities to which the government has denied assistance? What hope is being offered to those in the small business and farming sectors who are suffering, with no relief offered to them, from the high interest rates? Take, for example, a small businessman and his wife in Kingston. Their 15-year old business has gone bankrupt because of high interest rates. Their life work has been taken from them. Under the Conservative government this business would have qualified for lower interest rates through the small business development bond program. This would have effectively cut in half the nominal interest rates for small business. It might have saved that small business in Kingston and the Islands. Under the Conservative government taxpayers who employed their spouses in unincorporated businesses or on farms would have been able to deduct their spouses' salaries as taxable expenses. That is something that I personally wanted so much to see put through this House of Commons.

The Conservative government's policies were working toward lower interest rates and a climate of economic stability. This government has offered only the gimmick of floating interest rates. This, plus the statement that there will be no budget before May, not in May, perhaps not in June, perhaps not well into the year or perhaps never, given the statements of the Minister of Finance, means that businesses that do survive are faced with continuing uncertainty. In uncertain times we do not need a government that contributes to uncertainty.

Like the great majority of Canadians, I am deeply concerned about the political events throughout this country, but particularly in the province of Quebec.

[Translation]

I have lived the recent history of Quebec very intimately, often within the province itself. I feel involved in the political and cultural evolution of that province through friendship, admiration and belonging. As a woman in politics, as an ordinary Canadian, I feel involved but also worried because I simply cannot see a Canada without Quebec, the cradle of our country which remains an integral part of what we are and what we can become.

I simply cannot believe there are no cogent, lasting and equitable solutions to our national and constitutional problems, to our regional and cultural differences. It strikes me as folly that our quarrels should divide us to the point of there being talk of breaking up, particularly at this point in our history, in the history of the world, when unity and agreement are more important than ever, if not vital. But, Mr. Speaker, I am sure everyone in this House shares my feelings, and I trust that, together with the Canadians we represent throughout the land, we will find a way out of the impasse with greater understanding, will and tolerance. The alternative is simply no alternative at all.

[English]

The international scene as well raises the spectre of even greater problems than those we face domestically. In the field of foreign policy the government referred in the throne speech to what will be its new, "active" approach in this field. From what we have seen to date, sir, that active approach would be seen to be more one of retreat than of positive action.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Somnolence.

Miss MacDonald: The first thing which the government did was to reject the public review of foreign policy, a review that was well under way by the former government. Documents which would have served to stimulate discussion and provoke public debate had been prepared and they were ready for reference to the Standing Committee on External Affairs and National Defence. The intent was that that committee would serve as a forum in which many Canadians who are interested in international affairs could make their views known, rather than leave foreign policy as the exclusive domain of a clutch of bureaucrats, academics and politicians.

• (1420)

Not only would this have been the first foreign policy review designed for participation by Canadians already interested in international affairs but, sir, as well, it would have served to heighten the awareness of all Canadians as to the many ways in which international events affect their whole lives.

A public foreign policy review—a public review—would have brought home to Canadians a sense of their inter-dependence on the global community. It would have shown that geography and resources can no longer isolate us from external events, something which Canadians have believed for far too long. It would have stimulated both public suggestion and personal response as to how we meet the challenges of the 1980s in an increasingly unsettled and troubled world.

Yes, these documents were prepared but they now lie unheeded in the Department of External Affairs. These documents which lie there trace the dimensions of change in the world in the last 35 years. They did it in three dimensions. They traced those changes militarily, economically and politically. In each of these fields, whether political, military or economic, the documents recorded the growing instability that characterized the decade of the 1970s, an instability which threatens to escalate in the 1980s. Regional tensions are becoming more acute; east-west relations are deteriorating and the north-south dialogue cries out for a solution. These are the issues we face in the 1980s.

What is Canada's role and responsibility as we enter this troubled decade? That is what those documents asked. That is the question posed to the Canadian public. That is what the parliamentary committee would have invited the Canadian people to debate. An active foreign policy such as this party had envisaged would have sought not only broad public participation but would have stimulated a better understanding, a greater receptivity of the contribution that will be demanded of Canadians to help prevent and defuse growing instability. Defence, trade, aid, international institutions, law of the sea negotiations, human rights, refugees—debate on all these important issues would and could have made foreign policy a much more exciting part of the lives of countless Canadians.

But that open public approach has been rejected by the present government. The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), true to form, reinforced his restrictive and secretive approach to policymaking the other day when, in reply to a question from the hon. member for Dartmouth-Halifax East (Mr. Forrestall), he stated that we did not need defence or foreign policy reviews since such reviews had been carried out in the 1960s. Back in the 1960s! Of course in the 1980s another one is not required!

He did not, of course, state the obvious: first that those reviews back in the 1960s had been carried out in camera with only the elite being permitted to participate. Second, and more important, he did not state that the world has changed dramatically since the 1960s. Now, maybe it has not for the right hon. gentleman opposite; maybe he still sees himself as the style setter of the swinging 1960s. But, Mr. Speaker, for the millions who have had to suffer war and starvation and relocation, who are having to absorb the shock of a largely unheralded energy crisis, or who as new countries are struggling for a footing under the Roman arch of nuclear missiles erected by the super powers, for these peoples and countries the world has indeed changed since the 1960s.

My colleague the hon. member from Victoria (Mr. McKinnon) detailed and analysed many of these changes in his lucid speech of last Thursday, and with these changes has come the need for Canada to play a more dynamic role in the world today. In so doing we will be required to face up to the political realities of the world as they exist, not as we wish they might be. We cannot ignore the growing instability in the world, nor can we fail to respond to it. Our response must address both humanitarian needs and political realities.

As a government, we did that. We greatly increased our humanitarian aid to relieve the suffering in Vietnam, in Kampuchea and in Laos, but at the same time condemned the government of Vietnam for the inhuman atrocities they were perpetrating on defenceless peoples. We pursued new initiatives in disarmament but, knowing the strategic lead of the U.S.S.R. in weapons buildup, we supported a modernization of theatre nuclear forces in Europe so that the NATO alliance could bargain from strength, not weakness.

During the election campaign I attempted to find out where the New Democratic Party stood on that issue. After reading this morning's newspaper I am still trying to find out where they stand, Mr. Speaker.

Only by taking a firm stand which combines compassion with tough-mindedness, only by joining a solid commitment of assistance with a condemnation of any country which seeks to exploit or diminish the integrity of another—only by such a realistic approach can we contribute effectively to a reduction of the rapidly increasing instability we see around the world.

As a government we felt this must be done in a comprehensive and coherent manner, and that is why we had initiated the over-all foreign policy review. And as my leader said the other day, we will carry on with it despite the government's intention to terminate it, to whittle it down, or respond to events only in an ad hoc manner. A task force responsible to the minister rather than to Parliament and on only one aspect of foreign policy is no substitute for a comprehensive, over-all foreign policy review.

Let no one be misled by the fact that political instability around the world is not on the increase. Two of the most blatant examples of this increasing instability have occurred in recent months. First, the breaking of the age-old Vienna Convention on Diplomatic Immunity by the seizure of the United States embassy and staff in Iran was, and continues to be, one of the most reprehensible acts ever committed by one nation against another. Second, the invasion of the neutral country of Afghanistan by Soviet troops has created the greatest potential for global conflict since the second world war. In both these cases, Canada's answer under the Conservative government was swift and straightforward. We advised our friends and allies, and the Canadian people, of the sanctions that we would be prepared to impose as retaliation.

With both these events there were certain actions that Canada took unilaterally and others that we took in concert with our allies and with like-minded countries. Our allies knew where we stood. As the Wall Street Journal, in an editorial on February 1 of this year, wrote concerning the Conservative government's foreign policy:

> Its leadership has deliberately sought to put Canada on a new course, staunchly in the western camp and on the side of political humanism, after the long Trudeau regime that at times tended toward ambivalence.

No, sir, it was not our style to be ambivalent. But since the Liberal government has taken office, we have seen a public foreign policy review rejected; we have heard absolutely nothing from the present government about the sanctions against Iran which we had undertaken before the United Nations Security Council last December 30. We do not know whether they endorse them or not; and we have seen them retreat from the sanctions we had imposed against the Soviet Union as a result of its invasion of Afghanistan.

The decision of the previous government to boycott the Olympic Games in Moscow was a clear message to the Kremlin that aggression will not be tolerated. That boycott now includes some 53 countries representing all of the many regions, races and religions of the world. The Prime Minister might smugly continue to rebuff our demands that his government support a boycott, but how long can he remain deaf to the desires of the people of Afghanistan and elsewhere to be free—free from subjugation, free from occupation and free from Moscow's tyranny. How long can he remain deaf to that?

Even if this government eventually does decide to join a boycott of the Moscow games—probably in the wake of Secretary Vance's visit—its indecision and ambivalence will have reduced the impact which Canada could have both in Moscow and with our allies.

In addition, our athletes—those who will be called upon to sacrifice so much for principle—no longer know if this government has pursued the holding of international games of comparable standards. I would say to you, sir, that this morning's replies in question period did nothing to reassure our Canadian athletes that such arrangements were being carried on by this government. Over three months ago Canada was in the lead in organizing such games in the various sites around the world. Now this is not mentioned.

One other international commitment from which this government seems to have retreated is the commitment that Canada made last June in Tokyo, along with other members of the economic summit, to a reduction in the annual rate of growth of oil consumption and a consequent reduction of oil imports over the next five years. The right hon. gentleman opposite in a speech in Toronto on February 12 charged that my leader had "given in" to the demands of the other summit countries. He then went on to say "probably because he was in a state of euphoria over hobnobbing with the summit leaders".

I would say to the Prime Minister—if he were in his seat at the moment—who misled Canadians on this issue as he did on so many issues during the election campaign, that it was not euphoria but common sense and an understanding of what will be required of us in the future that persuaded the Conservative government to join with its economic summit partners in dealing effectively with the international oil crisis.

But since the Prime Minister believes that we gave in at Tokyo, and since he implies that somehow Canada was sold down the river for having to reduce our rate of growth of oil consumption and our oil imports, how is he going to explain his reneging on this commitment to our economic summit partners? What is his alternative to reducing the rate of growth of oil consumption? Is it an admonition to go out and use more of this rapidly depleting commodity and become ever more reliant on uncertain offshore supplies? But he leaves that unanswered.

I would also like to comment briefly on the reference in the throne speech to disarmament and the dangers of nuclear holocaust. We heartily concur with the appointment of an ambassador for disarmament, but one would hope that the work of such great Canadians as General E. L. M. Burns and Harry Jay, men who perform much the same kind of role over a long period of time, would not go unnoticed or unrecognized.

The throne speech correctly emphasizes that at stake in this issue is human survival on this planet, and I am certain that all members share a deep concern over nuclear proliferation. Yet nuclear proliferation does not occur in a vacuum; nor is it prevented by the appointment of an ambassador for disarmament. I would be far more confident if this government had recommitted itself to the most stringent safeguards possible in the export of nuclear technology, a commitment which we had made, something which certain government members objected to when I raised that issue at the United Nations.

I plead with the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. MacGuigan), because I know his intentions to be well-founded, even if his actions are somewhat circumscribed, to do his utmost to bring greater openness to the policymaking processes of his department as we look at foreign policy in this session. I plead with him to provide the means whereby Canadians will have the opportunity to make their views, their contributions and their concerns known.

I plead with the government not to be afraid to take a stand or to try to play it safe in some backwater of neutrality when international events require more of a response from this government than that which we so frequently hear on the Prime Minister's lips these days when he says: "Oh, we will consider that problem at the next summit meeting in Venice".

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. John Evans (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, before addressing myself to the Speech from the Throne I should like to congratulate you on being appointed Assistant Deputy Speaker of the House of Commons, and through you I should like to congratulate Madam Speaker on being elected Speaker of this House. At the best of times the position of Speaker is demanding, but I know you have the support and co-operation of all the members in this chamber in the execution of your duties.

In addition, I should like to congratulate the hon. member for Rimouski (Mrs. Côté) and the hon. member for Sudbury (Mr. Frith) for moving and seconding the Address in Reply to the Speech from the Throne.

I should also like to welcome to this House all returning members and to acknowledge our new colleagues who were elected for the first time on February 18. It was barely 11 months ago when I was first elected to this House, and now after two elections in the period of a year I find myself referred to as a veteran.

Most importantly, I would like to thank the people of Ottawa Centre for the renewed and strengthened confidence they demonstrated in me on February 18. I look forward, as before, to serving and representing my constituents on the local and national issues that we face.

I also look forward to my responsibilities as the Parliamentary Secretary to the Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen), and I want to thank the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) for the confidence he has expressed in me with this appointment.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Evans: Today, Mr. Speaker, I would like to address two issues of paramount importance to the future of Canada, two issues which permeated the Speech from the Throne. First, I refer to the necessary renewal of our national institutions, but more important of our national will; and second, to the revitalization of our economy.

Let me turn my attention first to the matter of the economy. The past several years have clearly been a time of serious economic difficulty for all industrialized nations. Inflation and unemployment have risen. Investment and growth have been lacklustre, and generally confidence in the ability of governments to understand and to come to grips with these persistent problems has diminished.

However, I firmly believe that this diminished confidence is unjustified. Governments, especially this government, not only understand the problems that we face but have hardened their resolve and are taking actions to restore stable economic order to the world economies. This is not to say that these actions can or will bring about quick solutions. They will not. We are facing extremely complex problems brought about by fundamentally changed conditions. Foremost among these are the disappearance of cheap energy and the dramatic redistribution of wealth between nations.

Such fundamental changes in our economic order require extensive industrial adaptation and equally extensive revisions in the expectations and behaviour of Canadians. Neither can be accomplished quickly, nor can they be accomplished simply and easily. However, with determined policy and political resolve, they can be accomplished.

● (1440)

In this regard, consider the economic policies of our government. On the fiscal front, there is a clear recognition of the need for sustained restraint in government expenditure and for the reduction of the federal deficit. Our commitment in these areas is clear. However, it must be recognized that changes in the fiscal posture of the federal government can only be brought about with care and caution if major economic dislocations and great individual suffering are to be avoided.

A government simply cannot make a blind assault on the deficit, for example, without precipitating serious economic consequences in the form of higher unemployment and reduced economic growth. Therefore, a program of reasoned transition must be implemented, and this is precisely what the Prime Minister has promised.

The program of restraint in government expenditures begun in 1976 will continue, as will the re-examination and reordering of both direct and tax expenditure priorities. Incentives will be provided to encourage private initiative and to raise the level of Canadian participation in our economic affairs. Our goal is to create an environment in which Canadians are strongly encouraged to commit themselves and their resources to the future of Canada. Yet selective programs of assistance must and will be brought forward to help those who are in greatest need.

These important fiscal commitments are clear in the Speech from the Throne. But, Mr. Speaker, of equal importance are the commitments with regard to monetary policy and the reduction of inflation. Inflation is the number one enemy of economic order and stability. It creates serious uncertainty and social unrest, and sharply curtails investment, growth and job creation. The conquest of this most debilitating economic sickness must be and is being given top priority in the formulation of this government's monetary policy.

But once again, inflationary forces built up over the years cannot be reversed overnight. Public expectations and behaviour patterns are slow to change, and they will not change if government policy is erratic and haphazard. The Bank of Canada has embarked on a long-term policy to restore stability to the price level. I believe it is the correct policy, and that with perseverance and patience it will succeed.

But the road is not easy. We have faced, and are facing, serious external pressures which dramatically increase the prices of imported goods and services such as oil, food and manufactured products. The steady reduction in the growth rate of the money supply, both here and in the United States, has led to rapid increases in interest rates.

Some believe that these effects can be avoided, that inflation can be beaten by imposing limits on wages and prices and that interest rates can be set by decree. I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that such beliefs are misguided and are a product of shallow thinking; both are examples of policies which attack the symptoms and not the causes of our problems. While wage and price controls may temporarily assist in breaking the inflationary psychology, they are not and cannot be a permanent solution. Likewise, interest rate ceilings only lead to a situation where no money is available to be borrowed.

No, Mr. Speaker, quick and simple solutions are inappropriate to problems which are deep and complex. What is required is what is being done—the conduct of sound, balanced policies aimed at the fundamental causes of the problem. In the case of inflation, the cause is excessive monetary expansion and this is precisely what the government's policy is designed to curtail.

In combination, the government's commitments to fiscal and monetary responsibility, implemented in a balanced way, will lead to a stable economic environment in which we enjoy moderate inflation, sound prospects for economic growth and reduced unemployment. As I have said, these results will not be achieved tomorrow or the day after, but with continued resolve and determination they will be achieved to the benefit of all Canadians.

I would now like to turn my attention to the issue of national renewal, an issue which I, as many others, consider to be fundamental to the future of Canada and at least as important as the economic issues previously mentioned.

As we enter the 1980s we, as parliamentarians, face inordinate challenges as the very essence of Canada is under serious stress. As was mentioned in the Speech from the Throne, in every part of Canada there are forces driving us apart rather than bringing us together. Yet I am encouraged by the Prime Minister's strong belief in the "opportunity" available to Canadians despite this domestic turbulence. I am excited by the Prime Minister's vision of Canada as a united whole as opposed to a conglomerate of fractional parts or a "community of communities". This integrative view, this vision of Canada, will be instrumental in restoring confidence among Canadians. It will be instrumental in renewing the national will.

When the Prime Minister stated in his speech on leader's day that the enemy is within, he was so right. The threat to Canada is not the aspirations of people in a province who share common attributes; the threat to Canada is regionalism. It is the divisive parochialism that pits one group of Canadians against others, that causes one group of Canadians to, as the Prime Minister put it, close the doors on other Canadians, to raise barriers to the flow of capital, labour, goods or ideas from one province to another.

From another perspective, the threat to Canada is a growing feeling of inwardness which is leading, as the right hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) stated, to a "growing doubt about our ability to act as one strong nation".

We know the disastrous effects of rampant protectionism on the international scene—all nations are made worse off. Why, we must ask ourselves, is there any reason to expect the result to be different when such foolishness is perpetrated by provinces within a nation? If that doubt transforms itself into reality, it will surely guarantee that we will all be made worse off. Economically, of course, but more importantly, the quality of our lives will be seriously diminished, our culture will lose its richness, our society will lose its diversity.

While the drive for regional power by premiers can be blamed for some of the problem, part of the problem lies here as well. Canadians must not only be free to move and to share the wealth in any part of Canada, but they must clearly perceive that these opportunities exist. It is the federal government's responsibility to ensure that these rights are protected and that this perception is made clear. The federal government must reassume its leadership role, for if we do not move now to put Canada first, we will surely witness the dissolution of the country.

If there is such a thing as alienation in parts of Canada—east or west—it is an alienation from the national interest, an alienation for which we are all responsible. Individually, Canadians do not have a great deal to complain about. Yet the country is deeply divided and our future is unclear. What has also developed in Canada is a "me first" mentality which casts our attention away from the benefits Canada has to offer, and which have traditionally been available to all Canadians, and towards the benefits which can be claimed by groups with special interests.

The survival of Canada as a coherent entity rests on a new appreciation of this national interest and a rekindling of the national will. We, the members of this chamber and the duly elected representatives of all the people of Canada, have the responsibility to ensure that this new appreciation and rekindled will are realized. We together, on both sides of this chamber, must reflect the common will and ensure that it is transformed into a living, dynamic nation. We, the members of this chamber, take a back seat to no appointed or elected representative anywhere in the country. The same people who elect the provincial and local representatives from Newfoundland to British Columbia, elect you and I. There is no truth or logic in the assertion that these other representatives are more clearly attuned to the people or are better able to reflect their needs and aspirations than are we.

The people of Canada have given us the responsibility for protecting, promoting, and fostering the well-being of this nation. They have charged us with the duty to ensure that all views are considered, that all voices are heard. They have granted us the honour and the privilege of leading them into the future. We have been granted these by the people of Canada; but we will fail if we let petty regionalism and self-doubt strip away our ability to rise above the parochial regionalism and to put Canada first.

Mr. Speaker, the future of Canada is matched by few other nations on the face of the earth. But that future will only be realized if we constantly recall our purpose for being here, if we dedicate ourselves to keeping Canada strong and unified as a nation. In the words of Kenneth White, chairman of Royal Trustco Ltd., speaking at the April 17 annual meeting of the Commercial and Industrial Development Corporation of Ottawa-Carleton, stated:

> We can direct our energies towards positive national goals or strive for a more self-centred regionalism where economies and people may be pulling in many different directions, thus nullifying any possibility of forward motion.

I believe that the feeling of uncertainty and self-doubt which is said to be growing in our country is a result of misplaced national vision, a national vision which has become focused on the material, on the territorial. Canadians are searching for their purpose, their vision. You and I, this Parliament, have the obligation and the opportunity to refocus that vision on a strong and unified Canada from one coast to the other. The task is complex and the challenge difficult, but together we can show Canadians their vision; we can rekindle that national will.

I look forward to working in this Thirty-second Parliament to ensure that the vision and the greatness which can be Canada is indeed realized.

Hon. Michael Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Mr. Speaker, before commencing my remarks in this debate on the Speech from the Throne I should like to congratulate you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, and through you to congratulate Madam Speaker on her election. I have no doubt that she, along with yourself, will exercise her responsibilities in a fair and judicious manner and I wish you both well in the duties you have undertaken.

I should like, also, to put on record the sense of honour I feel at being re-elected to serve the people of Etobicoke Centre in this Thirty-second Parliament. I express my gratitude to them. The last Parliament was far too short for many of us on this side of the House and I am sure hon. members opposite feel the same way, though for somewhat different reasons than my own. I am very grateful to have the opportunity to serve the people of Etobicoke Centre in this Thirty-second Parliament and I look forward to continuing to do so for many years to come.

Finally, may I offer a few words of welcome to the new members of this House. I myself am certainly not an old boy in this chamber; I came here for the first time in 1979. But I do understand very well the feelings of new members since it is so short a time since I came here myself. I am sure they all have the same sense of excitement, of achievement, of responsibility and enthusiasm when they think of the years ahead as I felt at the time I was elected, and still feel having been re-elected. I wish them well during the time they will be serving in this chamber. We may differ over various aspects of policy, but I am sure, as has been quite apparent from this debate, that we all have one thing very much in common and that is a very deep interest in building a strong and united Canada, a free Canada, a Canada where there are opportunities for many of our citizens.

A week ago today, hon. members heard the first Speech from the Throne in the 1980s. I listened to it very carefully and I read it very carefully, feeling that this should be an important document, one which addresses itself to the issues and indicates the direction the government and the country will take in the 1980s. There are parts of this document with which I can heartily agree. I share with the government the confidence it has in Canada and in Canadians. We are truly a fortunate nation. We have an exciting and challenging period ahead of us, a period in which Canada should achieve real greatness, a period during which we should be the envy of the world.

I share the government's objectives in seeking to bind this country together in a way in which we can fill this promise. I am committed, also, to the strong belief that for this country to stay together it is essential that federalism should enjoy a strong renewal commencing with a No vote in the Quebec referendum on May 20. I will come back to this topic later in my remarks.

Nevertheless, in spite of the innate strength Canada possesses, in spite of the success we have enjoyed in the face of great adversity in the past, we must be careful to ensure that federal government policies do not undermine the very strength which has allowed us to maintain such a favoured position.

It is here that I part company with the philosophy set forth in the Speech from the Throne, for it appears to signal a continuation of some of the disastrous policies which have plagued us in recent years, years when our favoured position in the world suffered a distinct decline.

Let me elaborate on this. The speech states as one of two main principles that Canadians "recognize the need to live within their national means." Right on! But the federal government has not done so. The sense of commitment on the part of the government to living within its means, to reducing the deficit, one of the principal causes of inflation, is diluted by the same qualifications as have been employed during recent years when we experienced such a damaging increase in the deficit and in the level of inflation. They are content to treat the symptoms of inflation, to offer some small help to home owners, pensioners, farmers and small businessmen. These are all welcome steps, but there is no sense of commitment, no program, no discussion of inflation itself or of the fundamental causes of inflation.

As I said, I have read this document very carefully and I have been able to find only two inconsequential references to the word "inflation" throughout the whole speech. Inflation today is swirling around everywhere. Home owners are being forced out of their houses, businesses are going bankrupt, financial markets are being dominated by inflation. Yet the government has chosen practically to ignore the issue completely.

This is one of the main reasons it is essential that a budget should be brought down at the earliest date so that Canadians—individuals, companies and governments—can assess the federal government's programs and, hopefully, gain confidence that something is being done. I say this in my role as spokesman for my party on industry, trade and commerce. It is essential for Canadian industry to expand and build new plants and equipment to meet the challenge of the eighties. High interest rates caused by inflation are sapping the cash and confidence which these people need to do their job. Investment decisions will be postponed and job opportunities will decline unless this confidence is restored.

I listened Tuesday to the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) speak of the importance of freedom in this country and the freedom of Canadians to enjoy relatively the same standard of living without feeling that they have to move to Alberta or other parts of the country which are moving ahead more quickly than some of the others. I was impressed with these words, but there are much more basic threats than what he was talking about in those remarks. I do not believe that people today have to move to places like Alberta to enjoy the things they want in this country.

The more fundamental threat to our economic freedom today is the threat from inflation. Consider our pensioners, who are forced to sell their homes because the cost of taxes and maintaining a home has become too onerous. Low income Canadians are struggling to move from subsidized housing, and every time they feel they are getting a little bit ahead of it all, they find that their rent has been increased. Home owners renegotiating their mortgages are now completely dependent on the whim of a government to save their homes.

These are much more serious examples of loss of individual freedom. The response of the government to date has been to introduce programs to make this loss of freedom more palatable, while turning its back on the basic problem. This only serves to place these people more and more at the mercy of the state, to the point that many have virtually no economic freedom.

Let me give another example, which is equally as serious but more long-term in nature. Canada is living in an unreal world. We have energy prices which are less than one-half of world prices, and we have been spending at the federal government level for a number of years at least 25 per cent more than we have been earning. This cannot last forever. In spite of what hon. members opposite and hon. members to my left have been preaching to win votes, there is still no such thing as a free lunch. While we are enjoying ourselves today, we are leaving our children such a legacy of government debt that the increase in taxes in future years must be so large as to cut much more deeply into their economic freedom than is the case today. In other words, our children tomorrow will be asked to pay a much greater share of their earnings in taxes to pay for the freeloaders of today, you and me. That was the true wisdom of the budget of the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie) which, I am afraid, was lost on the Liberal-NDP coalition in December.

One way out of this dilemma is for the government to establish a clear priority of industrial development in this country. If we are to maintain the wide variety of social programs which we have been enjoying for many years, we must make a clear commitment to strengthen the apparatus to pay for them. That sense of priority and commitment was missing in the Speech from the Throne. What we see is not a neutral position but, rather, a tendency toward greater intervention by government, more regulation and, hence, slower economic growth. I had thought that Professor Helmut Schmidt had taught his pupil a good lesson in 1978. Clearly, Professor Galbraith is now in charge, and we are now moving back to the musings of 1975.

The speech says that Canadians want more effective government, not necessarily less government. In view of the record of how successful the previous Liberal government has been in providing effective government, I read into this that the Liberals are now moving solidly toward more government in terms of cost of government and degree of regulation and intervention.

Regardless of the political philosophies of parties in this House, it must be abundantly clear that we are very close to the point where we cannot afford more government. A review of the impact of government regulation on economic efficiency and productivity will clearly lead to the conclusion that increased regulation in many cases reduces job opportunities, which is a particularly critical observation at a time when there are more than one million people unemployed in this country.

On looking at the specifics of the economic proposals, I must say that I was excited by the statement that "Canada's resource base will be used as a basic building block of our industrial policy". However, my excitement stopped there. One of the tragedies of this past election and the period since the election has been the inability of this government to allow its vision to range past the desire for short-term political gain by emphasizing the short-term costs of the energy policy which our government had evolved. It is far more important in the long run to grasp the opportunity given to us of the vast amount of energy development ahead. If Canadians pull together in support of the energy future of this country, I am convinced that the energy potential of Canada can build a major arch between the west and the rest of Canada.

The industrial activity which will be generated in eastern Canada by investment in the energy business throughout Canada will dwarf anything we have yet seen in this country. That is the opportunity, and I strongly believe that the national interest was served by the Conservative government energy policy. To be sure, there was a cost, and there will be a cost which is shared by Canadians; but the opportunity was also to be shared by Canadians from all parts of the country, both in terms of energy security and economic development. Unfortunately, the political myopia of this government has not allowed it to seize upon this opportunity.

I would like just to dwell on a few figures. Canada needs some $300 billion to $400 billion of investment in its energy sector alone during the next decade, and at least double that in the 1990s. That compares with our total national income—our total gross national product—today of some $260 billion. That is a 1979 figure. This represents a tremendous amount of business activity not only by the oil and gas industry, the electrical industry and pipeline companies themselves but also by all the supplier companies of steel and of high technology machinery and equipment.

Today far too much of this is imported. I urge the government to set as a top priority the establishment of policies to win the maximum amount of this business for Canadian companies. This will create jobs, improve our balance of trade, create a strong technological base in Canada and put us in a position in the future to dominate these industries in the world market. All of the ingredients are there for a major Canadian success story. This opportunity will drift into a major problem if the government does not address it.

Let me comment briefly on the proposal to create a national trading company. I welcome this initiative to help small and medium-sized business develop export markets. Earlier this year through the Export Development Corporation the Clark government announced a series of measures designed to make it easier for these companies to enlist the support of the EDC. Other measures were under active discussion. I am concerned, however, that this national trading company should not be launched in such a way that it will drown small business in bureaucracy and red tape. What is needed is an efficient means whereby business can respond quickly to export opportunities with confidence that the trading company will be able to respond in like fashion.

I suggest that the government consider the alternative of tax or other assistance to encourage greater development of smaller, more flexible trading companies. These companies would be privately owned and managed by entrepreneurs, not bureaucrats who have no profit orientation.

I would like to comment briefly on one perspective of the changing environment in the province of Quebec. I have been honoured to participate in this debate and to listen to many hon. members from both sides of the House commenting on the changing nature of things that have been happening in a very dynamic way in Quebec in recent months and years. It has been a privilege for me to listen, particularly to those hon. members opposite who are living with this dynamic situation and who have been put into a position where, in many cases, they are living in a very divisive environment. I congratulate them on the efforts they are making in their own constituencies, and I can only speak as strongly as I can for the people of Etobicoke Centre when I say that I wish them the best of luck in the efforts they are making in their own constituencies.

• (1510)

Going back to my own experience in the business world, in my early years as a businessman I was quite uncomfortable with some of my English colleagues and acquaintances in the Montreal business community. Attitudes on the part of these men toward their French-speaking associates were a real throwback to long-forgotten days in other parts of the world. I was not as perceptive then, but it was quite clear that these attitudes just had to change. I did not know how they were going to change or how quickly they were going to change, but in recent years they have changed quickly and in a very fundamental fashion. The reasons are varied, but the basic fact is that, to an ever-increasing extent, Quebeckers are wielding more power in le monde des affaires.

I am tremendously impressed with the capabilities of companies such as SNC, Lavalin, Bombardier, Provigo, National Bank of Canada, Credit Foncier and Paul Desmarais' Power Corporation. These and others like them are leaders in the Canadian business world. L'École des Hautes Études Comerciales is a respected business school across the continent. Quebec business has made its mark on the rest of Canada and in the world markets. These men have great pride in their achievements, and this is readily apparent in the self-confidence they have in their ability and the successes they have had to date.

What a tragedy it would be if Quebec were to opt for separation. For business to succeed, they must have a large domestic market. The Canadian market is not large enough but it is certainly much larger than the Quebec market, and to reduce the size of one's domestic market by three-quarters would be very damaging to the future success of growing medium-sized Quebec based companies. It is not the companies that I have mentioned that will be hurt; they have made their move, they are established in the world markets. It is the next generation who will suffer.

I realize that economic arguments will not necessarily have much impact on the vote on May 20. I can only view a Yes vote as being a futile and empty gesture in this context since Quebec companies and Quebec businessmen have achieved so much recently. It would be winning the battle of ten to 20 years ago while losing the war of the future.

All parties in the House, as well as all provincial governments, are committed to a renewal of federalism. We do not need a Yes vote to push us forward. Indeed, a Yes vote might well have the perverse effect of making agreement on a renewal of federalism more difficult to achieve. There is some real risk that there will be an adverse emotional reaction to such a vote.

Now, there is concern for the future, a sympathy for the Quebec position, and I believe that all the provinces agree that there must be changes. But a Yes vote, I believe, could well disrupt the negotiating posture of the different parties in future negotiations. The position of the government of Quebec, so long as it is represented by the Péquistes, is unclear. It is unclear what their negotiating posture will be. We cannot forget that they are committed to a breakup of this country, so that their position in any negotiations will certainly not be a constructive one.

As I have said, there has been much change to date. I have tried to illustrate this in the context of the business world to show Quebeckers that change can occur and can occur quickly. It has produced a stronger Quebec and in so doing has made Canada a stronger place. My hope is that Quebeckers will respond favourably to this and other examples to vote no in a strong way on May 20, for without Quebec in Canada it will be considerably harder for us both to reach our potential in the 1980s.

In closing, I urge the government to attach a much higher priority to fostering economic growth in the 1980s. This priority is sadly lacking in the Speech from the Throne. I have tried to approach this in a positive manner in my remarks. We cannot be all things to all people; we must set priorities. I believe it is clearly evident that if we do not establish a clear priority along the lines I have been advocating, it will be impossible to achieve our other broader social goals.

This government with its majority position has a great opportunity to rid Canada of the problems which developed in the 1970s. It is unfortunate that many of the same faces are on the government benches; I can only hope that they have learned that the old policies have not worked and that they will have a sufficient freshness of mind to expand their horizons to the benefit of all of Canada.

[Translation]

Mr. Robert Gourd (Argenteuil): Mr. Speaker, it is for me a great honour to address this House as the member for Argenteuil. First I would like to congratulate all hon. members, new and old, for their election and I hope all of us as representatives of the people of Canada will be able to carry out our mandate with dignity. I share without reservation the enthusiasm of this House over the appointment of Madam Speaker, and I am convinced, Mr. Speaker, that you will be able to discharge your responsibilities with wisdom and perseverance.

The history of this country has been strewn with highs and lows but we always have been able to overcome those crises and to better ourselves. But, Mr. Speaker, I think Canada is going through a difficult period, perhaps the most difficult in all our history. Indeed, at a time when the world economic situation is fragile, when the world political situation is under certain constraints, Canada, in addition to having to work hard and without respite to minimize the resulting adverse effects, must also face an internal political crisis. At a time when most governments in various countries can concentrate on strengthening their economies, the Government of Canada must also fight to keep the country united under a federal regime. And in spite of that, Mr. Speaker, I am confident and very optimistic about the future of this country because so far our economic performance—given the present state of the world—is the envy of several industralized countries. Not only our economic performance, Mr. Speaker, but also our political system is the envy of several countries because we forget too often that nowhere in the world can one have as much freedom, whether it be the freedom of association, of movement, of expression and so on. How many foreigners dream about being able one day to set foot on our soil and say: I am going to start a new life here. How many?

Of course, that does not mean in any way that Canada cannot do better but it is in my opinion an undeniable indication of the validity of our federal system, of its strength and its capacity to protect the well-being of the people of Canada. Personally, I am happy and feel privileged to have been born in this country, and on no account would I want to live elsewhere. Moreover, I hope that to the last gasp I may proudly say that I am a Quebecker but first and foremost a Canadian just as any Ontarian or Albertan.

Unfortunately, a shadow has been cast over that ideal which, I say without hesitation, is undoubtedly shared by most Canadians. This shadow, Mr. Speaker, is the possibility of our country breaking apart. As you all know, the separatist government of Mr. Lévesque feels that Quebec and its people could develop more fully outside of the present federal system. Sovereignty-association, according to them, is the solution to all the evils suffered by Quebec.

In order to better understand the unavowed objective of the separatist Parti Québécois, which is independence, one must wonder if the use of this fraudulent expression of sovereignty-association does not in itself reflect the irreverence of the separatist government in Quebec and also its desire to fool the people. Indeed, the Larousse dictionary appropriately defines the term "sovereignty" as follows: quality of the political power of a state or government body which is not subject to the control of any other state or body. In short, Mr. Speaker, sovereignty is a milder term which soothes and dulls the mind but which actually means nothing short of separation and independence.

Larousse also defines association as follows: a group of persons with a common interest. Of course, those persons must be able to identify their common interest. Now, an analysis of Mr. Lévesque's words seems to indicate that he, unlike any other premier, has identified the common interest which would allow such an association. I actually said, unlike any other premier, because one after the other, they have all dismissed the possibility of associating with a sovereign Quebec. What nonsense! What dangerous nonsense for all Canadians! Moreover, as the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) has so brilliantly demonstrated, such an undertaking can only lead to a dead end.

It is obvious that the separatist government of Mr. Lévesque is dishonest. Unable to bear the consequences of a separation, they want to have the best of both worlds, the political advantages of separation and the economic advantages resulting from an association with Canada. Mr. Speaker, all this comes down to the destruction of a political and economic association which already exists between the provinces, replacing it by a type of association they want to be strictly economic but which, in spite of my willingness to understand, would be built on undertermined bases. As a matter of fact, Mr. Speaker, our federal system is already an association based on a common interest which amounts to the will to live collectively. Provincial governments represent regional interests in their provinces. They are in a better position to understand the problems, the needs of their people because, Mr. Speaker, the geographical, economic and social diversity of the country necessarily brings about regional differences that should not be ignored. But unlike the provincial governments, the Canadian government does not represent any one province in particular, but all of them at the same time. This Canadian government is not a foreign entity to Canadians as Mr. Lévesque would like them to believe, it is the men and women of Canada. It ensures fair sharing among the provinces, the redistribution of wealth which sometimes tends to cater more to the needs of one area, sometimes to those of another. The sharing, the redistribution, are done in the greatest respect for democratic principles and freedom. Federalism, this political and economic association we enjoy, is in my opinion far superior to a strictly economic association as, for instance, the common market. Why? Because we were able to combine economic performance, mutual aid and fraternity. Obviously at times some policies tend to favour one area over another, but in the long run all areas benefit because the economic and political strength of Canada transcends all regional and provincial boundaries.

Before that reality, the separatist government of Mr. Lévesque wants to enjoy every economic benefit offered by Canada, but does not want to assist other needy provinces. It wants to receive but does not want to give. However, I ask you, who would accept an association on such an egoistic and inhuman basis? Moreover, such association gives rise to insuperable problems which Mr. Lévesque is avoiding at any cost. For example let us take the monetary policy. Mr. Lévesque wants his separatist government to be in a position to draft its own legislation, to levy its taxes, in short to be a sovereign state. He adds, however, that Quebec would use the Canadian currency. Now if Quebec incurred debts here and there, the remainder of Canada would be unable to intervene. What would happen in a particularly difficult period if Quebec were unable to keep its promises? Who would then cushion the fall of the Canadian dollar? Who would have been the instigator of that crisis, Quebec or the remainder of Canada? Such are the kinds of unresolved problems which Canadians of all regions should underline so that Quebeckers will realize the merits of federalism and the danger which they are facing.

Under those circumstances, all federal members, putting aside their ideological and political differences, must under their mandate uphold the federal system. How should they defend it? Well, they do not have to make up the advantages of the system but merely to point them out, because up to now, the PQ party has deemed advisable for quite obvious reasons to state only its negative aspects.

I would now like to emphasize that there is no question of hiding the weaknesses of our federal system, because by doing so we would be as much guilty of dishonesty as the present Quebec government, and even worse, we would be going against democracy itself by misleading Canadians.

Mr. Speaker, I believe there is no doubt that our system can and should be improved, to better meet the needs and aspirations of all regions of our country. But if we reflect on the matter, has this not been the case throughout our history? Through free and honest discussions and by taking into account the context in which we were living, have we not improved, amended and even eliminated certain outmoded structures which no longer coincided with the new realities? From what some people say, we might think that Canada has not evolved since the beginnings of confederation in 1867 and, in fact, that we have regressed into pre-history.

Has the separatist government of Mr. Lévesque said that in 1977-78 the federal government transferred $4.4 billion to Quebec? Has it said that $1.3 billion were paid out for equalization purposes? Has it told the citizens of my constituency of Argenteuil about the massive federal investments for the construction of the Mirabel airport which will soon become the major entry port to North America? Has it told them about the economic advantages this represents for my area? Has the present separatist government in Quebec told my fellow citizens that the purchase of the F-18 will bring about economic fallout of $100 million in the Saint-André sector in Lachute? And finally, Mr. Speaker, did Mr. Lévesque and his team tell Quebeckers that English Canadians of all provinces recognize Francophones? That they accept Quebeckers as Canadians on an equal basis? Unfortunately, the answer is no. It is therefore up to us, the members of the Liberal, Progressive Conservative and New Democratic parties in the federal Parliament, to do so, and as the member for Argenteuil, I shall undertake to do so in my constituency, in Quebec and throughout Canada.

● (1530)

[English]

To this effect, I am happy to see that the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) has understood the necessity to fight separatism, that he has realized that this ideal is inapplicable and dangerous, not only for English Canada but also for Quebec. Furthermore, when I mentioned a while back that the English Canadian felt strongly for the French Canadian, and even though I as a Liberal do not share the political beliefs of the Leader of the Opposition, I had him in mind because he is the perfect image of an English Canadian from the west who has felt the necessity for and taken the time to learn the language spoken by six million Canadians. If I may add, he has succeeded extremely well.

[Translation]

Some may wonder, Mr. Speaker, why I place so much emphasis on this question and why, in fact, my entire speech is devoted to it. Indeed, many people have told me and told others that our economic problems are more urgent than the issue of separation. I respect this opinion, Mr. Speaker, but I would add that there could be no healthy economic life in an unstable and uncertain political climate.

In closing, Mr. Speaker, may I say this: If we Canadians of any region want to learn an important lesson from all this crisis which we face now, then we should remember that Canada, its structures, its history and its future should never again be taken for granted.

[English]

Mr. Lyle S. Kristiansen (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I should first of all like to add my voice to those who have extended their congratulations and their best wishes to Madam Speaker on her historic appointment and also to you, sir, for your appointment. I would also like to extend my regards and my congratulations to both the mover and the seconder of the Address in Reply and, further, to newly elected members who, like myself, have made or will be making their initial address in this House.

My own involvement over some 25 years, starting in my mid-teens, in the political process has led me to believe and often say to my constituents and many others that those who are deeply involved in this business that is called politics, whether in an elective sense, in an organizational sense or in other ways, often tend to have much more in common with each other than they even have from time to time with those who share their allegiances but who are not as active as participants in this sphere.

As this is my maiden speech, I would also like to take an opportunity to say a few words about the nature and history of my riding, a constituency with rather a unique tradition, a constituency—I suppose others would say it—"not quite like the others" and which I am proud and honoured to represent. As the new member for Kootenay West, I must also say that I feel a rather significant degree of humility, having in mind the predecessors who have represented my party and others over the past many years.

For some 30 of the past 35 years, since the late Herbert W. Herridge, "the Squire of Kootenay West" as he was to become known to the nation in his later years, was first elected as the "people's CCF" candidate in the general election of 1945, which is an incident that is rather unique in the political process, Kootenay West has been ably represented by members who have been elected under the banner of both the CCF and the NDP.

Mr. Herridge's combination of dedication to his constituents, his gentlemanly manner, his good humour and sometimes his mischievous charm captivated members on all sides of this House and, indeed, across the land. Upon his retirement in 1968, he was succeeded by Randolph Harding, a 23-year veteran of the B.C. legislature who was known, at least throughout British Columbia, as the "Ombudsman of the Kootenays" and who during his six years in this House was accorded recognition by ministers and members on the other side of this chamber and many others as well as "the most dedicated and most knowledgeable member of this House on matters respecting the environment". The person who said that was the minister responsible for the environment during that time.

Mr. Harding, I would like to say, because I worked with him very closely over a period of time, was also one of the most honest, sincere, quietly conscientious and self-effacing public representatives whom I have ever had the privilege of knowing. Since his electoral defeat in the federal election of 1974, he has continued to serve both his community and his neighbours in either an elective or an appointed office.

I would also like to mention—hon. members will forgive me if I do so briefly—the brief term of my immediate predecessor, a representative of the Conservative party who was chairman of that party's caucus in the most recent year. Mr. Brisco, within the limits of his party and his philosophy—one would expect me to say that those are pretty serious limits, and indeed, I believe that they were—performed both conscientiously and very effectively on behalf of the constituents that he was elected to serve during that period.

An hon. Member: That's fair.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Kristiansen: However, on February 18 Kootenay West came home both to its roots and to its political tradition. I hope that by my efforts over the ensuing years I can persuade the riding to stay in that home and with those roots and to try to build a new tradition, not only there but in the rest of the country as well.

● (1540)

How is it that an area like Kooteny West should so often choose and choose for so long to act independently of their fellow citizens in many other parts of Canada? To begin with, Mr. Speaker, it is a matter of geography. Kootenay West is rather like an island. It is surrounded by rivers, lakes and mountains. The Columbia River winds around the 100 by five-mile span of Kootenay Lake, into the Arrow Lakes, which are a slight widening of the Columbia River. Mind you, Mr. Speaker, they are not as they used to be prior to the intervention of two successive federal governments and one provincial government in British Columbia.

We also have a richly diverse population. We share that privilege with many other provinces. There are British, German, Italian, Portuguese, Scandinavian, Dutch and many other nationalities, but we also have a rather unique blending of successive waves of political refugees. These are political refugees from the right, from areas all over the world, even this continent.

This began in the early 1900s with the large influx of Russian Doukhobors, many leaving their former homes on the prairies. What they had to say about why they came, through Peter (The Lordly) Verigin, who was their spiritual leader at that time, describes, I think, what can be said of many other people in our rather spiritually and geographically isolated corner of this country. I should like to repeat something Mr. Verigin said as quoted by Bert Herridge here in 1946, as follows:

> In British Columbia we will buy our land and own it so it will not be necessary to be subject to the English king, and keep our land. No schools are there. The air is very pure, like Switzerland. So we will live in good health in the Christian way with no government to bother us, no rheumatism and few mosquitoes.

Following the wave of Doukhobor settlers there came another, rather more forced migration, that of the Japanese Canadians. They came as a result of the War Measures Act during World War II and the hysteria that pervaded the land. I am proud to say that this party did not share in that hysteria at that time and neither did the right hon. gentleman, who used to lead the party to my right. Many of the Japanese stayed. Thousands came and many stayed and made their contribution to our society in the West Kootenays.

Next came the Quakers seeking the peaceful life that we seem to offer in our corner of our province. Members of the Society of Friends from all over North America settled there.

In the 1950s came the American refugees from the McCarthy era bringing an extremely rich array of skills and talents that could no longer find outlets for expression in their homeland during the dark age dominated by the senator known as "Joe". The final wave of American political refugees that arrived were driven by a distaste for a war which they sincerely believed was unjust, unwise and unAmerican. They arrived in increasing numbers in our community.

Now we have all of these groups piled one on top of another, mixing and blending their array of talents with many others of more conventional backgrounds who also came to our area attracted by work in the forest industry or the mining industry. The Cominco smelter in Trail is the largest lead-zinc smelter in the world. Many of these workers are industrial workers and some of them find a quieter and what is to them a more satisfying way to live. Now we all mix together and that makes us the rather rich community that we are today.

One event I mentioned earlier forged this community into what is perhaps one of the most active collections of community and volunteer organizations in the country, especially on environmental issues, that I have ever seen. I refer to the boondoggle called the Columbia River treaty. Hon. members from Kootenay West, whether Conservative, CCF or NDP, have fought that treaty and its extension that appears to be on the horizon in the form of an operation called "The Kootenay Diversion".

It is difficult to know who sired the Columbia River treaty. It was a kind of abortion resulting from an incestuous relationship between Conservative federal governments, Liberal federal governments and a Social Credit provincial government. We ended up with a $1 billion bill for something which was not supposed to cost us a nickel. The worst part of it is that our people were dislocated, we lost our valleys and many of our rivers, some of which are now nothing more than sloughs and dust bowls. We have nothing to show for that money, Mr. Speaker. That is something that will never be forgiven, and no matter what it takes to stop something else like it in that part of the country, it will never be allowed to happen again under any circumstances.

One of the things that happened as a result of the treaty is that thousands and thousands of acres of productive forest were wiped out. That leads me, in part, to the topic that I want to spend the rest of my allotted time discussing.

There is no mention of the forest industry in Canada in the Speech from the Throne. In spite of the rather brave and encouraging words of the Minister of the Environment and Minister of State for Science and Technology (Mr. Roberts) a few days prior to the commencement of this sitting, acknowledging the rather dismal record of the formal Liberal administration as regards the deterioration of the Canadian forestry service and the inactivity of that government in that area over many years, there was not a single word relating to Canada's forest industry in the Speech from the Throne. One out of ten people employed in industry in Canada work in that particular industry, yet there was no mention of it. This at a time when seminar after seminar and conference after conference from the east coast to the west and in between have been drawing attention to the neglect of that industry.

Our timber resources are no longer a renewable resource. Mr. Speaker, when a resource is being depleted faster than it is being replenished, then by definition it is no longer renewable. That is a tragedy. It is especially a tragedy in communities like Kootenay West and many others across the land, which contain single resource communities existing only because of one industry.

Interest rates under this government, as under the former government, are driving people out of their homes, virtually turning back the clock in regard to housing construction from one end of the country to another. Even in the so-called boom province of Alberta housing starts have dropped from 7,828 one year ago to 4,429 today. In Saskatchewan the drop is from 11,000 to 6,000, and in Manitoba the percentage fall is even greater. Thousands upon thousands of forest industry workers have been laid off in community after community after community across the country.

I worked in the forest industry before I was elected to this House, Mr. Speaker, and I intend to spend part of the summer recesses when we get them—we may not get one this year—working in that industry. That is where one hears what is going on. That is where it is at in the forest industry and in other industries throughout this land.

This past weekend I attended a meeting of over 100 woodworkers in the ridings of Kootenay West and Kootenay East. They are angry, Mr. Speaker—more than angry, because in the last two weeks they have seen the number of their brothers and sisters in British Columbia's forestry industry who are unemployed increase from slightly in excess of 2,000 to 6,000. At this very moment the statistics for today are being gathered and it is anticipated the figure will be somewhere between 8,000 and 9,000.

On May 2, Manitoba Forest Industry, the key employer in the central northern part of that province, a plant which employs many native people, will shut down. It will take a lot of other businesses in that part of the country down with it.

● (1550)

In northern Ontario we find that about one-third of Lumber and Sawmill union members are now out of work. One sometimes wonders whether the government is intending to solve the problem of reforestation by causing us to build less houses so that we will not cut as many trees, and maybe things will catch up without their having to do anything. That is rather an odd way to go about it. I could think of more lunchroom-like terms to describe it, but perhaps I will not at this point.

I would like to read a resolution passed by the meeting which I just attended this weekend. It was put by representatives of people who work in the sawmills, the plywood plants, and in the shake and shingle mills of this country. I quote:

> Whereas thousands of our brothers and sisters in the western Canadian forest industry are experiencing devastating lay-offs, including hundreds from our own local; and
> Whereas these lay-offs are caused almost entirely by the disastrous interest rates imposed by the federal governments of Canada and the U.S.; and
> Whereas these interest rates are also responsible for depriving many workers' families of their homes;
>
> Now therefore be it resolved that this local of the International Woodworkers' of America go on record as being absolutely determined to do everything possible to rid our country of governments which inflicts such massive injuries upon ordinary people, and generally to do everything possible to correct this disastrous interest situation;
>
> And be it finally resolved that this resolution be immediately submitted to the Prime Minister, to the Leader of the Opposition, and to the Leader of the NDP.

I have done that on their behalf.

I would like now if I may, Mr. Speaker, to move, seconded by the hon. member for Kamloops-Shuswap (Mr. Riis):

> That the address be amended by adding thereto the following words:
>
> This House, however, regrets to inform Your Excellency that the government has failed to provide a program to deal with the crisis created by massive lay-offs in the lumber industry, and this House condemns the government for its failure to provide such a program.

[Translation]

Mr. Marcel Roy (Laval): Mr. Speaker, I should like to join all my colleagues in the House to congratulate the new Speaker for her high position in the House. I am all the happier and prouder that part of the name of her constituency of Laval-des-Rapides was part of mine before and that I cannot feel unconcerned about the town of Laval-des-Rapides as it is the town where I was born and where I chose to live; I wish her satisfaction and good luck in all the responsibilities she will assume during this Parliament.

My dear colleagues, in this Address in Reply to the Speech from the Throne I should have liked today to describe some situations which would perhaps be more relevant to the speech itself. But I think you will not hold it against me if I have made a choice. Most of my speech will deal with the Quebec situation, and I thank in advance members from both sides of this House for the interest they showed and the concern they feel about this situation.

I intend in my speech to review the economic situation, to look into a subject which, I think, the supporters of sovereignty-association do not talk about, namely equalization, the centralization effected at present by the Government of Canada versus provincial governments, which supposes the constitutional status quo. I have been sitting here as member for Laval for nearly 12 years. During that time, I participated in several debates to improve the quality of life of my fellow citizens in Laval, Quebec and Canada. Today, however, it is again with great interest that I rise to express my views on the holding of a referendum which could mean for 24 million Canadians a change in the structure of Parliament and could also influence the quality of life they are now enjoying.

Indeed, the seventies allowed Canadians to enjoy a high standard of living and social peace, while on every other continent violence was rumbling, democracy was crumbling away and inflation eroded the purchasing power of everyone in the world. In Canada, one only has to think, for example, of the price of oil which in several countries is three times as high as in our country when, paradoxically, the purchasing power of those workers is often three times lower than the purchasing power of Canadian workers.

Canada is one of the most beautiful and most privileged countries in the world, with its income per capita in 1978 exceeding that of the United States, Norway, Denmark and the Federal Republic of Germany. When one considers the question of real purchasing power in Canada, the situation is even more favourable when Canadian tourists had to pay $5 for a cup of coffee in Switzerland this year, or $100 to sleep in a second-rate hotel in Germany, or $150 per person for a supper in Tokyo, those Canadian tourists realized that Canada with its purchasing power is still a paradise; this is a Canadian fact.

Canada is therefore a rich country, but its integrity must be preserved if we want the eighties to be as stimulating for all those men and women who have taken up the challenge in the past. Indeed, we often refer to the renewal of our constitution, but we forget all the fiscal arrangements and amendments which have been made especially during the last 25 years and more particularly since the beginning of the quiet revolution in Quebec, thanks to the Liberal initiative in 1960. The performance of our country which has recently reached its centenary is not too bad and, fully aware of the potential of our natural resources which have yet to be developed, we can still say that everything remains to be done in Canada. If European countries live for their past, Canada lives for its future, provided all Canadians are ready to take up the challenge together. This future is possible, this challenge can be met if all Canadians agree to meet it and if all of us, as shareholders in Canada, can reap the dividends it will produce.

This is why it is important to place in the proper context the referendum debate aimed at setting up a separate or sovereign Quebec. Even though the Canadian government is accused of being responsible for everything that is wrong in Quebec, I believe that history and Canadian policies show on the contrary that Quebec, like all the other provinces, has obviously always been able to develop. Canadians have certain social, economic and political advantages which are still only dreamed about in most countries. This is the Canadian reality for all Quebeckers while sovereignty is an adventure.

It remains a reality for most Quebeckers even if some sociologists, political scientists and other alleged observers pretend that Quebec is the poor relation in Canada and ask Quebeckers to be content with one-seventh of its territory while proposing another system without telling us about its structure or economic advantages, without telling us what will happen when the 135,000 federal public servants in Quebec have to be integrated and without telling us the facts about this new system.

The progression of the separatist movement in the sixties and seventies has followed a plan involving teaching in Quebec schools, its culture and its economy, which ensured that the participation of the Canadian government in all joint programs or those administered by the province with federal funds would be glossed over and that participation by the Canadian government kept silent, preferring to broadcast that federalism was not a viable proposition in Quebec and the money taken out in taxes was not coming back to Quebec. For example, at the official inauguration of the health centre in Ville de Laval on April 10, 1978, the authorities decided to ignore completely the presence of federal MPs for the area. And not only did they ignore it, on that occasion they even forbade the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin) to make a speech on behalf of the Canadian government which had contributed $16 million toward the cost of the building. Through my intervention we succeeded in getting invitations to the ceremony, but the decision remained. The Minister of National Health and Welfare had to agree not to speak. It was strictly forbidden for the representative of the Canadian government to do so on that occasion.

I gave the example of the health centre, but I could name other occasions of nursing home inaugurations whose construction again was financed to the tune of 95 per cent by the Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation, with 50 per cent of the operating deficits covered by the Canadian government. They took pains to prevent the Canadian participation from being referred to on those occasions.

That PQ propaganda has been very subtle and uses every symbol of sovereignty. The use of the lilied flag, the use of Mr. Vigneault's Gens du pays as a national anthem for their proposed nation, the use of the balcony speech—they even prompt France's invitation to Quebec's premier to go up Louis-Philippe's stairways even though France's investments in North America went to other provinces than Quebec. And this is how with all this careful planning it was possible to tell Quebec that it was not being treated fairly within Canada and that moneys levied by the Canadian government were not returned to Quebec. Here again, I could mention many incidences, for example the events organized by the Quebec state to propel the idea of this sovereignty while always applying in these instances and in this planning Doris Lussier's explosive theory or strategy as explained in the Journal de Montréal of June 21, 1978. After a survey in which a renewed federalism had received 44 per cent of the votes against 21 per cent in favour of sovereignty-association, Mr. Lussier, a sociologist, wrote a letter to Mr. Lévesque, leader of the Parti Québécois, saying, and I quote:

—that the Parti Québécois is losing ground, that is certain. Let us not be ostrich-like, let's face the facts.

He was advising Mr. Lévesque of an explosive strategy in several points to be applied before the battle. Here then are some of those points which they called lessons, and I quote:

The fourth factual lesson is to get Quebec nationalism worked up with all the means at our disposal, subtly yet constantly, on a day to day basis and massively.

The sixth lesson mentioned is to serve as propaganda material:

—the best form of defence is attack. Public opinion should be warned of the kind of people federalist Quebeckers really are: timorous, political retards, dead weights——and even—

—traitors practically.

I quote from the same letter:

As for the undecided, we must succeed in making them feel guilty of not jumping on the bandwagon to freedom.

And I continue. The letter stated that under that strategy:

—it is absolutely necessary to secure the support of the labour movement.

This was done a couple of weeks ago. Last week, we even saw the labour movement identify with the Yes team. Which does not necessarily mean that the rank and file will follow the stand taken by their leader——that the only way for Quebec to achieve independence is never to talk about it. It is stupid, but that is the way it is. A strategy is not built on what we should like things to be but on what they are.

And there is the part on the unions.

There is something else which seems to me to be of paramount importance. We must strive to secure the active participation of the labour movement. The hell with big business: it is against us anyway! As for unionized workers, we cannot afford not to have them on our side on the referendum question. We shall have to keep this notion in mind during the next round of collective bargaining with the public and near-public sectors.

And that is Mr. Doris Lussier's letter which appeared in all the papers on April 21, 1978. We can see how all the points mentioned in this letter are currently being applied according to a planned strategy. Mr. Speaker, it must be realized that the federalists can hardly compete with independentists with respect to propaganda. Contrary to separatism, federalism is a form of government which is essentially human, pluralist and which does not lend itself to great crusades. Federalism cannot hope to compete successfully with separatism in terms of propaganda and demagogy, but we prefer to rely calmly and serenely on the intelligence and good sense of Quebeckers with the greatest respect for the innate qualities of these people.

I heard the president of the committee for a Yes vote, who came back from holidays last week, accuse the federal liberal caucus of being a bunch of cuckolds. That only serves to confirm what I just said, and it is an insult not only to all my colleagues from Quebec but also to the Quebec people, 68 per cent of eligible voters, who elected those members to the House. Mr. Speaker, as a premier who got elected with only 41 per cent of the registered vote, Mr. Lévesque would have been better to study the file on which the trained experts of the three departments involved spent 200,000 hours before deciding on the right fighter plane for Canada. This decision will represent an injection of $1,573 million for Quebec, where 49 per cent of the investment will be made. It would have been much more proper for a premier to study the file before following Mr. Lussier's advice.

—on every decision that comes from Ottawa. It has to be wrong. It must be, and those decisions have to be turned down.

Federalism is nevertheless a noble ideal from many standpoints. It requires of men and women the greatest virtues of heart and spirit: intelligence, respect, tolerance, fairness, sharing and peace. Federalism is a mutual insurance. In a federation, people support each other and share their wealth in order to get stronger while having total respect for one another. We believe that unity can exist in diversity and that harmony can emerge out of variety.

Now as regards equalization. It is true to say that in a federal structure there is mutual support and sharing because the structure is flexible and the same standard of living applies to everyone from coast to coast thanks to an equalization system which was established in 1967 and which is the foundation of our Canadian federalism. For Quebec, this system means a gain of $12 billion, that is $1.3 billion for 1980 only, or 15 per cent of the total revenues of the Quebec government. This represents an amount of $216 for each Quebec citizen. Of course since Quebec has more than 6 million inhabitants, we get close to 50 per cent of the total amount of money distributed under the equalization scheme. In Newfoundland, for example, the per capita amount is about $592 for a total of $340 million, while in Quebec, because there are 6 million people, we got $1,352 millions out of the equalization system. That is a kind of language quite unknown to our sovereignist opponents, the Parti Québécois.

At all levels, the Canadian government has contributed to the prosperity of Quebec and unless you are dealing with a hypocrite who refuses to face reality and prefers to spread feelings of linguistic division and resort to emotional arguments and sentimentality in order to serve objectives tinted with non-objective political partisanry, at the risk of being accused of all sorts of wrongs I say that federal policies have not only respected but even encouraged certain Quebec particularities which constitute a historical and fundamental wealth in the Canadian context. In that respect, let us emphasize that the Canadian government has greatly contributed to the cultural development of Quebec. Without the efforts of the Government of Canada in the field of culture, the French network of the CBC would have never seen the day. I am also thinking about grants to universities. Canada Council, the National Research Council of Canada, the National Film Board which has enabled many Quebec moviemakers to earn a living and proudly represent us abroad since the NFB has won world recognition.

Mr. Speaker, if Maurice Duplessis gave Quebec a flag, the federal government, through its organizations, supplied it with a tripod mast from which to fly it. Mr. Speaker, with regard to centralization those who would oppose our Canadian federal system accuse the Parliament in Ottawa of being a big centralizing and self-complacent brute. There again, Mr. Speaker, the opponents of our political system manipulate history to the extent where, listening to them, one would think Jacques Cartier came to America to achieve the independence of Quebec, while, two centuries later, Louis-Joseph Papineau advocated a type of sovereignty-association with the United States. No, Mr. Speaker, we cannot accept such shortcuts.

The PQ makes a big to-do over the costs of two levels of government: overlapping jurisdictions, excessive competition, duplication of services. It is true that there is a price to be paid for such dispersal of authority, but that is also the price of greater freedom and better protection and defence of our rights. Thanks of the division of legislative powers, and a judiciary that stands above the intervention of a unitary state, Canadians have been able to build a society founded on individual freedoms. Under the Canadian federal regime, no level of government has enough powers to give in to the temptation of totalitarianism. Decentralization of administrative, legislative and judicial powers is the best guarantee against the erosion of fundamental freedoms.

In fact, since the confederation of 1867, the Canadian government has allowed Quebec to develop and become sovereign in many fields. Is it not that same government which, year after year, in the face of the ever-growing economic dynamism of Canada, has opened a host of various jurisdictions to the provinces and transferred several tax powers to them? The truth is that, 30 years ago, the federal government collected two-thirds of all taxes levied by all governments, and the others, one third. Today, after 30 years, the opposite is true. The provincial governments collect two-thirds of taxes paid while the federal government receives only 30.8 per cent. But nobody talks about that and the federal government is still accused of working towards centralization. Decentralization did not occur only in the fiscal field, but it was also apparent in many other arrangements like pensions.

In 1963, by virtue of an agreement with the Canadian government, Quebec was allowed to implement its own pension scheme while the other nine provinces decided to stick with the Canada Pension Plan. In 1974, another agreement was made with the province of Quebec in the field of family allowances. In 1975, another one in the field of immigration. To put it another way, the federal regime in Canada is one of the most decentralized in the world. It bears comparison with Australia, for instance, where 77 per cent of taxes go to the federal government while 22 per cent go to other governments at the regional and municipal levels. In the United States, 55.8 per cent go to the federal government and 44.2 per cent go to the state and municipal governments. Therefore, we can see that in Canada, with two-thirds of taxes going to provincial and municipal administrations the centralization thesis is unfounded.

I think that the concept of the status quo, of the lack of evolution of the constitution and of the absence of amendments has been exploited by the advocates of sovereignty. I am referring, Mr. Speaker, to the statement made by the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) in Quebec on January 28. He stated then that there is only one premise in the present constitution, namely respect for the rights of men and women, respect for human rights, respect for the collective aspects of these rights. I am thinking, said the Prime Minister, about language and the rights of regions to exist. From this premise, it is possible to start from scratch if we want to amend the constitution. But since—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but I must inform him that his allotted time has expired. However, he can continue with the unanimous consent of the House.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Roy: I thank you, Mr. Speaker, as well as all my colleagues. I will conclude by saying that sovereignty-association is the option of all those who do not want to choose, those who want to be dependent and independent, sovereign and associate. It is the option of those who want both to undermine Canadian federalism and to keep all the advantages of currency, postal services and defence.

I will vote No to that option, Mr. Speaker, for the referendum brings us at the crossroads. We have to make a choice between a renewed federalism and the separation of Quebec. A renewed federalism remains the preferred constitutional option for the very large majority of Quebeckers, and the PQ project represents the sole obstacle to the realization of desirable changes. My dear friends, I will vote No on the referendum because I want to remain a red-blooded Lavallois, an optimistic Quebecker and a realistic Canadian.

[English]

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Mr. Speaker, you are to be congratulated on your appointment as Deputy Chairman of Committees of the Whole House, and would you convey on my behalf and on behalf of hon. members of this side of the House congratulations to Madam Speaker on her election as Speaker of this House. I think that was an excellent choice and it bodes well for the Thirty-second Parliament.

When I spoke on October 15 last in reply to the last Speech from the Throne, I outlined three basic principles on which I as a member of Parliament stand.

First, in my view there is only one kind of Canadian. There is no distinction between those who speak French as their principal language and those who speak English as their principal language. There is no distinction by reason of cultural or racial background. There is no distinction among Canadians on the basis of how long they or their ancestors have been in this land.

A Canadian who has recently obtained his citizenship from our citizenship courts and who has chosen to become a Canadian is every bit as much a Canadian and every bit as honoured as a Canadian as those who might trace their ancestry back to the United Empire Loyalists or back to the time of Champlain and Frontenac. We are all Canadians. There is no distinction between Canadians, and efforts by governments to make a distinction, to protect one group of Canadians against another or to favour one group of Canadians over another, are divisive and cause disunity in this country.

Second, it is my view that the least government is the best government. As I said in October, it strikes me that the more we attempt to solve people's problems by legislation, rules, statutes and administrative orders, the more problems we create. The cost of government in most cases more than eats up the advantage of any protection that rules prepared and promulgated by government are intended to provide. There is rarely any cost-benefit advantage to more government. It must be apparent to us all by now, looking at the growth of government over the last decade or so and the growth of disunity in Canada over the last decade or so, that there must be some definite relationship.

Lastly, as a member of Parliament I said that a member has a threefold obligation. The first is as a representative, and I will attempt in this Parliament, as I did in the last parliament, to convey the ideas of Mississauga South to this government and to represent the attitudes of the ministries to the people in my riding. My second obligation is as an ombudsman. Because of the mountains of legislation, regulation, red tape and so forth, every riding in this country needs a pretty active ombudsman. Indeed, if there were not members of Parliament acting as ombudsmen to their constituents, there would have been a bloody revolution because of the red tape we have.

Lastly, as legislators I deem it necessary that we look very closely at the legislation that is produced to make sure that that legislation, in attempting to solve problems, does not add to some of the economic concerns and the disunity we have in this country.

Today I want to expand on these three principles as they relate to my vision of Canada. What I am talking about today is in relation to the referendum in Quebec, because that referendum makes us face up to some of the concerns which runaway big government, refusal to treat Canadians as equals and refusal by government to think seriously about the consequences of how they legislate have created.

The concept of Canada dates back to before confederation. It dates back before the union of Upper Canada and Lower Canada into one legislative unit. Indeed, it dates back to the time when young Canadians of French origin first looked at their country and said: "We belong here, and we are not going to pay attention to the kings of France and their rules; we are going to become coureurs des bois, go out on our own and be Canadians". Two sons of Canada, Radisson and Groseilliers, formed the Company of Adventurers trading into Hudson Bay.

Today we see this Canada, a dominion from sea to sea, being torn apart. This threat demands that we as members of Parliament look at the concept of Canada, the vision of Canada of Sir John Macdonald, Laurier, Borden, King, Bennett, St. Laurent and, above all, the vision of John George Diefenbaker, an honoured son of this Parliament who just recently passed away.

In days past governments of Canada were prepared to lead. They were prepared to build railways, seaways, ports and transcontinental pipelines and airlines. They were prepared to inspire the private development of our farms and forests and to encourage immigrants to settle in this still pioneer country. This government approaches Canada without any vision. It takes a restrictive, bureaucratic, socialist-minded approach. It seeks to divide the pie into smaller and smaller pieces and more evenly rather than build a bigger pie. This government has become an irrelevant colossus approaching various parts of the country with offers of money. Money will never buy people to stay in Canada.

The concept of Canada is an emotional concept. Canada never made much economic sense in the first place. The natural economic divisions of this North American continent are north and south, not east and west. This government approaches Canada with a bookkeeping mentality. It approaches the people of Quebec and says: "Vote No and you will make more money". We Canadians have had bookkeeping long enough. If it was bookkeeping or economic advantage we were talking about and a referendum was held in western Canada, people in western Canada would vote Yes for sure.

I have had the good fortune to be able to travel in a large part of Canada, much of it by canoe. I have paddled the rivers young French Canadians travelled when they were exploring this country in the early days. Some of those young French Canadians settled in Ontario in Essex county and in Penetanguishene in Northern Ontario. They settled in Manitoba, Saskatchewan, British Columbia and Yukon. How can they now be conned into surrendering that heritage? This government has created the climate for the Lévesque con.

Mr. Cousineau: Come off it.

Mr. Blenkarn: It has never talked about the huge realizable potential of Canada. It has never sold Canada to people; on the contrary, it has used all its efforts to speak about what the individual can get out of the system rather than to encourage Canadians to explore and take advantage of the growth of Canada. It has talked about linguistic equality rather than the equality of heritage and opportunity. It has promoted a limited, parochial Canada. It is no wonder the petty provincial future so well sold by Lévesque sounds so good.

An hon. Member: To you, maybe.

Mr. Blenkarn: We have all been told of the potential of the tar sands. Some of us talk about the potential of the Yukon and the Mackenzie Valley. Here in the province of Ontario we have a great clay belt which runs from New Liskeard to the shores of James Bay, and from deep into Quebec nearly to the Manitoba border. It is a land with minerals of every kind and with an agricultural potential at least equal to the potential of the prairies. I have seen cabbages on Moose Factory Island that are as large as pumpkins. While I was waiting last September for a train at Fauquier, I saw a vegetable garden that made mine at home look sick.

• (1630)

Where are government programs for this frontier? This is a pioneer land in the frontier of the clay belt where French and English-speaking Canadians work shoulder to shoulder. Why are we not stirring up the blood of our young men and women, offering them the opportunity of cheap farm land in the frontier? This government talks about affirmative action programs. Yes, what we need is an affirmative action program, not an affirmative action program which tries to divide existing jobs but an affirmative action program which makes employment for young men and women by giving them an opportunity to open up this vast land of ours, to pioneer it. Where is the vision?

Why have we not relaxed controls on the development of heavy oil? Why have we not given businessmen encouragement instead of regulation? Why have we not given low tax rates to those who want to go into business in the north? Why have we not started some land grant programs? Why have we not continued John Diefenbaker's roads to resources program? Whether they are railroads or roads does not really matter. Why have we not done things such as we proposed in the last budget in December to allow farmers with surplus farm crops and waste forest products to turn those into industrial alcohol for fuel? Why are we not talking about Canada's future? Why are we not selling? Why are we still listening to the old arguments put forward by those who mine our raw resources? They thought that the only economic thing we can do with resources is to export them raw. That was the argument used in Ontario when we were exporting pulp logs, and George Drew stopped that. That was the argument used in Ontario when we were exporting pulp for newsprint, and Les Frost stopped that.

Where was this government when the province of Quebec wanted to force the extractors of raw asbestos to manufacture asbestos products in that province? We are still exporting logs from this country, we are still exporting iron ore by the boat load, and coal and oil seeds. What are we doing about forcing the processing of these resources? Where is our vision? Where is our direction to build the country?

This government has developed a case of "bureaucratitis". It regulates, it controls, it proposes more Crown corporations and it tells Canadians to tighten their belts instead of negotiating positive trade deals with countries such as Taiwan and South Africa, where there are great opportunities. The whole of the southern continent of Africa is controlled through merchandising arrangements in Johannesburg. What have we got there? We have one lonely trade officer attached to our embassy. What are we doing from that market to develop trade in Mozambique, Zimbabwe, Namibia, Lesotho and Trans-kei? We are doing nothing at all. Johannesburg is where these countries go to buy their goods and that is where we should be selling.

No wonder Canadians are discouraged. The other day in this city I spoke to just that kind of discouraged Canadian. Let me say to members on the other side that he was a very strong Liberal supporter.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): He has every reason to be discouraged.

Mr. Blenkarn: He said to me: "Don, they are going to vote Yes in Quebec. When they do, I am moving out." I asked him where he was going, and he said: "To the States, of course, because there is no future here in Canada."

An hon. Member: Who said it?

Mr. Blenkarn: I will tell you privately. He is very close to you too.

It hurts me deeply when people from my own constituency say: "I hope they secede and then maybe we will get rid of this government that way." Nobody would have talked that way ten or five years ago. All of us on this side are aware that a Yes vote in the province of Quebec on May 20 will likely stir up such emotion in the rest of Canada that the rest of Canada will say: "We have been rejected. If you want to reject us, go your own way."

This government is greatly responsible for that condition. The Saguenay river belongs to me; the beauty of the Gaspé is mine; the mines of Val D'Or are mine. They belong to me and they belong to my children, not just to the people who live in the province of Quebec. The Churchill river and the fjords of Labrador, the Hibernian oil wells and even the park at Signal Hill are mine. They do not just belong to somebody who calls himself a Newfoundlander.

My wife comes from British Columbia. I obtained the right to practice law in British Columbia. I suppose if we are going to have a great breakup of Canada, I could go to British Columbia and say that I have certain rights and privileges there. But I say to you, sir, that the salmon in the Fraser river belong to me as a Canadian. The towering Douglas firs in the MacMillan park on the road to Alberni belong to me as a Canadian and they belong to my children. They belong to us all as Canadians. Someone spoke about Alberta. Yes, the tar sands are mine, and so is what is left of the oil in Leduc. They do not just belong to those people who because of where they happen to be living today call themselves Albertans. The same thing can be said for the wheat and potash and the beauty of the Interlake region in Manitoba and Saskatchewan.

To those wo do not come from Ontario, I say that the problems we have in our auto plants in Windsor are theirs too. So is the power of Pickering, the Great Lakes waters, the clay belt and all of the resources we have. All this is Canada and it belongs to all of us as Canadians. I want to say, sir, that no petty provincial politician or individual has the right by referendum or challenge to take away from me or my children or from my constituents in Mississauga our rights in Canada. We are Canadians, and no reconstituted or renegotiated confederation or realignment of the powers of provincial legislatures or this national government can in any way reduce or affect my rights as a Canadian or my children's rights and heritage as Canadians to enjoy all of Canada.

The regionalisms and parochialisms in Canada did not exist 16 or 17 years ago. They have only developed since this government and its predecessor government took office after the 1963 election.

This government has attempted to maintain national unity by inventing a "newspeak". In this newspeak, a No vote means yes, we want to have a renewed confederation, and a Yes vote means no, we do not. Meanwhile, this government has fomented controversy among Canadians. It uses funds from secretary of state grants and other departments to fund particularized interests. In the name of representation, particularly in the last ten years, it has caused a fragmentation of this nation that, I am afraid, is likely to destroy the heritage of my children and my constituents.

This has allowed René Lévesque, whose little vision is limited to the narrow borders of Quebec, to speak to the hearts of Quebeckers in his referendum. Liberals—the hon. member for Laval (Mr. Roy) was here a moment ago speaking in almost the same way—campaigning on the No vote in that province do not speak to the heart. They speak about how much boodle Quebec can get out of confederation and about the economic benefits of being associated with the Anglos. With a $16 billion deficit on fiscal account, there is not much boodle left. If Quebeckers vote Yes on May 20, it will be by reason of the heart; and if they vote No on May 20, also it will have to be by reason of the heart.

● (1640)

Within days of winning the election in February, this government went about creating one controversy after another. It stopped work on a uranium refinery for Eldorado Nuclear in Port Hope, just when the people of Port Hope were suffering from a devastating flood. The Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin) made the suggestion that maybe he would not bother with the Ridley Island port facility at Prince Rupert, even though that facility is absolutely necessary for expanded grain, coal and sulphur shipments. The Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde), that wonderful minister—the "minister of national unity" one could call him—immediately started a confrontation with Alberta and Saskatchewan. When it came to the Syncrude matter, he did not even bother to consult his own partners in that agreement but proceeded to cancel it.

We heard the hon. member for Sudbury (Mr. Frith) seconding the Speech from the Throne. He seems to have the disease of this government. In his maiden speech, what did he do? He picked a fight with the hon. Bette Stephenson, the minister of education in the province of Ontario, on a matter which does not affect his riding of Sudbury at all. It is a matter of provincial jurisdiction and in any event affects only the riding of Simcoe North.

I would like members of the House to remember who said, "Why should I sell your wheat?" We must remember who put French language television in Vancouver over the objections of members of his own party, even though there were no French-speaking viewers.

An hon. Member: Not true.

Mr. Blenkarn: Who imposed metrication on all sorts of Canadians without even a "yes" from the House of Commons? Which government forced Ontario into medicare despite the objection that the delivery of health service is clearly a provincial responsibility?

An hon. Member: Rubbish.

Mr. Blenkarn: Remember, this is the government that fomented endless wrangling at one dominion-provincial conference after another, so that in matters of legislative jurisdiction Canadians are faced with duplication and triplication. This is the government that refused to pay attention to the representations of the city of Montreal and the city of Toronto on matters of urban renewal and partially caused the problems we face in the Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation. This is the government whose former minister of finance, now the Minister of Justice and Minister of State for Social Development (Mr. Chrétien), otherwise known as the "minister of No" in this government, in a budget supposedly to stimulate the economy, jumped in with both feet on provincial sales tax collection.

When western Canadians see a bright future in the value of their resources on international markets, this government thumps them. When Atlantic Canada tries to get ahead by capitalizing on offshore resources, this government tries to welfare it to death. When the province of Quebec legitimately wants to take over cultural activities and communications, this government is not prepared to agree and holds a tight rein on their ambitions. Sometimes this government is not prepared — indeed, always not prepared — to enter into the real problems of confederation. I emphasize that this government is not prepared to step in on the problem of national unity because it will not step in on laws which prevent me as a Canadian from buying a farm in the province of Prince Edward Island or in the province of Saskatchewan. It will not step in and allow me as a Canadian to work as a construction worker in the province of Quebec. It will not do anything for me if I happen to want to export milk, chickens, eggs or what have you from one province to another. It imagines that as long as I am capable of paying a parking fine in English, it has done all it has to do an all that is necessary.

It is desperately necessary that the Government of Canada changes its direction, develops the vision of a Canada for all Canadians, gives Canadians a sense of belonging and a sense of freedom to develop a pioneering attitude, and gives Canadians a chance to own and create on their own. It is only with such a unifying attitude that the vision which created this dominion from sea to sea, the vision that inspired Laurier to say that the century belongs to Canada, and the vision that inspired Bennett to say that he would blast his way to the markets of the world, can be realized. It is only with vision, hope, the aspirations and the dreams of a great Canada, the vision of John Diefenbaker, that we can really make this country one united Canada.

[Translation]

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa-Vanier): Mr. Speaker, will you be so kind as to extend my sincere congratulations to Mrs. Sauvé for her appointment to her high position. I am all the prouder that you, the hon. member for Glengarry-Prescott-Russell, are in the chair today. I shall limit the questions I am going to deal with today to two subjects, through a lack of time.

[English]

I would love to have the occasion to answer some of the statements made by the hon. member for Mississauga South (Mr. Blenkarn). It appears to me, if I heard him properly, that he would even object to the people of Chicoutimi having television in English. I do not see the argument he is trying to make, except to say, if I repeat what he said correctly, that he said there were no French-speaking people in Vancouver. There are as many French-speaking people in Vancouver as there are English-speaking people in Quebec City, so he can take it from there.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Gauthier: The other statement he made, which I thought was a rather low blow, was to blame the seconder of the motion for making a comment on the Penetanguishene school question and picking a fight, as he said, with Mrs. Stephenson. I would like him to address himself as a Canadian to the following question: Is there a local fight in Penetanguishene, or is it a fight for the existence of a people? The issue is French-speaking Ontarians who want a school in Penetanguishene, not Mrs. Stephenson or the hon. member's statements.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, I could use up almost entirely the 20 minutes allotted to me to refute the remarks made by my colleague, the hon. member for Mississauga South, but I would waste my time in the exercise and probably my patience. First of all, Mr. Speaker, I should like to thank my constituents of Ottawa-Vanier who re-elected me for a fourth mandate in less than seven years.

Four elections in seven years, that means the participation of a great many people, but I have agreed to represent them and I agree, as I have previously done, to represent them to the best of my ability and to present their views as objectively and correctly as I possibly can.

If there is a lot of talk in this debate about the Quebec referendum, it is because all the members of the House and all Canadians are concerned about the referendum process which involves, whether we like it or not, the democratic right to self-determination. Personally, I live in Ontario, and my country is Canada where French and English are the official languages. As I said, I live in Ontario where English is the only official language. I have received from my parents a language and a culture which are not those of the majority in the province of Ontario. Some 500,000 Canadians of French descent in Ontario, people like me and you, Mr. Speaker, have worked very hard to keep their cultural and linguistic heritage. We pursue this Canadian dream of a united Canada. Yet, we are living a constant nightmare, that of assimilation. The frustations, and they are many, of which my Quebec cousins speak, we, of the Francophone minority outside Quebec, have felt them a hundredfold.

How much easier it would be for me to fight for the federalist thesis if the two official languages of my country were also the two official languages of my province! But such is not the case. If I am a federalist, and that I am, right through and through, as are also the million French-speaking Canadians who live outside Quebec, it is strictly because the federal government was the entity, at times the only one, which came to my rescue, supported me and gave me the services I needed to survive.

Earlier, the hon. member for Mississauga South mentioned the Secretary of State who spent money in support of those various groups. I am one of those. The Francophone minorities benefit from federalism, through the financial assistance they get from the Secretary of State in support of their social and cultural projects. The Official Languages Act of the federal government has allowed me, for almost 20 years now, to express myself in my own tongue, to make myself understood by my colleagues in this House of Commons. Outside the House, Canada, the Canadian government, have also agreed to serve the Canadian people in either French or English. In no small measure, the support needed for the education of the minorities was given and at times granted only by the federal government through grants and financial assistance to the education of the two official languages minority groups. The truth of the matter is that those groups receive considerable help from the federal government. I think it is quite normal that my country should help me, in the province where I live, when there is need for it, if we believe and wish that Canada exist as a separate entity, one that differs from the United States or any other state.

Mr. Speaker, it is sometimes despite the provinces that Francophone minorities have survived. This is why it is not unfair to say that had it not been for the role of the federal government you and I, Mr. Speaker, would have been assimilated. Yet we have made some gains, we have acquired things and in Ontario today, thank God, we can send our children to French schools, as least at the elementary levels.

At the secondary level there are still a few snags and problems. They will be ironed out I guess, some day, and I hope soon in order to enable the people of Penetanguishene, Midland and Lafontaine to send their children to a homogeneous French secondary school. It is at the secondary level that things seem to drag. This is the area in which we have had the main disputes over the last ten to 12 years. It is no fault of the federal government because it is a matter of provincial jurisdiction as has been stated earlier so rightly by the hon. member for Mississauga. But the provinces make up Canada. And if there are two official languages in Canada, how come I am denied the right to exist at the provincial level? This is something I cannot understand. So, let us be logical and say to the provinces: You must at least recognize the simplest argument of all, that of the two founding peoples, and grant to English-speaking Canadians in Quebec and French-speaking Canadians outside Quebec the right to the most basic services, mainly education, health services, and legal services.

I admit there has been some improvement, a lot of improvement because you only have to look at the number of schools in the past ten years which total nearly a hundred in Ontario. With respect to legal services, you can easily argue your case in French in criminal court today, at least since January 1 of this year. But in civil courts English alone is still being used. As for health services, let us be honest, if you do not live in Ottawa, health services in French are nearly non-existent in Ontario. So those are the challenges to be taken up. Those are not basically difficult problems to solve but you need to have the will and the capacity to do it. And the federal government has supported linguistic minorities where it was needed, at the proper time, with its funds and grants.

As I said earlier, Mr. Speaker, it would have been so much easier to talk about federalism if Ontario had gone with the two official languages of this country. But it was premier Bill Davis himself who torpedoed Bill 89 introduced by my provincial counterpart, Albert Roy, a little over a year ago when he opposed it against a unanimous legislature. He said no to Mr. Roy's bill which was to have given French equal status with English in Ontario.

I wonder how Mr. Davis can now substantiate, for the benefit of his own people in Ontario and for the Canadian people as a whole, the position he expressed in February, 1979, when he said he was prepared to see the language rights entrenched in the constitution. There again I am confused. I cannot understand that French should be refused legal status, that I, a French-speaking Canadian living in Ontario, cannot be allowed to make out in French strictly personal documents such as a will. That seemed to me absolutely elementary. But in Ontario, a will must be registered in English. So I ask myself this question: Am I a first-class citizen? That is what I want to be able to say, what I want to become, what I want to be. That is no big thing. It is important that the provinces, this parochial attitude the hon. member for Mississauga South was talking about and which concerns us today—

• (1650)

[English]

The parochialism that the hon. member was talking about, that concern with regionalism or the community of communities idea that exists today which was brought forth by some advisers to the former prime minister of this country, presents in my view a very difficult situation because, as a minority in such a situation, I am in conflict. I become the hostage.

[Translation]

The hostage in that game between the Francophone majority in Quebec and the Anglophone majority in Canada. I find it difficult to explain that I do not want to be held hostage in the bargainings between Canada's English-speaking majority and Quebec's French-speaking majority. I mentioned it earlier. I do not believe that any Canadian will ever agree to be an hostage in such a debate.

But that is what I am because, as you will recall, when Mr. Lévesque spoke about the right to education two years ago he said to the other premiers: we are going to establish reciprocity. Reciprocity means that if you recognize in your province the right to a French education, we will recognize the right to an English education. And they said: no, this is not Canada. Canada stands for respect, generosity, recognition of the existence of two founding peoples, the French-speaking and the English-speaking peoples. This is the formula. Once again, Mr. Speaker, I wish to make something clear. Let us not kid ourselves. As proposed by the Péquistes, sovereignty-association does not imply negotiation by a long shot. It implies independence.

Where is the linguistic minority in all this? On one hand, I cannot accept the status quo because it would mean assimilation. And as I have already said, this is a real nightmare for me. The one million Francophones outside Quebec are being assimilated at a fantastic speed. In 1971, 27 per cent of Francophones were assimilated. This means that the day will come when there will be no question of separating Canada because it will already have been divided into two groups, a balkanization of Francophones in Quebec and a balkanization of Anglophones in the rest of Canada. Should this happen, there will not be many cultural, social and linguistic ties between the two groups. We would talk about separating the two entities. I do not know. In such a case, I would be the loser, the Francophones outside Quebec would have to pay, and I find this unacceptable. This is what status quo means.

What Mr. Lévesque is proposing, that is independence for Quebec, would have the same results because who knows what would happen to the linguistic minorities both in Quebec and in the rest of Canada once Quebec is divided from the rest of the country? If we are not willing to be more generous than we are now in Canada in 1980, how can anyone say that the minorities will be treated better in a divided country? I say that things cannot be better and can be much worse. Indeed, in such a case, Canadians like myself who were born in Ontario and have lived all our lives in this province may become the Palestinians of North America, people without a country. This is a threat which haunts, scares and pains us because we want Canada to exist, we want Canada to improve, and most of all, we want a renewal of Canada which would take into account all the cultural, linguistic, social and economic realities. This is also very important, but I must tell my dear colleague from Mississauga South that there is no Quebecker and certainly no Franco-Ontarian who will be impressed by his economic arguments. The decision made on May 20 will be an emotional one. I hope it will be made in full knowledge of all aspects of the issue because no one will convince the population, at least not myself, by talking about money. I have never been convinced by this factor and I shall certainly not be this time. If strength lies in the challenge, the will to act and the will—

● (1700)

[English]

I agree; it is exactly what the hon. member said—not in those terms; but I think you understood at least that point in your speech, sir.

Mr. Blenkarn: It is exactly what I said. You cannot talk about money; you have to talk about heart.

Mr. Gauthier: That is exactly what I am doing.

[Translation]

If strength lies in the challenge, the will to act imperiously, Franco-Ontarians showed they were capable of overcoming obstacles, of establishing the cultural, economic and social institutions they required and desired. Mr. Speaker, time is lacking today for a complete review, but you will remember the Richelieu Club, l'Union du Canada, the newspaper Le Droit, are all institutions created and supported by us and which have defended us. And today, I can state that in that Canadian coexistence experience, we succeeded in building co-operation with our English-speaking colleagues in the country, a federation which in my view compares with any other nation, any other political system around the world. I am proud of it, and I am so much happier with it that I am convinced we can soon sit around a table and negotiate a constitutional renewal that will respect not only the basic rights of the individual, but also linguistic rights across Canada. And the undertaking in February last by five provinces, including my own province of Ontario, New Brunswick, Saskatchewan, Newfoundland and Prince Edward Island to enshrine linguistic rights in the Canadian constitution is a step forward. Of course, there remains to convince Alberta, British Columbia, Manitoba, Nova Scotia and Quebec. Yes, Quebec and why? Probably because the current PQ government did not and will not understand what Canada is all about. I tell them exactly what I suggested in the beginning, they do not want Canada, they are committed to its failure. When they refer to sovereignty-association, the inference to independence is easily visible. We are all involved here in an irreversible movement toward change, a constitutional change for the better, hopefully. We will see about this, Mr. Speaker. It is not easy to speak as I do now, because Quebeckers who will be looking at me will say: of course he is from Ottawa-Vanier, Ontario; this explains his views. Well, here in Canada I am still confident that my children, my family, my friends, my fellow Ontarians and Canadians are ready today, after 113 years, to renegotiate and establish a constitution that will respect my personal expectations and those like me who live in a minority situation.

Mr. Speaker, the position of this government is that everything is negotiable except the federative formula and the enshrinement of fundamental individual and linguistic rights. The federal government is ready to enter into negotiations in order to strengthen the Canadian federation. I feel it is important that we federal members of Parliament ought to expect before the end of this year a constitutional conference where the heads of the provinces making up this country will agree publicly on any trade-off they want, be it on natural resources, on manpower and its mobility, on economic, cultural or linguistic matters; but it is important that there be a federal-provincial conference dealing essentially with the renewal of this country, this Canada of ours, this Canada we want to maintain, this Canada which is ours and which we owe to ourselves to defend with all our energy. There is a real threat, Mr. Speaker, and I am talking about the rampant regionalistic tendencies which lead the parts to think they are more important than the whole. That threat explains why the "I" is more prevalent than the "we". That is because today, when people have problems, they tend to scowl, to withdraw into themselves and to build walls around themselves which is, I imagine, a normal and humanly understandable reaction. It is normal, humanly speaking, that when a man feels insecure, he tries to isolate himself.

● (1710)

But I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that if that reaction is allowed to persist it will cause serious damage to the fabric of this country and that is why I ask so seriously and with such insistence this Parliament to urge the present government to call a federal-provincial conference next fall to ask the most basic question: Are you for or against the thesis of two founding peoples? Yes or no? We would see then how the provinces perceive the whole issue. Then we would go on to constitutional amendments because they are at the roots of the present debate. If I am a second-class citizen in Ontario, I want to know it and I want to know it clearly. I do not think that the present government can tell me clearly, because it cannot renege its commitments.

[English]

Does the hon. member opposite want the floor?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. If hon. members have anything to say in this House, they must address the Chair.

[Translation]

Mr. Gauthier: Mr. Speaker, I would like to continue in the same vein but I think I have made the point I wanted to make, namely that we cannot skip stages. The referendum process skips the stage of honest and real negotiation. The present statu quo skips the stage of negotiation. I seriously think that when a partner skips stages and the other is hesitant, somebody must intervene, somebody must provide real leadership at the Canadian level. The gap is deepening, perhaps it is becoming impassable, I do not know but I certainly hope not. Points of contact are overloaded, fuses may blow. I leave the economic arguments to others. Others will also tell you that Canada has succeeded despite its weaknesses and its mistakes. The only thing I want to do is to invite you, my Quebec cousins, to think seriously before deciding, and to remember those in the forefront, the foot soldiers, your cousins in the rest of Canada. We know that Canada must be greater, that it must be better for all of us, for our children.

Mr. Speaker, I would not want to return to my seat without speaking of another issue. I do not know how much time I have left, but I would like to speak on a subject of great interest to me and which concerns federal civil servants. It is a topic with which my colleague from Nepean-Carleton is familiar, that is the need to implement a development and promotion policy.

[English]

I refer to the latest in a series of documents, the more recent one being the Auditor General's report. I see the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Johnston) is here, and maybe I should address myself to that question very briefly. I believe that it has been possibly a mistake on the part of politicians to single out public servants as being either inefficient or ineffective. The general consensus, from what I have gathered after looking at the subject for about seven or eight years, is that indeed we have some difficulties in the administration of this country. But these are mostly because of a lack of a philosophy of management. In this instance I refer hon. members to the D'Avignon report which makes a good case for that.

There is the lack of a global approach in training and development of our personnel as senior managers, and a need for a policy of management so that these managers know exactly what this House of Commons wants and expects of them. Instead of bashing the heads of the majority of public servants, maybe we should look at creating, discussing, and putting in place a policy of training and development for public servants, addressed to better efficiency and to more effective programs. I would like to discuss this matter at length, but I will keep my remarks for another time. I thank hon. members for their attention.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 40, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles)—Veterans Affairs—Prorata pensions for widows of veterans on disability pension; the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mr. Waddell)—Energy—Export of natural gas to United States.

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mrs. Côté for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session.

Mr. David Kilgour (Edmonton-Strathcona): Mr. Speaker, it is an honour to participate in this throne speech debate, and I am deeply grateful to the electors of Edmonton-Strathcona for the opportunity to do so. Permit me to thank each one of those voters again for electing me for the second time.

[Translation]

If I may, I would also like to congratulate Madam Speaker in assuming her new responsibilities in the House. Her qualities, her courage and her common sense in matters related to parliamentary democracy are well known and quite appreciated everywhere in the House.

[English]

In my view the throne speech shows why this government clearly needs a whole new set of cliches as Canada enters the 1980s. To illustrate, let me give two representative examples. My first quote reads: "Canadians expect much of this Parliament". This is self-evident sophistry. Approximately seven out of ten Canadians in fully 62 per cent of the land mass of Canada did not elect a single Liberal member of Parliament. Indeed, in parts of Canada there is probably no greater political insult than to call someone a Trudeau Liberal.

My second excerpt reads—and it refers to western members "You also have an extra responsibility in the present circumstances to represent the nation to your constituents".

This last quote is taken from part V of the Speech from the Throne entitled "An Active Foreign Policy". Why is that? One infers that when the government says nation in this context it really means the national government, and is calling upon western members of Parliament to convey its message to our constituents. But it has done nothing since February 18 on interest rates, the Prince Rupert port development, metrification, twinning both the CNR and western members of Parliament, and the Olympic games, all of which has not demonstrated anything other than Mr. Trudeau's fondness for kicking the west in the teeth.

On the very important energy question, the throne speech speaks of security of energy supply while making hostile gestures at everyone in the oil industry, PetroCan excepted, which now employs directly about one in three Albertans. Domestic security and self-sufficiency in energy have been harmed by virtually everything the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde) has said or done since his appointment. I include in that, of course, his expressed joy here, the other day that Canadians will pay more than world prices for Mexican oil but no longer will pay world prices for synthetic oil from Fort McMurray.

Does he think that such a policy will encourage the proposed Alsands and Cold Lake plants to proceed? Does he think his policy will help Canada's balance of payments or Canadian jobs in both eastern and western Canada? The answer is no, Mr. Speaker. At the back of western minds, and coming to the forefront, is the conviction that there is no one effective to speak for the west within the cabinet. The people of the west are convinced that the only power lies in central Canada, supported by a government that won its majority—albeit narrowly—in central Canada by campaigning on the backs of western Canadians.

A great many westerners were shocked by the election results and, in my opinion, are becoming increasingly bitter as those results are beginning to bear bitter fruit. They see the federal government once again turning its guns, not its ear, to the west. This is not new. Under successive Liberal governments the western promise has been thwarted, time and time again, by policies that either neglected or exploited the west. The attitude of those opposite has always been regarded as a flaunting of power. During 11 years of government under the present leader, westerners have felt that a highly centralized national policy was promoted which left little room for diversity, and resulted in disparity of social and economic benefits. In my opinion, the inequality of sacrifice, and the policy of inequality, westerners feel have contributed to the unhappiness of French Canadians, maritimers and westerners.

Why is it that the Liberals were unable to command enough support to elect a single member between the Red River valley and the Pacific, the 49th parallel and the Arctic? Westerners voted, quite simply, for their survival. They voted against the Liberal party which is identified with policies favouring only two provinces in this dominion.

Perhaps anyone who is not a westerner can really understand the kind of helpless anger we have felt as we have tried and failed to get a hearing for our unique regional perspective. Perhaps no one has really tried to understand. Perhaps our problems and concerns that seem particularly important do not even seem interesting to the rest of Canada. This seems to be the case. There appears to be a general public ignorance regarding the west's situation. We had better begin educating ourselves immediately.

Since the implementation of Sir John A. Macdonald's national policy in the 1870s, the west has been viewed as a source of raw materials and markets for central Canada. For generations westerners watched wealth move from west to east. The west was not even able to get control of its resources until we seized them from the Mackenzie King government in the 1930s.

The 1947 oil boom, caused by the finding of oil at Leduc, ignited a boom in one province in western Canada. In 1972 the OPEC countries began to increase the price of oil. Those of us in Alberta thought that after 100 years wealth would start to flow in our direction, but central Canada thought otherwise. The Trudeau government slapped an export tax on crude oil in order to subsidize eastern industry which was buying expensive overseas oil. Albertans were furious. I cannot stress too strongly that that fury has not diminished since February 18. Export taxes have never been levied on Ontario manufactured goods, gold production, electricity or anything, in order to subsidize westerners. And so, as every member here knows, the familiar issue of natural resources control, and oil pricing, began.

When we talk about dissatisfaction, it is more than just that issue. It is freight rates, industry, agriculture, banking, and culture. Take one example, the hog industry. I think this is symbolic. Ontario and Quebec import feed grains from the prairies on heavily subsidized freight rates, then create a feeding and packing house industry, pushing the prairie feed into locally raised animals and transferring the lucrative end of the business away from the prairie provinces. In part, because of federal feed freight assistance, figures show that it is cheaper to ship 880 pounds of barley off the prairies than 160 pounds of frozen pork. This is incredible to me. This enables feed-deficient provinces to raise hogs and slaughter them at the expense of the Canadian taxpayer in general and of the western hog industry in particular. This is certainly not the case where market forces set the pattern of production. For example, the state of Iowa, with less than 2 per cent of the American population, grows and slaughters more hogs than any other state simply because it has the best corn supply.

Take grain transportation. Wheat Board officials admit they are losing about $2 million per day in potential wheat sales because they cannot deliver the goods. Canada, once the breadbasket of the world, has slipped to fifth or sixth place as a wheat exporter. The main reason that Canada has lost command of the world wheat trade is that our system of grain storage and transportation has decayed to the point where it no longer works.

As western farmers and businessmen know, the problem is not just with railway cars. There are the farmers, and the railways, and the grain elevators, and the port terminals, and the ships—and they all have to mesh together.

To relieve the backlog of grain in western Canada, a proposal was put forward by the Clark government to build a terminal and port facilities at Prince Rupert. Since the election, the present government has seemingly hesitated to commit funds for the Prince Rupert project. Does this show concern for one of the west's most pressing problems? I think not.

Last month, when the trade ministers of the four western provinces met in Calgary, the conclusion was unanimously arrived at that the west's trading future lay not in eastern Canada but around the Pacific rim and towards the south. I understand that an American trade negotiator told the ministers that their interests had been neglected in the trade talks between Canada and the U.S. because Canadian federal negotiators put forward eastern trade objectives that fundamentally conflicted with those of the west.

As Canada goes through a period of political uncertainty and economic difficulty, will the west be lured towards ever-closer trading ties with the U.S.? Not if there are positive attitudes in Ottawa and central Canada regarding western concerns like tariffs and freight rates. The key word is "if".

Things, including opinion, are changing very fast in the west. Western oil has even attracted the attention of Canada's five major banks, which traditionally have not stirred to invest heavily in western energy development. Why is this so? The west has what the rest of Canada, and much of the world, want. That, of course, means oil and gas, and eventually more petrochemical derivatives. It means forest products and beef and grains. It includes metals and potash, hydroelectric power, and access to the north and the Pacific rim.

The west wants to use the new value of its commodities to pay the ticket for an old western dream—a more stable, more diversified and prosperous economy, and more say in national policymaking. Much will depend on the tenor of future federal-provincial negotiations. The increasing importance of western Canada in the economy of the nation requires national policies framed to support the growth and diversification of the regional economy. Nowhere is this more true, of course, than in the matter of energy. Energy is not an economic portfolio of government any more. It is a political portfolio. As we all know, it was one of the major issues in the election. As we all have witnessed, central Canada still fields the big political battalions.

If a new Canadian price for oil is to be established, it must be negotiated with the government of Alberta which, over the past six years, has forgone production revenues of about $17 billion by selling its oil and gas to Canadians instead of on the world market.

The chairman of the Canadian Petroleum Association, in a Toronto speech last month, reiterated the industry estimate that $200 billion will be required to attain energy self-sufficiency by 1990. A blended price, meaning a low price for current oil stocks, is not going to help raise that amount of capital. Apparently this government is not very interested in attaining the goal of energy self-sufficiency, judging by the lack of any serious reference to it in the throne speech.

Under the present regime, the gap between Canadian and world prices keeps getting wider. Ottawa will continue to subsidize more and more expensive imported oil. Canada will remain the only industrialized country to use national taxes to subsidize gasoline for automobiles. In fact the government currently pays more per barrel in taxpayer subsidy to multinationals which import oil into Canada than for the full price per barrel we pay for oil produced in Canada. This is absolutely incredible.

The British journal, The Economist, notes that Canada has "the most distorted cheap energy policies in the developed world". It labels Canada "internationally immature" in this regard.

The government's energy policy, and the process by which it implements it, poses the greatest test of its claim to being a national government. Let the government stand warned; there is no room in Canada today for confrontation politics and crude majority rule. We must live together by agreement, by consensus, or we will not live together at all.

The west believes it has borne the burden of unity for a long time. This burden will only lighten if the region can secure policies more favourable to itself. If the government refused to accommodate the west's interest, the region may lay claim, on its own behalf, to a broader range of powers and control.

In short, the west today is in a state of latent rebellion. In some ways westerners and Quebeckers have had similar experiences with central Canada. We should note John Calhoun's insight into the weakness of federative states which delegate powers to a central authority, namely, that the regions must then have institutional safeguards against the unfair exercise of the central power. As we are all aware at this particular time in Canada's history, there must be a balancing and compromising of interests, especially regional interests, leading to a conviction in all parts of Canada that the rights of people in each region have been respected.

There is a need in the rest of the country to see western goals in proper perspective. It should be remembered that development of the western provinces will first benefit the people who live there but that this benefit will spread to other parts of the country. Central Canada should take stock of its own resources, expertise, and, most important, its traditional complacency at being the hub of the nation's financial and industrial activity. It should keep in mind—and no one should know this better than hon. members from the maritime provinces—that these laurels were not so much earned as they were an accident of colonization, geography, and proximity to a similar series of historical events and industrialization in the northeastern United States. For their part, westerners should try to unlearn what generation after generation learned at their fathers' knees—that our political federation has fallen short.

In conclusion, I believe that as Canadians we should strive for a new initiative for national existence. As individuals, we should seek to return to the old ethics of our forebears—to the fundamentals of teaching right and wrong, to preaching responsibilities rather than rights and duty rather than gratification. Thus armed with the moral fortitude of our ancestors and with a renewed will to go on building together, we shall indeed meet and overcome the challenges ahead for the building of this land.

[Translation]

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I would like to say a few words about the Quebec referendum. I have shown in my speech up to now, I hope, that we should indeed amend our constitution. My region has been, is and will be asking for that. However, I beg my fellow citizens from Quebec to vote No on May 20 next. Should they separate from us, as their present premier would have it, it would be quite sad for the remainder of Canada.

The proposals which have just been disclosed by Mr. Ryan are largely acceptable, I think, to most people in western Canada. For example, I note that almost all premiers who stated their views on the Senate issue are generally in favour of the over-all proposals. The leader of our party, Mr. Clark, and all my colleagues are ready to alter radically our present federalist system. However, on behalf of the 800,000 Canadians who recently delivered a petition to Quebeckers and the thousands of others who would have liked but were unable to do so, I urge you to vote No in the forthcoming referendum.

[English]

Mr. John McDermid (Brampton-Georgetown): Mr. Speaker, may I at the outset congratulate Madam Sauvé on her election to the high office of Speaker. I wish her all the best. To you, madam, and to your colleagues who share the responsibilities of the chair, I express my best wishes also.

I represent an urban riding with some rural areas in it. It is the third largest riding in Canada, with a population of some 160,000, and 87,000 eligible voters. To them I should like to say "thank you" for re-electing me to the House. Now that the battle of the election is over I shall try to justify their confidence and represent them all here in this chamber.

Our area is a fast growing one, and before I deal with some of the problems we are experiencing there I should like briefly to mention some of the exciting things which are happening.

The new CN Bramport, where the containers will be shipped and the trains assembled, will be officially opened within the next few days. I am looking forward to taking part in that ceremony. This project will, in itself, attract a great deal of industry to our area. As late as last Friday the Caterpillar Company announced it had purchased 200 acres in our community for the purpose of establishing a manufacturing plant, and we are very pleased.

Some serious problems have arisen in the urban area which I represent. One which I should like to discuss today has to do with the Assisted Home Ownership Program, a program which was brought into being some five years ago by a Liberal government. With a great deal of respect, I cannot believe that sufficient thought was given to it in advance. As to the theory behind the program, I guess one might say it made a lot of sense—a down payment of $99 and two hundred or so dollars a month in payments at an interest rate of 8 per cent, an out and out grant, and monthly cheques coming in which, after five years, would turn into a second mortgage at current interest rates. The theory behind this, of course, was that over a five year period salaries would increase and people would be better able to afford a first and second mortgage at current interest rates.

Well, the five-year term is up. In my community we have 4,000 such units, and there are 16,000 such units in the region of Peel which is covered by four federal ridings. Madam Speaker, four out of ten units are vacant, with people moving out in the middle of the night because they are looking at mortgages at an interest rate of 17 per cent, plus second mortgages at current interest rates which are running at 20 per cent and 21 per cent. They cannot handle it, and right now they find themselves in a bind. We are hearing all kinds of platitudes from the other side of the House, but no answers to the problem.

For whatever reason, CMHC is giving people quit claims, not because they could not handle the financial burden within the first five years but so that they would not upset the political boat. Those people have received the grant. Those people have received the AHOP cheques. Every month they come in from CMHC, but they have vacated their properties. Where have they gone? They have moved down the street and, in some instances, right across the road from the development to private homes. They have not paid the government back the money they owe because the government gave them a quit claim. Do hon. members know what they told me? They told me they took the cheques the government sent them every month and saved that money for down payments!

● (1740)

The ones who are left in the AHOP homes today are the ones who are suffering. They are the ones who have stayed and tried to make it work. They are the ones who have not moved out in the middle of the night. They are the ones who have not asked for quit claims. They have tried to make homes for their families. Are they getting any help? Are they getting any encouragement? No. CMHC has moved in now, and it is selling the units which these people bought for, say, $43,000, $44,000 or $45,000, for $33,000, $34,000 or $35,000.

Automatically these people who were trying to make homes for themselves find their homes devalued by $10,000. They have first mortgages at 17 per cent coming up, and second mortgages of whatever CMHC sets them at, but the agreement says "current rates" which are 20 per cent, and what is the government doing to help? Nothing.

We hear all kinds of statements from the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Cosgrove) that he has four or five proposals before him. He received one from our commissioner of social services in Brampton, which was very, very close to the Progressive Conservative mortgage and property tax credit program. He thought that was an excellent program. It just had a different name on it. He has had three or four others presented to him as well, and he thinks they are grand too. However, then we heard from the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) that he cannot do anything to help these people. Oh, he has talked about perhaps increasing the amortization period from 25 to 40 or 50 years so that the payments are not quite as high. That is a slight help, but it is not good enough.

Today I am speaking on behalf of those people who have stayed in the AHOP homes, whether they be high rise or townhouse developments, and I am asking the government, through CMHC, to come in and take a look at the situation into which it put these people. I am asking the government to give these people some genuine help. I have met with many of the condominium associations, and one thing which is concerning them greatly is this AHOP second mortgage at current interest rates. I am asking the government today to consider putting the AHOP second mortgage payback on a much longer basis; rather than five years, it should be extended to ten years. I am also asking the government to waive the interest on that second mortgage. I do not believe in giveaways, but the reason I am asking for that is that these people were sucked into this program. They were enticed into this program.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): They were conned.

Mr. McDermid: They were conned and seduced into this program. They all say that. If anybody picks up a Toronto newspaper over the weekend and takes a look at it, he will find that the government is still at the same game of selling units for $90 down at $245 a month on 8 per cent mortgages. Nothing is said about paying it back in five years. There is nothing about AHOP assistance. It is just a great come-on. Why is the government continuing this program?

The government is going to be leading young families down the road to destruction, and I see it. They are in my office every weekend. I go out to their homes, and they have made beautiful homes out of these places. These places are their homes, and they are trying to raise their families, but they look at going from an 8 per cent first mortgage to a 17 per cent first mortgage and those AHOP loans which they have to pay back at current interest rates. It is frightening, and I am pleading on their behalf that the government take a very long and hard look at this and do something about it quickly. That is all I am asking. I am sorry that the Minister of Public Works is not here today to hear me, but I trust that those who are here will pass that plea on to him on my behalf.

I hate to put in a plug, but I have here the Sunday Sun home section. A nice new condominium in my community under AHOP is advertised. The cost is $43,000 for a three-bedroom unit, which is very nice. The story here is that the other three towers are sold out. Well, that is partially true. They have been sold out—

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): So have the people.

Mr. McDermid: —but now they are 50 per cent vacant. CMHC has decided that it is going to sell those units, but it will not sell those units until this last tower is filled. Once this tower is filled, CMHC will sell the other units at about $10,000 less. CMHC is sitting and waiting now until this tower is finished.

The government should admit that AHOP was nothing but a program to sell homes. It was not a program to provide homes for families but a program to sell homes for builders, and the misery and uncertainty which have been caused are now coming home to roost. The five years are just up now, and I plead once again with the government that it take a very long, hard look at this situation. If it does not, there will not be four in ten vacancies; there will be ten in ten vacancies, and the government will cause untold misery for families not only in my community but also in the community of the Minister of Public Works, Scarborough. There will be misery for people in the community of the housing critic, Orillia, and for people in the community of the new hon. member for Mississauga North (Mr. Fisher), who should be speaking up about this.

I will close on this point by saying to the government that I hope it will have an answer in a very short period of time so that we can encourage these people to stay in their homes and to raise their families.

The next thing I would like to talk about for just a moment, if I might, is the referendum which is coming up in Quebec. As an Anglophone from Ontario I cannot speak with much authority on what is going on in Quebec, but I think I can say what I feel in my heart, and that is that I do not want to see Quebec leave confederation because Quebec is as much a part of me, an English-speaking Canadian from Ontario, as is any other province in this country. Quebec is important to me as a Canadian, as is Alberta or B.C., and I do not want to see Quebec separate.

Mr. Nystrom: What about Saskatchewan?

Mr. McDermid: Yes, definitely Saskatchewan. That is where my mother's family is from.

Mr. Nystrom: Hear, hear!

Mr. McDermid: Thank you.

Mr. Knowles: How did you become a Tory?

Mr. McDermid: It was not hard to become a Tory, believe me, and with what is going on today it is not hard to stay a Tory either. I see the parliamentary secretary, the member for Ottawa Centre (Mr. Evans), testing the water here as well.

• (1750)

An hon. Member: He is a real Conservative.

Mr. McDermid: I am concerned about what is going on in the province of Quebec and I appeal to the people in Quebec to think very carefully before they cast their ballots on May 20 because this could shake the very foundation of our country for a long, long time.

We in Ontario, and I as a member from Ontario, are prepared to participate in constitutional change. There is no doubt we need it in this country. I think the premier of our province has made that very clear. He has also made it very clear that he will not, in any way, shape or form, discuss sovereignty-association. My constituents feel the same way. They are not prepared to see Canada break up and they are not prepared to discuss sovereignty-association.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McDermid: We can do it within our confederation—there is no question of it. So I plead in my language that those in Quebec vote no, and support all my colleagues in the House of Commons who feel the same way.

I would like, for just a moment, to talk about the economy of this country. I am concerned, as are a great number of people in my constituency from whom I have heard this weekend, that a budget is not being brought down by the Minister of Finance. Obviously he will make a few remarks tonight and I look forward to hearing what he has to say. But I ask him, on behalf of the small businessmen in my area, on behalf of the farmers in my area, and on behalf of those people who invest in Canada and make this country work: will he, for heaven's sake, bring in a budget so that they can do some financial planning and so that they know in which way this government is going to lead the country over the next four or five years?

The Speech from the Throne, if it is any indication, is not good news for the private sector. I am hoping that saner voices will be heard from the cabinet. However, I do have my doubts. I hope they will bring some common sense to the government and bring in a budget that will help the people of Canada. Why will you not bring in a mortgage program to help people with mortgages who are having problems right now? Come on; we promise not to yell flip-flop. Bring in a program to help the small businessman, not to create more Crown corporations. Bring in a program to help the farmer who, I will tell you right now—and I had the pleasure of sitting with the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) today and listening to him speak—is in dire straits. The young farmer especially is walking away from his farm, and the banks are selling farms at auctions. So I plead that the Minister of Finance bring us some economic news and some guidelines as to what exactly they will do in the next year or so, because there is an uncertainty in this country within the business community that is frightening.

I should like to close by asking everyone in the House to co-operate by putting petty political judgments aside and thinking carefully of what is happening in Canada. I am concerned about what I am hearing in the west, about what I am hearing from Quebec and what I am hearing in my own province of Ontario. It frightens me greatly because I love my country, as I know everyone here in this chamber does. I ask that we put some of our petty differences aside and come together for the good of the country. This is one of the greatest countries in the world, a country which is respected wherever one goes. That respect must be maintained.

Mr. Speaker, with your permission, may I call it six o'clock?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Is it agreed that we call it six o'clock?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): It being six o'clock, I do now leave the chair until eight o'clock this evening.

At 5.55 p.m. the House took recess.

• (2000)

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen).

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crosbie: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker, in connection with the statement planned to be made by the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen). I want to say now that we object to this procedure. I want to reserve the right to bring before the House a question of privilege. We think that is the proper course of action, after the minister finishes his statement, or tomorrow. I want to give notice of that now. It was only on Friday that the minister mentioned casually to me—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. If the hon. member wishes to raise a question of privilege, he is at liberty to do so at the appropriate time, and he knows the rules of the House.

Mr. Crosbie: I will make my question of privilege now if Your Honour wants me to do that. My question of privilege is that this is not the correct procedure. The minister is attempting to give, in effect, a budget speech in the debate on the Address in Reply to the Speech from the Throne.

An hon. Member: Smuggling it in.

Mr. Crosbie: Smuggling it in.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. With all due respect, I am not aware of any matter that has been raised by the hon. member so far which falls within the scope of privilege.

An hon. Member: Why don't you let him finish?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The Minister of Finance.

Mr. Crosbie: A question of privilege, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Andre: Privilege.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Crosbie: I would like to be heard on my question of privilege.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie) on a question of privilege.

Mr. Crosbie: I would like to have a chance to make a question of privilege before Your Honour rules on it. I am giving notice of it now, and I might want to elaborate on it later. My notice is that this is a budget speech being given here in the guise of a speech in the Address—

An hon. Member: How do you know?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. member is out of order.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, first of all I should like to take this opportunity to congratulate Your Honour on your selection as the Deputy Speaker and Chairman of our proceedings—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Crosbie: It is not in the notes, Allan.

Mr. MacEachen: —and also to express through you to Madam Speaker my compliments on her accession to the post of First Commoner. I certainly wish her well as she takes on these very important duties.

As Mr. Speaker knows, this is the first time that I have had an opportunity to speak to the House in a formal way since I have become the Minister of Finance. I want to take the opportunity of thanking so many members of the House on this side, and on the other side, for extending me congratulations on taking on this work. Some have joined their congratulations with commiserations, but nevertheless, I appreciate the good will which has animated their good wishes. At the same time I should like also to express my real satisfaction that the mover of the address in reply (Mrs. Côté), and the seconder (Mr. Frith), in their speeches have revealed to the House once again that new members come here with idealism and dedication, and in their first appearance are able to stir the House more deeply than members who have been here for many years.

An hon. Member: That is a great introduction.

Mr. MacEachen: I regret, in a way, that the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie) indicated that I am proceeding in an irregular way and, of course, I will debate that allegation with him later on. But my purpose in rising tonight is to clear up some unfinished business extending from the last two Parliaments, and to give the House background information on the fiscal and economic situation which faces us as we consider the new business to which the Speech from the Throne referred.

The unfinished business concerns the status of tax measures which were introduced in the December 11, 1979, budget, and indeed of certain measures that still remain outstanding from the November 16, 1978, budget, measures which have not yet received parliamentary approval.

I would recall that roughly two months after the election of last May the then minister of finance issued a press release setting out his intentions with respect to tax and tariff measures which had been introduced by the former Liberal government. He, and the then president of the treasury board, also reported in some considerable detail on the fiscal and economic outlook at that time.

Mr. Knowles: In the House?

Mr. MacEachen: Had Parliament been in session, they would no doubt have chosen to make this information available directly to members of the House, and that is what I propose to do tonight.

Mr. Stevens: For five years?

Mr. MacEachen: I want to take advantage—

Mr. Clark: Demonstrate contempt for Parliament.

Mr. MacEachen: —of this early opportunity to end the uncertainty with respect to outstanding tax measures and to inform the House of the fiscal situation as I find it on taking over my responsibilities as Minister of Finance. Of course I shall also comment upon the current economic situation.

I shall start with the tax measures. Of course the government will not proceed with the increase of 18 cents a gallon in the excise tax on gasoline—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

An hon. Member: You will tack it on somewhere.

Mr. MacEachen: —nor its extension to other transportation fuels proposed in December, nor will it reintroduce at this time the three measures affecting taxation on capital gains—the common stock investment plan changes in the treatment of capital gains, in Registered Retirement Savings Plans, and the provision for transfer of capital gains on farming assets to RRSPs.

• (2010)

Mr. Stevens: Shame.

Mr. MacEachen: I want to consider these and other measures in more detail, particularly in the light of a wide discussion about the role and importance of taxation on capital gains. Therefore I will be bringing forward a discussion paper on this subject. As well, I will not be reintroducing the measures to provide special tax incentives for investors in Atlantic fishing vessels. I want to explore with my colleague, the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans (Mr. LeBlanc), the impact of various measures on the structure and ownership of the industry in the context of the ongoing review that is under way.

I am also not making provisions for private corporations to be given tax contracts for investing in particular regions of the country. The Department of Regional Economic Expansion has considerable flexibility under existing legislation to support regional development. These mechanisms will naturally be under review prior to the expiry of the legislation next year.

My colleague, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde), and I have already announced that additional depletion allowances for oil and gas exploration in the frontier and offshore areas will not be continued, but will be replaced by a new incentive program to sustain the effort set in motion by the tax measure. I will, however, be introducing several of the other notices of ways and means motions tabled last December, including the measure providing for the deduction of salaries paid to spouses by persons carrying on an unincorporated business, and the temporary small business development bond provision enabling small businesses to obtain financing at lower interest rates.

Mr. Clark: Another broken promise.

Mr. MacEachen: This particular measure received special commendation from the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) in his speech, and I had his comments very much in mind as I considered whether I would bring back this particular measure.

To help offset the revenue loss associated with these measures and to help finance the increase in the guaranteed income supplement, I am reintroducing two of the tax measures. The increases in excise tax levies on alcohol and tobacco are to go into effect as of midnight tonight, and the two-year surtax of 5 per cent on federal corporate taxes effective January 1, 1980. I am also reintroducing other tax measures. Many are effective as of the dates originally proposed.

Mr. Clark: Budget measures.

Mr. MacEachen: These include tax relief for volunteer firemen—

Mr. Clark: Another broken promise.

Mr. MacEachen: —for temporary overseas employment—

Mr. Clark: Another broken promise.

Mr. MacEachen: —for employees who use aircraft in their work, and for certain situations where income taxes interact with family law. In addition, there are reduced write-offs for oil and gas properties, changes in the application of sales tax to cosmetics, extension of the sales tax to photo finishing, and tightening measures in the areas of deferred compensation plans and deductions for prepaid expenses. Details and dates of the application of these and other measures are contained in the notice of ways and means motions I am tabling tonight.

Mr. Clark: If you get that far.

Mr. MacEachen: For some measures, there are certain technical changes, often to reflect useful comments received from the business community and tax practitioners. The motions also include the commodity tax measures arising out of the November, 1978, budget. I would pause here to say that these changes are quite extensive. I will not detail them in the House tonight, but they were detailed by the former minister of finance last summer as he gave notice of his intention to reintroduce these measures emanating from the previous budget.

I also want to announce at this time that it is the government's intention to proceed with a number of changes to the income tax regulations as proposed in December. I recognize the difficulties that arise out of delays in enacting tax measures. It is my intention to introduce and proceed with the legislation implementing these tax changes as soon as possible. However, with respect to the changes to the Income Tax Act, I recognize the desirability of publishing draft amendments to the law so that those whose interests are affected can have an opportunity to assess the impact of technical changes and suggest modifications before the final legislation is introduced. It is my intention to proceed with draft law so that the legislation, when finally introduced, will have benefited from a careful analysis by specialists in the tax profession.

In concluding my statement on taxation measures, I would like, under the provisions of Standing Order 60, to table notice of ways and means motions in both official languages to amend the Income Tax Act.

Mr. Crosbie: There isn't unanimous consent.

Mr. MacEachen: Under Standing Order 60, Mr. Speaker, it is possible for a minister of the Crown to table ways and means motions at any time in the House of Commons. In doing that, I would also like to request that an order of the day be designated in the future to consider these ways and means motions.

I wish now to bring Parliament up to date with the preliminary information available to us on the fiscal outcome for 1979-80, along with a summary of the fiscal outlook for 1980-81 as it currently appears. I am thus tabling the standard summary figures on the fiscal position for these two years. The information on the current 1980-81 fiscal outlook will serve as a supplement to the main estimates which are to be tabled tomorrow.

The main estimates are those prepared by the former government and which were ready for printing when we took office. It was judged best not to attempt to revise this massive compilation of expenditure figures, but to table the existing material without delay as a basis on which interim supply could be sought. The expenditure figures in the fiscal forecast I am tabling are based upon the main estimates but contain, in addition, cost increases that have occurred since December in programs contained within those estimates, together with an allowance for the expanded guaranteed income supplement.

The current forecast of the over-all fiscal position will also provide Parliament with background information for the consideration of new borrowing authority which I shall be seeking shortly. With respect to the outcome for fiscal 1979-80, preliminary information suggests that financial requirements, excluding foreign exchange transactions, were $10.4 billion. That is $500 million lower than in the preceding fiscal year. The total outlays are expected to amount to $53.1 billion called for in the December, 1979, budget, although this estimate could still be subject to significant revision.

Revenues are lower than in the December forecast by some $300 million. The various increases in that budget which were not put into effect would have boosted revenues by close to $600 million. But corporation income tax revenue grew somewhat faster than expected in December and provided a partial offset. The projections for 1980-81 are based on economic assumptions for 1980 to which I shall refer shortly.

● (2020)

Revenues are projected to increase by 13 per cent after taking into account all the tax measures which I have just reintroduced. The expenditure projection includes the $35 per month increase in the guaranteed income supplement to needy old age pensioners.

On the basis of these assumptions, total outlays in 1980-81 are projected to increase by 13.7 per cent to $60.4 billion. This high projected growth in expenditures in 1980-81 is largely accounted for by the very high growth in the cost of two major existing expenditure programs, public debt charges and oil import compensation.

Mr. Andre: Surprise! Startling surprise!

Mr. MacEachen: Since the budget of December 11, 1979, increases in interest rates and the higher deficit now projected have resulted in an upward revision in public debt charges of the order of $500 million. Higher international oil prices have raised the projected level of oil import compensation programs by some $1.5 billion. While the December budget forecast contained some allowances for contingencies, the bulk of these revisions required additions to the forecast expenditure total. This fact, together with the increase in the guaranteed income supplement, basically accounts for the difference between the $60.4 billion total outlays I am now projecting and the $58.4 billion projected in the December budget.

Increases in the debt charges and oil import compensation costs would, of course, also have faced the previous government and almost certainly would have required it to allow expenditure growth to exceed the 10 per cent target it announced in December.

The projected increase in outlays of over 13.5 per cent is a good deal higher than I would like to see. The blended approach to oil pricing, which it is the government's intention to introduce, will allow a reduction in federal oil import compensation payments from the level assumed in deriving the $60.4 billion estimate of total outlays.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: A fraud.

Mr. MacEachen: In addition, we will exercise very tight control over discretionary government spending.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. MacEachen: Financial requirements, excluding foreign exchange transactions, are projected to be $11.7 billion in 1980-81. This represents an increase of more than $1 billion over 1979-80 and is substantially higher than the $8.2 billion forecast in the December, 1979, budget. By far the largest factor in the difference vis-à-vis the December budget is the absence of the massive increase in the gasoline excise tax.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

An hon. Member: We still pay for it.

Mr. Beatty: Just charge it, Allan.

Miss MacDonald: Borrow Broadbent's credit card.

Mr. MacEachen: Madam Speaker, I would like it well understood that these are projected expenditures—

Mr. Epp: And that will go up.

Mr. MacEachen: —and financial requirements as I assume my responsibilities as Minister of Finance. I have thought it important to provide the House with an early and accurate accounting of the current state of affairs.

Mr. Dick: Give us a budget.

Mr. MacEachen: I would further like it to be understood, however, that these projections do not in any way constitute the expenditure plan or the planned financial requirements of this government for fiscal year 1980-81.

Mr. Stevens: When do we see this?

Mr. MacEachen: Implementing blended oil pricing could alone reduce both expenditures and financial requirements by as much as $1 billion.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. MacEachen: I shall consider what further expenditure and revenue changes may be necessary when I put together my budget.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: That's what you are giving us tonight.

Mr. MacEachen: In framing my budget I shall be concerned to ensure that the rate of growth of government expenditures is tightly controlled.

An hon. Member: Oh, oh!

Mr. MacEachen: I shall be particularly concerned to ensure that government deficits and financial requirements diminish as economic growth resumes.

An hon. Member: Who is going to do it?

An hon. Member: You are blushing.

Mr. MacEachen: This will mean that major new expenditure programs, if any, will be financed from increased revenues or they will not proceed. In coming to a judgment as to the appropriate stance in 1980-81, I shall wish to take into account both the cyclical weakness of the economy and the critical need to ensure a diminishing of inflationary expectations. I will consider measures that will distribute the burdens of both unemployment and inflation more equitably. The budget will recognize that the well-being of Canadians, the creation of jobs, and the easing of inflationary pressures all depend critically upon a continuing and growing strength of private investment.

May I turn to a brief review of the international and domestic economic outlook.

The international environment which we are facing is a very troubled one indeed. Since December, 1978, we have seen oil prices more than double. This has been a shock to the world economy comparable in relative terms, and roughly twice as large in current dollar terms, as that which occurred in 1974. The ability of OPEC to raise prices was enhanced by a high level of demand in world markets as consuming countries built up their stocks and as the world economy moved into its fourth year of cyclical expansion.

Miss MacDonald: Blame the world.

Mr. MacEachen: Strength of demand also contributed to a sharp rise in primary commodity prices. On top of the inflationary impetus from oil and other commodities, there has been a slowdown in productivity growth. These developments led to a renewed acceleration of prices throughout the world, and this in turn has brought about a significant tightening in the stance of policy in most countries. The pace of monetary growth has been slowed down; interest rates have been run up to record levels, and restrictive fiscal policies have been adopted.

The United States, of course, has experienced a stronger cyclical expansion since 1975 than most other countries. The continued strength of the United States economy until recently has puzzled many observers who have been calling for a recession for quite some time. The surprising drop in the savings rate to 3 per cent has maintained the economy's cyclical momentum.

Inflation in the United States has recently taken a large further jump. The persistence of high levels of demand has been a major factor. High oil prices resulting from decontrol and imports, and the upward spiral of housing costs and mortgage rates have also played important roles. Inflation in the United States now appears to be at a higher peak than in previous high inflation years.

I might mention in passing that we Canadians have perhaps been too quick to take comfort from our relatively better inflation performance in recent months. A substantial part of the difference merely reflects the different treatment of mortgage interest rates in the two countries consumer price indices. The faster approach to world oil prices in the United States is also important. The fact is that the underlying rates of inflation in the two countries are not very different. Canada is certainly not in a position where it could afford to let its guard down against inflation.

To counter inflation, the United States government has taken a number of tough policy decisions. Fiscal policy has been tightened, and interest rates have been pushed up to rein in money supply growth. Credit controls have been imposed. It now appears that the recession is under way. Indeed, there would now appear to be some risk that the recession could be deeper than the American authorities would wish. This is, of course, leading to some easing in the demand for funds and thus interest rates. The hope is that it will have an early and substantial impact on the rate of inflation.

It is obvious that Canada is not immune or insulated from these worldwide forces. Slow output growth abroad will translate into weaker demand for our exports. International inflation has been reflected in higher prices for the goods and services we import.

Canadian consumers would have suffered even more from higher import prices if we had not allowed our interest rates to rise and thereby checked the decline in the exchange rate for our dollar. At the same time the Canadian economy has a number of important underlying strengths. Our competitive position has been improved by the substantial discount at which the Canadian dollar has been traded.

Our merchandise trade surplus increased last year to a record $4 billion, and our travel deficit has decreased. Strong business investment is providing us with more productive capacity which will enable us to take full advantage of the market opportunities open to us.

Another element of strength is our energy potential which is unique among industrial nations. We can benefit from the investment and jobs created in exploiting our country's energy resources. Also, our industry will have an advantage in competing on world markets because of its access to relatively low-cost sources of energy. However, in the immediate future we in Canada are going to feel the effects of slow world growth, rapid inflation, and high interest rates. The general view is that there will be little or no growth in Canada in 1980.

Mr. Stevens: Under the Liberals.

Mr. MacEachen: Our latest forecast is that the economy will grow by only one half of one per cent.

Mr. Stevens: Under the Liberals.

Mr. MacEachen: Growth in output is thus expected to be marginally weaker than forecast by my predecessor in office.

Mr. Crosbie: Where is Herb Gray when he is needed?

Mr. MacEachen: This downward adjustment is common to most private sector forecasts and has occurred in spite of the fact that the economy is no longer faced with a massive tax increase.

An hon. Member: Not yet, but it is coming.

Mr. MacEachen: The impact of higher international and domestic interest rates, together with revisions in the United States outlook—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. minister but the time allotted to him has expired. He may continue only with the unanimous consent of the House.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I just want to say to you, sir, and to the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) that what he is doing tonight is an abuse of Parliament and the process by trying to bootleg a budget address into the throne speech.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With all due respect to the hon. member—

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): May I finish my point of order, Mr. Speaker?

We are prepared to allow the minister to complete his remarks notwithstanding the contempt which he has shown to Parliament. But I want to serve notice on you now, sir, that I intend tomorrow to raise a question of privilege with respect to what I think is a very questionable parliamentary practice.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Baker) and the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie) have given notice of their intentions to raise questions of privilege. It seems to me that a question of privilege can only be raised at the appropriate time, that is, after the remarks of the Minister of Finance have been made to the House.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The Minister of Finance has asked for unanimous consent to continue his remarks. Do I interpret the comment of the House leader for the opposition to indicate that unanimous consent is granted?

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Yes, Mr. Speaker. That is what I said, on that condition.

Mr. Clark: That is what he said.

Mr. Trudeau: Getting tough there, Joe.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Baker) for permitting me to continue my remarks beyond the 30 minute expiry limit, but I would point out, merely to show that I contest his view, that there are ample parliamentary precedents for the course of action which I am following tonight, and that indeed I have to go back no further than the precedent of his colleague in office to justify my course of action tonight.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I believe there is unanimous consent for the minister to continue his remarks. I am not aware that there is a question of privilege before the House at this stage.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, may I continue my comments on the expected growth in the Canadian economy?

The hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens) has suggested that the slow growth forecast is due to the accession of a Liberal government.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacEachen: The hon. member may have his own view on that, but I would like to remind him that the growth forecast which I am indicating tonight for the economy for 1980 is not much different. It is marginally lower than the forecast which was given to the House of Commons last December by his desk mate.

The impact of higher international and domestic interest rates, together with revisions to the United States outlook, especially in the housing sector on which Canadian exports depend heavily, have been the major factors leading to downward adjustment in most forecasts of the performance of the Canadian economy for 1980.

The unemployment rate is now expected to rise to an average of about 8 per cent. This figure is slightly lower than the forecast in the December budget, reflecting continued strength in employment growth over the past few months.

The consumer price index is projected to rise by 10 per cent. This, of course, is less than the forecast increase in the December budget because we are not subjecting Canadians to the heavy excise on gasoline.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

An hon. Member: Saddle our children with the problem.

Mr. MacEachen: The increase in the price deflator for gross national expenditure is expected to be about 9.5 per cent. Taken together with an increase of one half of one per cent in real gross national expenditure, this will yield an increase in the nominal value of the GNE of around 10 per cent.

During 1980 the main areas of strength in aggregate demand will be in consumer expenditures and investment. The volume of consumer spending is projected to increase 2 per cent. The cycle of investment expansion which began in 1979 is expected to continue through 1980 with a further increase of more than 7½ per cent in real terms. Other domestic sectors will show no change or will show a decline in 1980.

● (2040)

Government expenditures on goods and services will continue to be affected by policies of expenditure restraint. Residential construction is likely to decline as high interest rates and a large stock of completed but unoccupied new dwellings restrict the number of new starts. A major uncertainty in the outlook for 1980 is the likely pattern of inventories as businessmen shade down their sales expectation in response to lower output growth.

In sum, the world economy is going through a difficult period of adjustment as higher international oil prices are absorbed and as the always painful process of winding down inflation is pursued. As a result of certain important underlying strengths, the Canadian economy should be able to avoid a slowdown as severe as that which appears in store in the United States, but we cannot expect to insulate ourselves fully from that slowdown. This is especially the case given the substantial deficit which already exists on the current account of our balance of payments, and given the size of the federal government deficit which already exists.

Having provided this general overview in an effort to bring the House of Commons up to date on current economic indicators, I would like to say a word or two about the most immediate and visible problem that is confronting the Canadian economy in respect of high interest rates. I refer to the impact of high mortgage interest rates on the estimated 350,000 home owners who will be renegotiating the terms of their mortgage this year. Unquestionably, these people face substantial, unanticipated increases in their monthly mortgage payments.

In assessing the situation, however, it is important to bear a number of facts in mind. It is estimated that less than 10 per cent of these households will confront housing costs in excess of 30 per cent of their incomes upon renewal of their mortgages. This 30 per cent figure is frequently used by lenders and insurers in judging the mortgage payments a household can reasonably be expected to carry.

Given the growth in incomes, the majority of those renegotiating their mortgage will in fact face housing costs that, as a proportion of income, are lower than they were when the terms of the original mortgage were negotiated. Of the less than 10 per cent confronting shelter cost greater than 30 per cent, the majority will be able to rely on a number of means already available or being developed by private lending institutions to ease the transition to higher mortgage costs and help keep their cash outlays within reasonable limits.

I have already indicated in the House of Commons that it was the intention of the government to take steps which would assist those limited number of mortgage holders who are unable to carry the normal proportion of costs to income. My colleague, the minister responsible for CMHC, will be meeting with representatives from the lending institutions to review the general situation. We believe that lending institutions which are involved in this particular sector of the economy are equally concerned in assisting home owners to meet this particular crisis. We know that at the present time certain of these institutions are making special adjustments in order to meet the current situation.

We hope that through a discussion between the minister responsible for CMHC and the lending institutions we may be able to identify further areas in which assistance can be developed. If these discussions demonstrate that new arrangements are required in the limited number of cases to which I have referred, then the government will be able and willing to take action to assist, particularly, to avoid the risk of foreclosure for any of those mortgage holders who are facing this current critical situation.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. MacEachen: Members opposite ought to get their economic policy together. They expressed indignation at mention of the deficit as if it ought not to exist at all. When an analysis reveals that maybe a big financial program is not necessary, hon. members also then express their indignation. One is related to the other. At some time they might be able in the course of this Parliament to develop some consistency.

I want to tell hon. members opposite that it is the judgment of this government that any broad measure of assistance aimed at providing relief to what is, in the vast majority of cases, a short-term cash flow problem, would raise serious questions of equity with respect to those Canadians who are hurt in other ways by high interest rates and inflation. If we move with a big expenditure program now which we cannot afford in this housing sector, then in terms of equity we would be obliged to move in other directions as well. It would be a costly undertaking on the part of the government which would result in a more difficult situation, and which would make more difficult the attainment of an over-all reduction in inflation and interest rates. The gradual reduction of inflation and interest rates is the only viable solution to this problem in the long term. In that connection, I am sure hon. members have noticed and have welcomed, just as I have, the increasing evidence of a downturn in general interest rates, both in the United States and Canada.

An hon. Member: A quarter of a point.

Mr. MacEachen: Yes. It is a development. The decrease in the bank rate and the subsequent decrease in the prime rate of the banks is a welcome development. A continuation in that trend is the only viable solution to this particular problem.

I wanted to give the House my assessment tonight very early in my tenure as Minister of Finance of the situation that exists in the world and in Canada. I do not think it escapes any of us that we are facing a difficult situation in Canada and in the world as a whole. I am confident, however, that Canada, as a united country with Canadians working together, can confront and overcome these difficulties. But obviously our capacity to do so, and the welfare of us all, will be gravely affected if we are unable to meet the immediate challenge to our unity arising from the referendum in Quebec. For myself, I wish to affirm my conviction that only our federal system of government can provide the assurance that the interests of Canadians in Quebec and in all regions of Canada will be served best.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, having now heard the complete statement I wish to give notice that I will be raising a question of privilege tomorrow with respect to the statement and the process we have engaged in this evening.

Mr. Crosbie: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is the hon. member rising on the same question of privilege? I assumed he was. I was about to recognize the hon. member for Winnipeg-St. James (Mr. Keeper) at this point.

Some hon. Members: Oh!

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I assume the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie) was rising to the same point as the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Baker). Otherwise the Chair will recognize the hon. member for Winnipeg-St. James.

Mr. Crosbie: I am rising on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. The point of order is this: It was agreed among the whips that I would follow the Minister of Finance. That is my point of order, and I should like the Chair to explain why a member on this side has not been called to follow the Minister of Finance.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With due respect, the Chair has been following the procedure which has been general throughout this debate, that of recognizing members on one side and on the other side in a manner which reflects the numerical proportions of the House, and having heard three speakers from the official opposition the Chair recognizes the hon. member for Winnipeg-St. James.

Mr. Keeper: Thank you, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Nielsen: On a point of order, I am sure that in a sense of fairness and in accordance with the time honoured practices and traditions of this House hon. members would wish to hear the spokesman for the opposition in response to this mini-budget which has been smuggled in. But if there is a desire to test that matter, I should like to move, seconded by the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Baker):

That the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie) be now heard.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The House heard the motion. Those in favour of the motion please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Those against will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Call in the members.

The House divided on the motion (Mr. Nielsen) which was agreed to on the following division:

Madam Speaker: I declare the motion carried.

The hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie).

Hon. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Thank you, Madam Speaker. I should like to congratulate you upon your elevation. Any movement from the Trudeau cabinet is an elevation!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crosbie: Apart from that, and quite seriously, Madam Speaker, we know you are going to distinguish yourself in the Chair as the first member of your sex to occupy that position.

Mr. Trudeau: Quit talking about sex.

Mr. Crosbie: Madam Speaker, I wish you well. I should also like to congratulate the mover and seconder of the Address in Reply to the Speech from the Throne, and I should like to thank the 148 members who voted for me here tonight, also the one who voted against me. I hope that proportion maintains itself in the coming general election.

The only thing I cannot do, Madam Speaker, is congratulate the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) on his statement here tonight. I think it was Walpole who said something like this about the world—the world is a comedy to those that think, and a tragedy to those who feel.

Any of us here tonight who both think and feel are in a dilemma as to whether we should cry or laugh at this spavin statement that has been presented to this House tonight, a complete abdication, a complete abnegation of the responsibility of a minister of finance, to bring before this House of Commons in this chamber a half-statement like this. It is a statement that brings in some points and reaffirms some points that were in the budget of December 11 that were right and proper and popular, but ignores his responsibility to this country, to our economic system and our economic structure, to our financial institutions, to deal with the real economic and financial problems that are facing Canada today. Therefore it does not face up to the needs of this country and the needs of this government for more revenue, to the need for economic and financial systems to be given a sign as to what direction this government is going. What is the sign that is presented in this statement tonight to the economic structure of this country? A sign of complete irresponsibility.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crosbie: Mr. Speaker, this is not a mini-budget—it is a Minnie Mouse budget.

There is no relief here for home owners. There is no relief for anyone.

The Minister of Finance is leaving tomorrow—leaving this country tomorrow—fleeing to Germany. Well might he flee to West Germany to his IMF meeting. I hope to God while he is there he learns something from the other finance ministers of the world who are going to be there. Perhaps he will learn from the IMF to cut oil use with a tax. That is what they advised all the countries who belong, on February 24, 1980.

A new study by the IMF states:

> Canada, the United States and other industrial countries should try to reduce consumption of imported oil by imposing sharply higher taxes on gasoline—

Perhaps he will listen to what they advise over there in the IMF as to what should be done in this day and age of vanishing oil supplies and increasing risks for every country that wants some security for its oil supplies. Perhaps he will learn some responsibility from them.

What has he done? He has violated the promise and the commitment he made in February or January in Toronto, the financial capital of Canada still. The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) spoke there and gave his five solemn economic and financial pledges, one of which was that on no account would he increase government spending beyond the real increase in the gross national product each year. Now the Minister of Finance comes in and says in his statement tonight that there is going to be a .5 per cent real growth in the gross national product in Canada this year, or no growth. That indicates that there should be no increase in government spending this year. But what is the increase? Not the 10 per cent limit that we had imposed—the $58.4 billion the total outlays would have been had we been kept in office—but the spending is going to go so far up by another $2 billion to $60.4 billion. This is a 13.7 per cent increase.

Some hon. Members: Shame!

Mr. Crosbie: When we take off the 10 per cent increase in the cost of living expected this year, that is a 3.7 per cent real increase while the economy itself is going to have no growth. So the Prime Minister in no time at all—as was to be expected by anyone who looked at the flip-flops and the distortions of his career in the eight or ten years or whatever it was that he was in power before from 1968 to 1978—of course, has no right to be surprised by this new confirmation that he never means what he says and never cares what he says as long as he gets himself back into power and thinks he has another four years to go for people to forget.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crosbie: Not only is there an increase of 13.7 per cent in the total outlays, but the budgetary expenditures are up from $57.3 billion in our estimates of December 11 to $59.8 billion. This is a $2.5 billion increase in government spending, not in the total outlays, but in government spending. There is some unexplained decrease in government loans and so on that will have to be explained by the hon. gentleman if he wants to be believed that that brings total outlays up only $2 billion.

The minister tells us that debt charges are up $500 million to $10.7 billion, which is what it is going to cost the people of Canada in interest this year on the debt. On what debt? It is on the debt incurred in the last six or seven years by the hon. gentlemen opposite, who are no sooner back in office than they start out in the magnificent way on the old route to bankruptcy that they were taking us on before we interrupted them for a few brief months last year.

What is their deficit going to be this year? It is not the $10.4 billion that we had planned and estimated, but $14.1 billion.

Some hon. Members: Shame!

Mr. Crosbie: The United States of America is reducing its deficit in the next financial year to zero. The Americans are convinced that this is the way to go to try to overcome the endemic inflation in their system and in ours. But the deficit that we are going to have under the new Minister of Finance is going up to $14.1 billion. The United States is ten times as large as Canada and the comparable debt in the United States would be $140 billion. The government is going to put the deficit up $3.7 billion according to this statement.

Mr. MacEachen: No way!

Mr. Crosbie: No way, the minister says. If it is no way, where are his revenue increases? Why did he not have the courage and the guts to come in here tonight and say it?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crosbie: What about borrowing? If we had stayed in office, the borrowing requirements would have totalled $8.2 billion this year. Under this Minister of Finance's irresponsible statement it is going to $11.7 billion of borrowing; up $3.5 billion. This is the Minister of Finance who, when he was out of power, had a surrogate finance critic who is now the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Gray). He was against interest rate increases and said that things could be done, that there are other alternatives. But now these people are back in power, he is shoved aside, and there is a new man involved, the new Minister of Finance who says he is following the Bouey policy—the Bank of Canada policy. He says that that is the right policy. He says that there is no alternative to the Bouey Bank of Canada interest rate policy. There is no alternative, he says, to governor Bouey's policies or to the policy that we had followed. In answer to a question a few days ago he said that he was following the same policy that I was following. Well, he was not following it very well when he was in opposition and we were in office.

But what does the governor of the Bank of Canada say in the annual report filed here today? The Minister of Finance has studied it with great care I am sure. I quote from The Globe and Mail of March 20:

> The Bank of Canada has warned the federal government that its large fiscal deficit is discouraging business investments and holding back productivity gains in Canada.
>
> "The fiscal deficits absorb savings that could otherwise be channelled by financial markets into financing the expansion of plant and equipment."

Also, if Canada wants to reduce its current account deficit and its reliance on foreign investment (savings), the governor in the annual report said this:

> —we shall have to pay careful attention to the rate at which domestic savings are being absorbed by the fiscal deficits of our governments".

That is the warning from the governor of the Bank of Canada. That is what has been ignored by this new Minister of Finance who does not have the courage to raise taxes as he should to keep this fiscal deficit down. This fiscal deficit is going to use up domestic savings. That is going to compete with those in the private sector who want money in equity and loans to expand their productive capacity which they now cannot do because of this giant government deficit that has to be financed this year.

This is a year when Canada Savings Bonds are already being turned in at an ever-increasing rate because the 12 per cent interest rate is too low compared to where other interest rates have gone in this country since this government took office just at the beginning of March.

They are going to ignore all the advice of the governor of the Bank of Canada that is politically unpopular. They could not ignore the interest rate increases because, as the minister said himself in an interview several days ago, as reported by the Toronto Star—the "Bible"—for April 18, 1980:

> MacEachen said the lower rate was "welcome news" but "it's worth pointing out that the high interest rates we have had and the very rapid increases in these rates recently have been the direct result of action taken in the United States."

Here is the Minister of Finance of Canada admitting that he is powerless, that he cannot do anything, that he is in the hands of the United States and high interest rates in the United States. That is not what we heard when "tattle-tale Gray" was across the aisle as the financial critic. But now we are told that this mighty Samson from Cape Breton is bound hand and foot by interest rates in the United States.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: The recycled minister.

Mr. Crosbie: What is the way for the minister to reduce this huge deficit? Why, the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Johnston) has disappeared. He has vanished in the night like a vampire.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Crosbie: Increased revenues are the only way to reduce the deficit, said Johnston in an interview on CTV. He was asked whether he thought it true that a deficit could only be overcome by increasing revenues. He replied, "I would judge that to be correct". Well, the message has not reached the Minister of Finance. If he wants to reduce that deficit, then he is going to have to increase revenues because that is the only way to reduce that deficit. The minister of Finance, when he was appointed, said this; "he is concerned but not consumed by the size of the government's $11.8 billion deficit." He is certainly not consumed by it because he has allowed it to balloon by $3.7 billion.

At the same time he said:

The best way to bring about lower interest rates is, of course, to reduce, generally, inflationary pressures in the country.

How is the gentleman going to reduce the inflationary pressures in the country when he is ballooning up the deficit in excess of $3 billion, when he is allowing the borrowing of the government to go up $3.7 billion? How is he going to control inflation? What is his program? What is the lead that this government gives the rest of the country? What lead do ministers give our corporations? What lead do they give our citizens? Their lead is spend, spend, spend; and borrow, borrow, borrow. Do not give a darn. That is their lead. That is the advice they are giving the country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crosbie: You cannot always be Dr. Jekyll, sometimes you have to be Mr. Hyde, Madam Speaker.

An hon. Member: That is what he is.

Mr. Crosbie: This honourable gentleman is going to be Mr. Hyde before his term of office is over because he is going to have to raise billions of dollars in additional revenue. Now he thinks that perhaps somehow in the oil negotiations with Alberta, after they have come to a standoff and there is a breakdown, that he and his government—the muscle men of confederation, those who so love this country and are trying to hold it together—are going to put the blocks to poor old Alberta and they think they are going to get $2 billion, $3 billion or $4 billion in oil and gas revenues from the oil and gas industry. That is not in the cards. There can be no united Canada. There can be no Canada whole and undivided with any government in office here in Ottawa which thinks it can crush the life out of Alberta or the west and redeem this huge increase in the budget deficit.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crosbie: Nor can it bully around the provinces on the east coast, the provinces that should have control of the oil and gas resources. There is going to be very little oil and gas developed in that area unless this government comes to its senses and reaches an accommodation and a modus vivendi with Nova Scotia, Newfoundland, and the other eastern provinces.

● (2200)

They better put that in their pipe and think about it because the next four years or five years will be their last. They are not going to see the government side of these halls again for the rest of the twentieth century, I can assure them of that. Where is the made in Canada interest rates we were promised?

Madam Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Crosbie: I call it ten o'clock.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

PRORATA PENSIONS FOR WIDOWS OF VETERANS ON DISABILITY PENSION

Hon. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Madam Speaker, I rise to direct the attention of this House to a very important matter. I thank the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. MacDonald) for being here at this time of night to deal with it. The matter is one of great concern to the widows of many of our veterans. It is also of concern to a great many of our veterans who are anxious as to what may happen to their wives if they, the veterans, die first. I put this matter to the Minister of Veterans Affairs on Wednesday, April 16, as reported at page 68, when I asked this question:

In view of widespread support for the proposition that prorata pensions should be paid to widows of disabled veterans where the veteran's disability pension was below 48 per cent, and in view of the statement made to the media by the minister a couple of weeks ago that he was planning to bring in such legislation, can he tell us if it will be introduced in the House at an early date?

The minister in his reply indicated that he was conscious of the importance of this legislation, that he was also conscious of Bill C-28 that was introduced in the last Parliament by the previous minister of veterans affairs. We also indicated that he would be making further recommendations. I rise now to express the hope that in his response to my question tonight he will make it clear and unequivocal that legislation on this matter will be brought in at this session.

I join with others in commending the former minister of veterans affairs, the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. McKinnon), for having brought in a bill last December 6 that would have breached the 48 per cent rule. Unfortunately, there was no time between that date and the end of the session for the bill to be called for second reading.

I say quite frankly to my hon. friend from Victoria that I thought there were certain deficiencies in that bill. In my view, it did not provide a sufficient level of pensions for widows where the veteran's disability rate was below 48 per cent. I thought also that it was a shame that in that bill there was a provision that it would not come fully into effect until six years had gone by.

I hope that any bill that is introduced in this session will provide a better level of pensions for widows of veterans where the veteran's disability rate was below 48 per cent, and I hope it will be made effective right away, not year by year over a period of five or six years.

As we all know, this is a matter that has been the subject of many studies and reports. Perhaps the most outstanding are the Woods report of a number of years ago and more recently the Hermann report, both of which recommended that there should be pensions for widows where the veteran's disability rate was below 48 per cent.

This matter has also been recommended to the House by veterans affairs committees on two or three occasions. In fact I believe the Deputy Speaker, who is now in the chair, was a member of the veterans affairs committee when we made such a recommendation. It just does not make sense that there is a cutoff at the 48 per cent point, which means in one case the widow of a veteran has a full widow's pension but where the veteran's pension rate was only 47 per cent there is nothing there at all for the widow if her husband goes first.

I know the Minister of Veterans Affairs feels as all of us do with regard to this matter. The statements he made to the media before the House resumed seemed to confirm it—he indicated he had been planning a bill along the lines of the very legislation the hon. member for Victoria brought in last December. I am not asking the minister to tell us the details of what will be in the bill; that would be contrary to the rules around here. But surely he can tell us, as he told the media before this House sat, that he will be bringing in a bill to provide pensions for these widows.

In my supplementary question the other day I asked whether the minister would look at a few other matters such as the long-promised review of the War Veterans Allowance Act so that it might be brought up to date. There is also the question of certain improvements which need to be made in the amounts payable under the Compensation for Former Prisoners of War Act. These are on the minister's desk in detailed form.

I assert quite readily that we have made a great deal of progress in terms of veterans' legislation in the last eight or ten years, but there are still these few matters which are as yet unresolved, and I think most of the veterans in this country would agree with me that at the top of the list is the need to protect the position of the widows of disabled veterans. I hope, tonight, that the minister, whose presence I welcome at this hour of the evening, will have a favourable statement to make to this House.

Hon. Daniel J. MacDonald (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his question as it gives me the opportunity to comment on the matter of pensions for widows of veterans who were in receipt of disability pensions at a rate less than 48 per cent, and to inform members as to the status of the war veterans allowance legislative review.

As hon. members know, the previous government had introduced in the House suggested changes to the Pension Act to enable widows to receive pension benefits upon the death of a veteran who had a pensioned disability assessed at less than 48 per cent. I expect to present my cabinet colleagues with proposals which will provide pension benefits to widows of disability pensioners who are not now eligible for such benefits. The proposals which were contained in Bill C-28 will be carefully considered to determine whether or not they can be improved upon.

The main criterion of the war veterans allowance legislative review has been that there will be continuing compensation paid to veterans under the WVA Act in recognition of their wartime contribution to this nation. Within this criterion, numerous proposals have been developed by the department, and I am pleased to report that the review has produced some very significant recommendations directed toward improving the lot of veterans and their dependants. Further, a continuing joint study has been undertaken with the Department of National Health and Welfare in order to achieve a greater level of harmony in the administration of income security policy and to identify opportunities for streamlining the administration of the MVA Program, both issues of major concern to the legislative review.

Mr. Speaker, in my view, we can never fully compensate those Canadians who have suffered the effects of war, but we can continue to ensure that their special status is fully recognized and that veterans and their dependants will continue to receive the assistance they require to meet their basic needs and to live in dignity. I know this view is shared by all members of this House.

While I am very anxious to introduce changes to the War Veterans Allowance Act as quickly as possible, it is necessary that they be examined in relation to other social policy initiatives. However, in the coming months I hope to be able to make a definitive statement on this subject.

• (2210)

ENERGY—EXPORT OF NATURAL GAS TO UNITED STATES

Mr. Ian Waddell (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, I would like to speak tonight on the topic of exports of natural gas and the pre-building of the Alaska Highway natural gas pipeline. My topic arises from a question I put to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde) in this House on April 17.

Before I go into that in detail I want to say, as an aside, that when I listened to this surprise mini-budget tonight in the House, I noted that the minister had to say that it had cost the Canadian taxpayer a $1.5 billion increase in the last little while to pay for imported oil under the oil import compensation program, and I thought back to the time of Joe Greene who used to be minister of energy in a Liberal government, who said "We have energy for hundreds of years in Canada".

Then he proceeded to okay the export of oil. Today we are paying for that because we do not have oil for hundreds of years. We have a shortage of oil, and I cannot understand how a country like Canada can make the same mistake twice.

I think we are about to make the same mistake twice when we deal with exports of natural gas, because now there is greater pressure on this government to open up the flood gates and to export more of our natural gas, the cheap stuff, the good stuff, the stuff that is available now, to the United States, and then later on we are going to have to deal with the expensive stuff, just like oil.

My question was directed to the minister. I raised the point that one way to achieve energy self-sufficiency was to keep our natural gas for our own use, and I asked the minister to comment on the ironclad guarantee, or the iron clad commitment which Canada should have, regarding the building of the whole Alaska natural gas pipeline before any pre-building of the southern portions of the pipeline should take place, because the words "ironclad guarantee" were the words of the minister when he was the Liberal energy critic. However, I did not get an answer to that question. Instead, I got comments that the minister was going to meet with the American secretary of energy and so forth.

Then I asked a supplementary question. I asked the minister to assure the House that if there was going to be any change in the Northern Pipeline Act the minister would come back to the House of Commons and seek permission to make changes in that act. The minister answered that, yes, he would come back to the House if there was going to be a change in the act. He slipped out of the question. He knew very well what I was asking, and that was whether there is to be a change in the act or the regulations under the act. The regulations under the act permit the Governor General to issue an order in council to allow certain minor changes—not major changes—in the act. The minister did not indicate to me—and I would ask that the parliamentary secretary do so—that ironclad guarantee and that ironclad commitment that there will be no order in council to allow the pre-building of the Alaska pipeline.

Let me explain. The original condition in the act was that all segments of the pipeline would have to be built at the same time, and financing would have to be guaranteed for the whole pipeline. It did not provide for building southern portions of the pipeline. Parliament did that for good, cautious, and sensible reasons, the reasons being that if we allowed pre-building of the southern line, we may never get the northern portion built. We would get what would amount to a natural gas pipeline sucking out—

Mr. Nickerson: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: One moment.

Mr. Nickerson: A point of order—

Mr. Knowles: No.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: There is no point of order at this time of the debate.

Mr. Nickerson: It does not matter that there is not order?

Mr. Knowles: No.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member is out of order. The hon. member for Vancouver-Kinsway (Mr. Waddell) will please continue his remarks.

An hon. Member: Read Beauchesne.

Mr. Waddell: Perhaps the hon. member should get his teddy bear and put it on his desk as he did in the last House.

What I was saying, as I was in full flight à la the hon. member from St. John's, was that if we allow the pre-building of that southern portion of the pipeline, it will suck out all the cheap Canadian gas to American markets right now, and we will never get the full pipeline built. That is why I want the parliamentary secretary to give us an answer today. Will there be an order in council permitting the pre-build portions against the intent of the Northern Pipeline Act, or will the government come back to Parliament if it is going to do that?

There is some hanky-panky going on with the National Energy Board. The National Energy Board wants to allow pre-building. It has issued an order to that effect, and the minister in this case, Senator Olson, has said, "Hold the hearing first on that and then come back to us". I think they are going to issue it. They are going to issue permission. They are going to issue an order in council. We in the NDP oppose that for all kinds of good reasons, specifically because of the intent of Parliament in the Northern Pipeline Act.

• (2215)

The fact that it is proving exceedingly difficult to obtain financing for the Alaska sections of the Alaska highway pipeline, indicates the dubious rationality—even from the Americans' viewpoint—of a gigantic project to bring frontier gas onstream at exorbitant prices. Canada's specific energy interest, in what is essentially an American project to bring Alaskan gas to the continental United States, has never been convincingly demonstrated or even addressed, either by the government or by the National Energy Board.

It was always assumed, both by the government and by the NEB, that the Canadian need for frontier gas was self-evident. Largely because of that assumption, which in turn reflected the fact that the government had neither a coherent energy policy nor a comprehensive industrial strategy into which frontier gas could be made to fit, the government allowed itself to drift into a pipeline treaty with the U.S., which may be of long-term benefit to that country but which makes a marginal contribution to our energy needs and at the price of considerable distortion of our economy.

We are now committed by the international treaty to permit the building across our territory of what is essentially a U.S. project, and the government is attempting to justify it on the grounds of job creation and as an insurance policy for the time when our own conventional energy reserves run out. Meanwhile, the government continues to increase our exports of conventional reserves, thereby making the need for frontier gas a self-fulfilling prophecy.

What constitutes a surplus in a non-renewable resource? The government cannot answer that question, but that has not prevented it from muddling its way into de facto continentalism in energy policy—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but the time allotted to him has expired.

Mr. Waddell: May I conclude, Mr. Speaker, since I was interrupted? I can conclude in one sentence.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is there consent of the House?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Waddell: It can be reported that it was the full House that said that.

I will conclude by asking the parliamentary secretary whether he can give me now an ironclad commitment—he knows what I mean—that there will be no order in council allowing the National Energy Board to renege on this promise of ironclad guarantees so that the pipeline will not go ahead and suck out all the Canadian gas to the United States without ironclad guarantees of a complete pipeline being built.

Mr. Roy MacLaren (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to respond further to the question raised by the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mr. Waddell) on April 17 concerning the relationship between gas export approval and commitments on construction of the Alaska highway natural gas pipeline.

The Northern Pipeline Act, and specifically condition 12, requires that construction of the Alaska highway pipeline, or any part thereof, including pre-build, not proceed until the whole pipeline has been financed. Financing of the Alaska section and the northern sections of the pipeline in Canada will not be in place for at least a year. Construction of pre-build, on the other hand, could get under way this summer. It therefore follows that if pre-build is to be approved this year, condition 12 would have to be amended, but this will not happen unless all necessary preconditions have been met.

Condition 12 is one of the many terms and conditions imposed upon the pipeline by the Northern Pipeline Act. The act provides that these terms and conditions can be amended by the NEB, but such amendments do not become effective until approved by the governor in council. Approval in Parliament on a change in condition 12 is not required, although it would be if the act were to be changed. The NEB has amended condition 12. The amendment allows the government to approve pre-build this year, provided it is assured that financing can be obtained for the northern sections of the line.

• (2220)

Mr. Waddell: Can be obtained? Should be obtained!

Mr. MacLaren: However, the amendment is not yet effective. Governor in council approval is required, and this has not yet been obtained because all the pre-conditions have not been satisfied. Cabinet will not consider the amendment until further information on the financing of the Alaska section has been obtained from the United States, and until further information on the financing of the northern sections in Canada has been obtained. The hearing of the NEB commencing April 29 on pipeline financing should elicit the desired information on the financing of the pipeline in Canada. Therefore the hearing does not imply government approval of pre-build. To the contrary, it indicates that the government is seeking further information.

Pre-build will require approval of additional gas exports. The stated view of the government is that such exports will not be considered until domestic gas market expansion is assured and the government is satisfied that the northern sections of the Alaska highway pipeline will definitely proceed in a timely manner.

AIRPORTS

GROUND TRANSPORTATION AT TORONTO INTERNATIONAL—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. John Bosley (Don Valley West): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity pursuant to Standing Order 43. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Etobicoke Centre (Mr. Wilson):

That whereas a lawsuit by one airport limousine driver against his employer for wrongful dismissal has brought to light the common practice of owners requiring drivers to pay for the right to drive, at fees up to $55,000, and to pay for the car and all associated costs; and whereas the drivers are led to believe they have bought the airport plate thereby, in contravention of the terms of issuance, and failure to pay results in imposed radio silence and death threats; therefore this House directs the minister to commence a full-scale inquiry into all aspects of ground transportation at Toronto international airport in order to properly protect the public interest and well-being and safety of the drivers.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

METRIC CONVERSION

REQUEST FOR DEBATE ON METRIC CONVERSION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bill Domm (Peterborough): Madam Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

Considering that the forced implementation of metrication in the county of Peterborough last summer had a negative effect on consumers and store owners, because of the difficulty tourists had in adapting to the new system, and due to the fact that the subject of metric conversion has never been introduced in the House of Commons in the form of a bill so that the views of the people of Canada may be heard, and considering that metrication in Canada is already seven to nine years ahead of metric conversion in the United States, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Crowfoot (Mr. Malone):

That no further implementation take place in the retail sector in Canada until full parliamentary debate on the issue occurs and until all Canadian citizens have been given an opportunity to make their feelings on metrication known to the government.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

GARRISON DIVERSION—U.S. COMMITMENT UNDER BOUNDARY WATERS TREATY—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Terry Sargeant (Selkirk-Interlake): Madam Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

In light of the evidence that conclusively shows the implementation of the Garrison diversion unit in North Dakota in its present form will cause an estimated $6 million worth of damage annually to the Manitoba commercial fishing industry, and that it will force Manitoba municipalities to pay tens of thousands of dollars each year for the chemical treatment of their water supplies, and in light of the mounting pressure on United States President Jimmy Carter to approve this project, despite the proven harmful environmental effects on Canada, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg-Birds Hill (Mr. Blaikie):

That this House instruct the Secretary of State for External Affairs that he should firmly and forcefully remind his American counterpart, during their discussions tomorrow, that the Canadian government expects the United States to honour its commitment under the Boundary Waters Treaty not to pollute to the injury of Canadian health or property and, further, the minister should advise Mr. Vance that the Canadian government is not prepared to accept a Garrison diversion project that permits damaging interbasin biological transfers.

Madam Speaker: The presentation of such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

GOVERNMENT EXPENDITURES

SALARY OF MICHAEL PITFIELD—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Tom Cossitt (Leeds-Grenville): Madam Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, concerning the fact that two years' salary, amounting in total to approximately $150,000, was paid to Michael Pitfield when his position terminated as Secretary to the Cabinet following the May 22, 1979, election and he is now back in that position. I would move, seconded by the hon. member for Mississauga South (Mr. Blenkarn):

That the Prime Minister clarify forthwith to the House whether or not Mr. Pitfield, on his return to the position of Secretary to the Cabinet and Clerk of the Privy Council after only nine months absence therefrom, refunded to the public treasury, as one would expect, the unused portion of the two years' salary payment; and, finally, the Prime Minister also clarify whether or not Mr. Pitfield, as required by conflict of interest guidelines, declared the existence of a consulting firm known as N. Michael Pitfield Investments Limited, or at least the fact whether he has or is in the process of divesting himself of any interest in such a company.

INSTALLATION OF RADAR AT VICTORIA INTERNATIONAL—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter of continuing and urgent, pressing necessity in virtue of the provisions of Standing Order 43.

It being statistically established that traffic at Victoria international airport by both jet-powered and propeller-driven aircraft has increased considerably over the past decade—in fact, nearly doubling in that period of time—and recognizing that the growing mix of propeller and jet-driven aircraft heightens the risk of accident, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. McKinnon):

That this House urge the government to proceed without further delay in securing Treasury Board approval for the proposals of the previous government to instal radar, as a matter of top priority, at Victoria international airport.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

POLITICAL PARTIES

SUGGESTED NAME CHANGE FOR NDP—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. In view of the fact that on Sunday the Ontario New Democratic Party passed a resolution censuring the federal NDP on its foreign policy during the 1980 election, thus creating a split on the NDP commitment to withdraw from NATO and the North American Air Defence Command, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Manicouagan (Mr. Maltais):

That the NDP change its name to the "Newly Divided Party" and that the Minister of Labour immediately appoint a conciliator to prevent the lamentable suicide of this party.

REQUEST TASK FORCE REPORT BE REFERRED TO STANDING COMMITTEE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Hon. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Madam Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43 I would like to move a motion. In view of the fact there was a disposition in the last Parliament to have the report of the task force on retirement income policy referred to a special committee of this House, and in view of the interest in this matter, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Rosedale (Mr. Crombie):

That the report of the task force on retirement income policy be referred to the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs.

INTEREST PAID ON CANADA SAVINGS BONDS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. Last evening, the Minister of Finance presented a budget indicating the greatest amount of borrowing in the history of Canada, $11.73 billion.

In view of the fact that interest rates presently being paid on Canada Savings Bonds are significantly less than the 15¾ per cent paid to the "big boys" on treasury bills, and in view of the fact that there is already a run on Canada Savings Bonds by people who have more sense than to lend their money at 12 per cent or less, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Leeds-Grenville (Mr. Cossitt):

That the government do forthwith increase the interest paid on Canada Savings Bonds to 13 per cent on all bond issues outstanding, to the maturity of those bond issues.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

INQUIRY OF THE MINISTRY

HIRING OF UNSUCCESSFUL LIBERAL CANDIDATES IN WESTERN CANADA—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. In light of the fact that the Minister of Employment and Immigration two weeks ago announced the appointment of an unsuccessful Liberal federal candidate for Calgary West as his special adviser for western Canada, and that the same minister last week appointed three unsuccessful Liberal candidates in Manitoba to comprise a task force studying native employment and assistance programs, and that there are currently native people in Manitoba with knowledge and experience in these programs who were not appointed, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg-Birds Hill (Mr. Blaikie):

That this House condemns the blatant abuse of ministerial powers by the Minister of Employment and Immigration in an attempt to revitalize the western Liberal party at the expense of the taxpayers of Canada.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

FINANCE

TREASURY BOARD APPROVAL OF FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF MINISTER OF FINANCE

Hon. Sinclair Stevens (York-Peel): Madam Speaker, in the wake of the debacle last night, I should like to direct my question to the President of the Treasury Board. As that minister knows, under the Financial Administration Act the Treasury Board has clear responsibility for all government financial management, including expenditures.

Would the hon. gentleman tell the House whether the Treasury Board was fully familiarized with the statement made by the Minister of Finance prior to its delivery last night, including the expenditure jump of $7.9 billion, the greatest one-year jump in Canadian history; and, if so, did they approve it?

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (President of the Treasury Board): Madam Speaker, it seems to me the statement made last night speaks for itself, and it is fully supported by Treasury Board.

Mr. Stevens: Again to the President of the Treasury Board, who has indicated that, indeed, he is only a token President of the Treasury Board. Would he tell the House whether he agrees that the deficit announced last night—which amounts to more than $500 for every man, woman and child in this country—will, in fact, be most inflationary and will crowd out financing in other fields, including the private and public sectors?

Mr. Johnston: It appears to me that that question would be more appropriately directed to the Minister of Finance, who is responsible for fiscal policy and for the over-all expenditure plan of the government. As he indicated in his comments last night, the expenditure plan is being fleshed out and will be available within a reasonable time.

Mr. Stevens: I can only take it from that comment that the minister has not read section 5, in particular, of the Financial Administration Act, and that he does not know his responsibilities to this House.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stevens: The Treasury Board is responsible for financial management and expenditure. Does the minister not agree that unless he gets some clout in cabinet and starts trimming the expenditure of these big spenders, the only recourse open to the Minister of Finance is going to be to increase taxation in the country which will place a needless load on the citizens of Canada?

Mr. Johnston: Let me assure the House that I am fully aware of my responsibilities as President of the Treasury Board. Unlike my predecessor, I have no intention of trying to usurp the position which is so ably handled by the Minister of Finance.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Johnston: As a matter of fact, I shall be making a full statement during the debate on the throne speech concerning my own, personal philosophy toward my role as Treasury Board president, perhaps later this afternoon.

INCREASE IN DEFICIT—PROGRAMS TO BE CUT

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Wellington-Dufferin-Simcoe): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the President of the Treasury Board. Last night's half-budget increases the federal deficit by fully $2.5 billion. Before he meekly agreed to that increase in the deficit, what specific programs did the minister insist be cut by the federal government?

An hon. Member: It was $3.7 billion.

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (President of the Treasury Board): Madam Speaker, if I understand the question correctly, the hon. member is asking me what programs are to be cut in terms of the projected deficit which the numbers given last night suggested to the House.

● (1120)

First, I point out that last night's statement with respect to the deficit, as indicated in the information put forward by the Minister of Finance, does not take account of what other measures may be introduced subsequently this year, and does not take account of the negotiations which will be carried on by my colleague, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. It was clearly indicated last night by the Minister of Finance that that number, at this point, represents a maximum number. I can assure the hon. member that I am continuing with the responsible restraint measures which were begun by this government in 1975 and will continue—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Beatty: Madam Speaker, the President of the Treasury Board now indicates that he insisted that no cuts be made prior to the statement being tabled last night. I would like to ask him about the statement by the Prime Minister on January 12, in Toronto, in which he outlined a five-point Liberal economic platform which included a firm commitment to hold down the growth in expenditures to less than the growth in the gross national product, and to reduce the federal deficit in a phased and orderly way.

Why did the President of the Treasury Board agree to allow these firm commitments to the Canadian people to be broken?

Mr. Johnston: Madam Speaker, I reject any suggestion that I have allowed any commitment to the Canadian people to be broken. It has been, and remains, the intention of this government to reduce the deficit in an orderly way.

EFFECT OF FISCAL MEASURES ON ECONOMIC GROWTH AND JOB CREATION

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance. On December 12 last, when in opposition, the Minister of Finance said that the Conservative budget "last night painted a picture of double-digit inflation, increased unemployment, higher taxes and slower economic growth".

Considering that his statement last night as Minister of Finance painted a virtually identical picture, and considering that the Liberals voted on December 13 on a motion calling for economic growth and job creation, why did the minister last night betray completely his party's commitment which led to the defeat of the Conservative government and to a general election?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I have no hesitation in replying to the hon. member's question as to why we joined with the New Democratic Party in defeating the Conservative government on that night. We did so because we opposed basically the inequitable tax system which was implied in the excise tax on gasoline, and because we opposed the use of that particular tax to finance what we considered to be an inequitable mortgage assistance program.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacEachen: That is the reason we defeated the government. There were other elements in the budget presented by the hon. member for St. John's West which were not pronounced upon and which I have looked at, and some of them I found worth while in the present circumstances and brought back. I am happy that I was able to rescue the hon. member for St. John's West from oblivion.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: Given last night's statement, I am sure the people of Canada will hope that the present Minister of Finance will soon join him in oblivion.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: I remind the minister that what he voted on, as opposed to what he says now, was a motion calling for a reduction in taxes, a reduction in interest rates, and economic stimulation. That is what his party voted for, not for what he just said.

● (1125)

I would like to say, in asking my second question, that considering that in the campaign and in the throne speech the Liberals have committed themselves to regional development programs, and considering that the minister of finance from Nova Scotia has pointed out in the past 24 hours that the statement of the Liberal Minister of Finance last night contains not a thing for regional development, when is this government going to start delivering on its commitments to all those parts of Canada which have not shared in the economic benefits of this land, which the Liberals have been promising for more than a decade?

Mr. MacEachen: Madam Speaker, the hon. member's question gives me an opportunity to explain why I dropped from my statement last night the provision calling for a special tax contract with firms which might decide to locate in regions of underdevelopment. The reason it was dropped is that I concluded that the present DREE program had sufficient flexibility and because, indeed, I could not find out from the material which the hon. member tabled in the House of Commons what was involved in that particular program.

I indicated in my statement last night the continuing concern of the government in regional development, and that presently there is an ongoing review of techniques that might be developed in order to accelerate the process of regional economic development.

PROMISES MADE DURING ELECTION CAMPAIGN

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): The ongoing review and flexibility to which the minister referred has been going on for a decade. Meanwhile, unemployment in Cape Breton remains at about 25 per cent and is unacceptably high throughout Atlantic Canada.

I should like to address my final supplementary question to the Prime Minister. In view of the failure to deliver on promises, not only by the Minister of Finance when he was in the opposition but by the Minister of Employment and Immigration, by the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, and a series of others—including promises made by the Prime Minister himself—would the Prime Minister tell the House what he will say to the people of Canada, who will view his colleagues' and his own statements made before the election as totally unacceptable cynicism, simply guaranteed to win them office instead of producing action for the people of Canada?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I think the hon. gentleman's comments are quite unfair. If he looks at the Speech from the Throne which was read to this Parliament less than ten days ago, he will see that, on the contrary, the Speech from the Throne is a composite of the promises that this party made during the last election. That is the program for this session which we intend to carry out.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

PUBLIC SERVICE

CRITICISM IN REPORT OF AUDITOR GENERAL

Mr. John Gamble (York North): Madam Speaker, my question is for the President of the Treasury Board. In light of the Auditor General's report, tabled in this House last week, referring to deplorable public service inefficiency, and in view of the mini non-budget of last evening of the Minister of Finance, forecasting an additional $3.7 billion in deficit for this year, will the President of the Treasury Board, in pursuing a policy of restraint, explain to the House what specific steps he proposes to take so that the oppressed taxpayers of Canada can receive a fair day's work from their public servants?

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (President of the Treasury Board): Madam Speaker, first of all, the report of the Auditor General will be in front of the Standing Committee on Public Accounts, and the hon. gentleman, who I hope will be an active member of that committee, will have ample opportunity to question the representatives of the Auditor General who can explain how the efficiency studies in question were conducted, and he can make his own evaluation with respect to them.

At the same time, the comments of the Auditor General must be placed in context, and the context is one of over-all management of human resources by the Government of Canada. The hon. member is aware of the existence of the D'Avignon report. We are looking very carefully at the steps we will be taking to improve human resource management, including job retaining, and so on, with specific reference to the D'Avignon report. I hope that in that manner we will be able to improve remarkably the efficiency, or correct some of the inefficiencies that we see. It is a mistake, however, to place the inefficiencies, as the hon. member suggests, on the backs of hardworking public servants themselves.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Johnston: The problem must be placed in the greater context of human resource management, and that is what we intend to do.

• (1130)

Mr. Gamble: Madam Speaker, we now know what "action, and action now," referred to in the Speech from the Throne, means.

An hon. Member: Question.

Mr. Gamble: Given that the Auditor General stated that a possible 85,000 public servants could be eliminated from the public payroll without reducing service in the public service, has the minister established targets and target dates for public service reductions and, if so, what are they?

Mr. Johnston: Madam Speaker, let it be noted in this House that I have no intention of being known as the happy slasher or a closet slasher. I think it is a mistake—

Mr. Kempling: Do you know how to subtract?

Mr. Johnston: —to set targets, particularly those extrapolated from one study, as the hon. member has done. I think this is unfair both to the public service and to the report of the Auditor General.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

LAMBERT REPORT—FIVE-YEAR PROJECTION OF FEDERAL GOVERNMENT SPENDING

Mr. Thomas Siddon (Richmond-South Delta): Madam Speaker, my question is also addressed to the President of the Treasury Board. Does the President of the Treasury Board have at his disposal a five-year projection of federal government spending which is an important expenditure control mechanism as recommended in the Lambert report?

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (President of the Treasury Board): Madam Speaker, of course long-term planning is essential to the management of government resources.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Siddon: Madam Speaker, I take it that the President of the Treasury Board has answered "Yes".

An hon. Member: He said "No".

Mr. Siddon: If that is the case, and recognizing his responsibility to control expenditures, will the President of the Treasury Board table here and now his five-year projections so that Canadians can judge the degree of restraint which he hopes to achieve in government spending over the next five years?

Mr. Johnston: Statements will be made at a later date—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Johnston: —with respect to projections and the government's intention with respect thereto.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

INTEREST RATES ON FARM LOANS

Mr. Vic Althouse (Humboldt-Lake Centre): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance. The non-budget, budget announcements last night avoided taking action on the question of interest rates on farm operating credit, which is in part what the demonstration outside is all about.

What is the minister proposing to do with regard to interest rates on farm operating credit, in light of the emergency situation which producers face in all parts of the country, but most dramatically in the potato producing areas of the maritimes as seeding time approaches?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I believe that the questioning today underlines the dilemma which a minister of finance faces in these current circumstances. I have already been berated by members of the official opposition because of what they describe as increased government spending, and I have the hon. member proposing another expenditure program which, if applied to farmers—however deserving they may be at the present time—would necessitate the application of a similar program to other groups affected in the economy.

My purpose, as I have indicated with respect to home owners, is to attempt to develop techniques which will assist affected groups with a minimum of public expenditure, but with a maximum consideration of the hardships that individuals may face at the present time.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Althouse: Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the Minister of Finance. In light of what he has just said, would the minister then provide a moratorium on all farm debts until such time as the Farm Credit Corporation could be upgraded to include, as well, the administration of the Farm Improvement Loans Act and the granting of operating credits at fixed rates under the Farm Credit Corporation?

Mr. MacEachen: Madam Speaker, for reasons which I have already indicated, it would be impossible to accept the suggestion of the hon. member at the present time.

An hon. Member: Just pass a law.

REDUCTION IN PROGRAMS TO ACHIEVE RESTRAINT ON SPENDING

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Madam Speaker, I wish to direct my question to the President of the Treasury Board. He came to my riding during the election and I would have been glad to see him if he had had the time.

An hon. Member: Question.

Mr. Crouse: Since rises in interest rates and oil import costs will increase spending by something like $2 billion more than was forecast in the December 11 budget for 1980-81, an over-all increase of 13.5 per cent—

An hon. Member: Question.

Mr. Crouse: Hon. gentlemen keep asking for the question. It is not my fault that they have made a mess of the economy. I will get to the question in a minute, if they will just be patient.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crouse: Would the minister indicate what departments or programs he plans to cancel in order to remain within his government's stated restraint program of keeping spending restraints below 10 per cent?

[Translation]

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (President of the Treasury Board): Madam Speaker, I am most flattered by the attention given me today. Frankly, Madam Speaker, I think it would be premature on my part to answer such a question.

PLANS TO REDUCE DEFICIT

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Madam Speaker, I have a brief supplementary question. I am not certain whether I should direct it to the President of the Treasury Board or to the Minister of Finance. Since there is no long-term forecast in the mini-budget presented last evening by the Minister of Finance, I should like to ask him, what yardstick can businessmen in Atlantic Canada or, in fact, what yardstick can businessmen in all of Canada use as a guarantee that he is serious about his plans to reduce progressively the deficit?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I appreciate the hon. member's raising this question, because it gives me an opportunity to reiterate a point which I made in my statement last night and which has been almost totally ignored by comment; namely, that I would like it understood that the projections I outlined last night do not in any way constitute the expenditure plan or the planned financial requirements of this government for the fiscal year 1980-81.

An hon. Member: They are meaningless.

Mr. MacEachen: I thought it was important to give the House and the country—

An hon. Member: What do they mean, then?

Mr. MacEachen: —an up-to-date accounting of the situation as I found it when I assumed my responsibilities as Minister of Finance, and that I did.

An hon. Member: Normally, that is done in a budget.

Mr. MacEachen: These are projections, and I have indicated to the House that I propose to maintain a very tight control on expenditures—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. MacEachen: —that through the introduction of a blended price on oil, we will be able to reduce both financial requirements—

Mr. Clark: And the size of the country.

Mr. MacEachen: —and the deficit by $1 billion over the projection mentioned last night; and that I will be considering, when I frame my budget, revenue measures which undoubtedly would have an effect on any deficit for the fiscal year 1980-81.

An hon. Member: More taxes.

Mr. MacEachen: I want to assure my hon. friend that that is the situation as I defined it last night. He ought not to regard these projections as firm figures which I have accepted as a basis for planning.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

INCREASE IN GOVERNMENT BORROWING—EFFECT ON PROGRAMS

Hon. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance, who last night showed that in tackling our economic problems he has all the courage, determination and ferocity of Robert Burns' little mousie.

In view of the fact that the minister's forecasts show an increase in government borrowing of $3.5 billion and an increase in government spending of $3.7 billion for the present fiscal year, I want to know whether the Minister of Finance has consulted with the Minister of National Health and Welfare, who advised the country on March 23 that she had "done a lot of work in the income tax system" and discovered a hidden tax budget of about $30 billion, including tax breaks which she thinks should be killed and which could be directed into special programs.

With this hidden tax system, with $30 billion in savings in tax expenditures which the Minister of National Health and Welfare has found, has the minister inquired of her where they are? Will he promise us he will bring some of them in so that he can reduce his spending or his budget deficit as a result?

• (1140)

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, the hon. member has a real fascination for mice.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. MacEachen: I would describe him as the mouse which roared on the night of December 11, and whose roar turned into a whimper on the night of December 13.

I just want to tell my hon. friend that I am aware of the proposals, or the ideas that have been put forward by the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Obviously, they would be considered as we seek ways of not only controlling expenditures but, if necessary—and, indeed, if I followed the advice of the hon. member last night, it would be necessary—of levying additional taxes when I bring forward a budget. I appreciate his advance support for any possible increase in taxation.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crosbie: There is nothing less intimidating than a fangless mouse.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Crosbie: The old bite has gone. The Minister of National Health and Welfare has said she wants to have re-examined and, by implication, eliminate exemptions for the aged, the married and for children, as well as those offered corporations.

Is the Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance seriously considering doing away with the income tax exemptions for the aged, the senior citizen, married persons and children? Is that now under contemplation? Would he enlighten the House and enlighten the people in the country who might want to think about these proposals more seriously?

Mr. MacEachen: Madam Speaker, I would like to tell the hon. member something which he already knows, that all these matters are constantly under consideration by any government.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. MacEachen: But I want to assure the hon. member he should not hold his breath in respect of the implementation of any of these proposals which he is putting before me at the present time.

EMPLOYMENT

JOB CREATION PROGRAMS TO REDUCE UNEMPLOYMENT

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Madam Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Employment and Immigration. Given the steady increase in unemployment in recent months—made worse by massive lay-offs in the auto and forest industries—and given the fact that the Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance last night gave no indication of measures to expand the economy and, indeed, predicted an increase in the rate of unemployment in the coming year, will the Minister of Employment and Immigration tell the House whether he is planning any new job-creation strategies, especially those which would help meet the very substantial rate of unemployment of women, young people and natives whose rate of unemployment is reaching alarming proportions?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, in response to the hon. member for Winnipeg North, I would be pleased to point out to him that the question he asked was a simple repetition of a statement we made in the throne speech a week ago Monday, indicating that in fact measures would be taken to develop job programs, particularly those helping women, young people and those with disadvantages in the job market.

I would say, Madam Speaker, that I am very pleased to note the interest of the hon. member for Winnipeg North, and look forward to his support and encouragement when we bring forward legislation and measures into this House to provide those job programs.

Mr. Orlikow: Madam Speaker, given the fact that the minister's government is committed to reducing the number of people working for the government, and given the fact that women and native people who work for the government—in too few numbers—were the last hired and, therefore, in any program of reducing the number of public servants will be the first to be let go, would the minister indicate some of the concrete steps he proposes to take in the near future to meet the needs of those people, rather than just giving us more rhetoric, as he usually does?

Mr. Axworthy: Madam Speaker, it is not rhetoric. It was stated in the throne speech very clearly that we intend to introduce affirmative action programs to make sure that the full working rights of all people, both in the public service and in the public sector, are provided, and to ensure that where there are inequities or inequalities in the work place, the affirmative action programs would aid and assist to overcome those inequalities.

Again, I welcome the hon. member's support when we bring those measures in, because we will need it, compared to the attitude taken by members directly opposite me.

NORTHERN AFFAIRS

SETTLEMENT OF ABORIGINAL CLAIMS IN MACKENZIE DELTA

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. As the minister knows, the former Liberal government had signed an agreement in principle with the COPE organization regarding the settlement of their aboriginal claims in the Mackenzie Delta, which agreement the Conservative government had attempted to unilaterally change or rescind.

Would the minister confirm that he intends to respect the COPE agreement in principle; and when does he intend to proceed with the final agreement and the legislation to implement it?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Yes, Madam Speaker, we do intend as a government to honour the agreement in principle. I have met on a few occasions now—the last time as late as last Friday, I believe—with leaders of COPE, and we discussed the personalities to be considered in terms of a special negotiator to get on with the discussions for implementation. I believe we will be in a position to appoint that special negotiator some time, perhaps, within the next two weeks.

FINANCE

PROPOSALS CONCERNING CAPITAL GAINS TAX

Mr. Gordon Taylor (Bow River): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance. I understood the minister last night to indicate that the capital gains taxes as proposed by the former minister of finance, the hon. member for St. John's West, would not be proceeded with. Since this may well ruin the retirement of many of our farmers, and will kill initiative, is the minister prepared to reconsider this decision?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I did say that it was not my intention to proceed with several items dealing with the treatment of capital gains. As the hon. member may recall, the former finance minister indicated that he would be bringing forward a discussion paper on the question of capital gains.

This is a very serious matter that often times is not fully understood. I thought it would be better to have the discussion paper produced first, and then to proceed in making any changes that might be justified as a result of public discussion of that paper.

Mr. Taylor: Madam Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the minister. Will the minister, then, assure the House that the discussion paper will include consideration of the once-in-a-lifetime exemption for those who finally have to sell outside the family and who often face ruination and have to borrow to pay the capital gains.

The once-in-a-lifetime exemption is a very important item when it accumulates at the end of the lineage. Will the hon. minister assure us that that item is one that will be discussed under the discussion paper?

Mr. MacEachen: Madam Speaker, I would like to discuss the matter with the hon. member to get a broader understanding of his concerns, so that when the discussion paper is produced his concerns may be addressed.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

BOYCOTTING OF OLYMPIC GAMES IN MOSCOW—FINANCIAL COMPENSATION FOR ATHLETES

Mr. Bob Wenman (Fraser Valley West): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. In view of the fact that, should Canada proceed with an Olympic boycott, those called upon to make the greatest sacrifice would be our athletes, and recognizing that most athletes have already given up many months of employment income, have incurred loans and expenses to a considerable extent, will the government—should it proceed with the boycott—make an assessment of those losses to our athletes and provide financial compensation?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, you recognize, of course, that the question is, in its very terms, hypothetical.

• (1150)

Mr. Wenman: A supplementary question, Madam Speaker. In order to end that period of time in which a decision is being made, to reduce those expenses and to allow athletes who are becoming discouraged and are not, perhaps, putting forth all their efforts in anticipation of the boycott, will the Prime Minister make that decision forthwith, in order that the athletes may end their indecision?

[Translation]

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Yes, Madam Speaker.

PENITENTIARIES

SHOWING OF SEX FILM TO INMATES

Mr. Benno Friesen (Surrey-White Rock-North Delta): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Solicitor General. Last fall, the administration of the B.C. pen showed a film to the inmates and the general population. The film was entitled "The Night of the Voyeur"—explicit sex,—and the commissioner of corrections, in justifying this, said that it was shown as part of the policy to provide an environment that, within the limits necessarily dictated by incarceration, emulates the normal.

I should like to ask the Solicitor General if it is the policy of his department to show sex films such as "The Night of the Voyeur", supposedly emulating the normal.

Hon. Bob Kaplan (Solicitor General): Madam Speaker, let me assure the hon. member that I shall look into that matter and be prepared to make a statement about it. In the meanwhile, he will be glad to know that we have decided on, and are planning and have under way, the closing of the B.C. pen.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

ALLEGED ILLEGALITIES COMMITTED BY MEMBERS OF FORCE

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Solicitor General. Yesterday, in this House, the Prime Minister stated that evidence of illegal RCMP activities—so-called disruptive measures—would be turned over forthwith to the provinces involved: Quebec, British Columbia, Alberta and Ontario.

In view of the fact that only heavily edited transcripts of evidence were, in fact, turned over to the provinces, and in view of the fact that the attorney general of Ontario has stated that he is being denied the evidence that he needs in order to prosecute, will the Solicitor General now assure this House that he will, in fact, turn over all evidence—not just edited evidence, but all evidence—of RCMP wrongdoing, to enable such prosecutions to take place?

Hon. Bob Kaplan (Solicitor General): Madam Speaker, I have communicated with the attorneys general and have told them that I would be prepared to discuss with them the evidence that was made available to them last week, following our policy of making the information that they require for the discharge of their responsibilities available to them. I am looking forward to those discussions, and I am prepared to share with them at that time all the evidence I have that I can legally share.

I should point out to the House, however, that the evidence relating to Checkmate—which I understand is the subject of the question—is mostly based on oral reconstruction, and not documents. In connection with that evidence, not very many names are available. Whatever I can make available to them legally, however, I will; and then it will be their decision what to do about it—whether to take action, and when to take action. That is their responsibility, and I want to support them in their discharge of it.

Mr. Robinson (Burnaby): Madam Speaker, of course, the reason that the evidence is largely oral reconstruction is that the files were in fact destroyed. My supplementary is to the Minister of Justice. Yesterday, the Prime Minister told this House that evidence of breaches of federal statutes by the RCMP would be turned over to provincial attorneys general for possible prosecution.

Will the Minister of Justice now confirm that, in fact, the responsibility for prosecutions under the Post Office Act and the Income Tax Act lies with himself, the federal attorney general, and not with the provincial attorneys general, as the Prime Minister suggested yesterday. In view of this, will the Minister of Justice tell this House what action he intends to take to ensure that there will be prosecution where there has been evidence of criminal wrongdoing by the RCMP?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Justice and Minister of State for Social Development): Madam Speaker, I do not think that the Prime Minister indicated yesterday that any violation should be turned over to provincial attorneys general. As Attorney General of Canada, I will take my responsibilities if it is necessary to prosecute under my mandate. However, under criminal law, it rests with provincial attorneys general to lodge proceedings and we will provide the necessary information. At this time, Madam Speaker, no decision has been taken. We are studying the records and it will be probably advisable to wait until the McDonald commission winds up.

CULTURAL AFFAIRS

FUNDING OF VANCOUVER ART GALLERY

Miss Pat Carney (Vancouver Centre): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Secretary of State concerning the Vancouver art gallery. Since provincial government commitments and private pledges totalling almost $4.5 million are dependent on federal funding, is it the minister's intention to honour the commitment made by his predecessor to provide $4 million toward the conversion of the old court house into Vancouver's art gallery?

Hon. Francis Fox (Secretary of State and Minister of Communications): Madam Speaker, I thank the hon. member for her question. I should like to add my congratulations on her appointment as official opposition critic on matters concerning the Secretary of State.

I should like to point out that there were a number of campaign promises—I really mean campaign promises—made by my immediate predecessor during the election campaign. I do not believe they were really commitments made by the previous government; I think, in fact, they were campaign promises, and in that sense I am reviewing all of them.

The hon. member has mentioned one, but if I looked at the whole series of campaign promises made by my immediate predecessor in the months of January and February, 1980, there would not be any revenue left in my department to honour any other intentions of funding in the arts and cultural communities.

I should also like to point out to the hon. member that there would be a great deal more money available to the cultural and artistic communities had not the previous government entered that sweetheart deal with the provinces by which they reduced, by a number of millions of dollars, the moneys available to those communities in Canada.

INDUSTRY

FINANCIAL SUPPORT TO CHRYSLER OF CANADA

Hon. Michael Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. A number of estimates have been given about the size of the possible support to Chrysler (Canada) Limited—$250 million, $500 million, $750 million. I ask the minister if he could give some indication to the House today of the level the government is considering for this support. Also, could he advise the House under what authority the aid would be provided?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Madam Speaker, the matter is still under negotiation and is being considered by ministers, so I do not think it would be appropriate to indicate a figure. As to the program in question, if it involves—as it may primarily, or perhaps even totally—loan guarantees, then there would be the provision whereby Parliament approves the loan guarantee activity by the government.

Mr. Stevens: When?

Mr. Wilson: A supplementary question, Madam Speaker. Last week, a motion was made by the hon. member for Halton asking that the government place this matter before a standing committee of the House for consideration. Is it the intention of the minister to follow through on that motion, or will a decision be taken prior to any consideration of the matter by the House?

Mr. Gray: Madam Speaker, the matter of committee consideration of the operations of the auto industry and the auto pact is something I certainly want to discuss with the House leaders.

Mr. Wilson: Prior to a decision?

Mr. Gray: But it may well be necessary for a decision to be reached on this by the government before the kind of consideration can take place that my hon. friend and his colleagues have in mind.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

AID FOR MICHELIN TIRE—DISCUSSIONS WITH PREMIER OF NOVA SCOTIA

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley-Hants): Madam Speaker, in view of the fact that the hon. member for Hamilton Mountain has, unfortunately, confused the problems of the car industry with problems of development in other parts of Canada, I wish to put a question to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion.

As this question involves joint expenditures of the federal and provincial governments, however, I know that the Minister of Finance is fully aware of the problem. Could he assure this House that the Michelin application under DREE, a national policy of both governments, will be considered on its merits, and will not become involved in any other confusion and/or problems of other industries in other parts of the country? Has he recently had discussions with the Premier of Nova Scotia, and when can we except an announcement?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I had discussions with Premier Buchanan last weekend by telephone and the earlier weekend, in person—at his request—on a number of development matters affecting Nova Scotia. One of the items we talked about was Michelin.

● (1200)

I want to assure the hon. member that the government proposes to consider that application in the usual way and to consider the important income and employment results it would bring to the province of Nova Scotia. It is our hope that we can conclude the discussion very early and have the matter decided.

CULTURAL AFFAIRS

FINANCIAL ASSISTANCE—LIST OF COMMITMENTS OF GOVERNMENT

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Secretary of State. Would the Secretary of State place upon the table of the House of Commons a list of all the commitments by the Government of Canada to the advancement of culture and arts in the country which he is contemplating breaking?

Hon. Francis Fox (Secretary of State and Minister of Communications): Madam Speaker, I would be delighted to table with the House a list of all the campaign promises made by my predecessor during the course of the election campaign. I would be delighted to do that, indeed. I would also be interested in seeing whether they were commitments made by the previous government, whether these campaign promises have gone through the process of Treasury Board and cabinet approval, and whether they were indeed campaign promises, as I believe they are.

[Translation]

Mr. Clark: Madam Speaker, I am afraid the Secretary of State did not understand the question I put to him.

[English]

The question I put was whether he will put upon the table a list of those clear commitments by the Government of Canada which his government is now considering breaking.

Mr. Fox: Madam Speaker, at the moment I am reviewing all of the requests that have been made to us by the cultural community throughout the country.

An hon. Member: Answer the question.

Mr. Andre: The question was fairly simple.

[Translation]

Mr. Fox: Madam Speaker, here is my reply to the question of the hon. member. I am now going over all requests addressed to me in that field, which come from all parts of the country. I should like to indicate to the former prime minister, the present Leader of the Opposition, that we would be in a far better position to meet those requests if his government had not reduced by, I believe, some seven or eight million dollars, the funds his immediate predecessor, the present Prime Minister of Canada, had made available to help those who labour in the arts. Indeed, the amounts now available to give assistance in the fields of arts and culture have been reduced as a result of the steps taken by his government.

PRIVILEGE

MR. BAKER (NEPEAN-CARLETON)—ECONOMIC REMARKS OF MINISTER OF FINANCE

Hon. Walter Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Madam Speaker, I gave you notice last night, and again today, of a matter which my colleagues and I believe is a very real question of privilege and which is a substantial invasion of the rights of members of Parliament.

I believe that what we saw last night was not, as the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) tried to pretend, a mere summary of the economic situation in Canada or a list of measures which did not go as far as a budget would go. His presentation had the essential ingredients which this House should be able to debate, amend, approve or disapprove within the procedures that have been established for a budgetary matter in this House. That is why I described what happened last evening as an attempt to sneak a budget matter into the throne speech debate without the usual protection and privileges given to members of Parliament and, indeed, to the public with respect to budgetary presentation.

I want to make it clear at the outset that I have studied the applicable precedents. I know that ways and means motions have been introduced without a budget presentation. That is a practice that has been accepted in the past, even though objections have been raised. I know that economic statements have been brought into debate at the resolution stage or at Committee of the Whole stage on income tax measures. We all remember the statement made to the House on October 20, 1977, during the throne speech by the present Minister of Justice (Mr. Chrétien) when he was minister of finance.

I contend, Madam Speaker, that the minister has leaped beyond all of these precedents and has presented a mini-budget to this House while denying to members of Parliament their right to debate and to amend a motion of approval which he would be putting to this House. That is the fundamental difference between the practice that we saw yesterday and what has occurred in the past. No doubt, Madam Speaker, you will have the occasion to examine Beauchesne, but if I could refer you to Beauchesne's fifth edition, citation 515, we find the following statement:

> There is no necessity to have a budget presentation before the introduction of ways and means legislation.

I agree with that statement. It makes sense to give the minister freedom to introduce some changes without a six-day debate. The citation is derived from a point of order raised by my friend, the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert), on March 20, 1972. On that occasion, the Speaker ruled that there was nothing wrong with bringing forward income tax measures from a previous budget without a new presentation. In turn, he was partially relying on a ruling made on October 22, 1962, at which time the then minister of finance had made a detailed economic statement at the resolution stage of an income tax ways and means motion.

There were objections to the procedure in 1962. But we should remember that there have been changes in the rules since 1962. We should remember that the House was able to debate a ways and means motion under the then existing rules. On that occasion, unanimous consent was given to allow the debate to be of a general economic one—quite different from the case last evening. At that time, the House was debating only one type of ways and means motion, and that was to amend the Income Tax Act.

In 1972, the House was again debating one type of change, again an Income Tax Act amendment. This was still a limited curtailment of the rights of the House because, by this time, the six-day budget debate had replaced the right to debate ways and means motions and the House debated only the bill. As everyone knows, the then government went further during the throne speech on October 20, 1977—just another step in the process of erosion. The then government made an economic statement and gave notice of ways and means motions regarding the Income Tax Act and the income tax application rules.

It is noteworthy that these measures were dependent on future administrative action or future amendments to the Income Tax Act and did not take effect immediately. There were no increases, only reductions. There were no amendments outlined to statutes other than the Income Tax Act.

Last night, despite the press statement, there were amendments; there were increases. Last night's case was completely different from the statement in 1977, which my friend no doubt would rely upon as some kind of precedent. Last night, we saw the full machinery of budgetary presentations and a full range of economic measures. The minister's only defence is that he lacked the courage to face all our economic problems and promised us another budget some time in the future. That is an apology, not a procedural argument, Madam Speaker.

Let us go over what happened last night. There were lock-ups for the press representatives because there was an opportunity to profit outside this House from advance knowledge. The minister spoke from a carefully prepared budget text. He even began his remarks at 8 p.m. on Monday, which is a traditional budget hour. He gave us a forecast of Canada's economic prospects and the projected deficit. More important, he tabled ways and means motions on all of the usual budgetary statutes. There are amendments to the Income Tax Act, the income tax application rules, the Excise Tax Act, and the Customs Act. Some of these provisions took effect at midnight last night. This is what happens when a budget is presented.

This was no statement. This was no summary that the minister was giving us. This was a real budget which today—as of midnight last night—is taking money out the pockets of Canadians. It is quite a different situation from that which occurred in 1977. These measures were drawn from a budget that was specifically rejected by this House and put forward by a government which was defeated largely on the terms of that budget.

The minister has no right whatsoever to pick and choose and say that the House and the electorate liked this, or did not like this or that tax. He must submit the statement of budgetary policy to this House and receive the general approval of the House in the terms of the usual motion. As great a parliamentarian as the hon. gentleman may be, he has no right to draw some sort of mystical mandate from the House and set a budgetary course for Canada by executive decree. That is precisely what he tried to do last night.

● (1210)

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): There have been previous mini-budgets that have followed the proper procedures, and this should have been done last night. It is silly to point to the speech that my colleague from St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie) made last summer and say that he is doing the same thing. The former minister of finance, the hon. member for St. John's

West, is here and is prepared to deny that, and I deny that to the House. My colleague said he would proceed with measures contained in a budget that had been approved by the House and which did not take immediate effect, as some of the minister's measures did last night. That is quite a significant difference.

I believe, Madam Speaker, that this is the first procedural point of substance of which you have had to hear argument. I say to you, with the greatest respect, that I think we have travelled too far down the road to submit this House of Commons to ministerial convenience. Because the normal procedures were not followed in this case, our rights as members of Parliament, and the rights of the people we represent here, have been abrogated by the process that we saw last night. That is why the question of privilege was raised last night.

We received no formal notice of the budget speech that we would have under the proper rules. We have no automatic right of debate and reply: Mr. Deputy Speaker confirmed that for us last night. We cannot move an amendment. All of those rights are vested in us as MPs, under the budget process, for the protection of the people of the country, and those rights were abrogated by the process that was used by the Minister of Finance last night.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Last night, an economic direction was established for this country without the approval of the House of Commons. That is an abrogation of the right of Parliament and the right of the people. The fact that the minister was afraid to face all of the country's problems in this budget does not mean that a new direction has not been established. It has been established.

If we allow this, Madam Speaker, what next? What else are we going to have? What other kinds of attempts are we going to have to abrogate the rights of members and the public? We will end up hearing a full-scale budgetary address after the House leader moves a motion "that this House notes with interest the economic remarks of the Minister of Finance", if this keeps on. The necessity of following the provisions of Standing Order 60 at any time is on the verge of being annihilated by the processes that we saw last night. I do not think it is an auspicious beginning for the government House leader to have given that kind of advice to the Minister of Finance.

The House is piling precedent upon precedent to remove from its members the right to vote general approval of budgetary policy. Last night, the precedent—if it is a precedent, and I hope it is not—the attempt at establishing a precedent was a giant leap forward in the abrogation of the rights of members of Parliament in terms of the budgetary process.

I think this is a very serious question. I have argued it at some length. I do not want it to end there; I do not think it should end there. I am, therefore, proposing the following motion:

Privilege—Mr. W. Baker

That the matter of the erosion of the rights of the House of Commons to approve the general budgetary policy of the government, particularly as revealed in the procedure followed by the Minister of Finance in his presentation to the House on Monday, April 21, 1980, during the debate on the Address in Reply to the Speech from the Throne, be referred to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections.

That motion is seconded by the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen). This is a question and a matter that should be stopped, and it should be stopped now. There are budgetary processes that could have been observed by the Minister of Finance. If the Minister of Finance had been doing his job in terms of the economic problems facing this country, we would not have had this pirating of the process: we would have had a budget, a real budget, with real protection, with all of the rights and privileges of hon. members observed, and the public protected with all of the statements that were made long before now.

At this point we have this trampling on the procedures of this House, which are there for good reason, for the sake of allowing the minister to avoid his responsibilities to the public of Canada. I do not think this could be allowed to happen in this House of Commons. Therefore, I move my motion for the consideration of the House.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I conclude that the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Baker) is describing my statement last night as a budget. The hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie), over television, said it was not a budget last night. He said it was not a mini-budget.

Mr. Crosbie: Minnie Mouse.

Mr. MacEachen: He said it was a Minnie Mouse statement. The two frontbenchers are sitting so close together I will not repeat the description of unity which the hon. member for St. John's West described during the campaign that existed between his leader and himself; but surely these two frontbenchers, sitting so close together, should decide what it was. The hon. member for Nepean-Carleton says it is a budget, and the finance critic says it is not. I agree with the finance critic on that matter. I want in a sense to review with the House the situation which I faced in becoming Minister of Finance.

Mr. Crosbie: This is a sob story.

Mr. MacEachen: It is not a sob story unless one would weep at the deficiencies of the former minister.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crosbie: Which one?

Mr. MacEachen: The situation that I faced was that there were ways and means motions which had been tabled in the House by the former minister of finance that had not yet received parliamentary approval.

Mr. Nielsen: They died.

Mr. MacEachen: I faced the additional fact that there were ways and means motions which had been tabled by the hon. member for St. John's West that were still there.

Mr. Blenkarn: They died.

Mr. MacEachen: The hon. member ought to remember that there were many people out in the country in the business community who were calling the department and writing to me asking what disposition I intended to make of the unfinished business arising from the budget of the present Minister of Justice (Mr. Chrétien) and the ways and means motions arising from the budget of the hon. member for St. John's West.

Mr. Clark: They are separate matters.

Mr. MacEachen: They wanted answers. I wanted to deal with that as quickly as possible in order to clear up the uncertainty. It is very surprising to me that the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton should overlook recent history. What made the statement last night a budget if it was a budget? What is a budget? Is the tabling of ways and means motions the essence of a budget? I argue that the tabling of ways and means motions is not, in itself, the essence of a budget. If that were the case, the hon. member for St. John's West would have presented two budgets in the only session of the last Parliament.

● (1220)

Standing Order 61(1) reads:

A notice of a ways and means motion may be laid upon the Table of the House at any time during a sitting day by a minister of the Crown but such a motion may not be proposed in the same sitting.

In other words, it is possible to table the motion but it is not possible to ask for concurrence. That practice has been followed by other ministers of finance. It was followed by my predecessor when on October 25 last he laid upon the Table notices of ways and means motions. In fact, on October 25 he moved that those ways and means motions be concurred in, both a ways and means motion to amend the Income Tax Act laid upon the Table on Tuesday, October 23—two days earlier—and a motion to amend the income tax application rules laid upon the table Tuesday, October 23, 1979.

These were not insignificant measures which were reintroduced by the hon. member for St. John's West. The tabling of the ways and means motions for the Income Tax Act and Customs Tariff amendments were contained in the budget of November 16, 1978. The new income tax motion—I draw this to the attention of the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton—significantly altered one of the measures, namely, the application of the small business tax rate to professionals. That income tax ways and means motion relieved and tightened.

In addition, there was a tabling of a ways and means motion for sales and excise tax changes from the November 16, 1978, budget. Was it a minuscule event? It certainly had broader implications than any step I took, because it contained $1 billion in tax reductions, and some tax increases. These were motions laid upon the Table by the former minister of finance last October.

I draw to your attention, Madam Speaker, that in the summer the minister issued a press release in which he gave notice that he would be tabling these ways and means motions. One hon. member made a point about the fact that the general motion relating to the budget had been defeated, and that therefore, for some reason, these motions should not be revived in any way.

An hon. Member: They are not ways and means motions.

Mr. MacEachen: Of course they are ways and means motions. The ways and means motions which I tabled last night were never dealt with by the former Parliament. They were never called. They were never concurred in. They were never defeated, and they were not approved. Neither thing happened to these particular ways and means motions. It is a travesty to suggest that the defeat or the carrying of the particular general motion on the budget presentation predetermined the result of the ways and means motions.

Let me explain to the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark): his minister of finance brought in ways and means motions which had been presented by a defeated government and which had been voted against by his party on the main budget resolution. So you cannot have it both ways. The former minister of finance brought in these ways and means motions because he thought they were good, even though his party had voted against his predecessor's budget and even though the government which had introduced these ways and means motions had been defeated in the campaign.

Mr. Clark: But not in the House.

Mr. MacEachen: Not in the House, but which is the more important—the House or the people of Canada?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacEachen: That is a red herring which has been drawn by the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton. His argument is a red herring. What I did was to revive motions which were tabled by the former minister of finance, and what he did was to revive motions which had been tabled by his predecessor, the present Minister of Justice. If I had to go through the formality of a budget presentation to accomplish that, I ask the hon. member why he did not do that himself.

An hon. Member: The circumstances were different.

Mr. MacEachen: What else did I do after I had revived some of these motions? I thought hon. members opposite would welcome the fact that I had accepted and brought back into the House certain measures which they thought were important. I did not bring in any new measures, not a single new tax measure. Except for some technical modifications, they are exactly the same motions. I thought hon. members would welcome them. I thought the Leader of the Opposition would welcome the fact that I had brought in the small business development bond, which was the only item in the budget to which he referred in his speech on leaders' day. But here they are raising questions about the actions I took.

In addition to tabling these ways and means motions, I gave information on the expenditure situation. This was done by the former president of the treasury board, and the minister of finance, in a most voluminous way before Parliament was called. Never given to Parliament. Is that a budget? I cannot understand why on this occasion, when motions are tabled and when, openly, they are tabled in the context of a speech which explains all the tax changes which are being reintroduced, a speech which gives information on the expenditure situation, the opposition should complain about an abrogation of the rights of Parliament. Why should they describe it as an abrogation of the rights of Parliament?

I carefully considered the precedents, Madam Speaker. I want to assure you that I considered very carefully whether I was in any way departing from a practice which had already been accepted by this House. Also, I wanted to make sure that nobody was caught by surprise. I wanted to make sure that I was making a statement in the context of the debate on the Speech from the Throne so that hon. members opposite would be alerted and so that if they wished to comment, criticize or condemn, they would have three or four additional days in which to do so. I was not concerned about the procedural ground, which I found very solid; I was concerned about the broad parliamentary character, namely, whether members opposite would have a fair chance to comment on anything I had done.

● (1230)

Last week, I called up the hon. member for St. John's West and told him I was going to make a speech last night. I tried to reach the financial critic of the New Democratic Party last week to tell him, but instead I conveyed the information to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) last week, alerting him that I was to make a speech on Monday night in which they ought to be interested, and to reserve their opportunity to speak after I did.

Mr. Clark: So you misled them too.

Mr. MacEachen: I indicated in general terms what I intended to do. Yesterday, if hon. members were alert, they would have noticed that I walked across the floor and sat with the hon. member for St. John's West and expanded upon my intentions, and I did the same thing with the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. So I cannot understand why there is indignation at the procedure.

Mr. Clark: Because it is wrong, Allan.

Mr. MacEachen: I hope the indignation is not very serious.

Mr. Clark: It is profound.

Mr. MacEachen: I hope it is a vigilance which oppositions normally show, and that it is not an attempt to reflect upon a practice which has been followed by the former minister and other ministers of finance.

Mr. Clark: That is not true, Allan, and you know it.

Mr. MacEachen: If I had brought in new tax measures—

Mr. Clark: Which you have.

Mr. MacEachen: —and if I had established a firm expenditure and revenue plan for 1980-81, then hon. members might conclude that it was a budget. I ask them to go to Erskine May and get a definition of a budget. I ask them to go to Beauchesne and get the definition of a budget and, if that is not sufficiently clear and lucid to indicate that what I did last night was not a formal budget presentation, I ask them to go to the Oxford dictionary. All three of them will illustrate very vividly that what happened last night was obviously a speech relating to the finances of the country and to the economy, and the tabling of ways and means motions.

Mr. Nielsen: And imposing taxes.

Mr. MacEachen: But it certainly was not a budget. The hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) says it was a budget because I imposed taxes.

Mr. Nielsen: Without debate.

Mr. MacEachen: The hon. member for St. John's West did the very same thing.

Mr. Nielsen: Not without notice.

Mr. MacEachen: His motions, if the hon. member for Yukon had read them—which he tabled—raised taxes by several hundred million dollars.

Mr. Nielsen: That is specious.

Mr. MacEachen: If they had been called, those motions would have been debated in the normal way.

Miss MacDonald: "If".

Mr. MacEachen: The hon. lady for Kingston and the Islands (Miss MacDonald) says "If". It is not my fault if her party has the capacity to self-destruct at critical times. I do not want to add any acrimony to the debate, but I stand by the statement I have made and say that the hon. member for St. John's West and hon. members of the New Democratic Party have plenty of opportunity to comment on what I did. No rights have been taken away in that sense. In fact, I think I have gone to good lengths to give them an opportunity to comment, because I could have tabled all these ways and means motions just by standing in the House and saying, "I table these ways and means motions, every one of them", and I would have done exactly what the hon. member for St. John's West did. I could have done that, and I am being attacked—

Mr. Clark: Poor Allan.

Mr. MacEachen: —because I took the additional step of providing additional information to the House of Commons in an effort to demonstrate that this is an open government and ready to tell the House of Commons all the facts.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Madam Speaker, I doubt if anyone would contend that last night was one of Parliament's finest hours.

Mr. Nowlan: We wasted an hour.

Mr. Knowles: As a matter of fact, I believe what happened is a matter of serious concern. We may be able to argue from both sides on the basis of the rules and the citations, but in my view what happened goes deeper than that. I shall come to what I have in mind in a moment, but first I should like to comment on one or two points of detail.

I was deeply disturbed last evening when I heard the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie), who at that time was trying to get the floor, say that there had been an agreement among the whips that he would follow the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen). I take it that the phrase "the whips" is an all-inclusive one which can include whips and House leaders; but I say on my behalf and on behalf of the whip of this party, the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville (Mr. Nystrom), that we had not been consulted on that point at all. We had not been told a word about the possibility of the hon. member for St. John's West following the Minister of Finance.

Mr. Nystrom: Shame on John.

Mr. Knowles: The Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Collenette) came over and talked to me during the latter part of the afternoon about the arrangements which were being made so that the Minister of Finance would get on at eight o'clock. That arrangement involved having two Conservative speakers in a row just before six o'clock. Did I object? Not at all. But there was no suggestion at all as to what would happen after the Minister of Finance spoke.

I went to the Chair several times to make sure that the name of the hon. member for Winnipeg-St. James (Mr. Keeper) was in the place which had been assigned to him, and it was. There was no question at all about the order of speakers. Therefore, although I was not surprised at the hon. member for St. John's West trying to get the floor, I am surprised, shocked and disturbed to learn that there was some kind of consultation with people who may have had authority but perhaps did not have authority, but in which we were not involved. The President of the Privy Council (Mr. Pinard) came over to me last night and said that he did not know about it, but the word "hanky-panky" is not too strong to use about this kind of thing.

An hon. Member: I can think of some better ones.

Mr. Knowles: I just remind the two older parties in this House that there are three parties here, and that the work of this House will proceed much better if we are all consulted on matters of this kind.

Before I get to what I think is the most serious part of this whole matter, may I say that I am not as greatly impressed by the indignation of my friends to the right as they might expect me to be. I had a feeling last night, and I have it again today, that they cannot attack the budget—budget or non-budget, whatever it was—brought in last night by the Minister of Finance because it was the same as the budget they brought in.

An hon. Member: No.

Mr. Knowles: Oh, just about the same. So instead they are attacking the Minister of Finance on the procedure that he used. However, this kind of procedure has been tried one way and another across the years. The Minister of Finance referred to the press release last summer by the former minister of finance. I remember long ago, before some of my hon. colleagues were born, that Mr. Abbott brought in taxation by announcing it over the radio.

● (1240)

If you want to read the debate on procedure, which was dramatic and went on for a long time, go back to about 1948 when we contended that taxes should be announced in the House of Commons, not over the radio. That was before the days of television. I also remember the last time we had a Conservative government before the one of last year, the one headed by the late Right Hon. John G. Diefenbaker. We had a minister of finance by the name of Donald Fleming at that time. He was like the present Minister of Finance. He did not want to bring in a budget; he wanted to find some way of getting around it. So when in December, 1957, we were discussing estimates— in those days we dealt with estimates on the floor of the House, instead of shipping them off to committees—Mr. Fleming rose during the course of a debate on estimates and gave us what in effect was a budget speech.

All of the arguments that we have heard today, that it is a mini-budget, a non-budget, a "mousey" budget—we heard all of that at that time, and the debate went on for hours. In the end, the Tories won the day and Mr. Fleming was allowed to present his resolutions and to make budget proposals. But what annoyed us was that he was a minister of finance who did not want to bring in a budget, yet he had to tell the House how things were going and he had to propose certain taxes, so he chose an unusual way of doing what the House prefers to be done according to the practices surrounding a budget presentation.

So, Madam Speaker, there is a lot of work for you and those at the table to do in reading the precedents before you make a ruling as to whether the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton has a point of privilege in precise procedural terms. But, as I said earlier, despite the fact that I have taken a crack or two at my friends to the right who have raised this issue, I think it is very important that we get this sorted out. The Minister of Finance can argue until he is blue in the face—Tory blue, in fact—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Knowles: —that in the debate on the Address in Reply to the Speech from the Throne a member can speak about anything, so that includes him and he can make a speech about anything he wants.

An hon. Member: Or about nothing.

Mr. Knowles: He can also argue that under Standing Order 66(1) he can give notice of a ways and means motion any time in the House of Commons. He can argue that there have been times when we have avoided a general budget debate. But this is an unusual Parliament. It was elected after the previous government was here for just a short time. I will not go into the motives of the last two elections, except to say that most of us realize that both of them were elections in which people were voting against something. But this government has been elected with a majority although many people in the country do not have confidence in it. They have the majority of seats and they can stay here, if they hold their numbers, for four or five years. But it is terribly important for this government to establish the feeling that it is trying to be fair and that it has lost its old arrogance.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles: Just before this session started, Madam Speaker, I became involved in one of those radio programs that abound around here, and I was asked how I thought the Liberals would perform. Being a generous soul who gives people the benefit of the doubt, I said, "Well, maybe they were chastised by those few months out of office and maybe they will not have their old arrogance."

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Knowles: I am sorry I said it, Madam Speaker, because that is what we are faced with now. It is a government which feels that because it has a majority, because it has the power, it can do things any way it wants to. As I said, the minister can argue from now until doomsday that he has the procedural right. But I do not think he had the moral or the parliamentary right to do something that went beyond what the House felt was the way to deal with budget measures.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles: The very fact that we are having this discussion today means that there was some question about the way this government is going to run Parliament. I think that the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark), when he was prime minister, made a mistake when he said—as he did so often—he and his colleagues intended to govern as if they had a majority, which they did not have. I think that was part of the reason for his downfall. But, Madam Speaker, I think, what we have now is even worse. We have a government which, of course, has a majority but it is acting as though it owned the whole store, as though there were nobody else here and it could do what it wanted to do.

The Minister of Finance says that he made known to the Conservatives and to us—through me, in this case—what was planned. It is true that he spoke to me last week about his intention to speak last night. I asked him quite openly whether it was going to be a budget speech. He answered, "No, it is going to be a statement setting out what we are going to do with these two left-over budgets and what our general plans are". It was more of a procedural matter than it was a budget speech.

Some hon. Members: Shame.

Mr. Knowles: Yesterday, when it got around because of a press notice that it looked more like a budget speech, we had another conversation and I asked him again, "Will it be a mini-budget or will it just be a procedural matter?" I was even called by the CBC and asked my opinion, because apparently they were wrestling with the proposition that they might put the minister's speech on live last night. I said, "I think you are making a mistake, because the minister tells me it is not a mini-budget." Well, this is a matter of definition, and the minister still says it is not. I took his word for it, and I even argued with some of my colleagues and some of the press, saying, "Let us not get hot and bothered about this." But when I saw the document at seven o'clock and heard the minister read it at eight o'clock, I felt it went beyond the simple procedural explanation which the minister had indicated was going to be the nub of that budget.

I feel that that being the case, he should have had much more discussion with the representatives of the two parties on this side to see how to handle the matter. He did not want to bring in a budget—sometimes, I think, just like Donald Fleming in 1957 who did not want to bring in a budget—so he dragged it in this way. This minister is not ready to bring in a budget, but he felt there were certain financial matters he had to bring forward, and he brought them in this way. As I said, he can quote Standing Order 60, he can quote the rules and the precedents regarding the throne speech debate, and we will have a hard time persuading Your Honour that you have to rule that what he did is out of order. But it is not good for the life of this Parliament and for the confidence of the people of this country—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles: —if we get the feeling that the government is just going to run things the way it wants. I contend, Madam Speaker, that this government, with its majority, should be more careful and more sensitive about the opposition than the minority government had to be last time. They took their life in their hands, and we know what happened. But we are here now for three, four or five years and it is terribly important for the country to get the impression that this Parliament is working together well. I do not think that what happened last night would give that impression.

The Minister of Finance says that he has leaned over backwards, he has done this on day five of the throne speech debate and there are three days left. This is the argument every time. It was the argument in the Donald Fleming case in 1957 and it has been the argument, in all those instances where budgets were bootlegged in in some other way, that members can still speak. But in the throne speech debate, especially in the first session of a new Parliament, there are many new members wanting to speak. There are a dozen or more in our party who would like to speak and do not have a chance. We cannot replace them by our leader and have him speak again. We had planned that our finance critic would not speak in the throne speech debate, but that he would wait for the budget debate. The chance of our members taking part in the debate on the budget in these three remaining days—and we will lose half of today on this question of privilege—is very small.

The minister might have chosen the vehicle of a statement on what we call motions, but it is really on statements by ministers, with the opposition parties having the right to respond or ask questions. But no, he feels he did the fair thing; he told us about it. However, when I saw the statement it seemed to me to go much further than I had thought from what he had said. I think the suggestion that the opportunity is there to comment is really meaningless.

• (1250)

It is in Madam Speaker's hands to study the precedents and decide what to do with the motion put forward by the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Baker). I think perhaps better than a committee study of that kind of thing would be a real heart-to-heart session among House leaders.

Mr. Clark: No, let's have it public.

Mr. Knowles: Perhaps even some other ministers and other members could be there as well to face up to the fact that the success of this Parliament two years, three years, or four years down the road depends on this government realizing that it does not own this place, that it has a majority but that we are here too. Just the bare fact that we had this hassle last night and that we are having this session today proves that members are not satisfied, that there was not sufficient consultation. I hope that the government will take these things to heart.

As I say, I leave it to Your Honour whether you rule that there is a question of privilege of the procedural or parliamentary kind that the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton is claiming, but I feel very strongly that before we go any further we should consider how we are going to run this Parliament. We have obligations too. We on this side of the House have to be responsible. We have to do our job. We must not obstruct and all that kind of thing, but the government must come to the realization that the country does not trust it as much as that majority seems to suggest.

We went through this some years ago. We had the 1972-1974 minority experience. We think that it was a pretty good Parliament; we got several things out of the government. Then the 1974 election gave them the majority and some members on the Liberal side of the House said to me then, "I hope we do not revert to the pre-1972 stance; I hope we learned a lesson in the 1972-1974 period". No, within a couple of weeks they were right back. From 1974 to 1979 it was the God-given Liberals running the show.

An hon. Member: So what's new?

Mr. Knowles: Then we had a few months last year when we had a respite from the Liberals. They are back now, and even I said on the radio before the session started that they might take a different attitude. They are not, in doing it this way and I plead for them to reconsider their attitude.

I thank the minister for having told me last week that he would be making his speech last night. If there is a misunderstanding between us as to what he meant by saying that it would not be a budget, which some of us think it is, I am sorry there is that misunderstanding. But to me this whole incident should lead to some pretty serious conversations among us, and it should lead the Liberal government of this country to the realization that just because it has 147 members does not mean that it owns the place. It has to operate in a way of complete consultation with the opposition parties. It has to make the people out there feel that it is helping to lead Parliament to constructive things, not just running Parliament the way it wants.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Madam Speaker, I want to address myself to some of the remarks which the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) has made. In considering this matter, it is very clear that there is no correspondence at all and no similarity to the statement I made on July 26, 1979, on tax and tariff measures. There were two statements, and I have both of them here. One was on the fiscal and economic situation, and the other was on the tax and tariff measures that were made on July 26 which had to be made for good reason.

On November 16 or 18—I think it was on November 16, 1978, that a budget was brought into this House. That budget was not defeated. The House did not repudiate the budget, but some of the measures in that budget were not passed, were not put forward to this House for passage. The then Liberal government, in its usual way, did not care whether it got these measures passed or not. They had announced that they would all go into effect on budget night whether or not the House passed any legislation. So the then House leader was not able to get amendments to the Customs Act, the Income Tax Act and the Excise Tax Act passed through the House by March.

In March, the then prime minister finally dissolved the House, or asked the Governor General for a dissolution. Of course, he was into his fifth year and that is probably a predecent for what will happen this time. He will be in his fifth year before he makes a decision as to whether the House should carry on or what will happen this time. But that was the position. The House was dissolved and they went to the electorate. All of those measures were put into effect by order in council and administrative measures taken by that government. So when I made a statement on July 26, it was not to say whether or not some taxes were going to go into effect on the night of July 26; it was to say what our attitude was going to be with respect to these measures that had been in effect since November 16, 1978—

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Quite a difference.

Mr. Crosbie: —and that people were paying taxes based on the fact that it was taken that these things would be enacted by Parliament. So people were doing their income tax returns based on the income tax changes. They had stopped paying sales tax. The sales tax was reduced from 12 per cent to 9 per cent—the general federal sales tax. There is still not a thing passed by this House of Commons. This Parliament has not yet passed legislation that approves the reduction in that sales tax rate from 12 per cent to 9 per cent, and it had not passed it between November, 1978, and July, 1979. But people had stopped paying. People were not longer paying 12 per cent; they were paying 9 per cent based on orders in council, jiggery-pokery and hocus-pocus that had been enacted by the previous government.

There is some question as to whether the whole kit and caboodle was legal, as to whether they could really be doing what they were doing. In any event, the public thought they could do what they were doing; the public was acting on the basis that they could do what they were doing. So there was a tax reduction that had been in effect. That is why I had to make a statement on July 26, 1979, on whether or not we were going to go along with these measures then in effect, what we were going to do about them when Parliament resumed, or what we were going to ask Parliament to do.

If Your Honour looks at those two releases, you will see that I deal with the situation in them. I said in the fourth paragraph that most of the measures that will be included in the legislation are measures that we have no choice but to continue, since the Canadian people have been conducting their affairs since November 16 on the basis that the budget provisions brought down that evening were effective at that date. We did exactly the opposite. After our defeat, which I think was on the night of December 13, the lucky 13, is it; or the unlucky 13—

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): December 13.

Mr. Crosbie: After our defeat on December 13 we had a cabinet meeting the next day, I believe it was. Based on the advice of myself and my department, and the advice of the Privy Council, we decided that we were not going to pretend that the measures in the budget of December 11 were in effect. We issued a statement saying that they were not in effect, that they were not going to go into effect, that they were all to be postponed until after the election and then we would have to decide what would happen.

We announced our intention to reintroduce them. We were not going to go to the country and weasel and try to pretend that we were not going to do some of the things which were unpopular. We were not going to say one thing to the electorate and do the other when we got in, as hon. members opposite have done, and have done before. So we announced that these measures were not in effect and we passed no orders in council to make them effective. We took no legal steps that would make these provisions effective. So there is a vast difference. Now the hon. Minister of Finance, a gentleman who has been in this House for donkey's years—

Mr. Nielsen: The Prime Minister calls them donkeys.

Mr. Crosbie: He has been in the House for donkey's years, and he is as slippery as a cod tongue in a barrel of cod livers. He tries to say that what he is doing is similar to what I did last July 26. Well, look at the background notes to the notices of ways and means motions, Madam Speaker, and you will see what he was doing last night. He reduced the write-off for oil and gas properties and he made it retroactive to December 11, 1979. That was never in effect before: it is a new tax measure. He imposed a temporary corporate surtax; he made it retroactive to January 1, 1980. It indicates 1979 in his release, but that is obviously a mistake: it is 1980. That is the new corporate surtax. That was not in effect before. That did not come into effect on December 11. We deliberately said it was not going to go into effect because we had been defeated in the House. So he introduced a new tax. He was not announcing that he was going to continue a tax already in effect—not at all. He was introducing a new tax. He increased the levies on tobacco.

PRIVILEGE

MR. BAKER (NEPEAN-CARLETON)—ECONOMIC REMARKS OF MINISTER OF FINANCE

The House resumed consideration of the question of privilege of Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton).

Hon. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Madam Speaker, as we adjourned at one o'clock I was outlining the difference between the situation last night and what the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) was doing and the action that was taken on July 26, 1979, by myself, to which he referred in an attempt to justify his extraordinary conduct of last night.

I was pointing out, Madam Speaker, that the measures I had to address myself to last July 26 had been brought down in the budget of November 16, 1978, and stated to be effective as of that date. The tax and tariff measures contained in it were already implemented by order in council and other legal measures although legislation had never passed the House. That is why we had to take some steps to advise people whether we were going to carry on on that basis or not.

To show you the difference, Madam Speaker, I might just make one other reference to the statement I made on July 26. I pointed out in that statement that the legislation involved in these bills should be passed as soon as possible. Because of the returns from 5,000 taxpayers who had filed on the basis of proposed changes for the 1978 taxation year before their returns could be processed, this situation had to be clarified and legislation passed. In other words, they were told in the November 16 budget that they had an option as to how they conducted their affairs. Some 5,000 taxpayers had filed returns for 1978 based on the changes in that budget, although there had never been legislation passed by the House. So we had an entirely different situation.

I am referring now, Madam Speaker, to the ways and means motion of which notice was given last night and on which the minister spoke. We have a whole set of new taxes, never before implemented in Canada, never advanced on. I shall also find for Your Honour—or Your Honour's staff, I am sure can get for you—a press release issued on December 13 or 14, 1979, in which the government, through the Department of Finance, pointed out that none of the tax measures in the budget speech of December 11 would go forward.

Last night, Madam Speaker, there was given to the people of Canada and to this House through a mere speech in the address in reply—and I was just reciting some of the tax changes—reduced write-off for oil and gas properties from 30 per cent to 10 per cent per year, made retroactive to December 11; a new temporary corporate surtax made retroactive to January 1, 1980—never in effect before; increased levies on tobacco and alcohol beverages, all of which went into effect at midnight last night—increases never in effect before in this country. We have an exemption for volunteer firemen. These are all good things. I am glad to see the Minister of Finance is following some of the things that had been indicated in my budget.

We have a new application of sales tax on cosmetics that will raise $25 million; we have the sales tax extended to photofinishing—never before in effect in this country and it is going to take in $10 million immediately; we have changes in sales tax exemptions for containers and coverings and so on—I will not go into it all. We have a different method of collecting the sales tax on gasoline and diesel fuel. Madam Speaker, this is a very significant change. Because the change there is from a tax of so many cents per litre or gallon to a tax of 9 per cent on the selling price of gasoline and diesel fuels, it means that the tax will go up each time there is an increase in gasoline and diesel fuel prices. That is to go into effect immediately, Madam Speaker.

Mr. Baker (Nepean Carleton): That is a sneaky one.

Mr. Crosbie: There is a whole series of other changes with effective dates given between December 11 and January 1 in this notice. So we have very, very many changes in the tax system of Canada imposed last night never before in legal effect in Canada, and in fact made clear by the administration that first suggested them on December 11 that they were not in effect and would not be going into effect unless our government was re-elected. We were not re-elected. The people of Canada had no reason to expect that this government was going to reintroduce them. This government had decried these tax increases. The Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Gray) practically bit through his lips, gnashing his teeth at the horrific tax increases contained in the budget. He said that if you smoked or if you drank in Canada, you could not get any relief from this government. Now his Minister of Finance and the government bring in exactly the same tax changes that were proposed for tobacco and alcohol on December 11.

If that is not the height of hypocricy, it is certainly a new budget measure. It is semantics, Madam Speaker, as to whether it is a budget, or a mini-budget, or a Minnie Mouse budget. It is a travesty of justice, whatever it is. Nevertheless, it is a major change in the taxation system of this country. It is a major change in the revenue system. It is a major change in the tax system of the country and the hon. minister opposite brings it in without any adequate notice.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) mentioned that the Minister of Finance called him.

The Minister of Finance called me last Friday, Madam Speaker, and I, being the trusty, innocent Newfoundlander that I am, picked up the phone. I was astounded to have a gentleman so high in dignity and power in this government call me. It certainly never happened between 1976 and 1979. They would not give me the time of day then. Anyway here was the minister calling. I picked up the phone, my hand trembling with excitement that the Minister of Finance was calling. He told me that on Monday night—you know what soft, dulcet tones he has and how he can persuade a rock that it is not a rock, it is a stone—and said that he was going to be making a speech Monday night in the Address in Reply to the Speech from the Throne, that he was going to deal with some questions affecting ways and means motions from the last two budgets, and that he was going to deal with some questions of revenues and expenditures, how they were last year and what he expected this year.

● (1410)

I was not even suspicious enough to ask any other questions of him. I thought that we would have a statement about revenues and expenditures and what was to happen with ways and means motions from the budget presented by the former minister of finance and so on. The minister never said to me that he was going to bring in a mini-budget or that he was going to deal with a number of tax questions or new taxation. He may not have meant to mislead me. It may be that I was just so reasonable and sweet on the other end that he forgot to enlighten me as to the full iniquity of what he was proposing.

Then in this House on Monday he came over and sat by me. I nearly dropped off my chair at the honour. He told me in essence the same thing and that I would get a copy of his speech an hour ahead of delivery. I was very grateful that these pearls of wisdom would come my way an hour before the actual delivery of his speech. When I saw the speech a minute after seven last night, I discovered a whole new world. It was like that afternoon serial called "Another World". It was not what I had been led to expect by the Minister of Finance. I am sure that he would not deliberately mislead anyone—such a sweet picture of Cape Breton innocence!

Not only were we not expecting this, and it would not have been palatable even if we were, but the press were locked up, though not just until the minister started his speech at eight o'clock. Oh! no, he was too cute for that; he thought that I might scuttle out to address the press while he was making his speech. So they were locked up until his speech was concluded, and if I had wanted to speak to the press, I would have had to give up my speech in the chamber. Not only had that been arranged, but by God I did not get my speech in the chamber until 9.45 last night.

This is a concatenation of events not to be encouraged. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre certainly put his foot on it, whether or not it is technically—and I do not think it is even technically—within the rules. It is certainly outside any sense of propriety or decency, and I know that the Minister of Finance is a man who has a high sense of both.

I will now address myself to the question of the whips. I had been told by our whip that it was arranged for me to speak after the Minister of Finance. I would have thought that the Minister of Finance would have wanted to arrange not only for myself to speak, but also for the NDP finance critic to speak following his address on such an important matter as this. The fact that this is out of good order at all, Madam Speaker, was shown by the fact that tonight the debate on the Address in Reply to the Speech from the Throne is being adjourned by order of the government. The government wants it to end tonight although we have two more days remaining. The government is going to suspend it because it wants to bring on other business.

It is not for us to consent or not to consent to that; they have the power to arrange these things themselves. We have members on all sides of this House who want to speak in the debate on the Address in Reply to the Speech from the Throne. These members are being prevented from that privilege and honour because of the argument that is now going forward and because of the minister's statements last night.

For all of these reasons, Madam Speaker, there is no justification for the minister to attempt this procedure. What he is doing is avoiding a debate on this major economic and financial statement that he made last night.

He cannot say he is just adopting part of our budget. Our budget took an over-all approach to the economic and financial problems of Canada. Its thrust was to reduce budget deficits. It was to reduce government borrowing, and over a period of three or four years would get inflation and all of these other serious problems under control. The thrust of the minister's actions last night, the actions that he indicated in his speech, was exactly the opposite. It was to throw out all restraint. It was to allow government borrowing to increase $3.7 billion and allow the deficit to go up $3.5 billion. Perhaps I have the figures transposed. In each case it is an addition of $3 billion more. This is completely opposite to the thrust of the fiscal policy that we set for this country. It is completely opposite to the thrust of the fiscal policy recommended by the governor of the Bank of Canada, whose interest rate policy the minister has endorsed.

So this was a financial statement, a budget or a mini-budget last night 180 degrees reversed. It reversed 180 degrees the fiscal course that we had set for this country in the last budget that was brought before this House. For the minister to suggest that such an important reversal of financial and fiscal policy should be done by means of a speech in the debate on the address in reply, where our leader has spoken and cannot speak again, where so many members of our party have done the same, and where the Leader of the New Democratic Party has already spoken—

Mr. MacEachen: They can speak again.

Mr. Crosbie: I am saying that on the address in reply they cannot speak. If there is another amendment, perhaps they can.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): It will be voted on tonight.

Mr. Crosbie: The point is that these members have been blocked out from this consideration. There is another vote tonight on a non-confidence motion of the government. The minister, who has been in this House longer than many of us, far too long for any good it is doing the people of Canada and who has adopted this technique, knows that it will boomerang. Rather than making this kind of a statement, if the minister is going to do more in the fiscal line, if he is going to indicate a different direction and that the deficit is not going to go up, that he is going to reduce the deficit, or that borrowing is not going to go up as it appears, surely to God he should have waited until he was ready with his whole package.

Now what he has done is shown that it does not matter. He is going to spend more. He is going to borrow more. That is his direction. That is his message to this country. That is his message to the investor. That is his message to the foreign investor. That is his message to the IMF. That is his message to the world. That is his message to the ordinary people of Canada—that he is going to be a spendthrift; that he does not care about what direction the United States is going or others. He is going to do the exact opposite to what everybody else who has studied this seriously thinks ought to be done.

If that is the role this government is now set on fiscally and financially, surely we should be having a six-day budget debate on this, not a two or three-speech debate, Madam Speaker.

[Translation]

Madam Speaker: The hon. Minister of State for Finance.

Hon. Pierre Bussières (Minister of State (Finance)): Thank you, Madam Speaker. I would not want to delay unduly the proceedings of the House but I would like to make a few comments following the question of privilege that was raised.

The Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) is in fact being blamed for following a procedure that is in accordance with the customs and rules of this House. That was very well explained under the rules and precedents that were quoted and recognized by one of our colleagues whose authority is respected when it comes to the rules and procedures of this House, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). The issue is clear to all members from a procedural point of view; the Minister of Finance proceeded according to the rules, customs and normal procedures as they are known to hon. members. However, he is being blamed for that.

What is the Minister of Finance also being blamed for, Madam Speaker? He is being blamed for taking the opportunity to inform hon. members and the people of Canada of certains measures that were already tabled in the House and the way he intends to proceed with respect to those measures and thus dispose of certain business that had been left in abeyance. Furthermore, he is being blamed for taking the opportunity to describe the situation with respect to the expenditures as they are forecast today and also give certain indications on the state of the economy. In fact, coming back to the first point, as was pointed out, the tabling of ways and means motions was often used outside budgets, as the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie) has done himself. He did so to table ways and means motions originating from the tabling of a budget, and in that instance, a new government.

His ways and means motion also included extremely important measures concerning either new revenues or tax reductions. The hon. member for St. John's West had also used a ways and means motion to put forward the mortgage interest tax credit program and property taxes on buildings. Everyone will recall that the revenues that were to be produced by this measure were very large. The hon. member had proceeded correctly by tabling a ways and means motion following the rules and traditions of this House.

We therefore see that the procedural argument is not valid since the procedure followed is in accordance with our rules and since there have been many precedents concerning the tabling of ways and means motions. Moreover, I said earlier, our colleague the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre recognizes that the Minister of Finance has faithfully followed the procedure in this case.

As for the second argument, I believe that no one should criticize the government for having given too much information. Quite the opposite, the government is often blamed for giving out too little information to the House and the public. This opportunity of clarifying certain points was used by the Minister of Finance to let the members know the situation and I believe that it shows a will to keep Parliament and the public well informed. The Minister of Finance should be congratulated for having taken the first opportunity after the general election to give this information to the House and to all Canadians.

Madam Speaker, those are the few comments that I wanted to make.

[English]

Hon. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Madam Speaker, we have heard several epithets used to describe the conduct of the minister in his presentation last night, some of which have been slippery, dishonest, fraudulent. I want to liken that conduct to a certain insect in Alice in Wonderland. When Alice was having a conversation with the caterpillar, Alice took objection to the misuse, distortion and abuse of words by the caterpillar in that conversation. She said to the caterpillar, "You cannot use words in that fashion". The caterpillar, like the minister, said, "When I use a word, it means precisely what I choose it to mean, nothing more or less".

That is the kind of verbosity which the minister is bombarding us with in this shabby, tawdry attempt to smuggle in by way of the throne speech debate what in effect is a full-blown mini-budget. He chides the opposition for not being aware of the precedents. He cites May.

An hon. Member: You deserve it.

Mr. Nielsen: I hear a heckler on the other side say we deserve it. If he will withhold his enthusiasm until I cite some of these citations, he may change his tune. If he has ever read May, Madam Speaker, he might even understand the arguments I am about to propose to you. I have turned up May and Beauchesne. I am going to quote from them to perhaps jog the minister's memory, which perhaps is becoming a little senile with the years he has spent in this place.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Nielsen: There can be no doubt that when a minister makes a statement outlining the financial situation of the country and accompanies that with a ways and means motion, which he did, for the purpose of raising or adding to additional taxes, this according to all of the authorities constitutes a budget. Traditionally this is preceded by a budget resolution which has the effect of providing for a budget debate, following a reference to committee, providing opportunity for the House to criticize the policy outlined by the minister. The minister has chosen this shallow and tawdry device to avoid that debate.

The House leader for the NDP makes the suggestion that this very serious matter can be resolved by some kind of cosy little chat between House leaders. I say to him on behalf of all members of the House, including his own backbenchers, that the seriousness of this matter goes beyond a cosy little chat among House leaders. It affects the privileges of every single member of this House who wants to participate in a debate and criticize.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Nielsen: That is why the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Baker) suggested an airing before the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections where views can be expressed.

There is another serious matter. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) says he does not expect the members of the opposition to criticize what they put forward last fall in their budget, and so why we should be raising a fuss may not be understood by a good many members in the House. Certainly those opposite do not care whether we understand or not. They intend to proceed like a steamroller in any event. They are up to their same old tricks because they are the same old bunch.

Some of the matters we would like to have debated which point out the seriousness of what this government is trying to do is the $14.2 billion deficit which is projected for 1980-81 as compared with the $10.5 billion projected by the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie) when he was finance minister. We would like to debate the $11.5 billion deficit which the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) project for 1979-80 which differs from that contained in the budget of our government. We would like to debate his figure of a .5 per cent real growth in 1980 as compared with the 1 per cent predicted by ourselves.

We would like to debate the 8 per cent unemployment figure that is projected by the minister as compared with that projected in our budget. We would like to debate the 10 per cent inflation he projected for 1980 as compared with the 11 per cent projected in our budget. We would like to debate the increases in interest and oil import costs which are being increased by $2 billion more than forecast on December 11 in our budget for 1980-81, and over-all increase of 13½ per cent. We would like to debate the revenue loss because of a decision not to impose the 18-cent excise tax, which means revenues of $2.5 billion less than forecast in our budget. We would like to debate the blended oil price which the government say would reduce the deficit and expenditures by $1 billion as the oil import subsidy is progressively phased out.

We would like to debate his dropping of the common stock investment plan. We would like to debate the changes in the treatment of capital gains and RRSPs. We would like to debate the provision for the transfer of capital gains on farming assets to RRSPs. We would like to debate his statement that also abandons special incentives for the Atlantic region, investment incentives for Atlantic fishing vessels, tax contracts for firms investing in depressed regions. We would like to debate the fact that he provides no major relief for home owners facing renewal of mortgages. Only those actually facing foreclosure will be helped. Those are some of the matters that the conduct of this minister and his government are preventing us from debating.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre sees no difference between what the Minister of Finance is attempting to do now and the occasion which arose, not as he believes in 1957, but rather in 1962. I have gone to the trouble of having the House of Commons Debates produced for me for that period. It was when the hon. member for Eglinton, Mr. Fleming, who was then minister of finance, was engaged in something which bears a similarity, a long-range similarity, to what is happening here. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre participated in that debate at the time. It begins, for his easy reference, on page 783 of Hansard for October 22, 1962.

Mr. Knowles: There was also an incident in December, 1957.

Mr. Nielsen: This, I submit, is the relevant precedent and the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre certainly had quite a number of things to say in opposition to the procedure which was allegedly being adopted at that time by the minister of finance of the day, Mr. Fleming. But the distinction there is very vivid. The House at that time under the rules then in force was in Committee of the Whole on ways and means. It was already a debate which had engaged seven or eight days of the time of the House with interventions by many members. The chairman at page 795 of the Hansard record of those debates at that time said:

Order. I am sorry to interrupt the minister, but this is the point at which we seem to be moving away from the ambit of section (2) of Standing Order 59.

Perhaps I should obtain unanimous consent of the committee before the hon. gentleman carries on. Is it agreed that he should be allowed to be at variance with the rules as to relevancy in section (2) of Standing Order 59?

The record continues:

MR. LEBOE: I think it should apply to all members.

THE CHAIRMAN: Unanimous consent is given on condition that it will apply equally to the leaders of all other parties in the House.

SOME HON. MEMBERS: Agreed.

THE CHAIRMAN: In addition, it is agreed that those other leaders of the House shall be permitted an extension of time, as will the minister, to permit them to complete their remarks on this resolution in a general way.

The present finance minister was also very prominent in that debate. I quote him from page 855, when the rules were quite different but what was being attempted was quite similar. He said at that time as a member sitting in opposition:

I should like to say a word on the point of order you have raised, Mr. Chairman, in awareness of the fact that your point was not raised with respect to relevancy. We decided when this debate began that it would be a general debate equivalent to a budget debate during which a wide range of matters could be brought before the committee. If you had raised a point of order in connection with the relevancy of the remarks of the hon. member, then I think we would have occasion to attempt to define the limits of the consent which we gave on Monday. But I understand that your comments are on an entirely different level, namely, you wish to secure from the committee an expression of opinion as to whether at this time, in view of the international crisis, it was proper or in good taste or in the interests of Canada to discuss a matter which has some sensitivity.

The distinction which emerges from that debate and which distinguishes it and the 1957 precedent, I suggest to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, is that the debate then took place on a debatable ways and means motion. There was unanimous consent given for a general debate and we spent eight or nine days on the resolution; and it affected—another distinction—only the provisions of the Income Tax Act as opposed to what is being attempted here.

The distinction which was pointed out to you, Madam Speaker, with respect to those objections in 1962 is principally that we must remember that the House was able under the rules in force at that time to debate a ways and means motion at great length with no limitations imposed by the rules. On that occasion unanimous consent was given to allow the debate to be a general economic one, and the House was debating only one type of ways and means motion, namely, one to amend the Income Tax Act. But that is not what is being attempted here. The Minister of Finance said in the last paragraph of his notice to the parliamentary press gallery, which I presume was distributed some time yesterday, announcing that there would be a lock-up: "There will be no formal official briefing"—and this is the important phrase—"inasmuch as no new measures will be involved." That, I suggest to the Minister of Finance, is a grossly false statement in view of what was contained in that statement last night, which did involve new measures.

The hon. gentleman wants, in response to my hon. friend for St. John's West, to impress us with this great opportunity which still remains for debate of his statement. He says there is an amendment and that the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) or anyone else who has spoken may speak again. That amendment is to be disposed of tonight, but in addition to that they are adjourning the throne speech debate and he is gallivanting off to Germany for the week. What kind of opportunity does that afford hon. members to criticize that mini-budget of his delivered last night? I suggest, none.

Through the device of introducing what is what I call a vest-pocket budget during this throne speech debate, the minister, like the Artful Dodger, has artfully evaded the possibility of a structured, organized opposition attack on his budget, which in effect is what it was. He has brought it in by the back door. He has brought in by the back door what he dare not do by the front and has cut off parliamentary debate in the process.

We have come to expect that kind of high-handed action, that abuse of parliamentary privilege by the same old bunch which sits over there once again. He has, in effect, imposed this government's view of the economy on the nation by fraud and by deceit. In so doing he has shown that this government's view of the economy consists of an intellectual vacuum. He has been obliged to borrow, resurrect, reinstate the economic views of his predecessors in borrowing liberally—and I underscore that word—from the budget which he and his party defeated with their collaborators in the NDP simply because they thirsted for power; and it ill behoves us to hear the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, speaking on behalf of his members, whining and complaining after participating and collaborating in the action which brought those rascals back to the other side of the House. The minister has shown by his conduct last night that he has learned nothing and forgotten everything.

What he has done is at the very least a breach of order, and at the very worst a breach of privilege; and many guise it is a surreptitious invasion of the right of this House to examine and criticize fiscal expenditures. This is another step in the erosion of parliamentary control, another example of the contempt in which that group holds parliamentarians.

We have had the example of their twinning. They do not need opposition members. They are going to set up a structure of their own which would replace the representative system here in Parliament, so why listen to us? Why have any debates at all on any matter? There was a mere casual announcement of financial policy without even fulfilling the parliamentary requirement of notice, and I draw that to the attention of the minister as being a further distinction between all of the past precedents and what he is attempting to do now.

This is nothing other than a definite imposition of new taxes through a ways and means motion. If these are not budgetary measures, what are they? The minister tries to take refuge in the fact that he is picking up these measures by the device of trying to convince us that they were already tabled in the last Parliament, and that somehow they are still living and breathing ways and means motions. He knows better than that. He knows that with the death of that budget last December the resolutions which were tabled at that time and, indeed, everything else on the order paper died, and died with that Parliament.

One would really expect the minister to have a little more shame, if at all, about venturing to suggest such a proposition. If the imposition of such a wide range of taxes as he announced last night is not a budget, I challenge him to tell me what it is. He would have us believe it is merely a statement of the financial condition of the country. I will have a reference from Beauchesne to refresh his memory in a moment.

If this government is allowed to get away with this trickery—it is now claiming the right to rule by diktat without recourse to Parliament—as I say, why not send us home? I have no doubt that that is what hon. members opposite would like to do. I think that is what the government in Ghana did when the opposition got a little obstreperous; it abolished the opposition. Hon. members opposite would like nothing more than to take that course.

Mr. MacEachen: You did not even face Parliament for four months.

Mr. Nielsen: That minister had 16 years in office.

Miss MacDonald: He was here with C. D. Howe.

Mr. Nielsen: I am reminded by my colleague that he was here with C.D. Howe and, if we want to compare ages in Parliament, he is getting a little long in the tooth. However, he and his government had sixteen years to do something about the economy, and now they are saying to us that we caused all this devastation in two parliamentary months. That is absolute, unadulterated rubbish.

Mr. Chenier: You are excellent in opposition.

Mr. Nielsen: To drag previous motions from previous Parliaments kicking and screaming into this one as an excuse for an invasion of the rights of Parliament would be invidious of any minister, but for a minister who is supposed to know Parliament and who is supposed to be an experienced parliamentarian, it is far too deliberate and too much a flouting of parliamentary rights to be passed over or tolerated. This government has now thrown aside the veil and revealed its absolute and utter disregard of the rights of Parliament and, indeed, of the parliamentary system, which certainly does not come as any news to most of us here.

The minister knows only too well that he cannot avail himself of the proceedings of a previous Parliament to justify his excesses and the excesses of his government in this one. Obviously he is still feeling a sense of guilt over the manner in which he brought his party to power by defeating a budget which would have been good and useful for this country. Now he is trying to have the best of both worlds in the process and is destroying Parliament's right to inquire and to criticize.

If there is any doubt about the nature of the document the minister read last night, I would like to refer him to page 174 of Beauchesne under the general heading of "Ways and Means", and I commend citation 514 to you, Madam Speaker, which reads as follows:

The consideration of the financial statement made by the Minister of Finance is the most important business of Ways and Means.

Indeed, it is one of the most important purposes, if not primarily the most important purpose, of the business of this House.

This statement, familiarly known as "the Budget Speech", is made when the minister has completed his estimate of the probable income and expenditure for the financial year. In it, the Minister of Finance develops his views of the resources of the country, communicates his calculations of probable income and expenditure, and declares whether the burdens upon the people are to be increased or diminished. The economic aspect of this budget is important and taxes are imposed for their economic effects as well as for raising revenue to meet the expenditure for the year.

Then Beauchesne goes on in paragraph 517 and other succeeding paragraphs to describe the procedures normally followed when fulfilling that objective, an objective which the minister fulfilled in very small part last night. There is no way that the statement made by him last night can be considered anything but a budget, meagre as it was, according to all of the precedents. If the minister takes the trouble to read chapter 30—and I commend this to the honourable heckler over there who interjected a moment ago—

An hon. Member: Groucho Marx.

Mr. Nielsen: —of May's nineteenth edition at pages 775 through 783, he will find that there is no way that he can weasel out of the conclusion that his contribution to the throne speech debate last night was a budget.

He asks, "What is more important, Parliament or the people of Canada?" That is very typical of him and that crowd opposite. It is time he found out that the rights of Parliament are the rights of the people, and when the rights of Parliament are abrogated, flouted and trampled upon, the rights of the people are equally abrogated and flouted. Parliament is the people. The people send us here to debate the most important thing, which the minister and his government, by this devious device, are preventing us from debating.

The minister is attempting to take credit for bringing in a budget without undergoing the scrutiny which a budget ordinarily warrants and which is part of our parliamentary tradition. This is in keeping with the philosophy, according to the Auditor General, that Parliament has lost control over the public purse. The minister is determined in his conduct to continue that, and his gesture of defiance and the flouting of Parliament is intended to ensure not only that that control will not be reimposed, but also that whatever vestige of control remains in parliamentarians will be disposed of in this shabby and fraudulent fashion.

Madam Speaker, this motion should carry and, if it does not, indeed we might as well all go home. Because the whole purpose of Parliament will be thwarted, and intentionally so, by a government which has lost none of its arrogance and none of its concept of being in government by divine right forever.

[Translation]

Hon. Yvon Pinard (President of the Privy Council): Madam Speaker, the procedure is quite simple. When a government wishes to amend tax provisions or levy taxes, there are not too many ways to go about it. Two rules are applicable: Standing Order 60, which I am sure our adviser called your attention to, and Standing Order 61.

Standing Order 60 has 11 paragraphs, while Standing Order 61 has only one. It is in light of those 12 paragraphs of these Standing Orders that amendments to fiscal acts or new taxes must be considered. That type of computation is reminiscent of the remarks made by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) in 1972 when he used the same figures. He almost apologized for using that kind of arithmetic, but added he wanted to limit the debate on a similar matter. He suggested: Mr. Speaker, you have a finding to make as to whether such a measure can be brought in outside a normal budget debate. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre was very much to the point when he submitted: Of course, in making your decision you are bound to interpret two Standing Orders, Standing Orders 60 and 61. Of the 12 paragraphs in those two Standing Orders, 11 in Standing Order 60 and one in Standing Order 61, nine deal with a budget proper, two allow the Minister of Finance to do what he did yesterday evening, and one is general in nature.

Therefore, Madam Speaker, making your decision is simply a matter of reading Standing Orders 60 and 61, and also Beauchesne, fifth edition, pages 174 and 175. Everything is there.

Madam Speaker, Standing Order 60(1) states quite simply, and I quote:

A notice of the ways and means motion may be laid upon the Table of the House at any time—

May I stress "at any time"—

—during a sitting by a minister of the Crown, but such a motion may not be proposed in the same sitting.

The door was open for the Minister of Finance to change tax laws or raise new taxes and that was done through our Standing Order 60(1). It is very simple. From everything that has been said on the subject since this morning it may sound very complicated but the procedure is so simple that it is staring at you in the face.

If we read paragraph 11 of the same Standing Order we realize that it completes the provisions applying to that kind of situation. It reads, and I quote:

The adoption of any ways and means motion shall be an order to bring in a bill or bills based on the provisions of any such motion.

An important fact should also be emphasized, Madam Speaker. When bills based on such motions are introduced they can be debated without any time limit on second reading, in committee or on third reading. The opposition parties have then all the time they need to criticize the government policy as concerns those new taxes or changes to tax laws. So when I hear that the opposition might be muzzled because the Minister of Finance has tabled ways and means motions, I say that it is unfair. According to our Standing Orders, it will be followed by an order of the House, bills will have to be introduced and debated at all stages without time limits, without any constraint on the opposition.

So, Madam Speaker, when we must make a decision in that kind of discussion, if Parliament is to be respected according to the wishes of my friends opposite, it is important to follow our Standing Orders. They authorize the Minister of Finance at any time—it might have been done outside the debate on the Address in Reply to the Speech from the Throne—to introduce ways and means motions at any other time, following which the opposition would not have enjoyed the opportunity to raise the question of privilege on which we heard several of its members and then to make comments on the budget. And he could have introduced his notices of motions at a time that would not have allowed the opposition to comment through its financial critic and through speeches criticizing the minister, if necessary, or congratulating him for his initiatives. So the procedure that was followed is perfectly acceptable. The minister did nothing but conform to Standing Orders 60(1) and 60(11).

I seize this opportunity also to congratulate the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre because we may owe to his intervention in 1972 the fact that the following principle is stated in Beauchesne's fifth edition, page 174, citation 515. There is no necessity to have a budget presentation before the introduction of ways and means legislation. The reference is to the Journals of March 20, 1972, page 202, and in that debate, Madam Speaker, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre with whom I agree, said the following:

[English]

But I do not think that Standing Order 60 and Standing Order 61 are all that deficient. They make it possible for a change such as is proposed today to be undertaken without a six-day budget debate, but the rules make it pretty clear that it is the intention of Parliament that at least once a year there will be a full dress six day debate on a budget presentation.

[Translation]

I agree with what the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre said in 1972 during a debate in very similar circumstances. The year is far from over, Madam Speaker, and I have every reason to believe that in the course of the year the parties across the way will have the opportunity of taking part in a six-day debate on a budget. But in the meantime there is nothing irregular, illegal, abnormal or unparliamentary with the Minister of Finance giving notice of a ways and means motion allowing him to amend tax laws or levying taxes. The situation being perfectly in order, I fail to see how you could entertain the motion presented by the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Baker) on his question of privilege and claiming that, in some way, the privileges of hon. members are being eroded.

May I point out, with all due respect, that when the rules of this House are clearly being respected the privileges of hon. members are not being violated even if past practice has not always been the same. How strange that every time standard practices are not strictly adhered to here in the House, everyone becomes excited, it almost becomes a scandal, even when the rules are still being respected. The House can act in many various ways within the framework of our Standing Orders. But it seems there are some who cling so much to tradition that they would have the House react, in absolutely every thing, in exactly the same way, to the Standing Orders of the House.

Madam Speaker, I do not agree with that way of thinking. I see no reason for it and when our rules give us sufficient leeway—of course, that supposes some broadmindedness, there I agree with the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton—when our rules allow us to act according to them, even if it is not exactly the same way as in the past. Provided we respect the Standing Orders of the House and act in parliamentary fashion, I say there is no reason to dramatize the situation, or to drag out the debates unduly or to rise on questions of privilege which are unfounded.

So, in conclusion, Madam Speaker, to solve the matter once and for all, I would respectfully submit that we are only dealing here with the integral application of Standing Orders 60(1) and 60(11) as explained clearly and specifically in Beauchesne's citations found on pages 174 and 175 of the fifth edition.

Madam Speaker: I would like to point out that indeed all comments by hon. members are useful for me to rule on the question of privilege raised by the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Baker). I will surely hear the two members who have already asked to speak, but I would urge them to limit themselves to new arguments, as should any other member wishing to rise after them.

[English]

Mr. Arnold Malone (Crowfoot): Madam Speaker, I want to share with you my best wishes on this very momentous day when the decision you make will reflect significantly on the direction of our Parliament, and I want to extend my best wishes on what I feel is an extremely important question that faces you.

What I sense we have before us today is, in its simplest form, the question of whether or not last night's performance was or was not, however we define it, in fact a budget. The Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) has suggested today that it was clear that last night his speech was not a budget speech. I submit that if that were the case, then that should be clear to this Parliament, which obviously it is not, and it should be clear to outside observers, which obviously it is not. They are referring to this as a mini-budget or an economic statement, and they are giving to it a diversity of descriptions, which certainly means that it is not clear to them what it is.

I would like to make a couple of points, one of which certainly has not been made up to this point. When the Minister of Finance submits that he brought this matter up during the throne speech debate so that we would have the opportunity to reflect upon it, in fact the minister is attempting to direct the throne speech debate, because members set aside what they came to this Parliament to speak about in what has been an assured period of totally free time for all members. It is an interjection therein which diverts members away from their free will. There is a very serious obligation on the part of any who are finance critics or associated with finance to cut down out of necessity the throne speech debate in order to give consideration to another matter placed before Parliament. Thus it would be irresponsible of opposition members not to comment thereon.

Keeping that in mind, and if we accept the explanation of the Minister of Finance, in effect the introduction of such a motion as the one last evening could totally do away with the concept of a throne speech debate, where members have the freedom to bring up constituency and regional issues. If I were able to catch Madam Speaker's eye during a throne speech debate, I would feel almost compelled to bring to the attention of Parliament the kind of antics which have taken place lately that bring about a tremendous alienation of the region of Canada from where I come. To somehow feel a diversion would be a great insult to my opportunity to be able to speak freely on some subject.

I should like to turn to another subject area which I think is specific and important to the question which relates to what happened last night. When Madam Speaker takes a look at the motion, I would ask that she consider the importance which has been traditionally attached to what we call the security or secrecy of budgets. That tradition is long and well-defined.

In Great Britain ministers of finance have resigned because of alleged budget leaks and leaks established by Parliament. In this Parliament some five or six years ago, the House will recall the review of statements made by the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. Reid). For much of that very hot July of that summer, members on both sides of the House sat to see whether there was a leak of security by knowledge which the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River may have had or by statements he may have made. Certainly to the gratification of Parliament and I am sure to the relief of the hon. member, it was found that there was no substantive evidence to show that there had been a leak. What I am attempting to put before Madam Speaker is the importance of the view which has existed over the long 700 years of tradition of Parliament, the view that there is nothing more important in terms of secrecy than the budget.

Last night there were lockups and handouts of the statement made, there were amendments to the Income Tax Act and the Customs Act, and new taxes were to take effect at midnight.

Let us put before the House the possibility that there were some leaks of that information. Then a very interesting question must be asked: Can a member or a minister be excused from his obligation now simply because he titled what he did last night as something different from a budget? I think it is a matter of extreme concern to Parliament if all one needs to do is somehow make reference to what happened last night by some other name. Then to relieve the minister of the obligation which goes with budgets would in itself be a very serious matter.

Probably recognizing the seriousness of what would happen if there was a leak, the minister took the opposite view. He called for a lockup and the kind of security that was always associated with a budget. Because he called for that nature of security, then surely what the minister was saying in his mind was that in fact this statement has the overtones of a budget. It called for the raising of money through new taxes and changes to the Customs Act, and referred to the new taxes which would be coming into effect as of midnight. If the minister did not see it in the context of a budget, then none of the security measures would have been necessary or implied. It seems to me the measures he took were traditional to a budget. In handing the speech out after eight o'clock, in effect the minister himself has said that this is budget like. All he did that was different was to label it with a different name.

I submit that at this point we are at a most interesting crossroads in Parliament. It is not just the question before us, it is the question as to how members of Parliament feel about Parliament, whether or not we in the opposition think there is a chance and an opportunity for a fair shake in representing out constituents and speaking about important issues and matters. We await with great curiosity Madam Speaker's deliberations because I feel, as one member, that this is an extremely important decision.

Government members should not seek any co-operation from us. If they live by the letter of the law but cannot live with the spirit of Parliament, even if there was a precedent in the past, when they know full well that there is a spirit and an esprit de corps among parliamentarians which says that we co-operate and allow each other to speak and to reflect upon important issues, then surely the Minister of Finance would not want to stand in his place and say that what he did last night was not important. If he stood and said that it is important, then surely he should not in the same breath say: "But in spite of the importance of what I say, no one else can reflect upon it".

With that long tradition of security and secrecy of budgets, in view of the kind of measure which the Minister of Finance took, I want to conclude by saying that by his very actions he is saying that what he did last night was budget-like in its nature. Therefore, the treatment by Parliament of that particular act last night should be budget-like.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley-Hants): Madam Speaker, I will be relatively brief because I do not intend to review the authorities which have been reviewed nor to draw the very relevant parallel of the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie) and other speakers who have spoken between what was done last night and what ordinarily is done on budget night.

I am rising because this matter is something which I think is most relevant. In effect, Madam Speaker is cutting her procedural eye teeth on a debate—and frankly the hon. member for Crowfoot (Mr. Malone) touched upon this in his remarks—which does not just involve the frontbenches of the government or the opposition. Fundamentally it goes to where the backbencher on either side sits and as to whether he will participate in the debates and/or the procedures of the House of Commons in trying to represent the views of his people. To me it is that fundamental.

Perhaps I would agree in part with some of the rhetoric of the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) and the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). I think Madam Speaker as the commoner of commoners, taking office for the first time, has a distinct duty in the interpretation of the point under dispute, whether it involves the finite rule of Standing Order 60 or making the rules of this House much more relevant than they have been heretofore.

● (1510)

You, Madam Speaker, and I have sat in this chamber and heard speakers talk about how we are the captives of archaic rules. Precedents have been cited here today by all speakers. Whether my Machiavellian friend, the Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance, is Minnie Mouse or Minnie MacEachen Mouse does not matter because, whether you call him "mini-minister" or "mini-budget minister", or any other name, were he sitting on this side he would know that the first four pages of his statement last night was a budget, a budget by any other name. You cannot make those tax changes in any way other than in a budget.

I am not going to review them all. There is not a person who was watching this debate over television—and this is my point—who did not consider it to be a budget speech. I do not want to trespass too far, but I am just wondering whether in the Chair's mind, with something called judicial notice, a legal phrase we sometimes use when we are doing professional work outside as lawyers before we come here to try to write laws, that was not also the case. There is not one common, reasonable person who watched the Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance last night who did not think when they heard the first four pages of this speech, with changes in the Registered Retirement Savings Plan, the common stock plan and the elimination of capital gains, let alone all the other tax additions, that they were not listening to a budget speech.

This is part of the dilemma, Madam Speaker. Regardless of the finite rule in Standing Order 60, this Parliament with these television lights and the cameras has something much more impressive than the precedents in respect of Standing Order 62, 72, 77 or even 79. Frankly they can all be distinguished, as has been done here today.

The one that worried me the most and which had some historic flavour, because it was in 1962 when the then member for Eglinton, and others who were around here and to one of whom I was vicariously related, was that one relating to the minister who did then, obviously with a little more purity, what this minister of finance did last night. I thought the Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance was going to refer to that a little more strongly, but there was in that case provision for an eight-day debate on a ways and means motion.

This dispute affects all members, not just frontbenchers. I was not too worried, quite frankly, about whether I spoke on the throne speech debate or the budget debate. Quite frankly, with this back door budget smuggled in by the minister last night, in effect we will not have a budget message presented by him with an opportunity for backbenchers to participate in respect of budgetary matters perhaps until next fall. The pressure is now on my whip to try to fit us in in order to take part in a joint Address in Reply to the Speech from the Throne and budget debate. I do not care what the rule says.

I am afraid the minister unfortunately did not spend enough time in opposition to appreciate that members of the opposition, especially the backbenchers but on the government side too, have very few opportunities to participate. Hon. members including the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, who is known for supporting certain issues and not necessarily for making great constituency speeches, paid credit to the fact that there are limitations on backbenchers' opportunities to participate and talk about constituency matters.

It makes it even more reprehensible that the minister at this time smuggles in this back door budget into the Speech from the Throne debate at a time when members, certainly members on the government side, are preoccupied with a fundamentally large question that is to be voted on May 20. We are now going to muddy the debate on the Speech from the Throne with a budget debate when in effect one of the more important questions in the country, which will be voted on in Quebec, has certainly very much taken the attention of members here. We have members standing up and talking about momentous issues, such as sovereignty-association, to say nothing of the usual constituency speeches from new members who are entitled and should have the opportunity to speak for their constituents as brand new members, not talking about budgetary measures.

The hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) earlier recited a list of matters in respect of which we are not going to have the opportunity to debate. I would take the matter a little further, Madam Speaker. Those on the other side when they sat over here last December 13 did not have a chance to take part in a debate but had the opportunity to vote during a division. Obviously I did not like the result of that division.

There were things smuggled in last night by the minister who has cloaked himself in royal robes. It was the Queen's birthday just a couple of days ago, and this minister in his solitude status has, in effect, infringed upon the purity of the Queen by, in effect, smuggling a budget speech in under her robes.

Some hon. Members: Shame.

Mr. Nowlan: I know he likes to wear kilts, but I did not realize his affinity for the kilt, or the quilt, would let him smuggle in a budget speech under the Queen's robes. But that is what he has done, Madam Speaker.

In a sense, I go further than the hon. member for Yukon. I am almost finished, Madam Speaker. I am trying to impress that it is not the frontbenches on either side who are the only ones involved. There are backbenchers opposite who I am sure wanted to speak today on the referendum in Quebec. They have been precluded from that opportunity by this discussion on a legitimate point of order, regardless of how Your Honour finds.

There are members here who I am sure wanted to make speeches about their own constituencies but cannot. Even if they could they might have been pre-empted because they would have had to reply to this pseudo-budget speech.

This is what has gone on here, Madam Speaker. It is more than just debate. The other side had a chance to vote on division. I would like to see members opposite vote on some of the proposals in this piece of paper. I would like to see members from Atlantic Canada vote in respect of the removal of no special tax contracts for Atlantic Canada. I would like to see any member of any constituency have the guts to face a division on the exclusion of capital gains assistance, in other words, the retirement plans of the farmers in this land who built this country. That is another thing that has happened, Madam Speaker. There is not an opportunity for members to stand up and put their votes where in effect some of the rhetoric is during a budgetary division.

In conclusion, I think this matter comes around full circle. The member for Yukon said there was a little Alice in Wonderland here. I think you were here last night, Madam Speaker. If there was an Alice in Wonderland here—and as the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre said, this was not Parliament's finest hour—Alice in Wonderland would have been boggled when she listened for three-quarters of an hour to the division bells ringing across the country, with members of Parliament hard at work going to take a meaty division. What was the result? It was 148 to one.

If that is not a reflection of how archaic some of our rules and/or some of our practices are, I do not know what is. With the penetrating eye of television, that sort of action will dissect this place unless we change some of the rules, not just to suit television but to make this a more reasonable place.

What does the resolution of my House leader ask? Does it ask for something extreme, does it castigate the Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance, or does it include some of the things we could call him, besides Minnie Mouse or anything else you want to call him? I am not going to get involved in appellations. All the motion says is that there is a prima facie case here. I suggest and submit in all sincerity that we have taken all this time to try to impress upon Your Honour that there is such a prima facie case. That is all we have to establish. We do not have to establish the fact beyond a reasonable doubt.

There is room for argument in respect of this debate. There is an area of grey here. All the motion says is that the matter of the erosion of the right of the House to approve the general budgetary policy of the government, particularly in view of the procedure followed by the minister in his presentation to the House on Monday, April 21, during the debate on the Address in Reply to the Speech from the Throne, be referred to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections.

You know as well as I, Madam Speaker, that the whole foundation of this institution in terms of the Mother of Parliaments is the power of the purse. We also know from every auditor general's report for the last 25 years, and certainly since the Second World War, that no matter who has been in the opposition benches, we have slowly, and sometimes too fast, lost control of the purse.

I submit, in conclusion, that unless this matter can be referred to the committee for proper redefinition as a minimum, then this institution is going to lose even more respect than it has to date. I think this institution should be advancing in terms of modern technology; but when we have modern technology with archaic rules and questionable procedures, I do not think it will advance.

I can understand the minister trying to get some paper before us. Madam Speaker, if the first four pages of the statement had not been read to the House—those implementing tax changes—and if from the middle of page 4, where he started talking about the fiscal position for 1979-80 and 1980-81, to page 12 had been his speech, that, Madam Speaker, would have been the speech that you and I and other members of the House had heard previous ministers of finance give in this House—a general survey of economic conditions, a general survey of the revenue position of the government and a general survey of what the government needs in terms of taxes, but not tax changes. Statements in the House, Madam Speaker, are not tax changes. When you get tax changes you have a budget, and then members on all sides have an opportunity to debate that budget.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Madam Speaker, one wonders what has been going on here today. We have heard all the rhetoric about mouseland. Sometimes I think this is mouseland. We have heard about Alice in Wonderland, we have heard the government House leader compared to a rascal, to a caterpillar and to a cod liver.

An hon. Member: Cod tongue.

Mr. Nystrom: Sometimes we might wonder what is happening to the institution of Parliament.

I just want to say one or two things, Madam Speaker. First of all, to repeat the point made by the House leader of our party, this is not so much a question of procedural argument as a question of whether it was good political judgment or good leadership by the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen). I maintain that it was not good leadership and it was not good political judgment by the Minister of Finance. That surprises me, because he is the wise old fox of Parliament. He is the architect of the Liberal party, the so-called architect of the downfall of the hon. member who is now Leader of the Official Opposition (Mr. Clark). It surprises me that the minister would make the kind of insensitive blunder that he did in a moral sense in terms of slighting Parliament.

Now, Madam Speaker, I want to mention a couple of things that are very important. First of all, it is obvious that a number of us on this side of the House feel slighted. We were planning the throne speech debate and a number of members wanted to participate in it, to speak about their own region or constituency or province. All of a sudden we have a budget measure, or something that most of us think is a budget statement, that is going to take the place of a regular budget debate a few weeks ahead. Some of our members were planning to speak at that time and others wanted to participate in the debate before the House today. I say that is very important.

The last few words in the throne speech were to the effect that members of Parliament are equals, that we should reflect each part of the country, and so on. If we are to do that, we should be equals in this place; we should all be treated as equals. This should be where the decision-making process takes place. We should all be consulted and we should be apprised of what is to go on. I do not think we were in this case. I maintain it is a question of fair play between the government and the opposition.

If the government wants to be productive, it must never forget that opposition parties are important and that they can be more productive if they know the opposition parties will co-operate. The way to get opposition parties to co-operate, of course, is to get them involved, to fully consult them and make them a legitimate part of the process with a legitimate amount of input into government policy, not to bend the rules of this place in any way.

It seems to me, Madam Speaker, that this is an adult institution. We should be "up front" with everybody and should level with everybody. Much of what this debate is about is the relationship between the various political parties. That relationship must, I think, be one that is co-operative and open.

I can tell you, Madam Speaker, that the House leader of our party did not understand from the Minister of Finance that the statement he was to make would include all the tax changes and the regular budgetary changes that he announced. We operate according to the information given by our House leader. I think that if the Minister of Finance were more open and more sensitive to the opposition—after all, we on this side of the House represent more than 50 per cent of the Canadian people—he would have handled this in a totally different way.

I just make that appeal, Madam Speaker. We have four years to go—maybe three or maybe five. I think we can have a very co-operative and productive Parliament, but that will depend on the leadership given by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), the government House leader and people as "heavy" as the Minister of Finance. If they provide us with open, frank and honest leadership, use good judgment in giving decent leadership in this House, and are sensitive to all parties, then this can be a productive place. If that were the case, we would not be engaged in this debate today and wasting three or four hours in this procedural debate. We would not have had the kind of crazy vote we had last night if there had been that type of "up front" attitude on the part of the Minister of Finance.

I make the appeal to him that in the future he be more sensitive to the wishes of the opposition parties in this House.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Madam Speaker: Order, please. At the end of this debate I want to assure hon. members that I have listened very carefully to all the arguments that have been brought forward on both sides of the House, and notably to those offered by the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Baker). He said that he feels very strongly that there has been an invasion of the rights of Parliament and that the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) should have followed the procedure for a budget rather than act in the way he did.

I note that the hon. member recognized that there are some precedents for tabling ways and means motions at the time when the hon. minister has. He has even quoted Beauchesne in saying that there is no necessity to have a budget presentation before a ways and means motion. He went on to tell the House that there were changes in the rules and that he did not feel we could any longer interpret it in that sense. I think his main conclusion was that the sequence of events suggests that the Minister of Finance indeed presented something that might be called a budget and that the rights of the members and of the public have been abrogated by the process.

The Minister of Finance has, of course, argued the point very eloquently. I feel that most of his argument is based on what he feels is the definition of a budget. He quoted authors like Erskine May and Beauchesne, authors with whom I have spent a lot of time in the last several weeks, but I did not know that I could learn something about parliamentary procedure from the Oxford dictionary! I shall look that up too.

An hon. Member: That's where he gets his!

Madam Speaker: The arguments of the Minister of Finance are mostly based on Standing Order 60(1) which other hon. members have also invoked in this House. He felt he was entitled to table this ways and means motion and that in fact he was only reviving motions that already existed.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) has once again offered his enlightening remarks to this House. I appreciate them but he bases his argumentation on grounds other than procedural in order to disagree with the Minister of Finance on the kind of procedure that he used.

I just want to point out at this time that the Chair knew nothing of any prior arrangements made between members of the House about who was to speak and when. Therefore, the Chair has to assume that there was no arrangement. It would be helpful if arrangements of this nature which occur between the parties were conveyed to the Chair.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Madam Speaker: I have listened to all the arguments but have summarized only some of them to indicate to the House that I feel the matter is a very, very complicated one, even for someone experienced in the function that I have assumed. No one in this House would have any trouble recognizing that I am indeed very inexperienced in this new function. Therefore, since I do want to give it all of the thought that is required by the seriousness of the matter and the seriousness of the arguments which were brought by all members in the House, I will take the matter under advisement.

MR. AXWORTHY—STATEMENT ON INTEREST IN WINNIPEG HOTEL

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege touching on my position as a member of this House. I realize that members of this House have just gone through a very extensive discussion on a question of privilege so I beg their indulgence to hear me out on a case which I think is of some importance.

It relates to my interest in a Winnipeg hotel. The matter of this interest has been raised in question period both on April 16 and again yesterday in connection with a permit I issued Mr. Timothy Leary to enter the country. I repeat now, as I did on the two previous occasions, that the action to allow Mr. Leary to enter the country did not represent in any way a conflict of interest in the application of my ministerial duties.

As I stated in the House yesterday in respect to a question by the hon. member for Winnipeg-Assiniboine (Mr. McKenzie), my interest in the Royal Albert Arms Hotel in Winnipeg has been placed in a blind trust. This measure was the consequence of instructions I gave to my solicitor in Winnipeg following my appointment as a minister.

The hotel in question had been established as a partnership with two categories of partners; a managing partner and several limited partners. I subscribed as a limited partner. In that category I never participated in the day to day management of the hotel. Indeed, under the partnership act of Manitoba, I could not have done so if I were to remain as a limited partner.

This past weekend, in the course of handling this transfer to a trust, my solicitor discovered that the hotel had participated in a federally-sponsored program designed to provide on-the-job training for handicapped workers. This program was entered into by the managing partner of this hotel last fall when I was a member of Parliament. This program has now terminated.

Upon learning of this fact, I felt it important to ascertain the full facts and present them to this House at the earliest opportunity so there would be absolutely no misunderstanding.

I am advised by the managing partner and the departmental officials that the facts surrounding these arrangements are as follows.

In September, 1979, a local officer of the Canada Employment and Immigration Commission approached the hotel with the request that the hotel accept the placement for on-the-job training of a handicapped worker under the special needs component of the Canada Manpower industrial training program. The hotel was approached by the employment officials because of its previous history in providing employment opportunities for handicapped workers, and because one of the managing partners had trained experience as a social worker in dealing with handicapped people.

In November, following a request by a teacher at the Prince Charles school for the mentally handicapped, two additional handicapped workers were given on-the-job training in the hotel. In return for providing training and supervision to these handicapped individuals, the hotel received from the government 85 per cent of a participant's remuneration. There was no additional subsidy or grant. The agreements were all signed during the period of the previous administration and were approved and monitored by both federal and provincial officers. These agreements were handled in a routine manner by the managing partners without reference to me as a limited partner. Thus I had no knowledge of these transactions until this past weekend.

Further, let me state, Madam Speaker, that at no time have I received any form of dividend, interest, payment benefit or return from my investment as a limited partner in the hotel.

I am convinced that, as these facts demonstrate, my interest in a hotel, now in a blind trust, did not in any way constitute a breach of my obligation as a member of this House. But I want to assure all hon. members of my willingness to bare the record and to conceal nothing about these transactions.

If hon. members require more details of these matters, I will be happy to have the issue referred to a committee so I may have the issue determined by the high court of Parliament.

If you rule that I have raised a prima facie question of privilege, Madam Speaker, I am prepared to move that the matter be referred to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections for examination and report, if it is the wish of the House so to do.

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, this is, of course, a matter of the utmost seriousness and a matter of deep concern to the House, and I am sure difficult for the minister involved.

I have just received and had delivered to me a copy of the statement that he intended to make. I must say, and I say this with no undue criticism, that it would have been helpful to us to have received notice of the nature of the minister's statement on the question of privilege a little earlier than we did.

The matter is important because it applies to the standards that attach to the conduct of a minister of the Crown. I presume the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) knew this matter was to be raised today. The minister nods to indicate that the Prime Minister did. I am consequently a little surprised that the Prime Minister is not here in the House at this time, since the conduct in question does speak to the Prime Minister's own severity of standards in terms of what he asks and what he expects of people who serve in his ministry.

The Prime Minister indicated in this House in answer to questions from the hon. member for Saskatoon West (Mr. Hnatyshyn) that he was reviewing conflict of interest guidelines that were to be established for the new ministry, that the conflict of interest guidelines to be followed by the Liberal government were to be different in fundamental ways, and I judge from reading the record that they were to be weaker than those which applied to the government of which I had the honour to lead. He said he hoped to have those tabled in the House of Commons within a fortnight.

I believe that it is urgent that those matters be put upon the House of Commons' Table as quickly as possible since there is prima facie evidence in the statements by the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Axworthy) that these standards raised by the Prime Minister do not appear to have been as searching as they should have been in the case of this particular minister.

The Prime Minister said, in answer to my colleague, that he would rely upon the word of individual ministers when he was interviewing them regarding their capacity to serve in cabinet. The statement by the Minister of Employment and Immigration, as I read it, indicates that this information to which he now draws the attention of the House came to his personal attention after he had been interviewed by the Prime Minister and after he had been sworn into the cabinet.

That may well be a matter which members of the House of Commons would want to have further elaborated in committee or elsewhere, and particularly there might well be some interest on the part of members of the House of Commons in knowing the degree to which there was scrutiny, either by the Prime Minister or the minister himself, of all of the implications of arrangements in a partnership which already, in six weeks in the ministry, has been raised twice now as a matter of public debate concerning the propriety and actions and involvements by this particular minister.

Unhappily, Madam Speaker, we have too many instances of ministers even sitting in this House now, whose conduct has been found inconsistent, at least for a period of time, with their maintaining their position as ministers of the Crown. There have been instances with regard to the present Secretary of State (Mr. Fox), the present Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Munro), the present Postmaster General and Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Ouellet), and the former minister of public works, the hon. Mr. Drury.

I raise these matters not to review history but simply to draw the attention of the House and of the minister, who is new to his responsibilities, to the practice that followed those cases. In each of those cases, when a question arose as to the propriety of the conduct of a minister of the Crown, the minister involved offered his resignation to the Prime Minister, and in each of those cases that resignation was accepted.

There has been an indication by the minister that he would be prepared to have the matter considered by a standing committee of the House of Commons. I think that that should be done. I believe that a matter of this kind, which obviously raises questions about the capacity of a minister of the Crown to carry on his responsibilities effectively and free of conflict, is a matter of the utmost seriousness and deserves consideration by a standing committee.

I say with some sadness and considerable seriousness that the minister should also recognize that so long as there is a question in the minds of the House of Commons and the people of Canada about the degree to which he was operating free of conflict, then it is incumbent upon him to follow the steps of certain of his colleagues in the present government and offer his resignation for at least the period embraced by the inquiry by a standing committee of this House.

I say this because it is obviously of some importance to the minister himself. If it were not important, he would not have raised the matter as a question of privilege in the House of Commons. I say simply that if it is a matter of sufficient importance to the minister that he would raise it as a question of privilege in the House of Commons, then it follows that it is a matter of sufficient importance that he should follow consistently the attitudes of some of his new colleagues in cabinet and step aside from ministerial responsibility for the period, which we hope will be limited and brief, of an inquiry by a standing committee of the House of Commons.

My recollection of the statements that were made by certain of his colleagues when they were in similar situations and faced conflicts between their private activities and their public responsibilities is that at least one of them and perhaps several indicated there would be the kind of questioning arise until the matter was resolved, that there would be the kind of worry and preoccupation involved that would be inconsistent with the effective carrying out of ministerial responsibilities. I think that that same argument exists in the case of the minister here involved.

I suggest this would be the honourable and the proper course for the minister, since he has raised this question which is obviously of deep concern to him, this question of a potential conflict of interest, a conflict not simply between himself and the government generally but between himself and the department of which he is minister. Because as I understand the statement, it was his department which was involved in the relations with the hotel in which he had a profitable interest. If it is important enough to have the matter raised as a question of privilege, then the course of honour for the minister would be to stand aside from the ministry for at least the period of investigation by the standing committee of this House.

I urge the minister to follow through with his offer and move a reference to the standing committee. I suggest to him also that he offer his resignation to the Prime Minister, which I hope the Prime Minister will accept for at least the period of the inquiry to which he has referred.

Hon. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Madam Speaker, it is not my purpose to pass judgment on the minister or on others who have raised this issue in the House. However, it seems that the request of the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Axworthy), if I may call it a request, is one to which we ought to agree. I think it is incumbent upon the House to have this matter cleared up. We do not seem to be getting it cleared up by questions and answers on the floor of the House of Commons. I believe it would be a good idea for the matter to be referred to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections.

Your Honour may feel that you would like to reserve judgment on it to decide whether or not there is a prima facie case of privilege, but now with a spokesman from each of the three parties in the House saying we would be satisfied, perhaps it could be resolved right now.

I may say, Madam Speaker, that if you do find that the minister has a case or privilege and if the motion is put, I do not think debate on it is necessary. The important thing to happen is for it to go to a committee to be examined thoroughly.

Hon. Yvon Pinard (President of the Privy Council): Madam Speaker, may I direct your attention to a similar question of privilege that was raised on May 14, 1970, by the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen), who had made an application to purchase land over which the then minister of Indian affairs and northern development had jurisdiction. At that time he sought consent on a motion to refer the matter to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections.

After the Speaker ruled there was a prima facie case of privilege, the House gave unanimous consent to refer the matter to that committee. After hearing the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) and the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), and after the generous offer made by the minister, there would obviously be no objection on this side of the House, if you should find there is a prima facie case of privilege, to referring the matter to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections.

Hon. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Madam Speaker, I would not have risen to participate in this discussion if it were not for the reference just made to me in the context that this discussion has taken place. I want hon. members to know that the reference to which the House leader just referred had nothing to do with conflict of interest. That case had to do with the provision in a government drafted agreement for sale which prohibited any member of Parliament from purchasing a piece of Crown-owned land. It had nothing to do with conflict.

It was decided by the standing committee that members of Parliament had the same right to purchase Crown-owned land as any other person. I want to make that clear because the matter was raised in the context of this discussion. The two matters are not similar at all.

[Translation]

Madam Speaker: The President of the Privy Council agrees and this is what I concluded from his comments and from those I heard on the other side of the House. If he wishes to introduce a motion with the unanimous consent of the House, I would receive it now. Otherwise, I will take the whole matter under advisement and decide later whether or not there is a basis for a question of privilege.

Mr. Pinard: Madam Speaker, if you would allow me, I could ask the minister who has raised the question of privilege to present a motion referring the case to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections. And, of course, there is no question of a short-term resignation as suggested by the Leader of the Official Opposition (Mr. Clark). It is only a matter of referring the case to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections for consideration. If you have no objection, the motion could be moved by the minister who raised the question of privilege and I presume that my colleagues will have nothing against that.

[English]

Mr. Axworthy: Madam Speaker, before moving the motion, I should perhaps make a clarification of the statement made by the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) and the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark). The events to which I allude took place prior to the time I was a minister. It is not a question of conflict of interest, but a question of standing in the House, which is comparable to the position which the hon. member for Yukon was in previously.

This is a matter which took place prior to my having been sworn in as a minister. It was terminated prior to that time. Therefore it is not a question of conflict of interest, it is a question of standing in the House comparable to the precedent cited by the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Pinard). As a result, that is why I am referring the matter to the standing committee.

I would therefore move, seconded by the President of the Privy Council:

That the subject matter of my question of privilege be referred to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for the minister to move his motion?

Hon. Walter Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Madam Speaker, I am by no means rising to suggest that the course the minister has indicted is an inappropriate course. I am a bit worried about the words "subject matter" as they appear in the motion. We will want to make sure the motion is reasonably precise so that it can be dealt with.

I had experience with this some time ago. There was a meeting of the House leaders of the parties whereby we may get some precision in the language so that it indicates what the House really has to deal with. There seems to be some imprecision. I know it is not intended, but I am sure the minister would want the matter cleared up. It is in that sense that I rise.

I wonder, Madam Speaker, if you would consider a meeting of some kind so that we may just review the words to ensure that what is indicated by members of the House of Commons in fact happens as a result of the wording of the motion. That is my only reason for rising. If you think it improper that I should rise on this occasion, I will have to go along with what is being presented to the House; but I wonder if we could just defer that matter until we have a chance to talk about it.

● (1550)

Mr. Axworthy: If I may speak to that point, Madam Speaker, I should like to say to the House leader for the opposition that the wording was drafted exactly from wording used in a previous motion in this House in 1968, so the precedent is there. We have checked it out carefully and it is wording which was applied in 1968 in a similar matter.

Motion agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Pinard: Madam Speaker, concerning the business of the House, I simply want to advise hon. members on both sides of the House that, following the vote tonight on the NPD amendment introduced by the hon. member for Kootenay West, the throne speech debate will be interrupted to be continued at a later date during this session.

[English]

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Madam Speaker, it might be appropriate at this time if the government House leader could detail for us the order of business which will be followed. We have had some discussions on this.

[Translation]

Mr. Pinard: Madam Speaker, I should like to repeat publicly what I said privately to my hon. colleague, namely that tomorrow afternoon we shall deal with Bill C-2. Other bills are to be introduced today, including one concerning small business loans, which we should like to consider, once Bill C-2 has been dealt with. There is another bill which must be urgently considered. It is because this legislation could not be introduced before the throne speech debate had ended that we have decided to interrupt it temporarily. It will be introduced tomorrow by the Minister of Employment and Immigration. It relates to the employment tax credit, and we shall deal with it the day after tomorrow, as soon as we have completed consideration of Bill C-2 and/or the small business loans legislation.

Therefore, the three bills which I feel are most urgent are those which I have just mentioned for this week, and next week if it is possible we shall look into the banking legislation.

[English]

Mr. Knowles: Madam Speaker, I should just like to be sure with respect to the order of the first three bills. The order as the minister has just given varies slightly, according to my notes, from what we were told at a meeting a day or two ago. We were told then that the first item would be the bill on immigration, that the second would be the bill with respect to the employment tax credit and that the third would have to do with small business. I take it the minister has altered that order slightly. It is now first, immigration, second, small business, and third, employment tax credit.

Mr. Pinard: It is correct that I have just said that. The reason is that the bill concerning the employment tax credit cannot be introduced in the House before this debate is interrupted. Consequently it will be introduced tomorrow for first reading. I would need unanimous consent to proceed with the second reading of that bill tomorrow if we have finished dealing with Bill C-2. So what I told the hon. member still stands. If possible, it will be Bill C-2, the employment tax credit, and then the small business loans bill. But it may happen that we have to deal with small business loans if tomorrow, by any chance, we have finished with Bill C-2. If the hon. member wishes a further explanation, I am available.

Mr. Knowles: The more things change, the more they are the same!

MAIN ESTIMATES, 1979-80

TABLING OF REPORT RESPECTING MAIN AND SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES (A) AND (B)

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (President of the Treasury Board): By leave I should like to table a report to the House of Commons covering the 1979-80 main estimates, supplementary estimates (A) and (B) and further supplementary estimates in order to complete the fiscal year 1979-80. This report shows how each of the items to be voted in these estimates were financed by appropriation acts, Treasury Board contingencies vote and special Governor General's warrant. Since some items were paid under the authority of a special warrant, specific reference to this effect will be included in the next appropriation bill.

Mr. Stevens: Madam Speaker, in this connection I was wondering whether the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Johnston) would confirm that he intends to make a statement on motions later this afternoon touching on what he is now tabling. I might say, also, that I should like to reserve for further consideration a question of privilege having to do with what is being tabled, especially in the context of the statement which was read to the House last night by the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen).

Statistics Canada

Mr. Johnston: I shall be making a statement later this afternoon, Madam Speaker.

STATISTICS CANADA

TABLING OF ORGANIZATION STUDY AND METHODOLOGY REVIEW

● (1600)

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (President of the Treasury Board): Madam Speaker, in accordance with the provisions of Standing Order 41(2), I wish to table, in both official languages, copies of the Statistics Canada organization study completed by Price Waterhouse Associates in February of 1980 and the Statistics Canada methodology review completed under the responsibility of Sir Claus Moser in March of 1980.

Point of Order—Mr. Malone

Mr. Stevens: Madam Speaker, at this time I rise on a point of order. I wonder if the minister could indicate whether he intends to make a statement later today with respect to the two reports he has just tabled and, second, when may we expect the tabling of the Peter Newcombe report?

Mr. Johnston: Madam Speaker, I do not intend to make a statement today with respect to the two reports I have tabled. I have indicated that I would make the report of Mr. Peter Newcombe available to spokesmen for the opposition parties. As yet I have not received a request for such copies and, as I also indicated in reply to a question, I believe last week, I would be prepared to consider tabling that report. But I think initially I would like to confer with my colleague, the hon. member for York-Peel (Mr. Stevens).

Mr. Beatty: He has already asked you to do it.

Mr. Stevens: Madam Speaker, to be abundantly clear on this question, I do not think it is right that the minister should suggest that there be a private disclosure of this report to certain members of this House without the report being tabled in the usual way for the consideration of all members. I would like formally to request that the minister table the report as initially promised when this commission was set up and that he do it at the first opportunity.

POINT OF ORDER

MR. MALONE—FAILURE OF CERTAIN MEMBERS TO RISE WHEN REQUESTED BY MADAM SPEAKER

Mr. Arnold Malone (Crowfoot): Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order relating to this question but with a different perspective from that just raised. My point of order relates to the fact that when the tabling took place under the name of Her Majesty's servant, Your Honour requested on both occasions, "Would hon. members please rise". In the first instance four members here to my left declined to rise. In the second three others very reluctantly did, while the hon. member for Churchill (Mr. Murphy) continued to refuse to rise after that request.

While on the surface it may appear that I am raising a position which may seem to some to be petty, I submit that for most it was only a few short weeks ago that we took our oaths of office as members of Parliament. We swore allegiance to Her Majesty the Queen, and we said that as members of Parliament and through the system we have we would recognize our obligation to our monarch under whom we serve and that we would be diligent to it.

When hon. members of their own party reminded them that they were supposed to rise, they shook their heads or moved their hands in a downward motion. In effect, what they were really doing was saying that, whatever their personal motives with respect to systems with which they may or may not agree, they were taking a position quite different from the oath they took just some short weeks ago.

All I am saying is that hon. members who cannot recognize the system in which they live or who find it unpalatable to live with it should at least have courtesy, recognize the dignity of this Parliament and force themselves to live with the system until there has been some change. I hope such change will not come about, but when they simply defy the tradition of this Parliament, I think that kind of behaviour should be noted and that it not be permitted in the future. They should not be allowed to sit in defiance of their oath in this Parliament.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Madam Speaker: Hon. members have surely heard the remarks made by one of their colleagues. They can make what they will of them. It is obviously an established custom in the House and the Chair has no authority whatsoever for enforcing it.

MAIN ESTIMATES, 1980-81

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (President of the Treasury Board): Madam Speaker, I tabled today the main estimates for 1980-81 providing for expenditures of some $58.4 billion, an increase of 11.4 per cent over the main estimates for the previous year. I would like to point out, Madam Speaker, that these estimates were put together using the economic assumptions and policies of the previous government without any changes to reflect the policies this government is in the process of elaborating.

In view of the time necessary for a technical analysis of such a complex budget, it was not possible for the government to put together its own policies and programs without unduly delaying the tabling of the estimates. As hon. members rely on the main estimates to vote supplies, it seemed important to me that they should have them today so we can get on with our work as rapidly as possible. My colleague the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) has already described to the House the economic and financial context for our estimates. As the planning process takes place, certain items of the main estimates will have to be adjusted through supplementary estimates or appropriate legislative measures.

[English]

Madam Speaker, I should like to draw hon. members' attention to several specific cases in which future supplementary estimates will reflect changes in programs in these main estimates. As hon. members are aware, the government introduced legislation to increase the payments under the guaranteed income supplement provisions of the Old Age Security Act by $35 a month per household. As the $1.7 billion presently included in the main estimates for this program are based on the old rates, the forecast expenditures for the program will be increased to provide for the higher payments.

I would also expect that the government's current review of energy policy will lead to adjustments in the level of funding for a number of energy-related programs. The $2.6 billion provision in the 1980-81 main estimates for oil import compensation payments is based on the previous government's domestic oil pricing strategy and on world oil prices as forecast last December. This forecast will be adjusted to reflect the impact of more recent changes in world oil prices as well as the effect of the domestic pricing arrangements being developed by my colleague the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde).

The government is also reviewing the capital financing arrangements for Petro-Canada. Until 1979-80 the government had been assisting Petro-Canada with its capital financing requirements through the annual purchase of equity shares in the company. The previous government suspended this financing arrangement and planned to provide for no equity purchase in the 1980-81 estimates. Last month this government took the first step in restoring the planned level of financing for Petro-Canada by providing an $80 million equity investment for the corporation's 1980 financial year. We will be considering further requirements for Petro-Canada in 1980 as part of our over-all energy policy and any adjustments will be reflected in future supplementary estimates.

I would also like to indicate to hon. members that the 1980-81 main estimates for the employment and insurance program reflect that the administrative costs of the national employment services are now being recovered in full from unemployment insurance premium revenues. In addition, it was assumed in determining the main estimates level for the government's contribution to the unemployment insurance account that the Unemployment Insurance Act would have been amended by April 1, 1980, to eliminate the threshold rate so that the first two phases of unemployment benefits would be paid entirely from employer and employee premiums. The legislation has not yet been amended and my colleague the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Axworthy) plans to make a full statement on this subject.

Madam Speaker, there are a few of the items which may have their main estimates funding level adjusted to reflect this government's policies and programs.

The main estimates which I tabled today represent an increase of $5,971 million compared to those of last year. This is comprised of a $1,123 million decrease in non-budgetary outlays and an increase of $7,094 million in budgetary expenditures. Two major items account for 53 per cent of the increase in budgetary expenditures. Oil import compensation payments have risen by $1,861 million and public debt charges are up $1,925 million over the 1979-80 main estimates. The other major sources of the $7 billion budgetary increase are the other transfer payments, principally to other levels of government, which account for 19 per cent; payments to Crown corporations, which account for 11 per cent; and national defence, which represents 10 per cent. The costs of all other operations of government represent only 7 per cent of the total growth. In other words, more than 83 per cent of the increase in budgetary spending will be transferred to other governments, individuals, and corporations in Canada or paid in interest on the public debt.

In 1975-76, the government set out to reduce the growth in person-year requirements in the public service as part of our over-all policy of restraint. The 1980-81 main estimates show the second consecutive annual reduction in the absolute number of authorized person-years to be used in the public service. The reduction of 6,685 person-years in 1978 resulted in a total of 1979-80 authorization of 318,435. Now, a further, 5,840 person-year reduction is reflected in these main estimates, which establishes the size of the public service at 312,595 for 1980-81.

Madam Speaker, in addition to the 1980-81 main estimates, I also tabled today the supplementary estimates (A) for 1980-81. These supplementary estimates cover new items which are not included in the 1980-81 main estimates. I have also included in these supplementary estimates a number of urgent items carried forward from 1979-80 which did not receive approval before Parliament was dissolved last December. These supplementary estimates provide for the outlay of $232 million.

I am also pleased, Madam Speaker, to have tabled two further reports on government spending. The first is a report on the 1979-80 estimates. This report summarizes the financial requirements of the ministries of government during 1979-80 and the use of spending authorities not provided in separate statutes, namely, Governor General's special warrants, the interim supply bill of last autumn and the supplementary estimates which received full supply. I have also tabled, in accordance with the provisions of the Financial Administration Act, a report on the use of Governor General's warrants since December 14, 1979, when Parliament was dissolved.

[Translation]

In concluding, Madam Speaker, I would also like to expand for the information of hon. members on the intentions of this government as they were expressed in the Speech from the Throne to carry out the policy of cutting down expenditures, to improve the efficiency of government programs and to provide Canadians with a more efficient government. To reach that objective, this government will pursue an integration of its expenditure policy and management.

In essence, the approach adopted by this government consists in establishing within its over-all spending program a set of budget portfolios which represent for each of the policy committees of cabinet a clearly defined planning structure applicable to a policy area. It will thus be possible to give every committee the responsibility to plan and make decisions dealing with policies and programs based on available resources in each sector. With that rationalization of policies and related spending authorities, it should be easier to pursue the examination of new or existing programs and to get the most out of the resources available.

[English]

Hon. Sinclair Stevens (York-Peel): I wonder, Madam Speaker, if I may be permitted to put certain questions to the minister, based partly on the estimates he has tabled and partly on the statement he has read into the record as prepared for him. Could the minister, first of all, indicate whether he accepts the main estimates as tabled? Does he support them and does he recommend them to the House for adoption?

Mr. Johnston: As I indicated in the course of my statement, Madam Speaker, these estimates represent the policy proposals of the previous administration. They are being tabled legally as our estimates but, as I indicated, we will be bringing forward supplementary estimates to give effect to those changes and to the policies which have been mentioned in the throne speech debate and which will be further elaborated during the course of the current year.

Mr. Stevens: Perhaps I was not completely clear in my question to the minister. My question is very simple. Does he recommend to the House the main estimates for 1980-81 as tabled in the House?

Mr. Johnston: These main estimates will be referred to committee and they are recommended for adoption, subject to such changes as might be brought down in the supplementary estimates.

Mr. Stevens: I think it should be noted for the record that twice the minister has refrained from recommending these estimates to the House. Unless the minister chooses to clarify the situation, we will be on the threshold of going into another question of privilege and a debate on how we can consider these main estimates if the minister who has brought them in is hesitant to recommend them to the House. It is a very simple question.

We had this out last fall. The present Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen), who was then opposition House leader, became terribly exercised last fall over this question, I would have thought they would have at least got their act sorted out to the point where the Minister of Finance would be in tandem with the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Johnston) and both of them would be willing to recommend these estimates to the House for acceptance.

Mr. Johnston: I thought my answer was quite clear. I said that these main estimates were being tabled and they will be referred to the committee. They are being recommended for adoption subject to such modifications as may subsequently be made thereto through tabling supplementary estimates to give effect to policy changes which this administration may wish to introduce.

Mr. Stevens: Madam Speaker, in the context of what the minister has said, and with the main estimates showing a total expenditure for fiscal 1980-81 of $58.4 billion, would the President of the Treasury Board reconcile that figure with the statement given to us last night by the Minister of Finance which indicated that the total outlays for 1980-81 would be $60.4 billion, in short a $2 billion difference? What has happened overnight that somehow or other the $60.4 billion figure, which we were asked to consider last night, is now only being substantiated to the extent of $58.4 billion? Does he have any statement which he can put before the House to reconcile these two figures?

Mr. Knowles: Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order. Is it not a rule, when a statement has been made by a minister, that a spokesman for each opposition party may make a statement in response thereto and that the question period comes afterwards? I am not trying to cut off the hon. member for York-Peel (Mr. Stevens) from asking his questions. I just think that he should make his statement now, let our spokesman make his statement, and then have the question period as the standing order provides.

Madam Speaker: I gathered that the hon. member had no statement but only questions. I am in the hands of the House as to what I should do now. I feel that I should continue to recognize the hon. member for York-Peel (Mr. Stevens) for the purpose of him putting his questions.

Mr. Stevens: Madam Speaker, I do not want to be overly technical, but if Your Honour reads Standing Order 15(3), I think it is very clear that the options are open to the members of the House. It reads as follows:

> A spokesman for each of the parties in opposition to the government may comment briefly thereon and members may be permitted to address questions thereon to the minister.

I do not think it is laid out in the standing order that one has formally to make a statement and then everybody, when they are through with their statements, may start questioning. I think it is open to each member to decide. If he wishes to make a statement, he can. If he wishes to ask questions, he can. In my case I think it is very important that certain very relevant information be revealed to this House, as opposed to any member feeling that he just wants to wax eloquent about whatever may come into his mind.

We were not given a full disclosure last evening. We have had a debate on the question of privilege as to whether in fact the minister's statement was a smuggled budget. Today I would suggest that we are not having a full disclosure as to the expenditure plans of this government. I feel that I am entirely in order in asking the President of the Treasury Board at least to shed a little more light on this question.

Mr. Knowles: Madam Speaker, I have no objection to the hon. member for York-Peel asking all the questions that he wants to. Neither do I insist that he make a statement. But it seems to me that those who wish to make statements should be heard first. If the hon. member for York-Peel does not wish to make a statement, then I believe that our spokesman should be permitted to make his statement and that the questions should follow.

Madam Speaker: Does the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) have a statement?

Mr. Anguish: A point of order, Madam Speaker.

Madam Speaker: The hon. member for The Battlefords-Meadow Lake (Mr. Anguish).

Mr. Doug Anguish (The Battlefords-Meadow Lake): Madam Speaker, I should like to say in my rookie observations as a member of Parliament that there is clearly no difference between the Conservative side of the House and the Liberal side of the House in the fact that the hon. member in opposition is asking the very same questions that were asked of him when he was president of the treasury board.

An hon. Member: Right on.

Mr. Beatty: That is not a point of order.

Mr. Anguish: Also I should like to say that I am disappointed that I see the hon. member, in trying to question the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Johnston), was given a copy of the estimates—

An hon. Member: You are out of order.

Mr. Anguish: —to which I had no access and could not peruse while the minister was making his statement so that I could intelligently respond to him.

The estimates which have been tabled before us today seem to indicate that the government intends to approach some things in a relatively new way and other things in the same old way as it always has. Last night's alleged budget and the tabling of these estimates today indicate—

Mr. Beatty: Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order. The hon. member asked for the floor on a point of order. He has not offered any point of order and he appears to be making a statement at this point.

Madam Speaker: The hon. member asked for the floor in order to make a statement, and that is the reason for which I gave him the floor. Since the hon. member for York-Peel did not have a statement and was asking questions, I decided to hear the hon. member for The Battlefords-Meadow Lake on his statement.

Mr. Beatty: The record will show something else.

Mr. Anguish: Thank you, Madam Speaker. Last night—

Mr. Stevens: A point of order, Madam Speaker. To be abundantly clear, I trust that I will have the right to finish my line of questioning following this statement.

Mr. Knowles: Certainly.

Madam Speaker: Yes, I will give the hon. member the floor afterwards for the purpose of asking his questions.

Mr. Anguish: It is nice to know that the older members always try to assist a younger member or a member not as experienced in the House and help them present the points of view of the constituents and the people of Canada which they represent.

An hon. Member: Order.

Mr. Anguish: Last night's alleged budget and the tabled estimates today indicate their new approach, as I was mentioning. Last night's presentation, I think, could be called the "Mac mini-budget", and today's estimates could be called the "maybe estimates" as well. In fact, if the truth be known, had the Liberals done their homework, they would have had time since the vote in December to produce policies consistent with reducing interest rates, tax cuts and other measures to stimulate the economy.

The estimates presented to this House are supposed to represent what I think is the intention of the government. What do they do? Well, we see first that the Liberals have immediately fallen into their old habit of refusing to plan at all. I think we need long-term planning. I suggest that these are ways the government could make the workings of government more efficient and more accountable to the people of Canada. We need a long-term plan which incorporates the use of public servants properly, thereby using them efficiently, not a cutting of the person-years as suggested by the estimates by a large number, the 5,840 person-year reduction. Those people could perhaps be used more efficiently within this government.

What about the energy policy that is alluded to? I can certainly agree with the minister's contention that we require the estimates early to get on with the business of government, but surely we do not have to go with estimates which have oil compensation payments based on the previous government's oil pricing strategy, a strategy that has been repudiated not only by the government but by the Canadian people in the last election. At that time Canadians said that they wanted a made-in-Canada price, but it seems that we cannot have this until we can have it made by Canadians themselves.

For some time now we have been receiving hints that the government may be raising its own energy prices higher than it would have had us believe during the election campaign. Perhaps it is part of their strategy to break another promise and to deceive the people of Canada by sneaking in higher energy prices through the back door.

What about the unemployment insurance which is alluded to in the report of the President of the Treasury Board? The Liberals, in these estimates and in their statements outside of the House, have indicated their intention to proceed with the Conservative's plan to switch the cost of manpower programs and even more of the unemployment insurance program directly to premiums. I think the government should be responsible enough to accept the legislation enacted earlier whereby when unemployment reached 4 per cent, it is the responsibility of the government to absorb cost. It is the government's policies that are responsible for creating unemployment, and in view of that fact the government should help in assisting and should suffer some of the consequences.

Before the last election the Liberals were calling such steps unacceptable, regressive taxation. How quickly they seem to forget or how quickly we seem to forget the amazing similarities between Conservative and Liberal policies. As a Saskatchewan cabinet minister so eloquently put it some time ago, "the 1979 federal election indicated that the Canadian people gave away onions and got back garlic; after the 1980 election we have got the onions back again".

In spite of the failings in what the estimates say, there are even greater failings in what the estimates do not say. The Liberals have promised action to reduce regional disparities, but nowhere do we see a real commitment to that in the comments made by the President of the Treasury Board this afternoon.

None of us must forget that this is a party and a government that voted last December to defeat the previous government because of a budget that did not stimulate the economy, lower taxes for Canadians and which did nothing about gaining control of the economy.

• (1630)

The estimates before us are a sort of cyclical document, I would think. After I have had a chance to look at them I believe they will show us once again that the Liberals are more interested in keeping power than in keeping their promises to the Canadian people. It seems they were not very responsive in the activities in this House over the past couple of days because of what they call the lack of federal representation in the Liberal caucus. With the possible loss of even more Liberal representation, they are certainly not being responsive to other members in this House.

As a new member of Parliament I had hoped the Liberal government would be responsive to the needs of Canadians in all areas of this country through the democratic process as indicated by what is in the throne speech. What has taken place over the last few days does not indicate any commitment to serve, in my opinion. As a result of public comment in my own constituency I had some praise for Liberals, their throne speech and their supposed response to other members of Parliament, but if this action over the last few days is any indication of what is happening, I regret ever having had any confidence in the Liberal party within Canada.

Mr. Stevens: Madam Speaker, I only wish the last speaker and his colleagues had sensed that lack of confidence in the Liberals during the last campaign.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stevens: Perhaps I could come back to my line of questioning of the President of the Treasury Board. Could he reconcile for the House the figure of $58.4 billion in total expenditures as tabled today with the statement we were given last night, showing total expenditures for fiscal 1980-81 of $60.4 billion? Could he specifically reconcile the $2 billion difference?

Mr. Johnston: Madam Speaker, I believe that the Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) spoke to this point last night, indicating that since the presentation of the budget in December and, of course, since the preparation of the main estimates which we inherited upon taking office, a number of events have taken place: an increase in public debt charges, for one; the increase in the international price of oil, which in turn increases the oil import compensation payments, to name but two of the major items; and the increase in the guaranteed income supplement which this government has committed itself to put into effect, which I believe was recorded as involving something in the order of $345 million. These represent increases beyond the figure set forth in these main estimates of approximately $58.4 billion. As you know, Madam Speaker, it is not unusual to table supplementary estimates, as I have done today, which take account of some parts of this increase over the numbers shown in the main estimates.

Mr. Stevens: Madam Speaker, perhaps we could look at these one at a time with the President of the Treasury Board. I think he owes it to the House to tell us exactly what accounts for the difference between the $58.4 billion and the $60.4 billion. Last night the minister indicated that the upward revision in public debt charges was of the order of $500 million. Could the President of the Treasury Board tell us what is the upward adjustment on account of the oil compensation amount that is included presumably in this $2 billion discrepancy or difference?

Mr. Johnston: Madam Speaker, I do not intend to analyze the full difference between the $58.4 billion which has been tabled in the main estimates and in the supplementary estimates that I have tabled today, and the numbers put forward by the minister last night. He indicated at the time that they were simply projections. He also indicated at the time, as I recall, that he hoped this would be reduced through the establishment of this so-called blended oil price which we trust the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources will, in due course, be able to agree upon. Pursuing an analysis of this kind at this time by the President of the Treasury Board and the hon. member for York-Peel I would regard as quite unproductive.

Mr. Anguish: I would address my question to the President of the Treasury Board, Madam Speaker. In his presentation this afternoon he said that an additional 5,840 person-year reduction would result in the public service of this country. Could he detail for us where we might expect those cuts to be found?

Mr. Johnston: Madam Speaker, I believe there has been some misunderstanding as to the statement I made. The indication was that 1979-80 was the second year of reduction. This reduction that these programs have given rise to in the current year I am advised is 5,840 person-years. If the hon.

member wants complete details on it I can give them to him. They are to be found in the estimates. The hon. member indicated earlier that he had not received a copy, but the actual man-year reductions are reflected in the table at the front of the main estimates. I am surprised that spokesmen for the NDP do not have a copy of that table.

Mr. Anguish: Could I ask that I get a copy of these estimates to peruse while the questioning is taking place?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Madam Speaker, I would like to ask the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Johnston) a question about the oil import compensation fund also. The budget speech of December 11 and the documents attached to that document showed oil import compensation payments in our estimate for the year 1980-81 as $1,620 billion. That was the predicted cost of the program for 1980-81 based on the oil price scenarios set out in the budget, and the estimate of what imported oil would cost during 1980. Of course, as has been pointed out in the House by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde), that estimate was based on the price estimated for the year of $27 and some odd cents a barrel.

The present price of imported oil landed at Montreal is about $35 or $36 a barrel, and the estimate is up. In the statement the Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) made last night it was indicated that the amount of the increase, with higher international oil prices, has raised the projected level of oil import compensation payments by $1.5 billion. Does that mean that the estimate for this year for oil import compensation payments is now $3,120 billion, or what is the estimate of the President of the Treasury Board for this year, 1980-81?

Mr. Johnston: Madam Speaker, perhaps I could take this opportunity in response to the hon. member's question to clear up what may be a certain amount of confusion in reconciling the total expenditure projections of the government at this time and the main estimates which were tabled today.

If I refer to the minister's speech of last night, the minister explained the difference between the total expenditure projections of the previous government made in December, and the current expenditure projections we are presenting at this time—those that he presented last night. As he pointed out, the increase in the interest rates on the public debt, and the two increases in international oil prices which occurred after the preparation for the December forecast of expenditures, account in the main for an upward revision of $2 billion in the projected total expenditures.

If we turn to the main estimates tabled today, Madam Speaker, by coincidence the total main estimates amount to $58.437 billion, which is approximately the same number as the previous government had forecast in December for total expenditures. These two numbers represent quite different factors, as the hon. gentleman knows. The $58.4 billion was the total expenditure forecast, whereas the $58.437 billion represents total authorities to be requested from Parliament at the time of tabling of the main estimates, and recognizing that there would be further requirements for supplementary estimates during the course of the year.

The main estimates tabled today are about $1 billion higher than had been expected by the previous government at the time they deposited their December budget and their total expenditure forecast, to which the hon. gentleman has made reference.

• (1640)

In the main, the approximately $1 billion increase in the main estimates was due to an adjustment to take into account the first increase in international oil prices which occurred just after the budget was presented and tabled in December, but prior to the finalization of the figures in the main estimates which I have tabled today.

The further adjustments to expected total expenditures have occurred subsequently, have not been included in the main estimates and must be taken into account in providing a realistic forecast of the total expenditures, which is what the Minister of Finance did in his statement last night.

These major additional adjustments, Madam Speaker, are the increase in the public debt cost, the second round of increases in international oil prices and the provision for the increase in the guaranteed income supplement, as I have indicated. Providing for these increases, which have already been identified, plus an allowance to meet further unforeseen requirements for supplementary estimates during the year, results in the forecast presented by the Minister of Finance last night of total expenditures of $60.4 billion.

I hope that this brief explanation of the coincidence of the two numbers, the two $58.4 billion amounts, will serve to clear up any confusion in the minds of my hon. friends.

Mr. Crosbie: Madam Speaker, I think I can understand what the President of the Treasury Board is saying, even though he is a tax lawyer. It would help us, though, if he would tell us about the two items that mainly account for this difference. He says they are the interest cost and the oil import compensation payment—the difference between the statement the Minister of Finance made last night, the estimates he has tabled and the guaranteed income supplement.

Could he just tell us—let us forget the estimates he has tabled—what is the latest estimates of Treasury Board which the Minister of Finance must have used last night for interest payments during the year 1980-81? As far as I can make out, it should be around $10.7 billion. What is the amount that he thinks will be spent on the guaranteed income supplement additional payment in 1980-81—because the Minister of Finance used that figure last night—over and above what already was in the law, assuming the new amendment is passed by the House, which it will be. Also, what does the minister now estimate will be the total cost of the oil import subsidization program this year for 1980-81, given what he now knows about the international price, with only a $1 increase in January and not counting any increases in the rest of the year because there may not be any. What is the best estimate now? Is it, as it appears to me to be, $3.120 billion? If the minister could give us those three figures it would clear up our confusion, because these are the three main items.

Mr. Johnston: Madam Speaker, I would be happy to take that question under advisement and let the hon. member know the exact numbers which are provided for. Some of the information appears in the material which I have before me, but some of it will require further analysis which it would not be appropriate for me to make during the course of this response.

Mr. Crosbie: This is most mysterious, Madam Speaker. The implication of what the President of the Treasury Board now says is that the Minister of Finance last night went ahead and gave this House his own estimates which were not prepared in consultation and co-ordination with the President of the Treasury Board, and that the President of the Treasury Board cannot give me the answer to those three simple items because he does not know how the Minister of Finance has calculated additional interest costs, additional oil import subsidization costs and how he has calculated the guaranteed income supplement.

Surely that is the job of the Treasury Board. I believe that is the way we did it when we were in government and things were properly run. Treasury Board prepared these estimates and went over them with officials of the Department of Finance. The Department of Finance agreed with Treasury Board on their estimates, or vice versa, and the Minister of Finance and the President of the Treasury Board knew what was what.

The President of the Treasury Board today is saying that he and the Minister of Finance have different figures and that he does not know how the Minister of Finance arrived at his.

Mr. Johnston: With respect, Madam Speaker, I believe that is a complete distortion of the answer I gave. I simply requested the opportunity to review the material and to provide it to the hon. member. By far the largest single item, of course, of the ones we have discussed in the over-all budgetary position of the items raised by the hon. gentleman, is the debt costs which are rising from $8.350 billion in 1979-80 to $10.275 billion in 1980-81.

Mr. Anguish: Madam Speaker, the question I should like to raise is this. In light of the large deficit of the government that has been occurring over the last couple of years—in 1978 $10 billion and in 1979 in excess of $16 billion—do we expect to have this same deficit between revenue and expenditure in 1980-81? If not, how does the minister expect to overcome this?

Mr. Johnston: Madam Speaker, that question is more properly addressed to my colleague the Minister of Finance. The issue of the deficit was dealt with by the Minister of Finance during his remarks last night. I believe the statement he made completely covers the government's intentions with respect thereto, including the reference he made to the possibility of a reduction in the $60.4 billion amount through the application or implementation of the blended oil price.

Madam Speaker: Order, please. I think I should start limiting the questions. I shall recognize, however, those who have already indicated their intention of asking a question—the hon. member for Richmond-South Delta (Mr. Siddon), the hon. member for Wellington-Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Beatty) and the hon. member for York-Peel (Mr. Stevens). The hon. member for Richmond-South Delta.

Mr. Thomas Siddon (Richmond-South Delta): Madam Speaker, with all due respect to the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Johnston), I believe that he has somewhat confused the definition of his figures. In his statement he indicated that government spending as projected in the estimates amounts to some $58.4 billion, while in fact the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) indicated last night that under his revised plan for spending the amount would be $59.8 billion in relation to the projection under the public account basis in our budget, which was presented by the former minister of finance, of some $57.3 billion.

I should like to ask the President of the Treasury Board if it is true that the increase in deficit for the projected 1980-81 year is indeed $2.5 billion and not a lesser amount, as he indicated a few moments ago.

I should like the opinion of the President of the Treasury Board as to where this is leading Canada. In particular, has he contemplated five-year projections as to what percentage of government spending we might anticipate in the form of deficit in the 1983-84 fiscal year; and in doing so, has he recognized that the budget of the former minister of finance predicted that percentage deficit would be reduced to some 6 per cent within four years?

The Canadian people would like to hear what the plans of the minister and the government are to produce a corresponding reduction in the deficit of his government.

Mr. Johnston: First, Madam Speaker, there seems to be some confusion in the mind of the hon. member about the purpose of the main estimates. They represent seeking authority for expenditures by this government. They do not represent an expenditure plan by this government. I think that point was made clear during the comments of the Minister of Finance last night.

In addition to that, Madam Speaker, I think we have demonstrated—and it is clear from this exchange—that in fact there is very little discretionary increase, if I may call it that, in the expenditure plans of this government. The guaranteed income supplement of approximately $345 million is indeed an increased expenditure which it is within the discretion of this government to make. As the Minister of Finance indicated last night, the increase in oil prices which we have discussed and increased debt charges accounted, for the most part, for this increase of approximately $2 billion.

As the hon. gentleman well knows, Madam Speaker, a deficit represents a shortfall between expenditures and revenues. Here we are merely looking at the expenditure side. I suggest, Madam Speaker, that had the Conservative administration had the opportunity of tabling these same main estimates, they too would have produced an expenditure plan far in excess of the authorization of $58.4 billion—

Mr. Stevens: No. No.

Mr. Johnston: —because they too would have had to deal with increased oil prices—

● (1650)

Mr. Stevens: No. Read the December 11 budget.

Mr. Johnston: —and they would also have had to deal with the increased debt costs.

The budget, in further response to the hon. member's question, did indeed provide for a substantially lower deficit, but almost entirely because of the imposition of an 18-cent per gallon excise tax at the gas pump which this government, as a policy matter, rejects. Hence, it is inconceivable that the deficit—having rejected that particular source of revenue which was regarded as regressive by the Liberal government—could not have been larger than that projected in the December budget figures.

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Wellington-Dufferin-Simcoe): Madam Speaker, the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Johnston) finally disclosed the cost of one discretionary expenditure, and that is the increase to the GIS.

With regard to the statement made by the hon. member's leader in Toronto on January 12, 1980, where he issued a five-point policy of the Liberal's economic strategy, the fifth point is this:

> Finally, in this election campaign we pledge that any new expenditure programs to meet the evolving needs and requirements of Canadians will be financed by reallocating existing expenditures or by increases in revenues. We will not add to the deficit by adding new programs.

I ask what cuts is the minister making in existing programs, or what revenue increases are anticipated to compensate for the $345 million of new spending on discretionary programs which the minister is dealing with today?

Mr. Johnston: Madam Speaker, I believe it was indicated during the course of the campaign that the guaranteed income supplement, the $35 a month, to go to each household is essentially to bring people below the poverty line up to the poverty line, which I suggest is a sound and important program with which I would hope the hon. member would agree. That was to be financed by a corporate tax of some form. As I understand it, that is the technique, and as I recall, the Minister of Finance indicated last night that the corporate surtax, the creation, conceptually at least, of my hon. friends, would be used in part for that purpose.

Mr. Stevens: Madam Speaker, what we have before us is an admission on the part of the President of the Treasury Board that the main estimates that he is now recommending to Parliament for a total expenditure of $58.4 billion are equal to the entire anticipated expenditure that was set out in the budget of December 11 by my colleague the former minister of finance. In short, the $1 billion rough reserve that was in there has been used up, and we now have the Minister of Finance, presently in office indicating that there may still be another $2 billion required in total expenditures before the government is through.

What I find most unbelievable today is that the President of the Treasury Board cannot simply explain how he arrives at this figure of $60.4 billion. We must be left only to conclude that this is a figure that was established by the Department of Finance and later communicated to the President of the Treasury Board, and he does not have any more idea than any of us as to where that figure came from.

Let me put this to the President of the Treasury Board. As I understand it, he indicated that the total debt charges in fiscal 1980-81 were to be $10,275 million. Perhaps he could answer that.

Mr. Johnston: Madam Speaker, I am referring, of course, to the the amount provided for in the main estimates. The amount provided for public debt in the main estimates is $10,275 million, representing 17.7 per cent of the total budgetary expenditures.

Mr. Stevens: Madam Speaker, perhaps I could ask for a clarification of that. The figure my colleague asked for is the estimated total debt charge for the coming fiscal year 1980-81, not just what is expressed in the main estimates but what is in fact the total debt charge? When the President of the Treasury Board is answering that question, perhaps he can reconcile for us his statement that there will be further funding for Petro-Canada in which he says that we will be reconsidering further requirements for PetroCan in 1980 as part of our over-all energy policy, and any adjustments will be reflected in future supplementary estimates.

Could the President of the Treasury Board reconcile that with the revelation last night on the part of the Minister of Finance, which may be pure fudging, that the advances, investments and loans to Crown corporations are only going to be $600 million in the current fiscal year compared to $1,250 million? How is it that their projection as revealed last night shows over $600 million less going into Crown corporations when he indicates that PetroCan is actually going to get more?

An hon. Member: Inconsistent.

Mr. Johnston: Madam Speaker, I find no difficulty in reconciling those two statements. That is a question of numbers. It is a question of arithmetic. It is a question of where less funds are going in and where more funds are going in. PetroCan happens to be a priority of this government, and what the Minister of Finance indicated last night was fully in keeping with that priority.

Returning to the hon. member's first question, by my calculation the total debt provided for at the moment, projected—that is, debt service charge—would be in the order of $10.8 billion, $10.9 billion.

[Translation]

Madam Speaker: I gave notice a few moments ago, before some members rose again, that I would hear no more speakers. I think that in the best interests of the House proceedings I must now put an end to that question period. Surely there will be other opportunities to discuss those questions. We should proceed to the remaining orders of the day if we do not want our day to be longer than everyone else's.

OLYMPIC GAMES

NON-PARTICIPATION OF CANADIAN ATHLETES

Hon. Mark MacGuigan (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Madam Speaker, the Soviet Union's move into Afghanistan at the turn of the year caught the world by shocked surprise. The depth of international opposition can be measured by the strength of the vote in the emergency session of the United Nations General Assembly called to deal with the question in early January: one hundred and four governments cast their votes in condemnation of Soviet action. That action continues. The Soviet leaders are proceeding to tighten their hold on what was, and has been for decades, an independent neighbouring country. Such international behaviour cannot go unheeded. The country responsible cannot claim for itself immunity from the consequences of its own freely chosen course of action.

There has been broad agreement internationally that the Soviet action can only be met by concrete measures, adopted by members of the international community as expressions of concern over unacceptable and unjustifiable policies. These measures are not, and cannot be uniform: nor can they themselves secure the withdrawal of Soviet forces from Afghanistan. They do, however, reflect a full range of national reactions which when added together constitute an impressive and deliberate demonstration of world opposition to the Soviet invasion.

[English]

For its part, and after the fullest consultation with allies and friends, Canada adopted a broad spectrum of measures under the previous government which have been reaffirmed by the present government. Visits to the Soviet Union by ministers and high level officials have been cancelled. Similarly, a wide range of exchanges in education, culture, and sport, along with a wide variety of exports of manufactured goods and agricultural products, have been halted. Thus, Canadians in a broad spectrum of fields of endeavour—artists, sportsmen, farmers, academics and businessmen, to name a few—have been called upon to make sacrifices in the process of Canada's response to Soviet aggression.

• (1700)

In the framework of the government's reaction to the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan, one issue has remained undecided: participation in the 1980 Olympic Games, scheduled to be held in Moscow in July. This government believes that the international situation brought about by Soviet aggression in Afghanistan makes it wholly inappropriate to hold the Olympics in Moscow.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacGuigan: Since taking office, the government has maintained that it is up to the Soviet Union to create the conditions under which the games may properly take place. Obviously, such conditions do not now exist. Furthermore, there is no present intention on the part of the U.S.S.R. to create them.

We have said from the beginning that an Olympic boycott would be advisable only if effective. A few countries acting on their own, or even more countries acting in an unco-ordinated fashion, would not constitute an effective boycott. Our policy has therefore been to work actively towards an effective boycott.

In the course of the last several weeks, we have canvassed our friends in the western alliance and Third World states to determine whether a boycott of the Moscow Olympics would be an effective instrument in displaying our abhorrence of the actions of the U.S.S.R. in Afghanistan. The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) took a personal initiative in writing a number of world leaders on the subject. The results of these consultations, coupled with conversations I had with foreign ministers present during the recent independence celebrations in Zimbabwe, have convinced the government that the criteria for an effective boycott are now clearly present. I expect similar announcements in support of an effective boycott by other governments within the next days.

To ask our athletes, who have been training for four years and more for their chance at an Olympic gold medal, to forgo that chance, is a hard thing for any free country to ask of its citizens. The government is, however, convinced that withdrawal from the Olympics is the clearest and most effective way available to make plain to the leaders of the Soviet Union that the world condemns the Soviet Union's invasion of Afghanistan and its defiance of international demands for its withdrawal. If, as the Soviet Union claims, the 1980 Olympics are a vindication of Soviet policies, then by not participating in those games, we repeat to the Soviet leadership and the Soviet people that their government's actions in Afghanistan stand condemned by the world.

The Canadian Olympic Association has requested a firm indication of the government's position in this matter. The government has considered the situation thoroughly. We have decided that the circumstances leave us no choice but to urge the Canadian Olympic Association to inform the organizing committee for the 1980 Olympics that Canadian athletes will not be participating in the games. The government does not intend to use coercion to bring about a withdrawal. It will not revoke passports or take powers to circumscribe the rights of Canadians to travel freely abroad. But should Canadian athletes participate in Moscow, they will do so without the moral or financial support of the Government of Canada.

Several nations are actively planning for athletic events in which their athletes can participate as some compensation for not having gone to Moscow. If Canadian athletes, through their accredited sport governing bodies, make it clear that they wish to participate in such events, the government will make it possible for them to do so. Moreover, the minister responsible for fitness and amateur sport will have his officials meet with national sport governing body representatives immediately to determine whatever opportunities may be available, or may be developed, to offset this setback to our amateur athletes and provide alternative competitive forums in their pursuit of excellence.

The government is aware that the final deadline for acceptance of invitations to the games is May 24. While any dramatic change in the situation in Afghanistan seems unlikely, the possibility cannot be entirely excluded. The government therefore intends to continue monitoring the situation closely. It remains up to the Soviet Union to create the conditions in which the Olympics can take place. Should it become apparent that, contrary to present evidence and, indeed, contrary even to our expectations, these conditions are being created, the government is prepared to reassess the request it is making today.

Finally, Madam Speaker, we ask Canadian athletes and Canadians generally to support this important decision which has been taken in the national interest. We all recognize the sacrifice this represents for our athletes who have trained so hard, and for whom we have so much respect.

It is, of course, not their fault, any more than it is the fault of other Canadians who are also being asked to support government policies designed to impress upon the Soviet Union that international terrorism in all of its manifestations—whether by armed students or disciplined troops—is unacceptable to Canada. The government urges Canadian athletes to respect its advice. We are confident that they, and the Canadian Olympic Committee, will have the national interest at heart and will decline to participate in the Moscow Games in the interest of Canadians and free peoples everywhere.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Madam Speaker, earlier today the minister did me the courtesy of sending me a copy of his statement. I was happy to receive it. I was happy to learn that the Liberal government has finally acted, has finally found its voice, with regard to a boycott of the Olympic Games. One hundred and eighteen days, four months, after the invasion of the neutral country of Afghanistan by Soviet troops, the Liberal government has finally seen fit to do something to protest this gross violation of the independence of one country by another. One hundred and eighteen days, four months, after the Soviet invasion, two months after this government has taken office, it has finally seen fit to adopt the stand taken by the Conservative government to boycott the Olympic Games.

The minister states that the procrastination, the reluctance, of his government to reach a decision on this issue was that it had to await his visit to Zimbabwe to consult with other countries, and particularly to try to convince Third World countries to join the boycott. From what we hear, Madam Speaker, the persuasion was the other way around. Even Third World countries had to join in persuading the Liberal government, the Government of Canada, to support a boycott as the most forceful way possible of condemning the subjugation of Afghanistan by the Soviet Union. And if the minister has any doubts as to why I say it was he and his government that had to be persuaded by Third World countries rather than the other way round, all he has to do is to read his telexes prior to the time that he left for Zimbabwe to know that a great list of countries had already joined in the boycott. Countries from the Third World had already committed themselves; Djibouti, Kenya, Mauritius, Sudan, Zaire, Central Africa Republic, Antigua, Bermuda, Honduras, Paraguay, Fiji, New Guinea, The Philippines, Saudi Arabia. I could go on for a long, long while. They had all committed themselves long before the minister ever went to Zimbabwe. But the Canadian government has finally moved and we agree with its belated action.

We took that action on Canada's behalf, to support a boycott, last January 26. That was three months ago. It is three months since a Government of Canada committed this country to boycott the Olympic Games in Moscow. In those three months the Liberal government has confounded our allies and disappointed our friends, first by its reversal of the former Conservative government's position and then by its reluctance to take a stand of its own.

It has done a real disservice to our Canadian athletes by its failure to proceed with the arrangements we had under way for the holding of international games of a comparable standard. Three months have been lost in the preparation of these games. Three months have gone by during which the government has ignored the work it might have been doing to ensure that our athletes would have a chance to participate internationally, so that they would not be called upon to make intolerable sacrifices.

The government's procrastination has damaged our relations externally and has caused needless anxiety among our Olympic athletes as to whether they would have the opportunity to compete in international games this year. Even now, as the minister presents his statement, one has to realize that this is a conditional boycott. One listens to the minister as he says, "The Canadian Olympic Association has requested a firm indication of the governement's position on this matter." They had to be requested. They could not give it on their own. That is what the minister is saying. He goes on, "We have decided that the situation left us no choice." Surely, after what has gone on, the invasion of Afghanistan by the Soviet Union, that should have left them no choice right at the outset.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Miss MacDonald: Madam Speaker, after two months in power the Liberal government has finally decided, as we did in January, to boycott the Olympic Games. I deplore the delay and the lack of interest shown by the government in that regard. The delay led to the deterioration of our relations with our allies and friends throughout the world. In addition, our athletes were allowed to drift without leadership during that period.

[English]

We in this party did not see the need for any delay in taking a stand on this issue. We knew right from the outset that the invasion of Afghanistan required a firm response. We knew that sanctions would have to be imposed against the Soviet Union. That is why the former government showed leadership at NATO, at the OECD, at the United Nations and within the Commonwealth. That is why we announced last January 11 a series of economic sanctions, including a grain embargo, the ending of export credits, the tightening up of high technology sales, and the end of visits of a scientific, cultural and ministerial nature.

Our decision as a government to support the Olympic boycott, a decision announced last January 26, was taken because we knew that such actions would convey clearly to the Soviet Union and, more important, to the people of the Soviet Union, that the invasion of a neutral country will not go unnoticed or unanswered.

It was clear to us that the Soviets intended to use the Olympic Games for propaganda purposes. I only need quote from a paragraph in the most recent "Handbook for Party Activists", an annual publication for Soviet Communist party members, commenting on the choice of Moscow as the site for the games:

> The decision to offer this honoured right to hold the Olympic Games in the capital of the first socialist state in the world was convincing proof of the universal recognition of the historical importance and correctness of the course of our country's foreign policy—

Well, it did not take four months for us as a party or as a government, while we were in office, to reject the claim that the holding of the games in Moscow was "convincing proof of the correctness of their foreign policy" especially with regard to the invasion of Afghanistan. We were not prepared to let the Soviet Union justify that kind of aggressive foreign policy. That is why my party welcomes the decision taken by the government to support, albeit belatedly, the widespread boycott of the Moscow Games.

I would urge the government to take the lead now in pursuing with like-minded countries the holding of alternative games of comparable standard so that our athletes may participate in international competition this year.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Miss Pauline Jewett (New Westminster-Coquitlam): Madam Speaker, may I first take this opportunity to congratulate the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. MacGuigan) on his appointment, and also to thank him for sending me in advance a copy of the statement he has made today.

The position of the New Democratic Party regarding a possible boycott by Canada of the Olympic Games in Moscow was clearly enunciated by the leader of the party in January. We were then, and are now, opposed to the boycott.

Some hon. Members: Shame!

Miss Jewett: In condemning the invasion of Afghanistan by the Soviet Union the leader of the NDP urged the Government of Canada to join with the many other nations which had voted against the Soviet invasion in developing international diplomatic, economic and cultural sanctions as the only effective means of bringing forcibly home to the Soviet Union the wishes of ourselves and the United Nations towards them.

We were then, and remain now, convinced that a boycott of the Moscow games would not fulfil the objective of forcing the Soviets out of Afghanistan. Indeed, the Secretary of State for External Affairs admits this himself when he states "any dramatic change in the situation in Afghansistan seems unlikely".

We regret also the decision to single out our athletes to bear personally the total burden of our anger. No comparable sacrifice is asked of others. Furthermore, crippling the games in Moscow probably signs the death warrant of future Olympic Games as well.

Finally, the proposed boycott, far from causing a Soviet withdrawal from Afghanistan, may well serve to escalate East-West tensions, making future arms control and mutual disarmament that much more distant.

The NDP feels the government should reject the boycott and instead show leadership among the 103 nations which, along with Canada, condemned the Soviet action in the United Nations Assembly, by developing effective sanctions to pressure the Soviets to withdraw from Afghanistan. Specifically in the case of Canada, the NDP feels that the termination of bilateral, cultural, and sports relations, the withdrawal of high-technology assistance in trade, and the cancelling of Soviet credit lines in Canada would mark the start of a more effective protest than an Olympic boycott. Such actions, when taken in concert with other nations, would have a strong chance of forcing a change in Soviet policy and would better serve world peace.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Miss MacDonald: Madam Speaker, I would like to pose a few questions to the minister in this regard. I suppose my first question should really be directed to the Secretary of State (Mr. Fox), but I am sure the minister will be able to answer in his absence.

I would like to find out whether or not the arrangements which were made for the CBC to cover the games in Moscow and the moneys which were allocated for that purpose have been cancelled.

Mr. MacGuigan: Madam Speaker, no action of that kind has been taken as yet because this decision was arrived at and announced only today. However, I can say that the government is determined to use all the means at its disposal to dissuade and discourage the CBC from covering the Olympics.

Mr. Nielsen: Get Ouellet after them.

Miss MacDonald: But this happens to be public funding and a decision which the government would have arrived at, I presume, after not only consultation with other countries but also consultation with ministers responsible for agencies in Canada. Therefore, I would have expected a firm commitment that there would be a cancellation of that when the minister spoke this afternoon, and when he replied. Can he tell me when he will be in a position to give us that information? It would seem to me that his colleague should be able to meet with the president of the CBC tonight to convey the government's decision and to make it clear that if the government has cancelled its participation, or indicated that it wants to cancel its participation in the games in Moscow, it surely would want to see the CBC, a government agency, also cancel its participation there.

Mr. MacGuigan: There is absolutely no difference between us as to the desirability that the CBC not cover the games. The hon. member's party is fond of proclaiming from time to time the independence of the CBC, which we certainly believe in, but the hon. member's words right now do not sound like that.

We will use every means at our disposal to discourage the CBC from doing this, but that is a decision for the CBC to make, and we will certainly take that up very strongly with the CBC.

Mr. Clark: Will you start now or in four months?

[Translation]

Hon. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Madam Speaker, first of all I should like to tell the minister that we have been in agreement with that decision for several weeks already. Our athletes have worked hard, have trained energetically and are ready. Can the minister tell the House, on behalf of the government, whether he has considered steps to encourage those athletes, perhaps to compensate them for the considerable expense they may have gone to? For instance, is there any intention of compensating them through some other competition, that could be very interesting and could somehow make up for the efforts they have made?

Mr. MacGuigan: Madam Speaker, as I have already mentioned, the minister responsible, my colleague the minister of fitness and amateur sports, intends to meet Canadian sports organizations without delay in order to give our athletes opportunities to appear here in Canada.

[English]

Mr. Bob Wenman (Fraser Valley West): Madam Speaker, just to pursue the last question one step further, sanctions always involve sacrifice, and we have clearly identified that the sacrifice will be made largely by athletes. It is very important that that sacrifice is not made in vain. There is no real compensation in a secondary type of non-Olympics. That is one minor compensation, but it is not a real compensation.

Somehow people have the image of an athlete as being a very wealthy person who can spend his money freely to develop. However, of course, that is not true. The sacrifice in many cases is a thwarted professional career, much lost employment income, four to eight years of intensive training five or seven days a week, and broken dreams. All these things are payment that they will make in sacrifice.

If in fact the Olympics are not held or this money is not expended as suggested, I suggest that the money which will be saved—and it will be substantial whether it be with regard to the CBC or whatever—could in fact be used to compensate the athletes directly for their personal losses, be they loans or expenses incurred on their behalf in the past year.

Mr. MacGuigan: Madam Speaker, I fear that the suggestion is impractical in its terms. I think the only way by which we can hope to compensate the athletes is through forms of organized athletics. I should point out to the House that when my colleague, the minister responsible for sport, and I met the Canadian Olympic Committee, the committee was totally opposed to the notion of alternate games of any kind. It refused to discuss that matter with us because it said that this was totally opposed to its views and, it believed, the views of Canadian sporting bodies. However, we intend to carry on a dialogue.

My colleague and his officials will very shortly—immediately—be meeting officials, not only of the Canadian Olympic Committee but also of the other sports governing bodies in Canada, to try to arrange for the upgrading and the augmentation of existing sporting programs so that our athletes will not find that their training was wasted. They will have an opportunity to participate and, I might say, now that we have a boycott—and this is where we differ from the opposition—with the announcements to come within the next few days from other countries as to their boycotting, the boycott will now be effective.

Mr. Beatty: No thanks to you.

Mr. MacGuigan: Those who do compete in Moscow will themselves realize that the medals they attain are of very little value. The medals which will be achieved in other competitions around the world may well be of more intrinsic importance to the athletic community than medals they might gain in Moscow with the kind of competition which will now be there.

Olympic Boycott

Mr. Benno Friesen (Surrey-White Rock-North Delta): Madam Speaker, there have been hundreds of families who have booked their vacations for Moscow to coincide with the Olympics, particularly families of competing athletes. Some of these have invested several thousand dollars in advance on pre-paid bookings with tour companies. They are charters, and some of these people are now losing their entire investments because the deadline for refund has passed, and maybe in some cases it has passed because of the delay in the announcement by this government.

Mr. Clark: No question.

Mr. Friesen: I would like to ask the minister if this Liberal government has done anything about bringing pressure to bear on these tour companies to make sure that they will refund the money that they have been using now for several months. They have been using money received from families which can ill afford to invest in a package which they will never be able to use. Is the government doing anything to make sure that these companies, such as Sears and others, will refund that money to those families, which cannot afford this kind of wasted expenditure?

Mr. MacGuigan: Madam Speaker, when a decision on public policy is made, it is not always possible to compensate all the citizens who may lose as a result. That is often the case because it is not possible to identify them or to determine what their losses really are, or it might be too expensive for the public purse, but I think my hon. friend has made a suggestion which is worthy of investigation. I can at least assure him that we will look at that problem to see what the dimensions of it may be.

Mr. Friesen: The minister suggests that I am asking that funds be expended. I am not asking that. I am not asking the government to lay out any money. All I am asking is that it use its good offices, if they are that, to bring pressure to bear on those companies to make sure these families get their money back.

● (1730)

Mr. MacGuigan: Perhaps I was overly suspicious as to the thought lurking in my hon. friend's mind. I certainly think we can have a discussion on behalf of the government with these organizations, and if there is no further commitment than that, then I think I can give him the assurance that we can do that.

Mr. Mark Rose (Mission-Port Moody): Madam Speaker, in addition to admitting in his statement that the boycott was not likely to have much effect on changing the Soviet position in Afghanistan, the minister tried to make the point on page two of his statement that, in addition to athletes, other segments of the Canadians society will be making certain kinds of sacrifices as a result of the government's decision. He mentioned that ministers will not be allowed to go to the Soviet Union as frequently as they did previously, and the same applies to other high officials. I do not know if that is much of a sacrifice. He called on sports federations and some cultural groups to restrict themselves similarly.

What concerns some of us is that farmers and businessmen, to name a few others besides the ones already mentioned, will be asked to bear what, it is implied, is an equivalent burden to that of the athletes. Can the minister tell the House what specific sacrifices he is asking Canadian farmers to make in expressing Canada's outrage? Perhaps he might also care to elaborate on what he is asking the commercial or business interests in this country to do.

Mr. MacGuigan: Certainly, Madam Speaker. I should mention that we are following the policies established by the previous government. We have adopted those policies as our own. There is quite an array of measures in place but, to be more specific about the ones to which my hon. friend refers, and I think he has in mind potential losses of the business community, that would largely be with respect to export permits for goods or materials of strategic significance. So far permits have been denied to two Canadian firms, and there is an apparent loss of export contracts by four other Canadian firms. The combined value of these losses has been estimated at $6 million. I would think that my hon. friend would be aware of the fact that we have been limiting our grain exports to the Soviet Union to traditional levels. As I think is well known, so far they have not sustained any losses as a result of that.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. MacGuigan: They have not sustained any losses in terms of volume because we are at the traditional level. But there is a potential loss situation there as well.

Mr. Rose: I wonder if the minister could be more specific as to the nature of the six firms he mentioned. Did any of them include high technology contracts, and has the minister considered withdrawing certain lines of credit for continued expansion of trade with the Soviet Union when he was considering other sanctions? It is my view, and also that of my colleagues, that the massive burden of expressing Canada's outrage falls on the high profile athletes in the Olympic Games, and we consider that unfair. If the athletes will be expected to bear this burden on behalf of their country or else be considered unpatriotic, then I think equivalent burdens should fall on other segments of society, and we have no confidence, on the basis of the minister's statement, that indeed they have.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacGuigan: I do not have with me the names of those firms. I will attempt to get them for the hon. member. But I think he should also take account of the fact that a great number of scientific, academic, and cultural exchanges have been cancelled, affecting hundreds of Canadians who were looking forward to various kinds of opportunities, from scientists from the National Research Council to others. If hon. members would wish to address a question to me that I can hear, I will be pleased to reply to it, but I cannot distinguish the words—

An hon. Member: Name one.

Mr. MacGuigan: One instance? Up to 15 National Research Council scientists will not be allowed to go to the U.S.S.R. this summer to do research under the aegis of the Soviet Academy of Sciences. I can name a whole list, if the hon. member wants to know. The opposition critic says that these are things which they have started. We have adopted their policies in this respect. This affects a lot of students, professors, and cultural performers, such as the Stratford ensemble, Karen Kain and Frank Augustyn who will not be making their tour of the U.S.S.R., and so on. There are many different forms of endeavour which are being cancelled. It is not really possible to equalize the burden exactly because it is different in various areas, but I think we have done our best, as I believe the previous government did, to have a wide-ranging program which would be as fair as possible in various sectors.

Mr. Nielsen: What new initiatives are you taking?

Mr. Douglas Roche (Edmonton South): Since the question of the Olympic boycott goes right to the heart of Canada's foreign policy and lets us see the sense of direction which the government will take in the 1980s, which are already starting out as a very dangerous period in world history, is the minister now prepared to have a parliamentary examination of Canada's foreign policy in a way that has not been done in the past ten years, the basis for such an examination already having been laid by officials in his department, in both external affairs and CIDA, and an examination by Parliament of the total foreign policy in a way that would turn out to be of assistance to him in the formulation of a policy which could win support from the Canadian people in this decade?

Mr. MacGuigan: As the hon. member knows, there is always that opportunity for a review of the foreign policy by standing committees in considering estimates and, from time to time, on other orders of reference. If he is referring to a specific order of reference, however, I might say that I have under consideration the best way in which to review specifically the question of aid to other countries. In my view that is something which, in some form or other, has to be given a fairly broad scrutiny. I want to get a good deal of input, and I welcome any suggestions by opposition members as well on how that best could be accomplished in terms of techniques. If the hon. member is referring to a general review of foreign policy, I must say that I do not have in mind an order of reference with respect to that. I believe our foreign policy is well established.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. MacGuigan: With specific reference to aid, we have had a policy which shortly expires in the sense that there was planning for a particular period of time, and now we need to set some goals for the next five or ten years in the area of aid.

Olympic Boycott

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): I will recognize the hon. member for Edmonton South (Mr. Roche) on a supplementary question and then I will recognize the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark).

Mr. Roche: Undoubtedly there is a need for a review of aid programs but that review will only be effective if it is done in conjunction with a review of our total foreign policy, since the aid question must be inserted into many aspects of foreign policy.

I want to ask the minister specifically if he has yet had the opportunity of personally reading the two papers that were prepared by the officials of external affairs and the officials of CIDA, which are professional, objective papers, outlining the aspects of the world situation to which Canada must relate in forming a total foreign policy and an aid policy for the 1980s. Has he read those papers and is he prepared to allow the parliamentary committee to review them so that there will be an opportunity for Canadian public opinion to express itself to that committee, which can then make a report which will be effective in the formulation of the policy for which the minister has responsibility?

Mr. MacGuigan: Yes, I have read those papers, as the hon. member knows. Since his government did not have an opportunity to make them public—the passage of events has perhaps slightly outdated them, more in some areas than in others—I would certainly be prepared to consider releasing those papers, either as they were or with some updating changes. I have not made any decision on that but I am considering that problem. Certainly I have not made a decision that it would then be a basis for a reference to a parliamentary committee. That is not a commitment which I am prepared to give at this time.

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Perhaps the most intriguing passage in this delinquent declaration by the government is the following:

It remains up to the Soviet Union to create the conditions in which the Olympics can take place.

● (1740)

The minister's statement then went on to indicate that if those conditions are created, the Liberal government is prepared to reassess the position that the minister, after four months, has announced today. Exactly what are the conditions that the Government of Canada has in mind which would cause it to reassess its decision to boycott the Olympic Games?

Mr. MacGuigan: Madam Speaker, there is no mystery about that. That is the same type of statement which has been made by most of the countries which have made declarations in favour of boycotting, with the United States alone excepted, because the United States has said that even if the Soviet Union withdrew its troops and allowed a free vote to take place in Afghanistan, that it still would not go to the Olympics. But most countries have made their decision to boycott conditional upon the fact that the Soviet Union continues its aggression in Afghanistan. I do not think we will ever have to decide that question because it seems clearly to intend to do so. But because we are making our decision a month before the time for signification by the Olympic committee, like other governments which have taken the decision we feel that at least we should leave open that possibility. We are speaking about an Afghanistan from which the Soviets would have effectively withdrawn and where the people would be allowed their own free choice of government.

Mr. Clark: The reason I raised the question is that when I expressed that as being the sole condition, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), the then leader of the opposition, who is now absent from the House, accused us of grandstanding. I believe that was his exact language. Will the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. MacGuigan) confirm that that is the only condition which his government applies to a boycott by Canada of the games?

Mr. MacGuigan: Madam Speaker, not at all. That is the sole remaining condition. It is not a condition in the sense that we do not expect that there will be any further need to consider it. It is an intellectual condition, if you like.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. MacGuigan: The great difference between us on this question has been that we have not been satisfied just with a verbal forum. We want an effective boycott, a boycott in which other countries that count in the athletic world will be participating.

The hon. member opposite read a list of countries that are boycotting. Certainly; but those are not the important countries in the world of athletics. Many of the important countries have still to make a decision, and they will be making their decision in the next short time. Canada is a part of that process. I might even add that as a result of a meeting which I had with the West German foreign minister in Salisbury last week, we have co-ordinated our announcement with the government of West Germany with respect to whatever decision they may make about the games.

Mr. Clark: I am sure that Kenya, West Germany, Australia and Japan will be interested to note that in the view of Canada they are not nations whose athletes would make significant contributions to the Olympic Games. But I want to come back to the question of the minister seeking a policy that would be effective. He has spoken about initiatives which have been taken. He quite properly credited the government which I had the honour to lead with starting most of those initiatives. Can he tell us which new initiatives were started by his government, apart from its whirling around on the question of a boycott? Which new initiatives were started by his government since it was sworn into office?

Mr. MacGuigan: Madam Speaker, I am not certain that I realize myself which of the measures now in effect were theirs and which were ours.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. MacGuigan: I believe the decision to deny Aeroflot its usual summer schedule of landing and increased flights in Canada was a decision which we made.

An hon. Member: No.

Mr. MacGuigan: At least I had to confirm it since coming into power. Whether or not the same decision was first made by hon. members opposite, I honestly do not know.

An hon. Member: It was.

Mr. Friesen: Who else?

Mr. MacGuigan: In fact the principal difference between us, I think, is that we have helped to create in the international community an effective boycott.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. MacGuigan: The hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) can quibble about which country participates, but our aim is to have enough countries which have Olympic medal-winning athletes participating in the boycott that the games in Moscow will be a sham. We believe that as a result of our initiative we have helped other like-minded countries to accomplish that objective.

Miss MacDonald: What initiative?

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Madam Speaker, my question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. MacGuigan) is about his concern with the boycott on grain. Because of the decision announced by the government today, I can say as a prairie member that there will be a great deal of concern in my province from a lot of farmers as to the government's position on the grain boycott. I should like to ask him whether or not it is his intention to announce shortly what the government's precise position is.

Farmers have already seen the price of wheat go down between 70 cents and 80 cents a bushel since the boycott was announced, and the use of food as a weapon was announced by the United States and concurred in by the former prime minister. The farmers are wondering how long that boycott will go on. Will we maintain our traditional amount of exports to the Soviet Union, or is the government contemplating cutting back even further? Does the government have any plans in mind for compensating the farmers? I wonder if the minister can answer some of those questions now. If not, perhaps he will consider making a statement on motions at a later date to tell the farmers exactly and precisely where they stand. It is a serious economic question for the farmers of this country. The overwhelming majority of farmers do not want to boycott grain sales. They do not want to be singled out as the people who have to pay the biggest price.

An hon. Member: That decision was made by the previous government.

Mr. MacGuigan: As one of the hon. members is shouting, that decision initially was made by the previous government, and we have been prepared to continue it. The arrangement and understanding with other countries is that we will continue only our traditional level of supply and that we will not seek to make up any shortfall which the Soviet Union may have. The fall in price is certainly not a direct result of the policies of the Canadian government, although it may arguably result from the over-all embargo situation in which we participated. That is a question we will have to discuss with the other countries which are involved in it. It is not one on which we could have a policy ourselves.

Mr. Nystrom: I wonder if the minister can offer farmers anything more concrete in terms of compensation. He implied that he might take some initiative in discussing with other countries what may be done because of the falling price, but is there anything else the minister can say at this time as to whether or not there is any compensation for the farmers other than the western grain stabilization plan which is not adequate in this case?

Mr. MacGuigan: In general we have taken the position, if there is a cutting back in our sales to the Soviet Union, that this would be an appropriate situation for compensation to the farmers. But that has not occurred. We have contracts now and we are in the process of shipping more than we have in many years, less than we have in peak years, but certainly a representative amount. The hon. member may at some future time wish to return to this subject if it becomes apparent that we are dropping below where we usually are in our exports.

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Madam Speaker, the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. MacGuigan) spoke of the comparative values in prestige terms of the medals which are to be won at the Olympic Games in Moscow this year by those who will be participating and those medals which will be won at other games. I was wondering whether the Secretary of State for External Affairs can say what arrangements have been made or what exploratory talks have taken place between Canada and the possible sites for those games, either dispersed sites or concentrated ones in Canada or abroad, where these other games with more prestigious medals will be held?

Mr. MacGuigan: Madam Speaker, I think it is worth drawing to the attention of the House that the initiative, perhaps led by the United States, to organize a complete series of alternate games or an international sports festival, as I think it was euphemistically called at the Geneva meeting which we attended as observers, is not really going well, for a combination of reasons. There does not seem to be great international favour even among the countries which are boycotting, their Olympic committees and their athletes, in organizing a series of events in the world which, in total, would amount to something like an alternate games.

What we have in mind, if that attempt does not succeed, and we certainly will participate in any such attempt by countries which are deciding to boycott, is that my colleague, the minister, plans immediately to approach the Canadian sports organizations to see if we can upgrade some of our events so that at least our athletes will have an opportunity of better competition. I might add that the best prediction I have heard is that if the boycott, as we are now convinced, will be effective, something like 80 per cent of the medal athletes from the non-communist world will not be participating. That will certainly make the intrinsic value of the medals in Moscow to those who win them very small, indeed.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Madam Speaker, I was wondering whether the Secretary of State for External Affairs could say whether there have been any conversations with possible organizers of sites in Canada which could entertain athletes from around the world, and Canadian athletes, for these games?

Mr. MacGuigan: I cannot answer that with complete assurance, Madam Speaker, because I am not sure that there have not been some informal consultations. But, after my colleague, the minister for sport and I were discouraged by the Canadian Olympic committee from considering such an idea, at least before we had made a decision as to the Olympic Games themselves, we have not carried out a systematic attempt to deal with these sites. As I say, my colleague, the minister responsible for sport, has the intention of immediately going into this very question.

Hon. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Madam Speaker, I would like to ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. MacGuigan) a question. Several months ago when Canada had an effective government, before February 18, when it had a government that had some conviction and some muscle, and this policy was put into effect, it was decided there was no need to interfere with a situation where Soviet fishing vessels were coming into St. John's, Newfoundland, to be repaired at the CN drydock at St. John's, Newfoundland. That is a drydock which is now ready for a Syncrolift, by the way, and I am hoping that the Minister of Industry Trade and Commerce (Mr. Gray) is going to do his thing and see to the financing of it now, and that the tenders should be called shortly to expand the Syncrolift. In the meantime, there are 18 or 20 Soviet trawlers per year being repaired there, giving considerable business to the port of St. John's and the people who work at that dock there. Is it still the government's position that it would not be of any benefit to Canada and it would not add to any effectiveness of the boycott or otherwise, and that arrangement can continue?

Mr. MacGuigan: Unless the hon. member wants to make a submission to the contrary, Madam Speaker, it is our present intention to allow Soviet fishing vessels to continue to come into Canadian ports to receive supplies. We have, as I believe the previous government did as well, denied permission to non-fisheries vessels, I think one in each case, or discouraged those vessels from coming into port. I think we will not be moving to take similar measures with respect to fishing vessels.

Mr. Crosbie: No, my representation is that the position stay exactly the same. I do not want the Secretary of State for External Affairs to misunderstand that, because this is of positive benefit to Canada and it would not bother the U.S.S.R. very much in any event. He has given me confirmation that the policy is unchanged, I gather.

Mr. Doug Anguish (The Battlefords-Meadow Lake): Madam Speaker, would the minister be prepared to table a list of those who are suffering the brunt of the sanctions imposed against the Soviet Union in achieving the boycott, or achieving success of the boycott to take the Soviets out of Afghanistan, and stop their aggression in that area? Would he be willing to table a list of those who are suffering the sanctions?

Mr. MacGuigan: Madam Speaker, I will certainly be prepared to write a letter to the hon. gentleman telling him what our over-all policy is, and he can make whatever disposition he pleases of that information.

Mr. Chris Speyer (Cambridge): Madam Speaker, this afternoon when there have been so many momentous statements by ministers I am sure it is a source of dismay to many members that the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) would not show more respect to this House by being here.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Madam Speaker: Would the hon. member ask his question?

Mr. Speyer: Is this not an important measure? Why isn't the Prime Minister here?

An hon. Member: He is busy working.

Madam Speaker: Order. Will the hon. member ask his question, please?

Mr. Speyer: My question is this. I wonder whether the minister can tell me precisely when he became convinced that the boycott would become effective, and what circumstances surrounded that decision when he knew in his own mind and made a recommendation to the cabinet that the boycott would become effective? The second part of my question is this. Can the minister envisage circumstances where international conduct is so outrageous that we, as a country, would be willing to take independent action, notwithstanding what the effect might have been in Russia, and does not the invasion of Afghanistan fall within that category?

Mr. MacGuigan: Madam Speaker, may I say first that the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) did come into the lobby this afternoon with the intention of being here for the statements of both my colleague and myself. He left when he found that the rather lengthy debate on the question of privilege raised by the hon. member was being prosecuted.

There are empty seats on all sides of the House, and I would not like to find fault with anyone for not sitting through the length of this afternoon's proceedings.

I do not know what kind of psychological test the hon. member's question holds for me, but I am quite prepared to say that it was this past weekend in Salisbury, Zimbabwe, when I had the opportunity of discussing this issue with something like 20 or 30 states that I had the opportunity of coming to a firm conclusion that an Olympics boycott would be effective. I may say that not the least important of the factors was the discussion I had with the West German foreign minister, at considerable length, during which we were able to co-ordinate our strategies for this boycott.

Madam Speaker: I still have three questioners. If hon. members would like to limit themselves to one question each, perhaps I could not see six o'clock for a while and we will see if we can conclude this debate before we adjourn. The hon. member has had one question. I would like now to recognize the hon. member for Saskatoon East (Mr. Ogle).

Mr. Bob Ogle (Saskatoon East): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. MacGuigan). I was very happy to hear earlier today that he was preparing to accept a revision of the whole question of international aid, but, like the former questioner, I have great doubt that this can be done without a complete revision of the whole role of Canada in the international community. I should like to ask the minister whether he does not really believe that today Canada has to kind of come to a new vision of itself, because I do believe that the era we are living in, in the 1980s and the coming 1990s, and I hope we get that far, is quite different from a time when Canada made its foreign policy before. I was hoping he would be willing to accept the suggestion. How does he feel about the possibility of really and truly making a new accounting of ourselves and who we think we are at this time in the international community, through a revision?

Mr. MacGuigan: Madam Speaker, in the interest of time and because of the eloquence of the hon. member, I will undertake to consider his representation.

Mr. Arnold Malone (Crowfoot): Madam Speaker, I would like to bring to the mind of the hon. minister that on many numerous occasions the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) has said he doubted that a boycott would be successful. I would like to ask the minister whether he can assure the House today that the Prime Minister believes it can be successful, particularly when he said just last Friday that his personal view would be irrelevant on this question. Can he assure us that it is the personal view of the Prime Minister that the Prime Minister thinks this move will be successful.

Mr. MacGuigan: Madam Speaker, the hon. member should know that the personal views of ministers, including mine, are not really relevant. I am here stating government policy, policy which, as the leader of the government, is firmly embraced by the Prime Minister, and I would have to take exception to the suggestion that the Prime Minister ever said that the boycott would not be successful. He said, in effect, that a boycott taken in a vacuum, as the other party was proposing, would not succeed. What we spent this time doing is organizing an effective boycott.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Madam Speaker, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), as has recently been stated by the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. MacGuigan), did not make much of the fact that he delayed taking action to boycott the Olympics in order to convince other countries that this was the right course. I should like to put two brief questions to the minister. First, how many countries did Canada convince to join the boycott and, second, what initiatives did the minister or the Prime Minister take in order to bring about this change of opinion in whatever the number of countries is that they were able to convince? Would the minister table this information so that the House will know precisely what he did, or is he just bluffing once again?

An hon. Member: Grandstanding.

Mr. MacGuigan: Madam Speaker, I am certainly prepared to summarize for the hon. member the steps that we took.

The Prime Minister wrote to some 14 government leaders. The Department of External Affairs, through its good offices across the world and through our ambassadors, actively contacted the governments in all countries in which we are represented. In addition to that I had the opportunity—

Mr. Nielsen: The question!

Mr. MacGuigan: —in my travels in the last month to discuss this with quite a number of western and Third World leaders—

An hon. Member: How many did you convince?

Mr. MacGuigan: —including the Mexican foreign minister, the French foreign minister, the British and German foreign ministers and, in some cases, the opposition critics as well.

An hon. Member: How many did you convince?

Mr. MacGuigan: The hon. member asks how many people we convinced. Let us assume we convinced them all—all those who are going to announce. We reached a meeting of minds with many of the countries with whom we discussed the issue. We naturally like to think it was our influence that made the difference. I think we have good grounds for thinking that the role we played in this was a very fruitful one indeed.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

PRIVATE MEMBERS' BUSINESS

SESSIONAL BALLOTING FOR ORDER OF PRECEDENCE

Madam Speaker: Order, please. With the permission of the House I should like to convey the following information.

On Monday, April 14, I wrote to all party whips and suggested that the sessional balloting for precedence on the notice paper for private members' motions and public bills be held Tuesday, April 22.

On April 16, I received requests from the whips asking that the date of the balloting be delayed one week. I agreed to the suggestion.

Thus, the sessional balloting for precedence on the order paper of private members' public bills and motions would be conducted by the Deputy Speaker on Tuesday, April 29, at 3.30 p.m and those bills and motions submitted before 6 p.m. on Monday, April 28, would be included.

The bills and motions would then go on the notice paper on Wednesday, April 30, and the bills could be given first reading with the usual caveat on Friday, May 2. The first private members' hour would then be held on Friday, May 2.

Is this suggestion agreeable to hon. members?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Madam Speaker: Agreed and so ordered.

With the indulgence of the House I shall now proceed to the other items so that we may arrive at orders of the day for eight o'clock tonight.

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The House resumed from Monday, April 21, 1980, consideration of the motion of Mrs. Côté for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the amendment thereto (Mr. Kristiansen) (p. 226).

Madam Speaker: It being six o'clock, I do now leave the chair until eight o'clock this evening.

At 6.07 p.m. the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Order, please. When debate was last adjourned on the Address in Reply to the Speech from the Throne, the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie) had the floor. Is the hon. member prepared to continue?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Yes, Mr. Speaker. I think it is around 22 hours since I last spoke here, and I am glad I have the chance to continue my remarks. I know that if I need to go over the 30-minute time limit, because we extended the courtesy to the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen), the House will extend to me the same courtesy so that I can finish my remarks.

Of course, I am not as full of fire and vigour as I was 22 hours ago. It really spoils a speech to be interrupted for 22 hours in between. Not only that, the Minister of Finance is now on his way to West Germany, having escaped the confines of this House. He will be gone for the rest of the week, so it is hard to get indignant.

To come back to this situation, we have had a major budget statement by him on financial matters if we listened to the Minister of Finance today arguing a point of privilege that arose. But there was nothing on energy. That whole subject has been left open. That is all to be solved in the near future. We have the spectacle of the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde), who had some of his officials issue statements several days ago trying to show that the projected increase in oil prices in the next four years under the Progressive Conservative policy was going to be much more than the public had ever realized before; it was going to be much greater than $4 a barrel this year and $4.50 a barrel in the next three years. This was going to open up limitless possibilities for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and this government to reach an agreement with Alberta where the increases could be $6, $7, $8 or $10, and hon. members will still be keeping to their commitment to a lower price for oil than we had made, using the fact that by January 1, 1983, we were prepared to go to 75 per cent of the international price or the Chicago price, whichever was lower, and, by January 1, 1984, to 85 per cent.

I will just remind those hon. gentlemen that 1980, 1981 and 1982 were years that were not affected by those provisions at all so that there is no question about $4 and $4.50 a barrel. There is no way for them to avoid their obligations in 1980, 1981 and 1982 to keep prices of gasoline and oil products in this country lower than those increases. The minister did not deal with that at all.

The government is sending the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources to negotiate this delicate subject with the government of Alberta. As I said in an interview last Saturday, it is like sending a mongoose to trade with a snake. The only thing that can result from all of that is a mortal struggle, because the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources is going to be a man who drives anybody he is negotiating with into a positive frenzy of opposition to whatever he suggests. But this too is not dealt with in the statement of last night.

There is a $5.19 billion deficit in the current account in the balance of international trade in 1979. That has been forgotten about and not mentioned. We have a net foreign debt in Canada of $69 billion. It is double that, but when one takes out foreign investment abroad it is a net of $69 billion at the end of 1979.

In 1979 we had a net outflow of interest and dividends of $5.2 billion in this country. That is not dealt with in this purported budget statement of the Minister of Finance last night.

We have a situation in Canada of people who know and people who do not know. The people who do not know are widows, those connected with estates, and young children. But those who know anything about interest rates and what they should get for their money are cashing in their Canada Savings Bonds. We have a situation where $17.89 billion of the total debt of the Government of Canada, of the internal debt of $70.6 billion, is in the form of Canada Savings Bonds. Except for the fact that many people do not know the difference, the people unlearned, the people not wise in the way of the financial world, the widows, the children and the innocents, most of these bonds would be cashed in.

Those who have any knowledge at all of financial matters are cashing in their Canada Savings Bonds because 12 per cent interest is not high enough in today's circumstances for a lender of money. There was no mention of that problem in the statement of the Minister of Finance.

The Minister of Finance is like the old ancient mariner—Alone, alone, all, all alone; Alone on a wide, wide sea!—that is the Minister of Finance, a crafty old bird with an albatross around his neck. Who is the albatross?

An hon. Member: Trudeau.

Mr. Crosbie: The albatross is the faded gentleman with a faded flower sitting next to him, and the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Gray) who sits two seats down from him—tattle-tale Gray.

Alone, alone, all, all alone; Alone on a wide, wide sea!

An hon. Member: All alone, John.

An hon. Member: Where are they, John?

Mr. Crosbie: This motley crew elected by the people of Canada to form a government for the next four or five years—

An hon. Member: God help us.

Mr. Crosbie: Yes, God help us—took the responsibility to defeat our budget, a co-ordinated approach to economic problem solving in Canada. They defeated a budget that took a long view that aimed to defeat inflation, that dealt with oil prices and energy issues, that stressed building up the private wealth creating sector of this country. They defeated all of that. When they came back to this House they brought in a ruptured version of that budget and presented it to the House last night. It is a ruptured duck of a budget. We have a Minister of Finance who cannot squawk for himself; he has to steal from somebody else.

An hon. Member: Look where it got you, John.

Mr. Crosbie: I would not tell you what I have got compared to you hon. gentlemen. It is in the same area, I can assure you.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Crosbie: I know that we cannot expect the hon. gentlemen opposite to take these matters seriously. It is only the ruination of the economic system of our country.

I want to refer to an analysis made by the C.D. Howe Institute. I do not want to quote our own expertise—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Crosbie: I want to quote from an independent source.

An hon. Member: You have given up on that.

Mr. Crosbie: We have two splendid representatives of New Brunswick here tonight. We can hear them squawking in the background. The albatrosses have woken up.

This is what the C.D. Howe Institute reported. I quote from their 1980 policy review which appeared in The Ottawa Journal for March 10.

● (2010)

Energy consumption is being encouraged by prices that are well below the cost of providing an adequate and secure energy supply base for the future. Debts are being increased at home and abroad to finance current public and private consumption. As a result, future generations will have to service and repay them.

That is the policy of hon. gentlemen opposite. They don't care. The hell with tomorrow. Let future generations pay.

They go on to say:

Throughout its history Canada has been exposed to, and strongly influenced by economic events in the United States and abroad, but during the 1970s it followed a course that was remarkably independent.

The 1970s when this tribe across the hall was in power. It goes on to say:

Unfortunately many of these policies turned out to be unsustainable,—

They certainly did.

—in fact they had contributed to a serious increase in Canada's vulnerability by the end of the decade.

They certainly did.

Canadian economic policy decisions became dominated by the need to sustain inflows of foreign capital to finance the fiscal and current account deficits.

Inflows of foreign capital. That is why we hear governor Bouey say we have no choice but to follow American interest rates, because the hon. crowd opposite for ten years followed those disastrous policies and put us in that position to finance the fiscal and current account deficits.

In effect, Canadian policies were dictated, in whole or in part, by decisions being made outside the country—decisions that were clearly determined by the interests of the OPEC countries or the United States.

That is what got us where we are today.

Then hon. gentlemen opposite had the gall to say they were going to have a made-in-Canada interest policy. They were going to have a made-in-Canada finance policy. The Minister of Finance admitted a few days ago that he is completely helpless—Samson shorn of his locks. He is helpless in the hands of the United States because of their past policies.

I go on with the C.D. Howe Institute:

The most obvious way to stop the use of foreign borrowing to finance current consumption is to increase domestic saving, and one method of doing so is to reduce the size of the fiscal deficit.

The size of the fiscal deficit, according to the statement last night, has been allowed to increase $3.5 billion.

Further on in their policy review they state:

The imbalances that have emerged in oil supply and demand, the federal fiscal deficit, and the current account are interconnected. The unfavourable trends in these three areas are generally not self-correcting; they can be altered only by deliberate policy actions. Most of the policy actions needed to turn these trends around will inevitably have immediate effects that are perverse—they will tend to increase inflationary pressures and dampen economic growth.

Yet there is a clear pay-off in the medium term.

I wish hon. gentlemen opposite would read this article. Medium term, that is what we were aiming for in our budget. We wanted to get Canada back on the track. We knew we had to aim for the medium term. However, hon. gentlemen opposite do not care about the medium term. They care about being in power now. They do not care what it takes to get them in power and they do not care what it does to the country to stay in power. Well, that is the difference between us. We are hopeful that some time during the present century this medium-term approach is going to be successful.

Let us look at what the financial critic of the opposition said on February 4, before he learned he was not going to be in finance any longer. The Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce said:

I don't think that allowing the dollar to have some downward adjustment would do as much harm to our economy as our present high level of interest rates.

That is what the minister said in the Toronto Sun of February 4—let the dollar go down, don't keep interest rates high, that is doing us more harm. That was his statement and his theory.

What does the governor of the Bank of Canada say? He made a speech a week or so ago, and the governor is backed up by the present Minister of Finance. On April 8 in Winnipeg, at page 10 of his speech, he was discussing this issue, should we let interest rates in Canada go lower and the dollar decline in value. He said:

Instead of merely trading off a lower Canadian dollar in exchange for lower interest rates, we would quickly find ourselves faced with more rapid exchange rate depreciation, more rapid inflation, and before long with even higher interest rates; in short, our economic problems would quickly get worse. To believe otherwise is merely wishful thinking.

The governor of the Bank of Canada said that the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce is a wishful thinker. On what side does the present Minister of Finance come down? Well, he comes down on the side of brother Bouey. He does not come down on the side of his colleague, the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. Not likely! He agrees with governor Bouey as to what the result of those actions would be. Here is what the minister said on page 9 of his statement last night:

Canadian consumers would have suffered even more from higher import prices if we had not allowed our interest rates to rise and thereby checked the decline in the exchange rate for our dollar.

These two gentlemen exist in the same cabinet. One of them says that if interest rates should go down and the dollar decline with it, it does not matter. That is what he said when he was in opposition. He said it in February. The Minister of Finance says he suffers from wishful thinking, that if we had done that, if we had not allowed the interest rates to rise and check the decline in the exchange rate for the dollar, Canadian consumers would have suffered more.

Who is right? Is it the man now in charge of saving Chrysler, the Chrysler saviour, the second comer for Chrysler, or is it the Minister of Finance? The Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce is being kept busy at the moment trying to save Chrysler. He is going for the winner. That is his new industrial strategy, go for the winners, the corporations that have lost billions and have misjudged the market and have done all the wrong things. Go for the winners. That is his new policy. If you come from Windsor and have a plant there, you are a winner no matter what you lost in the past. That is what he is doing at the moment.

These are the hon. gentlemen who are presenting a co-ordinated approach to overcome the economic problems of the Canadian people. When the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Axworthy) was in opposition and sat on this side, how he made the welkin ring against higher interest rates. He said, as reported in Hansard of November 6:

—that if there is a requirement to raise interest rates, there is an equal requirement to help those people who are hurt by those interest rate increases.

He is the same man who fought against our mortgage interest and property tax plan to help home owners and mortgagors in Canada. Hon. gentlemen opposite fought against that plan. They would not let it go through the House of Commons. They said they are going to help renters and bring in a more equitable plan to help mortgagors and home owners. They have not brought in a thing. They have not brought in a squiggle. They have not helped anyone. They say they are going to help a few thousand of the AHOP home owners whom they enticed five years ago to go into homes they could not afford, but no one else.

The Minister of Finance says that unless you spend 30 per cent of your income on rent or mortgage payments, we are not going to help you. Imagine, 30 per cent of your income before you get help from the flint-hearted Minister of Finance. The Minister of Employment and Immigration has allowed interest rates to go up 2.2 per cent. They are only up now 1.96 per cent since these hon. gentlemen came into office. He has done nothing to help the people hurt by those interest rate increases. We no longer even hear him mention them. Those are the hon. hypocrites who are now governing this country.

Here is the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce again, old tattle-tale Gray, in Hansard of November 6:

The Liberals and I generally want action taken now to prevent the hardships this Conservative high interest rate policy is creating for millions of Canadians and their families.

Some hon. members on his side of the House "quack, quack, hear, hear". What are they doing now they are over there? We do not hear a word from any of them about the effect.

Mr. Nielsen: Oink, oink!

Mr. Crosbie: Yes, oink, oink! They all have their noses in the trough. When are we going to have him as minister of finance? He said, as reported at page 1031 of Hansard for November 6:

For some members on this side, Mr. Speaker—

Yack, yack, yack.

It means a frontier has been crossed into dangerous uncharted territory—

Yack, yack, yack.

As a result, I believe it is right and necessary for Liberals to take a new approach and a new look at interest rate policy.

Where is the new approach? Where is the new look? The Minister of Finance gets up in the House and says proudly that he is following my policy on interest rates. This is the group of interest rate muscle flexers that were going to do something about interest rates.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): It is with some regret that I must interrupt the hon. member whose time has now expired—

● (2020)

Mr. Crosbie: Well, as the Irishman said, I shall conclude very shortly.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): —unless with the unanimous consent of the House, he is able to continue.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Crosbie: Only five minutes. There are other speakers to come and I do not wish to take up too much time or abuse the generosity of the House. I believe I have already demolished completely the arguments the minister put forward last night so I can conclude very shortly.

An hon. Member: Lost your notes?

Mr. Crosbie: Here I am. Made-in-Canada interest rates. "Wee sleekit beastie".

An hon. Member: Go back to reading again.

Mr. Crosbie: We have to take a reading test to be on our side. You are lucky. You don't have to take it on your side. Anyway, I am not going to read any further.

Some hon. Members: Hooray!

Mr. Crosbie: We shall have lots of time to deal with these matters.

An hon. Member: Four years.

Mr. Crosbie: I do not think it will be four years. I want to warn hon. gentlemen opposite that if they are going to send mongooses out to negotiate with snakes, it may be a lot quicker than four years.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crosbie: We will win an election a lot quicker than that. They took a large gamble when they defeated our budget last December 11 and got themselves back in power again. That's a short-term gain but there's a long-term danger because the people in this country are expecting them to come forward with some economic and financial solutions to their problems, and the solutions are not contained in this truncated, ruptured duck of a budget that was brought down here last night by the Minister of Finance. The people of Canada are not satisfied to be told quietly that they are going to have .5 per cent of growth in 1980. They are not satisfied to hear that they are likely to have 10 per cent inflation. They are not satisfied to hear that their deficit is going to be over $14 billion. They are not satisfied to hear that the borrowing requirements of the government are going to be almost $12 million this year, because they know that that way lies disaster, that they are not going to recover from the present economic circumstance either in North America or elsewhere here in Canada if that is the approach taken to their problems.

They are waiting now for the government to produce a rabbit out of a hat. The minister has promised them that there is going to be a painless way for him to get $3 billion or $4 billion to reduce these huge deficits, that he is somehow going to get it from the oil and gas price negotiations. Well, Mr. Speaker, he is not going to get it from the oil or gas price negotiations without splitting this country even further than it is split today, and I am thinking of the present dangers that we see in the province of Quebec. That is going ahead with the vote on May 20 and nobody appears to know how it is going to go. I may go down there myself to try to stem the tide.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Crosbie: Hon. gentlemen opposite do not appear to be able to stem it. I may go down there myself to put my finger in the dike. They had better look at the motes in their own eyes when they are considering that situation. If they consider themselves our saviours, they had better get to it. They are going to need more than Fridays to repair the damage which has been done over the years through their neglect, their high-handed approach to the problem. We may have to go down to pull the irons out of the fire for them.

The people of Quebec, the people of Canada are waiting to see how this government can handle the economic and financial problems of this country because they no longer have confidence that we are going to be on top no matter what. Our margin for error is declining all the time. Our margin for safety is declining. The people who are losing their homes through foreclosures are no longer so confident about the future of this country. The people who want to invest their money but who have to compete with this government to borrow a dollar at ruinous interest rates, are starting to wonder whether there is any future in the country and whether they should stay or not.

How can we persuade people in Quebec that they should stay in Canada if we cannot make a better success of our fiscal or economic affairs than we are making now? It may be that the Minister of Finance has gone to West Germany thinking he has had a coup, that he has sneaked into the House and dropped a little bit of a budget without cracking too many yolks. He got the press all excited; they published their version, and now they have gone on to something else. He may think he has done very well out of this. But he has had a very sticky start, the hon. gentleman who has been in this House for so very long. If he wants to continue stonewalling and baffle-gabbing, if he wants to get up in this House and say nothing and display his mastery of the art of saying nothing in expanded numbers of words, that is going to wear very thin for the Canadian people because a lot of them are wondering what their futures are in this country and where their next meal is coming from, where they are going to get jobs and how they are going to prosper, and how they are going to meet interest rates of 16 per cent or 17 per cent. They want these matters dealt with.

So some time this year the Minister of Finance has got to come face to face with the consequences of his engineering our defeat last December, and those consequences include his finding $3 billion or $4 billion in revenue. And the only place he will find that is in personal income tax, in stopping the indexing or something like that. There are no magic or golden pots in which he will find it. Or he will have to go back to the excise tax, he will have to look at all the tax reductions which have been made in the last ten or 15 years during which revenue was reduced by $7.5 billion. He will have to listen to the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Johnston) who has told him it is not there through cutbacks in expenditures, it must be got through increases in revenue.

At this stage we are satisfied, Mr. Speaker, that the people of the country have seen what we have proposed, not short-term solutions but measures over three or four years to help this country. People will remember, and they are going to be waiting to see what the hon. ladies and gentlemen opposite will come up with during the rest of this year. The private sector is going to be waiting to find out whether they are going to be encouraged to do the things that have to be done to create wealth in this country. We are satisfied that when these comparisons are made, when the minister really comes in with a budget, that the one we brought in will stand a test and that, in three or four years time, the Canadian people will remember that while we may have been defeated we at least made a serious attempt to meet their problems and we were not afraid to face them even though we were in a minority, while on the other hand the majority opposite seem afraid to face the facts even though they appear safe and secure for four or five years.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Cyril Keeper (Winnipeg-St. James): Mr. Speaker, it is indeed a real privilege for me to be speaking here in this chamber this evening. It is an honour. It is not a question of privilege—it is simply a privilege. I should like to begin by asking the Chair to convey my congratulations to Madam Speaker upon her election. I think it will be good both for the equality of women in this country and for the country as a whole.

My first attempt to speak in this House was interrupted by this discussion of the financial affairs of the nation, so I should like to direct a couple of comments to the so-called budget.

My understanding is that last December 12 when we had a Progressive Conservative government and this House was dealing with a budget, the NDP put forward a motion on that budget calling for lower interest rates, for a reduction in taxes, and for a stimulation of the economy. The Liberals voted for that motion, and the government fell. Last night in the first statement by the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) in this Parliament, he rejected all three of those measures for dealing with the economy. It certainly was not a very promising start for the Minister of Finance and offers very little hope to the country.

I would like to begin my remarks by thanking the people who sent me here. I am thinking, in the first instance, of the voters of my riding, Winnipeg-St. James. I would like to thank all those people who worked and helped to get me elected. I would also like to have the indulgence of this House to thank the New Democratic Party for my being here, for without that party it would not have been possible for me to be here, nor would there have been any purpose for my being here.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Keeper: There were many political personalities who assisted me in the recent election campaign, and I am sure that all those people, whom I will not mention, would join me in thanking one particular political personality for having helped this seat to fall within the NDP ranks. That person is—

An hon. Member: John Crosbie?

Mr. Keeper: —the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). To him I would like to pay particular thanks.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Keeper: My most deeply felt thanks for my being here tonight go to my family. I would like to thank my wife Lynne and my two boys for the sacrifices they have undertaken so that I can be here.

An hon. Member: What are the boys' names?

Mr. Keeper: David Samuel and Edward Stanley.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Keeper: Finally, by way of thanks I would like to thank the people of Canada for the opportunity to serve.

My riding of Winnipeg-St. James is a relatively new riding which includes part of the old riding which was represented by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre and by J. S. Woodsworth before him. This riding was represented in the last House by Bob Lane, who lived in the riding, as I have, and who is a realtor and a local businessman. I know that Bob did his best to represent the people of that riding, and I hope to do my best as well.

The reason I am in politics and in this House now is that I believe democracy can be made to work. By that I mean that the will of the people can be made to be felt and that the needs of the people can be met. I believe that democracy does not just happen but that it must be made to function. That is why we are here. If we can make it function, then we hold out the possibility for the full flowering of the human person.

The riding I represent contains a great variety of people. It is an urban riding, and I would like to take note of the various groupings which exist in it. There is a fairly large number of small business people in my riding who, at the present time, are suffering from the high level of interest rates. The riding contains a considerable number of working people, both organized and unorganized, who are suffering most particularly hard from unemployment at this time. Students make up a significant part of the population. These students attend both university and community college. Their tuition fees are too high, and their living allowances are too low. Immigrants and new citizens are in large numbers, and they seek an open immigration policy which, as we all know, can only in the final analysis be based upon a strong and vibrant economy.

Women are also a very important group. They seek not so much to be treated as men but as full and equal persons. They seek equality in the work place, and adequate family services such as child care. Public servants and armed forces personnel who live in my riding seek not to be scapegoats or to be ignored. Native Indian people—and there are a number in my riding—need their basic needs, such as housing and jobs, to be met. Franco-Manitobans seek equality and cultural affirmation. Pensioners faced with ever-rising costs of living need adequate incomes.

Home owners are faced with the spectre of exorbitant mortgage rates, and every citizen of my riding is faced with the ever rising cost of living due to continuing oil price increases and interest rates and the general lack of sensitive management of the economy.

I would like to turn my attention now to the substance of the throne speech, which is the focus of my remarks tonight. I would like to begin by mentioning the reference to the handicapped, and the amendments to the Human Rights Act which are projected therein. I must say that I welcome this item, and I urge the government to act on it expeditiously.

During the campaign I attended an all-candidates meeting on a local radio program. One citizen telephoned in and asked all three candidates if we could give the assurance that this item would be in the throne speech. I was not able to give that assurance, but I said that I would raise it in this debate. I am glad to see that the matter is included in the throne speech. However, being a member of the NDP and being a member of the opposition, I note that I am free to prod the government to fulfil this hope which has been offered. I am free in a way which a backbencher on the Liberal side would not be free to prod the government and, considering the entitlement of Manitoba in this administration to only one cabinet minister, another Liberal member of Parliament from Manitoba probably would not be able to move these things along at all.

An hon. Member: Rather like a eunuch.

Mr. Keeper: Those are not my words.

I would like to say, as stated in the throne speech, that I am willing to represent my constituents to the government. I am also willing to represent the government to my constituents in the manner that that is merited, and I am sure I will be given every co-operation in that regard.

Another major matter in the throne speech is the whole question of our very high interest rates. The throne speech mentions protecting those most affected by such rates. It is clear now that the government does not intend to do anything about interest rates in general. Its floating bank rate policy reveals a deliberate high interest rate policy. As an alternative, the NDP offers a low interest rate policy. We have called for an immediate reduction in interest rates by at least two percentage points as a first step to meet this problem head on and directly.

High interest rates are not simply a problem in general. They also affect specific areas of the economy and specific needs of people. I am thinking of housing, and the throne speech mentions that the government will help people who are having the greatest difficulty with renegotiating their mortgages. It goes on to state "without a major subsidy program." That would suggest to me that the government really does not intend to do much and that its measures will be simply cosmetic.

• (2040)

By way of contrast, the NDP has a comprehensive and, I think, effective housing policy, and I would recommend five points in that policy to the government. I will list them. First of all, we recommend that the government restore CMHC, particularly as a direct lender providing mortgage assistance in the form of subsidies for families with incomes under $30,000. Second, we recommend that we extend federal housing programs with special emphasis on non-profit and co-op housing. Third, we recommend that we promote public land assembly to keep costs down. Fourth, we recommend that the graduated payment mortgage, which perpetuates the problems inherent in the AHOP scheme, be dropped, and lastly we recommend that a federal-provincial conference to examine problems facing tenants as well as home owners be convened. The problems facing tenants have not received sufficient attention, with all the focus that has been put on home ownership problems.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Keeper: It would not be sufficient to have a good and sound housing policy only.

Before leaving the subject of housing I would like to say quite simply that without a sane energy policy there is no way people would be able to live in their homes and meet their other needs because of the rising cost of energy that will continue to make it very difficult for people to keep their homes and to meet their other needs.

In that regard I would like to say that the government must avoid any unjustifiable oil price increases. Judging from a reading of the press—in which I am sure we can place trust, at least I am willing to do so—we learn that the Liberals are beginning to back away from their commitment to lower oil prices. As well, specifically with housing itself, I read that the minister in charge of housing, the hon. member for York-Scarborough (Mr. Cosgrove), hopes that the interest rates have peaked. I should like to say that people want more than the minister's hopes; they want effective housing policies.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Keeper: The whole question of interest rates demonstrates the government's attitude toward management of the economy. I would like to deal with high interest rates as they affect small business. It is mentioned in the throne speech that the ceiling for loans under the Small Businesses Loans Act will be raised to $100,000. I would say that that is a simple bookkeeping change, in the sense that it just takes account of inflation as it affects the size of the loan for which one would be eligible under that program. It does not affect the interest rate for small business since the rate under that program is the prime rate plus 1 per cent, and in this context we should note that business bankruptcies for the first two months of 1980, according to the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, are up as compared with the same period in 1979, by 24.8 per cent. These bankruptcies are directly attributable to the very high interest rates and to poor economic management.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Keeper: That is why I think that Geoff Hale, spokesman for the Canadian Organization of Small Businessmen, described the promises in the throne speech as a sick joke. Yet the government promises more. It promises other measures of assistance.

I must say that when I read the throne speech, it indicated to me, first of all, that the government itself recognized the inadequacy of simply raising the ceiling on loans for small business. It also suggested to me that the government did not know what it was doing, or at least it did not know what it was doing while it wrote the throne speech. It suggested to me that perhaps the Liberal government was going to reveal some of its unreleased portions of the election platform from the last election campaign. But I must say that last night's economic statement, the budget, or whatever you wish to call it, indicated that, no, it was not the election platform in the last election campaign that the Liberals failed to reveal but rather that it was borrowed from the Tory budget. The reference here to other measures must have been a reference to temporary small business development bonds. I must say that those bonds are welcome to the extent that they are an attempt to provide some relief from interest rates as they affect small business, but I think that approach to interest rates will prove to be better in theory than in practice. The theory is that small business will have access to loans at one-half of the prime rate plus 1 per cent. I think that practice will probably indicate that it is more likely to be above the prime rate, and of course the question is what is the purpose of the loans? I understand them to be for expansion but not for normal activities such as inventory. Also, the interest rates set under such loans are at the discretion of banks, which means that the government really does not have control over its own policies. There is no real assurance that the policy objective which the government set up in establishing these bonds will be achieved. A better approach would be sane, economic management, and a general policy of lower interest rates.

The federal government reveals itself in its throne speech and in the remarks made last night as having no effective small business policy. That is a tragedy because such a policy would, at the minimum, produce 100,000 jobs a year, as testified to by the Canadian Federation of Independent Business. The NDP, by way of contrast, does have a small business policy, and while I will not go through its details this evening, I would recommend it to the government for action.

I would like to indicate also that the rising energy costs will have a very detrimental effect on small business as well. So we must once again stress that there is no room for unjustifiable increases in oil prices, and by that I mean energy dollars which leak from the energy account, which are used by the government for other purposes than energy projects and by corporations for investments other than energy. Those kinds of increases in price are, in my view, unjustifiable and damaging to the community as a whole and to small business in particular.

The very high interest rates which we have now, also have an impact on employment. In this country and in the United States we have what is clearly recognized as a recession. The government in its throne speech mentioned that it will be expanding its employment programs which will be helpful where they apply, but I would be surprised if they are of a sufficient size to be adequate. Also, they are really no substitute for a policy and for management of the economy which would lead to full employment.

● (2050)

Also the throne speech makes reference to women. There is much in the speech which is worthy of praise, but also there are other parts which I think require closer scrutiny. The government has made a commitment to affirmative action in the public service, but it failed to mention the private sector, certainly in the throne speech. If the government has any intentions with regard to contract compliance which affects the private sector and the employment of women, it has not said that. In fact a good reading of the speech indicates that the government has no intention of doing anything in the private sector—I think that is a major failing with regard to achieving the objective of equality in the work place for women.

As well, there is no mention of providing adequate and affordable day care which obviously is also necessary if women are ever to take their full and equal place in our society.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Keeper: There is mention of pensions, and whatever increase in pensions is forthcoming certainly is merited, deserves praise, and is long overdue. But I suggest that it will neither be adequate nor will it remove the many inequities which continue to exist in the area of pensions as they affect women. Women constitute a greater proportion of the unemployed than men. If the government is to have a real policy for women, then it must place a much higher priority upon things such as unemployment insurance, manpower training allowances, and outreach projects.

The Speech from the Throne mentions violence against women. The government is going to take action in this area in order to protect women against violence. I think that is a good move, and I hope that the substance of the government's action lives up to its rhetoric. Certainly women today will not be satisfied with words alone but will insist upon action, action which meets their real needs.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Keeper: Very briefly I should like to say that the throne speech makes absolutely no mention whatsoever of the major social problems in the central areas of our cities. That is a very grave oversight. Also it says nothing with regard to the alleviation of the pressing problems of native people living in urban areas. That matter affects the quality of life of us all.

The speech made considerable reference to national unity. I would not want to deal with that matter in a partisan fashion, but I want to say a few general things about Canada because I think at this time it is important to remind ourselves that we can build a better Canada if we so choose. We need a country which is not torn by great gaps in wealth, either in terms of social gaps or geographic regions. Rather, we should have a country where the basic needs of all people and communities are met.

We must not have a country which is torn apart by cultural differences. Rather, we need a country which, while it stays together because of its common interests, acknowledges, appreciates, and celebrates its cultural variety, a country which rejoices in the full flowering of its people, a flowering which emerges from the freedom enjoyed by a people whose basic human needs are met. I am not only referring to the need for food, clothing, and shelter, but also to the need for security, the conditions for self-fulfilment such as education, recreation, and freedom of expression. Let us seek today to build a better Canada, a Canada that will stand the tests of time.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Hon. Charles Lapointe (Minister of State (Small Businesses)): Mr. Speaker, it is an honour for me to rise in this first session of the Thirty-second Parliament, and I want to take this opportunity to extend to you and your colleagues in the Chair my most sincere congratulations and wish you well. I would also ask you kindly to convey to Madam Speaker, in addition to my most respectful regards, the expression of the great pleasure I as well as my colleagues in this House take in seeing her talent being put at the service of her colleagues in the House of Commons and to express also to her the great importance we attach to the fact that a woman who in recent years left her mark in the history of this country should now rank first among her peers in the House of Commons.

I also want to mention the excellent work done by the movers of the Address in Reply to the Speech from the Throne, and I want to thank the hon. members for Rimouski (Mrs. Côté) and Sudbury (Mr. Frith) for the generous vision they gave us of Canada and also the positive tone and pace they gave this debate in reply to the Speech from the Throne. As you know, Mr. Speaker, our country is going through one of the most critical periods in its history. Economically, we are faced with an extremely difficult situation where, on the one hand, we have to fight at the same time the unemployment that is affecting dramatically the poorer areas of this country and, on the other hand, to take difficult monetary and fiscal measures to overcome and fight inflation.

Politically, the situation is even darker, Mr. Speaker. The very future of Canada, our country, is being threatened by the separatist views of the Parti Québécois and its friends. The coming weeks will be decisive and the referendum scheduled for May 20 in Quebec concerns all Canadians from coast to coast and, above all, Quebeckers. This will be for us, Mr. Speaker, a fundamental choice for our collective future. Will we choose to renew our faith in Canada, to reassert that we belong to Canada, that great country that offers so many opportunities and challenges, or instead, Mr. Speaker will we choose to live isolated within narrower boundaries, because we are afraid of those Canadian challenges and because the opportunities offered leave us gasping?

That is the choice we will have to make: that is the choice of existence we are confronted with by the booby-trapped question that is put to us by the Péquiste government, whether we want to admit it or not. At this point in time, Mr. Speaker, we must ask ourselves why Canada exists, what led our forebears, the Fathers of Confederation, to sit around a single table and ask: Why should we not pool our resources? Why should we not seek the compromises and means necessary to ensure the fulfilment, the flourishing of our two peoples?

Mr. Speaker, during the discussions which led to the development of the federal agreement between 1865 and 1867, two great principles were in the foreground. These principles are the most generous and the noblest to which any human being can and must adhere. Mr. Speaker, I am speaking about sharing and generosity. These two principles, along with the courage and the tenacity of the builders of this country have made of Canada a rich and free country where it is good to live. It was not an easy task to build such a large country. Our ancestors had to face many difficulties.

Even today everything is not perfect but we can still consider ourselves one of the luckiest nations on earth. The other question that we have to ask ourselves, Mr. Speaker, is what this federal agreement has given us in the last 113 years. Not only are we living in a country with one of the highest standards of living in the world, but even more important, we are living in a country where basic freedoms are truly respected, in a country where the concepts of sharing and generosity have evolved into one of the most advanced wealth redistribution and social legislation systems in the world and in a country where our rights as a French community are respected and where we have been able to develop culturally, economically and socially.

Mr. Speaker, we have the opportunity to take part in a great adventure for civilization. We have the opportunity to build day after day this new man born out of the contacts between two great civilizations, the French civilization and the English civilization. This new man, whose behaviour is influenced by the civilization and the way of life of the first inhabitants of this country, our native brothers, this new North American man, formed also by all the wealth brought to this country by the new Canadians who have come here from everywhere in the world, this new man, a Francophone in our case, Mr. Speaker, has the opportunity to live in the second largest country in the world, a country which has never known war, a country born out of negotiations based on a common will to live together in the spirit of sharing and generosity. Or course, all this has not always been easy and in many cases in the past, Francophones in this country have been treated unfairly. But must we enter the future backwards, with our eyes riveted on past mistakes, Mr. Speaker? Or is it not better to consider the enormous progress accomplished during the last thirty years, and build our future on what is already established?

At the present time the spokesmen for the Parti Québécois are appearing in every forum of Quebec to try in an underhand manner to make our fellow citizens believe that the federal state, its Parliament and its government are foreign institutions. It is suggested that Quebec has always been the poor cousin of confederation and that French-speaking Canadians have constantly been exploited by the English in Canada. That is exactly what the Péquistes tried to prove in their white paper that distorts historical facts. Thus in all the speeches they make these days, culture is one of their favorite examples. They outdo one another in expressing their disgust at the federal government, this foreign power, as they like to say, which has been trying to dominate and control the French culture in Canada. How can they make such contentions, Mr. Speaker, when we know that the Canada Council, created in 1957 by the federal government, helped so many artists in Canada, in Quebec and French Canada, such as Borduas, Riopelle, Julien, Leclerc, Vignault and many others, have successful careers, develop their talents and make a name for themselves in the artistic community not only in Quebec but throughout Canada and even at the international level.

Some of those who benefited most from the Canada Council choose today not to remember. The same thing happened, Mr. Speaker, in the early fifties. You will recall that television was in its infancy and the then government had decided to endow this great country with a national television network. In 1952, Parliament decided to create the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. And in the same bill, Mr. Speaker, this government of foreigners, as the Parti Québécois calls it, also established the Société Radio-Canada, a corporation which enjoys an exceptional degree of financial and artistic autonomy, a corporation which through years promoted the development of French culture in Canada and the discovery of several talents in all realms of television.

Mr. Speaker, it is interesting to note also that in 1979, last year, 36 per cent of the budget of the whole corporation was given to Radio-Canada, the French network, and that 4,300 employees of this corporation now work in Quebec. There is another aspect, Mr. Speaker, which can exemplify the two basic principles of our federation, sharing and generosity, and that is the economic sector. With your permission, I would like to review briefly some industrial sectors of Quebec, starting with traditional industries like textiles, clothing, footwear and leather goods. What is the situation in the textile industry, Mr. Speaker? Statistics show that 48,000 employees of that Canadian industry or 51 per cent of the total Canadian work force are located in Quebec. And 45 per cent of all Quebec's textile production is sold in other Canadian provinces. In the apparel industry, 70 per cent of industrial plant is in Quebec, accounting for 66 per cent of the Canadian total. And as in the case of textiles, 47 per cent of all clothes made in Quebec are sold in other Canadian provinces.

What is the federal government doing to protect that predominantly Quebec industry that is threatened by foreign imports enjoying cheaper textiles and clothes costs? The national government acted to impose quotas on imports and increased tariff protection, which is now guaranteeing stable markets and safe jobs to the Quebec textile and clothing industries. The same goes for the leather and footwear industries. With 10,000 employees in Quebec, or 43 per cent of the total Canadian labour force in the industry, 50 per cent of all footwear and leather goods production is made in Quebec, of which 57 per cent are sold in other Canadian provinces.

The sectorial approach introduced at the federal level in 1973 greatly helped that industry. The use of tariffs and import quotas coupled with the assistance programs not only protected jobs in that industry in Quebec but also led to new job creations since 1976. One of the programs of great value for Quebec in the leather and footwear industry is the adjustment program under which businesses are offered both grants and loans at favourable interest rates. From 1974 to this day, 66 per cent of grants, and 56 per cent of loans under that program went to Quebec. The federal government also contributed in 1976 to the establishment of the Shoe and Leather Institute of Canada with headquarters in Montreal. That institute is very important for Quebec, where 50 per cent of its activities are concentrated. Mr. Speaker, these figures speak for themselves. I am deeply shocked to hear our opponents in the Parti Québécois suggest that Quebec gets less than other provinces in government help to the textile and shoe industries.

Let's not deceive ourselves, Mr. Speaker, our fellow citizens from Calgary, Kamloops, Winnipeg or elsewhere in Canada who buy textile and clothing, leather goods and shoes made in Quebec could buy these same items from Hong Kong, South Korea or elsewhere at a much better price. But, Mr. Speaker, as I have said previously, the very essence of Canadian federalism is sharing. That is why we want all Canadian consumers to help protect these industrial sectors which provide Quebec with many jobs. To prevent members of the Parti Québécois from claiming this is economic terrorism or lies, and to avoid a repetition of the Premier of Quebec's statement this morning on Radio-Canada that Quebec federal MPs in Ottawa are all damned liars, I wish to quote from one of the studies the Parti Québécois itself published in 1980, the Bonin report, entitled: A propos de l'association économique Canada-Québec. Mr. Speaker, I am quoting from pages 417 and 418 of this report:

> Shipments from Quebec to the rest of Canada originate mainly from the labour-intensive industries to which special customs tariffs are applied: food and beverages, leather, textile, hosiery, clothing, furniture. These industries are largely dependent on the Canadian market and, as is to be expected since they need special customs tariffs to survive, they do not export very much outside Canada. Should the Canada-Quebec association take the form of a free-trade zone, part of the Canadian market could be lost to some Quebec firms since Canada, in retaining its own trade policy with respect to third-party countries, would be free to shop elsewhere if conditions are more favourable.
> One other point is worth raising for it could also in the short term leave Quebec with less room to manoeuvre. If these highly protected industries are labour-intensive industries (and this is possible even though they could be called "low wage" industries), it follows that a liberalization of international trade in these sectors would be detrimental to workers employed by them unless transitional measures are provided which also include adequate compensation.

It is not only the traditional sectors of the Quebec economy which benefit from being part of Canada, Mr. Speaker, and I would now like to refer briefly to the shipbuilding industry. Two weeks ago when I attended the launching of two ferries in the Marine Industries shipyards of Sorel, I once again had reason to feel indignant. In his speech, the Quebec transport minister stated that Quebec was not getting its fair share of shipbuilding contracts because the federal government prefers to grant subsidies to the other provinces.

Mr. Speaker, I am seriously starting to wonder if our separatist opponents are capable of reading statistics correctly and if they do not suffer from some kind of paranoia toward the federal government. If one examines what happened during the last 18 years, from 1961 to 1979, one can see that grants and subsidies contributed by the federal government for shipbuilding have amounted to $625 million for Canada as a whole. Out of this amount, Quebec received $223 million which represents more than 36 per cent of the total and out of these $223 million Marine Industries of Sorel got nearly half or $102 million. So, Mr. Speaker, when I hear people like the Quebec transport minister say that other provinces have always enjoyed preferential treatment for subsidies to shipyards, to say the least I think they are using certain figures and statements which contradict reality.

Mr. Speaker, when we look at the contracts awarded by the Department of Supply and Services for naval repairs or alterations in 1978-79, we see that these contracts totalled $38.1 million for the whole of Canada. Quebec's share of this amount was $32.2 million, or 84 per cent of all contracts. And yet, Mr. Speaker, some people have the audacity to tell us that Quebec is the poor cousin in Canada and that the federal government gives it nothing. I find this attitude quite unacceptable and it revolts me as a Quebecker and a Canadian.

Aeronautics is another sector where Quebec is far from lagging behind the other provinces. Indeed, Mr. Speaker, more than 46 per cent of the entire aeronautic industry is centred in Quebec and creates employment for about 20,000 Quebeckers. And the federal government is certainly partly responsible for this favourable situation in Quebec. You will recall that in the early seventies, when this sector of the indsutry was going through a difficult period, the then minister of industry, trade and commerce, the hon. Jean Chrétien, urged the federal government to purchase the Canadair plant which at the time was employing 1,500 people. Nine years later, Mr. Speaker, Canadair employes over 6,000 people, which is due in part to the Challenger program which was heavily subsidized by the federal government.

Mr. Speaker, I have already said a few words about the textile, the shoe, the leather and the clothing industry, and about shipbuilding and aeronautics, which are all important sectors of the Quebec economy. However, there is one sector to which I would like to address myself more particularly and which concerns our very roots in this Canadian nation, and I am of course speaking about the agricultural sector. If there is one sector, Mr. Speaker, where the concepts of sharing and generosity apply, it is in agriculture.

One of the criticisms we hear most often is that federal agricultural policies have been more favourable to westerners, and to the detriment of easterners and especially Quebeckers. However, certain basic facts are being forgotten, Mr. Speaker. We have only to recall that western Canada has 89 million acres under cultivation compared with six million in Quebec. As for farm workers, they represent only 5.6 per cent of the work force in Quebec compared with 17 per cent in the prairies.

Although the potential of farm land in Quebec represents only 6 per cent of the total for Canada, Mr. Speaker, it is interesting to note that 13 per cent of all employees of the federal Department of Agriculture are stationed in Quebec. And although this farm potential is relatively small compared with the whole of Canada, Quebec receives a substantial share of federal agricultural programs. These programs tend to reflect the importance and the peculiarities of our various regions. For instance, we can mention the crop insurance program under which $10 million were paid to Quebec farmers between 1973 and 1978. The Federal Farm Credit Corporation has also helped Quebec farmers to a great extent, and for the sole fiscal year 1975-76, the federal government approved 1,116 farm loans to them, for a total of some $85 million.

What are we to say now about the supplementary Canada-Quebec farm development agreement which the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion has signed with the Quebec government? The purpose of this agreement is, for instance, to improve farm lands in the Montreal region and to encourage land redistribution in eastern Quebec, Saguenay-Lac-Saint-Jean and Abitibi-Témiscamingue. This agreement calls for some $62 million in federal contributions over a period of six years.

Still in the agricultural area, I would like to take a closer look at the dairy industry which is of capital importance to Quebec farmers. Indeed, in 1977-78, 75 per cent of Quebec farmers drew at least 60 per cent of their revenues from dairy products. The federal government is aware of that and has considered and still considers it to be most important. But there again, Mr. Speaker, I prefer to refer to that study by the Quebec government entitled A propos de l'association économique Canada-Québec and I want to quote from pages 150 and 151 the following excerpt:

It can be said that federal programs for the dairy industry are less varied than those for grain growing. Indeed, they consist almost exclusively of transfer payments to dairy producers. So the prime concern of the federal dairy policy remains the support of producers' income and marketing techniques play a lesser role than for grain. On the other hand, the dairy industry comes under a highly protectionist policy under which it enjoys privileged access to the Canadian market; the importance of liquid milk and most dairy products is subject to a quota system; certain processed products enjoy more than high custom protection (dairies, for example).

From the strict point of view of Quebec dairy producers, it would be difficult to say that the federal government's dairy policy has an unfavourable impact: nearly half the amounts spent on that policy between 1960 and 1976 were paid in Quebec, particularly in the form of payments to producers; not only did this amount represent a considerable addition to the revenues of Quebec producers, but since the creation of the CDC—

—the Canadian Dairy Commission—

—their total income has increased even more rapidly than that of Ontario producers. In addition, the Quebec milk processing industry enjoyed custom and other forms of protection. That industry sells about 25 per cent of its production to the rest of Canada and only 2 per cent abroad. However, it holds a privileged position (about 40 per cent of the added value) in the Quebec food and beverage industry.

Since in that study made by the Quebec government statistics on dairy policy did not go further than 1976, I thought it would be important and interesting to mention what happened in 1977-78. In that financial year, the federal government paid in direct subsidies to Quebec producers $128 million or 48.6 per cent of total payments to dairy producers in Canada. It means, Mr. Speaker, that in 1977-78 Quebec dairy producers received 52 per cent of federal milk subsidies, that is to say an amount of $238 million.

As concerns its contribution to the Canadian food assistance program to developing countries the province of Quebec also got its full share. In 1977-78, the Canadian International Development Agency, through the Canadian Dairy Commission bought 53.4 million tons of butter and 236.9 million tons of powdered milk in the whole country. Of those purchases, 95 per cent of the butter and 84 per cent of the powdered milk came from Quebec. Agriculture is a rather important sector of the Quebec economy and the federal government is determined to maintain its assistance to Quebec farmers.

I might continue along the same line, Mr. Speaker; as concerns grain transportation, the Parti Québécois keeps accusing us of sending all the money out west and always fails to mention that, when we invested $100 million to help western farmers ship their grain and asked the Canadian Wheat Board and western producers to build hopper cars with those $100 million, they always fail to say that Quebec, that is to say Canadian Vickers, Marine Industries or Bombardier, gets a large part of the money for those railway cars.

The same thing holds true for VIA Rail, Mr. Speaker, since a $115 million contract was awarded by the federal government to Bombardier for the design and construction of a new, state of the art, LRC train. I could say much more on the economy, but I think that some of my colleagues want to take part in this debate, Mr. Speaker. I also think that the deceitful referendum question asked by the Parti Québécois calls for only one answer: no, no to this dream, no to the adventure that this party wants to take us on. And this No vote, Mr. Speaker, is the only positive action we can take at this point in time. As His Excellency the Governor General mentioned in the throne speech, a No vote in the referendum, a no to the question asked by the Parti Québécois is a Yes vote for the renewal of federalism in Canada.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Order, please. Ordinarily I would recognize the hon. member for Joliette (Mr. La Salle) who has sought the eye of the Speaker, but in view of the hour, and with the consent of the hon. member for Joliette, we would understand that he will be the first to speak tomorrow, and with the consent of hon. members I will see the clock as 9.30.

An hon. Member: There is no debate tomorrow.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): He will be the first to speak on the next occasion for debate on the address in reply.

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Speaker, I understand the debate is being adjourned, but we have five minutes tonight for the hon. member.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): As I said earlier, if the hon. member for Joliette (Mr. La Salle) would like to take the floor for the remaining five minutes, obviously it is his right to do so.

[Translation]

If the hon. member for Joliette wishes to begin his speech, he may do so.

Hon. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, I frankly admit that I have barely enough time to greet and congratulate you as well as Madam Speaker and her assistants. I would also like to take advantage of those few seconds to congratulate the mover and the seconder. You pointed out that it was difficult to make a good speech, but you would expect me to do it, I am convinced, because there are problems which particularly concern me. First, however vague it may be, the throne speech deserves a few comments and I am also interested in order and in national unity. Under the circumstances, I would rather remain the first member to speak when the debate is resumed and I can assure you, Mr. Speaker, as well as my colleagues, that I will have some relevant comments to make on those two subjects.

I would ask that the vote be taken rather than begin a speech which would not have all the impact that it deserves. This is all, Mr. Speaker.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Order, please. It being 9.30 p.m., it is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 38(4), to interrupt these proceedings and put forthwith the question necessary to dispose of the amendment now before the House.

The question is, therefore, on the amendment to the amendment (Mr. Kristiansen). All those in favour of the amendment will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea,

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Call in the members.

The House divided on the amendment (Mr. Kristiansen) which was negatived on the following division:

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

RATIFICATION OF CANADA-U.S. FISHERIES AND BOUNDARY TREATIES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Hon. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. I think you will find that there may be a disposition on the part of the House to grant the necessary unanimous consent. My motion is as follows:

It is resolved that this House endorses the publicly expressed view of the Canadian and United States governments that the east coast fisheries and boundary treaties represent fair and urgently required co-operative arrangements in the interests of both countries, regards the early ratification and implementation of these treaties as a matter of national importance to Canada and to good relations between Canada and the United States, and urges the Senate of the United States to take early and favourable action for ratification of these treaties.

That motion would be seconded by the hon. member for Cape Breton-The Sydneys (Mr. MacLellan).

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Madam Speaker: The House has heard the terms of the motion. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

POST OFFICE

PROPOSED RELOCATION OF SASKATOON OFFICE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Hon. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon West): Madam Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, on a motion of urgent and pressing necessity. The Post Office is planning to move the Saskatchewan district office from Saskatoon to Winnipeg, leaving Saskatchewan and Prince Edward Island as the only two provinces without district offices.

In view of the fact that there are a substantially greater number of post offices in Saskatchewan than in Manitoba, spread over a far larger area, and the move will mean a loss of 103 positions with a salary of about $1¾ million per year to the city of Saskatoon alone, I move, and I should say that I had asked the hon. member for Ottawa Centre (Mr. Evans) to second this motion as he is the Liberal member twinned with Saskatoon East, but he demurred and it will therefore be seconded by the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Neil):

That this House directs the Postmaster General, in the interests of efficiency of operation of the Post Office in western Canada, to revoke the plan to move the Saskatchewan district office from the city of Saskatoon to the city of Winnipeg.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

NATIONAL UNITY

PROGRAM SET OUT IN NIAGARA FALLS "REVIEW"—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Al MacBain (Niagara Falls): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43. At this crucial moment in our history, all Canadians outside the province of Quebec find themselves at a loss as to how they, as individuals, can show to the people of Quebec in a tangible way their true feelings about Quebec, its culture, its language, its people and the fact that we in the rest of the country accept that a Canada without the beautiful province of Quebec is unthinkable.

All hon. members have been, or will be, supplied with a copy of the Niagara Falls Review of April 22 which sets forth a program for one-to-one communication between residents of Canada outside Quebec and residents within Quebec. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Guelph (Mr. Schroder):

That this House urge the press in every municipality outside the province of Quebec to forthwith establish a program similar to the one set out in the Niagara Falls Review of April 22, 1980, and that all Canadians outside Quebec be invited to take advantage of such programs to express to the people of Quebec their deep feelings of love and affection.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY

WINNIPEG—RELOCATION OF MARSHALLING YARDS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Hon. Jake Epp (Provencher): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. In view of frequent statements by the Minister of Employment and Immigration that the CPR yards in Winnipeg should be relocated, and in view of the request by the city of Winnipeg that an early decision be made by the federal government on whether it favours rail relocation along with a major financial commitment by the federal government to the project, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg-Assiniboine (Mr. McKenzie):

That the Government of Canada agree to the terms of reference as outlined by the city of Winnipeg and, further, that the federal government make its decision public by the end of May as requested by the city of Winnipeg.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

AIRPORTS

AVAILABILITY OF EVACUATION AND RESCUE RESOURCES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina West): Madam Speaker, I have a motion which is urgent within the terms of Standing Order 43, and I believe all hon. members will want to take action on it as of about an hour ago.

In view of the fact that Transport Canada has decided that airport firefighters will no longer have any responsibility for the evacuation or rescue of passengers or crew in the event of an aircraft crash or fire, and in view of the fact that Transport Canada has decided that these emergency actions are the responsibility of the airlines—that is, airline employees—I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg-Birds Hill (Mr. Blaikie):

That this House instruct the government to continue to maintain and provide adequate evacuation and rescue resources at Transport Canada airports.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

THE CONSTITUTION

INQUIRY WHETHER GOVERNMENT INTENDS TO AMEND CONSTITUTION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Hon. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Madam Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, I ask for the unanimous consent of the House to introduce a motion dealing with an important matter of pressing necessity.

Considering that the western premiers have unanimously stated that they are in favour of renewing the constitution; considering that they emphatically reject sovereignty-association and the status quo; and considering the recent commitment made by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) in favour of a renewed federalism, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Epp):

That the House call on the Prime Minister of Canada to answer affirmatively to the wish expressed by his western counterparts.

Madam Speaker: The House has heard the motion of the hon. member. Under the provisions of Standing Order 43, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

REGIONAL DEVELOPMENT

NEGOTIATIONS WITH ATLANTIC PREMIERS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. In light of the fact that two major measures of relief for the Atlantic provinces in the Crosbie budget—that is, tax contracts for firms locating in the region and incentives for the construction of fishing vessels—have been abandoned by the present Minister of Finance, and in light of the fact that the premiers of Nova Scotia and Newfoundland have recently restated their position that revenues from offshore resources should accrue to the provinces, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Malpeque (Mr. Gass):

● (1415)

That this House directs the Prime Minister, in the interests of national unity, to take immediate steps to meet with Atlantic Canada's premiers in order to achieve a negotiated settlement of this question as an expression of the government's concern for regional development in the Atlantic provinces.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

FINANCE

DISCREPANCY BETWEEN ESTIMATES OF PRESIDENT OF TREASURY BOARD AND MINISTER OF FINANCE

Hon. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Madam Speaker, I would like to put a question to the Minister of State for Finance. First, I would like to congratulate him on his appointment.

[English]

I would like to ask the minister: In view of the discrepancy between the spending estimates tabled here yesterday by the President of the Treasury Board, of $58.4 billion, and the projections of the Minister of Finance tabled on Monday night, of $60.4 billion for total outlays—which are said to be the result of increases in the oil import compensation program, and also increases in public debt charges totalling $2 billion altogether—and in view of the inability of the President of the Treasury Board to explain the discrepancy on what the latest estimates are—he has taken it under advisement—could the minister tell us, and the President of the Treasury Board, how the Minister of Finance arrives at the estimate of total spending this year under the headings of the oil import compensation plan and public debt charges?

What are the amounts now estimated by the Minister of Finance? Would he tell us and share the knowledge with the Treasury Board?

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre Bussières (Minister of State, Finance): Madam Speaker, I thank the member for St. John's West for his congratulations and I would like to tell him immediately that the Minister of Finance and I have full confidence in the ability and competence of the President of the Treasury Board. I think that the member for St. John's West can see in the statement of the Minister of Finance that the amounts stated are taken from figures which he had himself anticipated and from the differences in the negotiations on oil prices now under way.

[English]

ESTIMATES FOR OIL IMPORT COMPENSATION PAYMENTS AND PUBLIC DEBT CHARGES

Hon. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is to the President of the Treasury Board, since the minister of state does not know what these figures are. He has greater confidence in the President of the Treasury Board than we have learned yet.

The Auditor General has pointed out that the spending figures in the estimates are incomplete and sometimes incomprehensible—which is easy to understand, when ministers cannot comprehend them. Has the President of the Treasury Board now been advised by the Department of Finance as to what the government's estimates contain under the heading of oil import compensation payments for 1980-81, which I think is $3.1 billion, from what I can read, and $10.7 billion for public debt charges? Could he confirm whether these are the figures, or what the figures are, and advise us whether the Treasury Board might be going back as a branch of the Department of Finance?

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (President of the Treasury Board): Madam Speaker, I am surprised that the former minister of finance and his colleague, the former president of the treasury board, short though their tenure was, do not seem to understand that there is a fundamental difference between an expenditure projection and the number which is found in the main estimates.

Mr. Andre: There is not supposed to be.

Mr. Johnston: That has always been the case. That always will be the case. When the former minister of finance made his projections on that infamous day in December, of $58.4 billion, those were projections; and had the estimates been tabled at that time, they would have been in the order of, say, $57 billion because the reserve to which he sometimes makes reference is not included there.

With specific reference to the oil import compensation payments, the amount provided for in the main estimates is $2.6 billion, and the current projection is in the neighbourhood of $3.1 billion. Yesterday, I indicated that with respect to debt costs, the main estimates provide for $10.275 billion and the current projections are $10.775 billion.

Mr. Crosbie: Madam Speaker, I have a final supplementary for the President of the Treasury Board. That infamous budget has been adopted holus-bolus, with respect to about two-thirds of it, by the hon. gentlemen opposite. So he should watch his epithets, because they will turn into an epitaph.

May I ask the President of the Treasury Board this: he has now got the figures for the latest projections, or estimates, for this year. Could he explain to us this statement by the Minister of Finance which says, "implementing blended oil pricing could alone reduce expenditures and financial requirements by as much as $1 billion"?

● (1420)

How will this famous blender reduce these amounts by $1 billion? Could he explain that to the House? We all await it with bated breath. If that is the case, why do not the estimates reflect it, if they are only projections?

Mr. Johnston: Madam Speaker, the former minister of finance apparently still does not understand the difference between main estimates and projections.

An hon. Member: What are our estimates, if not projections of expenditures?

Mr. Johnston: The projections clearly do not take into account whatever pricing arrangement is arrived at by my colleague, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources.

An hon. Member: Explain.

Mr. Johnston: If the hon. member wishes to address that question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, I am sure my colleague will be prepared to deal with the issue.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

SPENDING TARGET OF GOVERNMENT

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Wellington-Dufferin-Simcoe): Madam Speaker, yesterday the President of the Treasury Board, when he tabled his estimates, was at pains to say that these estimates did not constitute a spending plan for the government. Surely the time now has come for the goverment to indicate what its spending plans really are. Will the President of the Treasury Board tell Parliament and the Canadian people what, in fact, is the spending target for this government this year?

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (President of the Treasury Board): Madam Speaker, it seems to me that these questions are a rehash of what has already been covered in the speech by my colleague, the Minister of Finance, and by the questions and answers exchanged yesterday.

An hon. Member: Then just answer it.

Mr. Johnston: The projection which the Minister of Finance gave the other evening was the figure of $60.4 billion, subject to reduction on the basis of whatever the blended oil price will be. I really do not understand—

An hon. Member: That is pretty clear.

Mr. Beatty: When the minister said he did not understand, it was the most candid statement he has made so far during his tenure.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Beatty: I want to ask the President of the Treasury Board, does he feel bound by the commitment made by his leader, the current Prime Minister, in Toronto on January 12, namely, that increases in spending would be held to less than the increase in growth in the GNP this year? "Yes" or "No"?

Mr. Johnston: Madam Speaker—

An hon. Member: That is a good start.

An hon. Member: "Yes" or "No"?

Mr. Johnston: First of all, the object of this government, since its declaration of 1975, has been to keep the annual increase in over-all government spending within the rate of increase in the GNP.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Johnston: That has always been the objective, and it remains the objective.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Johnston: I would like to point out, Madam Speaker—

An hon. Member: You are as reliable as Herb Gray.

Mr. Johnston: —something that I think the House would like to know, namely, that on the basis of the estimates that I tabled yesterday, were our friends making any kind of financial projections of the kind they made last December, their total expenditure would be almost as high, except they would not have that very important plan to provide $345 million under the GIS to our senior citizens.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

ENVIRONMENTAL AFFAIRS

ACID RAIN—CANADA-U.S. DISCUSSIONS

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Madam Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the Minister of the Environment. First, I should like to congratulate him on his appointment to one of the most important portfolios in Canada.

One hundred and fifty lakes in central Canada are dead today, thousands more are dying and plant life and health are threatened. Before the minister left for Washington, we heard him describe acid rain as "a time bomb that has already gone off", and that we were "on the verge of disaster". I share these concerns, and I am sure we all do.

Given the fact that the minister returned from Washington with his tail between his legs, with no commitment whatsoever from the U.S. Administration, can he now assure the House that he views the U.S. response as totally unacceptable to him, his government and the people of Canada, and that his government will be increasing pressure on the United States to get meaningful action?

• (1425)

Hon. John Roberts (Minister of State for Science and Technology and Minister of the Environment): Madam Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his kind comments on my arrival to this ministry. I agree with him that it is one of the most important portfolios, and I am anxious to have his support as well as his good wishes in the months to come.

I would like to make clear to the hon. member and to the House that the purpose of my trip to Washington was, not to return with an agreement but to begin the process of discussion. We received a sympathetic hearing. The American Secretary of State is here today and the same kinds of considerations which I presented in Washington will be renewed in those discussions.

We are anxious to press ahead as quickly as we possibly can, not only with the movement toward an agreement on air standards which go across borders, but also for some interim assertion of political will on the part of both the United States and Canada to use, as strongly as we can, the regulations which exist presently on both sides of the border to combat a very urgent and pressing danger.

Mr. Fulton: Madam Speaker, the question of acid rain in Canada is hardly a new one. I think some of the proposals being made by President Carter are worthy of note by this House. President Carter's plan called for 300 new coal-fired plants and 107 oil-burning plants being converted to coal, almost all of which will be in the northeastern United States, thereby affecting Canada.

Now, 48,000 lakes are threatened in Canada, and the United States emissions are proposed to increase dramatically. Perhaps the minister could advise this House and the people of Canada what precise steps the ministry is taking in considering the protection and the revitalization of these vital Canadian resources.

An hon. Member: We can put a fan on the border and blow all the air back.

Mr. Roberts: Madam Speaker, the question prompts a long response. I should like to say, simply, three things very briefly. We have already pressed on the United States our concerns over the implementation of President Carter's proposals if they were to go ahead unchanged. They must go through the congressional process, and I am confident that many changes will take place during that process.

Second, the hon. member should be as much concerned with the existing transgression of regulations, not simply about the future effects of oil conversion to coal but of the existing regulations which are not being fully applied in the United States. We have been making vigorous representations on that point as well.

The third thing of which the hon. member should be aware is that much of this problem is engendered here in Canada. I have undertaken discussions with some of my provincial counterparts. There are aspects of Canadian performance in this area which must be cleaned up. I am confident that within the next two weeks there will be significant movement on this particular part of the question, particularly in reference to the source of pollution which comes from Inco in Sudbury, as a result of joint action by the federal government and the provincial government of Ontario.

Mr. Fulton: Madam Speaker, I think a lot of Canadians are concerned about the sort of whimpering, headless horseman attitude which we have seen in the past and see in the present in terms of this type of pollution. Perhaps the minister would advise us the position he and his cabinet colleagues are taking toward the visit of Cyrus Vance today, whether it is simply going to be a back-patting gesturing—

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Fulton: —or whether the minister is going to make specific representations, through the Secretary of State for External Affairs, to Cyrus Vance to make sure the type of pollution emissions which are occurring today will be terminated.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Repeat the question.

Mr. Roberts: Madam Speaker, the hon. member refers to whimpering. I think it is clear from my answers that we have already taken considerably vigorous action. What the hon. gentleman is doing is neighing, after the barn door is closed, about proposals he would like to have made.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

CONSUMER AFFAIRS

PROSECUTION FOR FALSE ADVERTISING

Mr. Geoff Scott (Hamilton-Wentworth): Madam Speaker, last week the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Postmaster General dropped charges against 57 Ontario stores accused of selling ground beef laced with pork.

I want to ask the Minister of Agriculture if he was consulted before this decision was made; and, if so, where does this leave his department in terms of its ability to ensure Canadians that they are getting what is advertised in what they buy?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Madam Speaker, if I understand correctly, these charges were withdrawn because of a previous court decision affecting the legislation. It does not in any way mean that the surveillance, etc., will not be maintained by all departments concerned making sure meat and other products in Canada are pure and wholesome.

• (1430)

Mr. Scott (Hamilton-Wentworth): Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Postmaster General. Now that he has dropped these charges and has abdicated his responsibility to the Canadian consumer—who now has no protection against the sale of questionable ground beef—what guarantees can he offer, to the Jewish community especially, that mixing of ground beef with pork will not continue?

[Translation]

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Postmaster General): Madam Speaker, I would like to reassure the hon. member that indeed officers in my department continue to monitor commercial practices, and if they once more detect ground beef laced with pork they will take the appropriate action and this could mean seizure or criminal lawsuits. The hon. member has referred to dropped charges, which were based on contents and standards and had absolutely no implication of fraud, or selling or labelling in a deceitful way. So the distinction must be clear and I want to reassure not only the hon. member but all members of this House and the public at large that officers in my department are on the watch and will take necessary measures in the future.

METRIC CONVERSION

REQUEST FOR PARLIAMENTARY DEBATE BEFORE SYSTEM PUT INTO FULL EFFECT

Mr. Bill Domm (Peterborough): Madam Speaker, I would have preferred to ask my question of the Prime Minister, but in his absence I shall direct it to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. My question stems from a recent government announcement to proceed in some 20 cities in Canada with the implementation of metric, affecting approximately six million people.

In light of the adverse reaction and effects to small businesses and consumers, will the minister responsible for industry, trade and commerce assure this House—and answer the question—that he will allow full parliamentary discussion on the subject of the implementation of the metric system before it is forced on business communities across Canada?

[Translation]

Hon. Charles Lapointe (Minister of State, Small Businesses): Madam Speaker, first I should like to remind the hon. member that there were ample opportunities for hon. members to discuss this when the legislation on metric conversion was passed in this House. If members opposite will please quieten down, Madam Speaker, I should like to tell the hon. member that the suggestion he just made will be examined.

OFFICIAL LANGUAGES

INEQUITIES MENTIONED IN REPORT OF COMMISSIONER

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Madam Speaker, my question is to the President of the Treasury Board in his capacity as minister responsible for the Official Languages Act.

I think he knows that yesterday the Commissioner of Official Languages under the act tabled his annual report in this House and it is really a cataloguing of inequities and injustices against French Canadians in the public service of this country. In particular, it points out that Francophones are vastly underrepresented at the middle and senior echelons of the public service.

My question to the minister is this: Why has the government hesitated for so long in acting on equality of opportunity to work in French and to be served in French in the public service, especially when he is preaching every day in Quebec that that kind of equality exists which Mr. Yalden says in his report does not exist?

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (President of the Treasury Board): Madam Speaker, let me say to the hon. member that I was disturbed, and somewhat disheartened, by some of the conclusions reached by the commissioner and by what he said. But I am also heartened by many of the things which he did not say, because there have been remarkable improvements in certain areas.

With regard to some of the criticism—on pay differential, for example—if one analyses it, one finds that it is largely because English-speaking civil servants are older and in the under forty group the pay levels are the same. This kind of thing is not contained in the report. I think these are facts that should be noted. I can assure the hon. member that we are examining the report carefully, and any positive action that we can take to further the objectives of Mr. Yalden, with which we can concur, we will take.

Mr. Nystrom: The minister did not answer the question.

[Translation]

Madam Speaker, I would like to ask a supplementary question. Considering that Mr. Max Yalden has just shown that the problem is mainly one of attitude and action within the federal structure, the federal government, can the minister tell us what steps his government will take to achieve true equality between French and English in the federal government?

Mr. Johnston: Madam Speaker, as I have just said, we will do all that is within our power to ensure the application of this policy. We have to start with the senior civil servants and with management. We must impose our will because, according to the commissioner's report, it is lacking. So, Madam Speaker, we will manifest our will.

REQUEST THAT JOINT COMMITTEE ON OFFICIAL LANGUAGES BE ESTABLISHED

Mr. Serge Joyal (Hochelaga-Maisonneuve): Madam Speaker, considering the findings of the ninth report of the Commissioner of Official Languages, considering that last March the government tabled a motion in the House for the establishment of a joint committee on official languages, considering also that last December the right hon. prime minister, who is today on the opposition side, supported the establisment of such a committee, I wonder if the government House leader can tell us whether it is the government's intention of tabling a motion in the near future asking that the ninth report of the Commissioner of Official Languages be referred to a joint House-Senate committee.

Hon. Yvon Pinard (President of the Privy Council): Madam Speaker, that is an excellent suggestion which we could take up in the near future.

ALLEGED RIP-OFFS UNDER HOME INSULATION PROGRAM

Mr. John McDermid (Brampton-Georgetown): Madam Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Public Works, who is responsible for the CHIP program. Why is it that the government is allowing rip-offs to take place in the CHIP program, under which many operators are installing $350 worth of insulation no matter what size space there is to fill, be it 600 square feet or 1,600 square feet, and in most cases without any ventilation?

What is the government doing to educate and protect consumers on the process of checking out the firms they use to insulate their homes? Does the minister not agree that the program has attracted firms with no expertise whatsoever in the insulation business, because of its poor design and the lack of proper policing and administration?

Hon. Paul J. Cosgrove (Minister of Public Works): Madam Speaker, I can assure my friend that this ministry, in conjunction with the ministries of various provinces which have jurisdiction in the regulation of business operations, together with agencies and commissions such as the Metropolitan Toronto Licensing Commission—of which I was a member until coming into this House and the cabinet—is actively reviewing the problem raised by the hon. member opposite. I can assure him that we are concerned about the problem, and I hope to be able to respond later that these matters have been tightened up.

Mr. McDermid: Madam Speaker, has the minister talked with some of the small businessmen, as I have, who are going out of business and are pleading with the government to cancel the CHIP program? They are saying that because of this program, uncaring and large companies are providing poor quality insulation to the consumer. Has he investigated the possibility of establishing federal criteria for installers, and a bonding system designed to protect the consumer; and if not, why not?

Mr. Cosgrove: Madam Speaker, my initial response is that this is not a matter of jurisdiction for the federal government but, indeed, for provincial agencies responsible for business operations. However, it is something I will ask the legal branch of my ministry to investigate.

● (1440)

I would hasten to say, though, that this is the first time I have heard this protestation which the hon. member has raised, namely, that people are being put out of business. On the contrary, many, many constituents are saying that this is an excellent program and I am being urged, as the minister, to allocate additional funds in the budget to provide for expansion of the program.

Oral Questions

METRIC CONVERSION

REASON FOR CONVERTING TO METRIC SYSTEM—PARLIAMENTARY DEBATE

Mr. Bill Domm (Peterborough): Madam Speaker, in my supplementary question I would like to go back to the subject of metrication. I was pleased to hear that the Minister of State for Small Businesses is prepared to take under advisement the suggestion of a full parliamentary review on the implementation of the metric system. However, I would like to carry my supplementary question one step further.

In light of the throne speech, in which the government committed itself to putting people first and stated that it will not accept injustices, will the Minister of State for Small Businesses tell this House why we must force metric conversion on the people of Canada, considering the adverse effects that it has on business, particularly people in the food store business, and considering that it was implemented without the proper approval of Parliament, which the minister referred to in his first answer when he said that it had parliamentary approval?

Some hon. Members: Order.

Madam Speaker: Order, please. Since the hon. member for Peterborough is asking a supplementary question, will he please be more brief.

An hon. Member: He didn't have one.

Mr. Domm: Would the minister assure this House that he will introduce a bill for the implementation of the metric system in Canada before any other cities are forced to accept the metric system?

[Translation]

Hon. Charles Lapointe (Minister of State, Small Businesses): Madam Speaker, I would refer the hon. member to the Weights and Measures Act and the Consumer Packaging and Labelling Act, both passed in 1971, and I should like to tell him that the government has no intention of imposing the metric system manu militari and that it has always been the policy of the Liberal party and government of taking care of the people first, not regulations. I told him in my first answer to his question that I would review his suggestion, and I tell him the same thing now.

NATIONAL UNITY

REQUEST THAT FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL CONFERENCE BE HELD AFTER QUEBEC REFERENDUM

Hon. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Madam Speaker, I really do not know to whom I should address my question since the right hon. Prime Minister is absent. I would be inclined to put it to the former minister for federal-provincial relations, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Since the four premiers of the western provinces indicated yesterday they would oppose recognition of sovereignty-association, but as categorically as the status quo that you know so well, in the circumstances, the premiers also expressed their firm intention of making the government, which promised a renewed federalism, convene a federal-provincial conference immediately after the referendum to bring about a new constitution that could perhaps be enacted in two years, is the minister in a position today to grant the wish expressed by the western provinces and also by many Canadians?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, I would like to indicate at the outset that the Prime Minister is not in the House now because he has an important meeting with the secretary of state of the United States who is visiting in Canada today. Second, as to the hon. member's question, I am very happy to notice that the four western premiers have indicated their total disagreement with the principle of sovereignty-association. I am glad to see as well, that the hon. member for Joliette also believes that sovereignty-association must be rejected.

Mr. La Salle: The status quo, too.

An hon. Member: At last.

Mr. Lalonde: The hon. member for Joliette says he is also against the status quo. So are we and we are happy to count him among those who do.

However, I remind the hon. member that there is a referendum under way in Quebec at the present time and that it is led by a government which proposes to divide the country, to cut it in half. We will see the results of the referendum. We are confident that with the support of all federalist forces in the House and in the National Assembly of Quebec, as well as among the people of Quebec, we will register a strong victory for Canada and federalism. As for the matter raised by the hon. member, I refer him to the important speech made in this House by the Prime Minister in the debate on the Speech from the Throne. He will find the answer to his question there.

INQUIRY WHETHER GOVERNMENT WILL RECOMMEND HOLDING OF FIRST MINISTERS' CONFERENCE ON CONSTITUTION

Hon. Roch La Salle (Joliette): I am rather disappointed by the minister's answer, Madam Speaker. The Prime Minister did refer to a renewed federalism. There is, however, no detail about it. The provincial premiers have rejected Mr. Lévesque's proposition, as did this federal government as well as the minister and I agree that both the status quo and sovereignty be strongly rejected. But in light of the circumstances and in view of the lack of explanation on a renewed federalism, and knowing very well that regardless of whether the Yes or the No wins there is a pressing need for a meeting among the Prime Minister and the provincial premiers, could the minister, speaking today for the Prime Minister, at least commit himself in the interest of many people wondering about the government's real intentions toward a new constitution? Is the minister prepared at least to recommend that that conference be held with the shortest delay?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, the Prime Minister has already indicated many times in this House and elsewhere that as far as the government is concerned, we are prepared to consider a full review of the Canadian Constitution, and that what is important and fundamental for us in that consideration is that it be done on the basis of a federal regime, that the constitution be federal in nature; and, secondly, that citizens' rights, especially linguistic rights, be guaranteed in the constitution. This government is ready to negotiate.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

CONSULTATION ON PROPOSED FINANCING AGREEMENTS

Mr. Jim Manly (Cowichan-Malahat-The Islands): Madam Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. Will the minister table documents relating to the proposed new financing agreements with Indian bands and organizations as outlined in Treasury Board minute No. 763729; and will he inform the House whether these proposed agreements were developed in consultation with Indian bands and organizations?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Madam Speaker, to answer the latter part of the hon. member's question first, there have been allegations that there has not been adequate consultation with the leaders of the Indian communities and Indian bands. Therefore, I have suspended the application of the directive based on a Treasury Board minute which was sent out to the bands. It will no longer apply to the bands for a limited period of time, so that there can be further consultation to determine if, indeed, the directive should be applied.

If the directive is found to be unacceptable, then we will use the time to come up with some other arrangements. The bands are no longer subject to the directive embodied in the Treasury Board report to which the hon. member has referred.

Mr. Manly: Madam Speaker, considering that native Indian bands find the three-month suspension inadequate, and that they have expressed fear that the proposed agreements are yet another attempt by the government to implement policies from the 1969 white paper which would lead to assimilation, would the minister act to prevent further demoralization both to Indian people and to Indian Affairs personnel?

Specifically, would he assure the House that he will continue to negotiate with the Indian bands of New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island to reach a mutually satisfactory funding agreement before April 30, 1980?

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): Madam Speaker, I met with the NIB two or three days ago and the head of the provincial organization of the Indians of New Brunswick was present. I indicated fully to him, and to all the others at that time, that that is precisely what I wished to do, just as the hon. member has identified the situation.

I wish to enter into the fullest type of consultation to determine if we can come up with a solution in a joint way which would cover the real objections to these types of procedures which are embodied in the directive. I hope we can do that. I am quite optimistic that we can arrive at an agreement and that the more offensive aspects of this type of directive can be deleted.

NATIONAL UNITY

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL MEETING ON RENEWED FEDERALISM

Hon. Jake Epp (Provencher): Madam Speaker, I would like to ask a supplementary question of the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. I would prefer to direct this question to the Prime Minister, but it is supplementary to the questions asked by the hon. member for Joliette.

I am sure that all members of this House welcomed the statement by Canada's western premiers which urged an overwhelming No vote in the referendum and which favours discussions on renewed federalism. I ask the minister, is the government considering convening a meeting with the premiers for a discussion of renewed federalism shortly after the May 20 referendum date?

● (1450)

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, the referendum campaign is in progress at the present time. We will have to see what the results are. If the answer is a clear No in the referendum, we will all certainly be very happy. There will then be the possibility for all the premiers—I hope, including the premier of Quebec—to sit down and talk about the renewal of the Canadian Constitution in terms of a federal regime.

If, for some unfortunate reason, the result was to be a Yes vote in the referendum, you would end up with a situation in Quebec where you would have a government that has already indicated clearly that if it receives the mandate it is asking for, it would not be interested in debating the renewal of our Canadian Constitution.

An hon. Member: How do you know?

Mr. Lalonde: It would be interested in breaking up Canada. This has been stated, and repeated, by the premier and the minister of intergovernmental affairs for Quebec. This is why the Prime Minister has said, and repeated, that this would lead Canada into an impasse.

[Translation]

In short, a Yes vote at the referendum will result in a complete deadlock regarding the possibility of renewing Canadian federalism, for the simple reason that the Quebec government will have been given by the population of Quebec a mandate to do nothing else but try to negotiate the breakup of the country.

As a government, we have already said that we have no mandate to negotiate the breakup of this country, that we are not interested in asking for one, that our role is to preserve the country's unity and that is why we are fighting back now.

INQUIRY WHETHER GOVERNMENT WILL MAKE STATEMENT ON AMENDING CONSTITUTION

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, on a supplementary: The Prime Minister has spoken of a renewed federalism; that has stirred considerable interest among Quebeckers, as does, now, the statement of the premiers of the four western provinces, about exactly what the present federal government means by a renewed federalism.

The question put by the hon. member for Joliette was meant to let us find out whether, as the western premiers have asked, the government is willing to consider convening, immediately after the Quebec referendum, a federal-provincial conference to study the renewal of the federal system.

I should like to know whether this government will make a statement or at least give us an indication, either before or after May 20, of exactly what the renewed federalism described by the Prime Minister would entail?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, I find it amazing that the Leader of the Opposition, who had the chance of being prime minister for at least a few months, should put that question when his own party was unable to define anything at all while he was in power. Even today one wonders exactly what thesis it defends.

The question the Leader of the Opposition asked me concerns the general and constitutional policy of the government. I suggest that the answer should come from the Prime Minister himself who will be in the House before the end of question period today, or tomorrow.

INQUIRY WHETHER GOVERNMENT WILL ESTABLISH TASK FORCE ON AMENDING CONSTITUTION

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, I regret the partisan tone used by the hon. member because this matter concerns the security of Canada as a whole and is in the interest of all members of the House. As the minister suggested, we had the opportunity to govern the country and we made a lot of progress in showing the need for a renewed federalism. We also established a small task force presided over by Senator Tremblay to determine what this renewed federalism should involve. We made a firm commitment to publish our position. I now ask the minister if this government shares our view that it would be helpful for the federalist cause at least to establish a task force on the renewal of the federal system to show that the federal government is determined to consider seriously the changes requested by federalist Quebeckers and the people of western Canada.

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, I am very happy that the hon. Leader of the Opposition established this committee presided over by Senator Tremblay. We were very happy about this and we look forward to seeing the results of its work. The government does not need to establish a task force. The issue of constitutional reform is one which concerns us deeply and on which we have been working for many years. This is the responsibility of government departments, including the Department of Justice and all the people concerned in the administration of this government. This work will continue in the months and years to come.

REGIONAL DEVELOPMENT

DATE OF SIGNING ONTARIO RURAL DEVELOPMENT AGREEMENT

Mr. Keith Penner (Cochrane): Madam Speaker, I have a brief question for the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. As the minister knows, this past weekend the North Clay Belt Economic Conference was held in Kapuskasing, Ontario. One of the resolutions from that conference concerns the minister's department and its programs.

I wonder if the minister is able to tell the House when the Canada-Ontario rural development agreement will be signed. This is not a highly expensive program, but it is vital to a region like northern Ontario because of the variety of projects such an agreement would be able to assist.

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre De Bané (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Madam Speaker, I have visited this area of northeastern Ontario and, as the hon. member has stated, everyone would like the federal government to assist this region through some type of an agreement. All I can say to the hon. member is that I shall make representations to the cabinet on his behalf and on behalf of the people he represents in this House so that this unanimous request he is now supporting can receive a favourable reply.

METRIC CONVERSION

REQUEST METRIC COMMISSIONERS BE RELIEVED OF DUTIES

Mr. Gordon Towers (Red Deer): Madam Speaker, my question is to the Minister of State for Small Businesses and it is supplementary to a question asked by my colleague, the hon. member for Peterborough.

In view of the tremendous resentment against any further metric conversion in Canada, would the minister be prepared to relieve all the metric commissioners of their duties until such time as the whole issue has been amply debated in this House of Commons and a need proven for any further enforcement of that regulation?

[Translation]

Hon. Charles Lapointe (Minister of State, Small Businesses): Madam Speaker, I would like my colleagues opposite to have a somewhat longer-term vision of the economic future of this country. One has only to look at—

Mr. La Salle: A metric vision.

Mr. Lapointe (Charlevoix): A metric vision, as the hon. member for Joliette says. Maybe. One has only to look at what is being done in Australia and how the introduction of the metric system is being carried out very rapidly over there. One has only to look at the progress made in this area and in certain major industrial sectors in the United States, such as the automobile industry. I know certain Canadians find the introduction of that system difficult and we are prepared to give them all the sympathy and understanding needed so that introduction will be carried out as smoothly as possible for both consumers and users.

[English]

Mr. Towers: I wonder if the minister, through you, Madam Speaker, would answer my question. Will he fire the commissioners until there is a need proven for their presence?

[Translation]

Mr. Lapointe (Charlevoix): I think, Madam Speaker, that there is no answer to be given to such an irresponsible question.

CANADA MORTGAGE AND HOUSING CORPORATION

RENTAL HOUSING IN DOWNTOWN MONTREAL

Mrs. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Madam Speaker, my question is to the Minister responsible for Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation. Last May, CMHC purchased 720 units of rental housing in downtown Montreal with the express purpose of selling these back to residents for non-profit, co-op housing.

● (1500)

Since long delays and CMHC roadblocks have resulted in bitter disappointment and frustration for residents, can the minister tell us what he intends to do, hopefully by tomorrow, to resolve this impasse which is endangering a long-established community.

Hon. Paul J. Cosgrove (Minister of Public Works): Madam Speaker, I will indeed consider this notice and attempt to have the answer by tomorrow.

Mrs. Mitchell: Madam Speaker, I think the minister is unaware that a delegation of eight people from Montreal came to his office yesterday and has a crucial meeting tomorrow. Since, contrary to usual policy, CMHC is requiring a 50 per cent average increase in rents, which is unacceptable to local residents and will cause mass departures and convert this area to high-income housing, will the minister explain why CMHC is causing rents to jump by an average of 50 per cent, and what he intends to do about this to prevent the destruction of the Milton Park community of 2,000 moderate and low-income tenants?

Mr. Cosgrove: Madam Speaker, this problem no doubt is symptomatic of many of the problems facing the corporation for which I report to Parliament—the problem being simply one of finances. On one hand, we have the official opposition saying that we should not be increasing budgets and increasing deficits. We have to consider, on the other hand, that there are expressed needs as indicated by the question. That is the problem. We have to try to balance the means that we have available with the needs that are expressed. I can assure the hon. member that the officials of CMHC are sympathetic to these needs.

PRIVILEGE

MR. BAKER (NEPEAN-CARLETON)—TABLING OF MAIN ESTIMATES

Hon. Walter Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Madam Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. It relates to questions put to the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Johnston) and answered by him today, arising out of his statement to the House yesterday on the tabling of the main estimates. If I may say so, it is rather fundamental that the minister indicated to the House yesterday that what he was tabling were estimates, and I quote him from page 290 of Hansard:

—without any changes to reflect the policies this government is in the process of elaborating.

The lead questions to him today were designed to find out exactly what he meant by that and whether there was any explanation that he had to give to indicate that, by adopting the procedure being proposed, we would be giving the government a blank cheque with respect to the main estimates and that we would have to wait for some future time with respect to its future expenditure plans.

In the course of his statement yesterday, and he alluded to it again today, the minister indicated that there were several specific cases in which future supplementary estimates will reflect the changes in programs in these main estimates. He went on at that point to indicate that there was a $2.6 billion provision in the 1980-81 estimates for oil import compensation which was based on something that apparently is not akin or related to what the present government intends to do. He said they were reviewing the capital financing arrangements for Petro-Canada. He also said there were matters concerning the unemployment insurance program. Then he said this:

Madam Speaker, these are a few of the items which may have their main estimates funding level adjusted to reflect this government's policies and programs.

What he is really saying is that these main estimates in terms of the programs and policies of this government are absolutely meaningless. He is in effect asking Parliament to accept this process blindly. Frankly, I think it is a fetter on the rights of Parliament and the right of the public to know what the government intends to do. It is a trespassing on what I consider the legitimate concerns of members.

To cement it even further he went on to say, as reported at page 292:

They are being recommended for adoption subject to such modifications as may subsequently be made thereto through tabling supplementary estimates to give effect to policy changes which this administration may wish to introduce.

What the minister is really saying is that the consideration of the government's programs in these estimates in this House of Commons is meaningless. Frankly, I do not think we should put up with it. That is the position I take. It is about time the government realized that if there is a problem, it has to innovate some way to change it.

As reported at page 296 he said:

They do not represent an expenditure plan by this government.

Estimates are important to members of Parliament. They are either considered in this House in Committee of the Whole or in a standing committee of the House of Commons. It is only through consideration of the spending programs of the government that we can make an appropriate judgment with respect to the relevancy of those programs to the needs of Canadians. Indeed, it is the only way that members of Parliament can hold the government accountable for what it says to the Canadian people about what it intends to do.

In answer to the second question put by one of my colleagues, the minister indicated that it is always the objective of the government to fulfil this commitment with respect to maintaining a certain level of expenditures. That answer is quite different from one which he gave at the press conference. I quote from The Globe and Mail of April 23, 1980:

—Treasury Board president Donald Johnston admitted he could not predict when the Liberals might meet their election promise to hold down the annual increase in government spending to the nominal rate of increase in the gross national product.

That can have a dramatic effect on the deficit, on the administration of government programs, and on the delivery of government services to the people we represent. Quite frankly,

I do not think this Parliament should be asked to deal with a meaningless blue book, a book of figures that, in terms of this government's policy and this government's expenditure plans and programs it says it wants to put forward, is absolutely meaningless.

I raise this because it is important for Parliament in the consideration of the estimates by Parliament. I raise it for the purpose of saying to the President of the Treasury Board and to the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Pinard), whom I deal with quite amicably, that it is important before we get into this too far that there be a statement made to catch up with what has been laid out in the estimates, i.e., the plans and programs. It is important. It will be against that program, that statement of expenditure plans that we will be able to make appropriate judgments as to the propriety of the government's programs. Those are judgments we want to make. Whether the government likes them or not is irrelevant.

I raise this to give my friend, the President of the Treasury Board, an opportunity to consider a course of action which will allow him to give more precise answers to Parliament than the estimates which he tabled yesterday, and much more specific answers with respect to the questions put to him today. It is important to the people that the estimates process not be rendered meaningless and not be watered down like a number of other processes around here.

● (1510)

[Translation]

Hon. Yvon Pinard (President of the Privy Council): Madam Speaker, my hon. colleague has raised this issue as a question of privilege but I think it would have been more appropriate to have risen on a point of order. But if his purpose in rising was to make sure that the House will have the opportunity to study thoroughly both main estimates and the supplementary estimates, then I can reassure him immediately. We have had consultations together—he is aware of that—to ensure that the estimates of previous years can be reviewed by the opposition within reasonable and fair time, taking into account the two elections that took place in the last 12 months. I want to point out publicly to the House that we are prepared to allot the same period of time to the opposition parties as provided for under our Standing Orders, if these provisions could have been applied and if the estimates had been tabled on time last March 1. So I would like to give that assurance to the leaders and again to the House leader of the official opposition and I definitely see nothing wrong with what the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Johnston) did yesterday.

What the President of the Treasury Board did was to table the main estimates and he clearly said the following, as reported at page 292 of Hansard in response to a request for clarification made by the hon. member for York-Peel (Mr. Stevens), and I quote:

> They are being tabled legally as our estimates but, as I indicated, we will be bringing forward supplementary estimates to give effect to those changes—

All these supplementary estimates, Madam Speaker, are subject to consideration by committees of the House. Yesterday, after the President of the Treasury Board had tabled supplementary estimates (A) in addition to the main estimates, I presented a motion to refer these supplementary estimates to the appropriate committees of members of both sides of the House so that there be an opportunity of scrutinizing them thoroughly. So in the procedure that has been followed everything is legal and in conformity with Standing Orders 58 and 59 which are the only ones applicable and pertinent and nothing irregular has resulted from the attitude and the approach taken by the President of the Treasury Board.

This being said, Madam Speaker, again I want to assure hon. members opposite that we on the government side intend to allow them at least as much time as that which is provided for under our Standing Orders for the main and supplementary estimates, just as if the main estimates had been tabled at the proper time. My hon. colleagues are aware that we are operating under exceptional circumstances, having had to go to the people twice within a year, which does not happen every day.

We are therefore faced with the following situation: the 1979-80 estimates have never been approved by the House, and what matters even more, the 1980-81 estimates were not tabled on March 1 last as they were supposed to be under our Standing Orders, and this, for reasons which are clear. And because the main estimates were not tabled on March 1, the normal time limits for the debate on these estimates which are set under our Standing Orders cannot apply, so that we are entirely at the mercy of the opposition which, in theory, could cause the debate to drag on for years, if it wanted to, and therefore prevent the government from dealing with both the main and supplementary estimates.

I know this is not the official opposition's nor the New Democratic Party's intention. There has been in our negotiations up till now a spirit of co-operation that leads us to be optimistic that an agreement can be reached to reinstate so to speak a procedure allowing for serious consideration both of these main estimates and supplementary estimates. No dilatory consideration of course, or one that would leave the feeling that the official opposition is acting irresponsibly. I am convinced on the contrary that the official opposition will act responsibly, it will not use this truly exceptional situation to prevent Parliament from operating normally and disposing of the legislative work accumulated as a result of two successive elections in a year, as called for by His Excellency the Governor General in the throne speech last week.

This being said, Madam Speaker, I give to my hon. colleague the assurance he will have at least as much time as that provided by the Standing Orders were they applicable. This indeed is the formula we are negotiating on, and on which I am expecting an understanding from my colleague within the next two days if at all possible.

So, we will allow ample time to the official opposition, and on the other hand, the procedure followed up till now and in the future will be strictly and absolutely consistent with Standing Orders 58 and 59, which are relevant in the matter.

[English]

Hon. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Madam Speaker, the government House leader has addressed himself to some other question of privilege. He has not addressed himself to the question of privilege raised by the opposition House leader. It is not a question of how much time there is in which to study the estimates or of how much time the government House leader, in his generosity, is going to mete out to us. The question is, what are we going to study? Are we going to study estimates which the government is standing behind, or are we going to study estimates just thrown in to us like a dog to a bone, or a bone to a dog, so that we will be kept busy playing around and the government can get interim supply?

Neither the President of the Treasury Board nor the government has made it clear that these main estimates are anything but a fiction. Let me refer you, Madam Speaker, to the speech on Monday night by the effervescent Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) who is now effervescing in West Germany—I hope his message there is accepted in a better way than it was here the other night. This is what he said—I am not referring to Hansard, I am referring to the prepared speech:

> The information on the current 1980-81 fiscal outlook will serve as a supplement to the main estimates which are to be tabled tomorrow.

That is a piece of impertinence in itself, to suggest that a speech by him is going to be a supplement to the main estimates. He goes on to say that the main estimates are those prepared by the former government which were ready for printing when the present government took office. He tells us:

> It was judged best not to attempt to revise this massive compilation of expenditure figures, but to table the existing material without delay—

Why, Madam Speaker? As a basis upon which interim supply could be sought. It was a frank admission that these estimates will be brought into the House in an attempt to get interim supply through, not as estimates for 1980-81 but just as something thrown as a bone to a dog so that we can chew on it and vote interim supply while the government carries on with the real estimates, whatever those estimates are.

He went on to say:

> The expenditure figures in the fiscal forecast I am tabling are based upon the main estimates but contain, in addition,—

Then he gives his own estimates of what the outlays are likely to be. He disagrees totally with the outlays contained in these main estimates. Then, two pages further on, he says this—this is contempt, Madam Speaker; the man should be brought before the bar of this House in shackles:

> I would further like it to be understood, however, that these projections do not in any way constitute the expenditure plan or the planned financial requirements of this government for fiscal year 1980-81.

He wants us to understand that these estimates, his projections, are not in any way the expenditure plan or the planned financial requirements of the government. One loses one breath at the audacity of it. These estimates are tabled and we are baldfacedly told that they do not contain the expenditure plan for the projected financial requirements of the government. Surely we have the right to ask what are the planned financial requirements for the government, and what is the expenditure plan.

• (1520)

If the government is not recommending these estimates except in a technical sense, what are its estimates, and should this House accept estimates—they were tabled as main estimates—that two ministers frankly tell the House are not the estimates they are going to go by? We are being asked to vote money that the government is telling us in advance it is not going to spend in accordance with how we voted. Ministers are going to spend the money just as they feel they want to spend it, with no further reference to this House until they come back with supplementary estimates later in the year or next year. The bald-faced effrontery of those statements demands that this chamber rise up on its hind legs and say, "This is enough; we are not going to vote main estimates which ministers tell us do not constitute their expenditure plan, do not constitute their planned financial requirements". In other words, it is a piece of fiction which they are putting before us to get interim supply—not likely—and then ask us to co-operate in doing it.

So, Madam Speaker, if you look at what is said by the Minister of Finance and what was confirmed yesterday by the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Johnston), he could not be forced into an admission that he supported these estimates. He gave all kinds of examples of where they are going to change the estimates. In fact, they already had them changed before he tabled them. We do not know what authority he had for any of that. I do not want to give the quotations that my hon. friend has already given, but there is another quotation or two that I want to give. He could not give us answers, of course, in any event, on some of the questions that we asked him. I think that the quotations I am looking for have already been given, so I do not want to repeat that, but when he was questioned by the hon. member for Wellington-Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Beatty), he would not say that they were putting these expenditure plans forward or that—oh, here it is. Page 292:

> They are being recommended for adoption subject to such modifications as may subsequently be made thereto through tabling supplementary estimates to give effect to policy changes which this administration may wish to introduce.

I say fine, Madam Speaker. If there are policy changes not now decided upon that occur later in the year, which the government cannot foresee, then that is a proper use of supplementary estimates. They come in with supplementary estimates. They say to the House of Commons, "Sorry, members of the House of Commons and the Senate, we did not know when we put the main estimates before you that certain events were going to happen. There was a catastrophe. We did not know we had to spend money. There was a flood here, there was something unexpected there, or there is a massive change in policy on, say, the oil import subsidy program", or whatever the policy is, "and therefore we now have to ask you for forgiveness and to give us supplementary estimates". That is the procedure. You do not come in with the main estimates and say, "Disregard these main estimates; they are going to be whatever we say they are when the time comes that we feel suited to tell you what they are".

So, Madam Speaker, this is in line with the point of privilege that was before you yesterday. Because this government has a majority, it thinks it can do exactly what it likes, and what it now wants to do is to have this huge blue book referred to all the House standing committees and get all the backbenchers and members on this side busy examining the estimates and questioning the officials. Then the lordly ministers will come down every once in a while with their satraps around them or whatever, the flapdoodlers. They are experts. They will come in, the swarms, like they are going to the hive. They are honey bees, queen bees. The swarms of advisers will come down occasionally. We will spend all our time questioning them on these estimates, and after we are through with all that and report back and they are passed by the House, while this is going on they are back in their offices changing the estimates all around because these are not their main estimates.

So what is the point of our having these estimates referred at all to any of these committees? The parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Finance is one of the worst offenders. He is already busy changing these estimates, and his minister has admitted it, so for them to come before this House in this disgraceful manner—it was not bad enough that they disrupted and ruptured the whole budgetary process; they are now gouging the whole system of considering estimates, and we have to appeal to you, Madam Speaker, for protection and to put a stop to this.

When the House leader goes on about how much time he is going to give, we want time to consider real estimates. We do not want time to consider fictional estimates. We want time to consider the government's real spending plans. That is what we want the time for.

Just look at the outrageous speech of the Minister of Finance, who has gone off now ringing the gong in Munich, or whatever he is doing in Munich. I hope it is only a gong he is ringing. He said that he wants us to understand that the projections do not in any way constitute the expenditure plan or the planned financial requirements of this government. "Do not in any way", Madam Speaker. Well, of all the brazen effrontery that has ever been put before a House of Commons, that takes the cake, and that is why we bring up this point of privilege, and that is why we ask you, Madam Speaker, to consider this, as I know you will, extremely seriously with the other piece, the other—for whom the bell tolls. The bell is tolling for this House of Commons in this session and in the next four years, because already in the House we are here only six days and two of our cherished traditions have been done away with.

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Wellington-Dufferin-Simcoe): Madam Speaker, I would have deferred to the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Johnston), but I want to say a few words in support of the position taken by my two colleagues.

There is no more fundamental right and responsibility of Parliament than control of the public purse. This very institution developed because of a concern among the people of Britain that proper control over the public purse was not being exercised. This is the central function which we, as parliamentarians, are asked to discharge as part of our responsibilities.

What the government has done by putting forward estimates that it will not stand behind, and which it disavowed any responsibility for at the very time they were tabled, has been to make a mockery of our attempts to discharge our responsibilities on behalf of our constituents. What happened yesterday when the President of the Treasury Board tabled the 1980-81 estimates was that he not only denied paternity but also disinherited the child at the same time. He said in the course of his remarks that there were going to be substantial changes made. He made it very clear that these estimates did not constitute the spending plan of this government. My colleagues have quoted that statement on his part.

Madam Speaker, if you take a look at Hansard pages 290 and 291 yesterday, you will find that fully one-half of the minister's remarks were designed to indicate changes that he intended to make from these estimates and to indicate why these estimates did not represent the spending intentions of the government. He concluded that section by saying, and I quote:

> Madam Speaker, there are a few of the items which may have their main estimates funding level adjusted to reflect this government's policies and programs.

Clearly, the implication of that is that this is only a portion of the changes, and that what Parliament knows about today when it is asked to approve this blue book of estimates is only a portion of the changes which this government intends to make. So I ask you, Madam Speaker, how can we be called upon to discharge our responsibility to guard the public purse when the estimates which are being presented to us are patently phony, even on the basis of the testimony of the minister who introduces them?

When I tried to question the President of the Treasury Board to ask him what the spending plans of the government are—because this is central at the time we are approving the estimates; what else are the estimates for?—his response today was to refer me to the statement by the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) two days ago. Well, in that statement the Minister of Finance expressly said that that statement did not constitute the spending plans of the government either.

The central question here is, what are the estimates? What is the purpose of estimates? If we cannot get the spending plans of the government from the estimates, where does Parliament get them? What is our job? What is our responsibility? What is the point of these estimates we are being asked to approve? What does the government intend to do with the money we approve if we go ahead on the basis of these estimates which hon. members opposite themselves say are false and do not represent their spending plans?

The issue which my colleague, the House leader, was raising, was not that which was raised by the government House leader, a question of how much time we would have to examine these estimates. We want adequate time, but the central question is this: are the documents being put before the House? Is the recommendation coming at the request of the President of the Treasury Board for the appropriation of funds meaningful, or are we being asked to appropriate funds for programs which this government already has no intention of carrying out?

I submit that unless there is some candour shown by the government very soon in terms of indicating what its full spending plans are and in terms of setting for us a target for its spending for this year—because that is what the estimates are designed to do—if the government does not do that, Parliament is rendered meaningless and irrelevant, and there is no way we can continue to consider estimates which, on the testimony of the minister presenting them, are false.

That is the central issue here, and it is one to which the President of the treasury board has the responsibility to address himself. When will he be candid with this Parliament? When will he table the government's spending plan? When will he in fact give us the information that is essential before we are asked to approve one penny of the spending estimates which are before us today?

These estimates would have been relevant if the budget of the former minister of finance had been passed on December 13, instead of being defeated. If we had not had an election on February 18, these estimates would have been relevant. But all of that has happened, and this government indicates that it does not stand by these estimates, that they do not represent its spending plans, which means then that before ministers ask us to appropriate the funds for which they are asking they have a responsibility to level with the Canadian people and with Parliament, and say what in fact their spending plans are. That they have not done, Madam Speaker.

● (1530)

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (President of the Treasury Board): Madam Speaker, I find that this whole performance by my friends in the opposition to be quite extraordinary. This righteous indignation is coming from the hon. members who last year retabled the estimates which had been tabled by the Liberal administration in the spring—they retabled them in the autumn. I do not have the specific statement made by the then president of the treasury board in front of me, but my recollection is that all he said was that he was tabling these estimates and that he had no comment to make.

When I tabled the estimates yesterday, I said that we were recommending their adoption, subject to certain changes, and I tried to give the opposition every indication of which way we would be moving.

These estimates are not at all irrelevant. I realize that the gentlemen opposite were not in government for any great length of time, nor have I been, but at leat I know that the process of developing main estimates is one which extends over even more than one year. So it is perfectly obvious that these estimates have validity and that they should be adopted subject to the kind of modifications which we will be bringing forward.

When the hon. member for Wellington-Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Beatty) says to us that these estimates would have been relevant had the budget put forward by the former minister of finance been adopted, I say to you, Madam Speaker, that that is an interesting observation because a number of events have taken place since that night in December which would have made these main estimates, in their view, also outdated and outmoded, for several reasons.

First of all, as I think I indicated earlier, subsequent to the budget address there was an oil price increase. The oil price increase wiped out the so-called reserve to which reference was made by the former president of the Treasury Board yesterday, and, accordingly, the $58.4 billion projection—which was a projection and did not represent the estimates—became irrelevant. Subsequently they would have been faced with further oil price increases and public debt charge increases, and all of these would have had to be taken into account in the very hypothetical situation of their having been returned to power. It would have been necessary for them to bring forward supplementary estimates at the time of tabling the main estimates, and it would have been necessary for them to bring forward supplementary estimates during the course of the year.

In fact, it seems to me that we have been particularly candid in indicating in the message which I delivered yesterday, in my capacity as President of the Treasury Board, the specific areas in which we would hope to make particular and important policy decisions and changes. The guaranteed income supplement is one, and hon. members opposite are fully aware of it.

I must say that I find this performance extraordinary, in light of their own established precedents last year and in light of the fact that this government was elected on February 18 and we have already tabled these estimates. Obviously we have had no opportunity to make technical amendments to estimates of this size and complexity which have been developed over a multi-month period. I find no basis for the seeking of privilege, or for their protest, or for whatever comes forward from my hon. friends opposite. It seems to me that we have been candid. We have given a full explanation, we have tabled the estimates in a timely manner, and, as the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Pinard) has indicated, opposition members will have ample time to consider these estimates in committee. The President of the Privy Council has given that commitment to the opposition.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Ron Huntington (Capilano): Madam Speaker, I just wanted to offer a few comments in reply to the comments of the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Johnston). There is an essential difference between us. The former president of the treasury board in the previous government tabled the estimates as our spending plans. That is, the estimates were the spending plans of the previous government. The plans the present President of the Treasury Board tabled in the House yesterday are not, on the admission of both the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) in his speech, and of the President of the Treasury Board, the spending plans of this government. Therefore, they attack, as my colleague, the hon. member for Wellington-Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Beatty) has said, the very basis of supply.

Just what is it we are being asked to study and on which we are being asked to deliver comment and opinion? There is a fundamental difference between what was done by the former president of the treasury board in tabling the estimates at that time without comment, and the estimates that have been tabled with major comment and qualification from two senior ministers in the present government. I think that is an essentiel point, Madam Speaker, that you have to consider in deliberating on this important question.

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Madam Speaker, I have just a comment on this matter. It is a pretty serious matter that this House is being asked to consider, followed by committee consideration. We are already asked to consider something that will not in fact be the spending plans of the government. The President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Johnston), however, says that there will be minor alterations. Therefore, it should be possible for him, I expect, to table immediately amendments, or an addendum to his tabling yesterday of the blue book, indicating the alterations.

I can understand why he would not want to go through the problems of printing and segregating by page and reference number the details in that monster telephone book we call the blue book, but surely it would be possible for him to provide us with an addendum, not a supplement, so that we could really see what the spending plans of this government are. If they are what he says they are, that is, only minor alterations, small changes in interest expense of a billion dollars or so, small changes in the cost of oil subsidy of maybe a couple of billion dollars, then it should be possible for him surely to table addenda to this blue book so that the committees of the House can study the estimates properly and know what the spending plans of the government are. But he does not seem to want to do that. He says that here is something that was prepared back in December, that it does not mean anything, that they are not going to follow it, that they have changed their direction, that they defeated the budget of December 11.

The President of the Treasury Board says he does not stand behind the estimates completely and that they are subject to change. If they are subject to change, and if he wants the House to study them here and in committee, if he does not want to waste the time of members of Parliament, and if he wants to treat Parliament honestly, then surely he will come clean with Parliament and, before these estimates go to the committee, he will give us an addendum to them. The tabling he did yesterday is clearly wrong. I cannot see how members of Parliament can be asked to study something that the government itself says is wrong. If the government says that it is wrong, then the government should point out the corrections. Clearly there will be changes.

• (1540)

These estimates were prepared in December, and there has been an election in the interval. The government has clearly indicated a totally new direction for Canada. The spending that Parliament is being asked to approve on that new direction for Canada, surely should be reflected in the changes filed with the work that was done last fall. We appreciate the problem in preparing estimates. We are not trying to hold the House up; we are not trying to hold the government up. But we want some honesty from them, just some simple honesty. As members of Parliament, we will have to study the estimates. Surely we want to study what the government really intends to spend.

[Translation]

Madam Speaker: It seems to me that the House is entering into a debate on a grievance related to the validity of the estimates. There will be other opportunities to discuss this matter in the House when a supply order is tabled. I must therefore conclude that there is no prima facie question of privilege, and with the consent of the House, I shall now proceed to call the orders of the day.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

IMMIGRATION ACT, 1976

MEASURE TO INCREASE LOANS TO IMMIGRANTS

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Employment and Immigration) moved that Bill C-2, to amend the Immigration Act, 1976, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Labour, Manpower and Immigration.

Mr. Knowles: Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order with respect to Bill C-2. I believe it is appropriate for me to say that there was some discussion about the possibility of our dealing with this bill after second reading in Committee of the Whole rather than sending it to the Standing Committee on Labour, Manpower and Immigration. Speaking for our party, I may say that if that proposal were made we would agree to it.

Mr. Pinard: Madam Speaker, certainly we have no objection if it is proceeded with in that manner and the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Baker) agrees.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Madam Speaker, there have been those discussions, and we are prepared to deal with the bill in that way. I think it is eminently sensible.

Madam Speaker: The House has heard the suggestion. Is the House prepared to make an order by unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion amended.

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Employment and Immigration) moved that Bill C-2, to amend the Immigration Act, 1976, be read the second time and referred to the Committee of the Whole.

Madam Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Madam Speaker: Accordingly Bill C-2 stands referred to the Committee of the Whole, and I do now leave the chair.

Mr. Nielsen: Madam Speaker, that was not the intent. The usual course, if I might suggest, would be to debate second reading, and at the end of that debate the bill is referred to the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): That is correct.

Mr. Nielsen: I believe that would be the proper way to proceed.

Mr. Knowles: The minister was slow at getting up.

Madam Speaker: I want to inform the House that nobody stood up. If the House wishes to debate second reading, I will now recognize the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen).

Mr. Knowles: The minister should stand up.

Madam Speaker: The hon. Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Axworthy).

Mr. Axworthy: Madam Speaker, I apologize for my tardiness in that I did not rise to my feet. It is one of those afternoons, but I thank other hon. members of the House for their agreement to move this particular measure along with some dispatch. While it is simple in its purpose and intent, it is very urgent in its result and consequence. Bill C-2 is something which has been required for a long time and without its passage it would result in very severe consequences for the refugee program in this country.

Simply what the bill intends to do is to raise the loans ceiling in the immigration loans fund from the present level of $20 million to $60 million. As members will know, the loans fund goes back a long time in terms of the immigration programs of this country, back to about 1951. The basic principle of it is that the Government of Canada sets up a revolving loans fund and advances moneys to refugees and immigrants coming to this country to help pay for their transportation, and those funds are then repaid.

I am pleased to report to the House that over that period the return and repayment factor has been exceedingly high, somewhere in the neighbourhood of 95 per cent. Thus, the revolving loans fund has proven its validity and its soundness as a financial measure, and carries with it very little extra cost to the government. The only extra cost is encountered in terms of the actual money that we borrow to advance to refugees, which is lent to them at no cost during the time of repayment. But I would hasten to add that the repayment is exceedingly quick and that the turn around time is very little time at all.

● (1550)

I would like to illustrate that by the example of a letter I received from Mr. John Derkson, who is a representative of the Mennonite Brethren in my own province of Manitoba, and who has been very active in the sponsorship of refugees. He sent me a note with a letter he received from one of the refugees who had received a loan from our fund, and pointed out that in a mere four months from his arrival in Canada that particular refugee had paid back the entire sum of the $750 loan we advanced him. That is only illustrative of the general pattern of responsibility and obligation that those who receive loans from this fund have shown.

An hon. Member: It just happens to be in your constituency.

Mr. Axworthy: It just happens to be in my constituency, as the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) illustrates.

We have to increase the ceiling at this point in time, Mr. Speaker, because of the substantial numbers of additional refugees who have been brought into this country since 1979. In saying that I would pay some tribute to my predecessor who did initiate the refugee program in 1979 and was able to establish the program of matching grants to induce and provide a strong incentive for a very large contribution by the private, voluntary sector in this country. In fact I would say that what we have witnessed in Canada over the past years, in terms of the enormous outpouring of generosity by private Canadians through church organizations and voluntary organizations, is one of the great success stories in this country.

The reason we have added to those numbers is just to go back to the original formula established by my predecessor, where there would be some degree of equity or matching between government and private sponsors. It is our feeling that we want to encourage the continuation of that kind of generosity and contribution the private sector, or the volunteer sector, has been giving us in helping us deal with the very vast and major refugee problems which will continue to plague this world, and in respect of which our own country can be of major assistance.

As a consequence of those additional 60,000 refugees coming from South Vietnam, obviously the loan fund was over-extended. For the past several months in order to maintain the program, during the time of dissolution, the election, and delay in Parliament being called, the program has had to be operated under the requirement of warrants by the government. Because Parliament is now sitting, the time within which we can ask for a warrant will expire sometime in early May. Therefore I want to point out to members the urgency of moving this bill through as quickly as possible.

If we are not able to pass it and raise the ceiling in order to bring the loan fund up to its proper maximum, this would mean substantial cancellation of the airlift that is presently going on. It would mean we would have to break many commitments with the chartered airlines, and it would mean that the entire refugee program would be severely disrupted over that period of time, and would not provide the continuity that is required. What that does in terms of damaging our reputation internationally is obvious. I think far more severe is what it does in terms of the opportunity to provide continued placement of refugees in this country. Therefore I would say it is very important for this House to treat the matter with expedition and dispatch.

I would say to those members in this House who want to use this as an opportunity to raise greater questions about the direction and thrust of refugee programs and immigration policy, I personally welcome that kind of contribution, and it has certainly been my intention, and the intention of the government, to review the over-all question of refugee programs. I hope to come to grips with a larger and more comprehensive commitment so that we will not simply be forced into ad hoc responses year after year. This is something that will provide a program that will incorporate the newfound contribution of the voluntary sector with our own efforts as a government. I would hope that any comments of that kind could be restrained and perhaps restricted until another time, certainly on estimates or when we make statements in the House, because I think the urgency of getting this bill through is so great that such a debate, which I would welcome and in fact invite, might be delayed until a somewhat later date. In saying that, I will follow my own advice and recommend this measure to the House. It is an important measure, its urgency is great, and I hope that we will be able to dispatch it within this day's sitting.

Mr. Chris Speyer (Cambridge): Thank you, very much, Mr. Speaker, for recognizing me.

There has not been a large measure of agreement throughout this session, at least from where I sit, but I suggest that this is one of those occasions when we are happy to co-operate with what the minister suggests in terms of the urgency of this bill and the appropriateness of it, in terms of it being a constructive measure.

May I say that many of the assertions made by the minister are in fact correct. The loan program has been a constructive and useful vehicle. We know there has been repayment on a prompt basis, and the statistics, as I understand them, show almost 95 per cent in terms of repayment.

I also point out that it is necessary, in terms of the expenses which have increased dramatically since the last time, to support it. The summation of what I am really saying is that we constructively support this bill.

I will be reasonably brief, but there are a couple of comments I would like to make about immigration and immigration policy generally. Immigration policy, and especially the levels of immigration into Canada, represent one of the most sensitive and important social issues that this House will have to face. It is important, as with any issue, that we understand what are the facts. Before we can come to any type of reasoned conclusion, it is important that we all take the time to ascertain what are the correct facts.

Many people in Canada, and many people in this House, would be surprised to know that in 1978 net immigration into Canada was less than 15,000 people. I myself found that astonishing, and people I have spoken to since have found that to be astonishing. This is something I think many people should understand.

The second thing I should like to point out to other members in this House has regard to the fact that we should have some sense of realism as to the capacity of the country to absorb the numbers of people who come into the country. The refugee program, which I am happy to say my predecessor implemented, is an imaginative program. It is a program that brought a spirit of generosity to it. It is a program that I wholly support and endorse. I do point out and caution that, no matter what good will exists within this House, there have to be certain realistic limitations as to what this country can absorb. I think there will be a day when we can debate exactly what those limits are.

The final matter I should like to bring to the attention of this House is contained in the annual report to Parliament for 1980, which was tabled in November of last year. On reading the levels of immigration, in particular at page 28, I was somewhat amazed to find that between 1974 and 1978 the family class category of admission of immigrants had risen from 24.8 per cent to 53.5 per cent. Over that same period the independent category of people had dropped from 50.8 per cent to 25.6 per cent. There is no doubt that in certain of the western provinces there is a need for skilled people. I hope that at some point in time we will have an opportunity to debate whether the program should be more balanced. We should have an opportunity to discuss whether we should have more independent people who have trades and come in by merit, or at least reassess the balance in respect of the family category.

I know there is some urgency in getting this matter through, and in the interest of brevity I will conclude my remarks. Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker.

● (1600)

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I rise on behalf of my party to support the principles enunciated in this bill. My party has done so on each occasion such a bill has been brought forward.

I have been looking at the record of Canada in the area of immigration. It is a record which, I believe, cannot be matched by any of the other industrialized countries of the world. Since the end of the World War II, over 4.5 million people have come to Canada as immigrants or refugees. I am happy with that fact and the fact that, unlike the period just before and just after World War II, the immigrants who have come to Canada have not only been from northern Europe and western Europe, but from all parts of the world, areas such as southern Europe, Africa, Asia, the West Indies, and South America. They are not just people who are white Anglo-Saxon protestants, but people from all races and of all religions.

My party is also proud of the fact that in every one of the recent crises in which refugees have been driven from their countries, whether it was Hungary, Czechoslovakia, Poland, Uganda, Chile or, as it has been for the last couple of years, from the Indo-Chinese countries, Canada has been in the forefront in accepting and in willingness to accept these refugees.

I do not wish to prolong the debate, but my party is happy with the fact that the Immigration Act which we now have recognized refugees as an admissible category, that procedures have been established for the selection of refugees abroad, and that there is a procedure in Canada for applying for refugee status. These applications are now considered by the Refugee Status Advisory Committee. We are also happy with the fact that Canada has ratified the United Nations Convention on Refugees. We are not happy with the fact that we have not incorporated all of the provisions of that convention in our own legislation. My party believes that the time has come for Canada to reconcile our acceptance of the UN convention with our laws and regulations with regard to immigration.

We approve of this bill because, as the minister has said, there are a large number of refugees who have come to Canada, and more who will be coming, and because money is needed to help these people resettle. We join with the minister and with the official opposition in expressing our satisfaction with the way in which the refugees and immigrants have been fitted into this country once they have arrived. This has been demonstrated to a large extent by the number of these people, 95 per cent or more, who have repaid the loans advanced to them to assist them in resettling in Canada.

Having said that, I would like to say to the minister, as I said on the occasion a bill of this type was last debated in 1967 and on other occasions, that I think it is time that we look at the practical problems which we face in Canada, partly as a result of our constitution. It is the federal government—this minister and his department—which decides how many people will be allowed into Canada, from where they will come, and who will come.

As I look at the immigration figures, I cannot help but be amazed at the wide fluctuations between them. Let me give a few illustrations to indicate what has happened. In 1967 222,000 people were permitted to come into Canada. Just three years later in 1970 that figure dropped to 147,000 people. Then in 1974 it went up to 218,000 people, and in 1978 the figure was down again to 86,000 people. The hon. member for Cambridge (Mr. Speyer) put the number much lower. He must have deducted the people who left the country from the people who came into the country.

These figures denote a very pragmatic policy, and that is putting it nicely. It certainly does not indicate that we have made much progress toward a well thought out consistent policy to which we could adhere from year to year. I recognize that the question of immigration and of permitting refugees to enter this country is a very sensitive question and brings out very conflicting emotions. On the one hand there are people who have arrived fairly recently and who still have friends and relatives in the countries from which they came. Naturally, they want their friends and relatives to come to this country.

On the other hand, there are many people in this country whose parents, grandparents or great grandparents may indeed have been immigrants to this country, but they are now looking at the one million people who are unemployed and saying to their members of Parliament that we ought to go slow on the number of immigrants we permit to enter the country. As long as we have that kind of unemployment, it will be difficult to get a real consensus on this question. I suggest to the minister that in order to develop a policy which will meet with the approval of a very substantial majority of Canadians, we must move away from the kind of economic situation which we are in now with one million people unemployed.

I would like to deal with one specific point before I sit down, and that is with regard to the problem of the federal government being in control of deciding how many people will come to Canada. The federal government also decides what countries these people will come from, but I do not disagree with that. I am very happy with the fact that so many of the immigrants in recent years have come from countries in which the official languages were not either English or French, the official languages of Canada.

Once these people get to Canada, and because education is the responsibility of the provinces, the federal government to a large extent forgets about these people. This, I feel, is a serious defect in our system. I say this because people who cannot speak the language will not only find it difficult, if not impossible, to obtain jobs, but will find it difficult to live in Canada except in a very closed society.

The minister grew up in the part of Winnipeg which I represent, and I am certain that he is not surprised when I say that I still meet people, particularly women, in their sixties and seventies, who have been in Canada for 30, 40 or 50 years and who still cannot speak English. Even if they can speak a little English, they are not comfortable with the language. These people came to Canada at a time when their husbands worked 60, 70 and even 80 hours a week. As a result, they have lived in their little communities and have not become familiar with the language.

Canada has done better in this area in recent years than it did 40 or 50 years ago. We now have programs which encourage people to learn the language and to learn a great deal more about Canada. However, these programs are far from covering all the needs.

On Monday of this week the Ottawa Citizen published a story headed, "Boat People Strive to Overcome Aches". The story goes on to say:

> Their tales vary from loneliness and discouragement to pride and achievement.
>
> For a handful of the Vietnamese boat people, the burdens of settling into the Canadian lifestyle have resulted in bouts of alcoholism and in a few cases, wife-beating.
> But most of them agree with social agencies that their key frustrations are learning English or French, finding a job to support their families—

I know that there are programs and that the federal government pays for a certain number of people to take courses in a second language, either English or French, but the numbers for which the federal government pays are far short of the numbers who wish to take these courses. This is particularly true of married women who are not going out to find jobs and who are staying home. I say this is a very serious matter. Morally we have no right to put that burden on the provincial governments or on the municipalities.

Some years ago, I believe back in 1967 when we were discussing this matter, I pointed out that the city of Toronto estimated that it would cost that city $1.5 million a year to provide programs to educate the children in the Toronto schools who did not speak English at home. But now more than 50 per cent of the students attending schools in Toronto come from immigrant families where the language at home is not English. This has created tremendous problems in Toronto.

In my own city of Winnipeg—as I am sure the minister knows—where we have not experienced the number of immigrants as have cities such as Vancouver and Toronto, there are many classes in the core area where the majority of students are either from immigrant families or native families who do not speak English at home. This is a very serious problem for the people of Winnipeg as it is for the people in every city where this situation arises. I do not want to prolong the debate, Mr. Speaker, but I do want the minister to take note that at the appropriate time we certainly do intend to pursue this and other questions which we feel are very important if we are to look forward to a time when immigrants who have come to Canada will be able to fit into our society and play their full role.

Mr. Peter Stollery (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State and Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, I will be very brief because I know we all want to have this bill passed quickly this afternoon. However, I would like to make one or two points because it is our first opportunity in some time to discuss a few immigration questions that have been building up because of some steps that have been taken resulting from the green paper discussion of a few years ago, and resulting from the long and interesting hearings that went on regarding the new Immigration Act.

First, I think we all agree with Bill C-2, and the question of raising the limits for assistance to refugees is something that we all support. I publicly supported the previous government's program last year when it was first introduced. My position has not changed since. I think the program to bring in the southeast Asian refugees was consistent with Canada's approach to refugee problems. There will be more and more refugees in this era of world conflict in which we live, and I hope that the present government will be generous in its assistance to future refugee movements.

I believe it was this week when the minister announced that he was bringing in some of the people from the Peruvian embassy in Havana. I think he should be congratulated for that move.

On the broader question of our immigration policy, and the point raised by the hon. member who spoke a few moments ago, we learned at the committee hearings in the fall that the net intake of immigrants into Canada in the past 12 months was less than 15,000 people. Those of us who learned about that when the figure was made public in the fall were shocked.

Members of the House should again question a system that, in my view, has become so inflexible that it is impeding the growth of this country. I do not think a net intake of immigrants into Canada of 15,000 is enough to keep this country growing.

In my own area, the inner city of Toronto, I have noticed the effects the halt on immigration is having on small businesses, on the construction industry, on the appliance industry, and on all of the manufacturing jobs that were doing very well in the sixties and the early part of the seventies. I think it can be argued that the reduction in some of these areas is directly due to the fact that we now have such a small movement of immigrants into Canada. In my view, it is having grave consequences to large elements of our manufacturing sector.

I know that we do not want to go on too long this afternoon, but I am using this opportunity to flag a few of the things that I think we should be looking at as this Parliament progresses.

The hon. member who spoke earlier mentioned that the independent class over the past few years has become smaller in proportion to the family class. Certainly in the evidence that was presented to the various committees during our hearings, it was clear that people in the Department of Immigration were very concerned about it. Personally I think that we have to remember that members of the family class who come to Canada have to comply with occupational demand requirements. I think we tend to forget that. A person cannot come to Canada unless that person is a direct member of the immediate family, unless that person complies with occupational demand requirements. The problem has been that the occupational demand requirements are very stiff and inflexible.

The occupational and area demand report, that I believe is published four times a year by the department, say—for those who may have forgotten or who are not aware—that no matter what you do, what qualifications you have, or no matter what kind of contribution you can make in terms of being an industrious person who has abilities, if your particular occupation is rated zero, on a scale from zero to 15 in occupational demand in Canada, you are automatically excluded. That is the reason we have had only a net immigration flow into Canada of less than 15,000 people. I suspect that most members of this House would never be able to come into Canada under the current immigration requirements, in fact I doubt if 5 per cent of members of the House of Commons would be allowed into Canada as landed immigrants under the current regulations.

In the search for a system we have effectively stopped the kinds of people who traditionally made the immigrant movement into Canada—enterprising people, people with a sense of adventure who always came to Canada because they were fed up with where they were. They had something to offer but they did not know what. They just set out, and by the millions made good in Canada. They contributed to the Canadian life and in a major way to the Canadian economy. We have now said to those people,"Stay home, you cannot come to Canada." That has very serious implications.

The attitude is all very well if someone says that because we have unemployment in Canada, we cannot bring in more people. However, the problem with that argument is that it does not point out that many of the people who are employing Canadians are people who were immigrants. They create jobs. The argument should be made that they create more jobs than they take away from Canadians and others in this country.

The system has to be reviewed. It has gone much too far in restricting the movement of enterprising people into Canada. In fact it has not only restricted but stopped it. It has made it zero. The large immigrant movement into Canada in the seventies has resulted in a tremendous contribution to the Canadian economy. We have now put a stop to that. I hope that hon. members, the minister and the officials will take note, look into this question, and use a little more common sense than saying to those who would make good Canadians, with their initiative and sense of adventure, that we do not want them. I do not think that is very good.

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Mr. Speaker, the use of funds loaned to people who are immigrants into Canada, whether they are independent immigrants—and I have had instances of loans in those cases—or whether they are refugees, has been a good investment for Canada. It is the kind of thing that Canada has done for a long time. Away back in pioneer days immigrants to this country were given assistance by our government, sometimes in terms of just a cow or a horse or some farm equipment. Helping a person to come to this country is important. The history of these loans has been that the vast majority of them have been instantly repaid. Therefore this has been a first class program, and the extension of it to $60 million is very appropriate.

The bill before us gives us an opportunity that we have not had for some time, namely, to say a few words with respect to immigration. It is important for members of Parliament. Mississauga is a city that has a great number of people who were born in other countries. Indeed, our city probably has people from every land in the world, not just nominal representatives but great numbers of people with different ethnic origins, cultures, and backgrounds. Therefore the whole question of immigration and how it is handled is important to the people of my city.

The community dialogue that I sent to my constituents last March dealt entirely with immigration. As the replies to this questionnaire are received, I will be sending the material to the minister. I thought that today I would give the minister what we found in an analysis of the first 1,000 replies to that questionnaire, some of the problems raised by my constituents, and some of their attitudes.

It is important that we look at the question of immigration. How this or any other government handles immigration must depend on the feelings of those already here, particularly the feelings of those in a riding that is very much made up of immigrants. Their feelings and how they feel about further immigrants are something that must be considered in handling the whole matter of immigration into Canada.

Something I find very difficult is the fact that people somehow feel that their member of Parliament has great influence with the immigration minister. Indeed, last Saturday alone three sets of constituents came to see me on immigration matters. I do not think a week goes by that I do not write a letter to the minister. My executive assistant is probably on the phone to our immigration offices almost daily. Therefore this whole problem has to be resolved.

Some things must be done within the ministry. Some things should be done about the way it handles the over-all quota system required under the act. We should try to change the attitude of subjectiveness held by some people. My constituents firmly believe that the immigration officer who made the decision either liked them, did not like them, somebody had pull, somebody had drag, or that I, as a member of Parliament, could do something about it. I can assure them all I like. I certainly assured them in my newsletter that a member of Parliament might be able to tell them what the law is and to some extent the occupational demand and so on, but there is really not much I can do with respect to determining their points under the point system. Nonetheless the feeling persists, particularly for people who wish to bring their relatives to Canada.

The reason the number of family sponsored immigrants is up so dramatically is that the young, aggressive person wanting to come here as an independent may be turned down, but when it is a family matter, the family here and the immigrant in the other country keep pressing and eventually figure out how to accumulate the magic number of points in order to come here. It may well be the persistence of family sponsored immigrants that led to the situation where in 1978, 74.3 per cent of the immigrants were family sponsored whereas only 25.6 per cent were independent immigrants.

I agree with the hon. member for Spadina (Mr. Stollery) that the independent immigrant who comes here to create and build in Canada, who has the pioneering instinct to come out on his own, is probably the kind of immigrant that will create a new industry and new opportunity for Canadians. That type of immigrant may not come in with the exact occupational skills we want, but his entrepreneurial abilities would go a long way toward creating jobs in this country.

There is another matter that must be brought to the attention of the minister. I am sure he knows about this because I wrote to him only yesterday. I refer to the way certain immigration offices throughout the world operate. I may be telling tales out of school about key immigration officials from the Toronto area, particularly Mississauga, but I am told, and I know from my own experience, that if you have a problem with the office in New Delhi or with the office in Port of Spain, forget it, because even telexes sent from the ministry itself to the ministry's own offices do not get answered. People can wait to be interviewed for two and three years; they will get no response to letters written, and clearly this creates social problems.

I am going to get into the question of ethnic origin and all the rest of it because I believe we have to pay attention to what people think. It may well be there is a hidden or isolated quota system in each office around the world and that the way to enforce a quota system is through bureaucratic delay. If that is the case, it is totally reprehensible. I have discussed this matter with all sorts of immigrant groups and it would not be reprehensible to them if they were to know in advance that the quota for the New Delhi office was 1,000 or 2,000, or whatever it was, and that once that office had accepted that number of people, no matter how it was arrived at, whether they were family sponsored or whatever, that office had fulfilled its function for the year and if you wanted to apply you had to wait until the following year or until there was a quota open for that office.

The global quota which, this year, is 120,000, seems like a lot, but in fact it may not be that many. It seems there is a tendency among our people, the constituents I represent—and I am speaking today almost entirely on behalf of my constituents, and I am not necessarily giving all of my own views, although some of mine are certainly included—to feel that certain offices are being used to ration, if you like, the Third World people who want to come here.

Getting into the question of ethnic origins, I did ask these questions in the questionnaire and I think the minister would be interested in the answers. I think we should look into the balance of how our population is made up. That is the kind of response I have received from people from China, from Kampuchea, from India, Pakistan, Uganda and so on. They say the same thing: we have got to keep some sort of balance in the country. That is not a racist remark; it is a question of how they have perceived the country to be made up. I think the minister should seriously consider publishing a breakdown of his quota, allowing certain percentages for each office so that people may know where they can apply and, if they have to come from one part of the world to that office. It certainly would lessen the difficulties encountered by members of Parliament in trying to get an answer out of an office which does not seem to want to reply.

Dealing with the criteria the minister follows at the present time under the act, there seem to be basically three criteria.

One, of course, is family unification. A second would be manpower needs in Canada and then, as the minister is aware, there is special provision for refugees, the ones we are taking from the Vietnam area and certain refugees from certain countries in Latin America plus self-exiled people who happen to come here from one of the communist countries. I sent all those details out to my constituents and received some interesting replies.

First of all, people in urban Canada have a perception that there are too many people coming into the country. As was pointed out by the hon. member for Cambridge (Mr. Speyer), maybe there are a lot coming in but there are a lot going out. The net result, as was pointed out, was only 15,000 this year. When I asked my constituents whether they thought 120,000 was too high or too low or just about right, 13 per cent of them said it was too low, 25 per cent said it was about right, and 62 per cent said it was too high. That may be a question of communication by the department because as was pointed out by the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow) it may be that the perception that immigration is too high may be a bad communication problem by the ministry and by those involved in immigration, by those looking at the demographic requirements of Canada.

As was pointed out by the hon. member for Cambridge, the net figure may be ridiculously low. Nonetheless, the percentage by people in Mississaugua is on those lines. No less than 62 per cent say that the figure of 120,000 allowed in under the present quota is too high. The minister must bear in mind that this perception is what really counts when we are trying to govern a country, and questions of immigration do, of course, bring out the whole problem of the integration and multicultural attitudes of our society.

It may seem strange, but the overwhelming proportion of people replying said that the manpower requirement was number one. Some people said that if we do not need the people to work here, they should not come in at all. It should not matter who they were related to, we should not let them come in at all. Ninety per cent of the respondents listed manpower requirements as the number one priority under which people should be allowed into the country.

The next item, of course, was the question of ethnic origin. That became rather an interesting situation. The question of ethnic origin came second and the question of humanitarian or family relationships came down low on the list, and that seems to be different from the attitudes which are expressed in the way things are happening. You ask these questions and then you begin to doubt the answers perhaps. You begin to say, well, you know, maybe the ministry knows best. But when you are looking at a question of immigration and you find that people are saying something dramatically different from what is really the practice or the happening in the Department of Employment and Immigration, you begin to wonder whether the department should not perhaps alter what it is doing.

Earlier this session the Leader of the New Democratic Party asked the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) a question with respect to some pollings. It might well be appropriate for the minister to do some polling on attitudes with respect to immigration. The minister is continuing to get things like "Overview" from the National Citizens Coalition saying a number of rather tough things about the immigration program followed not only by this government but by the former government and by the government before that. It is not just the present minister who is getting it in the ear. The former minister of immigration got it in the ear from them, and I gather the present policy of the department, the way the minister is handling things, is essentially no different from the way the former minister was handling things. May I say the department is quite good at getting replies back to members of Parliament. I am quite pleased with the efficiency of the department. Perhaps there is an improvement in the efficiency. But the minister's approach is no different from that of his predecessor. Yet there is a lot of stir out there in the country on this matter. The coalition stirs it up. Undoubtedly the minister has been getting letters from a William Kelly, founding an organization known as Friends of the United Kingdom.

The minister knows that if we do not pay attention to the way people are reacting, we are going to have a very unhappy population. Surely to goodness it is the responsibility of his department to react and to run an immigration policy the way the people who are here as Canadian citizens want it run. It is not a question of some high faluting theory of people who are either far right or far left in their political ideology. It is a question of running immigration policy in accordance with the way the people who are in Canada right now seem to want it run. I therefore recommend to the minister that he do some private polling on this matter and perhaps make the attitudinal results available to members of Parliament.

My questionnaire went on to deal with attitudes with respect to the provision in the Immigration Act that five points are given if you decide to settle in an area of low unemployment. For example, as I said to a constituent on Saturday, "If your sister would only move to Calgary, I would bet she would find a job as a typist, and she would get in here instantly". That may be the case, but the situation is clear that there are extra points under the point system for where you happen to go in the country.

In an area like Mississauga the reply I get from 67 per cent of the people is that the minister should direct where immigrants go. He should make a form of contract with them, with some sort of a bonding system, and have people go to the north, to farms, and to certain places outside the great metropolitan areas. There may be a feeling that there are too many people in the cities and that the frontiers of the country should be expanded and developed. I do not know exactly where that feeling comes from, but I can say to the minister that enormous numbers of people replying convey that type of attitude. A typical reply is that simply giving an immigrant extra points to locate in a designated area does not accomplish the task because, if it takes extra points, all we have achieved is to admit an immigrant we do not really want in the area. If the immigrant is otherwise acceptable, he should not need extra points.

It is suggested that the government should facilitate viable settlements in the Yukon and Northwest Territories, for some reason, or the clay belt region.

I want to say to the minister that he should pay attention to these types of attitudes. The responses I am getting convey the attitude that there should be some direction to settle in a particular area, and that is with particular reference to the refugee program. There might be much more willingness to take more refugees if the refugees brought in were directed to certain specific outlying areas of the country as farm labour and so forth, and not allowed to come to the large cities.

The next question I raised was a question regarding appeal proceedings. The minister will remember that during the last election the former minister deported an East Indian lady after an alleged approximately $80,000 worth of expense. There is no question that that deportation was probably legally proper and all the rest of it, but the thing which bothered a great number of people—and it was brought to their attention—was the enormous amount of money which was expended on what people perceived to be a very extended appeal process. I want to tell the minister that some 65 per cent of the people responding indicated that they either wanted no appeal procedure at all or that the appeal procedure be a very brief and limited one, and directed only to one issue, whether the person is improperly or illegally in Canada, and no other issue, and they wanted no long string of appeals.

The other day there was a situation when I was involved with the minister where I suspect the minister issued a deportation order. The person being deported will appeal under the present law—quite properly, I think the minister will agree—and may well appeal right up to the Supreme Court of Canada. The question really boils down to whether Canada should finance a system of justice that allows persons who are not citizens, and who in many instances are illegally in the country or in the country only by permission, to use the court system, and the delay system that the court system we have in the act allows, to carry on with appeal after appeal and eventually use up, as was the case in the matter which came up during the election, some $80,000 in costs. That type of thing is just not acceptable to the vast majority of Canadians.

To summarize, I think there is a strong desire to see more strictness and some real selectivity, to make sure that manpower considerations are paramount and that when we bring in large numbers of people we have a policy which directs them more or less to new areas of the country so that we do not ghettoize people in the large cities. The interest of Canada in matters of immigration should come first.

I commend the new minister on the taking over of his portfolio, and I wish him luck with that portfolio. It is a portfolio which causes great concern and heartache, and which sometimes is not too politically rewarding. I wish the minister well.

Mrs. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I support the minister's feeling, as he stated it today, that it is time we had a planned, rational refugee policy rather than the emotional ad hockery that seems to be fairly common in our non-policy and which tends to favour some refugees while ignoring others.

If anything, I think we need a fair, impartial, and planned refugee policy which considers international needs and which, of course, is based on Canada's ability to accommodate people. We need a refugee policy which is humanitarian and not political. Therefore I suggest that our policies should be seriously studied and redefined, and that we support United Nations refugee policies on a regular basis and not just react to emotional crises which arise from time to time, which often make us feel like short-term do-gooders but which really do not make much impact on the problems of this world.

I would like to mention just two or three examples which I think dramatized this during the period when I was the critic on immigration for the New Democratic Party. Last year Canada generously sponsored some 50,000 political refugees from southeast Asia. We speedily processed their applications. There was a minimum of delay. Yet, at the same time in Argentina when there was a desperate situation with political prisoners in jails—some of them were waiting in Brazil to get out of their first country of asylum—the Government of Canada promised one hundred visas. We ended up by taking only nine people, refugees from that country who arrived in Canada later. The people who tried to enter Canada from Brazil had to wait for at least six months because our processing was slow. The Brazilian government required, of course, that they leave before that time.

So it appears that we could speed up the processing when we want to, but perhaps at the expense of refugees in other parts of the world, in this case particularly in Latin America.

I should like to point out also the case of a young Chilian refugee, Galindo Madrid, well known in British Columbia. He jumped ship and came to Canada as a political refugee. It was later established by the UN authorities that he could not return to his country without facing injustices there. After two years in Canada, during which he worked as a dishwasher and proved himself to be a responsible person—dishwashing was probably the only job he could get—he was refused asylum in Canada from the very same government—at that time it was a Tory government—which went overboard with election emotionalism because when two young Russian lovers jumped ship in Vancouver, they were welcomed to Canada, in contrast to Galindo Madrid, and were given asylum immediately.

I mention these examples to illustrate the unfairness and the emotional and reactionary policy which we have at present, and I urge the new minister to be as open hearted in his approach to refugees from right wing regimes as he is to refugees from left wing regimes. I hope his criterion for admitting refugees will be humanitarianism, not political prejudice. Of course we support the humanitarian needs of refugees who want to come to Canada at this time.

I should like to point out also that it is not good enough for us to consider only admission of refugees and immigrants without looking at what happens to them and what happens to Canadians, and looking at some of the feelings of Canadians once these immigrants and refugees come to Canada. It is very important that we have well planned immigrant services which will assist refugees and immigrants in general in adjusting quickly and in becoming established in Canada following their arrival. It is important that immigrant services be financed in a more flexible way—and I hope at some time to talk to the minister about this—and that these kinds of financial arrangements with immigrant service agencies be adopted in a flexible way over a three-year period at least.

As my colleague has mentioned, it takes longer than a three-year period for women to adjust. Immigrant women who come to Canada and who cannot speak English, who often raise children and cannot go out into the community as quickly as men, are now deprived of services if they have been here longer than three years. That means they will never adjust in this country, and that is why there are cases of grandmothers whose only contact is with their own family because they have been cut off from the Canadian community at large. That is another aspect we should consider.

Furthermore, there is a great need for the expansion of services for immigrant women who suffer double discrimination. If we look carefully and study the cases of immigrant women who are able to find jobs—many of them have to work in order to survive in Canada—we find them in jobs providing the lowest wages and very little in the way of benefits or protection. Often immigrant women are unable to obtain child care services, which prevents them from taking language classes. Often they are deprived of the possibility of participating in training programs, orientation programs and pre-employment opportunities, all of which are important to their adjustment in Canada.

Our Immigration Act discriminates against immigrant women, treating them as spouses rather than as people with rights of their own as human beings.

I think we should consider also the particular problems of immigrant workers who are working as domestics and farm workers, people who are brought to Canada because Canadians are not willing to do these jobs. These people have no rights when they come here, they have no benefits, and they are open to exploitation and intimidation by their employers. Domestic workers, many of whom are immigrant women in Canada, receive no UIC benefits, have no Canada Pension Plan, and are fearful of being deported if they complain about their work situation. They are unprotected by either federal or provincial labour legislation. Often they are overworked, having to work seven days a week, and underpaid. They have no recourse to appeal. I think the federal government should take leadership in developing policies and legislation to protect immigrant workers. After all, it is the federal government which brings them to Canada. It should prevent that kind of exploitation from taking place, rather than saying this comes under provincial jurisdiction.

It seems to me that if a domestic worker has worked for six months, or perhaps even longer, and has fulfilled the requirements, she should be entitled to receive landed immigrant status so she can have the protection that other workers have in Canada. The services of domestic workers are still needed here. So the federal government should take leadership in this area and not just leave it to the provinces to offer protection to immigrant workers whom we bring in to meet labour market demands in our country.

In British Columbia our farm workers, most of whom are of East Indian descent, have a terrible work situation. They receive low wages and are exploited by middle men who take their wages from them. They receive far below the minimum wage in many cases. Fortunately some of them are working for collective bargaining rights. This is something I would hope our government would support.

I know we are running short of time so I will be brief, but there is one very important and critical issue which I should like to raise at this time. It has to do with the current concern of many Canadians because of the infringement of human rights, and this could apply to either refugees, immigrants or Canadian-born citizens who are so-called visible minorities.

Our party, as I am sure are many members of the House, is seriously concerned at the repeated examples of racism and stereotyping which we have witnessed in the media in recent months, media that are supported by our tax dollars and are supposedly educating our citizens, and I shudder to think of the kind of education that some of these programs are giving to our children as well as to adults. Such programs inflame public prejudice and discrimination, attitudes that are only too prevalent among our citizens in times of economic stress.

Last year, a CBC program portrayed organized crime in such a way as to imply that most Italian Canadians have Mafia connections. At about the same time the National Film Board produced a very insensitive documentary on the Chinese community. It was produced largely in Vancouver. The misinformation and stereotyping in this film, which was called "Bamboo Lions and Dragons", was offensive not only to many Chinese people but to us non-Chinese who viewed it as well.

Most recently we had the incident of media misinformation and outright racism which was made public in the program called W5, entitled "Campus Giveaway". I hope that all hon. members are aware of the gross exaggeration in the stated number of foreign students in university programs, students who are not admitted unless there are spaces which are not required by Canadians. That program was a disservice to foreign students, and an insult to Canada's commitment to train young people for leadership roles in Third World countries. Much more serious, however, was the deliberate attempt to pick out and smear a group of Canadian students, probably many of them second or third generation Canadians of Asian descent. Because they were not Caucasian, Canadian-born citizens were accused of being foreigners with no right to a university education. In a country that stands proudly for multiculturalism, this is a national disgrace. It is not good enough, after denials over a seven-month period, that the CTV president apologized a few days ago. This was only two days before a national protest meeting was held.

● (1700)

I should like to quote one of the protestors who spoke at a meeting in Vancouver as follows:

The battle may be won but this does not remove the hurt.

An apology will not remove the insult and disrespect to thousands of Chinese Canadian citizens, nor will it assure that there will be no repetition of such incidents in the media. I am pleased that in this case an ongoing group has been formed called the "Chinese Canadian National Council for Equality". I know that this group plans to meet with other ethnic groups to form a strong coalition to do something about this discrimination and infringement of human rights. They are working to protect human rights for all and toward a true multicultural Canada. But this is not just the duty of those who are the victims of racist attitudes.

Those who are hurt should not be the only ones to object and have to defend themselves alone. Human rights are the responsibility of our country as a whole, and the responsibility of every citizen. Surely it is a particular responsibility of our media—the press, television, radio, columnists and film. Therefore I should like to present to the House and to the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Axworthy) several recommendations which were made at the meetings I attended in Vancouver.

First, media members should establish a code of conduct for their own industry and their own colleagues. Second, stronger legislation with teeth must be introduced to protect human rights and to be a deterrent to the kind of programming that we saw on W-5. Third, we should have a public ombudsman and positive programs on the media produced with advisory people from ethnic communities. Finally, members of Parliament must demand that there will be no more racist programs such as "Campus Giveaway" on Canadian television, particularly Canadian productions.

In the interest of time, I should just like to mention that there are a number of issues connected with the Immigration Act which very much require review and which I wish we had time to debate at this time. If we shorten our presentations, I would ask the minister if he would consider a time, perhaps during the hearings before the Standing Committee on Labour, Manpower and Immigration, when these issues could be discussed at some length.

Some of the aspects of the Immigration Act which I felt as immigration critic in the past really needed review were the following: the powers given to immigration agents to decide who is or is not desirable to come to Canada; appeal procedures, which certainly are very poor in regard to refugees but need improvement for other immigrants as well; discrimination against women immigrants, which I have already mentioned; policies which really disregard cultural differences, particularly the cultures of Asian countries where extended families are considered to be families and where our policies tend to break up families. I know of many cases—and I am sure other members do as well—where children as they turn 21 must be left in their home country while their parents come to this country. This is quite unacceptable to many immigrants from India and from Hong Kong. We give special concessions to entrepreneurs and to people with capital, yet we make it very difficult for many other immigrants to come to Canada.

Of course our immigration policy must take first account of the concerns of Canadians. We must have jobs and housing for all. In times of economic stress, in many ways it is understandable that people who are finding it hard to find jobs, to find a house or shelter for themselves and their children, are resentful of newcomers who seem to find homes and jobs more easily. We know that it does not work that way. Immigrants create jobs. We are all immigrants. We must have positive programs to help create understanding. The best way to do this is to ensure that Canadians and immigrants alike have jobs, housing, and the services which they need in our communities.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, it is our ardent hope and desire, on this side of the House at least, to see Bill C-2 given second reading this afternoon. Therefore my remarks will be rather short.

In speaking in support of the bill, I should like to say that the concept which it embodies confirms that the immigrant in economic terms is a valuable asset to this country. There is a long-standing tradition to this effect. This is a program which started early in the 1950s. It is my understanding, as others have already said, that Canada has done this before then in order to attract people to this country.

It is a fact, although this belief is not shared by everybody in the country, that an adult immigrant arrives in this country as a productive individual. Having been raised at the expense of another jurisdiction, and being in good health at the expense of another jurisdiction, he becomes almost immediately upon arrival a participant in the community, not only as a consumer and producer but also as an active member of the community and therefore a highly valuable, positive asset in the community, centre, town, region, province, or nation as a whole. This is what Bill C-2 means to us. Evidentally all of us in this House support it. The amount reflects the fact that there are certain projects and programs which require more immediate support because of increasing costs in the world. It is a fact of life that we not only recognize but support.

However, this bill raises in the minds of those of us who are familiar with the pattern of immigration and settlement in Canada the fact that there is a weak link in the chain which is beyond the scope of this bill but is implicit in its wording. The weak link in the chain is the fact that in this country we have a service or network of so-called immigrant settlement and adaptation programs which are not adequate. In analysing this bill and in passing it, it is important that we make reference to the desirability of a successful adaptation of immigrants brought into the country under the auspices of the bill, in other words, that we pay more attention to the needs of immigrants upon settlement.

The budget devoted to this particular program, the adaptation program, was in the neighbourhood of $2 million in the previous fiscal year. It runs in the same neighbourhood this fiscal year, with a slight decrease. I look at that fact in a very distressed manner. It seems to me that if we are embarking upon a program of this kind, we must increase the funding of this program, in particular the funding of volunteer agencies which are active in the communities across the country, mainly from Montreal to Vancouver, in facilitating the adaptation of the immigrants.

The hon. member for Vancouver East (Mrs. Mitchell) made reference a moment ago to the three-year rule. I do not know whether the time frame is accurate, but whatever the time frame is, I would urge the government to reconsider it and to remove it entirely.

● (1710)

There are situations in which immigrants who arrive and settle never require services. There are cases and instances when services are required upon arrival, and there are in the last instance situations in which this need arises well after the so-called three-year rule. Therefore, the services ought to be made available in a flexible manner as the need arises and not with time limits imposed, of course, through bureaucratic criteria that really do not take into consideration the facts of life and the process of integration of the individual into the new community.

The next point I would like to make briefly has to do with the receiving society, Canadians born here and Canadian citizens by adoption, who see the arrival of new immigrants and who make the necessary adjustments in absorbing those new arrivals into the neighbourhoods and into the new communities.

Here again, as I understand it, the Secretary of State (Mr. Fox) has an important responsibility to perform in somehow facilitating and encouraging, on the part of the so-called host society, an attitude of understanding and adaptability so as to encourage and make the welcome of the newly arrived immigrant warmer and more cordial.

It is quite clear that this task again is one that needs to be urged upon the government through the facilities of the Secretary of State which, as I understand it, is the department that keeps the pulse of Canadian society as a dynamic entity, in continuous change and in continuous adaptation as a result of the constant yearly immigration of individuals from various continents who come to settle in this country.

In order to make Bill C-2 effective, and in order to make the process of the adaptation of new immigrants in years to come not only easier but more successful, there are two ingredients required; one is a stronger immigrant settlement and adaptation program, and the second has to do with the preparation of the host society so as to be better equipped in receiving the newly arrived individuals.

Before I sit down, I would like in my intervention to reply briefly to a suggestion made earlier by the hon. member for Mississauga South (Mr. Blenkarn) who, in his long deliberation, which actually deserves perhaps the yearly top award to the politician who most successfully manages to talk out of both sides of his mouth, made one point clearly. He recommended that immigrants be sent to specific destinations for employment purposes, and that they be, if I understood him clearly, destined to such places for a certain period of time.

We on this side of the House reject this notion because it would create in Canada two classes of individuals, those who are free to move and those who are not. That is unacceptable. The strength of Canada's immigration policy has been that as a nation Canada has achieved something rather unique, namely, that it has treated and continues to treat immigrants, except for the right of voting, in the same manner as those who were born here and who are Canadian citizens. In humanistic terms that is a very rare and highly commendable achievement. We do not want to have this record spoiled by a suggestion of the kind made by the hon. member for Mississauga South.

Finally, if ever the Canadian government were to adopt a measure like this it would contravene both the spirit and the letter of the Helsinki Agreement which we signed in 1975, and which contains as a very strong premise the freedom of movement within countries and between countries. We would like to see that respected and implemented by other countries around the world as well.

Mr. Gordon Taylor (Bow River): Mr. Speaker, I do want to make a short contribution to this debate, and I hope it will be a contribution.

Most blanket policies have severe weaknesses, and I would endeavour to prove this afternoon to the hon. Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Axworthy), particularly, if he indeed requires that proof, that blanket policies of the Department of Employment and Immigration also have very severe weaknesses.

Let us take as an example the view of many people in Canada who say we should not bring immigrants in because we have 900,000 or one million people unemployed. That has a very severe weakness. It may well be sound that we should not bring immigrants in who are going to be in heavily unemployed areas where there is much unskilled labour. It is totally in error when we suggest that we should not bring unskilled labour into other parts of the country.

I want to point out two or three places in my own constituency of Bow River where there is a need for unskilled labour. When I receive letters from officials of the department of immigration refusing excellent applicants simply because they have not learned a trade or do not have a profession, I have difficulty explaining that to those people who want this type of worker.

For instance, let us consider our small towns, and I will use Bow River as an example. I suggest this would be applicable to almost any other rural riding in much of western Canada. There is no unemployment in our small towns and villages. The Canadian of Chinese origin who operates a restaurant in a small town many times works 14 hours a day while trying to raise his family, yet he cannot get help. It is useless for him to go to the manpower office in Calgary because most of the people will not go to a small town or village. As a result, the people in the small towns or villages have no one available.

When that Canadian of Chinese origin makes an application on behalf of a nephew or a niece in Hong Kong or mainland China who qualifies in every other way, I suggest it is not wrong to bring that person in even though he or she may be unskilled. I think that is in line with what the hon. member for Spadina (Mr. Stollery) was suggesting. These people are members of a family. This family will teach them the language, if that is required, and will make sure they continue to get their education, with the result that the Canadian of Chinese origin will not have to work 14 and 16 hours a day. That is the situation in many small towns, and I think it is applicable in many areas.

The next example I should like to give relates to farm work. There is an application before the department at the present time in respect of two young men from Bermuda who were met by the son of a farmer when he was there. They said they would like to come to Canada on a temporary basis to see what it was like, and work on a farm. This man has 2,000 turkeys arriving in a very few days and he cannot find anybody to help with the work. It requires a lot of work to care for 2,000 turkeys, and that is not particularly skilled work. The immigration officials interviewed one of these men—I have not heard about the second one—who was an hotel man, and they turned him down. That one man, at least, could have done that job on that turkey farm.

● (1720)

Many other farmers have been trying to obtain labour, but people will not come out and work on farms. There are many young men in Denmark, Sweden, Norway and countries like that, who would love to come and work in Canada. In many cases these are men of integrity but have no farming experience. In other cases these are men who were raised on a farm and who understand cattle and know the soil, the difference between loam and gumbo. Unfortunately many of these potential immigrants are turned down.

There are many farmers who are frustrated and discouraged because they cannot get help. The blanket policy of, "let's not bring people to Canada because we have unemployment", has several weaknesses with regard to small towns and our farms. There are many hon. members in this House who would agree that it is difficult to get certain types of labour in beautiful resort areas like Lake Louise and Banff. One of the motel operators in Lake Louise had to close early last year because he could not find workers. Lake Louise is not a large settlement of people from which to draw labour, and people will not come from Calgary. Here is a need for immigrants.

In referring to the situation in Lake Louise, I do not have particular types of immigrants in mind as I did in the other two cases. Surely there are people in this world today who want to work at this type of job. I would like to see the minister put the boots to some of the people who hang around the unemployment office in Calgary and who will not go out on some of these jobs. The blanket policy is not sound, and I urge the minister to reject it and utilize a more flexible policy.

For example, if there is an unskilled member of a family who wishes to immigrate to a small town where his or her relatives are, then I think that we should have a policy to allow such a person to enter Canada. This person will become just as much a Canadian as his relatives have been, and I think that we can bring the right kind of people into the country in this way.

The other point I would like to make is with regard to the restaurant business in small towns. It is difficult to find Canadians who wish to do the menial tasks demanded by our society. Many immigrants would come to Canada and perform these menial tasks. They will take these jobs and try to work themselves up in society. So where Canadians are not available for these menial tasks, let us bring in immigrants who want to work. They can be of any colour or creed. I do not care whether they are black, yellow, pink, blue or white. The main thing is that they be people of high integrity, people who want to become Canadians and who will be loyal to this country.

The other point that I wish to mention is with regard to the refugee problem. I believe that we are our brother's keeper, and I think that it is a splendid thing that Canadians are prepared to take those who are suffering in other countries and who have no home and nothing to live for. I spoke to a recent refugee in Calgary, shortly before I returned to Ottawa. He spoke broken English, but I was amazed at his ability, for a man who had just come from a foreign country a few days before, at speaking English. He said, "Wonderful, wonderful; I have a job". The job was very menial, but he was happy that he had a job. He said in his broken English, "I love Canada". That man will become an excellent citizen. I think that we should encourage refugees to come to Canada. I have some people in my constituency who say we should not bring in too many. Perhaps we are bringing in a proper quota right now.

There are many Canadians who would like to better themselves through training in language and many other things, as do the refugees, and I hope that our policy is flexible enough to allow these Canadians the same advantages as the refugees, and thereby enable them to become good Canadians because, after all, charity begins at home.

[Translation]

Mr. André Maltais (Manicouagan): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise in support of this bill. I want to remind the House that since the World War II, that is in the last 35 years, Canada has opened its doors to some 350,000 refugees. In other words, within the scope of our over-all immigration program, one immigrant in ten has come to Canada in that period, under the immigrant status. It also means that, in 35 years, 350,000 refugees have chosen to come to Canada, 350,000 new Canadians are Canadians by choice.

The importance of interest-free loans to allow the transportation of refugees cannot be doubted but it is important to point out to our people that after those refugees come to Canada, they have to reimburse the transportation costs. Generally speaking, Canadians think they pay to bring in the refugees to Canada, but the truth is totally different: the refugees reimburse their transportation costs at a later date.

Some of those who have benefited from that interest-free transportation loan later on expressed their gratitude concretely and in moving terms to the Canadians for the chance they have been given, through that free loan system, to start a new life in Canada, to find new hope and to prosper with their families in a free and welcoming land.

Throughout the years, several ethnic groups have benefited from those loans. For instance, the Hungarians, the Czechoslovaks, the Chileans, the Ugandans or, more recently, the Indo-Chinese. In truth, one of the main advantages of the loan system is that Canada can react more quickly to situations that are very complex and demand immediate action. It must be noted that, in this the twentieth century, in democracies such as the one in which we live, the main difficulty often lies in reaching a decision. To have substantial sums in readiness for interest-free loans gives the minister or Parliament the possibility of acting very rapidly and, as a first consequence, often those swift decisions allow us to bring people here fast, saving them from pressures or even simply from death, when the political or economic situation in the countries they must leave is critical.

The successive movements of refugees into Canada have proven clearly that each group could settle permanently in this country and contribute generously to the economic and cultural life in Canada. We all know, because we all have immigrants or refugees among our constituents, that those people have become full and active members of our communities.

My constituency of Manicouagan is 600 miles long by 1,250 miles wide and the co-operation and engineering competence of these refugees or immigrants has contributed greatly to the success of the important mining and hydroelectric projects that we have witnessed on the north shore in the last 20 years.

It can be said that those who came to the north shore to meet this challenge have been greatly appreciated, and this applies as much to the engineers as to the simple workers. As the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Taylor) said earlier, it is extremely important to realize that refugees and immigrants are a first-class work asset and wonderful even as simple citizens because they have chosen Canada while we have had the luck to be born here. These people make extraordinary efforts to come here and adapt to our country and they add a diversity to the Canadian community which can only enrich our nation.

I would like to take this opportunity to underline the very important work done by two mayors in my area, the mayor of Schefferville and the mayor of Sept-Îles, to help the Indo-Chinese refugees who had requested admission to Canada. The Manpower and Immigration employees in Sept-Îles also did an extraordinary job, and I would like the minister to take good notice of this fact because it is often said that public servants are too slow, that they are not really sensitive to the needs of the people. This afternoon, I want to emphasize that in our area, the reaction of the public servants to the plight of the Indo-Chinese refugees was marvellous and that the reception given to these people by the residents of Schefferville and Sept-Îles was extraordinary.

The bill now under consideration will enable Canada to maintain its considerable efforts to solve the problems of refugees throughout the world. Even though our attention has been focused mostly on the transfer of the Indo-Chinese refugees, which was probably the most important such operation ever undertaken in this country, the increase in the funds to be used for transport and which will be always available will enable Canada to pursue its humanitarian work in other parts of the world and allow us to receive in Canada, this land of freedom and prosperity, men and women seeking peace and justice.

I would also like to add that by opening our doors to refugees we seize the opportunity of having men and women who become the bulwarks of our rights and liberties. Often, these people have lived through extremely complex and difficult experiences in their country, which they must leave very quickly, and when they come here they enable us to detect in our system statutes or legislation which may constitute misuses of our rights and freedom. Often, as Canadians, we have never had the opportunity of expressing the fact that our rights and liberties are highly important values. These people make us realize that we can be proud of the level of freedom and rights that we enjoy, even though we may not be aware of it. These newcomers can make us realize this and by that token make us appreciate better our country.

As the minister said in his speech, this bill requires no financial commitment. But it is one step towards the creation of a world of sharing and openheartedness and I expect all members of this House to support the bill. I thank the minister for it and I hope we will grant it speedy passage.

[English]

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, I think Canada and Canadians welcomed with great joy in their hearts the decision of the previous government to accept such a large number of refugees from Indo-China. I think also it was a masterly stroke, given the notion that there are some tendencies in Canada—and we must admit this—to wonder whether we are accepting too many persons who may not fit in culturally. It was a masterly decision to decide that the number sponsored by the government would correspond and match the number sponsored by individual Canadians and groups. Therefore, of the 50,000 that were accepted, it meant that 25,000 would involve Canadians themselves individually or in community groups bringing in refugees to this country, looking after them for a certain time, and knowing what the responsibilities in so doing were.

Now we learn that an additional 10,000 have been accepted. It is not clear to me—perhaps the minister may be able to make this clear in his statement—whether the same conditions will apply or whether this additional 10,000 will be accepted and sponsored by the government itself.

However, there are a number of fallouts from this admission of 50,000, now 60,000, individuals from Southeast Asia, which had not been anticipated and which are causing some concern that I believe ought to be brought to the attention of the minister. I brought it to the attention of the previous minister in correspondence, but I do think the matter requires underlining because that concern has not been put to rest. It has to do with some of the non-North American diseases, or diseases that have been brought into the country that up to now have been unknown here. A fair number of them have been diagnosed and brought to the attention of hospital authorities. This is all the more worrisome for those who have these misgivings and concerns, and they are legitimate. A great number of these refugees have gone into the food-handling business.

Some of the diseases are transmittable by contact with the skin, by breath, and also, I believe, perspiratory glands. For example, there is a new type of flu that apparently has been introduced, also a new type of hepatitis which is most peculiar. Canadian dentists have been warned about this particular type of hepatitis. Hepatitis is a fairly disastrous type of disease. I had to spend about six weeks of my life recovering from it. I know that it is dangerous and that it comes from habits that we in Canada have managed to overcome, but this strain may well have been brought into this country by some of these refugees.

Tuberculosis has also been identified. I believe we had eliminated tuberculosis from the Canadian medical scene. Malaria is one of those extraordinary things that has cropped up. There may not be any anopheles mosquitoes in Canada. I hope that these types of mosquitoes were not brought in via luggage because malaria is a most debilitating disease. I was fortunate enough, though living in the tropics for many years, to have avoided that disease. However, I did see a number of people who suffered long-lasting disabilities because of the effects of malaria.

Then there is a form of gonorrhea that I believe is peculiar to Southeast Asia, which has been introduced into this country. I was assured by the authorities three or four months ago that proper medical attention was being paid to these people before they came into Canada.

I wonder whether the minister has had this matter brought to his attention and whether he feels that it is sufficiently worrisome to issue new instructions, or renew the instructions concerning medical examination of these refugees before they arrive in Canada.

I hope there is no doubt in anyone's mind that these are cooked-up excuses by people who are unwilling or are resisting the introduction of these refugees from southeast Asia. I think it is worth noting that there have been alerts circulated to hospitals urging all medical personnel to make a note of any unusual diseases that come to their attention, and to bring them to the attention of the provincial authorities. Furthermore, in the budget which was introduced in the legislature of British Columbia about two or three weeks ago, an additional $2.5 million was provided for the examination of the health of those refugees who are now in the country. It is not to check them as they come in because, and the minister should know this, it is assumed that there is a medical examination before they come.

● (1740)

True, they come from very desperate situations. That is understood. However, the fact remains that if there are illnesses or diseases, they should be diagnosed before the individuals arrive so that they can be properly treated once they arrive here. I did mention, and I think it is worth repeating, that some of these diseases of which I spoke are transferred by contact. Therefore the concentration of so many of these refugees in the food handling business has added to the concern of those who have expressed it to me.

Aside from that, there are a couple of matters I feel I would like to mention on this occasion. I doubt that there are many members in this House who have not had problems brought to them by persons from Britain seeking to emigrate to Canada to join members of their families. It may be a distant relative, an elderly sister or a married sister. This might be a widowed sister in Britain. I have in mind one such case.

There is another case where a person wanted to find out whether the social and physical climate was one to which he could accustom himself. He was very enterprising. He found a job. He found a prospective bride. That was fine. However, when the things were being processed, delays were encountered that would defy the imagination. The local immigration authorities would say, "It has just gone to Ottawa for processing, because we need this, that and the other thing." When it came back there would be another excuse. The bureaucratic excuses in this area of having British-born people emigrating from Britain into Canada have been a problem, and I would bet money on it, for every single member of this legislative body. I am sure everyone has had at least one case. I have had dozens of them.

All you have to do is try to emigrate from Britain and you are in trouble. I do not know why it should be, but it happens. Others come in. You would think there are the same rules, but I have had to write to the High Commissioner to have some matters looked into and have them put aside. I raise this, not because I want to but because it has been my experience. I do not get these problems with other countries, but I get them from Great Britain.

I find this difficult to believe having been in the public service, but I find there is a suggestion of bias against British born coming into this country.

Mr. Collenette: Nonsense.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Say nonsense if you like, but that is the suggestion my experience is leading me toward. I do not want to accept it. I hope it is wrong. But the minister should know there is this feeling among the public in Canada. That feeling does exist.

In conclusion, someone took a dig at one of the speakers from this side. Perhaps I should also take a little dig. On our return here before the Speech from the Throne, we were picked up at the airport by a taxi driver and driven in. The man said that he was pleased that the Liberals had been returned to office because he had been told that had the Conservatives been returned they would cut off the right or the openness in Canada for relatives from these countries. He had been told that by some of the candidates during the election. Lies were being circulated. I find that deplorable. It was being done. The remark was unsolicited. The man did not even know I was a member of Parliament. He spontaneously came out with that. I find it regrettable that any party would descend to that sort of prevarication in order to win votes.

Mr. Bob Ogle (Saskatoon East): Mr. Speaker, I rise to speak on Bill C-2, an amendment to the Immigration Act of 1976, whereby the amount of moneys will be raised from $20 million to $60 million. I wish to support this amendment, and at the same time offer a few thoughts about the question of immigration.

I would first like to extend to Madam Speaker my own personal congratulations on her new appointment. I remind the House that she is one of our native Saskatchewan daughters, having been born in Prud'homme, Saskatchewan. The people of her local community are extremely happy with the appointment.

I would also at this time extend my sincere congratulations to the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Axworthy). It is my sincere hope that he will have the basic concern and sensitivity to what I consider to be a most difficult assignment, an assignment which will have an historical reality in the lives of millions of people in generations yet unborn, many times on his own personal decisions as to who will come and who will not come to our country.

During the last year Canada has responded to the needs of the "boat people" in what I believe was a very fitting and humane way. The "boat people" were special among immigrants because they received a very high media image. Television, radio, and other media coverage showed the unique way in which they escaped and became refugees. Millions of other people who are in a refugee state do not get the same kind of publicity, and therefore do not get the same kind of care. I believe that the "boat people" have already had a unique influence on Canadian life. I believe that Canadians, groups of them in communities or church groups, have responded to this new event in our history in a most generous and open way.

During the last week as I was visiting my constituency and other areas of western Canada, I met some of these new families, and I spoke to a number of Canadians who were sponsoring them. I can see a good overflow, a good interchange beginning to take place as prairie towns and villages have taken it upon themselves to integrate into their lives a family that a year ago they did not even know existed.

● (1750)

The "boat people" though, are only symbolic of what is taking place in the world as regards the migration populations. Never before in the history of the world has population pressure been at the intensity that it is in many sections of the planet at this time. Open lands and spaces are just not available as they once were even in our century. Today, millions upon millions of people are being pressed into situations of life which, because of lack of space, lack of food growing land, lack of places to live, have turned cities and other areas into great squalor and slums.

The social and political conditions which have brought this situation about cannot all be mentioned at this time, but the basic fact remains that millions in ever-increasing numbers are now living on the face of the earth in conditions which are not of a minimum human standard.

I say these things because I think that we, as Canadians, have been blessed in a most unbelievable way with great areas of land and possibilities and have to look seriously at a principle which states that "people without land have a right to land without people". Many, of course, can argue that this statement pertains to national lands, but as we enter this decade and the ones which are to come, I think we have less and less right to bar people from access to a better life because of the technicality of having been born in the wrong place. So I foresee in the future great migrations of people to land which is now vacant or, at least, underused, and this will come about either in a peaceful, bargained way, or it will come about by force. This is a principle that has descended through the ages of humankind. People without resources will finally take over the means they need for a better life.

To reflect on ourselves, I believe that most of the people sitting in this House are themselves immigrants, or else certainly the children of immigrants who came here within the last 372 years—excluding my hon. friend from the constituency of Nunatsiaq (Mr. Ittinuar) whose relatives arrived some 20,000 years earlier. In my own case, my family originated in Ireland and came here because of a population explosion and famine some 150 years ago. In the generations which have followed we have had the benefits which that first great tragedy brought indirectly through the migration of my ancestors.

My forefathers, like the forefathers of many other Canadians, were, of course, looked upon as strangers, as aliens, and there were prejudices against them when they came. Later on, they themselves developed prejudices against others who were either here before them or who came after them. The problem of having a prejudiced viewpoint remains true of everybody with human blood in their veins. It is a prejudice we have constantly to work against, particularly today when the peoples of the world, by circumstances and history, are forced to live outside their traditional, natural communities, and to mix as a planetary people. I believe the basic prejudices which people carry within themselves have had much to do with immigration laws and restrictions which, even today, work against certain groups who wish to enter into Canada.

I trust the minister and his department will seriously take account at all times of laws which have built into them a prejudice against a certain type of person simply because such persons happen to be of a special colour or religion or political leaning, and will see that a bias of this kind is, as far as possible, eradicated from our immigration laws.

In just a moment I would like to speak about a particular instance which has come to my attention, having been raised by some of my constituents. It is an example of bias built in to our Canadian legal system. It specifically concerns Canadian families of Chinese origin who wish to bring in, from their former country, a relative who, according to Canadian standards, is not a relative because of differing marriage practices in China. In this particular case, a Chinese woman living in my constituency has been trying for a number of years to bring to Canada a man whom she considers to be her brother. However, in the Chinese tradition, her father had two wives. She belongs to the first wife and the brother belongs to the second. In these circumstances the brother has been refused entry. I hope that in future legislation we can be sensitive to the cultural norms of other peoples and respect them in bringing their families to our land, even though they may not truly fit the family standards which Canadian law lays down.

Finally, I would like to say that the immigration policies of Canada must be tied very closely to the whole of our foreign policy and that is why I believe there ought to be a complete revision and review of our foreign policy, tying it in very closely with the needs of populations around the world and how Canada will respond, not to the particular needs of Canada but to the particular needs of the planet.

Mr. Bill Clarke (Vancouver Quadra): Mr. Speaker, in the few moments remaining I want to make a few remarks on Bill C-2. My hon. friends have expressed support for this bill and I think it will make Canada's welcome to immigrants much better than it was before.

As I sat listening to their remarks, I wanted to bring to the minister's attention a problem which the government's policies have created particularly for the city of Vancouver and, no doubt, for other regions where there are high immigrant levels. The problem is known by the call letters ESL, which stand for "English as a second language". It is one which has been created by the immigration policy of the federal government. It has been brought to the attention of both the federal minister and his predecessor by myself and, I am sure, by others.

We heard earlier about immigrants who do not learn the language, and we understand how that happens at times. The problem arises when children who speak no English attend Canadian schools. The total education program is, of course, delayed while the children are tutored in the English language, and the education of Canadian English-speaking children is held up while that process is taking place. The penalty falls upon those children whose education is delayed, and also upon the taxpayers of regions where immigration is high, because school boards are required to pick up the tab for this "English as a second language" instruction. In the case of Vancouver, the cost complained of by the school board amounts to something like $2 million a year. I just want that to be on the record. There is this problem, and the burden is a heavy one. It is an unfair situation, and the federal government owes it to the regional areas to come up with a solution.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

Motion (Mr. Axworthy) agreed to, bill read the second time and the House went into committee thereon, Mr. Blaker in the chair.

On clause 1—

Mr. Siddon: Mr. Chairman, in the context of Bill C-2 and the whole question of immigrant assistance programs, I would like to raise a rather sensitive issue which leads to some questions which I would like to put to the minister while we have him present.

The matter relates to a quotation that has been brought to my attention in a recent issue of the Indo Canadian Times, published in Vancouver, and dated March 1, 1980. The front page of that issue shows a photograph of the present Prime Minister, and a translation of that article leads to some remarkable information which, to my surprise, never was put before the Canadian people during the recent election campaign. A partial transcript of that article, which is entitled "Efforts to free people who came to visit and gone underground", reads as follows:

> Readers would remember that in the last issue at the time of the federal elections some prominent politicians stated that it is the policy of the Liberal Party to free (to grant landed immigrant status) to thousands of visitors who have gone underground, in case they get in power. Now the Liberal party is in power and we are going to form a committee who should take responsibility and in consultation with the heads of various organizations, take a deputation to Ottawa to meet the government and put pressure upon them to achieve this task by this summer.

The task, as rumored within the minister's own department, I understand, is to encourage the government to grant a general immigration amnesty, and to grant it by this summer.

I raise this at this time as a rather sensitive issue, and I hesitate to raise it because all of the speakers this afternoon, myself included, feel that we have much room in this country and much opportunity to continue to attract more and more peoples from other parts of the world to enjoy the bountiful goodness of the Canada we know.

However, we have immigration laws in this country which demand respect. Our public servants are required to enforce these laws, and such a political promise or undertaking makes a travesty of those laws and, in fact, seriously complicates the whole question of all of the antagonisms which surround the immigration policies of our federal government. I do not at this time have the names of the prominent Liberal politicians, but I would be very anxious to hear the minister respond and indicate the extent to which he has knowledge of these undertakings, which were never discussed with the public but which, apparently, were used for the sole purpose of gathering votes, making a travesty of our immigration policy in the last general election.

Is the minister aware of an undertaking or a commitment to a general amnesty by certain Liberal politicians; who are these Liberal politicians; and is this not a flagrant abuse of innocent humans in encouraging them to come to this country illegally for the purpose of breaking an existing law which might be changed should a government be replaced?

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Order, please. I see that it is now 6.05. It may be the wish of the House to allow the Chair not to see the clock or that I call it six o'clock.

Mr. Collenette: Mr. Chairman, I rise on a point of order. I believe there may be some disposition to dispose of this bill today. Perhaps unanimous consent might be requested for proceeding to third reading after the bill is reported.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: The parliamentary secretary suggests that there may be unanimous consent to proceed through all stages of this bill. Is that agreed?

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, I believe the unanimous consent about third reading would have to be obtained with the Speaker in the chair. At the moment I simply suggest that you not see the clock. We shall co-operate.

Mr. Siddon: Mr. Chairman, I have two or three questions I would like to ask of the minister. He may want to reserve his response until a future meeting of the standing committee, but I would like the questions placed on the record now.

The first question which I asked of the minister was, does he have any personal knowledge of certain undertakings made to various ethnic communities in this country, to the effect that some form of amnesty would be granted after the February 18 election to persons coming to this country on visitors' visas, for the purpose of overstaying their presence?

The second question relates to an apparent upsurge in advertising within some countries encouraging the peoples of those countries to apply to Canadian immigration authorities or Canadian consular offices for visitors' visas. Apparently the word going around beneath the surface is that, having come to this country on the basis of such permits, they would then overstay their privilege. I am informed that there is a significant upsurge in travel advertising for that very purpose in some parts of the world.

Third, is the minister aware of this situation through any internal departmental communication? In other words, have his officials advised him about their concern about an upsurge in advertising which is being used to attract people to come to visit in Canada, since February 18?

Finally, would the minister condone a situation which would appear to reward those who enter this country with an illicit purpose, and is he aware that this kind of politicizing of the immigration policies of this country is not only distasteful to many ethnic groups, but also tends to polarize and aggravate the whole question of immigration and strained racial relations which exists in this country?

Mr. Axworthy: Mr. Chairman, I am somewhat taken aback by the questions raised by the hon. member because this is certainly the first that I have ever heard of any such suggestion or commitment. Frankly, I do not believe it. I have never heard anybody in our party state that there would be a general amnesty for any special group.

I recall—and this is simply from memory—that there was an amnesty declared several years back, prior to the passage of the Immigration Act, with respect to those who had been in the country for a long period of time, but that was a very clean cut period, and it came to an end.

I can give the hon. member every assurance that there is no amnesty being planned, nor is there one in the planning process, nor is there one being contemplated. I have never heard any reference by anybody in our party or in my department to suggest that that was the case. I would be very pleased to receive from the hon. member a copy of the article to which he referred, to have it examined further and to see what the sources may be. I can give the hon. member the assurance, to ease his mind and the minds of others, that that is certainly not the case.

We do have an immigration law, and we are attempting to uphold it. As the hon. member well knows, with the large number of people coming to this country, enforcement is not always easy, but we do have a very effective enforcement branch. I heard in debate today from several other hon. members that some tend to think that our enforcement is too zealous at the present time and that we should, if hon. members will pardon the expression, liberalize it. At the same time, I would say that the amnesty question is something I would not want to contemplate, and we do not contemplate it.

As far as the other question about travel advertising is concerned, as the hon. member knows, that is not within the jurisdiction of my department, but I do believe—and this again is recalling from when I was sitting on the other side of the House—that there were some very strenuous attempts made by the previous government, as well as by the government previous to that, to encourage more visitors to Canada in order to provide some offset to the balance of payments losses that we have, and I suspect that there is a certain kind of ambition to bring more people to Canada to spend more money so that the money spent by tourists who leave Canada to go down south can be offset.

Again I assure the hon. member that there is certainly no illicit or ulterior motives behind that, other than to deal with the fiscal balance of payments problems. I will certainly take the matter up with the Minister of State (Trade) and the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce to ascertain what the advertising is, but I would say on the first hand that that would be the purpose of the advertising, not to do anything more than that.

As far as any other illicit purposes are concerned, one of the primary requirements under this act is to ensure that there is an impartiality in the application of the law. That is really the standard I intend to apply.

As the hon. member well knows, discretion has been exercised on a variety of grounds, and that is something that is treated with a great deal of care. Various ministers and governments have approached it with somewhat different philosophies, but that is a question of philosophy, not a question of any intention to break the law. It is simply a matter of applying different interpretations. Again I give him every assurance that in the enactment of this provision visas are not given out to visitors with a great deal of abandon. In fact they are given out very charily. As he knows, the changes to the Immigration Act in 1978 require any landed status to take place in a territory outside of Canada, which does provide a substantial check and balance against any abuse.

I think there should be some review. I have heard some very interesting and very helpful comments from members during this debate about how we might ensure that those laws do not abuse people or discriminate against them in reverse. I will take those under close recognition. I am very pleased to have those comments, but any other further purposes I would deny and simply say that we will enforce the law as it is written and try to provide the enforcement of that law with all the compassion we can bring to bear.

Mr. Siddon: Mr. Chairman, I should like to close off this intervention by stating that I will be most pleased to table with the minister copies of the newspaper article. It refers to previous articles or advertisements placed during the election campaign. Apparently certain Liberal politicians made certain undertakings. I would recommend that the minister examine those undertakings to see if they are in accord with the policy of the Liberal party.

It is my understanding from the commitment he has given us today that, as a matter of policy, the Liberal party and this government will not be contemplating any sort of amnesty, general or otherwise, within the tenure of its office. I think there are a lot of people within the country who will appreciate having that assurance, as much as we want to find ways to modify our current immigration policies along the lines suggested by several hon. members this afternoon. I thank the minister very much for that confirmation. I will see that he gets a copy of as much of the transcript as I have, as well as the original article which is in a language that I cannot read.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Chairman, it was my hope that the minister would have wound up the debate on second reading and provided some sort of answers to questions which were not actually in question form. There were a number of comments made to which I think replies were at least suggested. Particularly I am thinking of the medical examination situation which I brought to his attention during the debate, whether he has had this brought to his attention by his officials and what assurances he can give us. I do not know whether he is able to do that at this particular time. I would be prepared to leave it to another occasion so that we could receive those assurances. Perhaps the minister could get them overnight from his officials and we could continue Committee of the Whole stage tomorrow.

Mr. Axworthy: Mr. Chairman, I do not think it is necessary to extend the discussion much further because I can give every assurance to the hon. member that I took notice of his comments.

On the question of medical examination, anyone who applies to come into the country, whether through the normal route of immigration or by the special refugee program, is required to have medical examinations while outside the country. Usually they are given by Canadian doctors or people from the health services. Those are most rigorous and are applied to most tests. I am not sure that medical science is at a stage where it can detect all the exotic strains of viruses to which he referred, but I know that the kinds of medical examinations which are required are very, very rigorous. Also I can tell him that once refugees are landed in the staging areas in Canada, they are further subjected to additional medical examinations. In fact, when I visited the staging area at the Greaseback medical base outside of Edmonton, I witnessed the kind of medical review which is required of refugee families coming in there.

Also I should indicate to the hon. member that there is a high degree of consultation with the provincial health services because they have expressed these kinds of concerns. We have had several discussions with them, and they are prepared to provide special facilities or treatments when they are required. I would say to the hon. member it is not always the case that every refugee family or individual that we take is going to be totally able-bodied and totally well in all life and limb. Some of them suffer certain kinds of handicaps. As part of our refugee program, we think that we should have our fair share of those refugees who have those kinds of problems. Provincial health authorities have been most co-operative in ensuring that those kinds of facilities will be available. In fact in discussion with both the health minister in Ontario and the health minister in Alberta, it was indicated that they were prepared to take additional measures above and beyond the normal ones to ensure that there would be proper care facilities available for refugees who have special problems.

I would want to give the member every assurance that to the extent medical science offers us proper detection, we are applying it. If there are further problems which he wants monitored, I will take it up with the department to see if there has been any evidence of anything special occurring. I would be quite glad to communicate that at a later date.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): I did not want the minister to leave the impression that it was handicaps or disabilities which were causing the concern. There are actual exotic diseases which are being brought into the country. This could reach proportions which could be rather frightening. For example, internal parasites are something which I would like to think we have been free of in this country, but they could very easily spread with the type of work in which some of these people have been engaged.

I am glad of the assurances. I hope he will go on monitoring and making sure that there is this particular care in the medical health field for these people before they are admissible, and as they come in, to find if there are other diseases that were not detected during the initial investigation. I hope that the co-operation with the provinces will continue as he mentioned.

Mr. Axworthy: The hon. member raised the issue of whether there would be a full response to a variety of comments, questions and suggestions that have been made. For the sake of time and the need to get the bill through, I do not intend to provide a response to every individual, although I would say that as the new minister I certainly welcome their contributions. It was a learning experience for me and it will help me in my own duties. I should like to say to members of the House generally that I am glad this bill provided us with an opportunity to air this. What is quite clear is that there are a number of people in this House who not only have an interest but have a great deal of knowledge.

I hope we will be able to have the opportunity at a later stage in the life of this Parliament to have a full discussion on immigration and refugee policies. I remind hon. members that under the new Immigration Act one of the requirements is for this government to consult with the provincial governments in establishing new quotas. Also I indicated publicly that I intend to initiate a variety of consultations with the volunteer sector and other interested parties throughout Canada in order to discuss the general question of the new refugee program or policy and what we should do about immigration. I am pleased to note today with the good will that has been expressed by members that members of the House of Commons will be able to provide the kind of change of attitude and outlook which will provide us with a base to establish a longer-term immigration and refugee policy. I would say to the member that I hope we will have future opportunities after those consultations are finished.

Clause 1 agreed to.

Title agreed to.

Bill reported.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): When shall the bill be read the third time?

Mr. Knowles: By leave, now.

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Employment and Immigration) moved that the bill be read the third time and do pass.

Motion agreed to, bill read the third time and passed.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, may I ask the government House leader if he will tell everyone what he has told some of us, that we will be on the employment tax credit bill tomorrow?

Mr. Pinard: Yes, Mr. Speaker. First of all I should like to thank hon. members for letting this bill go through all stages today. Tomorrow we will proceed, as I stated yesterday, with the employment tax credit bill.

Mr. Knowles: As you said the day before yesterday.

Mr. Pinard: And the day before, also.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): I understand there are no further discussions in the House. It being after six o'clock p.m., this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at two o'clock, pursuant to Standing Order 22(1).

At 6.20 p.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

PROPOSED GRANT TO MICHELIN TIRE IN NOVA SCOTIA—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Ron Stewart (Simcoe South): Madam Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

In view of the fact that the General Rubber and Tire Company of Barrie, Ontario, has already laid off 50 workers and that a great many of the remaining 850 workers face a similar fate, even though the company is in the middle of a $16 million, privately-funded expansion program involving new equipment for the manufacture of radial tires, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Mississauga South (Mr. Blenkarn):

That the government not allow the proposed $55 million regional economic expansion grant to Michelin Tire in Nova Scotia which will do nothing to create new employment but will, at the expense of the Ontario taxpayer, transfer jobs from Ontario at a time when the tire industry is operating below capacity.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

NATIONAL UNITY

REQUEST THAT FIRST MINISTERS' CONFERENCE BE HELD AFTER QUEBEC REFERENDUM VOTE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bill J. Yurko (Edmonton East): Madam Speaker, I rise, under the terms of Standing Order 43, on a matter of increasing urgency and pressing necessity.

In view of the mounting anxiety of many Canadians with regard to the possible adverse implications of the Quebec referendum vote on May 20, and the increasing need to provide the nation with assurance of economic, social and political stability and continuity following the referendum, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Epp):

That this House instruct the government to take immediate action to schedule a first ministers' conference at the earliest opportunity after the Quebec referendum vote on May 20 to discuss fully and evolve an economic, social and political strategy to deal with the consequences of the referendum vote on the nation and its international relations. Furthermore, that all official leaders of the oppositions in the ten provinces and the federal House of Commons be invited to fully participate as members of the conference.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

INDUSTRY

MEASURES TO SAFEGUARD AUTO INDUSTRY—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Ian Deans (Hamilton Mountain): Madam Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

In view of reports that United States trade representative Reuben Askew has indicated that no major overhaul of the Canada-U.S. auto pact is likely, and in view of Mr. Askew's statement that the pact is not perceived to be fair and helpful in spite of the $3 billion deficit which Canada now endures, all of which reflects an attitude toward the concerns of Canadian auto workers which could at best be described as unacceptable, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg-Birds Hill (Mr. Blaikie):

That this government place before Parliament immediately the measures it intends to take to safeguard the Canadian auto industry and its workers from the continued losses which are occurring.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

CALL FOR REMOVAL OF EXCISE TAX ON NORTH AMERICAN-BUILT AUTOMOBILES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Otto Jelinek (Halton): Madam Speaker, I, too, rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity under the terms of Standing Order 43.

In view of the continuing deterioration of the automotive industry in Canada, and in view of the reluctance of the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce to bring this whole matter before the appropriate standing committee—indeed, the reluctance of the government to do so, as witnessed by the previous motion proposed on the subject under Standing Order 43—and since this government has failed in every way to ease the uncertainty within this vital industrial sector, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Brampton-Georgetown (Mr. McDermid):

That this House direct the Government of Canada to immediately consider the removal of the 9 per cent federal excise tax on North American-built automobiles in order to stimulate the industry and at the same time assure continued employment for the thousands of Canadians who are threatened with massive lay-offs.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there such consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

GRAIN

PROVISION OF ADDITIONAL HOPPER CARS—GOVERNMENT POLICY—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Gordon Towers (Red Deer): Madam Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, on a matter of urgent and pressing concern to western Canadian grain producers.

It was the declared policy of the previous government to expedite the delivery of western grain by the acquisition of 2,000 additional hopper cars. Reliable reports from grain handlers in western Canada indicate that this figure will be reduced to 1,250 hopper cars by this present government. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Wetaskiwin (Mr. Schellenberger):

That this House requests the Minister of Transport to clarify the government's hopper car policy either by appearing as a witness before the Standing Committee on Agriculture or by making a definitive statement to this House.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

NATIONAL REVENUE

TAX BENEFITS FOR REMOTE AREAS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Doug Neil (Moose Jaw): Madam Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

In view of the uncertainty that exists in the remote regions of Canada regarding the stand of Revenue Canada to tax certain benefits which traditionally were tax exempt, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Western Arctic (Mr. Nickerson):

That the Minister of National Revenue take immediate steps either to bring in amendments to the Income Tax Act or a ways and means motion to ensure the exemption from taxation of the benefits as promised by government spokesmen during the campaign.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

TRANSPORT

ALLOCATION OF FUNDS FOR RAPID TRANSIT SYSTEMS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Ian Waddell (Vancouver-Kingsway): Madam Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

In view of the plans of the British Columbia government to build a new bridge at Annacis Island over the Fraser River to allow more automobile and other traffic to flow into already congested neighbourhoods in Greater Vancouver, including the Boundary Road area, and in view of the fact that in this energy-conscious age it does not make any sense to build commuter bridges and ignore rapid transit, I move, seconded by the hon. member for New Westminster-Coquitlam (Miss Jewett):

That this House notes that there was no mention of rapid transit in the Speech from the Throne, remembers previous government promises in this area and directs the government to allocate $300 million immediately to Vancouver and other cities for rapid transit, and not one penny at all to projects like the Annacis Island crossing.

I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for St. Catharines (Mr. Reid):

HUMAN RIGHTS

CONDEMNATION OF CONDITIONS IN GUATEMALA—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Benno Friesen (Surrey-White Rock-North Delta): Madam Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, on a matter that follows the spirit of the previous resolution.

Whereas there is a pattern of violence, repression, kidnapping, torture, murder and assassination in the Republic of Guatemala; and whereas in the first three months of this year alone it has been estimated that 1,000 individuals have been found murdered, many of whom had been tortured; and whereas the rule of law is not generally upheld, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Manicouagan (Mr. Maltais):

That this government formally express to President Romeo Lucas Garcia its profound concern and disapproval of such conditions in the Republic of Guatemala and urge him to do all in his authority to reinstate to the people of that country the human rights and fundamental freedoms to which they are entitled.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

ENERGY

FORMULA FOR BLENDED OIL PRICING

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. The government has spoken about a $1 billion saving as a result of blended oil pricing. If the government can calculate the anticipated saving, it must have a formula. I wonder if the minister will tell the House whether the government now has a firm formula for blended pricing.

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Yes, Madam Speaker, the formula is indeed the blended price formula, including the price for old oil, or traditional oil, another price for non-conventional oil, and the progressive blending into those prices of imported oil.

Mr. Clark: Madam Speaker, I wonder if I might ask the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources if that firm formula has been communicated to any or all of the provinces.

Mr. Lalonde: Yes, I had discussions with the producing provinces when I visited them shortly after my appointment. Obviously, they were all aware of this formula since it was a formula on which this party campaigned and was elected.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Clark: The Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources must have been answering a question I did not put. My interest is in knowing whether there is a detailed formula—not simply a general formula involving algebra and involving the main components—on which the Government of Canada has now calculated it will realize savings of $1 billion, and whether their detailed formula has been communicated to the provinces. The first question is: is there a detailed, specific formula? The second question is: Has that detailed specific formula been communicated to the provinces?

Mr. Lalonde: Madam Speaker, the formula is as detailed as I have just stated it to the Leader of the Opposition.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: "X" plus "Y" equals zero.

FUTURE PRICES OF OIL

Mr. Harvie Andre (Calgary Centre): If the minister will not inform us, or does not know the formula, will he at least admit that, given the statement by the Minister of Finance that he will save $1 billion on this formula, given the statement by the province of Alberta that they expect net benefits from this new agreement equivalent to last December's budget, and given the statement by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources on April 16 that the federal government expects to receive the same benefit as it would have had from the December budget, these three conditions can only be met with price increases this year, and each of the next three years, in excess of the $4 and $4.50 that was promised by him and his leader during the election?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): No, Madam Speaker.

Mr. Andre: The reality is that in fact his statement is impossible. His formula, plus these conditions, means a price increase of $6. Will the minister at least have the honesty to admit that this blended formula to which he referred will mean that consumers in Canada will immediately feel the effects of any future increases in OPEC or Mexican oil prices?

Mr. Lalonde: Would the hon. member repeat the last part of the question?

Mr. Andre: My question is: will the minister at least admit that this blended formula will result in Canadian consumers of heating oil, as well as transportation fuels, immediately feeling the effects of any future increases in world prices, OPEC or Mexican; in other words, they will no longer be sheltered from that, in fact, and they will feel the effect immediately on their monthly heating bill?

Mr. Lalonde: No, Madam Speaker.

THE CONSTITUTION

QUEBEC REFERENDUM—CONVENING OF FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL CONFERENCE

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Madam Speaker, my question is to the right hon. Prime Minister. It comes from a statement made in Alberta by the western premier a day or two ago where they called upon the Prime Minister to convene a conference of the continuing committee of ministers on the constitution, regardless of whether the referendum comes out Yes or No.

I say to the Prime Minister that I agree with the western premiers that we cannot accept sovereignty-association nor the status quo. But in light of the request, will he accede to it? Will he accept the request of the western premiers and convene a conference after the referendum, regardless of the results of that referendum?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, if the hon. member agrees with the position taken by this party for at least 12 or 15 years, that sovereignty-association is not acceptable nor is the status quo, that is why since 1968, when Mr. Pearson was prime minister, we began a series of proposals for amending the constitution in many ways. Most of those proposals are still on the table.

I believe the other part of the question was commented upon by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, on my behalf, yesterday and I support him in his answer. If the answer is No, as we hope and expect, then it will be important to convene a meeting of all the premiers and discuss the various proposals for renewed federalism, those that we have made as a government in the white paper entitled "The Way Ahead", the Pepin-Robarts—

An hon. Member: "A Time for Action".

Mr. Trudeau: I am sorry, the white paper entitled "A Time For Action".

Mr. Clark: "The Way Ahead" is better forgotten.

Mr. Trudeau: Also, there are other proposals made by some of the premiers, and they will all be up for examination. But if the answer to the referendum is No, as we do not expect—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: —is Yes, as we do not expect, and would regret, then of course the question would arise whether the premiers would want to meet in the absence of Mr. Lévesque. I think that had better be left for discussion.

Mr. Nystrom: Madam Speaker, the western premiers have made it very clear that they want a conference, whether the answer is Yes or No in Quebec. Allan Blakeney, speaking on behalf of the premiers, when talking about Quebeckers said the following:

> We are prepared to attend any conference. Bring along your ideas on sovereignty-association, and we'll bring along our ideas.
> We will not accept your idea, but, nonetheless, that is the nature of discussion. We clearly agree to have a conference to negotiate a new confederation.

My question to the Prime Minister is, why is he being so intransigent? Why is he hiding behind the referendum? Why is he letting Lévesque set the timetable? Is he going to use the same excuse and hide behind the next Quebec election as well? Why is he letting Lévesque determine the pace of change in this country?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, I do not understand why the hon. member is asking his question in such a hard tone. Perhaps it is because some of his NDP supporters in the province of Quebec are PQ sympathizers who say they will vote Yes. I would urge the hon. member not to ascribe to our party the confusion of his own party.

What I said in reply to the first question, Madam Speaker, is that the western premiers cannot force Mr. Lévesque to come to discuss with them and us, the federal government, the issue of renewed federalism, if his mandate is to discuss sovereignty-association. I cannot speak on his behalf, but I should be quite surprised that with the authority of a mandate secured under a hypothetical Yes he would agree to discuss anything but sovereignty-association. Under these circumstances, it would serve no purpose to call a conference of the other first ministers who would want to deal with other things, for Premier Lévesque could say: "Sorry, I am not interested. You may discuss these issues among yourselves, but I will come when you are ready to talk about sovereignty-association".

But this is only a hypothetical situation, Madam Speaker, and I do not see what interest there is for the hon. member to try to force us to make a commitment based not only on the hypothetical results of the referendum vote, but also on the attitude Premier Lévesque might adopt following these results.

Mr. Nystrom: Madam Speaker, the Prime Minister seems to be more concerned about whether or not Mr. Lévesque will come, and that is my concern. Why is he letting Mr. Lévesque determine the pace of the future of this country?

In Hansard, yesterday, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources is reported as having said that we will have to see what happens in the referendum campaign and see what the result is. My question to the Prime Minister is the following: Why does he not agree now to the calling of a conference of first ministers, or the calling of a conference of ministers talking about the constitution after the Quebec referendum, regardless of whether the Oui or the Non wins? That is the position of the western premiers, taken unanimously at their conference in Alberta, and I maintain it is also the position of a majority of the people in this country.

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, I can understand that the western provincial premiers say what they would like to do, and that the hon. member would say what he would like to do. What I am saying is that neither he nor they know what Premier Lévesque would like to do. If he should decide not to come to such a federal-provincial conference, I would ask the hon. member, is it the proper thing to do to convene a conference at that point?

Some hon. Members: Sure.

Mr. Trudeau: Well, the parties opposite say "yes". That is not my view, Madam Speaker. I will wait and see.

NORTHERN PIPELINES

OIL—STEPS TO PREVENT CONSTRUCTION OF NORTHERN TIER TRANSMISSION LINE

Mr. Thomas Siddon (Richmond-South Delta): Madam Speaker, my question, also, is for the right hon. Prime Minister. Perhaps he will have less difficulty with this question.

During the recent federal election campaign, the Prime Minister and several Liberal candidates promised the people of British Columbia that under their government there would be no increase in oil tanker traffic along the B.C. coast. Would the Prime Minister inform this House, today, what initiatives he has taken to prevent construction of the U.S. Northern Tier pipeline, a pipeline which would bring super-tanker traffic into the Juan de Fuca Strait, and what initiatives has he taken to ensure that B.C. waters will be spared the disastrous consequences of a major oil spill?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, the hon. member will recall that the government of which he was a member, the last government, flummoxed the negotiations which we had begun.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: We stated during the election campaign that if we formed the next government, we would do our best to undo the mess that had been perpetrated by his government. The Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources has begun discussion of this with his opposite number in the United States. We have reopened the question, and I hope we will be more successful than was the hon. member's party.

Mr. Siddon: Madam Speaker, the Prime Minister knows full well that the former Conservative government expressed its clear opposition to the Northern Tier pipeline and urged President Carter to opt for an all-Canadian overland route.
